conclusion that the contribution of GCHQ within the UKUSA alliance needed to be sufficient ‘and of the right kind to make a continuation of the Signals Intelligence-alliance worthwhile to our partners’.¹⁰⁹⁹ Direct and hidden subsidies for the British Sigint efforts have certainly contributed to this. To give one example, British interception equipment was bought that was more expensive than comparable American equipment.

In 1992 MI6 and the GCHQ encountered problems as a result of the open British support for George Bush’s presidential campaign. Clinton took exception to London’s behaviour and this was initially felt in the field of intelligence too, when the British services were to some extent ‘starved’ by Washington. Anglo-American intelligence relations improved after Prime Minister Tony Blair took office in 1997, but nonetheless GCHQ became increasingly dependent on the NSA. As early as 1993, much of the Sigint processed by GCHQ was of US origin. In terms of finance, monitoring stations and secure transatlantic communications links as well, the British were more or less dependent on the NSA. The British could for instance make partial use of an US Sigint satellite and GCHQ staff were seconded to the NSA facility at Menwith Hill to share in tasking and operating the satellites. Early in 1995, during the war in the former Yugoslavia, GCHQ exercised its capability to change the orbit of one of the US satellite constellations to obtain better coverage of Bosnia, but ‘the NSA could override GCHQ, even in tasking the craft’.¹¹⁰⁰

According to a senior US intelligence official this National Command override authority was never used, so far as he knew. According to this official it was a topic of a lot of policy discussion, and played far bigger than it ever really was. In this respect he remarked the following. ‘Why would the US relinquish command authority over their own satellite when US vital National interests were at stake and under what circumstances would a vital US National interest not also be of crucial concern to the UK?’ He knew of no circumstance when such an unusual conflict arose, much less require the implementation of the National Command override authority.¹¹⁰¹

It was in this relationship of dependency for the GCHQ that the war in Bosnia started. GCHQ had traditionally been interested in Yugoslavia, and this did not change when that country fell apart. The British services soon realized that when it came to intelligence in the former Yugoslavia they could place no reliance at all on the UN or UNPROFOR. The Head of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff, Air Marshal John Walker, put it as follows:

‘Intelligence is a dirty word in the United Nations. The UN is not a thing in itself; it’s an amalgam of 183 sovereign nations. If it does intelligence, it will be doing it against a sovereign UN member, so it’s incompatible. But you need a military intelligence job to protect your troops. If you don’t, you pay for it in body bags’.¹¹⁰²

As the United Kingdom’s political, military and humanitarian involvement in the events in Bosnia increased, the British services soon started to set up a wide range of intelligence units in the region. The most important task of these units remained the gathering of this intelligence for the British government, not for UNPROFOR.

The British resources

One British intelligence unit was stationed in Split, one at Bosnia Hercegovina Command (BHC) in Kiseljak in central Bosnia, and later one in Sarajevo itself. This growing involvement in the war also led ¹⁰⁹⁹ Richard Norton Taylor, ‘GCHQ’s Service to US ‘Crucial’, The Guardian, 17/05/94.

¹¹⁰⁰ Urban, UK Eyes Alpha, p. 300. The results were reportedly disappointing given the types of communications systems used by the Serbs, Croats and Bosnian Muslims. Also: Mark Urban, ‘The Magnum Force’, The Sunday Telegraph, 01/09/96.

¹¹⁰¹ Confidential information (80).

¹¹⁰² Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 238-241.

to a greater use of intelligence resources. British warships in the Adriatic started gathering Sigint more actively and E-3 AWACS (Airborne Warning and Control System) aircraft of the Royal Air Force were increasingly deployed for Elint and Comint missions. Comint monitoring personnel of the 9th Signals Regiment of the British Army operated from Akrotiri Air Base on Cyprus.¹¹⁰³ Britain's two sovereign bases areas (SBA's) in Cyprus cover 98 square miles (250 square kilometres), which is an area a quarter the size of Hong Kong, and are considered to have vital strategic interests as listening and military posts. The centres include the Episkopi garrison and RAF (Royal Air Force) Akrotiri, as well as a listening station at Ayios Nikolaos. Akrotiri is the largest RAF base outside Britain and an important staging post for military aircraft. It is also an essential element to Britain's global communications and surveillance network. The bases enable Britain to maintain a permanent military presence at a strategic point in the eastern Mediterranean and provide a training ground for its forces. About 3,000 UK-based military personnel train annually in Cyprus.¹¹⁰⁴

Probably the most important activity on the bases is the work of the electronic eavesdroppers listening to radio traffic in the Balkans and the Middle East. They are linked to Britain's GCHQ.¹¹⁰⁵ The 399th Signals Unit of RAF Digby in the UK was also active in Bosnia, as were elements of the British army's only electronic warfare unit, the 14th Signals Regiment (EW) from RAF Brawdy in Wales. This section was active in Bosnia with a Sigint unit of fifty soldiers in Banja Luka in the British zone, and passed on Comint and Elint to the British army commanders in Bosnia. Nimrod aircraft of the RAF flew missions over the Adriatic from Goai delle Colle Air Base in Italy, while the frigates of the Royal Navy in the Adriatic were equipped with a Classic Outboard Sigint system to monitor VRS and VJ radio traffic.¹¹⁰⁶

In addition, GCHQ also received information from the Combined Group in Pullach, where it closely cooperated with the Bundesnachrichtendienst. While in Bosnia from April 1995 onwards members of the British Intelligence Corps worked together with other NATO member states in the Military Information Office in Zagreb (see Chapter 1). This body monitored the military situation but also gathered political, economic and humanitarian intelligence, although in the UN context reference could only be made to military information and not to intelligence. One British military officer within the MIS had the sole task of liaising with the commander of the British troops and with London. In addition some of the information gathered by the Joint Commission Observers (JCOs), who were also present in Srebrenica, was shared with the MIO.¹¹⁰⁷

The British working methods in Bosnia

The British author Mark Urban makes an interesting remark concerning the gathering of Sigint which probably also illuminates the way that other countries deal with their intelligence:

‘Any channelling of Sigint or agent reports from the Government Communications Headquarters and MI6 to troops in Bosnia Hercegovina was constrained by the intelligence community's strict rules about dissemination’.

As already demonstrated in Section 2, this is a major disadvantage of Sigint. Due to this limitation much important and extremely interesting information fails to reach the troops on the ground, as even ¹¹⁰³ Udo Ulfkotte, ‘Die Nato ist im Bilde, doch gibt sie nur wenig preis’ (NATO is informed, but it is not letting on), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 10/04/99.

¹¹⁰⁴ ‘British bases in Cyprus vital military staging point’, AFP Report, 27/12/01.

¹¹⁰⁵ Colin Smith, ‘Cypriot rebel to continue fight on ‘satan masts’’, The Sunday Times, 08/07/01.

¹¹⁰⁶ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 216; The Rose and the Laurel: Journal of the Intelligence Corps, 1996, p. 43; The Rose and the Laurel: Journal of the Intelligence Corps, pp. 83-85; Major Robert L. McPeck, ‘Electronic Warfare British Style’, Military Intelligence, January - March 1996, p. 23 and Graig Covault, ‘Joint Stars Patrols Bosnia’, in: Aviation Week and Space Technology, 19/02/96, p. 45.

¹¹⁰⁷ Confidential information (39). Smith, New Cloaks, p. 210 talks about a Forces Military Information Unit in Zagreb but he probably confused this with MIO.

happened during the Gulf War, where the command structure was almost ideal. In Bosnia, Russian and Ukrainian troops also formed part of UNPROFOR and thus the chance was very small that London would pass on valuable intelligence. If intelligence was passed on, then this was ‘sanitized to the point of near-uselessness’.¹¹⁰⁸

The officer on the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) chiefly responsible for Bosnia was Captain Jonathan Cooke. He had an excellent perspective on the results of the Sigint. According to him MI6, the GCHQ and also the DIS had various teething troubles, and intelligence gathering only slowly got off the ground. GCHQ ‘had to start from scratch in Bosnia’ regarding the frequencies that needed to be monitored. At the outbreak of the war in the Balkans, the service apparently had only a few specialists in the field of Serbo-Croat who really spoke the language fluently. In fact everything had to be built up; Bosnia was actually terra incognita for the GCHQ.¹¹⁰⁹

It is remarkable, and actually hard to understand, that an area in which the United Kingdom had shown such interest in the past, especially during the Second World War and the Cold War, should suddenly be totally unknown territory for a service such as the GCHQ or SIS. The website of the GCHQ, for instance, did not actively advertise for Serbo-Croat linguists. On the other hand the NSA had initial problems with the availability of sufficient Serbo-Croat translators as well. According to Cooke another problem was that the flow of Comint and Humint to the Balkan Current Intelligence Group in Whitehall was often sufficient to give ministers good general briefings, but ‘the usual rules on the dissemination of sensitive reports further limited what was given to troops serving in-theatre’. British commanders in UNPROFOR noted this lack of intelligence and often had to fall back on Osint to get a better picture.¹¹¹⁰

The German Signals intelligence service

In Germany the Bundesnachrichtendienst (Federal Intelligence Service, BND) is responsible for gathering Sigint. This service, which reports to the Federal Chancellor, was set up on 1 April 1956. The forerunner to the BND, the Organisation Gehlen (Gehlen Organization) was based in Pullach near Munich and the BND was established there too.¹¹¹¹ The main responsibility for all Sigint was given to the BND. The German Military Intelligence Service, the Amt für Nachrichtenwesen der Bundeswehr (Intelligence Office of the Federal Armed Forces) in Bad Neuenahr-Ahrweiler, did have its own Sigint capabilities through its three Armed Forces, but intercepted messages were supplied directly to the BND for processing. It was not until 1978 that the Amt für Nachrichtenwesen der Bundeswehr, following considerable resistance from the Bundesnachrichtendienst, was given its own military Sigint analysis and processing centre.¹¹¹²

The Amt für Nachrichtenwesen der Bundeswehr remained however fully dependent on the material supplied for analysis, because the ultimate responsibility for selecting targets and for the analysis remained with the BND. The Amt für Nachrichtenwesen der Bundeswehr, with its 620 employees, was in this respect more a consumer of intelligence than a producer. Over all these years there was a continual struggle between the BND and the Ministry of Defence with regard to the authority over Sigint, and nowadays this struggle seems to have turned to the disadvantage of the BND. During the war in Yugoslavia the Bundeswehr (German Army) started its own Sigint operations (independently of the BND) by making use of its own tracking and monitoring stations in Germany.¹¹¹³

¹¹⁰⁸ Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 213-215.

¹¹⁰⁹ Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 215-216. A senior British intelligence official confirmed this to the author: Confidential interview (79).

¹¹¹⁰ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 217.

¹¹¹¹ For the creation of the BND: Zolling & Höhne, Pullach intern, pp. 95-247. For the relationship between Gehlen and the CIA: Reese, General Reinhard Gehlen, passim.

¹¹¹² Schmidt-Eenboom, Schnüffler, p. 236.

¹¹¹³ Erich Schmidt-Eenboom, ‘The Bundesnachrichtendienst, the Bundeswehr and Sigint in the Cold War’, in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, pp. 129-176.

According to press reports the BND operated from a monitoring station in the Austrian Alps. This station was originally manned by the Austrian Army, which used it to monitor signals in the former Yugoslavia. The Bundesnachrichtendienst is said to have been involved in setting up a joint intelligence centre of the BND, the CIA and the NSA in Augsburg (Germany). At this centre Sigint data from the NSA and BND was combined with Humint information gathered by both services in the former Yugoslavia. When the Bosnian crisis reached its climax in the summer of 1995, the BND flew daily Sigint missions with a Breguet Atlantique aircraft over the Adriatic. This aircraft had been active since 1992 and was chiefly directed at Serb military activities in Bosnia.¹¹¹⁴ Interviews by the author established that the BND was initially quite successful from 1993 onwards as regards Sigint operations against the VRS and VJ. However, the Bosnian Serbs soon found out and began to use different crypto and better equipment. The BND could no longer eavesdrop on the Bosnian Serb traffic. For this reason there was no Sigint available regarding the VRS attack on Srebrenica.¹¹¹⁵

The war in Bosnia also brought the German Sigint services an alliance. In 1995 the NSA concluded the first tripartite airborne tactical Sigint exchange programme between the American, German and French Air Forces. As part of this agreement, the German Luftwaffe flew Sigint missions over the Adriatic in support of ground operations in Bosnia, while the French Air Force flew Sigint missions with the same goal over the Mediterranean. In addition, the American, German and French Air Forces agreed to share all the intelligence they gathered and to distribute it via the headquarters of the NSA/CSS Europe in Stuttgart.¹¹¹⁶ Another source of information for the Germans was the close cooperation with the French in Austria, where a joint French-German unit was active on the border to the former Yugoslavia. The German contribution was drawn from the 320th Fernmelde Regiment (Signals Regiment) and a joint monitoring station was maintained in the Austrian Alps to the North of Slovenia. This station was formally under the command of the Austrian Military Intelligence Service, but the Sigint was shared with the Bundesnachrichtendienst and probably with French services too.¹¹¹⁷

The French Signals intelligence service

In recent years more has become known about the activities of the French services responsible for intercepting diplomatic and military traffic.¹¹¹⁸ The French foreign intelligence service, the Service de documentation extérieure et de contre-espionnage, was set up on 28 December 1945. This contained two units responsible for Sigint: the Service des matériels techniques, better known as the Service 26, and the Service 28, responsible for intercepting and decoding foreign diplomatic coded cables sent by the foreign embassies in Paris. On 4 April 1982 this service was given a new name: the Direction générale de la sécurité extérieure (DGSE). Following the arrival of a new director for this service, in January 1988, its budget for Sigint was increased considerably. In the period 1970-1980 Sigint was mostly handled by this service. The French Military Intelligence Service was much less involved in this area.

The Foreign Intelligence Service and the Military Intelligence Service operated jointly in the Mediterranean with a spy ship, the Berry. The Sigint infrastructure of the intelligence service abroad was further expanded in the 1990s. In 1996 the number of employees totalled more than 2500, while new monitoring stations were built on the Plateau d'Albion in the Haute-Provence and in Saint-Laurent-de-la-Salanque on the border with Spain. To begin with the main task of these stations was to intercept communications traffic from African countries, but they were later directed towards Bosnia as well.

¹¹¹⁴ Bruce, 'Allies Hamper Inquiry', The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95; Ian Bruce, 'Why These Men Remain Free', The Glasgow Herald, 09/05/97; Dierhart Goos, 'Marine-Offizier soll Kfor-Abteilung im Kosovo führen' (Navy officer to lead KFOR section in Kosovo), Die Welt, 13/05/00 and 'Report Details Luftwaffe Support for NATO', in: FBIS-WEU-95-171, 03/09/95.

¹¹¹⁵ Confidential interviews (98) and (99).

¹¹¹⁶ Biography, Lt. Col. Garry E. Sitze, USAF, undated. See: http://jitic-emh.army.mil/iop_conf/bios/sitze.htm.

¹¹¹⁷ Confidential Interviews (21) and (45).

¹¹¹⁸ For the following brief history of French Sigint operations, see: Roger Faligot, 'France, Sigint and the Cold War', in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, pp. 177-208 as well as information from the Intelligence Resource Program of the FAS. See: www.fas.org.

The Gulf War showed that there were ‘major gaps’ in the French monitoring network. This led to the dissolution of the Military Intelligence Service, which was replaced in 1992 by a larger service, the Direction du Renseignement Militaire (DRM). This service was to receive considerable Sigint capabilities, later strongly increased by the launch of the Helios spy satellite. The Sigint production was also increased by a new organization, the Brigade de Renseignement et de Guerre Electronique, which was set up on 1 September 1993. This latter service reported directly to the French Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces and was chiefly active in Sarajevo and Bihac. The former Director of Operations of this service, General Jean Heinrich, became the Head of the Direction du Renseignement Militaire. He immediately started the recruitment of some 300 new intelligence specialists. In 1995 the DRM had some 1600 employees. The accumulated expertise and its extensive network were also directed at Bosnia.

French resources

The service had excellent Sigint resources at its disposal, such as DC-8 Sigint aircraft and ‘sarigue’ (Système aéroporté de recueil d’informations de guerre électronique), belonging to the 51st Electronique ‘Aubrac’ (EE.51) Squadron, normally stationed at Evreux Air Base. This DC-8 flew countless Sigint missions over the Adriatic in support of French ground operations in Bosnia. In addition two Transall C-160 ‘Gabriel’ reconnaissance aircraft were in the air over Bosnia, originating from the 54th Electronics Squadron stationed at Metz-Frescaty Air Base in eastern France. The C-160 Gabriel can intercept communications traffic and radar emissions at a distance of 800 km. This aircraft and the DC-8s were used over Yugoslavia. Paris also had four AWACS aircraft at its disposal, as well as the Helios satellite which includes Sigint monitoring equipment and was built in great secrecy by the French company Matra.¹¹¹⁹ The Direction du Renseignement Militaire had kept this secret from its European partners and, by the same token, did not share this Sigint with them although they had made major financial contributions to Helios. Finally, French Mirage F1-CR reconnaissance aircraft also flew Elint missions over Bosnia.¹¹²⁰

Other European countries

Besides the United Kingdom, Germany and France, other European countries also conducted Sigint operations in the former Yugoslavia. To date almost nothing has been known about this. One known fact is that Italian monitoring stations were active during the war in Bosnia. To give one example, some time before the attack on the enclave the Italian monitoring service, via a monitoring station in Italy, intercepted a telephone conversation between the mayor of Srebrenica and President Izetbegovic. In this call the mayor requested permission to evacuate the population, but this was refused by Izetbegovic.¹¹²¹ In 1995 the Italian Military Intelligence Service, the Servizio per le Informazioni e la Sicurezza Militare (SISMI) operated a major satellite communications (Satcom) monitoring station in Cerveteri outside Rome. Ten parabolic antennas listened in to communications traffic in the Balkans, the Middle East and North Africa.¹¹²² It also seems that elements of the 8th Battaglione Ricerca Elettronica ‘Tonale’ of the Italian Army were active in Bosnia.¹¹²³ Furthermore, the Italian Navy probably had special trawlers for Sigint operations.

¹¹¹⁹ Guisnel, Pires, p. 156 and Lt. Col. R.L. Sargent, ‘Deliberate Force’, in: Owen, Deliberate Force, pp. 8-15 - 8-16.

¹¹²⁰ ‘Les Avions-Espions Français Gabriel et Sarigue’ (The French spy planes Gabriel and Sarigue), Air & Cosmos/Aviation International, no. 1460, 21-27/02/94; ‘French Support Bosnian Elint Ops’, Aviation Week & Space Technology, 14/08/95, p. 23 and ‘French and US MillInt’, Intelligence Newsletter, 07/12/95.

¹¹²¹ Confidential information (77).

¹¹²² Alberto Sisto & Francesco Sorti, ‘Echelon: Italia nel mirino’, Il Mondo, 10/04/98. See also:

<http://www.privacy.it/nigro20010619.html> and ‘L’Echelon segreta di casa nostra’, La Repubblica, 19/06/01.

¹¹²³ ‘Abruzzo: Rischio smobilitazione per la stazione radar di Sant’Antonio Abate’, Il Messaggero, 22/06/98.

The military intelligence services of the Scandinavian countries also monitored the communications traffic in Bosnia. The Netherlands military intelligence service discovered, for instance, that a Scandinavian intelligence service monitored the traffic between various military units of the Dutch signals battalion in Bosnia: this service had intercepted a conversation in which two soldiers had made highly derogatory remarks about their commander.¹¹²⁴ The Danish military intelligence service managed to intercept telephone traffic between the Generals Rose and Mladic; these generals spoke to each other very regularly on the telephone.¹¹²⁵ The Austrian military intelligence service was also very active in the field of Sigint; the Balkans had long been one of Austria's major centres of interest. For many years Austria had been a Third Party and had cooperated closely with the NSA. The Austrian monitoring stations on Mount Königswarte close to the Slovenian border, in Salzburg, Sankt Johann (Tyrol) and Mühlenviertel were the main stations aimed at the former Yugoslavia. The NSA is said to have played a major part in funding these stations.¹¹²⁶ This also applied to the Greek, Turkish, Spanish, Swiss and Hungarian Sigint organizations, which were active in monitoring signals traffic in the Balkans. It is still not known what results they achieved.

The Netherlands Signals intelligence service

Hence, the question now to be asked is whether Dutch Sigint operations also targeted the warring factions in the Balkans. This was indeed the case: in 1995 there were three Dutch military units engaged in Sigint activities. These were the Eerste Luchtmacht Verbindingsgroep (First Air Force Signals Group), the Verbindingsbataljon (Signals Battalion) of the Netherlands Army and the Technische Informatieverwerkingscentrum (Technical Information Processing Centre) of the Netherlands Navy. In 1996 these three services were merged to create the Afdeling Verbindingsinlichtingen (Sigint Department) of the Military Intelligence Service. These events were examined in detail in Chapter 4. This account shows that many Western Sigint services were extremely interested in the developments in the military theatre of operations in Bosnia. This is not surprising in view of the involvement of European ground troops in UNPROFOR and the role of the US Air Force within NATO. Much energy was expended, but the key question to be examined in the rest of this chapter is what results were achieved. To this end we will examine whether the intercepted messages were also shared between the allies within UNPROFOR, and if analytic capability was also present; this is a crucial issue due to one of the major disadvantages of Sigint, namely its extreme confidentiality and problems regarding its dissemination.

4. The international exchange of Signals Intelligence

As described above, the dissemination of intercepted signals is always accompanied by great secrecy. The exchange of Comint in particular is very limited; only a small circle of the highest political and military policymakers are given access to this. This secrecy is also important when it comes to sharing intelligence between the United States and its allies. The British Foreign Secretary, Malcolm Rifkind, is reported to have resisted the release of intercepts made by the GCHQ which the NSA wanted to hand over to the Yugoslavia Tribunal in support of the prosecution of Slobodan Milosevic. This related to intercepts from Cyprus, and which supposedly showed the connection between Milosevic and the Serb atrocities in Bosnia. At the end of 1996 too the Clinton administration was prepared to release intercepts for this purpose, but once again the British government blocked the process.¹¹²⁷

¹¹²⁴ Interview with J.M.J. Bosch, 10/10/01.

¹¹²⁵ Interview with H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

¹¹²⁶ 'USA zahlten Horchposten' (USA paid for monitoring stations), Magazin, No. 16, 21/04/99.

¹¹²⁷ D. Leigh & J. Calvert, 'Rifkind put paid to war crimes inquiry', The Observer, 18/05/97.

Despite this reservation there is a long history of Sigint cooperation between the Western intelligence services.¹¹²⁸ The intensive collaboration in this field dates from the Second World War, when the United States and the United Kingdom collaborated closely to break the German and Japanese codes. This endeavour proved highly successful and the cooperation was formalized after the war had finished. On 5 March 1946 the British-United States Comint Agreement was signed, opening the way for cooperation in the field of Comint. In June 1948 this was superseded by the UKUSA Comint Agreement.¹¹²⁹

During the Cold War the relationship between the NSA and the other Sigint partners, such as GCHQ and CSE, gradually developed to the disadvantage of the non-American services. After UKUSA increasingly started to deliver more Sigint, on an almost industrial basis, the Sigint services had to work ever more efficiently to process the avalanche of intercepted signals. This was made possible by a new division of tasks, the use of US technology and better and faster computers. This was noticed in the rest of Europe, and the interest in joining this collaboration thus grew steadily. Various European countries, such as the Scandinavian states, had started giving priority to Sigint from 1950 onwards. Other countries invested chiefly in Humint. The Bundesnachrichtendienst, for instance, spent most of its budget on Humint at the expense of Sigint.

In April 1968 the famous founder and Head of the BND, Richard Gehlen, ended his tenure. This was followed by a shift from Humint to Sigint. The German Military Intelligence Service also drastically increased its investments in Sigint from the start of the 1970s onwards. The French Intelligence Service was another organization that initially showed little interest in Sigint. The Dutch situation was different: from 1945 onwards major investments were made in Sigint although there was constant dispute about the budget and which ministry should 'cough up' for it.¹¹³⁰

Declassified American government documents show that from the mid-1950s onwards the United States and the United Kingdom concluded a series of bilateral agreements with Norway, Austria, West Germany, Italy, Greece and Turkey. These countries are known as the Third Parties, and were ideally located gathering Sigint on the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact. The NSA exchanged not only intercepts with these countries, but also information regarding cryptography and cryptanalysis. Moreover, major investments were made to equip certain countries with the required antennas, monitoring equipment and computers. The Netherlands was not among the Third Parties.

However, according to some publications, there was a 'price tag' attached to this cooperation. The independence of the Third Parties, and also of the non-American UKUSA countries (Canada, Australia and New Zealand) decreased further with regard to Sigint, and their dependence on the NSA became ever greater. The NSA asked for and received practically all intercepts gathered by the UKUSA partners. A former Sigint analyst of the US Air Force expressed the lopsided relationship between the US and Third Party countries as follows: 'they received absolutely no material from us, while we get anything they have, although generally it's of pretty low quality.'¹¹³¹ However, this was an observation from 1972. Has much changed?

According to some authors, around 1985 the GCHQ was nothing more than an extension of the NSA. An internal GCHQ document stated the following, for instance: 'This may entail on occasion the applying of UK [Sigint] resources to the meeting of US requirements'.¹¹³² A senior US intelligence official added that this observation was true, 'as it should be between partners in a global intelligence effort'. In return, he observed that US resources were routinely committed to meet purely UK requirements. Classic example is the routine commitment of British HF intercept capabilities to meet ¹¹²⁸ For this section much use has been made of: Matthew Aid & Cees Wiebes, 'Conclusions', in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, pp. 314-332.

¹¹²⁹ Andrew, President's Eyes, p. 163 and Hager, Secret Power, pp. 61-62.

¹¹³⁰ Cees Wiebes, 'Dutch Sigint during the Cold War, 1945-1994', in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, pp. 243-284.

¹¹³¹ 'US Electronic Espionage: A Memoir', Ramparts, August 1972, p. 45.

¹¹³² Richard Norton-Taylor, 'GCHQ's Service to US 'Crucial'', The Guardian, 17/05/94.

US requirements for open ocean HF intercept, particularly high speed burst data streams. Similarly, US Elint assets were committed to meet UK Elint requirements during conflicts such as the Falklands.¹¹³³

Indeed, the NSA could dictate in general terms which targets the UKUSA and Third Party allies should focus on. In these countries this was at the expense of certain targets that the governments were also interested in: the investment needed to monitor these targets independently was too great for them. Furthermore, most of the allies were dependent on the American computer-assisted analysis capability. Only the NSA was able to break and to translate the greatest number of, and hardest, codes. This relationship of dependence meant that the NSA could ultimately determine which decoded and analysed Sigint it was prepared to share with its allies. Limitations were even placed on the sharing of Comint with London. The reason given for this was that British personnel could be unmasked as KGB spies.

In those cases where this intelligence was shared, technical details such as frequency, date and time were first removed from the intercept. The compartmentalization (the strict separation of the activities of Americans and other personnel) at monitoring stations was taken to extremes. To give one example, British staff working at the US Sigint site at RAF Chicksands were explicitly forbidden to enter the so-called Joint Operations Centre Chicksands. This centre was manned exclusively by US personnel.¹¹³⁴

However, the NSA was not the only party to withhold intelligence: the GCHQ also kept some things to itself, such as decoded communications traffic contained in clandestine Soviet radio traffic between Moscow and the Soviet mission to Mao's Communist forces in Yenan. At a later date the British were prepared to hand over these intercepts.¹¹³⁵ Third Party countries were often treated even worse by the United States. They were expected primarily to simply deliver Sigint, while they seldom got back decoded, translated and analysed intelligence products derived from this raw material: this was not considered desirable by the NSA or the CIA. The reason for this was usually American fears of leaks, or incorrect or uncontrolled use of the information.

This situation was often a cause for complaint, for instance by the West German, Norwegian, Danish and also Dutch governments, but it made little impression on the Americans. Staff of the Bundesnachrichtendienst, for instance, complained that they were treated by the NSA as a second-grade ally. At the joint American-German Sigint station in Augsburg, for example, German requests regarding certain targets were always put at the back of the queue: the American targets always took priority. The BND staff were also not allowed to enter certain parts of the monitoring station. British staff at the Anglo-American Teufelsberg monitoring station in Berlin experienced similar treatment. In September 1999, a tour of the station was conducted during a public, CIA-organized conference; some former British Sigint staff then discovered for the first time that this monitoring station contained rooms that they did not even know existed.¹¹³⁶ However, this must have been fairly junior Brits because senior GCHQ staff helped to plan that station with the Americans and walked all over the place whenever they wanted.¹¹³⁷

The fear of leaks often prompted the NSA to break off contacts with other services. The collaboration with France was broken off in the 1960s, for instance, when it was discovered that the French Foreign Intelligence Service had been infiltrated by the KGB. It was only after ten years that the collaboration was resumed.¹¹³⁸ The forerunner of the Dutch Afdeling Verbindingsinlichtingen, the Technisch Informatie en Verwerkings Centrum (TIIVC) (Technical Information and Processing Centre), also encountered regular rebuffs. It became clear that the love was felt on one side only, that of the Dutch.

¹¹³³ Confidential information (80).

¹¹³⁴ Duncan Campbell, 'Over Here and Under Cover', The Independent, 06/10/93, p. 24.

¹¹³⁵ Matthew Aid & Cees Wiebes, 'Conclusions', in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, p. 322.

¹¹³⁶ Various interviews during the conference on The Intelligence War in Berlin, 1946-1961 at the Teufelsberg, Berlin, 10-12/09/99.

¹¹³⁷ Confidential information (84).

¹¹³⁸ Mangold, Cold Warrior, p. 134.

The NSA and CIA, as well as GCHQ, did not intend to institute extensive intelligence exchange with the Netherlands. In the year 2003 this matter has still not been arranged to the satisfaction of the Dutch.¹¹³⁹

The complaints from the Cold War were repeated in the 1990s: the NSA received much more Sigint from its European partners than it itself was prepared to share with them. One specific European complaint concerned the NSA's refusal to share high-level (the most secret and thus most valuable) Comint. This had been the case in the Cold War too. As early as 1951 the forerunner of the Dutch Sigint agency stopped the weekly transmission of intercepts of communications traffic from the Soviet embassy in The Hague, which were supplied to the CIA station attached to the American embassy in The Hague. The reason for this embargo was that the CIA refused to share its analysis of these intercepts with The Hague. So little has changed in this respect.

Third Party countries received the same treatment from America. A former Norwegian intelligence officer stated: 'Where it was not in the interest of the NSA that we should possess cryptographic insight, they did not have to share such matters with us.'¹¹⁴⁰ A British analyst recently wrote the following: 'America's allies have long complained that it is particularly mean with its intelligence'.¹¹⁴¹ Staff of the UN verification mission in Iraq (UNSCOM) constantly complained that all their Sigint was supplied to the NSA, but that they seldom got to see the results.¹¹⁴²

The American refusal to share high-level Comint is based on a directive dating from the 1950s, which derived directly from the NSA. It is not clear whether this directive is still in force,¹¹⁴³ but this is probably the case. The bilateral Sigint relations of the NSA with other countries were certainly continued into the 1990s. In the process, some partners received more intelligence than others; this was often determined by geopolitical and geographical considerations. Norway, for instance, always had a favoured position, but this was because the NSA was dependent on Norway for the information that was indispensable to the Americans: Norwegian monitoring stations provided Foreign Instrumentation Sigint on the Soviet launch base in Plesetsk and the testing base at Nenoksa on the White Sea.¹¹⁴⁴

Other Third Parties, such as Greece and Turkey, were involved less generously. The relations with these countries were regarded as a relic of the Cold War. European intelligence officers also suspected that the NSA sometimes played off these two countries against each other. The problem of dependence on the Americans still exists today. Some European countries tried to overcome this by collaborating more closely. France and the United Kingdom exchanged Sigint, for instance, even in the period following 1966 when Paris had left the military structure of NATO. Since the 1970s Paris and London have exchanged much Sigint relating to international terrorism. Another sign that European countries were trying to decrease their dependence on the Americans was seen during the Falklands War in 1982. The United States initially failed to help London, upon which the GCHQ received direct help from allies such as the Netherlands, France, Germany and Norway.¹¹⁴⁵ Moreover, on French initiative the cooperation with the Bundesnachrichtendienst was increased through bilateral agreements. And since the end of the 1990s the cooperation between the Dutch, German and French monitoring services has been growing strongly. Together with Denmark and Belgium, a so-called 'Group of Five' is slowly taking shape, intended as a counterbalance to UKUSA.¹¹⁴⁶ The irritation in Washington at this fact is clearly noticeable. It was revealed by the sudden decision to close the sizeable US monitoring station at Bad Aibling, Germany.¹¹⁴⁷

¹¹³⁹ Confidential interview (21).

¹¹⁴⁰ Riste, Norwegian, p. 95.

¹¹⁴¹ Grant, Intimate Relations, pp. 4-5.

¹¹⁴² Marian Wilkinson, 'Revealed: Our Spies in Iraq', Sydney Morning Herald, 28/01/99.

¹¹⁴³ Matthew Aid & Cees Wiebes, 'Conclusions', in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, p. 323.

¹¹⁴⁴ Berdal, The United States, pp. 30-31.

¹¹⁴⁵ Grant, Intimate Relations, p. 6.

¹¹⁴⁶ Confidential interview (22).

¹¹⁴⁷ Duncan Campbell, 'Fight over Euro-intelligence plans', The Guardian, 03/07/01.

Another way of retaining some independence from the NSA and GCHQ is not to admit these services onto one's sovereign territory. The Scandinavian countries, France, Belgium and the Netherlands have succeeded in this resolve to date. In the countries where US ground stations are located, this has been a constant source of diplomatic tension. Some Third Parties, such as Turkey, used the presence of these ground stations to make extra financial and material demands on the Americans; the NSA responded to this by gradually closing its ground stations there.

In fact, the history of the Cold War shows that when it comes to Sigint no intelligence service is really the friend of another service; instead, there are only intelligence services of countries that are friends with each other. In the world of Sigint all NATO and EU member states spy on each other. The forerunners of the NSA and GCHQ started this during World War II, and have never stopped doing it since 1945. These services and the Canadian CSE still read the coded telegrams of the larger and smaller NATO and EU members states, including those of the Netherlands. The Dutch diplomatic code was broken back in 1943, and in the 1960s Dutch diplomatic coded cables were still being read by the NSA. In the 1950s, as appears from an internal newsletter, Dutch was one of the languages taught in the translation training; this was still the case in 2001.¹¹⁴⁸ In 2000 the GCHQ openly advertised on its website for analysts who spoke Dutch. The CSE in Ottawa is also able, thanks to the collaboration in the UKUSA alliance, to read secret Dutch code telegrams. Inside the Netherlands intelligence community, it is known that this country is high on the list of targets of the biggest NSA base in the United Kingdom, Menwith Hill. Every hour this station scans more than 2 million domestic and foreign telephone calls.¹¹⁴⁹ The above account shows that the international exchange of Sigint has not always been a smooth affair. In particular the exchange of high-level Comint has often proved to be problematic, as such intelligence gives direct insights into the capabilities of the monitoring service in question.

Exchange between monitoring services with regard to Bosnia

The previous sections have indicated that political differences are sometimes an inhibiting factor in the exchange of Sigint. It can thus be assumed, for instance, that in view of the tense relations between Greece (pro-Serbia) and Turkey (pro-Bosnia) little intelligence was exchanged between these countries. It was less difficult to exchange military-tactical Sigint and Elint. Such intelligence was generally released easily. During the conflict in Bosnia much Elint was exchanged between the NATO allies between 1992 and 1995. This intelligence was channelled to the Linked Intelligence Operations Centre Europe (LOCE) network of the American Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth (see Chapter 3). This joint system handled mostly Elint, as is indicated by the daily intelligence summaries of the JAC. This related chiefly to emissions from hostile radar stations and other air defence systems. Tactical military Comint was also contained in this LOCE system, with the main focus on lower-level communications traffic. But there is no trace in LOCE of the 'better' high-level Comint, such as conversations between Milosevic and Mladic: assuming these were intercepted.¹¹⁵⁰

The question to be asked now is why the information in this LOCE network was so limited and contained so little Comint. To begin with one should consider the highly limited distribution of this intelligence product. High-level Comint was indeed available to the Americans, but it was not shared. There were further problems at the NSA, however. Between 1990 and 1998 almost 7000 employees left the organization, which strongly reduced the processing capacity. This personnel problem, together with the strong growth in international communications traffic, better encryption, increased use of fibre-optic cables and communications satellites such as Intelsat and Inmarsat, meant that the NSA was gradually 'going deaf'. Interception no longer seemed a problem, but processing certainly was. The capabilities of the NSA and its UKUSA partners are certainly impressive: around 1995 more than 90 million messages, sent via Intelsat and Inmarsat communications satellites, were intercepted each month. The technical structure was strongly upgraded from 1994 onwards. The problem was that the NSA ‘was buying all these new toys, but they don’t have the people to use them’, according to an intelligence expert.¹¹⁵¹ The inevitable happened: the NSA found itself unable to process the enormous flow of intercepts.¹¹⁵²

¹¹⁴⁸ Bamford, Body of Secrets, pp. 134 and 616.

¹¹⁴⁹ Udo Ulfkotte, 'Die Nato ist im bilde, doch gibt sie nur wenig preis', Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 10/04/99.

¹¹⁵⁰ Confidential interviews (31) and (32).

The greatest problem for the agency proved to be ‘the continuing decline of its Sigint processing, analysis and reporting infrastructure’. There was a major lack of trained personnel as a result of early resignations and departures for the private sector. Around 1995 the service was in serious trouble, because there was no money available to recruit new and competent personnel. The NSA encountered ‘a particularly severe problem with the size, age, skills and make-up of its workforce’. Internal problems probably also created further obstacles to the ‘free flow of intelligence information to the Agency’s customers’. Indeed, the internal communications systems within the NSA proved to be questionable.¹¹⁵³ Moreover, the NSA is said to have had a poor relationship with the Pentagon, which often complained about the NSA’s unwillingness to share Sigint for fear of compromising the source.¹¹⁵⁴ Pentagon staff openly complained that the NSA was often unwilling to part with the military Sigint that they needed to carry out their tasks. One Pentagon employee even said that staff of the NSA ‘are still fighting the Cold War and are more worried about maintaining security than improving tactical warfighting capabilities’.¹¹⁵⁵ In short, besides the inherent objection to sharing high-level Comint, insufficient analysis capabilities and internal bureaucratic struggles proved a further hindrance to the exchange of Sigint.

The initial lack of US Comint capabilities was also revealed by the creation of an intelligence unit at the Southern European NATO Command at Naples (AFSOUTH), known as the Deployed Shed Facility (DSF). The chief American reason for participating in this intelligence unit was that the NSA had major gaps in its Sigint in Bosnia.¹¹⁵⁶ The NSA did not have the personnel capacity to man this unit on a 24-hour basis, so other countries were asked to help out; reportedly the Netherlands Military Intelligence Service (MIS) also had to contribute to this multinational unit.¹¹⁵⁷ The proposal was supported by NATO, but before the Head of the MIS, Piet Duijn, was prepared to agree to this he first wanted to know the view of Defence Minister, Relus ter Beek, who immediately agreed to participation.¹¹⁵⁸

In the course of time the US services became prepared to share more Sigint. The U-2 reconnaissance aircraft were also able to supply valuable Sigint. The US services wanted to contribute this to the multinational gathering and processing unit in Vicenza, which was to work closely with the new DSF. In administrative terms this cell would report to NATO; the MIS supplied personnel for this unit too.¹¹⁵⁹ Apart from the LOCE system, and within the DSF, the NATO member states also mutually exchanged Sigint on Bosnia. This took place (and takes place) traditionally on a bilateral basis. There was also a regular exchange between NATO member states and non-alliance countries such as Austria and Finland, and also with neutral states such as Switzerland and Sweden.

¹¹⁵¹ Confidential interview (62).

¹¹⁵² Seymour M. Hersh, ‘The Intelligence Gap: How the Digital Age Left Our Spies Out in the Cold’, The New Yorker, 06/12/99, p. 58 ff.

¹¹⁵³ See: Matthew M. Aid, ‘The Time of Troubles: The US NSA in the Twenty-First Century’, in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 15 (2000) 3, pp. 1-32.

¹¹⁵⁴ Matthew M. Aid, ‘The Time of Troubles: The US NSA in the Twenty-First Century’, in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 15 (2000) 3, pp. 17-20.

¹¹⁵⁵ David Fulgrum, ‘Compute Combat Rules Frustrate the Pentagon’, Aviation Week & Space Technology, 15/09/97, p. 68.

¹¹⁵⁶ Confidential interview (22).

¹¹⁵⁷ MoD, MIS/CO. No. 14312, Report of Directing Council, no. DIS/93/157/1645, 23/04/93.

¹¹⁵⁸ MoD, DS. no. 335, Memorandum from Commodore P.J. Duijn, no. DIS/93/214/1474, 28/04/93 and Memorandum from Commander J. Waltmann to the Minister, no. SN93/938/2918, 12/05/93.

¹¹⁵⁹ MoD, MIS/CO. HMID Kok to the Minister of Defence, no. DIS/95/50.1/1366, 09/06/1995.

The Americans also profited from intelligence from NATO member states through the back door. At that time the US General Hayden received Sigint as Director Intelligence of the US European Command (EUCOM), an American national command outside the NATO lines of communication. In this capacity he was supported by a team of 60 Sigint experts from the NSA, that operated from Stuttgart, and from the Regional Sigint Operations Center at the US base Fort Gordon, which had the special task of providing Sigint support for this US EUCOM. This enabled the Americans to combine their own information from intercepts with the information gathered for them by NATO member states. An American intelligence officer stated with regard to this: 'if the NSA knew, Stuttgart would know'.¹¹⁶⁰ All things considered, the Americans had considerable information available to them from Sigint, but the exchange with other countries was limited. The next question is whether this also applied to the Sigint shared with the UNPROFOR staffs in Sarajevo and Zagreb. This seems indeed to be the case: the American and other Sigint agencies shared some intelligence with UNPROFOR.

In 1995 the Head of the intelligence staff in Zagreb was the Swedish officer Colonel Jan-Inge Svensson. He was assisted by his compatriot Lieutenant Colonel Ingmar Ljunggren, while the deputy intelligence officer was an American from the US Navy, Commander Morgan. The Swedes had national intelligence input at their disposal, and were also supplied with intelligence by the Americans, French and British. The French and British intelligence was rated as 'good'. One should bear in mind here that Sweden was not an 'official' member of NATO. Sometimes Svensson and Ljunggren received both tactical and strategic Sigint, such as fragments of telephone calls between Generals Mladic and Perisic. Briefings were also held on the basis of Sigint. However, they also rated Humint as an important source.¹¹⁶¹

Another UNPROFOR staff member confirmed that the intelligence staff in Zagreb sometimes received tactical military Sigint. These intercepts were also occasionally translated into French for Janvier, partly so that the interpreter did not then have to translate the English text out loud and thus to prevent the Croatian intelligence service from eavesdropping on this.¹¹⁶² The fact that Janvier had this information has already been dealt with in Chapter 1.

Some members of the intelligence staff in Zagreb also had access to valuable Sigint relating to Bihac. This was obtained through the LOCE system and national channels. In addition, intelligence officers in Zagreb often monitored the communications traffic between local commanders and Sarajevo, and they are even said to have monitored the regular telephone calls between their commanders in Zagreb and Sarajevo.¹¹⁶³ Members of the UNMO intelligence staff in Zagreb confirmed that they too had Sigint at their disposal. This is said to have originated from monitoring stations near Naples. During a critical situation in Bihac in November 1994 the UNMO officers working there at the time received copies of intercepts of communication between the Commander in Chief of the ABiH, Rasim Delic, and the ABiH General Dudakovic.

What Sigint was exchanged regarding the attack on Srebrenica?

In 1995 too, foreign monitoring services managed to intercept the communications traffic of the ABiH Commander in Chief Rasim Delic. An interviewed UNMO officer therefore wondered: 'Why didn't we receive this sort of information regarding the fall of Srebrenica?'¹¹⁶⁴ The probable reason for this was that this Comint did not in fact exist, because the various Western services did not have good Sigint coverage of Eastern Bosnia and thus were not able to monitor this area intensively.

There are further indications that there was no Sigint that directly indicated that the attack on Srebrenica was imminent. A few days before the attack the Deputy Head of the intelligence section in ¹¹⁶⁰ The head of the Balkan Sigint unit in Stuttgart at that time was Pat Donahue. Confidential interviews (6), (13) and (54).

¹¹⁶¹ Interviews with Jan-Inge Svensson and Ingmar Ljunggren, 04/11/99.

¹¹⁶² Confidential information (35).

¹¹⁶³ Confidential interview (45).

¹¹⁶⁴ Confidential interview (44).

Zagreb, Morgan, – Svensson was on holiday in Sweden – arranged a briefing for Akashi. Morgan told him that the Croatian attack in the Krajina was imminent. Reliable intelligence had been received on this, partly on the basis of Comint. Morgan reported nothing about Srebrenica; he had access to almost all US Sigint, and would certainly have mentioned that attack if he had seen any cause to do so. The British intelligence unit in Sarajevo did not have any knowledge of the true intentions of the VRS either. The regular consultations between the intelligence sections in Zagreb and Sarajevo reveals that BHC was also unaware that the VRS intended to take over more than the southern tip of the enclave.¹¹⁶⁵

A former US intelligence officer who could follow the flow of intelligence to the intelligence section in Zagreb stated that Comint is one of the most difficult forms of intelligence. An analyst needs to weigh up, translate and analyse all intercepts and compare them with other forms of intelligence such as Humint. Nonetheless, Sigint was the best way of determining where the parties were located, or wanted people to think they were located. This officer also pointed out that unfortunately there were no monitoring stations in Eastern Bosnia. In his opinion this could have provided valuable Comint, since the links between Belgrade, Pale and the VRS headquarters in Han Pijesak traversed this area.

This US official was flooded with Sigint on a daily basis, but according to him this was mostly tactical military data and policy information; none of it had any reference to Srebrenica. He did however confirm that Morgan, the intelligence officer in Zagreb, shared this information as much as possible with the generals Janvier and Ashton. This was indeed the aim of the American presence in the Zagreb intelligence section. He was sure that there was no Sigint available with regard to the attack on Srebrenica.¹¹⁶⁶ A foreign intelligence evaluation also concluded that at the tactical level Sigint provided little information about the activities of the warring factions below the corps level.¹¹⁶⁷

Exchange of Signals Intelligence elsewhere in Bosnia

Comint was also supplied to the intelligence staff of the UNPROFOR Commander Smith in Sarajevo. As a British officer he received mostly intercepts from GCHQ, but this consisted mostly of tactical military messages from the warring factions. Smith's staff in Sarajevo is not reported to have received any high-level Comint (such as conversations between Mladic and the Chief of Staff of the Yugoslav army, Perisic), but instead only tactical military traffic. According to British sources the GCHQ had major problems intercepting this communications traffic because the VRS and the ABiH almost always used secure land lines or Motorola walkie-talkies. The GCHQ sometimes managed to intercept the communications traffic between Mladic's headquarters in Han Pijesak and the various communications towers. The intercept site at Gornji Vakuf was the primary station to achieve this.¹¹⁶⁸

On one other occasion valuable intercepts were managed. It was probably this same monitoring station that was responsible for intercepting a conversation between an ABiH and a VRS commander at the end of 1993. At this time heavy fighting was taking place around Mostar between Bosnian Croats and Muslims. The ABiH, it seems, wanted to buy artillery shells from the VRS and to pay for these in German marks. After an agreement had been reached on the quantity and the means of transport – by truck – the ABiH commander decided on another approach: he asked whether the VRS would be willing to shell the Croat positions themselves. The VRS commander agreed to do this for an extra charge. When Lord Owen and Thorvald Stoltenberg told Milosevic about this, he was furious. Karadzic, who was also present, confirmed that this had happened and promised that it would not happen again.¹¹⁶⁹

¹¹⁶⁵ Confidential interview (45).

¹¹⁶⁶ Confidential interview (54).

¹¹⁶⁷ Confidential interview (8).

¹¹⁶⁸ Confidential interview (43).

¹¹⁶⁹ Owen, Balkan Odyssey, pp. 384-385.

Smith's staff also received intelligence from the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS). The Bosnia Cell in this service was also very nationally oriented, and chiefly had access to intelligence gathered by British and US services. This unit supplied mostly strategic intelligence to the Ministry of Defence. The Bosnia Cell supplied almost no tactical intelligence. Much material from the DIS did go to General Smith, however, via a specially created secure communications system of the British Army. The contact person for this service on General Smith's staff was his military assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Baxter.¹¹⁷⁰ In addition to his own intelligence cell, Smith also received intelligence from the British 'Black Box' intelligence cell in Sarajevo, according to a foreign intelligence officer.¹¹⁷¹

International negotiators, such as Lord Owen and Carl Bildt, also sometimes received Comint to support their work. Asked whether he received intelligence, Bildt answered that formally he did not, but informally he did. He did not wish to say much about this, but did admit that he also received Comint when he asked for it. He had noticed that the raw data in the reports from the various organizations was often the same as the intelligence resulting from it. This implied that he received his intelligence from his own Swedish Intelligence Service and from the Americans. According to Bildt, however, this intelligence did not constitute an important factor: moreover, it related to military affairs and this was of no use to him when he had to deal with international organizations. According to him, the Americans were usually busy counting tanks, and that was not relevant for a politician. Bildt cited BBC radio as a particularly important source of information for him. The information he received from their broadcasts was, in his opinion, faster and often more relevant than the analysed and processed Sigint reports.¹¹⁷²

In short, the basic Sigint situation was far from ideal. Nevertheless, it was in this situation that joint cooperation and mutual exchange on Bosnia needed to take place. It was a difficult affair, because the war in Bosnia led to divisions between the European countries and also put pressure on the relationship between the United States and the NATO member states. The political ideas about a possible solution to the armed conflict were disparate, and this was reflected in the way that Sigint was (or was not) shared.

5. The results of Signals Intelligence in Bosnia

In view of the extreme secrecy surrounding Sigint and the very limited distribution, in particular of Comint (often only on a need-to-know basis), it is not surprising that little is known about the results of the use of Sigint in the former Yugoslavia. Governments have never released any information about possible results achieved through Comint. Moreover, such material has never been declassified on the basis of the US Freedom of Information Act or any other similar act.

Nonetheless, disclosures have occasionally been made in recent years. These were mostly by journalists and other authors, who have found out more about the successes and failures of Sigint during the war in the former Yugoslavia through interviews and off-the-record media briefings with members of the western intelligence community. This section aims to sketch the achieved results, successes and failures, based on these publications and the author's own research. When describing targets for Comint and Elint, a distinction will be drawn between the following categories: diplomatic traffic and military communications traffic of the warring factions (military targets), such as the 'old' Yugoslav Army (the VJ) in Serbia, the VRS in the Republika Srpska, and the ABiH in Bosnia, in that order. This is followed by an examination of the Elint targets in and around Bosnia, and finally UNPROFOR as target.¹¹⁷³

¹¹⁷⁰ Confidential interview (8).

¹¹⁷¹ Confidential interview (9). It was not possible to confirm this through other interviews.

¹¹⁷² Interviews with Lord Owen, 27/06/01 and Carl Bildt, 13/12/00.

¹¹⁷³ The Croat Sigint operations are not considered because Croatia had probably nothing to do with the attack on the eastern enclaves.

Monitoring targets in Serbia

Officials of the international intelligence community, who are mostly quoted anonymously in publications, believe that the NSA certainly gathered Comint from Serbian and Bosnian Serb government communications links. Intensive monitoring of the microwave telephone network of the Yugoslav government, by means of satellites, special aircraft and other interception methods, reportedly enabled the NSA to intercept telephone calls between Milosevic in Belgrade and the Bosnian Serb leader Karadzic in Pale. According to officials of the US intelligence community, these intercepts clearly showed that Milosevic gave considerable political and military support to the military operations of the Bosnian Serbs.¹¹⁷⁴ Milosevic is reported to have been informed of the attack on Srebrenica (see also Chapter 8).¹¹⁷⁵ Intercept reports showed that Milosevic was equally aware of, and also agreed to, the programme of ethnic cleansing as conducted by the Bosnian Serb government. This material is said to be so incriminating that long before his arraignment by the Yugoslavia Tribunal, in July 2001, the authorities had been considering the prosecution of Milosevic. The US government decided however to keep the peace process alive, and thus to continue to make use of the services of Milosevic, because he was seen as the most important political personality in the Balkans.¹¹⁷⁶ The trial of Milosevic will need to show whether these claims are correct.

The existence of these intercepts was confirmed by a western diplomat. During a meeting at the White House between Gore and Bildt, the Swedish negotiator tried to convince the US vice-president that he should not form an excessively black-and-white image of President Milosevic. Gore responded to these statements by reading from US intercepts, which showed that Milosevic had consulted with Mladic about the attack on Srebrenica. Gore then reportedly said to Bildt: 'Forget about this. Milosevic is absolutely not the friend of the West.'¹¹⁷⁷ However, it should be noted that Bildt has no recollection that this happened.¹¹⁷⁸

US intelligence officials claimed, however, that in fact there are no intercepts, which might indicate a possible involvement by Milosevic in the war crimes around Srebrenica. 'After all, he's not an idiot', commented one CIA officer. According to this official, the microwave traffic was indeed monitored, but this resulted mostly in tactical military intelligence, gathered by the 'vacuum cleaner' method. The down side of this method has already been mentioned: due to the enormous quantity of intercepts much important material was missed by the Serbo-Croat translators. A Vortex satellite, for instance, intercepted 22,000 telephone calls a day. As a result, the Americans gained most of their strategic intelligence not from satellites, but mostly from taps on hardware.¹¹⁷⁹

A former French intelligence official confirms that Milosevic had no prior knowledge of the attack on Srebrenica. Asked whether the French Military Intelligence Service (DRM) had intercepts of conversations that Mladic and Karadzic conducted with Belgrade (Milosevic or the Chief of Staff of the VJ, Perisic), or whether this service had any indications about what Mladic was planning, the former Head of this service, General Heinrich, answered negatively. The reason he gave for this was that Mladic and Karadzic did not trust other people. Heinrich claimed that Mladic mostly communicated with Belgrade via an underground fibre-optic cable. He said that the Americans had employed many secret methods, but ultimately failed to intercept this communications traffic regularly. When they did ¹¹⁷⁴ 'Washington gaf tribunaal bewijs over oorlogsmisdaden Milosevic' (Washington provided tribunal with proof of war crimes by Milosevic), De Volkskrant, 29/05/99.

¹¹⁷⁵ According to the Bosnian Serb politician Rajko Dukic, Milosevic reacted with great surprise to the attack. Interview with Rajko Dukic, 14/06/00.

¹¹⁷⁶ Karsten Prager, 'Message from Serbia', Time, 17/07/95 and Tim Sebastian, 'The Secret Deal: Why Justice Won't Be Done', The Sunday Times, 25/02/96. See also: Ian Bruce, 'Allies hamper inquiry', The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95.

¹¹⁷⁷ Confidential interview (53).

¹¹⁷⁸ Confidential interview (101).

¹¹⁷⁹ Confidential interviews (12) and (13).

finally manage to do this – thanks to the DRM and by means that Heinrich did not wish to describe in detail – the Dayton Accord had already been signed.¹¹⁸⁰

In view of the long animosity between the Americans and the French, it is however doubtful whether the US services showed all their cards to the French. Various Canadian intelligence officials stated, according to the German author Udo Ulfkotte, that the NSA did in fact monitor many high-level conversations. Ottawa was ideally situated in this respect, because through participation in the UKUSA alliance the Canadians had access to American and British Comint and to material from Third-Party countries. According to Canadian officers the NSA was able to intercept, break and read the coded military traffic of the Bosnian Muslims, the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs. The Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs tried to prevent this with the use of electronic warfare equipment, but this usually made no difference. The code was often broken within about 15 minutes. Most other communications via telephone, fax, telex and e-mail were monitored too. The NSA reportedly also received many intercepts from the Austrian Military Intelligence Service (HNA) and for a long time the GCHQ was able to locate and monitor Karadzic by his mobile phone.¹¹⁸¹ This last claim may be doubted, however, because at that time there was no extensive GSM network in place in the Republika Srpska. It could only have been his satellite phone, which indeed could be intercepted for satellites as was done, for example, in the case of tracking Osama Bin Laden.¹¹⁸²

Since 1994 a special Bosnia Group had been operating at the NSA. A ‘four-hour turnaround time’ was applied for Sigint from Bosnia and Serbia: following interception a signal was translated, processed and analysed and within four hours was on the desk of the intelligence customer, such as the CIA or the State Department. According to an American intelligence official, in this period this NSA team carried out one of the best operations in its history.¹¹⁸³ Canadian and US officials drew however attention to the problem already mentioned earlier: the issue of how the flow of communications traffic should be processed. A Canadian analyst cited the example that the NSA was able to search for the work ‘tank’ in the intercepted signals; the problem was that this could also turn out to be a Serb who spent an hour complaining on the phone about the leaking petrol tank of his truck.¹¹⁸⁴ Besides all these factors, one should also consider that the interception of diplomatic communications before the fall of Srebrenica was of very limited value: the attack was a purely military operation. It was not to be expected that relevant military signals regarding the eastern enclaves would be exchanged through diplomatic channels. Only the traffic between Pale and Belgrade could have contained such information. This is why the NSA mostly focussed on military communications traffic during the Bosnian conflict.

Messages to and from units of the Yugoslavian Army was sometimes relatively easy to intercept as these units often used conventional radio equipment. The intercepts were supposedly revealing. It appeared that the VJ was closely involved in the war and handled almost all tasks for the VRS in the field of ‘command, control and communications’. Moreover, Belgrade reportedly ensured the operational status of the VRS air defence and early warning systems and is said to have provided military experts to do this work. The NSA and CIA are also reported to have discovered the coaxial cable system that linked Belgrade to the sites from where air defence missiles were fired (in military terminology, SAM sites). ‘We have unequivocal intelligence that Milosevic has his hand in the cookie

¹¹⁸⁰Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, no. 3412, 2 parts, Paris 2001, Part 2, Audition de Jean Heinrich, 08/02/01, pp. 179-186.

¹¹⁸¹ Ulfkotte, Verschlusssache BND, p. 31.

¹¹⁸² Peter Finn, ‘Bin Laden Used Ruse to Flee’, The Washington Post, 21/01/03.

¹¹⁸³ Confidential interview (13). Later 15 translators from this unit were offered to the Tribunal in The Hague, but the Tribunal did not wish to employ them.

¹¹⁸⁴ Confidential interviews (9), (47) and (62).

jar', said an US intelligence official. Intercepts apparently showed that Belgrade was involved in the 'loan' of military equipment to the VRS.¹¹⁸⁵

Intercepting Serb communications traffic in practice

It is established that conversations between Karadzic and Mladic were intercepted. According to intelligence officials who had access to these UKUSA intercepts, these conversations were sometimes entertaining to read: the two gentlemen did not like each other and constantly shouted at each other on the telephone. Sometimes they swore at each other too. However, the intercepts of such conversations can also lead to confusion. Mladic once shouted down the telephone at a local commander, telling him that he should take tough action and should put an end to 'the damned trouble'. Otherwise Mladic would intervene personally and remove the commander's head in the process. When this call was intercepted an alarm was immediately sounded (by a 'critic') at the NSA in Fort Meade. Was this taken to mean that the VRS was about to attack an ABiH position? US officials in the region were alerted. They in turn contacted UNPROFOR, but the force was unable to detect any heightened state of readiness or any preparations for an attack. Following long and intensive investigation, it was revealed that Mladic had ordered that an end should be put to the political unrest in the local commander's unit.¹¹⁸⁶

Comint operations were certainly not a simple matter, as members of US, Canadian and European Sigint organizations all emphasized. Interception by the 'vacuum cleaner' method was conducted by means of satellites, ships, aircraft and from the ground. The most common method of monitoring Comint was by satellite and special AWACS flights, conducted from Hungary. The VRS and the Yugoslav Army were aware of these flights, however, and usually all electronic equipment was then turned off. An US intelligence official admitted that there was no good Sigint coverage of the eastern enclaves, even though Sigint satellites do cover eastern Bosnia from a fixed geostationary orbit 22,000 miles over the Earth. These satellites targeted in particular the high-level command-control-communications, which used very extensively the microwave radio relay/telephone network. Vortex and other spy satellites in orbit at the time were designed specifically to collect this kind of microwave traffic.¹¹⁸⁷

If interception did succeed, then a further problem was that really everything was intercepted, from conversations between Mladic and Karadzic to a music channel. Hundreds of thousands of signals were intercepted on all possible frequencies. Sigint organizations thus needed to conduct highly focussed searches for 'a needle in a haystack'. One important thing that these agencies needed to know, for instance, is what HF frequency Mladic's communications equipment was using. But even then, for instance, a pilot of a scheduled KLM flight, could contact Schiphol Airport in Amsterdam on precisely the same HF frequency, in which case this call would be recorded too. The services thus had to refine their 'search key' more and more, and to note call times in order to discover whether, for instance, there was a regular pattern in the conversations conducted by Mladic. The calls finally selected were then screened for key words by computers. In most cases this still resulted in more than a hundred simultaneous conversations. These were then analysed on content and usefulness, and that required a lot of time. Ultimately only a few relevant intercepts landed on the desks of the policymakers.¹¹⁸⁸

Something else that made interception much more difficult was that the majority of the most important communications traffic took place via landlines or couriers, in order to prevent intelligence services from listening in. Moreover, there were no monitoring stations close to Belgrade or Pale. Another factor was that if the Serb forces were withdrawn far into the hinterland, they were outside the ¹¹⁸⁵ Karsten Prager, 'Message from Serbia', Time, 17/07/95 and Tim Sebastian, 'The Secret Deal: Why Justice Won't Be Done', The Sunday Times, 25/02/96.

¹¹⁸⁶ Confidential interview (47).

¹¹⁸⁷ Confidential interview (13) and E-mail Matthew Aid to the author, 17/12/02.

¹¹⁸⁸ Confidential interview (47).

range of the RC-135 and U-2R reconnaissance aircraft, as these usually flew over the Adriatic. Due to all these reasons, a detailed and substantial Sigint coverage of Serb military activities was fairly difficult. The previously mentioned taps on hardware sometimes presented an alternative.

The cryptography offensive against the Serbs

The use of cryptography equipment by the Serbs also made it harder to monitor their communications traffic. Despite this it was possible to discover weak points: in the past the VJ and the former Yugoslav government had bought most of their equipment from Crypto AG in Switzerland. The VRS and the current Serbian government inherited most of this equipment. It is now known that this company had a secret agreement with the NSA to build in a 'back door' in the computer software of the supplied encryption equipment. This enabled the Americans to read the coded messages.¹¹⁸⁹ Interviewed persons in Washington and London claimed that as a result of this secret agreement the coded traffic between Belgrade and various Serbian embassies abroad was systematically intercepted and read by the NSA, thanks in part to the use of Crypto AG equipment. Other countries were also 'victims'. Officials at the Vatican even labelled Crypto AG as 'bandits'.¹¹⁹⁰ Representatives of a European intelligence service confirmed this weak link in the Serb communications, but they also point out that in the past the Croats had supplied much computer equipment to Belgrade. This equipment too was provided with a 'back door'.¹¹⁹¹

Another relevant fact in this context is that the western (and above all the French) intelligence services had long suspected that the NSA had made an agreement with the producer of the most widely used computer software, Microsoft. According to a report by the French Ministry of Defence, this agreement meant that Microsoft reportedly provided all its Windows software with a 'back door'. Microsoft immediately denied all the accusations and stated it was prepared to cooperate with the French Government. The author of the French report, Admiral J. Marguin, was frank in his comments to journalists: 'After all, what would we do if we possessed such an effective group as Microsoft?'¹¹⁹² Furthermore the NSA is said to have made agreements with American, British, Swiss, Dutch, Belgian, Swedish, Italian, Finnish and Hungarian software companies engaged in marketing encryption programs.¹¹⁹³

The scandal in Washington involving the Cylink Corporation is another indication that both the required encryption software and the encryption equipment can be penetrated from outside. Cylink has been producing encryption software for foreign governments and companies for more than 16 years. However, the company had always managed to export its products, even to countries officially subject to a trade embargo, such as Libya, Cuba, North Korea, Iran, Iraq and probably also Serbia. Following all events around Cylink, the Cryptome website put the question: 'How is Cylink able to freely export security products, while other encryption companies were punished?'¹¹⁹⁴ It is in fact also known from other sources that Washington constantly encourages companies making code equipment or encryption software to include a back door in their products; this was confirmed to the US Congress by FBI director Freeh.¹¹⁹⁵

¹¹⁸⁹ Interview with Wayne Madsen, 21/06/99.

¹¹⁹⁰ Confidential interviews (6), (11) and (91) and interview with Wayne Madsen, 21/09/96. See also: Wayne Madsen, 'Crypto AG. The NSA's Trojan Horse?', Covert Action Quarterly, No. 63 (Winter 1998), passim and 'Huge NSA Encryption Scam', GSRReport, 10/02/99.

¹¹⁹¹ Confidential interview (48).

¹¹⁹² Charles Bremner, 'French accuse Gates of bugging software', The Sunday Times, 23/02/00.

¹¹⁹³ Madsen, Data, pp. 6-7.

¹¹⁹⁴ 'Cylink decrypted?', op: <http://cryptome.org/cylinked.htm>, 10/03/00. Cylink's lawyers - Morrison & Foerster - threatened to take the owner of this website, John Young, to court for libel. However, nothing more has come of this threat - which is unusual for American circumstances. See letter Morrison & Foerster to John Young, 09/03/00.

¹¹⁹⁵ E-mail from Stephen Peacock about Encryption on Intelforum, 10/03/00.

Naturally the Serbs had taken precautionary measures to prevent eavesdropping. To give one example, they used – and still use – ‘one-time pads’ for their most secret and most important communications. These are number or letter codes which are used only once and are thus very difficult or impossible to crack, even for the NSA. This has led to other methods of breaking the codes: increasingly often, clandestine operations are carried out in which specialists of the CIA (abroad) and the FBI (in embassies and consulates in the United States) penetrate a building to place monitoring equipment in the code room or to copy encryption software. This type of special operations has seen a strong growth in recent years as it is an easier way to gather intelligence than breaking difficult codes. However reliable and sophisticated the encryption equipment may be, vulnerable points will always exist. To give one example, if every night a Serb unit transmits the same sentence in code to the headquarters in Belgrade like ‘Quiet night: nothing to report’, then sooner or later this will lead to the code being broken. A comparable example was that all Saudi-Arabian diplomatic coded cables to the king ended with the sentence: ‘May Allah prolong your life to eternity.’ Once this is known, then every crypto-analyst can break the code quickly. A cryptography attack is always aimed at such weak spots.

The Special Collection Service

The only resource that the NSA and CIA were sometimes able to use was the joint Special Collection Service (SCS) of these two organizations. This unit manned special monitoring stations, which were based, in the greatest secrecy, in American embassies. These monitoring stations were set up in specially separated and closed rooms. The SCS had a monitoring station in the American embassies in Belgrade and Zagreb,¹¹⁹⁶ and from time to time the SCS managed to achieve high-level intercepts, such as a conversation between Mladic and Perisic or Milosevic.

The SCS also occasionally achieved high-level intercepts of conversations between Yugoslav political and military leaders. This happened sporadically however, and not in a systematic manner.¹¹⁹⁷ The activities of the SCS usually remained unknown to the ambassador and sometimes even to the CIA station chiefs in Belgrade, Zagreb and Sarajevo. These SCS stations produced extremely useful Comint from the communications traffic around Belgrade, Sarajevo and Zagreb. An US intelligence official confirmed that the most important intelligence derived from these Embassy Collection Sites at the American embassies in Zagreb and Belgrade. There was also a SCS station in the US embassy in Sarajevo; this was accommodated in separate containers at the headquarters of Bosnia Hercegovina Command.¹¹⁹⁸

Interception of Serb communications traffic: which country knew what?

One thing cannot be emphasized often enough: it was not easy for the Sigint services to intercept Serb communications traffic. One-time pads, the use of secure landlines or couriers hindered western services in their attempts to eavesdrop on Serb communications. The Special Collection Service post at the US embassy in Belgrade was probably the only monitoring station inside the Serbian capital. Moreover, the Armed Forces operated on the mainland, not always within range of the US reconnaissance aircraft flying over the Adriatic. This made it hard to achieve a detailed and extensive Sigint coverage of (Bosnian) Serb military activities. Only when the Serbian Army operated close to the border of, or even within Bosnia, and communications traffic increased strongly, did the NSA manage to intercept these activities effectively. This was the case shortly before the attack on Srebrenica: around this time much intelligence was intercepted regarding logistical matters, such as relocation of tanker trucks, trucks and other military support.¹¹⁹⁹

¹¹⁹⁶ Confidential interview (6).

¹¹⁹⁷ Confidential interview (13).

¹¹⁹⁸ Confidential interview (13).

¹¹⁹⁹ Confidential interview (6).

The Americans generally had strong capabilities for intercepting high-level communications traffic. This is also indicated by the fact that the NSA trained and employed Serbo-Croat translators.¹²⁰⁰ However, the main focus of the efforts was on important military traffic, and that was harder to monitor. Statements by US sources are confirmed by members of the Canadian intelligence community. This is important, because only Canada – and to a lesser extent also the United Kingdom – has a special relationship with America in this respect, and thus access to high-level Sigint. Despite American concern about General Rose's alleged sympathy for the Serb cause and political differences between the Clinton government and Whitehall about policy regarding Bosnia, the British like the Canadians continued to have direct access to the Sigint archives and databanks of the NSA and CIA. But GCHQ also independently achieved successes in the Sigint war. British sources confirm that GCHQ (not necessarily via the UKUSA alliance) sometimes managed to intercept and monitor the conversations of the major political and military leaders in the former Yugoslavia.¹²⁰¹ The question is whether this also included communications traffic relevant to the eastern enclaves. This is probable, but the British services concentrated exclusively on Gorazde because British ground troops were stationed in this enclave. When the threat to Gorazde became greater in July 1995, communications traffic – probably intercepted by the British – indicated that the VRS was building up a Command and Control Architecture. At the same time it was admitted that it was difficult to gather intelligence on the Bosnian Serbs.¹²⁰² The GCHQ also had difficulties getting started in this area, and thus gave priority to Comint regarding the VRS and ABiH around Gorazde. The second area of attention was formed by the other British military units in Bosnia.

Monitoring military targets in the Republika Srpska

A major part of the efforts of the NSA regarding Comint was concentrated on the VRS, under the command of General Ratko Mladic and his headquarters in Han Pijesak in eastern Bosnia. Spying on the military communications traffic of the VRS originally seemed relatively simple, so that the NSA was able to follow the military activities of the VRS in general terms. The VRS had minimal capabilities and resources for transmitting tactical military and operational radio traffic in encrypted and coded form. Military units of the VRS were, to begin with, completely dependent on the radios and walkie-talkies provided by the Yugoslav army (the VJ) in Belgrade.

Later however the VRS also acquired walkie-talkies that had been bought on the open market. These were used to maintain contacts with the local commanders. This often created difficulties for intelligence services, regarding not only the VRS but the Yugoslav army as well. Comint staff who worked in Bosnia had good reason to call the war in the region a 'walkie-talkie war', since most of the VRS communications took place via Motorolas or walkie-talkies of Japanese manufacture. Nowadays this traffic would be easier to intercept by satellite, but in 1994-1995 satellites were not yet able to intercept communications via Motorolas on a large scale given the extremely mountainous terrain of Eastern Bosnia. Only RC-135 aircraft were able to do this, but even then only under perfect conditions.

Due to the limited range of these walkie-talkies (3 to 25 km), proper interception of such communications traffic required a monitoring station in the vicinity, but there were none. In mountainous terrain it is not possible to pick up signals from walkie-talkies, radiotelephones or VHF transmitters at long range. Additionally, the communications equipment of a tank had a maximum range of 60 km, thus making it difficult to monitor these as well. US intelligence officials admitted this frankly to the journalist Gutman. The UK Defence Intelligence Staff was faced with the same problem. Due to the mountainous terrain in Bosnia, the results of the intercepted military Comint from the GCHQ and NSA were not spectacular.¹²⁰³ When asked about this, Canadian intelligence officials ¹²⁰⁰ Bamford, Body of Secrets, p. 616.

¹²⁰¹ Confidential interview (11).

¹²⁰² Confidential information (183).

¹²⁰³ Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Newsday, 29/05/96 and Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 216-217.

confirmed that monitoring walkie-talkie communications in Bosnia initially presented problems. They confirmed the story that Belgrade had concluded an agreement with the Motorola company and had bought a large number of walkie-talkies from this company. After pressure on Motorola to cooperate as regards certain technical specifics¹²⁰⁴, it became easier to monitor this type of traffic.¹²⁰⁵

The HF frequency is less suitable for tactical military operations. The warring factions did however often use this frequency for long-distance links of a strategic military nature. This meant that for a great deal of the remaining signals traffic, the VRS had to use what was left of the telephone and fax networks. Much of this traffic was routed via short-wave towers, located on all hill and mountain tops along the most important roads in Serbia and Bosnia. As soon as the signals were transmitted from these towers, the satellites and aircraft of the NSA 'had a field day'.¹²⁰⁶ The VRS commanders were equally aware of the dangers of communications through these channels and took this into account.

In early 1995 it became clear that the Americans were able to monitor this traffic. In diplomatic discussions about the (temporary) suspension of the sanctions against Serbs, the greatest stumbling-block was how reporting of violations of the embargo should be conducted. US diplomats revealed to European colleagues that they had intercepts with instructions from Belgrade to drivers of trucks to cross the border with the Republika Srpska. The diplomats had considerable difficulty with how they should use this evidence. The American services considered that this should remain secret in order to protect their methods and capabilities.¹²⁰⁷

A second example which showed that the Americans could read this communications traffic dates from the end of May 1995. At this time all US staff operating within the ICFY Border Mission were suddenly withdrawn (the task of this mission was to supervise the observance of the sanctions, for instance on the Drina). The Americans were suddenly withdrawn because the US embassy in Zagreb had received Comint and Humint about a direct threat to these Americans.¹²⁰⁸ A third example dates from August 1995, when it appeared that the NSA had access to the signals traffic from the headquarters of the Drina Corps of the VRS. This service intercepted the instructions from this corps to four units to shoot down NATO aircraft, operating close to Split, as soon as these aircraft entered the territory of the Republika Srpska.¹²⁰⁹ This was within the capabilities of the Drina Corps because the VJ and VRS had an integrated air defence system. The aforementioned examples show that the NSA was apparently able to tap the military communications traffic in the region. The units of the Special Collection Service at the American embassies in Belgrade, Zagreb or Sarajevo were probably responsible for this.¹²¹⁰

The VRS did possess code and encryption equipment, but it was often of poor quality or out of date. In times of crisis or armed conflict the VRS was regularly forced to use open links. Insofar as the VRS used encryption equipment, the NSA succeeded in intercepting and monitoring this traffic because the VRS also used equipment from Crypto AG. Since the NSA employed an increasing number of linguistic specialists, a marked improvement was also to be seen in the quantity and quality of the Comint product. Intercepts of HF and short-wave radio traffic from Pale confirmed the long-existing suspicion that Mladic had a direct fibre-optic line to the former Yugoslav General Staff in Belgrade, and also a direct line to Milosevic. This latter fact seemed obvious in view of earlier attempts ¹²⁰⁴ Confidential interviews (6) and (12).

¹²⁰⁵ Confidential interview (47).

¹²⁰⁶ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 217 and Charles Lane & Thom Shanker, 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', in: New York Review of Books, 09/05/96, p. 11.

¹²⁰⁷ Confidential information (36).

¹²⁰⁸ Confidential information (42).

¹²⁰⁹ Confidential information (37).

¹²¹⁰ As regards intercepting cellular phone traffic, Motorola has even applied for a patent for this. According to Motorola, all GSM or other mobile communications traffic routed via a satellite is relatively easy to intercept. See: Barry Fox, 'The Spy who bugged me. Why make it easy to eavesdrop on satellite telephone calls?', New Scientist Magazine, 11/03/00.

by Milosevic to get rid of Karadzic through a coup d'etat by Mladic in the Republika Srpska, as Lord Owen recalled.¹²¹¹

The analysis by the NSA of this high-level military traffic gave US policymakers and analysts from the intelligence community important information about the VRS activities in Bosnia. The messages from Mladic's headquarters in Han Pijesak were intensively monitored, which led to considerable insights into the military activities and capabilities. The regularly intercepted communications also told the analysts, however, a great deal about Mladic's personality and changing moods. The GCHQ was also reportedly able, via the British Army Intelligence Corps in Gornji Vakuf, to monitor the communications to and from Mladic. Various sources confirm that GCHQ and the British Sigint units in the region had successfully intercepted this military communications traffic. Later in the war these intercepts gave 'a dramatic insight into the general's depression, paranoia and growing mental instability'.¹²¹²

Did Sigint provide prior knowledge of the aims of the VRS regarding Srebrenica?

Up to now it is not clear whether, through Sigint, Western intelligence services knew of VRS plans to conquer Srebrenica. The issue of prior knowledge of the attack is dealt with in more detail in Chapter 8. There have been many press publications about Comint relating to the Srebrenica attack. In July 1995 the NSA, the Bundesnachrichtendienst, the French and also the Austrian Military Intelligence Services are reported to have intercepted military radio traffic which, it is said, proved conclusively that the VRS planned to attack Gorazde, Zepa and Srebrenica. This intelligence supposedly showed that the offensive was supported in deep secrecy by Belgrade.

However, a CIA employee with access to high-level Comint dismissed these reports as false. He noted that much tactical military information about the reinforcement of the VRS around Srebrenica was available, but according to him the aims of the VRS were totally overlooked by analysts of the US intelligence community due to insufficient analysis capacity.¹²¹³ Staff of the GCHQ and the UK Defence Intelligence Staff, also discovered that Comint only seldom produced reports containing a warning of impending military offensives by the VRS. An employee of the former organization told the journalist Urban: 'A lot of communication is done by [secure] land line or face-to-face. Mladic likes to be there in person during a big operation.'¹²¹⁴ Indeed, this proved highly relevant to the events in Srebrenica.

The first press articles claiming that the American intercepted messages indicating a planned VRS attack on Srebrenica date from August and November 1995. According to articles in the international media, three weeks before the attack on Srebrenica and for the period of a full week the NSA intercepted a large number of messages between Mladic and the Serbian general Perisic in Belgrade. These intercepts related to the planning of the offensive, which was then in full swing. The number of required troops and suitable dates for the VRS offensive are said to have been discussed. A western intelligence officer claimed that 'Mladic and Perisic conferred constantly about their strategy and what they were doing'. According to him it was also the case that 'Mladic is always asking Perisic about what he should be doing'.¹²¹⁵ It should be noted here that a great deal of preparatory planning was not required for the taking of Srebrenica. Mladic could probably do what he needed to on his own. Mladic probably did not need Perisic for the actual attack, apart from logistic support, and this was already constantly available. These considerations do not however rule out the possibility that they had contacts.

¹²¹¹ Interview with Lord Owen, 27/06/01.

¹²¹² Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 216-217 and Karsten Prager, 'Message from Serbia', Time, 17/07/95.

¹²¹³ Confidential interviews (12), (13) and (54).

¹²¹⁴ Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 216-217.

¹²¹⁵ Cabell Bruce, 'Belgrade Blamed', Newsday, 12/08/95 and Roy Gutman, 'Federal Army Tied to Bosnia Crimes', Newsday, 01/11/95.

The same month new articles appeared in the press. According to Daniel Plesch, the director of the British American Security Council, his organization had seen intercepts, which indicated prior American knowledge of the VRS attack on Srebrenica. He also mentioned intercepted calls between the Yugoslav Chief of Staff, Perisic, and Mladic. The contacts reportedly concerned the planned attack and later executions of Muslims. This information, said Plesch, was not passed on by the US services to the UNPROFOR and NATO partners.¹²¹⁶ A British researcher had also heard rumours about the existence of Comint relating to the VRS attack. He had tried to track this down, but had never made any discoveries. According to the rumour, the NSA and the CIA did have intercepted messages, but these were probably never shared with the GCHQ or other western services.¹²¹⁷

Janvier is said to have been told about the VRS plans for an attack on the enclave at least two weeks in advance by the French Military Intelligence Service, the Direction du Renseignement Militaire. The French services, just like the British ones, are said to have managed this without US intelligence. This Comint was reportedly passed to Janvier in his capacity as French commander, not as commander of the UN forces.¹²¹⁸ In Chapter 8 it will be shown that the veracity of these reports must be doubted.

Little is known about the British Comint successes against the VRS and the ABiH in the Balkans. In Bosnia the Army Intelligence Corps operated from Gornji Vakuf in close collaboration with the French and Canadian troops within UNPROFOR. This mostly concerned operations aimed at gathering tactical military intelligence on the VRS and the ABiH, to be used in briefing commanders. This British Army base also later functioned as a conduit: intercepts from GCHQ were passed on to a special British Black Box intelligence cell in Sarajevo that was equipped with special communications equipment. Staff gave daily briefings to General Rose and later to General Smith.¹²¹⁹ The GCHQ was the major supplier of Comint to the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS): this mostly comprised tactical Sigint on troop movements, with logistical information on matters such as fuel stocks and summons to meetings obtained through Elint. In 1995 the priorities of the GCHQ lay almost exclusively with Bosnia, but UHF/VHF traffic was often very hard to intercept, even from British ships in the Adriatic. The only possibility in this respect was the British monitoring station in Gornji Vakuf.

It has already been mentioned that British Sigint did not provide a clear picture because the VRS and the VJ used couriers and secure direct lines. There was only a limited exchange between the British and the ABiH, because the Bosnian Muslims actually interpreted everything in the sense that the UN should join them in the fight against the VRS. High-level intercepts, such as those of the conversations between Mladic and Perisic, were in any case not provided to the DIS, according to former staff members. Such intercepted messages may have existed, but if so then they remained at the very highest levels.

According to members of the DIS, high-level intercepts may have been gathered by the NSA, but this agency kept much intelligence to itself. Moreover it sometimes lasted a very long time – one to two weeks – before NSA analyses reached the desks of the DIS. The British could do little about this, however, because the GCHQ was dependent on the NSA when it came to Sigint in Bosnia. After all, this agency had greater capabilities due to its satellites and special aircraft. Besides this, the relationship between the American and British services became increasingly difficult: the British had a much more differentiated view of the conflict than the Americans. This more differentiated British vision led the CIA and DIA to limit the supply of information to the DIS from early 1995 onwards.¹²²⁰ This also meant that the British were deprived of intelligence regarding the actions of the ABiH.

¹²¹⁶ Ambrose Evand-Pritchard, 'Americans bow to forces of realpolitik in Bosnia: US steps in only when the minefield is clear', The Sunday Telegraph, 26/11/95.

¹²¹⁷ Confidential interview (79). See also: Urban, UK Eyes, p. 217.

¹²¹⁸ Andreas Zumach, 'Grosser Lauschangriff auf Srebrenica' (Major bugging operation for Srebrenica), in: Die Tageszeitung, 30/10/95 and Ian Bruce, 'Allies hamper inquiry', The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95.

¹²¹⁹ Urban, UK Eyes, pp. 213-215.

¹²²⁰ Confidential interview (8).

The Bosnian government and the ABiH as Comint target

The traffic between Pale, Han Pijesak and Belgrade was not the only target of the Americans. The NSA also intercepted the communications of the Bosnian government in Sarajevo. This became apparent in 1994 when the NSA intercepted conversations between a number of Bosnian government officials, who talked on the telephone about future secret weapons deliveries that had obviously been arranged by the US government. The NSA also intercepted conversations between Bosnian officials in Sarajevo and several foreign governments, in which the Bosnians let drop that they were receiving military support from Washington.

Furthermore, in 1996 intercepts of Bosnian government communications revealed that hundreds of militant Iranian fighters of the Revolutionary Guard were still operating throughout Bosnia, despite the government's promise that they would be removed from the country, as agreed in the Dayton Accord of 1995.¹²²¹ The Americans probably leaked this information to the press on purpose to give a political signal to the government in Sarajevo. Also Iranian intelligence agents were active in Sarajevo. There were even accusations that these agents were using advanced German spy technology to eavesdrop on US peacekeeping forces in Bosnia. This equipment was bought from the BND but the German service denied this.¹²²²

As described above, the British Army Intelligence Corps also conducted operations against the Bosnian government and the ABiH from Gornji Vakuf. The Bosnian Army was well aware of this, as was revealed by an internal memorandum of the National Security Service, which warned about British eavesdropping activities from Base A in Gornji Vakuf. The security service also reported that newly arrived British troops on the Kiseljak - Kresevo line possessed the same Sigint equipment. This involved operations chiefly intended to gather tactical military intelligence on the ABiH, for use in briefing commanders.¹²²³

The French intelligence services were also active, from both France in Sarajevo, in intercepting Bosnian traffic. Not only the communications of the government was targeted but also the messages between ABiH snipers. These snipers caused a large number of dead and wounded among French UNPROFOR soldiers. According to a member of the Canadian Military Intelligence Service, the French in Sarajevo had the best-working intelligence system of all UNPROFOR participants, with both Sigint and Imint capacities. According to the Canadians, the French service was the best-organized in Sarajevo: it had an excellent, centrally operated all-source intelligence system that stood head and shoulders above the other services in operational, tactical and strategic terms. The problem, however, was that the French service simply refused to share its intelligence with NATO allies. The Canadian intelligence officials in Sarajevo did however, thanks to the bilingual character of this country and some good personal relations, receive some French intelligence.¹²²⁴

UNPROFOR as target of the US Sigint operations and the British-American animosity

Despite the close relationship within the UKUSA framework, fundamental differences of opinion about Bosnia remained between the Americans and the British. London was particularly disturbed by the wish for a more substantial use of air power, and the US refusal to deploy ground troops. This created animosity between the American and British services, which at one moment led to some of the US intelligence flow to London being cut off. Captain Cooke of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff commented on this:

¹²²¹ Walter Pincus, 'US Sought Other Bosnia Arms Sources', Washington Post, 26/04/96 and James Risen, 'Iran Paid Bosnian Leader, CIA Says', Los Angeles Times, 31/12/96.

¹²²² 'Bonn denies Tehran using German spy gear in Bosnia', Reuters Report, 09/12/96.

¹²²³ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMS. 2nd Corps ABiH to 28th Division, no. 06-05-173/95, 14/06/95.

¹²²⁴ Confidential interview (9).

‘They more or less admitted they were holding stuff back from us; not everything, but really the bits relating to most pronounced political divide. They didn’t feel we took their information about Serb atrocities seriously enough (...) They pushed the stuff which favoured more punitive action against the Bosnian Serbs’.¹²²⁵

In other words, the Americans did not cut off the flow of intelligence completely, but it was gradually reduced. In fact, US ideas for a solution to the Bosnian conflict failed not only to meet with the approval of the British, but also not with the approval of the Canadians and the French for instance. This led to considerable mistrust on the part of the Americans. The consequences were wide ranging: UN traffic became a Sigint target for the NSA. This involved the communications between the military and civil UNPROFOR representatives in Bosnia.

The headquarters of Bosnia Hercegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo and of UNPF in Zagreb were notorious for their ‘near stone age communications’. Generally speaking both headquarters communicated with each other or with the UN via Inmarsat or via the non-secure satellite telephones (VSAT). Moreover, there were initially just four channels available for the entire BHC. According to intelligence experts the UN communications were monitored ‘as a matter of course’.¹²²⁶ There was almost no encryption equipment for links with New York and Zagreb, just a few purely national satellite lines in BHC and the American STU-III satellite telephone for the contacts with NATO in Italy. When General Smith left Sarajevo, for instance, then US Special Forces provided communications with a mobile satellite telephone. This meant, however, that the American services were able to listen in to what Smith discussed on the telephone, and this is just what they did, as Stankovic revealed in his book.¹²²⁷

Moreover, Smith’s staff was convinced that most offices were bugged by Bosnian and Serb services. Some suspected that the nearby US embassy also bugged their conversations.¹²²⁸ This certainly seems possible because the embassy had a special Sigint cell of the NSA, the existence of which was not even known to the Chief of Station who was later assigned to the embassy. Moreover, US intelligence services operated from three containers at Smith’s Sarajevo headquarters: this involved a unit of the Special Collection Service.¹²²⁹ Smith himself regarded his surroundings as non-secure with regard to communications. This is why he did not often correspond with Zagreb. He also assumed that most conversations he conducted at his headquarters were bugged by the Bosnian Intelligence Service.¹²³⁰ Two studies issued by the headquarters of the British troops in Sarajevo, BritFor, in July and September 1995 also assumed that all three of the warring parties had Sigint capabilities. These studies pointed out that the former Yugoslavia had possessed a substantial Sigint organization. Various cases had been noted in which communications traffic to and from UN troops had been intercepted, or jammed. Consequently the Sigint threat was estimated as ranging ‘between medium and high’.

As already described, most UN communications traffic was routed via Inmarsat and VSAT satellite telephones. According to the British, all links via VSAT, Inmarsat and the local post office telephones were completely non-secure. The ‘Tempest’ threat was also rated as high; this involves the scanning of data emissions from computer screens, telephones and telephone cables in a given building from outside the building. In particular the non-secure UN telephones could be used by the warring factions as a suitable means for monitoring data. It was thus recommended that computers be positioned at least three metres away from non-secure telephones. Moreover, power cables and

¹²²⁵ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 241.

¹²²⁶ Confidential interviews (44) and (80). Also: Stankovic, Trusted Mole, p. 459.

¹²²⁷ Stankovic, Trusted Mole, pp. 250-252.

¹²²⁸ Ripley, Operation Deliberate Force, pp. 40-41.

¹²²⁹ Confidential interview (12).

¹²³⁰ Interview with R.A. Smith, 12/01/00.

telephone cables should not run next to each other.¹²³¹ There had been many past cases when a telephone receiver 'on the hook' had been used to monitor conversations in rooms.

The UN's 'secure fax' also had to be regarded as completely insecure and 'compromised' because the UN had lent such a fax machine to the VRS for a while in order to enable communication with Pale from Sarajevo and Zagreb. The experts of the VRS and the VJ are sure to have taken all steps to study this 'secure communications resource' in detail. Moreover, the communications centre regularly made mistakes, such as sending Coded Cables via non-secure fax machines.¹²³² In January 1995 there was not even a secure communications link by fax or telephone between NATO Southern Command Headquarters (CINCSOUTH) and UNPF in Zagreb. In fact it was intentional UN policy not to use secure links; this was permitted only at the very highest level.¹²³³ The former UNPROFOR commander, Rose, claims in his memoirs that his former headquarters in Sarajevo was monitored by US services in 1994-1995. The monitored conversations are said to have been sent directly to the US military leadership in Naples. He also claimed that his communications traffic with the UN headquarters in New York was intercepted by the NSA. According to Rose the Americans did this because they feared he was too sympathetic towards the Bosnian Serbs.¹²³⁴ Rose did not reveal how he was monitored. It would indeed not be surprising if Rose was monitored, because the Americans did not automatically have access to all the general's correspondence. Rose was probably also monitored by the Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Serbs.¹²³⁵ In an interview Rose also claimed that the Bosnian secret service eavesdropped on him.¹²³⁶

Milos Stankovic's book also revealed that the communications links of the highest UNPROFOR commanders were a major target for the US intelligence services. Stankovic worked as interpreter and translator for Rose and later Smith. The Americans provided secure encrypted links between Sarajevo and NATO for General Smith. These conversations normally took place via a secure link, known as the Tactical Satellite Radio (TacSat). This link consisted of two components: a receiver component and a transmitter component. During the time of Rose, and later under Smith, this suddenly became three components. One day a member of General Smith's staff discovered what the third component was for. Smith had just carried out a number of conversations on this TacSat with Washington and London. Then Smith, accompanied by an aide, hurried to the neighbouring US embassy for a meeting. This member of Smith's staff took a look around the embassy building while the general was in the meeting, and suddenly heard Smith's voice coming from a room. It transpired that an American official was making a report of the telephone conversations that Smith had conducted half an hour earlier. Smith's staff then knew for sure: the third component of the TacSat was an extra transmitter, which passed on all calls directly to a receiver at the US embassy.¹²³⁷ After this Smith, to the fury of the Americans, started using a special TacSat of the British SAS for his communications. This worked with the help of an encrypted link, which was difficult to intercept and to break. The NSA is however reported to have managed to do this. It all points to a deep-rooted American distrust of British foreign policy.¹²³⁸

The Americans monitored not only Smith and Rose, but probably the entire UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo. Special 'sweeptams' sometimes came from the UK to Sarajevo to sweep the building clean. But each time new eavesdropping microphones were found, which could however also ¹²³¹ UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 220, File RRFOS/2300-3 Opsec. Memorandum RRFOS, 25/07/95 and 08/09/95.

¹²³² UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 211, BHC Communications to HQ Zagreb, Security Violation, T-040, 30/11/94.

¹²³³ Confidential collection (7), Annan to Akashi, MSC-337, 27/01/95 and G 6 to COS Log, no. G6/94/031, 15/08/94.

¹²³⁴ Rose, Fighting, pp. 72-73; Andrew Gilligan, 'American Satellite Spied on Britain', Daily Telegraph, 01/09/96 and Intelligence Newsletter, no. 347, 26/11/98.

¹²³⁵ Confidential interview (13).

¹²³⁶ Marijnissen & Glastra van Loon, De Laatste Oorlog, pp. 108-109.

¹²³⁷ Stankovic, Trusted Mole, pp. 251-252 and confidential interview (80).

¹²³⁸ Ed Vulliamy, 'How the CIA intercepted SAS signals', The Guardian, 29/01/96 and 'CIA luisterde VN-commandant generaal Rose in Sarajevo af' (CIA eavesdropped on UN commander General Rose in Sarajevo), De Volkskrant, 30/01/96.

have been part of a Bosnian government operation.¹²³⁹ The UNPROFOR headquarters was probably also monitored from the site itself. Under both General Rose and Smith the UNPROFOR compound, which accommodated the headquarters of the British generals, also always hosted three interconnected containers. A forest of antennas projected from this installation,¹²⁴⁰ and only American officers were allowed to enter the containers; no other nationalities were allowed access. The only exception was occasionally made for the Head of the Bosnian Intelligence Service, General Taljan Hajrulahovic. The service that these Americans worked for and the precise nature of their tasks was shrouded in secrecy: no one knew and no questions were asked. It was suspected that this Special Collection Service unit was engaged in 'vacuuming up' all the communications traffic in and around Sarajevo.¹²⁴¹ In this way not only UNPROFOR was monitored, but also the activities of the Mujahideen fighters in Bosnia.¹²⁴²

Another example of the animosity between the Americans and the British was that the NSA intercepted the calls made by General Rose to the Forward Air Controllers in Gorazde. This was done because the Americans had a certain distrust of the British political line in the region. They viewed Rose as pro-Serb because, according to the Americans, he constantly cited instances that the ABiH and the Croatian Army were also guilty of breaking cease-fires and other misdemeanours. In the view of Washington, Rose simply had 'the wrong agenda'; according to the American services General Rose was 'fucking up the script'. They did not trust Rose and suspected that he did not sufficiently encourage his Forward Air Controllers to promptly report Serb violations of the Gorazde Safe Area, and to keep a close watch on the intentions of the VRS. Cooke of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff told Urban this:

'We certainly believed the Americans tapped into communications of that sort (...) the Americans interpreted the threshold for air strikes differently to us. They could use those sorts of interceptions to say the UN knew the Serbs were doing something and didn't react'.¹²⁴³

Another example that seems to indicate major distrust was that the CIA Directorate of Operations had a special cell of about twenty employees whose most important task was to analyse British intelligence reports. The aim here was to establish which agents MI6 or the DIS had recruited in the former Yugoslavia and which other sources the British services had in Bosnia. It should be said that the CIA dismissed this report as absolute nonsense.¹²⁴⁴ It was only in the summer of 1995 that the transatlantic relations were to improve again, but the Americans persisted in not passing all their intelligence on to the British.

The Electronic Intelligence war: the (Bosnian) Serb air defence

It can thus be seen that the cooperation within NATO in the field of Sigint, and above all the sharing of high-level Comint, was not, to put it mildly, all it could have been due to the considerable American distrust of London (and Paris). Things were very different when it came to Elint: here mostly relevant to the interception of radar signals. American operational collection platforms, supplemented by other Sigint equipment, were not only intended to intercept communications traffic. Elint and also Foreign Instrumentation Sigint (Fisint) enabled the NSA to chart the VJ and the VRS air defence systems in detail. It is no surprise that the cooperation in this field was good, in view of the participation of the US Air Force and Navy in operations over Bosnia. American aircraft mostly collaborated closely with aircraft of other NATO allies, so there was a direct interest in sharing Elint. Furthermore, Elint was ¹²³⁹ Stankovic, Trusted Mole, p. 292.

¹²⁴⁰ Interview with A.P.P.M. van Baal, 01/11/01.

¹²⁴¹ Stankovic, Trusted Mole, pp. 251-252 and confidential interview (6).

¹²⁴² James Risen, 'Iran gave Bosnia leader $ 500.000', Los Angeles Times, 31/12/96.

¹²⁴³ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 241 and Mark Urban, 'The Magnum Force', The Sunday Telegraph, 01/09/96.

¹²⁴⁴ Confidential interview (79). See also: Urban, UK Eyes, p. 241.

usually not subject to any political considerations, thus reducing the secrecy constraints and making distribution easier. Cooperation was thus almost perfect in the field of Elint. A constant stream of Elint was sent via NATO's LOCE system to the allies. Radar stations, frequencies, surface-to-air missiles and other air defence systems were charted in great detail and most of the VJ and VRS systems were no secret to the NATO planners.

The analysts had more trouble with the fact that the VRS and the VJ sometimes did not switch on the radars of their air defence systems, or relocated them, in order to avoid discovery. The Elint and Fisint clearly showed that the VRS air defence was operated from Belgrade, and in fact it was commanded and coordinated there too. In the summer of 1995 the American services broke into the Serbian and Bosnian Serb HF and microwave radio networks and established that the headquarters of the VJ in Belgrade was 'feeding the Bosnian Serb anti-aircraft network information on NATO overflights' over Bosnia. Elint showed that Serbian early warning radar sites were stationed on Bosnian Serb territory, and that these tracked NATO flight movements and that this radar data reached the VRS headquarters in Han Pijesak almost in real time.¹²⁴⁵

The VRS had a network of eight large early warning radar sites of Soviet manufacture, as well as Swedish Ericsson Giraffe radars. These covered the Krajina and Bosnia, and thus gave Mladic sufficient warning, in the event of NATO air strikes, to move equipment to safety. The VRS air defence also had advanced early warning systems with which the Bosnian Serbs could monitor the radio traffic of NATO, the UN and the Bosnian and Croatian armies. This radar network, mobile surface-to-air missiles and early warning systems were linked together by a network of more than twenty short-wave relay towers centred around the military headquarters at Han Pijesak. Via links in Han Pijesak and Bijeljina these towers were linked to the VJ air defence network.¹²⁴⁶ Moreover, Bosnian Serb spotters who hung around the air bases in Italy kept a close watch on the movements of NATO aircraft. This information was passed on to Belgrade via amateur radio links.

Electronic intelligence in practice: the shooting down of O'Grady's F-16

One clear instance of the close collaboration between the VJ and the VRS was the shooting down of the aircraft flown by US Captain Scott O'Grady. On 2 June 1995 a U-2R Senior Span Sigint aircraft is reported to have intercepted radar waves from an SA-6 Gainfall surface-to-air missile, of Soviet manufacture, in North-Western Bosnia. This meant that the NSA knew of this threat. One day later O'Grady's F-16 was shot down by a surface-to-air missile of the Bosnian Serbs, close to Banja Luka. According to press reports the NSA intercepts never reached O'Grady: apparently this commander was firmly convinced that there were no surface-to-air missiles stationed in the area over which he was flying. The Russian representative in the UN Security Council had originally doubts about the SAM of Soviet manufacture but Albright told him: 'If something looked like a duck, quacked like a duck and walked like a duck, then it probably was a duck'. Later analyses by the NSA revealed that the U-2 Senior Span had discovered brief radar emissions by the VRS tracking radar, before O'Grady's F-16 was brought down. This intelligence reached Fort Meade in just a few seconds, but never reached the AWACS aircraft that were monitoring O'Grady's mission and checking that no hostile air defence was in the vicinity. This AWACS was not an American aircraft, and as a result it did not have any communications equipment compatible with the warning systems on board the F-16.¹²⁴⁷

Following the shooting down of the American F-16, it was Sigint that gave the first indication that O'Grady was still alive. Sigint aircraft and submarines monitored the VRS military radio traffic, and this provided evidence that O'Grady had survived. This ultimately resulted in a successful operation to get O'Grady out of Bosnian Serb territory alive (see Chapter 2 of Part III of the main Srebrenica report).¹²⁴⁸ Despite the technical causes that led to the failure to prevent O'Grady's F-16 from being downed, the alliance cooperation in the field of Elint was generally good. It has already been concluded that this was much less so regarding the exchange of American high-level military and political Comint. The role played by the Netherlands in this Comint flow has not yet been discussed. This chapter thus concludes with a closer examination of the position of the Netherlands Military Intelligence Service in the field of Sigint.

¹²⁴⁵ Karsten Prager, 'Message from Serbia', Time, 17/07/95.

¹²⁴⁶ Ripley, Operation Deliberate Force, p. 78.

¹²⁴⁷ Dana Priest, 'US Fliers Didn't Get Missile Data: Antiaircraft System Was Detected By NSA', Washington Post, 11/06/95; 'system Failed Downed Pilot, CIA Official Says', Washington Post, 28/06/95; Dana Priest, 'Communications Glitch Blamed in F-16 Downing', Washington Post, 08/07/95 and 'Commander's Comments', Spokesman, May 1996, p. 3.

6. Dutch Sigint in the Bosnian conflict

Between 1992 and 1995 there were three units engaged in Sigint: the First Tactical Air Force Signals Groups (1LVG), the 898th Signals Battalion (898 Vbdbat) of the Royal Netherlands Army, and the Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC) of the Royal Netherlands Navy. In 1996 these three services were merged to produce the Afdeling Verbindingsinlichtingen (Sigint Department, AVI) of the Military Intelligence Service (MIS). Until this time each of the three branches of the Armed Forces intercepted Sigint for itself.

Around 1995 the situation was as follows. The 898th Signals Battalion, with its home base at Eibergen, was then still under direct command of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army. The Sigint material was passed to the MIS/Army. The Sigint units at Eemnes, Zoutkamp and Amsterdam were then under the command of the MIS/Navy. Eibergen concentrated mostly on intercepting military communications traffic on the HF frequency. The TIVC, with its Granger antennas in Eemnes, also concentrated on intercepting international traffic on the HF frequency and also, via two receiving dishes in Zoutkamp, on intercepting signals sent by satellite. The Sigint section of the Air Force, 1LVG, also concentrated on intercepting military traffic on the HF frequency. This section did not however engage in any interception of HF links in the former Yugoslavia.¹²⁴⁹ Interception of Comint was carried out in various ways. The first method is to search the ether, and especially satellite links, with a 'vacuum cleaner'. This is done with the help of a computerized dictionary that can search for key words. Another method was to program computer systems for specific telephone, fax or GSM numbers. If the material received at Eemnes or Zoutkamp was coded then it was passed to the encryption analysis section in Amsterdam, where attempts were made to break the code with computers.

Following the fall of the Berlin Wall the tasks of these three units – i.e. one unit for each branch of the Armed Forces – generally involved the production of operational Sigint for the Netherlands Armed Forces with regard to Sea, Ground and Air Forces in the countries of the former Soviet Union. Another task was to produce strategic Comint; this related to political and strategic decision-making, organized crime, proliferation of nuclear weapons, terrorism and economic developments. This intelligence was produced for the Ministries of Defence, Justice, Foreign Affairs and Internal Affairs. Both the operational and strategic intelligence production was based on the interceptions and subsequent processing by each of the three aforementioned units, combined with shared Comint from foreign partners. It was only following the reorganization in 1996 that the exchange of Comint was also extended to crisis management operations.¹²⁵⁰

At no time during the deployment of Dutchbat did the Army, Air Force and Navy interception services actively focus on the events in the former Yugoslavia. The only exception to this was on 17 July 1994, for one of the three, the 898th Signals Battalion at Eibergen, concentrated on intercepting ¹²⁴⁸ Daniel Williams, 'I'm Ready to Get the Hell Out of Here', Washington Post, 09/07/95 and Richard J. Newman, 'Breaking the Surface', US News & World Report, 06/04/98, p. 30. See for the problems regarding sharing of US national intelligence with US marines supposedly to rescue O'Grady: Margaret S. Macdonald and Anthony G. Oettinger, 'Information Overload', Harvard International Review, Vol. XXIV (Fall 2002) 3, p. 48.

¹²⁴⁹ NIOD, Letter from MIS, Department AVI/BR&C to C. Wiebes, 10/07/00.

¹²⁵⁰ MoD, MIS, HAO to HMID, no. AO 960708, 31/12/96.

military communications. The Commander in Chief of the Army, General Couzy, then gave the unit a task relating to the former Yugoslavia: to produce an overview of the possibilities (or impossibilities) of receiving and recording Yugoslav military communications traffic. It was thus only at a late stage that the Eibergen unit was told to ‘take a look’ at Yugoslavia. The first problem was that the antennas were, as had always been the case, aimed at the East-West confrontation; it has already been discussed in Chapter 3 how it was a ‘mortal sin’ to focus on conflicts that did not fit into a Cold War view of things.¹²⁵¹

Eibergen’s slow turn towards Bosnia

On 14 July 1995, three days after the fall of Srebrenica, the 898th Signals Battalion received the order from Couzy to ‘take a look’ at Bosnia. The Eibergen unit immediately submitted a request for support; supplementary technical material and translation support was urgently needed. In addition, the Western partners were informed that certain interception activities would be halted due to ‘srebrenica’.¹²⁵² It was not until March 1996 – none too late – that Eibergen was actually ‘up and running’; this was when a second Beveradge antenna had been installed. The monitoring station was now able to look south. It needs to be said that Minister Voorhoeve provided little support in this respect. He had little affinity with intelligence in general and with the work of the MIS in particular. He mostly asked why the Netherlands needed to engage in Sigint activities, if foreign services did the same, and whether it couldn’t be done more cheaply. The minister could only be convinced if a successful result was presented from time to time.¹²⁵³

The Deputy Head of the MIS, Lieutenant Colonel A. Bleumink, confirmed that it was only after the summer of 1995, with the help of Comint, that some insight was obtained into communications networks of the VRS and the ABiH. This was only managed with ‘jury-rigging’ methods, because Eibergen’s monitoring installations were oriented towards the east, being the wrong direction. One reason why Dutch Sigint services only gradually abandoned their Cold War mode, and continued to look towards the East, was that the Netherlands would otherwise be left with nothing at all to exchange with its Western allies.¹²⁵⁴

Furthermore, the MIS was faced with a shortage of Serbo-Croat translators. This problem had already been raised in May 1993: the 898th Signals Battalion in Eibergen announced that in order to conduct its tasks it had an immediate requirement for an initially limited interception of communications traffic in the former Yugoslavia, and Serbo-Croat translation capabilities. It was proposed that five members of the 898th Signals Battalion should undertake this training from the start of 1994 onwards.¹²⁵⁵

Ultimately five intercept operators, also active as translators, were assigned to start a six-month training course at the Military Intelligence Service School from May 1994 onwards. Actual interception of communications traffic slowly started in January 1995, with limited use of personnel (ca. six people) who at that time still had relatively poor language skills. These operators worked in a five-shift system, with one interceptor on duty per shift. The translator examined all the intercepted messages fairly quickly, and later translated the most important ones. However, a long start-up phase was required in order to get to grips with the Yugoslav communications traffic. Frequencies needed to be located, for instance, transmitters and units charted, call-signs recognized and the battle order defined. A number of months are required for a Sigint organization to get to grips, even on a basic level, with a region as large ¹²⁵¹ Confidential interviews (21, 22 and 33).

¹²⁵² MoD, MIS, Memorandum: HINL to Wnd. SC-O, no. INL/194/140795, 14/07/95 and Message ‘Change of Targets’ to partners, 13/07/95.

¹²⁵³ Interview with H.J. Vandeweyer, 27/01/00.

¹²⁵⁴ Interview with A. Bleumink, 19/03/01.

¹²⁵⁵ MoD, MIS, File 443.0801. Colonel Bosch, HAI&V MIS/RNLA to Training Command Netherlands Army, no. 21892/1/270593, 18/05/93.

as the Balkans. Two to three years were needed to get the operation running really well. However, it was not until 15 August 1995 that Eiberger made its first tactical military reports on Yugoslavia.¹²⁵⁶

The military and political Comint relating to Bosnia that was nonetheless intercepted while Dutchbat was in that country was primarily intended for the intelligence agencies of the three branches of the Armed Forces (see Chapter 3). According to a MIS member, all relevant information obtained from Comint was passed on (in paraphrased form) via the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff to Dutchbat.¹²⁵⁷ This claim can be doubted, however, because hardly any Comint was available at the MIS.

Research by the NIOD in the Military Intelligence Service archives in The Hague, the former Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC) in Amsterdam and the former 898th Signals Battalion in Eiberger indicates that, prior to the fall of Srebrenica, there were just a few intercepts or integral transcriptions of intercepted signals traffic from Bosnia, and these bore no relation to the attack by the VRS on the enclave.¹²⁵⁸

The archives did however contain standard reports on unidentified military networks in Bosnia. These did not however contain any hard information, but dealt more with procedural traffic. This could in itself be useful to the MIS for localizing and charting certain troop forces. This material was obtained via interception by both the Dutch and foreign sister organizations. None of the data present makes reference to fighting in or around Srebrenica. This could be ascribed to the geographical location of the enclave (in a valley), which made it technically almost impossible to intercept local radio traffic around Srebrenica from Eiberger.¹²⁵⁹ Research in the archives of the First Tactical Air Force Signals Group and the 898th Signals Battalion also shows that, between 9 and 20 July, no information was available on the Drina Corps of the VRS, which carried out the attack on the enclave.¹²⁶⁰

On 15 August 1995 Eiberger started producing and supplying reports. This resulted in reports on the target area, but still in modest quantities. Moreover, the capabilities did not extend beyond military traffic on the HF frequency. Intercepting military VHF traffic in the region was not feasible, as this could not be 'netted' in Eiberger. The shorter the range of the transmitter, the harder it is to intercept this. VHF communications from tanks have a range of about 60 km, for instance, and can only be monitored from aircraft or some satellites. Indeed, no Western partner is reported to have had monitoring equipment on the ground in the Srebrenica area in this period which could have intercepted such short-range traffic. The mountains and the topography also made it harder to intercept the military traffic.

So even from August 1995 onwards the Sigint situation was not good; one should also note that differences between day and night, between summer and winter, and technical factors could also all affect the interception of communications traffic. It was not possible to precisely determine the transmission point of signals. The TIVC, operating with HF interception from Eemnes and satellite interception from Zoutkamp, was not aimed at the Balkans in 1995 either. In the period from 1993 to 1995 the interception capabilities of the TIVC were confined to HF radio traffic and telex communications via satellite. It was not possible to intercept telephone and fax traffic via satellite. Furthermore, between 1993 and 1995 the TIVC exchanged raw interception material with sister organizations; this material comprised intercepted HF and satellite communications traffic (telex material). Fax material was not exchanged during this time.¹²⁶¹

To sum up, some intelligence was exchanged with partners, but since the MIS did not have much to offer it also did not receive a great deal of intercepted Sigint. In addition, the MIS did not focus on the Inmarsat satellite, and it was precisely through this channel that most communications ¹²⁵⁶ Confidential interviews (21) and (33).

¹²⁵⁷ MoD, SMG, Report of interview with Col. Bokhoven, 25/07/95.

¹²⁵⁸ MoD, MIS, Overview report Bureau A-4 to HMID/RNLA, no. 31701/4/130395, 13/03/95.

¹²⁵⁹ Confidential interviews (21), (22), and (33). See also: MoD, MIS, Internal information by mr. D. Bijl to the WOB request from the NOS Journaal, Strictly Confidential, undated (ca. 24/03/99).

¹²⁶⁰ MoD, MIS, Signal days 95190 to 95199.

¹²⁶¹ NIOD, Letter from MIS, Department AVI/BR&C to C. Wiebes, 10/07/00.

were routed, such as the UN communications traffic. Furthermore, the Serbs and Bosnian Serbs made considerable use of encryption equipment, land lines, beam transmitters and one-time pads (codes used one time only) for their most important diplomatic and military traffic. This too made it almost impossible for Dutch services to monitor their traffic or to break their codes. In view of the above, MIS staff admitted that while the events in the Balkans, with the presence of Dutch troops, necessitated a corresponding intelligence response, this response by the Dutch intelligence services in fact came too late.¹²⁶²

What did the Netherlands hear from other western services?

The fact that the MIS had little to exchange is indicated by the following. On 5 October 1995 Minister Voorhoeve had a meeting with his US colleague Perry. Voorhoeve asked him if it was true that the US intelligence community had intercepted a telephone call by Mladic in which the general had requested buses. Perry confirmed that such a request by Mladic was indeed known to the American sources, but left open whether this information had been obtained through intercepts or other intelligence sources. Voorhoeve asked Perry to check the date on which this call had been made, and whether the recipients of the call were the authorities in Pale or in Belgrade. If the request had been directed to Belgrade, it could be concluded that the Serbian authorities were involved in the forced deportation, and could possibly even have been aware of the plans for mass executions. Perry promised that General Shalikashvili would investigate this.¹²⁶³

On 18 October the Americans, via their embassy in The Hague, presented an Information Paper in which they dealt with Voorhoeve's question. The memorandum stated that the US services had no information about a telephone call between Mladic and Milosevic regarding the use of buses for the deportation of citizens from Srebrenica. This answer seems evasive, because Milosevic was, after all, not a bus operator. In such a matter Mladic would have been more likely to have consulted with the General Staff in Belgrade. Voorhoeve had also not asked whether Mladic had spoken to Milosevic, but only whether a telephone call had been intercepted in which the general asked for buses.¹²⁶⁴

Did the MIS have access to calls between Janvier and Chirac?

Nonetheless, reports about this matter reached the NIOD from MIS officers who wished to remain anonymous. These persons reported that calls between Janvier and the French president Chirac had been intercepted during the attack on Srebrenica. The use of Close Air Support for Dutchbat is reported to have been discussed in these calls. In view of the weak information position of the Netherlands in the field of Sigint, it seems rather unlikely that the MIS should be aware of such high-level intelligence. The NIOD has sought indications for this in the archive of the Sigint Department of the MIS. Research in the material of foreign partners was excluded in view of relevant international agreements.

The archiving process in Eibergen is as follows. The intercept operators write down what they intercept, and these handwritten notes are kept for two years. These handwritten notes regarded mostly geographic locations, coordinates and frequencies. They are also kept in another form, in radio logbooks. Everything intercepted electronically is recorded on tape (intercepted conversations) or in the computer. In addition the physical intercepts are stored in the Comint archive. The Yugoslavia archive also contains the messages from the NATO Sigint cell in Vicenza and Naples. This intelligence cell works exclusively on the basis of Comint supplied by the alliance partners.

This author conducted research in Eibergen with the help of a very extensive list of keywords. This was aimed at material from the unit's own archive of Comint, the Yugoslavia archive, the raw ¹²⁶² Confidential information (38).

¹²⁶³ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Report of a meeting between Voorhoeve and Perry, 05/10/95.

¹²⁶⁴ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. US Information Paper, 18/10/95.

Comint archive and other archive material. Keywords (including ‘srebrenica’) were entered for the years 1992 to 1999. This research in the intercepts and reports resulted in a good picture. It transpired that although a great deal of intercepted material is present, very little of it concerns the events around Srebrenica in the summer of 1995. This tallied with the statements in a confidential briefing given to the author. There is some material at Eibergen that concerns Srebrenica, but this can be regarded as non-relevant. There is very little material about the military developments in the region. It is highly probable that foreign-partner material does not contain any intercepted calls between Janvier and Chirac either, because their presence would always have left traces, in disguised form, in the normal MIS reports.

In this way it was established that the claims made by anonymous sources that the Eibergen archive contained intercepts of calls between Janvier and Chirac were not correct. The same went for the archive of the TIVC in Amsterdam and the central Comint archive of the Signals Department in The Hague. This author conducted extensive research in these archives too. On the basis of a large number of relevant keywords a search was made for possibly present intercepted telephone calls, such as between Janvier and Chirac or between Mladic and Perisic. This material was not found in these archives either. Hence it can be concluded that these intercepts are not present in the Netherlands. Another reason why it is unlikely that these intercepts would be present in Eibergen is that the 898th Signals Battalion of the Netherlands Army concentrated only on strictly military networks, not on telephone traffic between UNPROFOR and national governments. In July 1995, however, Eibergen was not even capable of monitoring the military networks in view of the limited interception capacity and technical resources. The same applied to the TIVC of the Netherlands Navy in Amsterdam. It can further be assumed that General Janvier and President Chirac did not talk to each other on an open and non-secure telephone line.¹²⁶⁵

The claim that staff of the MIS have been enjoined to secrecy on this matter, as claimed by one MIS staff member, has not been substantiated. The author was able to speak freely to every staff member. On the basis of research in the MIS archives it can be concluded that if American high-level Comint was available on such conversations, it was not shared with the MIS. Thorough study of the MIS reports, and many interviews, indicated that nothing relating to this matter was exchanged with the Netherlands. In this respect the MIS was treated the same as the services of other alliance partners.

A secret request to the MIS: a suitcase for Dutchbat

The MIS would have been able to acquire a good intelligence position if a secret American offer had been accepted. Staff of American, Canadian, British and Dutch intelligence services confirmed that the NSA intercepted only few conversations in Eastern Bosnia. The Americans had problems with their Comint coverage, although they intercepted fairly large quantities of information. Communications via walkie-talkies presented a problem however, as described in the previous section. This provided an opportunity for the Netherlands. The Head of the MIS/CO Commander P. Kok – he occupied this post from 1 January 1994 to 25 June 1995 – was approached by the CIA representative in The Hague immediately after Kok took up his post at the start of 1994.¹²⁶⁶ Dutchbat I was then about to leave for Srebrenica and the CIA made an offer ‘which you cannot refuse’.¹²⁶⁷

Kok was told the following. The NSA, it appeared, had a serious problem: the service was unable to intercept communications via Motorola walkie-talkies in and around the eastern enclaves. The range of such communications equipment was no more than about 30 km. The Americans wanted to set up an interception network at various points in the Balkans, and envisaged Srebrenica as one of these points. They proposed setting up a reception and transmission installation at a number of OPs in the enclave. This involved equipment with the format of two 'samsonite' suitcases. One suitcase was for interception of the traffic, and the other provided a direct link to an Inmarsat satellite. The intercepted messages would be shared with the MIS. In exchange for this cooperation the MIS was also offered other 'broad' intelligence, taken to mean also Imagery Intelligence.

¹²⁶⁵ MoD, SMG, Report of visit to Lt. Col. A. Bleumink, 09/08/95.

¹²⁶⁶ Confidential interview (78). A request for a confidential interview with this American chief of station was refused by the CIA.

¹²⁶⁷ An initial indication of this operation was received during a confidential interview (6) with a former employee of the NSA.

For Dutchbat, then about to depart for Srebrenica, it would be easy to take along a few suitcases. The Bosnian Serbs would not be suspicious because these looked like normal communications equipment. The Dutch could decide for themselves how many of these suitcases they installed and how many hours a day the equipment would be operated. Two or three soldiers of the Electronic Warfare Company would need to operate the equipment and the Americans would provide a brief training course. Three men would provide round-the-clock coverage. The suitcases would be larger in size than the 'satellite Communication-M' system that had been in service with the Netherlands Army since 1994 and weighed less than 7 kg. The system was usable globally and very user-friendly.¹²⁶⁸

Kok first took this request to a member of the Intelligence & Security Section of the MIS/Army. He asked whether this was a realistic option in technical terms. The official in question confirmed to the author when asked that Kok had talked to him about the American offer for provision of a 'sort of box'. This official thought it was an excellent idea; in his view it would even be possible to camouflage the suitcases.¹²⁶⁹ Another official within the MIS/CO had also heard about this American request. He believed it concerned boxes in which Sigint equipment was hidden. He knew nothing about suitcases, but that was not unusual. Kok always kept such matters concealed from his subordinates.¹²⁷⁰

Kok then approached the head of the MIS/Army, H. Bosch, with this proposal. This was logical since all matters regarding intelligence and the operations of Dutchbat were the responsibility of the Army. Kok went together with Bosch to the Commander in Chief of the Army, General Couzy. The latter was not happy about the idea, however. Couzy said he could not remember the reason for this visit.¹²⁷¹ Bosch, who was to establish a good relationship with Kok, could not remember this incident either. He declared emphatically however that he had full confidence in Kok's account. Bosch, a great advocate of Comint, later tried to convince Couzy again about the usefulness of deploying an Electronic Warfare unit in the enclave, but Couzy rejected this proposal too.¹²⁷²

The CIA, also acting on behalf of the NSA, is said to have asked five or six times between March 1994 and January 1995 whether the MIS would cooperate in this project. Kok always had to reply in the negative.¹²⁷³ Kok was to try five times to get approval from the MIS/Army for this idea. He tried again with Bosch's successor as Head of MIS/Army, Colonel H. Bokhoven. According to Bokhoven, Kok passed this request to him just once; he could not recall that Kok said that he had been approached by the CIA several times. Kok presented this to Bokhoven as a 'spectacular' proposal, but Bokhoven considered that the MIS should not cooperate in this project. He viewed it as an offensive intelligence task that did not fit the context of UNPROFOR, and also felt it was more suitable for the intelligence services of other countries. Bokhoven confirmed to the author that he had refused to cooperate in the installation of these Comint devices in the enclave.

Bokhoven's view was based on his experiences in UNPROFOR: he was afraid that the Bosnian Serbs would discover the purpose of the suitcases and this would compromise him. Kok claimed that following positioning of the suitcases The Hague would receive more American intelligence, but Bokhoven still viewed the risk as too great. Bokhoven informed Couzy of the matter. According to ¹²⁶⁸ See: MoD, MoD LL. Internal memorandum from G-6 OPS/BLS, no. OPS/BLS/1997/6927, 27/06/97.

¹²⁶⁹ Confidential interview (22).

¹²⁷⁰ Confidential interview (25).

¹²⁷¹ Interview with H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

¹²⁷² Interview with J.M.J. Bosch, 10/10/01.

¹²⁷³ Confidential interview (78).

Bokhoven Couzy supported him in his rejection of the offer.¹²⁷⁴ It is remarkable that Couzy can remember nothing of this. He could not recall ever having been approached by Kok, Bosch or Bokhoven about this matter. He could also not recall whether he had ever gone to Ter Beek or Voorhoeve with this proposal. Couzy did however tell the author that Kok could have stuck to his guns and have had him overruled by the Chief of the Defence Staff. This clearly did not happen.¹²⁷⁵

In November 2002 both Defence ministers testified before the Dutch Parliamentary Inquiry into Srebrenica that they were never approached regarding the Sigint suitcases. Both ministers claimed that they would have gone along with this operation.¹²⁷⁶ Former Minister Voorhoeve had earlier already confirmed to the author that he had never received the suitcases proposal. Asked whether he would have cooperated, in view of the poor information situation of Dutchbat, Voorhoeve answered: 'Yes, certainly. The non-defensible position of Dutchbat, and what could happen, caused me to lose sleep from the moment I took office.'¹²⁷⁷ The Secretary-General of the Ministry of Defence, M. Patijn, had never received information about a request from a foreign intelligence service either.¹²⁷⁸ In 2001 Bokhoven still held the opinion that it would not have been possible to keep this operation properly concealed or secret. Even if the suitcases had been camouflaged as normal communications equipment, he thought the Bosnian Serbs would have discovered them and then the equipment would not have reached the enclave. Bokhoven was, and remained, convinced on the basis of his earlier experience in Bosnia that the VRS would have discovered the suitcases. As an example he cited the special encryption communications equipment of the British Joint Commission Observers (JCO) unit in the eastern enclaves. He said that these devices had been brought into the enclave secretly by land or air and not via the normal route in convoys or suchlike, as they would otherwise have been discovered.¹²⁷⁹ Bokhoven is mistaken here however: the British JCO unit had taken along its own communications equipment in its Land Rovers.

For Bokhoven the risk of this secret operation failing seemed real. The secure encryption equipment could then have fallen into hands of the ABiH or the VRS. The only way of transporting the suitcases without drawing attention to them would have been for Dutchbat I to take them along when all other communications equipment went to the enclave. Discovery of the equipment during the presence of Dutchbat would not have been a major problem. If the equipment threatened to fall into the hands of one of the warring factions, it could simply have been destroyed.

Kok finally visited Couzy again with the American request, but on the advice of Bokhoven the latter refused, as recounted, to provide his cooperation. Couzy did not want the MIS to carry out any intelligence or Sigint operations regarding Srebrenica; this related to the fact that Couzy was not particularly intelligence-minded.¹²⁸⁰ Kok did not give up however and made a second direct attempt with Couzy, but the latter once again rejected the idea: no spying for the Americans, he said; this was a peacekeeping mission and not a war. He was not receptive to the Force Protection argument, and the likelihood that this exchange would, in Kok's view, result in much intelligence on a quid pro quo basis. Kok continued to insist this involved equipment of a modest scale would not endanger Dutchbat. Couzy stuck to his previously adopted standpoint: he wanted a strict separation between strategic and operational intelligence. Couzy could not recall anything about this visit either. The possibility that the MIS/Army, responsible for gathering operational military intelligence, would benefit from such an operation was not regarded by Couzy as an argument of sufficient importance.

¹²⁷⁴ Interview with H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01. From April 1994 to December 1995 he was Head of the MIS/Army. Before this in 1993 and 1994 he was Plan Officer in UNPROFOR under General J. Cot.

¹²⁷⁵ Interview with H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

¹²⁷⁶ Testimonies by Relus ter Beek, 14/11/02 and Joris Voorhoeve, 28/11/02.

¹²⁷⁷ Interview with J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 01/10/01.

¹²⁷⁸ Interview with M. Patijn, 28/08/00.

¹²⁷⁹ Interview with H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01.

¹²⁸⁰ Interview with A. Bleumink, 19/03/01.

Kok then went to R.J. Hoekstra, Secretary-General of the Ministry of General Affairs and in this capacity ex officio intelligence coordinator. The latter said that he could do nothing either, and the Deputy Secretary-General of the Ministry of Defence, Barth, also told Kok he could do nothing. Barth was more interested in cutting back the MIS. These events frustrated Kok intensely. By his own account he could not adopt a harder stance than he already had, because everything relating to Dutchbat fell under the authority of Couzy as Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army. Other top officers of the Army did not wish to burn their fingers once Couzy had said 'no'. The Chief of Defence Staff, General A. Van der Vlis, had earlier taken a sympathetic attitude to the MIS/CO, but Kok did not involve him in this operation for Srebrenica. According to Kok, taking along the suitcases would have led to a win-win situation.¹²⁸¹

The MIS actually had another good opportunity to achieve an excellent information position, because most of the official international communications traffic in the region went via the KPN (Dutch Post Office) satellite reception station in Burum, in the northern Dutch province of Friesland. Letters from, for example, Karadzic to General Cot and General Briquemont, sent via the fax of the UNMO liaison officer in Pale, went always via Burum.¹²⁸² According to an employee of a Western foreign intelligence service, such a commercial ground station involved in international communications traffic could have provided valuable intelligence for the MIS.¹²⁸³ The situation in the Netherlands would disappoint this official, however. The KPN had in fact previously broken off all links with the MIS in this field; in the past the KPN had already experienced great difficulties with such proposals.¹²⁸⁴ The MIS did not expect that the government would permit the service to make use of this satellite reception station. This was indeed never proposed, in the belief that Voorhoeve or the government would never agree to it. Voorhoeve may have recognized the importance of Comint,¹²⁸⁵ but he would probably never have agreed to such an operation. Members of foreign intelligence services would doubtless be surprised to hear that the Dutch did nothing to use the possibilities offered by Burum.

Another question is whether the Military Intelligence Service could have managed this technically. When one considers the possibilities of the TIVC in 1993, it must be concluded that this centre could never have intercepted the satellite communications on its own. The organization was not able to intercept Inmarsat satellite traffic, and this was the route taken by all the communications. There was also virtually no chance that the TIVC could have obtained such intercepts in that period through exchange with a sister service, partly due to the refusal of the American offer.¹²⁸⁶ The only serious chance that the MIS probably ever had of obtaining excellent Comint about the VRS and the ABiH was thus the US offer of the suitcases for Dutchbat. This chance was not taken: Couzy refused to cooperate, partly on the advice of the head of the MIS/Army. The chances of the operation succeeding seemed large. Then the MIS and Dutchbat would have been given 'ears' and probably 'eyes' too. It would in any case have brought a major improvement to the weak Dutch intelligence situation and thus to the position of Dutchbat; this would now remain weak right up to the fall of the enclave.

7. Conclusions

With regard to the successes achieved during the war in Bosnia, one can conclude that American, British, French, German and other European services intercepted a great deal of military and political communications traffic. Comint targets included the VRS, the VJ, the ABiH but also the ¹²⁸¹ Confidential interview (78).

¹²⁸² Confidential collection (7), Letter from Karadzic to Cot and Briquemont, R 4574, 25/012/93.

¹²⁸³ Confidential interview (62).

¹²⁸⁴ Cees Wiebes, 'Dutch Sigint during the Cold War, 1945-1994, in: Aid & Wiebes (eds.), Secrets, pp. 243-284.

¹²⁸⁵ Jensen & Platje, De Marid, p. 390.

¹²⁸⁶ MoD, MIS, Memorandum AVI/00/0471, Analysis of the message from Karadzic to Cot of 25 December 1993, 24/03/00.

communications traffic of UNPROFOR. In particular, much interception was conducted in the field of Elint, and Sigint was exchanged between the NATO partners. The Comint seems mostly to have been low level. This too was shared between some NATO member states.

Was high-level intelligence also intercepted?

Members of the American and Canadian intelligence community confirm that high-level diplomatic Comint was also available, but this was not shared with the allies. Probably it was only the Canadians who had access to this, thanks to their special relationship, while the British services – despite the UKUSA alliance – did not. This particular Comint is in fact of less importance to research into the fall of Srebrenica, because plans for the attack on Srebrenica were probably not discussed in these channels. Things are different with regard to high-level military Comint, such as conversations between the Army commanders of the VRS with each other or with the leaders of the VJ. The overriding opinion among many intelligence experts, authors and journalists is that above all the US services, but also German and French intelligence services withheld information regarding the VRS attack. Highly important intercepts revealing prior knowledge of the attack were supposedly not passed on to UNPROFOR and not even to NATO allies, including the United Kingdom and the Netherlands.¹²⁸⁷ This view is opposed by a senior US intelligence official who had access to archival Sigint. When the first articles appeared in the press, such as the one by the journalist Zumach, he went through all the old Sigint archives of the US intelligence services and found nothing that vaguely resembled the intercepts referred to by Zumach. This suggests that the intercepts in question do not exist after all, or that this official had no access to these secret intercepts. However, a large number of those interviewed continue to have doubts, and believe that such intercepts do indeed exist.

This immediately raises two questions. If these important messages were intercepted, why did the intelligence services not pass them on to UNPROFOR? It would be the height of cynicism to suggest that these services wanted Srebrenica to fall into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs. As a senior intelligence official declared to Lane and Shanker: ‘We make mistakes but we don’t withhold information and let people get killed.’¹²⁸⁸ In turn, one can note that at least in Australia people sometimes thought differently about this, in view of the fate of the five journalists executed in East Timor (see Section 2).

It seems more likely that in the case of Srebrenica it was a problem of information not being made available in time, of priorities and of insufficient analysis capacity. This in turn relates to the fact that there were no American, German or French ground troops active in the region. That raises the penetrating question as to whether, if the information had been passed on, the killing of thousands of soldiers and civilians after the conquest of Srebrenica could have been prevented. This question will be returned to in Chapter 8.

One must conclude that high-level intercepts did exist. The evidence for this was provided by the conversation between Gore and Bildt, when Gore read aloud from these intercepts. The NSA will have concentrated chiefly on the international political developments; the question as to whether the intercepts also contained important intelligence about the attack and the later events in Srebrenica must probably be answered negatively. The eastern enclaves did not enjoy a high priority within the US intelligence community. The same went for the GCHQ, which concentrated on Gorazde. The French Military Intelligence Service mostly concentrated on Sarajevo for the same reason. The Comint coverage in Eastern Bosnia was poor, and the VRS is sure to have frequently applied strict communications security. The messages, which the NSA nonetheless intercepted will, due to insufficient analysis and translation capacity, have landed in the ‘pending but not urgent pile’. What remained were items of military Comint. Apart from this, the history of the exchange of Sigint is not exactly encouraging. Since 1945 this liaison has never been optimal, and the exchange of important diplomatic and military Sigint between the countries contributing troops to UNPROFOR and within NATO never took substantial form in Bosnia either. Much Comint was not analysed on time or was not allowed to be distributed due to its high classification – not among NATO allies and sometimes not even to a country's own national commanders. The exchange of Elint did go well, due to the common threat of the (Bosnian) Serb air defence.

¹²⁸⁷ Roy Gutman, ‘Federal Army Tied to Bosnia War Crimes/Serb Leaders ‘Death Camp’ Link’, Newsday, 01/11/95; Richard Norton-Taylor, ‘Inside Story: The Ghosts of Nuremberg’, The Guardian, 28/11/95 and Charles Lane & Thom Shanker, ‘Bosnia: What the CIA Didn’t Tell Us’, New York Review of Books, 09/05/96, pp. 12-13.

¹²⁸⁸ Charles Lane & Thom Shanker, ‘Bosnia: What the CIA Didn’t Tell Us’, New York Review of Books, 09/05/96, p. 11.

Reasons for not sharing Sigint

The reason for any high-level intercepts from VRS or ABiH communications not being shared must thus be sought in the reasons cited in this chapter. Intercepts are always surrounded by the greatest secrecy, meaning that the distribution of the Sigint product is always very limited. Only the highest political and military policymakers have access to high-level Sigint. Only a few are privy to such information, and even then only on a need-to-know basis. Many of the consulted members of the western intelligence community state that this presented a major barrier. During the war in Bosnia between 1993 and 1995, and later during the war in Kosovo, the NSA was faced with problems specifically relating to the exchange of Sigint with its NATO allies. This was mainly caused by the fact that most of the allies were not part of the UKUSA alliance – while not even the United Kingdom was given everything.

An initial summing up of the interception operations in the Balkans was made at a conference of the Armed Forces Communications and Electronics Association in Washington in June 2000. Bill Black, the former head of the European Center of the NSA and later deputy director of the NSA, declared that operations in the region had suffered strongly under the difficulties relating to an effective sharing relationship with allies. Black stated that in the past the NSA had only exchanged information on a bilateral basis, and that the American legislation regarding compartmentalization made it difficult to do the same in a coalition of allies. Bill Nolte, the Former Head of the NSA's Legislative Affairs Office, declared that the 'compartmentalization of intelligence doesn't really work anymore in modern coalition operations'. He also complained about 'the current problems of getting the NSA to modernize both its practices and mentality'. A British speaker said that there was a well-coordinated sharing arrangement between the English-speaking countries, but this was not the case between Washington and other foreign services.¹²⁸⁹ Staff of the Bundesnachrichtendienst are also reported to have complained repeatedly in this context about the American refusal to share really high-level Sigint.¹²⁹⁰

In short, the exchange between the allies in Bosnia (but also Kosovo) was not optimal. This extreme secrecy brought major disadvantages. Sigint often failed to reach the right commanders on the ground because it was decided that this Sigint had a need-to-know classification. As a result the intelligence product was not distributed any further. In fact this had already been the case in the Korean War, but the situation continued in the 1990s. A former intelligence official of the US Air Force, Richard Boyd, stated for instance that the 'intelligence connectivity between Air Force units and the NSA was "not good" in Kosovo'.¹²⁹¹ According to Cooke another problem was that the flow of Sigint and Humint to the Balkan Current Intelligence Group in Whitehall was often sufficient to give good briefings to ministers. The most important limitation of Sigint is the enormous flow of information in relation to an insufficient analysis capability. Many customers of the NSA product complained in mid-1995 that the NSA was not able to meet the needs of the intelligence consumer.

¹²⁸⁹ 'How Co-operation in Balkans Works', Intelligence Newsletter, 29/06/00.

¹²⁹⁰ Udo Ulfkotte, 'Die Nato ist im bilde, doch gibt sie nur wenig preis', Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 10/04/99 and confidential interviews (99) and (100).

¹²⁹¹ 'How Co-operation in Balkans Works', Intelligence Newsletter, 29/06/00.

Moreover, the NSA is reported to have had a poor relationship with the Pentagon, which often complained about the unwillingness of the NSA to share Sigint for fear of compromising the source.¹²⁹²

The limited usefulness of Sigint sometimes prevented the taking of practical action. This was the case in Bosnia too. Even the supply of British Comint to UK commanders was a problematic affair. Cooke, responsible for Bosnia at the DIS, was clear about this: ‘the usual rules on the dissemination of sensitive reports further limited what was given to troops serving in-theatre.’ But British commanders in UNPROFOR felt this lack of intelligence and often had to fall back on open sources intelligence to get a good intelligence ‘picture’.¹²⁹³

In the case of Bosnia the disadvantages of Sigint probably outweighed the advantages. The disadvantages were: an avalanche of intercepted data; the lack of sufficient translators and analysis capability; and the limited possibilities of interception due to cryptography, secure links via land lines, the nature of the terrain and atmospheric conditions. In particular the interception of the most common form of communications traffic in Bosnia, the walkie-talkie, presented serious problems. In September 1995 an American commission established that some of the ‘limiting factors identified in tactical Sigint were outside the range of technical fixes – the fact that the former Yugoslav forces practice very good Communications security/Operational security and the shortage of Serbo-Croatian linguists’. It also established that the result of tactical Sigint (especially HF and VHF) had been inadequate.¹²⁹⁴

Another reason for not passing on intelligence could have been the aftermath of the open British support for Bush’s presidential campaign and the dominant opinion in Europe about how the Balkans crisis could best be solved. The more or less neutral attitude taken by London and Paris towards the Balkans conflict was not properly appreciated.¹²⁹⁵ The US-UK animosity led to the Americans gradually reducing the flow of information from their side. The tap was not totally shut off, for that would have been in conflict with mutual agreements. But the flow slowly became less and of poorer quality, and the processing time was longer. Canadian intelligence officials, who still received this US intelligence, confirmed that the Americans imposed these limitations. They declared that the Americans had also reduced the flow of intelligence in the past, for instance during the Gulf War.¹²⁹⁶ A Canadian official confirmed that 85 percent of all intelligence from the United States ‘was stamped Can-US Only’, chiefly to keep the British out of the circuit. According to this official London reacted to this by reducing the intelligence flow to the other side of the Atlantic too.¹²⁹⁷

Despite all the resources employed by the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Austria and other countries, and despite all the successes apparently achieved, it must provisionally be concluded that little Sigint landed on the desks of policymakers and of UNPROFOR commanders. Members of the British intelligence community claim that if American high-level intercepts did exist, they were definitely not passed on to UNPROFOR. Officers of UNPROFOR were noticeably bitter about this cynical behaviour by the US ally.¹²⁹⁸ A former UNPROFOR intelligence officer said in this respect that his organization ‘lost ownership of the picture of the battlefield to the point where it was irrecoverable’.¹²⁹⁹

This non-sharing by the Americans involved both strategic and tactical Sigint. With respect to the latter an US military expert said: ‘NATO-releasable Sigint reporting consistently was a day late and a dollar short. It often comprised only marginally useful information as much as three to four days old.’

¹²⁹² Matthew M. Aid, ‘The Time of Troubles: The US NSA in the Twenty-First Century’, in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 15 (2000) 3 pp. 17-20.

¹²⁹³ Urban, UK Eyes, p. 217.

¹²⁹⁴ Zachary Lum, ‘Balkan Eyes: Airborne Recon over Bosnia’, in: IED On-Line, November 1995. For this see: <http://jed-prod.weblabs.com/jed/hml/new/now95/feature.html>.

¹²⁹⁵ Confidential interview (47).

¹²⁹⁶ Confidential interviews (62) and (90).

¹²⁹⁷ Confidential interview (9).

¹²⁹⁸ Ian Bruce, ‘US let safe haven fall. US knew of Serb build-up’, The Herald, 24/10/95.

¹²⁹⁹ Smith, New Cloak, p. 210.

He concluded that in Bosnia Humint formed a much more valuable, precise and rapid source of tactical military intelligence, as compared to Sigint.¹³⁰⁰ His remark related to the SFOR period, following the Dayton Accord. It can safely be assumed that the situation was no better before the summer of 1995, as at this point no American ground troops were present in Bosnia. It can be concluded that much intelligence material gathered through national strategic platforms, such as satellites and special aircraft, was simply not automatically provided to UNPROFOR.

Akashi confirmed this to Annan. Some of the countries that had contributed troops did indeed have access to a 'very large pool of detailed tactical and strategic intelligence'. After all, Yugoslavia was the object of scrutiny by all intelligence services. Akashi said that a large part of the intelligence gathered by the leading troop-contributing nations was indeed Sigint, 'the most jealously guarded of all intelligence products'. In the case of the US, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand this is governed through the UKUSA alliance, and 'sharing outside this agreement is simply not possible', according to Akashi.¹³⁰¹

It is also important that UNPROFOR, and probably Akashi himself, were important American and European monitoring targets. Not only was the communications traffic of the Generals Rose and Smith intercepted; their headquarters in Sarajevo, and that of Janvier in Zagreb, were permanently monitored with special eavesdropping equipment. In this respect the headquarters and the communications traffic with New York, Zagreb, Geneva and other capitals was also a relatively easy target, as virtually nothing was done to raise communications security. After all, the UN was an open and transparent organization. This made it possible, for instance, for a Scandinavian service to intercept the communications between various Dutch units,¹³⁰² and the Danish Military Intelligence Service managed to monitor telephone conversations between Rose and Mladic.¹³⁰³

Bosnia was an 'intelligence carnival' with dozens of intelligence actors, all seemingly operating independently of each other in the area of SIGINT. In this respect it is only fair to say that SIGINT was given to different UN intelligence officers in Zagreb and Sarajevo, but to them where it was coming from and in what form it was being received was not clear. It is also indisputable that the vast majority of the raw intelligence that was being provided to UN forces in Bosnia came from US sources, including much of the low-level SIGINT. However, the complaints were often that there was no source information attached to the intercepts, so the consumers in Bosnia had no idea where it was coming from, how reliable it was, etc.

But it is easy to have critique on Washington DC. For instance, why did the European Sigint organizations contribute so little to UNPROFOR? The Germans, French, Brits, Austrians, Italians, etc. all conducted extensive Sigint collection in and with respect to Bosnia. However, this material was hardly forwarded to UNPROFOR or the Dutch but mostly used in support of their own forces in Bosnia and not for sharing with the smaller nations participating in the Bosnia peacekeeping operation. There is much in this chapter about NSA's history of failing to liaise with NATO allies. However, the truth is also that British, French, German, Austrian or other national Sigint services operating in and with respect to Bosnia were any better than the Americans in providing comparable Sigint. The 'simple' answer probably must be that they were just as 'bad' as the Americans, which should be one of the lessons of Bosnia from an intelligence standpoint. It was not until Kosovo in 1999 that the system was partially repaired through greater sharing of intelligence, including Sigint. But this was a NATO operation rather than a UN sponsored operation.

¹³⁰⁰ Lt. Col. George K. Gramer, Jr., USA, 'Operation Joint Endeavor: Combined-Joint Intelligence in Peace Enforcement Operations', Military Intelligence, October-December 1996, p. 13.

¹³⁰¹ UNNY, DPKO, UNPROFOR, Akashi to Annan, Z-1189, 18/07/95.

¹³⁰² Interview with J.M.J. Bosch, 10/10/01.

¹³⁰³ Interview with H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

The role of the Netherlands: no to the suitcase operation

The Netherlands MIS hardly played a role in this Sigint war between 1992 and 1995. The service, and thus also the Ministry of Defence, were completely dependent on the intelligence that allies were prepared to exchange. Since the MIS had almost nothing to offer, however, this exchange remained very limited. The MIS could have played an important role if the secret American proposal for Dutchbat to take Comint suitcases into the enclave had been accepted. If true that the CIA made this offer five or six times, then it can be concluded that the US services themselves clearly were not achieving good results. Following each refusal the Americans came back to ask again; this is an indication that they were apparently not able to intercept the short-range communications traffic from satellites, U-2R aircraft or other aircraft. This was confirmed by British and Canadian intelligence officials. Flights by the U-2R did not provide much useful intelligence either. The main reason for setting up one intelligence cell, the Deployed Shed Facility in Naples, was therefore because the NSA had major gaps in its Comint in Bosnia.¹³⁰⁴

The US services were obviously desperate to change the situation; this meant that if the Dutch had agreed to the suitcases operation, the Americans would presumably have done everything they could to maintain friendship with the MIS. Agreeing to the operation would probably also have resulted in the MIS being able to give Dutchbat ‘ears’ and perhaps also ‘eyes’ in Srebrenica. The ‘ears’ would have been the capability to monitor VRS and ABiH radio traffic in and around the enclave, and ‘eyes’ would have been provided because the CIA, as part of the exchange of intelligence, would probably have also been able to share aerial photographs – which the Canadians had also been able to access. This would have given the MIS a strong position of power; if the Americans had not kept to their promises, then turning off the switch would have been an effective threat.

Turning to the opinion of the former head of the MIS that the Bosnian Serbs would not have let this monitoring equipment through, one can note that it is unlikely that the VRS soldiers who manned the checkpoints would really have been capable to judge whether the suitcases were intended for communications or for monitoring equipment. The entire interception capability was contained in the software supplied with the package: the equipment itself looked like a normal transmitter and receiver. It would have been easy to ship in a few suitcases with the arrival of Dutchbat I, because Dutchbat I was allowed to take its own communications equipment in the normal manner.

For national use the Royal Netherlands Army had already provided a coded telephone and fax for the commander of Dutchbat, for the Defence Crisis Management Centre and the Army Crisis Staff in The Hague, for the Dutch Deputy Commander of Sector North East in Tuzla, Colonel C. Brantz, and for General Nicolai of Bosnia Hercegovina Command.¹³⁰⁵ During the fall of the town this satellite telephone worked well. This sophisticated technology was packed in six suitcases;¹³⁰⁶ and if these could be taken into the enclave, then why not the American suitcases? The only answer to the question why the suitcases were not permitted to be taken in was because the ‘top brass’ of the Netherlands Army did not wish to allow this type of operation. Refusing the deployment of their own national Sigint assets in Bosnia meant that DutchBat was cut off from an important flow of intelligence. Would the Netherlands have been unique as a smaller member of NATO by deploying their own assets? Not at all because other smaller members of NATO like Denmark had already deployed their own national assets with respect to Sigint in Bosnia. Refusing the American offer was not wise and shortsighted.¹³⁰⁷ Therefore it is very difficult to understand why general Couzy until this day is defending this decision.¹³⁰⁸

¹³⁰⁴ Confidential interview (22).

¹³⁰⁵ MoD, CRST. G-6 RNLA Crisis Staff to CS Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, 09/05/95.

¹³⁰⁶ ‘Binnen halve minuut is Dutchbat thuis’ (Dutchbat home in half a minute), Haagsche Courant, 13/07/95.

¹³⁰⁷ Interview with General T. Lyng, 29/10/99.

¹³⁰⁸ Testimony of General H. Couzy before the Netherlands Parliamentary Inquiry into Srebrenica, 21/11/02.

Chapter 6

The Signals Intelligence War of the Warring Factions

‘A huge human mass of about 5,000 concentrated around Cerska and Kamenica. So many, you can’t kill them all...’ quoted from a Bosnian intercept of a conversation between VRS soldiers, 17 July 1995.

1. Introduction

The key role played by intercepted conversations during the conflict in Bosnia came to light in the spring of 2001 when the commander of the Bosnian-Serb Drina Corps, General Radislav Krstic, was standing trial in The Hague. At the Yugoslavia Tribunal a tape was played on which – according to the prosecution – Krstic could be heard issuing orders to eliminate groups of Bosnian Muslim prisoners. This message had been intercepted by the ABiH and was now being used as evidence against Krstic. One speaker on the tape identified himself as Krstic and was addressed as ‘General’ by the other speaker. The prosecution claimed that this was a recording of a conversation that took place on 2 August 1995 between Krstic and Lieutenant-Colonel Dragan Obrenovic, Chief of Staff of the VRS Zvornik Brigade. At that moment the Zvornik Brigade was scouring an area in search of ABiH soldiers, which were heading from Srebrenica to Tuzla. One voice on the tape said that Muslims were still being taken prisoner now and then. The other voice, allegedly that of Krstic, issued orders such as ‘Kill all in turn’ and ‘Don’t leave a single one alive’.

This incriminating intercept was immediately challenged by Krstic himself and his lawyers, but the prosecution had a trump card up its sleeve in the form of an identical recording of the same call registered at another Bosnian interception station. The ABiH had intercepted the same call from two different stations: Okresanica and Golija.¹³⁰⁹ So, it looked as if it had been monitored by both stations on 2 August 1995. The operators had recorded it on an audio tape and then entered it in their logbooks. Their notes were later typed out and sent on to army headquarters for further analysis.

It never became clear during the trial why these intercepts were not introduced as evidence against Krstic until November 2000.¹³¹⁰ One possible explanation is that at the end of 1999 the ABiH was still busy working out transcripts for the benefit of the Tribunal.¹³¹¹ One former ABiH general said that it was a miracle, or sheer coincidence, that the tapes had survived at all, as the ABiH archives had suffered serious fire and water damage in 1998.¹³¹² During the conflict in Bosnia it was not only the US, Canadian and European services that used Communications Intelligence (Comint). The Serbs, the Bosnian Serbs and the Bosnian Muslims also used it to obtain important advance information on military operations and activities. This chapter explores the resources and capacity of the VJ (Vojaska Jugoslavij, the Yugoslav Army), the VRS and the ABiH as they fought out a Sigint war alongside a ‘normal’ war. The main reason for investigating the signals war is that, insofar as can be determined, the following question has never been addressed at the Yugoslavia Tribunal or by the reports on Krstic’ trial in the international and domestic press or by current affairs programmes on radio and television.

If the Bosnian Muslims had intercepted calls relating to the attack on Srebrenica, the hunt for the column of men and boys, and the orders to kill everyone and carry out mass executions – calls ¹³⁰⁹ It is somewhat strange that Golija was mentioned; this lies in Western Bosnia and, given its distance from Srebrenica, it is hard to believe that the communication around the enclave was intercepted.

¹³¹⁰ ‘srebrenica Trial - Expert witness assesses key radio intercept evidence’, in: IWPR’s TRIBUNAL UPDATE 214, March 19-24, 2001.

¹³¹¹ Interview with S. Arnautovic, 05/11/99.

¹³¹² Confidential interview (73) and interview with S. Arnautovic, 05/11/99.

made by Krstic and other Bosnian Serbs – why did they not loudly announce this to the world in the summer of 1995? It is after all very hard to believe that the Bosnian signals services would have listened in ‘live’ to the killing of their friends, colleagues and perhaps even members of their family without raising the alarm. To be sure, world-wide publication of these intercepted messages might have saved a lot of lives and prompted the Bosnian Serbs to halt their atrocities. Before addressing these questions and drawing conclusions it is important to shed light on the intelligence capacity and the targets of the hostile parties.

Section 2 will discuss the Signals Intelligence (Sigint) operations of the VJ and the VRS; it will describe the resources that the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs had at their disposal, the ways in which they cooperated and the ABiH communication traffic that was intercepted by the Sigint units of the VJ and the VRS. The VJ and the VRS will be discussed in the same section because many documents and interviews have revealed that they cooperated closely on this type of intelligence.

Section 3 will concentrate on the Sigint operations of the ABiH. These appeared to be of high-quality, as demonstrated by the tape produced at the trial of General Krstic. It will also describe which Bosnian-Serb communication traffic the ABiH was able to intercept. Section 4 will answer the pressing question of whether the ABiH was able to follow these conversations in real time. In other words, were the intercepted messages and conversations directly available to the recipients of the intelligence product? And, if so, why did the Bosnian politicians and military commanders then decide to do nothing with this highly volatile intercepted communication? Why did they keep it under wraps and only reveal it years later to the researchers of the Yugoslavia Tribunal in The Hague?

This section will also deal with the exchange of Comint with UNPROFOR. Between 1992 and 1995 the ABiH and the Bosnian politicians wanted more western involvement in the war on the ground. They could have achieved this by throwing their intercepts into ‘the fight’ at UNPROFOR, but they would have had to be able to produce them at that moment, specifically those on the attack on Srebrenica and the flight to Tuzla by the Muslim soldiers. The VRS and ABiH had each other as Comint target. However, all the warring factions, including the VJ, also had a common target, namely, UNPROFOR units in general and Dutchbat in Srebrenica in particular. Section 5 will therefore consider UNPROFOR and Dutchbat as a Comint target for all the warring factions. Section 6 will draw some conclusions on this local Sigint war.

2. The Signals Intelligence War of the VJ and the VRS

The following extract is taken from a secret the British report of August 1995.

‘The former Yugoslavia had a considerable Signals Intelligence organization. The present location of Signals Intelligence assets cannot be accurately ascertained, but it must be assumed that all three Warring Factions have an intercept capability. There are recorded examples of limited Warring Faction intercept and jamming against UN troops. The Communications Intercepts threat has to be considered medium to high’.¹³¹³

It appears therefore that UNPROFOR knew about the excellent Sigint operations and capacity of the VJ. Certain background details can be established about this capacity.¹³¹⁴

The VJ (formerly the JNA) set great store by Sigint materiel and capabilities during the Cold War. In the 1980s the equipment was radically modernized to bring it up to western standards. This modernization programme took place under the code name Arios. Between 1989 and 1991 the VJ obtained the components for four Arios electronic warfare systems. Each system consisted of 14 vehicles which, during the conflict, had to collect Sigint across a 50-kilometre front. At the heart lay the Watkins Johnson WJ-8955 Electronic Support Measures System. During the conflict in the Krajina in 1991 the VJ used this system to launch artillery attacks on Croatian targets within one minute of a Croatian radio transmission. At the same time, it had enough supplies of older materiel which could be lent to the VRS, the army of the Bosnian Serbs. This consisted largely of French, Japanese, Swedish and older Russian systems. Some of the special equipment had been purchased in the USA by rich Serb businessmen who then smuggled it into Yugoslavia.

¹³¹³ UNGE, UNPROFOR, File RRFOS/2300-3 Opsec, Memorandum RRFOS, 25/07/95 and 08/09/95.

¹³¹⁴ The information which follows on the Sigint of the VJ is taken from confidential interviews (5), (6) and (73) and the MoD, MIS, Report by the Dutch NIC, 04/02/99. The information dates from October 1998. See also: http://www.vj.yu/vojska_e/struktura/vidovi/kov/.

Before the conflict broke out in Bosnia the Serbs had all the Comint on hand: this comprised a complete system with defence attachés, Signals Intelligence (Sigint), Human Intelligence (Humint), Electronic Intelligence (Elint), Radar Intelligence (Radint) and direction-finding. Most of the equipment came from Japan and was assembled in Hungary. The Hungarian firm of Videoton was especially involved in this. This firm also helped to build special Sigint trucks for the VJ. The VJ acquired other crypto equipment from Siemens, but developed its own crypto systems later on the basis of the Siemens products. It set up its own institute for this purpose.

There were Sigint units in Izvor and Vranje with targets in Macedonia and the Adriatic. Sigint stations were set up in Valjevo and Vojvodina for operations against Bosnia and Croatia. Permanent interception stations were established in Batajnica with a staff of around sixty, which battalions were under the direct command of the VJ General Staff. This site was unquestionably the most important HF site and was also responsible for direction-finding; other sites were situated in Novi Sad, Podgorica, Kraljevo and Pirot. The interception station in Batajnica analysed the intercepts of domestic and foreign telephone lines as well as diplomatic communication, data transmission and encrypted digital traffic. It is not known whether the VJ was able to decode this; but it was considered unlikely in NATO circles as far as high-level communication was concerned.¹³¹⁵

Western embassies in Belgrade will also have been key targets for Comint. It is known, for instance, that Serb intelligence services monitored communication from the Australian Embassy.¹³¹⁶ UNPROFOR and later SFOR¹³¹⁷ and IFOR were, at any rate, important Comint targets. The operators were trained at Banjica military academy in Belgrade. The time taken for intercepting, processing and sending the report to the Ministry of Defence ranged from 20 minutes to two hours. This station was also able to send important intercepts direct to Belgrade via secure land lines. Another important Sigint listening post was situated on top of a mountain in Kutlovo. In addition to all of this, the VJ had the so-called 109th Electronic War Battalion, stationed in Prokuplje, at its disposal. This battalion had, in turn, various Sigint detachments at diverse locations. Its operations included analysis, communication traffic and radar detection.

In addition, the VJ used mobile interception trucks, which monitored and registered specific frequencies. These trucks were constantly on the move from one location to another and did not, as a rule, stay longer than two days in the same spot. They had to follow and intercept tactical military frequencies at the front. Most of the intercepted traffic was recorded on tape and analysed at brigade level. Decisions were also taken at this level on the number of Sigint trucks allocated to each sector.

During the conflict in Bosnia the Serbian air force also had access to special Sigint aircraft. For example, the VJ had a squadron of twelve special MIG-21 planes. This squadron, which was fitted with 'pods' on the underside of the aircraft, carried out Imagery Intelligence (Imint) and Sigint tasks from the air base in Ponikve and Belgrade. These aircraft carried out a maximum of five reconnaissance missions a day. The special Obrva Soko aircraft were also used for Sigint missions. UHF/VHF radio ¹³¹⁵ Confidential interviews (6), (8) and (13).

¹³¹⁶ P.J. Spielman, 'ABC TC Yanks Lead Story on Aussie Spying on Chinese Embassy', in Associated Press Worldstream, 25/05/95.

¹³¹⁷ See for example: Alix Kroeger, 'Bosnian Serbs eavesdrop on NATO', BBC News, 23/05/02. The sites Prijedor and Livno were mentioned: 'UN Radio Headlines, UN Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, 28/05/02 and 'sFOR Block Livno Telecommunications Center', FBIS-EEU-2000-1120, 20/11/00.

messages, which were intercepted using Yugoslav and Russian equipment, were taped but were not directly relayed to a ground station. It was not until the end of a mission that the tapes were analysed. These MIGs were stationed at Ladjevci air base near Krajevo in Serbia. They were often moved to keep them out of sight of US spy satellites and U-2 missions. Sometimes, they flew over the Drina for operations above Bosnia. The VJ also used special Elint freight aircraft.¹³¹⁸

Like Croatia, Serbia had special UAVs (unmanned aerial vehicles) for Sigint operations. Before the war these were stationed in Bihac, and some of them fell into Croat hands. They were originally made in East Germany and ran on MIG 21 engines. They took off like a jet and could stay in the air between 45 and 60 minutes. The Yugoslav Navy had a special Sigint ship which was initially stationed in the port of Split but which was later transferred to Kotor in Montenegro. This ship was equipped with both Comint and Elint capabilities and was used constantly to monitor UNPROFOR and NATO traffic. During the war in Kosovo the VJ also used Sigint to mislead NATO. Special units were assigned the task of sending out disinformation. It was not possible to ascertain whether this also took place during the conflict in Bosnia, but it cannot be ruled out.

The VJ was the first organization responsible for Sigint in Serbia and had specially trained personnel for this purpose. Each worker was allocated a specific set of frequencies and had to tape the most important messages. The interceptor noted the time of interception and the subject of the message. He then took his notes and the tape recording to his superior for analysis. The interception station then informed the commanders of the other military units, who decided whether or not to inform the president. Routine military intercepts were sent direct to a brigade for analysis. If the messages turned out to be highly important, they were sent on immediately to the Commander-in-Chief via secure land lines. Every week, President Milosevic received a two-hour intelligence briefing, which included Sigint. Milosevic considered Comint especially important to the political and military decision-making process. He would have received tapes of, among other things, the telephone calls between Izetbegovic and political and military policy-makers in Washington.¹³¹⁹ He supposedly also heard telephone calls made by Karadzic. This led him to conclude that Karadzic was only using the Krajina as a concession to Mladic in exchange for areas in Bosnia: Karadzic knew that, in terms of military strategy, Mladic was more attached to Western Bosnia and the Krajina. Karadzic himself was more interested in Eastern Bosnia as it was geographically contiguous with Serbia.¹³²⁰

The telephone traffic between the enclave Srebrenica and Izetbegovic was also monitored. On 22 April and 4 May 1994 the VRS intercepted and allegedly taped two calls between Naser Oric and Izetbegovic in which Oric announced a military offensive. The two men also discussed the humanitarian situation in the enclave.¹³²¹ Oric was in permanent contact with the General Staff in Sarajevo and sent them reports on a regular basis.¹³²²

The VJ assisted the VRS by giving them old equipment. Up to the Dayton Accord VRS officers could participate in the special Sigint training in Belgrade. Afterwards, the VJ stopped this, saying that the VRS could not afford to pay for the training. Between 1993 and 1995 the VRS and the VJ cooperated closely in Sigint and Elint. Intelligence on NATO air strikes were especially shared in full; this gave the VRS time to switch off their radar systems and bring certain installations to safety (see also Chapter 7). The Krajina Serbs were also connected to this warning system and had excellent Sigint capabilities. Nevertheless, the bombings inflicted serious damage on the VRS Comint and Elint systems¹³²³, which made the VRS even more dependent on the VJ for Sigint. When the conflict was ¹³¹⁸ Confidential interview (73).

¹³¹⁹ Berislav Jelinic, 'Croatian citizen is the primary financier of both Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic', in: Nacional, Issue 294, 05/07/01.

¹³²⁰ Confidential interview (95).

¹³²¹ MoD, *Sitrap*s. HQ DutchBat to HQ SNE, 15/05/94.

¹³²² Report of a meeting with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia Committee for Compiling Data on Crimes against Humanity and International Law, Belgrade, 11/06/98.

¹³²³ For a photo of the elimination of such a communication antenna see Lutgert & De Winter, Check The Horizon, p. 445.

underway the VRS could sometimes call upon the Serb planes operating from Banja Luka, where some 40 or 50 aircraft were stationed, some with Sigint capabilities. According to a ABiH general, the MIGs could do very little or nothing at all because of the No-Fly Zone.¹³²⁴

Like the VJ, the VRS had a network of permanent interception stations at diverse locations. This was based on a detailed plan for the communication traffic of the Bosnian Serbs, which went under the code name of Vatra (Fire).¹³²⁵ The interception device that was used most by the VRS was the RPK-3. It also used Hungarian-made Sigint trucks which had come from the VJ. Bosnian military sources claimed that the Hungarians had always had excellent technical equipment. These trucks were converted by the VJ and fitted with the most suitable equipment. These trucks were capable of intercepting two HF, four VHF, and two air force frequencies.

Furthermore, the VRS had special scanners, which could easily intercept tactical intelligence at battalion level. A former ABiH general claimed that the VJ and VRS also had special helicopters with Sigint and Imint capabilities at their disposal. Some Bosnian Serb MIG-21s had Sigint as well as Imint equipment on board. The information would allegedly be relayed directly to the special Sigint trucks.¹³²⁶ Comint turned out to be a crucial source of information for the VRS. A VRS document dated 1993 shows that 70% of all intelligence received by the VRS high command came from Sigint.¹³²⁷ The main intelligence targets of the VJ and the VRS were the radio connections of the ABiH. When the conflict erupted, the VRS seized the Stolice tower to the north of Tuzla. This tower was the axis of all the communication traffic in Eastern Bosnia. The VRS cut off all the connections between Bosnian territory and Eastern Bosnia, with the result that Tuzla became isolated. It then cut off all connections with Croatia, Sarajevo, and Srebrenica.

Until early July 1993 this communication tower was still being used by the ABiH. At that time the telephone connection ran from Tuzla via the Stolice Tower to Srebrenica; this line was definitely tapped by the VRS. After that, the communications of the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla ran to Sarajevo via Konjuh and to Croatia via Okresanica. When the main centre of communication, the Stolice Tower, fell into the hands of the VRS, the number of ABiH phone lines fell from 1080 to only 24.¹³²⁸ After the tower had been seized, the ABiH made several attempts – also with the aid of tanks – to destroy it, but without success. It did, however, manage to inflict some damage.¹³²⁹ Thereafter, the 2nd Corps switched to high voltage cables for their communication. Most likely, the lightning conductors were used for connections.¹³³⁰ This gave the ABiH access to a few extra channels for which special equipment was used. This type of telephone connection was set up mainly with Sarajevo because the high-voltage cables with Croatia were severed. In addition, there were underground telephone cables between Tuzla and Srebrenica and between Srebrenica and Sarajevo, which were probably destroyed by the VRS during the conflict. There were no separate telephone lines for the army.

The VRS units responsible for electronic warfare did not have such a difficult job, as the ABiH had no special receivers. Most of the units, including the 28th Division in Srebrenica, used a YEASU FM Receiver FT-411E. This was a Japanese-made walkie-talkie which worked on the 144 - 146 MHz frequency. It had a range of between five and ten kilometres and a capacity of 2 Watts. The VRS could monitor this traffic because it normally operated with the same equipment or with Motorolas, which could intercept the YEASU. Though the YEASU had a small aerial, the 28th Division could still reach Tuzla from the enclave if they used an extended aerial (such as a wire in a tree) on the top of a mountain. Initially, an extended aerial was mounted on the roof of the Telecom building in Srebrenica;

¹³²⁴ Confidential interview (73).

¹³²⁵ Cekic, Aggression, p. 199.

¹³²⁶ Confidential interview (73).

¹³²⁷ Judgement in the Krstic Trial, § 112, p. 41.

¹³²⁸ For suspicions: MoD, MIS/Bakker Commission, Vreman to Van Dijk, Debriefing report, 09/03/95.

¹³²⁹ Confidential interview (73). See also: MoD, Sitrap, HQ SNE to BHC, Sitrep, 29/06/94.

¹³³⁰ MoD, MIS/Bakker Commission. Vreman to Van Dijk, Debriefing report, 09/03/95.

later treetops were used. Throughout the conflict the ABiH purchased this version of the YEASU in consignments of twenty, costing approximately DM 25,000.¹³³¹

The Electronic Warfare units of the VRS also had to intercept the permanent ABiH transmitter in Srebrenica. This was a RUP-20 transmitter and receiver, which was used in 1992 and had a range of around 50 kilometres. The RUP had a capacity of 20 Watts and operated on a frequency of 2-20 MHz. A second transmitter came later. Still later, the Presidency of the town, Opstina, obtained a RUP-12 with a range of 12-15 kilometres and a capacity of 2 Watts which operated on a VHF of 30-70 MHz.¹³³² The ABiH used two other extra communication systems. HF traffic with ABiH headquarters in Sarajevo and the headquarters of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla ran through the 'Pactor'. HF communication had a range of between 50 and 500 kilometres. One Pactor was flown by helicopter to Srebrenica via Zepa in January 1995. The so-called Paket VHF Radio System was connected with Tuzla and became operational on 20 March 1993. An encrypted message was fed into the Paket in Tuzla through a personal computer and then sent to Srebrenica, where it was subsequently decoded. Up to 1 March 1994, 586 messages were received and 525 were transmitted in Srebrenica.¹³³³ There are no figures available for subsequent years.

The 28th Division of the ABiH in Srebrenica received direct orders from Sarajevo via the Pactor. The 2nd Corps received a transcript. Sarajevo also issued orders to the 28th Division via Tuzla.¹³³⁴ As the incoming orders never bore the signature of the commander, they were sometimes ignored. The connections ran initially through the old telephone network, which was then still operational. Later, this was no longer possible.¹³³⁵ The Electronic Warfare units of the VRS were, however, confronted with Bosnian crypto programmes, designed by a team led by Dr Muhidin Lelic at the ABiH. These were based on the NATO crypto programme. US intelligence services supposedly helped Lelic to compile them. According to an ABiH general, the VRS never cracked this code.¹³³⁶ This claim is unlikely as the VRS could read the open as well as the encrypted communications of the ABiH before, during and after the attack on the enclave. The VRS had broken the ABiH crypto software and could read most of the communication traffic of the 28th Division in Srebrenica.

What ABiH communication traffic did the Bosnian Serbs intercept?

As early as 14 June 1995, Tuzla sent a warning to the 28th Division that the VRS had penetrated the ABiH radio network. Tuzla issued instructions to improve the communications security: makeshift landlines laid by the ABiH were to be monitored and checked every week. Telephone connections close to VRS territory had to be checked every day.¹³³⁷ These precautions were to no avail. On 9 July the 2nd Corps announced that the VRS was still constantly intercepting the open and coded messages of the 28th Division and that the Bosnian intercepts were being sent direct to the Command of the VRS Drina Corps for processing. The analysed messages were then immediately sent back to the VRS units at the front around Srebrenica. In the meantime, the commander of the 28th Division was again warned that their communications system had weak cryptographic protection.¹³³⁸

No doubt the VRS also intercepted messages regarding a possible joint defence of Srebrenica by Dutchbat and the ABiH. Bosnian Muslims have claimed that Dutchbat and the ABiH had agreed on ¹³³¹ Confidential interview (73).

¹³³² Interview with Osman Suljic, 04/03/98.

¹³³³ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. 28th Division to 2nd Corps, No. 02/8-537/2, 13/03/94. The claim by General Sead Delic that the 28th Division did not have its own crypto equipment is untrue. Interview with Sead Delic, 10/03/98.

¹³³⁴ Confidential information (37).

¹³³⁵ Interview with Sefko Hodzic, 24/05/99.

¹³³⁶ Confidential interview (73).

¹³³⁷ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Section MSS, 2nd Corps to 28th Division, no. 06-05-159/95, 14/06/95.

¹³³⁸ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. 2nd Corps to Odbrana Republike VoVJ TaVJ, no. 02/8-01-1130, 09/07/95.

a concerted defence shortly before the attack.¹³³⁹ These assertions were denied by Dutchbat.¹³⁴⁰ The belief by the ABiH soldiers that such an agreement had been reached was more a question of wishful thinking. They referred to it in early July in their communications with 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla. It is only logical that the VRS would have intercepted these transmissions and would have been aware of the discussions between Dutchbat and the ABiH.

On 9 July Osman Suljic, the War President of Srebrenica, called President Izetbegovic. During this call Suljic asked the Bosnian President to save the population of Srebrenica but Izetbegovic did not respond. It is likely that this too was intercepted by the VRS.¹³⁴¹ The belief that this call indeed was intercepted, is supported by the fact that, on 10 July 1995, the headquarters of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla sent another message to, among others, the 28th Division saying that the VRS had again deciphered some coded ABiH documents. This had happened because of weak cryptographic protection: the code had been cracked with the aid of a calculator. A special measure was then introduced whereby the 28th Division in Srebrenica was ordered to keep messages which were transmitted through HF, VHF and UHF to a bare minimum and to use the K-2 crypto programme. General documents had to be coded by means of frequently changing frequencies and keys. Telephonic contacts with the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla could only take place after changes had been made to the secret names and numbers.¹³⁴² However, Lelic's apparently weak crypto programme was used right up to the fall of Srebrenica.

Interception of the column heading from Srebrenica to Tuzla

The flight of the column of Bosnian Muslims from Srebrenica to Tuzla is addressed in detail in Chapter 1 of Part IV of the Srebrenica report.¹³⁴³ This section explores how far the VRS was able to intercept calls made during this event. The ABiH took along a laptop computer with crypto software, which was later destroyed by the operator. The VRS found the demolished laptop and took the operator prisoner. He was taken to Zvornik where he was tortured in the hope that he would disclose his secrets. The ABiH knew through Comint that he had been arrested and taken to Zvornik. The operator did not break under torture and the VRS eventually released him.¹³⁴⁴

It was fairly easy for the VRS to track the ABiH column as it made its way to Tuzla. Throughout the journey the ABiH used various Motorola walkie-talkies, including the YEASU. These had probably been supplied to the 28th Division in the spring of 1995; spare batteries were charged before the column set out. The different parts of the column communicated through couriers and Motorolas; the vanguard maintained contact with the command of the 28th Division, the middle section and the rearguard (on another frequency). The commander of the 28th Division was in the middle and had an overview of the whole column. Some 20 Motorolas were used in the course of the manoeuvre. The VRS were constantly tuned in to the YEASU Motorolas and knew the exact locations of the different segments of the column. Hence, they could easily launch targeted shelling and claim many victims.¹³⁴⁵ Two intercepts by the intelligence service of the Drina Corps of the VRS, sent through the police station at the town Bijeljina, indicated that two groups in the column attempted to get instructions on how to act when they ran into an ambush near Kamenica. Later, the VRS experienced increasing difficulty when it tried to intercept the Motorolas of the ABiH, because the batteries gradually ran out and use had to be kept to a minimum. When the ABiH reached the village Baljkovica the batteries were flat.¹³⁴⁶

¹³³⁹ ABiH Tuzla, 2nd Corps, no number. Additional statement by Ramiz Becirovic, 16/04/98, based on an earlier statement of 11/08/95.

¹³⁴⁰ See Chapter 6 of Part III of the main Srebrenica report for a detailed discussion.

¹³⁴¹ Interview with Osman Suljic, 04/03/98.

¹³⁴² NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. 2nd Corps to 28th Division, no. 02/08-684/2, 10/07/95.

¹³⁴³ See for the English version: www.srebrenica.nl

¹³⁴⁴ Confidential information (37).

¹³⁴⁵ Confidential information (37).

¹³⁴⁶ For the journey to Tuzla: Chapter 1 in Part IV of the main Srebrenica report.

Conclusions on the interception by the Bosnian Serbs

As far as the attack on Srebrenica is concerned, the measures taken by the ABiH for the defence of the enclave probably held no secrets for the Bosnian Serbs if they were passed on through radio. It has become apparent that the ABiH had been making considerable use of these channels in 1993 and 1994 as well. Communication traffic between Dutchbat and the ABiH was also constantly and successfully monitored by the Sigint units of the VRS. The men and boys in the ABiH column heading for Tuzla must therefore have been an easy prey for the VRS units. It must have been relatively easy to pinpoint the positions of the various groups in this long column by working out cross-bearings on the basis of the intercepted messages. In addition, the VRS must have been able to gather intelligence on the internal problems in the column, the difficulties it encountered, and the internal agreements and planning. Sigint provided the VRS with clear insight into what was happening within the ABiH and gave it a permanent head start on a group that was already in serious trouble.

3. The Signals Intelligence operations of the ABiH

‘We were listening to their communications and we could hear them as they crossed the river and headed to Bratunac.’ This statement was made by a Bosnian intelligence officer, who concluded from intercepts that the VJ was involved in the attack on Srebrenica.¹³⁴⁷ Sigint not only played a key role in the VRS attack on Srebrenica in 1995, but also much earlier, in 1993. However, at that time the attack on Srebrenica (and Zepa) did not ultimately go ahead. Mladic knew from his own intelligence service that the local ABiH commander of Srebrenica, Naser Oric, was desperate and ready to surrender and therefore he probably decided to ‘push on’. ABiH soldiers claimed that they had intercepted a radio message from Mladic to the VRS besiegers of Srebrenica; at that moment the VRS was 800 metres from the centre. Mladic ordered a local VRS colonel to ‘move forward’ and take the town.¹³⁴⁸ The exact wording of the intercepted message was allegedly: ‘Tell all units to enter Srebrenica this night. Go straight into town, no journalists, no reports, no statements’.¹³⁴⁹ In the same period the Bosnian Foreign Minister, Haris Silajdzic, showed a journalist from the Washington Post VRS messages intercepted by the ABiH which indicated that Zepa was to be taken and that everyone there was to be killed.¹³⁵⁰

The limitations of the ABiH Comint capacity in Srebrenica in the spring of 1993 did not make it any less effective. For instance, the ABiH could intercept VRS communications on HF as well as on walkie-talkies. They usually achieved this with the assistance of the Srebrenica amateur radio club, which operated in the enclave and was also responsible for the connections with Tuzla and Sarajevo. Two ABiH officers headed a group of forty, all members of the amateur radio club, which had two transmitter-receivers. Later, the 28th Division obtained an extra transmitter-receiver, which was capable of intercepting VHF communications.¹³⁵¹ This equipment, which was flown into the enclave, was suitable for tracking VRS walkie-talkie communications. In addition, VRS radio equipment was sometimes captured.

The Comint reports were always sent to the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla for further analysis and not to the 28th Division. The results were, of course, sent back to the 28th Division in Srebrenica. ABiH soldiers admitted that the Bosnian Army was not able to decipher the VRS coded messages.¹³⁵² During the demilitarization of Srebrenica in 1993 the radio equipment was hidden from UNPROFOR.

¹³⁴⁷ Cabell Bruce, ‘Belgrade Blamed’, Newsday, 12/08/95

¹³⁴⁸ Mladic would after the fall of Srebrenica boast to DutchBat Commander Karremans that he had again excellent intelligence. Interview with Th.J.P. Karremans, 17/12/98.

¹³⁴⁹ ‘srebrenica on the verge of falling to Serbs’, The Toronto Star, 17/04/93.

¹³⁵⁰ Phil McCombs, ‘At the Bosnia Crossroads’, The Washington Post, 05/05/93.

¹³⁵¹ Confidential information (38) and interviews with Sefko Hodzic, 24/05/99 and Isnam Taljic 18/05/99.

¹³⁵² Confidential information (38).

After the summer of 1993 the Comint network was greatly extended; new equipment was smuggled in, especially in 1994.¹³⁵³ The couriers between Srebrenica and Zepa were issued with ten pieces of RUP-12 and IC H 10 portable radio equipment, which was also used to track and intercept VRS messages en route. In January and February 1995 additional portable radio equipment, including a short-wave radio, 50 metres of coax cable, a short-wave antenna and telephone cables were brought into Srebrenica.

The Comint experts of the 28th Division were constantly requesting new equipment, as the quality of the supplied equipment left much to be desired. New problems soon arose: the batteries could not be charged easily. There was not enough fuel for the generators and the ABiH was forever wrestling with flat storage batteries. A decision was taken to bring an 'energy-saving' Bertoli generator by helicopter to Srebrenica. Later, the ABiH illegally tapped electricity from Dutchbat to help solve this problem.¹³⁵⁴ Sigint experts often dub the conflict in Eastern Bosnia 'the Motorola War'. Everyone used walkie-talkies in the mountainous terrain because they were ideal for short-range military-tactical communications. The ABiH was very active in intercepting traffic around Srebrenica, both from the enclave itself and from special interception stations. The fact that the Muslims were intercepting VRS radio communications around the enclave was also brought to light by Milos Stankovic, translator-interpreter to General Rose and later Smith. During his stay in Srebrenica in the spring of 1993 Stankovic had tried to win the trust of the Bosnian Serbs by disclosing the burial place of his father, a Cetnik, who was handed over by the British and was subsequently executed by Tito's troops. ABiH officers referred to this a day later; suddenly, they also knew of the burial place.¹³⁵⁵

Not only the ABiH tried to intercept (sometimes successfully) walkie-talkie communication from Srebrenica, it also had various interception stations outside the enclave. The most important of these were in Okresanica and Konjuh, which formed the operational base of the Electronic Warfare Unit of the ABiH 2nd Corps, the Electronic Warfare Unit of the 21st Division and – from April 1993 – the Sigint section of the Bosnian National Security Service. Though this latter unit worked independently, it shared some of its intelligence with the Electronic Warfare Unit of the 2nd Corps, especially during the events in Srebrenica. This unit focused on the interception of civil communications in Srpska in the Podrinje and around Zvornik and Vlasenica, though it also followed military communications.

In 1992, the ABiH started organizing activities related primarily to Comint in Eastern Bosnia through permanent interception stations. There is not much archive material for this start-up period, but it was possible to build the following reconstruction on the basis of interviews and confidential information. There was, to begin with, very little technological expertise. Only one unit had interception equipment, as a lot had been taken by the VJ. At that time, it was possible to intercept two HF, four VHF and two air force channels from Konjuh and Okresanica; one soldier was available per wavelength for this purpose. He decided which frequency to intercept and reported verbally. The information was not analysed, and there were no crypto analysts, so the ABiH could only intercept open communication.

The intelligence was, however, good because the VRS did not bother to encrypt its messages at first. The Bosnians discovered that the higher the rank of the commander, the more open was the VRS communication. The VRS was scarcely aware of communications security, even though it emerged at Krstic's trial that it had always known that the ABiH could intercept their messages. Apparently, this was a risk they were willing to take. In 1992 the Bosnian Serbs had already pinpointed the location of nine well-equipped and manned ABiH interception stations. A signals officer of the Drina Corps testified to the Yugoslavia Tribunal that the communications security was not properly observed.¹³⁵⁶ Consequently, the ABiH could collect intelligence on, say, VRS units, the location of VRS radio

¹³⁵³ UNGE, ICTY. 283rd Brigade to 2nd Corps, no. 191-10/94, 07/11/94.

¹³⁵⁴ UNGE, ICTY. Cos Enver Hadzihasanovic to Naser Oric, no. 1-1/224-1, 07/02/95 and NIOD, MIS CD-Roms, 28th Division to 2nd Corps, no. 02-08-04/95, 17/02/95.

¹³⁵⁵ Stankovic, Trusted Mole, p. 251.

¹³⁵⁶ Judgement in the Krstic Trial, § 113, p. 42.

equipment, planned operations, the supply of fresh troops, the order of battle, losses, new operational plans and logistical problems.

Before long, the ABiH in Eastern Bosnia needed more Sigint personnel in order to cope with the flow of information. The VRS realized that the ABiH could intercept their messages. Pressure was then put on the VRS command to use crypto equipment, but apparently without much effect. The ABiH also discovered that the VRS could easily follow UNPROFOR communication traffic. It is for this reason that the 2nd Corps exhorted Sector North East in Tuzla on various occasions to use crypto equipment. The intelligence officers of the Scandinavian battalion in particular were alerted to this threat but the UN allegedly refused to do anything about it.

To convince UNPROFOR of these threats one ABiH general even carried out a test designed to elicit a response from the VRS. The ABiH sent out a false radio message about an ABiH patrol. The Scandinavian battalion sent this message on to Sarajevo whereupon the VRS responded immediately with shelling.¹³⁵⁷ This was confirmed by the British Lieutenant-Colonel C.A. Le Hardy, Intelligence and Operations Officer from Sector North East in Tuzla. He believed that there was indeed a leak in the radio transmission with Bosnia-Herzegovina Command: there was no question of secure communication. Le Hardy claimed that the Bosnian Serbs had excellent Sigint and had come into possession of a lot of information by eavesdropping on phone lines.¹³⁵⁸

Later, it became increasingly difficult for the ABiH to monitor VRS communication as the Bosnian Serbs were making more frequent use of better crypto equipment; in addition, sometimes important discussions were carried out in Romanian or Hungarian. However, the ABiH could still follow the traffic at brigade level and lower. Usually, the communication was carried out at set times. Sometimes the ABiH intercepted calls from senior VRS officers who complained about logistical and other problems. At that time, the ABiH still had only limited technical capabilities, a personnel shortage and no mobile interception trucks. It was also plagued by a shortage of spare parts and fuel to keep the electricity generators running at the interception stations.¹³⁵⁹ The interception stations at Konjuh and Okresanica targeted the military communications of the VRS. Various witnesses at the trial of General Krstic testified that these communications were followed before, during and after the fall of Srebrenica. The Electronic Warfare Unit in Konjuh focused primarily on the Drina Corps and the General Staff of the VRS. The 2nd Corps of the ABiH also had its own interception station in Tuzla.¹³⁶⁰

The ABiH encountered considerable problems with the interception of this type of radio traffic. The VRS used the Stolice Tower, which it had seized from the Bosnian Muslims, for most of their communications, which the ABiH was unable to disrupt. The VRS also used mainly radio links. As all the stations and antennae were on Bosnian-Serb territory they could not be intercepted by the ABiH; these were line-of-sight radio links with a maximum point-to-point range of 50 kilometres. An electronic warfare unit can only intercept this type of communication if it has a 'highly directional' antenna, which for a good interception needs to be positioned directly under the radio link as the beam travels in a straight line from antenna to antenna and can cover anything from 100 to 1,000 channels.

There were no radio links between the Stolice Tower above Srebrenica and the military nerve centre of the VJ in Tara (Serbia). That connection was maintained via Veliki Zep. At that time, the ABiH did not have receivers to tap in to radio links; this equipment was not among secret weapon deliveries such as the 'Black Flights'. However, early in the conflict the ABiH, working from Zepa, had managed to destroy the tower in Veliki Zep and put it out of operation for a long time.¹³⁶¹ The VRS repaired it later during the war.

¹³⁵⁷ Confidential interview (73).

¹³⁵⁸ Interview with C.A. Le Hardy, 08/10/97.

¹³⁵⁹ Confidential information (37).

¹³⁶⁰ Overview of Court Proceedings, statements by 8 witnesses, 23/06/00 and 30/06/00, on: <http://www.un.org/icty/news/Krstic/Krstic-cp.htm>.

¹³⁶¹ John Pomfret, 'Bosnian Muslims Flee As Serbs Seize Town', The Washington Post, 25/07/95.

As far as the technological capabilities of the Bosnian Comint stations in Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla were concerned, the ABiH only had old scanners at the start of the conflict. These could only be used for listening in to tactical intelligence at battalion level; strategic and operational intelligence were not obtained with Comint. The Comint itself was analysed at the headquarters in Sarajevo. There were no teleprinters or computers for crypto analysis. Though the ABiH did sometimes manage to obtain strategic intelligence, this was more by coincidence and usually took the form of communication between VRS soldiers.

The search for frequencies in Konjuh and Okresanica took place manually. There were not enough tapes to record conversations, so the same tapes were used over and over again. Every evening a report appeared containing the information collected on that day. In Konjuh only two or three people, working in eight-hour shifts, tried to follow the communication; they independently selected the frequencies and recorded only parts of the VRS communication on tape. No real-time intelligence was possible here. The VRS also used the normal telephone connections between Bratunac, Skelani and Milici. The ABiH were unable to tap these lines for they could not get near it. They did not launch any special operations to break this connection.¹³⁶²

In Konjuh the ABiH also had several RUP transmitters and receivers with a range of over 50 kilometres and a capacity of 20 Watts. They operated on a frequency of between 2 and 20 MHz. The RUP could only listen in to one frequency at a time, and, though between four and eight receivers were in use, they could not all be used at once because of a shortage of fuel and batteries. A maximum of four frequencies could be listened to at the same time. In total, both Konjuh and Okresanica had around ten people, including security, who worked in shifts. So, work did not continue non-stop on Comint. One person worked on two stations, concentrating on finding frequencies that were used for the command. Sometimes there were long periods of silence, or the frequencies changed and the search had to begin again. Most of the VRS communication took place in the morning and evening.¹³⁶³

The crew of the Electronic Warfare Unit of the 21st Division in Okresanica was small, consisting of three interception positions which were manned round-the-clock in shifts. Each team worked between four and eight hours a day for a whole week and then had a week off. Operators who intercepted the message made crude notes and worked it out later in their logbooks. These notes were passed on to the commander, who typed out the messages on a computer. The intercepts were then sent by courier to the command of the 21st Division for further analysis. Important messages were phoned through immediately to the 2nd Corps in Tuzla. There was no direction-finding equipment and frequencies were identified on the basis of the knowledge of the Comint operator.¹³⁶⁴

In the course of the conflict the Electronic Warfare Unit of the ABiH in Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla encountered more and more difficulties as it tried to intercept the messages of the Bosnian Serbs. The civil authorities and the VRS made increasing use of crypto equipment, which they borrowed or obtained from the VJ. The VRS used the KZU-31 system and frequently changed the keys. For example, it would start with Code 11. After two hours it would change keys and use Code 12. This made it impossible to penetrate the traffic. The KZU-31 was mechanical and was used for connections between headquarters of a corps and headquarters of a brigade.

The constantly changing keys often presented the ABiH code breakers with insurmountable problems. The Electronic Warfare Unit did, however, discover during the attack on Srebrenica that the Bosnian-Serb General Milenko Zivanovic had a direct line to Mladic, who since 9 July had been in the forward commando post of the Drina Corps in Pribicevac. These communications were always protected by a crypto connection. The decoding programme of the Drina Corps ran via a telex and the KZU-31 encrypting machine which was produced in Serbia. According to a former ABiH general, this made it impossible to follow these messages.¹³⁶⁵ This was confirmed by a message sent by the 2nd Corps to the 28th Division on 9 July 1995. The 2nd Corps had intercepted a encrypted message between the VRS General Staff in Han Pijesak and the Drina Corps, which the ABiH was unable to decode. The 2nd Corps suspected that it related to the shelling of Srebrenica.¹³⁶⁶ At a lower level, VRS units used codebooks. For instance, the word ‘tank’ was assigned number 323 and ‘lorry’ 325. The ABiH sometimes managed to get their hands on VRS codebooks during military operations, but the VRS changed the system every day. All the words were assigned new numbers. It was only when the fighting started that plain language was used again.

¹³⁶² Confidential interview (73).

¹³⁶³ Confidential interview (73).

¹³⁶⁴ 'srebrenica Trial - Expert witness assesses key radio intercept evidence', IWPR's TRIBUNAL UPDATE 214, March 19-24, 2001. See also statement by witness CC (Radio Interception operator in Okresanica) on 27/06/00.

A study conducted by some foreign Sigint experts in Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla in 2000 revealed that the interception equipment used during the conflict was suitable for intercepting the aforementioned messages. In Okresanica a twelve-metre high antenna was found with different types of aerials attached. There was also a parabola antenna with a diameter of 1.5 metres which was intended for monitoring UHF radio traffic (above 300 MHz) and a YAGI antenna to intercept the VHF frequency (30-300 MHz). These were placed on a two-metre-high mast on top of the reception tower, giving an effective height of 842 metres above sea level. This tower stood at the top of Majevisa Mountain.

One of the radio systems that were used was the RRU 800. This was a 12- or 24-channel radio receiver that worked on the 610-960 MHz frequency and had a maximum range of 70 kilometres. An extra RRU 800 was available for communication traffic at greater distances. This system targeted communication between brigades and their headquarters. The second radio system was the RRU 1. This receiver intercepted messages at 230-270 MHz and had a range of approximately 50 kilometres. The RRU 1 targeted the communication traffic between the headquarters of battalions and brigades and could also be used as a mobile Comint system. One of the key ABiH targets was Veliki Zep. Both the RRU 800 and the RRU 1 systems in Okresanica focused on this. Veliki Zep, Cer and Gucevo were the most important communication nodes of the VRS. Communications in Veliki Zep were intercepted with an ICOM IC-R100 VHF/UHF receiver. Seven UHER tape recorders were used during the conflict. An ABiH officer in Okresanica said that he had read an intercept, which indicated involvement by the local police in the VRS operations after the fall of Srebrenica.

Konjuh was an interception station, which was not far away from Olovo and Kladanj. It was situated at the top of a mountain at some 1,316 metres above sea level. Originally, Konjuh had been an important relay station for communication in former Yugoslavia. When the ABiH threatened to seize Konjuh, the VRS tried to destroy the station, but were prevented from doing so by a swift ABiH operation. Konjuh was then converted into an ABiH intercept site. This is where the VRS communications on the column from Srebrenica to Tuzla were followed. It was closed after the Dayton Accord.¹³⁶⁷ There were still tape recorders in the building in 2000. The former staff in Konjuh said that they had only UHER tape recorders at their disposal during the conflict. Communications were intercepted with a parabola antenna with a diameter of 1.5 metres and two other antennae. These were still directed at Veliki Zep.¹³⁶⁸

What warning did the ABiH claim to have about the attack on Srebrenica?

In 1995 the Comint capabilities in Srebrenica itself were still very limited. The 28th Division of the ABiH did not have enough specialists or equipment. They used the Paket and Pactor to listen in to VRS communications. According to a former ABiH general, the VRS observed a radio silence from the moment it opened Pribicevac as its command centre and headquarters (from which the attack on ¹³⁶⁵ Confidential interview (73).

¹³⁶⁶ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. ABiH Komanda 2. Korpusa to Komanda 28. Divizije br. 02-/8-1132, 09/07/95.

¹³⁶⁷ Konjuh is now being used as an intercept site by the US Army's 103rd Military Intelligence Battalion from Fort Stewart, Georgia. E-mail from Matthew M. Aid to Cees Wiebes, 19/12/00.

¹³⁶⁸ Confidential information (39).

Srebrenica would be coordinated) until 6 July. Though this radio silence was not entirely observed, no major preparations could be construed from an analysis of the communications. All that the ABiH knew was that troops were being regrouped near Skelani and Bratunac.

The ABiH could also follow, to some extent, the movement of VRS tanks and troops and the arrival of reinforcements. However, it had no insight into the actual intentions of the VRS. So, as there was no real-time intelligence, the ABiH did not realize that the VRS was preparing a major offensive. It was unknown which units of the Zvornik Brigade were heading south. Nor was anything reported about buses that were ferrying in fresh troops. An ABiH soldier who was involved in this said that there was no foreknowledge and that the ABiH could not break the VRS code.¹³⁶⁹

This is contradicted by other ABiH military, who allege that there was intelligence available and that it was possible to break the code. Statements by witnesses could imply that the army command of the ABiH in Sarajevo, or at least the leaders of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla, were actually aware of the preparations the VRS were making to attack Srebrenica. For example, the electronic warfare expert of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla, Captain Hajrudin Kusic, stated that the 2nd Corps knew from Sigint that the attack was pending long before it happened.¹³⁷⁰ Kusic initially worked in the Operations Section, but was seconded to the Electronic Warfare Unit because there were no Sigint experts in the 2nd Corps. In his estimation, Sigint provided important prior information on the forthcoming attack. It was not too difficult for Kusic to construe this from intercepted messages: he had lived in Serbia for nine years, during which time he worked for the Operations Section of the VJ. He said that the training he received there – under heavy Soviet influence – and the operations left little scope for originality: he could easily identify the same patterns in the VRS. The main VRS communication tower, situated at an altitude of 1,537 metres at Veliki Zep, had a wide range, so Kusic's unit picked up real-time intercepts from Tuzla. The VRS used an analogue signals system and coded as well as open traffic, but these, according to Kusic, presented no problems for the ABiH.

The VRS communication ran between Veliki Zep and Pribicevac. A lot of information was derived from high-placed officers' complaints about the vision and behaviour of Mladic. The ABiH was also assisted by the frequent use that Mladic made of open lines. This is how one of Kusic's units managed to intercept calls between General Zivanovic, Commander of the Drina Corps, and Colonel Vukovic of the Skelani Brigade. The Skelani Brigade was positioned on both sides of the road at Zeleni Jadar; the Bratunac Brigade was in the east, the Milici Brigade in the north-west and the Romania Brigade in the west. There were no conventional front lines. The VRS controlled the key communication lines and the heights. Covert allusions were made to the planned attack in the form of comments such as 'spring is coming'; Kusic could remember that OP-E was captured around the time of this intercept.

General Sead Delic, Commander of the ABiH 2nd Corps, confirmed that the leaders of his Corps in Tuzla had prior intelligence of the VRS attack. The 2nd Corps is supposed to have warned Commander Karremans, but he did not believe them. The ABiH also sent warnings to Sector North East of UNPROFOR, but they did not share in its conviction. ABiH intelligence was not taken seriously.¹³⁷¹ The ABiH commander in Sarajevo, General Rasim Delic, also stated that messages from Mladic had been intercepted, which indicated that he was gearing up for an attack. According to General Delic, confidential information from one of the US intelligence services confirmed that a conversation had taken place between Mladic and Milosevic. For a whole week all sorts of subjects were discussed with Belgrade. Delic reported the conversation as follows: 'Look, Mladic, are you really going to Srebrenica?'. The answer was 'Of course, I haven't finished the job. I'm going to take Zepa and Gorazde as well.' There were other signs, such as the regrouping of troops, propaganda, the increasing frequency of incidents around the Safe Areas, and statements from the international community that the situation was becoming critical and prompting serious thought.¹³⁷² There are also reports of intercepts of Serb communication that pointed to VJ involvement in the attack on Srebrenica¹³⁷³ and indicated that the commands for executions were issued from Belgrade.¹³⁷⁴

¹³⁶⁹ Confidential interview (73).

¹³⁷⁰ Interview with Hajrudin Kusic, 17 and 18/05/99.

¹³⁷¹ Interview with Sead Delic, 10/03/99.

The Croats supposedly had identical intelligence, which they passed on to the Bosnian Muslims.¹³⁷⁵ According to these sources, no clear orders were ever issued for mass executions but there were vague references such as ‘getting rid of the problem’.¹³⁷⁶ Delic concluded that VJ troops were involved in the attack on Srebrenica, claiming that the ABiH had documents and intercepts to indicate this. These would prove that the VJ and specifically the Arkan Tigers were involved in the attack.¹³⁷⁷ However, these documents were not made available.

What did the ABiH claim to know about the column to Tuzla?

After the fall of Srebrenica, a long column of over 10,000 Muslims trekked through the mountains to Tuzla. On 12 July 1995 the intercept site at Konjuh was ideally positioned for tracking the progress of the column and the 2nd Corps in Tuzla also had an approximate idea of the size of the column. This was confirmed by a Sigint expert of the ABiH. The VRS used denigrating terms, like ‘swines’, to refer to the men from Srebrenica. VRS Colonel Vukovic asked: ‘Are you ready for the hunt?’ and orders to ‘kill all the beasts’ were issued. The order to catch Oric alive was also intercepted;¹³⁷⁸ apparently, not everyone was aware that Oric was already in Tuzla. The 2nd Corps also knew from Comint from Okresanica that the VRS was hunting down the column.¹³⁷⁹

The Sigint unit of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla knew the VRS frequencies and followed the fate of the column, often through intercepts of orders issued to VRS commanders inside and outside the enclave. During an interview held with the intelligence officer of the 2nd Corps of the ABiH, Major Sefko Tihic had some intercepted messages brought in which he then read aloud.¹³⁸⁰ The first was allegedly a conversation that took place between Colonel Obrenovic and General Krstic after the fall of Srebrenica. It ran as follows: ‘How are you? Are there more fish to catch?’ Mention was then made of the column. The two men agreed that most of the Muslims would probably step on mines anyway. Then the order was issued to ‘kill all of them’. The second intercept concerned a question from a VRS commander to the commander of a VRS Special Forces unit: ‘Where are my units? Are they in Milici?’ The answer was: ‘Yes, they are. They are working there and capturing people’. A third intercept indicated, according to Tihic, that the VRS knew that the ABiH were listening. Here, a VRS soldier warned Krstic, ‘They are listening to us’. Krstic replied, ‘Let them hear us talk. We will do the same in the other areas’.

At Krstic’s trial intercepts of 15 July were submitted in which a VRS colonel complained to Krstic that he still needed to distribute 3,500 parcels. ‘Parcels’ was the code for Muslims and ‘distribute’ was the code for execute. The colonel asked Krstic for more men to finish the job.¹³⁸¹ Some of these intercepts had already been published in the summer of 1998 in Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna by journalist Mehmed Pargan, who had managed to lay his hands on 200 pages of intercepted VRS messages and ¹³⁷² Delic provided no clear answer when asked by the NIOD whether the knowledge obtained from the US source came only after the attack.

¹³⁷³ Ed Vulliamy, ‘srebrenica killer in the dock’, The Guardian, 01/06/96.

¹³⁷⁴ Roy Gutman, ‘Bosnia Evidence Secret’, Newsday, 08/11/95.

¹³⁷⁵ FOIA State Department, Washington DC, US Mission Vienna to SecState, no. 2135, 26/07/1995.

¹³⁷⁶ Interview with Sefko Tihic, 08/03/99.

¹³⁷⁷ Interview with Sead Delic, 10/03/99.

¹³⁷⁸ Interviews with Hajrudin Kistic, 17 and 18/05/99.

¹³⁷⁹ UNGE, ICTY, No. 00924932, Okresanica to 2nd Corps, no. 01/12795, 12/07/95.

¹³⁸⁰ Interview with Sefko Tihic, 08/03/99.

¹³⁸¹ Annieke Kranenberg, ‘Krstic liet ‘pakjes’ in Srebrenica doden’ (Krstic had ‘parcels’ killed in Srebrenica), De Volkskrant, 14/03/00 and ‘Krstic aangeklaagd voor volkerenmoord’ (Krstic indicted for genocide), Algemeen Dagblad, 14/03/00.

other documents relating to the period from 30 June until the end of July. He revealed that on 14 July the ABiH had intercepted VRS orders to kill the men in the column.

According to Pargan, the Electronic Warfare Units of the 2nd Corps were disseminating disinformation on 14 July by sending out messages that Oric and his unit had broken the stranglehold on the column. This message triggered a panic in Zvornik, which led to the mobilization of larger numbers of VRS soldiers. As a result, it was even more difficult for the refugees to break through the VRS lines. Intercepts on 14 July revealed that the VRS asked for bulldozers at Konjevic Polje. Intercepts disclosed that a panic had broken out in the VRS ranks about the events. The VRS leaders had no clear idea of what was going on, so they consented to a ceasefire of 24 hours, which was negotiated by ABiH Major Semsudin Muminovic.¹³⁸² The actual existence of this Comint could be construed from interviews with the commander of the 2nd Corps, General Sead Delic, the Sigint experts of the 2nd Corps, Captain Hajrudin Kusic, the Head of Intelligence of the 2nd Corps, Major Sefko Tihic and the ABiH commander in Srebrenica, Ramiz Becirovic. It was moreover confirmed by Bosnian Comint that was placed at the NIOD's disposal¹³⁸³ and by the report by researcher the ICTY researcher Richard Butler, Srebrenica Military Narrative – Operation Krivaja 95, which was specially compiled for the Yugoslavia Tribunal.

The question at the Tribunal was, however, if the information from the interviews was accurate, and if the ABiH troops were not bluffing about their ability to intercept VRS communication. Butler answered these questions by testifying to the Tribunal that the tape recordings of the intercepted VRS radio communications were credible. He admitted that he too was sceptical at first but had later reviewed his assessment. Butler stated that he had listened to 80-90% of the militarily relevant radio traffic and had studied thousands of documents. It appeared to him from the intercept protocols that people were speaking openly over the radio about the mass murder of the Muslims from Srebrenica. Two men whom Butler could not identify spoke about 10,000 Muslims of military age who had fled. 'Have we halved them yet? Four or five thousand must be dead by now.'¹³⁸⁴ Another expert, who was called in by the prosecutor at the Yugoslavia Tribunal, also judged the intercepts as authentic.¹³⁸⁵

Orders issued by Krstic and other conversations about 'parcels' were also registered. On 17 July a message was intercepted about 'A huge human mass of about 5,000 concentrated around Cerska and Kamenica, so many you can't kill them all'. When Krstic, in an intercepted conversation with an unidentified person, asked who had issued orders to send soldiers to a specific place, he was told that the orders had come from the General Staff. This implied that the General Staff was directly involved in leading the operations. Intercepted calls indicated that the VRS also had 'secure lines'. However, although the VRS did have secure means of sending messages, the Tribunal heard evidence that these systems were not always functional and that often unsecured lines were used for expediency. In addition, secured communications took much longer to prepare and send.¹³⁸⁶ The 2nd Corps had ascertained this earlier after a military operation around Zepa. Two VRS soldiers who were killed in this operation had documents on them which revealed that calls were being made to Han Pijesak via fixed telephone lines from barracks to the north of Zepa. The documents listed the direct telephone numbers of Mladic, Gvero, Milovanovic and other generals.¹³⁸⁷

It can safely be concluded that the Sigint units of the ABiH were highly capable. This is also evident from the tape recording of the (disputed) intercepted conversation in which the former ¹³⁸² Mehmed Pargan, 'B-H Army Eavesdropped on VRS', Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna (FBIS translation), 11/07/98.

¹³⁸³ Confidential information (38).

¹³⁸⁴ Judgement in the Krstic Trial, § 115, p. 23 and Butler, Testimony 5107. See also: 'Verslagen afgeluisterde tapes zeer geloofwaardig' (Reports of monitored tapes highly credible), in: ANP Press release, 18/07/00 and 'Tapes val Srebrenica zijn zeer geloofwaardig' (Tapes on fall of Srebrenica highly credible), METRO, 19/07/00.

¹³⁸⁵ Judgement in the Krstic Trial, § 114, p. 42.

¹³⁸⁶ See for example: ICTY (IT-98-33) D 66a, 28th Division to 2nd Corps, Weekly Morale Report, no. 04-113/95, 30/06/95. See for all intercepts: Coll. NIOD, ICTY, OTP Ex. 738, List of Exhibits contained in Ex. 364 (2 volumes of Intercepts). For the existence of the special secured connections: Intercept 17 July/12/ii.

¹³⁸⁷ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. 285th Brigade, Zepa to General Staff ABiH, no. 08-13-52/95, 17/05/95.

commander of the Bosnian-Serb Drina Corps, General Radislav Krstic, issues orders to kill the ABiH soldiers. A British expert, Dr Peter French, testified to the Tribunal that he had not been able to definitively identify the voice as that of Krstic. According to the prosecution, the intercepts showed that Krstic had issued the order to kill the Muslim prisoners. The prosecution claimed that this was a tape of a conversation, which took place on 2 August 1995 between Krstic and Major Obrenovic, Chief of Staff of the Zvornik Brigade of the VRS. At that moment, the Zvornik Brigade was busy combing an area searching for ABiH soldiers from the column. One voice on the tape said that Muslims were still being captured. The other voice, presumably belonging to Krstic, responded with 'kill them all; don't leave anyone alive'. At the trial Krstic and his lawyers maintained that the intercept was a complete and utter fake. French, an expert in the analysis of speech and language, said that the recording was 'inconclusive'. He claimed that the poor quality and the brevity of the conversation made it impossible to determine whether the voice did indeed belong to Krstic. But an American witness testified that it was a conversation between 'speakers of ethnic Serb background' which according to this expert would be difficult for Muslims to imitate.

As mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, the prosecution had a trump card up its sleeve: the same intercept, but registered from another Bosnian interception station. Since the ABiH intercepted VRS communication from two different stations, Okresanica and Golija, on 2 August both stations had listened in to the conversation. The intercepting operators recorded it in their logbooks. It was typed out later and sent to the Army command for further analysis.¹³⁸⁸

All things considered, there are enough grounds for assuming that the Muslims had, since 1992, indeed been capable of intercepting important political and military communication traffic of the Bosnian Serbs. This took place from Srebrenica, Tuzla, Konjuh, Okresanica and perhaps at other stations as well and by other ABiH units. The evidence that the ABiH was actually capable of this was presented in the form of intercept texts to the NIOD, the Yugoslavia Tribunal and journalists. But the question still remains as to whether this was real-time intelligence. In other words, were the intercepts also directly available to the recipient of the intelligence or did it take days, or even weeks, before the contents were known?

4. Was the ABiH Signals Intelligence real-time?

Despite the emphatic claims by Bosnian military that they did have real-time Comint, there is still room for doubt. First, the ABiH was incapable of following most of the encrypted messages of the VRS. This is suggested by a message on 9 July 1995 from the 2nd Corps of the ABiH to the commander of the 28th Division in Srebrenica, which said that the codes could not be cracked.¹³⁸⁹ There may well have been intercepts which showed that VRS soldiers were incidentally ordered to kill ABiH soldiers, but no messages have been found in which Mladic or others ordered a mass execution.¹³⁹⁰

As neither the Bosnian Army nor the political leaders ever shared intercepts with UNPROFOR or the UN in New York, it is vital to establish whether these intercepts were real-time or near-real-time. If they were real-time, then the military of the Electronic Warfare Unit of the ABiH must have listened 'live' to orders to kill their Muslim brothers without taking any action. An US intelligence official commented that these VHF intercepts were 'authentic, genuine intercepts communications of Serb VHF communications and phone communications at tactical, operational and command levels'. He estimated that some 15,000 hours must have been spent on interception between 15 June and 15 July 1995. The Electronic Warfare Units in Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla reported to the 2nd Corps as well as ABiH headquarters in Sarajevo and the senior politicians. The Bosnian national security service in Okresanica probably reported only to the Bosnian political leaders.¹³⁹¹

¹³⁸⁸ 'srebrenica Trial - Expert witness assesses key radio intercept evidence', IWPR's TRIBUNAL UPDATE 214, March 19-24, 2001.

¹³⁸⁹ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. ABiH Komanda 2nd Corps to 28th Division, no. 02-/8-1132, 09/07/95.

¹³⁹⁰ Interview with S. Arnautovic, 05/11/99.

The question that now needs to be answered is: what was possible regarding the processing of the intercepts in real time? Simple arithmetic shows that, if the number of channels multiplied by the number of required personnel is greater than the number of available personnel, then near-real-time processing and reporting is impossible. A conservative estimate indicates that the monitored channels probably covered telephone calls from Okresanica via live interception or relayed intercepts. In addition to non-military traffic, the Bosnian national security service was bound to have been interested in the VRS high command and the operational levels immediately below. If we assume on the basis of this estimate that an absolute minimum of ten channels had to be monitored continuously, that three persons were needed per channel for interception, transcription and reporting and that there was a rotation of three shifts a day and a seven-day working week, then at least 90 Sigint operators would have had to be active in Okresanica. Not to mention 15 or 20 staff for support, technology, security, catering and so on. Hence, if there were 20 channels – probably a more realistic estimate – then at least 180 people would be needed. In reality, a maximum of ten people worked in Okresanica. Most of the communication was recorded on tape. It seems therefore that near-real-time analysis and processing was unattainable.

The VHF radio traffic was intercepted by the Electronic Warfare Units of the ABiH in Okresanica and Konjuh. We can perform some simple arithmetic on these activities as well. It appears from all the descriptions that these were standard Comint sites where the listener tuned in manually to the channels that were being monitored. On the basis of a very conservative estimate, around 30 channels would have to be manned permanently, including five frequencies at the level of high command, ten at operational level and ten tactical frequencies between units in the field. Thirty frequencies are regarded as the absolute minimum by US Sigint experts. The command and operational frequencies had to be monitored round-the-clock and the tactical frequencies 18 hours a day by three teams, each consisting of three listeners, who were individually responsible for interception, transcription and reporting. On the basis of this absolute minimum, around 210 people would have had to be working in Okresanica and Konjuh. The station was, moreover, not only responsible for monitoring communications around Srebrenica, but also the battles around Mount Vis, the northern part of Republika Srpska and other areas. At least 400 people would have been needed to follow all this traffic. In fact, the level of personnel was no higher than twenty. So, near-real-time analysis was impossible here as well.¹³⁹² We have already shown that the Electronic Warfare Units were also very modest in size.

The processing of Comint can only be described as long and laborious. With only a limited number of receivers at his disposal the interceptor probably decided to listen to the most valuable frequencies. If the number of valuable frequencies was greater than the number that could be intercepted, then tape recorders were used. In addition, the interceptor missed much of the messages when he had to leave his post to make his transcriptions in rough notes. Presumably, the interceptor spent 25% of his working hours away from his receiver and missed a lot, because there was no-one to relieve him. The commander then had the thankless job of 'handling' the intercept for the third time and typing it out. Probably, Okresanica did not have a direct phone line with Tuzla. As a result, the worked-out intercepts had to be stored on a floppy disk and sent by courier to the headquarters of the 21st Division or the 2nd Corps.

According to witnesses at the Tribunal, the working methods were exactly the same in Okresanica and Konjuh.¹³⁹³ In some cases the intercepted calls were first recorded on tape and then later worked out on paper or in a logbook. The messages were then typed out on a computer and sent to headquarters. The Comint operators often – but not always – made a note of the date and time of the intercepts.¹³⁹⁴ The conclusion is that though some phone calls and VHF channels may have been monitored ‘live’, the bulk of the very extensive military traffic of the VRS was tape-recorded and was not analysed until later. This undermined cohesion and meant that VRS communication that was actually intercepted in real time could not be placed in the right context. For the Electronic Warfare Units to have operated in real time the Bosnian national security service in Okresanica would have needed a staff of at least 120 while the ABiH units would have needed at least 210 people in both Okresanica and Konjuh. The very fact the Electronic Warfare Units existed implies, however, that they must have delivered valuable intelligence from time to time, but this will only have been a drop in the ocean compared with the huge flow of Bosnian-Serb communications. It may be safely assumed that the VRS used more than a hundred walkie-talkies during the attack. Given the number of available personnel, there can never have been any question of large-scale real-time intelligence.

¹³⁹¹ Confidential information (54).

¹³⁹² Confidential interviews (6), (13), (54) and (62).

¹³⁹³ See: <http://www.un.org/icty/news/krstic/krstic-cp.htm>.

In summary, we can draw certain conclusions about the Bosnian efforts regarding Sigint. To begin with, intelligence is useless (except in hindsight) if the information is not presented to the consumer promptly in a form that is both understandable and usable. If the intelligence is not reported or is kept secret for fear of compromising the source, then there is no point in collecting it, except for later use or storage in an archive. Taking the Bosnian efforts as a whole, it must be concluded that the service responsible for the Sigint was simply too undermanned (ten people per station) and too poorly equipped to fulfil its mission adequately. Though there were many intercepts, the processing, analysis and reporting were totally inadequate. Intercepts were not typed out immediately in a word-processing programme but transcribed by hand in a logbook; tapes bearing messages were re-used and hardly any use was made of computers to process and disseminate the data flow.

Moreover, there were no Comint analysts at the interception stations to analyse the messages and assess their value. There were no secure lines with various regional ABiH headquarters and no indications that the Bosnian services had any intelligence analysts at brigade, corps or higher level who were able to swiftly integrate the Comint with, say, Humint. Even if Bosnia had had the political will to publish the most volatile intercepts worldwide, it would never have succeeded because the intelligence structure was simply not geared for this. Even the real-time intercepts were too fragmented. There is, furthermore, no evidence that the ABiH Comint service shared intelligence with Dutchbat, western services or UNPROFOR.

Or was there near-real-time intelligence after all?

Nonetheless, an ABiH general claimed that the messages were actually intercepted and analysed in real time.¹³⁹⁵ This assertion should, however, be treated with the utmost scepticism. If the Bosnian Muslims did have real-time Comint then why did they not use it? According to an US intelligence official, this would have been the ‘best PR stunt ever’, and the Bosnian Muslims could have screamed ‘bloody hell and murder’. He suspected that the ABiH simply did not have real-time capacity. He offered the following example. If, in the best-case scenario, the ABiH had had 150 people in Konjuh, some of them would have had friends or even family in the enclave or in the column. Keeping the Comint under wraps would have triggered a ‘stampede’ among the staff in Okresanica, Konjuh or Tuzla for they would have done everything possible to save these people. According to this official, the ‘absence of a stampede’ implies ‘an absence of real-time intercepts’. In his opinion, the ABiH did not know about the contents of the intercepts until weeks, months, or even years after the fall of Srebrenica. If ABiH intercepts were to have any influence on military and political measures, they should have been available on the evening of 10 July at the latest.

¹³⁹⁴ Judgement in the Krstic Trial, § 107, p. 40.

¹³⁹⁵ Confidential information (38).

It is more likely that the Electronic Warfare Units did not realize at that moment what the intercepted messages actually meant. Though the ABiH intercepted many messages, they did not conduct enough analysis to form a measured judgement. Perhaps priority was accorded to other targets in the region so that Sigint on Srebrenica had to take a back seat.¹³⁹⁶ It is also quite likely that Sigint on Sarajevo had top priority. Another American intelligence officer also believed the tapes had been processed weeks, months or possibly even two years after the event.¹³⁹⁷ The Bosnians openly admitted that the ABiH had a huge backlog of unprocessed intercepts.¹³⁹⁸

There is yet another indication that the Bosnian Muslims did not have real-time Sigint. The many intercepts that were later published and disclosed at the trial of General Krstic give the impression that the VRS troop movements were efficiently followed by the Muslims in real time. There were dozens of intercepts which showed that the ABiH interception stations in Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla closely followed the VRS conversations about the column heading for Tuzla. However, at Krstic's trial no attention was paid to whether this intelligence was shared with UNPROFOR. This would, after all, have been a logical step, given that the Bosnian Muslims dearly wanted to get UNPROFOR or NATO on their side in the fight against the VRS.

Why did the ABiH not share intelligence with the western powers?

According to Lieutenant-Colonel Baxter, military assistant to General Smith, the ABiH in Sarajevo never delivered as much as a snippet of intelligence to Smith, his staff or the rest of UNPROFOR. ABiH General Rasim Delic only consulted with Smith four times a year. Smith's door was always open to the Head of the Bosnian Intelligence Service, General Taljan Hajrulahovic, but he never dropped by. On the other hand, the ABiH had excellent intelligence contacts with the Americans. Smith's staff discovered, through a slip of the tongue of the US Ambassador John Menzies, that General Wesley Clark called General Delic in Sarajevo every day from the Pentagon to discuss the latest military developments.¹³⁹⁹ General Janvier also denied ever having received Bosnian intercepts of VRS communication.¹⁴⁰⁰ Members of the US Intelligence Community said they were sure that, if the Bosnian Muslims had passed on these intercepts to the CIA or NSA, the US Administration would certainly have done something. Balkan experts from the CIA stated that the reports of the executions first reached Washington after soldiers from the column arrived in Tuzla.

It did not take long for rumours to circulate about the executions, but no one had the slightest idea of the scale. The ABiH did not share its Comint on the executions or the VRS hunt for the members of the column with the CIA. Rumours about mass graves and various stories prompted a search for the truth. No-one could confirm the rumours or give any indication of the scale. The Americans had never seen intercepts by the ABiH which referred to 'parcels' or 'swine'. According to the US intelligence officials, the ABiH frequently made 'a lot of noise' during the conflict but it was very difficult to prove such rumours.¹⁴⁰¹

Other officials who were working for the US Intelligence Community in 1995 stated that they too were unaware of the existence of the Bosnian intercepts; it was definitely news to them. If the NSA or CIA had known about these intercepts in 1995, then the officials would have known as well through their close involvement in the Balkan Task Force at the State Department.¹⁴⁰² Canadian intelligence officers made similar statements.¹⁴⁰³ Journalist Roy Gutman also heard from US officials that the US

¹³⁹⁶ Confidential interviews (13) and (54).

¹³⁹⁷ Confidential interview (13).

¹³⁹⁸ Interview with S. Arnautovic, 05/11/99.

¹³⁹⁹ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁴⁰⁰ Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, (Srebrenica, report of a massacre) Assemblée Nationale, no 3412, 2 Vols, Paris 2001, Vol 2, Interview with M. Bernard Janvier, 21/06/01, pp. 106-139.

¹⁴⁰¹ Confidential interview (7).

¹⁴⁰² Confidential interviews (12) and (13).

¹⁴⁰³ Confidential interviews (9), (62) and (90).

Intelligence Community had no access to such intercepts. The ABiH ‘was in a better position to collect tactical intelligence such as this’.¹⁴⁰⁴

The Comint on the attack on Srebrenica, the column, and the later executions of the ABiH soldiers was not passed on to the Dutch Military Intelligence Service (MIS) either. Archival research and interviews with MIS staff revealed that no-one knew anything about the intercepts until the publication in the press in 1995 and the trial of General Krstic.¹⁴⁰⁵ The fact that this Comint was not shared is another indication that the intercepts were not available in real time. Otherwise, one has to countenance the cynical idea that the ABiH and the political leaders in Sarajevo were prepared to sacrifice Srebrenica and thousands of Muslims to win over the West once and for all to the side of the Bosnian Muslims. This thought was actually expressed before and after the fall of Srebrenica by the Bosnian Foreign Minister Sacirbey, who said: ‘Well, now we have one problem less’.¹⁴⁰⁶

A CIA official who worked in the region also suggested during an interview that there was a certain disinterest regarding the events in the enclave. Srebrenica was scarcely broached in his talks with senior Bosnian commanders and government officials. The war crimes committed in the enclave did not top the list of questions that the ABiH wanted to solve or urgently discuss with the CIA. Instead, pertinent questions posed earlier by the CIA officer on the matter were avoided. There has never been a clear explanation for this. Apparently, everything revolved around Sarajevo, and Srebrenica was pushed into the background.¹⁴⁰⁷ That this should apply to the mass murders is, however, a cynical scenario that cannot be supported with convincing evidence.

What if the ABiH had shared its intelligence with UNPROFOR?

If the ABiH had actually been in possession of real-time Comint and passed it on to UNPROFOR, could this have influenced the fate of Srebrenica or saved the male Muslims? ‘What if’ questions are, by definition, difficult to answer. A senior member of the US Intelligence Community took the view that it would have made no difference; he pointed out that both the ABiH and UNPROFOR knew that the enclave was under attack. They knew that a large group of soldiers had left the enclave but, for various reasons, neither of them took action.

UNPROFOR could perhaps have interpreted its mandate more freely or exerted pressure on Pale and Belgrade, but this would have taken so much time that it would not have helped to save Srebrenica or the men.¹⁴⁰⁸ On the other hand, the immediate publication of these intercepted messages might have turned the tide for the men and boys in the column. The Bosnian Serbs might have halted the mass executions if their scale had been made known to the outside world. Pale and Belgrade would probably have had to give in to diplomatic, military and other pressure. The only people with whom the Bosnian Government was prepared to share its volatile Comint were journalists. In October and November 1995 the Bosnian Foreign Minister, Sacirbey, offered the aforementioned ABiH intercepts to various journalists. However, he waited until months after the fall of Srebrenica, perhaps in an attempt to improve his own negotiating position.¹⁴⁰⁹ The obvious conclusion from this is that neither the Bosnian military nor political leaders shared the intercepts with UNPROFOR, the UN in New York or the US intelligence services. Presumably, this was mainly because the Muslims did not have real-time communication intercepts.

¹⁴⁰⁴ Roy Gutman, ‘UN’s Deadly Deal’, Newsday, 29/05/96.

¹⁴⁰⁵ Confidential interviews (21), (22), (24) and (27).

¹⁴⁰⁶ Interview with Anđeljko Makar, 12/06/00.

¹⁴⁰⁷ Confidential interview (12).

¹⁴⁰⁸ Confidential information (13).

¹⁴⁰⁹ Confidential information (6).

5. UNPROFOR and Dutchbat as a target for Communications Intelligence

As already mentioned in a previous chapter, according to an article published in the Dutch newspaper Het Parool, 'During the conflict in Bosnia, Sarajevo was a hive of espionage. Everyone was spying on everyone else: the warring factions and the countries of the UN peace force.' Het Parool reported in 1998 that the telephone of General Rose was being tapped not only by one of the allies but by the Muslims as well.¹⁴¹⁰ The Chief-of-Staff under General Rose, General A.P.P.M. van Baal, also confirmed that the residence of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo was bugged. This building, Tito's former country retreat, was filled with bugging devices. Furthermore, the two lower storeys of an outbuilding were being used by the Bosnian intelligence services. Van Baal said that General Rose sometimes called out – for a joke – that an attack was pending. Shortly afterwards, a call would come from ABiH headquarters claiming that an attack was underway.¹⁴¹¹

UNPROFOR communications were a key target for all warring factions (VJ, VRS and ABiH). As far as Comint operations of the VRS in and around Sarajevo are concerned, virtually all the conversations between UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo and Zagreb and the leaders of the Bosnian Government were intercepted. But the Bosnian national security services and the ABiH were not sitting idle either. In November 1994, during the Bihac crisis, the Bosnian Muslims intercepted phone calls between General Rose and the political advisor of Karadzic, Jovan Zametica.¹⁴¹² The previous chapter has already addressed the fact that UN telephones and faxes were insufficiently protected against interception. Sometimes interception was not even necessary and the VRS and the ABiH got direct access to the UNPROFOR communications network due to internal errors at the UN.¹⁴¹³

In addition, the Bosnian intelligence services had been heavily infiltrated by the Serb military intelligence service. The Serbs had realized before the conflict broke out that the federal intelligence services would disintegrate. Hence, the Chief of the Federal Intelligence Services (KOS), Aleksandar Vasiljevic, started up an operation aimed at infiltrating various sections of the Bosnian secret service. He is thought to have succeeded in the case of the Bosnian military intelligence service (VOS) and the Bosnian civil intelligence service (AID). The VRS intelligence service probably received further assistance from the Serb Foreign Ministry (MUP), which had its own satellite monitoring station in Belgrade. The main targets of the MUP were the UNPROFOR and NATO communications that ran via Inmarsat and/or Intelsat. Here, the VRS was doubly successful: the Bosnian military intelligence service led by Brigadier-General Mustafa Hajrulahovic permanently listened in to UNPROFOR headquarters and all international telephone calls. As the VRS, in turn, intercepted the communications of the Muslims, it also had access to these intercepts.¹⁴¹⁴

This is how the VRS discovered through Comint that a senior UNPROFOR official had struck a deal with a prominent Bosnian minister. During the negotiations with the Bosnian Serbs the UNPROFOR official would try to get the access routes re-opened for humanitarian convoys to Sarajevo. A member of General Smith's staff heard this from VRS liaison officer, Major Milenko Indjic, and reported it to his superior. Smith disbelieved it at first, but it was quickly confirmed by another UN worker who had heard the same thing from the secretary of the Bosnian minister. In return for keeping the access routes open for four days a sizeable sum of money would be deposited in the UNPROFOR official's Swiss bank account. The Bosnian minister had already transferred substantial sums into this account. The Bosnian but also Bosnian-Serb mafia was namely making a fortune from the humanitarian ¹⁴¹⁰ 'sarajevo zat vol spionnen in oorlog' (Sarajevo full of spies during war), Het Parool, 24/04/98.

¹⁴¹¹ Interview with A.P.P.M. van Baal, 27/05/98.

¹⁴¹² Rose, Fighting for Peace, pp. 203 - 204.

¹⁴¹³ Confidential collection (7), UNPROFOR Outgoing Fax, C. White to Sector Sarajevo, no. 007, 27/02/95.

¹⁴¹⁴ In Croatia this operation was known as Operation Labrador. MoD, MIS, File 438-0190, box 307, Memorandum: The Bosnian civil intelligence service AID, 07/05/97.

aid being sent to Sarajevo. Both parties even shot at UN planes bringing the aid. As these were then prevented from delivering the goods, the prices on the black market rose.¹⁴¹⁵

Corruption hit UNPROFOR in another way, too. A member of General Smith's staff said: 'The Coded Cables of the UN were sold in Sarajevo for $1000'.¹⁴¹⁶ The Bosnian Minister Muratovic made no secret to the temporary Dutch chargé d'affaires, Glaubitz, of the fact that Bosnian Muslims were intercepting UNPROFOR communications.¹⁴¹⁷ Insiders knew this already, but that did not make Muratovic's admission any less remarkable.

The fact that UNPROFOR messages were being intercepted at the very highest level was also confirmed by a message from the 2nd Corps, which reported on 11 July 1995 that it had listened in three times to a phone call through an open line between Generals Janvier and Zdravko Tolimir.¹⁴¹⁸ The ABiH also intercepted phone calls between Generals Mladic and Janvier on 9 and 10 July,¹⁴¹⁹ and between the Dutch General Nicolai and the General Staff of the VRS.¹⁴²⁰ UNPROFOR headquarters was also a favourite target of the Bosnian intelligence services.¹⁴²¹ For example, all faxes from the Chief Political Officer of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, Phillip Corwin, were intercepted by the Bosnian Muslims.¹⁴²² This equally applied to the UNPF headquarters in Zagreb; here the Croatian services were responsible. According to a member of the UNPF intelligence staff in Zagreb, the Croatian national security and military intelligence services systematically monitored UNPROFOR traffic in Croatia and had engaged interpreters especially for this purpose. Rumour had it that they were experiencing problems with Belgian traffic, because Belgian officers tended to switch often between French and Flemish.¹⁴²³

The Croatian Army benefited considerably from UNMO intercepts, especially during the attack on the Krajina. They were among their best sources of intelligence.¹⁴²⁴ This was confirmed by the Post Mission Report of the UNMOs in UNPROFOR and UNPF, which said that, between 1992 and 1996, the Communications Security of UNPROFOR 'was a real disaster for UNPROFOR/UNPF'. The UNPF headquarters in Zagreb and the UNMO headquarters both used unprotected land lines for their daily reports and 'for that period UNMO (and UNPF in general) has become unwillingly (let's hope) "the second intelligence agency" for Croatian Army'. The satellite connections used by the UNPROFOR units were also an easy prey for the warring factions' interceptors. The headquarters of UnCivPol and the UNMOs in Srebrenica were monitored by the ABiH. Dutchbat made this public after it was discovered.¹⁴²⁵ The communications traffic of the UNMOs was similarly intercepted and read by the ABiH and as such became another a key source of military information.¹⁴²⁶

Up till then, open communications had been one of the cardinal principles of a UN operation. However, an UNPROFOR evaluation report stated: 'It is right for an academic Peacekeeping Operation, but for such an active operation like UNPROFOR it is not. There is a strong belief that it should be reconsidered on the basis of sad experience of this Mission'. The report stressed yet again that all the warring factions had stolen or seized large amounts of UNPROFOR communication ¹⁴¹⁵ Confidential interview (80).

¹⁴¹⁶ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁴¹⁷ NMFA, DEU Srebrenica, Glaubitz to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no. 25, 03/09/96.

¹⁴¹⁸ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Message from 2nd Corps to Odbrane Republike VoVJ TaVJ, no. 02/8-0101215, 11/07/95.

¹⁴¹⁹ ICTY, OTP Ex. 738, List of Exhibits contained in Ex. 364 (2 volumes of Intercepts), Conversation 9 July/1 and 10 July/1, 09/07/95 and 10/07/95.

¹⁴²⁰ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. ABiH Komanda 2. Korpusa to Komanda 28. Divizije br. 02-/8-1132, 09/07/95 and ABiH Komanda 2. Korpusa to Komanda 28. Divizije br. 02-/8-1142, 10/07/95.

¹⁴²¹ 'sFOR discovers eavesdropping center in Sarajevo', Glas Javnosti, 13/01/01.

¹⁴²² Corwin, Dubious Mandate, p. 165.

¹⁴²³ Confidential interview (45).

¹⁴²⁴ Thomas Quiggin, Response to 'No Cloak and Dagger Required: Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 13 (1998) 4, p. 206.

¹⁴²⁵ Interviews with Bob Patchett, 19/11/99 and E.A. Rave, 13 and 14/12/00.

¹⁴²⁶ For example: NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Komanda 2. Korpusa, Tuzla to Generalstab ABiH, Sarajevo, no. SP. 06-712-24-7/95, 15/07/95.

equipment and that the Sigint units of the VJ, the VRS and the ABiH were therefore able to intercept UNMO communications 24 hours a day ‘as the most reliable source of information’.¹⁴²⁷ A Scandinavian UNMO in Sarajevo was for example introduced to a Bosnian Serb officer who would act as his liaison. The VRS official told him simply that he actually did not need an introduction because he knew already everything about the UNMO because he did read the daily reports sent to this UNMO.¹⁴²⁸ Even the Coded Cables sent from Sarajevo or Zagreb to New York were unsafe. All sides to the conflict were able to read them.¹⁴²⁹

As was revealed during the UNSCOM mission in Iraq, the UN had learned very little from the Sigint war against UNPROFOR. The Iraqi intelligence service was able to decipher and read coded communication with UN headquarters in New York. Apparently, the crypto programme was too weak and could be easily broken. At that time, it was impossible to buy strong American crypto software because of the stringent export controls imposed by the National Security Agency. After all, weak crypto software also enabled the NSA to read the messages. After the Iraqi operation was discovered, UNSCOM switched to the Pretty Good Privacy software, which was still unbreakable at that point.¹⁴³⁰

Various Croatian intelligence services carried out intelligence operations against UNPROFOR. The Office of National Security served as an umbrella organization for the Croatian Foreign Intelligence Service, the Intelligence Service of the General Staff, the Security Intelligence Service of the Ministry of Defence, and the Intelligence Service of the Croatian Army. All of these agencies were active against UNPROFOR. Bureau IV of the latter organization was in charge of military Comint operations, which were coordinated from the Lucko air base in Zagreb. Bureau IV had close ties with the Bundesnachrichtendienst and the CIA, both of which provided equipment and organized training. The Croatian National Signals Intelligence service also collected Sigint outside Croatia.¹⁴³¹

Members of an European intelligence service also emphasized that at the start of the conflict the Croatians delivered a lot of computer hardware to Belgrade. All this hardware had, however, been fitted with a ‘back door’ so that the Croatian intelligence services could look over the Serb shoulders. Tudjman’s son reportedly played a key role in these operations.¹⁴³² The Croatian weekly publication Globus printed quotations from telephone conversations which purportedly took place between President Clinton from his presidential plane Air Force One and President Milosevic. The Croatian services allegedly listened in to hundreds of such calls.¹⁴³³

In addition, NATO intelligence flowed to the Croatians via the Bundesnachrichtendienst, much to the displeasure of NATO members, who knew that the Serbs had infiltrated deep into the Croatian intelligence services. This had been going on since 1989 through Operation Labrador, when Milosevic had ordered that a Serb network be set up within the Croatian intelligence community. Intelligence from US and German services ended up in Belgrade via this route.¹⁴³⁴ However, BND officials deny that this happened.¹⁴³⁵

The National Service for Electronic Monitoring – which formed part of the Croatian Agency for National Security – focused on intercepting civil internal and foreign communications. This section, ¹⁴²⁷ Confidential collection (5), UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF, Post Mission Report 1992 - 1996, Zagreb 1996, p. 29.

¹⁴²⁸ Confidential interview (100).

¹⁴²⁹ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 319.

¹⁴³⁰ ‘UNSCOM Hurt by Weak Encryption’, in: Intelligence Newsletter, no. 403, 05/04/01 as published on 18/04/01 on: <http://216.167.120.50/>

¹⁴³¹ Miroslav Tudjman, ‘The First Five Years of the Croatian Intelligence Service’, National Security and The Future, Vol. 1(2000) 2, p. 47 - 74.

¹⁴³² Confidential information (48).

¹⁴³³ ‘Ophef over gesprekken tussen Clinton en Milosevic’ (Commotion about calls between Clinton and Milosevic), De Volkskrant, 07/02/02; Alex Todorovic, ‘Tapes reveal Sloba chummy with Bill’, The Gazette (Montreal), 07/02/02 and ‘In leaked Milosevic tapes, father knows best’, The New York Times, 07/02/02.

¹⁴³⁴ Marko Milivojevic, ‘Croatia’s Intelligence Services’, Jane’s Intelligence Review, Vol. 6, No. 9, pp. 404 - 410 and Confidential interview (15).

¹⁴³⁵ Confidential interviews (99) and (100).

established in 1991, also received considerable American support. It was able to intercept 40,000 GSMs at the same time and to register over 100 conversations with the aid of target words in computers. The Berlin firm Rhode & Schwarz supplied the hardware and the CIA supplied the programs. The NSEM reportedly collected 70% of all the intelligence delivered to the Croatian political and military leaders.¹⁴³⁶

But not only high-level UNPROFOR communication was a key target for all the warring factions; tactical military communications were important as well. A member of the UNPF intelligence staff in Zagreb said that the ABiH and the VRS constantly intercepted this traffic, using Motorolas from captured UNPROFOR vehicles. The Chief Political Officer of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, Phillip Corwin, said that as it was impossible to change communication codes every time a car was hijacked. They had to assume that their mobile communications were being monitored by all sides.¹⁴³⁷ ABiH soldiers even broke regularly into these UNPROFOR communications to, for instance, improve target bearings in observation reports.¹⁴³⁸ The Croats followed suit.¹⁴³⁹ The British Royal Welch Fusiliers partially solved this problem by using Welsh-speaking communications staff; none of the warring factions could follow the conversations in Welsh.¹⁴⁴⁰ UNPROFOR traffic was regularly tapped by the VRS. Scandinavian UNPROFOR units meticulously observed the locations hit by VRS mortar grenades around Tuzla and passed this information on direct to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command via an open radio link. The VRS listened in to these messages and used the UNPROFOR observations to correct their aim.¹⁴⁴¹ The VRS only had to 'capitulate' when the Scandinavians communicated in one of their national languages.

Yet another target was the communications of the British SAS. It was not only the NSA that listened in to these connections;¹⁴⁴² the ABiH did so as well, but they never managed to break the code. A member of a British intelligence service said that the ABiH probably read 'open routine traffic' but not crypto traffic. This was 100% safe.¹⁴⁴³ The fact that the ABiH was following SAS communication was revealed by a report sent by the Bosnian national security services to the 28th Division. This report mentioned information that was being passed on by the JCO unit in Srebrenica to the Joint Commission Observer headquarters in Sarajevo on the fighting around the enclave and the numbers of dead and wounded.¹⁴⁴⁴

Dutchbat intercepted

The communication traffic of Dutchbat was an equally important target for Comint. Communication equipment was regularly stolen from Dutchbat personnel.¹⁴⁴⁵ The VRS listened in to the traffic between the various OPs and between the OPs and the Dutch base in Potocari. As the OPs were situated on ABiH territory, the VRS collected a lot of information on all sorts of military operations, because the Dutchbat soldiers dutifully reported all the movements of the ABiH troops. Accordingly, the VRS sometimes fired on targets where Dutchbat had just spotted the ABiH. The connections between the ¹⁴³⁶ Ivo Pukanic, 'Echelon Spy System' and 'The Details behind the Lepej Affair', Nacional, Issue 291, 14/06/01; Ivo Pukanic, 'The Wiretapping Fever has Shaken the New Government', Nacional, Issue 292, 21/06/01; Milivoj Dilas, 'The Wiretapping Affair', Nacional, Issue 293, 28/06/01 and 'Croatia Using Advances US-Installed Intelligence Technology', Belgrade Glas Javnosti, 03/01/02.

¹⁴³⁷ Corwin, Dubious Mandate, p. 4.

¹⁴³⁸ Confidential interview (45).

¹⁴³⁹ Confidential interview (44).

¹⁴⁴⁰ Thomas Quiggin, Response to 'No Cloak and Dagger Required: Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 13 (1998) 4, p. 207.

¹⁴⁴¹ A. Walter Dorn, 'The Cloak and the Blue Beret: Limitations on Intelligence in UN Peacekeeping', in: International Journal of Intelligence and Counter-Intelligence, Vol. 12 (1998) 4, p. 416.

¹⁴⁴² Ed Vulliamy, 'How the CIA intercepted SAS signals', The Guardian, 29/01/96.

¹⁴⁴³ Confidential information (1).

¹⁴⁴⁴ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Section MV, 2nd Corps to 28th Division, No. 06-05-174/95, 27/06/95.

¹⁴⁴⁵ Hans van Alphen, 'Binnen halve minuut is Dutchbat thuis' (Dutchbat home in thirty seconds), Haagsche Courant, 13/07/95.

UNPROFOR OPs and Sector North East were also intercepted by all the warring factions. This explains how a Danish report of an ABiH column near Tuzla led directly to VRS shelling. The ABiH also had knowledge of the communications between Dutchbat and the UNMOs. Sometimes, their reports contained literal quotations from Dutchbat reports.¹⁴⁴⁶

In October 1994 the Royal Netherlands Army used satellite communication equipment in the form of Inmarsat-A terminals as a key communications channel. These terminals were primarily intended for operational voice/fax traffic to the Netherlands, as well as contacts with the home front. However, they proved inadequate as the units were barely accessible due to the saturation of the Inmarsat system. The communication with the home front also impeded operational contact. Consultations were held and a suggestion was mooted to switch to a multiple-channel VSAT network, which used the PTT ground station in Burum (Friesland). This system was also suitable for data, crypto and video applications.¹⁴⁴⁷

However, on 10 December 1994 two Dutch UN vehicles fitted with satellite communication equipment were stolen by the Bosnian Serbs near Sarajevo. This gave the VRS the equipment and technology to improve their capability for listening in to the Dutch troops.¹⁴⁴⁸ The Dutch units in UNPROFOR used two civil satellite systems, namely, VSAT and Teledata. Secure and open telephone and fax traffic could be sent through these systems. It was possible to communicate with Dutchbat through the PTT and the satellite communication link. In addition, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had a radio connection (HF-EZB) with Dutchbat, which could send written messages, even those classified as 'secret'. Four international telecom land lines rented from the Bosnian PTT were also used for the Transport Battalion. In the meantime, Dutchbat was engaged in negotiations with the Bosnian PTT for the rental of international lines at Lukavac.¹⁴⁴⁹

The Dutch ambulances and command vehicles were fitted with satellite communication equipment for maintaining contact with the command post in the compound. This traffic was unencrypted. Under the terms of a contract signed with KPN (Dutch PTT) each message was relayed first by satellite to Burum and then sent on by satellite or fax. This procedure took approximately three minutes. Communication with the home front also went by satellite.¹⁴⁵⁰ The ABiH and the VRS monitored this open communication to determine the general atmosphere and actual military situation at Dutchbat. Karremans's predecessor had already discovered that this was going on.¹⁴⁵¹ This came to light, for example, in a memo at the end of 1994 on efficiency improvements at Dutchbat which stated: 'At the moment all connections are being intercepted by both the Muslims and the Bosnian Serbs'. The Dutchbat commander found it absolutely necessary that a secure connection be set up; apparently there was none at that moment.¹⁴⁵² These requests, which were submitted in December 1994, did not meet with an animated response. Indeed, it was not until 9 May 1995 that the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff started addressing the problem.

The compiler of a memo of May 1995 proposed that Dutchbat use the VSAT system of the UN to establish secure connections between the battalion and Bosnia-Herzegovina Command and Sector North East. The argument was that, as the system could also deal with crypto fax traffic, it could 'therefore not be intercepted'. This was wrong: the traffic could certainly be followed. Secure voice connections were not possible. As intense use was made of the telephone in a serious crisis, this traffic was indeed also 'open' to all the warring factions. For national use, the Army staff had placed the ¹⁴⁴⁶ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Zilich Mehmed to 28th Division, no. 06-401-103-2/95, 25/06/95.

¹⁴⁴⁷ MoD, CRST. Nr. 976, G-6 RNLA Crisis Staff to DOKL.HCIV, no. CRST\1004, 06/10/94 and 'VSAT-systeem voor teledata'. Compiler F. Polle, no. CRST/1132, 28/10/94.

¹⁴⁴⁸ MoD, MIS. File 1378, De gebeurtenissen in het voormalig Joegoslavië van juli 1994 tot januari 1995, (Events in former Yugoslavia from July 1994 to January 1995), 101 MIS/Cie, February 1995.

¹⁴⁴⁹ MoD, CRST. File 2504, Information on the communications structure from Major Luiting, 18/05/95.

¹⁴⁵⁰ NIOD, Coll. Koreman. Diary Koreman.

¹⁴⁵¹ MoD, Sitreps. Dutchbat Sitrep, 19/04/94.

¹⁴⁵² MoD, BDL. File 7914, Commander W.J.E. van Rijn to the Minister, no. S/94/061/4497, 23/12/94.

crypto telephone and fax with the Dutchbat commander, the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC), the Army Crisis staff, the Dutch Colonel Brantz in Sector North East in Tuzla and Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (General Nicolai).¹⁴⁵³

Bosnian military officials confirmed that the traffic of Dutchbat was a vital source of intelligence for the VRS. This was further borne out by intercepted communications traffic of the VRS. Sometimes, the ABiH could follow Dutchbat communications between patrols or vehicles, but they could not intercept the more important traffic. The messages sent from Dutchbat OPs to Potocari could not be received in Tuzla, but intercepts of the VRS communication led the 2nd Corps to realize that the VRS could listen in to UNPROFOR as well as Dutchbat lines. According to ABiH soldiers, the VRS could follow the communication of UNPROFOR perfectly, and the Bosnian Serbs were always well informed.¹⁴⁵⁴ This was illustrated by a message at the end of June 1995. Probably, the ABiH intercepted a message from the VRS which referred to a Dutchbat report. Dutchbat had just noticed newly arrived VRS formations and spotted new tanks. According to Dutchbat, a full mobilization had taken place in Bratunac. The Dutchbat report said that the Opstina had ordered that no new building was to be carried out in the enclave. Dutchbat subsequently concluded that a political deal had been struck and that an exchange of territory was in the pipeline. Moreover, people were being allowed to leave Srebrenica for a payment of DM6,000.¹⁴⁵⁵

Similarly, the NGO Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) in Srebrenica was an important source of information for the VRS. A study of the reports of this NGO revealed that it was passing on a lot of tactical information to MSF in Belgrade. This information stemmed from Dutchbat meetings with the UNMOs, local ABiH commanders and the Opstina of Srebrenica, where MSF was also represented. These messages often went by telex or satellite to Belgrade, but it would not have been too difficult to intercept them there. After all, the Serb national security service had its own listening station in Belgrade which used word databases. This service was allegedly capable of tapping 440,000 phone calls simultaneously.¹⁴⁵⁶ The main targets were the communications traffic of UNPROFOR and NATO via Inmarsat and/or Intelsat. The traffic of Médecins Sans Frontières fell under this.

The same applied to the UNHCR, the UN refugee organization, whose reports were even more meticulous than those of MSF, because its network in the enclave probably gave it access to better information, especially on the humanitarian situation. This connection also ran through the KPN communication node in Burum (It grutte ear). This likewise applied to the open connections of the International Red Cross and the communication sent from Srebrenica by the Swedish Shelter Project and Norwegian People's Aid. The traffic of these humanitarian organizations was an easy target for the intelligence and security services of the (Bosnian) Serbs. This was probably also true of the Muslims because they, like the VRS, usually saw the representatives of UNHCR and the International Red Cross as members of the intelligence services.¹⁴⁵⁷ The conclusion is that no-one trusted anyone in the enclave and that everyone was spying on everyone else.¹⁴⁵⁸ To complete the paranoia, President Izetbegovic even distrusted his personal staff. He had over 600 telephones in the presidential headquarters tapped by the Bosnian national security service.¹⁴⁵⁹

¹⁴⁵³ MoD, CRST. G-6 RNLA Crisis Staff to CS RNLA Crisis Staff, 09/05/95.

¹⁴⁵⁴ Interview with Harudin Kusic, 17 and 18/05/99.

¹⁴⁵⁵ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Section MV, 2nd Corps to 28th Division, no. 06-401-103-2/95, 25/06/95.

¹⁴⁵⁶ Interview with Bozidar Spasic, 16/09/01. See also: Udo Ulfkotte, 'Milosevic Geheimdienst' (Milosevic Secret Service), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 17/04/99.

¹⁴⁵⁷ NIOD, Coll. CD-Roms. Section MV, 2nd Corps to 28th Division, no. 130-13-75/94, 09/09/94.

¹⁴⁵⁸ See also testimony to the Tribunal of the British General Francis Richard Dannatt: ICTY, (IC-98-33) Testimony Dannatt, 25/07/00.

¹⁴⁵⁹ 'sFOR discovers eavesdropping center in Sarajevo', Belgrade Glas Javnosti, 13/01/01.

6. Conclusions

It has to be said that the Comint activities of the VRS in Eastern Bosnia were excellent. Before, during and after the fall the VRS was able to read the open and encrypted communication of the ABiH. This traffic held no secrets for the VRS and enabled Mladic and his generals to pinpoint ABiH operations when Muslims referred to them via radio connections. An ABiH general claimed that the VRS never managed to break the crypto programmes of the ABiH. He was wrong. The VRS had certainly broken the crypto software of the ABiH and could read most of the communication of the 28th Division. It was not without good reason that the 28th Division was warned by Tuzla on 14 June that the VRS had penetrated the ABiH radio network. Orders were issued to especially improve the security of the communication, but to no avail.

During the attack on Srebrenica the VRS continued to read the communications of the 28th Division. Hence, on 10 July 1995, the headquarters of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla sent another message to the 28th Division in Srebrenica that the VRS had broken its crypto traffic. It could not, however, prevent the fall of Srebrenica. The ABiH plans for defending the enclave – if they were not sent by courier but rather through technological channels such as walkie-talkies and other radio connections – presumably held no secrets for the VRS. If the ABiH was convinced that agreements had been reached with Dutchbat and then radioed this to Tuzla and Sarajevo, then it must be assumed that the VRS knew what was afoot. The Comint units of the VRS constantly monitored the communication traffic of Dutchbat and of the ABiH – with considerable success judging by official documents.

The evidence clearly suggests that the ABiH column of predominantly men and boys heading for Tuzla was an easy prey for the VRS units. It must have been relatively easy to pinpoint the positions of the various segments, for example on the basis of cross bearings. At no point in the journey were the ABiH soldiers safe. Their Motorola connections afforded the VRS an excellent opportunity to follow the progress of the journey. Intercepts not only enabled the VRS to determine the location of the column but to also gather intelligence on the internal problems, the difficulties, and the internal agreements and planning. This gave them clear insight into the modus operandi of the ABiH and a permanent head start. The column never had a chance.

Some of the intercepted messages which Butler, the military analyst at the Yugoslavia Tribunal, had access to were already published in the summer of 1998 by the journalist Mehmed Pargan in Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna. He accused the 2nd Corps of flagrant neglect and passivity because it made no attempt to lure the VRS away from the column. In his estimation, the 2nd Corps merely waited until the fighting stopped and observed the murders.¹⁴⁶⁰ However, his accusations are ungrounded: there was simply not enough real-time intelligence available. The murders were not observed and the 2nd Corps was not passive. That said, the efforts to help the column were small.¹⁴⁶¹ The Civil Affairs Officer of Sector North East, Ken Biser, seemed to share Pargan's opinion on the inaction of the 2nd Corps. He reported, for example, from Tuzla on the eve of the fall that high-placed military personnel at the 2nd Corps thought that the VRS attack on Srebrenica was merely an attempt to divert attention from Sarajevo and they were not prepared 'to create any additional diversions to relieve pressure on the enclaves'.¹⁴⁶²

If the ABiH knew about the VRS attack on the enclave, the column of between 10,000 and 15,000 males (including around 5,000 soldiers) and the subsequent murders, why did it not pass this information on to UNPROFOR or friendly western intelligence services? High-ranking officials of the ABiH who were interviewed, insisted that this crucial intelligence was definitely passed on. But the members of UNPROFOR staff who should have received it were equally insistent that it never arrived. Notably, nothing was found relating to the matter in the UNPROFOR reports or archives. According to Baxter, the Military Assistant of General Smith, the ABiH in Sarajevo never delivered intelligence to General Smith, his staff or anyone else at UNPROFOR.¹⁴⁶³

¹⁴⁶⁰ Mehmed Pargan, 'B-H Army Eavesdropped on VRS', Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna, (FBIS translation), 11/07/98.

¹⁴⁶¹ See Part IV, Chapter 1 of the main Srebrenica report.

¹⁴⁶² UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 67, Folder 25. Report for week ending 7 July, 10/07/95.

Various members of foreign intelligence services also said during interviews that no intelligence had been received from the Bosnian Muslims. This also holds true for the MIS and the Netherlands National Security Services. Studies of UNPROFOR documents revealed that no 'hard' tactical intelligence based on Comint and Humint that were apparently collected was ever passed on. Nonetheless, Sigint was altogether a principal source of intelligence information for both the ABiH and VRS for Humint penetration was probably extremely difficult other than low-level Humint collection.

It has to be concluded that the Bosnian Muslims did not have enough personnel, interception equipment, crypto analysts, analysis capabilities or even an adequate internal communication network to get the collected Comint to the right destination quickly and efficiently. The monitoring methods were so labour-intensive that many recorded messages are 'missing'. Only snippets were intercepted. These snippets could still, on occasion, have provided important intelligence, but never the complete picture. It is clear that the ABiH did not have a centralized Sigint service, but rather depended on independent collection efforts by electronic warfare units assigned to corps and divisions. This is obviously important because it explains the disorganized nature of the ABiH intelligence effort in general. It also important to emphasize the fact that the Sigint effort by the ABiH was crude and created from nothing, which explains why they used a hodge-podge of commercially available and military radio equipment in their Sigint effort. There were no computers to assist in decryption work, which meant that they were dependent on plain-language voice intercepts for the bulk of their information.

In this regard, the ABiH was always a step behind the VRS in its intelligence operations. In addition, the Bosnian Muslims could not count on the support of the Americans or other intelligence agencies for the delivery of Comint. And, as was shown in the previous chapter, their Sigint coverage of Eastern Bosnia was poor. The question still remains as to why the Bosnian Government or the military leaders did not pass on to UNPROFOR even the small amount of intelligence which they claimed to have. One possible explanation is that, according to many documents and official agreements, UNPROFOR in Safe Areas was considered ineffective by the ABiH and partial by the VRS.¹⁴⁶⁴ In 1995 ABiH hostility towards UNPROFOR merely intensified.¹⁴⁶⁵ Sarajevo was even contemplating non-renewal of the UNPROFOR mandate because the UN troops had not clearly and openly taken the side of the Muslims or helped the ABiH in the fight against the VRS. Very little came of attempts to gain more active armed involvement from the international community, specifically NATO. This triggered calls in the spring of 1995 to face the future without the UN. Relations between the ABiH and UNPROFOR deteriorated while Muslim offensives continued to increase. More and more UNPROFOR soldiers were shot or attacked and the ABiH imposed more and more restraints on UNPROFOR freedom of movement.

It is often forgotten that the freedom of movement of the Canadian troops around Visoko was almost reduced to zero by the Bosnian Muslims and that Canadian soldiers were even held hostage by the ABiH in June 1995. Canadian units at observations posts were also cut off from convoys carrying food, medicine and fuel. So, it is not only the Bosnian Serbs who were guilty of such practices. Perhaps its low level of expectation and downright hostile attitude contributed to the fact that the ABiH passed no intelligence on to Sector North East in Tuzla, BHC in Sarajevo, or UNPF in Zagreb. The Bosnian Government may have accorded prime importance to exploiting the unconditional support of the international media in its campaign to blame UNPROFOR for the failure of the defence of Srebrenica and Zepa.¹⁴⁶⁶

¹⁴⁶³ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁴⁶⁴ Confidential information (178).

¹⁴⁶⁵ Confidential collection (7), Janvier to Annan, no. Z-1068, 28/06/95.

¹⁴⁶⁶ Confidential collection (4), G-2 UNPF HQ, 'ABiH Hostile Attitude towards UNPROFOR', G-2 Rick Morgan (drafter Capt. Theunens) to COS, 12/07/95.

Secondly, the ABiH and the Sigint Unit of the Bosnian national security service may have been trying to protect their sources, capabilities, methods and techniques. This is conceivable but less plausible, given that the ABiH and the VRS knew that they were monitoring each other's communication. After all, most of the Sigint experts had worked for the VJ before the disintegration of Yugoslavia and each party knew that the other had the expertise.

But if the protection of sources was the real reason behind the decision not to pass on intelligence to UNPROFOR, then this would lead to the highly cynical conclusion that senior Bosnian military and political echelons did nothing to prevent the executions, simply in order to protect their sources. It is therefore more likely that the Bosnians knew nothing about what actually happened until days, weeks or months after the executions. By then, Comint efforts were too late to make any difference to the fate of those fleeing. Perhaps the contents of these intercepts were, however, considered useful at a later date to serve the wider political interests of Bosnia.

Chapter 7

Imagery Intelligence in Bosnia

‘Communications without intelligence is noise; intelligence without communications is irrelevant’,

General Alfred M. Gray.

1. Introduction

The capture and fall of Srebrenica were soon followed by allegations that the American intelligence services had aerial and overhead (satellite) images showing VRS preparations for the attack on the enclave. Photographs of the arrest and later executions of the Muslim males were also believed to exist. This can be illustrated by citing some examples. According to Westerman and Rijs, US spy planes and satellites had photographed the fleet of buses which were brought in to transport the Displaced Persons after the enclave fell: ‘It beggars belief that the American satellites did not also observe the build-up of tanks and artillery near Zeleni Jadar’.¹⁴⁶⁷ Magda van der Ende, a member of the Netherlands-Srebrenica association, also claimed that satellite photos which ‘must have shown troop concentrations’ were taken in the weeks leading up to the attack. Van der Ende said that she did not receive these photos from Minister De Grave because the CIA refused to release them.¹⁴⁶⁸ Some accusations went even further and, being of a somewhat cynical nature, were also less credible. The newspaper La Croix claimed that the CIA had followed the executions ‘live’ on large screens in their Observation Room. This allegedly took place in the presence of one of Clinton’s aides, who reportedly directly informed the White House and all the allies.¹⁴⁶⁹

Not only were accusations levelled, questions were asked as well. Why did satellites and spy planes such as the U-2 fail to spot the VRS troop movements and reinforcements around the eastern enclaves? Why did the US intelligence community with all its sophisticated technology fail to ‘see’ the deportation of the Muslims at an early stage, thus enabling timely intervention? And why was the imagery of the buses at Potocari, the rounded-up prisoners and the later executions discovered so late?¹⁴⁷⁰

As in the previous chapter, the question that needs to be answered is whether real-time intelligence was available and, if so, why Washington did not inform the other NATO partners in time. Some Dutch parliamentarians appeared confused and ignorant about this issue. For example, a written question was submitted in the Dutch House of Commons on why NATO satellites were not used. Apparently, the politician was evidently unaware that NATO does not have any such satellites at its disposal.¹⁴⁷¹ These and other questions were asked after Madeleine Albright, the US Permanent Representative at the United Nations had, on 10 August 1995, shown the Security Council photographs of Bosnian Muslim prisoners and churned-up earth where their bodies had been buried after execution.¹⁴⁷²

¹⁴⁶⁷ Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, pp. 149 – 150; ‘VS wisten al weken tevoren van val Srebrenica’ (The US knew about the fall of Srebrenica weeks before), De Gelderlander, 13/10/95; Bert Steinmetz, ‘Voorhoeve door VS fout ingelicht’ (Voorhoeve wrongly briefed by US), Het Parool, 15/05/96.

¹⁴⁶⁸ De Groene Amsterdammer, 10/03/99.

¹⁴⁶⁹ ‘AICG call to indict General Janvier’, Bosnia Report, No. 1, November-December 1997, p. 3.

¹⁴⁷⁰ This question was also asked during a Netherlands Ministerial Council meeting. See: Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 25/08/95, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

¹⁴⁷¹ MoD, DCBC, box 59, No. 1307, HMID to DS/HOPN, Parliamentary Questions on Srebrenica, 16/11/95.

¹⁴⁷² ‘US Reveals Photographs Of Apparent Mass Grave’, International Herald Tribune, 10/08/95 and ‘Up to 2,700 Massacred By Serbs, UN is Told’, International Herald Tribune, 11/08/95. Doubts were also expressed as to the existence of mass graves

The principal aim of this chapter is to clarify the ‘story’ behind these satellite images. It will begin by studying the general substance of the various accusations. Section 2 will present an inventory of the ‘eyes’ which the international intelligence community (also in the Netherlands) had at its disposal in Bosnia in the summer of 1995 and answer the question whether these instruments were actually deployed above Eastern Bosnia at that time. The images in question taken from the air are referred to as ‘Imagery Intelligence’ (Imint). The section will conclude by discussing the limitations of imagery intelligence.

Section 3 will explore the question whether Imint was also shared with UNPROFOR and the NATO allies and whether the photos – if available – were passed on by US intelligence services. Section 4 will analyse the ‘discovery process’ of the photos. Various interpretations and versions of this process have been mooted over the years. Concrete evidence – the actual photos, in so far as these have been released – will be used to ascertain what kind of photos were taken and on which dates. The deployment and success of Imint have always been cloaked in obscurity. Some claim that more Imint existed than has been published to date. Photos taken by US satellites and spy planes purportedly show the location where the estimated 4,000 men were taken by the Serbs.¹⁴⁷³ However, the first reports that the Americans had photos indicating a planned VRS attack on Srebrenica did not surface until October 1995. A journalist said to have heard this from sources in the US intelligence community. US Intelligence also allegedly had photos of mass executions to the north of Srebrenica.¹⁴⁷⁴

The argument that was put forward for not passing on the intelligence on the planned attack was that nothing could be allowed to upset President Clinton’s efforts to broker a peace deal.¹⁴⁷⁵ The implicit suggestion here is that the Bosnian Serbs had a free hand to go ahead. Several weeks later, reports appeared in the press that US satellites and unmanned spy planes had taken photos of tank and artillery concentrations in the vicinity of the enclave. Allegedly, reinforcements of VRS infantry were also observed from the air and from space. This prior knowledge of VRS movements was not, however, communicated to UNPROFOR. Officers at UNPROFOR were said to be somewhat embittered by this ‘cynical behaviour’ on the part of the Americans.¹⁴⁷⁶

At the end of 1995, reports again emerged of the operations of unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs). The Sunday Telegraph and The Herald International Tribune both claimed that UAVs had been deployed above Bosnia and that the Americans had video footage from Predators (unmanned aircraft vehicles) of the murders in and around Srebrenica.¹⁴⁷⁷ The accuracy of these allegations will be addressed in this chapter. To begin with, a few things need to be placed in perspective: the principal question is whether photos existed of the military preparations of the Bosnian Serbs in addition to the photos of mass graves.

and the estimated number of executed Muslim males. The finger of blame was also pointed at the press who had not taken the trouble to sound out the situation locally. See the letter of George Jatras, ‘Vilifying the Serbian Scapegoat’, The Washington Times, 20/07/97. For a more or less identical story see: Stella L. Jatras, ‘srebrenica - Code Word to Silence Critics of US Policy in the Balkans’, 31/07/00. At: www.antiwar.com/orig/jatras.3.html ¹⁴⁷³ ‘Onduidelijkheid over nieuwe luchtfotos val Srebrenica’ (Obscurity on the new aerial photos of Srebrenica), Drentsche Courant, 23/09/98. This report appeared in most of the GPD newspapers.

¹⁴⁷⁴ Andreas Zumach, ‘US Intelligence knew Serbs were planning an assault on Srebrenica’, Basic Reports, No. 47, 16/10/95. See also: ‘VS wisten van komende val Srebrenica’ (US knew of impending fall of Srebrenica), Nederlands Dagblad, 13/10/95; ‘VS wisten al weken tevoren van val Srebrenica’ (UN knew weeks in advance of the fall of Srebrenica), De Gelderlander, 13/10/95.

¹⁴⁷⁵ See also: ‘Amerikanen verzwegen voorkennis Srebrenica’ (Americans withheld foreknowledge of Srebrenica), De Stem, 13/10/95.

¹⁴⁷⁶ Ian Bruce, ‘US let safe haven fall. US knew of Serb build-up’, The Glasgow Herald, 24/10/95. See also: Ian Bruce, ‘Cover-Up led NATO to betray Muslims’, The Glasgow Herald, 20/04/01.

¹⁴⁷⁷ Ambrose Evand-Pritchard, ‘Americans bow to forces of realpolitik in Bosnia: US steps in only when the minefield is clear’, The Sunday Telegraph, 26/11/95; Ian Bruce, ‘Allies hamper inquiry: Serb war crimes hidden’, The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95.

2. What instruments were available for imagery intelligence?

Before examining the role of Imint in Bosnia it is necessary to determine what the term actually means. As explained in Chapter 1, the bulk of Imint consists of photos taken from a high altitude outside the atmosphere. This involves, for example, the use of photo satellites (Satellite Intelligence, Satint), some of which are fitted with infra-red sensors, which enable them to operate night and day, but only in the absence of cloud cover. Infra-red gives a night capability, but not all-weather because infra-red energy is blocked by moisture in the air. To get an all-weather capability, one has to use radar. Another form is photo intelligence (Photint) provided by photo satellites. This also includes Imint obtained from special planes or unmanned aircraft, which are designed to take photos of an area from a high altitude at a high speed or by high-speed planes at a low altitude. It should be remembered that most high-altitude aircraft taking pictures are not high speed at all. The U-2 is a good example of a low-speed, high altitude platform, which has survived so well in the satellite era. There are important reasons for that. Satellites were not designed to provide tactical intelligence. The U-2 can often overfly an area several times before a satellite can be reprogrammed. A U-2 can also provide Imint along any given path while a satellite may be over a portion of the path at one point because it is orbiting around the earth. Finally, U-2 Imint is less sensitive to dissemination compared to Satint.¹⁴⁷⁸

The American National Reconnaissance Office (NRO)

Most of the knowledge on the Imint capacity that was deployed above Bosnia relates to the Americans. In 1995, the NRO was primarily responsible for collecting Satint and for operating the various Imint tools.¹⁴⁷⁹ The existence of NRO was officially confirmed on 18 September 1992. In previous years it had been a standard joke that the abbreviation NRO stood for 'Not Referred to Openly'.¹⁴⁸⁰ The NRO, which is based in Chantilly, Virginia, designs, builds and manages the US reconnaissance satellites. It forms part of the US Defense Department, but it also has CIA members on its staff. It gets part of its budget from the National Foreign Intelligence Program.¹⁴⁸¹

The US intelligence services deployed a considerable number of Imint tools during the crisis in former Yugoslavia. These included satellites, U-2 planes and Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs), such as the Predator. The Imint satellite that was deployed above the Balkans was the Keyhole KH-11. The first KH-11 was launched on 19 December 1976. Unlike its predecessors, the KH-8 and KH-9, this satellite relayed Imint directly to Earth via a satellite data system. The first KH-11 had a life-span of 'only' 770 days, but it soon became possible to extend this to over three years.

On 28 November 1992, an 'advanced KH-11/Improved Crystal Metric System satellite' was launched, which operated in a higher orbit (around 1,000 kilometres) and had a life-span of approximately eight years. A second was launched in December 1995.¹⁴⁸² These satellites have infra-red capabilities, which enables them to operate in darkness. They also have a highly advanced crystal metric system so that they can meticulously register differences in height on the ground. Not much later, a third satellite of the same type was launched. Thanks to a much larger fuel reservoir, this KH-11 could be used more flexibly and positioned in new orbits around the earth.¹⁴⁸³ All Advanced KH-11 satellites circled regularly above Bosnia and sent back Imint.¹⁴⁸⁴ The same is true for the Lacrosse and other radar-imagery satellites, which are capable of penetrating clouds.¹⁴⁸⁵

¹⁴⁷⁸ Polmar, Spyplane, pp. 232 - 233.

¹⁴⁷⁹ For an overview of the development of the US satellite programme: Burrows, Deep Black, passim.

¹⁴⁸⁰ Laura Sullivan, 'A peek into secrets most jealously guarded', The Baltimore Sun, 08/09/01.

¹⁴⁸¹ See: www/nro.gov/background.html.

¹⁴⁸² For the orbits of these Keyhole satellites see: Allen Thomson, 'satellite Vulnerability: a post-Cold War issue?', Space Policy, Vol. 11 (1995) 1 pp. 19-30.

¹⁴⁸³ Richelson, The U.S. Intelligence Community, pp. 150-170.

¹⁴⁸⁴ E-mail from Jeffrey Richelson to Cees Wiebes, 29/11/99.

¹⁴⁸⁵ See: Jeffrey Richelson, 'U.S. Satellite Imagery, 1960-1999', 14/04/99, at: www.gwu.edu.

Very little is known of the technical operation and capabilities of Imint satellites, but some information can be gleaned from interviews with intelligence experts who had access to Imint. On average, the satellites fitted with pivotal cameras can cross a region once or twice a day. Making zigzag movements, they photograph swathes of territory, sometimes with a width of as much as 40 kilometres. The cameras take raster images (similar to those on a television or computer screen) made up of pixels (tiny points). Each pixel forms part of the overall image. If the satellite has a resolution of one metre, then each pixel represents a diameter of one metre. This means that objects of one metre or larger can be observed. The lower the resolution of the satellite photo, the easier it is for the Imint analyst to detect small objects. These pixels are relayed to Earth and, with the aid of the reflected radar beam, the analyst can precisely determine the height of buildings, installations and other objects.

He or she can also determine with a reasonable degree of accuracy whether a pit has been dug at a specific location for an execution and filled up again later as loose earth holds the radar beam slightly longer than compact earth. This brief absorption is enough to indicate whether the soil has been disturbed. Also, interred bodies cause a difference in ground temperature that can be picked up by infra-red sensors. This is how satellites discovered disturbed soil along a road near Srebrenica, which later turned out to contain a mass grave. Other locations identified in the same way, incidentally, later turned out (through air and ground inspections) to be loading sites for timber transport.¹⁴⁸⁶

For many years the resolution of the cameras was around one metre. Stories that circulated around 1995 about photographs of number plates or matchboxes were myths which were kept alive to mislead the enemy. This has all changed by 2002: even commercial satellites can now produce photos with a resolution of about 6 inches.¹⁴⁸⁷ People with daily access to US satellite images say that car number plates can now be distinguished without too much effort.¹⁴⁸⁸ The new generation of US satellites will be much smaller in size and will soon be able to produce photos with a resolution almost ten times better than the resolution of the photos taken by commercial satellites. These new satellites will be capable of delivering real-time images to US ground commanders anywhere in the world.¹⁴⁸⁹ The extensive and near-real-time capacity of US satellites can be inferred from the current generation of commercial satellites. These circle the earth at an altitude of around 700 kilometres, moving in a zigzag pattern that enables them to look 350 kilometres to the left and right. Images from these satellites are available within 18 minutes. It can safely be assumed that in 2003 the US satellites perform far better than in 1995.¹⁴⁹⁰

Could satellites 'see' the executions?

Imint experts have offered explanations for the failure of the satellites to photograph the summary executions of the Bosnian Muslims. Before a satellite could have recorded these images a lot needed to have happened under truly ideal circumstances. Normally, a satellite crosses an area (like Srebrenica) once or twice a day. As the demand for Imint is enormous, it is impossible to assign the satellites extra tasks above the region. There are geo-stationary satellites with a fixed position in relation to the earth but these are only used for Sigint, Elint and early warning systems for observing rocket launches.

Srebrenica was simply in too low a position on the list of priorities. But even if it had had higher priority and more Imint tools had been deployed, it would still be debatable whether the executions would have been discovered sooner. One Imint expert illustrated this point by offering the following calculation. If four satellites above the region were to circle the enclave four times a day, this would result in 16 sweeps for each video camera. If each sweep lasted 10 minutes, this would produce 160

¹⁴⁸⁶ Confidential interviews (13), (47), (54) and (62).

¹⁴⁸⁷ See for example: www.globexplorer.com/imgallery/image

¹⁴⁸⁸ Confidential interview (62).

¹⁴⁸⁹ Joseph Fitchett, 'spying From Space: U.S. to Sharpen the Focus', International Herald Tribune, 10/04/01.

¹⁴⁹⁰ Mark Stout and Thomas Quiggin, 'Exploiting the new high resolution satellite imagery: Darwinian imperatives?', Commentary, (1998) 75, pp. 3-4.

minutes of footage of Srebrenica. Only some of this would be taken in daylight: in the summer this would leave around 18 hours out of every 24. The satellite would then deliver two hours of footage, assuming that there were no low-hanging clouds, mist or heavy rain, as not all the satellites had infra-red equipment. The dense fog and cloud cover that often shrouded the mountains of Bosnia reduced the effectiveness of orbiting satellites. So, the executions would have had to have taken place at some point in these two hours, and in ideal circumstances, i.e. in broad daylight, with a full sun and no clouds, and precisely at the moment when the satellite was overhead.¹⁴⁹¹ The fact that executions usually took place at the edge of a wood, under trees or in a building is an additional factor which further reduces the chance of satellite detection. In short, a large percentage of these two hours must be subtracted in order to establish the period during which these executions could actually have been observed.

Even if more satellites had been targeting Eastern Bosnia it would still have been a 'lucky shot' – all things considered – if they had photographed the executions. Obviously, there were no 'lucky shots', but even if there had been, it is still possible that the Bosnian Serbs took account of the capacity of the US satellites. It is easy enough to find their orbit times on the Internet. Conversely, the possibilities of concealing objects or events from satellite reconnaissance should not be overestimated. For example, experts say that a spy satellite need not necessarily follow an exact path above a target to make good photos. As soon as it appears above the horizon there are already enough photo options, even if the target is hundreds of kilometres away.¹⁴⁹² That said, there will always be moments when a target is outside a satellite's range.

There are also other problems that need to be considered. For instance, where exactly should the analysts have looked? They did not know if executions had been carried out on a road to the north or the south of Srebrenica. They did not know which enlargements to make of which sectors in a sweep of 40 km x 10 km. It is, moreover, extremely difficult to identify a small group of people who are about to be executed. This takes a considerable amount of time, even for the most experienced analyst. All of this is typical of a classic intelligence problem, which also figures in other types of intelligence, namely, the intricate process of the intelligence cycle, whereby all data must first be converted into information. This information frequently leads to knowledge, but such knowledge is only useful if placed in the right context by thorough analysis. This can be a highly time-consuming procedure in both Satint and Sigint. Two US intelligence experts claimed that in 1995 the fastest Imint from satellites was ± 2 days old, provided that all the analysts worked on nothing else.

The intelligence gathered from the above-mentioned satellites revealed that though satellite photos of the whole of Bosnia and the eastern enclaves were constantly available, they definitely did not take priority in the analysis of all the incoming Imint. There was always a satellite with near-real-time intelligence in a good orbit above former Yugoslavia, but this had to cover the entire country. It then crossed Greece, Turkey, Cyprus, Kurdistan in Northern Iraq, the rest of Iraq, Iran and the area to the south of Iran. In the words of an American intelligence expert: 'I'm sorry for Dutchbat, but if you take a good look at this list, you can understand that the enclaves had absolutely no priority'.¹⁴⁹³ When one looks at the broader picture, it is hardly surprising that the photos which Albright presented to the Security Council turned up so late in the day. The countless number of photos and the abundance of rumours prevented the Imint analysts from searching for evidence of the deportations and executions until the start of August 1995. This matter will be returned to in Section 4.

¹⁴⁹¹ Confidential interview (47) and James Risen, 'Experts Warn U.S. Intelligence Help Has Limits', Los Angeles Times, 07/06/95.

¹⁴⁹² Confidential interviews (13) and (62).

¹⁴⁹³ Confidential interview (75).

The Imagery Intelligence technology of other countries than the US

Where the importance attached by the UK, one of America's closest allies, to Imint is concerned, it can be said that this country was bound hand and foot to the Americans for Imint after the failure of its ZIRCON spy satellite. It was also dependent on them for Sigint and other sorts of intelligence. London paid £ 500 million to get access to the Imint of the second generation Magnum satellite, which was launched in 1995.¹⁴⁹⁴ The UK did not, therefore, have its own satellite for overhead photo's.

Another satellite intelligence player in Yugoslavia was the Soviet Union. In the 1970s and 1980s the Soviet Union launched over thirty spy satellites a year. After the USSR collapsed, this number declined sharply. In 1999 there was only one launch and in 2000 there were three. There were four types of Russian satellites. The first was the Yantar-1KFT (codenamed Kometa) which gathered topographical intelligence for the Ministry of Defence. The second series was the Yantar-4K2 satellite (codenamed Kobalt) with an endurance of between 60 and 120 days. The Cobalt satellites had three small re-entry vehicles on board: two to bring back films to Earth and one to bring back the camera and the last roll of film. The Yantar-4KS1 (codenamed Neman) satellites were capable of sending digital images to ground stations in Russia directly or via communications satellites. They operated for over a year. During the 1980s it looked as if Moscow would be keeping at least one Neman and one Cobalt satellite permanently in space, but this was no longer possible after the country disintegrated.¹⁴⁹⁵

Experts claim that Moscow may have provided the VJ or the VRS with photos, especially satellite photos of the military positions of the ABiH and the Croatian forces. This is doubtful, given the limited Imint capacity of the Russians and the mediocre resolution of their photos. It is also debatable whether such photos would have been of any real use to the VRS in the area of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde. The information position of the Bosnian Serbs on top of the mountains and hills around the enclaves was so good that in reality they did not need satellite photos. In this respect Imint did not play a role in the VRS attack on Srebrenica.¹⁴⁹⁶ Apart from the USA and Russia, the only other country with a reasonably good satellite intelligence capacity is China. There are no indications that Beijing played a role in Bosnia. Despite the close ties between the Chinese and Serb intelligence services in Belgrade, no Imint appears to have been exchanged in 1995.¹⁴⁹⁷

Commercial satellites, such as Landsat, did not play an important role in the conflict either, because of their limited resolution. The French SPOT (Système Pour l'Observation de la Terre), though more suitable, also had a low resolution: it produced monochrome photos with a resolution of some ten metres.¹⁴⁹⁸ More could be expected of the Ikonos satellites, launched by Space Imaging Eosat (SIE) in Arlington, Virginia. SIE also manages the Landsat satellite.

Germany was not significantly involved in Satint, as the joint Franco-German Helios satellite was not launched until August 1995, i.e. after the fall of Srebrenica. It appears therefore that the only country, which was really active in gathering Imint was the US. They had sufficient capacity to take satellite photos of the ground situation, because a US spy satellite crossed Bosnia twice a day.¹⁴⁹⁹ Imint was shared with the BND but according to a senior German intelligence official, it often arrived after a specific German request after only 4 to 5 days. For example, Imint of the Muslim prisoners in the town of Bratunac arrived after the men already had been removed.¹⁵⁰⁰

¹⁴⁹⁴ Dorril, MI-6, p. 778.

¹⁴⁹⁵ Moscow did not even have a single spy satellite in space between 28 September 1996 and 15 May 1997. The most recent photo-reconnaissance satellite is the Orlets-2 (codenamed Yenisey) which can carry more than 20 capsules that can be sent back to Earth. See: Phillip S. Clark, 'Russia has no reconnaissance satellites in orbit', Jane's Defence Weekly, 08/05/01.

¹⁴⁹⁶ Confidential interviews (6) and (91).

¹⁴⁹⁷ Jasper Becker, 'spy boss welcomed by Serbian counterpart', South China Morning Post, 23/06/95.

¹⁴⁹⁸ See: Jeffrey Richelson, 'U.S. Satellite Imagery, 1960 - 1999', 14/04/99, at: www.gwu.edu.

¹⁴⁹⁹ Confidential interview (13).

¹⁵⁰⁰ Confidential interview (98).

American Imint technology

The American U-2s were essential for reconnaissance above Bosnia. Building started on the U-2 in 1953 and the first flight over the USSR took place in July 1956. The U-2 programme was the direct responsibility of the CIA. Since then, the U-2 has proven indispensable in diverse international crises and has provided policy-makers with intelligence by photographing targets and objects. For example, the U-2 and the later version, the TR-1, flew over 800 missions during the crisis in the Persian Gulf in 1990 and 1991. It comes in various versions, not least the U-2R (Comint version), which collects information on enemy radar systems. Another model of the U-2R carries out Elint assignments as well as photographic reconnaissance. The production figures are a state secret, but it is likely that many versions were built of the U-2 and the TR-1.¹⁵⁰¹

According to various sources the U-2s which were active above Bosnia sent 'imaging radar data via satellite links' for processing and analysis to their home base, the 99th Reconnaissance Squadron at Beale Air Force Base, California. Beale then sent the processed intelligence back to the commanders in Bosnia.¹⁵⁰² The U-2s were fitted with special radar equipment for taking photos night and day at an altitude of around 30 kilometres, regardless of the weather. The resolution of the photos was around 2.87 metres.¹⁵⁰³ However, one can have some doubts about this. The radar-version of the U-2, which flew over Bosnia was probably pulled from duty in Korea only in October-November 1995. A problem was also on having the available satellite bandwidth for relay of the imagery. Downlinking to a ground station was the conventional approach, but nobody wanted to put such a ground station within the footprint in Bosnia. The satellite uplink was the only solution, and that wasn't available until the US troop deployments began in October-November 1995, which jacked up the priority as the Dayton Accords took shape. In addition, there was probably never adequate data storage on-board the aircraft to hold the radar imagery for later analysis.¹⁵⁰⁴

Some aircraft, including the U-2R, were equipped with sophisticated video systems and produced near-real-time Imint. The U-2s have a range of over 11,000 kilometres and a cruising speed of 700 kilometres per hour. Their cameras presently have a resolution of 35-45 centimetres. The U-2 missions over Bosnia were usually launched and recovered in 1995 from RAF Alconbury in England.¹⁵⁰⁵ No missions over Bosnia were flown from the RAF base at Akrotiri on Cyprus. U2 flights out of Akrotiri flew missions in support of the treaty commitments from the Camp David Accords in Golan Heights and elsewhere in the Israel-Arab theatre.¹⁵⁰⁶ One of the recipients of the U-2 product in 1995 was the Combined Air Operations Center (CAOC) at the air-force base in Vicenza (Italy). The U-2s were managed by the Defense Airborne Reconnaissance Office (DARO) in Washington.¹⁵⁰⁷

Although the U-2 activities were stepped up after the Dayton Accord, when US ground troops arrived in Bosnia, U-2 aircraft were already operational above the enclaves in the spring and summer of 1995 and delivered considerable amounts of Imint. Each U-2 flight was not meticulously charted beforehand on the basis of intelligence requirements and targets but they did fly a huge pattern over Bosnia each time, and took pictures of everything that wasn't cloud covered. If there was a requirement for an unusual, special target area, such as Srebrenica, then they would amend their flight path as ¹⁵⁰¹ Polmar and Allen, Spybook, pp. 561 - 563.

¹⁵⁰² Graig Covault, 'USAF U-2 Satcom Link Employed in Bosnia Operation', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 26/02/96, p. 26.

¹⁵⁰³ Gert Kromhout, 'Op de grens van lucht en ruimte' (At the border between air and space), De Vliegende Hollander, (1997) 3, pp. 12 - 15 and Gert Kromhout, 'Overwerk voor de Dragon Lady' (Overtime for the Dragon Lady), ARMEX. 81 (March 1997), p. 25.

¹⁵⁰⁴ Confidential information (80).

¹⁵⁰⁵ Richelson, U.S. Intelligence, pp. 158 - 159.

¹⁵⁰⁶ Confidential information (80).

¹⁵⁰⁷ In 1996 the U-2s were stationed at the French air base of Istres, near Marseilles. They originally came from the RAF Fairford base in England. In August 1995 a U-2 crashed near Fairford. See: 'U.S. Spy Plane Crashes', The New York Times, 30/08/95.

needed. In general, they had only a few flight patterns, each of which was submitted and approved to a special reconnaissance command element in Washington. The flight pattern was divided into 'boxes'. After take-off (from the UK) the Polaroid camera was activated. A full mission delivered between 9 and 11 kilometres of film, which was analysed in small sections on a priority basis and priority basis here means less than one day. Sometimes, the U-2s flew over Bosnia twice a week. If the first flight was successful, the second was called off. After the U-2 film, all eleven kilometres of it, was developed, the U-2 photos were analysed and reported within 18 hours. Some target boxes were studied but most were not. It was totally impossible to analyse a whole U-2 film because there were not enough skilled analysts.¹⁵⁰⁸ However, according to an intelligence analyst all eleven kilometres of film was examined. He added that it perhaps was not reviewed with the scrutiny one might wish, if personnel, time and other demands were optimized. But a special team of photo-interpreters did their best to cover the film from one end to the other, and did a remarkable job to meet the requirements levied on them.¹⁵⁰⁹

The new requirements and targets were then defined and the second U-2 mission (if necessary) was planned and executed. The photos from U-2 planes arrived via the purely US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) at Molesworth. At that time, the intelligence team was well-coordinated and worked at wartime capacity. However, the pressure was so high that some people even committed suicide.¹⁵¹⁰ US intelligence officials responsible for Bosnia regularly issued additional assignments which required movements from target box to target box. The most suitable Imint tool for these target boxes was always determined beforehand: U-2, Predator, satellite or Tactical Air Reconnaissance (TACRECCE) like the F-16. Some tasks were not only performed by Molesworth but also by US European Command (EUCOM) in Stuttgart where Brigadier General Michael Hayden ruled the roost.¹⁵¹¹

The planned successor of the U-2 was the Lockheed A-12 (Oxcart), which made its first test flight at the end of 1964. Eighteen Oxcart are thought to have been built. The Oxcart was a success, but the last flight was carried out in 1968. The A12/Oxcart programme was terminated in 1968 because of a political decision to let the US Air Force assume responsibility for the missions. Its successor, the SR-71 Blackbird, became operational in 1968. The SR-71 was immune to fighter planes and air-to-air missiles, because it moved at such a high speed (Mach 3.3) and was undetectable on radar screens. The SR-71 was decommissioned in March 1990. Some went to museums and a few were stored in hangars. In 1994, Congress asked the US Air Force to keep some SR-71s ready for use or to make them operational again. The Air Force refused the request because of the high costs: $39,000 per flight hour. In 1995, Congress decided to foot the bill itself and offered $100 million. In return, the US Air Force had to keep three aircraft in working order. The resources were, however, never used and all requests by commanders to access the money were rejected by the Air Force Command.¹⁵¹²

Contrary to certain claims, these aircraft did not carry out photographic or Sigint missions above former Yugoslavia.¹⁵¹³ An official press statement announced that two SR-71s with crew would not be operationally deployable until 1 January 1997.¹⁵¹⁴ It is more plausible that, after 1997, they carried out missions and test flights in the USA for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). This was the main reason for the decision by Congress to recommission them in the first place. In any case, up till now no convincing evidence has been gleaned from documents or interviews that the Lockheed SR-71 operated above Bosnia.¹⁵¹⁵ In March 1998, the US Secretary of Defence, after ¹⁵⁰⁸ Confidential interviews (6), (13) and (91).

¹⁵⁰⁹ Confidential interview (80).

¹⁵¹⁰ Confidential interviews (8) and (54).

¹⁵¹¹ E-mail from Jeffrey Richelson to Cees Wiebes, 05/05/01.

¹⁵¹² E-mail from Jeffrey Richelson to Cees Wiebes, 01/08/99 and Gert Kromhout, 'Overwerk voor de Dragon Lady', ARMEX, 81(1997) (March), p. 25.

¹⁵¹³ Steve Macko, 'The SR-71 Blackbird Rises Like a Phoenix', Emergency Net News Service, Vol. 2 (1996) 45, 14/02/96.

¹⁵¹⁴ 'sR-71 Blackbird Back in Business', Air Combat Command News, 24/01/97.

¹⁵¹⁵ E-mail Jeffrey Richelson to Cees Wiebes, 29/07/99.

a review of options for the Blackbird program termination, approved permanent retirement of the SR-71.¹⁵¹⁶

Other aircraft with ‘eyes and ears’ that were active in the region were the RC-135 Rivet Joint, US NAVY F/A-18C fighters and the ERC-130 Airborne Command and Control Centers. These were fully operational in Bosnia, like the P-3C and EP-3 Orion planes (used by NATO). The P-3C Orion had ‘eyes’ and ‘ears’ and had been active since early 1994. After the arrival of US ground troops, it sent live images to ground stations in Mostar, Banja Luka and Tuzla. However, it is unlikely that these were deployed in operational Imint missions above the eastern enclaves in the summer of 1995.¹⁵¹⁷ However, from 1994 onwards there been problems because the overwhelming majority of targets were small or mobile rather than large, fixed sites. In the beginning US flyers even used 15 year-old hand-held 35 mm cameras, for they lacked timely imagery, according to a published account and Pentagon memos. In July 1994, a confidential NATO report claimed that of the 206 aircraft assigned to the operation Deny Flight only 14 were capable of air reconnaissance tasks. But some NATO members had their own national assets, which contributed to the overall intelligence picture.¹⁵¹⁸

Another excellent tool for observing troop movements and the repositioning of tanks and artillery was the Joint Stars aircraft, more commonly known as JSTARS, but these were not fully operational in the Balkans until 27 December 1995. The JSTARS were one of the great successes of the Desert Storm campaign. These E-8Cs (converted Boeing 707s) were able to register troop movements, tank formations and artillery positions at great distances with almost 100% accuracy. This is known as the detection of ‘Moving Target Indicators’ in military jargon. The JSTARS had direct contact with the ground commanders via near-real-time satellite connections.¹⁵¹⁹

But, as was pointed out by the former director of the French military intelligence services, General Jean Heinrich, Bosnia was not Iraq. The CIA knew what was happening on the ground in Iraq because it was desert terrain, something US intelligence services were comfortable with. The Americans were not used to flying over mountainous, densely-forested areas where small groups moved around in misleading ways, Heinrich said.¹⁵²⁰ The JSTARS also owed its success in the Kuwaiti desert to a string of other factors: large numbers of tanks, armoured vehicles and trucks that operated in large formations; low levels of civilian motorized traffic; a clear and broad dividing line between the two sides; no place to hide military materiel from radar missions; minimum vegetation and inhabited areas; flat terrain; air supremacy; and clear targets. Apart from air supremacy, none of these ideal operational conditions existed in Bosnia. On the contrary, in Bosnia the JSTARS were later confronted with mountains and hills and with ‘false radar returns’ from bare mountain expanses in what was later the French sector (in Republika Srpska). These signals were interpreted as moving targets and formations.¹⁵²¹

The JSTARS did not operate well in Bosnia. They could not distinguish between civilian and military traffic along the narrow roads. Sometimes a signal denoting a convoy was received, but this usually turned out to be vehicles passing each other. In any case, the ABiH and VRS generally travelled by bus to the theatre of war and not in long military convoys. Aside from the fact that the enclaves had ¹⁵¹⁶ FOIA National Security Archive, Letter William J. Lynn to Members of Congress, 21/0898. See also: Jeffrey T. Richelson (editor), The U-2, OXCART, and the Srebrenica-71. U.S. Aerial Espionage in the Cold War and Beyond, NSA Electronic Briefing Book No. 74, 16/10/02.

¹⁵¹⁷ Daniel Wakin, ‘Camera in Sky Keeps Eye on Bosnia’, The Washington Post, 19/12/97.

¹⁵¹⁸ Tony Capaccio, ‘Intelligence, Imagery Shortfalls Mar NATO Air Campaign’, Defense Week, 05/12/94 and confidential information (81).

¹⁵¹⁹ Annual Command History, U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command, Fiscal Year 1995, Top Secret, 30/09/96.

¹⁵²⁰ Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 part, Paris 2001, Deel 2, Audition de Jean Heinrich, 08/02/01, pp. 179 - 186.

¹⁵²¹ Colonel Collin A. Agee, ‘Joint Stars in Bosnia. Too Much Data - Too Little Intel?’, Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, (October-December 1996), pp. 6-10. See also in the same issue: Captain Bruce A. Niedrauer, ‘Joint Stars Support to Special Operations Command’, pp. 15 - 17.

no priority in the US intelligence community, the JSTARS had the greatest difficulty observing movements of troops, tanks and artillery in Bosnia.¹⁵²²

As the JSTARS were not fully operational in the Balkans until December 1995, the American and the international intelligence community (especially within NATO) did not have access to this intelligence platform in the summer of 1995. But even if they had, it is unlikely, given the local conditions, that the operational performance of the JSTARS would have contributed much – if anything at all – to the general intelligence on the situation in the enclaves. Finally, another air intelligence platform that could have been important was the ‘Guardrail’ mission, which had long been flown to all sorts of hotspots. The US Air Force had a fleet of 12 Guardrails (mainly for Comint and Elint), but they were not deployed in Bosnia before 1995.¹⁵²³

The European NATO allies did not have much to offer in this field. As far as the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) concerned, Imint took third place as a source of intelligence. Photos were delivered by the RAF Nimrods which carried out photo reconnaissance flights in the region. The U-2 flights also frequently produced good results. The British had borrowed U-2s in the past for various missions over the Soviet Union, but it is not known whether British pilots still fly U-2s. As a rule, the British used RAF Nimrods, Jaguars and Sentry AWACS for air reconnaissance and photography.¹⁵²⁴ None of these aircraft was active above the eastern enclaves. The DIS also had access to photos from UAVs, but most of the intelligence they provided pertained to Gorazde. These photos came from US UAVs, as the British UAV (Raven) was not flying over Bosnia at that time. According to a DIS official, Satint were delivered directly to the purely US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth.

The Nimrods performed Sigint as well as Imint tasks and were used chiefly for intercepting communications and electronic traffic.¹⁵²⁵ France deployed its own Mirage photo-reconnaissance planes above Bosnia but mainly for national assignments. In short, most of the western nations were capable of collecting their own Imint above Bosnia with special (spy) planes. However, as in the case of the spy satellites, American technology predominated.

The question that now needs to be answered is whether unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) such as the GNAT 750 (1987-1996) and the Predator (1994-1997) delivered intelligence. The only UAVs which were operational in the region in the summer of 1995 were those of the CIA.¹⁵²⁶ At the start of 1994, the first report appeared that the CIA had placed two long-range UAVs in Albania plus a ground station for satellite links. These were GNAT-750s, which had been flying since 1989. The GNAT fell under a CIA project known as ‘Tier 1’.

Depending on the terrain, the GNAT could make normal take-offs and landings, thanks to its retractable undercarriage. It could also be launched from a container and recovered with a parachute. The GNAT 750 is fitted with a data-link which needs a continuous line-of-sight connection. The CIA used to work with SGM-2-37A Schweitzer gliders which were flown by a two-man crew. It used these for photo reconnaissance missions. To secure the line-of-sight connection with the GNAT 750 a military version of the Schweitzer, the RG 8A, was later deployed as a relay station for the GNATs. The RG-8A is specially designed for silent flight operations; its acoustic signature is so low that it can operate above enemy territory without being heard. Two or three RG-8As are used by the CIA for special missions.

This manned aircraft had an endurance of only eight hours; as it operated from Albania, it meant that the GNAT 750 had an on-station time of only two hours. The aircraft had to operate from Albania because the Italian government had refused a CIA request to operate from Italy. The Albanian government was apparently less reluctant. The GNAT 750s were brought to Europe in January 1994

¹⁵²² Captain Kristin M. Baker, ‘Operation Joint Endeavor. Joint Stars in the Balkans’, Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, (October-December 1996), pp. 27 - 29 and Graig Covault, ‘Joint Stars Patrols Bosnia’, Aviation Week and Space Technology, 19/02/96, p. 45.

¹⁵²³ Ronald W. Wilson, ‘Eyes in the Sky: Arial Systems’, Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, Vol. 22 (1996) 3, p. 23.

¹⁵²⁴ Smith, New Cloak, p. 210.

¹⁵²⁵ Confidential interview (8).

¹⁵²⁶ For the history of the UAV see: Richelson, Wizards, pp. 224 - 226.

and stationed in Gjader, 30 miles north of Tirana. They became operational on 4 February 1994. They were fitted with several cameras (one with a 900 mm lens) and infra-red sensors.¹⁵²⁷ The GNAT had a range that covered the whole of Bosnia and Belgrade as well. It had an endurance of 24 hours and a maximum altitude of over five kilometres. Presumably these GNATs were used mainly for collecting near-real-time military information.¹⁵²⁸ The targets were air bases, entrenchments, fortifications, supply lines and troop movements. After approximately twelve flights, however, the CIA discontinued operations with the GNAT-750. The intended 30 missions did not go ahead due to bad weather, technical difficulties and problems with the relay of video images.¹⁵²⁹ They were later used to protect US troops in Macedonia against possible attacks.

In June 1994, the CIA renewed their efforts. It again wanted to fly three GNATs, preferably from Italy and otherwise from Albania. The home base was eventually Albania once again, but a new launch-site was set up in Croatia in November 1994. Now the GNATs were also fitted with Sigint capabilities to intercept communications and electronic traffic and radar emissions. As the GNAT was suitable for Comint, the CIA could now easily intercept ground communication passing through GSM phones or Motorolas and other walkie-talkies. The new GNATs could follow convoys and could even distinguish between fake and authentic artillery fire.¹⁵³⁰

The GNATs appear to have played a key role in November 1994. The stationing of the twenty members of the GNAT team on the island of Brac off the coast of Dalmatia (Operation Lofty View) coincided with the signing of the American-Croat military agreement on 29 November 1994. According to the journalist David Binder, the placement of the GNATs in Croatia also had a lot to do with the Bosnian-Serb counter-attacks against ABiH offensives. In return for their cooperation, the Croatian military commanders received intelligence about the positions, troop movements and communication links of the Bosnian Serbs. This information was allegedly also shared with the ABiH.¹⁵³¹ At any rate, UAV flights by the CIA and the Pentagon were carried out in January 1995 in the air space of the warring factions.¹⁵³² As will be shown later, the eastern enclaves were also on the target list and photos were taken by Predators. The GNATs definitely flew until 1996.¹⁵³³ At least, at the end of June 1995, GNAT UAVs with RG-8As were still flying for the Pentagon.¹⁵³⁴

Apparently, the results delivered by the GNATs were disappointing, though, because reports appeared before long that serious work was in progress to produce a successor. This would eventually be the Predator.¹⁵³⁵ The Predator, a more sophisticated version of the GNAT 750, falls under the 'Tier 2' programme of the CIA. It is much larger than its predecessor, but the greatest difference is the addition of a satellite data-link, which dispenses with the constant line-of-sight connection through the interim station of the RG-8A. The Predators were allegedly deployed in July 1995. The Americans are alleged to have had Predator video footage of the murders in and around Srebrenica.¹⁵³⁶

Images were indeed relayed by UAVs. Though the Predators were still in the test-flight phase, they were operational above Bosnia. These ground-controlled UAVs were deployed by the US Defense

¹⁵²⁷ Frederic Lert, Wings of the CIA, Paris, 1998, pp. 395 - 399 and MoD, MID/TCBU, Folder 443-0350, MID/KM Report, UAV's boven Bosnië (UVAs above Bosnia), PIR 95/1, 02/02/95.

¹⁵²⁸ David A. Fulgham, 'CIA to deploy UVAs in Albania', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 31/01/95, pp. 20 - 22.

¹⁵²⁹ 'GNATs Weathered Out', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 14/02/95, p. 19.

¹⁵³⁰ 'spying on Bosnia', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 06/06/95, p. 23 and David A. Fulgham, 'CIA to fly missions from inside Croatia', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 11/07/95, pp. 20 - 21.

¹⁵³¹ David Binder, 'GNATs for Bosnia', The Nation, 08/05/95, pp. 620 - 621.

¹⁵³² MoD, DCBC, File 792, DocId, 9221, AFSOUTH to ASCAL, 27/01/95.

¹⁵³³ David A. Fulgham, 'Predator survives lost satellite link', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 25/03/96, p. 24.

¹⁵³⁴ MoD, DOKP.u. STAOOPER. Telegram from Commander 5ATAF to AIG 5781, 27/06/95.

¹⁵³⁵ David A. Fulgham, 'Tier 2 UAV aborts first test flight', in Aviation Week and Space Technology, 11/07/95, p. 22 and David A. Fulgham, 'Predator UAV produces high-quality images', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 28/11/95, p. 62.

¹⁵³⁶ Ambrose Evand-Pritchard, 'Americans bow to forces of realpolitik in Bosnia: US steps in only when the minefield is clear', The Sunday Telegraph, 26/11/95 and Ian Bruce, 'Allies hamper inquiry: Serb war crimes hidden', The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95.

Department and the CIA. The Predator therefore carried out various missions depending on the actual 'owner', ranging from intelligence gathering on potential threats against US ground troops and planes (Defense Department) after the Dayton Accord to the collection of general intelligence on the warring parties (CIA). Hence, different types of UAVs were operational in the Balkans with Elint and Imint tasks.¹⁵³⁷

John. M. Deutch, the later Director of the CIA, was a particularly staunch advocate of UAVs. As Defense Secretary, he had already argued for a broader deployment in July 1993.¹⁵³⁸ It was also known at the Military Intelligence Service (MIS) of the Royal Netherlands Navy that the CIA was using seven Predators. The 'Periodic Intelligence Report' of February 1995 stated that for some time the CIA had been operating with this type of UAV above Bosnia. At the end of June 1995, the MIS/Air Force informed the MIS/Navy that the US Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) wanted to station the Predator in Albania for 60 days.¹⁵³⁹

Qualitatively, the Predator was definitely the best UAV.¹⁵⁴⁰ This Medium-Altitude Endurance UAV (MAE UAV) can operate day and night and has huge merits compared with most spy satellites. It has an infra-red sensor for reconnaissance and target recognition. An important mission of the MAE UAV is to gather Sigint.¹⁵⁴¹ The Predator also delivers Imint in the form of photos, but it can produce live video footage as well. These UAVs constantly relayed Imint with a resolution of 30 centimetres to ground stations. Thanks to zoom lenses this can provide sharp images. The UAV controllers on the ground could therefore observe targets such as tanks, APCs and other military vehicles on the ground from an altitude of ten kilometres. From an altitude of five kilometres they could distinguish a tank from an APC and from 1,800 metres they could identify the type of tank. The UAV has a range of over 800 kilometres and an endurance of 40 hours. It flies virtually silently at an altitude of 10,000 feet and it is more or less undetectable by radar systems, partly because it flies very slowly.¹⁵⁴² The UAVs were later guided to their targets by JSTARS. For instance, in 1996 the Predators were apparently capable of sending live images of VRS activities in Northern and Central Bosnia to the USA with a delay of one second.¹⁵⁴³

The deployment of UAVs in Operation Nomad Vigil became particularly relevant after the hostage-taking of UNPROFOR personnel in the spring of 1995. The shooting down of an American F-16 on 2 June 1995 was the main reason for bringing additional Predators to the region. Only then were the operational activities of the UAVs stepped up from Gjader (Albania) in order to support UNPROFOR and to prevent Serb air attacks in Bosnia.¹⁵⁴⁴ For example, on 5 June 1995, a UAV heading towards Kososka mountain was spotted close to the confrontation line at Drazevici in Sector South West. According to UNMO observers, this Drone was shot down by the VRS.¹⁵⁴⁵ It was not until after the summer that larger numbers of UAVs were deployed by the US Army and Air force. But, from the very start, the deployment of UAVs in Bosnia was not exactly successful. The Predators turned out to have serious flaws. In August 1995, two Predators were destroyed in four days. This led to an internal joke that 'they managed to add "soil-sampling" to their collection techniques'. One

¹⁵³⁷ A tactical UAV, the Hunter, was deployed by the Pentagon in 1999 in Kosovo but probably never flew above Bosnia. See: Lt. Commander J.D.R. Dixon, UAV Employment in Kosovo: Lessons for the Operational Commander, Naval War College paper, 08/02/00, p. 4.

¹⁵³⁸ See for example: www.fas.org/irp/aganecy/daro/uav95/endurance.html

¹⁵³⁹ MoD, MID/TCBU. AR Briefing MID/KM, State Secret, AR No. 26/1995, 03/07/95.

¹⁵⁴⁰ In 1998 followed by the Outrider.

¹⁵⁴¹ The planes will also be fitted with options for detecting minefields. See: Ronald W. Wilson, 'Eyes in the Sky: Arial Systems', Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, Vol. 22 (1996) 3, p. 23.

¹⁵⁴² Raymond D. Pickering, 'Tactical UAVs: A Supported Unit's Primer', Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, Vol. 23 (1997) 2, pp. 45 - 48 and Donald Harvey, 'Intelligence Notes', American Intelligence Journal, Vol. 16 (1995) 1, p. 94.

¹⁵⁴³ David A. Fulgham, 'Bosnian sky spy snoops for crime', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 06/05/96, p.25.

¹⁵⁴⁴ Annual Command History, U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command, Fiscal Year 1995, Top Secret, 30/09/96, pp. 31 - 32.

¹⁵⁴⁵ Confidential information (50).

Predator was hit by anti-aircraft fire when it descended to fly under the clouds. The other had engine problems.

Later versions of the Predator were fitted with Synthetic Aperture Radar (SAR), which meant that they would not have to fly below the clouds and hence could undertake reconnaissance missions in bad weather.¹⁵⁴⁶ SAR enables the Predator to look through clouds and even to detect planes through the roofs of metal hangars. Its range was extended to 925 kilometres and it could fly at a maximum altitude of 7.5 kilometres. It was only after September 1995 that the Predators started sending important intelligence about VRS tanks, heavy weapons, ammunition depots and artillery positions around Sarajevo and Gorazde. This information was passed on to UNPROFOR for the eventuality of air attacks on the VRS positions. Croatian Army officers admitted that the success of their offensive in the Krajina was partly attributable to the information from the Predators.¹⁵⁴⁷ They appear to have received this intelligence from the Americans. Late 1995 the Pentagon pulled its advanced Predator drones out of Bosnia because they were not equipped with the radar to see through dense Bosnian cloud cover. The drones were being flown so low beneath the clouds that they became easy targets for VRS ground fire. It did not take the Bosnian Serbs long to find a fast and effective weapon against low-flying UAVs. One tactic was to fly an Mi-8 HIP helicopter alongside the UAV. The gunner then shot the UAV to pieces with a 7.62 mm machine gun through the open side-door. This was a popular tactic during the war in Kosovo until NAVO fighter planes brought it to an end by firing at the helicopters.¹⁵⁴⁸ The CIA declined to discuss whether it also had withdrawn its drones from the Balkans.¹⁵⁴⁹

Besides the UAVs of the CIA, the US marines had their own UAVs, the Navy VC-6 Pioneers, which had been operating from sea and land since 1994, supporting the Sixth Fleet in the Adriatic. This was a short-range and older US Navy aircraft.¹⁵⁵⁰ Missions were flown over Bosnia from September 1994.¹⁵⁵¹

The deployment of other unmanned aerial vehicles

Did UNPROFOR itself have UAVs at its disposal? The Swedish Force Commander Wahlgren had already commented early on that his experience of getting correct and accurate information about Srebrenica and Zepa was not always positive. Getting intelligence from NATO was not much of a success. He suggested approaching Israel, which had used unmanned Drones for air reconnaissance missions in the past. UNPROFOR could perhaps buy or borrow some Drones for deployment in Bosnia. They were to be allocated to temporary ultra-mobile Drone teams which could be used quickly in problem areas.¹⁵⁵² In the summer of 1993, France also had deployable UAVs at its disposal. Brigadier General C. Ritchie, who was working for UNPROFOR in Zagreb, told DPKO in New York as early as at the end of 1993 that intelligence-gathering tests had been conducted with French UAVs. These five UAVs were rented from Paris but were only used above Bihac for the benefit of the French troops stationed there. They flew from Pleso airfield with the consent of Generals Briquemont and Cot. Their main task was to monitor troop and artillery movements.¹⁵⁵³

¹⁵⁴⁶ David A. Fulgham, 'Two Predators Destroyed in Bosnia', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 21/08/95, pp. 24-25.

¹⁵⁴⁷ David A. Fulgham, 'Predators bound for Bosnia soon', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 13/11/95, p. 73 and MoD, MIS/TCBU. MID/KM Report, UAVs above Bosnia, PIR 95/1, 02/02/95.

¹⁵⁴⁸ Lt. Commander J.D.R. Dixon, UAV Employment in Kosovo: Lessons for the Operational Commander, Naval War College paper, 08/02/00, p. 10.

¹⁵⁴⁹ James Risen and Ralph Vartabedian, 'spy Plane Woes Create Bosnia Intelligence Gap', Los Angeles Times, 02/12/95.

¹⁵⁵⁰ 'UAVs in Bosnia', at: <http://www.edwards.af.mil.pmay98/cover/bosnia.htm>.

¹⁵⁵¹ See for example: www.fas.org/irp/aganecy/daro/uav95/pioneer.html

¹⁵⁵² UNGE, UNPROFOR. Wahlgren to Annan, Unprofor Z-596, 067/05/93.

¹⁵⁵³ Confidential Collection (4), CoS Unprofor, Zagreb to BHC, Kiseljak, No. C811, 18/11/93.

As it happened, these UAVs did not perform up to scratch, but despite negative recommendations, UNPROFOR still rented them for $ 1,000,000 for a period of three months.¹⁵⁵⁴ A second bill arrived at the end of 1993 in which the French company CAC Systèmes charged UNPROFOR almost $ 253,000 for two UAVs which had crashed. UNPROFOR had doubts as to who was to blame for the accidents. A problem was, however, pinpointed: UNPROFOR had agreed not to fit UAVs with parachutes. This inevitably meant that the UAVs would crash in the event of problems. So the advice in August 1994 was to pay the bill.¹⁵⁵⁵ The intelligence product that was eventually delivered by the French UAVs could not be found in the archives of UNPROFOR or DPKO. Be that as it may, the problems with these UAVs prompted Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) to ask the headquarters in Zagreb to have other aircraft carry out photo reconnaissance missions at low altitudes.¹⁵⁵⁶

Though previous experience had proven negative, these were again French UAVs, namely, the FOX, which came in three versions: AT1, AT2 and TX. The French started developing these UAVs in 1986. The AT1 and AT2 were used for short-range battlefield reconnaissance and the TX was used for electronic warfare. The FOX was launched with a catapult and could be programmed or controlled from the ground. It landed by means of a parachute. The FOX had a real-time data-link and could be fitted with TV cameras, infra-red sensors, VHF or radar jammers (TX version). The UN is said to have had ten FOX AT1s at its disposal for reconnaissance flights above Bosnia. The FOX had a limited action radius of 55 km and a maximum endurance of 1.5 hours. The Netherlands Military Intelligence Service (MIS) had no knowledge of the operational base of these UAVs or who was responsible for their deployment. Nor did it know where the intelligence arrived, how it was processed and who was responsible for the processing.¹⁵⁵⁷ Again, the Imint which the French UAVs eventually delivered could not be traced in the archives of UNPROFOR or the DPKO. It did, however, clearly emerge that UNPROFOR footed the bill for the force protection activities of the French Army. The French also neglected to inform UNPROFOR that their military intelligence services were also working with their own UAVs. These were only operational in Sarajevo in the form of small, unmanned helicopters with a limited flying time. The results were not shared with UNPROFOR; the French were playing things close to their chest.¹⁵⁵⁸ It is therefore also unknown what Imint was collected by these UAVs in 1995.

The 'Raven', the UAV tested by the British in the 1990s, was not operational above Bosnia, but the German UAV, the Dornier CL-289 UAV, is thought to have been active in the region in 1995. These UAVs, which had a Zeiss camera and infra-red capacity, were especially involved in military tactical reconnaissance. An official of the Bundesnachrichtendienst claimed that this Imint was passed on to NATO.¹⁵⁵⁹ Most likely, these German UAVs were mainly active above Croatia. Their limited flying distance (less than 200 kilometres) continued to constitute a major problem. During the war in Kosovo, the German photos were rated as the sharpest, and the colour video of the Predator was deemed the best Imint.¹⁵⁶⁰

Among the warring factions, only the Croatians made regular use of UAVs – the MAH-1 and the MAH-2 – for gathering Imint. These machines were built in Croatia. In February 1995, UNMOs observed a launch near Karlovac. The Croatian UAVs were frequently deployed above Bihac. A

¹⁵⁵⁴ UNGE, DPKO, No. 81307, File DFC Office, Brig. Gen Ritchie, UNPROFOR, Zagreb to Annan, UNPROFOR-Z-1628, Drone Deployment, 23/12/93, 6p.

¹⁵⁵⁵ UNNY, DPKO, No. 81307, File DFC Office, 02/08-04/08/95, DFC Crabbe to COS, BHC, DFC 233, 24/08/94 and DFC, Crabbe to COS, BHC, DFC 266, 31/10/94.

¹⁵⁵⁶ UNGE, UNPROFOR. BHC to Unprofor, Zagreb, No. AOCC/OPS/30, 07/12/93.

¹⁵⁵⁷ MoD, MID/TCBU. MID/KM Report, UAVs above Bosnia, PIR 95/1, 02/02/95.

¹⁵⁵⁸ Confidential interview (54). See also: Eriksson, 'Intelligence and Peacekeeping Operations', International Journal of Intelligence and Counter-intelligence, Vol. 10 (1997) 1, p. 11.

¹⁵⁵⁹ Confidential interview (58).

¹⁵⁶⁰ Tim Ripley, 'UAVs above Kosovo - did the Earth move?', Defence Systems Daily, 01/12/99. Later during the Kosovo crisis in 1999, besides the Americans, various European countries reportedly deployed UAVs including the French with their Segem and the Germans with their Dornier CL-289. Even the Italians operated UAVs from Albania.

Croatian officer who participated in this programme said that the Croatian UAVs even flew above Belgrade. Croatian electronic warfare experts were also reportedly able to get access to the American VSAT downlinks which relayed images from the Predators to the ground.¹⁵⁶¹

During the conflict in Bosnia the Serbian air force also had access to special Imint aircraft. For example, the VJ had a squadron of twelve special MIG-21 planes. This squadron, which was fitted with 'pods' on the underside of the aircraft, carried out Imint and Sigint tasks from the air base in Ponikve and Belgrade. These aircraft carried out a maximum of five reconnaissance missions a day. They were often moved to keep them out of sight of US spy satellites and U-2 missions. Sometimes, they flew over the Drina for operations above Bosnia.¹⁵⁶² It may be construed on the basis of this information that especially American, French and presumably also Croatian UAVs were active above Bosnia, Srpska and Serbia. Quite a lot is known about the performance and results of the American UAVs, but nothing is known as yet about the performance and results of the French and Croatian UAVs.

Dutch reconnaissance flights

The Dutch Ministry of Defence also had access to Imint. Reconnaissance flights were carried out above Bosnia by four Dutch RF-16s.¹⁵⁶³ On 7 and 8 April 1993, four RF-16 photo reconnaissance aircraft of the 306th Squadron were dispatched to Bosnia. These RF-16s could take photos from a special pod attached to the fuselage. The pod contained five daylight cameras and one infra-red camera, which could operate in the dark.¹⁵⁶⁴ These four RF-16s were later withdrawn but four RF-16s were sent to Villafranca in February 1994.¹⁵⁶⁵ Before long it emerged that the intelligence flow to this unit was below par. This was partly due to the fact that updated intelligence was not available on time.¹⁵⁶⁶ While the four RF-16s photo reconnaissance aircraft of the 306th Squadron were stationed in Villafranca, there were squabbles among the personnel and a lack of cooperation between the Dutch detachment commander and the head of the Intelligence & Security Office at Villafranca. This came to light during a visit to Villafranca by two members of the Intelligence & Security Department of the Operational Command of the Netherlands Air Force. The commander and the head of Intelligence & Security were no longer on speaking terms, and the commander had a low opinion of the daily Deny Flight Intsums. Relations on the workfloor between the flyers and Intelligence & Security personnel were, however, good.

It also emerged that the Combined Air Coordination Center (CAOC) in Vicenza was being run by Americans and that US politics was determining the deployment of the resources. In addition, the possibility of national tasking for photo reconnaissance was being explored. The Dutch Senior National Representative was not averse to this but he pointed out that operations above Bosnia were subject to stringent constraints. It was even impossible to take photos above Croatia. In a later discussion with the Dutch tasker for reconnaissance flights it turned out, however, that such possibilities did exist after all. Implementation might then have to be undertaken by other NATO member states. Finally, the deployment of the UAVs was discussed and efforts would be made to find out what had become of this intelligence. It was, in any case, clear that The Hague did not receive any UAV Imint.¹⁵⁶⁷

¹⁵⁶¹ Ripley, Operation, p. 83.

¹⁵⁶² Confidential interview (73).

¹⁵⁶³ MoD, MID/TCBU. MID/KL, AI, Report on the enclaves of Srebrenica and Zepa, undated.

¹⁵⁶⁴ 'Eerste fotoverkenningsvliegtuigen naar Villafranca vertrokken' (First photo-reconnaissance planes leave for Villafranca), ANP press release, 08/04/93. For the role of the Royal Netherlands Air Force in Bosnia see: Lutgert & De Winter, Check the Horizon, passim.

¹⁵⁶⁵ 'Vier photoverkenners naar Villafranca' (Four photo reconnaissance vehicles to Villafranca) Defensiekrant, 17/02/94 and P.E. van Loo, 'Een open oog voor de Balkan' (An open eye for the Balkans), Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 12 pp. 684 - 697.

¹⁵⁶⁶ MoD, DOPKlu, No. 1475, Notes on intelligence problems, No. 9400603/01/U, 28/11/94.

¹⁵⁶⁷ MoD, DOPKlu, No. 1482, Summarized report: Visit to Villafranca, No. DOP 95004673/956, 20/01/95.

A search in the photo archives of the 306th Squadron failed to uncover any additional photographic material. The 306th Squadron carried out a few photo reconnaissance flights to Tuzla, Srebrenica and the surroundings between February 1994 and May 1997. The most interesting photos are of the compounds in Potocari and Srebrenica, which were taken on 2 March 1995. However, no photos were taken by Dutch aircraft of VRS military activities in the months before the fall.¹⁵⁶⁸

But this does not rule out the possibility that photos were taken by other NATO aircraft, even though aerial activities were scaled down after a US F-16 had been shot down on 2 June 1995. The Netherlands never ordered flights for its own purposes; it always adhered strictly to orders. This could not be said of the USA, the UK and especially France, which regularly executed operations for its own national intelligence authorities. This was demonstrated when a Dutch aerial photo showed a French reconnaissance plane in an area where it had no right to be.¹⁵⁶⁹

The last flight of the 306th Squadron (mission 1357), which was stationed in Villafranca and in charge of photo reconnaissance missions above Bosnia, dates from 27 May 1995. The activities on the western side were more or less stopped after the American F-16 of O'Grady was shot down. This incident showed that radar signals from were detected by the NSA before it downed the F-16 over Bosnia but that the vital intelligence was not relayed to the pilot. The deputy director of the CIA admitted that the system designed to collect and disseminate intelligence in Bosnia failed.¹⁵⁷⁰ An American U-2R aircraft, operating on behalf of the NSA, picked up SA-6 missile radar transmissions on and off for almost 3 hours before the shootdown. If this intelligence had been timely forwarded O'Grady would have had time to get out of the area, according to the chairman of the JCS, General John Shalikasvili.¹⁵⁷¹

In fact, no reconnaissance flights on behalf of UNPROFOR were carried out at all between 11 and 30 June. Apparently, it was considered too dangerous to operate after this date, given the mounting threat from the Bosnian-Serb anti-aircraft systems. During the war in Bosnia, the Bosnian Serbs and Serbs often fired their guided missiles without radar. If the flight route was roughly known, the VRS could adjust its anti-aircraft systems accordingly. The VRS radar was usually switched off out of fear of US HARM missiles. Another factor was that the VRS and the JNA had an integrated air-defence system, especially for early warning tasks. The JNA had also positioned air missiles along the Drina to support the VRS. These were also activated in the summer of 1995 during the operations against the eastern enclaves. Most of the time, the VRS worked with mobile missile launchers, which they moved around. The Dutch reconnaissance flights were not resumed until 2 August 1995 (mission 1358).¹⁵⁷² Unlike France, the Netherlands did not carry out independent missions (outside UNPROFOR and NATO) above Bosnia.¹⁵⁷³

The limitations of Imint

Though the Imint capacity of satellites, spy planes and UAVs appears impressive, it should not be overestimated. The claims of the French newspaper La Croix that the CIA even followed the murders 'live' on large screens in its Observation Room must be consigned to the realm of fantasy.¹⁵⁷⁴ Usually, there is no real-time Imint from satellites; there is only near-real-time intelligence. An explanation for this is the following. Near real time translates into available on the ground in 10 minutes, analysed ¹⁵⁶⁸ MoD, DCBC, box 61, Lt-Colonel J. Eikelboom to DOPKlu, No. VF/2498/95, 12/08/95.

¹⁵⁶⁹ Interview J. Schouren, 04/12/99 and Confidential interview (31).

¹⁵⁷⁰ Bill Gertz, 'NATO jet broke radar relay to U.S. pilot', The Washington Times, 28/06/95 and Dana Priest, 'system Failed Downed Pilot, CIA Official Says', The Washington Post, 28/06/95.

¹⁵⁷¹ 'Bosnia', Aviation Week & Space Technology, 03/07/95 and Dana Priest, 'Data Delay Blamed for Plane Loss', The Washington Post, 12/07/95.

¹⁵⁷² Confidential interview (32) and MoD, Archive 306 SQN PI-SECTIE, Overview of all reconnaissance flights above Bosnia, undated.

¹⁵⁷³ MoD, DCBC, File 1486, Memorandum from P.C. Berlijn to K. Hilderink, 02/08/96.

¹⁵⁷⁴ 'AICG call to indict General Janvier', Bosnia Report, No. 1, November-December 1997, p. 3.

sometime later, ranging from tens of minutes for US National Command priorities like destruction of Arafat's Compound, to several hours, like the sort of priorities discussed here. The dwell time of any imagery satellite from horizon to horizon would be less than ten minutes, from start to finish. Even best case, 'live' only lasts ten minutes, and would only be seen ten minutes after the fact. To do that, the satellite must pivot for the duration of its view time, looking only at a specific point on the ground. All other coverage of the theatre would be lost while the satellite stared at the one spot (like Srebrenica) on the ground. If such a feat were technically possible, which is arguable, it would mean the loss of hundreds of other targets across the theatre from the central Mediterranean to the Baltic. No one would imagine that any imagery target in the Eastern Enclaves would warrant that sort of priority.¹⁵⁷⁵ So, it would have been impossible for the CIA to have followed everything live. The claims of La Croix were also technically implausible: the number of satellite orbits makes it scarcely credible that the CIA watched live.

But the La Croix article contained even more errors. The CIA does not have an Observation Room, though it does have a Watch Center. Any Imint that went to the CIA was delivered by the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) to a CIA department, the National Photographic Interpretation Center (NPIC). It is indeed true that Imint went to the CIA Watch Center. But the CIA and pretty much everybody else in the US intelligence architecture does have access to imagery which was acquired using a near real time system. NPIC, more than anybody else except for a ground station element, has access to near real time imagery, arriving there about eight-ten minutes after the shutter of the satellite goes 'click'. These are all still photos. 'Live' coverage requires satellite gymnastics that are impractical, if not impossible.¹⁵⁷⁶

Nowadays, all Imint goes direct to a unit of the National Imagery and Mapping Agency (NIMA) at Fort Belvoir. Established on 1 October 1996, this agency is an amalgamation of the Defense Mapping Agency, the Central Imagery Office, the Defense Dissemination Program Office and NPIC.¹⁵⁷⁷ It was created largely to meet the fast-growing need for Imint and to bundle the Imint production of the various organizations and intelligence services. It was also probably the result of PPD 35, which decreed intelligence support for foreign armies and crisis operations.¹⁵⁷⁸

A unit of this new institute is currently stationed at Fort Belvoir in the USA. It has access to all Imint as soon as the satellite has relayed it to the ground. The only source of delay is the time that the Imint needs to reach the various ground reception stations from the sophisticated KH-11 satellite via the special satellite link. Fort Belvoir therefore has real-time Imint, but its analysts perform 'a primary analysis, particularly to determine if the imagery indicates something that requires immediate attention from policy-makers and analysts'.¹⁵⁷⁹

It may therefore be safely assumed that as real-time intelligence only became available after 1997, it could certainly not have been at the disposal of the CIA in 1995. It should also be remembered that, in 1995, the priorities of American intelligence did not lie with Srebrenica. In this light, it is hardly surprising that the satellite photos produced by Albright were not found until very late in the day and after a thorough search of archival Imint. In addition, before the establishment of the NIMA, a huge problem was who could issue orders to the satellites. There were more customers and orders than the satellites could cope with, which led to an almost daily bureaucratic fight in Washington.¹⁵⁸⁰

¹⁵⁷⁵ Confidential information (80).

¹⁵⁷⁶ Confidential information (80).

¹⁵⁷⁷ See: <http://www.nima.mil/>

¹⁵⁷⁸ Jeffrey Richelson, 'Examining US intelligence failures', Jane's Intelligence Review, September 2000, pp. 41 - 44. The establishment of the NIMA led to the departure of many Imint analysts who used to work for the CIA. A direct result of this was for example that the preparations for an Indian nuclear test in May 1998 was not discovered on time.

¹⁵⁷⁹ E-mails from Jeffrey Richelson and Matthew Aid to Cees Wiebes, 19/07/00 and 21/07/00.

¹⁵⁸⁰ The Permanent Select Committee of the US House of Representatives also pointed this out. Now the director of the CIA decides on the tasking. See: Joseph Fitchett, 'spying From Space: U.S. to Sharpen the Focus', International Herald Tribune, 10/04/01.

During the war in Kosovo, UAVs like the Hunters and the Predators were capable of sending real-time Imint to the ground with the aid of the Pentagon Global Broadcast System. Real-time Imint from UAVs arrived at the CAOC in Vicenza. But given the limited capacity, the tasking of the UAVs and the lack of a real-time downlink to the CAOC, there was no question of live Imint in the summer of 1995.¹⁵⁸¹

But there were more problems attached to the collection and processing of Imint. First, the bureaucratic obstacles: effective and fast dissemination of Imint has long been a problem at the Pentagon.¹⁵⁸² The success of Imint during the Gulf War increased the demand for Imint so much that it could only be met with the greatest difficulty. This problem was exacerbated by chronic rivalry between the various US intelligence services. The computer systems of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines were often incapable of communicating with one another. The chairman of a Congress Committee which investigated this said ‘When it came to Imint, it was like we had four separate countries out there rather than four services from one country’.¹⁵⁸³

Second, low-hanging cloud, mist between the mountains and valleys, poor weather and darkness often made it impossible to make good quality photos. Third, the ‘enemy’ often takes account of Imint and employs counter-measures. For example, India was able to conceal its nuclear tests from spy satellites by planning and conducting these tests during a period beset by sandstorms.¹⁵⁸⁴ During the Gulf War all sorts of cardboard missile systems were attacked which had been identified in the desert on the basis of Imint. Tanks and artillery that had already been eliminated were sometimes re-targeted because the analysis of the Imint was inconclusive. Sometimes, the Iraqi Army moved these destroyed tanks to another area to create the impression that they were new materiel. The same happened in Bosnia with the result that NATO planes attacked previously eliminated VRS tanks. After nightfall VRS soldiers moved the tanks a few hundred metres, giving the impression that they were new tanks. However, opportunities for misleading the enemy, though present, are often limited. For example, experts say that a spy satellite does not have to follow a circuit exactly above a target in order to take good photos.¹⁵⁸⁵

Then there is the issue of time. This must not be overlooked. The analysis of Imint makes heavy demands on specialists, as new images must constantly be compared with previous ones. The question that needs to be answered is what has changed in relation to the old situation and what conclusions can be drawn from this. These analyses are highly labour-intensive, even with the aid of sophisticated computer systems. The ‘enemy’ takes account of the capacity and possibilities of Imint and constantly moves operational weapon systems to confuse the observations of satellites, U-2s and UAVs. For example, Serb Surface-to-Air Missile (SAM) sites were moved every three or four hours with the result that the Americans regularly attacked old and deserted sites.¹⁵⁸⁶ Sometimes, dummy SA-6 missiles were set up, only to be identified after a U-2-mission, a UAV flight and a thorough analysis.¹⁵⁸⁷

Systems can also be hidden in bunkers, caves, sheds and garages. These can only be detected by infra-red sensors, and then only on the basis of heat emanating from the engine. These operations are also beset by problems because it is often impossible to determine whether the shed holds a tractor or a tank. Such problems can have a profound influence on the intelligence product derived from Imint. Members of the US intelligence community claimed that Imint was not the best method for locating the confrontation lines, especially amid the mist-covered and forested mountains around Srebrenica. By way of example, they pointed out that, in the spring of 1995, Imint was no use in pinpointing the ¹⁵⁸¹ Tim Ripley, ‘UAVs over Kosovo - did the Earth move?’, Defence Systems Daily, 01/12/99.

¹⁵⁸² James Woolsey, ‘The American Intelligence Community’, in: Carmel (ed.), Intelligence, p. 175.

¹⁵⁸³ Christopher Andrew, ‘How we won the spy game’, The Times, 10/12/01.

¹⁵⁸⁴ Jeffrey Richelson, ‘Examining US intelligence failures’, Jane’s Intelligence Review, September 2000, p. 44.

¹⁵⁸⁵ Confidential interview (62).

¹⁵⁸⁶ Confidential interview (31).

¹⁵⁸⁷ See for example: MoD, MID/TCBU. MID/Klu, Missile Order of Battle, 22/10/95.

whereabouts of the UNMO hostages, because there was no approximate idea of where they were being held.¹⁵⁸⁸

Finally, it is a misconception that all Imint is published in the form of photos. No more than two or three photos of Bosnia appeared each week in most reports because photos take up too much space. Usually, it is only the analysis of the Imint that is published. After all, reports sent by the intelligence services to high-level policy-makers must be short and concise. For example, the Intelligence & Research section of the State Department could only produce two-page reports upon the orders of Secretary of State Christopher. One American analyst wondered how on earth he could explain such a complicated conflict to Christopher, given the permanently shifting political and military circumstances.¹⁵⁸⁹

3. With whom was imagery intelligence shared?

Imint was used from the very start of the conflict in Bosnia. In August 1992, Newsday accused the Bush Administration of deliberately withholding evidence of prison camps and executions of Muslims and Croats. Imint from Keyhole satellites was said to have delivered proof of this. Originally, the US intelligence services had purportedly even refused to use U-2s to take a closer look at the concentration camps. This was considered 'too provocative'. Earlier revelations by Newsday supposedly led to the clearance of camps which had been identified by Imint. After criticism from presidential candidate Clinton, Bush declared that he had ordered the intelligence community 'to use every asset' to track down war crimes in Bosnia.¹⁵⁹⁰

The US diplomat Ron Neitzke confirmed that Imint was available in 1992.¹⁵⁹¹ The newspaper The Guardian managed to lay its hands on a report of a secret briefing by the CIA and NSA from late May 1992, in which Imint was shown of the VRS artillery around Sarajevo.¹⁵⁹² In 1993, satellite photos were also used to ascertain the precision of the American food droppings by C-130s.¹⁵⁹³ The fact that the Americans were gathering Imint on the prison camps came to light at the start of 1993 when the US negotiator Cyrus Vance was handed a list of camps which had been compiled partly from satellite photos and partly from Humint.¹⁵⁹⁴ Special aircraft were also deployed for photo reconnaissance above the enclaves. The subsequent intelligence was then shared with NATO. The Chairman of the Military Committee, Sir Richard Vincent, told NATO in January 1994 for example that detailed air reconnaissance was being carried out above Bosnia and that NATO now had a large database of the positions of the warring factions. Closer attention would now be paid to air reconnaissance above the enclaves of Srebrenica and Tuzla.¹⁵⁹⁵ No doubt Vincent made this promise because he was aware of the difficult predicament of the Canadian battalion at that time. The handover to Dutchbat was being impeded by the VRS and the ABiH, and a plan was being considered to send in US and Canadian Special Forces to extract the Canadians from the enclave by force (see Chapter 4). Probably, these photos were taken by normal NATO air reconnaissance planes and not by specialized aircraft such as the U-2.¹⁵⁹⁶

The Imint was shared within NATO through a heavily protected communication network known as the Linked Operational Intelligence Center Europe (LOCE) system. The results of imagery, electronic and other types of intelligence were exchanged through the LOCE system. In principle, U-2

¹⁵⁸⁸ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁵⁸⁹ Confidential interview (13).

¹⁵⁹⁰ K. Royce and P. Sloyan, 'The U.S. waited back in June, CIA told Bush officials of atrocities', Newsday, 15/08/92.

¹⁵⁹¹ Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, p. 173.

¹⁵⁹² Ed Vulliamy, 'US feud sealed Bosnia's fate', The Guardian, 20/05/96.

¹⁵⁹³ Tony Capaccio, 'Bosnia Airdrop', Air Force Magazine, July 1993, p. 56.

¹⁵⁹⁴ Confidential information (52).

¹⁵⁹⁵ Confidential information (53).

¹⁵⁹⁶ For the history of the U-2 see: Van der Aart, Spionage vanuit de lucht, pp. 28-45.

Imint went to all NATO members, but often analyses ('read-outs') were distributed instead of photos. Initially, Satint could only be released to the US Secretary of State or a four-star general at the head of the US EUCOM.¹⁵⁹⁷ Later, U-2 and other Imint arrived more often via LOCE. However, in the early stages of the Balkan War, LOCE registered no Imint. Presumably only the Canadian services had direct access to this. Inevitably, the fact that no Satint was shared with most European allies often led to complaints within NATO. Keith Hall, Director of the NRO, pushed for more comprehensive sharing with the European allies, but diplomats expected that this would be met by protests from the rest of the US intelligence community and Congress.¹⁵⁹⁸

A military analyst of the MIS/Air Force who worked in Villafranca between 1 April and 1 October 1995 said that he received Imint in Villafranca, but there was no way of determining whether it came from a U-2 or a satellite. Experts claim that U-2 imagery was of a better resolution. Nevertheless, it is often claimed that the Imint was made a bit fuzzier to conceal the actual resolution. However, this is disputed. Like one US intelligence official claimed: Who had time to 'fuzzy' pictures? The transmission across second-rate communications paths alone degraded the resolution to near unrecognizable.¹⁵⁹⁹ The analysis was carried out by the US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth. Normal imagery always went to Vicenza. In Villafranca this analyst had a direct national line to The Hague and delivered material every day. He had access to LOCE and telex for communicating intelligence and received finished intelligence from Molesworth. He also received the reports from Vicenza.¹⁶⁰⁰

Imint in the form of written reports was also made available to the UNPROFOR staff in Zagreb. From 1993, the workers at the Military Information Office had regular access to U-2 Imint, none of it relating to the Safe Areas.¹⁶⁰¹ Under General Rose, Imint from satellites was originally passed on to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo via the American deputy intelligence officer at BHC. Rose discovered from satellite photos that Sarajevo was not as isolated from the outside world as most of the observers believed. There were more supply lines than just the tunnel under the airport. Rose enjoyed telling his staff the story of how, one morning in early 1995, he received a satellite photo of the city. There had been a fresh fall of snow and the confrontation lines and the trenches were clearly visible. The next day Rose received another photo. No further snow had fallen during the night and a comparison of two photos showed a total of 25 lorry tracks cutting right across the lines. Apparently, during the night, lorries had crossed the lines with the permission of the warring factions. Everybody was cashing in on Sarajevo's 'isolated position'.¹⁶⁰²

An US military official for example watched how 55 tons of luxury goods, cigarettes and women's clothing - not food - being lifted out of the tunnel. But senior political figures in Washington DC and other capitals continued to believe that Sarajevo was under some sort of medieval siege. When The Deputy Commander US EUCOM, US General Chuck Boyd, told US Secretary of Defence, Perry, about the tunnel it seemed it was the first time that Perry heard about it.¹⁶⁰³

Later, the Americans came to regard Rose as too pro-Serb, and US intelligence services suspected that there were Bosnian-Serb spies among his staff. This reduced the flow of Imint. Scarcely any Imint was supplied to BHC in Sarajevo or SNE in Tuzla. The military aid to General Smith, Lieutenant Colonel Baxter, confirmed that Smith's staff had no access to satellite photos. Smith did, however, get U-2 photos. This probably had less to do with American reluctance and more with the ¹⁵⁹⁷ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁵⁹⁸ Joseph Fitchett, 'spying From Space: U.S. to Sharpen the Focus', International Herald Tribune, 10/04/01.

¹⁵⁹⁹ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁰⁰ Confidential interviews (31), (32) and (38).

¹⁶⁰¹ Confidential interview (47).

¹⁶⁰² Confidential interview (80).

¹⁶⁰³ Ripley, Deliberate Force, p. 92.

lack of secure connections with the Bosnian capital. Images from UAVs were not made available to BHC until August and September 1995.¹⁶⁰⁴

However, General Janvier in Zagreb already had access to military-tactical Imint from UAVs in June 1995. Imint was also shared with other officials in the Zagreb staff. The Deputy Force Commander, the Canadian General Barry Ashton, confirmed that he received Imint on a regular basis. However, it was not shared with the Dutch Colonel H. de Jonge, who was responsible for determining the military targets. He pointed out that the US Deputy G-2, Commander Morgan, was concerned that he scarcely received any Imint and could do little for UNPROFOR that way. This prompted Morgan to visit the US embassy Zagreb every two days, where he 'shopped around' for more information through secure communication links at organizations unknown to De Jonge.¹⁶⁰⁵

However, US intelligence officials claimed that the Deputy G-2 was receiving regular Imint reports from a variety of sources. This was shared with De Jonge and his staff. However, De Jonge wanted actual photos, which was a much tougher nut to crack, given the sort of communications links available.¹⁶⁰⁶ The head of the intelligence section in Zagreb, the Swedish Colonel Jan-Inge Svensson, and his assistant Lieutenant Colonel Ingmar Ljunggren also occasionally received photos from Predators after mid-July. Other intelligence from Predators was also phoned through to them after analysis. They had never seen photos taken by German UAVs. The analyses of photos and other intelligence from satellites or the U-2 Dragon Lady were always passed on to them by word of mouth. As Sweden was not a NATO member, neither Swede ever actually saw the Imint.¹⁶⁰⁷

So, many UNPROFOR officials in Zagreb had access to Imint: sometimes in the form of written reports. One member of the UNPROFOR staff even recalled that the first aerial photos of suspected mass graves and relating excavations were available a few days after the fall of Srebrenica.¹⁶⁰⁸ However, requests from SNE for Imint were to no avail. On 21, 22, 24, 26 and 29 April, General Haukland repeatedly and urgently requested satellite or other aerial photos of areas where the Bosnian Serbs were operational. NATO never even acknowledged his requests and Haukland never received the photos.¹⁶⁰⁹ When the Dutch Minister Jan Pronk confronted General Nicolai about this during a visit to Bosnia in July 1995, he was told that troops from a non-NATO state (Pakistan) were manning the reception station for the requested photos.¹⁶¹⁰ If that was the case, then UNPROFOR should have intervened. After all, a station is useless if the personnel stationed there are not authorized to receive Imint. It might have been better at the time to deputize a US intelligence officer with secure connections to Haukland's staff in Tuzla. This example is a further indication that neither UNPROFOR nor NATO accorded high priority to Eastern Bosnia.

Initially, the Americans shared their photos with The Hague (probably from U-2s), but that was during the Dutch presidency of the European Union. Later on, they only shared them for the purposes of planning a possible joint emergency helicopter evacuation of Dutchbat from Srebrenica. But this was months before the attack.¹⁶¹¹ Canada was probably the only ally with whom the Americans shared everything. The intelligence analysts at the Canadian Ministry of Defence had permanent access to imagery and other intelligence (raw as well as finished). The Canadian intelligence community in Sarajevo – and also in Zagreb – had access to Imint in their own intelligence cells. This was mostly current near-real-time Imint.

¹⁶⁰⁴ Interview James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁶⁰⁵ Interviews Barry Ashton, 30/05/00 and J.H. de Jonge, 30/05/01.

¹⁶⁰⁶ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁰⁷ Interview Jan-Inge Svensson and Ingmar Ljunggren, 04/11/99.

¹⁶⁰⁸ Confidential information (58).

¹⁶⁰⁹ Interview V. Haukland, 22/09/00.

¹⁶¹⁰ NIOD, Letter from J. Pronk to NIOD, 29/05/01; NMFA, DMP to R, draft report of the trip by J. Pronk to Tuzla and Sarajevo, NH-618/95, 31/07/95.

¹⁶¹¹ Interviews with M.J.C. Felix, 06/04/00 and A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

There was also Satint available on Eastern Bosnia which occasionally showed VRS troop movements. The Canadian intelligence cell in Bosnia itself had near-real-time Imint which was about five days old. Sometimes it had been processed, but the Canadian officers could always get archival Imint. The Canadian intelligence cell in Bosnia never received Imint on Croatia from the Americans.¹⁶¹²

The British community also had some idea of the events around Srebrenica through Imint. According to an official of the UK intelligence community, most of the information on the troop build-up came from Imint. It never emerged whether this came from satellites or U-2s. Anyway, Imint delivered pictures of VRS troop concentrations, though it did not show that the VRS was preparing to launch an attack. Eventually, this was also concluded by the UK Defence Intelligence Staff.¹⁶¹³ The British services also categorically insisted that Srebrenica was not an important area, not even for the DIS, which had focused all its attention on Gorazde and Sarajevo.¹⁶¹⁴

4. How were Albright's satellite photos discovered?

On 10 August 1995, the American Permanent Representative at the UN, Madeleine Albright, produced the previously mentioned photos in the Security Council. The photos showed Bosnian-Muslim prisoners and upturned earth where the bodies of the executed men had been buried.¹⁶¹⁵ Every set of U-2 imagery recovered at RAF Alconbury in Great Britain had a complete, separate copy run for shipment to DIA in Washington DC. The images shown by Albright to the UN unquestionably came from the DIA copy of Molesworth developed U-2 film.¹⁶¹⁶ The DIA copy was shipped separately by air to Washington, usually within a week or so. Albright showed these photos to the Security Council because initially there was nothing to suggest that executions had taken place. This came later, after the survivors reached Tuzla. Their testimonies then prompted a search for specific Imint. Albright used the photos to provide the Security Council with evidence of the atrocities and to pressurize both the Security Council and the Clinton Administration into taking a harder line. She stated that there definitely was sharper and better Imint but this had not been released in order to safeguard the techniques and the technology.¹⁶¹⁷ Albright also reputedly used the photos in an attempt to win support for the idea of a larger peacekeeping operation in Bosnia with US involvement.¹⁶¹⁸

Other UN officials suspected more sinister motives. In August 1995, the UNMOs in Zagreb organized a press conference on large-scale human rights violations by the Bosnian Croats during the recently completed Operation Storm (carried out with US assistance). The room was full of journalists and things were just about to start when an official from the US Embassy in Zagreb suddenly entered and announced that a press conference was about to begin at the embassy where information would be released on aerial photos of possible mass graves around Srebrenica. The room emptied immediately. The UNMOs had an uneasy feeling that the announcement was planned to divert attention from the Croatian crimes.¹⁶¹⁹ It is, however, likely that there were no sinister motives.

There are various versions of how the photos eventually were discovered. In one version Sacirbey, the Bosnian Permanent Representative to the UN, plays a role. Very soon after the fall of Srebrenica, Albright was tipped off by Sacirbey that atrocities had either already taken place or were about to do so. After consulting the Deputy National Security Advisor, Samuel Berger, she requested assistance from the US intelligence community. This request probably did not get high priority: the ¹⁶¹² Confidential interviews (9), (47), (62) and (90).

¹⁶¹³ The question of 'Foreknowledge' will be addressed in detail in the following chapter.

¹⁶¹⁴ Confidential interview (8).

¹⁶¹⁵ 'US Reveals Photographs of Apparent Mass Grave', International Herald Tribune, 10/08/95 and 'Up to 2,700 Massacred by Serbs, UN is Told', International Herald Tribune, 11/08/95.

¹⁶¹⁶ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶¹⁷ Interview with M. Albright, 28/09/01. A request by SAGE for the release of other satellite photos of Srebrenica was rejected by the court on 7 August 2001. For the judgement see: www.fas.org/sdp/news/2001/08/sage/html

¹⁶¹⁸ Confidential interview (13).

¹⁶¹⁹ Confidential interview (44).

NPIC, which had a special team for analysing photos satellite and U-2 photos, allegedly did not start searching for the photos until mid-July. Priority rested with the VRS advance towards Zepa and Gorazde and the anti-aircraft threat to the NATO planes.¹⁶²⁰ The National Photographic Interpretation Center is said to have discovered the first photos on 2 August.¹⁶²¹ It revealed this on 4 August in the National Intelligence Daily, a publication which is intended only for the eyes of the most senior policy-makers. On 10 August, Albright took the photos to the Security Council.¹⁶²²

Another version of the run-up to 10 August stemmed from interviews with Tune Bringa, a member of Akashi's Analyses and Assessment Unit, and the former US Ambassador in Croatia, Peter Galbraith.¹⁶²³ Galbraith was recalled to Washington for talks between 5 and 18 July 1995. At that moment, two UN researchers were busy screening displaced persons in Tuzla. Bringa came into contact with them and spoke with someone who had escaped the executions. She realized then that large-scale war crimes had probably been perpetrated. On 25 July, she returned to Zagreb and asked Galbraith whether this could be further investigated. On the same day, he sent a message to Washington through special channels (probably the CIA) requesting an investigation into possible war crimes. Holbrooke is said to have taken the telegram personally to Christopher, asked him to read it and take urgent action. This led to, amongst others, a mission by John Shattuck, who found more indications and reported his findings to Christopher on 4 August.¹⁶²⁴ The Deputy Director of Intelligence at the CIA, John Gannon, thought that it was a combination of reports and visual observations by Dutchbat and the interviews by Shattuck, which had led to the discovery of Imint.¹⁶²⁵

Galbraith also asked the CIA through the Intelligence and Research Bureau of the State Department to find out whether there were satellite and U-2 photos of ABiH prisoners or the mass murders in Konjevic Polje. Enough intelligence had been gathered by 2 August to indicate search areas. After searching for twenty-four hours and comparing thousands of Imint photos, one analyst at the intelligence service discovered that such photos did indeed exist.¹⁶²⁶

The third version is the most credible. The other two could easily be mistaken interpretations of personal actions in response to Albright's photos. What the fore-mentioned people could not know was that one US intelligence service had an invaluable Humint source. Only a handful of people knew the identity of this source. Since 1992, the DIA had been running an extensive programme for debriefing refugees. By the end of 1992, important intelligence had been gathered from over 800 interviews. American debriefers, who officially worked for the UN, also went to work in Tuzla and, after the fall of Srebrenica, their reports went to the highest echelons in the US Administration. Nothing was yet known in mid-July.

On 17 July, the Balkan Task Force of the CIA wrote in its secret daily report that countless eyewitness accounts had delivered details which strongly implied that atrocities had been committed. It also added that 'we lack authoritative, detailed information to substantiate this information'. Reporters of the Washington Post got no answer when they asked whether the intelligence analysts had taken any steps to get hold of the missing information. 'It was not a military priority,' said a CIA official. 'A lot of this [atrocities] stuff is not looked at at the time it is collected, the official said'.¹⁶²⁷ Another CIA worker who wishes to remain anonymous told the New York Times that his service 'lacked information regarding specific places and atrocities'.¹⁶²⁸

¹⁶²⁰ M. Dobbs & R. Jeffrey Smith, 'New Proof Offered of Serb Atrocities', Washington Post, 29/10/95.

¹⁶²¹ Rohde, A Safe Area, pp. 334 - 335.

¹⁶²² Confidential information (54).

¹⁶²³ Interviews with Peter Galbraith, 23/07/99 and Tune Bringa, 13/07/00.

¹⁶²⁴ American FOIA Declassification, John Shattuck to Secretary of State, 04/08/95.

¹⁶²⁵ DDI Speech by John Gannon for the SFRC, 09/08/95. See: www.209.207.112/irp/cia/product/

¹⁶²⁶ Rohde, A Safe Area, pp. 334 - 335.

¹⁶²⁷ M. Dobbs & Jeffrey Smith, 'New Proof Offered of Serb Atrocities', Washington Post, 29/10/95.

¹⁶²⁸ 'srebrenica: the Days of Slaughter', The New York Times, 29/10/95.

These scenarios are not entirely implausible because they do not contain the crucial data, such as the dates and times of the executions, the locations and the units involved. This kind of information could not possibly have come from interviews with refugees. What is more, if this information is missing, then a random search through old Imint is useless. Specific information is needed in order to select and compare the right images from a collection that runs into hundreds of thousands. It was, in fact, a crucial Humint source which eventually triggered the search for the execution sites and the mass graves. This source, who was unknown to Bringa, Galbraith and others, decided to pass on detailed information to an intelligence agency at the end of July.¹⁶²⁹

The source claimed to have personally witnessed the atrocities of the Bosnian Serbs and provided detailed information including dates, times, precise locations and drawings of the execution sites, such as the Branjevo state farm in the village of Donja Pilica on the road between Bijeljina and Zvornik. A bloodbath had also taken place there in the local theatre.¹⁶³⁰ It was only after the witness had described the atrocities to the intelligence service that the search really got underway. It appears therefore that the late availability of the photos was not due to US reluctance to release them, as was suggested by a minister of the Dutch Cabinet.¹⁶³¹

It emerged eventually that a satellite and U-2 had photographed hundreds of Muslim men on 13 July. CIA analysts had paid no attention to this because they were busy with other priorities. These photos from the U-2 were shown to President Clinton and his advisors for the first time on 4 August.¹⁶³² This was probably be the DIA copy of the RAF Alconbury U2 mission. This chain of events was largely confirmed in a talk with a US intelligence officer. Srebrenica and the other eastern enclaves had absolutely no priority in the summer of 1995. So, Imint from this region was not studied or analysed.¹⁶³³

5. What photos were taken and on which dates?

The question still remains as to what kind of photos were actually taken, when these were taken and what they provided in the way of imagery. The search in the Imint archives after the tip-off from the Humint source eventually produced a lot of material. As has already been described, satellites, U-2s and UAVs were operational above Bosnia. Using background interviews, documents and aerial photos it is possible to reconstruct the various missions above Bosnia and specifically above Srebrenica. The shooting down of the F-16 flown by O'Grady on 2 June was the main reason for bringing extra Predators to the region. On 16 June, the US intelligence community approved the target plan for the UAVs. The most important targets were Bihac and the Croatian areas; the Livno valley had priority. However, UNPROFOR's priorities lay with Sarajevo. Janvier was briefed on the possibilities of UAVs and said that he wanted to receive Imint. On 19 June, the intelligence staff in Zagreb asked the US intelligence community for Predator photos of Bosnia.¹⁶³⁴

The first report based on UAV images dates from 26 June and relates to the Livno valley. One important piece of information was that all the retreat routes from the Krajina could be cut off by the Bosnian Croats. The American UAVs also took photos above Croatia, but these were sent straight to the Croats and not to the intelligence section in Zagreb: at that time, the CIA was running the Predators. The Predator operations were based out of Croatia, and the photos for Croatia were part of the quid-pro-quo for that basing agreement. Thanks to a UAV flight, it was reported on 28 June that the Bosnian Croats could attack within 24 hours.

¹⁶²⁹ Confidential interview (13).

¹⁶³⁰ See for photos: ICTY, (IT-98-33) Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 25/6-25/14.

¹⁶³¹ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 25/08/95, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

¹⁶³² Interview with Peter Galbraith, 23/07/99 and Tune Bringa, 13/07/00.

¹⁶³³ Confidential interview (13).

¹⁶³⁴ Confidential interview (54).

On 26 June, a U-2 flew over the whole of Bosnia, which was 65 per cent cloud covered. The U-2 Imint reports were received and disseminated at HQ Zagreb on 28 June, but presumably paid no attention to the eastern enclaves. Given the earlier UAV reports, the focus of interest was probably Croatia. So, the priorities of the Imint analysts lay elsewhere. On 26 June a Predator indeed conducted a test flight over Liki Petrovo Selo.¹⁶³⁵ On 27 June, the MIS/Air Force also knew that the Americans had decided to send some Predators to the Balkans for a period of 60 days. An analysis concluded that this may have stemmed from the agreed support for the Rapid Reaction Force.¹⁶³⁶ All aircraft in Operation Deny Flight were warned to watch out for UAVs.¹⁶³⁷ Things settled down for a while after this.

On 2 July BHC in Sarajevo was requesting imagery emphasis on the Mt. Dinara area, where VRS artillery and mortar fire was threatening Tuzla area. A flight with an UAV was planned but the UAV was grounded on 4/5 July for unknown reasons but probably because of maintenance. On 5 July, a US national asset (unknown is what Imint system) photographed the now notorious Branjevo farm at Donja Pilica.¹⁶³⁸ Most of the photos of the region around Srebrenica were probably a spin-off from a wider reconnaissance mission above Bosnia and were not specifically intended for the collection of intelligence on the situation around Srebrenica. The same Imint asset took photos of the village of Glogova and of Orahovac, the area around Karakaj-Dulici, Kozluk and Cerska.¹⁶³⁹

Imint during the attack on and fall of Srebrenica

On 7 July, another UAV flight was carried out, this time above Western Bosnia. On the same day there was also a flight above Eastern Bosnia, which lasted until 11.20 hours. This US national asset also flew over Dvor, where a Danish UNPROFOR soldier had been killed. It is unclear whether Srebrenica was included. Given the start of the VRS attack, it might have been expected that this asset also flew above Srebrenica. Vicenza reported at 08.45 hours on 9 July that a U-2 was present. However, at 11.30 hours, a report came through that it had a defective camera. It was being protected by SEAD planes in order to stave off VRS anti-aircraft fire. This is remarkable and hard to believe statement. It was probably not a U-2 but another US national asset. This can be explained as follows. The U-2 required no SEAD support at 50-60 thousand feet and it did not fly at low altitudes, especially over a SEAD threat. It would run out of gas if it didn't get shot down. The engines of a U-2 are optimized for high altitude and that is where its fuel efficiency is best. Any low altitude operations would require aerial refuel immediately off-station over the Adriatic, and the fuel tankers operating in that area were already heavily committed to refuelling fighter aircraft in Deny Flight.¹⁶⁴⁰

On 10 July, a US national asset flew over Pusmilici at 15.00 hours and observed burning houses in West Rajne. At 19.00 hours, this asset passed the front line directly to the east of the town. By now, Janvier, who regularly received finished Imint via his intelligence staff in Zagreb, was beginning to realize the value of the UAVs like the Predator. It should be observed that the analysts at the MIS/Air Force were in this phase still under the impression that the Predator was not operational. They incorrectly thought that the Predators would not fly until 14 July.¹⁶⁴¹

On 11 July Zagreb HQ asked for UAV support over Srebrenica but an UAV was not yet available. An US official pointed to the problems as regards getting an UAV flying over Srebrenica. He claimed that the UAV in the months preceding to the attack on Srebrenica did not have a night landing ¹⁶³⁵ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶³⁶ MoD, JMG, 1002. Summary of Intsums MID/KL, 27/06/95.

¹⁶³⁷ MoD, DOKP.u. STAOOPER, Dossier 312, DocId, 6241, COMFIVEATAF to AIG 5781, 27/06/95.

¹⁶³⁸ Confidential interview (7). See also: ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 24/.

¹⁶³⁹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 9/2 and Volume II, Ex. 16/1, 2020/1-20/2, 22/1 and 27/1.

¹⁶⁴⁰ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁴¹ MoD, DCBC, 392. MID/Klu DFI (NATO secret), 13/07/95.

capability in June, and recovery at Brac in Croatia would have been very dicey after dark. There were hesitations to risk the UAV at this time, and Srebrenica was at the farthest edge of the UAV envelope. It would be very surprising, according to this US official, if it flew over to the eastern enclaves at all due to range considerations, and certainly not at the risk of losing the platform altogether due to crashing in the dark. The same official wondered if the Dutch intelligence community ever submitted collection requirements for Srebrenica? If nobody ever asked for it, 'you can bet it was never provided'. To his knowledge, the Dutch never submitted any collection requirements in support of DutchBat.¹⁶⁴²

Despite all these problems a discussion took place on 11 July in the US community on how to get a UAV above Srebrenica. This discussion was prompted by this request from Janvier for Imint on Srebrenica as he suspected 'atrocities'. This suggests that, up till then, Janvier knew that UAV missions had been flown over Bosnia. This was the same Janvier who claimed that he did not receive NATO intelligence. The US intelligence community told Janvier's intelligence staff in Zagreb that there was a probability that a UAV could be flown above Srebrenica early in the day (usually from 09.00 hours). But this mission never materialized partly because of the poor weather conditions in Eastern Bosnia (mist and low-hanging cloud), the fact that Srebrenica was at the farthest edge of the UAV envelope and partly because the US intelligence community still refused to give priority to Eastern Bosnia.¹⁶⁴³

One source claimed that a U-2 reconnaissance flight was sent out over Srebrenica during the VRS attack around 10 or 11 July, but it returned with engine problems and no photos.¹⁶⁴⁴ This statement was probably incorrect. It was not a U-2 but another Imint asset which actually took photos of the post-strike area on 11 July. These photos, shown in Washington DC to the author, were classified as 'secret, Releasable to NATO'. They showed four bomb craters that were caused by the air attack of 11 July. The first was taken at 09.34 hours and showed the route to the south. The second was taken at 13.17 hours and showed the four bomb craters.¹⁶⁴⁵ Did this Imint come from a U-2, a UAV or another platform like a Tactical Air Reconnaissance (TACRECCE) flight with an F-14 or F-16?

The standard classification on all U2 imagery was 'Confidential: Releasable to NATO'. All U2 imagery was subject to declassification upon approval of specific requests. But the standard classification on all NATO TACRECCE photos was 'secret: Releasable to NATO'. This suggests that the U2 photos described above, taken at 0934 and 1317 may have been in reality TACRECCE photos. Another rationalism for this was that the U2 would ordinarily not retrace its flight path for a revisit of the same area at all, much less four hours later. If the Srebrenica area just happened to correspond to an off-angle view from an adjacent track, a second look was feasible, but highly unlikely. In sharp contrast to the improbability of the UAV and the U2, NATO aircraft flew 25-30 sorties per day over Bosnia, most of which were at liberty to fly over the eastern enclaves. In addition to US Navy F-14's, which were the only American TACRECCE capability, French and British TACRECCE capabilities (and of course Dutch F-16's) all were much more probable platforms for any photos taken, by several orders of magnitude.¹⁶⁴⁶ So, the photo's shown to the author came probably not from a satellite, U-2 or UAV.

On 12 July, an Imint platform (probably a TACRECCE mission by a NATO-member) took photos of Potocari showing the Dutch compound.¹⁶⁴⁷ The photos that were later released during Krstic's trial show the Fontana Hotel, the football pitch and other buildings.¹⁶⁴⁸ Presumably, this photo-reconnaissance mission was specifically searching for clues about the situation on the ground. Another photo, taken at 14.00 hours, shows a fleet of over twenty parked buses. Photos with a better resolution

¹⁶⁴² Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁴³ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁶⁴⁴ Confidential interview (25).

¹⁶⁴⁵ Confidential information (55).

¹⁶⁴⁶ Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁴⁷ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 5/15.

¹⁶⁴⁸ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 6/2.

show the football stadium with the prisoners.¹⁶⁴⁹ At 14.00 hours on 13 July, photos were taken above Potocari, which clearly showed the buses and lorries that had come to collect the women, the children and the elderly from the civilian population. It also registered signs of disturbed earth.¹⁶⁵⁰ On 13 July, photos were also taken of a warehouse in Kravica, situated between Bratunac and Konjevic Polje. Researchers of the Yugoslavia Tribunal in The Hague later found bloodstains and numerous bullet holes in this warehouse.¹⁶⁵¹ The collection of Imint was difficult because of bad weather. US systems confirmed heavy cloud cover over eastern Bosnia. Finally, on 18 July US assets confirmed the presence of two VRS tanks at Srebrenica HQ.¹⁶⁵²

During this period the CIA conducted several test flights with Predators in Croatia and on 15 July a Predator made a flight but the quality of the Imint was not what had been hoped for. The same day other US national systems confirmed heavy cloud cover over eastern Bosnia. On 17 July a Predator took off just after midnight and was recovered in the afternoon. All target areas were cloud covered and the UAV encountered mostly thunderstorms mostly. The Predator collected good imagery of Mostar and loitered in Zepa area for three hours. However, the UAV was confronted with bad weather but no artillery or refugees were observed. Bad weather played an important role in these days because on 18 July a Predator flight cancelled due to foul weather. But the US intelligence community had more Imint platforms at its disposal.

American C-130s with special infra-red sensors were also deployed above Srebrenica. These flew from Brindisi (Italy) above the eastern enclaves if circumstances were favourable for nocturnal operations. They probably flew on the orders of the DIA. On 10 July these platforms identified at 17.00 burning houses in the enclave. At 22.30 hours on 12 July, the infra-red sensors of these C-130s detected a large mass of prisoners in the vicinity of Srebrenica (the exact position is unknown). The infra-red sensors enabled these special C-130s to follow both the column of Muslim men and the VRS advance on Zepa and Gorazde. The C-130s observed campfires along the road throughout the night and registered the heat from the tank and lorry engines. Other US Imint platforms confirmed 4 military trucks plus sedans next to a house.¹⁶⁵³

What happened to this Imint and was it shared with Zagreb HQ and BHC? It was shared indeed with the senior UN leadership. This intelligence regarding campfires was conveyed to UN leadership on the morning of the 14th. In particular, intelligence passed was about the primary and secondary position of the VRS, with campfires at locations 2 km, 4.5 km and 6 km south-west of Srebrenica, and approximately 13, 14, 15 km north-east of Zepa. The position of additional VRS units located in a certain area was also reported. This intelligence was also delivered to Sarajevo, briefed to the UN leadership, and injected into the Zagreb overall threat assessments for Zepa delivered again to the UN leadership, in the COS's office at noon on 15 July.¹⁶⁵⁴

In this phase the stories about warcrimes started to circulate more persistently. The stories about mass executions were greeted with incredulity at first. But when more and more signs emerged that atrocities had taken place on a mammoth scale and that thousands of men were still missing, the Imint activities were stepped up. The photos which a KH-11 had taken of Srebrenica and the immediate surroundings were now analysed. Suddenly, the Americans were taking the rumours of mass murders more seriously. The U-2 flights now targeted the eastern enclaves more often and the analysts were instructed to analyse the images.

A report to General Michael Hayden, Director of Intelligence at US EUCOM, stated that Mladic had told a UN official that hundreds had been killed in the Bandera triangle inside the enclave Srebrenica. By then, the 'collection priorities' in the American intelligence community had changed.

¹⁶⁴⁹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 6/3 and 6/4.

¹⁶⁵⁰ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 5/2-5/4.

¹⁶⁵¹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 8/3 - 8/8

¹⁶⁵² Confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁵³ Confidential interview (54) and confidential information (80).

¹⁶⁵⁴ Confidential interview (54) and confidential information (80).

They were now: '1) Zepa; 2) Potocari and Srebrenica; 3) Gorazde and 4) Tuzla camp and the column of men and boys'. Even so, requests for 'atrocities verification' through Imint were still rejected. At that time, there was still insufficient evidence or indications.¹⁶⁵⁵

As described earlier, on 15 July, a Predator again headed for Eastern Bosnia. Its main assignment was 'Bratunac males key priority'. But the quality of the video footage was disappointing. The main targets were still the men in Bratunac. The UAV flew above Zepa, and then more reports came on a regular basis which entered the LOCE directly. On the same day, Hayden heard that, according to UNMO reports, some 10,000 men had disappeared. On 17 July, another US asset flew over Branjevo farm at Donja Pilica.¹⁶⁵⁶ A photo was later released by the US Administration.¹⁶⁵⁷ However, the author was shown much sharper photos than this one, which clearly showed a great many people and corpses as well as lorry tracks and digging operations.¹⁶⁵⁸ On 21 September, another U-2 flight showed that Branjevo farm seemed totally deserted.¹⁶⁵⁹ This U-2 also flew above Glogova, where comparisons with the photos of 5 July revealed that digging had also taken place.¹⁶⁶⁰ At 18.12 hours on 18 July, satellite intelligence on Srebrenica was also available in the US intelligence community. A satellite had spotted two tanks in front of the headquarters at Potocari. The photos also showed an APC in Glogova.¹⁶⁶¹

The fact that US Imint was available in this period emerged in Belgrade on 15 July, during the negotiations on Srebrenica between Akashi, Bildt, Stoltenberg, Smith, Milosevic and Mladic.¹⁶⁶² US Imint (presumably from a U-2 or UAV) was on the table. It had been provided by the US Embassy in Belgrade and was causing Mladic serious discomfort. These photos, incidentally, were not the same as those, which Albright presented to the Security Council.

Albright's photos came as a complete surprise to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in general and to Smith in particular. Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) knew nothing of their existence.¹⁶⁶³ Again, this was not so much attributable to reluctance on the part of the Americans but rather to the insecure connections with the Bosnian capital. An intelligence analyst with access to American Imint said that Satint of (the surroundings of) Srebrenica again became available on 19 July. The content of these photos is unknown. On the same day, it was announced that the Predators would no longer fly above this area because of the situation around Zepa. Judging from their Deny Flight Intelligence Summary, the analysts at the MIS/Air Force found this a remarkable message, especially considering that UAVs were perfect for performing such local reconnaissance operations. Regular aircraft could not do it. On the other hand, the Deny Flight Intsum stated that the MIS analysts at the Air Force had the impression that the VRS troops around Zepa were not pushing forward. There was no real need for this, because the international community had already given up on Zepa and, according to the MIS/Air Force, an evacuation was being considered.¹⁶⁶⁴ This could indeed explain why the Predator reconnaissance flights were halted above Zepa. Perhaps the fear of a repetition elsewhere of the atrocities of Srebrenica also played a role in this; apparently, the UAV had more important missions to perform. Paris reacted immediately. The French would step up its reconnaissance flights above Bosnia because Paris thought that Washington was not sharing aerial photo intelligence with the allies.¹⁶⁶⁵

After the fall of Srebrenica, the Dutch Chief of Defence Staff asked the United Nations if detailed satellite photos or UAV photos could be taken of the surroundings of Srebrenica and Bratunac ¹⁶⁵⁵ Confidential interview (53).

¹⁶⁵⁶ Interview with J. Schouren, 04/12/99.

¹⁶⁵⁷ For the photos: www.fas.org.irp/Imint/bosnia16.html

¹⁶⁵⁸ Confidential interview (7). See also: ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 24/2-24/3.

¹⁶⁵⁹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 24/4.

¹⁶⁶⁰ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 9/3.

¹⁶⁶¹ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁶⁶² For example: Rohde, A Safe Area, pp. 309 - 310

¹⁶⁶³ Confidential interview (43).

¹⁶⁶⁴ MoD, DCBC, 1696. MID/Klu DFI (NATO secret), 19/07/95.

¹⁶⁶⁵ 'Onwaarschijnlijk dat Belgen Zepa helpen evacueren' (Belgians unlikely to help evacuate Zepa), De Standaard, 19/07/95.

to ascertain whether there were prison camps in the area. Minister Voorhoeve wanted to know whether this request had been productive and sent a memo to this effect to the deputy Chief of Defence Staff.¹⁶⁶⁶ The Director of Atlantic Cooperation and Security at the Foreign Ministry also wanted more details. On 6 August, it had asked the UN Permanent Representative for further information on aerial photos of men deported from Srebrenica. No photos were available at the NATO Situation Centre or Intelligence Division; NATO said that there may have been US satellite photos but that national intelligence was only shared with allies in exceptional cases.

This did not deter the Dutch Permanent Representative from making inquiries of his American counterpart, who had sent out an all-stations call on the same day but had received no answer. The Permanent Representative thought that perhaps in this case the request would get a positive answer.¹⁶⁶⁷ The government had also asked Minister Voorhoeve if it could see Imint.¹⁶⁶⁸ The Chief of Defence Staff, the Director of Atlantic Cooperation and Security and the minister did not have to wait long.

Albright shows the photos

On 10 August, Albright produced the photos of the disturbed ground where the executed men were buried.¹⁶⁶⁹ They were also passed on to the Ministry of Defence by the US Embassy in The Hague.¹⁶⁷⁰ If the Dutch Government wanted to see more photos or more detailed photos then Washington would be prepared to look favourably on this request.¹⁶⁷¹ The DPKO did not, however, receive the same treatment because, on the same day, all that Annan's advisor, Tharoor, received was a copy of Albright's speech. He did not get the photos because of 'technical difficulties'.¹⁶⁷² He would get them on 15 August through a separate briefing. DPKO was also shown a sketch of a classified photo of a wider area one kilometre north of Nova Kasaba. The actual photo was not released.¹⁶⁷³

On 18 August, Minister Voorhoeve received an answer to the memo he had sent two weeks before. In the meantime, the Albright photos had been published. The US military attaché also had some classified detailed imagery of the vicinity of Srebrenica, but they could betray the technological possibilities of the satellite. For this reason, his government had instructed him not to release them. But it would not object if they were studied, analysed and interpreted by government photo analysts at the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC). The Royal Netherlands Air Force was therefore asked to make a team of photo analysts available on 21 August.¹⁶⁷⁴

On the same day, American representatives showed the strictly classified satellite photos to analysts of the Air Force. During the weekend Joup Schouren and his colleagues were allowed to briefly analyse the photos at the DCBC under the watchful eye of an US colonel. Schouren would have liked to have inspected them at the Volkel air base, but this was not allowed. The Americans did not offer their own interpretation of the photos. Standard details were also missing, including the type of film, the time, the height and the focal distance of the lens for calculating the scale of the photos. The only available information was the date and the position. After a short analysis the photos had to be returned directly to the US Embassy.¹⁶⁷⁵

¹⁶⁶⁶ MoD, PCDS, DE01108, Voorhoeve to PCDS, No. 26/95, 04/08/95.

¹⁶⁶⁷ NMFA, PV/NATO, Permanent NATO representative to Foreign Affairs, No. 0017, 07/08/95.

¹⁶⁶⁸ Interview with C. Hilderink, 11/08/00.

¹⁶⁶⁹ 'US Reveals Photographs of Apparent Mass Grave', International Herald Tribune, 10/08/95 and 'Up to 2,700 Massacred By Serbs, UN is Told', International Herald Tribune, 11/08/95.

¹⁶⁷⁰ MoD, DCBC, Box 61. US Army Attaché to Commander Hilderink, 11/08/95.

¹⁶⁷¹ MoD, DJZ. Permanent NATO representative to Foreign Ministry, No. 1147, 11/08/95.

¹⁶⁷² UNNY, DPKO. Annan to Akashi, No. 2686, 11/08/95.

¹⁶⁷³ Confidential Collection (8), Annan to Akashi, No. MSC 2720, 15/08/95 plus a copy of photos.

¹⁶⁷⁴ MoD, DS, No. DE01107, Acting Commander of Defence Staff Schouten to Minister Voorhoeve, No. S95/061/3269, 18/08/95.

¹⁶⁷⁵ Interview with J. Schouren, 04/12/99 and J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 13/03/97.

However, an erroneous observation is presumably made here by Schouren. Time, date and geographic co-ordinates are standard annotations for any sort of imagery, but altitude and focal length are definitely not. This observation clearly comes from a TACRECCE person (which Schouren was), where such information is normally imbedded in the photo with a matrix arrangement. It does not apply to UAV imagery, U2 imagery, or any sort of satellite imagery.¹⁶⁷⁶

One interpretation of Albright's satellite photos was as follows: two groups of 'possible' prisoners were discernible on a football pitch near Nova Kasaba, 19 kilometres west of Bratunac and Srebrenica and five kilometres south of Konjevic Polje: one of approximately 100 persons and one of approximately 500 persons. Both groups were seated on the ground and surrounded by twenty or so sentry posts. There were five vehicles at the entrance to the football pitch. On the photos Schouren saw a football pitch with guards, space for loading people onto transport, people (some of whom were kneeling), two bulldozers and two T-55 tanks with a bulldozer blade, a hole in the ground, buses and trucks.

He could also see a British Warrior in UN colours driving in a bus convoy. It was not a Dutch APC; the British had lost a few Warriors to the VRS earlier in the war. Schouren counted 600 men kneeling at an assembly point. There was also a camp enclosed by fencing, which reminded him of aerial photos he had seen of a POW camp in World War II during his training in England. One photo had been made 16 kilometres west of Srebrenica. Photos that were later released to the Yugoslavia Tribunal did indeed clearly show two groups of prisoners and a convoy of buses in Nova Kasaba. An enlargement left no doubt about there being two groups.¹⁶⁷⁷ This was probably the same Imint which was released at the start of August, which Schouren was allowed to examine.

Two groups of possible prisoners were discernible in the enlargement of the satellite photo of Sandici taken at 14.00 hours on 13 July.¹⁶⁷⁸ one group of 80 and one of 320. Five large buses were parked at the entrance. A U-2 flight (codenamed Creek Quick) produced photos of digging operations at exactly the same spots on 27 July.¹⁶⁷⁹ Excavations performed later by personnel of the Yugoslavia Tribunal revealed that bodies were buried there.¹⁶⁸⁰ The U-2 also took photos in the vicinity of Konjevic Polje, Cerska, Orahovac and the area around Karakaj-Dulici, Kozluk and Glogova.¹⁶⁸¹ These photos also clearly showed digging operations and many lorry tracks leading to and from the location.¹⁶⁸² U-2 flights on 14 August, 7 September, 27 September, 2 October, 12 October, 18 October, 20 October, 23 October, 30 October and 9 November again registered traces of digging at the fore-mentioned sites, but also at various other locations, such as HodZici, Liplje, Snagovo, Cancari and Redzici.¹⁶⁸³ Photos taken at the end of September showed that the bodies at Branjevo farm had been exhumed.¹⁶⁸⁴

Photos of the compound in Potocari also show traces of digging operations.¹⁶⁸⁵ These photos illustrate how the interest of the Imint analysts always focuses on the roads and the surroundings. As U-2s always followed the connecting routes in the valleys, they did not register the column of Muslim ¹⁶⁷⁶ Confidential information (80) and confidential interview (54).

¹⁶⁷⁷ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 12/1 - 12/3 and Volume II, Ex. 14/2. See also: ICTY Dossier, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 87.

¹⁶⁷⁸ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 7/3 and 7/4.

¹⁶⁷⁹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 7/7 and Volume II, Ex. 14/2 - 14/4 and 15/1.

¹⁶⁸⁰ For photos of the exhumed bodies: ICTY Dossier, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 14/7-14/8 and 17/2-17/3. See also: Rohde, A Safe Area, pp. 334 - 350.

¹⁶⁸¹ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 9/3 and Volume II, Ex. 16/1-16/2, 20/1-20/2, 22/1 and 27/1.

¹⁶⁸² MoD, MID/TCBU. American analysis (secret), undated and analysis by Schouren and Molleman, 22/08/95. The latter memorandum is more or less a literal translation of the American analysis.

¹⁶⁸³ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 12/5 - 12/6 and : ICTY Dossier, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 161/5, 161/6, 162/4, 162/5, 162/2, 164/3, 1662-166/11.

¹⁶⁸⁴ ICTY, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 165/4.

¹⁶⁸⁵ ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume I, Ex. 5/27.

men or the fighting between the VRS and the ABiH in the mountains and the forests. The satellites, on the other hand, did not have these limitations.

Schouren confirmed that it is difficult to analyse photos taken by U-2s. Though an experienced photo interpreter, he too would have failed to notice the presence of people. He might have spotted the buses and trucks, but would probably have paid no attention to them because he was looking for other things. After all, huge amounts of data can be gathered from Imint. Many of the photos taken by satellites, U-2s and UAVs are a by-product of a specific mission. The analyst's attention therefore focuses on the mission, and not on the by-products.¹⁶⁸⁶

Certain comments may be mooted about the signs of digging operations and the bulldozers. According to analysts, photos which were produced at the Yugoslavia Tribunal showed the arrival of bulldozers of the 5th Engineer Battalion of the Drina Corps at Konjevic Polje on 5 and 27 July. Other photos taken on the same dates also reportedly showed the arrival of bulldozers.¹⁶⁸⁷ However, no bulldozers are discernible on the actual photo, but (according to the official description on the actual U-2 photo) mobile bridge trucks, some low-loaders and a tractor with a trailer.¹⁶⁸⁸ These may have been intended for the transportation of forestry equipment across the River Drina. Another photo, which was taken some time in 1999, even shows two similar trucks which had apparently been abandoned because they were defective.¹⁶⁸⁹

The photos do not make clear whether the murders had been planned in advance. However, the photos of bulldozers did lead to additional evidence, for the 5th Engineer Battalion of the Drina Corps and other units involved in the digging operations had kept meticulous records of the fuel consumption (with a view to theft) and also of the heavy machinery that was used for trips between the execution sites and the burial sites.¹⁶⁹⁰ One member of the British intelligence community verified that there was no Imint on the executions, but there was intelligence about the Muslim fighters who had been taken prisoner and about the start of the flight to Tuzla. It was unclear whether this Imint came from U-2s or satellites.¹⁶⁹¹

Albright had personally shown the Dutch deputy military attaché to the Permanent Representation at New York, Major E. Koestal, detailed photos which even showed an arm protruding from the ground. These photos were never released, ostensibly because they were considered unsuitable for publication.¹⁶⁹² The real reason was that the capabilities of the satellites had to be safeguarded. On 24 August 1995, the Americans responded to further Dutch questions in a Secret Nofoan memorandum.

When asked when the mass graves were first discovered the US services replied that there was evidence of digging operations on 2 August. This emerged when an Imint analyst was examining a U-2-film from a mission flown on 27 July. The analyst was studying specific locations on the basis of Humint (presumably the US Humint source) and intelligence reports from open sources. He discovered areas that appeared to indicate the presence of mass graves. A comparison between this and other Imint, taken by a satellite on 13 July, revealed that changes had occurred in the soil structure. It was then that the groups of prisoners were discovered on the Imint.

The fact that this was not discovered earlier was explained by saying that the people on the ground 'could have been mistaken for vegetation and overlooked where the analyst was not aware of subsequent press reports from refugees claiming that people were herded onto soccer fields in the area'. The explanation further stated that there was 'no usable coverage, however, between 13 and 27 July, ¹⁶⁸⁶ Interview with J. Schouren, 04/12/99.

¹⁶⁸⁷ ICTY, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 160/5 - 160/9.

¹⁶⁸⁸ ICTY, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 160/1 and 160/3.

¹⁶⁸⁹ ICTY, Krstic Case, Case IT-98-33-T, OTP Exhibits, No. 160/4.

¹⁶⁹⁰ Mirko Klarin, 'Analysis: Danube surrenders Kosovo Cover-up evidence', IWPR's TRIBUNAL UPDATE No. 223, Part I, May 28-June 2, 2001.

¹⁶⁹¹ Confidential interview (8).

¹⁶⁹² Interview with E. Koestal, 24/02/00.

because of bad weather or poor image quality – the principal factors affecting whether we have coverage'. This meant that the Americans only had images of the locations before and after the executions and no images of the execution itself. The conclusion was that the people in the football stadium had probably been executed shortly after 13 July.¹⁶⁹³ This was confirmed by an official at the US intelligence community.¹⁶⁹⁴

On 28 August, the Minister of Defence was briefed at the Defence Crisis Management Centre on the basis of this analysis. In addition to Voorhoeve, the Chief of Defence Staff and his deputy were present. The Director-General of Political Affairs was also invited to attend.¹⁶⁹⁵ In an interview Minister Voorhoeve said that, during the briefing, he had asked the Americans if they had more photos dating from before the fall of the enclave. He was told that this would be looked into.¹⁶⁹⁶ Voorhoeve again raised the question of whether there were more satellite photos when he met his American counterpart, Perry, on 5 October 1995. Perry told him that he had closely studied the Imint and Sigint and that though these did not provide conclusive evidence of mass executions, there were certainly indications to that effect. Perry said that no alternative picture had been pieced together from additional intelligence. He was prepared to release this additional intelligence to the Yugoslavia Tribunal.¹⁶⁹⁷

To make doubly sure, Voorhoeve listed all the points a few days later: the US intelligence services did not have foreknowledge of the VRS attack on Srebrenica on the basis of Imint. He added: 'Not even on the basis of the photos taken on 11 July'. Perry had admitted that there was plenty of photographic material pointing to mass executions. This material pertained mainly to the period between 13 and 27 July. Perry was prepared to hand these photos over to the Yugoslavia Tribunal but 'some conditioning/adjustments would be needed' in order to protect the sources and the technology. The Minister pressed for further action through the US Embassy in The Hague.¹⁶⁹⁸ On 18 October, he received an Information Paper via the US Embassy but this document did not contain any further information.¹⁶⁹⁹

6. Conclusions

On the basis of the above and the released Imint it has to be concluded that photos were available which were taken by US spy satellites, U-2s and UAVs of the events before, during and after the fall of the enclave. Reports of the existence of these photos appeared regularly in the press and other publications from the autumn of 1995. The debate on the photos began after the US Administration released photos of mass graves and locations where the Muslim men had been executed. This action triggered all manner of wild speculation that the agencies, such as the CIA, had more photos of Srebrenica and the surroundings. It prompted a battery of accusations, not least that these services had withheld from their European allies vital intelligence regarding prior knowledge of the attack. There were also rumours of photos showing the summary executions. However, as the researcher for the Yugoslavia Tribunal, Ruez, testified to the French Parliamentary Inquiry in Paris, there were no such photos. Hence, the Yugoslavia Tribunal only had photos of before and after the executions.¹⁷⁰⁰

This was confirmed by intelligence officials who had full access to the Imint on Eastern Bosnia during the Bosnian conflict. The characteristics of Imint, analogous in many regards to the shortfalls in ¹⁶⁹³ MoD, DCBC, box 61, No. 2850, American memorandum, 24/08/95.

¹⁶⁹⁴ Confidential information (57).

¹⁶⁹⁵ NMFA, DGPZ, Memorandum from Acting DAV to DGPZ, 23/08/95. At the bottom was written: "This will also provide an opening to push the United States for the release of any additional photographic material (vide dzz memo dd. 15/8)". This took place on 31 August. See: NMFA, DDI DAV 999.241. Letter from J. Vos to T. Dornbush, 31/08/95.

¹⁶⁹⁶ Interview with J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 13/03/97.

¹⁶⁹⁷ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Report of a meeting between Voorhoeve and Perry, 05/10/95.

¹⁶⁹⁸ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Voorhoeve to CDS, No. 32/95, 09/10/95 and Report of Main Points Confidential interview Perry, 05/10/95.

¹⁶⁹⁹ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. American Information Paper (Secret Releasable Netherlands), 18/10/95.

¹⁷⁰⁰ 'Ruez testifies for French committee', AFP Press Release, 22/02/01 and confidential information (56).

the Sigint realm, resulted in documenting the war crimes, but not preventing them. After the fact, the information came slowly, but only, and this must be said, as a result of a lengthy effort by the US.¹⁷⁰¹ If the Americans had possessed any such photos then they would, of course, have informed the allies accordingly. Janvier later told the French Parliamentary Investigative Commission in Paris that he had never seen Imint such as those, which Albright presented to the Security Council. He knew nothing of their existence until 16 August.¹⁷⁰²

The publications on whether or not Imint existed have also resulted in a general conviction among the public and the press that satellites function as a sort of ‘ubiquitous eye’. This is a misconception. Though satellites, U-2s and UAVs have impressive capabilities, most of the systems are occasionally hampered by unfavourable local weather conditions, which can affect their operational performance. As has already been demonstrated, other elements also play a role. The analysis speed, the focus and expertise of the photo-analyst and other factors can affect the quality of the Imint product. The problem is not so much the dispatch speed of the Imint but rather the whole time-consuming process of analysis, processing and searching for further confirmation. One author concluded: ‘For that reason, it would be difficult to intervene in a specific incident of ethnic cleansing. Nevertheless, tracking the civilian toll had value in a war where the political stakes are high.’ In a nutshell, Imint is basically unsuitable for stopping war crimes, but it can detect them.¹⁷⁰³ One should add that they can also be used to document war crimes, but not to prevent them. The Dutch photo-analyst Schouren confirmed that it is extremely difficult to analyse photos taken by satellites and U-2s.¹⁷⁰⁴ In addition, it is undeniable that the Americans did not accord Srebrenica high priority in their Imint. To be perfectly frank: the Dutch intelligence community did neither. Obviously, Sarajevo was the main US target and not the eastern enclaves, including Srebrenica.¹⁷⁰⁵

Summarizing, it can safely be said that US spy satellites, U-2s and UAVs collected a lot of Imint showing buses, trucks, tanks, male prisoners, corpses and disturbed ground where the executed men could have been buried. The failure of this Imint to arrive on time (i.e. not until early August) on the desks of the policy-makers was probably due to the priorities within at the US intelligence community. Other hard targets were more important than the eastern enclaves, where no US troops were stationed at that moment. A foreign intelligence evaluation therefore concluded that Imint was useful but, given the guerrilla character of the fighting, few regular units could be photographed from the air and space.¹⁷⁰⁶

In addition, the American analysts had no idea that the VRS was planning to seize the whole enclave. The expectation was that the Bosnian Serbs would be deterred from such action because it would bring heavy losses on their side, air attacks and floods of refugees which they could not cope with. These points will be discussed in the next chapter. Spy planes had spotted bus convoys at various locations at the end of June, but it was assumed that these were being used to transport VRS troops.¹⁷⁰⁷ CIA Director Deutch referred to this when he categorically denied that the CIA had foreknowledge of the attack. He once again called attention to the laborious process that eventually led to the discovery of the photos of the mass graves.¹⁷⁰⁸

The general picture that emerges from the currently available information indicates that the eastern enclaves were not (high) priority for Imint analysis. Executions on such a large scale were totally unexpected. Although it must be said that some analysts in Zagreb anticipated executions, but the ¹⁷⁰¹ Confidential interviews (8) and (54) and confidential information (80)..

¹⁷⁰² Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 parts, Paris 2001, Deel 2, Audition de M. Bernard Janvier, 25/01/01, pp. 106-139.

¹⁷⁰³ Alan Boyle, ‘spies in the watch for atrocities’, MSNBC Interactive, 26/03/99.

¹⁷⁰⁴ Interview with J. Schouren, 04/12/99.

¹⁷⁰⁵ Confidential interview (46).

¹⁷⁰⁶ Confidential interview (8) and confidential information (29).

¹⁷⁰⁷ Charles Lane and Thom Shanker, ‘Bosnia: What the CIA Didn’t Tell Us’, in The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96.

¹⁷⁰⁸ ‘The CIA and Bosnia: An Exchange’, New York Review of Books, 06/06/96.

eventual scale of thousands of dead was far beyond expectations. Though satellites and U-2s were active, other instruments such as UAVs were not fully operational above Bosnia until a later date. Moreover, the American services never analysed this Imint on time. However, it must be said that if some of the photos referred above to were TACRECCE photos, than the analysis was done by NATO analysts at various bases near the Adriatic, not by American analysts. That being the case then NATO was also very slow. Though the UK Defence Intelligence Staff had actually identified the concentration of troops around the enclave on the basis of Imint, it had not paid too much attention because the VRS had always had enough troops on hand to take the enclave in any case. Most of the intelligence on the troop concentrations came from Imint; whether from satellites or U-2s never became clear. There was, at all events, no Imint on the executions; but there was Imint on the ABiH prisoners and on the start of the journey to Tuzla. This is borne out by information from an American report which stated that ‘there was no usable coverage between 13 and 27 July because of bad weather or poor image quality’. There can be no doubt that the US community had permanent (near-) real-time information on what was going on in and around Srebrenica via satellites and spy planes. The claim by a member of the Dutch Cabinet to the effect that Washington had, at ‘his’ special request, taken satellite photos of the area around Bratunac showing probable mass graves is, however, incorrect.¹⁷⁰⁹

The inevitable conclusion is that not enough personnel were deployed to quickly utilize and analyse this real-time coverage of Eastern Bosnia in the summer of 1995 and pass it on to the allies. Also, military intelligence support for the UN ground troops, such as Dutchbat in Eastern Bosnia, did not have top priority in the US intelligence community. According to Hayden,¹⁷¹⁰ the military intelligence priorities in the summer of 1995 were as follows:

1. Force protection; chiefly to combat terrorism against US troops in Macedonia and the anti-aircraft threat to NATO planes;
2. Ground truth; information on what was happening between the warring factions;
3. Support for air operations, such as searching for suitable targets;
4. Support for NATO ground force planning;
5. Support for UN ground troop operations.

This list of priorities in itself is not surprising, as the Americans were not yet deploying ground troops. On the other hand, it indicates that American intelligence support to, for example, Dutchbat, was not high on the agenda. Again to be frank: it was also not very high on the Dutch intelligence agenda. Perhaps it ranked even lower. But the lack of US intelligence support for UN troops on the ground places in perspective the comment by ‘a senior intelligence official’ at NATO in Mons that General Rose ‘lost ownership of the picture of the battlefield to the point where it was irrecoverable’. In his view, this resulted in operational decision-making, which was not based on an objective picture.¹⁷¹¹ What was left unsaid was that the Americans distrusted Rose and therefore slowly cut off the flow of intelligence. Apart from this, at the BND it was noticed by senior officials that there was no good Imint coordination within the US intelligence community and hardly any analyses was done regarding Eastern Bosnia.¹⁷¹²

All of this does not alter the fact that Imint could have played a key role in intelligence-gathering before and during the fall of Srebrenica. The availability of good intelligence on the operations of the warring factions is always absolutely vital to the troops on the ground, also in peacekeeping operations. All peacekeepers should have clear military insight into the operational zone. One might therefore expect commercial satellites to have a future in peacekeeping operations. The authors Stout and Quiggin are pessimistic in this respect. They maintain that warring factions, rebels

¹⁷⁰⁹ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 18/08/95, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

¹⁷¹⁰ Michael V. Hayden, ‘Warfighters and Intelligence: one team - one fight’, Defense Intelligence Journal, Vol. 4 (1995) 2, p. 24.

¹⁷¹¹ ‘Bosnia underscores intelligence gaps’, Aviation Week and Space Technology, 20/03/95, p. 56.

¹⁷¹² Confidential interview (98).

and terrorists are more likely to use the information provided by satellites than the UN or other international organizations involved in peacekeeping. This is because, they say, good Imint is greatly in the interest of the warring factions: it always pays for itself and can be used immediately in the theatre of war. There is always an inherent urge to stay one step ahead of the enemy; otherwise the war may be lost. International organizations do not share this kind of Darwinian perspective. Probably, all the warring factions in Bosnia would have made use of commercial Imint if it had been easily and relatively cheaply available in 1995.

In addition, the command structure of terrorist or rebel groups is usually small and new procedures and methods are more easily accepted and adopted there than in a highly complex structure such as that of the UN. Moreover, the UN suffers from a sort of ‘intelligence phobia’. Though New York has had fewer qualms about intelligence since the establishment of the Situation Center for the processing of US intelligence, it is still to undergo a full cultural change. Both authors believe that the day when the UN will make use of commercial Imint is still far in the future, as someone will then have to control this form of intelligence and determine the targets. If this task is assigned to UN headquarters, the question still needs to be addressed as to who will perform the analysis, who will be the recipients and how the Imint can be quickly distributed among the recipients. The authors see the solution to such problems in ad hoc peacekeeping operations, where the communication lines are shorter.¹⁷¹³

It also must be stated that the Dutch Government was not properly briefed on Imint. An American memorandum, which was drawn up for The Hague in response to questions posed by the Dutch, proved to contain incorrect statements. The memorandum stated that there ‘was no usable coverage, however, between 13 and 27 July, because of bad weather or poor image quality - the principal factors affecting whether we have coverage’.¹⁷¹⁴ This was factually untrue: there was certainly ‘usable coverage’. On 15 July, a Predator flew to Eastern Bosnia with the primary mission: ‘Bratunac males: key priority’. The quality of the subsequent video was disappointing, but other Imint was available: on 17 July, a U-2 flew over Branjevo farm at Donja Pilica, the scene of countless executions. A – rather blurred – photo of people who were executed shortly afterwards was released later by none other than the US Administration.¹⁷¹⁵ The NIOD was even shown far sharper photos of the same target, which clearly showed a larger and a smaller group of bodies and lorry tracks and digging operations.¹⁷¹⁶ Similar but less sharp photos were later given to the Yugoslavia Tribunal for use at the trial of General Krstic.¹⁷¹⁷

At 18.12 hours on 18 July, Imint on Srebrenica was again available within the US intelligence community. An asset had identified two tanks outside the headquarters in Potocari. U-2 photos also showed an APC in Glogova. The availability of US Imint came to light in Belgrade on 15 July during the negotiations with Milosevic and Mladic on Srebrenica. American Imint was lying on the table. According to an intelligence analyst with access to Imint, Satint of Srebrenica and the surroundings were already available on 19 July.¹⁷¹⁸ Despite all of this, there was probably no conscious attempt to mislead: the American memorandum with the answers to the questions asked by the Dutch in which reference was made to these photos is dated 24 August 1995. At that time, the US community still did not have full insight into and access to all the Imint on the events around Srebrenica. The Dutch Government was therefore not incorrectly informed, but the US memorandum was certainly premature.

¹⁷¹³ Mark Stout and Thomas Quiggin, ‘Exploiting the new high resolution satellite imagery: Darwinian imperatives?’, Commentary, No. 75 (Summer 1998), pp. 5 - 10.

¹⁷¹⁴ MoD, DCBC, box 61, No. 2850, American memorandum, 24/08/95.

¹⁷¹⁵ For the photos: www.fas.org.irp/Imint/bosnia16.html

¹⁷¹⁶ Confidential interview (7). During this interview classified U-2 photos could be studied.

¹⁷¹⁷ See: ICTY, Krstic Case, OTP Exhibits, Volume II, Ex. 24/2-24/3.

¹⁷¹⁸ Confidential interview (54).

Finally, a word about the Dutch intelligence community and Air Force could have played in this respect. It is of course also a bit ‘easy’ to blame the US intelligence community for conceivable shortcomings. It is also not true that the Dutch were totally dependent on other sources for their Imint. As said earlier, the Dutch had excellent TACRECCE capabilities in the area. However, the last flight of the 306th Squadron (mission 1357) of the Royal Dutch Airforce, which was stationed in Villafranca and in charge of photo reconnaissance missions above Bosnia, dates from 27 May 1995. The activities on the western side were more or less stopped after the American F-16 of Scott O’Grady was shot down. In fact, no reconnaissance flights were carried out at all between 11 and 30 June. Apparently, it was considered too dangerous to operate after this date, given the mounting threat from the Bosnian-Serb anti-aircraft guns.

As said earlier in this study. In brief, there were no additional enhancements in the area of intelligence; neither Parliament nor the Ministry of Defence nor the Cabinet insisted on it. However, the 306th Squadron of the Royal Dutch Airforce could have provided the Dutch with a unique opportunity. One of the best, if not the very best Imint asset in the theatre was the Dutch RF-16 TACRECCE capability. It was newer, more flexible and better technology than any other TACRECCE system in the theatre. It can provide better resolution, more flexible coverage and offset the effects of foul weather better than any satellite. Unlike the UAV, it has a man on-scene, at the controls, with a full situational awareness, which is always superior to a remote control system, and it yields far better imagery. One must conclude again, like in the precious chapters, that the Dutch shortfall in intelligence was recognized at the policy level, but that action was not properly taken. Dutch political and military leadership never took the courage to order the 306th Squadron of the Royal Dutch Airforce to fly over Srebrenica in order to support DutchBat.

The Dutch had assets at their command, which in many ways were superior to any others available. Perhaps the Dutch political and military structure deserve, according to an US intelligence official, far more blame regarding Imint than they do under the Sigint category. Perhaps they did not understand the value of their own Imint system, and the incredible utility it can provide. Experts who worked with TACRECCE systems and Imint collections systems of every stripe claimed that in a tactical situation, where the targets are troops on the ground (or prisoners for that matter), in a known area of limited dimensions, there is no other system that even comes close to TACRECCE. The Dutch RF-16 pod system in this respect was considered to be one of the very best in the world. And it was under the exclusive control of the Dutch. One American intelligence official posed these questions to the author: where was it when all this was going on? What was the higher priority that they sought to satisfy somewhere else with that precious Dutch Imint system and was that more important than DutchBat? They knew they wanted information, they had the assets, and they did nothing to get the information. Instead, the ‘voice from the sofa’ vilifies, according to this official, the US intelligence effort.¹⁷¹⁹

Despite this critique it remains a serious fact that on the basis of the above and the released Imint it has to be concluded that photos were available which were taken by US spy satellites, U-2s and UAVs of the events before, during and after the fall of the enclave. However, this Imint was not made readily available to the Dutch.

¹⁷¹⁹ Confidential information (80).

Chapter 8

Was 'Srebrenica' an intelligence failure?

'Gentlemen, I notice that there are always three courses (of action) open to an enemy and that he usually takes the fourth.'

- General Helmuth von Moltke

'Intelligence did not prepare us adequately for the attack on Srebrenica.'

- Richard Holbrooke.¹⁷²⁰

'Many intelligence reports in war are contradictory; even more are false, and most are uncertain and in short, most intelligence is false.'

- Carl von Clausewitz.¹⁷²¹

1. Introduction

Ever since the fall of Srebrenica there has been speculation about prior knowledge of the VRS attack. The Dutch Nova current affairs programme, for instance, revealed on 11 July 2000 that on 8 June 1995 the DutchBat commander Karremans had sent a warning to the Netherlands Ministry of Defence stating that he expected a major attack. Large troop concentrations and special combat troops had been reported around the enclave. This warning was apparently ignored and no further action was taken. Moreover, the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army General Ad Van Baal did not consider it necessary to inform Defence Minister Voorhoeve about this. A Ministry of Defence spokesman referred the matter to the UN: according to him it was this organization that should have acted on the information, not the Army. But according to the report UNPROFOR did nothing with this information from Karremans.¹⁷²²

This NOVA report can be seen as a late echo (prompted by a newly discovered document) of concerns that had already been raised in 1995. In earlier years it had been the press that had contained most of the speculation on this matter. It was claimed that in June 1995 American and German intelligence services had spectacular evidence that the Bosnian Serbs were planning to take the enclave: it was reported that as early as three weeks before the dramatic fall, the US government was already informed of the details. Washington, it was said, did not want to share this prior knowledge of the attack with the UN. As already discussed in the previous chapter, spy aircraft and satellites reportedly photographed the fleet of dozens of buses that were to be used to transport the Displaced Persons after the fall of Srebrenica. In the process, journalists wrote, they could hardly have overlooked the tanks and artillery pieces at Zeleni Jadar.¹⁷²³

¹⁷²⁰ Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Newsday, 29/05/96.

¹⁷²¹ Howard and Paret (ed), Clausewitz von, Carl: On War, p.117.

¹⁷²² 'Alarm Karremans over enclave werd genegeerd' (Karremans' alarm for the enclave was ignored), De Volkskrant, 12/07/00. Also the VPRO radio programme Argos, Radio 1, 11.00-12.00, 02/07/01. In fact, in Chapter 5 of Part III of the Srebrenica report it was proven that Voorhoeve was indeed informed.

¹⁷²³ 'VS wisten al weken tevoren van val Srebrenica' (US knew about Srebrenica weeks in advance), De Gelderlander, 13/10/95; Bert Steinmetz, 'Voorhoeve door VS fout ingelicht' (Voorhoeve wrongly informed by US), Het Parool, 15/05/96; Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, pp. 149-150.

Speculation was rife not only in the press. This question was also put to Akashi by New York. On the day of the fall of Srebrenica Annan declared that the situation raised serious and urgent questions for UNPROFOR:

‘How was it that UNPROFOR was taken unaware again, as with Gorazde and Bihac last year, by the true extent of Serb intentions? What intelligence resources do you [Akashi] have and what information, if any, was provided to UNPROFOR by those troop-contributing nations with intelligence-gathering assets in the area?’

Annan continued: ‘I find it difficult to accept that no “early warning” was possible when the evidence suggests that a major build-up of troops and heavy weapons by the VRS occurred prior to the offensive’.¹⁷²⁴ It was to prove no easy matter to answer this.

The central question in this chapter is whether intelligence and security services or other directly involved parties had prior knowledge of the VRS plans for the attack on Srebrenica, or in other words whether they were forewarned. Were there intelligence indications before the attack that the VRS planned to reduce the enclave in size or possible to conquer it entirely? And if these indications were received in time, who gathered or withheld this dramatic information, and why?

The answer is to be found in the intelligence situation of various intelligence and security services on the eve of the fall. In the process, a distinction must be drawn between ‘strategic’ and ‘tactical’ prior knowledge, or forewarning. Strategic prior knowledge relates to the patterns of expectation extending over a long period. This knowledge existed in plenty, because the Bosnian Serbs had often declared that they would one day take over the enclaves. Various officials of one European intelligence service thus expected that the eastern enclaves would be conquered sooner or later, and they were not surprised when this finally happened.¹⁷²⁵ A memorandum from the MIS/Army written in June 1995 predicted that the tension around the eastern enclaves would continue unabated, and would increase even further if the smuggling of weapons and ammunition from Zepa to Srebrenica were to continue. An attack on the enclave was not expected, but attempts to create better lines of communication were forecast.¹⁷²⁶ But as a member of the MIS/Army declared after the fall: such strategic indications offer little or no practical insight. The core of intelligence work is formed by tactical indications, such as troop concentrations, tanks, trucks and new trenches.¹⁷²⁷

If these tactical indications were not noted, then the attack on Srebrenica should indeed be regarded as an ‘intelligence failure’. Section 2 first provides a description of this term. The primary causes of such a failure are described; this may relate to a lack of intelligence, or to a failure to correctly interpret, or to evaluate in time, the intelligence which did exist.

Section 3 then examines strategic prior knowledge. The issue here is whether it was expected that the Srebrenica enclave would disappear in the long term, either as a result of political negotiations or through an attack. Section 4 deals with intelligence aspects of the actual course of the attack on the enclave.¹⁷²⁸ Section 5 turns to the information situation of UNPROFOR, and looks at the tactical prior knowledge in more detail. The question asked here is whether any prior knowledge based on hard indications really existed. This involves an examination of the Signals Intelligence (Sigint), Imagery Intelligence (Imint) and Human Intelligence (Humint) gathered by the various national intelligence services. An important question is whether this information was shared with the UN or the troop-contributing nations. Then the various parties in the enclave are dealt with, such as Dutchbat, the JCOs, UNHCR, NGOs and the ABiH. The Sigint capabilities of the ABiH are analysed. If these players ¹⁷²⁴ Confidential collection (7); Annan to Akashi, ‘situation in Srebrenica’, No. 2280, 11/07/95.

¹⁷²⁵ Confidential interview (48).

¹⁷²⁶ MoD, SMG, IntSum MIS/Army, Department I&V, 010609-070695, 07/06/95.

¹⁷²⁷ MoD, SMG, Report of a conversation with an Military Intelligence Service official, 03/08/95.

¹⁷²⁸ The attack itself is described in detail in Chapter 6 of Part III of the main Srebrenica report.

gathered intelligence, then it must be asked what elements of this arrived at UNPROFOR's headquarters in Tuzla, Sarajevo and Zagreb, and the UN, New York.

This analysis of the tactical prior information that was available with regard to the preparations for the attack is concluded in Section 6 with a review of the information present in the Netherlands at various levels. A description will be given of what information was received by NATO and what the information situation of the Dutch MIS was. Section 7 then takes a closer look at the information situation of the foreign intelligence services. This chapter ends with conclusions in Section 8 about the available prior knowledge regarding the Bosnian Serb attack. An answer is then given to the question: was this operation expected or did it come 'out of the blue'?

2. An intelligence failure?

Many publications describe the attack on Srebrenica as an intelligence failure. In the words of the author Metselaar: 'Increasingly, the attack tended to be seen as a tragic consequence of a combination of failures in intelligence estimates, of failing anticipation, or, perhaps even worse, as a cynical chess game in international "Realpolitik".'¹⁷²⁹ Military and political policymakers within UNPROFOR and NATO are said not to have received indications and warnings in time.

A warning can be associated with four possible aspects:

1. Hit: a warning is given and the event takes place;
2. Miss: no warning is given and the event still takes place;
3. False Alarm: a warning is given and the event does not take place;
4. Correct Rejection: no warning is given and the event does not take place either.

Whether a warning is correct or not depends on the actions of the recipient of the warning and of those who plan to take action. If the recipient makes the right analysis and takes action then he will try to reduce the future uncertainties.¹⁷³⁰ If warnings were received about the attack on Srebrenica, then the next question is whether these warnings were correctly identified and taken seriously by the recipient (e.g. UNPROFOR or others), whether no warning at all was given, or whether this came too late, or whether it was taken seriously enough.¹⁷³¹

A warning may not be effective for a number of reasons. One reason may be that there is a lack of information about the capabilities of the opponent. This does not seem to have been the case however: UNPROFOR had a reasonably reliable picture of the capabilities and the order of battle of the VRS. But it was harder to gain good insights into the short-term and long-term aims of the VRS. Mladic and Karadzic had, after all, often announced that the eastern enclaves would be reduced or conquered; this was nothing new. The more important question was when this would happen.

In fact, in the spring of 1995 there were continual rumours that an attack was going to take place. Both UNPROFOR and the US government were regularly warned by the Bosnian Muslims that a VRS attack was about to begin. But each time this proved to be a false alarm. This could easily create a 'Cry Wolf' mechanism: the more often a false alarm was sounded, the less credibility was attached to a following warning.¹⁷³² One particular CIA report concluded that this mechanism did indeed affect UNPROFOR. There were indications of the attack, such as the flow of reinforcements, but the authors of this report themselves noted: 'similar troop movements had been recorded around the enclave ¹⁷²⁹ M.V. Metselaar, 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence Estimates - Unprofor, the Dutch, and the Bosnian-Serb Attack on Srebrenica', Netherlands Annual Review of Military Studies. The Bosnian Experience, 1997, p.25.

¹⁷³⁰ Arie Ofri, 'Crisis and Opportunity Forecasting', ORBIS, Vol. 26 (1983) 4, pp. 822-827.

¹⁷³¹ R.K. Betts, 'Intelligence Warnings: Old Problems, New Agendas', Parameters, Spring 1998, pp. 26-35.

¹⁷³² Handel, Diplomacy, pp. 478-479. In the Netherlands this is referred to as the 'Major Sas Syndrome'. Sas was the Dutch military attaché in Berlin who since November 1939 had repeatedly warned of a German attack that always failed to materialize. In the end he was no longer believed, after which the attack then came. See: De Jong, Het Koninkrijk der Nederlanden, pp. 117-143.

dozens of times in the past, and the VRS was constantly adjusting its forces all across Bosnia. There was no special indicator, which would particularly distinguish these reports among hundreds of reports over the months and across the country.¹⁷³³

Another aspect of the Cry Wolf mechanism is that the credibility of the messenger starts to be doubted.¹⁷³⁴ Toby Gati, the US Assistant Secretary of State for Intelligence and Research, made an interesting observation about this: '[The Bosnians] wanted us in more (...). Do you know how many times we heard this? They were getting bombed out. Which one do you respond to? The times they cried wolf in one month - the problem is, they were crying about a real wolf.'¹⁷³⁵

Intelligence and security services are well aware of the Cry Wolf mechanism. The credibility of policymakers is also affected if reports sound the alarm too often. As a consequence the services generally wait to see which way the wind is blowing in an attempt to gather extra information on the nature of the threat. But this often leads to a new problem: services tend to gather as much information as possible for fear of missing something. This can often result in the information flow becoming 'uncontrollable in the search for eventual certainty as a basis for decisions and the essential information will be obscured by "noise"'.¹⁷³⁶

Metselaar, drawing on the work of the late Handel, who published a great deal about surprise attacks, wrote that the stream of information is sometimes filtered by 'noise barriers', such as the enemy and the international environment. Mladic had already declared several times that he wanted better control of the route to the bauxite mine at the southern tip of the enclave, and therefore wanted the relocation of a Dutch observation post, OP-E in this specific area.¹⁷³⁷ However, he left open how and when he planned to do this. Plans that are continually and frequently changed at the last moment also form a filter. As Metselaar comments 'Obviously, what an aggressor does not yet know himself can hardly be expected to be determined by one's own intelligence sources. Even the enemy's military and political elite itself is often, until the last moment, not completely certain about many of these elements'.¹⁷³⁸

The international environment can also function as a noise barrier, because the attention of the political and military policymakers, such as Janvier, Akashi and R. Smith, was directed at issues of a more strategic nature and not at the eastern enclaves. This is revealed by Janvier's remark on Operation By-Pass. The general recognized on 8 July, when the attack on Srebrenica had already begun, that the situation in Sarajevo was certainly not the only problem in Bosnia requiring a solution, but 'the focus of attention is such that we must deal with Sarajevo first'.¹⁷³⁹ This indicates that the attention in Zagreb and Sarajevo was directed towards other, more strategic issues.

Finally, the aspect of self-generated noise can also play an important role. This happens when policymakers are not able to adjust their expectations about the intentions and capabilities of a party on the basis of reality.¹⁷⁴⁰ This is also known as the 'sheer nerve scenario': the VRS would never have the 'nerve' to conduct an attack on the enclave. On 7 July, for instance, Karremans thought that the VRS attack was an attempt to provoke and intimidate the ABiH.¹⁷⁴¹ Analysts in the US intelligence community did not suppose either that Mladic was aiming for the entire enclave: after all, what would he do with so many Displaced Persons?¹⁷⁴²

Indeed, even on 10 and 11 July the true intentions of the VRS were not believed; not only in Dutchbat, but also in Zagreb, Sarajevo and The Hague. It did not fit the pattern of expectations that ¹⁷³³ Confidential information (57).

¹⁷³⁴ Michael Handel, 'The Study of Intelligence', ORBIS, Vol. 26 (1983) 4, p. 819.

¹⁷³⁵ Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Newsday, 29/05/96.

¹⁷³⁶ Välimäki, Intelligence, p. 34.

¹⁷³⁷ See also Chapter 6 of Part II of the main Srebrenica report at: www.srebrenica.nl

¹⁷³⁸ M.V. Metselaar, 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence Estimates', p. 37.

¹⁷³⁹ Confidential collection (7); Janvier to Akashi and Smith, Z-1129, 11/07/95.

¹⁷⁴⁰ Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

¹⁷⁴¹ M.V. Metselaar, 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence Estimates', pp. 39-40. See also: Debriefing Report, p. 23.

¹⁷⁴² Confidential interview (7).

the VRS attack should aim to take over the entire enclave. This aspect of self-generated noise was, according to Metselaar, actually the logical consequence of the fact that Dutchbat had been a 'hostage' of the VRS for a longer period. The Serbs had always been in a position to take over the enclave; why should that suddenly happen now? Both UNPROFOR and The Hague assumed that the VRS 'would not dare to go to such brutality and thereby provoke the whole international community'. It was viewed as totally inconceivable that Mladic would in fact do precisely this.

The policymakers clung to belief systems: a cohesive collection of views, convictions and values that have adopted an influential position in one's thinking. These belief systems form a filter in the perception of reality and the corresponding statements one makes. Here, reality is not determined by the actual situation but by the picture that those involved have formed of it. They try for as long as possible to perceive their surroundings in the most cohesive way possible and to avoid certain contradictions. Many tend to avoid what is known as 'cognitive dissonance' (the tension between new information and established ways of thinking).¹⁷⁴³ A study of the operations in Somalia, for instance, showed that important 'intelligence indicators were not assessed and analysed from first principles but were rather conveniently tailored to fit around what was wanted to be believed'.¹⁷⁴⁴

Another aspect of self-generated noise is the exaggerated value assigned to air power. It was long assumed that this would prove a sufficient deterrent to the VRS. After the fall of Akashi's advisers stated: 'The magic of air power is gone.'¹⁷⁴⁵ Self-generated noise can also occur if the analyst 'allows his own cultural background to influence the result rather than the culture, ideology, society and logic of the country concerned, giving rise to the Mirror Image phenomenon'. This refers to the inability to understand that the opposing party would act differently to the way the analyst himself would act. Decision-makers often tend to report the events that confirm their predictions and 'ignore those that fail to conform'.¹⁷⁴⁶

On the basis of the information available at the time, Metselaar concluded in 1997 that the way in which warnings of a VRS attack were handled can be regarded as an intelligence failure. At the same time he asks how great the failure was and to what extent it also explained the later tragic events. 'Could it be possible that the lack of capabilities and (probably even more importantly) the lack of willingness of (most if not all) members of the international community (at least until the end of July 1995) were more crucial?' In other words: would the result have been different if the indications and intelligence had been taken more seriously?¹⁷⁴⁷

One important question is whether there were sufficient intelligence capabilities to perceive the preparations in time. It is often assumed that a surprise attack is able to take place because enemy preparations are not discovered early enough to sound the alarm. According to the author Brady, history shows that in many successful surprise attacks the attacked party had enough information to make an accurate prediction of the enemy's intentions. The problem was that the signals were ignored or interpreted wrongly.¹⁷⁴⁸ Preventing a surprise attack is 'not simply a problem of detection, but very much a problem of assessment and acceptance'. The Argentinean attack on the Falkland Islands can serve as an example. Despite many warnings, the British government did not believe that Argentina would attack the islands. In turn, the Argentineans did not believe either that the United Kingdom would take the trouble to regain the territory.¹⁷⁴⁹

Previous chapters have described the resources and capabilities deployed by the international intelligence and security services in Bosnia. Attention has been given to the resources at the disposal of ¹⁷⁴³ Van Staden, De fuik, p. 10.

¹⁷⁴⁴ Connaughton, Military Intervention, p. 127.

¹⁷⁴⁵ UNNY, ICFY, SRSG, Mark Baskin to Akashi, 'How is the Fall of Srebrenica a Turning point for the Mission', 14/07/95.

¹⁷⁴⁶ Välimäki, Intelligence, p. 37 and 41.

¹⁷⁴⁷ Metselaar, 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence', p. 46.

¹⁷⁴⁸ Christopher Brady, 'Intelligence Failures: Plus Ça Change ...', Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 8 (1993) 4, p. 86.

¹⁷⁴⁹ Gordon H. McCormick, 'surprise, Perceptions, and Military Style', Orbis, Vol. 26 (1983) 4, pp. 836-837.

the ABiH. The question to be examined now is what intelligence services or the ABiH were able to discover and report about the military preparations of the VRS. Did they provide indications in time, and if so, how were these evaluated and interpreted, and finally: what was done with this intelligence?

3. Strategic prior knowledge

Ever since the establishment of the Safe Areas there had been discussions – albeit quiet ones – in the international political arena, about the inevitability of giving up the enclaves. This could take place through forced or voluntary surrender or through an exchange of the Safe Areas for other territory. Robert Hayden reported for instance that staff of the State Department had told him at the start of 1994 that they were convinced that Srebrenica would no longer be under Muslim control at the end of the war, but that they ‘were unwilling for moral reasons to urge the Muslims to cede the town’.¹⁷⁵⁰ The author Sadkovich pointed out that US negotiator Charles Redman travelled to Pale at the end of 1994 with a proposal that the eastern enclaves be exchanged for territory around Sarajevo.¹⁷⁵¹ Indeed, during international consultations Redman had indeed considered the option of exchanging Srebrenica and Zepa for territory around Sarajevo. At the same time, however, he thought that public opinion and the Clinton government would block this proposal.¹⁷⁵² But even before this, the matter had been discussed within the Bosnian government.

It was clear that the abandonment of the enclaves had been the subject of discussion in diplomatic circles for some time, because it was generally acknowledged that they were not viable. A senior German diplomat confirmed that Redman was aiming for ‘an exchange of territories. However, Bosnia had to agree. Sarajevo always maintained mixed feelings about the enclaves as a bargaining chip.’ The Bosnian Serb side showed interest too, as revealed by all sorts of direct bilateral contacts. Karadzic regularly bombarded Bonn with all sorts of secret letters and memos in this respect.¹⁷⁵³ Members of the US intelligence community confirmed that in Pale there were advocates of the plans for the exchange of territories.¹⁷⁵⁴ The existence of mixed feelings in Sarajevo was confirmed by a member of the State Department. The body language of the Bosnian representatives showed that some of these too were in favour of ‘swapping away the enclaves’: this issue created tensions within the Bosnian government.¹⁷⁵⁵ All things considered, there was thus some willingness among the warring factions to exchange the enclaves for other territory.

From the military perspective too it was assumed that the enclaves had little chance of survival in the long term. In a secret memorandum to the Canadian Chief of Defence Staff in the autumn of 1994, the Canadian Major General Ray Crabbe, at the time Deputy Force Commander of UNPROFOR, reported that UNPROFOR staff in Zagreb had ‘a very uneasy feeling regarding the situation in the eastern enclaves’ and regarding ‘the potential vulnerability of the enclaves to military action by the BSA [VRS]’. This latter possibility should not be ruled out, according to Crabbe.¹⁷⁵⁶ He did not fear an imminent attack, but in the long term the situation could only get worse. A briefing at the Ministry of Defence in December 1994 also stated the expectation that ‘in the long term, the enclave will fall to the Bosnian Serbs’. But the aim of the VRS was not, it was thought, the conquest of Srebrenica, because it had no military significance and a conquest would provoke a serious international response. Srebrenica would fall because of the intolerable humanitarian and socio-economic situation there.¹⁷⁵⁷

¹⁷⁵⁰ Robert M. Hayden, ‘Reply’, Slavic Review, Vol. 55 (1996) 4, p. 777.

¹⁷⁵¹ Sadkovich, Media, p. 216.

¹⁷⁵² Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 163.

¹⁷⁵³ Confidential interview (53).

¹⁷⁵⁴ Confidential interviews (7).

¹⁷⁵⁵ Confidential interview (3).

¹⁷⁵⁶ Confidential information (58).

¹⁷⁵⁷ MoD, CRST. G-2 Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff to Military Intelligence Service/CO, 07/12/94.

In January 1995 a European intelligence service also concluded that the VRS could have taken the enclave long before; Pale probably had political reasons for not launching an attack. An important factor in all considerations was what would happen to all the refugees. Moreover the VRS saw advantages in the current situation too, according to this source, because UNPROFOR soldiers were hostages in the enclave. The VRS could make excellent use of this in both the political and military arenas. It was thus expected that no attack would take place in the short term.¹⁷⁵⁸

But in February 1995 the British Lieutenant Colonel C.A. Le Hardy of Sector North East (SNE) in Tuzla concluded that 'srebrenica has to be dealt with before the situation further deteriorates'. He warned that the Security Council resolutions on Safe Areas provided no guarantee whatsoever of stability in or around the enclave.¹⁷⁵⁹ Analysts in Western intelligence agencies thought that the VRS would take action before, during or after the summer and that this could well mean the end of the eastern enclaves. Mladic and Karadzic wanted to end the war; the VRS and above all the Drina Corps was approaching the end of their resources and the VRS was simply no longer able to bring the war to a positive conclusion in any other way. So sooner or later the VRS would have to get rid of the enclaves.¹⁷⁶⁰ Since early 1995 US intelligence analysts had also been expecting the offensive as part of a VRS campaign 'to finish up the eastern enclaves this summer'.¹⁷⁶¹

The analysis of a European intelligence service reflects this sombre view of the future of the eastern enclaves. In a report dating from May 1995 it was claimed that one of the VRS goals was to exert maximum control over Eastern Bosnia. The most extreme variant of this scenario was the annexation of the enclaves. According to this analysis, the operational goal of the ABiH was to secure the links between Zepa and Srebrenica. An intelligence report of June 1995 said that Karadzic believed he could achieve the following goals through escalation: breaking through the isolation; re-establishing his own internal political position; extending the war and demonstrating to Milosevic that the latter could not make an agreement without including Pale. And it was noted that Karadzic could not afford a further escalation of the war. The only possible success could be achieved in the eastern enclaves.¹⁷⁶² The same opinion was put forward during a briefing for the NATO council.¹⁷⁶³

After the event too it transpired that UNPROFOR had viewed the eastern enclaves as untenable. In an interview General Smith admitted that Srebrenica would fall sooner or later. He received the first confirmed intelligence during his first meeting with Mladic in Vlasenica on 7 March 1995, when the latter declared that the eastern enclaves were definitely in his way; Mladic wanted to get rid of the Safe Areas. In Smith's estimation, from that time on the VRS strategy was aimed at freeing troops and resources, because Zepa, Srebrenica and Gorazde caused a constant drain that Mladic could not afford.¹⁷⁶⁴ The Military Assistant to General Smith, Lieutenant Colonel Baxter, later added that during this visit Mladic showed a map on which one could clearly see that the size of the enclave had been reduced.¹⁷⁶⁵

Smith's view was confirmed by an American official. In early 1995 general Smith had told the US ambassador in Sarajevo: 'If I were Mladic, I would take the enclaves.' The ambassador and Smith were good friends and the American visited Smith or Baxter at least once a week. This was not a forecast, but a rational calculation.¹⁷⁶⁶ Smith himself wrote in a Situation Report in April 1995 that Mladic had a choice: either to concentrate his troops on the western front (the Krajina and Bihac) or on the eastern front. Fuel shortages, the proximity to Serbia and the possible strategic plans for Sarajevo ¹⁷⁵⁸ Confidential information (59).

¹⁷⁵⁹ Simms, Unfinest Hour, p. 316.

¹⁷⁶⁰ Confidential information (60).

¹⁷⁶¹ R.J. Smith, 'Bosnian Forces Capturing Territory From Serbs, Intelligence Indicates', Washington Post, 21/07/95.

¹⁷⁶² Confidential information (61).

¹⁷⁶³ NMFA, PVNATO. PVNATO to Foreign Affairs, No. brni665/8434, 04/05/95.

¹⁷⁶⁴ Interview with R.A. Smith, 12/01/00.

¹⁷⁶⁵ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00 and NIOD, Coll. Westerman. Notes from a conversation with Lt. Coll. Jim Baxter, 03/05/96.

¹⁷⁶⁶ Confidential interview (3).

'lead me to think that his main effort will be in the east. In order to achieve a sufficient concentration of force, he will probably have to neutralize one or all of the Eastern enclaves.' His intelligence staff shared this opinion.¹⁷⁶⁷ One of Smith's intelligence officers, the American Brian Powers, later concluded that Mladic would probably take over the enclaves in June. A source in the Serb general's staff is said to have confirmed this.¹⁷⁶⁸ An officer who analysed the intelligence for Smith later told Roy Gutman: 'We felt it would occur by June.'¹⁷⁶⁹

At the meeting with Akashi and Janvier in Split at the start of June 1995¹⁷⁷⁰, Smith declared that he was convinced that the VRS would continue to challenge the international community to show that the Serbs would not submit to control. In his opinion this could lead to an intensification of the siege of Sarajevo, or in the long term an attack on the eastern enclaves. He said that UNPROFOR would have great difficulty in finding a suitable response to this crisis, with the exception of air strikes. Smith reportedly stood alone with this sombre analysis; the French intelligence community attached little credit to this view. General Clark at the Pentagon did not believe either that an attack would take place.¹⁷⁷¹

Early in the year the intelligence section in Sarajevo pointed out, with regard to the capabilities of the VRS for conducting offensive operations, that the VRS response to the ABiH offensives had not yet materialized. In previous cases this response had been relatively swift, with the use of heavy equipment and troops. Possible reasons cited for this phenomenon were: problems with logistics and supplies, lack of infantry, dissatisfaction among the officers and NCOs about the course of the war, long preparation periods needed to carry out military operations, internal disputes within the political leadership in Pale and finally the possibility that the Bosnian Serbs had not closed all their doors on a peace agreement. Every major operation aimed at the enclaves would exclude the possibility of an international settlement. The VRS counteractions would thus not be aimed at the enclave, but at other areas. The goal was thus to lure ABiH troops out of other areas and thereby to force the Muslims onto the defensive.¹⁷⁷²

In 1995 a discussion on the possible abandonment of the enclaves also began within the UN's Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO). The fact that this option was discussed was typical of the mood at that time. According to the Assistant Secretary-General for Planning and Support, the German General Manfred Eisele, the idea of letting the enclaves go originated with Smith and Janvier. The Security Council opposed this, however, because agreement to the proposal would be an admission that the Safe Area concept devised by the Council had failed. Moreover, most of the Security Council members generally took their lead from the United States and the US felt that the eastern enclaves should be maintained.¹⁷⁷³

At the end of May tension in Bosnia increased. The NATO bombardments near Pale on 25 and 26 May, following by the taking hostage of UN personnel, had a strong influence on the situation. The Bosnian Serbs not only took UN personnel hostage, but also threatened observations posts around the eastern enclaves. This happened around Gorazde and Zepa, but Dutchbat was to encounter problems too.

The question is whether the threat to the enclaves increased at the start of June 1995, following intensification of the hostage crisis when western countries announced their plans for troop reinforcements in the form of a Rapid Reaction Force. An analysis by the intelligence staff in Zagreb

¹⁷⁶⁷ Confidential collection (7), BHC Situation Report by General Smith, No. 8800 Confidential, 05/04/95, and BHC G-2 Assessment, 05/04/95.

¹⁷⁶⁸ NIOD, Coll. Westerman. Interview Cable Bruce with Brian Powers, undated.

¹⁷⁶⁹ Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Newsday, 29/05/96.

¹⁷⁷⁰ NIOD, Coll. Banbury. SRSG's Meeting in Split, 09/06/95; See also Chapter 1 of Part III.

¹⁷⁷¹ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁷⁷² Confidential collection (4). Memorandum VRS – Ability to conduct offensive operations from Capt. Wallace to COS, Zagreb, 11/04/95.

¹⁷⁷³ Interview with Manfred Eisele, 14/10/99.

stated that the deployment of the Rapid Reaction Force could have serious implications. Although it was not intended for deployment in the enclaves, the VRS could well view the Rapid Reaction Force as a renewed threat and as additional proof of support for the Bosnian government.¹⁷⁷⁴ The VRS could take retaliatory measures against UNPROFOR, including direct attacks on troops and installations. It would also become more difficult to move reinforcements to the enclaves. Sarajevo would initially welcome these developments, but the reaction would be negative if the new troops were intended to assist the withdrawal of UNPROFOR from the enclaves.¹⁷⁷⁵

Smith remained gloomy about the long-term prospects. In an analysis issued on 6 June he concluded that the VRS 'wants a conclusion this year'. In his opinion the ABiH had no interest in a ceasefire; moreover UNPROFOR was no longer seen as a peacekeeping force. The VRS wanted to neutralize UNPROFOR; as said, the troops in the enclaves were actually hostages. Moreover, Close Air Support would in the future be 'of doubtful value except as a measure of last resort and once potential hostages have been removed to safety'.¹⁷⁷⁶

The low-level effect of Close Air Support was also revealed by a conversation held on 2 June in Naples between the British Foreign Minister, Douglas Hurd, and the NATO Admiral Leighton Smith, who gave a detailed account of the problems in the relationship between the UN and NATO. Admiral Smith saw no political goals in Bosnia that could still be achieved in the long term. The existing mandate was mainly responsive in nature; consequently there was no realistic military goal. Admiral Smith was satisfied with the air operations; he had 216 aircraft at his disposal. But, emphasized Smith, 'it was impossible to win the battle with the Serbs by air power alone'. Hurd then asked if it was a myth that the enclaves could be defended and protected from the air. Admiral Smith's answer to this was: 'absolutely'. Most attacks were carried out with mortars, which were often transported by two men; these could be set up and dismantled within a few minutes and then be concealed in barns or houses. Close Air Support could do nothing against this type of operation.¹⁷⁷⁷

Despite this General Smith did not expect any operations by the VRS in Sarajevo in view of the political implications, negative publicity and lack of infantry. The VRS tactics boiled down to increasing pressure 'to degrade and deplete the ABiH to the point of capitulation'. Mladic was convinced that this method of slow strangulation would not provoke any response from NATO, and thus the VRS would continue to attack military targets in and around the enclaves. He expected that the ABiH would slowly lose much of its territory around the eastern enclaves and would gradually run out of ammunition. This would force the ABiH to withdraw for its own safety into more populated areas among the large numbers of Displaced Persons. The ABiH would try to use UNPROFOR as a shield and this in turn could provoke a VRS response against UNPROFOR.¹⁷⁷⁸

Following the fall of OP-E the intelligence section of Unprofor in Zagreb drew up an 'Eastern Enclaves Assessment' which predicted that the VRS would try to gain a stronger hold on the activities of the ABiH in the enclave. Although it was not expected that the VRS would attack the enclave, one could expect operations intended to force the ABiH further away from the most important communications links to the north and south of the enclave. Since the ABiH was not in a position to take effective countermeasures, the intelligence cell predicted that the VRS operation would progress slowly and methodically so as to minimize the number of casualties in its own ranks. The intelligence officer was convinced: 'The VRS is not expected to seize the Safe Area, preferring to leave the refugee problem to the local ABiH authorities to solve.' This analysis was partly based on the previously mentioned report and estimate by Karremans.¹⁷⁷⁹

¹⁷⁷⁴ United Nations, Srebrenica Report, pp. 63-64.

¹⁷⁷⁵ Confidential collection (4). Memorandum Warring factions' responses to UN 'reinforced' peacekeeping from Capt. R. Theunens to COS, Zagreb, 02/06/95.

¹⁷⁷⁶ Confidential collection (4). Memorandum Unprofor reinforcements from General Smith, No. 8190, 06/06/95.

¹⁷⁷⁷ Confidential information (62).

¹⁷⁷⁸ Confidential collection (4). Memorandum Eastern Enclaves Operations - Assessment by General Smith, No. 8940, 06/06/95.

¹⁷⁷⁹ Confidential collection (4). Eastern Enclaves Assessment, Annex A to Unprofor 800, 06/05/95.

On 9 June the intelligence staff in Zagreb produced the analysis entitled 'Intentions of the Warring Factions in the Eastern Enclaves'. The VRS, it was thought, would maintain its strategy of keeping a firm hold on the enclaves. This could lead to a further deterioration of the living conditions and possibly to civil unrest. Augmented by military pressure, in the long term this could lead to the capitulation of the ABiH. The VRS did not need to make any extra efforts to achieve this. 'Consequently, large-scale offensive operations of the VRS to eliminate the enclaves are not likely.' The intelligence officer expected that the ABiH would continue with small-scale sorties and ambushes, to which the VRS would respond with heavy weapons. The ABiH would continue to try to involve UNPROFOR or NATO in the conflict. 'sudden abandoning of positions along the confrontation line or (unconfirmed) alarming reports from Bosnian side on the situation in the enclaves, will be indicators for this.' In conclusion, the intelligence staff assessed the intentions of the VRS as follows: 'Large scale operations (assessed to be very unlikely), would only serve psychological aims'. In the short term the VRS would continue to pressurize Dutchbat to withdraw from certain OPs. Once this succeeded, the VRS would then try to reduce the size of the enclave in order to secure the communications links and access routes. A major military operation to eliminate Srebrenica was considered unlikely.¹⁷⁸⁰

On 29 June General Smith indicated that he was uneasy. If the ABiH continued its offensive elsewhere in Bosnia, then: 'we can expect the VRS to counter attack at some stage'. He then wrote: 'I am particularly sensitive to the situation of the units in Sarajevo and the Eastern Enclaves who for no fault of their own are without clear direction.'¹⁷⁸¹ This expectation was of a more strategic nature, however, because Smith did not indicate where he expected a VRS operation and at what time. This sombre view of Smith's was reproduced a year later in an article in Newsday. Smith's intelligence cell had predicted that a 'major push' directed at the three enclaves would take place sometime around the summer.¹⁷⁸² This is in line with the accounts given to the journalists Charles Lane and Thom Shanker by the CIA staff. In early 1995 the CIA had reportedly had 'bad indications'.¹⁷⁸³ It was not specified what these were.

The ABiH high command also had little hope that the enclaves could survive in the long term. The great weakness of the Safe Area concept was that the fear of attack continued: the Areas were not safe. In 1998 Minister Muratovic declared that Srebrenica had not been defensible.¹⁷⁸⁴ It was estimated that the main obstacle for the VRS would be the refugees; in the logistical sense this was bound to present a major problem. The general expectation was, as often said, that the VRS would never want to take the entire enclave, and was only interested in its southern tip. According to the Commander in Chief of the ABiH, General Rasim Delic, this was a flawed estimate. He later said that he had seen omens of the coming events:

'I was not 100% sure about what was going to happen, but I had my fears, partly because of the bilateral contacts with Akashi. But all we could do was to tell the population of Srebrenica to be on their guard (...) We tried to alert the international community, we didn't stand around with our arms folded, event though our hands were tied'.¹⁷⁸⁵

However, Delic never expressed this fear directly to General Rupert Smith in 1995.¹⁷⁸⁶

¹⁷⁸⁰ Confidential collection (4) Memorandum Intentions of the Warring Factions in the Eastern Enclaves, from G-2 drafter R. Theunens for COS, UNPF HQ, 09/06/95.

¹⁷⁸¹ Confidential collection (7). General Smith to FC, 'Commander HQ Unprofor Directive 3/95', 29/06/95.

¹⁷⁸² Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Newsday, 29/05/96.

¹⁷⁸³ Charles Lane and Thom Shanker, 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96.

¹⁷⁸⁴ Interview with Hasan Muratovic, 30/01/98.

¹⁷⁸⁵ Interview with Rasim Delic, 21/04/98.

¹⁷⁸⁶ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

The Military Intelligence Service of the Central Organization of the Ministry of Defence (MIS/CO) made a negative estimate of the long-term viability of the enclave right from the start. Since the creation of the Safe Areas, the MIS/CO had consistently pointed to the risk inherent for UNPROFOR. The strength of UNPROFOR was not sufficient to be able to successfully defend the existing positions. This was indeed not the aim, because the mandate stated that attacks or aggression should primarily be deterred by the presence of the UN troops.

From the moment that Dutchbat arrived, the VRS was in a position to take the enclave. The question was not whether the VRS was able to do this, but whether and when the VRS wanted to do it. The MIS/CO did not expect, however, that a potential offensive would go further than occupation of the south-eastern corner of the enclave, which was of tactical relevance to the VRS.¹⁷⁸⁷ On 23 May Karadzic stated that the VRS would conquer the eastern enclaves and Sarajevo unless the ABiH was disarmed and withdrawn in these areas. The MIS/CO analysis was that he had primarily said this in order to direct international attention to the fact that the UN had not responded to the presence of Bosnian heavy weapons in towns and enclaves. MIS/CO also pointed to the recent sorties from these 'safe areas'.¹⁷⁸⁸ Karadzic's declaration on 23 May that the VRS was going to conquer the eastern enclaves was also by the Canadian diplomat Snider and the Canadian intelligence community not viewed as a threat. Only if Mladic were to say the same would it have been a real threat.¹⁷⁸⁹

It was thus expected by many organizations and persons that in the long term the enclaves were not viable and would disappear. However, no major attack was expected. But strategic prior knowledge is not the same as tactical prior knowledge. The latter involves clear intelligence which makes it very clear that an attack is being prepared. Below it is examined whether this type of prior knowledge was present or not. This is done by reviewing the hard intelligence that was available at various levels. Were there tactical indications, such as military transports, troop concentrations and reports that provided mutual corroboration? Before answering these questions it is important firstly to give a brief reminder of how the actual attack took place¹⁷⁹⁰, as this will provide a framework for answering the formulated questions.

4. The attack on Srebrenica

On 3 June, OP-E at the southern tip of the enclave fell into the hands of the VRS. After this attack Dutchbat expected on 4 June that the VRS would continue the assault within 36 hours. The indirect declared objective of the VRS was to take the valley of the River Jadar and the mountains to the north of this up to Mount Kak: 'As a coincidence this line matches the southern border of the enclave as the VRS sees it.'¹⁷⁹¹ In an assessment a day later Karremans reported that the VRS attitude had hardened and the status quo had disappeared. He feared that if UNPROFOR did not take any effective military countermeasures, the VRS would respond to this by trying to take the entire southern flank, which would make the situation of the population worse. Karremans did not consider the use of air strikes to be opportune either.¹⁷⁹²

The situation remained threatening. On 8 June ABiH representatives requested an urgent meeting with Dutchbat. The deputy commander of the ABiH said that he expected a major attack. The VRS was concentrating around the enclave and special combat troops had been reported; these units were the same ones that had attacked OP-E. Zero Hour was expected to be the evening of 8 June or the morning of 9 June. Mladic was to personally lead the attack, which was intended to neutralize all

¹⁷⁸⁷ NIOD, Memo from Military Intelligence Service to the NIOD, January 1998.

¹⁷⁸⁸ Military Intelligence Service/CO. Memorandum on Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, No. 24/95, 23/05/95.

¹⁷⁸⁹ Interview with Dennis Snider, 17/11/99.

¹⁷⁹⁰ This is dealt with in detail in Chapters 5 and 6 of Part III of the main Srebrenica report.

¹⁷⁹¹ MoD, DCBC, Box 4, HQ Dutchbat to CO SNE, T-068, 04/06/95.

¹⁷⁹² MoD, CRST. No. DE00309, Karremans to C-KL Crisis Staff, TK9589, 05/06/95.

OPs. Karremans noted that this information should be regarded as reliable because it came from the same source that had announced the attack on OP-E. Nonetheless Karremans was not impressed by the situation. He concluded with: 'Reaction Dutchbat: continue task and, if necessary, defend the OPs.'¹⁷⁹³

The intelligence report sent by the liaison officer of the 28th Division of the ABiH, Ekrim Salihovic, to the 2nd Corps in Tuzla was less alarming in its tone, like the reports from Karremans. This report did indicate that Dutchbat had been informed of details regarding the possible attack, but the reported activities of the VRS mostly related to the north-western section of the enclave. The VRS was engaged in intensive reconnaissance in Zalazje close to OP-R, but the ABiH had not seen this for itself in the area.¹⁷⁹⁴ Other ABiH officers were however of the opinion that the situation was alarming and that a VRS attack on the enclave was imminent. There was intensification of VRS propaganda, logistical support had been received from Serbia and the morale of the VRS was improving. These indications led Captain Nijaz Masic (responsible for the morale of the 28th Division) to conclude that the VRS definitely planned to conquer Eastern Bosnia.¹⁷⁹⁵

In his book, Karremans mentioned that on 8 June the British Joint Commission Observers (the JCOs) who had been detailed to the battalion came to him with the suspicion that the VRS would attack all the enclaves within two weeks. Karremans also reported in his book that he had passed on reports from the JCOs and from the ABiH to the higher command,¹⁷⁹⁶ but the report that he sent to Tuzla, Sarajevo and The Hague in fact gave only the information that the ABiH had gathered about an attack, and not the suspicions of the JCOs.¹⁷⁹⁷

Strangely enough this 'alarm letter' from Karremans was never passed on to the MIS/Army. Its Head at that time, Bokhoven, confirmed that in May and July 1995 Karremans had written two alarm letters to the Commander in Chief of the Army, for the attention of the minister. He had expected that a copy of these letters would be sent to the MIS/Army, but this never happened. As Head he knew nothing about the letters. If he had received copies; then the MIS/Army might have been able to make an analysis of the situation and his service might have been more alert. But he first heard about these two letters during the major debriefing operation in Assen.¹⁷⁹⁸

The MIS/CO did however receive Karremans' reports and analysed the report deriving from the ABiH. The MIS/CO concluded that there were no indications of large-scale troop concentrations. On the other hand, this analysis concluded that the VRS around the enclave was strong enough to carry out a limited operation on the territory of the enclave and it did not seem unlikely that, just as in Gorazde, the VRS would try to gain control of parts of the enclave. The MIS/CO considered however that it was premature to view the limited operation against OP-E as the start of further operations. In Gorazde such warnings from the ABiH had reached UNPROFOR, but they seemed intended to prompt Dutchbat to abandon the observations posts so that the ABiH could take them over. It was conceivable that the Bosnian warnings on Srebrenica had the same goal. Another possibility considered by the MIS was that the ABiH warnings could be intended to place responsibility for any escalations with the VRS right from the start. The minister was properly informed of the matter.¹⁷⁹⁹

The United Nations Military Observers, the UNMOs, had not expected the attack on OP-E either. The UNMOs had a very limited perspective in and around the enclave. This was later confirmed

¹⁷⁹³ MoD, DCBC, Box 4. HQ Dutchbat to CO SNE, 08/06/95. See also: MIS/CO. Memorandum to CDS; Re: Intelligence on attack on Srebrenica; Author: L. Col. Van Geldere; Annotation: Col. J. Mulder Head MIS/Army; 18/03/97.

¹⁷⁹⁴ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. ABiH Komanda 28. Divizije to Komanda 2. Korpusa, , Str. Pov. Br. 02-06-27/95, 08/08/95.

¹⁷⁹⁵ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. ABiH Komanda 28. Divizije to Komanda 2. Korpusa RBiH Odjeljenje morala, Str. Pov. Br. 04-93/95, 09/08/95.

¹⁷⁹⁶ Karremans, Srebrenica, p. 149.

¹⁷⁹⁷ MoD, DCBC, Colonel R. van Dam to the Minister, 09/06/95.

¹⁷⁹⁸ Interview with H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01.

¹⁷⁹⁹ MoD, MIS/CO. Memorandum from Head of Operations (Col. R.S. van Dam) to the Minister, Junior Minister, CDS, PCDS and SCOCIS, 09/06/95, unnumbered. The press reports to the effect that the minister was not informed are thus incorrect. It is not clear if and how Karremans was informed of the findings of the MIS/CO.

by the Norwegian Brigadier General Haukland, Commander of SNE, who said that the UNMOs had a difficult time and knew no more than Dutchbat. They had no freedom of movement and the team was not able to travel through the region around Srebrenica.¹⁸⁰⁰ This is also clear from the reports made by the UNMOs and their later debriefing following their return from Srebrenica. A Dutch UNMO, Major A. de Haan, did however report that on 2 June rumours were circulating with regard to an attack on OP-E. A day later these rumours proved to be true. Their report showed that the attack on OP-E was evaluated by the UNMOs on 3 June as an operation aimed at gaining control of the southern road,¹⁸⁰¹ and not taking over the enclave itself. Furthermore, the report portrayed things as not so serious. At that time neither the observers nor anyone in Dutchbat imagined that the Bosnian Serbs would take the entire enclave. It was however thought that the VRS might try to carve off pieces of the enclave.¹⁸⁰²

The loss of OP-E was not experienced as a shock within SNE. Ken Biser, the head of Civil Affairs, stated in his weekly report of 9 June that this was not a surprise. It had long been known that the VRS wanted to use the southern road. If UNPROFOR was not prepared to permit this 'they might feel the need to take it by force'. In a summary Biser wrote that on the basis of the 'rhetoric of the past few days, I warned that they would seize it by force. I did not think they would do it prior to Sunday or Monday though.' Biser did however expect problems in the long term. Moreover, the Bosnian governor in Tuzla had urged that OP-E be regained 'without regard to civilian casualties from any subsequent shelling', as in the event of such a retaking the VRS would shell the enclave. In Biser's opinion the situation around the road would probably escalate, because the VRS was already using it. It would not be long before the ABiH started setting up ambushes. In turn the VRS would then take reprisals and shell the enclave, and would then proceed with 'seizure of additional territory'.¹⁸⁰³ However, things remained fairly quiet until the start of July.¹⁸⁰⁴

The first sign that the VRS intended to do something around Srebrenica was the arrival of a group of staff officers of the Drina Corps in Eastern Bosnia at the end of June,¹⁸⁰⁵ led by the Chief of Staff of the Drina Corps (and after 13 July its commander), Major General Radislav Krstic. This marked the start of the planning for Operation Krivaja '95.¹⁸⁰⁶ On 2 July this led to the issue of an operations plan by the Drina Corps. The aim of Krivaja '95 was to separate the enclaves of Zepa and Srebrenica, to reduce them to the built-up areas and to create the conditions for their 'elimination'. This goal was to be achieved with a surprise attack. Units around the enclave were ordered to conduct an active defence, while separate combat units were to reduce the enclaves. Full radio silence was to be observed so that no military traffic could be monitored.

The consulted Bosnian Serb sources claim that the continual ABiH sorties from the enclave were a major reason for this operation. The former Chief of the General Staff of the VRS and later Minister of Defence of the Republika Srpska, General Manojlo Milanovic, stated that the attack was a response to the sortie towards Visnjica, in the direction of the headquarters of the VRS in Han Pijesak. This attack resulted in many civilian casualties.¹⁸⁰⁷ The historian Milivoje Ivanisevic also believed that the attack on Srebrenica was caused by the ABiH sorties. In order to prevent a repetition the ABiH lines had to be taken.¹⁸⁰⁸ The journalist Zoran Jovanovic, at the time the information officer of the Drina Corps, confirmed when asked that the murder of the five VRS woodcutters close to Milici on 28 May and the sortie on 26 June near Visnjica, followed by an attack on a VRS signals patrol at Crna Rijeka (three kilometres from the headquarters of the Drina Corps) prompted Mladic to take definitive ¹⁸⁰⁰ Interview with H. Haukland, 03/05/99.

¹⁸⁰¹ SMG. UNMO SNE to UNMO HQ, Sarajevo, No. IN 854, 03/06/95. The UNMO headquarters at BHC came to the same verdict. UNMO, BHC to UNMO, HQ Zagreb, No. IN. 891, 04/06/95.

¹⁸⁰² Interview with L.C. van Duijn, 02/07/99.

¹⁸⁰³ UNGE, UNROFOR, Box 55. Biser to Joseph, SSN 467, 05/06/95 and Biser to Corwin, SSN 209, 09/06/95.

¹⁸⁰⁴ How the VRS attacked is described in detail in Chapter 5 of Part III of the Srebrenica report.

¹⁸⁰⁵ This brief reconstruction draws on Part III (Chapters 5 and 6) of the Srebrenica report.

¹⁸⁰⁶ ICTY (IT-98-33) OTP Ex. 403/a, Butler Report, p. 6 and 15.

¹⁸⁰⁷ Interview with Manojlo Milovanovic, 18/11/98.

¹⁸⁰⁸ Interview with Milivoje Ivanisevic, 17/09/99.

action on the enclave.¹⁸⁰⁹ At the time there were varying accounts of the numbers of Serb dead resulting from ABiH attacks.

Another significant reason for the VRS general staff to start the operation was to release troops who were badly needed elsewhere. The troops were required around Sarajevo and elsewhere on the front line held by the Drina Corps.¹⁸¹⁰ The NATO bombardment on Pale on 25 and 26 May also influenced the decision to attack the enclaves, according to the ABiH. The bombardments led to a further degradation of the military infrastructure and strengthened the support for a military solution to the crisis.¹⁸¹¹ Moreover, the morale of part of the VRS was low and a victory at Srebrenica could help to restore this.¹⁸¹² Possibly the strategy pursued by the Croats also influenced the decision to initiate the attack on Srebrenica. Releasing troops to resist the Croatian operations in the Krajina (which had started on 4 June 1995) could, according to ABiH Corps Commander Sead Delic, also have played a role.¹⁸¹³ On the Bosnian side there were no further insights into the motivation for the VRS attack.

As regards the progress of the attack: it suffices to say here that the operational plan for Krivaja '95 was developed in a very short period and that there was also little time for the preparations. Moreover, the aim of the operation was not the conquest of Srebrenica but to reduce the size of the enclave in order to cut the links with Zepa. It appears that UNPROFOR and the Bosnian Muslims had no knowledge of the VRS plans for this operation. Although Mladic once again pointed out to Janvier on 29 June that there were a large number of armed men in the enclaves who formed a threat to the VRS,¹⁸¹⁴ there was little that pointed to preparations for an attack. At the start of July it was still fairly quiet in the enclave, despite an increase in battle incidents, which was however limited. The last situation report issued by Dutchbat on 5 July, hours before the start of the attack, reported that the general situation was assessed as calm and stable. No major changes were expected in the coming 24 hours.¹⁸¹⁵

On 5 July the 28th Division of the ABiH in Srebrenica reported to 2nd Corps in Tuzla that there were indications of a possible major offensive. The population had been observing troop movements for some time and reconnaissance had revealed that VRS units had arrived in the area around Zeleni Jadar in the afternoon of 5 July.¹⁸¹⁶ It is striking that it was not until the morning of 6 July that the 28th Division reported that a large column of armoured and mechanized units was moving from the area around Zvornik towards Bratunac.¹⁸¹⁷ The relocation of the VRS's heavy equipment, chiefly moved in from Zvornik, had not been noted by the ABiH and had also not been revealed by intercepts of radio traffic. This would have been the chief indication of an attack. It was pure coincidence that a passing convoy of the UN's refugee organization, UNHCR, noticed these convoys. Starting from the positions that had been taken up around the enclave on 5 July, the Bosnian Serbs were to conduct the final act in what was to become the drama of Srebrenica.

On 6 July the VRS started its attack on positions of Dutchbat and the ABiH at the southern edge of the enclave. Almost all efforts were aimed at this sector, which was in line with the primary goal to separate Srebrenica and Zepa. The VRS advance went so well that the evening of 9 July saw an important 'turning point' of which Dutchbat, UNPROFOR and the ABiH were not aware. The ¹⁸⁰⁹ Interview with Zoran Jovanovic, 13/09/99.

¹⁸¹⁰ ICTY (IT-98-33) D 160/a, Radinovic Report, section 3.3.

¹⁸¹¹ Interview with Semsudin Murinovic, 17/05/99.

¹⁸¹² Interview with Sefko Tihic, 08/03/99.

¹⁸¹³ Interview with S. Delic, 10/03/99.

¹⁸¹⁴ UNNY, DPKO coded cables. Code Cable Janvier to Annan New York, No. UNPF Z-1082, 01/07/95.

¹⁸¹⁵ NIOD, Coll. Sitreps, HQ Dutchbat to Sector HQ North-East, Sitrep for period 041700 to 051700B Jul 95.

¹⁸¹⁶ ICTY (IT-98-33) OTP Ex. 403/a, 28th Division Combat Report, No. 01-161/95, 05/07/95. Butler Report, p. 17. In a report of 6 July as well, the 28th Division indicated that a strong concentration of tanks and artillery had been seen the previous day. See also: Collection NIOD, Collection CD-ROMs, Komanda 28. Divizije to Komanda 2. Korpusa, Str. pov. br. 01-163/95, 06/07/95.

¹⁸¹⁷ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. ABiH 28. Divizije to Komanda 2. Korpusa, odjeljenje bezbjednosti, General Stab ARBiH Uprava bezbjednosti, Str. Pov. Broj. 13-05, 06/07/95.

Bosnian Serbs decided that they would no longer confine themselves to the southern part of the enclave, but would extend the operation and take the town of Srebrenica itself. Karadzic was informed that the results achieved now put the Drina Corps in a position to take the town; he had expressed his satisfaction with this and had agreed to a continuation of the operation to disarm the 'Muslim terrorist gangs' and to achieve a full demilitarization of the enclave. In this order, issued by Major General Zdravko Tolimir, it was also stated that Karadzic had determined that the safety of UNPROFOR soldiers and of the population should be ensured. Orders to this effect were to be provided to all participating units. The safety of the population should also be guaranteed in the event that they should attempt to cross to the territory of the Republika Srpska. The orders made no mention of a forced relocation of the population. The VRS units were to be ordered not to destroy any civilian property unless they met with resistance. Buildings were not to be set on fire. A final instruction, also of significance, was that the population and prisoners of war should be treated in accordance with the Geneva Convention.¹⁸¹⁸ On 11 July all of Srebrenica fell into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs.¹⁸¹⁹

The conquest of Srebrenica was, according to some authors, 'not to be attributed to an unexpected decision taken by unpredictable Serb leaders at an unguarded moment; it was probably a carefully planned operation that had been prepared four months before the actual start of the attack'.¹⁸²⁰ This is incorrect. The plans for an attack on the enclave were actually drawn up at a very late stage and in a very short time; there was no months-long preparation. It was a question of days. Equally, it was not intended to occupy the enclave in its entirety. This decision was taken only on the evening of 9 July. This ad hoc decision was confirmed by a VRS soldier in an interview with the Banja Luka Srpska Vojska. He took part in the attack and was involved in the 'rectification' of the chaotic situation that arose later. According to him the Bosnian Serbs had not planned to take Srebrenica at all, but on 9 July the VRS had come so close to the enclave that it was decided to press on. This was due to the lack of any serious resistance by the ABiH.¹⁸²¹

The question of whether there was prior knowledge of the attack on the entire enclave is thus relevant only to 9 and 10 July; the issue of prior knowledge of the attack on the southern tip of the enclave, by contrast, must focus on the period from 2 to 6 July, because this is when preparations for the Krivaja '95 plan were made. It needs to be established what information was gathered during this time and how this was interpreted by the UNPROFOR staff in Tuzla, Zagreb and Sarajevo. Following this, it will be examined whether documents of UNPROFOR, DPKO and official documents from private and government archives or conducted interviews cast light on the question as to whether there were relevant indications, and whether Western intelligence services passed on intelligence to the political and military policymakers within UNPROFOR.

5. The intelligence situation of UNPROFOR

According to press reports General Smith had been warned by an UNPROFOR report that if the ABiH continued its offensive around Sarajevo, the VRS would attack the enclaves in order to conquer them and thus to free soldiers for the battle in other areas.¹⁸²² Smith himself claimed that the attack came as a great surprise and the Political Director at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and former chairwoman of the British Joint Intelligence Committee, Pauline Neville-Jones, stated the same.¹⁸²³ By the same token, the Swedish negotiator Carl Bildt said he had no indications of a military ¹⁸¹⁸ ICTY (IT-33-98) OTP Ex 64B, Main Staff of the Army of Republika Srpska to President of Republika Srpska, for information, Drina Corps IKM/Forward Command Post, Generals Gvero and Krstic, personally, 09/07/95, Strictly Conf. No. 12/46-501/95.

¹⁸¹⁹ For a detailed analysis of the fall of Srebrenica: Chapter 6 in Part III of the main report.

¹⁸²⁰ Van Staden, De fuik, 1997, p. 9 and Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, p. 148.

¹⁸²¹ Zeljko Planincic, 'The call for help goes out to the best', Banja Luka Srpska Vojska, (FBIS translation), 03/11/95.

¹⁸²² S. Sullivan and A. Sage, 'Britain's UN forces gave warning of Serb attacks', The Times, 15/07/95.

¹⁸²³ Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

build-up or of the aim to conquer Srebrenica. Bildt stated that the general assessment by ‘all analytical and intelligence units in and out of the theatre of war at this point of time’ was that the VRS did not intend to take the entire enclave.¹⁸²⁴

When verifying these views it is important to examine the flow of information within UNPROFOR. Such prior information would initially have had to come from players operating within the enclave, such as Dutchbat, UNMOs, the British JCOs (SAS units), or non-governmental organizations (NGOs). In addition, the ABiH in the enclave and in the 2nd Corps in Tuzla could have been an important source of intelligence for UNPROFOR. Information from these sources would have reached SNE, from where it would have been passed to Bosnia Hercegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo and then to the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb. This would have been the route for the most important intelligence concerning Srebrenica, which could then have been supplemented by the information available to the various national intelligence and security services. The issue to be examined next is to what extent this actually happened.

Prior knowledge held by, and assessments made by, Dutchbat and the UNMOs

All documents and interviews indicate that Dutchbat was completely surprised by the attack: Karremans had no prior knowledge. The final situation report sent by Dutchbat on 5 July, just hours before the start of the VRS attack, stated only that the situation was calm.¹⁸²⁵ Things were quiet in the enclave. At one OP 43 men and women set off in a southerly direction at the end of the afternoon. The only other report that indicated military activity was that the ABiH had occupied many positions close to the line of confrontation and that another OP had reported seeing a trailer with a tank.¹⁸²⁶ In Bratunac nothing had been noticed of the build-up for the attack on the enclave. The VRS liaison officer actually heard from Dutchbat, through the special telephone line, that the attack on the enclave had begun.¹⁸²⁷ The commander of the SAS reported to his headquarters that he too had received reports mentioning VRS troop movements. He did not believe that Karremans regarded the VRS as a serious threat. In June Karremans had told a doctor of Médecins sans Frontières (MSF) that the ABiH would be able to resist for at least seven days and was strong enough to prevent the fall of the enclave.¹⁸²⁸

A first indication of the approaching storm was received on 5 July. Dutchbat reported that a convoy had been seen consisting of five APCs, four T-55 tanks and five trucks, and the relocation of five artillery pieces from Bratunac to the south, as well as reporting that five tanks had been seen on the road south of Zvornik. The report about the tanks originated from a UNHCR Field Officer, and the report about the artillery from the Dutchbat liaison team.¹⁸²⁹ These were not however indications that led Dutchbat or UNPROFOR to draw conclusions about an attack. The closest thing to a ‘storm warning’ came from the G-2 (intelligence staff) of SNE. The reports from Dutchbat here led to the following comments:

‘It is not known what the final destination is for the convoy or the arty [artillery] pieces but it may be a show of strength to keep the pressure on the enclave or to stop the movement of arms between the two enclaves of ZEPA and SREBRENICA. This may mean an increase in Warring Faction activity around ¹⁸²⁴ Bildt, Peace Journey, pp. 55 – 57.

¹⁸²⁵ MoD, Sitreps. HQ Dutchbat to Sector HQ North-East, Sitrep for period 041700 to 051700B Jul 95. The report of the tanks to the south of Zvornik came from a UNHCR Field Officer, and the report of the artillery at Bratunac from the LO Team of Dutchbat. (Supplement to Daily Milinfosum 4 Jul 95. Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff).

¹⁸²⁶ MoD, SMG. Fax S2/3 Dutchbat to A-Comp. (Simin Han), 1 (Nederland/BE) Logtbat, Logbase Zagreb, Comcen Crisis Staff, Milinfo 040600 - 050600B Jul 95.

¹⁸²⁷ Interview with Jovan Ivic, 20/10/00.

¹⁸²⁸ Confidential information (1).

¹⁸²⁹ MoD, CRST. Supplement to Daily Milinfosum 04/07/95 and SMG 1004/59, Logbook G3 Sarajevo 4 July 18.00B.

the enclaves in the very near future. The tks [tanks] were not reported as being on low loaders so it is assumed that they will not be going too far remembering that DUTCHBAT will shortly be in the process of rotating and the BSA [VRS] may wish to test the new boys out'.¹⁸³⁰

This test came even faster than 'the near future' and Dutchbat was completely unaware of the peril. This danger showed itself totally unexpectedly in the early morning of 6 July, when shells landed in the enclave. The fact that this marked the start of the VRS attack on the enclave penetrated only slowly to the higher echelons.

It does not seem likely that the UNMOs had noted the preparations, otherwise they would have reported this to Dutchbat. The UNMOs were a separate organization. When the Canadian battalion arrived in Srebrenica, the UNMOs took up accommodation in the Post Office building in the centre of Srebrenica because of the central location and the good telecommunications facilities.¹⁸³¹ According to the UNMO interpreter Emir Suljagic the UN and Dutchbat should have known about the impending attack. According to him, a month before the attack several UNMOs travelled from Srebrenica to Sarajevo. En route, about twenty kilometres from Srebrenica, they reportedly saw large numbers of tanks, soldiers and weapons, including SA-3 missiles. According to Suljagic it was obvious that something was going to happen. He reportedly also passed on this intelligence to the ABiH.¹⁸³² But in fact these observations had nothing to do with the attack on Srebrenica because at that point the preparations had not yet begun.

The alarming vision can also be found in claims that the UNMOs had prepared a confidential report on 2 June regarding the presence of the Arkan Tigers (a notorious Serb paramilitary unit) in the vicinity of Bratunac. According to the author Hartmann, Arkan's reputation 'aurait dû alerter les hauts commandements militaires de Sarajevo et de Zagreb' ('should have alerted the military high commands in Sarajevo and Zagreb'). The UNMOs in the region should have concluded that the Arkan Tigers 'were evil enough to cleanse "an enclave" and emphasizing the probability of an offensive in the near future'. This report of Arkan dated from the end of May, however, at a time when the VRS preparations had not yet begun.¹⁸³³

Westerman and Rijs also refer to reports from the UNMOs, who concluded from the arrival of the Arkan Tigers that the VRS was not able to conquer the enclave. The Arkan Tigers were needed to do this.¹⁸³⁴ Apart from the issue of whether this is a correct estimate of the military strength of the VRS, it must be established that the UNMOs did not present hard and concrete indications for a coming attack. Statements were confined to vague suggestions that something like that might possibly happen.

It seems that the UNMOs observed nothing of the VRS preparations. According to the Canadian UNMO Bob Patchett, who remained in the enclave until the end of June 1995, no VRS build-up had been noted. In the months of April and May it was even possible to cross the ceasefire line to talk to VRS soldiers, which at the time comprised local military personnel. They asked about people in the enclave whom they knew and about the state of certain houses. Patchett was the only UNMO who was allowed to leave on 23 June; he had not expected to be permitted to travel via Bratunac. He saw no military build-up or checkpoints in the town. He also saw no artillery positions close to the bridge over the Drina. For weeks the VRS had been complaining that the ABiH had been ¹⁸³⁰ MoD, SMG. HQ Sector NE Daily Milinfosum from 031700B to 041700B Jul 95. UN Conf. The report of the tanks to the south of Zvornik came from a UNHCR Field Officer. MoD, SMG, LO Team to UNMOs Srebrenica, Milinfo, 05-07-95 16:46.

¹⁸³¹ Interview with Emir Suljagic, 24/05/99.

¹⁸³² Interview with Emir Suljagic, 23/11/97.

¹⁸³³ Florence Hartmann, 'Chronologie d'une négligence criminelle: le génocide de Srebrenica', in: Allain, e.a., L'ex Yougoslavie and Europe, p. 115, and 'AICG call to indict General Janvier', Bosnia Report, No. 1, November-December 1997, p. 3.

¹⁸³⁴ Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, p. 149.

digging trenches and was going around heavily armed. The VRS had however showed Patchett a map with new lines of confrontation, which indicated that the Swedish Shelter Project would come under VRS control. He expected that once the VRS had started its attack this would be continued; that was the usual pattern. The VRS aim was to bring its own lines closer to the boundaries of the enclave. In June Patchett observed that the VRS was cutting down a lot of trees and dragging them away with tractors. This could be to open a route, or for commercial purposes. It was not possible to say that the VRS was engaged in a build-up.¹⁸³⁵

On 25 June the UNMO team in Srebrenica reported that there was very little news about the VRS. The ABiH were openly displaying their weapons and new uniforms were reported.¹⁸³⁶ The overview for the period 25 June to 1 July, drawn up by the UNMO headquarters in Zagreb, also gave no indication that an attack was imminent. No forecasts to this effect were made.¹⁸³⁷ The UNMOs were therefore surprised when ABiH commander Becirovic reported that two buses and two trucks had been observed at Zeleni Jadar on the afternoon of 5 July which had dropped off VRS troops. All through this day, 5 July, troop concentrations had been observed around the enclave. In their report the UNMOs expressed their surprise that the ABiH had not reported these preparations (which had not been observed by Dutchbat).¹⁸³⁸

It was only on 6 July that more serious reports were received from the UNMOs. It reported serious bombardments; at this point however the attack had already begun. Becirovic stated at a meeting with Dutchbat and the UNMOs that in the past 24 hours a concentration of VRS troops had gathered. He requested Karremans to plan his rotation of DutchBat III with its successors, the Ukrainians, carefully so that the VRS was given no chance to allow UN soldiers to depart and then not to permit any replacements. He seems not to have expected the conquest of the enclave.¹⁸³⁹ The UNMOs commented that the ABiH had prior knowledge of these preparations but had not reported them, which can be interpreted as an indication of the 'underrated attitude they attached to it'. The UNMOs thought that if the VRS movements on 5 July were reported at an early stage then the attack of the following day 'could have been pre-empted and counter measures taken to prevent it'.¹⁸⁴⁰

According to all three UNMOs the collapse of the defence was due to a weak chain of command in the ABiH. The orders, sometimes contradictory, were simply not followed by some units. This led to total confusion, which in turn resulted in pointless troop movements from one side of the enclave to the other. The VRS knew about this weakness and exploited it.¹⁸⁴¹ In addition the weak position of Commander Becirovic, following the departure of Oric from the enclave, may have played a part as well. To summarize: diaries, UNPROFOR reports, debriefings of and interviews with UNMOs provide evidence that is at odds with the claims by various cited authors: the UNMOs did not have prior tactical knowledge.

The observations of the JCOs

In an analysis of reports by Joint Commission Observers in Tuzla and Srebrenica it is concluded that they had no indications whatsoever of an attack.¹⁸⁴² It should be noted here that the JCO team in the ¹⁸³⁵ Interview with Bob Patchett, 19/11/99.

¹⁸³⁶ MoD, SMG. UNMO SNE to UNMO HQ, Sarajevo, No. IN 551, 25/06/95. See also the report from UNMO HQ Zagreb: UNPF, Geneva, Box 75, UNMO HQ Daily Sitrep, 25/06/95.

¹⁸³⁷ UNGE, UNPF, Box 75, UNMO activities, UNMO HQ Zagreb, MIO Office, Infosum for the period 25 June-01 July, 1995, 03/07/95.

¹⁸³⁸ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. Komanda 28. Divizije to Komanda 2. Korpusa, 6 July 1995, Str. pov. br. 01-163/95. UNMO Srebrenica to TX 061700B Jul 95 and Archive MoD, MIS/Army. UNMO HQ Sector BH-NE to UNMO HQ BH COMD, 06/07/95.

¹⁸³⁹ Confidential collection (5). Report: Report on The Battle of Srebrenica, 21/07/95.

¹⁸⁴⁰ MoD, MIS/Army. No. 153, UNMO Srebrenica to TX, No. 5220, 06/07/95.

¹⁸⁴¹ Confidential collection (5). G-2 Air, Flt. Lt. Hooper, 'Debrief in UNMOS from the Srebrenica enclave', 23/07/95.

¹⁸⁴² Confidential information (1).

enclave was seriously confined by Karremans in its freedom of movement; they were allowed only to accompany Dutch patrols. The commander of the JCOs reported in May that 'there were constant rumours at this time from the ABiH that the Bosnian Serb Army (VRS) were planning to attack the Enclave'. On 25 May the JCO commander reported that BHC had informed him that 'a move on the eastern Enclaves was a real possibility and that if this occurred then Srebrenica would be the first'. This was probably an analysis by Smith following the NATO bombardments near Pale. This information was passed to Dutchbat, 'who it is reported, did not believe it'.¹⁸⁴³

On 8 June representatives of the ABiH convened an urgent meeting with Dutchbat and the JCOs and 'gave them detailed plans for an 'imminent attack' on the Enclave'. This did not lead to any alarms being sounded: the JCOs were not impressed. Such rumours had often been heard and 'were thus hard to take seriously'. Furthermore the JCOs had received 'no confirmatory evidence for the plan'. From this it can be deduced that General Smith and the British intelligence services also knew of no such plans. This was also revealed during the morning briefing on 25 June, where General Smith declared that the problems was 'that we have very little intelligence on what Mladic's movements are'.¹⁸⁴⁴

On 5 July five tanks, five APCs and four trucks were seen heading in a southerly direction. This report came from a UNHCR official and the commander of the JCOs reported this to his headquarters in Sarajevo; the attack started a day later. On 7 July the commander reported that Dutchbat and his headquarters in Sarajevo both believed that the VRS operation would be on a limited scale and was intended only to teach the ABiH a lesson. He did however add: 'There was (...) no way of knowing for sure.' The attack was continued but the JCOs still remained uncertain about the intentions of the VRS. The team clung to the analysis that the attack was aimed only at the southern tip and 'even after the attack had started in July it was only in the last 2 days that it became evident that the Serb objective was to overrun the whole enclave'.¹⁸⁴⁵ It must therefore be concluded that the JCOs, due in part to their limited operational freedom, knew little or nothing about the build-up of the VRS troops and the planned attack. There was constant uncertainty about the true aims of the VRS. Apparently the JCOs' headquarters had no additional information either.

Prior knowledge at UNHCR

In a report of 25 June the UNHCR representative examined the situation around Srebrenica in more depth. The population was starting to become worried by statements made by Karadzic about stopping the supplies to the enclave.¹⁸⁴⁶ The following day the director of the hospital in Srebrenica gave an interview to the Bosnian state broadcasting company. The director declared that if nothing was done within 14 days to improve supplies, the situation in Srebrenica would become disastrous. The policymakers in Pale could not have wished for a better confirmation that the Serb strategy of strangulation was working. The director mentioned the many rumours about military operations outside the borders of the enclave. ABiH troops had reportedly infiltrated in Han Pijesak; a Serb village had been burned down close to Milici; there was fighting around Vlasenica, and shelling of the enclave was expected. Dutchbat had warned the population not to gather at the marketplace.¹⁸⁴⁷

The UNHCR reports contain no further references to a planned attack. Nonetheless, according to an article written in 1997 by the UNHCR special envoy to the former Yugoslavia, José Maria Mendiluce, things were very clear.

¹⁸⁴³ Confidential information (1).

¹⁸⁴⁴ Corwin, Dubious Mandate, p. 130.

¹⁸⁴⁵ Confidential information (1).

¹⁸⁴⁶ MoD, CRST. UNHCR, Srebrenica to UNHCR, Zagreb, No. IN. 001, 25/06/95.

¹⁸⁴⁷ MoD, CRST. UNHCR, Belgrade to UNHCR, Zagreb, No. IN. 004, 26/06/95.

‘We knew what was going to happen in Srebrenica. Mladic was going to be more merciless than ever to get revenge for his setbacks. Only a fool couldn’t have seen it coming, or someone very badly informed. I don’t know whether General Janvier is a fool or very badly informed, but he is an accessory to this genocide’.¹⁸⁴⁸

The question is whether Mendiluce had this knowledge at the time or whether he first arrived at this viewpoint after the event; the latter seems more likely.

Prior knowledge held by Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF)

MSF was the only organization that heard the rumours that the VRS was busy preparing an attack. This is revealed by an MSF report of 27 June 1995. Important sources ‘close to the VRS said that the VRS might soon launch a large-scale offensive on Srebrenica with the intention of taking the entire enclave’.¹⁸⁴⁹ This report came one day after the ABiH attack on Visnjica.¹⁸⁵⁰ It was probably not passed on to Dutchbat or Zagreb UNPROFOR HQ. Since the actual order was first issued on 2 July, one might ask whether this MSF information was of a tactical or strategic nature. It is also unclear who the source in the VRS was.

Prior knowledge held by the ABiH

The ABiH claimed to have had prior knowledge. The commander of the 2nd Corps in Tuzla, General Sead Delic, claimed afterwards in an interview that the attack did not come as a surprise. The 2nd Corps, said Delic, had corresponding intelligence and warned Karremans, but he did not believe this.¹⁸⁵¹ It is strange, however, that no traces of this have been found in the Dutchbat reports. It is also strange that the reports of the 2nd Corps to the ABiH headquarters in Sarajevo also make no mention of this fact. On 3 July the Corps reported exclusively on the humanitarian situation in Srebrenica. There was an almost catastrophic shortage of food and the ABiH troops could not operate properly without enough food.¹⁸⁵² Moreover, the 8-page post-mortem analysis drawn up by the 2nd Corps for the ABiH headquarters in Sarajevo does not indicate any prior knowledge.¹⁸⁵³

The ABiH also sent reports to UNPROFOR, but there too, according to Delic, nothing was done about the Bosnian warnings.¹⁸⁵⁴ As described in Chapter 6, Sigint played an important role for the ABiH and reportedly provided important information. The most important monitoring stations were in Tuzla, Okresanica and Konjuh, operated by the Electronic Warfare unit of the 2nd Corps and the Sigint section of the Bosnian national security service. This latter section worked independently of the Electronic Warfare unit, but shared intelligence with it. The goal of these stations was to monitor and record the military radio traffic of the VRS. This was also carried out before, during and after the fall of Srebrenica, according to various testimonies for the Tribunal during the trial of General Krstic. Konjuh focussed chiefly on the Drina Corps and the general staff of the VRS.¹⁸⁵⁵

¹⁸⁴⁸ AICG call to indict General Janvier’, Bosnia Report, No. 1, November-December 1997, p. 4.

¹⁸⁴⁹ Archives MSF, Brussels. MSF Capsats, Message IN 481, 27/06/95.

¹⁸⁵⁰ MoD, DCBC, Box 66. Captain RNLAf P.C.J. Blonk, ‘Chronologisch overzicht Srebrenica 1 maart 1996 t/m 26 juli 1996, Stg. Geheim’ (Chronological overview of Srebrenica 1 March 1996 to 26 July 1996, Strictly Confidential), 11/07/96.

¹⁸⁵¹ Interview with Sead Delic, 10/03/99.

¹⁸⁵² ABiH, Tuzla. Archive 13-05-95, Report from 2nd Corps to HQ, no. 02-2-13-489, 03/07/95 and Report from 2nd Corps to HQ, unnumbered, 04/07/95.

¹⁸⁵³ ABiH, Tuzla, Archive 13-05-95, Report from 2nd Corps to HQ, Report of the events in Srebrenica for the General Staff of the ABiH in Sarajevo, Document No. 24, Draft Top Secret (8 pp.), 28/08/95.

¹⁸⁵⁴ Interview with Sead Delic, 09/03/99.

¹⁸⁵⁵ Overview of Court Proceedings, statements by 8 witnesses, 30/06/00 and 23/06/00, on: <http://www.un.org/icty/news/Krstic/Krstic-cp.htm>

The VRS's most important communications station was located on Mount Veliki Zep close to Han Pijesak. This communications tower had a wide range and, according to Bosnian military personnel, the Electronic Warfare unit had access to real-time intercepts and intelligence. In each case, it would seem that the ABiH in Tuzla was aware of the preparations. Lieutenant Colonel Semsudin Murinovic, as Deputy Commander responsible for security in the 24th Division of the ABiH, stated that the 2nd Corps had prior knowledge. About four months before the attack reports were already being sent to the headquarters in Sarajevo that 'something' was going to happen. This was indicated in particular by intercepts of VRS traffic. According to Murinovic it was chiefly Comint that betrayed this fact. The surface-to-air missiles at Srebrenica had to come from another area, and the instructions for their relocation were intercepted. All air defence resources were concentrated in Eastern Bosnia. Comint also showed that Mladic was seriously planning, in the event of continued air strikes, to take Dutchbat hostage and to expose the soldiers to the strikes.

Another Sigint expert, Captain Hazrudin Kistic, confirmed that thanks to Comint the 2nd Corps was informed well in advance.¹⁸⁵⁶ His unit intercepted real-time intercepts and intelligence from its base in Tuzla. On 3 June the ABiH received new indications that something was about to happen;¹⁸⁵⁷ this was after the attack on OP-E. General Sead Delic confirmed that intercepts of messages from Mladic showed that he was planning an attack.¹⁸⁵⁸ On the basis of Comint it was possible to report to Tuzla by the ABiH in the enclave about the results of the Muslim attack on Visnjica. A day later the army received an overview of the most important intercepts relating to this attack. The VRS wanted to track down the units involved in this attack and to this end sent special instructions to troops, codenamed 'yellow'.¹⁸⁵⁹ On 2 July Kistic discovered, through intercepts, the plans for an attack on Srebrenica: one week before the actual attack he had intercepted messages which incontrovertibly showed that the VRS was going to attack. This also indicated that the VRS was requesting logistical support and a large number of buses. The intercepts were of conversations between Krstic and his deputy; the operation was led from Prebicevac.¹⁸⁶⁰

The trial of Krstic showed that around 5 July the ABiH in Srebrenica and the 2nd Corps in Tuzla were informed about the planned military operations. Humint from the local population indicated that extra VRS units had arrived. ABiH reconnaissance groups discovered that these fresh units arrived in the afternoon of 5 July. The aim of the VRS operation was to cut the line of communication between Srebrenica and Zepa.¹⁸⁶¹

Some of the intercepts at the disposal of the Yugoslavia Tribunal had already been published by Mehmed Pargan in Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna. Pargan revealed that at the end of June the commander of the Drina Corps passed on to the local commander in Zvornik Mladic's instruction to prepare for the attack. Following initial reconnaissance, on 3 July the Drina Corps sent more than 40 vehicles, including buses and trucks, towards Srebrenica. The next day the Corps already had more than 1200 litres of fuel and four tanks were dispatched. On 6 July the logistical preparations were complete and the armbands were distributed.¹⁸⁶² In Pargan's article the transcriptions of the intercepts made of the attack by the 2nd Corps are printed. His account also indicates that the intelligence section in Kladanj closely followed the progress of the battle.

In short, the ABiH and the Bosnian security service seem to have been well-informed about the imminent attack, but also about the battle and the later murders. In this context one can also refer to the statements by Becirovic, who on 6 July told Dutchbat that the ABiH had observed the build-up by ¹⁸⁵⁶ Interview with Hazrudin Kistic, 17 and 18/05/99.

¹⁸⁵⁷ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. 28e Division to Section MV, 2nd Corps, No. 02-06-25/95, 06/06/95.

¹⁸⁵⁸ Interview with Sead Delic, 10/03/99.

¹⁸⁵⁹ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs. Section MV, 2nd Corps to 28th Division, No. 02/8-01-998, 27/06/95 and 02/8-01-1012, 28/06/95.

¹⁸⁶⁰ Interview with Hazrudin Kistic, 17 and 18/05/99.

¹⁸⁶¹ Rapport Butler, Srebrenica Military Narrative – Operation Krivaja 95, 15/05/00, pp. 950763 - 950764.

¹⁸⁶² Mehmed Pargan, 'B-H Army Eavesdropped on VRS', Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna, (FBIS translation), 11/07/98.

the VRS on 4 and 5 July but had not passed this information on. A reason for this was not given.¹⁸⁶³ The report drawn up by Butler for the Tribunal reveals that a report was indeed prepared by the 28th Division.¹⁸⁶⁴ It is unclear however what then happened to this ABiH report. Westerman and Rijs also reported that two weeks before the fall the Bosnian Intelligence Service had clear indications that the Bosnian Serbs were planning something. An elite Serb unit had been reported; unusually busy military traffic had been observed and intercepts revealed large deliveries of fuel.¹⁸⁶⁵

Despite this, one must seriously question all the aforementioned claims about prior knowledge of the attack on Srebrenica. To begin with, there were in fact no preparations that started weeks before. The planning for the operation only started on 2 July. Secondly, in Chapter 6 it has been shown that the Bosnian Muslims did not have real-time Sigint at their disposal. It thus seems probable that their knowledge of preparations was gained only after the event. After all, although there were Bosnian intercepts which show that it was possible to monitor VRS communications traffic, the Bosnian military or political leadership never shared these intercepts with UNPROFOR or the UN in New York.

The intercepts were however later provided to journalists and to the NIOD (directly and via the MIS). It is important to ask whether these were near-real-time or even real-time intercepts. If this was the case, then the Bosnian intercept operators listened in live to attack orders. Konjuh, Okresanica and Tuzla reported both to the 2nd Corps and to the ABiH headquarters in Sarajevo and to the higher political leadership. The Bosnian national security service in Okresanica reported chiefly to the political leaders of Bosnia.¹⁸⁶⁶ The fact that the Bosnian permanent representative to the UN was certainly not informed is revealed by statements by Sacirbey. On 10 July Sacirbey called Minister Voorhoeve with the news that Bihac was to be the next VRS target. He made no mention at all of the other eastern enclaves.¹⁸⁶⁷

Were real-time intercepts possible? As previously described, a simple calculation shows that the number of channels to be monitored multiplied by the required personnel was larger than the number of people available to process and report in near-real-time. The processing of the Comint was very slow and labour-intensive. Chapter 6 concluded that some telephone calls and VHF channels may have been monitored live, but that the large majority of the substantial VRS military communications traffic was recorded on tape and first analysed much later. Moreover, up to 6 July the VRS had maintained radio silence. As a result, much of the context was lost and VRS messages that were indeed intercepted in real time could never be placed in the correct context.

Reviewing the Bosnian Comint efforts, it can be concluded that the service responsible for Sigint was simply too small (ten people per monitoring station) and too poorly equipped to fulfil its mission adequately. When the attack started it is possible that a great deal was intercepted (mostly traffic via walkie-talkies), but there was not enough processing and analysis capability for these intercepts, and insufficient reporting of the intercepted messages. Intercepts were not processed in a computer, but written by hand in logbooks. Tapes of intercepts were re-used and almost no use was made of computers to process and disseminate the stream of information. Moreover, there were no Comint analysts working at the monitoring stations to analyse the intercepts and to evaluate its true value. In addition, there was a lack of fixed, secure communications links to the ABiH headquarters.

Moreover, there are no indications that the Bosnian services had analysis capabilities at the level of brigade, corps or higher to facilitate the swift integration of Comint with other intelligence, such as Humint. Even if the political will to publicize these dramatic intercepts had existed, this would still not have succeeded because the intelligence structure was not geared to this. The real-time intercepts were too fragmentary. In any case, the study of archives of Dutchbat, UNPROFOR, the MIS and of foreign

¹⁸⁶³ NIOD, Coll. Brantz, Diary Brantz, pp. 277, 281 and 284.

¹⁸⁶⁴ Rapport Butler, 'srebrenica Military Narrative – Operation Krivaja 95', 15/05/00, pp. 950764.

¹⁸⁶⁵ Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, pp. 209-210.

¹⁸⁶⁶ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁸⁶⁷ Diary Voorhoeve, p. 103.

archives, together with interviews, has not indicated that the ABiH shared intercepts with Dutchbat, UNPROFOR or Western intelligence services. General Delic is thus not correct in claiming that intercepts of Mladic already in June and July revealed he was planning an attack.

Another ABiH general claimed, however, that intercepts in real time did exist.¹⁸⁶⁸ This must however be doubted. If the Bosnian Muslims did indeed have real-time Comint, why did they not make use of it? According to a senior US intelligence official, it would have been the best public relations stunt of all time because the Muslims could have shouted 'bloody hell and murder'. The ABiH would never have missed this chance if they had had real-time intelligence. This official supposed that the ABiH simply did not have real-time capabilities.¹⁸⁶⁹ One must also ask why the ABiH, if it knew of the attack, did not pass on this knowledge to UNPROFOR or Western intelligence services. All available intelligence was actually passed on to UNPROFOR, according to Major Sefko Tihic, Head of Intelligence of 2nd Corps. Intelligence was passed on to SNE, but nothing was done with it there, according to Tihic. Supposedly it was estimated that the VRS wanted to take over all of Srebrenica and that June/July would be the best time for this. There were indicators, such as the relocation of surface-to-air missiles from the left bank to the right bank of the Drina.¹⁸⁷⁰ No proof has been found for this latter claim.

The diary of the Deputy Commander of Sector North East, Colonel C. Brantz, shows that officers of the ABiH did indeed regularly give indications that the developments around the enclave were being monitored closely. On 28 June, for instance, Brantz spoke to the Chief of Staff of the 2nd Corps, who showed on a map the place where ABiH reconnaissance units operated to monitor developments. They had established that increasing numbers of soldiers and amounts of equipment were being moved from Serbia to Srpska.¹⁸⁷¹ During this conversation the Chief of Staff was constantly informed by telephone of the situation around the enclave. But it was not until 6 July that Dutchbat heard anything from the ABiH about the build-up of the VRS on 4 and 5 July.¹⁸⁷² This is very late. If the 2nd Corps was already informed at an early stage, then why were no stronger warnings given to UNPROFOR? Various Bosnian Muslims claim that they did this but that they were not heeded. This is categorically denied by officials working at SNE and other staff at UNPROFOR.

Was it then, as Mehmed Pargan accused the 2nd Corps, a question of gross negligence and enormous passivity?¹⁸⁷³ Probably not: there was simply not enough real-time intelligence available. Interviewed ABiH military personnel continue to claim that the crucial intelligence was passed on. But UNPROFOR officials who would have been the recipients of this intelligence state that they never received it. Their statements are supported by the fact that little to nothing has been found in the UNPROFOR reports. Virtually nothing was found that could be interpreted as alarming information or explicit prior knowledge at the ABiH. According to Lieutenant Colonel Baxter the ABiH have never provided a snippet of intelligence to General Smith, his staff or the rest of UNPROFOR.¹⁸⁷⁴ In various other interviews with staff of foreign intelligence services, interviewees also denied that Bosnian intelligence had been received. In short, it must be concluded that the ABiH did not have prior tactical knowledge.

Prior knowledge at Sector North East (SNE) in Tuzla

The attack on the enclave came as a total surprise to the Norwegian Brigadier General Haukland, the commander in SNE. He went on leave on 25 June. At that moment some troop movements had been ¹⁸⁶⁸ Confidential information (71).

¹⁸⁶⁹ Confidential interview (54).

¹⁸⁷⁰ Interview with Sefko Tihic, 08/03/99.

¹⁸⁷¹ NIOD, Coll. CD-ROMs, Ziulich Mehmed to 28th Division, No. 06-05-171/95, 24/06/95.

¹⁸⁷² NIOD, Coll. Brantz, Diary Brantz, pp. 277, 281 and 284.

¹⁸⁷³ Mehmed Pargan, 'B-H Army Eavesdropped on VRS', Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna (FBIS translation), 11/07/98.

¹⁸⁷⁴ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

reported, but the reasons for these could only be guessed at. As said, it was not thought that these presaged an attack. There was no reason that the staff of SNE could see why Haukland's planned holiday leave should not go ahead. Following his return he discovered that Tuzla had known nothing. He doubted whether the ABiH had indeed known of the attack. If that had been the case, then Delic would have contacted him, but he never did this. The Norwegian did not receive any intelligence from UNPROFOR or NATO. His SNE was 'blindfolded in the dark'.¹⁸⁷⁵ In April 1995, for instance, the Sector command had submitted five requests to NATO for Imint, but NATO had refused to supply these.¹⁸⁷⁶ According to the British Lieutenant Colonel C.A. Le Hardy of SNE in Tuzla, his organization had insufficient priority at BHC in Sarajevo. When SNE sent documents to Sarajevo no answer was received. When Le Hardy paid a visit to BHC, no map of SNE could be found 'Outside Sarajevo we couldn't get BHC's attention for any case', he added critically. No intelligence was ever received from BHC.¹⁸⁷⁷

The attack also came as a great surprise to the Commander of the Danish tanks in Tuzla, Captain N. Petersen. In the preceding months he had never received any reports about a possible military build-up of the VRS. Just a few days before the attack he received reports about a troop build-up, supplied by the intelligence officer of the Swedish battalion. The final attack on Srebrenica was a major surprise. He immediately put his unit in the highest state of alert and started deploying his tanks over various defensive positions. If he had had any earlier indications, he would have taken these measures earlier too.¹⁸⁷⁸ The same went for the Commander of the Scandinavian battalion, Colonel G. Arlefalk.¹⁸⁷⁹

But according to the liaison officer of the 2nd Corps, Mehmed Suljkanovic, UNPROFOR was indeed informed. All available intelligence, according to him, was shared. Before the fall Suljkanovic also tried to make clear to the Deputy Commander of SNE, Colonel Brantz, that the matter was serious, but the latter attached little credibility to the reports.¹⁸⁸⁰ On 8 July it was still (rightly) assumed at SNE that the VRS did not plan to take the entire enclave. In line with this, in the evening of 8 July 1995 the Chief Political Officer of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, Phillip Corwin, received a telephone call from the Civil Affairs Officer in SNE, the American Ken Biser, who told him that the VRS planned to take over a few OPs in order to control the southern route. This would shorten the Serb supply line by about 60 kilometres. According to Biser the VRS did not appear to want to take the entire enclave 'since there are 50,000 Muslims in it and they wouldn't know what to do with them'.¹⁸⁸¹

What was known by Bosnia Hercegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo?

BHC not only had all UNPROFOR reports at its disposal, but also national intelligence. General Smith could call on the British intelligence services, and his own intelligence officer was an American. On 15 June the Office of the Regional Senior Military Observer in Sarajevo reported in a general, periodic assessment that the situation in Srebrenica was possibly the most threatening, compared with the two other eastern enclaves. According to this organization Mladic had instructed his VRS to conduct offensive operations. The VRS was reportedly concentrating troops around the enclave for this operation, or had already done this. Here too it was not expected that an attempt would be made to conquer the enclave, but possibly Mladic wanted to reduce the size in a first phase, or to better control ¹⁸⁷⁵ Interview with Hagrup Haukland, 03/05/99. Early in 1995 he received constant complaints about ABiH attacks from the enclave on Serb villages. Haukland then went to General Sead ('little') Delic and asked him to end these provocations. This was because the VRS retaliated with artillery and mortar bombardments on the population of the enclave. General Delic declared: 'I do not care'.

¹⁸⁷⁶ NIOD, Letter from Minister J. Pronk to NIOD, 29/05/01.

¹⁸⁷⁷ Interview with C.A. Le Hardy, 08/10/97.

¹⁸⁷⁸ Interview with N.E. Petersen, 29/10/99.

¹⁸⁷⁹ Interview with G. Arlefalk, 18/05/00.

¹⁸⁸⁰ Interview with Mehmed Suljkanovic, 18/05/99.

¹⁸⁸¹ NIOD, Coll. Clingendael. Note for the File, Drafter P. Corwin, 08/07/95.

the hills and mountains along the boundary, and might then aim to achieve the rest later in the summer.¹⁸⁸² It was clear that BHC was concerned. But it would be another matter if there had been hard indications at the end of June for a planned attack aimed at taking over the southern tip of the enclave.

General Smith stated that while he was in Sarajevo he had never received any prior indications, not from national military sources or intelligence channels either. In any case, he said, he received no British intelligence with any indication of a VRS attack. He consistently and categorically stated that he received nothing from MI6, DIS or GCHQ, because 'otherwise he would have done certain things differently'. In fact, Smith left Sarajevo for a short holiday during the fall of Srebrenica. He said that 'there were no forewarnings regarding an imminent attack on Srebrenica'. If any British intelligence was supplied, then it mostly regarded Gorazde, because that was indeed a national issue.¹⁸⁸³

This was confirmed by his military assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Baxter. Smith was dependent on the reports from Tuzla and the UNMOs. The American intelligence officer Brian Powers occasionally supplied something, and they also had a direct link to the British services. They did not have any direct access to US Imint. Photographs from UAVs first became available in August and September 1995. According to Baxter an attack on Gorazde was considered more likely. Baxter commented: 'In Sarajevo we had absolutely no intelligence about a build-up of the VRS around the enclaves.'¹⁸⁸⁴ Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, who was on Akashi's staff as a political adviser in 1994 and 1995, confirmed the expectation that Gorazde would be the next target.¹⁸⁸⁵ The Chief Political Officer of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, Phillip Corwin, also noted on 10 July 1995 in his diary that it was clear 'that our intelligence has been faulty'. Sarajevo expected a limited operation but, according to Corwin, 'we were dead wrong'.¹⁸⁸⁶

According to press reports UNPROFOR supposedly intercepted telephone calls which revealed the military organization of the offensive, in collaboration with the VJ, and the arrival of new troops and weapons from Serbia.¹⁸⁸⁷ This is not a credible statement, because UNPROFOR did not have its own interception capabilities. This information could, at the most, have been supplied by the one of the countries that had troops stationed in Bosnia but it is strange that this is not to be found in UNPROFOR documents. Another member of Smith's staff declared that no one at BHC believed that the VRS intended to conquer Srebrenica.¹⁸⁸⁸ The American intelligence officer in Sarajevo, Powers, was surprised too. According to the Dutch Lieutenant Colonel A. de Ruiter, at that time Military Assistant to the Chief of Staff of BHC and as someone who knew Powers well, the G-2 analyses were produced under the auspices of Powers. If US services had possessed any indications, then Powers certainly did not have this information at his disposal. No hard indications were available in Sarajevo.¹⁸⁸⁹ This was confirmed by the deputy military assistant, the Danish Major J.M. Wallin.¹⁸⁹⁰ The Canadian Lieutenant Colonel R. Hatton, operations officer in Sarajevo, admitted that things were 'cooking' around Srebrenica and Zepa; the frustration of the VRS was known and had been pointed out several times. But the intention of the VRS to take the enclave had never been clear.¹⁸⁹¹

¹⁸⁸² Confidential collection (5). RSMO's Periodical Assessment 16 May to 15 June 95, 15/06/95.

¹⁸⁸³ Interview with R.A. Smith, 12/01/00.

¹⁸⁸⁴ Interview with James Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁸⁸⁵ Interview with Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, 06/06/97.

¹⁸⁸⁶ Corwin, Dubious Mandate, p. 203.

¹⁸⁸⁷ 'AICG call to indict General Janvier', Bosnia Report, No. 1, November-December 1997, p. 3.

¹⁸⁸⁸ Confidential interview (56).

¹⁸⁸⁹ Interview with J.A.C. de Ruiter, 29/06/00.

¹⁸⁹⁰ Interview with J.M. Wallin, 28/10/99.

¹⁸⁹¹ Interview with Rick Hatton, 16/11/99.

The level of knowledge of Zagreb

The attack and conquest thus came as a surprise to BHC in Sarajevo. But did the UN headquarters in Zagreb have prior knowledge? Janvier had national French intelligence input at his disposal, with an US deputy intelligence officer who had national intelligence input. What warnings arrived one way or another in Zagreb? About a week before the attack on OP-E Janvier wrote down his Personal Directives for Smith. In his analysis Janvier concluded that the VRS had restored the balance and even held the advantage. Were the eastern enclaves a target for the VRS? According to Janvier there were two goals. The first was to neutralize UNPROFOR and secondly to achieve military goals which until now had been hindered by the presence of UNPROFOR. These goals included the complete isolation of the eastern enclaves. According to Janvier the situation there was exacerbated by Bosnian provocations in the form of attacks which then led to counter responses by the VRS. All that UNPROFOR could do was to remain alert and undertake initiatives without unnecessarily endangering its own troops.¹⁸⁹² This shows that Janvier did not reckon with a rapidly planned conquest of Srebrenica, but simply pointed out that the eastern enclaves could be in danger.

According to journalists Janvier is said to have been told about the VRS plans for an attack on the enclave at least two weeks in advance by the French Military Intelligence Service, the Direction du Renseignement Militaire (DRM). The DRM, just like the British ones, are said to have managed this without US intelligence. This French Comint was reportedly passed to Janvier in his capacity as French commander, not as commander of the UN forces.¹⁸⁹³ However, in view of the author's findings one can doubt this. On 27 June General Janvier wrote a 'Dear Rupert' letter to General Smith in which he mentioned a 'window of opportunity' for the peace process. This could however close again within three to four weeks. He would quickly arrange a meeting with Mladic. Gaining time and exercising patience was the most important thing at that moment.¹⁸⁹⁴ If Janvier had had specific prior knowledge (possibly from French national sources) then he would have surely have couched his letter in different terms and would have struck a more alarming tone. Others at the headquarters in Zagreb lacked this prior tactical knowledge as well. The Canadian Deputy Force Commander, Ashton, started the briefing for Akashi on 6 July 1995 with the words: 'overall a quiet day militarily'. During the fall Janvier was initially in Paris for discussions. It is clear that he would not have departed if he had had advance warning. Janvier discussed a wide range of questions, but in Paris that day Srebrenica was not on the agenda.¹⁸⁹⁵

General Ashton stated that the available intelligence did not indicate that an attack on Srebrenica was imminent.¹⁸⁹⁶ Zagreb was not aware of any attack because the reports generally related to the past 24 hours. Tony Banbury, who at that time was working in Zagreb as Political Affairs Officer for Akashi, confirmed that they knew nothing about it.¹⁸⁹⁷ This was corroborated by Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein. He pointed out that there was no 'early alarm'.¹⁸⁹⁸ The daily report sent by Akashi to New York also made no mention as yet of the bombardment of Srebrenica. The situation in Croatia, the Croat offensive in the Livno Valley and the increase in fighting around Bihac were the centres of attention. As was often the case, the situation in Sarajevo dominated the agenda of the morning briefing in Zagreb, together with a statement by the French Chief of Defence Staff, Admiral Lanxade: he wanted to use the Rapid Reaction Force to open a corridor for the withdrawal of the French troops

¹⁸⁹² Confidential collection (7), FC Janvier to General Smith, FC's Personal Directives to Unprofor Comd, File Ref. FC/95/0801, 29/05/95.

¹⁸⁹³ Andreas Zumach, 'Grosser Lauschangriff auf Srebrenica' (Major bugging operation for Srebrenica), in: Die Tageszeitung, 30/10/95 and Ian Bruce, 'Allies hamper inquiry', The Glasgow Herald, 01/12/95.

¹⁸⁹⁴ Confidential collection (7). Letter from Janvier to Smith, 27/06/95.

¹⁸⁹⁵ Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 parts, Paris 2001, Part 2, Audition de M. Jaen-Claude Mallet, 05/04/01.

¹⁸⁹⁶ Interview with Barry Ashton, 30/05/00.

¹⁸⁹⁷ Interview with Tony Banbury, 11/05/00.

¹⁸⁹⁸ Interview with Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, 06/06/97.

from Sarajevo, because they were at too much risk. Srebrenica was indeed mentioned in the Zagreb briefing, but only because UNHCR reported that it had heard from Bosnian sources that 13 people had died of hunger. UNHCR was however unable to confirm this.¹⁸⁹⁹ The Canadian Major David Last, Military Assistant to General Ashton, also emphasized that the attack came as a total surprise to Zagreb. Srebrenica was a low-profile point of attention, and an issue that was marked with a yellow and not a red flag. Zagreb needed to concentrate on much more urgent matters, and in this respect Srebrenica was only a minor issue.¹⁹⁰⁰ The same picture is provided by the diary of Emma Shitaka, personal assistant to Akashi in 1994-1995. On 7 July all she noted with regard to the Zagreb briefing was that Gorazde was of strategic importance. No attack on the enclave was expected. The VRS would try 'to reduce size of enclaves and cutting of humanitarian aid'.¹⁹⁰¹

At that time the intelligence section in Zagreb was led by the Swede Svensson and his military assistant Ljunggren. Their diary notes reveal that on 11 July they still expected that the VRS would not take the entire enclave. When that actually happened, it came as a total surprise to Zagreb. The two Swedes noted that the French officer General Andre Soubirou held a briefing that morning in the Zagreb headquarters in which he declared that the VRS wanted a stronger hold on the enclave. Soubirou did not expect the VRS to conduct a major attack with infantry. Mladic needed these troops in Sarajevo and the VRS would mostly attack Srebrenica with artillery. But at that moment the enclave had already fallen. Both Swedes came to the conclusion afterwards, on the basis of all available information, that Srebrenica was a retaliation for the ABiH hit and run operations conducted from the enclave, the use of Close Air Support and the creation of the Rapid Reaction Force.¹⁹⁰² However, Srebrenica did not remain a topic on the agenda for long. Major Last noted in his diary at 4 pm on 12 July that all attention had shifted to the Croats and the Krajina.¹⁹⁰³

Officials who worked for the intelligence staff in Zagreb were later to declare that information was withheld by the Americans. Their claims were, however, fiercely disputed by US and European intelligence officials. According to them The US Deputy G-2, Morgan, had indeed direct access to all US intelligence, but there was no prior knowledge of the assault. Up to the last moment, according to an UNPROFOR official who worked in Zagreb at the time, Morgan and others remained convinced that the VRS planned only to take the southern part of the enclave.¹⁹⁰⁴

The fact that also the US military establishment was taken by surprise can be deduced from a later analysis. The document was drawn up by the wholly US Joint Analysis Center in Molesworth in the United Kingdom, the final destination of all available intelligence from various (inter)national channels, and gives an overview of the event. The analysis of the operation notes that the VRS attack 'runs counter to what has been expected of them for several years'. Normally pressure was exerted only on the borders of the enclave to take control of the high ground. No attempt to attack the entire enclave or the town was expected, due to the number of soldiers needed for house-to-house fighting. The US Joint Analysis Center in Molesworth thought that the VRS had insufficient infantry and that the ABiH would be too strong. In retrospect it was supposed that ABiH units had departed at the end of June and that those who remained behind had insufficient courage and fortitude to put up a long and determined resistance.¹⁹⁰⁵

The British intelligence cell in Sarajevo also had no insights whatsoever into the true intentions of the VRS. In fact, consultation took place between G-2, Zagreb and the British cell in Sarajevo, but ¹⁸⁹⁹ NIOD, Coll. Banbury. Diary Banbury, 06/07/95 and UNNY, DPKO coded cables. Code Cables Akashi to Annan, No. Z-1104, 06/07/95 and Janvier to Annan, No. Z-1111, 06/07/95.

¹⁹⁰⁰ Interview with David Last, 05/07/00.

¹⁹⁰¹ Interview with Emma Shitaka, 11/05/00.

¹⁹⁰² Interview with Jan-Inge Svensson and Ingmar Ljunggren, 04/11/99.

¹⁹⁰³ Interview with David Last, 05/07/00.

¹⁹⁰⁴ Confidential interview (54) and confidential information (80).

¹⁹⁰⁵ Confidential collection (4), JAC Analysis Balkan Crisis Group to Capt Theunens, 14/07/95. Also: Interview with General George Joulwan, 08/06/00.

BHC also had no indications of VRS goals beyond the southern tip of the enclave.¹⁹⁰⁶ The US ambassador in Zagreb, Peter Galbraith, also stated that he had not seen any intelligence about the attack.¹⁹⁰⁷ The operations officer in Zagreb, the Danish officer Colonel K. Bache, could only surmise at a possible attack. He expected that the VRS would respond to the ABiH's nightly hit and run operations. The VRS could no longer summon the patience and wanted to put an end to this. He also made the following observation. Zagreb was totally dependent for its decision-making on the reports supplied by Sarajevo. And this was precisely the problem: in General Smith's perspective Zagreb was a long way away. Little information arrived from Sarajevo. According to Bache Zagreb was completely 'out of touch with the events in SNE' due in part to the relationship between Janvier and Smith: 'they did not like each other'. The attack on Srebrenica ultimately came as a great surprise to Zagreb.

Bache's diary and that of Tony Banbury clearly show that the possibility of an attack on Srebrenica did not once appear on the agenda of the daily briefings.¹⁹⁰⁸ Colonel Harm de Jonge, who attended all crisis meetings in Zagreb, also confirmed that the attack came unexpectedly.¹⁹⁰⁹ The reports of the Senior Staff Meetings chaired by Akashi and the Force Commander give the same picture. A study of the reports from 30 June to 12 July indicates that Srebrenica received almost no attention in Zagreb and that the VRS build-up was completely overlooked.¹⁹¹⁰

All official documents, diaries and interviews indicate that the VRS intentions remained unclear right up to the last moment and up to the very highest level of UNPROFOR. The records of the daily council between Akashi and Janvier in Zagreb shows that even when the enclave had already fallen into the hands of the VRS, there was still uncertainty about the intentions of the Bosnian Serbs. On 12 July an Interoffice memorandum from the Zagreb intelligence section provided an estimate of the VRS intentions. This update was based on the events of the previous day. Two options were noted; a limited VRS operation to take a firmer hold on the enclave, to minimize the ABiH activities, to free troops, to take hold of the black market in the enclave and to further increase the pressure; or conquest of the enclave. The reasons for the second option were the same as the first, plus to test how far UNPROFOR was prepared to respond seriously and to send a strong signal to the ABiH. The VRS showed in this way that it was still able to carry out such operations. The bombardments in the north of the enclave 'point to VRS intentions to collapse the Enclave further'. Possibly the events around Sarajevo had led to a decision to free troops more quickly, and this 'now outweighs the political bargaining value of the enclaves'. If Mladic wanted Srebrenica, then it was expected that Zepa would soon follow. The VRS might leave Gorazde alone.¹⁹¹¹ An 'after action analysis' by the G-2 Staff in Zagreb also shows that no tactical prior knowledge was present. This document kept to the view that, in the short term, the VRS would continue to concentrate on the strategy of strangulation and the use of the 'humanitarian weapon' instead of launching major operations. The conquest had created a totally new situation.¹⁹¹² To summarize: there are no indications that senior military and political officials of UNPROFOR in Zagreb had any knowledge of the troop build-up around the enclave. Officials in Tuzla, Sarajevo and Zagreb were totally in the dark as to the intentions of the VRS.¹⁹¹³ But did the same go for New York too?

¹⁹⁰⁶ Confidential interview (45).

¹⁹⁰⁷ Interview with Peter Galbraith, 23/06/99.

¹⁹⁰⁸ Interview with K. Bache, 29/10/99.

¹⁹⁰⁹ Harry Meijer, 'Voor VN kwam aanval onverwachts' (Attack came as surprise to UN), NRC Handelsblad, 27/07/95 and interview with J.H. de Jonge, 27/09/99.

¹⁹¹⁰ UNNY, ICFY, Archive FC, Senior Staff Meetings, 30/06/95-14/07/95.

¹⁹¹¹ Confidential collection (4). G-2 UNPF HQ, Update: Assessment on Srebrenica enclave – VRS intentions, G-2 Rick Morgan (drafter Capt. Theunens) to COS, 12/07/95 and G-2 UNPF HQ, 'BIH Hostile Attitude towards Unprofor', G-2 Rick Morgan (drafter R. Theunens) to COS, 12/07/95.

¹⁹¹² Confidential collection (4). G-2 UNPF HQ, Srebrenica: the Aftermath, G-2 Rick Morgan (drafter Capt. Theunens) to COS, 13/07/95.

¹⁹¹³ See also: Westerman & Rijs, Het Zwartste Scenario, p. 148.

The UN headquarters in New York

The headquarters of the UN did not have its own intelligence channels. As described earlier, the headquarters had a ‘situation centre’, which included a special cell with representatives of the intelligence services of the five permanent members of the Security Council. Intelligence was provided to the Secretary-General, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) and specially selected officials. Within the DPKO, not everyone at the highest level received intelligence from all services. Some received intelligence from the Russian foreign intelligence service but not from Western services. The CIA sometimes supplied Imint and the British mostly Humint. But this special cell too received no intelligence about Srebrenica.¹⁹¹⁴ The report of the informal consultation with the members of the Security Council held on 3 July 1995 indicates that no major military operation was expected. The eastern enclaves were not even mentioned.¹⁹¹⁵ The Canadian General M. Baril, the Canadian Chief of Defence Staff and former Senior Military Adviser to the Secretary-General of the UN, had no forewarning either. However, it did not surprise him that Srebrenica fell. Very laconically he remarked: ‘If deterrence works, it works, if not, not.’¹⁹¹⁶

In other words, senior policymakers and the UN headquarters in New York had no relevant intelligence. Akashi declared that he did not have intelligence and had no knowledge of the Bosnian Serb plans. ‘If any government had such reports, they were not shared with the UN.’ Akashi did not know whether Mladic aimed for the fall of the enclave right from the start. Perhaps the VRS general was an opportunist who, when he realized that no resistance was being offered, pressed on. ‘NATO may have had intelligence’, but Akashi did not wish to comment on press reports to this effect. He had earlier asked for intelligence reports on Rwanda and Zaire, and then received documents of foreign origin on a non-attributable basis. He had never received anything about Srebrenica.¹⁹¹⁷

It should be noted that Akashi, of course, was speaking figuratively rather than literally. For example, during the month of June alone, Srebrenica was reported on in the Zagreb Defense Information Summary on 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 20, 25, 26, 28, 29. Akashi and his staff were the primary consumer of this report, along with the Force Commander and his staff. Of these 18 reports on Srebrenica, none predicted the imminent collapse of the enclave. Presumably Akashi was referring to any predictive intelligence which spoke unequivocally of the collapse of the Srebrenica enclave. The deputy G-2 Morgan personally briefed Mr. Akashi on 29 June, covering the overall theatre situation. His intelligence brief covered the following strategic issues: Croatia: 1) polarization of factions over Krajina; 2) Sector east update. Bosnia: 1) Summer long VRS campaign expected to focus on north-south lines of communication as well as stabilizing the Posavina Corridor. 2) emerging tactical confidence on part of the ABiH. 3) Parallels between factions in BiH and VRS. However, no predictive intelligence of an attack on the Srebrenica enclave (or any enclaves) was broached, but anticipation of a summer-long VRS offensive was discussed. Not only was this anticipated for some time, and it was the usual pattern for summertime warfare in Bosnia and Croatia. Additionally, VRS strategists recognized that without substantial gains in the summer of 1995, any negotiated settlement would be that much more disadvantageous to the Serbs. However, a major problem with Akashi was also that he was not very often available. The US Deputy G-2 personally tried to brief Akashi as often as possible whenever his schedule would permit, which was not terribly often. Akashi did receive genuine all-source briefings during the tenure of the US intelligence official in Zagreb.¹⁹¹⁸

At the time Annan had put critical questions to Akashi about the ignorance of Zagreb and what was ‘provided to UNPROFOR by those troop-contributing nations with intelligence-gathering assets in the area’? He had also stated: ‘I find it difficult to accept that no “early warning” was possible when the ¹⁹¹⁴ Confidential interview (58).

¹⁹¹⁵ UNNY, DPKO. Coded cables. Annan to Akashi, No. MSC 2182, 03/07/95.

¹⁹¹⁶ Interview with Maurice Baril, 21/12/99.

¹⁹¹⁷ Interview with Y. Akashi, 29/11/99.

¹⁹¹⁸ Confidential information (80).

evidence suggests that a major build-up of troops and heavy weapons by the VRS occurred prior to the offensive.¹⁹¹⁹ Akashi declared that the possibilities for monitoring the military activities of the VRS, apart from static OPs, were very limited. The exchange of national intelligence between countries was governed by bilateral treaties to which the UN was not party. Sometimes local ambassadors or national contingents supplied extra information, but this did not happen in the case of Srebrenica. Furthermore, Akashi had received no additional intelligence relating to Zepa and Gorazde. Akashi continued with the notable statement: 'It would not be appropriate for us to attempt, at our level, to improve access to national intelligence.'¹⁹²⁰ In fact one might have expected just the opposite. In view of the threatening situation for the other enclaves and the fate of the refugees, an order to gather extra intelligence would have been highly defensible.

A week later Akashi returned to Annan's questions. The general issue of the availability of intelligence and the problems with its dissemination were complex and required separate treatment. Some countries had access to a 'very large pool of detailed tactical and strategic intelligence'. After all, Yugoslavia was an object of interest for all intelligence services. A part of the intelligence gathered by the leading troop contributors was Sigint. This was 'the most jealously guarded of all intelligence products'. In the case of the US, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand this was arranged through agreements and 'sharing outside this agreement is simply not possible', according to Akashi. This is not correct: it is permitted to share national intelligence products. He mentioned that special arrangements had been created for senior officers to receive intelligence support from their national governments, but this exchange was 'so surrounded by national caveats that it takes considerable effort and ingenuity to make use of it in any multi-national activity'. This led to unavoidable tensions which could better be solved among the military. After all, they were used to such problems.

Akashi recommended Annan to review, when times were quieter, whether new mechanisms for the operational aspects of peacekeeping should be created within the UN; these could serve the task of gathering national intelligence to be made available to a special secure information unit¹⁹²¹ at the New York headquarters. Akashi concluded with the following observation: 'For the moment enquiries here suggest that with the current group of TCNs [Troop Contributing Nations] and the support of NATO the flow of intelligence is as efficient, timely, and detailed as it can be within the constraints of individual perceived national security considerations.'¹⁹²² It is not clear who prompted Akashi to say this, but this conclusion certainly did not apply to all the troop-contributing countries at that moment. In June 1996 Akashi repeated in a conversation with Dutch Foreign Minister Van Mierlo that Janvier 'did not have the US intelligence and in fact had insufficient insights into the intentions of the Serbs'.¹⁹²³

Annan later complained to the Netherlands Permanent Representative at the UN about the fact that 'the UN was not given intelligence available to some allies about the imminent Serb attack'. Game-playing had been widespread. He referred to an article that had earlier been published in Time about a deal between the US and Milosevic, whereby the Serbs could take over the enclaves and the Croats the western part of Bosnia.¹⁹²⁴ And during a meeting of the NATO Council at which Annan was a guest, he had declared that Srebrenica had involved an intelligence failure. At that time he had given no further explanation.¹⁹²⁵ So, New York was in the dark too.¹⁹²⁶

¹⁹¹⁹ Confidential collection NIOD (7). Annan to Akashi, 'situation in Srebrenica', No. 2280, 11/07/95.

¹⁹²⁰ UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 239, File 6/15. Akashi to Annan, Z-1147, 12/07/95.

¹⁹²¹ Akashi was apparently still unable to utter the word 'intelligence'.

¹⁹²² UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 139, File Crypto Fax In 46. Akashi to Annan, Z-1189, 18/07/95.

¹⁹²³ MoD, DCBC. Van Mierlo to PR New York, No. 183, 07/06/96.

¹⁹²⁴ MoD, DCBC. PVVN Biegan to Foreign Affairs, No. 389, 05/06/96.

¹⁹²⁵ NMFA, PVNATO. Feith to Foreign Affairs, No. 1467, 03/11/95.

¹⁹²⁶ See also: United Nations, Srebrenica Report, 15/11/99, §486, p. 143.

Who did have prior knowledge? In 4 July 1995 in Belgrade, Vladimir Matovic, the former adviser to President Cosic, heard from his foreign ‘political friends’ that something was going on near Srebrenica. He did not wish to reveal who these friends were. He called political sympathizers in Pale, but they knew nothing. On 7 July local newspapers wrote that the VRS was going on the offensive. Matovic knew nothing. ‘His friends’ had told him on 4 July that an attack was imminent, but advisors of Karadzic and Mladic in Pale said (after Matovic contacted them) this was not the case. Who should be believed? He later realized that people outside Mladic’s circle did indeed know nothing.¹⁹²⁷ If Matovic’s claims are true, then the VRS army command was the only group to be aware of what was coming. This can also be deduced from a conversation with Dragan Milovanovic, who at that time had already been a war photographer for eight years. A woman had told him that two days before the attack women in Bratunac noticed that something was about to happen. Mladic had told local military personnel that they should reveal nothing of what they were doing, not even to their mothers and wives. Milovanovic found this striking, because other Serb attacks had generally been discussed long and openly beforehand.¹⁹²⁸

In Belgrade, however, politicians responded to the events with incredulity. The Canadian diplomat Dennis Snider, who worked at the Canadian embassy, experienced this for himself. According to him the mood in Belgrade was one of disbelief. The hunting of the column of men on the route to Tuzla was understandable, but not the later executions. Most of the people he talked to found this hard to accept. General Momcilo Perisic¹⁹²⁹ of the VJ apparently did know of the attack. He told the Canadian diplomat that he knew of a ‘significant force to Srebrenica’. Officers of the VJ were stationed at the headquarters in Han Pijesak and regular officers of the VJ constantly accompanied Mladic.¹⁹³⁰ The question is whether he had informed Milosevic of this. An interview with Rajko Dukic, who talked to Milosevic after the fall of the enclave, indicates that the president was indeed surprised. The president had asked the group of persons that included Dukic ‘which idiot’ had taken the decision to attack Srebrenica. According to the president the enclave would have bled dry or have become depopulated anyway. Milosevic then drew a comparison with letting water flow away over a plank of wood. According to Dukic the struggle for prestige between Mladic and Karadzic also played a role. Mladic needed a success.¹⁹³¹

6. Did The Hague have prior knowledge?

According to staff of the MIS, they never received hard intelligence from sister services which warned of an attack. One of the sources from which intelligence might have been obtained was NATO. Reports were sent daily from the Deployed Shed Facility (DSF) in Naples. The DSF was an intelligence cell operated by several member states (including the Netherlands). It should be stated again: NATO has no intelligence capabilities of its own apart from AWACS, and is totally dependent on the intelligence supplied by the member states. If a tactical warning had been available then it would have been very likely to have arrived through NATO channels. An analysis of the reports, which the NIOD was able to access gives the picture described below.

The Balkan Intelligence Summary by the purely US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth on 6 June, i.e. shortly before Karremans’ ‘alarm warning’, predicted for the next 24 to 96 hours that the VRS might possibly increase its military activities on the line of confrontation in Bihac, but not elsewhere. Such a development was not expected in SNE. Only certain OPs would come under heavier ¹⁹²⁷ Interview with Vladimir Matovic, 16/12/00.

¹⁹²⁸ Interview with Dragan Milovanovic, 17/12/99.

¹⁹²⁹ Perisic was later accused for working for the CIA. ‘Court Postpones Spy Trial of Former Yugo Army Chief’, Reuters, 24/12/02.

¹⁹³⁰ Interview with Dennis Snider, 17/11/99.

¹⁹³¹ Interview with Rajko Dukic, 14/06/00.

paramilitary pressure, now that the Arkan Tigers had been reported in Bratunac at the end of May.¹⁹³² In a memorandum for the period 8 to 9 June, and sent on 10 June by the DSF, the military developments were noted but no predictions of a conquest of the enclave were made.¹⁹³³ After this time things were comparatively quiet, but at the start of July tensions rose again. The Balkan IntSum for 2 July made no mention of preparations.¹⁹³⁴ The summary for 6 July noted the outbreak of fighting. For the next 24 to 96 hours it was predicted that warfare activities in Bosnia would be increased, because the ABiH would undertake new sorties around Sarajevo and the Majevica hills. No indications could be found that the VRS planned to launch an attack.¹⁹³⁵

A 'Cosmic Top Secret Bohemia' report in a Balkan Intelligence Summary on 8 June noted that fighting around Srebrenica was escalating. It was expected that the VRS would try to reduce the size of the enclave.

'However, this course of action had been forecast for several months. The VRS would probably shift forces from other areas before totally reducing any of the eastern enclaves. Such a VRS move could potentially be risky given the ABiH pressure in such areas as Sarajevo'.¹⁹³⁶

Once again there is no prediction whatsoever of a major attack. Rather, in fact, it contains the expectation that such an attack would not take place. Another analysis concluded that the intensification of fighting was a consequence of the local military situation and the conflict around Sarajevo. It seemed that the VRS goals were limited, aimed at reducing the ABiH defence line and not at conducting a general assault. If the VRS was successful, however, and the number of Serb casualties remained low and the ABiH intensified the fighting around Sarajevo and Bihac, then the VRS might possibly expand its operations and could thereby take the enclave.¹⁹³⁷ On 9 July it was predicted for the next 24 to 96 hours that the VRS would continue the attacks in order to neutralize the ABiH. A report of the latest military developments was made, in which it was concluded that the VRS would do all it could 'to avoid involvement with UNPROFOR troops'. It was expected that the relationship between the ABiH and Dutchbat would seriously deteriorate as a result of the death of the Dutch soldier R. van Renssen.¹⁹³⁸ He was killed by an ABiH soldier. Another NATO report, drawn up on 10 July, still did not expect that the VRS would take the entire enclave. The true intentions of the Bosnian Serbs remained unclear right up to the last moment.¹⁹³⁹

During telephone calls on 9 and 10 July Mladic assured Janvier that he did not intend to attack the enclave. On this basis it was concluded that the VRS had successfully carried out a limited attack to gain possession of the bauxite mines to the south of the town.¹⁹⁴⁰ On 10 July the US Chargé d'Affaires in Zagreb discussed the situation in Srebrenica with Akashi and Janvier. The Japanese diplomat declared that following consultations with Major General Herve Gobilliard (the French commander Sector Sarajevo), Janvier and himself on 9 July a warning had been sent to Mladic. It was demanded of Mladic that the offensive be halted and that the VRS withdraw 'to the perimeter of the demilitarized zone as delineated by the Morillon agreement of 8 May 1993'. Akashi threatened the use of air power. Although Mladic had not yet responded, Akashi believed that the suspension of the offensive by the VRS was a 'strong sign' that the warning had been received. In an American commentary it was remarked that this comment was totally opposed to a statement by an adviser to Akashi that the VRS

¹⁹³² Confidential information (64).

¹⁹³³ Confidential information (65).

¹⁹³⁴ Confidential information (66).

¹⁹³⁵ Confidential information (67).

¹⁹³⁶ Confidential information (68).

¹⁹³⁷ DCBC, Box 66. Balkan Intsum, Nato Secret, No. CT9507072217270, 07/07/95.

¹⁹³⁸ Confidential information (69).

¹⁹³⁹ Confidential information (70).

¹⁹⁴⁰ Confidential information (182).

offensive was stopped before the ultimatum. An US diplomat later spoke to one of Akashi's political advisers, John Almstrom. He recounted that the offensive with 100 to 200 soldiers had been halted at 1pm. Janvier had sent the warning to Mladic at 6pm but, Almstrom remarked that 'it was not an ultimatum'. Since no deadline had been set, no answer had been received until then. Almstrom was surprised that the VRS had attacked from just one side, had used such a small force and had suddenly stopped its advance for no apparent reason. He concluded that the VRS simply wanted to exert pressure and did not plan to take Srebrenica: 'Perhaps the worst is over.'¹⁹⁴¹

Janvier declared later that in view of the small size of the VRS force he did not expect that the VRS would try to take Srebrenica or one of the other enclaves. 'What would they do with them if they did?' he wondered. Janvier regarded the action more as a signal to Sarajevo to show what the VRS was capable of. Furthermore the VRS offensive could in part be prompted by recent ABiH sorties in which a Serb village had been destroyed.¹⁹⁴² This shows that Janvier was not aware that on the evening of 9 July Mladic had decided to take the entire enclave. This is also indicated by the diary entries of the military assistant to the deputy FC, Major David Last. On 9 July at 11pm a further briefing took place in Zagreb. The US intelligence officer Morgan informed those present that the VRS was not aiming to cause the collapse of the enclave: 'The BSA [VRS] was moving from the West'. The ABiH was responsible for the tense situation due to the sorties from the enclave: 'This incident was triggered by the ABiH attacks.' The events were local, but tank bombardments had taken place in Zepa and the crisis could well start there too.

A briefing for Janvier was held on 10 July at 10am. Last noted in his diary that it was around mid-morning that Zagreb began to fear the worst. They still had no idea of the VRS aims. 'BSA [VRS] is unworldly in their logic.' On 10 July at around 3pm Zagreb began to suspect that Srebrenica would fall. The deputy G-2, Commander Morgan, reported that the attack had originally been a local initiative but had now become VRS policy. It was only on 11 July at 11am that Janvier realized that the issue at stake was the conquest of the entire enclave. Until then two options had constantly been applied: a limited attack or the conquest of the enclave. It was not yet clear in Zagreb which option was being followed. Late in the morning of 11 June Janvier concluded that the attack was aimed at the entire enclave.¹⁹⁴³ Lieutenant Colonel Baxter, the military assistant to General Smith, passed on the latest intelligence at 4.50pm. Dutchbat had withdrawn to Potocari, where more than 20,000 Displaced Persons had gathered. The NATO liaison officer announced that the situation was very poor and 'the enclave was lost'.¹⁹⁴⁴

On 10 July the situation in Srebrenica was discussed during informal consultations in the Security Council. The representative of the Secretary-General, C. Gharekhan, briefed the members about the latest developments. He reported that the ABiH had attacked a Dutch APC. According to Albright the Security Council should first have additional information before conclusions could be drawn. In response to her question about Close Air Support, Gharekhan stated that the commanders on the ground could request this if their troops were endangered. He declared, nota bene, that 'there had not yet been any requests for close air support'.¹⁹⁴⁵ If Gharekhan really said this on 10 July, then it would seem that he informed the Security Council wrongly. Indeed, earlier on that day Karremans had already made various CAS requests.

In the Balkan IntSum of the JAC at Molesworth on 10 July it was reported that air strikes had been threatened if the VRS continued with attacks. The prediction for the next 24 to 96 hours was that the VRS attack on Srebrenica and Zepa would be continued with a possible escalation around Zepa. In an analysis the JAC concluded that despite the threats it was unlikely that air strikes were imminent above all because the VRS had taken Dutch soldiers hostage. Boutros Ghali had spoken out in support ¹⁹⁴¹ Confidential information (71).

¹⁹⁴² Confidential information (72).

¹⁹⁴³ MoD, DAB. Notes of the meeting regarding the fall of Srebrenica, 01/11/95.

¹⁹⁴⁴ Interview with David Last, 02/07/00.

¹⁹⁴⁵ Confidential information (73).

of the use of air power, but since final approval still lay with Akashi, and in the light of previous UN reactions, the threat of air strikes presumably remained ‘a hollow one’. The VRS knew this and this was why the Dutch had been taken hostage.¹⁹⁴⁶ In a Cosmic Top Secret Bohemia report by the Combined Air Operations Centre (CAOC) in Vicenza on 11 July, all the developments were summarized. The attack had been interrupted for some time. The VRS had now set an ultimatum that UNPROFOR and the ABiH should depart, leaving behind their weapons and equipment. Even now, no mention was made of the intention to take the enclave as a whole.¹⁹⁴⁷ In the Balkan IntSum of 11 June, however, it was noted that the VRS now controlled Srebrenica. For the coming 24 to 48 hours it was predicted that more UNPROFOR soldiers and UNMOs would become hostages or targets. The VRS operation could well be the start of a new (either planned or ad hoc) strategy. The aim could be twofold: force the Bosnian Muslims to accept Bosnian Serb conditions for peace negotiations and/or the elimination of the eastern enclaves (‘always a thorn in their side’). In addition it would release troops for other purposes.¹⁹⁴⁸

An analysis by JAC Molesworth on 11 July noted that the attack ‘runs counter to what has been expected of them for several years’. The VRS had encountered little resistance and had conquered more territory than expected. After Srebrenica the focus turned to Zepa and Gorazde. It was also expected that the VRS would pressure the population to leave the town and to head for the surrounding hills and villages or to go to Zepa. This stream of refugees would cause a humanitarian crisis, by which the VRS could achieve one or possibly two goals. First of all, Srebrenica was no longer a military factor. Secondly Sarajevo would be forced to the negotiating table. In the meantime 400 Dutch soldiers could be used as hostages against possible air strikes. ‘It is basically a no-lose situation for the Bosnian Serbs’, according to JAC, Molesworth. If Sarajevo did not wish to negotiate, then the VRS had at least eliminated the enclave and the Serb army would switch its attention to Zepa. The story would be repeated and once again the VRS might manage to achieve its earlier goals: elimination of Zepa and force Sarajevo to negotiate. If this once again failed to work, then it would be Gorazde’s turn. Although the ABiH was stronger in Gorazde, the VRS would have new troops (about ten brigades) at its disposal.¹⁹⁴⁹

Intelligence briefings at NATO in Brussels in the days after the fall were confined to the actual course of the battle around Srebrenica. No attempts were made to predict VRS strategy. It was thought unlikely that the VRS was carrying out a coordinated attack on the eastern enclaves, or that the conquest of Srebrenica had been ordered by the high command.¹⁹⁵⁰ In short, it can be concluded that no intelligence reached the MIS that indicated an attack. But was intelligence possibly received in a bilateral context? And how did the MIS actually analyse the situation?

The Military Intelligence Service and the attack on Srebrenica

As earlier described, the information situation of the Military Intelligence Service of the Central Organization (MIS/CO) and the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army (MIS/Army) was not a unique or special one. Analyses by the MIS/Army made following the fall of OP-E regarding a possible VRS attack went no further than the supposition that the VRS could continue to take over OPs and that the ABiH would try to increase the tension through provocation, resulting in bombardment of ABiH positions and possibly of civilian targets.¹⁹⁵¹ This analysis was confirmed a few days later: a repeat of the scenario that had been applied during the taking of OP-E was possible, but as long as the hostage crisis was not solved, this would be unwelcome to the ¹⁹⁴⁶ Confidential information (74).

¹⁹⁴⁷ Confidential information (75).

¹⁹⁴⁸ Confidential information (76).

¹⁹⁴⁹ Confidential information (77).

¹⁹⁵⁰ Confidential information (168).

¹⁹⁵¹ MoD, MIS/Army. INTSUM 107/95, 07/06/95.

leadership of the Republika Srpska for political reasons, according to an analyst. If the VRS should nonetheless take action, then this would probably be confined to OPs; occupation of large sections of the enclave was thought unlikely for the time being.¹⁹⁵² At the end of June the MIS/army did not expect any major changes in the positions of the warring factions.¹⁹⁵³

A briefing by the MIS/Army on 5 July dealt with the chances of an attack. Which advantages and disadvantages could this have for the VRS? One reason to attack was that the VRS needed a success that could not be achieved elsewhere. Furthermore, this could be conducted with relatively little effort and without many casualties on its own side. Moreover, the VRS would then have a free hand in Eastern Bosnia and could significantly shorten the line of confrontation. A disadvantage was that the Bosnian Serbs would be seen as the guilty party and the Americans would urge reprisals. There were a variety of reasons not to attack. The ABiH in Gorazde was strong and well-organized. Zepa, in contrast to Gorazde, did not provide any improvement to road and river communications. The analysts believed that Srebrenica could indeed be taken in a relatively short time, but that the VRS would have to make considerable sacrifices to do it. It was easier to work for collapse from within. Moreover, the enclave could be taken piece by piece.

It was already possible to use the southern road following the taking of OP-E. From April 1993 onwards the road lay on VRS territory with the exception of a small section at OP-E. The bauxite mine was also in VRS hands, but lay within reach of the ABiH. Taking the entire enclave could be attractive in that it would provide a good north-south route. If the VRS decided to take apart the enclave piece by piece, then considerable difficulties could be expected with the ABiH. The Muslims could isolate OPs, use UN troops as a shield or kill a number of UN soldiers and then give the VRS the blame. The ABiH could attack Dutchbat to gain heavier weapons, or isolate the battalion by surrounding it with civilians. This could be organized in a few hours and would render Dutchbat immobile.¹⁹⁵⁴ The MIS/Army briefing thus did not give indications of an attack, even though a certain predictive value could not be denied.

The MIS/Army therefore did not have prior knowledge. The intelligence section of the Army Crisis Staff had its suspicions, but it never expressed these out loud. In the daily briefings it constantly stuck to the MIS/Army analysis. All parties involved thought that the attack was aimed at the southern road and the adjacent bauxite mines. In the worst case Dutchbat would be forced back into a small (VRS 'recognized' Safe Area) around Potocari. This reduction in size would have roughly corresponded to the Bosnian Serb interpretation of the enclave borders, i.e. the actual demilitarized area of April 1993.¹⁹⁵⁵ According to one MIS official the MIS/Army had started to receive reports of movements around the enclave as early as the end of June. Communications links were being laid by the VRS along the line of confrontation, which indicated the desire to communicate securely. Buses had been observed too. What did this mean? Tanks had also been reported and heard by OPs, but it was consistently assumed that the VRS was interested only in the southern road.¹⁹⁵⁶

The Head of Intelligence Production and also acting Head of Intelligence of the MIS/Army declared, however, that there were 'absolutely no' tactical indicators that revealed a pattern. Observations from the enclave were particularly summary, and the only possible source of information could have been American UAVs (unmanned aerial vehicles). But the Americans never passed this intelligence to the Netherlands. However, the Dutch official forgot to mention that the Dutch F-16s were also very suitable TACRECCE assets which could have been used outside UNPROFOR. In this respect a senior US intelligence official complained to the author that it was all too easy to lament about

¹⁹⁵² MoD, MIS/Army. INTSUM 109/95, 09/06/95.

¹⁹⁵³ MoD, MIS/Army. INTSUM 120/95, 26/06/95.

¹⁹⁵⁴ MoD, MIS/Army. Notes on briefing dates 5 July 1995. No author indicated.

¹⁹⁵⁵ MoD, SMG. Report of conversation with Colonel Dedden, 10/08/95.

¹⁹⁵⁶ Confidential interview (38).

the US behaviour. However, ‘the Dutch never got their own information from assets under their control!’¹⁹⁵⁷

Nonetheless, on the other hand the value of the UAVs should not be exaggerated, because the VRS had sufficient options for concealing its troops, tanks, artillery and mortars in the mountainous terrain. Apart from this the US intelligence services did not expect a further VRS advance either, but instead that Mladic would be content to control the southern road. The conclusion by British intelligence services, as reported in the press, that an attack was imminent was a typical report at strategic level that was of no use to the MIS. A few MIS officers talked to the British services but the report was too vague and did not fit any pattern.¹⁹⁵⁸

The former Head of the MIS/Army, Colonel Bokhoven, also stated that his service did not anticipate the crisis and the fall. The problems were associated with the approaching rotation, whereby the battalion due to be relieved (and now under-strength) was subjected to ‘pricking’. Perhaps the VRS was angry about the attack on a Serb village two weeks earlier. The only thing that possibly gave more insight was a report made when the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla was ordered to lay mines on all roads to and from Srebrenica. The reason for this was that a VRS attack was expected from the direction of Milici and Han Pijesak.¹⁹⁵⁹ But this report dated from 7 June. Conversations with other MIS officers show that small-scale actions such as that in Srebrenica can almost never be predicted on the basis of intelligence. The VRS already had sufficient military resources in the region to conduct such an operation.¹⁹⁶⁰

On 6 July the MIS/Army concluded that the VRS would attempt to occupy one or more Dutchbat OPs. It was assumed that this did not involve ‘a large-scale attack (Srebrenica has no great strategic value), nor an attempt by the ABiH to break out (too weak)’.¹⁹⁶¹ The situation was analysed a day after the start of the attack. One possible reason cited for a large-scale attack was the need for a success that could not be achieved in other parts of the operational area. The occupation of the enclave would cost the VRS relatively little effort. This would then give the VRS greater freedom to act in Eastern Bosnia, the line of confrontation would be reduced, troops would be freed for other tasks and the Drina crossings could be better used and exploited. The disadvantages of a major attack were condemnation by the international community and the use of NATO air power.

Such an attack might not be necessary, because the VRS could switch to a battle of attrition and simply wait for the enclave to collapse from within. Dutchbat was faced with considerable potential problems, such as individual blockades within and outside the enclave, organized group actions, attacks, taking of hostages, escalation through provocation, etc. In the event of the enclave being dismantled the ABiH could be expected to try to isolate the OPs and to use the troops remaining there as a shield. A direct ABiH attack on Dutchbat to gain possession of heavy weapons was also possible. The ABiH could quickly achieve complete isolation and total division of Dutchbat. The VRS could in turn also isolate OPs and then give Dutchbat the chance to withdraw or to take them off as hostages or prisoners. It could well be expected that the VRS would try to occupy one or more OPs but, once again, it was not assumed that a major attack was underway. Srebrenica had no great strategic value. No attempt by the ABiH to break out was expected either.¹⁹⁶²

This analysis probably never reached Dutchbat. In any case on 5 and 6 July Karremans told the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff that he did not expect any notable changes to the situation in the ¹⁹⁵⁷ Confidential information (80).

¹⁹⁵⁸ MoD, SMG 1006/18. Report of conversation, 03/08/95. For the reports see also: House of Commons Hansard, Vol. 264, Column 1010, 25/10/95.

¹⁹⁵⁹ Confidential information (36). Also: MoD, SMG 1006/18. Report of conversation, 20/07/95 and Confidential interview (36).

¹⁹⁶⁰ MoD, SMG. Report of a conversation, 09/08/95.

¹⁹⁶¹ MoD, MIS/Army. Intrep Srebrenica from the Director of Operations, AIV/KI, No. 32729/4, 06/07/95.

¹⁹⁶² MoD, MIS/Army. Kooijmans to YUGO Dept., around 07/07/95 and INTSUM No. 129/95, 07/07/95.

coming 24 hours.¹⁹⁶³ On 11 July the analysis of the MIS/Army still stated that it was ‘hardly likely’ that the Bosnian Serbs wanted to take the entire enclave. After all, the VRS did not have sufficient infantry to occupy the enclave in the long term.¹⁹⁶⁴ In an analysis from March 1997 of the information position of the MIS/Army it was established that the service’s own sources and those of its counterparts offered little indication that the VRS was planning an attack. Shelling and troop movements were in evidence at the start of July, but these occurred frequently and ‘were thus not of an exceptional nature’.¹⁹⁶⁵

Was there thus no specific plan from which such an operation could be inferred? As early as August 1995 a MIS officer claimed that the conquest was not a preconceived strategic plan. The VRS wanted to control the southern road and to achieve this had to clear the adjoining area. When the VRS troops realized how weak the resistance was, they pushed on further. When the resistance of the ABiH proved to be negligible, the enclave fell swiftly and unexpectedly. Perhaps an operational plan had been prepared and ‘shelved’ earlier, which the VRS then put into practice when the resistance proved to be weak. This could explain why Dutchbat considered that the whole operation was prepared and executed so well.¹⁹⁶⁶ This is an analysis which seems to fit the later findings of the Tribunal. Operation Krivaja '95 originally did not envisage the conquest of the enclave, but when the resistance of the ABiH and UNPROFOR proved to be so limited on 9 July, on that day it was decided to conquer the entire enclave.¹⁹⁶⁷ The ad hoc nature of the VRS decision-making was confirmed by the military security officer of Dutchbat IV, N. Franssen. He spoke to a Dutchbat soldier who was among the 55 prisoners. He attended a celebration in Bratunac at which high-ranking VRS officers were also present. They told him that they originally had no intention of taking the enclave as a whole. But their probing attacks met with almost no resistance, and so the VRS proceeded with the conquest.¹⁹⁶⁸ A former official of the Tribunal confirmed this ad hoc nature of the VRS attack to the French parliamentary investigation commission.¹⁹⁶⁹

What was true of the MIS/Army was also true of the MIS/Air Force. One year after the fall an analyst drew up a ‘Chronological Overview Srebrenica 1 March 1995 to 26 July 1995’ on the basis of the facts available at the time. This once again shows that the MIS/Air Force had no prior tactical knowledge. Troop movements were observed at the eastern edge of the enclave on 5 July, although these were not reported by Dutchbat. On 6 July the same happened in the south of the enclave. This time it was reported by Dutchbat.¹⁹⁷⁰ But an attack on the enclave was not expected.

The Military Intelligence Service of the Central Organization (MIS/CO)

A study of the reports by the MIS/CO produces the picture described below. At the start of May 1995 the Intelligence Department of the MIS/CO stated that probably no new major military operations would be undertaken by the ABiH and the VRS. It was, however, conceivable that the VRS would once more take the military initiative. The possibilities for doing this seemed limited in view of the shortage of infantry.¹⁹⁷¹ At the start of June it was reported that VJ troops were regularly being deployed, around the eastern enclaves in particular. This was chiefly being done to allow VRS soldiers to take a few days’

¹⁹⁶³ MoD, SMG. Report on Srebrenica project, Overview Sitrep Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff Morning Report, 05/07/95 and 06/07/95.

¹⁹⁶⁴ MoD, MIS/Army. INTSUM No. 131/95, 11/07/95.

¹⁹⁶⁵ MoD, MIS/Army. Memorandum: to CDS; Re: Intelligence on attack on Srebrenica; Drafter: Lt. Col. Van Geldere; Annotation: Col. J. Mulder Head MIS/Army; 18/03/97.

¹⁹⁶⁶ MoD, SMG. Report of conversation, 03/08/95 and confidential interview (28).

¹⁹⁶⁷ Butler, Srebrenica Military Narrative – Operation Krivaja 95, 15/05/00, pp. 950764-950765.

¹⁹⁶⁸ MoD, SMG 1006/18. Report of conversation with N. Franssen, 15/08/95.

¹⁹⁶⁹ AFP Press release, Testimony by Ruez, 22/02/01.

¹⁹⁷⁰ MoD, DCBC, Box 66. ‘Chronological overview of Srebrenica 1 March 1995 to 26 July 1995’, 11/07/96 and confidential interview (31).

¹⁹⁷¹ MoD, MIS/CO, Memorandum: ‘Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation’, No. 20/95, 02/05/95.

leave. No mention was made of the chance of a coming attack.¹⁹⁷² A study of the weekly reports by the MIS/CO about the developments in Bosnia also provided no indication that an attack was predicted.¹⁹⁷³

The report from the end of June stated that the political leadership in Pale had hinted at possible negotiations, but with conditions unacceptable to Sarajevo. Mladic, however, had declared that the chances for peace in the short term were negligible. Following the ABiH sorties from Srebrenica, Pale had once again cast doubt on the neutrality of UNPROFOR. There was no indication that the cited Serb accusations of ABiH infiltrations and sorties were accurate. According to the MIS/CO it was conceivable that with such reports the VRS was hoping to create a justification for new operations in Eastern Bosnia.¹⁹⁷⁴ In fact, just three days after the attack on Visnjica the MIS/CO was wrong in this respect.

The first report by the Intelligence Department in July mentioned Karadzic's announcement that the VRS would shortly start offensive operations to force the Muslims to accept a political solution. According to Karadzic a rapid and coordinated attack on the ABiH would enable the VRS to gain maximum advantage from its dominance in heavy weapons. This was preferable to a continuation of the current situation in which the initiative lay with the ABiH, forcing the Bosnian Serbs to deal simultaneously with a large number of relatively small-scale operations. The MIS/CO judged this statement as notable because Mladic had just predicted a longer war.¹⁹⁷⁵

On 5 July the MIS/CO prepared a briefing for the Defence Crisis Management Centre. One reason for a 'major' attack could be that the VRS needed a success that could not be achieved in other parts of Bosnia. The advantage was that these enclaves could be occupied with relatively little effort. After clearing away the enclaves, the VRS would be free to act in Eastern Bosnia, the line of confrontation would be reduced and troops would be freed for other tasks. Srebrenica would probably not be attacked because the enclave could be reduced piece by piece, partly through collapse from within. The taking of OP-E provided an example of this. Although the VRS could take the enclave in a relatively short time, it would probably result in a large number of casualties. A disadvantage of such an attack was thought to be that the VRS would be seen as the main guilty party and UNPROFOR could be prompted to use NATO air power.¹⁹⁷⁶ The MIS/Army drew an identical conclusion.

The fact that both the MIS/CO and the MIS/Army remained in the dark as to the intentions of the VRS after 9 July is also indicated by the weekly report by the Intelligence Department of the MIS/CO issued on 11 July. In this document it is concluded that for the time being there was no reason to assume that the latest VRS operations were the start of attempts to take total control of Srebrenica. The VRS units involved (a hundred men and four tanks) were insufficient for the task. It was assumed that the VRS would maintain pressure on the enclave and would continue with gradual and modest territorial gains. It was true that the VRS had advanced close to the edge of the town, but the main road was now blocked by Dutchbat.¹⁹⁷⁷ This conclusion was not remarkable, because all the analyses available up to then (BHC in Sarajevo, Zagreb, Deny Flight Intelligence Summary in Naples, the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) and JAC, Molesworth) pointed in precisely the same direction. And since the MIS analysts mostly gained their information from these sources, their conclusions and prognoses were in line with the other available analyses. It was only in the analysis made after the fall ¹⁹⁷² MoD, MIS/CO, Memorandum: 'Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation', No. 27/95, 08/07/95.

¹⁹⁷³ MoD, MIS/CO, Intelligence Dept., 'Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation', No. 28/95, concluded 14/06/95, No. 29, concluded 21/06/95 and No. 30/06, concluded 27/06/95.

¹⁹⁷⁴ MoD, MIS/CO, Intelligence Dept., 'Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation', No. 31/95, concluded 29/06/95.

¹⁹⁷⁵ MoD, MIS/CO, 'Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation', No. 32/95, concluded 04/07/95.

¹⁹⁷⁶ MoD, MIS/CO, Memorandum on briefing dd. 05/07/95.

¹⁹⁷⁷ MoD, MIS/CO, Intelligence Dept., 'Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation', No. 33/95, concluded 11/07/95.

that it was established that the initial analysis of the previous week had been off the mark. Everything seemed to indicate that the lack of ABiH resistance had led to the rapid conquest.¹⁹⁷⁸

What precisely did the MIS/CO receive from its foreign counterparts? According to MIS/CO personnel they never received any hard intelligence which gave explicit warning of an attack.¹⁹⁷⁹ Staff of a Canadian intelligence service claim that a warning did go to the MIS but ‘in disguised form’ so as not to reveal the Humint source.¹⁹⁸⁰ This was nowhere to be found in the MIS archives. A British warning can, however, be reconstructed. Interviews with British and Canadian officials revealed that at the end of June the DIS became concerned about the eastern enclaves.¹⁹⁸¹ This was also indicated on 28 and 29 June during a bilateral meeting between the MIS/Army and the DIS. A Dutch analyst was told in confidence that there were indications for a VRS attack on the eastern enclaves.¹⁹⁸² This intelligence originated from MI-6 and according to a DIS official this threat deserved particular attention. It was assumed that the VRS was busy increasing the pressure on all three enclaves, whereby the British expected that the first move would be an attempt to take Srebrenica. The threatening, reduction or conquest of the enclaves could be an extra means of bringing Sarajevo to the negotiating table. It would also put the UN in a difficult position. Karadzic’s position was still seen as stable, but Mladic’s attitude was a cause for concern. He wanted to solve the conflict on the battlefield, while Karadzic envisaged a solution through political consultation.¹⁹⁸³

The assessment of the conversation with the DIS led to a difference of opinion within the MIS/Army. The most important question was whether this was an official DIS position that had been taken outside the bilateral discussions. This proved not to be the case, because it was revealed in confidence. A fierce discussion then ensued within the MIS. How seriously should this report be taken? The majority of the analysts continued to believe that the VRS aimed only to take the southern road. Another problem was that Dutchbat reported no military details, making it difficult to form a complete picture. Sometimes the gathered intelligence was confusing. Several analysts weighed up the British report and set it off against the other intelligence available at the time. The British intelligence sounded unlikely. The VRS would never have the ‘sheer nerve’ to do something like that. The report on the bilateral talks with the DIS was never passed to the Heads of the MIS or the MIS/CO. The only Balkans analyst in the MIS/CO first heard about this report years later. The MIS/Army was a very closed organization and the DIS information remained ‘stranded’ there. The matter needed to be weighed up because there was no further corroboration.¹⁹⁸⁴

In an assessment after the attack the MIS/CO concluded that the international community seemed to accept the fall as a fait accompli and to be awaiting the further course of events. The unexpected nature and speed of the operation had taken the international community by surprise. How could this have happened? It was unclear whether the VRS plan had been established beforehand or whether the VRS had exploited its unexpected success in taking the south-western part of the enclave. On the other hand the occupation of the enclaves had always been a strategic goal. Perhaps the easy conquest of OP-E had given the impetus for further action. Following this more VRS troops were shifted to the southern edge of the enclave, also serving to cut off the link with Zepa. The speed and effectiveness of the VRS showed – according to the MIS – that Srebrenica had been taken with clear intent. The entire operation indicated lengthy preparation and the presence of Mladic ruled out a spontaneous local offensive.¹⁹⁸⁵

¹⁹⁷⁸ MoD, MIS/CO. ‘Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation’, No. 34/95, concluded 20/07/95.

¹⁹⁷⁹ Confidential interviews (25) and (40).

¹⁹⁸⁰ Confidential interview (9).

¹⁹⁸¹ Confidential interviews (8) and (9).

¹⁹⁸² Confidential interview (38).

¹⁹⁸³ Confidential information (30) and MoD, MIS/CO. Report Bilat 28-29 June 1995, q.v. (late June/early July 1995).

¹⁹⁸⁴ Confidential interviews (25), (26), (28), (37) and (38).

¹⁹⁸⁵ MoD, MIS/CO. The situation in the former Yugoslavia, briefing, ± 13/07/95.

The Central Organization and the attack on the enclave

What elements of the intelligence gathered by the MIS actually reached the policymakers? In the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC) the question as to the true intentions of the Bosnian Serbs consistently remained unanswered. Did they want the entire enclave or just the southern road? During a hearing in Dutch Parliament a senior Defence official, J. de Winter, declared that ‘only later’ did he realize that the aims of the Bosnian Serbs went further. ‘That became clear, at least as far as I am concerned, three or four days before the fall’. As explanation for this De Winter cites the fact that the VRS then started to attack OPs at the western and northern edges of the enclave. ‘That would be strange if they aimed only to occupy the south-eastern tip’. De Winter thus concluded on 6 or 7 July that there was something strange going on, but declared that his further inquiries resulted in nothing apart from the statement that the only Serb goal was the southern road.¹⁹⁸⁶

General Couzy was on holiday but was in constant contact with the Ministry of Defence. The Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Major General A.P.M. van Baal, also appears to have had no prior knowledge, and was also unaware that warnings had been received. He was completely in the dark.¹⁹⁸⁷ The same was stated by Lieutenant Colonel M.C.J. Felix, Head of Operational Affairs of the Royal Netherlands Army. No signals regarding the coming danger had been received from foreign military attachés in The Hague either. Regarding the Dutch intelligence situation Felix said: ‘The Netherlands is a small country. In the intelligence community you’re at the bottom of the pile if you yourself have nothing to offer. In my view, this played a role during that period as well.’¹⁹⁸⁸ However, the Dutch with their excellent F-16s had TACRECCE to offer.

It is also important that in the decisive weeks before the fall of Srebrenica, the MIS/CO and the MIS/Army were not present at the DCBC for crisis consultations. Their presence was in fact not customary and was obviously not considered necessary during this time of tension.¹⁹⁸⁹ Minister Voorhoeve confirmed to Parliament that no prior knowledge was held. The MIS appeared not to have had any. Voorhoeve admitted that The Hague remained in great uncertainty right up to the end and did not have its own independent intelligence.¹⁹⁹⁰ Couzy also admits in his memoirs that he had no prior knowledge. He thought that the operation was aimed at the southern road, and it was only on Thursday evening, 10 July, that Couzy realized that the VRS were out to take the entire enclave.¹⁹⁹¹

In short: ‘The Hague’ was surprised at the sudden attack. Is it true that, apart from a few unclear indications from the DIS, no other foreign intelligence and security services were aware of the situation? It is almost inconceivable that with all their Sigint and Imint, the US services should have gathered no information. Moreover, the Bosnian intelligence and security services also had good Sigint. Was this not shared with UNPROFOR or the United States?

7. The foreign intelligence services

In Section 3 it was established that the plans for a VRS attack on the enclave were made only at a very late stage and in a short time. There were no preparations beginning months earlier. The preparations for the attack on Srebrenica took place between 2 and 6 July. The goal of the operation was, as said, not to conquer the Safe Area but to reduce it in size and to cut the link with Zepa. Prior knowledge about the occupation of the entire enclave could thus only have been available after 9 July, because this was when the decision was taken. The question as to whether prior knowledge existed must thus focus on a ¹⁹⁸⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt The Hague, Part 1, pp. 182-183.

¹⁹⁸⁷ Hearing of Bakker Commission, Stenographic report of testimony by A. Van Baal, X19/14-06-2000, No. 121U.doc-3, 31/05/00.

¹⁹⁸⁸ Interviews with M.J.C. Felix, 06/04/00 and A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

¹⁹⁸⁹ Confidential interview (26).

¹⁹⁹⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt The Hague, Part 1, p. 182.

¹⁹⁹¹ Couzy, Mijn Jaren, pp. 155-163.

very short period: 2 to 6 July. This was when the preparations took place. In addition 9 and 10 July are important because this was when it was decided to take the entire enclave. What was perceived during this time and how was this interpreted?

According to claims in the press Western intelligence and security services had prior knowledge of the attack. In the autumn of 1995 various daily papers reported that the Americans knew about the assault plans three weeks before the fall. This was reportedly held back from NATO and the UN in order not to disrupt the peace efforts of Clinton's emissaries. These articles¹⁹⁹² were to a great extent derived from an article by Roy Gutman in Newsday and an article by Andreas Zumach in Die Berliner Tageszeitung on 12 October in which it was reported that unmanned US reconnaissance planes (UAVs) had followed and photographed the preparations for the Srebrenica attack for days in advance. US intelligence services had intercepted the daily conversations between the Chief of Staff of the VRS, General Perisic, and Mladic more than three weeks before the attack began, from 17 June 1995 onwards. In these calls the generals planned the operation. Excerpts from the reports of these conversations had been shown to him, and proved that the initiative for the operation came from Belgrade. Perisic reportedly commanded the actual attack. Moreover, UAVs had collected Imint on the build-up of the VRS around the enclave and relocation of tanks and artillery.¹⁹⁹³ As shown in Chapter 7, the question is whether UAV's were flying over Bosnia around this time and if so, whether this Imint was analysed in time. This was very probably not the case.

According to journalists the German government also knew about the VRS plans. Through liaison the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) is said to have received about 90 per cent of all its intelligence on Yugoslavia from the US services. But a senior BND official seriously distrusted this percentage.¹⁹⁹⁴ This would have been a more substantial intelligence liaison than with the British or French services, while NATO received even less intelligence. The US cooperation with the BND is said to have intensified even further from September 1994 onwards when the US intelligence services cut back their cooperation with the French and the British. Independently of the Americans, the BND was able to monitor the communications traffic between the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs. Journalists also claimed that the BND eavesdropped on the traffic between Mladic and Perisic. A joint CIA-BND listening post even monitored 'all' key telephone conversations between Belgrade and Serb field commanders in Bosnia.¹⁹⁹⁵ The German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Klaus Kinkel, categorically denied that the BND or the government had known anything.¹⁹⁹⁶ A senior German diplomat with permanent access to BND intelligence confirmed this statement. No immediate forewarning was provided by the BND. There had been rumours, but these caused a sort of 'cry wolf' effect.¹⁹⁹⁷

Interviews by the author established that the BND was initially quite successful from 1993 onwards as regards Sigint operations against the VRS and VJ. However, the Bosnian Serbs soon found out and began to use different crypto and better equipment. The BND could not any longer eavesdrop on the Bosnian Serb traffic. For this reason there was no Sigint available regarding the VRS attack on ¹⁹⁹² See for instance: 'Amerikanen verzwegen voorkennis Srebrenica' (Americans kept prior knowledge of Srebrenica to themselves), De Stem, 13/10/95 and 'Verenigde Staten wisten al weken tevoren van val Srebrenica', De Gelderlander, 13/10/95.

¹⁹⁹³ Andreas Zumach, 'US Intelligence knew Serbs were planning an assault on Srebrenica', Basic Reports, No. 47, 16/10/95. See also: 'VS wisten van komende val Srebrenica', Nederlands Dagblad, 13/10/95; 'VS wisten al weken tevoren van val Srebrenica', De Gelderlander, 13/10/95 and Ian Bruce, 'Massacre helped Nato take charge of Bosnian conflict', The Herald (Glasgow), 12/07/01.

¹⁹⁹⁴ Confidential information (87).

¹⁹⁹⁵ Andreas Zumach, 'BND wusste von Srebrenica-Angriff' (BND knew about Srebrenica attack), Berliner Tageszeitung, 20/10/95; 'Angriff auf Schutzzone Srebrenica. BND wusste angeblich vorab von serbischer Offensive' (Attack on Srebrenica Safe Area. BND allegedly knew about Serb offensive in advance), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 20/10/95; Ian Bruce, 'Massacre helped Nato take charge of Bosnian conflict', The Herald (Glasgow), 12/07/01; 'Woman of iron with a steely resolve', The Herald (Glasgow), 07/07/01 and 'Why these guilty men remain free', The Herald (Glasgow), 09/05/97.

¹⁹⁹⁶ Andreas Zumach, 'Ich muss diese Enklaven loswerden' (I have to get rid of these enclaves), Die Tageszeitung, 01/11/95.

¹⁹⁹⁷ Confidential interview (53).

Srebrenica. A senior BND official also confirmed that the BND had no foreknowledge regarding the attack on Srebrenica and was completely surprised by it. Like the US and British services, the Germans also had recruited sources close to Mladic but they apparently produced no timely warning. The BND knew all the time that the VRS had the capabilities and intentions in the longer run but the attack and also the scale of the subsequent atrocities was a surprise.¹⁹⁹⁸ And the BND did also not receive much intelligence from its European partners like the French. According to German intelligence sources the French were even reluctant to share information with the BND.¹⁹⁹⁹

On 29 October 1995 the New York Times responded to the European reports. In June the US intelligence community received indications that the VRS was going to concentrate on the enclaves. At that time it was unclear what the scale of the operation would be.²⁰⁰⁰ On the same day the Washington Post also provided a reconstruction. At the end of June US intelligence services reportedly observed a build-up around the enclave. Mladic was furious about the raids being conducted from the enclave and wanted to put an end to them. But analysts had concluded that the aim was to neutralize Srebrenica 'rather than take it over all together'.²⁰⁰¹

In a new article a day later it was claimed that the French intelligence services were also aware of the situation. The French also intercepted the communications traffic between Perisic and Mladic.²⁰⁰² Florence Hartmann received, more or less, a confirmation of this in a conversation with a high-ranking member of the French military intelligence service. According to Hartmann's anonymous source the buses and trucks had been waiting for days on the border with Serbia. The French service knew that a large-scale operation to deport the population was going to take place. However, these latter claims are both completely untrue and totally unfounded. Hartmann's source directly added that it was absolutely impossible to predict the mass murders.²⁰⁰³ This last statement is directly at odds with that of a British official of the DIS. In an interview this person declared that the murders did not come as a surprise. It was only the scale that was surprising and that Mladic let them take place, which was 'a very stupid thing to do'.²⁰⁰⁴ Also a US intelligence official claimed the same. In the Force Commander's briefing at 1630 on 7 July when a question was asked about the aftermath of a collapse of the enclave to a VRS offensive the US Deputy G-2 response was 'there will be a bloodbath'. Anybody who had watched the war in Bosnia and Croatia unfold could not rationally believe otherwise, according to this official. On the contrary, the only question in the minds of reasonably informed observers was not whether atrocities would occur, but rather how bad they would be. After all, military logic demands that the worst case is assumed, which in this case was still that the VRS wanted to capture the enclave. But on the other hand, according to a senior US intelligence official, even if the intelligence was available that the enclave was to be collapsed by the VRS that still provided no indication that a massacre was about to happen. Any knowledgeable observer of the war in Bosnia and Croatia would still have doubted that the VRS had the audacity to do it anyway.²⁰⁰⁵

After this things remained quiet for a while, but an article in The New York Review of Books in May 1996 caused a new stir. According to the journal, US intelligence services had sufficient warning of an attack. Research revealed that the intercepts as described did indeed exist. The VRS planned, it was said, 'to shave the enclave'. Analysts expected that the VRS would not take the entire enclave for fear of major losses, air strikes and the problem of the thousands of refugees. It was true that US spy aircraft had observed large numbers of buses at Bijeljina but it was assumed that these would be used to ¹⁹⁹⁸ Confidential interviews (98) and (99).

¹⁹⁹⁹ Confidential interviews (98) and (99).

²⁰⁰⁰ 'srebrenica: the Days of Slaughter', The New York Times, 29/10/95.

²⁰⁰¹ M. Dobbs & R. Jeffrey Smith, 'New Proof Offered Of Serb Atrocities', Washington Post, 29/10/95.

²⁰⁰² Andreas Zumach, 'Grosser Lauschangriff auf Srebrenica' (Major eavesdropping offensive against Srebrenica), Die Tageszeitung, 30/10/95.

²⁰⁰³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 338.

²⁰⁰⁴ Confidential interview (57).

²⁰⁰⁵ Confidential interview (46) and confidential information (80).

transport VRS troops.²⁰⁰⁶ However, it was forgotten to mention that this town was outside the territory of the Drina Corps and that the observed buses therefore had little to do with the attack on Srebrenica. Just like the ABiH, the VRS transported all its soldiers by bus. The CIA director John Deutch, in a letter sent to The New York Review of Books, denied that his service had had prior knowledge. This was a remarkable step, because in the past the CIA had seldom responded to a wide range of accusations. There were also no intercepts of conversations between Perisic and Mladic. An internal State Department document also denied that there had been any prior knowledge.²⁰⁰⁷ In addition the author spoke to two U.S. intelligence officials who independently from each other checked US Sigint archives and not a trace could be found of the intercepts.²⁰⁰⁸ Apart from this, these important intercepts certainly would have ended up in the daily reporting of the purely US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth. The author was able, thanks to a foreign intelligence agency, to study these reports over a period of many months before, during and after. However, these intercepts as mentioned by journalists never showed up in the daily reporting of JAC, Molesworth, which sometimes had the highest classification grade. It was again an indication that one can have doubts about the existence of these intercepts.

In a response the authors of the article in The New York Review of Books stood by their story. An anonymous source confirmed the existence of these raw intercepts. There was a 'week's worth of such intercepts about the coming assault on Srebrenica'.²⁰⁰⁹ As the VRS had imposed radio silence and communicated over secure landlines, this claim may be doubted. Nemday also wrote about the existence of prior knowledge. General Nicolai saw reports concerning the Arkan Tigers. 'They always showed up at places where something was about to happen', according to Nicolai. 'That also was an indication that Srebrenica was on their wish list'.²⁰¹⁰ But a report of the wandering Arkan Tigers, weeks before the attack, is absolutely not the same as a hard indication of an attack on Srebrenica.

What was the response in the Netherlands to all these revelations? The information was so disturbing that Voorhoeve contacted his US colleague and asked him for clarification. Perry assured Voorhoeve during their meeting in Williamsburg that the Pentagon knew of nothing. An investigation by the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) showed that a 'review of the intelligence prior to 10 July does not reveal any tangible evidence of an intent to completely take control of the enclave'.²⁰¹¹ The question of whether the CIA or the NSA knew something was not asked, and so was not answered either. In order to be quite sure, General Van den Breemen also inquired with the chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), General John Shalikashvili, who assured him that no crucial intelligence had been kept back.²⁰¹² The military adviser to Boutros-Ghali, General Van Kappen, had also talked to various sources in the Pentagon about the issue of prior knowledge, where he had been assured 'hand on heart' that the information in question had not been held. He had no reason whatsoever to doubt this.²⁰¹³

So what is true of all these claims in the press and other publications that the CIA or other agencies was aware of the preparations for an attack? Since Mladic first decided on 2 July to 'shave' the enclave at the southern edge and on 9 July to take over the entire enclave, any prior knowledge of the attack would have been minimal and the aforementioned press reports cannot be true. Ambassador ²⁰⁰⁶ Charles Lane and Thom Shanker, 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96. For Lane's background in the debate on Bosnia: cf. UNNY, UNPROFOR, Archive SRSG, Box 87717. Jim Shear to Akashi, 15/10/94 and Charles Lane, 'Brock Crook', The New Republic, 05/09/94.

²⁰⁰⁷ American FOIA, State Department memorandum, 19/12/96.

²⁰⁰⁸ Confidential interviews (13) and (54).

²⁰⁰⁹ 'The CIA and Bosnia: An Exchange', New York Review of Books, 06/06/96.

²⁰¹⁰ Roy Gutman, 'UN's Deadly Deal', Nemday, 29/05/96.

²⁰¹¹ Charles Lane and Thom Shanker, 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96.

²⁰¹² MoD, MIS/CO. Memorandum: to CDS; Re: Intelligence on attack on Srebrenica; Drafter: Lt. Col. Van Geldere; Annotation: Col. J. Mulder Head MIS/Army; 18/03/97.

²⁰¹³ B. Ummelen, 'Verenigde Staten ontkennen wetenschap aanval op Srebrenica' (United States denies knowledge of attack on Srebrenica), De Limburger, 14/10/95.

James Pardew, who was the head of the Balkan Task Force (BTF) at the Pentagon, confirmed that there was no prior knowledge. The BTF did indeed note an increase in fighting and troop movements from the end of June onwards, but an attack was not expected. The enclave was of no great value to the VRS, which would then also become responsible for all the Displaced Persons. Moreover, it would mean a direct confrontation with UNPROFOR and NATO.²⁰¹⁴ It thus seems more likely that the troop movements and tanks were first established in analyses made after the event. Indeed, Srebrenica did not enjoy high priority in the US intelligence community. Moreover, American officers in the G-2 staffs in Sarajevo and Zagreb, Powers and Morgan, had no prior knowledge.²⁰¹⁵ When journalists write that US intelligence services were informed ‘weeks in advance’, one can doubt this.

Nonetheless, the ABiH also declared that the Americans knew about the intentions of the VRS. This was stated by a Bosnian officer, General Andjeljko Makar. He even spoke of knowledge a month in advance. He came to hear of the VRS plans from a foreign source. According to him the German services also knew about it. The raid on Visnjica on 26 June was thus not the ‘famous last straw’. Knowledge a month earlier would be logical too, because the planning for the attack required at least four weeks.²⁰¹⁶ Just as with other claims, these statements can be questioned because all foreign intelligence analyses in 1994 and 1995 established that the VRS was in a position to take the enclave at any moment without having to make any substantial extra preparations beforehand.

Various military analysts of the US intelligence community interviewed by the author also denied that they had prior knowledge. In fact, the CIA had great difficulty in keeping tabs on the VRS. Most of its troops were infantry, and this field of VRS operations was well-organized. It was difficult to keep track of its structures. There were no hard indications that the VRS wanted to take over the enclaves in their entirety; no significant build-up was observed. One should also not forget, according to the interviewed analysts, that ultimately it was only a small unit that attacked Srebrenica. At the time it was almost impossible to establish which VRS units carried out the assault. This knowledge was first gained by the US intelligence community in retrospect. Regarding the motives for the attack on the eastern enclaves, US analysts stated that the VRS was afraid of losing the war. This fear also played a role in the decision to attack Srebrenica. Pale wanted to put an end to the war and therefore they had to get rid of the enclaves.²⁰¹⁷

In this respect there are two important parallels between the attack on Srebrenica and Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait. The assessment by the CIA on the eve of Iraq’s invasion was that Saddam Hussein would likely launch a military campaign to seize a limited piece of Kuwaiti territory. This ‘limited objective’ was forward leaning at the time. Many of the most astute observers of Middle East politics, including Arab heads of state intimately familiar with Saddam Hussein such as King Hussein of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, were predicting that Iraq was militarily posturing to politically pressure the Kuwaitis over oil production levels. King Hussein even assured President Bush in a phone conversation that the crisis between Iraq and Kuwait would be resolved without fighting. Another parallel between Srebrenica and Iraq’s invasion was the lack of Humint. A major shortcoming in warning of the Gulf war was the lack of Humint to help decipher Saddam’s political intentions. And the poor Humint achievement is not an isolated incident in CIA’s history. Civilian policy makers shared this assessment. As U.S. Secretary of State James Baker characterized the situation: ‘U.S. intelligence assets on the ground were virtually nonexistent’. He judged that ‘there wasn’t much intelligence on what was going on inside Iraq’. The same applied to Bosnia: there was also a lack of Humint regarding short-term Bosnian Serb intentions.

²⁰¹⁴ Interview with James Pardew, 01/04/98.

²⁰¹⁵ Confidential interviews (9) and (54).

²⁰¹⁶ Interviews with Andjeljko Makar, 12/06/00 and 16/06/00. For the attack on Visnjica see for instance: Part III, Chapter 6 of the main report. Also: Stephen Kinzer, ‘Government Troops attack Bosnian Serb village’, The New York Times, 26/06/95.

²⁰¹⁷ Confidential interviews (9) and (54).

In this respect the author Russell points to the following distinction. Secrets are facts that can be stolen by Humint collectors. Mysteries, on the other hand, are projections of the future that are less vulnerable to human collection and tend to be the bailiwick of analysis.²⁰¹⁸ However, as Russell correctly observed, these criticisms, moreover, neglect the fact that CIA is not designed to be a 'combat support agency'. CIA's charter has been to provide strategic-level intelligence primarily to civilian policy makers and not tactical intelligence to battlefield commanders. While military commanders are often prone to fault CIA for perceived shortcomings, they appear reticent to fault their own military service intelligence shops and the DIA whose charters are to provide tactical combat support to field commanders. Accordingly, DIA and military intelligence manpower for conducting tactical military analysis dwarfs that of CIA.²⁰¹⁹

Nevertheless, an initial signal regarding Srebrenica was sent by Karadzic in his speech on 23 May, in which he said that he wanted to get rid of the enclaves, but at that time the CIA was unaware that this announcement fitted in with the VRS strategy. According to US analysts the operations in July 1995 were to some extent coordinated with Belgrade. There was no pressing military need for the VJ to assist the VRS in an attack; the VRS had sufficient manpower. But did the VRS only want the southern section, or did it want the entire enclave? This question long remained unclear. The CIA did not expect Mladic to go for the entire enclave. The service had little intelligence regarding Serb intentions and the actual course of events, and was confronted with an army that operated with small units and a few tanks in the woods.²⁰²⁰ This made it hard to keep track of the VRS and no hard indications were obtained. What was the situation for other US intelligence services?

The Bureau of Intelligence & Research (I&R) at the State Department had no prior knowledge either. This bureau was in a unique position: it liaised with all US intelligence and security services. A great deal of tactical military intelligence was held on the warring factions. The Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) did some fine work and kept track of the order of battle. There were few surprises in the modus operandi of the VRS because this did not deviate from that of the VJ. The standard approach was: firstly artillery and mortar bombardments, then the deployment of tanks and infantry, and then paramilitary units and special police. This was the systematic pattern that almost always presented itself. This service managed to chart all VRS positions involved in the siege of Sarajevo. The DIA also had excellent intelligence on Northern Bosnia, but there was very little intelligence on Eastern Bosnia. One problem was that the DIA gathered a great deal of humanitarian intelligence, but this was never analysed within the DIA and was thus often lost. The DIA concentrated only on military operations and many humanitarian issues were not passed on to I&R. Besides this, although the DIA was good on 'capabilities' it was weak on 'intentions'.

Much tactical military intelligence was not shared with other services, but retained by the DIA for itself. Four months after Srebrenica, for instance, much DIA material was discovered in Washington that had never been sent to Zagreb. Much of its intelligence was chiefly examined for its military value, and in this case attention was mostly devoted to variations in the military battle order. The best sources were formed by the press, NGOs and Displaced Persons. In any case the State Department's I&R did not expect an attack.²⁰²¹ Many interviews confirm that most intelligence and security services were not aware of the coming attack. This is not so surprising in view of the short time needed by the VRS to set up the operation. Moreover, the radio silence observed by the VRS meant that little was intercepted.

²⁰¹⁸ Richard L. Russell, 'CIA's Strategic Intelligence in Iraq', Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 117 (Summer 2002), 2, pp. 196-197 and 206.

²⁰¹⁹ Richard L. Russell, 'CIA's Strategic Intelligence in Iraq', Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 117 (Summer 2002), 2, p. 204.

²⁰²⁰ Confidential interview (7).

²⁰²¹ Confidential interviews (12), (13) and (76).

So which organizations did have clear indications?

The question remains: despite Mladic's late decision to undertake an assault on Srebrenica might there, notwithstanding all denials, be indications that foreign military intelligence services knew something? Research has shown that this Canadian did have suspicions that the VRS was up to something. For some considerable time Ottawa had been warned by Canadian staff in Zagreb and Sarajevo that in the longer term the VRS would go on the attack. Reportedly the build-up was monitored by Ottawa through Humint, Sigint and Imint. But it still remained unclear whether the VRS aims were confined to the southern tip or encompassed the entire enclave. It had often happened that the VRS massed troops at certain places. Everyone then expected an attack or an operation, but ultimately it failed to materialize. When the ABiH did this, however, it was a sure indication that a military operation was going to take place.²⁰²² On the basis of Imint the J-2 Military Intelligence Cell at the Canadian Department of National Defence (DND) reportedly ascertained that two groups of T-54 tanks were moving in the direction of the enclaves. One later turned off towards Srebrenica, heading for the southern tip of the enclave, and the other unit headed for Zepa. This happened 2 to 3 weeks before the event, and the intelligence officials wondered whether this was a reconnaissance mission. 'What was going on?' The Canadian military intelligence service also established that the VRS had moved new and heavier long-range artillery to Sugar Hill, the mount that controlled Tuzla and Tuzla Air Base. Relocations of other artillery in the direction of Zvornik and Bratunac were also observed.

Imint from satellites and U-2s over Eastern Bosnia was, according to some Canadian sources, rapidly available in Ottawa. One can, however, doubt if this was indeed so rapidly as outlined to the author. Even if DIA gave the Canadians the second copy from RAF Alconbury, they still had more than a week's delay, because the shipment out of the UK was usually at least a week after the U-2 mission was flown. If the DIA took the time to make a third copy for the Canadians from their own DIA copy, one must add at least another day. Satellite imagery is a different story of course, but it does not provide the comprehensive coverage required to maintain the sort of picture as described by the Canadians.²⁰²³

In addition, the SAS had managed to take photographs of the new artillery and tanks from close up. Reports were also received that frequently changing VJ units had been observed at the southern tip of the enclave. This was evident from the shoulder emblems on the uniforms and the Belgrade dialect spoken. Partly on the basis of this intelligence a briefing was given to the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, General Armand Roy, two weeks before the attack. In this briefing analysts forecasted that something would happen around Srebrenica in the near future. Roy is said to have rejected the however: he did not believe in an attack. Ottawa probably had the same intelligence at its disposal as the British DIS, but a different conclusion was drawn.

It also seems that the Bosnian Muslims, on the basis of Comint, also knew of a Serb action long in advance. In Chapter 6 of this study it was established that they did have intercepts, but that these were first analysed weeks or months later. The Muslims had insufficient personnel, interception equipment, cryptoanalysts and analysis capabilities, and no internal communication network to get the gathered Comint to where it was needed quickly and efficiently. The method of interception and processing was too labour intensive, meaning that many messages were 'missed'. It is likely that only fragments were intercepted. Nonetheless, these fragments could sometimes have provided quite important intelligence, but not the full picture. But let us suppose that these intercepts were indeed available in real time and not too late. Were they then passed on to the US intelligence services? Or did the Americans gather such information themselves via satellites or aircraft? In June 1995 US officials admitted that intelligence about tactical military matters provided largely through technical sources ²⁰²² Confidential interviews (9) and (60).

²⁰²³ Confidential information (80).

(presumably they were referring to Elint and low-grade Comint) would be a much easier issue for them than gathering political intelligence on what the Serbians and Bosnian Serbs were thinking.²⁰²⁴

If the CIA or the NSA were able to access Bosnian intercepts, then one must ask what reasons there might have been for not sharing these. One of the biggest problems seems to be the dissemination of Sigint among the US and foreign consumers. In the US intelligence community this is referred to as the Green Door Syndrome, in which the vast majority of political and military policymakers do not have access to Sigint. This prevented an effective integration of Sigint in other intelligence products. It was only in the course of the 1980s that Sigint started to be spread a little more widely, but this process still cannot be described as optimal.²⁰²⁵

But if Sigint on operation Krivaja '95 was possibly available to the CIA or the National Security Agency, why was it not passed on? A variety of possibilities present themselves. The Green Door Syndrome may have played a role. The highly sensitive nature of Sigint may have led to the intercepts not being fed into 'the line'. Perhaps the US services wanted to conceal the original source and the relationship with the 2nd Corps. A third possibility is that the intercepts did enter the pipeline but then remained 'stuck' due to a lack of analysis capability. Despite all the publications implying that intelligence services have become 'deaf' due to the avalanche of information,²⁰²⁶ it seems that gathering intelligence is no problem. In reality the biggest problem is 'the continuing decline of its Sigint processing, analysis and reporting infrastructure'.²⁰²⁷

But in Bosnia this was not the case. The Bosnian Sigint was not passed on to UNPROFOR. Was it perhaps passed on to the Americans, and was there a special liaison between the 2nd Corps and the US services? Hagman establishes that 'it was general knowledge that US advisers (without any affiliation to the UN) were deployed in Sarajevo and Tuzla throughout 1994 and 1995, working out of, for example, the HQ ABiH 2 Corps (Tuzla) and Bosnia Hercegovina Government buildings.' According to various reports this was a 'two-way street', as Americans are said to have passed on intelligence to the ABiH.²⁰²⁸ It is likely that staff of the CIA and DIA were active in the region, but they concentrated mostly on Humint. The CIA did not open its first official station in Sarajevo until September 1995. There was also no official representation of the NSA and no formal or informal liaison with the Bosnian intelligence services.²⁰²⁹

However, as already stated in Chapter 6, the Americans never gained access to these intercepts. Following publication of the first press reports, a US intelligence analyst undertook a lengthy search but it was found that these Bosnian intercepts were not held in the relevant archives. The conclusion was that these were not shared. This analyst pointed out that his government would not have kept such information to itself and would have immediately publicized it in order to save many lives.²⁰³⁰ This was also indicated by interviews with other US policymakers. Like the head of the Balkan Task Force at the Pentagon, James Pardew, who categorically denied that this Task Force ever received this intelligence in 1995. One or more (video) conferences between the Pentagon, the NSA, the CIA and the US EUCOM were held almost daily in order to exchange intelligence, but these intercepts were never mentioned.²⁰³¹ An intelligence analyst of the US State Department also denied ever having seen Bosnian intercepts and declared that this material would certainly have been used by the State Department.²⁰³² This is a further ²⁰²⁴ James Risen, 'Experts Warn U.S. Intelligence Help Has Limits', Los Angeles Times, 07/06/95.

²⁰²⁵ Matthew M. Aid, 'Not so Anonymous: Parting the Veil of Secrecy About the National Security Agency', Theoharis, A Culture of Secrecy, pp. 64-65 and confidential interviews (6) and (13).

²⁰²⁶ Seymour M. Hersh, 'The Intelligence Gap: How the Digital Age Left Our Spies Out in the Cold', The New Yorker, 06/12/99, p. 58.

²⁰²⁷ See: Matthew M. Aid, 'The Time of Troubles: The US National Security Agency in the Twenty-First Century', Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 15 (2000) 3, pp. 1-32.

²⁰²⁸ Hagman, UN-NATO, p. 92.

²⁰²⁹ Confidential interview (13) and interviews with James Pardew, 30/11/00 and Matthew Aid, 02/12/00.

²⁰³⁰ Confidential interview (54).

²⁰³¹ Interview with James Pardew, 30/11/00.

²⁰³² Confidential interview (13).

confirmation that the ABiH intercepts released later were not in real time. And again, the reports of JAC, Molesworth as studied by the author also did not contain any reference to these intercepts.

To summarize: American, British, Canadian and perhaps other agencies did have some indications of troop movements and the relocation of equipment, but did not conclude from this that a large-scale attack was imminent. If something was about to happen, then it would be a limited operation. The warning from the DIS to the MIS/Army was on a confidential, personal basis. It is also quite possible that all this 'prior knowledge' was first established after the event and that the indications were not signalled in time in July. After all, Srebrenica was not assigned high priority. Then there is the analysis of the Canadian intelligence cell at DND, made at the end of June, that an attack was imminent. How can this be explained? To begin with this information came from a single source and can be confirmed nowhere else. One possible explanation is that the Canadian analysts had access to the same intelligence as did their US and British colleagues but took a different view of it and drew different conclusions. It is also possible that the Canadian unit in Bosnia made an extra national contribution which tipped the general analysis of the situation in a different direction. Another possibility is that the Canadians may have followed developments in Eastern Bosnia more closely. The American and the French concentrated mostly on Sarajevo and the British mostly on Gorazde.²⁰³³

One of the political advisers to Akashi, Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, noted that at the end of June attention was directed mostly at Sarajevo and Gorazde.²⁰³⁴ However, the involved Canadian analysts failed to impress the significance of their findings on their superiors, who rejected their analysis. The latter apparently continued to adhere to the general view of the Western intelligence community that no VRS attack would take place. This is also indicated by a Canadian intelligence analysis of 11 July, which still did not expect that Mladic would try to take the enclave. It was thought that the VRS would probably concentrate on limiting the abilities of the ABiH to conduct operations from the enclave.²⁰³⁵

If the Bosnian Muslims were unable to share intelligence because their Sigint was not in real time, then did Western intelligence services gather relevant Sigint? As concluded in Chapter 5, high-level intercepts did indeed exist. The NSA will have concentrated mostly on international political developments. The question as to whether these intercepts also contained important tactical military intelligence on the attack must, in all be probability, be answered in the negative. The NSA did not assign the eastern enclaves high priority either. This also went for GCHQ, which focused on Gorazde, and the French DRM, which was mostly interested in Sarajevo. The head of the French military intelligence service, General Heinrich, confirmed that his service had only limited sources. The capabilities that his service had were concentrated in the zones for which the French troops were responsible. 'We had very few exchanges with the British and no relations with the Dutch at that time.'²⁰³⁶ In fact, during the fall of Srebrenica the DRM was reportedly totally unaware of what was happening.²⁰³⁷

Furthermore, the Comint coverage in Eastern Bosnia was poor. The VRS had imposed strict communications security and observed the radio silence conscientiously; the communications that the NSA was nonetheless able to intercept were uneven; due to a lack of analysis and translation capacity they will have landed in the 'pending but not urgent pile'. What remained were often items of Elint. Moreover, the history of the exchange of Sigint is not exactly encouraging. Since 1945 this liaison has never been optimal, and the exchange of important diplomatic and military Comint between the troop-

²⁰³³ Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

²⁰³⁴ Interview with Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, 06/06/97.

²⁰³⁵ Confidential information (78).

²⁰³⁶ Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 parts, Paris 2001, Part 2, Audition de Jean Heinrich, 08/02/01, p. 186 and 'US not keen to nab Bosnian Serb leaders in 1996: French general', AFP press release, 08/02/01.

²⁰³⁷ Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 parts, Paris 2001, Part 2, Audition de M. Bernard Janvier, Remark by Member of Parliament Lamy, 21/06/01.

contributing nations and within NATO never took substantial form in Bosnia either (apart from Elint). With regard to the non-exchange of strategic and tactical Sigint, an US military expert declared: 'NATO-releasable Signals Intelligence reporting consistently was a day late and a dollar short. It often comprised only marginally useful information as much as three to four days old.' He concluded that in Bosnia Humint formed a much more valuable, precise and rapid source of tactical military intelligence than Sigint.²⁰³⁸ His remark referred to the SFOR period after the Dayton Agreement. It can be inferred that the situation before the summer of 1995 was no better, because at that point there were no US ground troops in Bosnia. It must be concluded that much intelligence material was gathered by national strategic platforms such as satellites and special aircraft. It was sometimes released to NATO like Elint data which, as already established, was collected by US national platforms and which was automatically released to NATO via the LOCE system, and this worked quite well. But this kind of intelligence was of course not automatically released to UNPROFOR. Much Comint is never analysed, or not analysed on time, or due to its high classification is not permitted to be distributed – not among NATO partners and sometimes not even to a country's own national commanders.

Did spy satellites, U-2s, UAVs or other national assets possibly take photographs of the preparations? The section on Imint established that photographs were available of the events before, during and after the fall of the enclave. This has created a general pattern of expectation that Imint functions as a sort of 'Eye of God': an eye that is able to perceive absolutely everything on the ground. Satellites, U-2s, UAVs and other national assets may have impressive capabilities, but most systems are sometimes impeded by weather conditions above a certain area that can influence the operational possibilities. As described in Chapter 7, other elements play a role too. The speed of analysis, the specific focus of the analyst's expertise and other factors can all affect the quality of the Imint product. It is not so much the speed of transmission of the Imint to the ground that is the problem, but rather the speed of the entire process of analysis, processing and searching for further confirmation. One author concluded in this respect: 'For that reason, it would be difficult to intervene in a specific incident of ethnic cleansing. Nevertheless, tracking the civilian toll had value in a war where the political stakes are high'.²⁰³⁹ As said earlier, the characteristics of Imint, analogous in many regards to the shortfalls in the Sigint realm, resulted in documenting the war crimes, but not preventing them.

From the start of July 1995 onwards, spy satellites, U-2s, UAVs and other national assets started collecting large amounts of Imint, which presented images of buses, trucks, tanks, etc. The fact that this Imint did not arrive promptly on the desks of the US policymakers (i.e. not until the start of August) is closely related to the set priorities, as demonstrated in Chapter 7 of this study. Other hard targets were more important. Furthermore, a foreign intelligence evaluation concluded that Imint was 'useful', but in view of the guerrilla nature of the fighting few regular units could be photographed from the air and from space.²⁰⁴⁰ The overall picture created by the currently available data is that the eastern enclaves did not enjoy (high) priority with regard to Imint.²⁰⁴¹ Satellites and U-2 aircraft were indeed active, but other resources such as UAVs only became fully operational over Bosnia at a later stage. In addition, the Imint gathered about Srebrenica was not analysed in time. The imagery intelligence process will always remain a balancing act between available analytical resources, and the urgency of the tasks at hand. As more imagery comes in the door, the ability to analyze all of it becomes dependent on the resources that can be committed. Even as that imagery is analyzed, more continues to come in the door, every frame ripe with more urgent tasks. Prioritization of analytical tasks becomes paramount. Moreover, the intelligence community did not assign top priority to supplying military intelligence support to UNPROFOR. According to Hayden²⁰⁴², in the summer of 1995 the provision of support for

²⁰³⁸ Lt. Col. George K. Gramer, Jr., USA, 'Operation Joint Endeavor: Combined-Joint Intelligence in Peace Enforcement Operations', Military Intelligence, October-December 1996, p. 13.

²⁰³⁹ Alan Boyle, 'spies in the watch for atrocities' MSNBC Interactive, 26/03/99.

²⁰⁴⁰ Confidential information (1).

²⁰⁴¹ Confidential interview (13).

²⁰⁴² Michael V. Hayden, 'Warfighters and Intelligence: one team - one fight', Defense Intelligence Journal, Vol. 4 (1995) 2, p. 24.

UN operations took fifth place in the list of priorities for military intelligence. In this context it is not surprising that 'a senior intelligence official' at SHAPE, Mons stated that General Rose 'lost ownership of the picture of the battlefield to the point where it was irrecoverable'. According to this official, this resulted in decision-making on military operations that was based on a non-objective picture.²⁰⁴³ What was not stated here was that the US services did not trust Rose and thus slowly cut off the supply of intelligence.

Another important factor was that US analysts did not expect that the VRS would wish to take the enclave due to the risk of high losses, air strikes and the problem of the refugees.²⁰⁴⁴ CIA director John Deutch emphatically denied that his organization was forewarned and also pointed to the difficulties experienced in finally discovering the photographs of the mass graves.²⁰⁴⁵ Deutch's claims were confirmed by others. The Intelligence Head of the US EUCOM and later Director of the NSA, General Michael Hayden, concluded in the Defense Intelligence Journal with respect to the attack on Srebrenica: 'The quick fall of Srebrenica was as significant as it was unexpected. It was brought about by the "massing" of a force that would have been a disappointing crowd at many high school basketball games.' The major strategic changes that were usually generated by long-term processes were in this case, according to Hayden, the result of just a few tanks.²⁰⁴⁶

And Hayden was in a position to know because he had access to virtually all intelligence. His Yugoslav Joint Planning Cell at US EUCOM interpreted 'the gathering of groups of people in school yards in connection with the capture of Srebrenica as being "in the nature of a demonstration" when these had in fact been troops belonging to the Serb Army in Bosnia'.²⁰⁴⁷ There was a consensus at the State Department, the Pentagon and the CIA: the VRS would never want to conquer the entire enclave. Following the assault the US intelligence community established that intelligence was indeed available, but that the indications were too vague to be analysed effectively and in time. The journalists Stephen Engelberg and Tim Weiner of the New York Times were told more or less the same at a confidential briefing at the State Department and NSA. They were reportedly presented with a very accurate picture in which the Americans held nothing back.²⁰⁴⁸ A former director of the NSA declared: 'Gleaning hard facts from the avalanche of information was like trying to take a drink of water from a fire hose.' It transpired that the best information was obtained from NGOs, the UN and the press.²⁰⁴⁹

After the fall of Srebrenica the Netherlands MIS started an investigation into what its foreign partners knew. It transpired that in June 1995 the CIA and SIS received indications that the VRS was planning to start operations. The CIA had a 'variety of reports' which stated that an offensive would start in June 1995. According to the CIA the ABiH offensive around Sarajevo had caused a temporary delay in the VRS operations. A CIA report of 10 July, that was first received by the MIS/CO after the fall of Srebrenica on 12 July, also showed that the aforementioned 'variety of reports' never reached the MIS. The British foreign intelligence service is also said to have had indications that the VRS would attack the enclave with ethnic cleansing as the ultimate objective. The report itself was dated 15 June but (just like the CIA report) it was first received by the service on 12 July. Due to a misunderstanding it remained at the British embassy. The report was in fact not dated, had no attached evaluation, no indication of the reliability of the source, etc.²⁰⁵⁰ The news of the attack had, according to a senior British intelligence official, been passed to SIS by a source close to Mladic. This possible attack was the subject of discussion within the British intelligence community, where opinions were divided as to the reliability of the source. In the first week of June the British Joint Intelligence Committee repeated the ²⁰⁴³ 'Bosnia underscores intelligence gaps', Aviation Week and Space Technology, 20/03/95, p. 56.

²⁰⁴⁴ Charles Lane and Thom Shanker, 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96.

²⁰⁴⁵ 'The CIA and Bosnia: An Exchange', New York Review of Books, 06/06/96.

²⁰⁴⁶ Michael V. Hayden, 'Warfighters and Intelligence: one team - one fight', Defense Intelligence Journal, Vol. 4 (1995) 2, p. 18.

²⁰⁴⁷ Välimäki, Intelligence, pp. 104.

²⁰⁴⁸ Confidential interview (13).

²⁰⁴⁹ Stephen Engelberg and Tim Weiner, 'srebrenica', The New York Times, 29/10/95 and confidential interview (13).

²⁰⁵⁰ Confidential interview (18)

expectation that ‘on balance it is judged that the Bosnian Serbs will probably not seek to over-run the “safe areas” for the moment’.²⁰⁵¹ It must be doubted whether this US and British intelligence about an imminent attack was ‘hard’, as Mladic first decided at the end of June to set the operation in motion.

At a meeting in The Hague on 15 November 1995, a senior DIS official, Commodore J.G.F. Cooke, emphatically denied that the British services had had prior knowledge of the attack. Cooke had been sent to The Hague on behalf of this service to calm matters at the request of the British Chief of Defence Staff, Field Marshall Sir Peter Inge. There was great concern at the Dutch Ministry of Defence that British and other Western services had withheld information. Cooke talked to the Commander in Chief of the Army and to the Head of the MIS and made clear that the DIS had not known anything more than had been passed on to the Dutch.²⁰⁵² The CIA later also denied that it had held such information.

The highest US military commanders also firmly denied having had prior knowledge of the event. According to the Supreme Allied Commander Europe of NATO (SACEUR) General George Joulwan, it was only two or three days before the fall of Srebrenica that a feeling arose that an attack might take place. It was clear that the VRS wanted to take control of Eastern Bosnia. This intention did not change over the years, and in this respect their aims were clear. Good intelligence was available about the way that the VRS acted; the VRS very quickly gathered troops around Srebrenica ‘to support forward elements already in place’. The same later happened at Zepa. This should have been a ‘trigger’: the reports of troops being massed and artillery being moved into position.²⁰⁵³ Admiral Leighton Smith also stated that he had had no hard intelligence that Mladic was planning to attack. His intelligence was not good; the VRS efficiently rendered its communications secure. It was only three to four days beforehand that troop movements were observed. At this point it became clear to him that an operation was probably imminent.²⁰⁵⁴

Despite this, articles about prior knowledge continued to appear. In response to a spate of publications at the end of 1996 the Dutch Chief of Defence Staff, General Henk van den Breemen, wrote to his British colleague Inge and requested him to investigate what signs the British intelligence community had received concerning the attack on Srebrenica. Would a warning have been possible? The response from Inge and the enclosed DIS Assessment from 30 June 1995 indicates the following. The assessment was based on various sources and no further analysis was made until after the fall. The DIS regarded the enclave as ‘virtually indefensible’. The VRS had the military strength to take the enclave at any moment they wished. When the attack finally materialized, the DIS believed that the VRS was interested only in the southern road. ‘It was only the rapid and unexpected collapse of government defences which led them to push on and take the enclave at that point.’

According to Inge the Ministry of Defence in London had once again checked the archives of the British intelligence community to see whether this analysis still stood. Following a detailed study of documents it appeared that this was still the case. Inge concluded with the remark: ‘I am clear that we had no tactical warning on timing which might have helped to forestall events there.’²⁰⁵⁵ A study of the DIS Assessment of the situation around Srebrenica on the eve of the definitive attack reveals that the DIS was highly uncertain about the intentions of the VRS. This document was drawn up shortly before the final attack on Srebrenica and the DIS did not have a ‘tactical warning of an upcoming attack’. There were no indicators that the ‘VRS would launch an attack without warning’. The service did, however, establish that the VRS had long been complaining about the ABiH sorties conducted from a ‘demilitarized zone’. At the end of June 1995 the DIS concluded that ‘tension is high around the Srebrenica enclave, but there are no indicators to suggest that the VRS are about to launch an attack to ²⁰⁵¹ Confidential interview (8).

²⁰⁵² Confidential interview (8).

²⁰⁵³ Interview with George Joulwan, 08/06/00

²⁰⁵⁴ Interview with Leighton Smith, 06/06/00.

²⁰⁵⁵ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Letter from Sir Peter Inge to Henk van den Breemen, No. D/CDS/1/8/6, 29/01/97 plus DIS Assessment, 30/06/95.

take the whole pocket'. If the VRS did however attack, it was not expected that the ABiH would be able to stop this. The Bosnian Muslims might be able to delay the assault for a few days, but 'they are not strong enough to halt indefinitely a pre-planned assault'. The UN was also not in a position to 'dissuade or prevent' the VRS from such an action. Armed resistance by Dutchbat 'would be of no value even if the UN mandate authorised such action'. The nature of the terrain and the small number of VRS soldiers required for such an attack 'would render air strikes relatively ineffective as a preventative measure; NATO would have difficulty in acquiring worthwhile targets as the VRS forces would be relatively dispersed.'

The VRS did not need to bring in troops from elsewhere because the local units were sufficient. It would thus be difficult 'to identify a VRS attack before it had begun. It is anticipated that if the VRS did decide to attack Srebrenica there would very little, if any, warning time.' The VRS would not be significantly deterred by the presence of the UN once the final decision had been taken to attack Srebrenica. However, there were no indications that the VRS had taken a 'command decision' to attack Srebrenica, although this 'does not preclude opportunistic campaigns as happened in Gorazde last year'. If the VRS did however attack then 'there would be little or no warning from imagery; the VRS do not need to move troops and equipment into the area to take the enclaves, the local troops are sufficient in number for the task'. In reality it was only the forbearance of the VRS that allowed and enabled the continued existence of the enclave. Srebrenica and Zepa had always been completely indefensible, according to the UK Defence Intelligence Staff.²⁰⁵⁶

This analysis was confirmed by British intelligence officials. The DIS had no hard tactical intelligence on the attack. The concentration of troops had been noted, but the service had attached little importance to this because in fact the VRS constantly had sufficient troops at its disposal. The intelligence about the 'massing of troops' that was supplied was chiefly obtained through Imint. These pictures definitely did not indicate that the VRS was about to start an assault. Furthermore, it should be remembered that Srebrenica was not a major area of attention for the DIS. Its eyes were turned towards Gorazde and Sarajevo.²⁰⁵⁷

Up to a week before the actual attack the service did not reckon on a planned attack. It can be assumed that the DIS analysis was based in part on information obtained from other British services such as SIS and GCHQ and on intelligence supplied by foreign partners such as US and Canadian agencies. This was confirmed by Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, who was the chairwoman of the British Joint Intelligence Committee in 1993-1994. Srebrenica came as an enormous surprise; there were no prior indications. Mladic conducted the operation without consulting others. 'London was completely ignorant as regards the upcoming attack.'²⁰⁵⁸ It must be concluded that foreign intelligence and security services did not have specific operational information or hard indications from sources and technical intelligence resources indicating that the Bosnian Serbs would move to attack Srebrenica on a particular date. Indeed, the presence of such information was not likely either in view of the very short-term preparations needed by the VRS to set up the operation.²⁰⁵⁹

8. Conclusions

Many organizations and persons expected that in the long term the eastern enclaves would be given up and would disappear. At the diplomatic level, as early as the start of 1994 the eastern Safe Areas were seen as an obstacle to the peace process that needed to be 'cleared up'. The US mediator Redman had already made reasonable progress in persuading the Bosnians to give up the Safe Areas; abandoning and exchanging these areas were options that Sarajevo was prepared to discuss, but it remained a very ²⁰⁵⁶ NIOD, Coll. van den Breemen. DIS Assessment of the UN's Prospects in the event of a VRS Assault on Srebrenica as at 30 June 1995, NATO Restricted, 30/06/95, appendix to letter from Inge to Van den Breemen.

²⁰⁵⁷ Confidential interviews (8) and (43).

²⁰⁵⁸ Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

²⁰⁵⁹ Confidential information (83).

thorny issue. A foreign intelligence service established that opinions were divided in Sarajevo on this issue.²⁰⁶⁰ That was understandable, because as long as the enclaves had military value and could be used in the propaganda war against the Bosnian Serbs, some Bosnian ministers were not prepared to consider giving up this bargaining chip.

It was clear that in particular Srebrenica and Zepa would not be able to continue for long, in both humanitarian and military terms. The VRS had the areas in a stranglehold and the 'neck' was being squeezed ever tighter. Less and less humanitarian aid was arriving and the Serbs had a constant military advantage in equipment, firepower and troops, making a swift conquest a constant possibility. In addition, there were no logistical limitations. The main reasons why the Serbs had still not taken the enclaves were international political motives and because they would become responsible for the population.²⁰⁶¹ In short, most negotiators assumed that the enclaves would disappear sooner or later through a political or military solution. Srebrenica was tolerated by Mladic.²⁰⁶² Nothing more and nothing less.

However, strategic prior knowledge is not the same as tactical prior knowledge. Did the latter exist? According to some publications it did. US services reportedly had indications that the Bosnian Serbs were planning an attack. It was even written that the US government was informed in detail three weeks before the fall of the enclave. Washington was said to have intentionally withheld this information. In view of the above, what evidence still stands?

First of all it must be stated that no one can have known of an attack intended to conquer Srebrenica as a whole. Although the options contained in Krivaja '95 included the conquest of the enclave, it was only late in the evening of 9 July that it was decided to actually take this step. Hence there cannot have been any prior knowledge of this. There can only have been prior knowledge of the preparations, which had a limited military goal, namely the southern road.

Furthermore, an essential element is overlooked in many publications: the attack was not comparable to Operation Barbarossa or the invasion of Normandy, with hundreds of thousands of troops, aircraft and tanks involved. This was a small military operation with a limited amount of troops, a maximum of ten tanks and APCs and supported by twelve artillery pieces and mortars that were already in position around the enclave. The VRS needed to bridge only a short distance to reach Srebrenica, and since the troops and equipment were hidden in the wooded hills there was an extremely limited chance of issuing a warning in time.²⁰⁶³ ABiH reconnaissance troops observed something on 5 July but this was not reported to Dutchbat until 6 July.

But let us assume that preparations such as troop concentrations, tank movements, new artillery positions, etc. had been observed and reported. The question then remains: preparations for what precisely? The intentions of the VRS remained unclear up to the last moment. The players in the enclave had little information; Dutchbat's view of the situation was very limited view. The little intelligence available came from patrols, observations posts, convoy commanders, the local population and authorities, and at the higher level from SNE, BHC and UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb. Since operations were strictly limited due to lack of fuel and by military activities, Dutchbat became dependent on static OPs. Reports based on Humint became ever fewer, partly because DutchBat Commander Karremans sharply reduced the interaction of Dutchbat with the local population. As little was supplied through other channels, the information situation of Dutchbat was very weak indeed. The sources of information dried up more and more. The only possible method was photo-reconnaissance flights, but these were limited after an American F-16 was shot down on 2 June. Besides this, the VRS apparently strengthened the air defences around the enclave after the decision to attack was taken. This ²⁰⁶⁰ Confidential information (61).

²⁰⁶¹ Confidential information (59).

²⁰⁶² Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

²⁰⁶³ This conclusion is also drawn in the CIA report made available to the NIOD. See the chapter 'srebrenica: Background and Battle', CIA, 'Balkan Battlegrounds: A Military History of the Yugoslav Conflict, 1991-1995', unpublished, p. 17, 13/07/99.

latter fact could have been an important source of intelligence for NATO if the VRS had activated the radars.²⁰⁶⁴

However, were the Dutch military not again too prudent? TACRECCE played an important role throughout the summer, and into the air campaign in September. There may have been tactical restrictions placed on NATO aircraft due to the proximity of Srebrenica to the Serbian border and the SAM defenses on the other side. Nevertheless, there were tactical aircraft operating in the vicinity of the enclave (as shown in the previous chapter) before, during and after the fall. But such restrictions would certainly not prohibited them. Nothing would have prevented the Dutch from flying their own TACRECCE assets over their own troops and in support of the interests of the UN. According to a US intelligence official 'no NATO commander would stand in the way of such action, especially not a man like Admiral Snuffy Smith'.

The F-16 would probably have been ideal for such reconnaissance missions. Probably even better than an UAV, which often encountered frequent morning mist and low cloud cover. An UAV loiters at medium altitude and uses its substantial focal length to observe objects on the ground. Typical loiter altitudes were 5000 feet above ground level, well above any small arms fire. But TACRECCE is most capable against medium foul weather, and a properly equipped aircraft like the F-16 can use cloud cover to its significant advantage, especially in a heat-seeker SAM threat. According to a senior US official, the SAM can't see through the clouds, and the aircraft can drop below the cloud cover, to altitudes of 500 meters or even less, just long enough to collect the imagery and then retreat to safety back above the clouds, or in the clouds. 'That sort of flying takes guts, and willingness to take some big chances'. For TACRECCE aircraft, there's no intent to remain hidden while taking the pictures, unlike the UAV. One TACRECCE pilot once said: 'I know I never bombed any of the enemy, but by God, there's a bunch of them that can't hear too good'.²⁰⁶⁵

A number of precautionary measures were taken following rumours that the Arkan Tigers had been sighted. After consultation between BHC and Karremans it was decided to prepare a swift evacuation of the OPs. The report of Arkan Tigers in the area is cited by many publications as the ultimate proof that something was going to happen. However, this was information that dated from the end of May.²⁰⁶⁶ It was assumed that, in view of the number of VRS troops, their strength and the lack of heavy weapons on the ABiH side, there would be hardly any warning. An attack could take place at any minute and this situation had actually existed since 1993. In short, most of the players in the region had no clear indications. This also went for the JCOs (SAS), NGOs, SNE and BHC.²⁰⁶⁷ At the end of June there were a few indications that something was going to happen, but nobody knew exactly what. The UNPROFOR intelligence officers in Sarajevo and Zagreb had no forewarning and continued to believe that the operations were aimed at the southern tip of the enclave. On 12 July it dawned in Zagreb that the VRS had taken over the enclave.²⁰⁶⁸

The Force Commander's meeting on 12 July announced that the UN forces had accomplished their task within the means available. In the aftermath of Srebrenica, the Force Commander's primary concern was the food, health of refugees; secondary concern was assisting DutchBatt in their retrograde (from the fallen enclave). The Force Commander's meeting concluded that support from NATO had been good and DutchBatt had reacted in a remarkable way.²⁰⁶⁹

The MIS/CO and MIS/Army were equally unaware of what was coming. Right up to the end analysts were unsure as to the real intentions of the VRS. The MISs assumed, just like UNPROFOR and other intelligence services, that the attack would be aimed at the southern part of the enclave. This ²⁰⁶⁴ Interview with Jan-Inge Svensson and Ingmar Ljunggren, 04/11/99.

²⁰⁶⁵ Confidential information (80).

²⁰⁶⁶ Confidential interview (3).

²⁰⁶⁷ Annan stated the same. See: United Nations, Srebrenica Report, 1999, p.143.

²⁰⁶⁸ Interview with Jan-Inge Svensson and Ingmar Ljunggren, 04/11/99.

²⁰⁶⁹ Confidential information (80).

was a correct analysis, as was later revealed by VRS documents.²⁰⁷⁰ Although conversations in London had indicated that the British services were fairly concerned, there was no hard intelligence on this either. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) doubted the reliability of a source in the VRS. The reports of the Defence Intelligence Staff and the CIA only reached the Netherlands MIS after the fall. A study of it shows that these did not contain any hard indications. Furthermore, the Service did not receive any intelligence from other services, such as the German or the French organizations. Dutch analysts concluded that other foreign intelligence services had no information either. The DCBC and civil servants on the Minister's staff, who were dependent on the reports from UNPROFOR and the MIS, therefore knew nothing either. Perry gave his word to Voorhoeve that the Pentagon also had no prior knowledge. The report to the effect that the US intelligence community had discovered from intercepted telephone calls before the attack that buses were being gathered was not confirmed either.²⁰⁷¹

The Americans did not have good Sigint coverage in Eastern Bosnia and did not operate with their own interception equipment from Tuzla. In any case, documents and interviews have not indicated that active Sigint support was provided to the ABiH. The only assistance came from the US Special Forces officer, who worked in Tuzla as a liaison officer. According to an UNPROFOR official the US services always worked through this officer.²⁰⁷² This officer was probably involved in the secret flights to Tuzla and was probably the contact man for the MPRI staff who were sometime reported to be in Tuzla.²⁰⁷³

It was not only that the attack came totally unexpectedly but, as the Dutch Ministerial Council also established,²⁰⁷⁴ from the Western perspective it also represented new tactics and a new strategy, irrespective of whether these were applied ad hoc or had been devised beforehand. The usual approach was to exert pressure on the boundaries of the Safe Areas to gain control of the higher ground. No one expected that the enclave would be taken. This was because some assumed that the VRS had insufficient troops to overcome the numerically superior ABiH forces in house and street fighting.²⁰⁷⁵ Apparently the Western intelligence services overlooked the possibility that more local factors might play a role in deciding to attack. Giving evidence to the Yugoslavia Tribunal, General Krstic of the VRS stated that the decision to attack Srebrenica was taken for two reasons. The first was a directive from the general staff in March 1995, ordering the separation of Srebrenica from Zepa. The second reason was the hit and run operations conducted from the enclave and the constant infiltrations into Bosnian Serb territory.²⁰⁷⁶ The Western services had an insufficient perspective on the local events and the effects these had on the thinking of the Bosnian Serbs. Their goal – to reduce the size of the Safe Area – was not known either. This also applied to the decision of 9 July to go ahead and take the entire enclave, when this appeared opportune due to the weak resistance of the ABiH and possibly also due to the lack of a vigorous response by UNPROFOR in the form of NATO air strikes or armed resistance on the ground.

The Bosnians had equally little insight into the reasons for the VRS attack. Insofar as can be established they never became aware of the directives issued by Karadzic and Mladic for the separation of Srebrenica and Zepa. Unfortunately there are no reliable sources which can be consulted to give a precise answer to the question why the decision was taken to attack, and why 6 July was chosen.²⁰⁷⁷ The ²⁰⁷⁰ MoD, MIS/CO, Chronology of the Events by Lt. Col. Van Geldere, 23/10/97.

²⁰⁷¹ MoD, MIS/CO, Chronology of the Events by Lt. Col. Van Geldere, 23/10/97.

²⁰⁷² Interview with Hans Holm, 13/03/99.

²⁰⁷³ Interviews with C.L.Brantz, 11/06/99 and H. Haukland, 03/05/99. See also UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 193, SNE 23 May – 15 October 1995. Haukland to Comd. Unprofor, 31/05/95 and Hagman, UN-NATO, p. 93.

²⁰⁷⁴ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meetings of 18/08/95 and 25/08/95, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²⁰⁷⁵ Confidential information (25).

²⁰⁷⁶ ICTY, (IT-98-33), OTP Ex. 399/a bis, Interview with Radislav Krstic, 18/02/00.

²⁰⁷⁷ Attempts by the NIOD for interviews with Karadzic or his political advisor Zametica faltered. An appointment for an interview with Mladic was granted by the Bosnian Serb general but the war in Kosovo did him change his mind.

explanations given for this are taken from testimonies after the event, although they do not contradict each other. The general picture created here is that the main reason was the activities carried out by the ABiH outside the enclave. This already played a role in March, when Karadzic and Mladic issued their directives. The military activities in June will simply have confirmed the VRS in this aim. It also cannot be ruled out that Mladic's fear of an ABiH corridor from Tuzla to the eastern enclaves played a role. In addition, the elimination of the enclave offered several further advantages, even if these did not constitute a primary motivation. Freeing troops from around the enclaves would help the infantry-starved VRS and a victory would bolster the flagging morale. Moreover, it would force new political negotiations by turning the map of Bosnia on its head.

Many publications have described Srebrenica as an intelligence failure. The preceding sections have established that military and political policymakers within UNPROFOR and NATO did not receive the indications in time. However, a senior British intelligence official observed to the author that intelligence did as much as it could reasonably be expected to have done about the attack on Srebrenica. The problem, according to this official, was that decision-makers all too often expected analysts to be prophets with the ability to forecast coming events. What the analyst must do is set out the range of possible outcomes and the assessed likelihood of each and leave it to the policy-maker or the military commander to judge the probability and damage equation. He knew from experience that policy-makers are very resistant to unwelcome messages from intelligence. In the opinion of this official, policy-makers 'know' their policies are right and don't want unwelcome reality to intrude.²⁰⁷⁸

Nonetheless, as previously said, a warning about an upcoming event or war can have four relationships with reality: hit, miss, false alarm and correct rejection. But like Von Clausewitz once wrote: 'War is the realm of uncertainty; three quarters of the factors on which action in war is based are wrapped in a fog of greater or lesser uncertainty'.²⁰⁷⁹ It is clear that 'false alarm' and 'correct rejection' are not applicable here. So 'hit' and 'miss' remain. The ABiH has constantly claimed that Srebrenica was a 'hit'. It gave the warning, but Karremans in Srebrenica and SNE refused to believe it. As indicated above, one must doubt the reliability of claims that real-time Sigint was available. However, a military build-up was established on the basis of Humint. This took place on 4 and 5 July, but the reports by Dutchbat, the UNMOs and JCOs show that this was not passed on by the ABiH until 6 July, after the start of the attack. ABiH commander Becirovic's request to Karremans to plan his rotation with the Ukrainians carefully so that the VRS was given no opportunity to allow Dutch soldiers to depart and then not to allow in any replacements was an indication that he too did not expect a reduction or conquest. Hence one must doubt the claims that a warning of the VRS assault plan was given. No indications of this were contained in the UN reports and in interviews conducted with UNPROFOR officials.

But let us suppose that the ABiH did sound the alarm. In this case, why was the warning not effective? There was no lack of intelligence about the capabilities and the battle order of the VRS. UNPROFOR had a relatively reliable picture in this respect. However, obtaining a good insight into intentions was more problematic. Mladic and Karadzic often announced that the eastern enclaves would be reduced or even conquered. The chief question was: when would this happen? In early 1995 there were constant rumours that an attack was imminent. Every time it proved to be a false alarm. Did a 'cry wolf' mechanism creep into people's minds? Did the alertness of the recipient grow less each time the warning proved not to be true?²⁰⁸⁰

This may well have played a role. To give one example, on 26 June 1995 the UNPROFOR Chief Political Officer in Sarajevo, Corwin, and his staff burst out laughing when the Bosnian radio reported troop movements around Srebrenica and Gorazde 'Nobody believes the local news. Nobody believes any news in Sarajevo.²⁰⁸¹ This observation was also made in a CIA report, which stated that there were some indications, such as the bringing up of reinforcements. But:

²⁰⁷⁸ Confidential information (82).

²⁰⁷⁹ Quoted in: Richard L. Russell, 'CIA's Strategic Intelligence in Iraq', Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 117 (Summer 2002) 2, p. 191.

²⁰⁸⁰ Handel, Diplomacy, pp. 478-479.

‘similar troop movements had been recorded around the enclave dozens of times in the past, and the VRS was constantly adjusting its forces all across Bosnia. There was no special indicator, which would particularly distinguish these reports among hundreds of reports over the months and across the country’.²⁰⁸²

This mechanism may have been reinforced by the many false alarms, which the Bosnian Muslims frequently issued in their attempts to get UNPROFOR and NATO on their side. This applied to Eastern Bosnia too. In May the JCOs reported that ‘there were constant rumours at this time from the ABiH that the Bosnian Serb Army (VRS) were planning to attack the Enclave’. This did not lead to all alarm bells going off: the SAS was not impressed. They had often heard such rumours and they ‘were thus hard to take seriously’. The same was true of 8 June, when a major alarm was sounded. But at the time that the VRS was busy with its preparations the ABiH did not issue any serious warnings.

Did ‘noise barriers’ play a role? At various times since the start of 1994 Mladic had declared that he wanted better control over the southern tip of the enclave, but he did not say how and when he wanted to achieve this. His intentions remained unclear right up to the last. The international context also worked as a noise barrier, because the attention of the major policymakers such as Janvier, Akashi and Smith was directed towards matters of a more strategic nature, and not Srebrenica. Eastern Bosnia had low priority and the same attitude was true of most of the Western intelligence and security services. According to an ex-member of Akashi’s staff, it was an enormous intelligence failure. If Akashi had known what was going to happen then he would have reacted differently: above all because of his political ambitions. He thus brought himself into an impossible position with regard to the leading members of the Security Council. Srebrenica proved the decisive reason for ushering him from the stage through a side door. According to this source it was a sort of standard thinking at the UN (and hence an intelligence failure) that the Bosnian Serbs simply would not know what to do with the tens of thousands of refugees. The greatest failure was that it was not imagined in advance that the VRS would murder all the men and less the question of whether they would take over half the enclave or all of it. In itself this is strange because military logic demands that one should assume the worst, i.e. the VRS wanted to take the entire enclave. The failure therefore also lay with the Dutchbat personnel, according to this source, because they were the only ones who, possibly with the help of the JCOs, could have gathered intelligence about an attack.²⁰⁸³ However, this former member of Akashi’s staff forgot to mention that nobody could foresee the massmurders. There was no automatic link between the attack and atrocities.

Self-generated noise also played a role. Policymakers were not able to adjust their expectations about the Serb intentions and capabilities in accordance with reality. Thinking was dominated by the ‘sheer nerve scenario’ (i.e. the VRS would never have the nerve to attack the enclave).²⁰⁸⁴ A VRS assault with the aim of conquering the entire enclave did not fit the general pattern of expectations. In other words, policymakers clung to belief systems, and these created a filter in the perception of reality and the making of corresponding judgements. Reality was not determined by the actual situation, but by the image that those involved had of it. For as long as possible they attempted to perceive their environment in the most cohesive manner possible and to avoid certain contradictions. Many were inclined to avoid cognitive dissonance (i.e. the tension arising between new information and established

²⁰⁸¹ Corwin, Dubious Mandate, p. 131.

²⁰⁸² See: CIA Report, Chapter Srebrenica: Background and Battle, p. 15, CIA, ‘Balkan Battleground: A Military History of the Yugoslav Conflict, 1991-1995’, unpublished, 13/07/99.

²⁰⁸³ Confidential interview (46).

²⁰⁸⁴ Interview with P. Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

patterns of thought). On 7 July, therefore, Karremans still thought that the VRS attack was an attempt to provoke and intimidate the ABiH. Analysts in the US intelligence community also failed to realize that Mladic was aiming for the entire enclave, because what would he then do with so many refugees? In such a situation signals are constantly interpreted wrongly and perceived intentions are subject to disbelief. This aspect of self-generated noise was important. Both UNPROFOR and The Hague actually assumed that the VRS 'would not dare to go to such brutality and thereby provoke the whole international community'.²⁰⁸⁵ It was thought inconceivable that Mladic would do precisely this. Perhaps this self-generated noise also includes the exaggerated effect that was attributed to air power. Policymakers long assumed that this would prove a sufficient deterrent to the VRS.

Metselaar concluded that the way in which the warnings about a VRS attack were treated can be regarded as an intelligence failure. But the problem was precisely that there were no warnings. In spite of this, can Srebrenica still be called an intelligence failure, and under what circumstances could we call it a 'hit'? A warning would have needed to be based on adequate intelligence capabilities. In that case the preparations could have been noted in time. History shows that in the case of many successful surprise attacks, the attacked party had sufficient information to make an accurate prediction of the enemy's behaviour.²⁰⁸⁶ However, the indications were ignored or interpreted wrongly. Preventing a surprise attack was therefore 'not simply a problem of detection, but very much a problem of assessment and acceptance'.²⁰⁸⁷

In Srebrenica it was possible for a surprise attack to take place because enemy preparations were not discovered in time. So in Eastern Bosnia it was indeed 'simply a problem of detection', and thus also 'very much a problem of assessment and acceptance'. If Dutchbat had had been given its own 'eyes and ears' then the preparations might have been discovered in time. Let us suppose that the Netherlands Army had agreed to the positioning of the US Sigint equipment in the enclave or that the MIS/Army had been permitted to operate with an Electronic Warfare unit from Tuzla or the enclave (and this option was possible, as shown in Chapter 5 of this study). In such a case the information situation could have been strongly improved. There was an 'intelligence shortage' and this could and should have been exploited. As it was, the Dutch intelligence and security services remained 'poor'. By agreeing to the US offer, The Hague would not only have been given 'ears' but also 'eyes', because the Americans would then have been dependent on the Dutch for a large proportion of their Sigint on the enclaves.

This could even have led to the timely provision of Imint from U-2s and UAVs in exchange for Dutch Sigint. The MIS would probably have analysed the Imint quickly. Sigint and Imint would have revealed more about the intentions of the VRS. And if Karremans had set up an active structure for gathering intelligence, had given his men explicit orders to have more contact with the local population in order to gather information, and had also given the JCOs a free hand within and outside the enclave, then his Humint situation might have improved. These were missed opportunities, because as it was the Dutch intelligence services had little or nothing to expect from their foreign counterparts and from UNPROFOR. The most important partners were concentrating on Sarajevo, Gorazde and Croatia. This could and should have been exploited, because intelligence on Eastern Bosnia would have considerably improved the quid pro quo position of the MIS.

On the other hand, one should not blame other intelligence services too easily. From day One, the Dutch policymakers and military leadership knew the incredibly precarious position of their troops in Srebrenica. They refused the assistance of foreign capabilities, offered to reduce the threat like the US offer to bring tactical Sigint equipment into the enclave. The Hague refused to employ their own assets to learn about the threat, both Sigint and Imint. No Dutch indigenous Sigint assets were deployed nor were the readily available Dutch TACRECCE assets like the RF-16s properly used. And ²⁰⁸⁵ M.V. Metselaar, 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence Estimates', p. 46.

²⁰⁸⁶ See for instance: Hughes-Wilson, Military Intelligence Blunders, passim.

²⁰⁸⁷ Gordon H. McCormick, 'Surprise, Perceptions, and Military Style', ORBIS, Vol. 26 (1983) 4, pp. 836-837.

as said before, this is not a natural fact, but the result of policy decisions hinged on funding, capability and political will. In the light of these refusals, the prospect of castigating American, British, Canadian, German, etc. intelligence for failing (albeit perhaps negligently) to do what the Dutch armed forces had deliberately and consistently refused to do themselves seems not always justified.

Nonetheless, various members of the MIS also believed that, for various other reasons, Srebrenica was an example of an intelligence failure. It was often posited that if the MIS had had more resources it could have exchanged more with foreign partners and thus could have gathered more intelligence through liaison.²⁰⁸⁸ According to another MIS official it was a failure because the MIS/CO was not geared to supporting this operation in an adequate manner. Through its internal method of functioning the organization also made it difficult for itself to get information about Srebrenica to the right places. Couzy and Voorhoeve were given different pictures of events. This could have had fatal consequences in other ways too because, in the opinion of one MIS official, if things had gone a little differently an entire battalion could quite possibly have been killed.²⁰⁸⁹ One official thought that Srebrenica was an intelligence failure because the Army had learned nothing from the events.²⁰⁹⁰ For others it was the refusal of the US offer that represented a major failure.²⁰⁹¹

Metselaar was of course correct when he wrote that a major noise barrier was created by Mladic's plans, which changed constantly and often at the very last moment.

‘Obviously, what an aggressor does not yet know himself can hardly be expected to be determined by one’s own intelligence sources. Even the enemy’s military and political elite itself is often, until the last moment, not completely certain about many of these elements’.²⁰⁹²

This does not detract from the fact that some indications of the preparations could still have been gathered in time. As it was, the assault but also the quick collapse of the enclave came as a total surprise to Dutchbat and UNPROFOR. This was therefore a ‘miss’: no warning was given, but the event took place. The same probably went for most of the other Western services, although the American, Canadian and British services did receive indications. There was Imint regarding buses, but it was thought that these would be used for the transport of troops. There was some Sigint about logistical support by the VJ.²⁰⁹³ Troop movements and tanks were reported. There were Humint sources close to Mladic. But the indications were too unclear, the reliability of sources was doubted, intelligence was often interpreted wrongly or not analysed in time or had insufficient priority.

How big was the intelligence failure actually and would the result have been different if more intelligence had been available? This is of course a ‘what-would-have-happened-if’ question. Let us suppose that intelligence had been available on the directives from Karadzic and Mladic, the planning for operation Krivaja '95, the orders from the general staff of the Drina Corps and the operational plan issued by the Drina Corps on 2 July. Let us suppose that the initial preparations had been noticed and correctly interpreted. Then UNPROFOR and NATO would still have had time to react. After all, the Bosnian Serbs were not always insensitive to international political pressure, as the solution to the hostage crisis indicated, and as was later the case in Gorazde. This is also a conclusion drawn in the UN report on Srebrenica. ‘Had the United Nations been provided with intelligence that revealed the enormity of the Bosnian Serbs’ goals, it is possible, though by no means certain, that the tragedy of Srebrenica might have been averted.’ The UN report stated that this did not apply to Zepa. This ²⁰⁸⁸ Confidential interview (22) and (36).

²⁰⁸⁹ Confidential interview (26).

²⁰⁹⁰ Confidential interview (37).

²⁰⁹¹ Confidential interview (78).

²⁰⁹² M.V. Metselaar, ‘Understanding Failures in Intelligence’, p.37.

²⁰⁹³ Confidential interview (6).

enclave did not fall due to lack of intelligence, but due to the unwillingness of the international community to do anything else than accept a fait accompli.²⁰⁹⁴

The intelligence failure described throughout this work made clear that there was no effective warning, except of the most general sort provided to commanders and policymakers, at virtually any level or nationality. The issue of a duty to provide warning becomes the next question. The author is not aware of any treaty, or a bilateral or multilateral agreement that definitively obligates any of the allied forces operating in Bosnia to provide intelligence of the sort involved here to the UN or the Dutch in particular. Even under the NATO Treaty, a member nation is not obligated to come to the aid of any other member if an attack occurs, rather, a member need take only 'such action as it deems necessary' to restore and maintain the security of NATO. All NATO intelligence sharing in voluntary and NATO members need share only that intelligence which they choose. There is no obligation to do so.

However, it should also be stated that this intelligence failure occurred within the context of a massive operational and policy failure by the UN, which placed civilians and soldiers in an impossibly indefensible position with full knowledge of its tenuous character. To lose sight of the monumental operational failure by focusing exclusively on the equally substantial intelligence failure is to doom oneself to repetition. The intelligence failure was of several days or even weeks duration, but the policy failure was systematically ignored for years at a variety of UN and national levels. The unsupportable operational posture at Srebrenica, and the decision by key policy-makers in the UN, and various western nations to ignore the volatile potential is directly connected to the lack of intelligence focus on the potential for a VRS effort to collapse the enclave. Intelligence assets are nearly always focused on collection issues as directed by the policymakers. It were those policymakers at the UN and national levels who chose to turn a blind eye to the desperate situation in the eastern enclaves. And as a result, the limited intelligence assets committed to the Balkans were much more rigorously applied to other problems where production was more fruitful and more central to the vital national interests represented. The enclaves in Bosnia fell off the collection priority list of a dozen countries when those limited collection assets were committed against the numerous intelligence problems elsewhere in the Balkans.

It can also be concluded from the above that if no structural intelligence gathering and intelligence activities take place, or if crucial decisions are taken only at a very late stage, then intelligence has only limited significance. But since the international community continued to hold the view that the Bosnian Serbs would ignore political pressure, this should clearly have led to greater alertness and should have been a signal to strengthen intelligence gathering. The same argument applies to the fact that UNPROFOR knew that Mladic was seriously short of troops for meeting the Bosnian offensive elsewhere in Bosnia and the Croatian operations in the Krajina

In the case of a good follow-up by UNPROFOR, it is possible that the southern part of the enclave would not have been attacked and that the rest of the enclave would therefore also have been spared. Perhaps the rapid collapse of the ABiH could have been prevented if it had been decided earlier to return the still serviceable heavy weapons at the Weapon Collection Point in Srebrenica to the ABiH, if agreements had been made about the joint defence of the enclave, and if Close Air Support had been deployed faster and more effectively. Although the first measures would have been at odds with the mandate of Dutchbat, this aspect should have been tolerated in view of the emergency at hand. This remains speculation of course but since it is now evident that none of those involved had prior knowledge of the assault, a 'proper' response was ruled out right from the start. In this respect Srebrenica was an intelligence failure.

²⁰⁹⁴ United Nations, Srebrenica Report, § 487, p. 143.

Chapter 9

Survey of archival records

Introduction

A large number of records and collections of documents were consulted for the Srebrenica inquiry and this study. Private organizations and individuals also made documents available. It is a generally accepted rule that the curator, manager or owner of such archives or documents must give permission for third parties to consult them. This usually means, certainly in the case of all documents belonging to government agencies and international organizations, that applications have to be submitted to the bodies concerned in order to inspect the material. In several cases the institutions or individuals involved gave the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation (NIOD) permission to have third parties inspect the documents (originals or copies). In such cases the NIOD was obliged to check whether there were any restrictions on making the documents public by virtue of the Freedom of Information Act, the Personal Data Protection Act and the Public Records Act. It is possible that as a result of these Acts certain data and/or names of individuals must be made illegible. Below a survey is provided of the records, collections and separate documents consulted, with mention of the abbreviations used in the report. The aim of this survey is to provide insight into the archives, which were consulted for the purposes of this study. Important archives consulted in the Netherlands for this study were those of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Defence. All other Dutch and foreign archives and private collections have been brought together in a section: other archives and collections.

Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs archives (NMFA)

1. Cabinet archives, strictly confidential codes, Red telegrams.
2. Documentary Information Service (Dutch DDI)
3. European Department (DEU)
4. Political UN Affairs (DPV)
5. Atlantic Security Department (DAV)
6. Archives of the UN Permanent Representation in New York
7. Archives of the Netherlands embassy in Washington.
8. Archives of the Canadian embassy in Washington.

Collection Hattinga van 't Sant

Working archive of the Deputy Director of the Europe department

The Netherlands Ministry of Defence archives (MOD)

The archives present at the Ministry of Defence on the subject of the Dutch mission in Srebrenica, its background and its consequences fill more than one hundred metres of shelf space. The study of the archives focused mainly on the period from 1993 to 1996, but in connection with the run-up to the Dutch military involvement in the former Yugoslavia and the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica, it also extended to 1992 and 1997.

1. Department of the junior minister of Defence.
2. Secretary-General's Department.
3. Defence Staff.
4. Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC).
5. Directorate for General Policy.

6. Directorate of General Information.
7. Directorate of Legal Affairs, Department of Administrative Law, Criminal Law and Disciplinary Rules.
8. Directorate-General of Personnel.
9. Directorate-General for Equipment.
10. Directorate-General for Economy and Finance.
11. Military Intelligence Service (MIS), Central Organization.
12. First Air Force Signals Group (1LVG),
13. The 898 Signals Battalion (898 Vbdat) of the Royal Netherlands Army in Eibergen,
14. Royal Netherlands Navy Technical Information Processing Centre (TIIVC) in Amsterdam
15. Signals Intelligence Department (AVI) in The Hague
16. Defence attaché in Ottawa.

Royal Netherlands Army Archives

1. The Army Council.
 - Archive of the Cabinet/Staff Group of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army.
2. Archive of the Royal Netherlands Army Operational Staff.
 - The archive of the former Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff
 - Operational Staff's 'Lessons Learned' Section.
 - Department of Operational Affairs.
 - Archive of the Department of Operational Policy.
3. Archive of the Military Intelligence Service, Royal Netherlands Army (former Department of Intelligence & Security).
4. The First Army Corps.
5. The 11th Airmobile Brigade at Schaarsbergen.
6. Collection of the Military History Section.
7. Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Archive of Srebrenica Debriefing.
8. The 101st MI platoon at Ede.
9. 'Lessons Learned' Section.
10. Archives consulted at the Royal Netherlands Air Force
11. Staff Department of Operations, Exercises, Plans, Evaluations & Reporting (STAOOPER)
12. The photo archive of the 306th Squadron at Volkel Air Base.

Other archives and collections

Ministry of Home Affairs, The Hague

Collection of the Dutch National Security Service (BVD) in Leidschendam. Files 98272 and 116679 concerning the situation in the former Yugoslavia and its possible implications for Dutch national security and the democratic system were made available.

Collection of the Economic Investigation Service, International Economic Investigations Branch in Utrecht.

Documents concerning evasion of the embargo against the former Yugoslavia were consulted.

Cabinet Office, The Hague

1. The archive of the Prime Minister's office (KMP)
2. The archive of the Secretary-General.
3. Objectivized summaries of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meetings from 1992 – 1998 made for the purposes of the present NIOD study.
4. The archive of the Committee of the United Intelligence Services in the Netherlands (CVIN).
5. The archive of the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV).

United Nations, Geneva

1. UNPROFOR Collection. The archive contained documents from the UN headquarters in Zagreb, Sarajevo and Tuzla. Many of the documents from Tuzla originally came from the UNPROFOR Civil Affairs official in Tuzla, who reported on a wide variety of subjects.
2. Collection of the International Conference on Former Yugoslavia (ICFY) Papers, Palais des Nations. This collection includes the most important correspondence between the European negotiators Lord Owen, Vance, Stoltenberg and Bildt, the UN Secretary-General's special envoy Akashi, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations led by Annan and the Unprofor military representatives in the period from 1992 – 1996.
3. Collection of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). In the UN refugee organization's archive many documents concerning humanitarian affairs in the Srebrenica enclave were found.

United Nations, New York

1. Collection of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO). This collection includes all of the United Nations coded cables which were exchanged between DPKO and the Unprofor representatives and diplomatic negotiators during the war in Bosnia. The part of this collection covering the period from 1992 – 1995 was inspected.
2. Collection of Siergo Vieira de Mello. This archive contains correspondence between DPKO and UPROFOR officials in Bosnia.
3. UNPROFOR Collection. This archive contains the most important correspondence between the UN Secretary-General's special envoy Akashi, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and the UPROFOR commanders during the period from 1992 – 1996 and also the archives of the Force Commander, Deputy Force Commanders and Chiefs of Staff.

International Criminal Court for the Former Yugoslavia, The Hague

A collection of documents used in the trial of Serbian General Krstic before the Yugoslavia Tribunal (IT-98-33).

Canada

1. Collection of the Canadian Ministry of Defence in Ottawa. In the so-called Green Folder Confidential and Red Folder Secret I & II documents concerning the Canadian UNPROFOR units in Bosnia in general and Srebrenica in particular were inspected. They were mainly reports from Bosnia to the National Defence Headquarters (NDHQ) of the Ministry of Defence and correspondence with Canadian UPROFOR units in Srebrenica. There were also Situation Reports from the Canadian UPROFOR unit in the enclave.

2. Collection of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) in Ottawa. A total of 39 dossiers from the so-called File No. 21-14-6-UNPROFOR were consulted from the archive of the Canadian Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT). This collection contains Canadian diplomatic telegrams which were exchanged between the ministry in Ottawa and the Canadian diplomatic representations abroad relating to UNPROFOR affairs.

3. Canadian Access to Information Act (AIA), Kevin O Neill, History of CBNRC (1987) [Classified].

4. Canadian Access to Information Act (AIA), Dossier 1972.

5. Reports from ECMM observers in Bosnia were acquired through the Ministry of Defence.

6. A total of 76 documents of various sorts were sent by the headquarters of the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla.

7. Several documents connected with the journey of the men of Srebrenica to Tuzla were received from the Ministry of the Interior of the Republika Srpska (Ministarstvo Unutrasnjih Poslova).

Ivanisevic Collection.

This collection contains documents which are kept at the Centar za istraživanje zločina nad Srpskim narodom at Belgrade, of which Milivoje Ivanisevic is the director. The collection contains about 300 documents including 86 Bosnian army documents from a plundered computer in Zepa, containing commands and reports connected with Srebrenica and Zepa. The authenticity of these documents has been confirmed by Ramiz Becirovic, former Chief of Staff of the 28th Division from Srebrenica. One hundred documents came from the Republika Srpska and were mainly witnesses' statements, drawn up in the Opstinas of Skelani, Srebrenica, Zvornik, Milici and Bratunac, about Muslim-perpetrated violence from 1992 to 1994. Also in this collection are about 60 UN documents dating from July and August 1995, from UNMOs, and messages exchanged between UN agencies in Bosnia about Displaced Persons from Srebrenica. Several Dutchbat documents were also found in the collection. At a later stage two diaries from Srebrenica were also made available through this centre; they are mainly concerned with administrative matters. The Ivanisevic collection also contains Bosnian Serb newspaper and magazine articles and videotapes recorded by private individuals, which give an impression of everyday life and were found in Srebrenica after 11 July 1995.

1. Trifunovic Collection. This collection is kept at the Law Projects Centre in Belgrade, an organization affiliated with the Republika Srpska. The collection contained video tapes from both Srebrenica and surrounding Bosnian-Serb towns and villages. The material includes pictures of victims of Muslim attacks in 1993 and 1994. A small number of documents relating to the presence of Dutchbat in Srebrenica was also found at this Centre.

2. Yugoslav Ministry of Information. A collection of articles from international periodicals and newspapers concerning the media warfare between the Bosnian Serbs and the Bosnians was received from this ministry.

3. Situation reports dating from July 1995 and a few unrelated letters were received from the archive of the Danish Army Operations Command.

4. 'The Clingendael Collection', a pack of UNPROFOR documents thought to be originally from the archives and staffs of the United Nations in the former Yugoslavia. These documents were made available to the Clingendael Institute for research by an anonymous source in the autumn of 1996.

Médicins sans Frontières, Brussels

In the archive of Médicins sans Frontières (MSF) there were reports dating from 1993 about the situation in Srebrenica and a complete series of 'Capsat messages' exchanged between the coordinator of Médecins sans Frontières in Srebrenica and coordinators elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia. In this archive a number of messages from Dutchbat about medical matters were found, as well as messages concerning Dutchbat.

This organization ran the so-called Swedish Shelter project, a village made up of prefab houses offering shelter to about 3000 people. This organization made its 1994 and 1995 reports, written mainly in Swedish, available. The last report dates from 11 July 1995.

Norwegian People's Aid (NPA, Norsk Folkehjelp), Oslo, Norway

This organization was involved in humanitarian projects in Srebrenica and Bratunac and made all its documentation from Srebrenica and Bratunac available. The documents written in Norwegian and Swedish from collections 28 and 29 were adapted by Krsti Thørsen at the request of the NIOD.

U.S. National Archives, Washington DC

1. RG 263, CLA-records, Entry 27, Box 12, Martin T. Bimfort, 'A definition of Intelligence', in: Studies in Intelligence, Fall 1958. No. 8, pp. 75 - 78.
2. RG 263, CLA-records, Entry 27, Box 12, Max F. Millikan, 'The Nature and Methods of Economic Intelligence', in: Studies in Intelligence, (1956)3(Spring), pp. 3-4.
3. RG 263, NIE's 1951 - 1993, Box 6, Folder 47, NIE 11/4-82: The Soviet Challenge to US Security Interests, 10/08/82.
4. RG 457, NSA-Records, Box 1028, Folder Monthly Production Trends Report, Tab E: Annual Production 1944 - 1945, June 1945.
5. RG-457, CP, SRH-264, A Lecture on Communications Intelligence by Captain J.N. Wenger, USN, 14/08/46.

George Bush Library

FOIA, National Security Directive 74, Peacekeeping and Emergency Humanitarian Relief Policy, 24/11/92.

US Freedom of Information Act

1. FOIA, State Department, Code Cable Dallaire to Baril/DPKO, No. 2052, 11/01/94.
2. FOIA, US Army Intelligence, Annual Historical Review, 1 October 1992 to 30 September 1993, no date (\pm late 1993).
3. FOIA, Letter of Daniel Krutzer, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, to Vice-Admiral J. McConnell, Director NSA, 06/09/95.
4. FOIA State Department, Washington DC, US Mission Vienna to SecState, No. 2135, 26/07/1995.
5. FOIA State Department, John Shattuck to Secretary of State, 04/08/95.
6. FOIA, State Department, State Department memorandum, 19/12/96.
7. Sector North East Collection, 1994 and 1995.

Collection of UNHCR Tuzla reports

UNHCR messages to and from Tuzla, concerning relief for Displaced Persons after the fall of Srebrenica. Acquired from a private source.

Voskamp Collection

Documents concerning the provision of Close Air Support to Dutchbat in July 1995.

1. Collection of De Weerd, former adviser to the NATO Permanent Representative at Brussels: diary and abstracts of NATO documents, compiled for the purposes of the NIOD.

2. Sudetic Collection: abstracts of UN documents originally from the UN Headquarters in New York. At the time of the war in Bosnia, Sudetic was a correspondent for the New York Times and author of Blood and Vengeance: One Family's Story of the War in Bosnia.
3. Karremans Collection: letters and documents belonging to the former commander of Dutchbat III.
4. Rohde Collection: various documents including UN documents, collected during David Rohde's time in Bosnia as a correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor.
5. Westerman Collection: documents collected for the book Srebrenica: Het zwartste scenario (Srebrenica: the Blackest Scenario), of which Frank Westerman, at the time a correspondent for NRC Handelsblad in the former Yugoslavia, was a co-author.
6. Brantz Collection: documents belonging to the former Deputy Commander of UNPROFOR Sector North East at Tuzla. In addition to notes dating from the period when Brantz was Chief of Staff of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, this collection also contains an (adapted) diary of the Crisis Staff Situation Centre which was not found anywhere else in the archives. The collection also contained a series of diaries which were supplemented over the years. The original version of the diary was not made available.
7. Van Duijn Collection: several documents relating to the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica.
8. Wahlgren Collection: documents belonging to the former UNPROFOR Force Commander, mainly about the realization of the Safe Areas.
9. Stagge Collection: several documents about the organization of the debriefing in Assen.
10. Nicolai Collection: documents originally belonging to the former BH-Command Chief of Staff in Sarajevo. The documents are mainly concerned with the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica and came from a Dutch source.
11. Collection of Momcilo Cvijetinovic: the diary of an ABiH soldier, found at Srebrenica, and a newspaper published in Srebrenica on 8 February 1994.
12. Stanojevic Collection: several diaries and a collection of internal ABiH documents pertaining to the administrative affairs of several brigades in Srebrenica.
13. Kolsteren Collection: diary notes and several documents from the UNPF Headquarters in Zagreb.
14. Vader Collection: correspondence relating to the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica.
15. Hegge Collection: documents about training and the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica.
16. Vandewijer Collection: diskettes containing notes and briefings dating from 1993-1994.
17. Hilderink Collection: chronology and notes on various subjects, written after the fall of Srebrenica.
18. Collection of Rupert Smith: 58 documents which were not found in the UNPROFOR archives in Geneva were selected from four files containing personal correspondence, documents and notes.
19. Vermeulen Collection: personal documents belonging to the commander of Dutchbat I.
20. Schouten Collection: diaries from Srebrenica covering the period from February to July 1995 and documents about medical matters and training courses.
21. Collection of David Moore (Commander of Canbat): documents about Canbat's time and rotation in Srebrenica.
22. Collection of Bo Pellnäss (Chief UNMO): diary and several documents.
23. Collection of General Kjeld Hillingsø (Commander of Danish Operational Forces): Danish situation reports.
24. Collection of Berry Ashton (Deputy Force Commander, United Nations Protection Force): diary notes and policy documents.
25. Collection of Tony Banbury (Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General): diary notes, accounts of talks and a 'srebrenica dossier'.
26. Collection of Emma Shitakha (Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General): diary notes and accounts of talks.
27. Meurkens Collection: correspondence and diary notes.
28. Jacobovits de Szeged Collection: diary notes.
29. Van den Breemen Collection: annotated copies of archive documents.

30. Uiterweer Post Collection: notes and documents about Tuzla Air Base and relief for Displaced Persons there.
31. Jansen Collection: Diary fragments and documents from the UN headquarters in Zagreb and intelligence briefings for the Army Council.
32. Lubbers Collection: notes made for the purposes of the NIOD enquiry.
33. Rave Collection: diary notes.
34. Neisingh Collection: diary notes dating from 11 July 1995.
35. Hicks Collection: documents concerning humanitarian affairs associated with the fall of Srebrenica.
36. Bourgondiën Collection: documents concerning humanitarian affairs associated with the fall of Srebrenica.
37. Groen Collection: notes of the debriefing in Zagreb.
38. Beneker Collection: document about the press conference in Zagreb.
39. TCBU Collection: documents collected for the purposes of the Temporary Committee for Despatch Decision-Making.
40. Svensson Collection: UNPF documents and diary notes.
41. Jacobovitz de Szeged Collection: diary notes made as NATO Permanent Representative.
42. Ter Beek Collection: archive documents and newspaper articles used to write his book Manoeuvreren (Manoeuvring).
43. Pennin Collection: several documents relating to the debriefing in Assen and the aftermath of Srebrenica.
44. De Ruiter Collection: documents originally from the UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo.

Personal memoirs

1. For the purposes of the NIOD enquiry, the former Netherlands Minister of Defence J.J.C. Voorhoeve compiled a diary on Bosnia policy and Srebrenica covering the period from 22 August 1994 to August 1995.
2. Deputy Director of General Information of the Ministry of Defence, B. Kreemers, recorded his memories of Srebrenica and its aftermath for the purposes of the NIOD.
3. Adjudant Koreman (Dutchbat III) lent the NIOD a manuscript he himself had written about his time in Srebrenica, illustrated with abstracts of reports.

Archives of Political Parties

1. CDA, D'66, GroenLinks, PvdA and VVD.
2. Blaauw Collection: documents from the archive he had compiled on the former Yugoslavia as VVD parliamentary party spokesman and also from his term as chairman of the so-called Blaauw Parliamentary Committee on Srebrenica.
3. Valk Collection.

CD-ROM Collection

This collection appears to contain the complete correspondence between the 28th Division in Srebrenica and the 2nd Corps of the ABiH in Tuzla during the period when Srebrenica was a Safe Area. The CD-ROMs also contain material from civilian authorities in Srebrenica, and VRS archive material from the 'Zivojin Misic' barracks at Zvornik, which sheds some light on the conflict at Baljkovica where the retreating column had to fight its way through VRS lines after the fall of Srebrenica. The printouts of the most relevant documents in these CD-ROMs were about two metres long.

Another twelve private collections were consulted which it was agreed would remain confidential.

Confidential Collection (1): documents originally from the American State Department.

Confidential Collection (2): a large number of documents dating from 1994-1995 which were originally from G-2 UNPF Zagreb, and 11.000 military diary notes on CD-ROM.

Confidential Collection (3): report on Unprofor intelligence acquisition.

Confidential Collection (4): several Interoffice Memoranda from the Military Information Office UNPF-HQ.

Confidential Collection (5): UNMO documents from the UN headquarters in Zagreb.

Confidential Collection (6): diplomatic correspondence of foreign origin.

Confidential Collection (7): military documents of Canadian origin.

Confidential Collection (8): military documents of foreign origin.

Confidential Collection (9): notes and policy documents.

Confidential Collection (10): notes and policy documents.

Confidential Collection (11): notes and reports of Bosnian origin.

Confidential Collection (12): documents about secret arms supplies to Tuzla.

Confidential Collection (13): documents related to the trial of General Krstic before the Yugoslavia Tribunal, which were not included in the trial documents.

Books

A.

Aart, Dick van der Spionage vanuit de lucht, Weesp, 1990.

Aid, Matthew and Wiebes, Cees (ed.), Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.

Aldrich, Richard, The Hidden Hand. Britain, America and Cold War Secret Intelligence, London, 2001.

Andreatta, Filippo, The Bosnian War and the New World Order, WEU Occasional Paper No. 1, October 1996.

Andrew, Christopher, For the President's Eyes Only. Secret Intelligence and the American Presidency from Washington to Bush, London, 1995.

Assemblée Nationale, Srebrenica: rapport sur un massacre, Assemblée Nationale, No 3412, 2 volumes, Paris 2001.

B.

Baer, Robert, See No Evil. The True Story of a Ground Soldier in the CIA's War on Terrorism, New York, 2002.

Bais, Karolien, Het mijnenveld van een vredesmacht. Nederlandse blauwhelmen in Cambodja, Den Haag 1994.

Bamford, James, Body of Secrets. Anatomy of the Ultra-Secret National Security Agency from the Cold War through the Dawn of a New Century, New York, 2001.

Beale, M.O., Bombs over Bosnia: the Role of Airpower in Bosnia: Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama, 1997.

Becker, David W., Coming in from the cold war: defense humint services support to military operations other than war, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, 2000.

Beek, R. ter, Manoeuvreren: herinneringen aan Plein 4, Amsterdam, 1996.

Bell, Martin, In Harm's Way, London, 1996.

Berdal, Mats R., The United States, Norway and the Cold War, 1954-60, London, 1997.

Berdal, Mats R., Whither UN Peacekeeping?, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1993.

Bert, W., The Reluctant Superpower: United States' Policy in Bosnia, 1991-95, New York, 1997.

Bildt, Carl, Peace Journey. The Struggle for Peace in Bosnia, London, 1998.

Blank, Stephen, Yugoslavia's Wars: The Problem from Hell, New York, 1995

Blood, Th., Madam Secretary: a Biography of Madelaine Albright, New York, 1999.

- Bodansky, Y., Offensive in the Balkans: the Potential for a Wider War as a Result of Foreign Intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Alexandria, Virginia, 1995.
- Both, N., From Indifference to Entrapment: The Foreign Policy of the Netherlands with regard to the Yugoslav Crisis between 1990 and 1995, Amsterdam, 2000.
- Boutros-Ghali, B., Unvanquished: A U.S.-U.N. Saga, New York, 1999.
- Briquemont, F., Do Something, General: Kroniek van Bosnië-Herzegovina, Antwerpen, 1998.
- Buha, A., Arguments en Faveur de la République Serbe, Lausanne: 1999.
- Bulatovic, Ljiljana, General Mladic, Beograd, 1996.
- Bülow, Andreas von, Im Names des Staates. CIA, BND und die kriminellen Machenschaften der Geheimdienste, München, 1998.
- Burg, S.L. en P.S. Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina: Ethnic Conflict and International Intervention, Armonk, N.Y./London, 2000.
- Burrows, William E., Deep Black. Space Espionage and National Security, New York, 1986.
- Butler, Richard, The Greatest Threat, New York, 2001.
- C.
- Carmel, Hesi (editor), Intelligence for Peace. The Role of Intelligence in Times of Peace, London, 1999.
- Cekic, S., Uzroci, ciljevi i razmere agresije na Bosnu i Hercegovinu 1991-1995: Causes, Objectives and Extent of the Aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina 1991-1995. -- Sarajevo, 1995.
- Christopher, W., Chances of a Lifetime, New York, 2001.
- Christopher, W., In the Stream of History: Shaping Foreign Policy for a New Era, Stanford, Cal., 1998.
- CIA, The Acme of Skill, Washington, n.d.
- CIA, Factbook on Intelligence, Washington D.C., 1990
- CIA, CIA Documents on the Cuban Missile Crisis 1962, Washington D.C., 1992
- CIA, A Consumer's Guide to Intelligence, Washington D.C., 1993
- CIA History Staff, Directors and Deputy Directors of Central Intelligence, Washington D.C., 1994.
- Cigar, N., Genocide in Bosnia: the Policy of 'Ethnic Cleansing', College Station, 1995.
- Clark, W.K., Waging Modern War: Bosnia, Kosovo, and the Future of Combat, New York, 2001.
- CM 4897, Intelligence and Security Committee, Annual Report 1999-2000, 02/11/00.
- Codevilla, A., Informing Statecraft: Intelligence for a New Century, New York, 1992.
- Cohen, B. and G. Stamkoski, With no Peace to Keep: United Nations Peacekeeping and the war in the former Yugoslavia, London, 1995.
- Cohen, Ph.J., Serbia's Secret War: Propaganda and the Deceit of History, College Station, 1996.
- Cohen, R., Hearts grown Brutal: Sagas of Sarajevo, New York, 1998.
- Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, Hearing before the Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights, The Betrayal of Srebrenica: Why Did the Massacre Happen? Will It Happen Again?, Washington, March 31, 1998.
- Connaughton, Richard, Military Intervention and Peacekeeping: The Reality, Lancaster, 2002
- Cornish, Paul, Partnership in Crisis. The U.S., Europe and the Fall and Rise of NATO, London, 1997.
- Corwin, Philip, Dubious Mandate. A Memoir of the UN in Bosnia, Summer 1995, Durham and London, 1999
- Cot, J. (ed.), Dernière guerre Balkanique?: ex-Yougoslavie: témoignages, analyses, perspectives, Paris, 1996.
- Coulon, J., Soldiers of Diplomacy: The United Nations, Peacekeeping, and the New World Order, Toronto, 1998.
- Couzy, H.A., Mijn Jaren als Bevelhebber, Amsterdam, 1996.
- Craddock, Percy, Know Your Enemy. How the Joint Intelligence Committee Saw the World, London, 2002.
- Curtis, Mark, The Great Deception, Anglo-American Power and World Order, London, 1998 D.
- Daalder, Ivo, Getting to Dayton: the Making of America's Bosnia Policy, Washington D.C., 2000.
- Department of Defense, Directive S-5100-20, The National Security Agency and the Central Security Service, 23/12/71

- Delafon, G. en Sancton, Th., Dear Jacques, Cher Bill: Au cœur de l'Elysée et de la Maison Blanche 1995-1999, Paris, 1999.
- Dijkema, W. (red.), Dutchbat in vredesnaam: januari 1995 -- juli 1995, Rijswijk, 1996.
- Director of Central Intelligence, The Future of Eastern Europe: National Intelligence Estimate, Washington D.C., 1990.
- Doder, D. en L. Branson, Milosevic: Portrait of a Tyrant, New York, 1999.
- Dorril, Stephen, MI 6. Inside the Covert World of Her Majesty's Secret Intelligence Service, New York, 2000.
- Drew, E., On the Edge: the Clinton Presidency, New York, 1995.
- Dumas, R., Le Fil et la Pelote: Mémoires, Paris, 1996.
- Dzamic, Dragan, Psi Rata na Balkanu, Beograd, 2001.
- E
- Eisendrath, Craig (ed.), National Insecurity. U.S. Intelligence After the Cold War, Philadelphia, 2000.
- Elands, M. et al., Van telegraaf tot satelliet: 125 jaar telecommunicatie in de Koninklijke Landmacht 1874-1999, Den Haag, 1999.
- Engelen, D., Inlichtingendienst Buitenland. Een institutioneel onderzoek naar de Buitenlandse Inlichtingendienst/Inlichtingendienst Buitenland (1946-1996), 's-Gravenhage, 1996.
- Engelen, D., De Militaire Inlichtingendienst 1914-2000, Den Haag 2000.
- Franchet, Commandant; avec la collaboration de Sébastien Fontenelle, Casque bleu pour rien: ce que j'ai vraiment vu en Bosnie, Paris, 1995.
- G
- Gajic, Dobrila Glisic, Srpska Vojska. Iz Kabineta Ministra Vojnog, n.y.
- Gammer, N., From Peacekeeping to Peacemaking: Canada's Response to the Yugoslav Crisis, Montreal, 2001.
- Gates, Robert M., From the Shadows, New York, 1996
- Genscher, H.D., Erinnerungen, Berlin, 1995.
- Geraghty, Tony, BRIXMIS. The untold exploits of Britain's Most Daring Cold War Spy Mission, London, 1997.
- Geus, P.B.R. de, Staatsbelang en Krijgsmacht. De Nederlandse defensie tijdens de Koude Oorlog, Den Haag, 1998.
- Glenny, M., The Balkans: Nationalism, War and the Great Powers 1804-1999, New York, 1999.
- Godson, Roy (ed.), Intelligence Requirements for the 1980s: Clandestine Collection, Washington, D.C., 1982.
- Godson, R., May, E.R. and Schmitt, G., U.S. Intelligence at the Crossroads. Agenda for Reform, Washington, 1995.
- Godson, Roy, Dirty Tricks or Trump Cards. U.S. Covert Action & Counterintelligence, New Brunswick, 2001.
- Gow, J., Triumph of the Lack of Will: International Diplomacy and the Yugoslav War, London, 1997.
- Graaff, Bob de en Wiebes, Cees, Villa Maarheeze, De geschiedenis van de inlichtingendienst buitenland, Den Haag, 1998.
- Grant, Charles, Intimate Relations: Can Britain Play a Leading Role in European Defence – and Keep its Special Links to US Intelligence?, London, 2001.
- Guisnel, Jean, Les pires amis du monde: Les relations franco-américaines à la fin du XXè siècle, Paris, 1999.
- Gutman, R., A Witness to Genocide: the 1993 Pulitzer Prize-winning Dispatches on the 'Ethnic Cleansing' of Bosnia, New York etc., 1993.
- Gutman, R. en D. Rieff (eds.), Crimes of War: What the Public Should Know, New York/ London, 1999.
- H
- Hager, Nicky, Secret Power, Nelson, NZ, 1996.
- Hagman, Hans-Christian, UN-NATO Operational Co-operation in Peacekeeping 1992 - 1995, London, 1996, p. 63.

- Halberstam, David, War in a Time of Peace: Bush, Clinton, and the Generals, New York, 2001.
- Halilovic, S., Lukava Strategija, Sarajevo, 1997.
- Handel, Michael, The Diplomacy of Surprise, Boston, 1977
- Hart, P. 't, Groupthink in government: a study of small groups and policy failure, Leiden, 1990.
- Hartcock, Lt. Colonel Clyde T., The Peace Operations from an intelligence perspective, Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, 1999
- Hartmann, Florence, Milosevic. La diagonale du fou, Parijs, 1999.
- Herman, Michael, Intelligence power in peace and war, Cambridge, 1996
- Hren, Hatidza, Srebrenica. Het verhaal van de overlevenden, Amsterdam, 1999.
- Hersh, Seymour, The Price of Power: Kissinger in the Nixon White House, New York, 1983.
- Hill, S.M. en S.P. Malik, Peacekeeping and the United Nations, Aldershot, 1996.
- Hodzic, Sefko, Otpacaceni koverat, Sarajevo, 2000.
- Holbrooke, Richard, To End a War, New York, 1998.
- Hollingworth, L., Merry Christmas, Mr Larry, London, 1996.
- Honig, Jan Willem en Both, Norbert, Srebrenica. Record of a War Crime, London, 1996.
- Howard, M. and Paret P., (ed), Clausewitz von, Carl: On War, Princeton, 1976.
- Hughes-Wilson, John, Military Intelligence Blunders, London, 1999.
- I.
- Ignatieff, M., The Warrior's Honor: Ethnic War and the Modern Conscience. -- London, 1998.
- International Committee of the Red Cross, Missing persons on the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 3rd ed., 2 vols, Genève, 1997.
- International Council of Voluntary Agencies, The ICVA Directory: of agencies operating in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and FRY: NGO's, GO's, UN and EU Organisations Local and International, Sarajevo, 1997.
- International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Basic Documents, The Hague, 1988.
- International Crisis Group (ICG), Is Dayton failing?: Bosnia Four Years after the Peace Agreement, Brussels, 1999.
- Izetbegovic, A., Islam between East and West, Plainfield Indiana, 1999 (1984).
- J.
- Jellema, E. en Klep, Chr. (red.), First-in: de ervaringen van de commandant Bravo-compagnie Dutchbat-1 in Srebrenica, Den Haag, 1996.
- Jennsen, C. en O. Riste (eds.), Intelligence in the Cold War: Organisation, Role and International Cooperation, Oslo, 2001.
- Jensen, M.W. en Platje, G., De Marid. De Marine Inlichtingendienst van binnenuit belicht, Den Haag, 1998.
- Jong, L. de, Het Koninkrijk der Nederlanden in de Tweede Wereldoorlog, 1939 - 1945, Deel 2: Neutraal, Den Haag, 1969.
- Jopp, Mathias (ed.), The Implications of the Yugoslav Crisis for Western Europe's Foreign Relations, (Chaillot Paper 17), Paris, 1996.
- Judah, Tim, The Serbs, History, Myth & The Destruction of Yugoslavia, Essex, 1997.
- K.
- Kaldor, Mary, New & Old Wars: Organised Violence in A Global Era, Oxford, 1999.
- Kaplan, R.D, Balkan Ghosts: a Journey Through History, New York, 1996.
- Karremans, T. Srebrenica Who Cares??: een puzzel van de werkelijkheid, Nieuwegein, 1998.
- Karskens, A., Pleisters op de Ogen: de geschiedenis van de Nederlandse oorlogsverslaggeving van Heiligerlee tot Kosovo, Amsterdam, 2001.
- Klep, Christ en Gils, Richard van, Van Korea tot Kosovo, Den Haag 1999.
- Kluiters, Frans, De Nederlandse Inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten, Den Haag, 1993.
- Kluiters, Frans, De Nederlandse Inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten. Supplement, Den Haag, 1995.

- Koedijk, P., J. Linssen en D. Engelen (red.), Verspieters voor het Vaderland: Nederlandse spionage voor, tijdens en na de Koude oorlog, Den Haag, 1996.
- Kreemers, Bert, De Achterkant van de maan. Haagse schaduwen over Srebrenica, Amsterdam, 2002.
- Kurtz, H., Spin Cycle: Inside the Clinton Propaganda Machine, New York, 1998.
- L.
- Lake, Anthony, 6 Nightmares: Real Threats in a Dangerous World and How America Can Meet Them, Boston, 2000.
- Lanning, Hugh and Norton-Taylor, Richard, A Conflict of Interest: GCHQ 1984-1991, Cheltenham, 1991.
- Leary, William M., Perilous Missions. Civil Air Transport and CIA Covert Operations in Asia, University, Alabama: 1984.
- Lert, Frederic, Wings of the CIA, Paris, 1998
- Leurdijk, Dick, The United Nations and NATO in Former Yugoslavia 1991-1996, Den Haag, 1996.
- Loncle, M.F., Rapport d'information déposé en application de l'article 145 du Règlement: par la mission d'information commune (_1_) sur les événements de Srebrenica, Paris, 2001. [Assemblée Nationale, le 22 novembre 2001, nr. 3413, 2 volumes].
- Lowenthal, Mark. M., Intelligence. From Secrets to Policy, Washington DC, 2000.
- Lutgert, W. en Winter, R. de, Check The Horizon: de Koninklijke Luchtmacht en het conflict in voormalig Joegoslavië 1991-1995, Den Haag, 2001.
- M.
- Maass, P., Love Thy Neighbour: a Story of War, London, 1996.
- MacDonald, Peter, The SAS in Action, London, 1998
- MacKenzie, Lewis, Peacekeeper: The Road to Sarajevo, Vancouver, 1993
- MacKinnon, Michael G., The Evolution of US Peacekeeping Policy under Clinton: A Fairweather Friend?, London, 2000.
- Madsen, Wayne, Data Privacy Matters, Arlington, 1996.
- Magas, Branka and Zanic, Ivo, The War in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, 1991-1995, London, 1998.
- Major, John, John Major. The Autobiography, New York, 1999.
- Malcolm, Noel, Bosnia. A short history, London, 1996.
- Mangold, Tom, Cold Warrior, New York, 1991
- Marijnissen, J. en K. Glastra van Loon, De laatste oorlog: gesprekken over de nieuwe wereldorde, Amsterdam/Antwerpen, 2000.
- Markwardt, Waldemar, Erlebter BND, Berlin, 1996.
- McCarthy, S.P., The Function of Intelligence in Crisis Management: Towards an Understanding of the Intelligence Producer-consumer Dichotomy, Aldershot, 1998.
- Michas, Takis, Unholy Alliance, Greece and Milosevic's Serbia, College Station, 2002.
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1991, Den Haag, 1992
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1992, Den Haag, 1993
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1993, Den Haag, 1994
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1994, Den Haag, 1995
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1995, Den Haag, 1996
- Ministerie van Binnenlandse Zaken, Jaarverslag BVD 1996, Den Haag, 1997
- Ministerie van Defensie Debriefingsrapport, Den Haag, 1995.
- Mock, A. (Hg.), Das Balkan-Dossier: der Aggressionkrieg in Ex-Jugoslawien -- Perspektiven für die Zukunft, Wien, 1997_.
- Monnery, D., Soldier O: SAS: The Bosnian Inferno, Rochester, 1994.
- Morillon, Ph., Croire et oser: chronique de Sarajevo, Paris, 1993.
- Morillon, Ph., Mon credo, Paris, 1999.
- N.
- NAIC, Draft, Technical Requirements Document (TRD) for the SIGINT System Integration Contract, 24/07/00.
- Neillands, Robin, In the Combat Zone. Special Forces since 1945, London, 1997.

O.

O'shea, Brendan, Crisis at Bihac. Bosnia's Bloody Battlefield, Stroud: 1998.

Off, Carol, The Lion, The Fox & The Eagle, Montreal, 2000.

Owen, David, Balkan Odyssey, New York, 1997

Owen, R.C., Deliberate Force: a Case Study in Effective Air Campaigning, Maxwell AFB, 1998.

Owens, B. with E. Offley, Lifting the Fog of War, New York, 2000.

P.

Parenti, Michael, To Kill a Nation. The Attack on Yugoslavia, London, 2000.

Pellnäs, B., Utan Slut? Kriget på Balkan -- bilder fran ett FN-uppdrag, Falun, 1995.

Pellnäs, B., De hundra dagarna. På gränsvakt i Serbien, Falun, 1996.

Perez de Cuellar, Javier, Pilgrimage for Peace: A Secretary-General's Memoir, New York, 1997

Pickert, Perry L., Intelligence for Multilateral Decision and Action, Washington DC, 1997.

Politi, A. (ed.), Toward a European Intelligence Policy, Paris, 1998 [Chaillot Paper 34].

Polmar, N. and Allen, T.B., Spy Book. The Encyclopedia of Espionage, New York, 1998

Polmar, N., Spyplane. The U-2 History Declassified, Osceola, 2001.

Powell, C.L., met J.E. Persico, A Soldier's Way: An Autobiography, London, 1995.

Powell, C.L. en J.E. Persico, My American Journey, New York, 1996.

Prados, John, President's Secret Wars. CIA and Pentagon Covert Operations since World War II, New York, 1986.

Pugliese, David, Canada's Secret Commandos. The Unauthorized Story of Joint Task Force Two, Ottawa, 2002.

R.

Ranelagh, John, The Agency. The Rise and Decline of the CIA, New York, 1987

Reese, Mary Ellen, General Reinhard Gehlen: The CIA-Connection, Fairfax, 1990.

Report of the Select Committee on Intelligence US Senate, 'U.S Actions Regarding Iranian and Other Arms Transfers to the Bosnian Army, 1994-1995', Washington DC, 1996.

Richelson, Jeffrey T. en Ball, Desmond, The Ties That Bind, Boston: 1990

Richelson, Jeffrey T., The U.S. Intelligence Community, Boulder, 1995

Richelson, Jeffrey T., The Wizards of Langley, Boulder, 2001

Richelson, Jeffrey T. (editor), The U-2, OXCART, and the Srebrenica-71. U.S. Aerial Espionage in the Cold War and Beyond, Washington DC, 2002 (NSA Electronic Briefing Book No. 74).

Rieff, David, Slaughterhouse. Bosnia and the failure of the west, London, 1995.

Ripley, Tim, Mercenaries. Soldiers of Fortune, Bristol, 1997.

Ripley, Tim, Operation Deliberate Force. The UN and NATO Campaign in Bosnia 1995, Lancaster, 1999

Riste, Olav, The Norwegian Intelligence Service, 1945-1970, London, 1999

Rohde, D., Endgame: the Betrayal and Fall of Srebrenica, Europe's worst Massacre since World War II, New York, 1997.

Rohde, David, A Safe Area. Srebrenica: Europe's Worst Massacre since the Second World War, Londen, 1997

Rose, General Sir Michael, Fighting for Peace, Bosnia 1994, London, 1998.

S.

Sadkovich, James J., The U.S. Media and Yugoslavia, 1991 – 1995, Westport, 1999, Scheffers, Joop, Ambassadeur in Zagreb, 1994-1998, Den Haag, 2000.

Schmidt, Gustav, A History of NATO - The First Fifty Years, Volume I, New York, 2001.

Schmidt-Eendoom, Erich, Der Schattenkrieger, Klaus Kinkel und der BND, Düsseldorf, 1995.

Schmidt-Eenboom, Erich, Schnüffler ohne Nase. Der BND, Düsseldorf, 1993.

Seierstad, Å., Med Ryggen mot Verden. Portretter fra Serbia, Oslo, 2000.

Shawcross, W., Deliver Us From Evil: Warlords & Peacekeepers in a World of Endless Conflict, London, 2000.

Shevchenko, Arkady, Breaking with Moscow, New York, 1985.

- Shukman, H. (ed), Agents for Change. Intelligence Services in the 21st Century, London, 2000.
- Silber, L. and A. Little, The death of Yugoslavia, London, 1996.
- Simms, Brendan, Unfinest Hour. Britain and the destruction of Bosnia, London, 2001.
- Sluik/Kurpershoek (red.), De Duiveljager. Het verhaal van een Nederlands soldaat in Kroatische dienst, Amsterdam 2000.
- Smith, Michael, New Cloaks. Old Daggers. How Britain's Spies Came in From The Cold, London, 1996.
- Spence, Cameron, All Necessary Measures, London, 1999.
- Sremic, D., War of Words: Washington Tackles the Yugoslav Conflict, Washington DC, 2000.
- Staden, A. van, De fuik van Srebrenica, Den Haag, 1997.
- Stankovic, Milos, Trusted Mole. A Soldier's Journey into Bosnia's Heart of Darkness, London, 2001.
- Stoltenberg, Th. en K. Eide, De tusene dagenen: Fredsmeklere på Balkan, Oslo, 1996.
- Stover, E. en G. Peress, The Graves: Srebrenica and Vukovar, Zurich, 1998.
- Sudetic, C., Blood and Vengeange: One Family's Story of the War in Bosnia, New York, 1998.
- T.
- Taylor, S. en Brian Nolan, Tested mettle. Canada's Peacekeepers at War, Ottawa, 1998.
- Taylor, Scott, Diary of an UNCivil War. The violent aftermath of the Kosovo conflict, Ottawa, 2002.
- Taylor, Scott, INAT. Images of Serbia & the Kosovo Conflict, Ottawa, 2000.
- Theoharis, A.G. (ed.), A Culture of Secrecy: the Government Versus the People's Right to Know, Lawrence, KS, 1998.
- Thune, H. en V.V. Hansen, Etter Srebrenica: Massakre, militærmarkt og moral, Oslo, 1998.
- Tomlinson, R., The Big Breach. From Top Secret to Maximum Security, Edinburgh, 2001.
- U.
- Ulfkotte, Udo, Verschlussache BND, Munchen, 1997.
- Urban, Mark, UK Eyes Alpha. The Inside story of British Intelligence, London, 1996.
- United Nations, Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to General Assembly Resolution 53/35 (1998) 'srebrenica Report'. -- United Nations: 1999.
- U.S. House of Representatives, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Report No. 95-1795, Annual Report by the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, 1978.
- U.S. House of Representatives, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Annual Report by the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, 95th Congress, 2nd Session, 1978.
- U.S. Marine Corps, Marine Corps Warfighting Publication (MCWP) 2-15.2, Signals Intelligence, June 1999.
- U.S. Senate, Report No. 94-755, Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations With Respect to Intelligence Activities, 94th Congress, 2nd Session, Book III, 1976.
- U.S. Special Operations Command, 10th Anniversary History, MacDill AFB, Florida, 1997.
- V
- Valk, Gilliam de, De BVD en Inlichtingenrapportages, Nijmegen, 1996.
- Välimäki, Pasi, Intelligence in Peace Support Operations, Helsinki, 2000.
- Védrine H., Les cartes de la France à l'heure de la mondialisation, Paris, 2000.
- Védrine, H., Les mondes de Francois Mitterand: a l'Elysee 1981-1995, Paris, 1996.
- Vertrekpunt Den Haag, Deel 1 Rapport, Rapport van de TCBU, Den Haag 2000.
- W
- Walsh, Lawrence E., Iran-Contra: The Final Report, New York, 1994.
- Wentz, Larry, Lessons from Bosnia: the IFOR Experience, Washington DC, 1997.
- Westerman, F. & Rijs, B., Het Zwartste Scenario, Amsterdam, 1997.
- Wind, O. van der (ed), Rapport gebaseerd op de debriefing Srebrenica, Assen, 1995.
- Wongergem, G., Je komt anders terug: aantekeningen uit het dagboek van een VN-waarnemer in Sarajevo en Kostajnica (sector Noord), Amsterdam, 1993.
- Woodward, B., The Choice: how Clinton won, New York, 1997.
- Woodward, S.L., Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution After The Cold War, Washington D.C., 1995.

Woolsey, R.J., Partners for Peace: Strengthening Collective Security for the 21st Century: a Report of the Global Policy Project The United Nations Association of the United States of America, New York, 1992.

Y.

Yost, D.S., NATO Transformed: the Alliances New Roles in International Security, Washington D.C., 1998.

Z.

Zimmermann, W., Origins of a catastrophe: Yugoslavia and its destroyers: America's last ambassador tells what happened and why, New York, 1996.

Zolling, H. and Höhne, H., Pullach intern, Hamburg, 1970.

Contributions to Books

A.

Aid, Matthew M., 'Not So Anonymous: Parting the Veil of Secrecy About the National Security Agency', in Athan G. Theoharis (ed.), A Culture of Secrecy: The Government Versus the People's Right to Know, Lawrence, KS, 1998.

Aid, Matthew M., and Wiebes, Cees, 'Introduction on the importance of SIGINT in the Cold War', in: Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.

Aldrich, Richard J., 'GCHQ and Sigint in the Early Cold War 1945 - 1970', in: Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.

Allen, Robert J., 'Intelligence Support for Peace Operations', in: Perry L. Pickert, Intelligence for Multilateral Decision and Action, Washington DC, Joint Military Intelligence College, 1997.

C.

Copley, Gregory, 'Intelligence and the Iraqi Invasion: Why Did So Many Services Fail?', in: Strategic Policy, September 1990.

Christianson, David L., "Signals Intelligence," in Gerald W. Hople and Bruce W. Watson (eds), The Military Intelligence Community, Boulder, 1986.

D.

Dreyfuss, Robert, 'TECHINT: The NSA, the NRO, and NIMA', in: Graig Eisendrath, National Insecurity. U.S. Intelligence After the Cold War, Philadelphia, 2000.

F.

Fort, Randall M., 'Economic Espionage', in: R. Godson, E.R. May and G. Schmitt, U.S. Intelligence at the Crossroads. Agenda for Reform, Washington, 1995.

Faligot, Roger, 'France, Sigint and the Cold War', in: Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.

G.

Godson, R. 'Counterintelligence: An Introduction', in: Roy Godson, Intelligence Requirements for the 1980s: counterintelligence, Washington, 1980

Godson, R., 'Covert Action: neither exceptional tool nor magic bullet', in: R. Godson, E.R. May and G. Schmitt, U.S. Intelligence at the Crossroads. Agenda for Reform, Washington, 1995

H.

Hannay, Sir David, 'Intelligence and international agencies', in: Harold Shukman (editor), Agents for Change. Intelligence Services in the 21st Century, London, 2000.

Hartmann, Florence, 'Chronologie d'une négligence criminelle: le génocide de Srebrenica', in: M.F. Allain, e.a., L'ex Yougoslavie en Europe. De la faillite des Démocraties au Processus de Paix, Paris, 1997.

Hays III, Joseph G., 'Oversight of U.S. Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping Operations', in: Perry L. Pickert, Intelligence for Multilateral Decision and Action, Washington DC, Joint Military Intelligence College, 1997.

- Hilsman, Roger, 'After the Cold War. The Need for intelligence', in: Graig Eisendrath, National Insecurity. U.S. Intelligence After the Cold War, Philadelphia, 2000.
- R.
- Rudner, M., 'Canada's Communications Security Establishment from Cold War to Globalization', in Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.
- S.
- Sargent, Lt. Col. Richard L., 'Deliberate Force' in: Robert C. Owen, Deliberate Force. A Case Study in Effective Air Campaigning, Maxwell AFB, 1998
- Schmidt-Eenboom, E., 'The Bundesnachrichtendienst, the Bundeswehr and Sigint in the Cold War and After', in: Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, Londen, 2001.
- Sims, Jennifer, 'What is Intelligence? Information for decision makers', in: R. Godson, E.R. May and G. Schmitt, U.S. Intelligence at the Crossroads. Agenda for Reform, Washington, 1995.
- W.
- Wiebes, Cees, "Hookers and sportscars?". De theorie van het inlichtingenwerk', in: P. Koedijk, J. Linssen en D. Engelen (red.), Verspieters voor het Vaderland. Nederlandse spionage voor, tijdens en na de Koude oorlog, Den Haag, 1996.
- Wiebes, Cees, 'The Netherlands Intelligence Community: Past, Present and Future', in: Lars Christian Jennsen and Olav Riste (Eds), Intelligence in the Cold War. Organisation, Role and International Cooperation, Oslo, 2001.
- Wiebes, Cees, 'Dutch Sigint during the Cold War, 1945-1994', in: Matthew Aid and Cees Wiebes (ed.) Secrets of Signals Intelligence during the Cold War and Beyond, London, 2001.
- Woolsey, James, 'The American Intelligence Community', in: Hesi Carmel (editor), Intelligence for Peace. The Role of Intelligence in Times of Peace, London, 1999.

Articles and Periodicals

- A.
- Agee, Lt. Colonel Collin A., 'Too Much Data --Too Little Intel?', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, January-March 1999.
- Aid, Matthew M., 'The Time of Troubles: The US National Security Agency in the Twenty-First Century', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 15, No. 3 (Autumn 2000).
- SR-71 Blackbird back in business, Air Combat Command News, 24/01/97.
- 'Les Avions-Espions Francais Gabriel et Sarigue', Air & Cosmos/Aviation International, No. 1460, 21-27/02/94.
- Andrew, Christopher, 'Conclusion: An Agenda for Future Research', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 12 (January 1997) 1.
- Ashton, B., 'Making Peace Agreements Work: United Nations Experience in the Former Yugoslavia', Cornell International Law Journal, Vol. 30 (1997) 3.
- 'Bosnia Underscores Intelligence Gaps', Aviation Week & Space Technology, Vol. 142 (1995) 12.
- 'French Support Bosnian ELINT Ops', Aviation Week & Space Technology, 14/08/95.
- B.
- Bata, J., 'serbiens geheime Auslandskontakte', in: Aussenpolitik, No. IV, 1993
- Bazolu, Duygu, 'Implications for Turkey's relations with Western Europe', in: Mathias Jopp (ed.), The Implications of the Yugoslav Crisis for Western Europe's Foreign Relations, Chaillot Paper 17, Paris, 1996.
- Binder, David, 'Bosnia's bombers', in: The Nation, Vol. 261, No. 10, 02/10/95.
- Betts, R.K., 'Intelligence Warnings: Old Problems, New Agendas', in: Parameters, Spring 1998.
- Boyd, Colonel H. Allen, 'Joint Intelligence in Support of Peace Operations', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, January-March 1999.

- Boyle, Alan, 'spies in the watch for atrocities' in: MSNBC Interactive, 26/03/99.
- Brady, Christopher, 'Intelligence Failures: Plus Ç Change ...', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 8 (October 1993) 4.
- O'Brien, K. en Nusbaum, J., 'Intelligence gathering for asymmetric Threats, Part I and II', in: Jane's Intelligence Review, October and November 2000.
- Brands, William J., 'Intelligence and Foreign Policy: Dilemmas of A Democracy', in: Foreign Affairs, Vol. 47(1969) 2.
- Burton-Rose, D. en Madsen, W., 'Corporate Soldiers. The U.S. Government Privatizes the Use of Force', in: Multinational Monitor, March 1999.
- C.
- Charters, David A., 'Out of the Closet: Intelligence Support for Post-Modernist Peacekeeping', in: The Pearson Papers, No. 4, Intelligence and Peacekeeping, Halifax, 1999.
- Clark, Phillip S., 'Russia has no reconnaissance satellites in orbit', in: Jane's Defence Weekly, 08/05/01.
- Covault, Graig, 'Joint Stars Patrols Bosnia', in: Aviation Week and Space Technology, 19/02/96.
- Crawford, Timothy W., 'Why Ever Not Never? Intelligence Cooperation in United Nations Security Affairs', Paper prepared for the Annual Conference of the Canadian Association for Security and Intelligence Studies, Ottawa, 28/09/02.
- D.
- Deutch, J., 'The CIA and Bosnia: An Exchange', in: New York Review of Books, 06/06/96.
- Diamond, John M., 'Re-examing Problems and Prospects in U.S. Imagery Intelligence', in: International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 14, No. 1, 2001.
- Dixon, Lt. Commander J.D.R., UAV Employment in Kosovo: Lessons for the Operational Commander, Naval War College paper, 08/02/00.
- Dorn, A. Walter, 'The Cloak and the Blue Beret: Limitations on Intelligence in UN Peacekeeping', in: International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 12 (1998) 4.
- Dilas, Milivoj, 'The Wiretapping Affair', in: Nacional, Issue 293, 28/06/01.
- E.
- Eklund, Dylan, 'The Reconnaissance Squadron', in: Air World International, November 1995.
- Eriksson, Pär, 'Intelligence and Peacekeeping Operations', in: International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 10(1997) 1.
- F.
- Fox, Barry, 'The Spy who bugged me. Why make it easy to eavesdrop on satellite telephone calls?', in: New Scientist Magazine, 11/03/00.
- 'French Support Bosnian ELINT Ops', Aviation Week & Space Technology, 14/08/95
- Fulghum, David A., "Sigint Aircraft May Face Obsolescence in Five Years," Aviation Week & Space Technology, 21/10/96.
- Fulghum, David A., 'Flexibility, Endurance Are Valued EP-3 Assets', in: Aviation Week & Space Technology, 05/05/97.
- Fulghum, David A., "Compute Combat Rules Frustrate the Pentagon", in: Aviation Week & Space Technology, 15/09/97.
- G.
- Garthoff, R. and Knight, A., "New Evidence on Soviet Intelligence: The KGB's 1967 Annual Report," Cold War International History Project Bulletin, No. 10, March 1998.
- Gervasi, S., 'Involvement of the US and German intelligence services', in: Strategic Policy, No. 3, 1995.
- Gramer Jr., Lt. Col. George K., USA, 'Operation Joint Endeavor: Combined-Joint Intelligence in Peace Enforcement Operations', Military Intelligence, October-December 1996.
- H.
- Handel, M., 'The Study of Intelligence, in: ORBIS, Vol. 26, No. 4 (Winter 1983).
- Harlfinger, Mark, USAF, 'C-ROFA Becomes Arsenal of IO', Spokesman, December 1997.
- Harvey, D., 'Intelligence Notes', in: American Intelligence Journal, Vol. 16, No. 1 (Spring/Summer 1995).

- Hayden, Michael V., 'Warfighters and Intelligence: one team - one fight', in: Defense Intelligence Journal, Vol. 4, No. 2 (1995).
- Hayden, Robert M., 'Reply', in: Slavic Review, Vol. 55 (Winter 1996) 4.
- Henriksen, Thomas H., 'Covert Operations, Now More Than Ever', in: Orbis, Vol. 44 (Winter 2000) 1.
- Herman, Michael, Intelligence after the Cold War: contributions to international security?, unpublished paper.
- Herman, Michael, Diplomacy and Intelligence, Diplomatic Studies Programme Discussion Paper No. 39, 1998.
- Hersh, Seymour M., 'The Intelligence Gap: How the Digital Age Left Our Spies Out in the Cold', in: The New Yorker, 06/12/99.
- Hitz, F.P., 'Unleashing the Rogue Elephant: September 11 and Letting the CIA be the CIA', Harvard Journal of Law & Public Policy, Vol. 25 (Spring 2002) 2.
- I.
- 'Intelligence and policy: What is constant? What is changing?', in: Commentary, No. 45 (June 1994).
- J
- 'The Army of Bosnia and Herzegovina', in: Janes's Intelligence Review, February 1993.
- Jelincic, Berislav, 'Croatian citizen is the primary financier of both Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic', in: Nacional, Issue 294, 05/07/01.
- Jonge, W. de, 'Train and Equip', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 169 (September 2000) 9.
- Johnson, Loch K., 'Making the Intelligence 'Cycle' work', in: The International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 1 (1986) 1.
- Johnson, Loch K., 'spies', in: Foreign Policy, (September 2000).
- Johnston, Paul, 'No Cloak and Dagger Required: Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 12 (1997) 4.
- Jones, G., 'Working with the CIA', in: Parameters, Winter 2001, Volume 2.
- K.
- Kahn, David, 'Cryptology', in: The Encyclopedia Americana, 1987, Vol. 8, p. 276.
- Kappen, F.E. van, 'strategische inlichtingen en de Verenigde Naties', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 11.
- Kassing, J.R., 'De NAVO en inlichtingen', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001), 11.
- Katz, Ytzhak & Vardi, Ygal, 'strategies for Data Gathering and Evaluation in the Intelligence Community', in: The International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 5 (1991) 3.
- Kolb, Richard, 'Into the Heart of Darkness. Cold War Africa: Part 2 Angola', in: VFW Magazine, May 1999.
- Kromhout, Gert, 'Overwerk voor de Dragon Lady', in: ARMEX. Onafhankelijk Defensiemagazine, Maart 1997.
- Kromhout, Gert, 'Op de grens van lucht en ruimte', in: De Vliegende Hollander, No. 3/97.
- Kuijken, W.J., 'De coördinatie van de Nederlandse inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten in verleden, heden en toekomst', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 11.
- L.
- Lake, A., 'Bosnia: America's Interest and America's Role', in: Inside The Army, 11/04/94.
- Lane, C. and Shanker, T., 'Bosnia: What the CIA Didn't Tell Us', in: The New York Review of Books, 09/05/96.
- Last, David M., 'Peacekeeping Doctrine and Conflict Resolution Techniques', in: Armed Forces & Society, Vol. 22 (1995) 2.
- Loo, P.E. van, 'Een open oog voor de Balkan', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 12.
- Lum, Z., 'Balkan Eyes: Airborne Recon over Bosnia', in: IED On-Line, November 1995.
- M.
- Macartney, J., 'Intelligence: A Consumer's Guide', in: The International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 2 (1988) 4.

- Macdonald, Lt.-Colonel Oliver A.K., 'Peacekeeping Lessons Learned: An Irish Perspective', in: International Peacekeeping, Vol. 4 (1997) 4.
- Macdonald, Margaret S. and Oettinger, Anthony G., 'Information Overload', Harvard International Review, Vol. XXIV (Fall 2002), 3.
- Macko, Steve, 'The SR-71 Blackbird Rises Like a Phoenix', in: Emergency Net News Service, Vol. 2, No. 45, 14/02/96.
- McCormick, Gordon H., 'Surprise, Perceptions, and Military Style', in: ORBIS, Vol. 26 (Winter 1983) 4.
- McPeck, Major Robert L., 'Electronic Warfare British Style', Military Intelligence, January - March 1996.
- Metselaar, M.V., 'Understanding Failures in Intelligence Estimates - Unprofor, the Dutch, and the Bosnian-Serb Attack on Srebrenica', in: Netherlands Annual Review of Military Studies. The Bosnian Experience, 1997.
- Milivojevic, M., 'Croatia's Intelligence Services', in: Jane's Intelligence Review, Vol. 6 (1995) 9.
- Milivojevic, M., 'slovenia - An Arms Bazaar', in: Jane's Intelligence Review, Vol. 6 (1994) 11.
- Milivojevic, M., 'The Balkan Medellin', in: Jane's Intelligence Review, Vol. 7 (1995) 2.
- Millis, John, 'Address at the CIRA Luncheon, 5 October 1998; John Millis' Speech', in: CIRA Newsletter, Vol. XXIII (Winter 1998/1999) 4.
- Morrison, D., 'How Bosnia is Becoming a Priority', in: National Journal, 20/08/94.
- N.
- 'Naval Security Group Sailors of the Year', in: NCVA Cryptolog, Summer 1997.
- Neville-Jones, Dame Pauline, 'Dayton, IFOR and Alliance Relations in Bosnia', Survival, Vol. 38 (Winter 1996-97) 4.
- Niedrauer, Captain Bruce A., 'Joint Stars Support to Special Operations Command', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, (October-December 1996).
- Nomikos, John N., 'Intelligence Requirements for Peacekeeping Operations', in: RIEAS Papers and Reports, 07/02/01.
- O.
- Ofri, A., 'Crisis and Opportunity Forecasting', in: ORBIS, Vol. 26 (Winter 1983) 4.
- Onderdelinden, E.A.O., 'Verbindingsinlichtingen. Wat is dat eigenlijk?', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (December 2001) 12.
- P.
- Peleman, J., 'Wapenhandel naar Bosnië-Herzegovina', in: Noord-Zuid Cabier, No. 22 (3), September 1997.
- Pickering, Raymond D., 'Tactical UAV's: A Supported Unit's Primer', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, Vol. 23 (April-June 1997) 2.
- Pocock, C., 'U-2: The Second Generation', in: World Air Power Journal, Spring 1997.
- Potter, William C., Djuro Miljanic en Ivo Slaus, 'Tito's Nuclear Legacy', in: Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, Vol. 56 (March 2000) 2.
- Pukanic, I., 'Echelon Spy System' en 'The Details behind the Lepej Affair', in: Nacional, Issue 291, 14/06/01.
- Pukanic, I., 'The Wiretapping Fever has Shaken the New Government', in: Nacional, Issue 292, 21/06/01.
- Q.
- Quiggin, T., Response to 'No Cloak and Dagger Required: Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 13(1998) 4.
- Quiggin, T., 'srebrenica en de internationale gemeenschap in Bosnië', in: De Internationale Spectator, Vol. 52 (Februari 1998) 2.
- R.
- 'U.S. Electronic Espionage: A Memoir', in: Ramparts, August 1972.
- Ramsbotham, Sir David, 'Analysis and Assessment for Peacekeeping Operations', Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 10 (October 1995), 4.
- Rathmell, A., 'Privatising intelligence', in: Cambridge Review of International Affairs, Vol. XI (1998) 2.

- Reijn, Generaal-majoor Joop van, 'De Militaire Inlichtingendienst, vandaag en morgen', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (November 2001) 11.
- Richelson, J., 'As World Fiddled Army Intel gathered World Of Serb Butchery', in: Defense Week, Vol. 17, No. 37, 16/09/96.
- Richelson, J., 'Examining US intelligence failures' in: Jane's Intelligence Review, September 2000.
- Ripley, T., 'Operation Deny Flight', in: World Air Power Journal, Vol. 16, Spring 1994.
- Ripley, T., 'UAVs over Kosovo - did the Earth move?', in: Defence Systems Daily, 01/12/99.
- Rogers, A., 'Yugoslavia', in: Flashpoint 1994, London, 1994.
- Rosenau, W., 'A Deafening Silence: US Policy and the Sigint Facility at Lourdes', Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 9 (October 1994) 4.
- Roy, H.K., 'Betrayal in the Balkans: undercover Central Intelligence Agency officer introduced to Iranian Intelligence', in: World and I, Vol. 16, No. 8, 01/08/01.
- Ruggie, John Gerard, 'Peacekeeping and U.S. interests', in: The Washington Quarterly, Vol. 17 (1994), 4.
- Russell, Richard L., 'CIA's Strategic Intelligence in Iraq', Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 117 (Summer 2002) 2.
- S.
- Smith, C., 'The information vacuum cleaner', in: WorldNetDaily, 09/04/00.
- Smith, H., 'Intelligence and UN Peacekeeping', in: Survival, Vol. 36 (1994) 3.
- Sray, John, 'selling the Bosnian Myth', in: Foreign Military Studies, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, October 1995
- Stout, M. en Quiggin, T., 'Exploiting the new high resolution satellite imagery: Darwinian imperatives?', in: Commentary, No. 75 (Summer 1998).
- Sudetic, C., 'The Reluctant Gendarme', in: The Atlantic Monthly, April 2000.
- T.
- Taplin, Winn L., 'six General Principles of Intelligence', in: The International Journal of Intelligence and Counterintelligence, Vol. 3 (1989) 4.
- Theunens, R., 'Intelligence en vredesoperaties', in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 11.
- Thomson, A., 'satellite vulnerability: a post-Cold War issue?', in: Space Policy, Vol. 11 (February 1995) 1.
- Todd, Rear Admiral J.J.R., 'UK Perspectives of Current Security Arrangements', in: RUSI Journal, Vol. 139 (February 1994) 1.
- Travers, R., 'The Coming Intelligence Failure', Studies in Intelligence, Vol. 1, (1997) 1.
- Tudjman, M., 'The First Five Years of the Croatian Intelligence Service', in: National Security and The Future, Vol. 1 (Summer 2000) 2.
- Turner, S., "Intelligence for a New World Order," Foreign Affairs, Fall 1991.
- U.
- U.S. House of Representatives, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Report 105-508, Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1999, 105th Congress, 2nd Session, 05/05/98.
- V.
- Villeneuve, Captain Daniel, 'Intelligence and the UN: Lessons From Bosnia-A Canadian Experience', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, No. 4 (October-December 1996).
- W.
- Warner, M. 'Wanted: A Definition of Intelligence', Studies in Intelligence, Vol. 46 (2002) 3.
- Westerfield, B., 'America and the World of Intelligence Liaison', in: Intelligence and National Security, Vol. 11 (July 1996) 3.
- Wiebes, Cees en Zeeman, Bert, "I don't need your handkerchiefs': Holland's experience of crisis consultation in NATO", in: International Affairs, Vol. 66 (January 1990) 1.
- Wilson, Ronald W., 'Eyes in the Sky: Arial Systems', in: Military Intelligence Professional Bulletin, Vol. 22 (July-September 1996) 3.
- Z.
- Zubok, Vladislav M., "Spy vs. Spy: The KGB vs. the CIA, 1960-1962," Cold War International History Project Bulletin, No. 4, Fall 1994.

Zumach, A. 'US intelligence knew Serbs were planning an assault on Srebrenica', in: Basic Reports, No. 47, 16/10/95.

Zumach, A. 'New evidence further implicates France in fall of Srebrenica', in: Basic Reports, No. 56, 11/02/97.

Zumach, A., 'Bosnian Challenge', Covert Action Quarterly (1995) 54.

Zumach, A., 'Andreas Zumach Responds to Philips', in: Covert Action Quarterly (Winter 1995-96) 55.

Newspapers, journals and other publications

Agence France-Presse

Air Force Magazine

Algemeen dagblad

ANP

ANP English News Bulletin

Associated Press

Associated Press Worldstream

Aviation Week and Space Technology

The Baltimore Sun

Banja Luka Srpska Vojska

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

Belgrade Glas Javnost/i

Bosnia Report.

The Boston Globe

Chicago-Sun Times

The Daily Mail

The Daily Telegraph

Defensiekrant

Drentsche Courant

Elsevier

European Stars & Stripes

FBIS-WEU

Financial Times

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung

De Gelderlander

De Groene Amsterdammer

The Globe and Mail

The Guardian

Haagsche Courant

The Herald (Glasgow)

HP/De Tijd

Il Messaggero

Il Mondo

The Independent

Intelligence Newsletter

International Herald Tribune

IWPR's Tribunal Update

Le Monde Du Renseignement

Leidsch Dagblad

De Limburger

The Los Angeles Times

Magazin

METRO
 The Nation
 Nederlands Dagblad
 Newsday
 The New Republic
 The New York Times
 New York Review of Books
 NRC Handelsblad
 The Observer
 Het Parool
 The Phoenix Gazette
 Reuters
 The Rose and the Laurel: Journal of the Intelligence Corps
 Sarajevo Slobodna Bosna Borba
 South China Morning Post
 Srpska Vojska
 De Standaard
 De Stem
 Süddeutsche Zeitung
 The Sunday Telegraph
 Sydney Morning Herald
 Die Berliner Tageszeitung
 De Telegraaf
 Time
 The Times
 The Toronto Star
 Tribune
 Trouw
 The Sunday Telegraph
 The Sunday Times
 Sueddeutsche Zeitung
 Sydney Morning Herald
 U.S. News & World Report
 Vesti
 De Volkskrant
 Vrij Nederland
 The Washington Times
 Die Welt

INDEX

Aidid Mohammed Farrah
 Akashi Yashusi
 Albright Madeleine
 Alkemade F.H.
 Allard Kenneth Almstrom John
 Ames Aldrich
 Andreev Viktor
 Andrew Christopher
 Annan Kofi

Arafat Yasser
Aristide J.B.
'Arkan' Zeljko Raznjatovic
Arlefalk G.
Ashton Barry W.
Baal A.P.P.M.
van 'Babo' see Friket Abdic
Bache K.
Baker James Banbury Tony Baril Maurice
Bastiaans G.J.M.
Bauleke Gary Baxter Jim
Becirovic Ibrahim
Becirovic Ramiz
Beek A.L. ter
Behmen Omer
Beks J.
Bektic Nedzad
Bell Jesudas
Bell Martin
Berger Sandy
Besier A.P.
Bhutto Benazir
Biden Joseph R.
Biegman N.H.
Bildt Carl
Binder David
Biser Ken
Black Bill
Blair Tony Bleumink Ad
Boban Mate
Boering Piet
Bokhoven Herman
Bos Douwe van de
Bosch J.M.J.
Bouchard Yvan
Boutros Ghali Boutros
Boyd Richard
Brady C.
Brantz C.L.
Breemen H.G.B. van den
Brinkman J.W.
Briquemont F.
Bringa Tune
Bulatovic Ljiljana
Bush George
Butler Richard
Caris A.A.L.

Carter Jimmy
Casey William
Cengic Halid ('Hadzija')
Cengic Hasan
Cengic Muhammed
Charters David
Ciller Tansu
Chirac J.
Christopher Warren
Chrétien Jean
Claes W.
Clark Wesley
Clinton William Jefferson
Cooke Jonathan
Copley G.
Corwin Philip
Cosic, Kresimir
Cot Jean
Couzy H.A.
Crabbe R.R.
Craig Robert
Crawford Timothy
Dallaire Romeo
Dedden B.
Del Ponte Carla
Delic Rasim
Delic Sead
Derksen A.J.
Deutch John
Dewatre Jacques
Doctors van Leeuwen Arthur
Dole Robert
Dorn Walter
Dorril Stephen
Draskovic Vuk
Dudakovic A.
Dudic Ibro
Duijn L.C. van
Duijn Piet
Dukic Rajko
Dulles Allen W.
Eikelboom J.H.L.
Eilertsen Knut
Eisele Manfred
Ende Marga van der
Engelberg Stephen
Engelen J.H.M.
Engelen Dick
Escobar Pablo
Everts Peer
Faisal Prince Turki al

Felix M.C.J.
Franken R.A.
Franssen N.
Freeh Louis
French Peter
Fuerth Leon
Galbraith Peter
Galvin John R.
Ganic Ejup
Gannon John
Gates Robert
Gati Tobi
Gehlen Reinhard
Genscher HansDietrich
Germanos Raymond
Gharekhan Ghinmaya
Glaubitz B.O.J.K.
Gmelich Meijling J.J.C.
Gobilliard Herve
Goldstone Richard
Gore Al
Goulding Sir Marrack I.
Gowing Nick
Granic Mate
Grave F.H.G. de
Gray A.M.
Gudmundsson R.
Gutman Roy
Gvero Milan
Haan A. de
Hadzihasanovic Enver
'Hadzija' (see: Halid Cengic)
Haglund Magnus
Hajrulahovic M
Halberstam David
Halilovic Sefer ('Halil')
Hall Keith
Hammerskjöld Dag
Handel Michael Hannay Sir David
Hartmann Florence
Hassanein Elfatih
Hatton Rick
Haukland Hagrup
Hayden Michael Heinrich Jean
Helso K.
Hennessy Peter
Herman Michael
Hilderink C.G.J.
Hoekstra R.J.

Holbrooke Richard
Holm Hans
Hunter Robert E.
Hurd Douglas
Hussein Saddam
Idsinga S.W. van
Indjic Milenko
Inge Sir Peter
Ivic Jovan ('Jovo')
Izetbegovic Alija
Jankovic Radoslav
Janvier M.B.
Johnson Loch K.
Johnston Paul
Jones Timothy C.
Jonge J.H.de.
Joulwan George
Jovanovic Zoran
'Jovo' (see: Jovan Ivic)
Kappen F.H.van
Karadzic Radovan
Karremans Th. J.P.
Kertes Mihajl
Khamenei Ali
Kievits A.
Kinkel Klaus
Kisic Hajrudin
Kissinger Henry
Knapp J.C.F.
Koestal E.A.W.
Kok Piet
Kok Wim
Krajisnik Mirko
Krajisnik Momcilo
Krasni Boris
Krstic Radislav
Lake Anthony
Lakonovski Sergei
Lane Charles
Lanxade J.
Lapresle B.G. de
Last David
Le Hardy C.A.
Lieberman J.
Ljunggren Ingmar
Lubbers R.F.M.
Macartney J.
MacInnes J.
MacKenzie Lewis
MacKenzie King W.
Maisonneuve M.

Makar Andjelko
Marchal Luc
Marguin J.
Martin W.H.
Masic Nijaz
Matovic Vladimir
Matthijssen C.J.
McConnell John
Mendiluce Jose Maria
Menem C.
Menzies John
Metselaar M.V.
Mierlo H.A.F.M.O. van
Miers Sir David
Mihailovic Cedomir
Milanovic Manojlo
Millis John
Milosevic Slobodan
Milovanovic Dragan
Milovanovic Manojlo
Milutinovic Milovan
Mitchell Bernon F.
Mladic Ratko
Moldestad Ivan
Moltke Helmut von
Moore David
Morgan Ric
Morillon Ph.P.L.A.
Mubarak Hosni
Muhidin L.
Mulder M.
Muminovic Semsudin
Muratovic Hasan
Murinovic Semsudin
Mustafic Deli
Nambiar Satish
Nasir Javed
Neitzke Ron
Neville-Jones Dame Pauline
Nicolai C.H.
Nieminen Tauno
Nikolic Momir
Nixon Richard M.
Nolte B
Nunn Sam
Obrenovic Dragan
O'Grady Scott
Omerbasic Sefko
Oric Naser
O'shea Brendan
Owen Lord David

Ozal T.
Palomar Juan
Pardew James
Pargan Mehmed
Patchett Bob
Patijn M.
Perez de Cuellar Javier
Perisic Momcilo
Perry William J.
Petersen N.E.
Plesch Daniel
Powell Colin
Powers Brian
Pronk J.P.
Quiggin Tom
Rafsanjani Hashemi
Ramos Fidel
Rathmell Andrew
Ratso V.
Rave E.A.
Raznjatovic Zeljko (see: 'Arkan')
Reagan Ronald Redman Charles
Reijn Joop van
Richardson Douglas J.
Richelson Jeffrey T.
Rifkind Malcolm
Rijs Bart
Ritchie Charles
Riza Iqbal
Rose Sir Michael
Roy Armand
Ruez J.R.
Ruiter J.A.C. de
Russell Richard L.
Sacirbey Muhamed
Sadkovich James
Saeterdal J.
Salihovic Ekrim
Sands Pingot Guy
Schmidt-Eenboom Erich
Schouren Joup
Shalikashvili John Shattuck John
Sims Jennifer
Silajdzic Haris
Smith Hugh Smith Leighton
Smith Michael
Smith Rupert A.
Snider Dennis

Soljic Vladimir
Soubirou André
Soyster Harry Sray John
Sredojevic Milorad
Stanisic Jovica
Stankovic Milos (Stanley Mike)
Stanley Mike (see Milos Stankovic)
Stoltenberg Thorvald
Stout Mark
Suljagic Emir
Suljic Osman
Suljkanovic Mehmed
Susak Gojko
Svensson Jan-Inge
Swigert Jim
Talbott Strobe
Taplin Winn
Tarnoff Peter
Tharoor Shashi
Thatcher Margaret
Theunens Renaud
Tihic Sevko
Tilder Johan
'Tito' Josip Broz
Toholj Miroslav
Tolimir Zdravko
Tomlinson Richard Travers Russ
Tudjman Franjo
Tudjman Miroslav
Turner Stansfield
Twetten Thomas
Ugljen Nedzad
Urban Mark
Valentic Mikica
Vance Cyrus
Vandeweijer Jo
Vasiljevic Aleksandar
Vasiljevic Jezdimir
Velayati Ali Akbar
Vermeulen Chr.H.P.
Vershbow Alexander (Sandy)
Vieira de Mello Sergio
Vincent Sir Richard
Vlis A.K. van der
Voorhoeve J.J.C.
Vukovic Vukota
Wahlgren Lars Eric
Walker Jenonne
Walker John

Wallin J.M.
Warner Michael Weinberger Casper
Weiner Tim
Weisband William
Westerman Frank
Western John Wickland Gene
Wieffer E.G.B.
Williams Paul
Woolsey R. James
Zametica Jovan
Zeid Al-Huseein A.F.
Zivanovic Milenko
Zumach Andreas

Appendix III

Chemical weapons used?

Author: D.C.L. Schoonoord

1. Reports about the use of chemical weapons during the war

A number of people who took part in the journey to Tuzla after the fall of Srebrenica thought that on the way they had been attacked with chemical weapons by the Bosnian-Serb army. In endeavouring to answer the question of whether chemical agents were used after the fall of Srebrenica and in what form, we will begin by examining what was known about the use of such agents in the period before the fall.

Throughout the war in Bosnia it was continually asserted that chemical weapons had been used. Parties accused each other of their use, although there was no evidence for the use of lethal chemical agents. Even before the war in Bosnia broke out it was asserted that poison gas had been used by the Yugoslav army (the VJ) at Osijek in Croatia on 25 September 1991. The Yugoslavs denied the claim, and American observation on site did not show that the VJ had taken protective measures.

After the war in Bosnia had started, the Western media repeatedly reported the use of chemical weapons. They based their accounts on UN, Serb, Bosnian-Serb and Bosnian sources. Dutch sources also mention a possible use of chemical agents. It was notable that the reports on the subject mainly involved North-East Bosnia and the Tuzla region. It cannot be ruled out that these early rumours stirred up the fear of possible use of chemical weapons. Such fears may possibly have led people to interpret strange phenomena on the explosion of shells observed during the journey from Srebrenica to Tuzla as the use of chemical weapons.

When discussing the possible use of chemical agents it is important to consider how they should be defined. The Chemical Weapons Convention of 1994 makes a distinction between 'munitions and devices, specifically designed to cause death or other harm' and 'Riot Control Agents', chemical agents that 'can produce rapidly in humans sensory irritation or disabling physical effects which disappear within a short time following termination of exposure'. Possession and use of lethal agents is prohibited. The convention does not prohibit the possession of Riot Control Agents, but it does forbid their use as 'a method of warfare'.

It would appear that the agents used before the fall of Srebrenica in Bosnia belong to this second category. There is no evidence that chemical agents that cause death were ever used in Bosnia. They were available on the Bosnian side, albeit in improvised form. As early as October 1992, President Izetbegovic said in Teheran that the Bosnian Muslims possessed poison gas and might find themselves forced to use it against the Bosnian Serbs. Selim Beslagic, mayor of Tuzla, declared to the NIOD that this was chlorine, the only chemical agent available in 1992. He had had preparations made at the Tuzla chlorine factory so as to be able to use chlorine in the event of a Bosnian-Serb attack. He said he was aware of the international ban on the use of chemical weapons 'but what can you do in an attack if you have no other weapons?'

The Bosnian Muslims were indeed making preparations to use chlorine gas. In July 1993 radio reporter Salih Brkic reported from Tuzla that the 2nd Corps of the ABiH (the army of the Bosnian Muslims) was preparing to use it in the Posavina Corridor near Brcko. Tanks with the gas had been brought to the area. Detailed instructions for its use had been issued by the 2nd Corps. In the event of an attack by the Bosnian Serbs, first a small quantity of chlorine gas and other 'highly dangerous gasses' would be released as a warning. Subsequently a number of barrels containing several tons would be opened. The population would be warned to evacuate. If they were to end up in the zone where the chlorine gas had been released, the Bosnian Serbs would be held responsible.

That use seemed imminent; on 10 August 1993 the 2nd Corps issued an ultimatum for the Bosnian Serbs to halt the march on Brcko. However, the Deputy Commander of the 2nd Corps, Brigadier General Andjelko Makar, said he decided not to ignite at the very last moment because the VRS (the army of the Bosnian Serbs) abandoned further action. The municipal authorities in Tuzla are also thought to have exerted pressure not to deploy the gas because such a desperate act would only provoke retaliation.

Shortly afterwards the Commander of the 126th Brigade of the ABiH told UN personnel in Tuzla that chemical shells - presumably chlorine gas - had been used against the VRS to demonstrate the capabilities of the ABiH. The Security Council was informed about this. In October 1993, the Bosnian Serbs also reported that ABiH artillery near Zvornik in Eastern Bosnia fired chemical shells. The commander of the Zvornik garrison, Major Vinko Pandurevic, contended that over 60 shells had been fired, of which at least one-third had a charge based on chlorine gas.

A team of UN observers was instructed to carry out an investigation and to take samples. However, tests of remnants of the shells showed that they were smoke shells. The only other shells that could be categorized as chemical shells were CS shells (ortho-chlorobenzyl-malononitrile). This gas is not lethal and was often used by soldiers to test gas masks. Moreover, the small quantity of chlorine gas that a shell could hold would make its use relatively ineffective, unless it exploded in a confined space. UNPROFOR knew that threats about exploding barrels of chlorine had been made in the Tuzla region, but that they were probably meant to terrify and were not to be taken literally. UNPROFOR saw no evidence that such threats would be carried out.

At an earlier stage, mid-1993, there were reports from the other side that shells fired by the VRS at the positions of the ABiH near Sarajevo included some shells with riot-control gas (CS gas). UN observers had seen shells that produced white smoke. Shots by Reuters television of a UN observer wearing a gas mask and photographing an unexploded 122 mm shell increased the fear among the public that chemical weapons had been used. However, a UN spokesman declared that there was no evidence that either of the parties had used warfare gasses. At the same time in Belgrade, Cedric Thornberry, deputy head of the UN mission there, declared that the UN would investigate what the contents of the shells had been and who had fired them. Earlier the British government had declared that all three parties in the Bosnian war possessed improvised shells with riot-control gas.

In late 1993 it was the turn of the Bosnian prime minister Silajdzic to send a letter to the Chairman of the Security Council accusing the Bosnian Serbs of firing 2000 shells with toxic gas during an attack on the region Teocak, near Tuzla. In Washington, also in late 1993, Marshall Harris, former Chief Desk Officer for Bosnia at the State Department, suggested that Bosnia was on the brink of a chemical war. Harris referred to the threats by ABiH commanders about using chemical weapons against the Bosnian Serbs and 'credible evidence' of traces of chemical weapons on artillery shells around Sarajevo. Through the ambassador in Sarajevo, Washington warned the Bosnian government that this would constitute a violation of the Geneva Protocol of 1925, which banned the use of chlorine gas and other lethal gasses. However, the Bosnian government denied the possession or use of chemical weapons and the Yugoslav government in Belgrade denied having supplied chemical weapons to the Bosnian Serbs.

Subsequently, from the Croatian side came allegations that the ABiH had used chemical weapons on 22 December 1993 in Krcevena near Nova Bila in Central Bosnia. The Croatian ambassador brought the allegations during consultations in Geneva attended by the UN Secretary-General and the Undersecretary-General Marrack Goulding. The complaint was accompanied by a toxicological report from a Franciscan hospital indicating that intoxication of a girl had been caused by an unspecified 'chemical warfare agent'. With the message that, on the basis of a resolution by the General Assembly, the Secretary-General had to respond as soon as possible to a complaint by a member state that chemical, biological or toxic weapons had been used, New York searched the reports of UNPROFOR and newspaper cuttings. Nothing was found there.

The British battalion in Vitez started a further investigation. The incident had not been reported to them, though the British did know about three other reports during the period November 1994 - January 1995. A 120 mm mortar shell manufactured by the Bosnian Muslims was alleged to have contained chlorine. However, test results were negative. Responding to a subsequent report, the British could not find any traces of chemical weapons with what is known as NBC detection equipment (the abbreviation for Nuclear, Biological and Chemical weapons). Reported symptoms matched those after breathing in cordite released during explosions. Once again, despite efforts by the British and the UN, no evidence had been revealed for the use of chemical weapons.

In June 1994 new reports appeared about the use of toxic gas. During attacks by the ABiH south of Doboj in Western Bosnia, sources within the VRS claimed that gas shells were used. It was alleged that a patient had died in Doboj hospital of the effects of such an attack and that a second was in recovery. During the same period there were also reports that the VRS were using toxic gas in the eastern enclaves. British Joint Commission Observers (JCOs) reported that the VRS had used gas during an attack on Gorazde. The reports did not speak of CS gas, but an unspecified suffocating gas, which had nevertheless not caused any fatalities. In Zepa a girl was overcome by breathing in what was presumably CS gas. She recovered after a few hours. Mother and child were playing a ball game with something that looked like a tennis ball, but in fact was a remnant of the air raid on Zepa at the start of the war. Residents said that at the time explosives had been used which had produced strange red and white hazes. Reports about such hazes would appear again later.

On 11 November 1994 during an offensive in the Majeвица Hills in the area of Velika Jelica the VRS allegedly fired shells at the 2nd Corps of the ABiH, where every second shell caused a yellow cloud. At the request of the 2nd Corps, officers of the Scandinavian battalion accompanied by the staff physician and the NBC officer of the 2nd Corps visited the field hospital in Rainci where 17 soldiers had been admitted with symptoms such as red faces, perspiration and fatigue. Three hours later, after drinking milk, most of them had recovered. It was concluded that the symptoms were probably caused by a strong type of tear gas.

Because the contagion had taken place only ten kilometres from the Dutchbat A Company in Simin Han, this last event caught the attention of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. On top of that, a few days later a Dutchbat physician went to visit the hospital in Tuzla after a report from an interpreter that three patients had been admitted who had been in contact with warfare gasses. The patients in question were soldiers with respiratory problems and irritated mucous membranes. One patient had transient paralysis symptoms in the lower body. The symptoms disappeared after three hours. From the symptoms, the Dutch medical officer was unable to conclude what gas was involved. In view of the transient nature of the complaints, nerve gas seemed unlikely.

Two separate debriefing statements by Dutch soldiers describe similar and possibly the same events. A first report indicated that during the fighting near Visoko and in the Sapna Thumb (where A Company was stationed) the VRS had carried out attacks with chemical weapons. It was a yellow gas. Some 40 ABiH soldiers suffered eye complaints, collapsed lungs and nervous system failure. After five hours they had recovered. According to the UN the gas used was comparable to pepper spray. However, a Dutch Medical Officer who visited the Tuzla hospital thought it was a stronger type of gas. A second report indicated that the commander of the 2nd Corps of the ABiH, General Sead Delic, had called the A Company of Dutchbat in Simin Han to tell them that the VRS had used chemical weapons. Delic appeared horrified and said that the victims had been transferred to a field hospital at Rainci Gornji but that they had recovered after a few hours. It was asserted that the VRS had used a strong type of tear gas. In addition, the Dutchbat company heard from the ABiH that they had been shot at with shells that emitted yellow smoke. Subsequently, the ABiH had handed out atropine injectors to their own soldiers as a countermeasure. Because the chemical agents had not been used on a large scale, Dutchbat did not expect any problems. Questions about the type of agents possibly used by the VRS were posed to The Hague.

The Engineering Training Centre investigated these reports but was unable to reach a conclusion without further information about effects, texts on unexploded shells and samples. The symptoms were not really typical of a tear gas attack. Nevertheless, the presence of such agents in the former Yugoslavia made it likely that such an attack was the case. Yellow smoke could be an indication of chlorine compounds. However, under the NATO doctrines the use of such compounds did not mean that the chemical threshold had been crossed. According to Dutch manuals tear gas (ortho-chlorobenzyl-malonitrile (CS)), chloroacetophenone (CN) and also sneezing gas, chlorodihydrophenarsazine (DM), are used for training purposes to simulate chemical warfare agents and to control riots. They could also be used to hinder the enemy by forcing him to wear a gas mask. Exposure to high doses could, in addition to the usual irritation of eyes, mucous membranes and skin, cause nausea and paralysis symptoms. Usually the effects of CS disappear in 5 to 10 minutes, the effects of high concentrations CN in a few hours and of DM in high concentrations after about three hours. The Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff concluded that the warring factions had apparently used tear gas and CS gas. These agents are not prohibited chemical warfare agents.

In early 1995, the fear suddenly increased that the war would escalate through the use of chemical weapons. In an ABiH training area north of Maglaj, a British battalion observed an exercise by soldiers in protective clothing with decontamination equipment. The local battalion commander refused to answer the question whether the ABiH had the capacity for chemical warfare. For the British, this confirmed the existence of chemical weapons and the will to use them.

In 1995 there were more reports about the possible use of chemical weapons. Eighty ABiH soldiers had been taken to the hospital in Tuzla to be treated for the effects of the use of gas shells during the fighting around the Stolice tower east of Tuzla. However, the gas turned out to be tear gas. Reports that on 7 June 1995 first one and later 21 French UN soldiers in Sarajevo had been admitted to hospital possibly as a consequence of chemical weapons, also appeared to be incorrect: only one soldier had been admitted after he had been exposed to the smoke of what was probably a phosphorus shell. Once again no lethal weapons were involved. From UN and Dutch sources no further reports are known about the use of chemical warfare agents in Bosnia.

2. Chemical weapons used against the column on the way to Tuzla?

After the fall of Srebrenica and after the arrival of the column of fleeing men in Tuzla (see Chapter 1 of Part IV of the main report), the possible use of chemical weapons came up again. Human Rights Watch investigated this possibility. The focus was on the possible use of BZ gas (tri-quinuclidinyl benzilate) that was available in the arsenals of the former JNA (the Yugoslav army), among other things in the form of 82 and 120 mm mortar shells. The new Yugoslavia had not acceded to the Chemical Weapons Convention and it appeared that old stocks had not been destroyed, which fuelled fears of a possible use of BZ by the Bosnian Serbs.

According to the Dutch NBC Defence Manual, BZ is categorized as an incapacitant. It is a smokeless agent that in summer has a contagion duration of one to ten minutes and a slow rate of effect (between one and four hours). The gas enters the body through respiration and the gastrointestinal tract. Symptoms are a rapid pulse, dry mouth, restlessness, memory loss and delusion. Use of a gas mask offers sufficient protection; protective clothing is not required.

A JNA doctrine from 1981 indicates that BZ is highly suitable for disorienting armed groups in an ambush in such a manner that they can no longer operate as combat unit, making it easier to kill or capture them. After one hour BZ causes mental confusion that can continue for several hours or even days. Particularly in parts of the area with few possibilities for escape, such as the wooded and rough terrain on the route from Srebrenica to Tuzla, the use of BZ could be effective, more so because BZ could also lead to fighting within a group, screaming, shooting at random and leaving hiding places.

Human Rights Watch concluded that the use of BZ could not be excluded, but that there was no solid evidence. It was impossible to test the clothing of victims for traces of BZ. A Finnish investigation, the results of which were published in July 1997, could not identify traces of BZ in clothing that had been found on a mountain where heavy shelling had taken place.

Human Rights Watch was aware of the limitations of the investigation. Most witnesses had been in the front part of the column, which had been less exposed to shelling than the rear section. That was where most of the casualties had been, which made it harder to find witnesses.

Human Rights Watch also noted that recollections of the journey to Tuzla should be handled with due care. The journey had been one long terrifying experience and the traumas suffered were extensive. People were intent on survival rather than observing special events in detail. The observations could also have been influenced by the fact that those who made the journey knew there were chemical weapons in the Yugoslav arsenal and therefore in that of the Bosnian-Serbs. A number of witnesses suspected in advance that chemical weapons would be used. Such reports had already appeared in Bosnian newspapers before the investigation by Human Rights Watch and they have been described above. In an interview with the magazine Ljiljan the authority Avdo Hasanovic, managing director of the hospital in Srebrenica, declared that during the journey to Tuzla toxic shells had been fired and also that the water wells used by the fleeing people had been poisoned. As a result, people started to hallucinate and imagined that they were suddenly face-to-face with the Bosnian Serbs; they supposedly reacted by shooting at people they knew or by committing suicide to avoid having to surrender. Hasanovic himself said he had experienced such influences after drinking water, but also confirmed that the effects were also partly caused by lack of food, fatigue, insomnia and the continuous pressure applied by the Bosnian Serbs.

Mainly as ways of explaining the hallucinations, these last elements caught the attention of one of the Human Rights Watch investigators, Britain's Alistair Hay of the Leeds School of Medicine. He published an article of his own in Medicine, Conflict and Survival. Although these studies partly overlap, it seems very much as if Human Rights Watch was very keen to demonstrate the use of chemical weapons, while on the basis of the same witnesses, Hay was trying to find a psychological explanation for the phenomena that were observed.

It is true that the Human Rights Watch report also mentions other explanations for the hallucinations than chemical weapons, but Hay concentrates on psychological causes. To Hay it appeared that the phenomena observed during the journey to Tuzla were mainly the result of stress, exhaustion, drinking polluted water, and the continuous threat of the VRS. According to him one or two per cent of all individuals run the risk of becoming schizophrenic under normal conditions, and these people are especially likely to become psychotic when placed under great strain. If chemical ammunition had been used, many more people and groups would have shown psychotic symptoms or strange and aggressive behaviour. Although Hay did not exclude its use as cause of hallucinations, in his opinion it was more feasible to regard them as psychological symptoms exhibited by individuals. According to the Bosnian physician Ilijaz Pilav quoted in the magazine, the number of hallucinations increased after every VRS attack. Many of these people lost their sense of direction and surrendered. Suicides on the way also seemed to be a consequence of the enormous stress. Scientific literature supports Hay's assumption that there were other causes for aberrant behaviour than BZ. According to him, there was no conclusive evidence for the use of chemical weapons. The head of the intelligence section of the 24th Division of the ABiH in Zivinice, Major Semsudin Muminovic, told Human Rights Watch:

We followed everything that happened during the days of the march with our monitoring equipment. We gained most information by listening to Serb radio communications. We learned from their messages that in Konjevic Polje, Nova Kasaba, Udrc and Kamenica the VRS used tear gas and psychochemical agents in ambushes. According to the information we received the purpose of the VRS was to break up the column into smaller groups.

However, transcriptions made available by the ABiH to the NIOD do not report the use of tear gas or chemical agents. According to Major Muminovic the tapes had been transcribed and subsequently reused, wiping out the information in the process.

The content of these messages could not therefore be verified. It seems less likely that the VRS used rifle shells or hand grenades filled with BZ – these were also reportedly available in the Yugoslav arsenals – because of the very short distance at which such weapons are used; it would have been noticed, and nobody saw VRS soldiers wearing gas masks. Moreover, during the days of the fall of Srebrenica the weather forecast warned of thunderstorms with gusting winds. Consequently, use of the agent would not have been entirely without risk for the VRS's own troops and would certainly have been less effective.

Interviews did not offer Human Rights Watch enough of a basis on which to demonstrate the use of BZ. The various witnesses mainly spoke of the use of smoke shells, and they had noticed shells with blue-green, green, red, purple, grey and yellow smoke. However, such smoke shells may also have been used to mark impacts in wooded areas or to indicate the position of the column.

Situation reports by the Zvornik Brigade of the VRS did indeed state the use of smoke shells. For instance, on 14 July they fired 20 155 mm smoke shells at the column on its way to Tuzla. No information is available about the preceding days. However, for the following days the reports make no more mention of the firing of smoke shells.

In the interviews held by the NIOD little of substance surfaced about the possible use of toxic gas either. Yet there were widespread stories about its use. In addition to the alleged use of toxic gas, other mysterious phenomena were described. Stories were told that on the roads along the route bottles with honey-coloured water had been left. The contents of those bottles could only have been produced in Serbia. People who drank from it went berserk and started shooting at each other.

One interviewee, Hamdija Fejzic, deputy mayor of Srebrenica, said that although he had not noticed any shelling with chemical shells, he did see small bags with unknown content in rivers. However, no effect from these could be identified. People also drank mud and polluted water. Some men who became hysterical could be brought to their senses by slapping them in the face. Others went insane and blew themselves up. A 30-year-old deaf-and-dumb man went insane just before reaching Muslim territory, ran away and could not be caught by anybody. Fejzic thought that the heat and the lack of water were more likely causes of the insanity. Everybody was afraid, even those who had previous combat experience and who had behaved bravely.

The journey from Zepa to the area of the Muslim-Croat Federation, two weeks later, also caught the attention of Human Rights Watch. It offered starting points for comparison. During that march the men experienced similar circumstances: lack of food, water and sleep. Again the VRS were a continuous threat. Yet there was less shelling and people did not move in one large column, but in small groups. But the breakout from Zepa and the journey of the men to Tuzla also brought hardship: they broke through the VRS lines in an unorganized manner while in fact there were hardly any VRS soldiers. They shot at each other while the VRS were 30 metres further on. This journey too was a horrific ordeal.

From Zepa they took roughly the same route as the one that had been followed earlier from Srebrenica to Tuzla. One man who made the journey declared: 'all the way from Zepa to Tuzla I had nothing to eat.' Around Konjevic Polje there were a large number of dead bodies, which had started to emit a cadaverous smell because of the hot weather. On 18 July near Konjevic Polje there were 200 VRS soldiers with dogs who tried to surround the men and steer them to the road. However, none of the men interviewed by Human Rights Watch were aware of hallucinations or aberrant behaviour.

So although Human Rights Watch did not produce any evidence, the organization did point out that during the summer of 1996 American military personnel had interviewed survivors of Srebrenica and that those results had supported the suspicion of a 'chemical incapacitant'. In addition, a more extensive American military investigation was reportedly carried out in late 1996 and early 1997. Information about it was not released, but it may be assumed that if there had been any reasonable suspicion of the use of chemical weapons, the United States government would have made it public.

After publication of the Human Rights Watch report the US government denied knowing anything about the use of toxic gasses against fleeing Muslims. It did admit that tear gas had apparently been used. Several teams of investigators had investigated the use of chemical weapons, but had found no evidence of the use of weapons classified under the Chemical Weapons Convention of 1993.

In the opinion of the Prins Maurits Laboratory the Bosnian Serbs did have BZ, but there were only rumours about the use of this gas in Bosnia and the investigation had not revealed any facts.

In the Netherlands the report by Human Rights Watch prompted parliamentary questions. The Dutch government took the position that so far it had not been made clear that chemical weapons had been deployed in Bosnia or that supplies of the former JNA had been used. Nor did the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (OPCW) based in The Hague appear to have any clues to this effect. In reply to the question of whether a further investigation was being carried out, the Dutch government referred to the 'comprehensive report' about the Safe Area Srebrenica that had been announced by the UN. However, the UN report, published in November 1999, did not address this issue.

3. Conclusion

Though the Bosnian Muslims had chlorine gas and threatened to use it, there is no evidence whatsoever that it was used. There are no indications that the Bosnian Serbs had combat gasses. During the war in Bosnia there were widespread stories about possible use of chemical agents, but in so far as these were used it never involved lethal agents, but rather tear gas and smoke. It is understandable that rumours and reports in the media about the use of chemical weapons led people to think that their use was possible and understandable that symptoms that could point to the use of a chemical weapon were readily identified as such. For instance the War President of Opstina (municipality of) Srebrenica, Osman Suljic, thought that the VRS had already used chemical weapons in their offensive against Srebrenica.

In particular in the column fleeing to Tuzla, strange symptoms were linked to the use of chemical weapons. The Bosnian Serbs fired heavy smoke shells at the column, which may have given rise to the idea that chemical agents were being used. Discolorations in water courses that were difficult to account for also contributed to this notion. Along the route followed by the column there were no substances, like bauxite for example, which could have coloured the water. Mention was made of the possibility that the yellow coloration of the water could have been caused by clay that had been stirred up by passing people.

Consequently, the explanation for the alleged use of chemical weapons should rather be sought in the circumstances under which the journey to Tuzla took place. Fear, confrontation with death, insufficient rest, lack of food and water and not being able to explain phenomena such as coloured smoke may have led to the conclusion that chemical weapons were involved here. The fact that some people were hallucinating supported this opinion. However, this supposition does not withstand the scrutiny of thorough investigation.

Finally it should be pointed out that there were major differences between the men fleeing from Srebrenica and those who fled from Zepa to Tuzla. Though their numbers were smaller, there were considerably fewer casualties in the group exfiltrating from Zepa. Almost all ABiH soldiers managed to escape and they arrived in Tuzla in better condition. The commander of the 2nd Corps, Sead Delic, attributed this to the fact that the situation in Zepa was much better than in Srebrenica. Moreover, the journey from Zepa had been better organized and people had covered the terrain in small groups.

Yet in terms of the horrors that had to be faced there was little difference. Here too men had to face death, hunger and the VRS in hot pursuit. Still it was notable that, unlike the column from Srebrenica, no hallucinations and other phenomena were reported that could be interpreted as the consequence of the use of chemical weapons by the VRS.

Appendix IV

History and Reminders in East Bosnia

Author: G. Duijzings

Introduction

“If people in Bosnia cannot reach consensus on how to remember the past, the country will have no right to exist. In fifty years time, there will be either one Bosnia or no Bosnia”.

Jakob Finci, President of the Jewish Community of Bosnia-Herzegovina, NIOD interview 24/10/2000

“If the identity of a nation lies upon its memory, then the memory that makes the foundations of the Bosniak people is made of the chain of genocides and innumerable crimes committed against it”.

Smail Èekic, History of genocide against Bosniacs, p.47

On the eleventh of July 1995 the Bosnian Serb Army conquered Srebrenica, a Muslim enclave in Serb-held eastern Bosnia which had been proclaimed a ‘safe area’ by the United Nations two years before. When the Serbs marched into Srebrenica’s town centre, general Ratko Mladic, who led the operation, gave a brief statement in front of a Bosnian Serb television camera: “Here we are in Srebrenica on the eleventh of July 1995, on the eve of yet another great Serbian holiday. We present this city to the Serbian people as a gift. Finally, after the rebellion against the dahis, the time has come to take revenge on the ‘Turks in this region’”.¹ The events that followed are all too well-known: under the eyes of Dutch UN peace-keepers, hundreds of Muslim men were separated from their women (at the Dutchbat base in Potoèari), while thousands of others decided to try to escape through the forests to Bosnian-held Tuzla. Most of them disappeared: they died or were executed by the Serbs in the aftermath of the fall of the Srebrenica enclave.

From Mladic’s statement – he was referring to events two centuries ago – it is clear that history played a prominent role in the Bosnian war, in a way that was often hard to accept for outside observers, and often led to reactions of sheer disbelief and exasperation on their part. One can still hear the complaints of Western journalists, diplomats and UN personnel, who had to listen to endless ‘history lessons’ presented to them by politicians, intellectuals, soldiers, and ordinary peasants, about battles that took place centuries ago and the ultimate wrongs their nation had suffered in a recent or more distant past. As Nena Tromp notes in her contribution (see appendix), history was used extensively at the negotiation table, not only to justify political demands, but also to outmanoeuvre foreign diplomats who had no grasp of the region’s complicated history. For some the surplus of history that seems to exist in the region became an obstacle to peace: in the final stages of the Bosnian war, US envoy Richard Holbrooke, for instance, refused to attach special importance to historical claims, which he thought obstructed any attempt to come to a settlement of the conflict. In his memoirs he writes that he put the Bosnian Serbs one important condition for negotiations: “(...) they must not give us a lot of historical bullshit, as they have with everyone else. They must be ready for serious discussions”.²

It is clear that ‘history’, or rather the various strands of national histories, were conducive to the wars in the former Yugoslavia, and it is therefore understandable that Holbrooke refused to take them into account in his attempts to find a settlement to the Bosnian conflict. His objective was not to grasp the historical ramifications of the conflict but to bring an end to it in a swift and pragmatic manner. Our aim here is quite different, i.e. to develop a deeper understanding of the conflict and its specific characteristics, and the starting point is that we cannot fully understand the war, and particular events such as the Srebrenica massacre, if we leave history aside, or more particularly, if we ignore the living historical memories and perceptions of history that exist among local players.³ In Bosnia and other parts of the former Yugoslavia, some historical episodes are ‘remembered’ as if they happened yesterday, and people often refer to them if they try to justify their actions. Thus, it is not just the past itself but current visions of the past which are important for an understanding. The word ‘history’ itself reflects this duality, meaning both the past and stories about the past, representations and what is represented.⁴ Historical narratives shape people’s cognition and perception, and as a result help to motivate, justify or contextualise action.⁵ Sudetic’s account of events in eastern Bosnia and Srebrenica offers an excellent illustration of this. He points out –and demonstrates throughout his book– that there is more to the story of the Srebrenica massacre than just the naked sequence of events in July 1995. His informants told him many stories, which went far back in time, to the time of other wars, invasions and rebellions. The stories he heard “began with memories of a time long before the war, memories of fistfights, funerals, and feasts, of great-great-grandfathers who struggled to be free of feudalism, of great-grandfathers who helped ignite a world war, and of grandfathers who fought to survive Fascist butchery, who exacted blood vengeance to appease their dead, and who suffered defeat and buried their guns for another day”.⁶

¹ David Rohde describes this episode in his book A safe area. Srebrenica: Europe’s worst massacre since the Second World War (p.167). See also Stover and Peress, The graves, p.122. The televised images of Mladic’s entry into Srebrenica were included in the British tv documentary A cry from the grave (1999). The holiday Mladic is referring to is Petrovdan, the Serbian-Orthodox St Peter’s Day (12 July), which the Serbs have now proclaimed the town’s official patron saint’s day.

² Holbrooke, To end a war, p.148

It should be clear from the outset that it is not my main intention here to provide a full and comprehensive history of eastern Bosnia and Srebrenica. I will focus on those historical episodes which present-day actors actively remember and point at when they explain their motives, aims and actions (the revolutionary wars of the nineteenth century, the Balkan wars, the First and Second World Wars). It is quite obvious that what many Bosnians tend to talk about are the more turbulent episodes of their history, i.e. those events which drastically changed realities on the ground and left deep traces in collective memory. It is striking to see how the much longer periods of relative peace and coexistence have almost become ‘blank spaces’ in collective memory and official historiography (even though they have not become completely obsolete in people’s private narratives). It is clear that this present-day obsession with wars, violence and ethnic conflict, inevitably leads to simplifications and distortions which I will try to correct by keeping my eyes open for the nuances and complexities of these events, as well as by giving attention to the fact that people in this region have also managed to live together peacefully for considerable periods of time. I have decided not to try to historically represent all these periods of relative peace and coexistence (which is an almost impossible task seen the lack of good local source material), but instead to focus on the communist period which is still fresh in people’s minds. As a corollary, I have invested much effort in trying to describe the process of transformation from the relatively peaceful conditions under socialism to the outbreak of ethno-nationalist violence in the 1990s. Although I will describe this process in its wider Yugoslav context, I will primarily focus on the micro-level: my narrative will include those local events that led to the outbreak of the war (in April

³ Several journalists and academics who were interviewed for this report have stressed the importance of historical memories for an understanding of the war events in eastern Bosnia. Most often reference is made to the violence in World War Two, which was particularly ruthless in these parts of the former Yugoslavia, and has left deep traces in personal and collective memories. Interviews and conversations with Endre Bojtar 28/05/1997, Zoran Kusovac 01-11-1997, Uros Komlenovic 06-11-1997, Bratislav Grubačić 06/11/1997, and Momčilo Mitrović 07/11/1997.

⁴ With regard to my (anthropological) approach to ‘history’ and ‘memory’, I am indebted to the work of E.E. Evans-Pritchard, Anthropology and history; Peter Burke ‘History of events and the revival of narrative’; Emiko Ohnuki-Thierney, ‘The historicization of anthropology’; Marshall Sahlins, Islands of history; and Anton Blok, ‘Reflections on “making history”’.

⁵ It is the influential article “Theory in anthropology since the sixties” by Sherry Ortner (1984), which has become paradigmatic for this idea of a culturally structured praxis. See also John Davis, who formulates this idea in historical terms: “Thought about the past is a cultural activity which varies from place to place and from time to time, and it is a consequential activity: when people take decisions, one of the things they consider is the past” (Davis, ‘History and the people without Europe’, p.14).

⁶ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.XXXVII.

1992), as well as those in the first year of the war until Srebrenica was declared a 'safe area' by the United Nations (April 1993).⁷

All of this is not an easy task. 'History' in the former Yugoslavia has been very much subject to revision and manipulation by historians, intellectuals, journalists, and nationalist politicians. Historical narratives and myths have been used as vehicles for political messages, and the politics of memory also imply that rival factions may compete for historical truth: some claims on the past have obtained recognition, while others have been marginalized, and this is an ongoing process which has brought previously silenced discourses to the surface again. This is visible at the individual and personal level as well. Due to the things that happen in people's lives, they may change their perspective on the present as well as the past (in some cases even quite radically). Let me quote from David Rohde's book A Safe Area (1997), where this is illustrated by one of the main characters of this book, Zoran Radic (a pseudonym), a Serb policeman who participated in the attack on Srebrenica in July 1995:

"Like so many other people in Bosnia, he had joked with his Muslim and Croat friends as Yugoslavia disintegrated and believed that war would never come. But a book he read during 1992 in a Serb trench around Sarajevo had answered many questions for him. Entitled Bloody Hands of Islam, it described atrocities carried out around Srebrenica by Muslim and Croat Fascists allied with Hitler during World War II. The book had been banned by Tito's government. Forty Serbs had been executed in Zalazje, a village just outside Srebrenica. Radic could see that history was repeating itself. Roughly fifty years later, on July 12, 1992 – the Serb Orthodox holiday of St. Peter's Day – Naser Oric's men killed 120 people in the same town. As time passed Radic decided the war was a good thing. The Serbs needed to live separately from the Muslims for their own protection."⁸

This small passage describes the change of perspective of an ordinary Serb who first genuinely believed, like many other Bosnians, that war was impossible in his country because he had powerful memories of a common and shared existence, and then is forced to reconsider –or literally reread– history in the light of his war experiences. Under these new circumstances, communist views of 'brotherhood and unity' become obsolete and the old nationalist narratives are recovered to explain what is happening. These narratives, which were silenced and censored away during the communist period, come to the surface again and start to function as a vehicle for understanding and guideline for further action. However, what this example also shows is that memory is multi-layered and contains certain contradictions. As such, cultural praxis –of which the work of memory is part– can often be described as mixed, fragmented and incoherent, at least from the point of view of national and religious orthodoxies. Thus, elements of conflict and coexistence may be part of the same person's sense of social existence and identity.

Any attempt to come to grip with the history of the region is therefore hampered by the existing multiplicity of 'histories' and 'memories', which are often at odds with one another, within the same community or even within the same individual: there is the former communist historiography which in recent years has been replaced by various nationalist representations of the past, and underneath the official histories there is a reservoir of collective folk and personal and individual

⁷ My description of subsequent events, and of conditions in and around the Srebrenica 'safe area', are included in the main NIOD report.

⁸ Rohde, A safe area, p.14. The book mentioned by Radic (Bloody hands of Islam) is probably Momir Krsmanovic's historical novel Krvave ruke Islama which was also translated into English: The blood-stained hands of Islam. The book was also mentioned in conversations with other local Serbs.

memories which are often hidden and contradictory.⁹ In the case of Srebrenica this is exemplified by the different perspectives that exist about what happened during recent years, perspectives which seem to be wholly incompatible: although similar in style and rethorics, the ‘official’ Muslim and Serbian accounts of the war tell completely different stories, which are difficult to match, even if they dovetail on the level of particular events, specific dates, places and actors.¹⁰ In addition, there are many individual narratives which do not fit into these larger schemes. Although I do not claim that there is only one historical truth, I still believe that out of these divergent and often mutually exclusive histories it is possible to shape a more inclusive and ‘truthful’ version of events, the challenge of which I will take up here.

A major undercurrent of my account is that there is no historical inevitability in the way the recent conflict developed. I subscribe to the idea formulated by the British social anthropologist Evans-Pritchard that we should not mistake the irreversible for the inevitable.¹¹ In the case of Srebrenica, it might be tempting to write a kind of ‘culminatory history’, explaining the end of the story, the fall of Srebrenica and the massacre of Muslim men, as the final and inescapable outcome of what has gone before. Although this view seems compelling when we look all at the evidence of repeated violence and brutality in the region –which two of the most astute observers have recently called “the most bitterly contested area in Bosnia-Herzegovina”¹²– I think that history is never completely decided in advance. Similarly, I would like to argue that it is too easy to say, as some Bosnians did in the midst of the war, that ‘history is repeating itself’: people are not only the objects of the forces of history, i.e. the passive recipients of social, economic, political, and cultural legacies inherited from the past, they are also its subjects. My approach is based on the fundamental presumption that people ‘make’ history in two related ways: 1. by imagining and constructing a past, which is relevant for the present, and 2. by the way they choose to act, taking –among other things– their visions of the past into account. This kind of approach has certain implications: instead of accepting the view that the brutalities of the Bosnian war were the result of ‘ancient ethnic hatreds’, i.e. the product of irrational and almost impersonal historical forces which are beyond everybody’s control, I would rather adhere to the idea that there is always a clear element of personal choice, agency and responsibility in the ways people decide to act or not. It underscores that history is the work of people, who act and interact with different motives and interests in mind, the chemistry of which leads to results that are often unintended in their final outcome.

⁹ One could add here a variety of discourses about the Balkans and the Yugoslav crisis in western sources. It is far beyond the scope of this report to address this issue. It is dealt with in Nena Tromp’s and Bruno Naarden’s contributions (see annexes...). See also: Todorova, Imagining the Balkans; Goldsworthy, Inventing Ruritania; Kent, ‘Writing the Yugoslav wars’; Stokes et al, ‘Instant history’; Gow, ‘After the flood’; Campbell, ‘MetaBosnia’.

¹⁰ The main Serb sources are Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja; and Miljanovic, Krvavi Bosic sela Kravice. The main Muslim ones are Masic, Istina o Bratuncu; Masic, Srebrenica; and Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje.

¹¹ See Davis, ‘History and the people without Europe’, p.16.

¹² Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.25.

Chapter 1

Serbs and 'Turks' – The Ottoman Heritage

Title page of the war edition of the local Serb newspaper, Nasa Rijec (Bratunac, March 1994) on the occasion of the 190th anniversary of the start of the first Serbian uprising. The upper right corner features a picture of the leader of the uprising, Karadjordje, against the background of the Drina River. Below it is a quote from a well-known Serbian epic poem:

“Drina water, O thou noble barrier, Thou that partest Bosnia from Serbia! Soon the day will dawn, O Drina water, Soon will dawn the day when I shall cross thee, Pass through all the noble land of Bosnia.”¹³

The first Serbian uprising (1804-1813)

Let us return to the eleventh of July 1995. Mladic’s reference to the first Serbian uprising (1804-1813) is a good starting point in our discussion, for more than one reason. Apart from the apparent role the uprising played in Mladic’s mindset –at the time he was attacking the Srebrenica Safe Area – it is the first major event in modern Serbian history to have a direct impact on eastern Bosnia, leaving clear traces in local collective memory and history writing. As Mladic’s statement demonstrates, the event is central to Serb nationalist thought, as it ties together two of its most important themes: the long period of suffering under the ‘Turks’, and the struggle to liberate the Serbs from the Muslim yoke. The stories and imagery connected to the first Serbian uprising have a strong thematic link to the Kosovo myth that has become so central to Serbian nationalist thought. The uprising was the first attempt to put an end to the long period of Ottoman rule, which started after the Serbs lost their mediaeval empire during the famous Battle of Kosovo (1389). Moreover, it symbolises their efforts to avenge the humiliation and injustices inflicted upon them by the ‘Turks’, comprised both of the Ottomans and the ¹³ Translation taken from Morison, The revolt of the Serbs, pp.72-73.

Bosnian poturice (members of the indigenous population who ‘became Turks’, i.e. converted to Islam and ‘betrayed’ their Serb brethren).

Let us take a closer look at the events themselves. The first Serbian uprising began in 1804 as a rebellion against the Turkish dahis (local military or janissary leaders). It occurred at a time when the Ottoman Empire was losing control over its Balkan provinces. Its rule was undermined by rebellions, both by unruly Muslim elements who opposed the centralising policies of the Sublime Porte, and the Christian subject populations who wanted to free themselves from Ottoman rule.¹⁴ These centrifugal tendencies were visible throughout the Balkan provinces. They explain in part why the Great Powers (Austria and Russia, in particular) were able to shift the borders of the Ottoman Empire to the south.¹⁵ Aside from relinquishing territory to its European rivals, the Ottoman Empire was also disintegrating from within; it failed to maintain peace and security in what remained of its provinces in southeastern Europe. Life had been made increasingly difficult, particularly in the countryside, by (legal or illegal) armed bands. In addition, local centres of power had sprung up throughout the empire, filling the political vacuum caused by its decline.

It was, however, the ever-growing unrest and revolts among the Christian populations that posed the most serious threat to Ottoman rule in these parts. The first Serbian uprising was the earliest major example, followed by the Greek revolution (1821-1829). Although in Serbian collective memory, it is seen as the first attempt at liberation from Ottoman rule, it did not start in this way. The immediate cause of the uprising was another rebellion, that of a group of unruly local janissary commanders who had been expelled from Belgrade, but who had managed to re-assert themselves against the will of the Ottoman establishment (the government officials, merchants and landlords) and the Serbian population.¹⁶ Initially, the Ottoman establishment and the Serbian insurgents formed a common front, but both remained powerless in the face of janissary terror.¹⁷ Among those ‘Turks’ supporting the uprising were Hasan-pasha from Srebrenica, who at the time of its outbreak was district governor of Zvornik, as well as Hadzi-Salihbeg (or Hadzibeg), the local governor of Srebrenica.¹⁸

Even as early as 1801, the janissaries assassinated Mustafa Pasha, the Ottoman governor of Belgrade whose benevolent attitude towards the Christian population was resented. In 1802, four dahis (high-ranking janissary officers) took full territorial control of the Belgrade pashalik.¹⁹ Serbian peasants set up armed resistance units, and in the spring of 1804, their leader, Karadjordje Petrovic, a prosperous livestock trader, organised them into an army of thirty thousand men ready to fight. When the dahis learned of these clandestine activities they started liquidating Serb leaders. This finally triggered the revolt against the dahis. Initially, the Sultan and most other Ottoman officials supported the Serbs in ¹⁴ Srebrenica was also the scene of clashes between local autonomous forces and the Ottoman centre. In 1820, Ottoman forces attacked the town. See Malcolm, Bosnia, p.120.

¹⁵ Jelavich, History of the Balkans, Vol.1, pp.62-72. The siege of Vienna by the Ottoman army (1683) is seen as the beginning of the end of Ottoman rule in the Balkans. It ended in failure, after which Austria and its Catholic allies launched successful (but devastating) military campaigns into Ottoman territory. This had severe repercussions, among other things, for the position of Roman Catholics in the Ottoman Empire, which was one of the factors that also put an end to their centuries-old presence in Srebrenica. In 1686, the Turks set the town on fire, burning down the Franciscan monastery, which had been a main centre of Catholic activity in Bosnia. The Catholics, who formed a substantial part of the town’s population, if not the majority, fled over the Sava River into Austrian territory. For Srebrenica’s past, see in particular the articles by Jusuf Hasic, Zivan Jovanovic and Bosko Milovanovic in Srebreničke Novine.

¹⁶ The janissaries formed the backbone of the Ottoman army, at least starting in the fifteenth century. At the end of the eighteenth century, the Sultan tried to abolish them, as they had become a state within the state, a force that the Ottoman centre was unable to control. They were finally suppressed in 1826.

¹⁷ Jelavich, History of the Balkans, Vol.1, pp.193-204. Local historians claim that Ottomans and Serbs fought side by side. See, for instance, Jovanovic ‘Posljednje decenije turske vlasti’ [2].

¹⁸ Both later participated in military actions against the insurgents. Jovanovic ‘Posljednje decenije turske vlasti’ [1]. The story is that Hadzibeg was friends with the Serbs, providing them with information after he was mobilised into the Ottoman army. Because of his Serb sympathies, he was killed in 1827 by order of the Sultan (Deroka, Geografsko-turistička monografija, p.248).

¹⁹ Pantelic, ‘Dahije’.

their efforts to overthrow the dabīs. However, after the insurgents achieved an important series of military successes, and threatened to become an uncontrollable force, the Sultan decided to suppress the movement in the summer of 1805. At this point, the uprising developed into a direct confrontation between Serb and Ottoman (including Bosnian) forces, in which the Serbs' main objective became outright independence. From the start, some of the major battles were fought near the Drina. It was at this stage that the Drina valley became a frontier between lands under Serbian and those under Ottoman control. By early 1804, Muslim refugees began to cross the Drina from Serbia into eastern Bosnia.

As eastern Bosnia was in a state of anarchy, local reactions to the uprising varied widely. Some Ottoman officials (like Hadzibeg) sympathised with the Serbian insurgents, while others (such as Mehmed kapetan of Zvornik) sided with the dabīs, although they showed little willingness to come to their rescue. Among the Orthodox population of eastern Bosnia, however, there was an outburst of enthusiasm for the uprising, at least according to historian, Vaso Èubrilovic, who produced an interesting, though romanticised, account of the events.²⁰ He writes that during the summer of 1804, local Serbs were singing epic songs about Karadjordje, hoping that he would come to liberate them from the Turkish yoke. In spring 1805, the uprising spread to western Serbia: insurgents attacked towns such as Karanovac, Soko, and Uzice. As a result, the Serbs and Muslims in eastern Bosnia became increasingly embroiled in the conflict. The friendly relations between the Serbian insurgents and local Muslim leaders in eastern Bosnia started to deteriorate, especially after the former won a series of important victories against the Ottomans. As readiness among Bosnian Serbs to join the uprising grew, Bosnian Muslim leaders realised that the uprising could endanger their position. Relations also deteriorated when Muslim leaders from eastern Bosnia joined in military operations to suppress the Serbian uprising. By autumn 1805, Bosnian units crossed over into Serbia, and suffered their first major defeats.²¹ Muslim leaders from Srebrenica also shared this fate. In February 1806, for instance, Hasan-pasha from Srebrenica was defeated, after which Serbian forces burned Muslim villages along the Drina. A few months later, Hadzibeg from Srebrenica lost a battle near Valjevo. The most humiliating defeat for the Ottoman forces was the famous battle at Misar, which was won by Karadjordje.²² Despite these military defeats, Bosnian forces managed at this stage to prevent the uprising from spreading into Bosnia.

These constant battles on the Serbian side of the Drina affected conditions in eastern Bosnia. The Serb population suffered from marauding Ottoman (Bosnian) troops who pillaged Orthodox villages on their way to Serbia, and later, back home. In addition, Serbs were forced to supply the Ottoman troops. In some cases, they were recruited into the army to fight the insurgents in Serbia, for instance, by Hasan-pasha of Srebrenica. Serbs became increasingly restless, preparing themselves for an uprising and forming small, armed bands of hajduk irregulars. Muslim leaders believed these bands had been sent by Karadjordje to cause trouble in Bosnia. Finally, in 1807, the uprising spilled over into Bosnian territory. On late March of that year, the Serbian insurgents started a major offensive westward and reached the town of Loznica. By early May, troops crossed over into Bosnian territory. Major battles were fought between Zvornik and Bijeljina, and some Serbian troops managed to reach the outskirts of Tuzla. In June, however, Bosnian forces drove the Serbs back into Serbia, forcing many local Serbs who had joined the fighting to flee as well. During the summer and autumn, Ottoman and Serbian units engaged in constant battles along the Drina, raiding each other's territories, and burning and looting enemy villages. In October 1807, serious clashes occurred, including near Srebrenica: Serbian units entered Bosnian territory, scorching Muslim villages and returning home with large booties. Turkish troops had to rush in to rescue Muslim houses and property.²³ It was through Russian mediation that this cycle of mutual violence was brought to a halt. However, as Èubrilović writes, Serbian units still found it difficult to give up the habit of pillaging Muslim villages in eastern Bosnia.

²⁰ Èubrilovic, 'Bosansko Podrinje i prvi srpski ustanak (1804-1813)'. Vasa Èubrilovic is one of several well-known Bosnian Serb historians who were direct participants in events that led to the establishment of Yugoslavia after World War One. During his youth he had been a member of Mlada Bosna, a socialist youth organisation that advocated South Slav union and the liberation of Bosnia from Austrian rule. As such, he was involved in the assassination of Arch Duke Franz Ferdinand and his wife in Sarajevo on 28 June 1914. The attack was carried out by members of this organisation and triggered off World War One.

²¹ See also Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, p.328.

²² Novakovic, Die Wiedergeburt des serbischen Staates, pp. 40-41; Jovanovic, 'Posljednje decenije turske vlasti' [1].

One of Karadjordje's major objectives was to extend his control to the Bosnian Krajina, where most of the Bosnian Serb population was concentrated. Eastern Bosnia, with its large non-Serb population, formed a kind of 'Muslim' wedge and was, therefore, crucial to the Serbs' ability to break the enemy's resistance (especially around Tuzla). In spring 1809, the revolt spread again across the Drina into eastern Bosnia. Serbian forces besieged Bijeljina in the north and attacked Muslim strongholds near Srebrenica in the south. Èubrilović claims that local Serbs massively joined the uprising, sending their wives and children to Serbia. In the end, however, the Serb uprising in Bosnia resulted in huge disappointment. Though many had expected it would take only one last effort and a little luck to free Bosnia from Ottoman rule, they faced serious defeats in June, including near Srebrenica. In the north, the Serbian forces were also pushed back over the Drina. A substantial portion of the Serb population fled into Serbia and settled on the other side of the Drina, in villages abandoned by the 'Turks'. The Drina River remained the border between Serbia and Ottoman Bosnia. As the Serbian revolution was now on the decline, and Russian support for the insurgents was diminishing, the Sultan finally managed to suppress it. In October 1813, Karadjordje was forced to flee to Austrian territory.²⁴

The uprising was remembered in oral tradition, including in Srebrenica, particularly in the legendary figure of Karamarko ('Black Marko'), a local Serb hero who fought on Karadjordje's side.²⁵ But more importantly, it became a major source of inspiration for the nineteenth-century Serbian national movement and later generations of Serbian nationalists (of whom Mladic is the most recent example). The revolt was remembered in the form of epic songs, sung, among others, by Filip Visnjic, the most celebrated epic singer in Serbia's history. As a native of eastern Bosnia, Visnjic had witnessed these events, and in 1809 he had fled together with many other Serbs from eastern Bosnia to Serbia. Visnjic's songs were included in Vuk Karadžić's famous collection of epic poetry.²⁶ One of his songs, Poèetak bune protiv dahija ('The beginning of the revolt against the dahis?'), was to become particularly famous.²⁷ It presents the revolt as a Holy War of the Christian Serbs against Islam, as the first opportunity to avenge the forebears who had suffered under Ottoman rule, and to take back Serbian lands on the other side of the Drina in Bosnia. It contains the famous lines which have since become part of Serb nationalist folklore, including in eastern Bosnia (see the vignette at the beginning of this chapter): "Thus spoke Djordje to the Drina water – Drina water, O thou noble barrier – Thou that partest

²³ Novaković, Die Wiedergeburt des serbischen Staates, pp.64-65.

²⁴ Morison, The revolt of the Serbs, pp.XV-XXVII.

²⁵ Marko was a smith who lived near the settlement of Crvica (along the Drina). According to local tradition, Karadjordje gave him an army and ordered him to conquer the region of Osat, which he did. As he was left without gunpowder, he was forced to flee to Serbia, where he manufactured mighty ('shaking') guns for the Serb insurgents (Beatović, Bratunac i okolina, pp.18-19; see also Sudetić, Blood and vengeance, p.140). Other local participants who are remembered in songs are Birëanin Ilija, who was one of the first leaders of the uprising, and Hadzi-Melentije Stevanović, the abbot of a Serb-Orthodox monastery on the Serbian side of the Drina. A third figure, whom we encountered earlier, is the Muslim local governor, Hadzibeg. He was killed by order of the Sultan because he provided assistance to the Serbs (Deroka, Geografsko-turistièka monografija, p.248; Deroka, Kajakom i splavom niz Drinu, p.81).

²⁶ Vuk Karadžić was a pivotal figure in this formative period of the Serbian national movement. He was responsible for the standardisation of the Serbian vernacular language and the development of the Serbian Cyrillic script, both key steps in the process of Serbian nation-building. He also published a well-known collection of folksongs, Srpske narodne pjesme, which became the classic anthology of traditional Serb oral poetry. He himself was a native from the Podrinje area, born in the village of Trsic, near Loznica on the Serbian side of the Drina in 1787.

²⁷ See, for instance, Corović, 'Historiska vrednost'. Other well-known epic songs about the first Serbian uprising by Visnjic are 'The Battle of Misar' and 'The Battle of Loznica' (for a translation of the former, see: Morison, The revolt of the Serbs, p.74-87).

Bosnia from Serbia! – Soon the day will dawn, O Drina water – Soon will dawn the day when I shall cross thee – Pass through all the noble land of Bosnia”.²⁸

Interestingly enough, this famous epic song also makes references to the dahis' plans to kill all male Serbs above the age of seven. This shows a striking parallel between the old 'epic' history of the first Serbian uprising and the new 'real' history of events in July 1995, one being the mirror image of the other.²⁹ It would be far too simplistic on our part to draw a clear line of causation between the cultural images contained in an epic song and real historical events. Yet looking at the images contained in songs can be helpful in understanding the ideological context behind the massacre of Muslim men in 1995, and the mentality in at least some of those who orchestrated and committed these crimes. We can only speculate as to whether Mladic had this particular song in mind in his reference to the revolt at that crucial point in time when he took the Srebrenica enclave. However, it is indeed plausible that his general outlook was permeated by this complex of national Serbian epics about the fight against the 'Turks', especially the Kosovo songs, the songs about the first Serbian uprising, and Njegos's 'Mountain Wreath' (a classic in Serbian literature that celebrates the massacre of Montenegrin converts to Islam as a revenge for the defeat suffered in Kosovo).³⁰ It is abundantly clear that these epic elements were part and parcel of the discursive patterns that Serb nationalists and populists employed to 'explain' recent and more distant events and to justify certain decisions and actions.³¹ Since Mladic saw his take-over of Srebrenica as revenge for the defeat suffered against the dahis, he may very well have seen the massacre of Muslim men as a legitimate historical act from the perspective of these national epics.³²

From the very beginning of the Bosnian war, the Kosovo mythology was among the things that played a key legitimising role, presenting Serbian war efforts in Bosnia as an attempt to avenge Kosovo and turn back the clock in history. The Bosnian Muslims were persistently labelled as 'Turks', the direct descendants of the Turkish oppressors, while the conflict was continuously understood in terms of a battle between Christianity and Islam. The importance of the Kosovo myth as a legitimiser in Republika Srpska was expressed most poignantly in the adoption of Vidovdan as the Bosnian Serb Army's official holiday and patron's day at the very beginning of the war (1992). It is also reflected in the fact that many Bosnian Serbs saw Mladic as a modern-day Lazar (the Serbian army leader during the Battle of Kosovo), a kind of epic hero who was fighting a new Holy War against the 'Turks'.³³ The clearest manifestation of the ideological significance of the Kosovo myth for the events in Srebrenica occurred on 28 June 1995, just a few days before the Bosnian Serb army opened the attack on the Muslim enclave. On that day, Mladic made direct allusions to the myth in a speech to his soldiers, who had gathered at the annual Vidovdan ceremony of the Bosnian Serbian Army in Bijeljina. Speaking of the importance of the Battle of Kosovo, he told them, "Prince Lazar gave his army the Communion, and bowed for the Heavenly Empire, defending fatherland, faith, freedom and the honour of the Serbian people. We have understood the essence of his sacrifice and have drawn the historical message from it. Today we make a winning army, we do not want to convert Lazar's offering into a blinding myth of sacrifice".³⁴

²⁸ Morison, The revolt of the Serbs, pp.72-73.

²⁹ Morison provides a translation of the relevant lines: "We will slaughter all the Serbian knezes, All the knezes, all the Serbian leaders, All the kmets who are a danger to us, All the village priests, those Serbian teachers; Only will we spare the helpless children, Children weak of seven years and under; Then the Serbs in truth will be a rayah, Truly will they serve their Turkish masters." (Morison, The revolt of the Serbs, p.46-49)

³⁰ See Duijzings, Religion and the Politics of Identity, p.188. Some authors have presented this work as a blueprint for genocide and ethnic cleansing (see, in particular, Sells, The Bridge Betrayed, p.51).

³¹ See, in particular, the work of Ivan Eolovic, Bordel ratnika (1993), Pucanje od zdravlje (1994), Jedno s drugim (1995), Politika simbola (1997).

³² That there was an undeniable link between the epic mindset of Bosnian Serb peasants and politicians and the violence committed against the Muslim population (for instance, during the siege of Sarajevo at the beginning of the war) was also demonstrated in the documentary film Serbian epics made by Paul Pawlikowski and first broadcasted by the BBC (Bookmark, BBC 2, 16 December 1992).

³³ See, for instance, Block, 'The Madness of General Mladic'.

³⁴ Bulatovic, General Mladic, p.154 (my own translation).

As I have explained elsewhere, an important aspect of this myth is its a-historical or pan-chronic nature. It tends to be timeless. It fuses past and present, and locates the actual events above historical time, fitting them into an all-encompassing cosmological order. In times of crisis and war, myths can help to give meaning to the kind of historical events that cause intense distress and chaos in the lives of those directly affected by them. If the events seem to be similar to those remembered in epic songs, myths can impose themselves once again as their most adequate representation. Regardless of the actual social, political, and economic circumstances that led to the conflict, and the active role present-day politicians and (para)military played in bringing about war, it was clear to many Bosnian Serbs that history was repeating itself. And indeed, there were clear parallels with earlier events, such as the first Serbian uprising, at least –and this is important – in the ways Serbs have remembered these events through various genres of historical folk tradition. What has been remembered is how the Serbs fought for their freedom, how the Ottomans suppressed the uprising and how Turks and Bosnian Muslims retaliated against the rebels by plundering Serb villages, enslaving Serb women and children, torturing and executing Serb leaders, and in some places by murdering all males capable of carrying guns.³⁵ Even if we were to adopt the view that ‘history’ is not an objective reality, but is always mediated through forms of historical representation, the parallels between the first Serbian uprising and the latest conflict are striking indeed, at least as regards eastern Bosnia. During the recent conflict, Serbs took up arms again against the Muslims or ‘Turks.’ And again, the Drina became the frontier between them. The actual battlegrounds were often the same (Tuzla, Bijeljina, Srebrenica). Warfare was equally brutal (as reflected by the burning and looting of villages along the Drina). Political goals, at least on the Serb side, were also identical and the overall geopolitical and military configuration was similar. Muslim-inhabited eastern Bosnia was, once again, perceived as an obstacle to the unification of Serb territories in Bosnia with motherland Serbia, a Muslim wedge that ran deep into Serb lands and was the product of historical injustices that needed to be undone.

The Drina River: a frontier

“The Drina River has long – one may say for centuries – been the border between the Serbian state (...) and the states that succeeded one another during various periods of occupation (...) of the territory of present-day Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Drina was long the frontier between Serbia and the Turkish Empire. Then it formed the border with the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and during World War Two, with Hitler’s and Pavelic’s Independent State of Croatia. Each of these occupiers aimed at removing the Bosnian Serbs from this border region with Serbia, which has led to large-scale expulsions of the Serb people. As a consequence, the national structure of the population has changed, leaving the Serbs with an ever-smaller share in the total population. Today, one can find the traces of our centuries-old presence only in destroyed churches, the names of certain settlements and other toponyms, but, unfortunately, not in the population of these settlements, where no Serb elements are left”.

Milivoje Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.1

“Oh, you Serb, do not worry

There will be no border at the Drina”

³⁵ See also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.15.

Turbofolk star Baja-mali Knindza, in the song Nece biti granica na Drini (There will be no border at the Drina), on the tape Pobediće istina (Truth will win), 1994

In interviews, local Serb nationalists point out that eastern Bosnia was always Serb territory even though Muslims have managed, in more recent times, to outnumber the Serbs demographically. Many explanations have been given for this Muslim demographic dominance, one of which is the higher birth rate in eastern Bosnia's Muslim population. As in Kosovo, this is seen as one of the elements of a deliberate policy to reduce the Serb element in previously held Serb lands. Much effort has been invested in demonstrating that until quite recently, eastern Bosnia had a predominantly Serb population. In fact, the more extreme nationalists try to convince ignorant outsiders that this was the case even up until the 1970s and 1980s. I will deal with the more extreme claims later on in this discussion. At this point, however, we can gain greater insight by focusing more closely on the late Ottoman period. It was during this period that eastern Bosnia became a kind of permanent frontier between Serbia and Ottoman Bosnia, resulting in a very clear change in the region's demographic make-up. I will demonstrate that these changes were not merely the result of some Muslim 'master plan' to make eastern Bosnia Islamic territory. Rather, the changes were also produced by nineteenth-century Serbian policies that made Serbia's small Muslim population flee into Bosnia.

Although the first Serbian uprising failed, the second uprising, which started in April 1815 under the leadership of Milos Obrenovic (a rival of Karadjordje), finally put Serbia on the road to independent statehood. Within a few months, the insurgents liberated several towns in central Serbia, after which Obrenovic struck a political deal with the Ottomans consolidating his military successes. Serbia acquired a limited degree of autonomy, while Obrenovic was recognized as the prince of Serbia, who was to pay tribute to the sultan. In the years that followed, he managed to further reduce Ottoman influence in Serbia's internal affairs. He also strengthened his own position by securing the Sultan's recognition of his title on a hereditary basis. In July 1817, Obrenovic also struck hard against his major internal rival. When Karadjordje returned to Serbia, he was immediately executed and Obrenovic had his head sent to the Sultan.³⁶

One of the consequences of creating an autonomous Serbia was that the Drina, as already mentioned, became a permanent frontier between Ottoman and Serbian territories. Initially, only the lower reaches of the Drina river formed the border. However, with Serbia's southward expansion in 1833, the border was also stretched to include the areas near Srebrenica. This border, now an international border, remained in place until the establishment of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in 1918. Throughout the nineteenth century, massive population 'exchanges' occurred at this border, bringing about important demographic changes on both sides. The general trend was for Muslims (from Serbia) to cross the Drina into Bosnia, and for Serbs (from Bosnia) to migrate to the liberated territories in Serbia. The first trend was by far predominant, as it was the official policy of Serbia's successive rulers to expel all 'Turks' from Serbian soil. Bosnian Muslim authors today present this as the first episode in a long and continuous Serbian campaign of ethnic cleansing of the Muslim population in Serbia (and Bosnia).³⁷

Supported by Russia, Milos Obrenovic first negotiated the expulsion of Muslim landowners and peasants with the Ottoman government. In a firman or imperial decree (the Hatiserif of 3 August 1830), the Sultan summoned all of them to leave Serbia, except for the urban 'Turkish' population of the six garrison towns that remained under Ottoman control.³⁸ Bajina Basta, at the border near Srebrenica, ³⁶ Jelavich, History of the Balkans, Vol.1, pp. 203, 207, and 238-240.

³⁷ See, for instance, Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, pp.9-10; Ćekić, Historija genocida, pp.56-58.

³⁸ It is important to note that during Ottoman times, towns such as Belgrade, Valjevo, SSabac, and Uzice were garrison towns with a considerable Muslim population. Serbs formed only a minority there. In addition, the Serbian side of the Drina river was lined by many Muslim villages (Dedijer et al, History of Yugoslavia, p.263). The Bosnian historian, Mustafa drove out its Muslim population in 1832, while Muslims of other nearby villages like Perucac and Ljubovije left in 1834. Many of these Muslim peasants resettled in the Osat region southeast of Srebrenica. The few thousand Muslims who were still left in Serbia, mainly consisting of urban Muslims living in Turkish garrison towns, were expelled in the 1860s by Milos Obrenovic's son, Mihailo. Under a protocol that he signed with the Ottoman empire in 1862, all Muslims from Uzice, the most important 'Turkish' town in western Serbia, and Soko, a fortress near Zvornik, were forced to leave. Finally, in 1867, the Ottomans agreed to withdraw the four remaining Turkish garrisons (Belgrade, Sabac, Smederevo, and Kladovo).³⁹ Among this last wave of Muslim refugees were the ancestors of Alija Izetbegovic, who had been living in Belgrade as merchants.⁴⁰

Many of these Muslim refugees resettled in eastern Bosnia. Yet, the first wave of rural Muslim immigrants in the 1830s was much less of a problem for the Bosnian authorities than was the urban exodus of the 1860s. As the Bosnian historian Hodzic writes, the former group was less demanding. Aside from that, there was sufficient land for them to resettle, which guaranteed them a means of subsistence. The urban Muslim immigrants of the 1860s had a much higher living standard. They were also much more embittered and were also less inclined to accept the resettlement options that the Bosnian authorities proposed to them. Thus, their integration into Bosnian society, i.e. their resettlement into towns such as Zvornik, Srebrenica, Vlasenica, Tuzla, and Bijeljina was a much more painful process.⁴¹

In terms of numbers, there were 297 refugee households (approximately 1,770 people) living in the district of Srebrenica in 1864. Most of these were from the villages on the Serbian side of the Drina. However, some were from the towns of Uzice and Belgrade. In the Zvornik sandžak, the number of immigrants exceeded the 5,000 mark (1,037 households). Clearly, this influx of Muslim refugees drastically changed the ethno-demographic balance, causing a rapid increase in Muslim-dominated settlements.⁴² Relations also changed, not only in quantitative, but also in qualitative terms. Muslim refugees, particularly those from towns, harboured intense animosity towards Serbs, which contributed to the rise of Muslim radicalism and fanaticism in the second half of the nineteenth century. Probably, this was also one of the factors that prompted local Serbs from eastern Bosnia to emigrate to 'liberated' Serbia.⁴³

The ethno-demographic changes in the area of Srebrenica, i.e. the regions of Osat (southeast of the town of Srebrenica) and Ludmer (northwest), have been studied in some detail by Nikolic, who has compared data collected by Vuk Karadzic in 1860 with those of the Austrian period. These data seem to indicate that the majority of the rural population was still Serb in 1860. At that time, thirty-three out of a total of sixty-five settlements, were predominantly 'Christian' (i.e. Serb-Orthodox). Twenty-eight were mixed, and only three were entirely Muslim.⁴⁴ The comparison with the Austrian data suggests that the mixed villages soon became predominantly Muslim or were divided into Serb and Muslim sections. Although most Serb villages remained (almost) exclusively Serb throughout the period, a few Imamovic, puts the number of Muslim Slavs (Bosnjaci) living in Serbia before the first Serbian uprising at about 20,000 (Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, p.328-329).

³⁹ Hodzic, 'Migracije muslimanskog stanovništva', pp.65-66. Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, pp.329-31; Jovanovic, 'Kraj turske vlasti u Bosni?'

⁴⁰ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.82. These measures did not pertain to Muslim Gypsies, who were allowed to stay. Muslim Gypsies, as well as Muslims who adopted a Gypsy identity, continued to stay in Serbia, mostly in the towns. In 1874, the Muslim community in Serbia counted 6,176 members (Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, p.331).

⁴¹ Hodzic, 'Migracije muslimanskog stanovništva', p.76. Hodzic provides some data for Srebrenica on the basis of Ottoman documents: twenty-two Muslim households had come from Uzice in 1862, of which roughly half were Gypsies. The same families were still living in Srebrenica at the time of Hodzic's research. See Hodzic, 'Migracije muslimanskog stanovništva', pp.134-36.

⁴² Nikolic, 'Jedno interesovanje Vuka Karadzica'; see also Kulenovic, Etnologija sjeveroistoène Bosne, p.189.

⁴³ See: Malcolm, Bosnia, p.105-106.

⁴⁴ For a detailed list of villages and the ethnicity of their inhabitants, see: Nikolic, 'Jedno interesovanje Vuka Karadzica', pp.145-47.

Serb villages became mixed as well.⁴⁵ The three villages Dobrak, Osatica, and Osmace, which had been the only three entirely Muslim villages in 1860, remained Muslim (until the 1990s).

In short, the number of Muslim settlements soared in the second half of the nineteenth century. Mixed villages became almost exclusively Muslim, and as a consequence, the number of mixed settlements (almost half of all settlements in 1860) fell drastically. The end result was a geographic pattern of juxtaposition of ethnically 'pure' Muslim and Serb villages, a situation that continued until the Bosnian war. Only the town of Srebrenica, and later, the town of Bratunac, retained a mixed population. The relatively small size of the settlements has also characterized the situation over the long term. Until the 1980s, villages usually contained no more than a few hundred inhabitants (and rarely more than 500). As will be demonstrated later, these ethno-demographic factors in the countryside may explain in part the ethnic mobilisation and nationalist voting patterns in the countryside before and during the elections of November 1990. They also explain why it was very easy to discriminate between villages on the basis of ethnic criteria during the waves of attacks (and counter-attacks) on both Muslim and Serb villages during the first year of the Bosnian war. Even before the war, everybody knew which village was Muslim and which village, Serb.⁴⁶ As there were hardly any mixed villages, the danger of inflicting damage on members of their own group was negligible. Moreover, because of the small size of rural settlements and the inability to organise an effective defence, 'enemy' villages were usually easy targets for armed groups on both sides.

Rising Serb-Muslim antagonism

“Q: Do you think that the Muslims should get something?”

A: They can get something in Iran or Iraq if these countries are willing to give them their own state. Let them pursue their Jihad and state there if they wish. There is no place for them in Europe. They are Serb martyrs, but they do not understand they are Serbs. These are Serbs who have become Turks and adopted the Islamic faith.”

“Q: Where did you get such a [martial] talent from?”

A: I am from a warrior house. I have an ancestor, Jokelj Raznjatovic, who once, during the Serbo-Turkish war, cut off seventeen Turkish heads and seized two Turkish banners.”

Zeljko Raznjatovic 'Arkan' in an interview with journalist Dusica Milanovic, November 1992⁴⁷

All of the factors discussed earlier (i.e. memories of bloodshed during the first Serbian uprising, the creation of a Serb-Ottoman frontier at the Drina, and the ensuing population exchanges and ethno-demographic changes) contributed to the growing antagonism between Orthodox Serbs and Muslims

⁴⁵ It should be noted here that there were no villages with a homogenous or largely Serb population (in 1860) that became predominantly Muslim in the twentieth century, except for the village of Blazijevici. This village southeast of Srebrenica, which was mixed throughout the period, was initially predominantly Serb and then predominantly Muslim. Of course, some villages had already been Islamicised or abandoned by their Christian inhabitants long before the nineteenth century. The village of Sase is an example: it was abandoned by its Catholic (Saxon) population during the early Ottoman period, and is said to have remained uninhabited for about three centuries. It became Muslim during the nineteenth century when 'Turks' from Valjevo settled in the village (Deroka, Kajakom i splavom niz Drinu, p.87).

⁴⁶ Interview Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998.

⁴⁷ Milanovic, 'Arkanov srpski san'

during the nineteenth century. The Muslims perceived the creation of an independent Serbian state on the other side of the Drina as an immediate threat to their own privileged position. The Bosnian Serbs, in turn, saw in it a promise of liberation from the Ottoman yoke and inclusion into that new autonomous state. Among the Bosnian Muslims, national feelings, in the modern sense of the word, were largely absent: because of the religious supremacy of Islam and the privileged position Muslims enjoyed within Ottoman society, their sense of group identity was primarily confessional, rather than ethnic. Even during most of the twentieth century, when Bosnia became part of Yugoslavia, the Bosnian Muslims retained an ambiguous sense of ethnic identity. Some considered themselves to be Serbs, Croats, or Yugoslavs, and others as Bosnians or ‘Turks’ loyal to the Sultan.⁴⁸

It may be helpful here to examine the structural organisation of the Ottoman empire, since it explains the specific forms that Serb-Muslim antagonism took, as a clash between two sides: 1. a conservative and confessionally defined Muslim community and 2. a modern, though also religiously inspired, ethno-nationalist movement on the Serb side. The Ottoman state had always assigned a crucial role to religious affiliation as the main means of defining communal identities. Regardless of their ethnic origin, Muslims formed the privileged strata of society. However, what was termed the millet system allowed non-Muslim religious communities (Christians and Jews) to enjoy a high degree of autonomy, which guaranteed their continued existence and protected them against attempts at religious assimilation. For the Serb populations, it was the Orthodox millet, especially the lower clergy that played a crucial role in preserving their separate identity vis-à-vis the dominant Muslim layer of society. Although differences were religiously defined (making no formal difference between Greek, Serb, and Bulgarian believers within the Orthodox millet), the fact that ordinary priests shared a common language and ethnic background with their flock guaranteed closely intertwined religious and ethnic affiliations on the grassroots level. Not surprisingly, therefore, religious ideas and doctrines became crucial in articulating nationalist discourse when modern concepts of nationhood developed in the nineteenth century. This merging of national and religious identity was reinforced by the creation of several autonomous and autocephalous (‘national’) Orthodox churches in the newly established Balkan national states.

In the case of Serbia, religion (or rather the religious imagery and symbolism of Serbian Orthodoxy) became an important element of Serbian national identity. This development took place even though many early nineteenth-century national ideologists, (such as Vuk Karadzic), advocated a language-based definition of Serbian identity, which was designed to justify Great-Serbian claims to Bosnia, Slavonia, Dalmatia and Croatia and to assimilate the non-Orthodox Catholic Croats and Muslims into a future Serb or South-Slav state.⁴⁹ Even so, social, political, and church pressures always remained strong to identify ‘serbianness’ closely with Orthodoxy, rendering non-Orthodox Serbs as potentially ‘anomalous’ or ‘ambiguous’, or as ‘not really’ Serb. This idea was particularly prevalent among the more powerful traditionalist and conservative nationalist circles linked to the clergy. Thus, it is not surprising that the Serbian state and Orthodox church developed a relation of close co-operation and symbiosis from the very beginning. Even as early on as the first Serbian uprising, Serb Orthodox priests were actively involved in the armed struggle against the Turks.⁵⁰

On the ideological level, the Kosovo myth, with its strong religious or Christian overtones, moved to the centre of Serbian nationalist discourse. It served as a source of inspiration to avenge the loss of Kosovo, to stand up against the Ottoman empire, to resurrect the Serbian nation and to recover the national homeland at the expense of the Muslim oppressor and his indigenous collaborators. During Ottoman times, the Kosovo tragedy was kept alive in the popular epic songs. Performed by ⁴⁸ The most salient example is perhaps the Bosnian Muslim leader, Alija Izetbegovic, who admitted during an interview to have once declared himself a Serb. See: Lazovic, ‘Nekad sam se pisao kao Srbin’.

⁴⁹ Banac, The National Question in Yugoslavia, p.80. See, for instance, Vuk Karadzic’s text ‘srbi svi i svuda’ (1849) in which he writes that there are five million Serbs belonging to three different religions: Orthodoxy, Islam and Catholicism. A French translation (‘serbes, tous et partout’) can be found in: Grmek, Gjidara and Simac, La nettoyage ethnique, pp.42-53.

⁵⁰ Petrovich ‘Religion and ethnicity in Eastern Europe’, p.399. An example already mentioned is Hadzi-Melentije Stevanovic, who was the abbot of the monastery of Rača near Bajina Basta on the Serbian side of the Drina.

folk singers, these songs retold the tragic events in Kosovo and hailed contemporary heroes and battles with the Turks, such as those in the first Serbian uprising.⁵¹ Vuk Karadzic compiled a particularly large collection of these songs from Serbian popular tradition. He pieced them together into one literary body, thus ‘canonising’ the Kosovo myth and providing Serbian national ideology with its mythical cornerstone. In drawing on folk songs as his source, he also bridged much of the gap between the nationalist intelligentsia and the peasant masses.⁵²

These steps towards building a nation in Serbia had an effect on the Bosnian Serbs as well. Aside from the spill-over effects of the first Serbian uprising and the lofty example that the autonomous Serbian state held up to Bosnian Serbs, the growth of national consciousness was further intensified by the establishment of Serb schools, which were administered by the Serbian Orthodox church. Instead of viewing this process of national ‘awakening’ merely in terms of a reaction against an increasingly oppressive Ottoman regime, as Serbian historiography usually does, I would propose a different perspective: the opportunities for national mobilisation within the Ottoman empire (for instance through the establishment of schools) were growing as a result of the new conditions created during the period of Ottoman reforms, a period commonly referred to as the Tanzimat or ‘Reordering’ (1839-1876). The primary goal of this Ottoman ‘Perestroika’ was to save and revitalise the Ottoman Empire by introducing European standards of organisation and administration. In part, this was the result of growing interference from European powers, which were pressing for the equal status of the Christian populations living in the empire.

The reforms started with the imperial edict of the Gülhane (Rose Garden). This was a declaration of the Ottoman government’s intentions to establish security of life, honour, and property, to introduce a fair and effective taxation system, to create a regular army based on conscription, and to establish equality of all subjects irrespective of religious affiliation. In 1840, a revised penal code was introduced, which recognised legal equality for Muslims and non-Muslims. In practice, however, the success of these reforms was hampered by conservative opposition from the ulema and the majority of Ottoman officials. Many ordinary Muslim believers resented the doctrine of religious equality for Christians, seeing it as against the natural order of things.⁵³ Conservative Muslim elites became increasingly suspicious of Christians, whom they feared would invite foreign powers to interfere in their affairs. The reforms were particularly sabotaged in the provinces, where they were yet to be implemented even decades after their introduction. High-ranking local officials refused to comply with measures that would inevitably bring an end to their almost absolute power and would introduce a great degree of intervention from the Ottoman centre. Resistance against these reforms also grew in eastern Bosnia, especially against the new conscription (nizam) system. When Omer-pasha Latas, the new Bosnian governor, started to implement this system in the fall of 1850, high-ranking eastern Bosnian Muslim officials took up arms. In November 1850, the muselim of Srebrenica Hadzi Rustembeg and a group of volunteers from Srebrenica joined the uprising, but they were defeated near Kladanj. Hadzi Rustembeg, who was initially one of the Sultan’s supporters in Bosnia, was killed.⁵⁴

It was only in the 1850s, under the enlightened Bosnian governor, Topal Osman-pasha, that the Ottomans started modernising Bosnian society. Under his rule, schools, roads and railways were built, as was the first public hospital in Bosnia (in Sarajevo).⁵⁵ During the 1860s, measures were taken to ⁵¹ The heartland of this tradition of epic singing was the mountainous terrain of Bosnia, the Sandzak, Montenegro and northern Albania. One of the major functions of these songs was to keep the memory of important historical events alive and to spread news about contemporary events among an illiterate population. Ugresic has aptly called it ‘gusle journalism’ (Ugresic ‘Balkan blues’).

⁵² Ekmečić, ‘The emergence of St. Vitus Day’, p.335.

⁵³ Davison, Reform in the Ottoman empire, p.43; Zürcher, Turkey, p.53; Malcolm, Bosnia, p.122-23.

⁵⁴ Jovanovic, ‘Otpor Hatiserifu’.

⁵⁵ See: Malcolm, Bosnia, p.127-28. In 1851, Topal Osman-pasha also organized the first census, according to which Bosnia had 964,095 inhabitants. The Orthodox formed the largest category with 45.3% of the total population, while Muslims and Roman-Catholics comprised 39.9%, and 14.1% of the population, respectively. The Srebrenica district had 31,422 improve the economy and reduce illiteracy. For the first time, the Ottomans opened secular (secondary) state schools, called the ruždija-s, which were attended by pupils of all religious backgrounds.. There, they were prepared for official positions in local administrations. Nonetheless, these reforms did little to change the enormous percentage (97%) of illiteracy in Bosnia.⁵⁶ They did, however, improve the legal position of the Christians communities. During this period, many new churches and schools were built, which contributed to a revival of Serbian Orthodox church life and the development of an indigenous and nationally minded intellectual elite. In addition, a class of wealthy Christian merchants emerged, who were able to finance much of these activities. This educational and economic advancement provided the Christians with a renewed sense of superiority. At the same time, it deepened their resentment of the conservative Muslim elite who tried to block them from political power.

School teachers did much to stimulate national feelings among the peasant population. They even travelled to villages to encourage peasants to call themselves Serbs instead of briscani (Christians).⁵⁷ The Ottoman authorities viewed such activities with suspicion and tried to slow down the process. Despite their efforts, trade and community schools soon began to flourish in towns with active and wealthy populations. The first schools, run by the clergy, were often fairly primitive. However, new teaching methods and the rise of a class of qualified teachers introduced a growing trend towards professionalism in education. Support also came from Serbia proper, especially in the 1860s, when the Serbian government supplied teachers with textbooks.⁵⁸ In Srebrenica, the first Serbian school was established before 1850, and schoolbooks were smuggled in from Serbia by builders from the Osat region.⁵⁹ Some years later, during the final years of Ottoman rule, another school was built in the Serb stronghold of Kravica, next to the Serbian Orthodox church.⁶⁰ Some wealthy local Serb peasants sent the priest's son away to Belgrade to study there, and he later became the school's first teacher. It was one of the very few boarding schools in eastern Bosnia, attracting pupils from Srebrenica, Vlasenica, Han Pijesak, and other nearby Serb villages.⁶¹ Kravica soon became one of the most important - if not the main - centre of Serb nationalist activity in the region. Many Serbs from Kravica participated as volunteers in the wars that Serbia fought against the Ottoman Empire during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Vaso Eric (born 1844) became the Serbs' first important leader in Kravica.⁶² inhabitants, 15,272 of which were Muslims (48.6%) and 15,182 Orthodox Christians (48.3%). There was also a relatively large community of Gypsies. Jovanovic, 'Kraj turkse vlasti u Bosni'.

⁵⁶ Curic, 'sSkolstvo u sjeveroistoènoj Bosni', p.149.

⁵⁷ Malcolm, Bosnia, p.126.

⁵⁸ Curic, 'sSkolstvo u sjeveroistoènoj Bosni', p.150, 153.

⁵⁹ Serbs from the Osat region made a living as dundjeri (carpenters), who went to Serbia during the summer season to look for work. They were much in demand for their wooden house constructions. As travelling artisans, they had their own secret language (the so-called banalaèki jezik), which they used among themselves and which contained numerous Albanian words. See: Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.17-18; Jovanovic, 'srebrenica kroz vijekove (5)'; Milovanovic, 'Neki zanati u Srebrenici'.

⁶⁰ Kravica is the centre of a cluster of Serb villages and hamlets that all gravitate towards the local Serb Orthodox church, which stands on a hill. The present church was built in 1910, near an old church that had been built during Turkish times. As it always was the only church in this region, it formed an important gathering place for the whole Serb community. Kravica belongs to the region of Ludmer, which until the 1970s, was a relatively isolated stretch of territory because of poor road connections (Miljanovic, Krvari Bozic sela Kravice, p.11; Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.19). Local oral tradition has it that the entire region experienced a constant influx of Montenegrins and Hercegovinians from the end of the seventeenth until the middle of the nineteenth century. These people fled for various reasons, including to escape epidemics, poverty, and hunger, and to find refuge from blood feuds (see Jovanovic, 'Kraj turske vlasti u Bosni'). Thus, the majority of the Serb Orthodox population in and around Srebrenica is said to be of Montenegrin and Hercegovinian origin. See Hasic 'Porijeklo prezimena' [1].

⁶¹ Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.18-19. After the Serb schools in Srebrenica and Kravica were established, Muslims in Srebrenica also decided to form a school. In the 1860s, they collected money and established a medresa, which continued to function for a considerable period of time. See: Curic, 'sSkolstvo u sjeveroistoènoj Bosni', p.184.

⁶² Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.15-17; M.Dj., 'Uprkos carskoj zabrani?'; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.140-141.

Class also played a clear role in the growing Serb antagonism towards the Muslims. The majority of the Serb peasant population belonged to the class of kmets (serfs), whereas Muslims largely belonged to the class of landlords and free peasants. This Serb peasant population enjoyed few – if any – benefits from the Ottoman reforms and only saw their taxes raised. It was primarily towards the late 1850s that peasant unrest started to surface. Initially, it was directed against the tax collectors and not so much against Muslim landowners. The first peasant uprisings occurred in 1857 and 1858 in eastern Hercegovina. Later, in 1862, the tobacco planters in the Srebrenica district also revolted.⁶³ In some cases, Muslim peasants participated in these protests, which shows the cause of the dissatisfaction to be primarily economic rather than religious or ethnic.⁶⁴ Nevertheless, Serbs were disproportionately affected by deteriorating conditions in the countryside, as they comprised the bulk of the most deprived rural class of kmets (serfs). The growing unrest among the Serb peasant masses was thus increasingly directed against the Muslim landowning classes and conservative elites. They, in their turn, developed anti-Christian sentiments, which contributed to the ever-increasing Serb-Muslim divide.

Thus, the large Bosnian peasant uprising of 1875 quickly evolved into an uprising of the Serb peasant masses, which wanted to join Serbia and be liberated from their oppression in the Bosnian countryside. Serb peasants attacked Muslim landowners, who retaliated by mobilising Muslim irregulars, burning hundreds of Serb villages and killing several thousand peasants.⁶⁵ When the uprising was still in full swing, public pressure mounted in Serbia to come to the rescue of the Bosnian Serbs. As a result of that pressure, Serbia (and Montenegro) declared war on the Ottoman Empire in June 1876, and many Serbs from Kravica went to Serbia to fight as volunteers in the Serbian army.⁶⁶ As Serbia was still unprepared for war, it suffered almost immediate defeat, and was forced to sign a truce with the Ottoman Empire in November 1876. Yet its objectives remained unchanged throughout this period: to push the Ottomans out of the Balkan peninsula, and to liberate and unite all Serbs into a Greater Serbian state. It was primarily Ilija Garasanin, the Serbian prime minister and minister of foreign affairs in the 1860s, who put the reconquista of Ottoman territories and the unification of all Serbian territories at the heart of Serbia's foreign policy. In a secret document entitled Načertanije ('Outline', 1844) he justified the annexation of Bosnia and Kosovo. This document also sought to bring about a union with Montenegro, and to secure an outlet to the Adriatic sea.⁶⁷ Bosnian Muslims usually see him as the spiritual father of the Greater Serbian Idea, and one of the evil masterminds behind Serb plans to cleanse Muslims from Bosnia. It should be noted here, however, that Garasanin was primarily inspired by Vuk Karadzic's linguistic nationalism, which aimed at assimilating the non-Orthodox 'serbs' into a Serbian state. Although he was critical of defining Serbian national identity exclusively in religious terms, most of his contemporaries favoured a much cruder version of these Greater Serbian claims, pairing Serbianness to Orthodoxy and showing open hostility towards Muslims. The Bosnian Muslims were depicted as traitors, who had collaborated with the Turks since the Battle of Kosovo. The liberation of 'Christian' territories under 'Muslim' control became a kind of sacred duty, an obligation to avenge and reverse the injustices of Kosovo.

⁶³ Jovanovic, 'Kraj turske vlasti u Bosni'.

⁶⁴ See Malcolm, Bosnia, p.130.

⁶⁵ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.16.

⁶⁶ Nikolic, 'Kravica u prošlosti', p.16.

⁶⁷ Jelavich, History of the Balkans, Vol.1, p.331.

Chapter 2

The Austro-Hungarian Period And World War One

“My motive in collecting these paintings is my admiration for these Serb warriors, these soldiers from 1916 and 1917, when the Serbian army showed the most tremendous endurance and bravery until today. I admire these Serbian soldiers and can look at these paintings endlessly”.

Zeljko Raznjatovic ‘Arkan’ talking about his hobby of collecting World War One paintings, in an interview with journalist, Dusica Milanovic, November 1992⁶⁸

Under Austro-Hungarian Rule

It took several decades, until the Balkan Wars and World War One, before Serbia achieved its primary objectives of annexing Kosovo and Bosnia, and of unifying all Serbs into one state. Until then, Kosovo and Macedonia remained in Ottoman hands. At the Congress of Berlin (1878), Vienna was given the right to occupy and administer Bosnia-Herzegovina, though the Ottomans retained sovereignty over the region. While the Ottoman empire was falling apart, the Balkans were being divided into an Austrian and Russian sphere of influence, which placed Serbia’s ambitions in Bosnia in jeopardy. Serbia’s only gain from what was called the Eastern Crisis was full independence. In Bosnia proper, both Muslims and Serbs were angered by the news that Austria-Hungary was going to occupy the country, although for different reasons. Muslims thought that it would put an end to the privileges they had enjoyed living in an Islamic empire, while most Serbs feared that Austrian rule would postpone unification with Serbia indefinitely. In eastern Bosnia, particularly in Tuzla, Muslims took up arms en masse to resist the Austrians. In Srebrenica, Muslim landlords encouraged peasants to join the resistance.⁶⁹ Even so, it took the Austrians just a few weeks to crush resistance, though they were forced to call in numerous reinforcements to do so. They soon took control of major towns, such as Sarajevo and Tuzla. Even Srebrenica fell into Austrian hands.⁷⁰ Rebellions continued during the first years of the Habsburg occupation. In 1881 and 1882, for instance, the introduction of universal conscription by the Austrians provoked a Serb insurrection in Herzegovina, which also had support from the Muslim population. The insurrection rapidly spread over the country, but was soon suppressed by Austrian forces.⁷¹ Not very eager to live under Christian rule, Muslims – not only the Turkish elite, but also a huge number of indigenous Islamicized Slavs – immigrated to the territories still in Ottoman hands. According to Muslim historians, approximately 150,000 Muslims left Bosnia between 1878 and 1914. This led to a decline in their number in the general population: from 38.7% in 1879 to 32.3% in 1910.⁷²

⁶⁸ Milanovic, ‘Arkanov srpski san’, p.48.

⁶⁹ Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.35; Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.23.

⁷⁰ Jovanovic, ‘Kraj turske vlasti u Bosni’.

⁷¹ Batakovic, The Serbs of Bosnia, p.64.

⁷² Èekic, Historija genocida, p.58; Musovic,, p.454.

Bosnia-Hercegovina fell under the governance of the Common Ministry of Finance of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. In 1882, Benjámín Kállay, a Hungarian nobleman who had spent some years in Belgrade as the Austrian consul, was appointed governor. He was familiar with the situation in this part of the Balkans and developed a policy aimed at reducing Muslim resistance and countering Serb nationalist and irredentist ambitions. As he noticed the widespread appeal that independent Serbia held for Bosnian Serbs, he tried to bring about a rapprochement between the Muslims and Catholics. This was his attempt to isolate the Serbs in their endeavours to join Serbia, the Piedmont of a new and expanding southern Slav state on the Balkans.⁷³ He tried to achieve this by appeasing the agas and begs, who owned most of the land, and whose ownership titles he left untouched. Another important element in this policy was that of promoting a separate Bosnian nation, into which all three ethno-confessional groups were intended to merge.

Kállay's attempts to construct a separate Bosnian identity were paired with measures aimed at severing economic ties with neighbouring Serbia and Montenegro, and strengthening those with the Habsburg empire. During those years, trade between Bosnia and Serbia declined dramatically, a trend that continued for decades.⁷⁴ Austrian policies in Bosnia led to growing tensions with Serbia, which deeply resented the fact that Austria was keeping Serbia out of Bosnia and was blocking Serbia's access to the Adriatic. Yet in many ways, the Austrian period had also positive effects on the economic development and industrialisation of Bosnia, although much of these development activities were basically tailored to exploit the rich natural resources of the country.⁷⁵ The Austrians built roads and railways, for example, between Sarajevo and Visegrad in eastern Bosnia, where forestry was the most important growth industry. They also took the first steps towards developing a mining industry, particularly in eastern Bosnia. During the 1880s and following decades, Austrian geologists and mining experts mapped out the area to see whether its mineral resources could be turned into profit. Srebrenica was one of the areas explored for mineral reserves. And indeed, the Austrians did discover substantial reserves of bauxite there at the onset of the twentieth century.⁷⁶

These Austrian geological explorations also led to the discovery of the ancient Roman history of Srebrenica. The Austrians already knew that Srebrenica had been a mining town in mediaeval times. They also suspected that the town was the site of the ancient Roman toponym 'Argentaria'.⁷⁷ With that in mind, they tried to discover all sites where mining had taken place in the past. As a result, mining expert, Ludwig Pogatschnig, discovered a Roman settlement in Gradina (near Sase) in 1883. An Austrian mining company called 'Bosnia' then launched archaeological excavations that uncovered the remains of the Roman municipium (town) of Domavia, a town that, until then, had been known only from written sources.⁷⁸ It became clear that during mining Roman times had been an important economic activity around Srebrenica: the area had contained the most important silver and lead mines

⁷³ According to the first census the Austrians held in 1879, the total number of inhabitants in Bosnia was 1.2 million. Serbs formed the largest group (42.9%). In parts of eastern Bosnia, Serbs formed an absolute majority, such as in the districts of Vlasenica (64.4%), Zvornik (54.8%), and Bijeljina (70.6%). See: Batakovic, The Serbs of Bosnia, p.64.

⁷⁴ Batakovic, The Serbs of Bosnia, p.66. For a more detailed historical study of Kállay's rule in Bosnia-Hercegovina, see: Kraljačić, Kalajev režim.

⁷⁵ Sugar, Industrialization of Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.

⁷⁶ See: Milovanovic, 'O rudarenju u Srebrenici'; Dukic et al, Dvadeset pet godina rada, p.12.

⁷⁷ The work of Austrian historian, Konstatin Jireček, particularly his book, Die Handelsstrassen und Bergwerke von Serbien und Bosnien während des Mittelalters: historisch-geografische Studien (1879), was instrumental in this respect. As the names Srebrenica and Argentaria are both derived from the word 'silver' (i.e. 'srebro' in Serbian and 'argentum' in Latin), it was assumed that the two toponyms were different historical designations for the same area. For accounts of Srebrenica's history as a mining town see: Jovanovic, 'srebrenica kroz vijekove (1-4)'; Jovanovic, 'Gradska uprava i vlasti'; Jovanovic, 'Trgovina u Srebrenici'; Jovanovic, 'Zanatsvo u Srebrenici'; Hasic, 'Privredno stanje Srebrenice i njene okoline 1906. godine'; Hasic, 'Privredno stanje Srebrenice i okoline (1906-1926)'; Hasic, 'Dubrovačke zanatlije u Srebrenici'; Hasic, 'Dubrovačke zanatlije u srednjovjekovnoj Srebrenici'.

⁷⁸ Ibisevic, 'Bosnien-Herzegowina', p.15; Munro, Rambles and studies, pp.348-350. For a local account of the discovery of Argentaria see: Milovanovic, 'Traganje za Argentarijom'; Milovanovic, 'Argentarija je otkrivena'; Milovanovic, 'Iskopine Argentarije'; Milovanovic, 'Život i obiçaji'.

of the western parts of the Balkans.⁷⁹ Further excavations during the 1890s, financed by the Austrian Landesregierung of Bosnia, led to a more complete picture of the Roman settlement of Gradina.

The Austrians themselves never opened mines in the area of Srebrenica. However, their explorations prepared the way for the mining activities that developed there later, during Tito's time (particularly bauxite, silver, lead, and zinc mining). Until the 1990s, the exploitation of these resources was based on the original drawings and plans of Austrian geologists and engineers, which still existed at the beginning of the war (in the archives of the local museum of Srebrenica). Austrian economic activity remained confined to the exploitation of the Crni Guber mineral water source. The Heinrich Mattoni company built a small bottle factory, mainly using a local female work force, which produced 20,000 bottles of mineral water a day for export. The demand seems to have been highest during World War One, when the water was used to treat wounds of injured soldiers. The Austrians also built a paved road from Srebrenica to the Crni Guber source, with the intention of developing it into a spa. However, these plans were foiled by the outbreak of World War One. In addition, the Austrians built an ochre plant in a suburb of Srebrenica, which produced the yellow pigment that was used to paint houses and buildings throughout the Habsburg empire. This plant was closed down when the Austrians left in 1918.⁸⁰ The Austrians did much to improve the local infrastructure. Apart from the paved road to Crni Guber, they also built macadam roads between Srebrenica and Bratunac. Between Srebrenica and Milici, they built a road that passed by a Muslim cluster of villages around Suceška.⁸¹ They also built schools (in Srebrenica as well as Skelani), a hospital, and several other public utility buildings, most of which were still in use in that capacity at the onset of the Bosnian war. One of the most beautiful Austrian buildings in Srebrenica is the old konak or hotel, built in 1906, which later became the seat of the municipal council. Along the Drina, several Austrian military and police posts were set up to defend the border against Serbian incursions. Around this time, the town had approximately two thousand inhabitants.

After Kállay's death in 1903, his policy of suppressing ethnic divisions by promoting a 'Bosniac' identity was abandoned. New policies were introduced, allowing ethno-national cultural associations to be established among the three main communities. In 1905, for instance, the Bosnian Serbs received ecclesiastical and educational autonomy, which the Austrian authorities hoped would bring a halt to rising Serb nationalism and irredentism. Yet a new generation of young and educated Serb politicians emerged. And they made much more radical demands than had their predecessors (who had always shown more willingness to compromise with the Austrians).⁸² This was the formative period of ethnic politics in Bosnia. Between 1905 and 1910, Muslims, Serbs and Croats established the first political parties along confessional or ethnic lines. The first Muslim party was the Muslim National Organisation (Muslimanska Narodna Organizacija - MNO) created in 1906. The first Serb party was the Serb National Organisation (Srpska Narodna Organizacija - SNO) established in 1907. The Croats, in their turn, set up the Croat National Union (Hrvatska Narodna Zajednica - HNZ) in 1908. The first inter-confessional party was the Social Democrat Party established in 1909 (Socijaldemokratska stranka BiH).⁸³

As a result, ethnic divisions and rivalries very much affected political life in Bosnia, even more so as relations between Austria and Serbia deteriorated. Austria-Hungary's sudden annexation of ⁷⁹ From the third century AC on, Domavia was the seat of the Roman prokurator metalorum (the mining administrator) for the two Roman provinces of Pannonia and Dalmatia. At that time, it was the most important urban centre in the territory of present-day Bosnia-Herzegovina (Kulenovic Etnologija sjeveroistočne Bosne, p.184). Other Roman settlements in this area were found in Voljavica and Skelani (Municipium Malvesiatium). The latter was a Roman garrison, from which the Roman armies organized their campaigns on the eastern borders of their empire. When the Western Roman Empire collapsed, Domavium's mines closed, and the town was destroyed (Renner, Durch Bosnien, p.182).

⁸⁰ Ibisevic, 'Bosnien-Herzegowina', p.15-16; Renner, Durch Bosnien, p.184-85.

⁸¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.X. The Muslim inhabitants of Suceška later always complained that the Austrian road was never repaired during the seventy years of Yugoslavia's existence. To them, this was a clear sign that the Serb and Communist authorities were never interested in developing this remote Muslim area (Ibisevic, 'Bosnien-Herzegowina', p.16).

⁸² Corovic, Političke prilike, p.38.

⁸³ Arnautovic, Izbori u Bosni, pp.26-27.

Bosnia-Herzegovina in October 1908 only fuelled these tensions. In Belgrade, this led to a huge public outcry. Nationalist associations sprung up, such as Narodna Odbrana (National Defence), which recruited volunteers to cross into Bosnia and help to organise resistance against Austrian rule. This organisation was also active in Kravica, through the farmers' cooperation.⁸⁴ Another group was formed by junior officers from the Serbian army, who rallied around the powerful and charismatic figure of Dragutin Dimitrijevic 'Apis' ('The Bull'). They established the secret organisation 'Unification or Death!' (also called Black Hand), which saw Serbia as the heart of a new South Slav national state, and propagated an armed revolutionary struggle in order to liberate and unite all Serbs. Later, in 1911, on the eve of the Balkan Wars, the 'Black Hand' organisation became an instrument of the Serbian government's foreign policy in its preparations for war. From its ranks, a network of secret agents was created, which was active in Habsburg and Ottoman territories, and whose main goal was to wrest these regions from Austrian and Turkish control.⁸⁵

The Balkan Wars and World War One

'Rest in peace, you immortal heroes of the immortal and brave leader, Major Kosta.
You sacrificed your lives for our freedom Brave avengers of Kosovo rest in peace.
Because better times have now come to us.
Sunnays of freedom warm us from all sides.
The painful wounds of Kosovo are no more.'

Text on a plaque commemorating Major Kosta Todorovic and his soldiers, who fought in eastern Bosnia at the start of World War One and fell in battle near Srebrenica.

Serbia grew increasingly confident after its military victories during the two Balkan Wars (1912-1913), as it had doubled in size by taking control over Kosovo and Macedonia. The annexation of the Serb inhabited regions of the Habsburg Empire seemed within reach, and the Serb population in Bosnia thought that their liberation from 'the Ottoman yoke' was imminent. Many young Bosnian Serbs, ⁸⁴ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.141.

⁸⁵ Dragutin Dimitrijevic Apis was a high Serbian army officer, who played an important role in Serbian political life in the first two decades of the twentieth century. See MacKenzie, 'Dragutin Dimitrijevic-Apis'.

including from the Srebrenica and Bratunac area, crossed over the Drina into Serbia to join the Serbian army as volunteers. Some were arrested by the Austrians at the border, who tried to prevent them from joining the Serbian forces.⁸⁶ As the ideology of these young insurgents was an ambiguous mixture of socialist, South Slav and Serbian ideals, some Muslims also went to Serbia to join the Serbian army. Austria became increasingly nervous and started to strengthen its military presence along the border. In 1913, the Austrians imposed martial law, introducing various repressive measures against the Serb population.⁸⁷

These events were just the prologue to World War One, which was triggered by the assassination of Austria's heir to the throne, Archduke Franz Ferdinand, and his wife on their visit to Sarajevo on 28 June 1914. The assassins, a group of Bosnian youths (five Serbs and one Muslim), were all members of the youth socialist organisation, Mlada Bosna (Young Bosnia), which advocated South Slav union and the liberation of Bosnia from Austrian rule. They had received assistance from Dragutin Dimitrijevic Apis, Chief of Military Intelligence of Serbia at the time, who supervised a network of secret agents operating inside Bosnia. Although his role has never been clarified, he probably supplied the group with weapons without informing the Serbian government.⁸⁸ These arms were then smuggled into eastern Bosnia, which was an important chain in the conspiracy network. According to the local chronicler of these events, Djordje Beatovic, young Serbs from villages along the Drina and even Gypsy musicians were involved in carrying out certain tasks. The person who coordinated these activities from Serbia was army officer and border guard captain, Kosta Todorovic, who was stationed in Loznica on the Serbian side of the Drina. Later, when Austria declared war on Serbia, he led military operations in and around Srebrenica.

On this particular Sunday in June, Serbs in eastern Bosnia were commemorating Vidovdan, which is celebrated as the anniversary of the Battle of Kosovo. According to the description of events in Bratunac on that day, people had gathered in the yard of the Serbian Orthodox church to celebrate with music and dance. Around noon, something terrible happened in Sarajevo, after which people went home immediately. In the afternoon, at about five, the Austrian authorities announced a curfew and established a drumhead trial. Army and police units patrolled the empty streets of Bratunac.⁸⁹ Throughout Bosnia, the murder caused an immediate outburst of anti-Serb sentiment. The very same day, demonstrations were organised in all major Bosnian towns, as well as in Zagreb, where Croatian nationalists called for revenge on the Serbs. As one speaker there said: "Vidovdan is the day of Serb vengeance, and from this day onwards let it be the day of our revenge as well, because he who does not avenge himself will not live in honour [...]. We will avenge the death of the Croatian Crown Prince, we will take revenge for Croatia!"⁹⁰ All over Bosnia, anti-Serb pogroms began, against which the Austrian authorities undertook little, if any, action. For several days, Croats and Muslims looted Orthodox churches and Serb shops, and in Sarajevo, criminals were released from prison to participate.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire sent an immediate ultimatum to Serbia. When the Serbian government refused to comply, the Austrians declared war on the country on 25 July 1914. They recruited Bosnian Croats and Muslims into special auxiliary militia, the so-called Schutzkorpsen, which were assigned the task of paralysing Serb resistance and intimidating the Serb population. All over Bosnia, they exerted a reign of terror and fear.⁹¹ Thousands of Serbs, particularly intellectuals, teachers, merchants, and priests, were arrested and put in prisons and concentration camps. Nineteen Serbs from ⁸⁶ Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, pp.6-7. This source mentions 239 names of local Serbs, from the Bratunac and Srebrenica area, who joined the Serbian army during the 'wars of liberation', i.e. from the Serbian-Turkish wars of 1876-1878 until the end of World War One (pp.57-59). Another source says that more than fifty Serbs from the Kravica area fought as volunteers in the Serbian army during World War One (Nikolic, 'Kravica u prošlosti', p.17).

⁸⁷ Corovic, Političke prilike, pp.46-48.

⁸⁸ Batakovic, The Serbs of Bosnia, p.84-87; MacKenzie, 'Dragutin Dimitrijevic-Apis', pp.71-73, 78-82; Ljubibratic, Mlada Bosna, pp.153-64.

⁸⁹ Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.28-29.

⁹⁰ Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.31 (translation mine).

⁹¹ Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.32; Banac, The National Question in Yugoslavia, p.149.

the Srebrenica district were also arrested and spent the rest of the war years in Austrian prisons.⁹² In some cases (as in Foča), Serbs were taken hostage and kept as human shields at strategically important places, such as bridges.⁹³ In Srebrenica and elsewhere in Bosnia, Serbs were 'mobilised' into the Austrian army in order to keep them under close surveillance. They were also forced to dig trenches and carry out hard labour. Their treatment was harsh. Many suffered from hunger and disease, while others were killed in retaliation, particularly at times when the Serbian army achieved major military successes. (In fact, this is how a dozen Serbs from villages near Srebrenica died).⁹⁴

When the war started, the Serbian-Austrian border along the Drina River was one of the main lines of confrontation, where clashes occurred almost immediately. During the first months of the war the Austrian forces invaded Serbia three times crossing the Danube, Sava and Drina rivers. But the Serbs – battle-hardened as they were from the two Balkan wars – managed to drive the Austrians back. Serb forces intruded into eastern Bosnia, forcing thousands of Muslims from the Visegrad area to flee.⁹⁵ Major battles were also fought near Srebrenica, between Austro-Hungarian forces and a unit of Serb volunteers commanded by Kosta Todorovic.⁹⁶ Todorovic's unit first crossed into Bosnia on 1 August 1914, taking up positions along the Drina. In reaction, Hungarian soldiers – helped by Schutzkorpsen and local Muslims – plundered Serb houses and shops in Srebrenica and some nearby villages, also killing a number of Serbs.⁹⁷ A Muslim priest from Srebrenica, a member of the Schutzkorpsen, is reported to have participated in killing three Serbs on a hill near Srebrenica. At the end of the month, local Austrian police forces and Schutzkorpsen burned the Serb village of Podravanje after they killed four inhabitants and looted the village. A number of Serb peasants from Podravanje were hanged in the town of Srebrenica.⁹⁸

Todorovic was ordered to give up his positions along the Drina, after which he returned to Bajina Basta. Almost three weeks later, he renewed his attacks on Bosnian territory. On 18 September, his unit of some 150 well-armed volunteers managed to take Srebrenica and Bratunac, but they were soon forced back by the Austrian army. During the clashes that followed, near Brezani and Zeleni Jadar, fifty of Todorovic's volunteers died. Todorovic himself was heavily wounded, and the story goes that the Austrians took him to Srebrenica, where they burned him alive together with one of his soldiers, on 27 September 1914.⁹⁹ In reaction to Todorovic's actions, the Austrian army and Muslim and Croat Schutzkorpsen retaliated against the local Serb population. They rounded up its leaders, particularly priests who were seen as the disseminators of Serb nationalist propaganda. Between August and October 1914, nine Serbs from Srebrenica were accused of 'crimes against the army.' They received the death sentence and were subsequently shot or hanged. In Vlasenica, revenge was carried out by Muslim and Croat legionasi, or volunteers, who killed local Serbs on a hill above the town by decapitation.¹⁰⁰ According to Serb historians, Srebrenica was among the districts that suffered most from Austrian reprisals during the war, due to its proximity to the border and Todorovic's actions at the beginning of the war.

⁹² Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.34.

⁹³ Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.50.

⁹⁴ See Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.83.

⁹⁵ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.21. One of the participants in these clashes at the Drina front was Josip Broz Tito, who, as a young conscript, had been recruited into a Croat infantry unit of the Austro-Hungarian army. See: West, Tito, pp.40-41; Pavlowitch, Tito, pp.10-11.

⁹⁶ Some volunteers were Serb émigrés, who had come back from the US, Canada and Australia to join the fighting. Also several Yugoslav-minded Croats and Muslims were part of these units. For instance at least half a dozen of Bosnian Muslims from villages at the border near Skelani joined the Uzice corps (Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, pp.48-50).

⁹⁷ Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.39.

⁹⁸ Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.84.

⁹⁹ For Kosta Todorovic see: Vojna enciklopedija, vol.10, 1975, p.12; Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.42-43; Ljubibratic, Mlada Bosna, p.218; Deroka, Geografsko-turistička monografija, p.247.

¹⁰⁰ Corovic, Crna knjiga, p.210; see also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.142. Beatovic provides all the names of local Serbs from Srebrenica and Bratunac who were hanged (18 persons) or executed (102 persons), or who went missing or died in Bosnian prisons or in concentration camps (111 persons) (Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.54-59).

After World War One, major Kosta Todorovic remained a hero in the eyes of local Serbs and still is today. In September 1924, on the tenth anniversary of his death, a monument was erected in Srebrenica's town centre, commemorating Todorovic and the members of his unit who perished.¹⁰¹ The monument remained there until the beginning of World War Two, when Ustashe forced local Serbs to remove and destroy it. The Serbs, however, kept the monument somewhere, 'hiding' it for the next five decades: it turned up again after they took Srebrenica in July 1995. It is perhaps one of the clearest local examples of how official 'history' and 'memory' are subject to revision and manipulation, and how claims on the past that have been silenced can be revived.¹⁰² The two stone plaques, one with a short biography of Todorovic and the other containing a poem referring to the Battle of Kosovo, now stand in the park in Srebrenica's centre. (See the photo at the beginning of this section). While Serbs revere him as a hero, who avenged Kosovo and who helped to liberate Bosnia, Muslims regard him as a war criminal. The local historian and SDA leader, Besim Ibisevic writes, for instance, that Kosta Todorovic killed "hundreds of Bosniacs of the district of Srebrenica" during "terrorist" actions in 1914. In other recent Muslim publications, such as the books of Naser Oric and Nijaz Masic, Todorovic is said to have pillaged and burned numerous Muslim homes and to have killed many Muslims.¹⁰³

It is worth mentioning that from the Serb nationalist perspective, World War One is just one episode in the long history of local Serb victimisation at the hands of foreign occupiers and their Muslim and Croat collaborators. As the chronicler of Serb suffering in Srebrenica and Bratunac, Milivoje Ivanisevic, writes that "they" (the Turks, the Muslims, the Austrians, the Ustashe and the Germans) have persistently tried to exterminate the Serbs from this region. He claims that during World War One, the Serb population in the districts of present-day Srebrenica, Bratunac and Skelani, was reduced by half, the underlying message being that Srebrenica became predominantly Muslim because of the 'genocide' committed against the Serbs.¹⁰⁴ This, he says, is a recurrent crime against the Serbs in this region, even up to the present day. The one case he presents to illustrate his point can serve as an icon of local Serb suffering throughout twentieth-century history. Milan Petkovic, an Orthodox priest from Srebrenica, spent World War One in an Austrian labour camp. During World War Two, he was arrested by the Germans and died in Dachau. His only mistake, Ivanisevic writes, was that of being a Serb. Throughout his book, Ivanisevic draws one straight historical line from these events to the present. The same thing is recurring time and again, he says, and the perpetrators are basically the same people: the Austrians and/or the Germans, and their local servants, the Muslims (who sometimes belong even to the same families).¹⁰⁵

¹⁰¹ Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.49. There have also been songs about Kosta Todorovic's death (see for instance Beatovic, Bratunac i okolina, p.43). During the 1990s the primary school in Skelani, which was named after the Bosnian Partisan hero Slavisa Vajner, was renamed into the Kosta Todorovic primary school (Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.72). For Todorovic see also Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, p.9-10.

¹⁰² The first attempts to revive the memory of Kosta Todorovic occurred in the late 1980s. Besim Ibisevic, the then custodian of the Museum of Srebrenica, was approached by a Serb from a village near Skelani, who told him that he possessed Todorovic's monument. The Serb offered the marble plaques to the museum, but Ibisevic refused to accept them. He also remembers that the town's mayor, Salih Sehomerovic, asked for advice in this matter. Serbs had asked for permission to re-erect the monument in the park of Srebrenica. Ibisevic told him not to grant permission because "Todorovic had been a Chetnik" (conversation Ibisevic 01-06-2001).

¹⁰³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.X; Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, p.9; Masic, Srebrenica, p.15. For Serb actions against the Muslim population in southeastern Bosnia in general, at the start of World War One, see also Èekic, Historija genocida, p.60; and Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.142. Ibisevic claims to have seen a document written by a member of the District's Council of Srebrenica, containing 233 names of Muslims killed in Serb actions in 1913-1914. They were murdered by Serbian komita, who crossed the border from Serbia into Bosnia and attacked Muslim villages. Massacres were for instance committed in Suceška and Tokoljaci. Conversation with Besim Ibisevic 01-06-2001.

¹⁰⁴ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.15.

¹⁰⁵ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.13.

Land Reforms between the two World Wars

“The land that was taken from Muslims was given to Serbian kmets and their relatives, so they can now boast in Geneva that no less than 64% of Bosnian land, according to the cadastre, belongs to them”.

Naser Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, p.10

In the anarchy ensuing Austrian withdrawal from Bosnia towards the end of World War One, Serb peasants attacked Muslim landlords. War veterans also harassed and killed other Muslims in retaliation for Serb casualties during the war.¹⁰⁶ During the years that followed, Muslims remained at the receiving end of violent and drastic measures meant to eliminate the social, cultural and political legacies of the Ottoman past. The Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, which was created in 1918 from the remnants of the Habsburg and Ottoman empires, introduced land reforms at the expense of Muslim landowners, who, though compensated, were often reduced to poverty and economic hardship. In describing their experiences of national suffering and victimisation, Muslims often refer to this particular period in their history. This was when Bosnia became part of a non-Muslim state which transformed them into second-rate citizens and took away most of their land. According to Adil Zulfikarpasic, a well-known Muslim intellectual and member of a dispossessed Muslim family, the land reform was a “calculated move to impoverish the Muslim population in Yugoslavia”.¹⁰⁷ This issue of land reforms between the two world wars has had far-reaching implications even during the recent years. Bosnian Serb politicians have claimed more than fifty percent of the land based on ownership rights that were partly acquired during the land reforms in the aftermath of World War One.¹⁰⁸ Muslims, on the other hand, have pointed out that Serbs acquired this land at their expense, claiming that most of the land had initially been Muslim property.

Agrarian reform started in 1919, and was seen by those who introduced it as a revolutionary undertaking aimed at abolishing the feudal estates, which, in Bosnia, were owned primarily by Muslims. The plan was to redistribute the land among the former tenants of these estates. The reforms were meant to redress the inequalities on the Bosnian countryside, where a small class of large and wealthy Muslim landowners possessed the land, while Christian kmets, the class of serfs or customary tenants to which the bulk of Serbian peasants belonged, cultivated it.¹⁰⁹ Clearly, the land reforms had a political aspect in that they were intended to weaken the position of the old Muslim elite and ‘break’ them economically and politically. Although the reforms formally applied to other regions in Yugoslavia as well, in practice, they were carried out only in Muslim-dominated areas, such as Bosnia and Kosovo, in a final attempt to settle accounts with the ‘Turks’. Only Muslim landowners were targeted, whereas ¹⁰⁶ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.22.

¹⁰⁷ Zulfikarpasic, The Bosnia, p.13.

¹⁰⁸ This issue of who historically owns the land is highly contested, which explains the hugely varying figures given by Muslim and Serb sources concerning landownership in eastern Bosnia. According to Muslim sources, Muslims have held most of the land in the municipalities of eastern Bosnia until the start of the recent war. In Srebrenica, Muslims are said to have owned 79,4% of the land, while Serbs are said to have held only 20,6%. According to the same source, Muslims also owned most of the land in the Bratunac (71,8%), Vlasenica (61,8%), and Zvornik (75,1%) municipalities (Ratni zločin, pp.32-3). A Serb source, however, provides us with quite opposite figures: in the four municipalities of Srebrenica, Bratunac, Milici and Skelani together, Serbs are said to have held 52% of the land, and Muslims only 29%, while the rest was state owned (Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.6). It seems that already during Communist times land ownership titles were highly contested; in Srebrenica, for instance, the Communist authorities registered around 2.000 legal requests for the return of land usurped before April 1941. It is not clear whether these cases also included land taken from Muslims and given to Serbs (Delegatski bilten (Srebrenica), no.11, 06/06/1977, p.10-11).

¹⁰⁹ Almost all landowners whose land was cultivated by kmets were Muslims, while the great majority of kmets were Serbs. There were hardly any Muslim kmets. Most Muslim peasants were smallholders, who had full ownership rights over their land, although this usually did not mean that life was much better for them. It is clear from these figures that the agrarian question in Bosnia had a strong confessional or ethnic dimension (Eric, Agrarna reforma, pp.72-73).

Serb landowners in Serbia and Bosnia were usually exempted. In Bosnia, several large Serb landowners increased their property at the expense of the former Muslim elite.¹¹⁰ The compensation offered to Muslim landowners for confiscated land was insufficient, while they were only allowed to keep a limited amount of land under the condition that they would work it themselves.¹¹¹ Muslim authors usually point out that Muslim smallholders and peasants lost their land as well.

In eastern Bosnia, the well-known Zulfikarpasic-Èengic family was among the Muslim nobility seriously affected by these reforms. The family was based in Foča, but also owned large tracks of land around Srebrenica. As Adil Zulfikarpasic relates in his conversations with Milovan Djilas, his relatives lost almost all of their possessions. Although he is usually known for his liberal and moderate views, Adil Zulfikarpasic is uncompromising when it comes to the land reforms: “Agrarian reform in Bosnia was in effect the theft of estates, and conducted with a brutality that can only be called genocidal”.¹¹² State owned and communal lands were also confiscated. In the Srebrenica district, common pasturelands and forests were given to so-called Solunci, Serbian World War One veterans who had fought at the Thessaloniki front.¹¹³ It seems, however, that although local Serbs, especially World War One veterans, benefited from the land reforms, the advantages they took from it were modest. They often received land of inferior quality, or in remote areas, such as in Srem, Slavonia or the Banat, where they often did not want to settle.¹¹⁴ Agriculture remained primitive, on plots of land that were too small and fragmented to produce crops beyond a subsistence level.

The economic crisis of the 1930s made life even more difficult for the Serb peasant population. Yet politically, the Serbs had the upper hand. Quite a number of World War One veterans became leading members of the local branch of the Agrarian Party, which supported radical agrarian reforms. Among them were Jovan Nikolic and Pero Djukanovic, who were both from Kravica. Nikolic was appointed president of the newly established municipality of Kravica. Muslims, on the other hand, feeling deeply threatened by these ‘revolutionary’ political designs and by Serb supremacy, rallied massively behind the JMO (the Yugoslav Muslim Organisation).¹¹⁵ Many others left Bosnia for Turkey, reducing the Muslim segment of the population and making the Serbs by far the largest ethnic group in Bosnia. In November 1939, at the eve of World War Two, Bosnia had 2.75 million inhabitants, 44.8% of whom were Orthodox (Serbs), 31.2% Muslim, and 22.8% Catholic (Croats).¹¹⁶ Although Serbs did not possess the absolute majority, they were the most numerous and politically the most influential group in the Bosnian population, a position reinforced by Serb political hegemony in the Kingdom of Yugoslavia as a whole. This continued to fuel existing rivalries and nationalist tendencies among the other groups, particularly the Croats. With the growing threat of the Axis powers, this finally resulted in the Cvetkovic-Maček agreement or Sporazum (August 1939), which was meant to appease the nationalist Croat demands for autonomy. For the sake of the preservation of Yugoslavia, the idea of a unitary state was abandoned in favour of a dualist Yugoslav state, including the Banovina of Croatia. One of the results of the agreement was that Bosnia was partitioned between Serbia and Croatia, without the faintest regard for Muslim interests. Most of eastern Bosnia was included into what was in effect a reduced Yugoslavia or Greater Serbia. During the early 1990s, the Cvetkovic-Maček agreement formed the source of inspiration for the Tudjman and Milosevic regimes to launch new talks about dividing Bosnia between Croatia and Serbia.

¹¹⁰ Eric, Agrarna reforma, p.175.

¹¹¹ Eric, Agrarna reforma, pp.440-41.

¹¹² Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.14.

¹¹³ Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, p.10.

¹¹⁴ Nikolic, ‘Kravica u prošlosti’, p.20.

¹¹⁵ Nikolic, ‘Kravica u prošlosti’, p.21-22.

¹¹⁶ Radovanovic, ‘Evolucija verskih odnosa’, p.482. These figures are almost identical to the census results of 1931, when the Orthodox population made up 44.6% of the population, Muslims 31.2% and Catholics 21.7%. Radojevic, ‘Bosna i Hercegovina u raspravama’, p.32.

Chapter 3

World War Two, 1941–1945¹¹⁷

“This war is the continuation of World War Two; the same criminals from the same criminal hordes are, once again, exterminating the same Serb families in the very same villages; and they are all lined up under the same banner, using exactly the same fascist rhetoric”.

Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic, in an interview with Pogledi, 11 December 1992.¹¹⁸

“In Karadzic’s mind, the need to avenge Serb deaths during World War II would justify anything his people might do. In his mind, the blood on the hands of the Serbs during the war had been justified by the Ustase genocide. ‘The Serbs are endangered again,’ Karadzic warned. [...] ‘This nation remembers well the genocide. The memory of those events is still a living memory, a terrible living memory. The terror has survived fifty years. The feeling is present still because they won’t allow us to bury the dead’”.

Excerpts from a conversation New York Times journalist Chuck Sudetic had with Radovan Karadzic in September 1990.¹¹⁹

“We are back again in 1946 - World War Two never finished here.”

Ljubisav Simic, SDS leader and President of the Municipality of Bratunac, in an interview with Nasa Rjec, 23 October 1992.¹²⁰

The onset of the war and of Ustashe terror

Yugoslavia did not enter the war until April 1941. On 25 March, after months of German pressure, the Yugoslav government joined the Axis powers. Only two days later, however, it was overthrown by an army putch, which was backed up by huge mass demonstrations in Belgrade and other towns in Serbia, ¹¹⁷ For this chapter, I have made use of various sources, which describe the same events from different perspectives. In the former Yugoslavia, there was a great diversity in (pseudo-) historiographic genres dealing with World War Two. On the one hand, there is a tradition of scholarly works, most of which were written during the socialist period. Although this body of work is serious, it usually suffers, at least to some extent, from ideological constraints imposed by the communists. These works are supplemented by many other works of a more mundane or autobiographic nature, which can be characterised as ‘Partisan’ historiography. In addition, two new developments emerged during the 1980s: scholars began to tackle themes that had been taboo during communism, while popular works began to disseminate revisionist views, replacing old communist stereotypes with new nationalist ones. As far as events in Srebrenica are concerned, I relied mostly on scholarly works and Partisan sources from the communist period. Muslim or Chetnik accounts are practically non-existent. I did, however, draw on a historical novel by Momir Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands of Islam, which sums up the events in eastern Bosnia at the beginning of the war from a Chetnik perspective. It is based on numerous interviews, which the author conducted with local Serbs who participated in these events.

¹¹⁸ Jankovic, ‘Primorani smo na nove uspehe’, p.16.

¹¹⁹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.84.

¹²⁰ Anonymous, ‘Ima zaista, mnogo teskih izazova’.

Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Prince Paul was removed from power and the 17-year-old King Peter II was installed on the throne. Although the new government tried to ward off German intervention by offering declarations of loyalty, Germany responded by attacking Yugoslavia and bombing Belgrade on 6 April. Almost at the same time, German, Italian, Hungarian and Bulgarian forces entered the country. They defeated the Yugoslav defence within days. King Peter hastily fled the country, passing through eastern Bosnia to Niksic airport, from where he escaped to Greece. In the eastern Bosnian town of Vlasenica, as the story goes, local Muslims tried to stop the king and his following by strewing nails over the road, presumably in an attempt to kill him.¹²¹

Most Croats and Muslims, unlike the Serbs, welcomed the Germans, whom they thought would put an end to Serbian hegemony as it had existed during the interwar period. Nationalist Croats hoped that Nazi Germany would enable them to create an independent Croatia, which they could only achieve with German support. The conservative Muslim elite in Bosnia hoped that the Germans would give them back control over the land they had lost during the agrarian reforms of the 1920s. Before long, the Axis forces carved up Yugoslavia. Serbia was occupied by the German army, which installed a puppet government under general Milan Nedic. Bosnia became part of the Independent State of Croatia (NDH), a fascist puppet state, which was headed by Ante Pavelic, the leader of the fascist Ustashe organisation. The Drina was seen as the historical border of this Greater Croatia. Bosnian Muslims were proclaimed to be 'the flower of the Croatian nation' in a deliberate attempt to define the NDH as inhabited by a Croat majority.¹²² Although most of the Bosnian Muslim political and cultural elite was sceptical of the NDH and Ustashe rule – they preferred an autonomous Bosnia under German tutelage – others soon joined the Ustashe movement. The movement was to swell from a few thousand followers at the beginning of the war to a 100,000 members in May 1941, many of whom belonged to the less educated classes and the rural poor.¹²³ Eastern Bosnia was one of the regions where non-Catholics joined the Ustashe in substantial numbers.¹²⁴ One of the ways in which Muslims were induced to join the Ustashe was by promising them the return of land that was taken from them during the land reforms in the 1920s.¹²⁵

The new regime was fanatically anti-Serb, and was determined to get rid of the large Orthodox community that lived within the borders of the NDH (about one third of the total population). This caused an almost immediate upheaval among the Serbs living in the NDH. That upheaval was later to evolve into a complex civil war in which the major fault lines ran along different ethno-religious and political lines. Bosnia became one of the central stages of this civil war. There, aside from the occupying German and Italian forces and various Croat and Muslim militia, two other parties were involved: the communist Partisans (comprised of Serbs as well as a growing number of Muslims) and the royalist and Serb nationalist Chetniks. In most regions, such as eastern Bosnia, the situation was complicated even more, as local 'Chetnik' and 'Ustashe' militia acted independently of the leaders of the movements to which they belonged, at least nominally. Throughout the war, alliances often shifted, depending on local circumstances, and people switched (sometimes en masse) from one side to the other. The Ustashe and Chetnik forces, in particular, committed numerous massacres in eastern Bosnia. According to post-war communist sources, 2,267 people from the territory of the district of Srebrenica were killed, died in concentration camps, or disappeared during the war.¹²⁶ Srebrenica changed hands several times, which led to mutual acts of revenge, regularly causing large groups of people to flee.

¹²¹ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.19.

¹²² Goldstein, Croatia, p.135-6; Galic, Veze narodnoslobodilačkog pokreta, p.36.

¹²³ Redzic, Muslimansko Autonomastvo; Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p.105. Goldstein, Croatia, pp.133-4.

¹²⁴ Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.459.

¹²⁵ Tuzla Archive, document 48/2214.

¹²⁶ Lazarevic, 'Napad partizana', p.85. Other sources mention only 1,200 to 1,280 'victims of Fascist terror' in the municipality of Srebrenica. See for instance: Privredni pregled, 4(2), 1986, p.1; Srebreničke novine 4(33), 1981, p.1. This figure may not take into account all victims on the Muslim or 'Ustashe' side. Recent Muslim estimates vary between 1,000 to 1,500 people for the Srebrenica district. (See for instance: Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.XI).

Once the Ustashe installed their government, they soon proved to be extremely intolerant of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies. Within a few weeks, the Pavelic regime adopted discriminatory laws that were more extreme in some respects than those of Nazi Germany. The Serbs were a primary target: one third were to be expelled, one third were to be exterminated, and the rest converted to Catholicism. Ustashe forces, consisting mainly of volunteers, committed innumerable crimes and became notorious for their brutality.¹²⁷ Aside from the Ustashe forces, the NDH also possessed a regular army, the Home Guardists (Domobrani), consisting of Croat and Muslim recruits. They were not as extreme as the Ustashe, and proved to be a somewhat unreliable force from the Ustashe perspective.¹²⁸ In eastern Bosnia, Ustashe formed the backbone of NDH rule. They controlled major towns and roads, while the interior was in the hands of various other forces (Chetniks, Partisans, local Muslim militia, etc.). German and Italian forces only appeared in this region at the beginning of the war, and later, during major offensives against the Chetniks or Partisans.

The Germans first appeared in Srebrenica at the start of the war, when three German soldiers entered the town on motorbikes and left again. Soon a small German unit was stationed in Srebrenica, while civil administration was taken over by officials of the NDH, Croats as well as Muslims. Some local Muslim notables and religious leaders, such as the mayor of Bratunac, Jusuf Verlasevic, welcomed them as liberators from twenty years of 'slavery' under Yugoslav rule. The Ustashe started recruiting local Muslims into their ranks, which was particularly successful in the villages.¹²⁹ In the town of Srebrenica, many Muslims remained sceptical of the Ustashe extremists. They tried to mitigate the consequences of Ustashe terror for the Serb population, partly out of fear of possible Chetnik reprisals in the future. The newly established head of the Srebrenica district, Salih Redzepovic, a Muslim who was married to a Serb, was among those who did his best to offer protection to local Serbs. Others included Pavao Petrovic (a Catholic Croat who became head of the district court) and Asim Èemerlic (a Muslim doctor).¹³⁰ Some of these moderate Muslims were killed by the Ustashe later during the war. Even up to the present day, many people recall the acts of mutual help and solidarity between Serb and Muslim neighbours during World War Two. It seems that efforts to protect each other from the violence of 'outsiders' (Chetniks as well as Ustashe) were much more common then than during the recent war.¹³¹

Because of the positive role of moderate Muslims, the urban Serb population in towns such as Srebrenica initially suffered less from Ustashe terror than those in the villages of eastern Bosnia. There, as Karchmar writes, the Ustashe militia "applied their anti-Serb measures with such lack of discretion and disregard for sequence as to cause tens of thousands of frightened Serbs to flee across the Drina River into German-occupied Serbia".¹³² Ustashe searched and plundered Serb houses under the pretext

¹²⁷ Ustashe units were normally located in administrative centres, small towns and villages. The smallest units, the so-called tabor-s (of twenty to forty men) were stationed in larger village settlements. At the district level, they were labelled logor-s (consisting of fifty to one hundred men), placed in towns or administrative centres. The regional Ustashe headquarters was called stožer, which in eastern Bosnia, was located in Tuzla. See Kovaèevic, 'Partisan and enemy forces in the Tuzla region', p.462.

¹²⁸ Goldstein, Croatia, p.135-6; Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p.108. The number of Home Guardists peaked at the end of 1943 (130,000), but dropped dramatically in 1944. The Ustashe (volunteer) units simultaneously increased their numbers to 76,000 (Goldstein, Croatia, p.149). The Domobrani often performed poorly in combat. Increasingly demoralized, they frequently surrendered large quantities of materials to the Partisan forces. The Ustashe referred to them as the 'Partisan supply units'. See Trew, Britain, Mihailovic and the Chetniks, p.275.

¹²⁹ Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.22; Hodzic, Hronika, p.6.

¹³⁰ See the two documents published in Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p. 237-238 and 229-233. Ivanisevic has provided the NIOD research team with copies of the original documents. Muslims of high rank and status in other parts of Bosnia (judges, teachers, professors, businessmen, religious leaders) also protested against the Ustashe massacres, which they feared would provoke Serb reprisals against the Muslim population. See Banac, 'Introduction', p.XII; Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.62-63.

¹³¹ Interviews and conversation with Damir Skaler 06/02/1998, Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998, Hasa Selmanagic 07/08/1997, Branko Filipovic 14/11/1998, Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998, and Mehmed Malagic 14/06/1998.

¹³² Karchmar, Dražica Mihailovic, p.438.

of weapon searches. They were also reported to have raped Serb women. Some Serbs were arrested and imprisoned, for instance in Kravica, which was a Serb nationalist stronghold.¹³³ Churches were closed down and religious services were prohibited, while priests were forced to leave Bosnia. Dragoljub Jolovic, for example, an Orthodox priest from Srebrenica, received an ultimatum: he was to leave town within three days, which he did. The new parish house (built in 1937) was transformed into the local Ustashe headquarters. Later that summer, a number of Serb village priests were arrested (for instance in Kravica, Fakovici, Vlasenica, Milici, and Han Pijesak). Some of them were killed or taken to concentration camps.¹³⁴ Kravica's priest was detained in Drinjača, in the building of the local peasant association, where Ustashe tortured Serb prisoners to death.¹³⁵ The persecution of Serbs only intensified when, at the end of July 1941, the German troops left Srebrenica and the Ustashe forces took control. The very same day, forty-five Serbs from Srebrenica were arrested and put in jail, where some were to stay for the next two months and be subjected to terrible treatment from local Muslim guards.¹³⁶ As an ultimate humiliation, the Ustashe ordered the Serbs from Srebrenica to remove and destroy the monument of Kosta Todorovic. As mentioned earlier, the monument went into 'hiding', only to turn up again after the Serb take-over of Srebrenica in July 1995, when it was remounted in a park in the town's centre.

Among the crimes most shocking to the Serbs in this part of eastern Bosnia were the massacres in the village of Rasica Gaj, near Vlasenica, which occurred after the German army left the town on 21 June 1941. Even today, local Serbs refer to these events as one of the worst Ustashe crimes in the region at the beginning of the war.¹³⁷ The local Ustashe commander, Mutevelic, a carpet salesman who had regularly visited Vlasenica before the war, reigned by terror. Daily, black uniformed Ustashe rounded up prominent local Serbs, transported them to a makeshift prison in Vlasenica and killed them there or executed them in Rasica Gaj. During those massacres, which continued for several weeks, at least seventy Serbs were killed, although other sources list death tolls as high as two hundred.¹³⁸ Historical novelist, Krsmanovic, presents an almost 'epic' description of these massacres in his book, The blood-stained hands of Islam. In it, he condenses the massacres into a single event that takes place early one morning. The Ustashe round up all Serbs living in Vlasenica and force them to shout, "Long live Pavelic!" as they are taken to prison. Next, the Ustashe form a column of two hundred Serbs, who, tied to each other, are forced to walk to Rasic's grove, where they are ordered to undress and are then slaughtered with knives and thrown into an abyss. According to this account, only two Serbs escaped the massacre.¹³⁹ He also writes that the 'Turks' of Vlasenica planned these massacres well in advance. Before the start of the war a local Muslim official who joined the Ustashe drew up a list containing the names of over two hundred Serbs who were to be killed.¹⁴⁰ As we have already seen, Krsmanovic's fictionalised account seems to have had a clear impact on the views of local Serbs in eastern Bosnia during the last war. It also strikes the reader, not only with the amount of open and explicit brutality in its descriptions, but also for very different reasons. In July 1995, for instance, Rasica Gaj was one of the ¹³³ See for instance Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.22-23.

¹³⁴ See for instance Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.226.

¹³⁵ For these events in Drinjača see: Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja pp.228-229; Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.65-66; Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.23. According to the latter source, more than a hundred Serbs were killed in Drinjača by 12 August 1941. Ivanisevic claims that the basket full of eyes from Serbs came from Drinjača. This basket was found by Italian war journalist, Curzio Malaparte, at Ante Pavelic's desk during a late-summer visit to Zagreb in 1941, (an episode which he described in his autobiographical war novel Kaputt). The Ustashe had sent these as a 'present' to their leader (Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.23). See Malaparte, Kaputt, pp.221-28.

¹³⁶ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.229-33, 237-38.

¹³⁷ Interview: Rajko Dukic 14/06/2000. Ivanisevic's book contains several eyewitness accounts of the events in Vlasenica and Rasica Gaj. See Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp. 238-246 and 249-255.

¹³⁸ See for instance: Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.241-242; Jaksic, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.382.

¹³⁹ See especially: Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, pp.54-56. The same author writes that the Ustashe killed several dozens of local Jews in a similar way: they cut their throats and threw them into a cave (p.74).

¹⁴⁰ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.16. This is corroborated by another (Partisan) source. See: Jaksic, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.382.

sites where Muslim captives from the safe area of Srebrenica were executed by Mladic's forces, a choice of location that may have been more than mere coincidence. At least 21 Muslims were killed here.¹⁴¹

Partisans and Chetniks organise the resistance

These Ustashe massacres and the brutality with which they conducted their actions against the Serb population of the NDH shocked even the Germans, who feared that this could provoke armed Serb resistance. Indeed, already in June 1941, Serbs started a rebellion in Hercegovina, which was the first in a long series of uprisings that erupted throughout the NDH as the summer went on. Two forces appeared: the royalist and nationalist Chetniks, headed by the Yugoslav army colonel Draza Mihailovic, and the communist Partisans, led by Josip Broz Tito. Throughout most of 1941, the two movements cooperated, burying their ideological differences and gaining control over most of eastern Bosnia. At the local level, it was very difficult to distinguish the two because they both had the same recruitment base: the Serb peasant masses who felt threatened with extinction. The Partisans, many of whom had fought in the Spanish Civil War before, kept a low ideological profile, presenting their struggle as a war of liberation from fascist occupation. On this 'patriotic' basis, they managed to rally segments of the traditional and apolitical peasant masses to their side, segments that were more inclined to support the nationalist Chetniks.¹⁴² As Banac writes, at this early stage of the war, it was Communist policy to appease Serb nationalism, and not to punish the Chetnik assaults on the Muslim population if the Serb perpetrators showed signs of willingness to join the partisans.¹⁴³ Yet the communists remained determined to put an end to Chetnik attacks on Muslim villages and the massacres of Muslims in eastern Bosnia during 1941. They even created special Partisan units whose exclusive task it was to protect Muslim villages against these Chetnik attacks.¹⁴⁴

It was clear that the political aims and ideological orientations of the Chetniks and Partisans were very different. The Partisans aimed at a common and united struggle of all nations and ethnic groups to liberate the country from fascism, a struggle in which they never lost sight of their plans to take power after the war. The Chetniks' mission, by contrast, was to create an ethnically homogenous Greater Serbia as an answer to very similar Ustashe objectives to engineer an ethnically homogenous Greater Croatia. Inevitably, therefore, the two movements were later to become very fierce opponents.¹⁴⁵ In eastern Bosnia, the Partisans had very little initial support from the Serb peasant population (except in Sekovici which became their main stronghold in the region). Many of them came from elsewhere, particularly from the region of Srem (the southern part of the Pannonian plain), which bordered on eastern Bosnia and had been included in the NDH.¹⁴⁶ The resistance against Ustashe rule developed mainly along the lines of a traditional peasant ustanak or rebellion, in a spontaneous and disorganised manner. Entire adult male populations of villages would take up arms, organise themselves into local armed village bands, and begin fighting without any clear purpose beyond making life difficult for the enemy.¹⁴⁷ They were often under the command of prominent local peasant leaders and World War One veterans.

¹⁴¹ International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), Transcripts of proceedings for Krstic trial (case IT-98-33), 24 March 2000, p.1295 <<http://www.un.org/icty/transe33/000324ed.htm>>. The executions in Rasica Gaj were first reported by David Rohde in The Christian Science Monitor, 2 October 1995.

¹⁴² Goldstein, Croatia, p.142.

¹⁴³ Banac, 'Introduction', p.X. Zulfikarpasic writes that Muslims who joined the partisan units (such as Zulfikarpasic himself) received Serb noms de guerre, ostensibly to protect them from Serbs who were still not well educated in socialist dogma (Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniaks, p.71-72).

¹⁴⁴ See for instance: Novakovic, 'Legendarna Romanija', pp.727-728.

¹⁴⁵ For these political and ideological clefs between Partisans and Chetniks, see in particular: Antonic, Ustanak u istoènoj i centralnoj Bosni, pp.417-486. See also Antonic and Peric, Biraè u Narodnooslobodilaèkoj borbi.

¹⁴⁶ Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilaèkog pokreta.

¹⁴⁷ Karchmar, Draza Mihailovic, p.440-41.

According to most Serb narratives, the resistance started on the eve of Vidovdan, the anniversary of the Kosovo Battle, when the Ustashe began arresting large numbers of Serbs out of fear that the Serbs would launch an uprising on that particular date. Many Serb peasants left their families, took up their weapons and went off to the hills and forests. One of the main Chetnik figures in the Srebrenica and Vlasenica area was vojvoda Acim Babic, a well-to-do landowner and trader from a village near Han Pijesak, who led the revolt in the area between Han Pijesak and the Drina River.¹⁴⁸ According to Krsmanovic, Babic's first speech to his men was about Kosovo:

“On the first day of the uprising, brothers, over one hundred men have gathered here to form the proud èetnik army. May the St. Vitus's day of so long ago and Prince Lazar's curse on those Serbs who did not come to fight in the Battle of Kosovo be ever present in our minds, inspiring us to defend our people and our homes from the blood-thirsty Croats and Turks. They want to wipe the Orthodox Serbian nation from the face of the earth”.¹⁴⁹

In early August 1941, Chetnik forces carried out their first successful attacks on Ustashe positions in eastern Bosnia. Babic took control of Han Pijesak, while Rajko 'Èelonja' Èelonjic (a peasant from a village near Vlasenica) entered Derventa near Milici. There they established their joint Chetnik headquarters, which became one of the main Serb strongholds in eastern Bosnia.¹⁵⁰ In Kravica and surrounding villages, the uprising started on 8 August 1941 with the tolling of the church bell. There the uprising was led by World War One veterans Jovan Nikolic and Pero Djukanovic. Within a few days, they brought most Serb villages under their control, and between 15 and 19 August they also liberated Drinjaèa, Bratunac, and Srebrenica.¹⁵¹ On 5 August 1941, Partisans took control of Sekovici, which was singled out as the most suitable base for their operations in the region. Throughout the war, it remained a Partisan stronghold, even though initially, the Partisans only had the support of the Communist youth.¹⁵²

Even as early on as this stage, Chetniks and Partisans were struggling for control over the uprising. Frequent clashes occurred, for instance, regarding the question of who was to be credited most for certain military successes. One example was the take-over of Vlasenica on 10 August 1941. Both sides claim to have led and carried out the attack, with either very limited or no assistance at all from the other side. Partisan commander, Cvijetin Mijatovic, writes that he took control of the town, while Babic's Chetniks only showed their faces after the job was done.¹⁵³ In Krsmanovic's narrative, by contrast, it was not the Partisans but Babic who organised the attack on Vlasenica soon after he taken control of Han Pijesak. The 'communists' rushed to the scene from Sekovici to join the fighting and to prevent Acim Babic from claiming victory.¹⁵⁴ After Vlasenica was liberated, Partisan and Chetnik commanders continued to quarrel about who was to exert authority over the town, as well as about the ¹⁴⁸ Zekic, 'The uprising in Biraè', p.344-5; Karchmar, Draza Mihailovic, p.461; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.252. Babic had been a Serbian army commander during World War One, and had fought at the Salonica front (Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.15; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.252). According to Krsmanovic's account, he started to organise the resistance after he escaped from Ustashe captivity in June 1941 (Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.44-49).

¹⁴⁹ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.64.

¹⁵⁰ Partisan sources claim that the headquarters in Derventa was initially shared by all insurgent groups, Chetniks as well as Partisans (Mijatovic, 'Memories', p.332-333).

¹⁵¹ Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.14 and 52-55; Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.23-24; Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilaèkog pokreta, p.45; see also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.143. For Pero Djukanovic, see: Milivojevic, 'Dobrovoljac sa Soluna'.

¹⁵² Jaksic, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.382; Mijatovic, 'Memories', p.328-9. Sekovici was suitable as the Partisan regional headquarters because of its isolated location in the mountains. From there, it was easy to maintain contacts with other areas both in Bosnia and Serbia (Zekic, 'The uprising in Biraè', p.341).

¹⁵³ Mijatovic, 'Memories', p.337. Chetniks are reported to have been unreliable as partners in battles with the enemy on other occasions as well. See for instance: Zekic, 'The uprising in Biraè', p.344-6.

¹⁵⁴ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.68-70.

distribution of arms and ammunition seized from the enemy.¹⁵⁵ According to Karchmar, the fact that the Chetniks alone governed the town after it was taken probably shows that the capture was mostly their doing.¹⁵⁶

As Partisan leader Mijatovic Chetniks writes, the Partisans had very different ideas regarding who was the enemy. He describes his first encounter with Babic's men, just before the attack on Vlasenica:

“They had beards, black fur caps with some kind of ribbons on them. Right away, they started asking who I was, where I came from, what my name was, was I a Serb and so on. They wanted to know if there were any ‘Turks’ in our group. I answered that there were some Moslems with us and that they were fine comrades and fighters. The men from the ‘Planina’ group stopped talking freely with us and wanted to leave right away. ‘Are we going to make plans for attack?’ I asked them. ‘We don't know anything!’ they answered and prepared to leave. On their way back, they told the messengers who were accompanying them, ‘We don't want any Turks in this’.”¹⁵⁷

The Chetnik-Partisan divide was perhaps the most crucial one, but there were also many internal divisions within the Chetnik forces, which were usually locally based and loosely organised. The label ‘Chetnik’ was widely used by various armed Serb bands throughout Yugoslavia, many of whom had little to do with Mihailovic except by a formal declaration of allegiance to his movement.¹⁵⁸ Mihailovic's forces operated from Ravna Gora, just across the border in Serbia. They were poorly organised, however, and had little contact with Chetnik groups in Bosnia, which often ignored Mihailovic's orders.¹⁵⁹ Mihailovic's Chetnik movement was never anything more than a loosely organised conglomerate of Serb nationalist bands, which usually followed their own course and carried out numerous crimes against Muslim civilians, particularly in eastern Bosnia. It is clear that Mihailovic never dissociated himself from their actions (claiming after the war that he did not know at the time), and that he tried to establish his authority over them. He sent Jezdimir Dangic into eastern Bosnia to bring the Chetnik resistance more under his control. Dangic, a Yugoslav army officer, was born in Bratunac and was also the son of a local Serbian Orthodox priest.¹⁶⁰

Apparently, local Chetnik leaders did not particularly welcome Dangic as their new commander-in-chief.¹⁶¹ On his arrival at the Chetnik headquarters in Derвента, Dangic was informed immediately that the Èlonjic brothers, who led the Srebrenica brigade, had no intention to submit themselves to his command: “Rajko's Srebrenica brigade is independent. With his army, he liberated the entire district of Srebrenica, and he deserves to have the command his own way”.¹⁶² Krsmanovic's description of the first meeting between Dangic and Babic in Han Pijesak also clearly shows that Acim Babic claimed the leadership of the uprising for himself. Nonetheless, Dangic showed him the authorisation he received from Mihailovic to take command over the Chetnik units in eastern Bosnia. Babic seems to have ¹⁵⁵ Zekic, ‘The uprising in Biraè’, p.345-6; Mijatovic, ‘Memories’, p.337.

¹⁵⁶ Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.516. Nonetheless, a document in the Tuzla Archive states that a [Partisan] unit from Sekovici (led by Mijatovic) took the northern part of the town at 7:00 PM, while a [Chetnik] unit from Milici captured the eastern part at 8:00 PM. At that point, only the army barracks remained under Ustashe control, which were finally taken by the Partisans (Tuzla Archive, Document 5294).

¹⁵⁷ Mijatovic, ‘Memories’, p.334.

¹⁵⁸ Trew, Britain, Mihailovic and the Chetniks, p.8-9; Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.444.

¹⁵⁹ Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p.156; Trew, Britain, Mihailovic and the Chetniks, p.191-195; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.26.

¹⁶⁰ Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p. 157; Djuric, Novi prilozi, p.6-7; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp. 229-33. Major Dangic had been the commander of the Royal Gendarmerie, who had organised King Peter's retreat to Niksic airport at the start of the war. See: Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.515; Djuric, Novi prilozi, p.5; Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.24.

¹⁶¹ See for instance, Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.142.

¹⁶² Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.87.

reluctantly accepted Dangic as his chief-of-staff, apparently under a condition of some form of shared power.¹⁶³ Even though he was appointed by Mihailovic, Dangic exhibited a large degree of independence in his actions. In November 1941, after the Chetnik attack on Tito's stronghold in Uzice ended in disaster, he completely ignored a desperate plea for assistance from Mihailovic.¹⁶⁴ Dangic developed good contacts with Nedic's government in Serbia. Through Nedic, he tried to persuade the Germans to remove their Ustashe protégés from eastern Bosnia, with a view to ending the Ustashe brutalities against the local Serb population.¹⁶⁵ In Partisan historiography, Dangic is presented as a tough nationalist, who called on the Serbs to take vengeance against the "Turks" and who should be held responsible for the Serb massacres of the Muslim population.¹⁶⁶

Chetnik terror against Muslim villages

"Draza Mihailovic's Chetniks killed about ten thousand Bosniacs in south-eastern Bosnia and Sandzak; they plundered and burnt down thousands of houses; they completely exterminated the Bosnian population in some places and destroyed their settlements; they expelled hundreds of thousands of Bosniacs from their homes, etc. South-eastern Bosnia and Sandzak, especially the river Drina, are the biggest Bosnian cemetery from the Second World War [sic]".

Smail Èekic, History of genocide against Bosniacs, p.69.

As the recently published memoirs of Pero Djukanovic, a local Serb leader from Kravica, demonstrate, the situation on the ground was extremely complex, especially during the first year of the war, as well as later. At the start of the war, the divisions between Chetniks and Partisans had still not crystallised. There was also a certain degree of cooperation between moderate Muslims and Serbs vis-à-vis the Ustashe.¹⁶⁷ Even though local Serbs and Muslims belonged to different camps and militia, people in villages were much less afraid of their immediate neighbours, whom they usually knew well, than they were of outsiders.¹⁶⁸ Older people from Srebrenica and Bratunac, who had experienced World War Two, often point out that that war was not as brutal and inhumane as was the recent conflict. Muslims offered assistance and protection to their Serb neighbours in the event of an Ustashe attack, and Serbs offered shelter to Muslims when attacked by Chetnik forces. In Kravica, for instance, Muslims from a neighbouring village intervened to prevent the Ustashe from massacring local Serbs.¹⁶⁹ Nevertheless, the fear resulting from brutal and indiscriminate violence of both Ustashe and Chetnik extremists drove a wedge between moderates on both sides. They were hardly in a position to exert control over these unruly forces and even risked being killed by them if accused of 'collaboration' with the enemy. In the ¹⁶³ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.90. It is not exactly clear what kind of deal was made. Krsmanovic writes that Dangic appointed Babic as his first deputy (p.91). Another source claims that Babic was appointed as head of the so-called national liberation government of eastern Bosnia, leaving command over the armed forces in the hands of Dangic. (Statement by Muharem Djozic, undated; Collection Ivanisevic). See also Jaksic, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.383; Karchmar, Draza Mihailovic, p.464.

¹⁶⁴ Karchmar, Draza Mihailovic, p.478; Trew, Britain, Mihailovic and the Chetniks, p.76, 210; Djuric, Novi prilozi, p.16-17; Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.138.

¹⁶⁵ Karchmar, Draza Mihailovic, p.467; Trew, Britain, Mihailovic and the Chetniks, p.257-8.

¹⁶⁶ Jaksic, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.385. For Dangic, see also Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.71; Miletic, 'O saradnji komandanta'.

¹⁶⁷ See, for instance, Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.39-50 passim, and 57-58.

¹⁶⁸ Hodzic, Hronika, p.10.

¹⁶⁹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.143.

eyes of some, Chetniks and Ustashe actually cooperated in trying to eliminate the moderate voices in their own camp before assaulting the other side.¹⁷⁰

After the Ustashe had terrorized Serb villages at the beginning of the war, Serb 'Chetnik' bands started to do the same in Muslim villages during autumn 1941. As Karchmar writes, local peasant leaders "never succeeded in establishing effective control over their followers, nor did they, on the whole, make any conspicuous effort in that direction. Worse than that, from their original self-defence against the Ustashe, they soon progressed to attacks on Muslim villages, to the accompaniment of widespread looting, in which some of the commanders, unfortunately, were the bellwethers and principal beneficiaries".¹⁷¹ The groups led by Acim Babic and Rajko 'Ēelonja' Ēelonjic (from Derventa) were particularly notorious in the area around Srebrenica. Their main activity was to roam the countryside and plunder Muslim villages under the pretext of weapon searches. During such attacks, the Muslims inhabitants of such villages were frequently killed.¹⁷² Other Chetnik leaders, such as Pere Djukanovic from Kravica, condemned these activities and did their best to prevent them.¹⁷³

In one such raid in the village of Sebiočina, over thirty Muslims, including women and children, were killed.¹⁷⁴ The Serb take-over of Srebrenica on 18 August 1941 was also carried out with a great deal of violence against the Muslim inhabitants of the town and its surrounding villages. Approximately four hundred Chetniks, some of them armed with guns and others carrying axes and clubs, entered the town. They confiscated all arms and ammunition from soldiers, policemen and other officials, and immediately installed their authority in the town. They plundered Muslim shops, requisitioned food from the population, seized small and large cattle, and forced Muslims to work for them.¹⁷⁵ In Muslim accounts published after the Bosnian war, the Chetnik forces are said to have terrorised the Muslim population for about ten days after taking Srebrenica. As time passed, their actions became more ruthless. While the majority of the Muslim population went into hiding in the forests, Muslim villages were burned to the ground and the Muslims who remained behind were killed. One example mentioned is the village of Abdulici (or Zanjevo) near Fakovici, which was burned to ashes. Almost all Muslim inhabitants were liquidated by the Chetniks.¹⁷⁶ From Serbia, groups of Chetniks crossed the Drina River to participate in the plundering of Muslim villages; the booty was transported over the border into Serbia. Chetniks are also said to have searched Muslim houses for Ustashe hiding in them, some of whom were shot and "sent tumbling down the cliffs into the Drina".¹⁷⁷

Aside from antagonising the Muslim population, Chetnik actions led to growing tensions with the Partisans, who increasingly condemned the brutality of these actions and asked Chetnik commanders, such as Dangic, to stop them. Nevertheless, Partisan-Chetnik cooperation still continued at this stage: at their meeting in Drinjača, on 1 October 1941, Partisan and Chetnik leaders reached a formal agreement and the Chetniks promised to stop attacking the Muslim and Croat population.¹⁷⁸ A unified Partisan-Chetnik operational headquarters was established for eastern Bosnia, and joint civil administration bodies, the so-called People's Liberation Committees (Narodno-oslobodilački odbori), were set up in most of the liberated areas (Sekovici, Vlasenica, Srebrenica, Bratunac, Milici, Fakovici, and Skelani).¹⁷⁹ Men who enjoyed wide respect among the population were elected as members of the ¹⁷⁰ See, for instance, Masic, Istina o Bratuncu.

¹⁷¹ Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.462.

¹⁷² Hodzic, Hronika, pp.10-16. One of those killed by 'Ēelonja' was Jusuf Verlasevic, Bratunac's mayor at the start of World War Two. His son has claimed that during the first year of the war Ēelonja killed some four hundred Muslims, mostly wealthy people, in the districts of Bratunac and Srebrenica. Interview: Ibro Verlasevic 01/06/1998.

¹⁷³ Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.113; Galic, Vezę narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.73.

¹⁷⁴ Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.113.

¹⁷⁵ Dedijer and Miletic. Genocid nad Muslimanima, pp.122-124.

¹⁷⁶ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.55.

¹⁷⁷ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.79.

¹⁷⁸ Djuric, Novi prilozi, p.15; Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.471; Galic, Vezę narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.67.

¹⁷⁹ Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p.157. In October 1941, well-known local Partisans and Chetniks, such as Rodoljub Ēolakovic, Rade Jaksic, and Pero Djukanovic, organised meetings in Srebrenica, Fakovici, and Skelani, to set up local People's committees at public meetings. The committees played an important role in administration, the coordination of agricultural activities and the distribution of agricultural products among the people and the armed forces.¹⁸⁰ Due to growing Chetnik-Partisan rivalry, however, some of these committees did not survive. The most active committee was the one in the Partisan stronghold, Sekovici. However, in Srebrenica and other places, such as Milici, these committees died a slow death because of Chetnik obstruction.¹⁸¹

The rift between the Chetniks and Partisans deepened in November 1941, when Mihailovic attacked the main Partisan stronghold of Uzice, signalling the beginning of the civil war in Serbia.¹⁸² Although this did not put an immediate end to their cooperation in eastern Bosnia (where the two movements worked more closely together and were also harder to distinguish from one another than in Serbia), relations between Chetniks and Partisans also became increasingly hostile there, which is reflected both in Chetnik, as well as Partisan, historiography. Both sides accused each other of undermining their cooperation, of sabotaging their activities, of plotting against the other and of attempting to infiltrate the other's forces. On 16 November, during a joint meeting in Vlasenica, Chetniks and Partisans were unable to put their mutual disagreements to rest, and formal cooperation was abandoned. The Chetniks established a separate command for eastern Bosnia, which was hesitantly joined by some Chetnik leaders, such as Pero Djukanovic, who was much more in favour of continuing the cooperation.¹⁸³ Unruly bands of armed Chetniks, joined by the Serb population, continued looting Muslim villages and committing atrocities against the Muslim population in revenge for Ustashe atrocities at the beginning of the war.¹⁸⁴ As Karchmar writes:

“Units marching to attack Ustasa strongholds were accompanied by columns of peasants, including women and children, who busily stripped the captured towns of everything portable and threw themselves upon the surrounding Moslem villages like a plague of locusts. The looting was accompanied by small and large massacres of the Moslem population, in which the armed Chetniks competed in inventing barbarous ways to dispatch the hated ‘Turks’. In this, they only modelled themselves on the earlier Ustasa treatment of the Serbs; but their indiscriminate persecution threw even those Moslems who were still politically uncommitted into the arms of the Ustase.”¹⁸⁵

The leader of the Chetnik forces in eastern Bosnia, Dancic, complained repeatedly about the cowardice and lack of discipline among peasants. He violently denounced the looting, saying that Bosnian Serb peasants “had become the most accomplished robbers in the world, so that he was ashamed to call himself a Serb”.¹⁸⁶ But he could do nothing to stop it. Chetnik forces also continued to carry out such Liberation Committees (see Milivojevic, ‘Bio nam je drag gost’; for Srebrenica, see Document 5289, Tuzla Archive 5289). By mid September, the Communists had already established a party cell in Srebrenica (Tuzla Archive, Document 5288).

¹⁸⁰ Savic, ‘First people’s liberation committees’, p.398. According to Partisan sources, there were some 6,000 Partisan and 4,000 Chetnik forces in eastern Bosnia at the time. See: Eolakovic, Zapisi, p.268; Zekic, ‘The uprising in Birač’, p.350.

¹⁸¹ Savic, ‘First people’s liberation committees’, p.400.

¹⁸² For the start of the civil war in Serbia, see: Petranovic, Srbija u drugom svetskom ratu, pp.262-289.

¹⁸³ Karchmar, Dražica Mihailovic, p.479-80; Tomasevich, The Chetniks, p.157; Miletic ‘O saradnji komandanta’, p.136; Djuric, Novi prilozi, p...; Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.82-83.

¹⁸⁴ This occurred especially in the zone under Italian command (for instance in Visegrad, Gorazde, Foča), where the Chetniks started to massacre the Muslim population after they took power under the auspices of the Italians (Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.86). In Foča, thousands of Muslims were killed during World War Two, even though only a few Muslims in the Foča district joined the Ustashe (Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniaks, p.57-62). For the most detailed treatment of Chetnik massacres against the Muslim population during World War Two, see Dedijer and Miletic, Genocid nad Muslimanima. For Chetnik massacres of Muslim civilians in the Visegrad and Mount Zvijezda area, see Kljun, Visegrad, p.67-233; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.24-35.

¹⁸⁵ Karchmar, Dražica Mihailovic, p.473.

¹⁸⁶ Karchmar, Dražica Mihailovic, p.517.

actions in the Srebrenica area. In December 1941, Chetniks from Kravica, for instance, carried out a huge massacre in Sopotnik (near Drinjača), in which eighty-six Muslims were either shot dead or beaten and knifed to death.¹⁸⁷ In the beginning of January 1942, Rajko Ćelonjić's forces raided Muslim villages and plundered Muslim houses and shops in and around Srebrenica. As a result, eleven Muslims were killed in the town and an additional number in the surrounding villages. The Muslim population of Srebrenica fled into the forests and stayed there until the German army entered the town.¹⁸⁸ According to one Partisan source, the Partisans tried to prevent these Chetnik actions. Their efforts, however were futile as "[m]any Serbs regarded the Croats and Muslims all as Ustashe and threatened to kill them, and thus to avenge the victims of Rasica Gaj and other massacres".¹⁸⁹

Due to growing dissatisfaction with the Ustashe, whose actions had provoked Chetnik reprisals against the civilian population, increasing numbers of Muslims joined the much more disciplined Partisans. The Chetniks, in turn, perceived this as a form of Ustashe-Partisan cooperation.¹⁹⁰ The Chetniks tried to draw the Germans, and later the Italians, to their side in their fight against the Ustashe and the Partisans. Chetnik collaboration with the occupying forces in Bosnia was motivated primarily by the continuous pressure of the Nedic government on the Germans to incorporate the seventeen eastern Bosnian districts into Serbia. As a result, Dangić, commander of Chetnik forces in eastern Bosnia, aligned himself with the Germans and Nedić. The inevitable breakdown of relations between Partisans and Chetniks found its apotheosis in the Chetnik offensive against the Partisan stronghold of Sekovići.¹⁹¹ At this stage, many Serb peasants who had initially been organised in Partisan units went over to the Chetniks. This switch was prompted by rumours that the implementation of the 'seventeen districts' plan was imminent and that continued resistance to the Germans would jeopardise it. Only Serbs with a high degree of political consciousness remained with the Partisans. The number of Partisans in eastern Bosnia dropped from 6,000 to 1,000. The only area that remained in Partisan hands was a small pocket around Sekovići.¹⁹² In March 1942, the Partisans tried to re-gain some of their influence by creating the Volunteer Army of Yugoslavia (Dobrovoljačka vojska Jugoslavije), intended mainly to attract Chetniks and to draw them back under Partisan command. These attempts failed, however.¹⁹³

¹⁸⁷ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.143; Masić, Istina o Bratuncu, p.12; Antonić, Zapisi Pere Djukanovića, p.146-47. After the war, Tito's secret police arrested some of the perpetrators, who, in the meantime, had become Partisans. See Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.144.

¹⁸⁸ Dedijer and Miletić. Genocid nad Muslimanima, pp.122-124; Hodžić, Hronika, p.17-20.

¹⁸⁹ Jakić, 'Activity of the Communist Party', p.382.

¹⁹⁰ See: Trew, Britain, Mihailović and the Chetniks, p.257-8; Milazzo, ..., pp.62-73; Karchmar, Dražica Mihailović, pp.457-502; Miletić, 'O saradnji komandanta'; Tomasević, The Chetniks, pp.159-161 and 206-209. In Krsmanović's account, Partisan-Ustashe cooperation is exemplified by the defeat of Rajko Ćelonjić's Srebrenica brigade in the attack on Zljebovi on 2 March 1942. He writes that Ćelonjić was betrayed by the Partisans, who enabled the Ustashe to attack the Chetniks from the rear. The forces of Ćelonjić were crushed, leaving 128 dead and 29 wounded. Krsmanović writes that this day was a black day for Ćelonjić's Chetnik army (Krsmanović, The blood-stained hands, pp.129-131).

¹⁹¹ Ostojić, 'Reflections and memories', p.405.

¹⁹² Savić, 'First people's liberation committees'; Karchmar, Dražica Mihailović, p.476-77, Galić, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.87.

¹⁹³ Galić, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.95-97.

Ustashe extermination campaigns against the Serb population

Ustashe iconography depicting the Drina as the unconquerable border of the Independent State of Croatia
(<http://cro.ustasa.net/images/drina2.jpg>)

During the first few months of 1942, the Germans attempted to pacify eastern Bosnia, which had become one of the main refuges and strongholds of the insurgent forces. Chetnik-Partisan rivalry and continued Serb attacks on Muslim villages in this region had also produced an extremely volatile situation, which was detrimental to German interests in the region as a whole. In mid January, German and Croat forces launched an offensive, (also termed the ‘Second Enemy Offensive’ in Partisan historiography), which aimed at destroying various insurgent forces in eastern Bosnia. Dangić ordered his units not to resist German troops. He even offered the Germans his cooperation in combating the Partisans. But the Germans were also intent on neutralising the Chetnik forces, which they deemed to be unreliable because of their previous cooperation with the Partisans and uncontrollable because of their continuous attacks on the Muslim population. Thanks to Dangić’s declarations of loyalty, however, the German forces were instructed not to kill the Chetniks, but to treat them as prisoners of war. Some Chetnik forces took refuge in the mountains, while others surrendered to the Germans without offering any resistance at all.¹⁹⁴ The Germans disarmed and arrested several hundred Serbs from the region of Kravica, Bratunac and Srebrenica, who were transported to a camp in Sabac. From there, they were sent to work camps in Germany.¹⁹⁵ Others fled to Serbia, including Dangić, who continued trying to convince the Germans to evict the Ustashe from eastern Bosnia in order to end the assaults on the Serb population. He proposed that the Germans place the area under his (i.e. Dangić’s) administration, and also offered to put his forces under German command to fight the Partisans. Although the German command in Belgrade entered into negotiations with Dangić, these proposals were unacceptable to the NDH and senior German officials, who favoured preserving the integrity of the NDH up to the Drina.¹⁹⁶

During the offensive, the Ustashe killed a number of Serbs in Srebrenica. When the Germans entered the town, local Muslims urged them to stay in order to protect them against possible Chetnik ¹⁹⁴ Djurić, Novi prilozi, p.38-40; Karchmar, Dražica Mihailović, p.488-489.

¹⁹⁵ Nikolić, ‘Kravica u prošlosti’, p.25; Antonić, Zapisi Pere Djukanovića, p.16-17.

¹⁹⁶ Karchmar, Dražica Mihailović, pp.475-76, 492-493; Tomasević, The Chetniks, pp.160, 206-209; Djurić, Novi prilozi, pp.44-54; Miletić, ‘O saradnji komandanta’; Redžić, Muslimansko Autonomastvo, pp.41-46. After negotiations with the Germans failed, Dangić turned to the Italians for help, which was one reason why the Germans arrested him in April 1942. The Italians hoped to occupy eastern Bosnia through Dangić and to include it in their zone of interest at the expense of the Germans. The Germans deported Dangić to Germany. See Tomasević, The Chetniks, p. 208; Djurić, Novi prilozi, p.55-56; Karchmar, Dražica Mihailović, p.501. After the war, he received the death sentence from a Partisan military court in Sarajevo. He was accused of cooperating with the Germans, Mihailović and Nedić, of fighting the Partisans and of bearing responsibility for the massacres against the Muslim population in eastern Bosnia (Djurić, Novi prilozi, p. 69-74; Masić, Istina o Bratuncu, p.11).

reprisals. The Germans refused, claiming that the Croatian army would soon replace them, and left again after four days. As the Croat forces did not show up, many Muslim inhabitants followed the German forces to Zvornik. After they left, the Chetniks took control of the town again and ousted the Ustashe who had remained behind.¹⁹⁷ The same happened in several other towns in eastern Bosnia, such as Vlasenica and Bratunac.¹⁹⁸ This clearly shows that although the Germans had weakened the Partisan and Chetnik presence in eastern Bosnia, they did not succeed in eliminating them. Most of the insurgents took refuge in the mountains, or went to Serbia for the duration of the offensive, only to return and reorganise themselves afterwards. Thus, the Germans' objectives remained largely unfulfilled. Partisan elite forces were soon to resume their attacks on the Chetniks in eastern Bosnia, which led to serious defeats of the latter.¹⁹⁹ Vlasenica, Bratunac and Drinjača were taken by the Partisans. On 18 March, the Partisans entered Srebrenica. They soon left again for Sekovici, after which the Chetniks burned Muslim villages and carried out massacres against the Muslim population, especially in the Derventa region.²⁰⁰

All the same, the Chetniks were seriously weakened by the Partisan attacks. As a result, they were helpless against the subsequent Ustashe and German offensives that took place in April 1942 (called 'Operation Trio' or 'Third Enemy Offensive' in Partisan historiography). Ahead of the German army, were the forces of Jure Francetic's Crna Legija or Black Legion, which was an Ustashe combat unit similar to the German SS and notorious for its brutality. They first took Vlasenica, and then advanced in the direction of the Drina valley, plundering one Serb village after another. On their way to Bratunac and Srebrenica, villages were set afire, and several dozen Serbs were killed.²⁰¹ Fearing possible Serb reprisals, Muslims from the Suceska area took refuge in Srebrenica, where some of them joined the Ustashe for protection.²⁰² Some Serb settlements, such as those in Podravanje, Brezani, and Kravica, were largely destroyed, and all Serbs found there by the Ustashe were killed.²⁰³ Thousands of Serbs were driven to the Drina. There, in the few days before and after 9 April 1942, they were either shot and slaughtered en masse by the Ustashe, or drowned while trying to swim across the Drina to Serbia. There were only a few boats and rafts, and those who had money to pay to the rafters made it across first to the Serbian side of the river. These massacres, carried out near Polom, Tegare, Fakovici, and Skelani, among other places, are deeply etched in collective memory. They have also been commemorated and described in recent Serb publications, such as in Ivanisevic's book and in Pero Djukanovic's memoirs.²⁰⁴ Krsmanovic sketches the Ustashe atrocities, such as rapes and throat cutting, in brutal detail, using almost 'epic' strokes that do not fail to have an impact on the reader:

“Like rounding up cattle, the seven thousand Ustasha of Jure Francetic formed a huge semicircle and drove towards the Drina ten thousand Serbs, refugees from Eastern Bosnia. The columns of refugees, along with animal-drawn carts, cattle, horses, and sheep, pressed on to Milosevici and Stari Brod along the left bank of the Drina, where the boats plied all day and night, ferrying the Serbs to ¹⁹⁷ This passage is based on unpublished local documents from World War Two in the Ivanisevic's collection (Statement by Muharem Djozic, undated; another document entitled Srež Srebrenica, undated) and on similar documents of the same collection published in Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.229-233. See also a document on Srebrenica published in Dedijer and Miletic, Genocid nad Muslimanima, pp.122-124.

¹⁹⁸ Karchmar, Draža Mihailovic, p.490.

¹⁹⁹ Djuric, Novi prilozi, p.58-59; Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.18.

²⁰⁰ Hodzic, Hronika, p.20-27.

²⁰¹ Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.18-19. Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniaks, p.83. Ostojic, 'Reflections and memories', p. 404. Nikolic, 'Kravica u prošlosti', p.25-26; Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.105-106.

²⁰² Hodzic, Hronika, p.28-29.

²⁰³ In and around Srebrenica, these crimes were committed mainly by the Black Legion's commander, Arpadzic, who was a tax inspector in Srebrenica before the war. Ivanisevic claims that some 270 people died in Podravanje during World War Two (Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.301)

²⁰⁴ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, p.22. Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.19,175-80,196-97. See also Lazarevic, 'Napad partizana na Srebrenicu'. Conversations Bozo Jovanovic 20/06/1998, Dobrisav Koëevic 14/11/1998.

the right bank of the Drina. People jostled one another in panic as they moved ever closer to the banks of the swollen, murky Drina river. The Ustashe were catching up with the stragglers and butchering them, coming closer and closer to the Drina. Mounted on his white horse, Jure Francetic observed the position of Milosevici and the vast multitude of people who were being killed by his ustashe and thrown into the Drina. The throng was being pushed onto the very banks of the river, near the ferry. Thousands of Ustashe swarmed over the crowd and, brandishing their knives, wrested the children out of the arms of their mothers and threw them into the river, slit the throats of the elderly, and took all the jewellery and gold they could find from the women and children before killing them and casting their bodies into the fast-running river, swollen from the recent rains and melting snow”.²⁰⁵

When the Germans arrived at the scene, steering course down the Drina in rubber boats, they were appalled by the atrocities committed by the Ustasha. As Krsmanovic writes, they went over to Francetic, and told him to stop it.²⁰⁶ At the end of this massacre, several thousand Serb corpses were left on the banks of the river. Some of the women and children who had survived the Ustashe atrocities returned to their destroyed villages under German protection.

The terror of the Ustashe, which had now reached its climax, continued during the summer, with incessant attacks on Serb villages and killing of Serbs. In the village of Zedanjsko, for example, almost everyone in the entire extended Spasojevic family (about forty people) were murdered in June 1942.²⁰⁷ Three thousand Serbs from the district of Srebrenica were arrested and interned in barracks near the hospital of Srebrenica. Pits were already prepared to bury the corpses. However, thanks to local Muslims, who intervened with the Ustashe authorities, all of these people's lives were spared.²⁰⁸ A high-ranking NDH police officer issued a critical report about the situation in Srebrenica in October 1942. In it, the local Ustashe leader, Kurelac, was blamed for indiscriminate arrests and internment of Serbs from the region. The report also noted that, while women and older people were released, the men were forced into hard labour with no compensation. Their properties were plundered, in spite of regulations prohibiting such acts. This same officer asked Kurelac to release the men in order to quiet down the situation and give the population a basic sense of order and security. Among the interesting passages in the report are those referring to the three to four hundred Serb refugees who returned to their homes after the summer. Although the police officially agreed that they should be expelled on the shortest route to Serbia, he felt this was not feasible because only the Ustashe were in a position to carry this out. They were more likely to kill these refugees than to expel them, which, as the police officer wrote, would certainly have negative repercussions for 'our people'. The report is critical about the lack of discipline among the Ustashe, and proposes the establishment of units of local volunteers, who are much more familiar with the region and 'know how to fight the outlaws'.²⁰⁹ Indeed, towards the end of 1942, organised local village militia, or the so-called 'legion' forces, were becoming more and more common in eastern Bosnia. They were based on the idea of local Muslim self-defence, offering a ²⁰⁵ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p. 157.

²⁰⁶ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.161; see also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.33; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp. 229-233.

²⁰⁷ Hodzic, Hronika, p.30-34. One of the hotspots was the strategically important village of Jezestica, which was attacked three times during 1942 by Muslims from the nearby village of Eizmici. The first attack occurred in May (on the Serb holiday of Spasovdan), followed by an attack on 12 July (on Petrovdan), and finally one on 21 September (on Mala Gospojina). During these attacks 144 Serbs were killed. See Nikolic, 'Kravica u proslosti', p.26; Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic sela Kravice, p.55; Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, pp.193-94; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.292-294.

²⁰⁸ Lazarevic, 'Napad partizana na Srebrenicu'. Interview: Boban Vasic 15/07/1998.

²⁰⁹ The document was published in: Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, 340-342. A copy of the original document was obtained from Milivoje Ivanisevic.

much more effective protection than the Ustashe rule of indiscriminate terror. Muslims lived under constant fear that the Ustashe assaults on the Serb population would provoke Chetnik reprisals.

This NDH police report also criticises the Ustashe for requisitioning food and other possessions, even from Muslims, without offering compensation. According to the report, this led to bitterness among Muslim peasants, who threatened to burn the wheat and 'to look for protection on the other [Partisan] side'. Muslims were also forced to harvest the fields in Serb villages, which they did reluctantly out of fear of possible Serb attacks. The report stated that the local Ustashe needed to stop this type of exploitative behaviour, and proposed raising the matter with the higher Ustashe command. On the whole, however, the security situation was considered satisfactory since there were no large groups of active insurgents in the area. Nonetheless, the number of Ustashe (some 1,200 to 1,300 at the time) and police officers was considered insufficient should a serious Partisan or Chetnik attack occur.²¹⁰

During spring 1943, fierce fighting broke out between Partisan units and the occupying and quisling forces. This led, among other things, to a huge Ustashe massacre of Serbs in the villages of Fakovici and Bjelovac during April.²¹¹ The Partisans succeeded nonetheless in destroying many Ustashe strongholds all over eastern Bosnia, and the entire defence system, which the Ustashe had set up in the spring of 1942, was crushed. The Partisans took control of certain areas, and Muslims joined the Partisan forces in increasing numbers.²¹² In early June, the Ustashe began a counter-offensive and managed to oust the Partisans from Sekovici, the most important centre of Partisan resistance.²¹³ The Partisans then simulated an attack on Vlasenica, in order to trick the Ustashe and carry out a surprise attack on Srebrenica, where they expected to find a large booty, especially of ammunition. The objective was not to take permanent control of Srebrenica.²¹⁴ Although these Partisan actions were successful, they also provoked a brutal reaction from the Ustashe. That led to the largest single massacre in Srebrenica during the war, in which many Serbs and several Muslims were killed. The entire Serb population of the village of Zalazje, a few kilometres from Srebrenica, were also butchered, which is still remembered as one of the worst crimes committed during the war. Recently, the 1943 massacre in Zalazje acquired enormous symbolic significance for Serbs of this region when Naser Oric's forces killed a large number of Serbs (about forty people) in the very same village during an attack in July 1992. Serbs view the occurrence of massacres against them on the very same sites of previous massacres as history repeating itself. From their perspective, it is as if nothing has really changed.²¹⁵

The Partisan surprise attack on Srebrenica started on 11 June 1943.²¹⁶ Many Ustashe, including, local commander, Kurelac, were fighting near Sekovici. When Kurelac received news of the pending attack, he returned immediately and arrived in Bratunac at the end of the day, where the fighting had already raged for several hours. Without delay, he sent auxiliary forces to Srebrenica, but only one Ustashe unit managed to get through. The fighting soon shifted to the centre of town, where the Ustashe occupied the main buildings, including the Orthodox church. The Partisans took these buildings the next day, while the Ustashe retreated in the direction of Bratunac. They were ambushed near the Srebrenica hospital, where many of them were shot by the Partisans. One of them was the younger brother of Kurelac, the Ustashe district commander of Srebrenica. He was still a boy at the time. A few hundred Partisans then plundered shops, took medical equipment and medicines from the hospital, and set fire to the district office and police station. In addition, they took considerable

²¹⁰ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.340-342. Hodzic, Hronika, p.34.

²¹¹ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.22-23.

²¹² Ostojic, 'Reflections and memories', pp.406-407.

²¹³ Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.208.

²¹⁴ Lazarevic 'Napad partizana na Srebrenicu'.

²¹⁵ Interviews and conversations, Momčilo Cvjetinovic, 10/06/1998, 11/06/1998, 14-15/09/1999; Luka Bogdanovic 15/09/1999; Mile Stanojevic 15-16/09/1999.

²¹⁶ Lazarevic, 'Napad partizana na Srebrenicu'; Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.234-237; statement by Ivan Pavlovic about situation in Srebrenica, Tuzla, 16 June 1943 (collection Ivanisevic).

amounts of arms and ammunition, some 800,000 cigarettes, two wagons full of flour, substantial amounts of sugar, food and groceries found in shops. Because of the large amounts of booty, the Partisans were unable to transport everything out of Srebrenica; some of the booty was given to the local population.

During the night of 13 June 1943, the Partisans withdrew from Srebrenica. At this stage, local Muslims panicked when rumours spread that the Chetniks would enter the town soon after the Partisan retreat. However, it was the Ustashe, on their way from Bratunac, who reappeared on the scene the very same day. Wishing to avenge his brother's death, Kurelac ordered his troops to kill every Serb that they came across. One of his units passed through the village of Zalazje, where the Serb inhabitants were totally unprepared for the massacre that would follow. One platoon, consisting of some local Muslims, went into the village, while another positioned itself on the surrounding hills in order to prevent the inhabitants from escaping. Jusuf Djozic, the Ustashe commander of Srebrenica, told the Serbs to stay in their houses and not to worry. After the advance party left and continued for Srebrenica, thirty-two Ustashe entered the village, going from house to house and killing all inhabitants. Only a few people survived, hiding silently under the pile of dead bodies of their relatives, until the Ustashe had left. Those who tried to flee were killed. This massacre took the lives of ninety-six inhabitants of Zalazje (including some forty children). Some families, such as the Rakic-s, were almost completely exterminated.²¹⁷

The massacres continued in Srebrenica, during which some local Muslims were also murdered. The first victims in town were two Muslim nurses, who were killed near the hospital. The Muslim inhabitants of Srebrenica were shocked. Some local notables found the courage to approach the Ustashe in an attempt to stop them, but they showed no sign of remorse. They went on to kill local Serbs, some of whom had been waiting quietly outside on the street, in the naive hope that their lives would be spared in that way. One Jewish family was butchered with axes. The Ustashe also murdered local judge, Muhamed Aganovic (who had had the courage to approach the Ustashe after they murdered the two Muslim nurses), together with his wife and three children. Another local Muslim, Dzemal Pliska, a postman, was killed because he tried to protect some local Serbs.²¹⁸ Several Serb women survived thanks to Muslim families who provided them with shelter and Muslim clothes. But all other Serbs present in Srebrenica on that day were killed. The Ustashe ordered local people to dig a hole near the former Austrian army barracks to bury the dead. The same day, another group of Serb captives from Brezani were executed and buried in the same mass grave. It is estimated that these events in Srebrenica and Zalazje left some 200-250 people dead.²¹⁹

The massacre stirred a great deal of commotion, provoking widespread disgust with the Ustashe reign of terror in eastern Bosnia. Even several Ustashe officials in Srebrenica stepped down from their posts and left the movement out of protest. The Croatian army started an investigation into the massacre, and tried to arrest and convict the Ustashe perpetrators in order to quieten the situation. The case was dropped, however, in September 1943. The move was justified by the argument that the Ustashe had acted in rage because of the deaths of their comrades. It was also said that local Muslims had sympathised with the Partisans, disclosing local Ustashe to them. Judge Aganovic was also said to be a Partisan sympathiser. In the meantime, a delegation of Muslims from Srebrenica went to Tuzla to demand protection against Chetnik reprisals, or resettlement of the entire Muslim population of Srebrenica if protection could not be provided.

²¹⁷ Interviews: Ljubo Rakic 09/06/98, Momèilo Cvjetinovic 10/06/1998, Ilija Miladinovic 10/06/1998, Boban Vasic 15/07/1998.

²¹⁸ Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, pp.252-253; Tuzla Archive, Document 5291. Interview: Boban Vasic 15/07/1998.

²¹⁹ The number of victims in Srebrenica was at least seventy-eight. One week after the massacre, on 20 June 1943, seventy-eight bodies were exhumed. Most of these victims had been shot or knifed to death (Milivojevic, 'Srebrenica u junu 1943. godine'). A document in the Tuzla Archive presents the following figures: 95 victims in Zalazje, 106 victims in Srebrenica, and another 22 who were captured in Brezani, and later killed in Srebrenica (Tuzla Archive, Document 5291). One informant claims that there were between 120 to 130 victims in the town of Srebrenica, 27 of whom were members of his own family. Interview: Boban Vasic, 15/07/1998. Pero Djukanovic mentions 307 dead (Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.196).

At this stage of the war, however, the Chetnik forces were in serious decline. The Partisans, by contrast, had managed to strengthen their positions and increase their influence among both Serb and Muslim peasant populations. They gained control over most of eastern Bosnia, and on 25-26 June, they launched new attacks on Srebrenica, Bratunac, and Vlasenica, driving out all remaining Ustashe and Croatian gendarmes. The Muslim population of the Srebrenica district, still fearing possible Serb reprisals, fled to Zvornik.²²⁰ On their retreat to the north, the Ustashe set Serb villages alight, killing at least one hundred Serbs in Kravica in early July. Approximately half of them burned to death hiding in houses.²²¹ The Ustashe tried to halt the Partisan advance at Drinjača, but failed. On 5 July 1943, the Partisans took Zvornik, the most important Ustashe stronghold in eastern Bosnia. This was a terrible defeat for the Ustashe, and they lost between four and five hundred people. Because of the Partisan successes, a German SS division, Ustashe forces, and Croatian army forces started a counterattack in an attempt to destroy the Partisan forces. They managed to recover some of the lost territories, but only Zvornik was retaken permanently.²²²

At this point, the tide of the war was clearly changing in favour of the Partisans. On 9 September 1943, Italy surrendered to the Allies, and Germany was losing terrain. In Yugoslavia, the Allies shifted support to Tito's Partisans. They formed a much more effective and disciplined force than Mihailovic's Chetniks, who continued to commit huge atrocities against the Muslim population, including in the Visegrad area.²²³ In addition, after the Italian surrender, the Partisans acquired huge amounts of weapons, food, and equipment from various disarmed Italian units. This was one of the main factors contributing to the shift in the balance of power.²²⁴ The Partisans were superior in weaponry and in manpower. Moreover, increasing numbers of Chetniks began joining their ranks, especially after Britain ended cooperation with Mihailovic's Chetnik resistance. On 2 October 1943, the Partisans achieved one of their largest military successes in eastern Bosnia with the liberation of the strategically important town of Tuzla, the first major town in the region.²²⁵ On 9 October 1943, the Srebrenica Partisan Detachment was created, incorporating Pero Djukanovic's (Chetnik) forces from Kravica and a Partisan unit from Fakovici, which had been established some time before.²²⁶ They set up the National Liberation Committee for Kravica, of which Jovan Nikolic, the pre-war mayor of Kravica, became the president.²²⁷

From December 1943 until the end of the war in May 1945, eastern Bosnia was a constant battlefield between Partisan and German and Ustashe forces. Srebrenica changed hands several times during this period. In December 1943, German SS forces (the 13th 'Handzar' and 7th 'Prince Eugen' SS divisions) began operation Kugelblitz, in an attempt to destroy the Partisans in the regions of Rogatica, Srebrenica, and Vlasenica. That operation ended on 16 December without much success, leaving the Birač region and Srebrenica still in Partisan hands.²²⁸ Nevertheless, the 13th 'Handzar' SS Division ²²⁰ Hodzic, Hronika, pp.43-44. During World War Two, the Muslim population of Srebrenica fled three times en masse—in large convoys or columns of people, animals and animal-drawn vehicles—to Zvornik. On their way, they usually suffered huge losses due to enemy attacks. Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.XI.

²²¹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.144; Nikolic, 'Kravica u prošlosti', p.27.

²²² Lazarevic, 'Napad partizana na Srebrenicu'.

²²³ Kljun, Visegrad, pp.102-106; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.34-35; Ćekić, Historija genocida, p.68.

²²⁴ Goldstein, Croatia, p.149.

²²⁵ Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.233.

²²⁶ Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, p.24; Hodzic and Milivojevic, 'Značajna vojna i politička uloga'; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.144. From Krsmanovic's point of view, Djukanovic betrayed the Chetnik army by crossing over to the Partisans (Krsmanovic, The blood-stained hands, p.207). The well-known post-war Bosnian writer, Mesa Selimovic, was appointed as political commissar of the Srebrenica Partisan Detachment (Hodzic and Milivojevic, 'Značajna vojna i politička uloga'). See also Selimovic's memoirs, Sjecanja, pp.126-32.

²²⁷ Nikolic, 'Kravica u prošlosti', p.26.

²²⁸ Galic, Veze narodnooslobodilačkog pokreta, p.238.

became notorious for the brutality of its actions in eastern Bosnia during 1943 and 1944. It consisted of Bosnian Muslim volunteers who were trained in France before they were sent off to Bosnia in late 1943. The fact that the Germans created this Muslim SS division reflected growing German influence in the NDH. The Germans tried to establish closer ties with the Bosnian Muslim elite, who wanted autonomy for Bosnia within the Third Reich at the expense of the NDH.²²⁹ The Handzar SS division acted as an occupying force, carrying out punitive expeditions against the Serb population and taking over civil administration from the NDH. During spring 1944, they organised frequent attacks on Partisan territory in eastern Bosnian. They did this together with the 'Prince Eugen' SS division, and other Ustashe and German units, as well as Chetnik forces from Serbia. All of them were joining forces in an attempt to eliminate the Partisans. The brutality of their actions, particularly against the Serb population, caused general dismay and fear among the Muslims in eastern Bosnia, many of whom either joined the local Muslim village militia or the Partisans.²³⁰

In May 1944, Ustashe forces took Srebrenica once again and began mobilising the Muslim population. The Partisans retreated towards the Kraljeva Gora mountain range near Han Pijesak.²³¹ Until the end of the war, Srebrenica remained firmly in Ustashe hands, in spite of frequent Partisan attacks on Ustashe positions west of Srebrenica (such as in Viogor, Zedanjsko, and Suceška). Many Muslim villages were controlled by local Muslim village militia, the so-called 'legion' forces or 'Green cadres'. These militia forces often cooperated with the Ustashe and carried out attacks on Partisan and Chetnik units that frequently roamed the area. The region around Srebrenica became a refuge for Ustashe and other Muslim legion elements that had fled from areas that had come under Partisan control.²³² Although neighbouring areas were in Partisan hands, Partisan attempts to retake Srebrenica remained largely unsuccessful. However, intermittent fighting did lead to continuous shifts in control over certain localities.²³³ Srebrenica was liberated on 11 March 1945, five months after Bratunac (and Belgrade) were liberated.²³⁴ It took several months to eliminate the last remnants of the 'enemy' forces. Local Chetniks and Ustashe and Muslim militia leaders were still hiding in the mountains, for instance, in villages near Bratunac and Skelani, where they were arrested by Tito's secret police in the months and years that followed.²³⁵

²²⁹ In March 1943, the Germans put up recruitment posters for the 'Handzar' division in villages around Srebrenica, including in Suceška. Muslims who joined the 'Handzar' division were promised a bonus of 3,000 kuna and large plots of land after the war. Several local Muslims joined the Handzar division (Hodžić, Hronika, p.39). See also Redžić, Muslimansko Autonomastvo, p.81; Galic, Veze narodno-oslobodilačkog pokreta, p.202. The Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Amin el-Huseini, who was an important Muslim ally of Nazi Germany, played a crucial role in establishing the Bosnian Muslim Handzar division (see Lebl, Jerusalimski muftija, pp.89-96).

²³⁰ Redžić, Muslimansko Autonomastvo, p.172, 184.

²³¹ Hodžić, Hronika, pp.68-70.

²³² Hodžić, Hronika, pp.46-81 passim. Well-known local Muslim 'Ustashe' militia leaders included Muradif Hreljić (who was based in the village of Bostahovina near Suceška), Jusuf Džović (who lived in Srebrenica), and Omer Mustafić and Kadrija Softić (both active in the region of Osat). The main organiser of these village militia was Meho Arapđić from Zvornik (Hodžić, Hronika, p. 46-48,49,77). Mustafić and Softić received weapons from the Germans, and had about eight hundred men under their command. Softić worked for the Gestapo. Both were from Dobrak near Skelani, which acquired a reputation for being a Ustashe stronghold. Interview: Ibisević 24/05/1998. Ibisević writes that after the war, local Muslims regarded Mustafić and Kadrić as their heroes, while Serbs saw them as war criminals (Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.4-5). See also Antonić, Zapisi Pere Djukanović, p.196.

²³³ Hodžić, Hronika, p.70.

²³⁴ Nada Ostojić, 'Kako je Srebrenica oslobođena'.

²³⁵ See, for instance, Kršmanović, The blood-stained hands, p.330; Ibisević, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.4-5. Interview: Boban Vasić 15/07/1998. Omer Mustafić was caught by the secret police (OZNA) in January 1946. He shot himself as the police discovered his hideout. As Ibisević writes, his body was brought to Skelani, where Serbs danced around his deformed corpse. Kadrija Softić tried to escape with his unit to Germany, but failed. He was last seen at the Slovene-Austrian border in May 1945. See Ibisević, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.4-5; Hodžić, Hronika, p.81. Well-known Chetnik leader, Rajko Ećlonjić, from Derвента near Milici, managed to elude the secret police until 1947, when he was killed with other members of his group (Hodžić, Hronika, pp.9,83).

Chapter 4

Under Communist Rule

Part of a World War Two monument in Zalazje, commemorating the massacre that occurred there in June 1943, listing the names of Serb victims.

Srebrenica in Tito's time

After the war, monuments for 'the victims of Fascism' were the only clear reminders of a brutal civil war, in which Muslims and Serbs, Ustashe, Chetniks and Partisans had fought each another. These monuments were erected throughout Tito's period, and even after his death. In Srebrenica, a huge white marble monument was built in the 1960s, on the slope of a hill near the centre of the town. The monument consisted of a relief representing the terror and killing of civilians and Partisans by Fascist forces. Apart from this monument, two plaques were placed in the Serbian Orthodox church, commemorating the victims of the massacre committed by the Ustashe in the town of Srebrenica on 14 June 1943. Other monuments were erected in Serb villages, such as Fakovici, Kravica, Jezestica, Zalazje, Banjevici, and Zlijebac. The majority of these were situated in the municipality of Bratunac.²³⁶ Most monuments listed the names of all the victims, while the perpetrators remained unnamed. Although the monuments did not explicitly mention the ethnic background of the victims, it was clear to everybody that these victims were Serbs, except for a small number of Muslims who had joined the Partisans and had also been killed. Monuments for the numerous Muslim victims of the war were non-existent. Although many had never joined the Ustashe, and had just been innocent civilians killed by local Chetnik bands, their names never appeared on any of these monuments.

Muslims who survived the atrocities, or had lost family members during the war, were unhappy with this silence, as recent criticism on these monuments plainly shows. The subtext of these monuments was clear: Serb victims were being commemorated because most Partisans had been Serbs (even though many had started out as Chetniks and only joined the Partisans in 1943). Muslim victims were silenced because the Muslim population had been the Ustashe's main base of support and recruitment. Nonetheless, even the Serbs did not feel that the monuments told the whole truth. They did not like the fact that the Fascist perpetrators had remained unnamed. Nor were they happy about the lack of any mention that these perpetrators had been the same Croats and local Muslims with whom they had been forced to live after the war.²³⁷ Ivanisevic claims that many victims' names did not even appear on these monuments. For instance, the monument in Srebrenica listed only 145 victims, whereas at least 200 Serbs were claimed to have been killed there in June 1943 alone. Other Serb villages, some of which were completely levelled to the ground, contained no reminders of Serb suffering except for graves in Serbian Orthodox burial grounds.²³⁸ In other words, the Communists' approach of reducing the complexities of World War Two to a simple conflict between Fascists and Partisans left both Serbs and Muslims feeling that no real justice had been served.

²³⁶ One of the last local World War Two monuments to be erected was the one in Zlijebac (municipality of Bratunac). Raised in 1983, it marked the fortieth anniversary of the creation of the Srebrenica Partisan unit (Srebreničke novine, 6(57), 1983, p.1). Many of these monuments were damaged or destroyed during the Bosnian war.

Yet, this was not a real issue directly after the war, or, more accurately, the Communists did not allow it to become an issue. They wrote the history of the war, and theirs was a history of Partisan resistance against Fascist occupation. The fact that half of Yugoslavia's war casualties were victims of fellow Yugoslavs was glossed over. The dead were passed off as casualties in a war of 'national liberation'. Rebuilding the country and establishing a new socialist order was the main focus. Tito set out to reconstruct Yugoslavia with slogans, such as 'There can be no rest as long as reconstruction continues' and 'Brotherhood and unity'. Although bitterness remained, open expression of nationalist resentment was harshly suppressed, particularly in Bosnia where civil war had ravaged the country. As Chuck Sudetic writes in his wonderful description of post-war Yugoslavia, a deep silence prevailed. Nobody talked about the horrible events during the war, although all knew what had happened, who had been a Chetnik or an Ustashe, who had committed crimes and whose family had been killed. Serb and Muslim children sat next to each other on school benches and played with each other as if nothing had happened.²³⁹ But many painful memories of the war lingered, and they contradicted the Communist version of events in World War Two:

"The war had not just been a liberation struggle against invaders and their quislings. It had been something far more sinister. It had forced people to take sides. It had brought on circumstances that drove them to commit horrible acts and affiliate themselves with men and organizations committed to genocide. It had wounded the Yugoslavs in a thousand different ways, and though the wounds had healed over [...], the scar tissue was thin".²⁴⁰

Stories of fugitive Chetniks and Ustashe, who were said to be hiding in caves and forests, never stopped circulating even long after the war had ended. Although not completely fictional, these tales also symbolised hidden realities that were externalised but never exorcised. Some people stood up to denounce neighbours for killing civilians during the war, but few were ever tried, and fewer still, convicted. Former Chetniks, who had joined the Partisan forces towards the end of the war, now occupied positions in the administration and the police, although it was a public secret that some had killed their Muslim neighbours during the war.²⁴¹ Very occasionally, Tito's secret police caught an Ustasha or Chetnik wartime extremist in his hideout in some village deep inside a forest, and finished him off in ways sometimes reminiscent of wartime brutalities. Milovan Djilas recounted an interesting anecdote in discussing such an event with Nobel-prize winning writer, Ivo Andric (who was born in ²³⁷ Miljanovic writes, for instance, that the World War Two monument in Jezestica made an almost cynically imprecise reference to 'fascist terror'. In his view, this actually helped to cover up Muslim crimes (Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, p.55).

²³⁸ Ivanisevic, Hronika naseg groblja, pp.22-23. Interview: Milivoje Ivanisevic 03/02/1998.

²³⁹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.38.

²⁴⁰ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.57.

²⁴¹ Interview: Mitko and Mevla Kadric, 17/01/1998.

Travnik and grew up in Visegrad). Although Andric himself detests violence, he believes that it was an inevitable part of life in this region. Djilas:

“I once tried to explain to him how the party leadership endeavoured to put behind them those frightful events they could not avoid during the war and revolution. I told him how, in the mountains of eastern Bosnia during the first years after the war, security agents had killed an infamous renegade, a Chetnik. It was a long way for them to carry his body to the city, but they wanted to put it on public display. So they cut off his head and exposed it in the marketplace at Tuzla. When Belgrade was informed, I was talking with Rankovic in his office at the Central Committee. He received the report over the phone with a look of revulsion and gave immediate orders to remove the head and to avoid such displays in the future. Andric’s response was one of wise resignation: ‘You people took it too much to heart – in Bosnia that’s normal’.”²⁴²

Nonetheless, some Chetniks who had joined the Partisans during the war were tried for crimes they committed during the first two years of the war. One of them was Golub Eric from Kravica. In late December 1941, Eric participated in the massacre of Muslims in the village of Sopotnik, in which eighty-six people were killed.²⁴³ He then joined the Partisans, and was appointed after the war as president of the district court in Srebrenica. Five years after the war he was arrested, together with some of his accomplices, and was sentenced to several years in prison.²⁴⁴

As Sudetic illustrates, incidents, small provocations, and fights between former enemies continued into the 1950s in the area around Visegrad. The atrocities of World War Two had not been forgiven and vengefulness lingered: “memories live for a long time. Kad tad, sooner or later....”, as one woman told Sudetic.²⁴⁵ Nevertheless, wartime memories did fade. This development facilitated by a regime that suppressed any real discussion of these painful realities, a regime that believed it possible to make a fresh start without reflecting too much on the events of the war. Too many were also prone to believe that forgetting was the only remedy and that rebuilding their lives was the only option they had. Tito’s socialism certainly held the promise of creating a new kind of society, one that would prevent such atrocities from ever recurring. And quite clearly, this prospect found widespread support among the population. Josip Broz Tito became one of the few Communist leaders in Eastern Europe with a genuine popular mandate.

Yet some realities were very hard to change. One was that Serb and Muslim communities in eastern Bosnia continued to live almost separate lives, particularly in the countryside, where most villages were either almost exclusively Serb or Muslim. Segregation remained the dominant pattern despite the communists’ efforts to foster inter-ethnic contact and cooperation. Among these efforts was the establishment of mixed local administrative entities (i.e. communes that usually consisted of a number of Serb and Muslim villages).²⁴⁶ The communists also nurtured a common culture throughout society. In schools, Serb and Muslim children shared the same benches and teaching staff was mixed.

²⁴² Djilas, Rise and Fall, pp.55-56.

²⁴³ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.143; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.12; Antonic, Zapisi Pere Djukanovica, pp.146-147.

²⁴⁴ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.11-12; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.144.

²⁴⁵ See Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.43-48.

²⁴⁶ The district of Srebrenica (including Bratunac) was divided into fifteen communes, most of which were ethnically mixed (Bjelovac, Bratunac town, Karaëici, Kravica, Krnjici, Skelani, Srebrenica town, Toplica). Only a few communes in largely Serb (Cravica, Fakovici, Krasanovici, Zljebac) or largely Muslim (Luka, Osatica, Suceska) areas were not mixed (Konaèni rezultati popisa stanovništva od 15 marta 1948 godine. Knjiga IX: Stanovništvo po narodnosti. Beograd: Savezni zavod za statistiku, 1954). In the 1950s, the number of communes was reduced to seven, most of which consisted of both Muslim and Serb settlements (Bratunac town, Skelani, Kravica, Srebrenica town, Krnjici), with only one largely Serb (Fakovici) and one largely Muslim commune (Osatica). (Popis stanovništva 1953. Knjiga XI: Starost, pismenost i narodnost. Beograd: Savezni zavod za statistiku, 1960, p.498).

Businesses and local government offices employed Serbs as well as Muslims. In the army, men intermingled with members of the other nations and ethnic groups in Yugoslavia, including in far-off places where they had never been, such as Slovenia and Macedonia. The same was true of interaction at party meetings and in sports clubs. Srebrenica for instance, had two mixed football clubs: 'Cinkarna' in Potoèari and 'Guber' in Srebrenica. Because of these practices, Bosnia became a model for the rest of Yugoslavia. Although Muslims, Serbs and Croats had fought one another during the war, they also had united in the Partisan struggle. Now, they lived and worked together peacefully, on the basis of equality and mutual respect. Despite this kind of socialist rhetoric, however, these groups led fairly segregated lives, particularly in the countryside. As William Lockwood demonstrated in his anthropological study of the small Bosnian market town of Bugojno, market exchanges were regarded in instrumental terms and did not really produce a sense of identity or community beyond the purely local or ethnic level.²⁴⁷

Although towns and municipal centres were mixed, and intermingling was more common there, in the private sphere, cultural and religious divisions ran deeper than is usually acknowledged. The element of 'mixing' often only applied to the town as a whole: some degree of ethnic separateness was retained, as groups were usually concentrated in particular quarters. During the war statements were commonly made to the effect of "it did not matter at all to us whether someone was a Serb, a Muslim, or a Croat, we did not even know!" Nonetheless, genuine respect and tolerance were paired with ignorance about the other. As Adil Zulfikarpasic said in his conversations with Milovan Djilas: "I would say that even though we lived together, Bosnia suffered and continues to suffer from the fact that we don't know much about each other. The private sphere was taboo. The religious sphere was particularly taboo".²⁴⁸ Even though mixed marriages between Serbs, Muslims and Croats became common in urban areas by the mid-1980s, they rarely came off without comments from family or neighbours. In the villages, these marriages were virtually unthinkable.²⁴⁹ On the other hand, it was common in Bosnian towns to exchange gifts on important religious holidays. In Zulfikarpasic's hometown, Foèa, for instance, Serb Orthodox neighbours would send Easter eggs to their Muslim neighbours, while Muslims reciprocated with meat and sweets on Muslim holidays. Before World War Two, the Serbs in the town of Foèa never raised pigs out of consideration for their Muslim neighbours. There are similar stories about Srebrenica and Bratunac. Serbs and Muslims exchanged gifts and visited each other on religious holidays, and paid due respect to each other's customs and traditions. Serbs even helped to build and repair mosques, or donated building materials or money for that purpose. Yet, ultimately, these strong reciprocal ties also tended to reinforce mutual differences.²⁵⁰ The well-known and admirable Bosnian notion of komsiluk, which stood for good neighbourliness and coexistence, was in fact predicated on ideas of ethnic and cultural difference.²⁵¹

The development of communal feasts in Srebrenica during this period is a good indicator of how the Communists tried to nurture forms of community across ethno-religious boundaries and attempted to replace traditional religious feasts with modern communist ones. Religious feasts – such as the Serb slava-s (the patron-saint ceremonies at the family or local church level) and the Muslim bajram celebrations – continued to be observed during the Communist period, particularly in the villages. They were usually celebrated as village fairs (called vasar-s among Serbs and teferic-s among Muslims) and offered ample opportunity for socialising and entertainment. Such fairs were also held in Srebrenica and Bratunac, mostly on Orthodox holidays, and even attracted local Muslims. In Bratunac, the main vasar took place on the Orthodox holiday of Sv. Makaveja (14 August). Muslims, in turn, celebrated kurban

²⁴⁷ Lockwood, European Moslems, p.210.

²⁴⁸ Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.49.

²⁴⁹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.69; see also Bougarel, Bosnie, p.87. Interview: Mitko and Mevla Kadric, 17/01/1998.

²⁵⁰ Interview: Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998.

²⁵¹ In his excellent analysis of the significance of the concept of komsiluk in the Bosnian context, Xavier Bougarel shows that, in its original meaning, it symbolised local and non-territorial forms of daily coexistence. In 1990, the nationalist parties appropriated, and somehow perverted, this idea by turning it into a principle of political and territorial division (Bougarel, Bosnie, pp.81-100).

bajram, which evolved into huge mass gatherings on three consecutive days in the villages of Konjevic Polje, Voljavica, and Glogova, especially in the years preceding the war.

The Communists added, as some ironically put it, new ‘state saint’ holidays to the ceremonial calendar that had such great resonance among the population. Aside from official Communist feasts and events, such as International Women’s Day (8 March), the Liberation Day of Srebrenica (11 March), the Youth Relay Race (in April), the First of May celebrations, and the Day of the Partisan Uprising in Bosnia (27 July), the Communists organised popular fairs very similar to the traditional village fairs. Such fairs were held in the villages of Podravanje and Luka (on the anniversaries of the opening of the first local primary schools).²⁵² The main fair, however, was in Jezero, a village located on a plateau above Skelani. This so-called general national, or popular, fair was an event that attracted huge masses. Established in the mid 1950s, it was organised by the association of veterans. It was celebrated each year on 4 July, on Veterans Day, commemorating the start of the Partisan resistance against the fascists. It developed into the largest fair in the municipality of Srebrenica and drew Muslims, Serbs and Gypsies alike. The fair attracted some thirty thousand visitors, and the day usually kicked off with speeches from politicians and Partisan heroes. Events included horse racing, athletics, football competitions, and other sports. According to locals, the horse races were particularly outstanding. They featured the best horses from the area, especially from Krusev Do and Luka (two remote Muslim villages on the way to Zepa), and even horses from Serbia and Bosnia.²⁵³ In this way, the Communists tried to draw people away from the traditional religious fairs, which were felt to reinforce ethnic divisions and sustain backwardness in the countryside.

Aside from their efforts to reduce the role of religious communities and the clergy, the Communists introduced other measures aimed at modernising society and ridding the countryside of its general backwardness. In 1949, they launched a programme to create peasant cooperatives in order to collectivise agriculture. This measure proved extremely unpopular among the rural population. The clearest sign of discontent was the rapid drop in production. The plans to collectivise agriculture were abandoned, although some large agricultural collectives continued to exist, particularly in the lowlands.²⁵⁴ Instead, the communists focused on improving rural infrastructure (such as by constructing roads and introducing electricity and telephones). They also built schools to reduce the staggering illiteracy of the peasant population.²⁵⁵ Despite these initiatives, there were complaints that the communist regime followed a discriminatory policy in this respect. It was claimed that development efforts and investments were withheld from former Chetnik and Ustashe villages to “punish” them. Partisan villages, by contrast, were said to be provided with everything they needed.²⁵⁶ Jobs were also made readily available to them. Local historian and SDA leader, Besim Ibisevic claims, for instance, that it was difficult for Muslims of his native village, Dobrak, a former Ustashe stronghold, to secure jobs in the town of Srebrenica.²⁵⁷ He also claims that Serbs and Montenegrins, who had been the main ²⁵² These fairs were not always very peaceful due to the use of large amounts of alcohol. For example the annual fair in the village of Luka saw frequent fights between the inhabitants of this and other villages in this isolated area along the Drina (part of the Srebrenica municipality). See: Delegatski bilten (Srebrenica), no.11, 06/06/1977, p.12.

²⁵³ Interviews and conversations with Momčilo Cvjetinovic 25/06/1998, Dobrisav Kočević 26/06/1998. See also Masic, Srebrenica, pp.113-114. For local reports on the Jezero festivities see: Srebreničke novine 1(3), 1966, p.8; 4(37-38), 1981, p.1; 7(62), 1984, p.1.

²⁵⁴ See: Bokovoy ‘Peasants and partisans’.

²⁵⁵ Srebrenica was attached to the electricity network in 1952. Road construction started at the end of the 1950s and continued throughout the next two decades. The first roads were built in the southern part of the municipality (Srebrenica-Zeleni Jadar, and Zeleni Jadar-Kragljivoda-Jezero), mainly to open up the area for forestry. Afterwards the existing macadam roads between Srebrenica, Bratunac, and Konjevic Polje were modernised. See: Milivojevic, ‘Putevi uslov za razvoj’; see also Srebreničke novine, 1(3), 1966, p.5; 1(5), 1966, p.3; 6(53), 1983, p.1. Interview Dobrisav Kočević 10/06/1998.

²⁵⁶ Even towns, such as Ljubovija on the other side of the Drina, felt they suffered from their ‘Chetnik’ reputation, and were punished with underdevelopment for several decades after the war. Interview: Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998. By contrast, the village of Kravica, where the Serb population had joined the Partisans in time, received electricity in 1956. Other villages had to wait until the 1970s (Nikolic, ‘Kravica u prošlosti’, p.28).

²⁵⁷ Interview: Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

recruitment base for the Partisan movement, took all the important positions in town, while Muslims did the hard, physical jobs. Similar charges were made on the Serb side with regard to former Chetnik villages. Although the protection of parochial interests always seems to be at the heart of such accusations, the former Partisans probably did reap the benefits of having fought on the right side during the war.

Eastern Bosnia's illiteracy rate was enormous, and much higher than in most other parts of Bosnia. During the 1950s, literacy improved, although discrepancies remained high between communes (particularly between towns and villages), between men and women, and even between boys and girls of school age. In 1953, for instance, seventy percent of the population in the district of Srebrenica and Bratunac, did not know to how read and write. (The illiteracy rate for women was over eighty-five percent). The situation was better among the younger age groups. Even so, there were still huge differences between boys and girls: 73.6% of boys aged 10 to 14 could read and write, while the figure for girls was only 34.7%. The general literacy rate was highest (including for females) in the communes of Fakovici and Skelani along the Drina, and lowest in Srebrenica and Kravica. The situation was similar in the neighbouring district of Vlasenica. There were notable differences between the Serb-dominated commune of Han Pijesak (50.9%) on one end of the scale, and the mixed commune of Nova Kasaba (24.9%) and Serb dominated Sekovici (27.4%) on the other.²⁵⁸ In order to improve the situation, the Communists targeted rural areas in particular, building many primary schools there from the 1960s on.²⁵⁹ Yet peasants still refused to send their daughters to school, particularly in the more remote Muslim areas, such as Luka. Some parents were fined for refusing to send their young children to school.²⁶⁰ Aside from primary education for children, the Communist authorities in Srebrenica also tried to improve the level of education among adults through literacy programmes and specialised training for workers.²⁶¹ Even so, the illiteracy rate remained high in these parts. During the 1980s, it still ranged between 22% and 25% in the municipalities of Sekovici, Bratunac, and Srebrenica, whereas in Bosnia as a whole, the percentage had dropped to around 15%.²⁶²

To some extent, economic development helped to improve general social and economic conditions. The 1960s and 1970s saw an increase in wage labour income, and peasants started to work in urban centres as miners, truck drivers, or factory workers. Some went to Serbia, others to Sarajevo, or even abroad, leaving their women behind in the village. Srebrenica saw its first industrial development, which at that stage in time, was mainly confined to primary industries, such as mining (the 'sase' lead and zinc mines) and forestry (the 'Drina' forestry firm). The mines in Sase began regular production in 1961, after several years of research and preparations. The municipality became an important supplier of raw materials (lead, zinc, silver, and timber) as well as of cheap labour, catering for the manufacturing industries in Serbia.²⁶³ Later, Muslims pointed out this fact to underline that Serbia had always exploited the area at the expense of the Muslim population.²⁶⁴ In addition, a bauxite mine was opened in neighbouring Milici, a Serb settlement, which is part of the Vlasenica municipality. Later, that mine was to become the largest of its kind in Europe. In 1981, the 'Boksit Milici' firm expanded its activities to Podravanje, in the territory of the Srebrenica municipality.²⁶⁵ Despite these economic developments, the municipalities of Srebrenica, Bratunac, and Vlasenica continued to be part of the most peripheral and underdeveloped parts of the republic.

²⁵⁸ Popis stanovništva 1953. Knjiga XI: Starost, pismenost i narodnost. Beograd: Savezni zavod za statistiku, 1960.

²⁵⁹ In November 1966, a referendum was held in Srebrenica to gauge public opinion about an additional income tax of 1% for the construction of schools in villages. See Srebreničke novine, 1(6), pp.1 and 6-7.

²⁶⁰ Interview Hatidza Hren 18/06/1998. See also: Srebreničke novine 1(2), 1966, p.4; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.41.

²⁶¹ In the municipality of Srebrenica, these services were provided by the adult education centre 'Zvonimir Subić', which was established in 1960. See: Narodni univerzitet 'Zvonimir Subić' Srebrenica. 20 godina rada. Srebrenica: Narodni univerzitet 'Zvonimir Subić' u Srebrenici, 1980.

²⁶² See Smit, 'A regional geography', pp.394-95.

²⁶³ Conversation: Dobrisav Kočević 10/06/1998.

²⁶⁴ See for instance: Oric, Srebrenica svjedoči i optužuje, pp.10-11.

²⁶⁵ Rajko Dukic et al. Dvadeset pet godina rada. See also: Srebreničke novine 4(42), 1981, p.3.

This changed during the late 1970s and the first half of the 1980s, when steps were taken to process locally produced natural resources (timber, zinc, and lead) on site, particularly in the Srebrenica municipality. Huge Bosnian firms, whose headquarters were located in Sarajevo or Tuzla (such as 'sipad' for forestry and 'Energoinvest' for mining and related activities) established manufacturing industries in Srebrenica.²⁶⁶ An industrial zone was created around Potočari. Some of the factories there produced batteries ('Fabrika akumulatora') and car brake systems ('Feros'). Others (such as '11. Mart' and 'Potočari'), processed lead, zinc, silver, tin, and other minerals into final products. Most of these companies were set up by the 'Energoinvest' firm, which also controlled the 'sase' lead and zinc mines. A second industrial zone was created in Zeleni Jadar, at a road junction south of Srebrenica. It included a furniture factory ('Fabrika stolica') and a stonecutting workshop ('srebrenicakamen'). In Skelani, the 'UPP' food chain opened a cannery ('9. Maj'), and in the town of Srebrenica, the Zvornik 'Vežionica' opened a textile factory. Tourism became the main economic activity in the town of Srebrenica. The focal attraction was the 'Banja Guber' spa, which drew thousands of tourists each year. Two hotels were built ('Domavia' and 'Argentarija') to accommodate the tourists, although many visitors found accommodations among the local population.²⁶⁷ The municipality of Srebrenica also boasted one of the best-known hunting grounds in Bosnia, the Susica mountain range south of the town.²⁶⁸

Dutch geographer, Jan Smit has pointed out that it is fairly surprising that a small, isolated municipality, such as Srebrenica, should have such a high concentration of industries. He suggests that this may be attributable to the municipality's wealth of resources, as well as to the strategic importance of its isolated location. One important political element in Yugoslavia's industrialisation policy was to concentrate industries in the mountainous areas least vulnerable to foreign (Soviet) aggression. But, as Smit admits, this assumption is not based on any actual proof. However, Srebrenica - unlike most other parts of Bosnia - had almost no private enterprises. Moreover, official economic and employment figures as well as detailed maps of the area were non-existent. All of this indicates that Yugoslav authorities saw Srebrenica as a zone of special strategic importance. Srebrenica became one of the few places in eastern Bosnia where the local economy was not characterised by dependency, even though it was very similar in other respects to underdeveloped municipalities elsewhere.²⁶⁹

Local Communist officials claimed the credit for Srebrenica's remarkable economic success during the late 1970s and early 1980s. They stressed that it was the result of efforts at the local level to improve Srebrenica economically and culturally. This was done through a deliberate and well-planned shift from primary industries to manufacturing, allowing the town to profit from its own natural resources through the export of finalised products. Previously, others had reaped the benefits from Srebrenica's natural wealth. In addition, much energy was invested in improving the educational level in order to create a well-educated workforce. Srebrenica's secondary school (gymnasium) was one of the best in Bosnia.²⁷⁰ Although I heard this claim mainly from former Serb communist officials, who still

²⁶⁶ Smit, 'A regional geography', p.394. Conversations: Bozo Jovanovic 11/06/1998, Dobrisav Kočević 10/06/1998.

²⁶⁷ Milivojević, 'Četvrt vijeka turizma'.

²⁶⁸ Around the mid 1980s, 7,000 of the 38,000 residents of the Srebrenica municipality were employed. Conversation: Dobrisav Kočević 10/06/1998. For an economic survey, see Privredni pregled (special issue on Srebrenica, 4(2), December 1986). Bratunac's economy was based primarily on agriculture, for which good conditions existed in the lower parts of the valley (along the Drina, Jadar, and Kravica rivers). Aside from various agricultural collectives, there were several enterprises, such as the 'Kaolin' tile factory (which also exported tiles to Holland and other European countries), two other ceramic firms, and the 'Kartonaza' cardboard factory, which produced packaging for ceramic products. There was also a timber plant ('9 Oktobar'), a brick factory ('Ciglana'), a metallurgic construction company ('Metal'), and a tobacco processing plant ('Duhan'). One of the most important enterprises in Bratunac was the 'Vihor' transport company, which facilitated the transportation and distribution of ore and manufactured goods produced in Srebrenica and Bratunac. See: Masić, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.7-8. Interview: Mitko and Mevlā Kadrić 17/01/1998.

²⁶⁹ Smit, 'A regional geography', p.397.

²⁷⁰ Interviews: Bozo Jovanovic 11/06/1998, 20/06/1998. See also: Dogovor o osnovama društvenog plana Opštine Srebrenice za period od 1981. do 1985. godine. Skupštine Opštine Srebrenice. Izvršni odbor. Srebrenica, 16/02/1981, pp.35-36; Srebreničke novine 4(33), 1981, p.1 and 6(53), 1983, p.1. A substantial portion of the investments needed for industrial development in Srebrenica were financed by foreign loans. These loans covered eighty percent of the costs of industrial equipment take pride in having built up the local economy after World War Two, Muslim authors, such as Masic, claim that it is not the Serb, but the Muslim cadres, who are to be credited for Srebrenica's success story. They suggest that the town started to thrive only when Muslims entered into cadre positions.²⁷¹ Although there may be some truth in this, the fact remains that Serbs usually continued to hold general management positions, whereas Muslims occupied the specialised technical cadres. A more accurate claim would be that the economic successes of the early 1980s are attributable to Serb and Muslim cadres alike. Unlike most other towns in the region, Srebrenica developed into a modern, prosperous town, a pleasant place to live.

Yet Srebrenica's prosperity, matched only by the other main mining town in the region, Milici, caused some economic rivalry with neighbouring municipalities, such as Bratunac. Bratunac remained one of the most economically backward and underdeveloped municipalities in the republic. Despite many family ties between the inhabitants of Srebrenica and Bratunac, Srebrenicans looked down on the 'frog catchers' (žabari) from Bratunac, a nickname derived from their location in a valley. They considered them less civilised and less educated as well as envious of Srebrenica's wealth. The inhabitants of Bratunac, in turn, called Srebrenicans 'storks' (rode), as they found them very arrogant and prone to guard their privileged position against outsiders.²⁷² It was harder for any outsider to get a job in Srebrenica than in Bratunac, they claimed. There was also a certain degree of ethnic rivalry running across these municipal divides. It surfaced more and more during the 1980s, when the economy collapsed and increasingly critical decisions had to be made regarding the distribution of jobs and other benefits.²⁷³ Ethnic rivalry was also fuelled by an undeniable shift in the ethno-demographic balance, increasing the Muslim and reducing the Serb share of the population. This process took place throughout Bosnia, where Muslims became the largest nation by the early 1970s. In eastern Bosnia, this development was visible in all municipalities, although it was expressed most poignantly in Vlasenica, as the following figures show:

Census ²⁷⁴	Srebrenica			Bratunac			Vlasenica
	inhabitants	M %	S %	inhabitants	M %	S %	inhabitants	M %	S %
1921	27,422	50	49	part of Srebrenica			28,865	33	66
1931	35,210	49	50	“			37,532	32	67
1948	39,954	49	51	“			27,305	17	83
1953	46,647	50	49	“			30,749	25	73

purchased between 1976 and 1980 (Dogovor o osnovama društvenog plana Opštine Srebrenice za period od 1981. do 1985. godine. Skupštine Opštine Srebrenice. Izvršni odbor. Srebrenica, 16/02/1981, p.45).

²⁷¹ Masic, Srebrenica, pp.15-16.

²⁷² Interview: Boban Vasic 03/09/1998. This rivalry probably explains why the two municipalities of Srebrenica and Bratunac remained two separate entities, despite discussions during the 1960s to join the two for economic reasons. See: Srebreničke novine, 1(2), 1966, pp.1-2.

²⁷³ See also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.139.

²⁷⁴ It is important to note that relevant categories during the censuses changed. The main categories in the censuses preceding World War Two were based on religious affiliation (Orthodox, Muslim, and Catholic). In post-war censuses, by contrast, they were ethnically based, which made it difficult to capture the Muslim component of the population, as Muslims were not recognised as a nation. The 1948 census placed them under a category labelled 'undeclared Muslims', and the 1953 census, under 'undeclared Yugoslavs'. In 1961, a new category was created, 'Muslims in the ethnic sense'. This was finally changed during the 1971 census into 'Muslims in the national sense' (Jackson, 'Changes in ethnic populations', p.98).

1961	29,283	50	43	23,149	43	56	23,457	14	60 ²⁷⁵
1971	33,357	63	36	26,513	51	48	26,623	48	50
1981	36,292	69	28	30,333	57	40	30,498	50	44
1991	37,211	75	23	33,575	64	34	33,817	55	42

The ethno-demographic balance between Muslims and Serbs (each comprising approximately half of the population) in Srebrenica and Bratunac throughout most of the twentieth century ceased to exist. By the 1980s, Muslims formed a clear majority in these two municipalities. In Vlasenica, the once strong Serb majority was replaced by a Muslim majority. Between 1981 and 1991, Srebrenica also witnessed a drop in the Serb segment of the population, both in relative (from 28 to 23%) and absolute numbers (from 10,924 to 8,315).²⁷⁶ Parallel to this demographic development was a rise in Muslim cadres in local government and industry, which resulted from the recognition of Bosnian Muslims as a nation (in 1968). As indicated earlier, a growing number of well-educated Muslims entered the cadres, while Serbs, who had almost monopolised them in the past, lost much of their influence in political and economic life. Many Serbs, particularly the younger generations, left for Serbia in search of better opportunities. In absolute terms, the number of Muslims in the Srebrenica municipality increased by more than ten percent between 1981 and 1991. The Serb population, by contrast, decreased by nearly twenty percent during that period. In the town of Srebrenica itself, Muslims increased their numbers by almost fifty percent, and Serbs by a mere sixteen percent.²⁷⁷ These figures also reveal a strong migration trend from villages to urban centres. Kravica, for example, witnessed a drop in the Serb population because young people left their villages to find jobs in towns, especially over the border in Serbia, while parents and grandparents stayed behind.²⁷⁸

Ethno-demographic shifts became even more painful for Serbs as Yugoslavia entered a period of economic and political decentralisation. Power devolved from the federal centre (dominated by Serbia) to the six republics and two autonomous provinces. This process was sealed with the 1974 Constitution, which put an end to Serbia's dominance and strengthened the position of other nations in the federation. A system of ethnic quota was introduced as part of this process. Based on census results, 'ethnic keys' were established, pertaining to all levels of administration. These quotas were used to ensure proportional distribution of key resources, such as jobs, houses, high positions in administration and industry, and scholarships between the various nations and nationalities. In Srebrenica, for example, local Communists established a system in which the eight highest positions in the municipality (including the mayor, chairman of the Executive Board, chief of police, etc.) were divided proportionally among Muslims and Serbs. (Normally, five of these posts went to Muslims and three to Serbs).²⁷⁹ According to Salih 'Tale' Sehomerovic, Srebrenica's mayor in the late 1980s, the Communists adhered strictly to this rule even until the end of the 1980s.²⁸⁰ Although the system of ethnic quota was ²⁷⁵ These figures do not include the people who identified themselves as 'Yugoslavs' during the post-war censuses. This explains the huge drop in percentage for Muslims (and to a lesser extent, also for Serbs) in Vlasenica. The 'Yugoslav' portion of the population, which was normally limited to a few percentage points, was highest during the 1961 census: in Vlasenica 24% of the population identified themselves as such, and in Srebrenica 7% (Bratunac only 1%). The enormous fluctuations in census results in Vlasenica may have been caused by a weak sense of ethnic belonging among local Muslims. Many of them may have listed themselves as Serbs during the 1948 and 1953 censuses, then shifted to the 'Yugoslav' category in 1961, and finally identified themselves under the 'Muslim' category in 1971.

²⁷⁶ Stanovništvo Bosne i Hercegovine. Narodnosni sastav po naseljima. Zagreb: Drzavni zavod za statistiku, 1995, pp.226-27.

²⁷⁷ Smit, 'A regional geography', p.396.

²⁷⁸ Miljanovic, Krnavi Bozic sela Kravice, p.11.

²⁷⁹ The highest administrative official at the municipal level was the President of the Municipal Council, which I will refer to as the 'Mayor' throughout the remainder of this text. The Chairman of the Executive Board of the Municipal Council was a position of almost equal standing, but was formally a subordinate to the Mayor.

²⁸⁰ Milovanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao', p.16. A leading local politician and former mayor of Srebrenica, Veselin Stevanovic, stressed in an interview that the ethnic principle was indeed important, but not paramount, in selecting people for positions. According to Stevanovic, it was considered imperative, in principle, that cadres reflect the ethno-national designed to guarantee fair distribution of resources and to reduce ethnic tensions, it did not always produce these positive effects in underdeveloped regions. In Kosovo, Macedonia, and Bosnia, it kept ethnic rivalries alive. The consequence was the creation (or continuation) of a political arena in which ethnic affiliation was of primary importance. This also led to forms of abuse and nepotism. Many people in key positions developed networks of family and friends, who were given jobs in exchange for loyalty.

Another development that would lead to increased tensions between Serbs and Muslims was the official recognition of the Bosnian Muslims as a nation. This recognition led to increased self-awareness among the Muslim elite, which was expressed in an unprecedented cultural revival. Although this revival was predicated on a secular definition of Bosnian Muslim identity, it was difficult to completely separate this ethnic identity from its religious origins. Thus, the cultural revival also brought about a religious revival. During the 1970s, many new mosques were built, especially in the countryside, which caused concern among the Serb population.²⁸¹ In addition, the Islamic community, though loyal to the Communist regime, set itself up as the main institution representing the Muslim nation within Yugoslavia. Several new Islamic journals were launched, and an Islamic theological faculty was opened in Sarajevo. Opponents of the exclusively secular definition of Bosnian Muslim identity, as propagated by Muslim communists, also became more verbal. Former members of the pre-war Bosnian pan-Islamicist organisation 'Young Muslims' (Mladi Muslimani) started to spread such views in journals of the Islamic community, generating support among young and conservative ulema, mostly from rural backgrounds. Written in 1970, Izetbegovic's 'Islamic Declaration' became a kind of implicit manifesto for this group.²⁸² The growing importance of the Islamic community in public life also led to a rapprochement between the Muslim clergy and various Bosnian intellectuals linked to the League of Communists.²⁸³

Others, particularly the Serbs, felt that the Muslim cultural and religious revival went too far. At the end of the 1970s, the Bosnian branch of the Yugoslav League of Communists started to campaign against the rise of 'Islamic fundamentalism' and 'Muslim nationalism' in the republic. The Serbian and Croatian press also voiced criticism of fundamentalist tendencies in Bosnia. In 1983, the Bosnian authorities organised a show trial against a group of thirteen Muslim intellectuals, who were accused of counter-revolutionary activities and of disseminating anti-Yugoslav propaganda. Five of them had been members of the group of 'Young Muslims', including Alija Izetbegovic, Omer Behmen, and Hasan Èengic (who later became leaders of the SDA). Twelve of them received long prison sentences. Although they were still marginal in political and intellectual life at that time, they became martyrs when they were released in the second half of the 1980s. It was this group of religiously inspired Muslim intellectuals, who, in the late 1980s, started to question the Islamic community's loyalty to the structure of the population. However, exceptions were made on occasion for candidates with superior qualifications. Interview: Veselin Stevanovic 23/06/1998.

²⁸¹ Interview: Milivoje Ivanisevic 03/02/1998. At the outbreak of the Bosnian war, there were over 30 mosques in the municipality of Srebrenica, most of which were built after World War Two. Aside from the four mosques in the town itself, there were a large number of new mosques in villages, particularly in the region of Osat (southeast of Srebrenica), but also in Potoèari, Sase, Luka, and Sucevka. They were all damaged or destroyed during the war. (See the lists of damaged and destroyed religious buildings in: Ratni zloèin, pp.47-52). Serbian Orthodox churches were far fewer in number, both in the Srebrenica and Bratunac municipalities. However, there were churches in Srebrenica, Crvica, Bratunac, Fakovici, Sase, and Kravica, most of which were built before World War Two.

²⁸² For a discussion of Alija Izetbegovic's 'Islamic Declaration' see Xavier Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.142-148. According to Bougarel, this document is a classic example of an Islamicist text. It contains all the elements of similar texts in other parts of the Muslim world: it is exemplified by its insistence upon the decadence and corruption of Muslim society, due to the loss of influence of Islam in modern and secular societies, and by its call for the restoration of an ethical and political order inspired by Islam. Bougarel stresses that Izetbegovic's pan-Islamic viewpoints, laid out in this text, also imply the rejection of nationalism as an anti-Islamic ideology.

²⁸³ Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.130-150.

Communist regime, and began to advocate a more active role for Islam in society. They later established the SDA.²⁸⁴

Economic decline during the 1980s

OUR COMRADE TITO DIED

‘Comrade Tito, we swear to you that we will not turn off your road.’

Front page of a special issue of Srebreničke novine 3(24), on the occasion of Tito’s death, May 1980

“I am a worker and a peasant, I live in the village on a small piece of land, here, near town.
Believe me, life would be difficult, my brother had there been no jobs in the social sector.
At home almost everything is broken, tractor, combine, and hoes are run-down, the interest rates still fleece me, however and they want me to pay this cursed money.
When the wheat grows high, the field calls me, yet I do not have enough time to work the land.
I never manage, on neither side,
and my doctor says I cannot go on sick leave”

Poem written by peasant worker Mladen Kulic, published in Biraè
(Zvornik), December 1988

Growing nationalist tendencies and religious revivalism were rife throughout Yugoslavia after Josip Broz Tito, the country’s undisputed leader after World War Two, died on 4 May 1980. His death marked the beginning of a deep economic, moral and political crisis, which threatened the very fabric of socialist society, the established political order and the unity of the country. Tito, with his charismatic personality, had managed to hold Yugoslavia together. But his death left the federation without a powerful, unifying figure at its centre. Before he died, Tito wanted to make sure that his death would not give any politicians or ethnic groups an opportunity to gain predominance at the expense of others. For that reason, he introduced a rotating presidential system according to which the position of president changed hands every year.

²⁸⁴ Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.161-169. See also Irwin, ‘The Islamic revival’; and Reuter, ‘Islam in Jugoslawien’

During the 1980s, Yugoslavia was hard hit by the worldwide economic recession. The country was also sliding into a political crisis. This combined economic and political crisis manifested itself in low productivity figures, a growing lack of discipline among the workforce, widespread corruption, and the erosion of social and moral values. The Yugoslav system of workers' self-management proved inadequate in tackling these problems. Large firms fell apart into smaller 'self-managed' units, which started to act on their own, independently of the head offices. Many large firms teetered on the brink bankruptcy, and only survived due to state intervention. Financial scandals, such as the Agrokomerc affair (1987), came to light, unveiling the intricate and unhealthy links between the local and regional communist party bosses and the economy. Reforms that could have averted the approaching disaster were systematically blocked by the communist elite, who had no wish to relinquish their tight reins on the economy.²⁸⁵ The authorities began printing money to cover losses and pay the salaries, causing an unprecedented inflation rate. At its height, inflation reduced wages almost overnight and completely wiped out people's savings. Jobs were unavailable to the young and educated, and workers who once assumed they had a job for life suddenly faced the terrifying prospect of unemployment. As Sudetic writes: "Everyone grew anxious to see who would decide which workers would be laid off; who would decide the size of the pay checks, the pensions, and the unemployment benefits; who would inherit the assets of bankrupt factories that belonged to everyone and to no one; who would be the winners; who would be the losers; who would be the scapegoats; who would be the new masters?"²⁸⁶

At the end of the 1980s, when communism collapsed all over eastern Europe, and Yugoslavia's economic crisis had reduced salaries to a fraction of what they once were, communist politicians started to play the nationalist card. In a multi-ethnic state, ethnic rivalry has the potential to make things worse. This was especially true in Yugoslavia, since the communist leaders became defenders of the 'national' interests of their respective republics. Thus, the Agrokomerc case quickly acquired a political dimension, offering Serbian politicians an opportunity to attack the Bosnian Muslim communist leadership for having protected the corrupt management of the firm. Some Muslims, on the other hand, regarded the arrest of Fikret Abdic, the director of the firm (who became one of the most popular Muslim politicians in the early 1990s), as an anti-Muslim conspiracy.²⁸⁷ Behind the official façade of 'Brotherhood and Unity', a growing inter-republic rivalry developed, which evolved into outright nationalism by the end of the 1980s. It was Milosevic who opened Pandora's box, bringing these rivalries fully to the surface. He came to power playing on the feelings of existential insecurity among ordinary Serbs, who were afraid of losing their jobs. He knew he could find many who were desperate enough to fight for Serb control over factories, mines, and other economic assets that provided a means of subsistence for the workers, minimal though it was. He also took on and instrumentalised the theme of Serb suffering and victimisation, under the 'Turks' and the Ustashe, and under Tito, feeding widespread popular sentiment that history has always treated Serbs unfairly.

In the early 1980s, before Milosevic's rise to power, Serb suffering was epitomised in the alleged Albanian 'genocide' of Serbs in Kosovo. It was the Serbian Orthodox church that first openly addressed the issue, presenting the conflict in the province as a renewed battle between Christianity and Islam. Albanians were alleged to have embarked on a Jihad aimed at ethnically cleansing Kosovo of its Serbian population. Parallels were drawn with World War Two. After years of silence, memories of the ²⁸⁵ Meier, Yugoslavia, pp.10-17.

²⁸⁶ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.76.

²⁸⁷ Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.155-56.

war resurfaced with a vengeance. Well-known writers, such as Vojislav Lubarda and Vuk Draskovic, published novels depicting the Ustashe atrocities against Serbs in graphic detail. Lubarda even mentioned the real names of the perpetrators in his hometown of Rogatica (in eastern Bosnia).²⁸⁸ In the second half of the 1980s, these themes of Serb suffering and victimisation became a leitmotif, including in Serbian politics, academic life, and mass media.²⁸⁹ The Memorandum of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences (1986) became a major ideological landmark in this process. It presented the predicament of the Serbs in Kosovo in almost apocalyptic terms: “The physical, political, legal, and cultural genocide of the Serbian population in Kosovo and Metohija is a worse defeat than any experienced in the liberation wars waged by Serbia from the First Serbian Uprising in 1804 to the uprising in 1941”. It compared the ‘genocide’ in Kosovo to the extermination of Serbs during World War Two. It also claimed that the Serbs were under threat in other parts of Yugoslavia, particularly in Croatia and Bosnia. “Intellectually and politically unmanned, the Serbian nation has had to bear trials and tribulations that are too severe not to leave deep scars in their psyche...”²⁹⁰

Most importantly, this discourse on Serb victimisation was adopted by Slobodan Milosevic, who soared to power when he stood up to protect the Serbs as a nation against further suffering, making his famous statement, “nobody should dare to beat you ...” during a visit to Kosovo in April 1987. In the years that followed, he launched a political campaign to abolish Kosovo’s autonomy, which was accompanied by a hate campaign against so-called Albanian nationalists and fundamentalists in the state-controlled Serbian media. This campaign was later extended to the Bosnian Muslims and Islam in general.²⁹¹ Attention was focused on Serb suffering – both under the Ottoman Turks and in World War Two. In the years before the outbreak of the war, the images of Ustashe concentration camps and slaughtered Serbs became commonplace on prime time Serbian television. As one Serb analyst writes, counting the dead became a kind of “national hobby”²⁹². At the same time, nationalist politicians (such as Jovan Raskovic, leader of the Krajina Serbs) started to refer to their nation as “the slaughtered people,” thus lending another, more sinister meaning to the notion of “heavenly Serbia”. The dead bodies of Serbian World War Two victims were exhumed and reburied in ceremonies held by the church and frequented by nationalist politicians.²⁹³ It became normal to refer to Croats as ‘Ustashe’. Bosnian Muslims, in turn, were branded as ‘Muslim fundamentalists’, who were said to want to turn the clock back to Ottoman times. As Milovan Djilas noted in his conversations with Adil Zulfikarpasic: “The Belgrade-based Politika newspaper fostered the belief that the Croats were going to slaughter Croatian Serbs. Highly misleading facts and distorted ideas were bandied around in the press and on television (...). An atmosphere of fear was created, which was followed by an atmosphere of hatred, and hatred was followed by ... conflict”.²⁹⁴ It seems that the hate campaign in the Serbian media was a deliberate attempt to prepare people for war and brace them for revenge. The Milosevic regime’s manipulation of the memories of World War Two were thus an important factor in the spiral of violence in the region during the 1990s.²⁹⁵

²⁸⁸ Dragovic Soso, Between democracy and nationalism, pp.211-218,

²⁸⁹ Markovic, ‘Nacija, zrtva i osveta’.

²⁹⁰ Mihailovic and Krestic, Memorandum, resp. p.128 and 138; see also Dragnich, ‘The rise and fall of Yugoslavia’.

²⁹¹ In academia, political scientist, Miroljub Jevtic, was the most outspoken protagonist of Serbian Albanophobia and Islamophobia. From the late 1980s on, he popularised his ideas on Islam, especially as regarding the Muslim Albanians in Kosovo and the Slavic Muslims in Bosnia. He achieved this by means of numerous articles and interviews in newspapers, such as Politika, Interju, Svet etc. He also published several books expressing his views; see in particular, Jevtic, Dzihad; Jevtic, Od Islamske deklaracije; Jevtic, Siptari i Islam. For a description of contemporary intellectual hostility towards Islam in Serbia, see Cigar, ‘serbia’s Orientalists’; see also Mufaku, ‘The Serbian view of Islam’.

²⁹² Markovic, ‘Nacija, zrtva i osveta’, p.647.

²⁹³ See: Denich, ‘Dismembering Yugoslavia’; Hayden ‘Recounting the dead’; Bax ‘Mass graves’.

²⁹⁴ Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.158.

²⁹⁵ See for instance Bassiouni, Final report, p.78. See also a short text in the Serb nationalist journal, Pogledi, which criticizes the silence around Serb mass graves in Srebrenica (Vasic, ‘suti se o Srebrenici...’)

Political tensions rose in Bosnia as a result of Milosevic's actions. The Bosnian republican authorities grew increasingly nervous regarding expressions of Serb and Muslim nationalism, which they feared could lead to conflicts such as that in Kosovo. In Srebrenica, for instance, local Serbs, influenced by media propaganda from Serbia, joined the huge mass meetings in solidarity with the Kosovo Serbs in towns across the border in Serbia. This created a great deal of unrest among local Muslims.²⁹⁶ The Bosnian communist authorities tried to suppress these tensions, which were seen as extremely dangerous for multi-ethnic Bosnia, by fiercely repressing all forms of nationalist agitation. This policy was also implemented in eastern Bosnia. There, Serb, as well as Muslim political activists – some of whom later became well-known nationalist leaders – were monitored by the Bosnian state-security (SDB). Among them was Besim Ibisevic, a local historian and Muslim activist who later became mayor of Srebrenica for the SDA after the first democratic elections in Bosnia in 1990. In his political memoirs, he describes how he was arrested by agents of the Zvornik SDB section in January 1987 for sending a letter to the editor of a newspaper called Oslobodjenje. The letter contained a warning against renewed Serbian aggression towards Bosnia's Muslim population. The letter had been prompted by an incident at the Drina, where Serbs on the Serbian side of the river allegedly shot at two Muslims on the Bosnian side, injuring one of them. In his letter, Ibisevic wrote that forty years after the atrocities against Muslims during World War Two, Serbs were again firing at them.²⁹⁷ The newspaper did not publish the letter, but forwarded it to the Bosnian state security. Consequently, Ibisevic – as he himself writes with a sense of nationalist pride – acquired a reputation as a big fish, 'the most important nationalist and fundamentalist in the region of Zvornik'.²⁹⁸

As a figure, Ibisevic is interesting since he represents the archetypical village-born intellectual, whose attempts to gain respect from urban people in the èarsija (town) of Srebrenica failed, as he remained a 'peasant' in their eyes.²⁹⁹ Like many other village intellectuals, he became a nationalist and started to rally village against town when he – as the custodian of the local museum in Srebrenica after 1987 – paid frequent visits to villages to gather material and stories for the museum. In these villages, as Ibisevic writes in his book, people respected him. He was also able to talk more freely there, far from the earshot of the secret police. By 'lecturing' on local history during his visits to these villages, he claims to have raised Bosniac national consciousness. He also taught these ordinary peasants certain political lessons. One such lesson was that Yugoslavia was an artificial creation that conflicted with their own interests and that the Drina was a border between two different nations, two opposing civilizations. He tried, as he himself states, to convince people not to buy Serbian newspapers, not to support Serbian football teams, and to liberate themselves from the ekavian ('serbian') influences in their dialect. While many village people took his messages to heart, urban people mocked him, ²⁹⁶ Milanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao', p.16.

²⁹⁷ Later, Ibisevic was forced to admit that the two Muslims had invented their story as a cover up for illegal fishing activities along the Drina (during which one had injured himself with explosives). Yet apparently, by the late 1980s, such incidents did in fact occur, judging from an article in the Serbian magazine, Duga. According to the article, a small fishing war was going on in the Drina canyon towards the end of the 1980s. Inhabitants of Muslim villages west of Skelani built dams and caught huge amounts of fish. The fishers association in Bajina Basta, on the Serbian side of the river, tried, in its turn, to prevent them by destroying these dams. This conflict escalated: Serbian guards shot in the air, while Muslims sabotaged and stoned a vehicle of the association. Muslims allegedly threatened Serbian officials with remarks like "we will cut your heads off and build them into the dams". The writer of the article thus draws a parallel with Ottoman times, stating that Muslims in Srebrenica are building a new skull tower such as the one the Turks erected in Nis, the famous Cele-kula (Elez, 'Cele-kula na Drini').

²⁹⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.5-11; interview Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

²⁹⁹ Besim Ibisevic was born in the village of Dobrak, near Skelani. After primary education, he enrolled in the Gymnasium in Bajina Basta (Serbia), where he was one of a very small number of Bosnian Muslim pupils. He claims having suffered discrimination at the hands of fellow students and Serb teachers. In 1978, he went to Sarajevo to study history, together with his close friend and future SDS activist, Momèilo Cvjetinovic. There he fell into trouble with the SDB, as he claims, for spreading anti-Yugoslav propaganda. He completed his studies in 1982, after which he served in the army. He fell into trouble again and spent some time in an army prison for similar offences. In 1986, he became the first custodian of the local ethnographic and historical museum in Srebrenica (located in the Culture House). Interview: Ibisevic, 24/05/1998.

regarding him as a typical history teacher turned nationalist. As he was born in Dobrak (near Skelani), some called him a Kadrinovac (a sympathiser of Kadrija Softic, a local Ustasha leader during World War Two).³⁰⁰

Eastern Bosnia becomes a ‘second Kosovo’

“...the Islamic countries, led by Turkey, and supported by Saudi Arabia, Iran, Pakistan and others, are moving up towards Europe and the other developed countries. They use the demographic bomb, causing a quick rise of the population, while unable to sustain these people on their own territories. Nowadays, Islam and Christianity are competing for control over the Balkan space, which is, according to my own deepest conviction, the centre of the world, at the crossroad of three continents: Africa, Europe, and Asia”.

Ratko Mladic in an interview for The Canadian Srbobran, quoted in Pogledi, 12 November 1993, p.34

The Agrokomerc scandal was followed by a similar affair, with very similar effects, in eastern Bosnia. Eastern Bosnia also witnessed local tensions rise due to the economic crisis. These tensions manifested themselves in petty jealousy and resentment against ‘others,’ who appeared more prosperous in these times of hardship. Old enmities resurfaced during disputes over who was to get a particular job, apartment, or whose son or daughter would win a scholarship to study in Sarajevo. Some were convinced that certain villages received a larger share of municipal resources due to nepotism and ethnic favouritism on the part of those in power, while other villages were kept backward because they lacked the necessary veze (connections).³⁰¹ The fact that villages were either exclusively Serb or Muslim only reinforced a general pattern of thought, which regarded the main lines of division in society in terms of ethnic differences. The ‘haves’ became increasingly anxious to defend their position against incursions from ‘the have-nots’. In and around Srebrenica, these tendencies first manifested themselves most clearly in the neighbouring municipality of Vlasenica.

At the beginning of 1988, conflicts arose between municipal authorities and the community of Milici, a Serb-dominated mining town of several thousand east of Vlasenica. Milici had developed into a major economic centre, because the Vlasenica bauxite mines had concentrated their mining activities there. The firm was established in the late 1950s or early 1960s. Production had seen a rapid increase in the 1960s and 1970s, and since that time, the mines had grown into the largest of their kind in Europe.³⁰² The firm operated mainly in the municipalities of Vlasenica and Srebrenica. It also functioned as a major impetus to local economic and infrastructural development, providing employment for the inhabitants of Vlasenica and other communities, such as Zvornik. In 1979, one of Europe’s largest aluminium plants was opened there. It was the largest single employer in Zvornik. The hydroelectric plants along the Drina River (near Zvornik and Bajina Basta) supplied the huge energy resources needed to process bauxite. In short, the mines played an enormous role in raising the living standard of the population. This was especially true in Milici where large sums of money were invested in housing, health care, and cultural and sports activities. The mines turned Milici, like Srebrenica, into a booming town, an oasis of prosperity in an otherwise fairly underdeveloped region.

³⁰⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.15-17. Interview: Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

³⁰¹ Masic claims, for instance, that Serb officials in Bratunac only invested money in roads that connected Serb villages (for instance around Kravica). He also claims that some of these roads were built mainly for military reasons, with the assistance of ‘reliable’ construction companies from Bratunac and Serbia (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.14).

³⁰² The mines accounted for 2.10% of the world’s bauxite production. Production started in 1959, even though the firm was not established until 1962. In 1969, it became part of the ‘Energoinvest’ company based in Sarajevo. In 1981, it opened a new mine in Podravanje in the territory of the Srebrenica municipality (See Dukic et al. Dvadeset pet godina rada). In 1990, the firm became a stock-trade company, selling shares to its workers. This was the result of economic reforms introduced by Yugoslav prime-minister, Ante Markovic. At the same time, the firm started to diversify its economic activities, as mining was not a viable long-term option due to limited local bauxite reserves. Interview: Dukic 14/06/2000; Andjelic, ‘Poplasen je bio spreman’.

Because of this, tensions arose when Serb leaders in Milici started to discuss the option of separating from Vlasenica and creating their own municipality. That move would entail a return to the situation before 1964, when Milici was included in the municipality of Vlasenica.³⁰³ Muslims from Vlasenica accused Serb leaders of selfish attempts to keep the revenues of the mines in the Milici Township. "While the inhabitants of Milici have turned their settlement into a mini Switzerland, the town of Vlasenica has 2,000 unemployed", said critics in Vlasenica. The greatest target of criticism was Rajko Dukic, the director of the bauxite mine. Although immensely popular among his Serb workers, he was despised by many Muslims, who felt they had no equal share in the wealth and prosperity created by the mine. Most people in Milici saw these attacks on Dukic, a native of their town, as an attack on the community at large. Muslim officials in the municipal committee of Vlasenica drew comparisons with the Agrokomerc scandal. They compared Dukic with Fikret Abdic, the Muslim politician who had brought prosperity to the town of Velika Kladusa by means of financial speculation and malversations.³⁰⁴ An article published in Nasi Dani (February 1989) repeated these allegations. According to that article, Dukic was responsible for malversations, fraud, and shady investments, and also guilty of nationalist offences. The journalist who wrote the article suggested that the wealth he had accumulated for himself and his community had been acquired illegally.³⁰⁵

Similar conflicts occurred between Dukic and Muslim communist officials from the municipality of Srebrenica. They wanted a clearer say and a larger share of the revenues of the Podravanje mine, which though located on within the Srebrenica municipality, was run by Boksit Milici. The conflicts regarding the Podravanje mine seem to have existed from the outset, i.e. from the early 1980s. It was then that mining authorities authorized the company's commercial use of the bauxite reserves within the municipality of Srebrenica. Their lack of any formal say in matters relating to the mine located on 'their' territory made Srebrenican authorities feel that their municipality's interests were neglected. Increasingly, these problems acquired an ethnic dimension. This trend was welcomed by people like Dukic, who used it to divert public attention from their dubious economic activities. Local Muslim politicians, such as Salih Sehomeric, mayor of Srebrenica, began openly describing Milici as a Serb nationalist stronghold. Serbs, in turn, expressed fear that Muslim politicians from Vlasenica and Srebrenica were keen to seize control over 'their' firm.³⁰⁶ According to an article in the Belgrade nationalist bi-weekly Duga, Muslims had already successfully taken over the 'sumarstvo' forestry company. All Serb managers had been dismissed. The crucial element contributing to these rising ethnic tensions was the fact that Vlasenica's Serb majority had dwindled into a minority, as explained earlier. During the 1970s, Muslims became numerically predominant in that municipality, and Serbs ³⁰³ Interview: Dukic 14/06/2000; Vukovic and Barjaktarevic, 'Istoèna Bosna'. These Serb aspirations were part of a wider trend. Even in Kosovo, Serbs were trying to carve new 'serb' entities out of Muslim-dominated municipalities in order to secure control over important natural resources. See Roux, Les Albanais en Yougoslavie; Hardten, 'Administrative units'. One informant claims that Rajko Dukic offered Muslim villages around Milici schools and even a mosque in return for supporting the creation of the new municipality of Milici. Interview: Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998. On 28 March 1992, on the eve of the outbreak of war, Milici proclaimed itself a separate Serb municipality, independent from 'mixed' Vlasenica (Stamenkovic 'Opet ce se Dukic pitati').

³⁰⁴ Meier, Yugoslavia, pp.41-2.

³⁰⁵ See Palameta, 'Dukic - jedan i jedini'. See also the polemics that followed between Dukic and various officials from the Milici mines, as well as between him and Palameta, a journalist, in Nasi dani, 17/02/1989 (pp.42-44) and 03/03/1989 (pp.37-38). In 1990 and 1991, accusations of fraud and malversations were also made by various Serb employees, whom Dukic then tried to fire (see B.S. 'Rajko se sveti!'). Dukic later became one of the leading members of the SDS in Bosnia.

³⁰⁶ The bitter conflicts between Sehomeric and Dukic over the Podravanje mines is mentioned as one of the reasons why the former was murdered at the start of the war. Conversation with Boban Vasic 05/05/2001. Another former Muslim director of a Srebrenican firm confirmed that there were constant clashes with Rajko Dukic about plans for regional economic development. Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

feared this would also lead to Muslim political supremacy. This fear of Muslim domination, in Vlasenica and in Bosnia as a whole, was reinforced in the Belgrade press. Journalists even wrote that Serbs could no longer buy pork in the communal butcheries of Vlasenica.³⁰⁷

In Serbia, nationalist hysteria and anti-Muslim feeling reached a climax during the spring of 1989, when Milosevic's campaign to abolish Kosovo's autonomy went into full swing. The apotheosis of his campaign was the celebration of the six-hundredth anniversary of the Kosovo Battle on 28 June in Gazi Mestan near Prishtina. Milosevic – in tune with his new role as Serbia's modern-day saviour – was flown into the ceremony by helicopter, literally descending from Heaven. His portrait was plastered on thousands of buses, next to images of other Serb heroes from the past. Hundreds of thousands of Serbs, from Serbia, Croatia, and Bosnia, as well as from abroad, gathered on the battle site. A number of Serbs from Srebrenica, Bratunac, and Vlasenica also attended the celebrations, and the story goes that one Serb, vojvoda from Vlasenica, even went to the celebrations at Gazi Mestan by horse.³⁰⁸ The remains of Serbian army leader, national martyr and saint, Tsar Lazar, were transported to the monastery of Gračаница, near Prishtina, after having toured churches and monasteries in Serbia and eastern Bosnia. The tour, organised by the Serbian Orthodox Church, had started one year before in order to underscore Serbian claims to Kosovo and eastern Bosnia. Lazar's martyrdom also served as a reminder of centuries of suffering among the Serb people. When Lazar's remains entered the diocese of Sabac-Valjevo (western Serbia, near the Drina river), the bishop wrote: "From the times of prince Lazar and Kosovo, Serbs have built Heavenly Serbia, which nowadays has grown into the largest heavenly state. If we only put together all the innocent victims of the last war, millions and millions of Serbian men and women, children and the weak, those killed and tortured in the most appalling pain or thrown into caves by Ustase criminals, then we can comprehend how large the Serbian empire in heaven is".³⁰⁹

For the Serbs, the celebrations marked Milosevic's victory in bringing Kosovo under his control and 'uniting' Serbia; they also showed that the defeat at the Kosovo battlefield six centuries earlier had finally been avenged. Serbia was reborn and Milosevic had a clear message for the other Yugoslav nations: "Six centuries after the battle of Kosovo Polje, we are, once again, embroiled in battles and quarrels. These are not armed battles, but the latter cannot be ruled out yet". As Sudetic writes, this was the moment when Milosevic decided to "drive a ceremonial stake into the heart of Brotherhood and Unity".³¹⁰ Obviously, in Bosnia, the celebrations were seen as a blatant provocation to Yugoslavia's Muslim population, a provocation addressed not only to Albanians, but also to Bosnia's Slavic Muslims. For the first time, Muslims in Bosnia started to show open solidarity with the Albanians. Within the ranks of the Islamic Community, the idea grew that Muslim groups all over Yugoslavia should form a common front against the Serbian Orthodox Christian threat.³¹¹

Milosevic's campaign did not stop at the borders of his new 'united' Serbia, as many politicians in Croatia and Slovenia had hoped. Since he had managed to 'solve' the Kosovo problem, he had a free hand to intensify his assault on Bosnia, which had begun a year before with an anti-Muslim media campaign similar to the campaign against the Kosovo Albanians. During the summer of 1989, Milosevic began in earnest to meddle in Bosnian affairs. This was done by intensifying activity on the part of pro-Milosevic politicians in Bosnia. Even as early as May, Mirko Ostojic, a high Belgrade official (and former partisan from Sekovici who had climbed to the ranks of ambassador in China), started to tour eastern Bosnia. His purpose was to rally public support for Milosevic's policy in Kosovo. On 26 May 1989, Ostojic made an unannounced visit to Srebrenica, where local Communist 'activists' organised a small meeting in the Culture House. All municipal officials who attended the meeting were very critical of Ostojic's views and Milosevic's policies in Serbia. They included: Salih Sehomeric 'Tale' (mayor), Nedžad Selmanagic (municipal secretary for economic affairs), Adib Džozic (president ³⁰⁷ See, for instance, Vukovic and Barjaktarovic, 'Istoèna Bosna'.

³⁰⁸ Oric, Srebrenica svjedoèi i optužuje, p.62.

³⁰⁹ Quoted in Radic 'Crkva i 'srpsko pitanje', p.278.

³¹⁰ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.78.

³¹¹ Bougarel, Islam et politique, p.157.

of the municipal Socialist League of the Working People), and Miloje Simic (president of the League of Communists of Srebrenica). Later, they complained that Ostojic had made notes of their names and personal details, as if the reason for his mission, the aim and status of which remained nebulous, had been to gather intelligence for Serbia's secret police.³¹²

During the summer of 1989, rumours started to circulate among Srebrenica's Muslim population that an armed group of so-called Chetniks was conducting military exercises in the hills above the town. As the story went, all respectable local Serbs had joined this organisation, and its leader was Goran Zekic (judge at the district court of Srebrenica).³¹³ Other names mentioned in the press reports were Bosko Milovanovic (director of the Culture House), police officer, Milisav Gavric, Miodrag Jokic 'Zmigo', and Delivoje Sorak. And indeed, some of these individuals did actually become local leaders of the Serbian Democratic Party (SDS) in 1990. According to Muslim sources, some peasants spotted Serbs hunting in the forests around Srebrenica, dressed up in uniforms and singing Chetnik songs. They were alleged to have received arms and uniforms from Belgrade. These were said to have transported to them in vans of the Serbian newspaper, Politika, where they were hidden among the early morning newspaper deliveries to Srebrenica.³¹⁴ In response to these rumours, local Muslim thugs started to show their muscles as well. In a café in the village of Glogova, four Muslims announced the formation of a group of Ustashe, and called on local Muslims to join. They were arrested, but released, as they had done this in a state of drunkenness.³¹⁵ The local Srebrenican radio station tried to quieten the situation.³¹⁶

During the autumn of 1989, just two months after the Kosovo celebrations, the Serbian media started talking about the 'ethnic cleansing' of Serbs from eastern Bosnia, particularly in the Bratunac and Srebrenica area. The whole issue became hot news when 'confidential' documents of the State Security of Serbia (SDB), containing information about the alleged expulsion of Serbs from eastern Bosnia, were leaked to the press.³¹⁷ The documents claimed that considerable numbers of Serbs from the Bratunac and Srebrenica area had immigrated to Serbia due to Muslim pressure. It was said that most local businesses and municipal offices were controlled by Muslim 'nationalists' and 'fundamentalists', who favoured their own people at the expense of the Serbs. It was claimed that Serb villages along the Drina still had no roads or telephone connections, while Muslim villages in the much more isolated mountain areas had much better facilities.

The documents also stated that political and economic life in Srebrenica and Bratunac was dominated by a number of old Muslim bey families, who had joined the Ustashe movement during World War Two and now had close ties to the Islamic community. All of them were said to collaborate in the Islamicisation of the region, by building mosques and other religious facilities, with an ultimate view to cleansing the area of its Serb population. They were said to have expressed strong anti-Serbian views and to have supported Albanian separatism. Among the names mentioned in the documents was Ahmed Smajlovic, a well-known Muslim theologian and high official of the Islamic community, who originally came from a village near Skelani. He was said to be the most prominent 'fundamentalist' in ³¹² Milanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao'; Ibisevic, 'Ostojic je i mene ispitivao'; Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.24-26. S.A. 'Mirkove bosanske turneje'.

³¹³ See Nestic, 'O èemu se telalilo'; Malisic, 'Masovni pojedinaèni sluèajevi'.

³¹⁴ Masic, Srebrenica, p.22; Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.35.

³¹⁵ Reljic, 'Nasi reporteri'.

³¹⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.35.

³¹⁷ Excerpts of these documents were first published in the Croatian weekly, Danas (Mijovic, 'strogo kontrolirana republika'). During a meeting of the Yugoslav Presidency, Serbian representative, Borisav Jovic, waved these documents in order to pressure Bosnian representative, Bogic Bogicevic, into supporting Milosevic. Bogicevic, who was extremely critical of Milosevic's policies, took copies of them to Bosnia where he gave them to journalists. The full texts of the reports were published in the Bosnian weekly AS (Anonymous, 'sta su agenti trazili', Malenica 'sve je to suludo!'). See also, Malenica 'Opet bih isto rekao'; Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.28; M.L., 'sDB otvara krug; Milanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao'.

the region. The SDB documents, however, failed to mention that he had died a year earlier.³¹⁸ The press also targeted Nedžad Selmanagic, the municipal secretary for economic affairs, and Sabit Begic, the director of the hospital (and later vice-president of the Social-Democrat Party). Selmanagic had never been a member of the League of Communists, and was known to be a regular visitor at the mosque. This made him an easy target. Muslim schoolteachers in Srebrenica and Bratunac were also mentioned as fundamentalist activists.³¹⁹ Several local Serb communist officials were criticised as well (particularly the president of the local branch of the League of Communists of Srebrenica, Miloje Simic) for opposing Milosevic's policies and attacking Serbian nationalism.³²⁰

After these reports were published, the Communist authorities of Bratunac and Srebrenica denied that Serb emigration was the result of Muslim pressure. They claimed socio-economic factors to be the main cause. Even some Serb officials, including Pavle 'Bato' Beatovic, Mayor of Bratunac, and Miloje Simic, president of the local branch of the League of Communists of Srebrenica, supported this point of view.³²¹ All of them denied that Muslim fundamentalism was to blame for the exodus of the Serbs. All the same, ethnic tensions were undeniably on the rise by this point and the nationalist press in Serbia was clearly adding fuel to the fire. This trend manifested itself in a dramatic increase in convictions for verbal offences, especially of Muslims, who had dared to criticise Milosevic and had taken a stand against Serbian nationalism. Among those sentenced was Malik Meholic, who was later to become the SDA leader and mayor of Srebrenica. In his case, the offence was having cursed Slobodan Milosevic in a café in the village of Bjelovac in July 1989.³²² Other local Muslims spent several weeks in Serbian prisons after making similar remarks about Milosevic in Serbia itself.³²³ Mounting ethnic tensions were also visible in the increasing number of café fights and other incidents. In December 1989, a group of local Muslims wrote a petition, protesting against nationalist provocations, including those by Orthodox priest, Todor Tomic and future SDS activist, Delivoje Sorak. Some Muslims were said to have been beaten up by Serb nationalists. The Communist authorities were criticised for doing too little to curb the rise of such incidents.³²⁴

The Serb village of Crvica (a few kilometres east of Skelani) played a particularly prominent role in Serbian press reports.³²⁵ The inhabitants complained to journalists that their village was completely isolated, that no roads had been built, and that the municipal authorities had refused to invest money in improving facilities and living conditions. They had already voiced their protest in December 1983, when the leaders of the local commune of Crvica called on the Bosnian presidency to do something ³¹⁸ Between 1975 and 1985, Smajlovic was President of the Bosnian branch of the Islamic Community. He participated in the purges against 'fundamentalists' in 1979, taking control over the main Islamic newspaper, Preporod. He also became editor-in-chief of Islamska misao, the mouthpiece of the Bosnian branch of the Islamic community. In 1985, he himself came under attack, after the publication of an article in Preporod (Smajlovic, 'Podvale umjesto zahvale'). He was removed from his position, and became a professor at the Islamic theological faculty in Sarajevo. Smajlovic had been a student at the well-known Al-Azhar university in Egypt, where he became the first Yugoslav Muslim to earn a doctorate. Because of his good connections in Egypt, where he had lived for twelve years, he played an important role during Tito's visits to Egypt. These visits took place at a time when Yugoslavia and Egypt were the two leading members of the Conference of Non-aligned States. He was a prolific author, publishing numerous articles on Islamic theology and the Muslim community in Bosnia and Yugoslavia. (See, for instance, Smajlovic 'Muslims in Yugoslavia'). He died in August 1988. (See the special issue of Islamska misao, 10(116), August 1988, which provides biographic data and a complete bibliography).

³¹⁹ Masic, Srebrenica, pp.21-2.

³²⁰ See also Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.27; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.12-13.

³²¹ Ignja, 'srebrenica - Bratunac'; Milanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao', p.18. Muslim authors have rightly - or wrongly - 'unmasked' these Communist officials as Serb nationalists. For example, according to Masic, Pavle 'Bato' Beatovic was merely a crypto-nationalist who made every effort to ensure that Serbs would not lose their grip on power. He is said to have done this by nurturing a public image of himself as a friend of the Muslims (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.19-20).

³²² Another was Ejub Golic, from Glogova, who became one of the most prominent commanders in the Srebrenica enclave during the war. For the names of those convicted, see Nesic, 'O èemu se telalilo'.

³²³ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.15.

³²⁴ Cosovic 'Prijetnje s udarcima'.

³²⁵ See, for instance, Reljic 'Nasi reporteri'; Caric, 'Akcija "Muslimanskog" socijalizma'; Nesic, 'O èemu se telalilo'.

about the road between Bratunac and Skelani.³²⁶ In August 1989, a group of World War Two veterans from the area re-addressed these matters in a letter of protest to the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Bosnia. “Serbian villages are easily recognisable: they have no telephones, no roads, no factories, nothing”. They claimed that, since the war, hardly anything had been done for these villages, and that the old road between Bratunac and Skelani in particular, which had been built by the Austrians, was still in deplorable condition. It was said that Serbs were forced in this way to send their children to Serbia to be educated or to find jobs. They held the local authorities of Srebrenica responsible for this, and also accused them of doing nothing against the pressures of Muslim ‘nationalists’ and ‘fundamentalists’.³²⁷

They warned against a Serb exodus due to what they called a deliberate policy of demoralisation by Muslim authorities. Hundreds of Serbs were said to have already immigrated to Serbia due to Muslim pressure.³²⁸ In one press report, published in Duga, Miodrag Jokic, a local Serb from Srebrenica, (who later proved to be one of the worst Serb extremists in town), claimed that because of this, he was leaving Srebrenica and selling all his property. He claimed that the town was controlled by a few Muslim families, who had the power to give their friends anything they wanted (a strip of land, a job, a scholarship, or credits).³²⁹ Many other stories of anti-Serb harassment appeared in Serbian newspapers. Most of these presented the truth in a very distorting light. The Muslim police were accused of entering Serb homes to demand the removal of Milosevic’s portrait from the walls, and of issuing fines to people for having small photos of Milosevic in their cars. Windows of houses, shops and cars featuring photos of Slobodan Milosevic or Cyrillic inscriptions were said to be smashed. The reports claimed that Serbs could not buy pork in Srebrenican butcher shops and that music was banned in the gradska kafana (the town café) during Ramazan.³³⁰ They also alleged that verbal offences against Serbs and President Milosevic were commonplace, and that Muslim cafes refused entry to Serb customers. Muslim supporters of the FC Guber football club were reported to have shouted such anti-Serbian slogans as, ‘This is Turkey,’ especially during football games against teams from Serbia or Montenegro. The press also ran stories on Muslims raping Serb girls and attacking Serbian Orthodox priests.³³¹ Most of the accusations in the press grossly misrepresented the facts.

The contents and timing of these press reports show a clear parallel with Kosovo. During the late 1980s, such stories had been commonplace in Kosovo in the Serbian nationalist press. Eastern Bosnia was now presented as a second Kosovo, ‘a special copy of Kosovo’. One press report drew a picture of a slow, but undeniable, process of ‘Muslimification’ in Srebrenica. According to the journalist, the handrails of the stairs in the municipal building were as green as the seats of the Culture ³²⁶ See also: Srebreničke novine, 7(60), 1984, p.3.

³²⁷ See also Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.26-27. Some articles refer to non-ethnic and economic reasons for the lack of development in villages along the Drina. Before the onset of the war, rumours persisted that a new dam and hydroelectric power station was being planned here. As a result, banks refused to issue loans for the development of this region, as they expected the area to be flooded at some point in the future (Drazic ‘srbin Vidoje Radovic’; Elez, ‘Cele-kula na Drni’).

³²⁸ One report cites a figure of two thousand Serbs who immigrated to Serbia during the 1980s (M.L., ‘sDB otvara krug’). The last three censuses do indeed show a steady decline of the Serb population. The village of Crvica counted 992 inhabitants in 1971, 717 in 1981, and only 473 in 1991. In the municipality of Srebrenica as a whole, the number of Serbs dropped from 10,294 in 1981 to 8,315 in 1991 (Stanovništvo Bosne i Hercegovine. Narodnosni sastav po naseljima. Zagreb: Drzavni zavod za statistiku, 1995, pp.226-27).

³²⁹ Malisic, ‘Masovni pojedinaèni sluèajevi’.

³³⁰ The press reports do not mention that Miloje Simic, a Serb, was the director of the UPI firm that owned the gradska kafana. Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998; conversation: Boban and Bedrija Vasic 14/12/2001.

³³¹ The priest who was allegedly attacked by Muslims was Mitar Krsmanovic in Fakovici. Muslim author, Nijaz Masic, writes that Krsmanovic provoked a conflict in a local café to polarise his village. He then organised a protest meeting against ‘Bosniacs who beat up Orthodox priests’. He was criticised for this by Srbislav (‘Bato’) Blazic, the Serbian Orthodox priest for Bratunac. Blazic told him that what he was doing was wrong and that his place was not in the café (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.15-16). Later, Bratunac’s priest seems to have come into conflict with other Serb nationalists as well, as implied by Miroslav Deronjic, the SDS president for Bratunac, in an interview with local newspaper, Nasa Rijec (Anonymous, ‘Neka mi neko od vas pokaze’).

House (Dom Kulture), and local Muslims had just built a new mosque facing the Culture House. Local townspeople reacted with dismay to these reports, which infused them with nationalist fervour from the outside by describing incidents completely out of context, and creating an atmosphere of insecurity and suspicion. In the villages, these tendencies were even more divisive. Serbs were well advised not show up at any Muslim village celebrations, as that could cause problems. Slogans from a distant past re-emerged, and it became commonplace to brand members of the opposite group as 'Chetniks' and 'Ustashe'.

Moderate opinions were more or less marginalized, or, if represented in the press reports, were rendered as naive, unrealistic, or even insincere, voices. This happened, for instance, with Salih Sehomerovic, the Mayor of Srebrenica, who was presented as being out of touch with reality. He was quoted as saying that ethnic relations in Srebrenica were among the best in Bosnia; the fact that Radio Srebrenica could not reach the villages was to blame for the deterioration of ethnic relations there.³³² In another interview, Sehomerovic showed his goodwill towards Serbs, by stating, "There is no better Serb among the Muslims than me!".³³³ He did his utmost to convince the public that there was no anti-Serbian feeling in Srebrenica. He told journalists that Muslims in Srebrenica read Serbian newspapers, watched Serbian TV, and supported Serbian football clubs.³³⁴ Another communist official, Adib Djozic, also stressed that relations in Srebrenica were good: local Serbs had contributed to the building of the new mosque, while the Muslim municipal authorities had assisted with the restoration of a Serbian Orthodox church in the village of Medja.³³⁵ Others, such as the Muslim president of the local commune of Fakovici, told the press that there was no pressure on Serbs to leave and that relations had always been good, even during World War Two.³³⁶

Another well-known local communist official and 'Yugoslav', Mustafa Djozic 'Egber' ('the Mighty') from Bratunac, told one journalist stories of a past that seemed to have become obsolete. Many of his family members had married non-Muslims. Moreover, his father, a Muslim clergyman and local politician in the first decades of the twentieth century, had been good friends with the Serbian Orthodox priest. On major religious Serb and Muslim holidays, they paid mutual visits, and welcomed one another as the most honourable guests. He also pointed out that Serbs and Muslims had protected each other during World War Two, and that consequently, relations had been always good after the war. He admitted, however, that he himself had made enemies in Bratunac when, after the war, as director of the catastro of Bratunac, he had signed many decisions to usurp and collectivise private land. People, even some of his relatives, were still angry with him and did not want to talk to him. In the same press article, however, a local Serb policeman accused Djozic of being a Muslim nationalist, despite his communist and Yugoslav credentials. He claimed that Djozic was helping Muslim friends and family and refusing Serb requests for allotments of land.³³⁷

These press reports caused unrest in Bosnia as well as in Serbia. In Srebrenica, communist officials protested against the released SDB documents and the fact that no local official was ever contacted to verify the allegations made there.³³⁸ Local Serb officials, such as Miloje Simic and Boban Vasic, also denounced the contents of the documents.³³⁹ Boban Vasic showed that Serb directors of firms controlled most of the workforce in the municipality (5,000 out of a total 7,000). With this ³³² Malisic, 'Masovni pojedinaèni sluèajevi'.

³³³ Elez, 'Cele-kula na Drni'.

³³⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.33. Salih Sehomerovic was arrested and executed at the bridge over the Drina near Bratunac at the beginning of the war (Masic, Srebrenica, p.16).

³³⁵ Malisic, 'Masovni pojedinaèni sluèajevi'.

³³⁶ Ignja, 'srebrenica - Bratunac'.

³³⁷ Drazic 'srbin Vidoje Radovic'.

³³⁸ Even the head of the local police, Savo Aleksic (a Serb), was not informed about these investigations of the Serbian SDB. See: Milanovic and Loza, 'Nas niko nije pitao', p.16.

³³⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.35. See, for instance, Malenica, 'Narod'.

knowledge, it was difficult to sustain that the Serbs were under Muslim threat in Srebrenica.³⁴⁰ In the Bosnian media, there was much talk about ‘serbian agents infiltrating Bosnia’.³⁴¹ One of the fiercest critics of Serbian propaganda was the Muslim journalist, Salih Brkic, who pointed out, among other things, that Serbs were over-represented in Srebrenica’s police force (even the Police Chief was a Serb). He produced a TV programme titled ‘Black on White’ in which he took the edge off most Serbian allegations.³⁴² The Bosnian authorities accused the Serbian SDB and Slobodan Milosevic of trying to destabilise Bosnia. They drew comparisons with the situation on the eve of World War One, when the Serbian state security was active on Bosnian territory. Serbia was accused of interference in Bosnian affairs and of ‘Apis’ methods.³⁴³ Similar comparisons to World War One were drawn on the other side of the Drina. Serbian authorities spoke of an anti-Serbian campaign in Bosnia comparable to that launched by Austria at the onset of World War One.³⁴⁴

Clearly, political temperatures were running high at the local level. Moderate people, such as Boban Vasic, received anonymous threats by phone.³⁴⁵ In their efforts to rein in these growing tensions, the authorities organised public meetings at Srebrenica’s Culture House, where Serbs and Muslims exchanged bitter words.³⁴⁶ In his memoirs, Ibisevic describes one such meeting in November 1989, which was attended by a large number of Muslims and a minority of Serbs. Among those present were Serbs from villages near Skelani, as well as several high Communist officials from Sarajevo: Muhamed Besic, the republican Minister of Interior, and Edina Residovic, president of the Socialist League of the Working People of Bosnia. During the meeting, Ibisevic writes, the Muslim president of the local Association of War Veterans was accused by a Serb of having been an Ustashe during the war and of having an ‘U’ (the Ustase symbol) tattooed under his armpit. While some Muslims, boiling with rage, geared up for a fight, the official accused jumped on the stage, took off his clothes and asked people to judge for themselves. Afterwards, he had to be taken to hospital as the stress of the incident had given him a heart attack.³⁴⁷

Miodrag Jokic, a Serb hardliner, also spoke at this meeting.³⁴⁸ He claimed that the Serbs were under-represented in cadre positions, and that the municipality of Srebrenica was run like some sort of feudal estate by one Muslim family. Hamed ‘sado’ Salihovic, the Muslim president of the local commune of Potočari, warned those present that statements such as these were merely the harbinger of greater Serbian aspirations. His assessment went too far for most urban Muslims, who hissed at him. Yet Muslims from the villages endorsed his point. After the meeting, various municipal officials and the guests from Sarajevo went to Crvica, where they were threatened and humiliated by these ‘imperilled’ Serbs, as Ibisevic put it. The police had to intervene to protect certain members of the delegation from the anger of the Serb mob. After these incidents, Miloje Simic became a persona non grata in Serb villages in the municipality, and received death threats. As he openly criticised the wave of nationalist ³⁴⁰ Interview: Boban Vasic 06/07/1998. Boban Vasic was the son of Veljko Vasic, a local Partisan who became a Communist official and well-respected figure in Srebrenica after the war. He died only a few years before Communist rule collapsed. During World War Two, he lost most of his family members in the Ustashe raid on Srebrenica in June 1943. Interview: Boban Vasic 15/07/1998. During the Bosnian war, Boban Vasic’s mother, Dragica, remained in the Srebrenica enclave together with the Muslim population. She is one of the main characters in Sudetic’s book. See, for instance, Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.137-38.

³⁴¹ See, for instance, Milanovic and Loza, ‘Nas niko nije pitao’, pp.16-17; Anonymous, ‘sta su agenti?’.

³⁴² Conversation with Salih Brkic 02/02/1998, 10/11/1998.

³⁴³ The SDB of Serbia claims to have based its reports on interviews held in Serbia, i.e. Bajina Basta and other locations, where Serbs from the municipalities of Bratunac and Srebrenica had settled.

³⁴⁴ Nikolic, ‘strogo poverljiva rezija’.

³⁴⁵ Interview: Boban Vasic 06/07/1998.

³⁴⁶ See, for instance, Nestic, ‘O èemu se telalilo’.

³⁴⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.30-31.

³⁴⁸ Miodrag Jokic had been a salesman for the Feros company. Ibisevic writes that he was given early retirement because he was suspected of financial malversations. After that, “he had enough time to read the ‘objective’ Serbian press and look for Muslim fundamentalists in his community” (Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), p.32). Jokic publicly distanced himself from his own daughter who married a Muslim. Interview: Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

propaganda from Serbia, he was regarded as a traitor, a Muslim vassal.³⁴⁹ In Bratunac, a similar large public meeting was organised in a cinema. Serb nationalists, including Miroslav Deronjic, claimed that Serbs were being expelled by Muslim fundamentalists. However, others countered these claims, saying that these were primarily cases of economic migration.³⁵⁰ During 1990, the attacks against so-called Muslim fundamentalists in Srebrenica and Bratunac continued, including by well-known Kravica notable, Jovan Nikolic, who was also president of the Socialist League of the Working People of Bratunac at the time. He released new 'confidential information' that fundamentalist intellectuals were active in Srebrenica's Health Centre (Dom Zdravlje) and in the 'Djuro Pucar Stari' secondary school in Bratunac. Although no names were mentioned, in cafes and on the street, everybody knew exactly whom he meant.³⁵¹

³⁴⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica (1987-1992), pp.32-4.

³⁵⁰ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.16.

³⁵¹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.13, 19.

Chapter 5

The Nationalist Take-Over

“Six hundred years ago, we stopped the advance of Islam, defending Europe but also sacrificing in Kosovo our great and glorious state, which during the Middle Ages was one of the most advanced states in Europe. Today, we again defend Europe, both from Germany and from Islamic fundamentalism [...] One day Europe will be grateful to us because we stood up in the defence of Christian values and Christian culture.”

Bosnian Serb leader, Radovan Karadzic, in an interview with Pogledi, 12 November 1993, p.17-18.³⁵²

Election year 1990

The fall of Communism in Eastern Europe in 1989 also put an end to one-party rule in Yugoslavia. The country entered a period of political pluralisation. In January 1990, Yugoslavia's League of Communists (LCY) crumbled when the Slovenes and Croats walked out of the fourteenth extraordinary LCY congress. The rivalries between the various republican leaderships – particularly between the ‘centralists’ of Serbia and the ‘confederalists’ of Croatia and Slovenia – surfaced with a vengeance. Slovenia and Croatia favoured reforms, while the Serbian regime opposed party pluralism and the introduction of a market economy. The conflicts occurred after a long period of growing internal division within the LC. Republican party leaders were concerned primarily with protecting the economic interests of their own republics in times of economic crisis. By late 1987, they had started seeking allies outside Yugoslavia's League of Communists, but within their respective republics. In some republics, relations with the nationalist opposition improved and were often better than they were with sister branches of the League of Communists in other republics. Slobodan Milosevic was not the only one to find common ground with the nationalist intelligentsia. A very similar rapprochement occurred between Communist officials and nationalists in Croatia and Slovenia not much later. In multi-ethnic Bosnia, where such developments were potentially very dangerous and disruptive, the authorities tried to hang on to the old Yugoslav ideal of Brotherhood and Unity, frantically suppressing all forms of nationalism.³⁵³

After the LCY fell apart, however, the Bosnian leadership was forced to accept the inevitability of political liberalisation and democratisation. In March 1990, it agreed to the introduction of a multi-party system, even though it initially proscribed associations based on ethnic and religious affiliation. Many Bosnians, particularly in towns, supported the idea of prohibiting ethnic parties. According to a May 1990 opinion poll by the Zagreb weekly, Danas, a large majority of the inhabitants of Sarajevo, Banja Luka and Mostar favoured the ban and expressed support for the economic reforms of Yugoslavia's prime minister, Ante Markovic. The memories of ethnic warfare during World War Two probably played an important role in this.³⁵⁴ In Srebrenica, Muslim and Serb nationalists discussed the creation of a joint peasant party as a possible and viable option if ethno-nationalist parties were to be banned from political life.³⁵⁵ The idea was that a peasant party of that nature could put an end to Communist hegemony by uniting rural populations against those in urban areas. It was clear to them ³⁵² Simonjan, ‘Zapad ce nam biti zahvalan’, pp.17-18.

³⁵³ Goati, ‘Politički život Bosne’, pp.49-52.

³⁵⁴ Danas, 22/05/1990, pp.24-26; Goati, ‘Politički život Bosne’, pp.52-53; Bougarel, Islam et politique, p.181.

³⁵⁵ Conversation: Besim Ibisevic 17/08/1999.

that the rural masses were the key to power. After all, they formed the majority of the electorate in Srebrenica (as they did in most other Bosnian municipalities).

Despite the Communists' wish to keep such developments at bay, ethnic politics made soon headway after the Slovenian and Croatian elections in the spring of 1990. When the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina formally lifted the ban on ethno-national parties, Bosnian Muslims, Serbs, and Croats finally gained a free hand to establish such parties.³⁵⁶ Ethnic parties then began to dominate the political landscape, just as they had under the Austrians in the first decade of the twentieth century. As Bosnian political scientist, Suad Arnautovic, observes, these parties were characterised by a conspicuous lack of any political profile or programme, although they had unquestionably rightist and ethnically exclusivist tendencies. As one former Communist official in Srebrenica noted, these parties had no programme; all they were banners, slogans, and flag bearers.³⁵⁷ The Muslim Stranka Demokratske Akcije (Party of Democratic Action) was the first of these parties to emerge in Bosnia, in May 1990. Alija Izetbegovic, a retired lawyer and prominent former member of the Young Muslims, who had spent several years in prison for political activities, became its leader. At this stage, liberal and secularly minded 'Bosniac' intellectuals, such as Adil Zulfikarpasic, an émigré, and Muhamed Filipovic, also joined the SDA. Later during the election year, they left the party again because of the predominance of traditionalists and conservative clericalists in it. Zulfikarpasic's idea of a secular Bosniac party did not find broad support in the SDA's leadership. The latter favoured a religiously oriented 'Muslim' party that mobilised the rural masses through the Muslim village clerics.³⁵⁸ This traditionalist faction within the SDA centred around a group of Bosnian 'fundamentalists' and 'nationalists,' who were convicted during the 1983 trial, especially Alija Izetbegovic, Omer Behmen, Dzemailudin Latic, and Muhamed Èengic.³⁵⁹ As former political prisoners, they enjoyed a great deal of authority in the party's upper ranks, particularly in the SDA's Executive Board. Although few in number, they were able to control internal developments within the SDA at the expense of the liberals, such as Zulfikarpasic and Filipovic.

As he later told Milovan Djilas, Adil Zulfikarpasic abhorred the excessive use of nationalist symbols, religious banners, and bizarre populist slogans during SDA mass gatherings, such as those held in Novi Pazar (29 July), Foèa (25 August), and Velika Kladusa (15 September 1990). These meetings reflect the efforts of SDA traditionalists to rally support from: the rural masses; urban inhabitants of peasant backgrounds, who had profited little, if at all, from modernisation; and the Muslim populations of marginalized regions, such as the Sandzak and eastern Bosnia. Undoubtedly, it is no coincidence that the first huge mass gatherings during the 1990 election campaign were held in these two peripheral and underdeveloped regions. Only after the SDA secured support from the most traditional segments of Bosnian society did they begin targeting Muslim communities in Bosnia's major ³⁵⁶ Bougarel, Islam et politique, p.177. Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.46.

³⁵⁷ Arnautovic, Izbori, p.40; Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

³⁵⁸ For these divisions within the SDA, see Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, particularly pp.135-145. See also Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.47, 68; Borogovac and Rustempasic, The White Paper on Alija Izetbegovic.

³⁵⁹ French political scientist, Xavier Bougarel, describes how this relatively small and peripheral group of pan-Islamists succeeded in taking control of the SDA, thus influencing the way Bosnian Muslim nationalism was defined. Their activities dated back to their student days in the 1930s. They came from well-educated, but socially disoriented and politically deprived families, who had been part of the Muslim elite before the establishment of Yugoslavia. They embraced the ideals of an Islamic revival and the establishment of a Muslim state, and opposed the ideas of modernism and communism that appealed to other Muslim youth from similar backgrounds (such as Zulfikarpasic). During the 1940s, they established an organization called Mladi Muslimani (Young Muslims). After the war, the communists suppressed this organisation. Many of its members received prison sentences, and some were even sentenced to death. Almost half of the Muslim intellectuals indicted during the 1983 trial in Sarajevo had been original members of this organisation. Bougarel describes in great detail the longstanding opposition between two currents in Bosnian Islam. These are the conservative, religiously oriented traditionalists (supported by the lower clergy and the ulema) and the liberal, secularly minded modernists (consisting of intellectuals and higher religious leaders, such as Dzemailudin Èausevic, leader of the Islamic community in Bosnia between 1913 and 1930.). (Bougarel, Islam et politique, see particularly pp.170-213).

urban centres with mass meetings such as that in Sarajevo on 6 October 1990. There, the SDA's popularity and success was much more limited.³⁶⁰

Zulfikarpasic left the SDA in October, just weeks before the elections because of its strong traditionalist and populist tendencies. He publicly denounced the conservative and traditionalist attitudes of leading figures in the SDA's Executive Board. Together with other SDA dissidents, he formed the Muslimanska Bosnjačka Organizacija, the Muslim Bosniac Organisation (MBO), which attracted only a small minority of urban intellectuals. The semi-literate Muslim masses all rallied behind Izetbegovic's SDA, which formed a coalition with Serb and Croat nationalists in a bid to put an end to Communist rule. Bougarel notes that the SDA propagated a religiously inspired brand of nationalism very similar to that of other (Serb and Croat) nationalist parties. While Islam served as the most important marker of Bosnian Muslim identity, and pan-Islamists ranked among the SDA's leaders, the party's objective at this stage was certainly not to impose an Islamic religious order. As Bougarel notes, the sweeping support for the SDA during the November 1990 elections cannot and should not be interpreted as pan-Islamist support contrary to the Serb nationalist presentation of it. Votes for the party stemmed primarily from feelings of nationalism and not Islamic zeal, focusing above all on supporting Bosnian Muslim identity.³⁶¹

After the SDA's establishment in May 1990, the Bosnian Serbs and Croats soon followed suit, creating new branches of already existing nationalist parties in Croatia. In July 1990, The Bosnian branch of the Srpska Demokratska Stranka, or Serb Democratic Party (SDS), held its inaugural meeting in Sarajevo. It met with full support from Milosevic and the Belgrade leadership. Its goal was to make the Serb regions of Croatia and Bosnia either part of a reduced Yugoslavia or to include them into a Greater Serbia. These two main options were formulated during the pan-Serbian congress that took place in Banja Luka in October of that year. The SDS was a religiously inspired party with strong ties to the Serbian Orthodox church. The main party leaders were Radovan Karadzic, a psychiatrist and poet, and Momèilo Krajisnik, a manager of the 'Energoinvest' mining company. Sudetic points out that Karadzic and Krajisnik were once partners in crime in the mid 1980s when they took out a loan from an agricultural development fund and used the money to build themselves houses in Pale. They were arrested for fraud and spent almost a year in prison before they were bailed out by Nikola Koljevic, a professor of English literature at Sarajevo university. These three men became the key figures in the SDS.³⁶² Finally, the Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica (HDZ), the Croatian Democratic Union, was the third main nationalist party created in Bosnia. It was established in September 1990 as an off-split of Tudjman's HDZ, but played no significant role in eastern Bosnia. Aside from the three main ethno-nationalist parties, a number of non-ethnic parties participated in the Bosnian elections. These were: the former Communists and Social Democrats, who formed one bloc (SK-SDP), and the Reformists (SRSJ), who were led by Yugoslavian prime minister, Ante Markovic. Both favoured civil society and the introduction of a market economy.

Barring the HDZ, most nationalist, as well as non-ethnic, parties were represented in the municipality of Srebrenica. In mid June 1990, a few weeks after the SDA's inaugural meeting, a group of Muslims gathered in Potoèari to establish a local branch of the SDA.³⁶³ Among those present were Malik Meholic, his brother Hakija Meholic, and Ibran Mustafic. Malik Meholic was chosen as the ³⁶⁰ Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.187 and 190.

³⁶¹ Bougarel, Islam et politique, pp.207-208.

³⁶² Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.83. Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.47. As one interlocutor has pointed out, before the SDS became a broad Bosnian Serb movement there were intensive contacts between Bosnian Serb politicians and the Democratic Party in Serbia, led by Dragoljub Micunovic and Zoran Djindjic. They wanted to establish a Bosnian Serb party that was democratic and moderate in approach. They were, however, overruled by Milosevic, who steered the SDS into a tough nationalist course. Interview: Boban Tomic 11/11/1999.

³⁶³ In Bratunac too, the first local SDA meeting took place in June 1990. Among the founders was Mustafa Mujkanovic, the imam of Bratunac who was brutally murdered by Serb paramilitaries at the beginning of the war. Dzemail Becirovic was the chairman of the SDA steering committee. SDA branches were soon established in most Muslim villages throughout the municipality (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.59-60).

president of a steering committee to establish a local branch of the SDA. Several weeks later, a number of other people entered the local steering committee. Among them was Besim Ibisevic, who later became Mayor of Srebrenica.³⁶⁴ At this stage, local SDA meetings were overseen by Ibrahim Džananović, a native of the town who worked at the Muslim theological faculty in Sarajevo and represented the SDA centrala.³⁶⁵

Initially, the SDA in Srebrenica was divided into two factions, replicating the higher-level divisions in the party. Locally, these differences crystallised into what were called the ‘urban’ and ‘village’ factions. The former was more liberal and moderate, while the latter was nationalist and anti-communist.³⁶⁶ This internal division first surfaced during the pre-election period, when Malik Mehlić (the main representative of the urban faction) put a large number of townspeople on the local SDA election list. The main representatives of the village faction, Besim Ibisevic and Ibran Mustafić, strongly objected, pointing out that 85% of all potential SDA voters in the municipality were Muslim peasants living in villages. As a compromise, Ibisevic was placed second on the list, while Ibran Mustafić became the SDA’s candidate for the Bosnian Parliament’s Council of Municipalities. Sadik Begić (a doctor) was appointed the SDA’s candidate for the Bosnian Parliament’s Council of Citizens.³⁶⁷

Similar – though less pronounced – divisions seem to have existed between members of the local SDS branch. Goran Žekić, a Srebrenican district court judge, who was a moderate and well respected by the town’s Serbs and Muslims alike, was made head of the party. At the same time, two extremists, Miodrag Jokić, a retired salesman from Srebrenica, and Milenko Ćanić, a former teacher from Skelani, were placed next on the electoral list.³⁶⁸ As with the SDA, support for the SDS generally came from village populations. Most urban Serbs rallied behind the former Communists. The main party in urban areas was the SDP, whose president, Miloje Simić, was a former Communist official. Having taken a strong position against Milošević in 1989, he was quite popular among Muslims, though many Serbs regarded him as a traitor. The SDP’s main slogan was ‘We will live together’ (Zivcemo zajedno). It was clearly an urban list, consisting of ‘pale intellectuals’ and ‘eternal directors’ as Ibisevic writes in his memoirs. Their programme was tailored to Srebrenica’s urban community, and not to the villages, where the SDP had a hard time conveying its message.³⁶⁹

The local branch of the Reformist Party in Srebrenica was led by Saban Mehmedović, a Muslim married to a Serb woman from Serbia. As Ibisevic writes, his wife wished to join the SDA, but was obstructed by the local steering committee, which felt they could never defend the move to their Muslim constituency. The Reformists worked more or less in conjunction with the SDA, and sought support among urban voters at the expense of the former communists. Like the SDP, the Reformists ³⁶⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.41-42. Throughout this chapter and the next, I drew extensively on Ibisevic’s book Srebrenica, which is an invaluable source of information on the period immediately preceding the war. It was written from the perspective of a local Muslim politician and contains a wealth of inside information unparalleled in any other work. The book should be read as Ibisevic’s political testimony. For that same reason, however, it is necessarily biased (despite the author’s insistence that it is the work of a trained historian). What makes the book interesting is that Ibisevic, an SDA hardliner, tries to justify himself in the light of the accusations of ‘cowardice’ launched against him by other Muslims, who lived through the siege of the Srebrenica enclave. In their view, Ibisevic’s biggest mistake was to ‘run away’ at the very time the town and its Muslim population needed him most, while others took up arms. Although steeped at times in nationalist rhetoric, the book discloses, often down to the minutest detail, the rivalries, the factionalism and the alliances that existed between and among local politicians, particularly within the Muslim camp. It also offers insight into the divisions between rural and urban populations. Aside from its very critical view of people, such as Oric and Muslim politicians, who became crucial figures during the war, the book is also astonishingly frank at times in describing political intrigues and the (illegal) methods that nationalist politicians, such as Ibisevic himself, used to achieve their goals.

³⁶⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.45.

³⁶⁶ Interview: Sefkija Hadžiarapović 22/05/1998. Similar divisions within the SDA existed, for instance, in Zvornik (Oric, Srebrenica, p.79).

³⁶⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.76

³⁶⁸ Conversation: Zdravko Novčić, 09/06/1998; Boban Vasić 06/07/1998; Boban Tomić 11/11/1999, Marinko Sekulić 10/11/1998.

³⁶⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.72-3. Interview: Sefkija Hadžiarapović 22/05/1998.

did not campaign in the villages. Finally, there was the Democratic Socialist Alliance (DSS), a small, non-ethnic party led by Bosko Milovanovic, the Serb director of the local Culture House. The party's vice-president was Adib Djozic, a Muslim and former communist who had been once been president of the local branch of Srebrenica's Socialist League of the Working People (SSRN). Djozic was placed first on the list in order to draw as many Muslim voters as possible to the party. Ibisevic writes that activists of these leftist and non-ethnic parties were unable to campaign, or even to enter, villages. Muslim villages rallied behind the SDA en masse, while all Serb villages sided with the SDS. The town of Srebrenica supported the non-ethnic parties SDP, SRSJ and DSS.³⁷⁰

August 1990 witnessed the first series of election meetings. On 5 August 1990, a meeting took place in the Serb stronghold of Milici. It was attended by Serbs from Kravica, who travelled there in a convoy of cars and buses, decorated with Serb flags and other national symbols. "This will open their eyes so they will not see green colours only" was the caption local Serb nationalists placed under this still fairly unusual and provocative scene.³⁷¹ The SDA also started to prepare for election campaign meetings. Ibisevic's office at the museum in Srebrenica's Culture House became the SDA's local nerve centre, where he met regularly with two local SDA party leaders, Malik Meholic and Ibran Mustafic. Both men saw Ibisevic as the party ideologist, at least according to Ibisevic himself, who claims to have devised local party strategy for the elections and the immediate post-election period. He felt it was futile to fight the SDS at this early stage: the top priority was to eliminate the communists, if necessary in collaboration with the SDS. Ibisevic claims to have edited Meholic's first public speech for the SDA's inaugural meeting in Srebrenica, a speech that reflects this strategy.³⁷² This meeting was planned for 19 August 1990, at 2:00 PM in front of the Culture House in the town's centre. It was soon discovered, however, that the local SDS had planned its own inaugural meeting on the very same day at 10:00 AM in the yard of the Serbian Orthodox church only two hundred meters away. Although Ibisevic notes that this was sheer coincidence, neither party was willing to change the date of its inaugural meeting for fear that the move might be interpreted as a sign of weakness. The local SDA leader, Malik Meholic, tried to quieten the situation by talking to the local SDS leader, Goran Zekic. Both claimed that they, as two old school friends and respectable gentlemen, would be able to solve any problem that occurred in Srebrenica. In this case, their solution was to invite one another as honorary guests at their meetings.³⁷³

Although Zekic reassured his friend that he did not expect many people at the SDS meeting ("nothing to be afraid of"), the number of Serbs that turned up was higher than anticipated. They also arrived from the neighbouring towns of Bratunac, Kravica, Vlasenica, and Milici. The Serbs from Milici, in particular, made a nationalist road show of the event. As they passed through Muslim villages, they brandished knives, filling the local people with fear. Wearing Chetnik symbols, they entered Srebrenica in a boisterous and provocative manner, on open vans, holding up raised three fingers. In Potoèari, Muslims threw stones at the vans and buses on their way to Srebrenica from Kravica. As one eyewitness put it, "the air smelled of worse to come". During the meeting, Goran Zekic was chosen as the local SDS president, and Miodrag Jokic as vice-president. Malik Meholic, Zekic's honorary guest, was booed. He was unable to address the crowd. The most extreme and populist speech came from Miodrag Jokic, who claimed that Srebrenica was inalienable Serb territory and that the Serbs had historical rights to the town. Unrest spread through the Muslim community as a result of the SDS meeting and the arrival of the 'Chetniks', and Muslim villagers flocked to Srebrenica en masse to attend the SDA meeting there.

Roughly ten thousand Muslims soon gathered in front of the Culture House. Some even carried Tito's image and the Yugoslav flag, still not completely aware of the new era that had begun. Others, however, carried green Muslim banners, shouting, "we want arms!" Many inhabitants of Srebrenica stayed in their houses or left town during the day for fear of the trouble the Serb and Muslim village ³⁷⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.73-74.

³⁷¹ Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić, p.38.

³⁷² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.42-44.

³⁷³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.46.

mobs might cause in town. At the meeting, Ibran Mustafic and Malik Meholjic held speeches. Muhamed Filipovic and Muhamed Èengic, two SDA leaders who had come from Sarajevo, also addressed the crowd. Goran Zekic was hissed at, as was Salih ‘Tale’ Sehomerovic, the Communist mayor of Srebrenica. An eleven-member Executive Board was appointed during the meeting. Among them were Besim Ibisevic, Ibran Mustafic, and Malik Meholjic.³⁷⁴ Meholjic represented the SDA’s urban faction and Ibisevic and Mustafic, its village faction. The latter two worked together almost daily. They knew each other from their student days in Sarajevo in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Both had been supporters of the FK Sarajevo football club. Ibisevic writes that they liked to yell anti-Yugoslav and anti-communist slogans when their club played against a team from Serbia, while he composed ‘pro-Bosnian’ and ‘pro-democratic’ songs for the supporters of his team. Ibisevic and Mustafic had much in common. Both were intellectuals from rural backgrounds. Both were of the same age and had similar ideological leanings. And both came from villages that the Serbs had considered ‘Ustashe’ strongholds during World War Two.³⁷⁵

The election campaign, the viciousness of which was echoed in the Bosnian and Serbian press, created a volatile situation that could easily end in ethnic violence. Anticipating such violence, the Yugoslav People’s Army (JNA) launched preparations to prevent Yugoslavia’s disintegration and to rally to the rescue of the Serb population in Croatia and Bosnia if the two republics broke away. One morning in June 1990, JNA units emptied the arms and ammunition storerooms of the Territorial Defence (TO) of Srebrenica, whose chief commander was local Serb, Miodrag Stanisavljevic. Stanisavljevic presented the move as a routine army procedure, even though it was obvious to everybody that this was not the case. The Army removed 1,300 long barrels, 7 light anti-aircraft weapons, and the complete rolling stock of Srebrenica’s TO.³⁷⁶ The JNA also emptied the stores of the Territorial Defence in Bratunac. There too, the local Serb commander aided in carrying out the operation smoothly.³⁷⁷ These actions were part of a wider campaign. Led by General Kadijevic, the Federal Minister of Defence and Commander-in-Chief of the Yugoslav People’s Army, this campaign focused on seizing all arms and ammunition from TO storehouses in predominantly non-Serb areas.³⁷⁸ At the same time, the army provided the Serb population in such areas with arms. According to Masic, arms taken from the TO in Bratunac went via SDS channels to the Serbs in Kravica.³⁷⁹

A number of incidents showed that violence was becoming imminent. On the afternoon of very same day that the local SDS and SDA organised their inaugural meetings in Srebrenica, makeshift barricades were erected, first in Kravica, and then in various Muslim villages. In Kravica, Serb militants ³⁷⁴ In Bratunac, the SDA held a large election meeting on 1 September. Mirsad Kavazbasic was elected as the first president of the SDA in Bratunac (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.60). For the situation affecting the election meetings, see: Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.46-49. Interviews and conversations with Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998, Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998, Momèilo Cvjetinovic 10/06/1998; Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

³⁷⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.43-44.

³⁷⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.39-40.

³⁷⁷ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.20-21.

³⁷⁸ The concept of Territorial Defence (Teritorijalna Odbrana) was central to Yugoslav military doctrine. According to this concept, the country would defend itself against foreign invasion or occupation by means of mobilising the entire population. This doctrine was introduced after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. It relied on partisan tactics and local territorial forces, which could, if necessary, operate independently under the command of local authorities. Weapon and ammunition stores were dispersed throughout the country, in municipal buildings and factories. Bosnia-Herzegovina was the centre of gravity in the Territorial Defence, as its mountainous, inaccessible terrain made it the most difficult to overrun. During World War Two, Tito’s Partisan resistance was most successful there. The republic became the favoured location for storing arms and supplies and building arms and ammunition factories. The Territorial Defence forces reflected the ethnic make-up of their respective municipalities. For that reason, they could pose a threat to the JNA if their local municipalities came under non-Communist (and nationalist) control after the elections (Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III, pp.11-16). Even as early as 1989, General Kadijevic declared Tito’s concept of Total National Defence to be ‘a fraud’ (Arnautovic, Izbori, p.42). See also, Vasic, ‘The Yugoslav Army’, p.122.

³⁷⁹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.21; see also Arnautovic, Izbori, p.42; Bassiouni Final report, Annex summaries and Conclusions, p.17 and Annex IV.

stopped Muslim cars, and in Potoèari, Muslims threw stones at Serb cars returning home from the meeting in Srebrenica. In other Muslim villages along the road from Bratunac to Konjevic Polje, Muslims set up roadblocks to check Serb cars and buses returning to such places as Milici.³⁸⁰ As in a chain reaction, barricades set up by one side provoked the immediate erection of new barricades by the other side. The next day, authorities in the eastern Bosnian municipalities (Srebrenica, Bratunac, Vlasenica, Zvornik) held meetings to discuss the new situation, which was growing increasingly tense. Officials with Serb sympathies proposed that the JNA intervene.³⁸¹

One week later, on 25 August 1990, the SDA organised a mass meeting in Foèa. Its aim was to commemorate the massacres that Chetnik forces had committed there against the Muslim population during World War Two, and to pay tribute to the dead. Over 100,000 people attended, including Jakub Selimoski, the Reis-ul-ulema (the Head of the Islamic Community of Yugoslavia) with a following of a hundred Muslim clerics. All major SDA leaders, such as Alija Izetbegovic, Adil Zulfikarpasic, and Muhamed Filipovic, were present. Representatives of the SDS and HDZ were also invited. The Serbs were invited to a ceremony, where flowers were to be thrown by both sides into the Drina as a sign of reconciliation. The SDS, however, refused to participate. The tone of the meeting was set by extremist elements from within the SDA as well as from the HDZ. These elements stirred up passions and referred to the 'serb genocide' of the Muslim population in Foèa during World War Two.³⁸² Aside from a large contingent of Muslims from the Sandzak, there were three buses with SDA sympathisers from the municipality of Srebrenica. On the road to Foèa, buses waving green flags and other nationalist symbols were stoned in Serb villages and towns, such as Kravica, Milici, and Han Pijesak.³⁸³

In early September 1990, not long after these events, Miroslav Deronjic (the SDS president of Bratunac) and Momèilo Cvjetinovic (an SDS activist from Srebrenica) visited Ibisevic. Their purpose was to invite him to a meeting in Bratunac, in order to discuss the situation in the two municipalities. They hoped especially to soothe tensions between Serbs from Kravica and Muslims from Potoèari. Relations between these two communities had deteriorated after the SDA and SDS election meetings in Srebrenica. Muslims were afraid to travel through Kravica and Serbs through Potoèari because of roadblocks erected in both villages. This situation had lasted for days and could explode into a major conflict at any time. Cvjetinovic, a journalist for the local Srebrenica radio station, promised to publicize this attempt at reconciliation so that it would have the desired defusing effect. They also made it clear that both the SDA and SDS could benefit politically, if the attempt succeeded. Ibisevic accepted their invitation. Joined by another SDA activist, he left for Bratunac, where they met SDS delegations from Bratunac and Srebrenica in Hotel Fontana. Although the Serbs were not encouraged by the small Muslim delegation that came to participate in the meeting, both sides agreed to provide freedom of movement in Kravica and Potoèari. On his return to Srebrenica, Ibisevic was criticised by Ibran Mustafic for entering into talks with the Serbs.³⁸⁴

The Bosnian electoral campaign officially started on 15 September 1990. The SDA began its campaign in Velika Kladusa with a large mass gathering, attended by Muslims from all over Yugoslavia. According to Ibisevic some 400,000 people attended, "the largest meeting of Bosniacs ever in their 1000 year history".³⁸⁵ Thousands of boisterous, fanatic Muslims were there from the Sandzak, waving green flags and shouting "Sandzak is ours!" Other chants from the crowd included: "We want arms," "We'll kill Vuk [Draskovic]," and "Long live Saddam Hussein". People held up images of the Iraqi dictator, wore Arab dresses, and carried hundreds of green flags with Islamic inscriptions. Izetbegovic spoke out a warning against the possibility of civil war, declaring that the Muslim nation would defend ³⁸⁰ Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic, p.32.

³⁸¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.49.

³⁸² Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.138; Bougarel, Islam et politique, p.180. See also the reports in Preporod, 1 September 1990.

³⁸³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.50-51.

³⁸⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.51-53.

³⁸⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.54.

Bosnia at any cost necessary, including with arms.³⁸⁶ In Srebrenica, Besim Ibisevic and Ibran Mustafic immediately launched a local campaign with a meeting in Pusulici (a Muslim village between Srebrenica and Zeleni Jadar). Together, they went to address the villagers, who seemed to be impressed by the fact that two politicians were taking the trouble to talk to them at all. Communists had never done this. Photos of Tito were removed from public places, and party membership books and other communist symbols were thrown into a brook. Feeling very satisfied with their performance, Ibisevic and Mustafic joked on their walk back to Srebrenica, “Wherever Besim and Ibran go, Communism will die!”³⁸⁷

Local SDA campaign leaders made plans to visit Muslim villages, first in order to recruit villagers to the party, then to establish local party branches, and finally, to organise a few large meetings. They divided the territory of the municipality among SDA members, who were usually appointed to the villages where they were born. Ibisevic covered the border region with Serbia near Skelani, i.e. the Muslim villages in the southern part of the municipality along the Drina. SDA activists usually campaigned during the weekends, trying to find local sympathisers willing to spread the campaign. One of them was Ahmo Tihic from Lijesce (a Muslim village near the Drina), who became a military commander during the war. A charismatic figure, he was extremely successful in recruiting people to the SDA. For that reason, the Serbs also saw him as a dangerous extremist.³⁸⁸ In Skelani, activists of the first hour were Fahrudin ‘Bijeli’ Salihovic and Nesib Mandzic, who became well-known Muslim officials during the war. (The former climbed the ranks to Head of Administration in Srebrenica, while the latter went on to become a Muslim representative in the negotiations with Mladic in July 1995). Ibran Mustafic, Hamed Efendic and Hamed Salihovic were active in the greater Potocari area, while the local SDA president Malik Meholic covered the town of Srebrenica and the remote village of Luka.³⁸⁹ Religious gatherings, such as the opening of mosques, were ideal occasions for spreading propaganda. One such occasion was the inauguration of a mosque in a suburb of Srebrenica, on 14 October 1990, which drew thousands.³⁹⁰

In late September 1990, SDA leaders from eastern Bosnia held a meeting in Nova Kasaba. Among the issues addressed there was the region’s complicated security situation. According to Ibisevic, the SDA leaders agreed to develop plans to arm the Muslim population as they recognized the danger of a coup attempt by the JNA or a Serbian attack on Bosnia. They also agreed to organise night vigils in Muslim settlements and to plan sabotage operations, for instance at important bridges over the Drina, in case of aggression from Serbia. Ibisevic, who was present at the meeting, proposed a coordinated defence plan for eastern Bosnia (under the code name Štit, ‘shield’). Coordination of the plan was to be assigned to a member of the SDA’s crisis staff. However, none of these plans ever materialised. As Ibisevic observes, this was due to petty rivalries and local chauvinism, which kept everyone from looking beyond the boundaries of their own municipalities. Contact between SDA leaders of various eastern Bosnian municipalities became less and less frequent. Nonetheless, the meeting highlighted what was perhaps the most important issue at stake in the elections, both for the SDA and the SDS: control over the local economy. The SDA representative from Zvornik complained that all the income generated by the local aluminium plant, ‘Glinice,’ went to Serbia. He promised that the first thing he would do after winning the elections was to bring the company under his control, so he could start financing the arms needed to fight the Serbs.³⁹¹

³⁸⁶ Arnautovic, Izbori, p.9.

³⁸⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.56.

³⁸⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.59-60.

³⁸⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.63.

³⁹⁰ The mosque had been financed by Azem Begic, a wealthy local businessman, SDA sympathizer, and fanatic horse lover. Begic enjoyed more than local fame for having given a pedigree horse to Libyan leader, Colonel Gadafi, when he visited Yugoslavia (Preporod, 1 November 1990, p.4).

³⁹¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.64-66.

The fact that economics played no insignificant role also emerged clearly in the case of Skelani, a village that occupied a special position along the border with Serbia. It had formed a separate municipality during the 1950s and was now part of Srebrenica. Its inhabitants, Serbs and Muslims alike, were disgruntled about Skelani's inclusion into Srebrenica as they felt that the Srebrenican municipal authorities discriminated against them.³⁹² Muslims lived mainly in the hills, whereas the population in the low-lying areas along the Drina River was mixed. Since job opportunities were limited in Skelani itself, many people worked in Bajina Basta. Most of the Muslims there looked to Serbia for their economic needs and education, which made it difficult for the SDA to recruit new people and gain support among them. Muslims in Skelani shared the criticisms local Serbs had of Srebrenica's municipal authorities. Moreover, they were not particularly willing to embark on anti-Serbian ventures, as they were completely dependent on Serbia. Ibisevic tried to explain to them that Srebrenica was unable to do much for them, and that Serbia was entirely to blame for this problem. Serbia exploited this region. The hydroelectric plant near Perucac was in Serbian hands, which is why all the revenues went to Serbia and not to Bosnia.³⁹³ Skelani was a peculiar place, one that had figured prominently in police and intelligence reports during the communist era. There were no churches or mosques there. It was an 'atheist' oasis, where it was hard for the SDA to gain any ground. Ibisevic saw Skelani as a hotbed of Serbian nationalism and a source of Bosniac disunity.³⁹⁴ At the same time, it was strategically and militarily vital due to its position near the border and the bridge over the Drina.

The election campaign continued into the autumn. The Social-Democratic SDP organised a meeting in the Culture House, which was attended by former leading communist politicians, Mirko Pejanovic and Nijaz Durakovic.³⁹⁵ The SDA organised several large meetings in villages. The first took place near Suceška on Sunday, 23 September during the traditional local autumn fair. Some 1,500 to 2,000 people were present. Among them was Ibisevic, who waved a document he had found in the Tuzla archives about the Serb war crimes committed in Suceška at the beginning of World War One. He announced that, if the SDA were to win the November elections, the local school would be renamed the 'Osman Gabeljic' school after the youngest victim of the 1914 massacres. A second meeting was held on 21 October 1990, in the village of Peci next to Lake Perucac. The speeches by local SDA leaders were followed by a religious ceremony led by Muslim clerics: a commemoration of the Muslim victims of World War Two for whom the Drina had been the last resting place.³⁹⁶ The imam of Srebrenica gave a speech, as did the popular village imam, Abdurahman 'Dulan' Abdurahmanovic. Almost all imams from the Srebrenica municipality attended the ceremony.

According to Ibisevic's account, Ibran Mustafic began to demonstrate his demagoguery and megalomania for the first time at this meeting. Relations between the two leaders were deteriorating by this stage. Mustafic was campaigning ferociously against the communists as well as against Serbia, shouting that he would destroy the Perucac dam if Serbia refused to share its revenues with the municipalities on the Bosnian side of the river. Mustafic's threats sparked off rumours among the Serbs in Bajina Basta that Muslims were planning to destroy the dam. Srebrenica's communist authorities also felt that the SDA had declared war on them. The third large SDA village meeting was held in Osmace, on Sunday, 4 November 1990. It was attended by numerous Muslims from Vlasenica, Tuzla, Bijeljina, and the Sandzak, including Sulejman Ugljanin, SDA leader of the Sandzak. As Ibisevic observes, the meeting was of huge symbolic importance. During World War Two, the village of Osmace had been a centre of Muslim 'resistance' against the Chetniks as well as the Partisans. Moreover, the resistance had fought until the bitter end: the story goes that Osmace continued to fight even after Berlin had already ³⁹² Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

³⁹³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.60.

³⁹⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.79.

³⁹⁵ Interview: Veselin Stevanovic 23/06/1998.

³⁹⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.67-68.

surrendered.³⁹⁷ At the meeting, people sang the old and previously prohibited song, 'Berlin has fallen, Berlin has fallen, but Osmace hasn't [fallen] yet!'

As the elections drew near, the SDA distributed copies of filled-out voting forms to Muslim peasants to show them how to vote. The SDA feared that many people would not know how to go about voting, and they were right. During the elections, people took the very copies they had received from the SDA with them to place them in the ballot box.³⁹⁸ In the countryside, where the majority of the electorate was concentrated, people submitted to nationalist voting patterns, whereas the non-ethnic parties won in towns. Although it is often said that the elections were a demonstration of almost complete ethnic loyalty, the non-nationalist parties still won roughly one quarter of all votes. This was not reflected, however, in the number of seats because both the Presidency and the Chamber of Municipalities (one of the two chambers of the National Assembly) were elected on the basis of majoritarian rules. Only the Chamber of Citizens was elected according to proportionality, and there, the non-ethnic parties gained 21.5% of the seats.³⁹⁹ The SDA won most seats (86) in both chambers of the Bosnian parliament, followed by the SDS (72) and HDZ (44). In terms of the number of seats, the (former) Communists were completely marginalized. Izetbegovic became Bosnia's president, and he formed a coalition government of all three main nationalist parties.⁴⁰⁰ At the Yugoslav level, he did his best, together with President Kiro Gligorov of Macedonia, to save the entire country, proposing a loose and 'assymetrical' confederation, leaving Croatia and Slovenia virtually independent. These plans were rejected by the Serbian, Croatian and Slovene leaderships. Izetbegovic tried to plead with world leaders not to recognise Croatia and Slovenia until an overall settlement of the Yugoslav conflict was negotiated. In the meantime, Milosevic's propaganda machine continued to threaten violence. The JNA said it would go to war to preserve Yugoslavia's 'unity' and defend the Serbs against 'resurgent fascism' in Croatia.⁴⁰¹

The nationalist parties also won in the municipality of Srebrenica, except in the town itself. The SDA won almost 100% of Muslim votes in the villages. Skelani was the only exception. But even there, the SDA won twice as many votes as the SDS. SDA leaders were euphoric, as they were now in a position to take power according to the election results. The formal transfer of power took place at the inaugural meeting of the new Municipal Council of Srebrenica, which was held on 21 December 1990. The new Council counted seventy seats, almost two thirds of which (45) were occupied by the SDA. The rest of the seats were divided among the SDS (15), the SDP (6), the SRSJ (2), and the DSS (2). In terms of ethnic backgrounds, fifty-one of the municipal councillors were Muslims, and only nineteen were Serbs. Muslims and Serbs were both represented in the three non-ethnic parties (SDP, SRSJ, and DSS). Malik Meholic (SDA) was elected president of the Municipal Council and Miodrag Jokic (SDS) vice-president.⁴⁰² In Bratunac, the ratios between the SDA and SDS were more balanced. Of the sixty seats in Bratunac's Municipal Council, thirty-one went to the SDA, twenty-four to the SDS, and five to the other parties. After the elections, some SDA members left the party to form the MBO. However, this party soon fell apart, and most of its members returned to the SDA.⁴⁰³ The local branch of the Democratic Alliance - Alliance of the Socialist Youth (DS-SSO) also fell apart, and its members joined the SDA as well. The only non-ethnic party of any significance to remain active in Bratunac was the SDP.

³⁹⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.69-71. Conversation: Ilija Miladinovic 10/06/1998.

³⁹⁸ Interview: Boban Vasic.

³⁹⁹ For a detailed account of the November 1990 elections see: Arnautovic, Izbori. See also Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.49-56.

⁴⁰⁰ All important positions were divided among the SDA, SDS, and HDZ. While Izetbegovic became president of the Presidency, Momèilo Krajisnik (SDS) became president of the National Assembly, and Jure Pelivan (HDZ) prime minister. The new Bosnian government consisted of twenty-two ministers, ten of whom came from the ranks of the SDA, seven from the SDS and five from the HDZ. See: Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.49-56.

⁴⁰¹ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.84-87.

⁴⁰² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.81; see also, Masic, Srebrenica, p.24.

⁴⁰³ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.23.

Nationalist parties in power

On the eve of the elections, the SDA, SDS and HDZ signed a coalition agreement to ensure that the (former) communists, most of whom were now Social Democrats, would not remain in power. And indeed, the nationalist parties won the elections hands down, after which they entered into a period of mutual 'partnership'. They removed the communist officials from their positions and tried subsequently to divide the power amongst themselves. This took place at the republic, as well as at the local levels.⁴⁰⁴ Their attempts to divide power along ethno-national lines could actually be seen as a continuation of the ethnic quota system that existed under communism. In their efforts to share power, the nationalist parties referred to, and in fact twisted, the well-known Bosnian concept of komsiluk, which stands for good neighbourly relations. They presented the coalition as a guarantee for further coexistence: the three nations would continue to live together as good neighbours. The concept of komsiluk was now used not only to refer to the grass-roots level, i.e. to the everyday life of ordinary citizens living in the same buildings, streets or city districts, but also to that of separate ethnic and national entities within the state.⁴⁰⁵

As could be expected, ethnic coexistence fell under immediate threat when the three nationalist parties began to carve up Bosnia. At the municipal level, the party with the majority vote started to monopolise all important local positions. This sparked off a process of ethnic homogenisation of the political cadres on the municipal levels, which was the first step towards ethnic segmentation in Bosnian society. The battle for strategic positions and other economic and political resources started immediately after the elections. Its development unfolded almost simultaneously with that of the deteriorating economy. In early 1991, production fell drastically, inflation soared once again to astronomical heights and unemployment spread.⁴⁰⁶ Aside from causing tensions between the nationalist parties, the competition for resources and positions also produced a great deal of factionalism within these parties, often turning moderates against hardliners, or urban populations against village communities.

Initially, the three parties agreed that they would divide power proportionally, at the republic, as well as at the local level. In Srebrenica, this meant that power was to be shared between the SDA and the SDS on a 75-25% basis. The non-nationalist parties were excluded. Despite these arrangements, however, problems soon arose between the SDA and the SDS.⁴⁰⁷ According to Ibisevic, the SDS demanded a larger number of posts in Srebrenica. Local SDS leader, Goran Zekic, claimed that he was not bound to the proportionality agreement as it conflicted with the existing municipal statute in which the Serbs were entitled to three of the eight most important cadre positions in the municipality. In an effort to resolve these problems, SDA leader, Malik Meholic, began negotiating with Zekic without consulting others in his party. The move soon created a great sense of dissatisfaction. Rumours spread that Meholic would even accept a fifty-fifty percent deal with the Serbs. During a local SDA meeting in late December, Meholic (the leader of the town faction) was openly attacked by Ibran Mustafic (one of the leaders of the village faction) for his tendency to monopolise the negotiations with his old school friend, Zekic. Meholic was subsequently forced to agree to negotiations with the Serbs through delegations. This set off a fierce internal struggle, in which Meholic began lobbying to have Ibran Mustafic and Hamed Efendic expelled from the party, efforts that met with the support of the majority of the SDA's Executive Board.⁴⁰⁸

Mustafic and Efendic were ultimately excluded from the SDA. As both were from the nationalist stronghold of Potoèari, they began to mobilise support among the rural population. While most village communities opposed Meholic and supported the Mustafic faction, urban Muslims ⁴⁰⁴ Goati, 'Politièki zivot Bosne', p.57. Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.52-53, 62-63.

⁴⁰⁵ See Bougarel, Bosnie, pp.81-100.

⁴⁰⁶ Goati, 'Politièki zivot Bosne', pp.57-58. Zulfikarpasic, The Bosniak, p.157.

⁴⁰⁷ Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.52-56.

⁴⁰⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.82-83.

favoured the Meholic faction. Serbs also supported Meholic because of his readiness to compromise. The struggle remained undecided until Ibisevic returned from a trip abroad in January 1991. Ibisevic lent his support to Mustafic even though the Meholic faction tried to win him over to its side by offering him the director's post at the Culture House if they remained in power. A hardliner, Ibisevic dryly comments that he considered Malik Meholic an unacceptable ally for the simple reason that he was an 'acceptable figure' to the Serbs. These divisions led to rapid polarisation between 'village hardliners' and 'urban moderates'. The hardliners gathered in Ibisevic's office or Hamed Efendic's home in Potocari, while the moderates established themselves in the new SDA office. Urban Serbs sided with the latter group. They considered the villages to be hotbeds of extremism and felt certain that their position would come under much further threat if SDA hardliners were to rise to power in Srebrenica.⁴⁰⁹

The SDA party headquarters in Sarajevo tried hard to reconcile the two factions. Omer Behmen, Osman Brka, and later also, Mehmed Kavazbasic (SDA leader in Vlasenica), came to Srebrenica to mediate. Local SDA leaders shuttled between Srebrenica and Sarajevo for talks. When the first SDA delegation from Sarajevo visited Srebrenica, the situation escalated immediately. Peasants came to the town to demonstrate in front of the SDA office. Village hardliners forced themselves into the office and almost started a fight with Meholic. Furious, Behmen accused Ibran Mustafic of resorting to street methods similar to those used by Milosevic in Serbia. At this juncture, the hardliners shifted their strategy. They started to organise the countryside by establishing local village committees, who would send representatives to the SDA municipal assembly to be held in Srebrenica. The moderates, in turn, used Srebrenica's radio station to attack SDA hardliners, and Serb journalists provided them with radio airtime. This period was marked by mutual accusations and mud slinging through Srebrenica's local media. Behmen put an end to the local media war, intervening on behalf of the SDA party headquarters.⁴¹⁰

Yet it was clear that the hardliners were in a much better position to win this internal battle. In late January 1991, the SDA organised an extraordinary municipal assembly. It was attended by over a hundred delegates, most of whom represented the SDA village committees. To secure their victory even more, the hardliners mobilised village mobs, who entered Srebrenica to attend the meeting. A new 45-member local SDA Council was chosen, along with a 22-member Executive Board. The newly established Executive Board pushed hard-line policy forward by appointing 'village faction' leaders to the posts of local SDA president (Hamed Efendic), and vice-presidents (Besim Ibisevic and Ibran Mustafic). The assembly ratified these candidates by acclamation. Moderates, such as Malik Meholic, were expelled from the party and were summoned to resign their posts in the town's administration.⁴¹¹

Apparently, similar processes were taking place within the SDS, although these are not as well documented. Serb villagers accused their leaders in town, including Zekic, of being too lenient towards the SDA and of having surrendered too much power to the Muslims. To placate these critics, the local SDS leadership proposed appointing Milenko Eanic, a village 'hardliner' as the new vice-president of the Municipal Council instead of Miodrag Jokic, a hardliner from the town of Srebrenica. The SDA accepted this proposal in a show of willingness to 'compromise' with the SDS despite their alleged extremism. In return, Zekic and the other SDS members of the Municipal Council promised to vote with SDA hardliners to remove Meholic and other moderates from their official posts, and nominate village candidates instead. SDA hardliners did not trust Zekic's promises, however, as he and Meholic were good friends. Moreover, other Serbs in town, who were Zekic's main support base, clearly favoured Meholic. For this reason, SDA hardliners hoped they would not need the SDS votes, but could rely on a majority within their own ranks, and possibly, on the support of a few odd councillors from other parties.⁴¹²

⁴⁰⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.85-86.

⁴¹⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.86-89.

⁴¹¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.89-91. Interview Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

⁴¹² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.91-92.

The Municipal Council, which was intended to cast a vote of no confidence to the present municipal officials, met on 23 February 1991. It was immediately adjourned, however, because of the unexpected absence of Malik Meholic, Goran Zekic and Miodrag Jokic. They had gone to a meeting in Sarajevo where a working party of SDA, SDS and HDZ representatives was discussing the practical issues involved in dividing up local power throughout the republic. Ibisevic claims that they had gone to the meeting to strike a deal for Srebrenica, which would have given them sufficient political credit to remain in power. A small group of SDA hardliners sprang into immediate action. Ibran Mustafic, Besim Ibisevic, Hamed Efendic and others rushed off to Sarajevo in Ahmo Tihic's Mercedes, vowing to remove Meholic at all cost, if necessary by non-democratic means, as Ibisevic recounts. They ran straight into the meeting at the parliament building, where SDA, SDS, and HDZ leaders were negotiating local power arrangements case by case. As Srebrenica had not yet been discussed, Mustafic and his following were in time to intervene. Meholic was deprived of the opportunity to represent the SDA in Srebrenica during these negotiations. At the same time, Radovan Karadzic summoned Goran Zekic and Miodrag Jokic to accept a deal based on 75% Muslim (SDA) and 25% Serb (SDS) participation, which they finally did despite previous objections.⁴¹³

Meholic's role was finished even though he remained in place as president of Srebrenica's Municipal Council. The SDA party headquarters still tried to bring about a reconciliation between the two factions. The battle was decided, however, on 28 February 1990, during a Municipal Council meeting. Many villagers gathered on the streets of Srebrenica to support Hamed Efendic's bid for power, while urban Muslims rallied in favour of Malik Meholic. The latter expressed their opposition loudly to 'a peasant' as mayor of Srebrenica: "Peasants will not be allowed to govern Srebrenica, we will chase them back to their villages!" This led to vicious verbal exchanges between villagers and townspeople. As could be expected, Hamed Efendic's faction emerged as the victors. The 'Malikovci' were removed from their official positions and hardliners were appointed instead. Even so, Efendic had faced a very close call with only thirty-six out of seventy votes. Nine SDA councillors voted in favour of Meholic, along with almost all other councillors from various parties (the SDS, the SDP, the DSS and the SRSJ). The SDS did not keep its promises to support the SDA hardliners and voted for Meholic because of 'higher' Serbian interests. Efendic actually won thanks to the support of Milenko Èanic, the SDS hardliner who was promised the position of vice-mayor if Efendic were to win, and one other SDS councillor from Skelani. Both were very critical of Zekic and the SDS leadership of Srebrenica, accusing them of ignoring the interests of Skelani.⁴¹⁴

As a result of the voting, all municipal posts were divided up among SDA and SDS hardliners, and members of the SDP lost all their influence. Besim Ibisevic became President of the Municipal Council (Mayor) and Milenko Èanic its Vice President. Ibran Mustafic stepped up as Chairman of the Executive Board of the municipality of Srebrenica. Hamed 'sado' Salihovic (SDA) was made Head of Police, and Miodrag Stanisavljevic (SDS) kept his position as Commander of the Territorial Defence of Srebrenica.⁴¹⁵ A handful of SDA moderates in the Municipal Council went over to the hard-line faction. Others, such as Malik Meholic, founded the local branch of the Muslim Bosniac Organisation (MBO). Before long, a number of freshly appointed municipal officials proved to be incompetent for their jobs. One of these was Salih Siruèic, the municipal secretary for the economy, who resigned just a few months after his appointment. As the SDA was unable to find any qualified people within its own ranks, they asked Cazim Salimovic, a former communist and member of the SDP, to take over the post. Ibisevic writes that this appointment was also meant to demonstrate the SDA hardliners' willingness to bridge the gap between town and countryside, and to signal the need for unity among all Muslims, regardless of party loyalties.⁴¹⁶

⁴¹³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.93-94.

⁴¹⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.97-98.

⁴¹⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.95-97; see also Masic, Srebrenica, p.24.

⁴¹⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.109-110. Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

SDA hardliners govern Srebrenica

On 25 March 1991, Slobodan Milosevic and Franjo Tudjman met secretly at one of Tito's grand old villas in Karadjordjevo, where they agreed to carve up Bosnia. They appointed a working party to draw up new borders.⁴¹⁷ In late June, Slovenia and Croatia declared their independence. Two days later, the ten-day war began in Slovenia. Croatia also witnessed clashes in Slavonia and the Krajina. By autumn, the conflict had escalated into a full-fledged and brutal war. Serbian-Croatian negotiations about carving up Bosnia and organising population transfers continued in Austria. At the same time, Milosevic tried to persuade Bosnia's Muslim leadership to support Serbia and remain within Yugoslavia. But Izetbegovic declared Bosnia neutral in the Croatian conflict. Moreover, he objected to the mobilisation of Bosnians by the Yugoslav army to fight the war in Croatia.⁴¹⁸ Milosevic responded by placing Bosnia under an economic blockade. He blocked supplies of food and agricultural products. Srebrenica's population, which depended on these imports, was hard hit as a result. These sanctions became even more effective by early 1992. On more than one occasion, Serb officials, politicians and company directors from both sides of the Drina met in towns, such as Ljubovija and Bajina Basta, to discuss how to continue the blockade without affecting the Bosnian Serb population.⁴¹⁹

While the town of Srebrenica was now governed by SDA hardliners, Ibisevic and Mustafic, tensions and fear of the future encroached increasingly on daily life. The fabric of society was disintegrating, a fact clearly reflected in the tug-of-war that developed over Srebrenica's local dumping site. At the heart of the conflict was the question of where to dump the town's wastes. The SDS wanted to close down the main collection point near the Serb village of Zalazje, which the SDA was willing to accept as a sign of goodwill. Yet an alternative site was not easily found without antagonising other Muslim or Serb villages. Because it took some time to resolve the issue, Srebrenica continued to dump its waste in Zalazje. Serbs in the village then blocked the entrance. By early April, barricades appeared making it impossible transport waste out of the town. The waste then began to pile up in the town itself. Ibisevic writes that although Mustafic was responsible, as chairman of the Executive Board, to respond to the problem, he left it to Ibisevic to solve. Attempts to find new locations failed due to protests by every Serb and Muslim village near the different dumpsites proposed. Nobody was willing to accept Srebrenica's waste. Instead, they all preferred to see it end up in "one of the other side's" villages. The entire operation became an exercise in manoeuvring – literally and figuratively – between Muslim and Serb villages. The solution was to find a site at an acceptable distance from any village and one located at a more or less equal distance from a Serb and a Muslim village. When the craters of the bauxite mines in Podravanje were eliminated as an option due to protests from the local Serb population, the authorities were forced to dump waste illegally at night in forbidden sites, such as in Zalazje. This prompted the Serb inhabitants there to begin guarding the old dumpsite again.⁴²⁰

The next cause of tension was the Yugoslav census, which took place in April 1991. People objected to the fact that the census takers were not local people, as was the case in previous censuses. Ibran Mustafic had chosen his own people from Potočari to carry out the census in the Muslim villages. Another source of criticism was the fact that Serbs were allowed to carry out the census in their villages, which, according to Ibisevic, was a recipe for malversations. He claims that many Serbs who had left Srebrenica and had gone to live in Serbia were included.⁴²¹ This problem existed, for instance, in the commune of Osat, where the number of Serbs was much inflated according to local Muslims.

⁴¹⁷ Silber and Little, The death of Yugoslavia, pp.143-44; Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.82; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.85.

⁴¹⁸ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.86.

⁴¹⁹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.13-14; Masic, Srebrenica, p.22; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.147.

⁴²⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.98-100.

⁴²¹ In an interview for this report, Ibisevic admitted that Muslims also manipulated the census results, for instance by statistically 'assimilating' the 500 to 600 Romani living in the municipality of Srebrenica. Muslim census takers tried to convince these Romani to identify themselves as Muslims, which most of them did. Interview: Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

Mustafic undertook no action to conduct another census in these Serb villages. At this stage, Ibisevic (president of the Municipal Council) and Mustafic (chairman of the Executive Board) became more rivals than colleagues. According to Ibisevic, Ibran Mustafic liked nothing more than showing his face ‘among the people’ in the villages and holding nationalist speeches aimed at advancing his ambitions of becoming the leading local SDA politician. He neglected his executive duties, which included solving such practical problems as bad roads, local companies teetering on bankruptcy, and the deplorable condition of the water supply system.⁴²²

One of the major problems facing the municipality was the sudden unwillingness of the majority of citizens to pay communal taxes. Serbs as well as Muslims refused to pay these taxes for different reasons. In fact, several SDA and SDS politicians even instructed their constituents not to pay them. Ibisevic tried to turn the tide in this respect, pointing out to local Muslims that the municipality could never fulfil its communal duties if they failed to pay these taxes. The Muslims resumed paying taxes, but the Serbs continued to refuse. In villages near Skelani, the Muslim inhabitants refused to pay the taxes. Even worse, they threatened the Serb tax collector, whom they considered a nationalist ‘Chetnik’. In the village of Dobrak, Muslim women threw stones at him, after which he refused to ever return to any Muslim villages.⁴²³ Srebrenica’s overstuffed municipal bureaucracy was another problem Ibisevic tried to solve. It employed some one hundred and fifty people where seventy would have sufficed. By discharging forty people on early retirement, the number of employees working in the local bureaucracy was reduced by over twenty-five percent.

What Ibisevic does not mention is that most of these early pensioners were Serbs. Among them were directors of firms and of other institutions, such as the primary schools and the hospital. Moreover, they were replaced by Muslims loyal to the SDA. This process was carried out not without deliberately humiliating the Serbs. As one former Serb official, Veselin Stevanovic, put it during an interview, Ibran Mustafic ran into his office requesting the very desk at which he was working at the time.⁴²⁴ All of these developments nourished Serb fears that Muslims were using their political supremacy to take over the local economy and administration, and to take control of important firms and institutions as soon as they were privatised.⁴²⁵ And this process did indeed unfold throughout most of Bosnia, as well as in Serbia, where nationalist parties expelled members of the ‘other’ group from their jobs and positions as soon as they won the elections and took over local power. In this context, Serb authors refer to the ‘process of Islamicisation’ in SDA-dominated municipalities, such as those in eastern Bosnia.⁴²⁶ However, the same happened in Serbia: just across the border, in Ljubovija, numerous Muslims from Bratunac were dismissed from their jobs. Among them was Nijaz Dubiëic, the director of a firm, who later became the SDA mayor of Bratunac.⁴²⁷

Relations also worsened due to nationalist incidents and forms of symbolic warfare. These included the conspicuous use of nationalist banners and flags, and the practice of displaying photos of extremist leaders and other paraphernalia on cars and buses, as well as in cafés and restaurants, etc. Many Serbs, including moderates, became annoyed when Muslims hung two long banners across the road in Potoèari, a green Muslim banner and another featuring the nationalist Croatian sahovnica (chessboard). The banners were left to hang indefinitely.⁴²⁸ In the village of Glogova, it became fashionable for young men to shave their heads, dress in black, and call themselves Ustashe. The justifying rationale was: “If they can be Chetniks, we can be Ustashe just as easily”.⁴²⁹ Occasional incidents and conflicts between individuals of different ethnic backgrounds also exacerbated the ⁴²² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.100-102.

⁴²³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.104-105.

⁴²⁴ Interviews and conversations with Veselin Stevanovic 23/06/1998, Zdravko Noviëic 09/06/1998.

⁴²⁵ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.146-147.

⁴²⁶ See Miljanovic, Krvavi Božic, pp.29-30.

⁴²⁷ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.16-17.

⁴²⁸ Interview: Veselin Stevanovic, 23/06/1998.

⁴²⁹ Z.B., ‘Majka Srbija’.

situation. Such problems occurred in Lijesce (a Serb village near Skelani) where a dispute escalated between Serb peasants and SDA activist, Ahmo Tihic, about the use of a small path over Tihic's land. Tihic blocked the path out of fear that it would develop into a permanent road, used not only by pedestrians, but also by vehicles. In May 1991, a mixed SDA-SDS delegation tried in vain to solve the conflict. The issue tended to polarise the entire community and to poison relations between local Serbs and Muslims. When the district court in Srebrenica decided in favour of the Serb peasants, the town's SDA government (supporting Tihic) refused to implement the judge's decision. The move gave new impetus to Serb complaints that they were living under a constant Muslim threat. Local Muslims, on the other hand, saw the demands of the Serb peasants in Lijesce as an expression of 'Great Serbian expansionism'. Ibisevic claims that the SDS thrived on such conflicts and that it was not really willing to solve them. However, he also ignores the fact that SDA leaders probably had just as little interest in ending this conflict. SDA officials refused to issue orders to the police to implement a court order.⁴³⁰

A similar problem arose concerning the building site of a Serbian Orthodox church in Skelani. The Serbs wanted a small piece of extra land belonging to the municipality next to the building site. The Muslims interpreted this as political provocation, a symbolic expression of Greater Serbian aspirations. The inhabitants of Skelani, Serbs and Muslims alike, had a reputation for not being particularly religious. Consequently, the common reaction among Muslims was: "why would they need a church in the first place?" Serbs justified it by pointing out that Muslims had built fifteen mosques in the municipality in the last two decades, while Serbs had built no churches at all. According to Ibisevic's rather one-sided perspective, the SDS used this conflict once again to reinforce the image of threatened Serbdom under Muslim domination. In the end, the Serbs simply took the three-metre wide strip of extra land and started to lay foundations for the church building without permission. When the foundations were completed, the Serbs organised a celebration to consecrate them. The bishop of Zvornik, as well as various other priests, took this opportunity to hold nationalist speeches and propagate slogans, adding extra fuel to the fire. Ibisevic was present at the event, as he was invited by Milenko Ćanic, but decided it was wiser not to address the crowd himself. Instead, he left the task to Cazim Salimovic, an old Communist who called for reason and self-restraint. In a small, but unfortunate slip of the tongue, Salimovic referred to the 'green' Drina river. This provoked an angry reaction from the Serbs: "Look, he talks about the green Drina! Fuck his fundamentalist mother! Because he's a communist, we thought he was a decent Muslim, but hear this!". Both Ibisevic and Salimovic felt intimidated and left, accompanied by gunshots from the Serb mob.⁴³¹

War was drawing close in Slovenia and even more so in Croatia, where the first armed clashes occurred between Serb paramilitaries and the Croatian police. In May and June, the extremist leader of one of these groups, Vojislav Seselj, incited panic in Bratunac and Srebrenica. Touring eastern Bosnia and areas across the border in Serbia, Seselj organised promotional meetings for his Radical Party. The Bosnian police set up checkpoints along the Drina, and on one occasion it sealed off the bridge near Skelani to prevent Seselj from crossing into Bosnia. Both Seselj's tour and the new Bosnian police checkpoints at the bridges crossing the Drina caused great unrest among Serbs and Muslims.⁴³² At this stage, Ibisevic and Mustafic persuaded Muslim men to stop responding to the mobilisation calls of the JNA. Ibisevic told them to go home, assuring them that the Srebrenican police had orders not to arrest them. He advised them to take refuge in the forests to hide from any military police that might come to fetch them. Some men left in order not to be mobilised by the JNA.⁴³³ SDA leaders also wrote to Muslim officers actively serving in the JNA, who had been born in the municipality of Srebrenica, calling on them to leave the JNA.⁴³⁴ As the first series of incidents unfolded along the Drina – shots were fired at Muslim villages from the territory of Serbia – the idea arose within the local SDA

⁴³⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.107-109.

⁴³¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.112-114. See also, Radulovic 'sve spremno za sukob'.

⁴³² Z.B. 'Majka Srbija'; Radulovic 'sve spremno za sukob'.

⁴³³ Interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

⁴³⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.109.

leadership to establish a crisis staff to organise the local defence and arm the Muslim population. Ibran Mustafic and Hamed Efendic, however, opposed the establishment of SDA crisis staff, claiming that they could supply arms much more efficiently and discretely through their contacts in Sarajevo. After some discussion, most SDA Executive Council members accepted Mustafic's and Efendic's proposal, leaving the acquisition and further distribution of arms in their hands.⁴³⁵

Instead of keeping their promises, Mustafic and Efendic left the Muslims of Srebrenica completely unprepared for any armed conflict. In the villages, especially, many grew restless when the promised weapons were not delivered. In response, Ibisevic set up a number of local crisis staff units, who laid the groundwork for future Muslim resistance. However, the lack of arms proved to be an enormous problem. In early August, Mustafic and Efendic met with the Muslim directors of local firms to discuss the purchase of arms. They devised a plan to usurp municipal funds and to channel the money via a number of firms to the SDA, who was to buy the arms. One of the Muslim directors present at the meeting was also head of the municipal commission responsible for making decisions about these funds. The money was to be transferred to the bank accounts of three firms in Srebrenica. They would then pass it on via a Sarajevo bank account to Hamed Efendic, president of the SDA in Srebrenica. This method was intended to glean 1,400,000 dinars from municipal funds in order to purchase seventy rifles.⁴³⁶

During the summer of 1991, Naser Oric, the famous commander of the Muslim forces in Srebrenica during the war, entered on stage as Ibran Mustafic's confidant. He was born in 1967 in Potoèari, Ibran Mustafic's home village. They were related through Oric's mother whose maiden name was Mustafic. During the 1980s, Oric had done several jobs in Serbia, after which he followed a police course in Zemun. He applied for a job as a policeman in Srebrenica, but he was rejected because his grandfather had been a member of the Ustashe during World War Two. They accepted him in Belgrade, however, where he was soon recruited into a special police unit set up by Serbia's Ministry of Internal Affairs. Oric participated in actions against Albanian miners in Kosovo, during 1989 and 1990, as well as against the Serbian opposition in 1991. His extraordinary performance in these operations helped him to climb the ranks to one of Milosevic's bodyguards. He later fell into trouble when he was suspected of involvement in the murder of one of his colleagues, who was found dead a few days after a fight with Oric.

When the war in Croatia started, Oric returned to Bosnia and worked half a year as a police officer in Ilidza near Sarajevo. There, he was approached by an officer of Bosnia's Ministry of Internal Affairs, who asked him to go to Belgrade and try to persuade Muslim police officers working there to transfer to Bosnia. Oric claims to have responded to this request and recruited 150 Muslim policemen back to Bosnia. In the meantime, he moved back to Srebrenica, where he set up a small local militia of about thirty men, whom he trained in the hills near Potoèari.⁴³⁷ Serb sources claim that he and Adnan Karovic, another Muslim from Potoèari, were involved in the arms trade. Incidentally, Karovic was also the deputy commander of the police station in Zvornik. Together, the two are said to have organised several weapon transports from Croatia, via Tuzla and Zvornik, to Potoèari, where they sold these arms among the Muslim population. As soon as Adnan Karovic left for Croatia, Oric took over the entire organisation of this arms trade, at least according to Serb sources.⁴³⁸ Ibisevic writes, however, that it was Ibran Mustafic who was the key figure in these arms dealings and that Oric was merely his right ⁴³⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.115-116; see also, Ibisevic 'Nisam pobjegao'.

⁴³⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.117-118; see also Ibisevic 'Nisam pobjegao'.

⁴³⁷ For this short biography of Naser Oric I used: Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.77-78, 150-151; Kamemica, 'U Kakanj'; Kamenica 'Zasto se nije vratio'; Maljukan, 'srebrenièki kapo'; Pargan 'Od legende'; Dutchbat Srebrenica / Lukavac / Tuzla Milinfo; July 1994 (MIDKL Dossier 1589); Chapter 1, Section D6; Westerman and Rijs, Het zwartste scenario, pp.51-53; Conversations: Naser Oric 23/10/2000, Momèilo Cvjetinovic 11/06/1998, Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998.

⁴³⁸ Excerpts from police reports and interrogation records published in Serb sources seem to offer evidence of this. See Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp.31-35. Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic, pp.34-35. See also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.150-151.

hand, i.e. Mustafic's personal driver and bodyguard. They had their own local network and figureheads, such as Ahmo Tihic in Lijesce and the Muslim priest, Aziz Hasanovic, in Osmace, who sold the arms in their villages. Since Oric was employed as a local police officer, frictions occurred between Mustafic and Head of Police, Hamed Salihovic, who complained that Oric never showed up at work. Mustafic defended Oric against attacks by his boss, claiming that Naser was serving the broader interests of the Muslim people.⁴³⁹

During the summer, tensions mounted between Muslims and Serbs as a result of the war in Slovenia and Croatia. A number of local Serbs and Muslims went to Croatia to fight as volunteers on different sides. In the weekends, they would return, parading in their new uniforms. Others were recruited into the Yugoslav army and mobilised to the frontlines. Tensions also rose when JNA troops and paramilitaries were transferred to Bosnia, the base from which they carried out their operations on Croatian territory. Serb soldiers and paramilitaries often created small incidents, targeting Muslims or Islamic buildings, and adding fuel to the fire. In Skelani, a local Muslim primary school teacher was molested at this time. The perpetrator, a local Serb, fled to Serbia and was never arrested. This led to embitterment on the part of the Muslim population in the commune of Skelani.⁴⁴⁰ The schools now became part of the Serb-Muslim struggle. The SDA appointed Muslim directors at six of the seven primary schools in the municipality – the molested teacher being one of them. The SDS, in turn, began to boycott municipal council meetings in protest of these appointments. Incidentally, Serbs were not the ones to oppose these appointments. They were also opposed by quite a few Muslim teachers, who had been devoted communists and now sympathised with the SDP. In the primary school of Osat, for instance, both Muslim and Serb teachers defended their Muslim director, opposing the nomination of an SDA candidate to the position. In the end, however, the appointment went through.⁴⁴¹

Once the Serb-Muslim conflict began touching on the issue of who controlled the police and the army, the situation took a grave turn for the worse. In July 1991, Srebrenican authorities selected twenty-six Muslim boys for a three-month police course in Croatia, organised and sponsored by the SDA. The Belgrade press (particularly Politika Ekspres, a daily newspaper) now claimed that 'Ustashe' from Srebrenica were being trained in Croatia, to prepare them to partake in the massacres of Serb children. Lists of the trainees' names were also published. As a result of these reports, local Serbs started to see the Bosnian police as a Muslim militia, whom they refused to recognise as a legitimate police force. This led to tense incidents. In Skelani, for instance, a local SDS politician ignored a Muslim reservist policeman, who signalled him to stop. The policeman then stopped the man at gunpoint, which reinforced rumours of 'serbs being under threat'. Serbs in Skelani demanded that the Muslim reservist be dismissed. Trying to calm the situation, Hamed Salihovic gave in to the demand.

Nonetheless, tensions continued to mount as a result of such incidents. One of these occurred in the village of Zgunje, near Skelani. One night, a drunken Serb policeman there began a shooting spree. Terrified, the Muslim inhabitants fled to the forests. The next day, the Muslims responded by protesting at the police station in Skelani and erecting barricades at the bridge over the Drina. Local Serbs, in turn, set up barricades on the road to a Serb village. Ibisevic and Mustafic convinced the Muslim militants to remove their barricade, and thus managed to prevent the outbreak of a potentially very serious conflict. With tensions soaring rapidly at this point, Muslims in the villages along the Drina started to demand arms. Hamed Salihovic, Head of Police, saw to it that some weapons did indeed remain in Muslim hands. Fearing that Serbs would try to empty the weapon and ammunition stores of the police station in Skelani, he removed these weapons and transported them to Srebrenica in the ⁴³⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.118-119. Later, Mustafic reproached Salihovic for his hesitance about accepting Naser Oric into the police service (Ibisevic, 'Nisam pobegao'). Oric immediately removed Salihovic from his position as Head of Police when the war started. In May 1995, Salihovic was assassinated in the enclave, probably by Oric's men. Both Hamed Efendic (still the SDA president) and Ibran Mustafic survived the attack, which apparently targeted all three of them. Interview: Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998, Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

⁴⁴⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.119-120.

⁴⁴¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.130-31; Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine nema vedrine'.

middle of the night. The news soon spread among the Serb population in Skelani, triggering a new wave of protests: again a barricade was erected in Kalimanici.

These recurring incidents led to the activation of a local body called the National Defence Council on 17 July 1991. Set up to overtake the most urgent duties of the municipal council in times of crisis, this body's powers included introducing special measures to protect citizens and their properties. The new council consisted of twelve local officials. Eight of these were Muslims, including Besim Ibisevic, Ibran Mustafic, Hamed Efendic, and Ramiz Becirovic. The other four were Serbs: Milenko Èanic, Goran Zekic, Miloje Simic, and Miodrag Stanisavljevic. Ibisevic and Èanic agreed to organise a meeting in Skelani to discuss the situation with local Muslims and Serbs. This meeting took place in late July. Ibran Mustafic also attended, as did Desimir Mitrovic, a doctor at a hospital in Uzice, who was also the main local SDS 'ideologist'. It was at this meeting that the Serbs first put forth their demand to make Skelani a separate Serb municipality. This was unacceptable to the Muslims and led to fierce exchanges and mutual accusations. The meeting ended in dissension and the situation polarised even further.⁴⁴²

In August, the JNA arrived on the local scene for the first time. Two army officers from the Tuzla Second Corps and a number of soldiers entered Srebrenica in two vans. They had come to confiscate the local army card files in order to mobilise recruits and reservists. Muslims quickly gathered in and around the municipal building to prevent this. Besim Ibisevic removed the uninvited guests from the building with the help of two policemen. The news that the army had been chased out of town spread like wildfire. That afternoon, thousands of Muslims from surrounding villages and the town of Srebrenica itself gathered in front of the warehouse. Ibisevic addressed the crowd, saying that he refused to allow the army to recruit local Muslims and use them as cannon fodder to defend Serbian interests in Croatia. They were needed here, said Ibisevic, to defend their own town and to defend Bosnia. Most local Serbs regarded this Muslim protest meeting as an expression of growing anti-Serbian, anti-Yugoslav and anti-JNA sentiment. A number even interpreted it as a declaration of war against Serbia and the Serbian people. Some Serbs felt they that they needed leave Srebrenica.⁴⁴³

At the end of August 1991, the JNA Second Corps also attempted to confiscate the army card files in Bratunac. In the morning, Miroslav Deronjic and various other SDS officials entered the municipal building, demanding that the army card files be handed over. The Muslim caretaker refused. In the meantime, thousands of Serbs and Muslims gathered in front of the building. It was Friday, which was market day in Bratunac. The streets were already full of people, and many more – Serbs and Muslims alike - were mobilised from the villages over the next few hours. The Serb demonstrators urged the army to take the card files by force, if necessary, shouting "Armija", "Jugoslavija", and "Srbija". The Muslims, in turn, tried to prevent the army from taking such action. The chants on their side included: "Murderers", "Fascists", "This is Bosnia!" and "This is not Kosovo". Threats were exchanged. According to one Serb source, Mevludin 'Mevko' Sinanovic, a Muslim extremist, pulled out a dagger, kissed it and screamed: "The Vlachs [pejorative term for Serbs gd] will not live here, and this will teach them...!"⁴⁴⁴ A local SDS official reportedly videotaped the entire event from the roof of a building in the main street. Later, local Serb officials used the tape to identify Muslim 'extremists' when the war started.⁴⁴⁵

The mayor, Nijaz Dubièic, as well as the SDA president of Bratunac, Mirsad Kavazbasic, both tried to calm the situation, urging people to go home. They failed however, and the danger at hand began to rise to a boiling point, especially when the first army units arrived around 3:00 p.m. Around 10,000 Muslims and 5,000 Serbs had gathered. The Bosnian police sided with the Muslims, while the JNA joined forces with the Serbs. JNA soldiers pointed their guns at the Muslims, but shot in the air. When the Muslim police commander ordered his men to point their guns as well, Serb police officers

⁴⁴² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.122-26.

⁴⁴³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.129-30.

⁴⁴⁴ Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić, pp.32-33. Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine', p.10.

⁴⁴⁵ See Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p.9.

deserted their ranks to join the other side. Fortunately, the army decided to retreat, which prevented what would almost certainly have ended in bloodshed.⁴⁴⁶ Thinking Muslims were planning an attack on their village, Serbs in Kravica set up barricades and took some thirty Muslim young people hostage. They were released after one night.⁴⁴⁷ After these events, the SDA leaders in Srebrenica decided to transfer the local army card files from the municipal building to Potoèari.⁴⁴⁸

In August 1991, it became clear that the JNA's efforts to prepare Bosnian Serbs for war were well underway. Yugoslav Prime Minister, Ante Markovic, disclosed the existence of a secret army operation entitled 'RAM', which called for covert deliveries of weapons from JNA arsenals to local Serb forces in Croatia and Bosnia. Coordinated from Belgrade, the operation resulted in the delivery of hundreds of thousands of weapons to Serbs in several parts of Bosnia during 1990 and 1991. Markovic also released a telephone conversation, in which Milosevic instructed Karadzic to accept the arms delivered.⁴⁴⁹ According to the Slovene newspaper Delo, operation RAM was supplemented by plan for psychological warfare. This second plan was intended to tear down Muslim resistance if war broke out through the rape of girls and women and executions of Muslims in mosques.⁴⁵⁰ It became increasingly clear that the JNA's main objective after the disintegration of Yugoslavia was to protect the Serb population outside Serbia proper. One way it tried to ensure such protection was by supporting paramilitary forces and providing them with weaponry that the JNA had written off.⁴⁵¹ As a result of these activities, Kravica soon became a centre for arming and training Serbs from towns and villages from the municipalities of Bratunac, Srebrenica, Zvornik and Vlasenica. The JNA also built a new heliport in Bratunac, which was used for the delivery of weapons.⁴⁵² In November 1991, the JNA forces that had withdrawn from Croatia were redeployed in Bosnia. Some units were stationed in eastern Bosnia, such as in Zvornik and in Milici. The JNA strengthened its positions along the Drina, placing artillery on the mountains just across the border in Serbia and aiming it at Srebrenica.⁴⁵³

Alarmed by these developments, the Bosnian government decided to strengthen the police force by recruiting young men and training them in a six-month crash course. The police was the only armed force that the government could build up if the Serbs launched an assault on Bosnian territory.⁴⁵⁴ The authorities also started to form their own paramilitary units, called the 'Green Berets'. As compared to the (Bosnian) Serbs, however, the Bosnian government lagged far behind in its war preparations. The most important paramilitary force then became the so-called Patriotic League, which was created under the auspices of the Bosnian government. It had a reported strength of 3,500 troops. After the war started, it became the nucleus of the new Bosnian army.⁴⁵⁵ The first series of initiatives to create units of the Patriotic League in eastern Bosnia date to mid July 1991, when a regional steering committee met in Srebrenica. Dominated by the SDA, that meeting became known as the 'Podrinje initiative'. In it, the committee established the following action priorities: to retake possession of the weapons and other equipment belonging to the Territorial Defence, to prevent further disarmament, to start training members of the Patriotic League, and to prevent the JNA from seizing army archives.

⁴⁴⁶ For these events in Bratunac see: Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p.9; Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine nema vedrine'; Ibrahimovic, 'Pakleni vikend'; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.147-148; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.21-22; Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic, p.32; Oric, Srebrenica, pp.37-38. Interviews and conversations with Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998; Mitko and Mevla Kadric 25/04/98.

⁴⁴⁷ Bosnjak, 'Da li je policija umijesena?'; Ibrahimovic, 'Pakleni vikend'.

⁴⁴⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.132-33. Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine', pp.10-11. The JNA only succeeded in confiscating the card files in Zvornik. In Vlasenica, Srebrenica, and Bratunac, however, they were obstructed by the SDA's formidable resistance (Oric, Srebrenica, p.37).

⁴⁴⁹ Glenny, The Fall of Yugoslavia, pp.149-50.

⁴⁵⁰ Bassiouni Final report, Annex III, p.21; Annex IV, p.27; Glenny, The Fall of Yugoslavia, pp.149-50.

⁴⁵¹ Bassiouni Final report, Annex III, p.24.

⁴⁵² Oric, Srebrenica, p.36; Èekic, The aggression on Bosnia, p.66; interview: Boban Vasic 15/07/1998.

⁴⁵³ Bassiouni Final report, Annex III, p.22; Oric, Srebrenica, p.60; Masic, Srebrenica, p.23, 30.

⁴⁵⁴ Interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998, Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998.

⁴⁵⁵ Bassiouni Final report, Annex III, p.29; III.a, p.44. The Patriotic League (the original Green Berets) was a paramilitary organisation consisting largely of former JNA officers of Muslim backgrounds. See also, Vasic, 'The Yugoslav Army', p.135.

Even after this first step was taken, it took months to establish a military organisation. This task reached completion in early 1992 with the creation of the Patriotic League for the Tuzla region. Most of the staff consisted of former Muslim members of the Territorial Defence and JNA officers, who had deserted the army after the war in Croatia began. Although its core organisation was in place, the Patriotic League encountered numerous problems as it continued to develop. It faced a deplorable lack of arms and ammunition, causing some army officers to resign. One of these was Nedzib Husic, the commander for the region of Bratunac, Zvornik, and Vlasenica. In Bratunac, the SDA acquired only six automatic rifles and twenty-five pistols. Eventually, it was forced to rely on weapons in the possession of Muslim policemen and other licensed people. The Patriotic League in Bratunac also succeeded in seizing a considerable number of explosives from the Sase mines. However, despite all the signs of preparations for war among the Serbs, Muslims were generally not particularly eager, or willing, to organise resistance. Some Muslims accused SDA activists of contributing to the outbreak of a war in which Muslims stood no chance.⁴⁵⁶

Aside from the police and the Patriotic League, (a semi-official undertaking by the authorities), other Muslim paramilitary groups were created. However, these were usually little more than poorly armed village militia. There was one exception in Bratunac. In February 1991, Nurif Rizvanovic, a former JNA officer and undercover agent, established the Muslimansko Nacionalno Vijeće (MNV) or Muslim National Council. This was a militant organisation that tried to unite Muslims dissatisfied with the policies of the SDA and MBO. Rizvanovic was born in Glogova, had worked in Slovenia, and had served some years in prison for espionage for western intelligence services. Soon after his release, he returned to Glogova, where he was often seen together with Mevludin 'Mevko' Sinanovic.⁴⁵⁷ In press reports, Rizvanovic declared that his objective was to mobilise all Muslims of Yugoslavia, regardless of their ethnic backgrounds (including Bosnian Muslims, Muslims from the Sandzak, and Albanians from Kosovo and Macedonia). He also announced the creation of units of volunteers. He established a steering committee in Glogova, and then set up similar committees in Konjevic Polje and Voljavica during the summer of 1991. Plans were made to establish a fourth MNV committee in Bratunac, but local SDA authorities prohibited its work, saying that the formation of paramilitary units would accelerate the break-up of Bosnia-Herzegovina. In early September 1991, Rizvanovic attended the celebrations of the first anniversary of the formation of the SDA. Held in the Bratunac stadium, the celebrations drew thousands of people. An embittered Rizvanovic addressed the crowd there, speaking out a prophecy that would later prove true: "We will see each other next year on the battlefield!" Within a few days, Rizvanovic returned to Slovenia, putting an end to his aspirations as a politician and paramilitary leader.⁴⁵⁸

The Kravica killing

Daily life in the municipalities of Srebrenica and Bratunac became punctuated by incidents, provocations, quarrels and café brawls. Certain cafés became gathering places for Serb or Muslim nationalists, who regularly burst into 'enemy' cafés to start fights. Serb and Muslim youth from villages infamous as hotbeds of nationalism, including Kravica and Potoèari, came to Bratunac every night to cause trouble.⁴⁵⁹ Kravica had an especially notorious history as a source of trouble. Feuds and ⁴⁵⁶ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.60-62.

⁴⁵⁷ Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine', p.10.

⁴⁵⁸ See the interview with Nurif Rizvanovic in the Serbian magazine, Duga (Vasovic, 'Privatni dzihad'). See also, Delalic, 'Rizvanoviceva majka i brat tvrde', p.20; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.63-64; and Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic, p.36. For reprints and translations of MNV documents, including a public invitation of the MNV to all Muslims to come to Bratunac on the first day of Bajram, see Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp.15-19. See also, Ivanisevic, Hronika, p.136.

⁴⁵⁹ Interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998. A Serb chronicler describes how the authorities took little action against such provocations. See Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic, p.39.

vengeance were a fairly normal part of village life.⁴⁶⁰ In light of this, no one was surprised when two Muslims were killed in an ambush near Kravica on 3 September 1991, the region's first victims of ethnic violence. Travelling by car, the Muslims ignored a group of Serb policemen, who signalled them to stop in the centre of Kravica. Instead, they drove full speed ahead, straight into an ambush prepared by Serb nationalists. The shooting was so heavy that it could be heard in Bratunac. As one of the perpetrators later declared, they wanted to put an end to Muslim provocations in Kravica. In the weeks preceding the incident, Muslim men had driven up and down the road through Kravica, yelling and insulting the local Serb population, waving green flags, and playing 'oriental' music. The Serbs wanted to teach these Muslims a lesson, especially Mevludin 'Mevko' Sinanovic, an extremist from Glogova, who had been in the car, but had managed to escape and survive the attack. Although the attack was carried out by two Serbs from Kravica and Ljubovija, Muslims thought that it had been orchestrated by the SDS and a Chetnik paramilitary group led by Radomir 'Raso' Milosevic. The perpetrators escaped to Croatia, where they fought as volunteers before returning to eastern Bosnia once the war started.⁴⁶¹

The next day, Muslims filled the streets of Bratunac, and tensions between Serbs and Muslims soared to unprecedented heights. Many Serbs and Muslims fled to Ljubovija (Serbia) for fear that the situation might explode. Schools and businesses closed down, and the authorities feared Muslims would start a general revolt. Muslims gathered in front of the police station, demanding an investigation to find the perpetrators of the Kravica killings. Their demonstrations continued throughout the night and following day. The demonstrators demanded the immediate resignation of Nezir Muratovic, Head of Police in Bratunac, and of Nikola Mandic, Police Commander. And indeed, both turned in their resignations after two days. Police troops from elsewhere were deployed in the town to keep the situation under control. The police also set up checkpoints throughout the municipality, which were manned twenty-four hours a day. Despite these measures, Muslims from the village of Voljavica witnessed Serbs crossing the Drina in small boats during the night; they were transporting arms into eastern Bosnia to distribute among the Serb inhabitants.⁴⁶² On the afternoon of 4 September, several police officials from Tuzla visited Bratunac. The next day, two prominent politicians, Ejup Ganic (SDA) and Nikola Koljevic (SDS), both members of the Bosnian presidency, arrived to urge their Muslim and Serb constituencies to stay calm. Ganic called on the Muslims not to take revenge for the attack, promising a thorough investigation. Koljevic, in turn, went to Kravica to inform local Serbs that the Bosnian police would not be entering their village. According to Muslim sources, police inquiries into the incident also revealed the involvement of three Bratunac police officers in the attack over and above the two perpetrators. One of these officers was Luka Bogdanovic, the future commander of Bratunac's Serbian police. None of the Serb perpetrators and accomplices in the attack were ever brought to trial, let alone convicted.⁴⁶³

After the Kravica incident, Muslims started to organise armed patrols in their villages and settlements with the few arms they had. Serbs did the same in their villages. However, they also evacuated women, children and the elderly to Serbia.⁴⁶⁴ Feelings of insecurity intensified, among other things, because clashes were occurring elsewhere, such as in the Visegrad area.⁴⁶⁵ Ibisevic's account clearly reveals how very difficult it was under the circumstances to maintain any degree of law and order, including in Srebrenica. The social fabric had more or less disintegrated. One of the main

⁴⁶⁰ Conversation: Zdravko Novičić 09/06/1998, Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998, Boban Vasic 15/07/1998.

⁴⁶¹ For the Kravica incident, see Oric, Srebrenica, pp.36-37; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.25; Masic, Srebrenica, p.11; Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić, pp.39-41; Bosnjak, 'Da li je policija umijesena?'; Komlenovic and Ivanisevic, 'sa Drine'. Interviews: Mitko and Mevla Kadric, 17/01/1998, Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

⁴⁶² Bosnjak, 'Da li je policija umijesena?'; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.26.

⁴⁶³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.134-35. See also, Oric, Srebrenica, pp.36-37; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp.25-26. Interview: Ibro Verlasevic 01/06/1998. Luka Bogdanovic was arrested by the police and subjected to interrogations and lie detector tests. He was released after four days because - as he claims - they found no evidence against him. Conversation: Luka Bogdanovic, 15/09/1999.

⁴⁶⁴ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.60; Oric, Srebrenica, p.37; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.26. Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić, p.41.

⁴⁶⁵ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp.90-91.

problems was the enormous rise in economic crime, such as the widespread theft of electricity in the villages and illegal chopping of trees in forests around Srebrenica. Muslim foresters accepted bribes to keep silent about the illegal transport of timber into Serbia. Measures to stop such practices failed. It was impossible to take any action against the trade, or the widespread corruption among foresters, road guards and policemen at the bridge in Skelani. Ibisevic writes that local Muslims were especially to blame for this. Many of them, having lost their incomes, needed money. Consequently, they resorted to chopping down walnut trees en masse, which were transported off to Serbia for a few hundred German marks per truckload. The theft of equipment from companies also became more common. As Ibisevic observes, everybody was stealing and it had become virtually impossible to protect state and communal property. The people appointed to protect the property were often corrupt. In fact, they were the ones who stole the most.⁴⁶⁶

After the Kravica killings, more incidents occurred near the Perucac dam. Serb gunmen shot at Muslim villages from the Serbian side of the Drina on 5 September 1991. The firing continued throughout most of the night. The next day, the inhabitants came to Srebrenica to demand protection. According to Ibisevic, the leader of the paramilitary forces who had organised the shootings was the brother of Bajina Basta's police chief. And he, in his turn, had provided the paramilitaries with arms and explosives. The JNA was also strengthening its positions along the Drina. Miodrag Jokic, the SDS extremist from Srebrenica, boasted to Ibisevic that the army had installed twenty-three cannons in the Tara mountains, which could scorch the municipality of Srebrenica within a few hours.⁴⁶⁷ The situation grew so tense that every village quarrel had the potential to escalate into a much larger-scale conflict. At this stage, municipal authorities and SDA and SDS party leaders were constantly moving from one locality to the next to extinguish the beginnings of would-be bonfires. To reduce tensions, local Muslim and Serb leaders called for a meeting on 24 September 1991 to discuss all contentious issues. Serbs put all their complaints on the agenda: the alleged discrimination of Serbs in the allotment of private building sites, the dismissal of Serb workers, the appointment of Muslim directors in primary schools, the removal of the army card files by the Muslim authorities, as well as the latter's refusal to forward regular calls for the army to Serb conscripts and reservists. The SDA added several other items: Serb obstruction of the work of local companies and that of the newly appointed officials in local communes, the excessive prolongation of negotiations regarding the distribution of directors' positions, the systematic absence of SDS members at municipal council meetings, and the refusal of Serbs to pay taxes.⁴⁶⁸

The coalition of nationalist parties that had replaced communist power after the elections was also disintegrating completely throughout the rest of Bosnia. In September 1991, the SDS began to create Serb Autonomous Areas or SAO-s, as it had previously done in Croatia.⁴⁶⁹ The SAO of Biracè was formed in eastern Bosnia, encompassing the municipalities of Bratunac, Srebrenica, Zvornik, Vlasenica, Sekovici, Kalesija, Zivinice, and Kladanj. Its assembly met regularly in Sekovici and Milici. At a meeting of the Bosnian parliament in mid October, the Muslim and Croat parties voted for a proposal that would make Bosnia a 'sovereign republic', formally part of Yugoslavia, but independent in practice. Radovan Karadzic, who attended the meeting, warned those present that this decision would lead Bosnia to war, and that Muslims might disappear as a people. The SDS delegation demonstratively left the parliamentary session. Only ten days later, the Bosnian Serbs created their own assembly, thereby underlining their determination to remain in Yugoslavia. This position was reinforced ⁴⁶⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 135, 138, 172-173.

⁴⁶⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.136.

⁴⁶⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.137.

⁴⁶⁹ SOA stands for Srpska Autonomna Oblast (Serb Autonomous Area). See Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.73; Gow, 'After the flood', p.455.

by the Serbian referendum on 9 November, in which Bosnian Serbs voted against a sovereign Bosnia. Even in Srebrenica and Bratunac, many local Serbs took part in this referendum.⁴⁷⁰

Unwilling to cooperate any further with the Croats and Muslims who were heading for independence, the SDS stepped back from the state institutions – parliament, presidium and government – regarding the decisions taken by them as illegitimate. At the same time, the SDS started to carve out new ‘serb’ municipalities, such as Skelani and Milici, from the Muslim-dominated municipalities of Srebrenica, Vlasenica and Bratunac. The director of the Milici bauxite mines, Rajko Dukic, was one of the instigators of these plans.⁴⁷¹ As chairman of the SDS Executive Council, he held one of the highest positions within the party hierarchy in Bosnia as a whole. As such, he is still seen by many as the main mastermind behind the program of ethnic cleansing in eastern Bosnia. Dukic’s business empire was one of the main sponsors of the SDS. According to Muslim sources, his primary objective was to acquire full control over the economic resources and assets in eastern Bosnia. The main partners in this project were Jevto Subotic, director of ‘Biraè’, a large aluminium plant in Zvornik and Djordje Jovièic, the director of the Zvornik bank.⁴⁷² The hydroelectric plants on the Drina, near Zvornik and Bajina Basta, were already under Serbian control (i.e. they were owned by Serbia), securing the enormous energy resources needed for processing bauxite into aluminium.

In November 1991, the Yugoslav Army returned to the scene. At the start of the month, Hamed Salihovic, Head of Police, received a dispatch from the Second Army Corps in Tuzla, announcing the passage of JNA troops and vehicles through Srebrenica. Rumours spread that the JNA was planning to position its forces and heavy and light artillery in Brezani. A Serb village, Brezani lies southeast of Srebrenica on a plateau of great strategic importance. The JNA did exactly the same around Sarajevo and other Bosnian towns. Ibisevic protested to the commander of the Tuzla Army Corps, informing him that JNA forces were not welcome in Srebrenica. He even threatened with Muslim resistance (barricades) and acts of sabotage (destruction of roads and bridges). Milenko Gavric, the commander of the Tuzla Army Corps, threatened to arrest Ibisevic. Ibran Mustafic added fuel to the fire by telling Gavric that the only army welcome in Srebrenica was a Muslim one. Ibisevic called Izetbegovic to ask him whether he would support acts of direct resistance. Izetbegovic told him that he felt Muslims should put up resistance if they had enough weapons and stood a chance of defending themselves.⁴⁷³ In the face growing unrest among the town’s leadership, the command of the Second Army Corps abandoned its plans. At this stage, the JNA’s strategy was to take control silently of positions in eastern Bosnia, without attracting too much attention or provoking Muslim resistance. According to Muslim sources, between late 1991 and early 1992, the JNA supplied arms to many Serb villages, including Brezani, Podravanje, Orahovica and Ratkovici. Allegedly, every Serb in the region of Srebrenica was armed.⁴⁷⁴ It has also been reported that Serbs held army exercises in the area of Fakovici in early 1992.⁴⁷⁵

A year had passed since the elections, and the SDA and SDS had still failed to reached any agreement about the distribution of directors’ posts in various firms in Srebrenica. At this stage, ⁴⁷⁰ Burg and Shoup, The war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, pp.73-79; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p.87; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.24; Masic, Srebrenica, p.27; Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.87.

⁴⁷¹ Masic, Srebrenica, pp.26-7; Oric, Srebrenica, p.36. Several SDS activists from Srebrenica and Bratunac were involved in establishing and administering the Autonomous Region of Biraè, such as Goran Zekic, Miroslav Deronjic, Miodrag Stanislavljevic, and Milenko Èanic. Oric’s book contains the minutes of the SAO Biraè meeting on 5 February 1992 in Milici, where the discussion focused on closer ties to Serbia in economic policy as well as in the media (Oric, Srebrenica, pp.28-34).

⁴⁷² See Oric, Srebrenica, pp.12-13. Interview: Boban Tomic 11/11/1999. During the war, Dukic made huge profits by circumventing the sanctions imposed on Serbia, trafficking oil and expensive western consumer goods. Republika Srpska was exempted from the embargo and Boksit Milici, which also had an office in the centre of Belgrade, could freely buy oil and other products abroad. See Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, pp.178-82

⁴⁷³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.141.

⁴⁷⁴ Some Serbs refused to take up arms against their Muslim neighbours. Muslim sources report cases of Serbs, who gave the weapons they had received from the JNA to Muslims when the war first broke out. See Masic, Srebrenica, pp.23,27.

⁴⁷⁵ Interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

divisions deepened within the SDA, with Mustafic and Efendic on one side and Ibisevic on the other. In his book, Ibisevic accuses Mustafic and Efendic of trafficking in arms and other dubious activities. This entire situation caused great dissatisfaction among the Muslim population in the villages along the Drina, as Efendic did not deliver the arms he had promised to them. Evidence of the abuse of the arms monopoly was piling up: Efendic and Tihic were selling arms only to those who had money, and not to those who needed them. Efendic also abused his position as local SDA President by opening a newsstand in Potocari called 'sDA'. Initially, many people thought it was an SDA party booth, but it was merely Efendic's private stand. Ibisevic claims that Efendic, unwilling to face growing criticism of his doings, refused to call any further meetings of the SDA's local Executive Council, thus paralysing the party's work.⁴⁷⁶

Radio Srebrenica was another bone of contention, in this case between Serbs and Muslims. As the director of the Culture House, Bosko Milovanovic, a Serb, was officially in charge of the station. And he employed only Serb journalists (including Momèilo Cvjetinovic and Marinko 'Kokeza' Sekulic). One Muslim was employed as a technician. Muslim nationalists claimed that Radio Srebrenica followed a pro-Serbian policy, and that it had become a propaganda instrument. In response, Ibisevic decided to bring it under SDA control. The municipal council suspended work at the radio station until a new, Muslim team was nominated. In late November 1991, all Serb journalists were dismissed and a Muslim became the chief editor. This decision was communicated to Milovanovic, who simply ignored it. In the end, the police closed the station down and sealed it.⁴⁷⁷ In his crusade against Bosko Milovanovic, Ibisevic also accused him of financial embezzlement and theft, which he claims was later proven during an investigation. SDS leaders, Goran Zekic and Milenko Èanic, begged Ibisevic to stop his campaign, but Ibisevic refused. Zekic admitted that Milovanovic was a thief, but pointed out that he was not the only one in Srebrenica, and that it would be unfair to persecute only him.⁴⁷⁸

In December 1991, Bosnia-Herzegovina applied for diplomatic recognition by the European Community. The EC stipulated that a referendum, which was to be held on 29 February and 1 March 1992, was to settle the question of independence. The Bosnian Serbs, in their turn, proclaimed their own Republic on 9 January 1992, and declared that it was to remain part of Yugoslavia if Bosnia's independence was to be recognised by the international community. On the local level, Serbs were still in the process of forming new 'serb' municipalities. The Serb municipality of Skelani was created in December 1991. At a meeting in Kravica in early 1992, the SDS of Bratunac formed the new Serb municipality of Bratunac. Ljubisav Simic (a Serbian literature teacher) became the 'Mayor' of this Serb municipality. Rodoljub Djukanovic was appointed as the President of the Executive Council, and Milutin Milosevic as the Head of Police. With the formation of these parallel Serb institutions, the existing municipal organs, which were dominated by the SDA, were completely paralysed.⁴⁷⁹ The same happened in Vlasenica, where, in March 1992, the Serb municipality of Milici was created. The final tug-of-war between Serb and Muslim nationalists over the territories, resources, and economic assets of eastern Bosnia had started.

In January 1992, the economic factor in the Serb-Muslim conflict surfaced during a strike at the bauxite mine of Podravanje. The mine, which was located on the territory of the municipality of Srebrenica, had been opened and developed by 'Boksit Milici', but was now controlled by Muslims and run by a director who became a prominent SDA leader. According to Serb sources, he recruited Muslim employees only, completely excluding local Serbs from Podravanje from jobs in the mine.⁴⁸⁰ After JNA units arrived in Milici in late 1991, Serb miners commandeered the machines and equipment ⁴⁷⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.144-45.

⁴⁷⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.165-66; conversations Momèilo Cvjetinovic 23/06/1998 and 14-15/09/1999, Marinko Sekulic 10/11/1998 and 14/11/1998. Ibisevic claims he dismissed Serb journalists in January 1992, while Cvjetinovic has stated that this happened on 21 November 1991.

⁴⁷⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.165-169.

⁴⁷⁹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p.17. See also, Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić, p.30.

⁴⁸⁰ Interviews: Dukic 14/06/2000, Cvjetinovic 11/06/1998.

of the Podravanje mine in order to end what they felt was the ‘Muslim’ exploitation of ‘serb’ bauxite reserves.⁴⁸¹ Muslim workers showed up at the municipal office in Srebrenica to demand the return of the mine’s equipment. However, the authorities felt it too risky to send in the local police to retake possession. It was commonly known that the JNA had distributed weapons among local Serbs, and that additional paramilitary troops had arrived in Podravanje from other places.

The Serb workers of ‘Boksit’ Srebrenica formed a strike committee, demanding the resignation of the Muslim director, Mirsad Kavazbasic (who was also president of the SDA in Bratunac at the time). The committee pointed out that the ratio of Muslims to Serbs among the employees had once been fairly equal (55% to 45%), but that this had changed after Kavazbasic’s appointment as director some six years earlier. Several meetings were organised in Srebrenica and Sarajevo, but nothing helped to solve the problem. Ibisevic writes that the Serbs from Podravanje had been incited by the SDS, and that the JNA was lying in wait to intervene if things escalated. In February 1992, Serbs proposed dividing the firm and its machines and equipment. Despite attempts at a compromise solution, however, the situation remained unresolved.⁴⁸² The mine did not resume operations in the three months before the war broke out. Similar divisions emerged in the Sase mine, albeit without the far-reaching consequences seen in Podravanje. There, the Serb miners established a separate Serb trade union.⁴⁸³

On 29 January 1992, the local SDA party held its first regular assembly in Srebrenica’s Culture House. As Ibisevic observes, instead of discussing how to defend the town in the ever-approaching war, the delegates were much more preoccupied with fighting enemies among their own people. Avdo Hasanovic, a Muslim doctor and SDA Executive Board member, tried to ban his colleague, Sabit Begic, from Srebrenica’s Health Centre, as Begic was vice-president of the Social-Democratic SDP. Hasanovic proposed that the SDA assembly bar Begic from treating members of the SDA, which it accepted by acclamation. Muslim unity also fell under serious threat elsewhere. In Lijesce, tensions mounted between Ahmo Tihic and inhabitants of villages along the Drina, who complained that only a limited number of families were able to obtain weapon licenses. They claimed that Tihic ensured that others would be prevented from obtaining these licenses. Tihic’s involvement in the secret arms dealings of Hamed Efendic and Ibran Mustafic dealt yet another blow to his reputation.⁴⁸⁴ Faced with defending themselves against growing criticism from the population, these men now claimed that the worst was over, that ‘there would be no war’. They told people that it was unnecessary “to throw away money on weapons”, even though they had been selling weapons before. Ibisevic accused Mustafic and Efendic of lulling people to sleep, and of delivering all the arms available into the hands of a select few in Potocari.⁴⁸⁵

Late February 1992 witnessed the referendum on Bosnia’s independence. The SDA Mayor of Srebrenica, Ibisevic, saw this as a historical opportunity for Bosnia to acquire its own sovereign state. To achieve this higher goal, he admits his involvement in small irregularities, such as collecting the ⁴⁸¹ This was not the only case in which villages claimed ‘their’ natural resources. During the summer of 1991, the Muslim villagers of Luka stood up to the SIP ‘Drina’ forestry company, as they felt the company was exploiting local forests without giving the local population anything in return. Similar protests occurred in the Serb village of Brezani six months later. In the newly created Serb municipality of Bratunac, ‘Drina’ was also banned from chopping ‘serbian forests’. Serbs from Kravica obstructed the firm’s activities and attacked its employees. Most workers had to be discharged on involuntary leave. Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.161-62; Oric, Srebrenica, p.15. Interview: Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998.

⁴⁸² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.148-55.

⁴⁸³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.162; Oric, Srebrenica, p.15.

⁴⁸⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.156-58.

⁴⁸⁵ Ibisevic himself, however, had also contributed to this – at least to some extent. One small episode is worth mentioning here. In February 1992, a 22 mm anti-aircraft gun disappeared at the battery factory in Potoèari. In June 1990, when local Territorial Defence arsenals were emptied by the JNA, the army left the gun because it had been unable to transport it. When Stanislavljevic (head of the Territorial Defence) told Ibisevic that the JNA was going to take it, Ibisevic informed Mustafic and Efendic, who removed it. See: Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.162-63; Mandzic, ‘Zlatni Ljiljani’, p.37. Interviews Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998, Momèilo Cvjetinovic 11/06/1998.

votes of “dead souls”, i.e. of Muslims who had died but had not been removed from the list of voters.⁴⁸⁶ He also campaigned in the villages, explaining to peasants the importance of their participation in the referendum. As he recounts, he urged them “to register all people present and absent, all those dead and alive: let all of them vote for an independent Bosnia-Herzegovina - so history will not find fault with us!”⁴⁸⁷ The municipality’s Muslim population voted almost unanimously for Bosnia’s independence, while the Serbs boycotted the referendum. In Sarajevo, the referendum sent tensions between Serbs and Muslims soaring to unprecedented heights, culminating in the killing of a Serb wedding guest in the town’s old centre, and the erection of barricades by Serb gunmen. Rajko Dukic, who had become president of the SDS Crisis Committee, was closely involved with these barricades, negotiating directly with Izetbegovic and setting the conditions for their removal.⁴⁸⁸

Although war was now drawing near, the SDA Executive Board of Srebrenica did not call a meeting to discuss the situation. As no meeting had taken place for almost two months, Ibisevic went on 24 March 1992 to the SDA headquarters in Sarajevo. He discussed the situation with Omer Behmen, who bore primary responsibility for SDA problems at the municipal level. Ibisevic also met with Hasan Èengic, who was surprised to hear from Ibisevic that Srebrenica was unprepared for war. He had been informed by Hamed Efendic that the SDA in Srebrenica was ready. They also discovered that Ibisevic had not received the gun sent to him by SDA headquarters. Other weapon deliveries from the SDA Headquarters to Srebrenica had ended up in the hands of people who traded them away on the black market. Èengic then gave instructions to Ibisevic to organise the town’s defence. In a telephone conversation the very same day, he urged Efendic to call a meeting of the SDA Executive Board immediately. Efendic set up a five-member SDA crisis committee, which never met again simply because it was too late and events accelerated rapidly out of control.⁴⁸⁹

At this stage, the local security situation worsened by the day. At a meeting for workers of the SIP ‘Drina’ forestry company in Zeleni Jadar, Ibran Mustafic demonstrated his talent for demagoguery once again. He told everyone present that the time had finally come to settle accounts with the Serbs, whom he accused of all kinds of economic crime and sabotage. He did not realise that Serb workers were present at the meeting. Naturally, they informed Miodrag Jokic about the matter. Jokic, in turn, passed on the information to the Serbian press, which published stories of Muslims in Srebrenica preparing for a massacre of Serbs on the Muslim holiday of Bajram.⁴⁹⁰ Many Serbs decided to flee from Srebrenica. Parents took their children out of school, and many abandoned their jobs and left town. SDS leaders, such as Miodrag Jokic, urged Serbs to take refuge in Serbia in order to avoid the Bajram ‘massacre’ that Muslims were allegedly preparing for the Serbs.⁴⁹¹ The Muslims of Srebrenica watched with growing alarm as their Serb neighbours packed their belongings and left for Serbia, loading furniture, electrical equipment, and even windows, doors and posts onto trucks. These developments struck fear in the hearts of the Muslim population, as they felt they had nowhere to go.⁴⁹²

⁴⁸⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.159.

⁴⁸⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p.163.

⁴⁸⁸ Dukic’s company, Boksit Milici had a branch office in the Holiday Inn hotel in Sarajevo, which became the SDS nerve centre at the start of the war. Mirko Krajisnik, brother of SDS heavyweight, Momèilo Krajisnik, was head of the Boksit Milici office in Sarajevo. In interviews, Dukic has minimised his role, claiming that the barricades were erected entirely spontaneously. He also denies widespread accusations that his company played a crucial role in financing the SDS, embezzling oil from the republican reserves of BiH in early 1992, and purchasing weapons. For Dukic’s role, see: Andjelic, ‘Poplacen je bio spreman’; Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p.118; Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, p.193; documents from the Rajko Dukic collection: Obavjestenje kriznog staba srpskog naroda BiH, dated 02/03/1992, and Magnetofonski snimak 56. sjednice Predsjedništva SRBiH, održane 2. marta 1992. godine, dated 02/03/1992; interviews: Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998; Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998.

⁴⁸⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.170-72.

⁴⁹⁰ Interviews: Marinko Sekulic 10/11/1998, Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998. Later, in May, in an interview with Ilustrovana politika, Jokic claimed that Muslims intended to kill all Serbs during a joint SDA-SDS meeting in Hotel Domavija, which was planned for 6 April, the first day of the Bajram celebrations (Milanovic ‘Ubice su medju nama!’).

⁴⁹¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp.173-74. Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp.334-336.

⁴⁹² Interview: Abdulah Purkovic, 04/02/1998.

Chapter 6

War In Eastern Bosnia

“Novi borci, novi praznici, novi sveci”

(New fighters, new holidays, new saints)

Dobrisav Koèevic, former Communist official of Srebrenica, in NIOD interview 26/06/1998

[Interviewer:] Do you believe in the church and in God?

[Arkan:] Yes I believe. Didn't you see my cross?

[Interviewer:] No, I didn't.

[Arkan:] Here, I will show you, this is the cross of the Serbian Volunteer Guard made of 34.5 grams of gold. I take it always with me. Here, you see the date when the guard was created. I can tell you, there are quite a few bishops who are envious of my cross.

Zeljko Raznjatovic 'Arkan' in an interview with journalist Dusica Milanovic, November 1992⁴⁹³

Recognition of Bosnia's independence and fights in Bijeljina

In late March 1992, just days before the European Community recognised Bosnia's independence (on 6 April), heavy fighting broke out in Bijeljina. Situated in northeastern Bosnia not far from the Serbian and Croatian border, this small town had a mixed population (the majority of which were Muslim). Even during 1991, when war was sweeping across Croatia, Bijeljina had been strategically important because of its location on the transit route between Serbia and the Krajina, from which Serbs in Croatia were supplied with arms. From the very onset of the war in Croatia in August 1991, the situation in Bijeljina was very tense. Serb gunmen established roadblocks and checkpoints and by the end of the year, they were levying tolls on vehicles passing through Bijeljina. Once the war in Croatia ended, in January 1992, Serb paramilitary forces crossed over into Bosnia, further exacerbating the situation. These forces were scattered around Serb-dominated areas, at the flashpoints of possible future conflicts, mainly in the northern and eastern parts of the country. Among them were the Arkan Tigers who established their presence in Bijeljina several weeks before the outbreak of the war.

On 31 March 1992, Arkan sent more troops from Serbia across the Drina. He attacked Bijeljina, making short work of a small Muslim militia that had been organized by the SDA. The SDA forces consisted partly of what were called muhadžeri, i.e. new settlers in Bijeljina who came from much more backward areas, such as Srebrenica and Bratunac.⁴⁹⁴ These Muslim militants fought back for about three days, erecting barricades and placing snipers on several high buildings in the town's centre. By 2 April, however, almost all barricades and sniper nests had been eliminated, and the next day, Bijeljina fell under full Serb control. JNA troops stationed not far from Bijeljina stayed inside their barracks on receiving orders from Belgrade not to intervene. The local police, who had formed mixed Serb-Muslim patrols to keep the situation in check, also decided not to intervene in what was basically a battle between Muslim and Serb nationalist paramilitary forces. Once the Muslim militia fled Bijeljina, the Tigers and other local militia went from house to house, looting the Muslim homes and killing some of the inhabitants. According to press reports, at least forty-two people, almost all Muslims, died during these events. (Other sources place the death tolls in the several hundreds, though these figures appear to be grossly overestimated). Bodies were left lying in the streets, and were only removed when the fighting stopped. An SDS crisis committee took control of the local government with assurances that 'loyal' Muslims would not be harmed. Serb and Muslim inhabitants, who had fled the town to surrounding villages or to Serbia, began returning to their homes. During the following weekend, local Muslims celebrated the feast of bajram. Tensions diminished after Arkan's announcement on the local radio that everyone who had not participated in the fighting would be safe. "Let honourable Muslims," said Arkan, "freely make their famous pita-s at home today, and let them invite us. We will be their guests, because we have been their liberators as well. To Mr. Izetbegovic we want to say that he has bad advisors and that there will be no chance to establish a mujahedin state in this part of Europe".⁴⁹⁵

⁴⁹³ Milanovic, 'Arkanov srpski san'.

⁴⁹⁴ Borba, 1992-04-03, p. 3.

The Serb attack on Bijeljina prompted the Bosnian presidency to call for a general mobilisation. It decided to allow municipalities that were under Serb threat to raise Territorial Defence forces and to arm the population. In Sarajevo, paramilitary groups of both sides appeared on the streets. The Serbian media, in turn, accused the Bosnian presidency of being "selective" in its concern, saying it responded only to the clashes in Bijeljina yet ignored similar events in Kupres, Bosanski Brod and in the Neretva valley, where the main victims were Serbs.⁴⁹⁶ Unlike other eastern Bosnian towns, Bijeljina was not immediately cleansed of its Muslim population. Most Muslims were allowed to stay, and tried to establish a modus vivendi with the new SDS authorities. To avoid trouble, many Muslims decided to change their names into Serbian ones. Some Muslims converted to Orthodoxy to ensure they would not be expelled from their homes. (Others were forcibly 'baptised' in mock rituals by Serb paramilitaries, as documented in film footage of Bijeljina). Most Muslims remained in the town until the Serb SDS authorities started to expel its non-Serb inhabitants in 1993 and 1994.⁴⁹⁷

Three days after the Serbs took Bijeljina, the European Community recognised Bosnia's independence. This triggered the beginning of a full-scale war. Sarajevo became the focus of world attention. On 5 April, Serb snipers opened fire from the Holiday Inn hotel in Sarajevo, killing half a dozen people demonstrating for peace in the streets of the Bosnian capital. The Holiday Inn was the seat of the SDS crisis committee, which was headed by Boksit Milici, director Rajko Dukic.⁴⁹⁸ On 6 April 1992, after the SDS left its Sarajevo headquarters, the shelling of the town began. Izetbegovic declared a state of emergency. The next day, the Bosnian Serbs proclaimed the Serb Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina (SRBiH), later to be renamed Republika Srpska. Immediately, they claimed two thirds of Bosnia's territory. In what appears to have been one massive military effort coordinated from Belgrade, local Serb militia, paramilitary forces from Serbia, and JNA forces took control of seventy percent of Bosnian territory in just a few weeks. Eastern Bosnia was invaded by paramilitary troops and the JNA, who launched an assault on towns along the Drina. SDS crisis committees were established all ⁴⁹⁵ Borba, 1992-04-06, p. 4. For the events in Bijeljina see: Silber and Little, The death of Yugoslavia, pp. 247-48; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 96-97; Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p. 119; Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a: 136-138; Zafirovic, 'susret'. I also consulted press reports in Politika and Borba.

⁴⁹⁶ For these other clashes, see: Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p. 119; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 42-51.

⁴⁹⁷ For the situation in Bijeljina in 1993 and 1994, see the Humanitarian Law Center reports, 'Bijeljina' and 'Banja Luka and Bijeljina'. See also Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, p. 15. Conversation with: Slavica Stančić 09/11/1999.

⁴⁹⁸ Dukic played a crucial role on the eve and during the beginning of the war. Trucks from 'Boksit' were used to erect barricades in Zvornik before the town was attacked and run over by Serb paramilitaries and the JNA (Bassiouni, Final report, Annex IV, pp. 45-46). At the ICTY, in the Dragan Nikolic case, two Muslim witnesses named him as one of the main organisers of the take-over of Vlasenica in April 1992 (ICTY 12-10-95). See also Stamenkovic, 'Opet ce se Dukic pitati'.

over Serb-held Bosnia to plan and carry out the ethnic cleansing of non-Serbs. These committees were assisted in this by the JNA and various paramilitary forces from Serbia and Montenegro.⁴⁹⁹

The UN Final Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), published by the head of that commission, Cherif Bassiouni, provides a detailed picture of the organization of this campaign of ethnic cleansing and the almost symbiotic nature of the cooperation between the army, local militia and paramilitary groups.⁵⁰⁰ Typically, the JNA took possession of strategic positions and then proceeded to shell Muslim settlements, after which the paramilitaries entered. In many cases, Serb inhabitants would receive notice in advance to leave the area. Once the paramilitaries took control of a town or village, they began terrorizing the non-Serb population, killing innocent civilians and looting their homes. They did this with help from members of the local SDS crisis committees, who pointed out which houses to target. Local administration was taken over by the SDS crisis committees, often in conjunction with the paramilitary groups. Finally, non-Serbs were detained and evicted, and their property confiscated.⁵⁰¹

As the Bassiouni report notes, Serb combatants, including those in the regular army, usually did not wear distinctive uniforms, recognisable emblems or insignias of rank. Officers freely moved from army to militia and from one unit to another, and the command structures were unclear even to insiders. What had emerged was “a multiplicity of combatant forces” operating within different command structures or without any structure at all, merging and cooperating in ad hoc combinations during specific operations. Although local Serb TO forces had a separate command structure, they frequently operated within the framework of the regular army and under regular army command. At times, however, they also operated independently of the army. According to the report, the unclear and hazy chains of command helped to conceal responsibility, and provided a shield of plausible deniability. This situation “seems to have been purposely kept that way for essential political reasons”.⁵⁰²

A crucial role was reserved for various paramilitary groups. These consisted of armed bands and ‘special (police) forces’ from Serbia, as well as local (police) forces augmented by small groups of armed civilians. The latter groups were active in their own towns and villages under local SDS leadership. The former groups, however, were mobile forces operating throughout all of what was once Yugoslavia, springing into action as soon as war swept over a particular region. (This was mainly the case in Croatia and Bosnia, and later also in Kosovo). They received weapons from and were trained by the Serbian Ministry of the Interior, yet these links were not always publicly known and they were usually denied both by government officials and paramilitary leaders.⁵⁰³ The first paramilitary units were established towards the end of 1990, at a time when non-Serbs were still recruited into the JNA. As it was unclear what the JNA’s role would be in the case of future armed conflicts, many nationalist politicians in Serbia (but also in Croatia and Bosnia) decided to create their own armed forces.⁵⁰⁴ Only after the war broke out in Slovenia and Croatia did the JNA transform itself into a Serbian army. And instead of defending the integrity and constitutional order of Yugoslavia, that army now served the interests of Serbs outside Serbia in republics that wanted independence. During this period, non-Serbs were walking out on the army en masse, leaving the JNA with serious personnel and recruitment problems. Unsuccessful efforts to mobilise reservists only added to the recruitment problem. By and large, Serb reservists had little inclination to join the army and morale was at an historic low after the JNA’s

⁴⁹⁹ Human Rights Watch, Bosnia and Herzegovina, pp. 4-5.

⁵⁰⁰ The ‘Bassiouni report’ is a study of the first years of the Bosnian war, and includes several annexes on, among other things, the military structure of the ‘warring factions’ and the strategies and tactics employed by them, the policy of ethnic cleansing, the establishment of prison and concentration camps, and the destruction of public and cultural property. The report also gives a day-to-day account of the siege of Sarajevo (until 1994) and includes case studies of ethnic cleansing in the towns of Prijedor and Zvornik (by Serb forces), and in the Medak pocket (by Croat forces).

⁵⁰¹ See also Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, p. 9-10.

⁵⁰² Bassiouni, Final report, pp. 30-32.

⁵⁰³ Bassiouni, Final report, pp. 31-32. For the intimate links between the paramilitaries and Milosevic’s regime (particularly the Serbian Ministry of the Interior) and the Yugoslav Army, see Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case (especially pp. 34-54).

⁵⁰⁴ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex summaries and conclusions, p. 11.

humiliating military defeat in Slovenia in June 1991. The army needed the paramilitaries, and in July 1991, the JNA High Command took the (secret) decision to grant volunteers full status as members of the armed forces. With this decision, the JNA opened its gates to the paramilitaries, as well as to extreme nationalist ‘believers’, right-wing militants, and ordinary criminals.⁵⁰⁵

Aside from the plethora of small bands, the most well-known and notorious of the paramilitary groups were the Serbian Volunteer Guard, better known as the Arkan Tigers, Seselj’s Chetnik Movement, and the White Eagles. The Arkan Tigers were established in October 1990 by Zeljko Raznjatovic, alias ‘Arkan’. A former bank robber, Raznjatovic had also carried out assassinations for the Yugoslav secret police abroad. Initially, the Arkan Tigers operated illegally. In August 1991, however, Arkan became the commander of a paramilitary training centre in Erdut (Slavonia) under the auspices of the Serbian Ministry of the Interior – particularly Radovan ‘Badza’ Stojić, a former policeman and confidant of Milosevic. Arkan recruited his men mainly from the Red Star Belgrade supporters club, of which he was president.⁵⁰⁶ The Arkan Tigers fought in Croatia and later also in Bosnia. They were armed with tanks, mortars, sniper guns, machine guns and other modern infantry arms, and were also highly mobile.⁵⁰⁷ During their operations they often received artillery and logistic support from the JNA. The Tigers had a reputation for being extremely ruthless, and as they formed the vanguard of the attacking forces, they were first in line to loot. In general, all paramilitary groups sustained themselves primarily through looting, theft, ransom and trafficking.

Vojislav Seselj, the leader of the extreme rightwing, nationalist Serbian Radical Party, created his own paramilitary forces in late 1990. In April 1991, he carried out his first operation in Borovo Selo near Vukovar in Croatia, attacking a police patrol and killing several Croatian policemen. Later, Seselj participated in the ethnic cleansing operations in Bosnia and in Serb actions against Muslim forces around Srebrenica in late 1992.⁵⁰⁸ The third major paramilitary group was the White Eagles, led by ultra-nationalist intellectual, Dragoslav Bokan. Initially, the White Eagles had ties with Mirko Jovic’s SNO (Serbian National Renewal). A rightwing party, the SNO had played an active role in stirring up Serb nationalist sentiment in eastern Bosnia (for instance, in Milici) before the war.⁵⁰⁹ During the war, they participated in the killing and looting in Vukovar, the counties of Zvornik and Visegrad, and other Bosnian and Croatian counties. They also worked together with the JNA, Serb TO forces and local police, as well as other paramilitary groups.⁵¹⁰ The Bassiouni report estimates the total number of paramilitaries that fought in Bosnia and Croatia during the first years of the war to fall between 20,000 to 40,000.⁵¹¹

Although these forces usually fell under the army’s chain of command, the JNA failed to restrain them from committing war crimes against civilians. The lack of effective control over the army is among the factors contributing to the numerous excesses. However, as Bassiouni points out, it was probably also part of a deliberate policy of ethnic cleansing aimed at ridding strategic areas – linking Serbia proper with Serb-inhabited areas in Bosnia and Croatia – of their non-Serb populations as ⁵⁰⁵ See Ciric, ‘svi smo mi dobrovoljci’; Vasic, ‘The Yugoslav Army’, p. 128, 134; Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, pp. 29-30. Some sources say that only fifty percent of Serb reservists obeyed summons to report for army duty. In Belgrade, this figure was a mere fifteen. Many men of military age went into hiding. Moreover, thousands of those who were involuntarily mobilised (particularly from the province of Vojvodina) deserted, usually ending up in Hungary or other European countries. See: Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p. 84.

⁵⁰⁶ For Arkan, see also Bassiouni, Final report, p. 76; Annex III.A, p. 31; Annex IV, p. 33; Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, p. 14-15, 68-69, 80; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 97-98; Vujasinovic, ‘Ratnik’, ‘Pedagoska poema’; Komlenovic, ‘Arkanzas’; Nerazzini, ‘Ko stiti’; Thomas, Serbia, pp. 94-95.

⁵⁰⁷ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a: 24.

⁵⁰⁸ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a, p. 23; Andonovski ‘Odmah bih isao u Hag’; Thomas, Serbia, pp. 96-98; Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, pp. 13, 15-16.

⁵⁰⁹ Malenica, ‘Pustite nas’.

⁵¹⁰ For Dragoslav Bokan’s White Eagles, see Glenny, The Fall of Yugoslavia, p. 39; Thomas, Serbia, pp. 95-96; Anastasijevic, ‘Èerupanje orlova’; Williams and Cigar, A prima facie case, p. 16; Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a, pp. 130-32.

⁵¹¹ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex Summaries and Conclusions, p. 14. For an overview of paramilitary groups, see Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a - Special Forces.

swiftly and efficiently as possible.⁵¹² Instead of organising ‘decent’ deportations of unwanted populations, Serb officials relied on terror and brutality to drive Muslims away and strip them of any desire to ever return.⁵¹³ An unbridled army also permitted senior military and political leaders to claim they were unaware of such brutal violence or were unable to control it, as it was carried out largely by criminals, former prisoners, urban dropouts, uneducated young people from rural areas, and other individuals in the margins of society for some reason or other. Acts of brutality and savagery were publicized by the perpetrators to maximize the effect of the terror. This not only caused Muslims to flee, but also had another convenient side-effect: it intimidated other Serbs into submission. No one in his right mind would dream of confronting these people, or even worse, of reaping the material benefits of ethnic cleansing, of dipping into the booty once the dirty part of the whole job had been done.⁵¹⁴ All of these developments and circumstances appear to have been part of a deliberate policy that was planned and coordinated by Bosnian Serb politicians with the support and direct and indirect involvement of the Yugoslav government and the JNA.⁵¹⁵ As Cornelia Sorabji writes, although much of the violence was neither bureaucratic nor centralised, and although it appeared to be the disorganised work of ‘out-of-control’ extremists, the context was in fact organised. The violence stemmed from a kind of ‘franchise organisation,’ in which general aims were established at the top, and specific details were left to local initiative. Small politicians and commanders were free to organize the violence in their respective regions, allowing local ‘freelancers’ to inject their own individual sadistic methods.⁵¹⁶

In spite of the regional variation, patterns and practices were similar in the separate theatres of operation. As noted in Bassiouni’s report, the existence of a deliberate policy of ethnic cleansing was also indicated by the wholesale and surreptitious departure of Serb populations living in areas soon up for ‘ethnic cleansing’. In light of the facts, the report observes the following: “There is sufficient evidence to conclude that the practices of ‘ethnic cleansing’ were not coincidental, sporadic or carried out by disorganized groups or bands of civilians who could not be controlled by the Bosnian-Serb leadership. Indeed, the patterns of conduct, the manner in which these acts were carried out, the length of time over which they took place and the areas in which they occurred combine to reveal a purpose, systematicity and some planning and coordination from higher authorities. Furthermore, these practices are carried out by persons from all segments of the Serbian population in the areas described: members of the army, militias, special forces, the police and civilians. Lastly, the Commission notes that these unlawful acts are often heralded by the perpetrators as positive, patriotic accomplishments”.⁵¹⁷

The Drina valley campaign

[Interviewer:] Where did you get this [martial] talent?

[Arkan:] I am from a warrior house. I have an ancestor, called Jokelj Raznjatovic, who once, during the Serbo-Turkish war, cut seventeen Turkish heads off and seized two Turkish banners

⁵¹² Bassiouni, Final report, pp. 33-34. The term ‘ethnic cleansing’ is defined here as: rendering an area ethnically homogenous by using force or intimidation to remove from a given area persons from another ethnic or religious group. This definition was presented by Bassiouni, Final report, Annex IV.

⁵¹³ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex summaries and conclusions, p. 21; Annex IV, p. 9. See also Vasic, ‘The Yugoslav Army’, p. 134.

⁵¹⁴ Interview: Filip Svarm, Dejan Anastasijevic and Aleksandar Ciric, 03/11/1997; Bassiouni, Final report, p. 34.

⁵¹⁵ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex IV, p. 21.

⁵¹⁶ Sorabji, ‘A very modern war’, pp. 86-87.

⁵¹⁷ Bassiouni, Final report, p. 35.

Zeljko Raznjatovic 'Arkan' in an interview with journalist, Dusica Milanovic, November 1992.⁵¹⁸

“The present generation of Serbs is conscious of the fact that they are predestined and obliged to accomplish the centuries-old dreams of their ancestors, and to finally bring the old myths, ideals, and aspirations to life”.

BSA General, Milan Gvero quoted in the local Serb newspaper of Bratunac, Nasa Rijec, 12/01/1993, p.1.

When the Bosnian war first started, one of the main objectives of the Serb campaign was to take control of the border areas along the Drina. Eastern Bosnia formed a vital link between the Serb-inhabited lands of Bosnia, it was part of this arch of 'serb' territory (from Foča, via Visegrad, Bratunac, Zvornik, and Bijeljina, to Banja Luka and Prijedor) that the Serbs wanted to include in a Greater Serbia. As in the first Serbian uprising, Serbs wanted to create a continuous territory, linking eastern Hercegovina and Romanija with the Bosnian Krajina, and both areas with Serbia proper. Not surprisingly, therefore, the first major Serb military campaign, the Drina campaign, focused on seizing full control over eastern Bosnia. The Arkan Tigers carried out this campaign, with the help of other paramilitary groups and the government of Serbia (particularly the Ministry of the Interior). The authorities in Belgrade supplied the paramilitary groups and special forces with weapons, equipment, uniforms, army maps, and vehicles.⁵¹⁹ The JNA was directly involved in the operations, providing support in various ways, including by bombarding and shelling Muslim areas.⁵²⁰

Once Bijeljina was taken, Serb forces moved southward along the Drina to the Muslim town of Janja, and then to Zvornik. At around the same time, Visegrad and Foča, two other major towns along the Drina, were attacked by forces from Serbia. Strategically, Zvornik was almost as crucial as Bijeljina, because of its rail and road bridges over the Drina, linking Bosnia and Serbia, and connecting Belgrade and Sarajevo. It was also economically vital due to the large hydroelectric dam a few kilometres south of the town and the huge alumina plant, which processed bauxite from Milici. On 6 April, the Zvornik branch of the SDS established a separate Serb police station in Karakaj, from where they blocked the entrance into town. On 7 April, TV Belgrade broadcast the news of an impending attack by Muslim extremists. Then, on 8 April, the Arkan Tigers, joined by JNA forces and special commando units of Serbia's Ministry of the Interior positioned themselves on the Serbian side of the Drina. They gave the town's Muslims an ultimatum to surrender, but received no response. As a result, the Yugoslav artillery opened fire on Zvornik from Serbia that same evening. Most Muslim leaders, including Asim Jazbasic, leader of the moderate SDA 'town' faction, fled to Tuzla. At the same time, two hundred Muslim fighters retreated to Kulagrad, the old Turkish castle above Zvornik, from where they fought a long battle against Serb forces.⁵²¹

The next day, the Arkan Tigers, special police units of the Serbian Ministry of Interior, and various other paramilitary groups (Seselj's Chetniks, the White Eagles, the Yellow Ants, and the Panthers of Ljubisa Savic 'Mauzer' from Bijeljina), entered Zvornik. Thousands of civilians fled to the forests, while the paramilitaries searched every house and apartment, stealing money and other valuables and killing any Muslims they encountered. For days, life in Zvornik was dominated by marauding, uncontrolled groups of paramilitaries. Some sources claim that during the assault on ⁵¹⁸ Milanovic, 'Arkanov srpski san'

⁵¹⁹ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex summaries and conclusions, p. 15.

⁵²⁰ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex Summaries and Conclusions, p. 4-5.

⁵²¹ Hamzic, Zvornik, pp. 193-223.

Zvornik, several hundred Muslims were murdered, and 42,000 were expelled from their homes.⁵²² Among the victims were the deputy director of the spa resort, 'Guber' in Srebrenica, Boban Vasic (a Serb) and his two Muslim drivers. On 11 April, after having returned patients to Zvornik, they were arrested by paramilitaries at a roadblock on their way back to Srebrenica. The paramilitaries imprisoned, interrogated and tortured them for the next two days. Vasic was released and brought to Serbia, while his two Muslim drivers were killed.⁵²³ Fights continued in Kulagrad, where Muslims managed to hold out until 26 April 1992. When the situation calmed down, the SDS called on Muslims to return. Although this appeared to be a good sign, it was in fact the beginning of a process of administrative ethnic cleansing: those who came back were arrested and forced to sign their property over to the Serb District of Zvornik as a precondition for their release. Moreover, from May on, the entire Muslim population of villages surrounding Zvornik were deported, many of them to Hungary, through Serbia, and others to Tuzla.⁵²⁴

The attacks on Foča and Visegrad occurred almost simultaneously with the one on Zvornik, though it took more effort to seize control of Visegrad. On 6 April 1992, Serbs started to shell the town. JNA tanks and artillery pieces were moved in from Serbia. Muslim villages on the right side of the Drina were torched and Muslim refugees streamed into town. The Muslim defenders of the town held out for some three days before their commander, Murat Sabanovic, withdrew and retreated to the hydroelectric dam with sixty of his men and several Serb hostages.⁵²⁵ In an attempt to stop the army's advance towards the town, he threatened to blow up the dam, which would cause massive, devastating floods that could wash away whole villages downstream. For several days, the inhabitants of the Drina valley remained anxious of a possible torrent that could also affect major towns such as Bajina Basta, Bratunac and Zvornik. Peasants living along the Drina packed their things and headed for higher ground, taking most of their cattle with them. Serbian television brought the hysteria to a boil in an effort to convince Serbs in Serbia that Muslims intended to commit genocide against the Bosnian Serbs.

After Serb commandos took the dam, the JNA entered Visegrad's suburbs on 13 April, together with special police forces and various paramilitary groups. One or two days later, they took control of the town. The head of the local SDS was appointed as President of the new Serb district. Once the fighting stopped, the JNA called on the numerous Muslims who had fled in the direction of Gorazde to return home, which most did. The ethnic cleansing of the Muslim population started in earnest only a month later, when the army left as part of the general 'withdrawal' of JNA forces from Bosnia. (These forces were replaced by the newly established Bosnian Serb Army). Under the command of local Serb, Milan Lukic, paramilitaries from Serbia and local irregulars started to expel and kill the Muslim inhabitants and plunder their homes. Many Muslims were deported to central Bosnia, or to Macedonia via Bajina Basta (where Lukic's distant cousin, Mikailo, commanded a special police unit). The killing continued for the next two months. So many dead bodies floated down the Drina that people gave up trout fishing in the river for the next three summers.⁵²⁶ Foča saw similar gruesome scenes. Here, Serbs established a network of detention centres, where many Muslim civilians were detained and tortured. Foča became particularly notorious for its rape camps.⁵²⁷ ⁵²² Bassiouni, Final report, Annex IV, pp. 36-62; Annex III.a, pp. 70,76-77,80; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 100-01).

⁵²³ Interview: Boban Vasic 06/07/1998. See also Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 148-49.

⁵²⁴ Bassiouni, Final report, Annex summaries and conclusions, pp. 22-23; Annex IV.

⁵²⁵ Sabanovic had made himself a hero among nationalist Muslims as early on as 1991. In his home town of Visegrad, he destroyed the monument to Ivo Andric, the Nobel prize winning Bosnian writer, who was unpopular among Muslims because his portrayals of them in his writings (Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p. 90).

⁵²⁶ For a detailed account of the events in Visegrad, see Kljun, Visegrad, pp. 246-305; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 101-04 and 120-25. See also Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 74-78.

⁵²⁷ Human Rights Watch, Bosnia and Herzegovina, p. 4.

Srebrenica on the brink of war

“When I was young, I really loved cowboy films. From them I learned my first lessons about morale. I particularly liked the endings, when the main hero kills all bad guys, various plunderers, vagabonds and other communists, and when the town’s population gathers and offers him the sheriff’s star; he smiles, mounts his horse, and leaves. I think I will know to choose the right moment to climb my horse”.

Miroslav Deronjic, President of the SDS in Bratunac, in an interview for the local newspaper Nasa Rijec, May 1994.⁵²⁸

All major towns along the Drina were taken by the Serb forces, making the Drina valley campaign a major success. Even so, there were still several towns and numerous villages with a majority Muslim population that Serb forces had bypassed. (These included Srebrenica, Zepa, and Cerska). The geographic characteristics and settlement patterns of the area are significant in understanding why this happened.⁵²⁹ Eastern Bosnia is very hilly and rugged. Road connections only exist between major towns, whereas villages and hamlets often lie hidden away in isolation in the mountains. Paved roads in this region are few and far between. As a result, these settlements are difficult to reach, especially in bad weather (e.g. during winter or heavy rains). While distances between settlements may be technically small when viewed as a straight line on the map, actual travel times can be considerable. This is due to the inevitable detours along inferior mountain roads and narrow, winding and unpaved tracks. In addition, as discussed before, settlements are relatively small in size. Before the war began, villages usually contained no more than a few hundred inhabitants. Moreover, they were ethnically homogenous for the most part, which explains why it was easy for most combatants born in the region to discriminate between Serb and Muslim settlements. The small size of rural settlements also made it difficult to organise an effective defence against outside attacks. Enemy villages were usually easy targets for armed groups on each side. Srebrenica itself is located at the end of a narrow valley, surrounded by high, heavily forested hills. Approaching the town, the valley narrows and the surrounding hills rise ever higher and steeper. The highest hill, Kvarac, towers above the town at 1014 metres and lies only two to three kilometres from the town’s centre.

After the Serbs took control over the major towns, they began consolidating their grip over the rest of eastern Bosnia by clearing out these more isolated patches. The war started to affect Bratunac and Srebrenica only after the Drina valley campaign was complete. Muslim chroniclers, Nijaz Masic and Besim Ibisevic, describe these events in great detail.⁵³⁰ In early April, bad news from Bijeljina and Zvornik prompted Muslims in Bratunac and Srebrenica to flee towards Tuzla. Most Serbs went to friends or relatives in nearby Serbia, as did a number of Muslims. Some returned during the day to go to work. On the instigation of the SDS, local Serb children, women and elderly people were transferred en masse, which served to clear the schools of any Serb children. This situation continued for almost a week.⁵³¹ The local economy, as well as municipal services, ground to a halt as increasingly fewer people showed up to work. Ibisevic writes that people simply left without giving any notice. They just disappeared. By 11 April, only 20 out of a staff of over 110 civil servants at the municipality of ⁵²⁸ Pilovanovic, ‘Mi udaramo’.

⁵²⁹ I would like to thank Endre Bojtar who first pointed this out to me (conversation 28/05/1997).

⁵³⁰ During the war, Masic was head of the Commission for the Investigation of War Crimes in Srebrenica, as well as Assistant Commander for morale in the Srebrenica division of the ABiH. He is a historian by profession. The information compiled by this commission were included in Naser Oric’s as well as in both of Masic’s books.

⁵³¹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 31-32.

Srebrenica were still in town.⁵³² Some Muslims returned after a few days. Those who tried to come back later, encountered great difficulties passing the Serb lines.

Members of the urban elite in Bratunac and Srebrenica regarded the attempts to resist the Serb advance as futile and hopeless. In Bratunac, the SDA's efforts to set up the defence were even considered counterproductive. Some felt that the SDA was contributing in this way to a war, which Muslims were certain to lose. Popular support for organising resistance disintegrated further when Muslims from the neighbouring village of Glogova returned from Bijeljina. They came with reports of how many houses had been destroyed there because the town's Muslims had refused to surrender, while the small town of Janja was left untouched because most of its Muslims had handed over all their weapons.⁵³³ Near Srebrenica, the population of several Muslim villages felt so threatened by the sporadic gunfire that they spent nights outside, organising guards to protect their houses and villages. Rumours spread that the Serbs in Fakovici kept arms and ammunition in an old school building. On 3 April, the mayor of Srebrenica, Ibisevic, went to check the location together with Miodrag Stanisavljevic, the Serb commander of the local TO. As they approached the school, they were stopped by half a dozen armed men, who confirmed that it was full of arms. But they were not allowed to inspect the building. Serb peasants were already driving their tractors and other vehicles to safety in Serbia in fear that war would soon break out. As Ibisevic observed, rumours were circulating in Bajina Basta that Muslim and Croat forces in Srebrenica were preparing for genocide against the Serbs. The commander of the local TO told Ibisevic that he had information that Muslim forces were being trained in the remote village of Luka and were preparing to attack Serbia. The JNA took positions on the Tara mountains pointing its guns at Bosnian territory. By this point, efforts to mobilise the army were underway in Bajina Basta and other Serbian towns along the border.⁵³⁴

Muslims from villages near Srebrenica came down to the town almost daily to 'besiege' the SDA office, asking for the arms that Ibran Mustafic and Hamed Efendic had once promised. Ibisevic accused Mustafic of not honouring his promises and of sacrificing Muslim villages along the Drina, keeping most of the weapons in Potoèari. Many Serbs also felt threatened. Along the Drina, villagers crossed over into Serbia in little boats every evening, to spend the night in Serbia and return in the morning to work the fields or take care of their animals. In many other Muslim and Serb villages, men organized guards at night with improvised checkpoints. In Podravanje, for instance, Serbs organised armed patrols, blocking the road between Zeleni Jadar and Milici, as well as the road to the two Muslim villages of Luka and Krusev Do, which were now practically cut off from Srebrenica. Other villages to the south and southeast of Srebrenica that depended on the road connection through Zeleni Jadar, were also affected by these armed Serb patrols. During this period, SDS and SDA leaders formed mixed teams that went to villages where the tensions ran highest. Ibran Mustafic went together with SDS hardliner, Miodrag Jokic. Besim Ibisevic paired up with Miloje Simic. They advised Serb and Muslim villagers to follow their example and form mixed patrols as well.⁵³⁵

On 6 April, Ibisevic sent out official summons to all members of the Anti-Sabotage Platoon to mobilise in preparation to defend the town. He pointed out to the unit's commander, Asim Redzic, that this also provided an opportunity to demand arms and ammunition from the Bosnian Ministry of Interior. He claimed he had received promises to that effect. He also told Redzic that he wanted him to be the commander of the future army in Srebrenica and his platoon to become the nucleus of that army. On 8 April, the Muslim members of the platoon reported for duty; the Serb members failed to appear. Redzic sent everyone back home, because, as he told Ibisevic, he did not want to become the commander of a purely Muslim unit. This earned him the grudge of the Mayor, who told him "You better go home to grow flowers of brotherhood and unity!" Ibisevic assumed that this 'indoctrinated communist' did not want to listen to orders of SDA politicians. On Monday, 6 April, Ibran Mustafic ⁵³² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 192.

⁵³³ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 29-30, 62-63.

⁵³⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 175-78; Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p. 95.

⁵³⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 180-84. Masic, Srebrenica, p. 31. Interview: Momcilo Cvjetinovic 10/06/1998.

travelled to Sarajevo to attend a meeting of the Bosnian parliament. As Ibisevic writes, however, the purpose of this trip was more to escape Muslim resentment regarding his unfulfilled promises to arm the population. Later that day, Mustafic pretended it was impossible to return to Srebrenica because the buses were no longer running.⁵³⁶

The situation in Skelani was also reaching a very critical point. On 7 April, SDA activist, Ahmo Tihic, urged Ibisevic to come to Skelani, where representatives of both the Muslim and the Serb sides were waiting in a restaurant. SDS politicians demanded a separate municipality from Skelani, and warned that 250 Bosnian Serb volunteers were waiting in Bajina Basta to cross the Drina to help them achieve this. At this point, Ibisevic walked out of the talks. Milenko Ćanic, who was present at the meeting, warned Ibisevic that he and four other SDS leaders (Goran Zekic, Miodrag Jokic, Desimir Mitrovic, and Blagomir Jovanovic) could call for immediate assistance from Serbian paramilitaries at the other side of the Drina if they felt that Serbs were under threat. As Ibisevic notes, these SDS politicians became the key figures in deciding about war and peace in that part of the municipality of Srebrenica. The next day, they took control of Skelani, paving the way for the establishment of a separate Serb municipality and a local Serb police force.⁵³⁷

Similar steps were taken in Bratunac. There, in a meeting held on 3 April, the SDS and several Serb policemen decided to create a Serb police force. In the days that followed, they began talking to individual Serb policemen to convince them to join the force. On 8 April, the SDS demanded the division of the MUP. The creation of a Serb police force was presented as a necessary measure to guarantee the security of Serb civilians. SDA leaders gave in to the enormous pressure, and legalised the formation of such a force in a meeting of the Bratunac municipal council on 9 April 1992. After the meeting, SDA and SDS politicians went for a drink in Hotel Fontana to celebrate the agreement, which they said 'saved peace' in the municipality. The next day, the Serb police set up its headquarters in the Vuk Karadzic school. Two Serbs from Bratunac living and working in Berlin, Miodrag Stevic and Sredo Aleksic, were particularly helpful in providing the equipment for the new police force.⁵³⁸ For the next eight days, before the SDS took over completely, Bratunac had two police forces. Serb policemen who had been against the creation of a separate Serb police had no choice and were pressured into joining the new force. In some cases, they were threatened by SDS members and by other newly appointed Serb policemen, some of whom had received no police training at all (but had sufficient nationalist credentials).⁵³⁹ Policemen from Srebrenica joined the Serb police in Bratunac as well, while others joined the Serb police in Skelani as soon as the SDS took over the police station there. Milutin Milosevic (from Kravica) stepped up as head of the Serb police in Bratunac, and Luka Bogdanovic was appointed as police commander. The Serb police in Bratunac immediately received new uniforms from Serbia.

Starting in early April 1992, meetings of the National Defence Secretariat (SNO) were held daily and attended by SDA as well as SDS members of the municipal council.⁵⁴⁰ Sometimes, the directors of the most important firms were present as well. In emergencies, the SNO was authorized to serve as a crisis committee and take over the town's civil administration. Under these provisions, Ibisevic – mayor and head of the SNO – would become the commander of all armed police and territorial defence forces in Srebrenica. In its meeting of 8 April, the SNO decided that six additional 'war' police stations were needed - over and above Srebrenica's police station - to maintain control in important villages. (These were the villages of Suceška, Potocari, Podravanje, Skelani, Sase and Osat).⁵⁴¹ On 9 April 1992, Ibisevic went to Ljubovija, where he noticed many paramilitaries and volunteers in JNA uniforms. Some people (unaware of his identity) told him that the JNA had placed heavy artillery on a hill above ⁵³⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 185-189.

⁵³⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 186-188; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 36.

⁵³⁸ K. Ć. 'Prava srpska milicija'; interview: Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 30-31.

⁵³⁹ Interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

⁵⁴⁰ Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998

⁵⁴¹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 188; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 32.

the town. He then went to Milos Mihajlovic, the mayor of Ljubovija, to ask him what was happening. Mihajlovic told him that he had received information that several buses with Croatian paramilitaries had arrived in Glogova (a Muslim village between Kravica and Bratunac), to create a Muslim Drina brigade. The JNA and volunteers had come to protect the town and its industrial zone near the Drina. Ibisevic then invited him and the mayors of Bratunac (Nijaz Dubiëic) and Bajina Basta (Milos Jelisavëic) to attend a public meeting in Srebrenica the next day. The purpose of this meeting was to discuss actions against the wild rumours and growing war fever. Despite promises, nobody showed up, which was a bad omen and clear sign that war was imminent.⁵⁴²

Anxiety increased as the last reliable source of information had disappeared at the very beginning of the war when Serb extremists blew up the television mast on Kvarac mountain above Srebrenica. As a result, the inhabitants of Bratunac and Srebrenica had no access to the Yugoslav federal Yutel and the Bosnian channels, only to Serbian television. Similar Serb attempts to inactivate broadcasting or take control of television relays were reported in many other parts of Bosnia, including in the county of Prijedor.⁵⁴³ One or two days after the town's television access was cut, its water system was mined as well. Left with blank screens and dry faucets, the inhabitants grew increasingly aware that worse was still to come. Ibisevic warned people over Radio Srebrenica that the radio mast on the Bojna hill, just one kilometre outside the town, could be the next target. He called on the population to protect the mast. No action was taken, however, and on the night of 9 April the radio mast was indeed mined. Hamed Salihovic confided in Ibisevic that he knew who the perpetrators were, but did not dare arrest them due to the explosive situation in town.⁵⁴⁴ The action cut off the population even from Radio Sarajevo.

In April, Hakija Meholic, a local policeman, started organising an armed Muslim militia in the Petrica and Klisa quarters of the town. He had stayed on sick leave for over a year, because he refused to accept the new head of police, Hamed Salihovic. He was also furious with SDA hardliners, who had removed his brother, Malik Meholic, from his post as mayor of Srebrenica. Malik formed the local branch of the MBO, of which also Hakija had become a member. This moderate party had many supporters in Petrica and Klisa. Relations between members of the SDA and MBO were unfriendly. According to Ibisevic, members of the MBO were quite impudent, arrogant and hostile to local SDA officials.⁵⁴⁵ Hakija Meholic attacked the SDA for having failed to organise defence for the town. Instead, he gathered his own people around him, people from Petrica and Klisa and MBO members, and established a checkpoint in Petrica on the road to Zeleni Jadar. He also managed to take a certain amount of arms from the police station. Serbs complained about this 'wild' checkpoint by a Muslim policeman, who had slipped away from the municipal police commander's authority. However, on the SNO meeting of 8 April (when six additional police stations were created) Meholic's role was formalized. He became the commander of the seventh additional 'war' police station of Srebrenica. Four days later, Ibisevic tried to re-establish relations with Meholic. He went to Meholic's 'headquarters' in Motel Lovac, located on a hill beneath the old Turkish fortress of Srebrenica. Meeting with a very cold welcome from Meholic when he entered the motel, Ibisevic left immediately.⁵⁴⁶

In the meantime, Serbs forged ahead with the establishment of the Serb municipality of Skelani. Blagomir Jovanovic, a former communist, who joined the SDS after the first elections in 1990, stepped up as president. On 11 April, Serbs in Skelani took control of the local police station, an operation coordinated from Serbia. Using arms transported over the Drina into Bosnia with little boats, they surrounded the police station and forced Muslim policemen to surrender. After allowing the policemen to leave unharmed, the Serbs proceeded to establish a Serb crisis committee in the building. On 13 April, Ibisevic went to Skelani to meet with Milenko Èanic in the new Serb police station. Èanic was ⁵⁴² Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 189-192.

⁵⁴³ Bassiouni, Final report, pp. 38-39; Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p. 65; Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, p. 193.

⁵⁴⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 190-191. Masic, Srebrenica, p. 32.

⁵⁴⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 193-94.

⁵⁴⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 194-95.

wearing a camouflage uniform and was busy disassembling and re-assembling a new scorpion gun. In a corner of the building, Ibisevic saw a pile of hand grenades and dynamite. Èanic refused to talk to Ibisevic, referring him to Marko Milovanovic, commander of the Serb crisis committee for Skelani. Ibisevic asked him to identify the boundaries of this self-proclaimed municipality. Milovanovic then informed him that the border ran from Fakovici, over Bjelovac, Brezani, Osmace, and Kragljivoda, to Sjedaci, carving out a large piece of the southeastern section of the municipality of Srebrenica. Ibisevic objected, pointing out that the majority of the population in that territory was Muslim. Milovanovic responded simply by reminding him that 2,000 Serb volunteers were waiting in Bajina Basta to cross over into Bosnia. Milovanovic also claimed to have received information about the formation of a Muslim paramilitary unit in Kragljivoda and Osat, set up by Ahmo Tihic, an affiliate of Hamed Efendic and Ibran Mustafic.⁵⁴⁷

Ibisevic left Skelani and tried to find Ahmo Tihic to inform him that the Serbs were after him. He found him in Osat, where Tihic had organised a group of some twenty armed men. Ibisevic writes that, as Tihic's unit was 'the first armed Bosniac unit' in this part of the municipality, he promised to do his utmost to help him with food, blankets, and equipment, which he thought he could acquire from the TO's stores in Srebrenica. Ibisevic went to Srebrenica and managed to send one truckload of supplies to Tihic and one to Suceška.⁵⁴⁸ The next day, a couple of Muslims were found dead on the road between Skelani and Srebrenica, near the village of Jezero. These were the first casualties of the war in Srebrenica. According to Muslim sources, they were killed the day before by a group of Serb paramilitaries, who had been out to attack Ahmo Tihic's unit but were unable to locate it. In frustration, they killed the two Muslims as their car passed by. The victims were driving back from Bajina Basta, where they had gone to buy gasoline.⁵⁴⁹

On 14 April, an extraordinary meeting of the municipal council was scheduled to discuss Serb proposals to divide the municipality along ethnic lines. Although the SDA initially opposed the idea of dividing Srebrenica into Muslim and Serb sections, it yielded to Serb pressure and agreed to discuss the issue. Many Muslims from the town, who were desperate for a solution, gathered in front of the Culture House to demand anything but war. According to Ibisevic, some shouted out pleas to give the Serbs whatever they wanted. Only sixteen councillors (of the seventy) showed up for the meeting, mostly SDA members. SDS leader, Goran Zekic was the only Serb present. During the meeting, the SDA approved the principle of territorial division for the municipality. A mixed commission of Serbs and Muslims was established to lay the groundwork. Besim Ibisevic and five other Muslims, including non-SDA members, Sabit Begic and Cazim Salimovic, were appointed to the commission. The Serb appointees were Milenko Èanic, Momèilo Cvjetinovic, Desimir Mitrovic, and two other individuals. They agreed to meet twice daily to discuss further details. Ibisevic ordered topographic maps of the municipality and lists of communal assets.⁵⁵⁰ Apparently, the general objective was to make the upper section of the town 'Muslim', and allot the lower section to the Serbs. As Oric writes, even though the Serbs had already appropriated a large portion of the municipality's territory near Skelani, they now also demanded a share of what remained.⁵⁵¹

Muslims had gathered outside the venue where the meeting was held, eager to hear the decision. For that reason, Goran Zekic, Hamed Efendic, and Besim Ibisevic decided to address the population in the hall of the Culture House. Zekic declared that they had reached a basic agreement about the territorial division of Srebrenica, which he presented as a step towards peace. Some Muslims applauded. As Ibisevic writes, many Muslim townspeople – particularly MBO and SDP supporters – wanted Zekic, even as mayor of Srebrenica, if that would avoid war. It seems that they had confidence in Zekic. Compared to such figures as Milenko Èanic in Skelani, Miodrag Jokic in Srebrenica, and Miroslav ⁵⁴⁷ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 195-96.

⁵⁴⁸ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 198-200.

⁵⁴⁹ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 208-209; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 32-33.

⁵⁵⁰ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 200-02; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 33.

⁵⁵¹ Interview: Momèilo Cvjetinovic, 10/06/1998. Oric, Srebrenica, p. 20.

Deronjic in Bratunac, Zekic was certainly considered a more moderate politician.⁵⁵² In closing his short speech, Zekic tried to leave, but was stopped by Ahmo Tihic, who had come from Osat to discuss events in Skelani. He attacked Zekic, who defended himself saying that he had no influence in Skelani, because they did not recognize him there as president of the SDS. A group of Srebrenicans ended the conversation by removing Tihic from the room, giving Zekic free passage. A number of Muslim Srebrenicans yelled at Tihic, accusing him of creating a mess in the town after having done the same in Skelani. Tihic was accused of antagonising the Serbs and of jeopardising good community relations in town.

After Zekic, it was Hamed Efendic's turn to address the crowd. According to Ibisevic's account, he had hardly any chance to speak at all, as Muslim townspeople began shouting 'Thieves, thieves!' at him. A very heavily built man ran from the back of the hall to the speaker's platform and pushed Efendic away amidst loud applause from the crowd. The same happened to Besim Ibisevic, who was attacked by a group of MBO sympathisers. They shouted that there was no place for peasants in Srebrenica. "Go back to your village! Go plough your field! You peasants stirred up all of this by coming to Srebrenica! If it weren't for you, we wouldn't have had a war. If you'd allowed Goran Zekic to become mayor, it wouldn't have come to all of this!" At this point, someone actually physically attacked Ibisevic, forcing him to end his speech. Clearly, Ibisevic was no longer welcome. Similar voices were raised against him in Potocari, where Naser Oric had seized power after local SDA leader, Ibran Mustafic had left to Sarajevo. Ibisevic was warned not to show his face in Potoèari under any circumstances whatsoever. SDA leaders had clearly lost most of their support among the population. Many wanted to see Hamed Efendic removed as SDA leader, and Ibisevic as town mayor. Ibisevic writes that he received anonymous phone calls, from both sides: Serbs, who cursed his Muslim mother, and Muslims, who cursed his peasant mother. At this stage, the exodus of the Muslim population from the town intensified. Most people went in the direction of Tuzla, while others went to Serbia. Guards and night porters of factories and other public premises abandoned their posts, leaving these buildings unprotected.⁵⁵³

Due to his constant involvement in managing the growing political crisis in town, Ibisevic had not been able to buy food for his wife and son. As shops were closed or empty, he asked Momèilo Cvjetinovic to accompany him to Ljubovija just across the Drina to buy some basic food items.⁵⁵⁴ For security reasons, they drove in Cvjetinovic's car. When they finished shopping, they went to look for the SDS vice-president of Srebrenica, Miodrag Jokic, who had taken refuge in a motel in Ljubovija. They hoped that by talking to him they might be able to decrease tensions. Cvjetinovic advised Ibisevic not to be too rash and to talk to him in a jovial, non-confrontational way, "as peace depends on these kind of idiots". They found Jokic in a JNA officer's uniform, carrying a Scorpion on his waist belt. Cvjetinovic, who knew that Jokic had not served in the army, asked him whether he knew his rank. "How is it possible that you don't know! This is the rank of captain first class", said Jokic pointing at the insignia on his shirt. Cvjetinovic, who had great difficulties suppressing his laughter, told him: "How is it possible you do not see it! This is the rank of major. Whoever told you this stands for the rank of captain lied." Jokic, angry, said it did not matter: "Captain or major, it's all the same to me!" And to intimidate Ibisevic, Jokic showed him the receipts of two arms deliveries by the JNA from Tuzla and Belgrade, both which he had personally signed. They agreed to meet next day in Bratunac for further talks. On their way back to Srebrenica, Cvjetinovic complained to Ibisevic that the JNA gave its weapons to the biggest fools in town.⁵⁵⁵

The next day, on 16 April 1992, Serb and Muslim leaders met in Hotel Fontana in Bratunac. The Serb representatives there included Goran Zekic and Miroslav Deronjic. Ibisevic represented the ⁵⁵² This undermines Miodrag Jokic's claims during an interview with Ilustrovana politika that Goran Zekic had been the main target of Muslim attacks (Milanovic, 'Ubice su medju nama', p. 14).

⁵⁵³ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, p. 202-7; Ibisevic, 'Nisam pobjegao'; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 25.

⁵⁵⁴ This was confirmed by Momèilo Cvjetinovic; interview: 10/06/1998.

⁵⁵⁵ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 206-07.

Muslim side, together with a few others whom he had gathered at random, as he had been unable to find anyone else. Among those who joined him was Sabit Begic, a former communist and member of the SDP. As Ibisevic writes, Begic, a 'moderate,' was useful in negotiations with the Serbs. With that in mind, the Muslim delegation left most of the talking to Begic, who tried to bide for time and divert the discussion from political to humanitarian issues. He pointed out that peasants were without food, because villages, such as Luka and Krusev Do, were completely cut off by Serbian barricades and checkpoints. He also mentioned the refugees streaming into the town from Bijeljina and Zvornik. Begic asked the Serbs to show a sign of goodwill and bring food to these people. Goran Zekic promised to do that. They agreed to meet again the next day in Srebrenica. On that same day, Goran Zekic also had a meeting with the head of police, Hamed Salihovic, in order to legalise a number of Serb checkpoints in villages. During that meeting, they signed an agreement sanctioning the formation of Serb police stations in Vijogor, Orahovica, and Sase, as well as in the main police office in the town of Srebrenica. The agreement stipulated that Serb police stations were to cooperate and coordinate their actions with the Bosnian police. It was signed by ten people, including Ibisevic, Zekic, Begic, Cvjetinovic, Perendic, and Salihovic.⁵⁵⁶

Bratunac and Srebrenica are taken by Serbs

A new SDS and SDA meeting was planned for the morning of 17 April. Moments before it was scheduled to start, Miodrag Jokic called Ibisevic to say that he and his SDS colleagues were not coming to Srebrenica, as they lacked sufficient guarantees of safety. He proposed holding the meeting in Bratunac that very same day. Once again, Ibisevic gathered several people, including Sabit Begic. When they arrived in Bratunac, they noticed various military units and paramilitary groups roaming the town's streets. Among these were regular army units from the Novi Sad corps, the Arkan Tigers, White Eagles, and Seselj's Chetnik forces. It was Friday, which was market day in Bratunac, and many people had been on the streets when these armed units entered the town. They met with no resistance, as the Muslim defence or Patriotic League was taken by surprise and completely unprepared for action. Even though the SDA had established a crisis committee days before the event, most Patriotic League commanders fled to Tuzla as soon as the Serbs entered the town. The crisis committee did not even have a chance to meet.⁵⁵⁷ Bratunac's SDS leaders issued an ultimatum to the Muslim authorities to surrender power, and also ordered the Head of Police to relinquish all weapons and leave the police station. This put an end to the existence of the two parallel (Muslim and Serb) police forces in Bratunac. The mayor of Bratunac, Nijaz Dubičić, was forced to hand over the municipal building. The Head of Police and the Mayor left immediately for Tuzla. Most other Muslims stayed in town, feeling intimidated and terrorised by the presence of the JNA and paramilitary forces.⁵⁵⁸

Units of the JNA Novi Sad corps, commanded by Colonel Svetozar Milosevic, set up headquarters in Hotel Fontana. The SDS crisis committee also sent out invitations to local Serb reservists and officers. Miroslav Deronjic, the head of the Serb crisis committee, coordinated the entire operation. According to a Muslim source, he met with Radovan Karadzic in Pale just days before the take-over of Bratunac to receive instructions.⁵⁵⁹ Ljubisav Simic was appointed as the new SDS mayor of Bratunac, and Rodoljub Djukanovic became chairman of the municipal Executive Board. Milutin Milosevic and Luka Bogdanovic remained head of the police and police commander, respectively. The Arkan Tigers played an important role in the Serb take-over of Bratunac. Sreten Radic, a wealthy local businessman, is said to have paid them 100,000 DM to come to Bratunac.⁵⁶⁰ Based in Café Jasen in the town's centre, the Arkan Tigers organised plunder expeditions to Muslim villages. They sped through ⁵⁵⁶ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 207-209, 249. Masic, Srebrenica, p. 33.

⁵⁵⁷ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 62-63.

⁵⁵⁸ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi; Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 211-12; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 33-39.

⁵⁵⁹ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 11.

⁵⁶⁰ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p.14 and p. 120; interview: Becir Hasanovic 17/05/1998.

town in cars and jeeps equipped with special sirens that frightened local residents even more than the incidental shots fired.⁵⁶¹ They also entered the mosque and played Chetnik songs from the loudspeakers of the minaret. The wife of the Serbian Orthodox priest of Bratunac, Bata Blazevic, who had died not long before, stopped them and threw them out of the mosque.⁵⁶² Paramilitaries controlled the town at night, plundering shops of Muslims and ‘disloyal’ Serbs. Explosions blasted through the night. Various Muslim shops were blown up or burned down. Muslims stayed inside their houses, turning off their lights. Some men slept in their gardens so they could escape if paramilitaries tried to take them from their beds.⁵⁶³

When Ibisevic arrived in Bratunac, he was welcomed by Miodrag Jokic, who pompously introduced various paramilitary leaders to Ibisevic and his company. They presented themselves as the commanders of the TO of Vukovar, the TO of Knin, the Yellow Ants, White Eagles, and Arkan Tigers. Those present also included local SDS leaders, such as Goran Zekic, Delivoje Sorak, and Miroslav Deronjic, as well as Miloje Simic, the former president of the League of Communists of Srebrenica. Goran Zekic began to address the meeting. Miodrag Jokic soon interrupted, however, laying down the terms in no uncertain terms: “All previous agreements between the SDA and SDS of Srebrenica are void. The borders of Yugoslavia (or Great-Serbia as you call it) have been redrawn and this area is part of it now. We want you to collect all your arms and hand them over to us in Srebrenica by 8:00 A.M. tomorrow. If not, we will destroy everything with our artillery. You Muslims have two options: you can either leave quietly or we will kill you!” The Muslim delegation asked for extra time to consult members of the Executive Board of the SDA, and promised to come back at five p.m. This proposal was accepted.⁵⁶⁴

The Muslim delegation denied the presence of any organised armed units in Srebrenica. However, they did promise to talk to those who had a certain number of arms at their disposal or those in a position to form militia, such as the police and the TO. They returned to Srebrenica, where they informed the townspeople about the Serb occupation of Bratunac and the ultimatum the SDS had issued Srebrenican authorities. On hearing the news, the population began to flee, mostly to Tuzla. A meeting was then held to discuss the Serb’s ultimatum to hand over all weapons. Among those present were Hakija Meholic, Hamed Salihovic, Hamed Efendic, and Suljo Hasanovic, Deputy Commander of the TO in Srebrenica. Meholic refused to comply and announced that he would rather escape to the forests, inviting others to join him. Hamed Salihovic said he would first need to contact the Bosnian Ministry of Internal Affairs for further instructions. The discussion prompted Ibisevic and several other members of the Muslim delegation, who had gone to Bratunac, to take their families and leave Srebrenica.⁵⁶⁵ Begic remained behind to wait for Zekic, while almost all inhabitants left the town. By around five o’clock that afternoon, only 300 to 400 Muslims remained, waiting to see what would happen. When Zekic failed to show up, Sabit Begic also left for Sarajevo. In the meantime, two Muslim policemen returned to Bratunac on their own initiative to gain time. Thanks to them, the ultimatum was postponed for two hours, from 8:00 until 10:00 A.M. the next day.⁵⁶⁶

Later, both during and after the war, the town’s elite came under fierce criticism by resistance organisers for having all fled on 17 April 1992. According to Naser Oric, the future commander of Muslim forces in Srebrenica, almost all Muslim leaders and intellectuals were unprepared and incapable of coping with the situation, and had responded indifferently and irresponsibly. Some SDA leaders ⁵⁶¹ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 13.

⁵⁶² Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 25. Interview: Ibro Verlasevic 01/06/1998.

⁵⁶³ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 39; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 14-16. Interviews: Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998.

⁵⁶⁴ Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 212-213.

⁵⁶⁵ Ibisevic claims to have contemplated evacuating the population en masse, but did not do so because it no longer seemed feasible. As Ibisevic writes, ‘newly composed commanders’, ‘political dilettantes’, and ‘war adventurers’ had given people false hope that they could do something against the Serb onslaught. In his view, it was much more realistic to go to Tuzla and try to re-conquer the town from there. Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 214-15.

⁵⁶⁶ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 34-35; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 21,41; Ibisevic, Srebrenica, pp. 214-16 were trading arms instead of preparing the people for armed resistance. Although Oric does not mention any names here, he is clearly referring to his former patrons, Ibran Mustafic and Hamed Efendic. Oric also blames Muslim intellectuals for supporting the ‘pro-Serb’ oriented parties before the war began, which he felt had contributed to the establishment of Serb hegemony. According to Oric, all of them left town at the start of the war, including some with large foreign bank accounts. Abandoned by their leaders, ordinary people handed over their weapons to the Serbs, a pattern that repeated itself all over eastern Bosnia. The worst case was probably Vlasenica, where local Muslims handed over some 2,000 rifles to the Serbs. Oric provides lists of SDA leaders, local officials, heads of police and territorial defence, and directors of firms and other public institutions, who are said to have ‘betrayed’ their nation and to have left just before the start of the war. His list of Srebrenican leaders includes Besim Ibisevic, Cazim Salimovic, Ibran Mustafic, Sabit Begic, and Adib Djozic.⁵⁶⁷

The JNA and various paramilitary groups, commanded by Captain Reljic of the Novi Sad corps, entered Srebrenica in the afternoon of 18 April. Goran Zekic and other SDS politicians paraded through what had almost become a ghost town that offered no resistance whatsoever. The Serb flag was raised above the police station and other public buildings. In the meantime, paramilitaries ransacked the town, searching for weapons among the remaining Muslims, and seizing money and jewellery. Then they began plundering, assisted by local Serbs who pointed out which houses and shops to target. Numerous truckloads of livestock, machinery, equipment, and personal possessions (televisions, electric appliances, furniture, etc.) were transported to Serbia. The most popular commodity, however, were cars. Hotels, factories and the hospital were also plundered. X-ray and ultrasound equipment were removed from the hospital. The catastrophe was transferred to Skelani to leave the Muslims without any documentation to claim back their properties. Local Serb women participated in plundering the houses of their former Muslim neighbours, pilfering jewellery, Gobelins, carpets and fur coats. There was, however, one area where the paramilitaries and plunderers did not dare enter: the industrial complexes in Potočari where Oric was hiding. Once the Serb forces captured the town, Serb inhabitants who had fled returned to their houses. A small number of Muslims also remained behind. Most of them stayed in their homes the entire time or hid with Serb neighbours. None were killed until ten days later, on 28 April, when Serb plunderers killed a Muslim man who tried to resist them. He was the first Muslim killed in town. Other Muslims were now waiting for the first available opportunity to flee the town. On 3 May 1992, Serbs evacuated a busload of Muslims to Bratunac, and took some the police station for further interrogation. Many ended up in the Vuk Karadzic school, where some of them were tortured and killed.⁵⁶⁸

The last town to fall into Serb hands was Vlasenica, on 21 April 1992. Serbs arrested prominent Muslims and burned their houses, using lists they had previously prepared. Arrests continued during the next few months, when numerous Muslims were still hiding in their homes unable to leave the town. Many ended up in the Susica camp. Commanded by Dragan Nikolic, alias ‘Jenki,’ the Susica camp continued operating until the end of September (long after other concentration camps in north-western Bosnia had been discovered and closed down). Hundreds of Muslims, including from areas outside the municipality of Vlasenica (e.g. from villages near Bratunac) were tortured and killed in the camp.⁵⁶⁹ Others managed to escape through the forests in the direction of Srebrenica, and many ended up in the Muslim-held enclave. The Vlasenica municipality was soon divided in two, Vlasenica proper and Milici, which then became a separate (Serb) municipality. The SDS’s final objective was also to abolish the Srebrenica municipality and divide it between Bratunac and the newly established Serb ⁵⁶⁷ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 15-21.

⁵⁶⁸ For accounts of the Serb take-over of Srebrenica, see: Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 139; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 35-37; Rifatbegovic, Ratni mir, pp. 52-57; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 15; Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a, p. 161; Interviews: Hasa Selmanagic 07/08/1997, Damir Skaler 06/02/1998, Abdulah Purkovic 04/02/1998; Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

⁵⁶⁹ For the events in Vlasenica, see Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 59-67; Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, pp. 195-198. For the Susica camp, see Cohen, Hearts grown brutal, pp. 203-209, 214-216.

municipalities of Skelani and Milici. According to these plans, Bratunac was to become the main Serb centre of the region.

Ethnic cleansing by Serbs and first acts of Muslim resistance

“Before this summer ends, we will have driven the Turkish army out of the city, just as they drove us from the field of Kosovo in 1389. That was the beginning of Turkish domination of our lands. This will be the end of it, after all these cruel centuries [...] We Serbs are saving Europe, even if Europe does not appreciate our efforts, even if it condemns them”.

Serb soldier besieging Sarajevo, at the beginning of the war, quoted in: Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 103

After taking over the towns of Bratunac and Srebrenica, the Serbs launched large-scale ethnic cleansing operations. This period also marked the beginning of active armed resistance by small, improvised groups of Muslims located in the hills and villages. They consisted of peasants and Muslim townspeople who had fled their homes and had tried to survive in the forests, in the snow, cold and rain, without proper food and shelter. Some Muslims from Srebrenica carried automatic rifles with them, which had been taken from police stores. Others made handmade rifles from water pipes. In the municipality of Srebrenica, two main centres of resistance emerged initially. One of these was in the village of Potoèari, where Naser Oric had been organising and training Muslim militia. The other developed in Stari grad (the upper part of town near the ancient Turkish fortress), where Hakija Meholic and Akif Ustic commanded a group of local armed men who were able to stave off the Serbs. Meholic and Ustic also protected some three hundred civilians who had taken refuge in the hills and forests above the town.⁵⁷⁰ Other resistance groups formed in the Muslim villages of Suceška (led by Ramiz Becirovic and Zulfo Tursunovic), Bajramovici (Hamdija Fejzic), Tokoljaci (Hedib Smajlovic), Biljeg near Osmace (Ahmo Tihic), Kragljivoda (Nedžad Bektić and Sefik Mandžić), Skenderovici (Senahid Tabakovic), Poznanovici (Dzevad Malkić) and Luka (Samir Habibovic). Although part of the municipality of Srebrenica, Luka was actually closer to Zepa than to the town of Srebrenica.⁵⁷¹ Similar centres appeared throughout the Bratunac municipality, including in Konjevic Polje (Velid Sabić), Bljeèeva (Ejub Golić), and in Muslim villages along the Drina, such as Poloznik (Osman Malagić). They often consisted of Muslims who had fled their homes in Serb assaults on their home villages.⁵⁷²

The first successful Muslim action against the Serb forces occurred on 20 April 1992, in Potoèari, where Oric attacked a group of Arkan Tigers only two days after the Serbs took Srebrenica. Seventeen armed Muslims blocked the road to Bratunac and ambushed several (police) cars and other vehicles returning from Srebrenica. At least four Serbs were killed in the attack.⁵⁷³ Local radio stations just across the border in Serbia began broadcasting reports that thousands of Green Berets were active around Srebrenica, leaving many local Serbs too terrified to go through Potoèari.⁵⁷⁴ Immediately, the JNA started shelling Potoèari and various other Muslim villages from artillery positions near Bratunac.

⁵⁷⁰ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 44. Conversation: Meho Ustic 13/11/1998.

⁵⁷¹ Oric, Srebrenica, Srebrenica, pp. 142-44. See also Masic, Srebrenica, p. 48.

⁵⁷² Golić's group in Bljeèeva consisted of refugees from Glogova. His group soon linked up with Oric's forces in Potoèari (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 69-71). Malagić led a group of some two hundred men, who had fled from Voljavica (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 71-74; Omeragić, Satanski sinovi, pp. 22-24).

⁵⁷³ Although Muslim sources usually cite more casualties, Ivanisević mentions only four names of Serbs killed in Potoèari on 20 April 1992. (Ivanisević, Hronika, p. 71). For the Muslim version of the attack see: Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 140-141. See also: Mandžić, 'Zlatni Ljiljani', p. 37; Interview: Mitko and Mevlā Kadrić 17/01/1998.

⁵⁷⁴ Interviews: Mitko and Mevlā Kadrić 17/01/1998; 25/04/1998.

The shelling forced the villagers to flee their homes. The first village destroyed and taken by the Serbs was one of vital strategic importance: Likari. Due to its location, Likari was eminently suited to monitoring and shelling the Muslim stronghold of Potoèari. Serbs also entered the nearby Muslim village of Peèista. According to some Muslim sources, however, they left the village again after one Serb was killed during internal clashes. In Vlasenica, Serb forces attacked and burned the Muslim villages of Nedjelista, Zaklopaèa, Pomol, and Djile, one day after they established control over the town. According to a Muslim source, over three hundred Muslims were killed during Serb actions around Vlasenica.⁵⁷⁵

Although they attacked Potoèari and various villages near Vlasenica, the Serbs usually issued ultimatums first to the inhabitants of Muslim strongholds before attacking them. The three most important Muslim strongholds that threatened to block Serb communications were Voljavica (on the road from Bratunac to Fakovici and Skelani), Glogova (between Bratunac and Kravica), and Konjevic Polje (on the road junction linking Bratunac to Zvornik, Milici, and Vlasenica). First, the head of the SDS crisis committee of Bratunac, Miroslav Deronjic, issued an ultimatum to the Muslims in Voljavica and Glogova. In it, he asked them to hand over all their weapons. On 20 April, Voljavica was surrounded by Serb forces. During the afternoon, SDS leaders entered the village, confiscating a limited number of arms. Voljavica was crucial to the Serbs because it was the only road connection linking Bratunac to Srebrenica after the Muslim attack in Potoèari. Since the Serbs were still seriously engaged in countering Muslim actions in Potoèari, they extended the deadlines for Glogova and Konjevic Polje by another week. Finally, when the SDS leaders entered Glogova on 27 April, most Muslims handed over their weapons. In Konjevic Polje, however, the head of the local Muslim crisis committee, Velid Sabic, refused to comply with the Serb demands.⁵⁷⁶

The SDS sent out a last ultimatum to hand over all weapons before 1 May, at which time 'peaceful' attempts to disarm the Muslim population ended. From then on, Serb leaders resorted to other methods. They began massive ethnic cleansing operations, expelling the Muslim inhabitants of the town of Bratunac and most other villages in the municipalities of Bratunac, Srebrenica and Vlasenica. Only a few Muslim strongholds held out against the general Serb assault, and these became the places of refuge for the displaced. The operations finally took off on 29 April, when Colonel Svetozar Milosevic, commander of the 'Drina' operative unit of the JNA, posted an official proclamation on all public buildings in Bratunac, ordering all Muslims to sign a declaration of loyalty to the Serb authorities in the municipal building. In effect, Muslims were given only a few hours to sign, which almost nobody did. The next day, the SDS authorities of Bratunac placed an official announcement on public display calling on all men aged 18 to 60 to join the army. Muslim men, who were also subject to this measure, fled to the forests to avoid being recruited into the army. By this stage, telephone service to most Muslim homes had already been disconnected.⁵⁷⁷

Then, on 1 May, a long series of armed attacks were launched against Muslim villages. They were carried out from the two main Serb operating bases in the area: Milici and Bratunac. This time, instead of SDS delegations, the Serbs sent out armed bands and paramilitary groups to the Muslim villages, who expelled and killed the inhabitants and plundered and burned their houses. Bands from Milici attacked most Muslim villages located south of the road to Podravanje between 1 and 4 May. All were burned to the ground. Some inhabitants were killed or taken to the Susica camp in Vlasenica, but most others through the forests to the Muslim-controlled villages of Krivaèe (municipality of Vlasenica) and Sucasca (municipality of Srebrenica).⁵⁷⁸ Serb forces also tried to take Sucasca, north of that same road, but failed due to fierce Muslim resistance.⁵⁷⁹ On 4 and 5 May, Serb forces took control

⁵⁷⁵ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 39 and 54.

⁵⁷⁶ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 44-45; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 36-38, 64-5.

⁵⁷⁷ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 35-6; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 36-41; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 48; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 26-27.

⁵⁷⁸ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 62, 66, 118-121, 134. Interviews with: Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998 and Omer Subasic 17/06/1998.

⁵⁷⁹ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 141-42; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 39, 43

of Zeleni Jadar, an important and strategic road junction south of Srebrenica.⁵⁸⁰ In the municipality of Bratunac, the village of Hranèa was the first to be attacked. On 2 May, masked Serb gunmen set fire to numerous Muslim houses in the village, killing five people and abducting nine men.⁵⁸¹ British journalist, Tim Judah, visited Hranèa two days later. He found local Muslims keeping vigil next to the dead bodies of their relatives (including the body of seven-year-old, Selma Hodzic). The villagers told him that it was hard for them to recognise whether the perpetrators had been army reservists, police, or paramilitaries. Yet they were convinced that some had been from the neighbouring village of Repovac (a Serb suburb of Bratunac) and the Serb part of Hranèa.⁵⁸²

While the attacks on Muslim villages continued, the SDS consolidated its power in both Bratunac and Srebrenica. The SDS leaders replaced all Muslim directors, and ordered the Muslim population to report to work, which made it easier to exert control over them. Few Muslims returned to work, however. In the Sase mine, which was now part of the new Serb municipality of Bratunac, Muslim employees were also required to show up to work. The Serb authorities tried in this way to prevent them from starting any form of resistance and to block the road between Srebrenica and Bratunac. They were also paid bonuses to ensure loyalty.⁵⁸³ Many other Muslims in Bratunac and Srebrenica, however, were arrested and killed. In the town of Srebrenica, which had been abandoned by most of its Muslim population, gunmen killed Muslims hiding in their homes as soon as they appeared on the streets. Their bodies were left lying on the streets for days. Other Muslims were discovered inside their homes and murdered there. Several elderly Muslim inhabitants were burned alive when Serb paramilitaries set fire to Muslim houses in the centre of Srebrenica. Some Muslim families, however, found refuge with their Serb friends or neighbours. At least one Serb was forced to flee from Srebrenica after Serb gunmen discovered that he was hiding two Muslim families in his house.⁵⁸⁴

In Bratunac, the new Serb authorities started rounding up prominent Muslims, particularly political leaders, former officials and intellectuals. The objective was to eliminate existing non-Serb leadership. Some received summons to go to the police station, where they were interrogated and released - if they were lucky. Most, however, were carted off to makeshift prisons set up in such facilities as the Vuk Karadzic school and the cellars of local hotels, restaurants and firms. Once in prison, they were interrogated about who they knew to possess arms or to have been members of the Patriotic League.⁵⁸⁵ Many of those arrested or summoned to the police station disappeared, or were found dead later. The first to be liquidated were a father and two sons, whose bodies were found near the Krizevica river in Bratunac on 29 April 1992. According to the Serbs, the two sons had fought in Croatia for the Croatian National Guard (ZNG). They were also suspected of having participated in the Muslim ambush in Potoèari, in which several Arkan Tigers had been killed. The next day, Serb authorities issued permission to bury their bodies. The small funeral held was attended by close relatives only and was among the last few Muslim burials to take place in Bratunac.⁵⁸⁶

After these initial killings, the Serbs added new victims to the list almost daily. Among them were the local chemist, a police inspector, several managers of firms, the former head of the police of Bratunac, a teacher, and the former mayor of Srebrenica, Salih 'Tale' Sehomeric. Following his arrest, Sehomeric was executed at the bridge over the Drina. A number of other people were also liquidated there and thrown into the river. Others disappeared and were never found again.⁵⁸⁷ Between 18 April and 9 May 1992, seventy-four Muslims from Srebrenica were killed or disappeared. Various local ⁵⁸⁰ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 39; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 57.

⁵⁸¹ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 31; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 41.

⁵⁸² Judah, 'Women keep tearful vigil'; interview: Tim Judah 09/12/1997.

⁵⁸³ Oric, Srebrenica, p. 44; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 35; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, p. 27.

⁵⁸⁴ Interviews: Abdulah Purkovic 04/02/1998; Boban Vasic 06/07/1998; Damir Skaler 06/02/1998.

⁵⁸⁵ See Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 34.

⁵⁸⁶ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 34-35; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 17-28. Interviews: Mehmed Malagic 14/06/1998 and Mirsada Bakalovic on 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998

⁵⁸⁷ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 16; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 57; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 46-47; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi:17-28. Interview Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998.

Muslim politicians went missing in far-away places in Serbia and Montenegro, where they had taken refuge after the Serbs took Srebrenica.⁵⁸⁸ Saban Mehmedovic (president of the local Reformist Party SRSJ) was arrested near Sabac, where his Serbian wife had a house. He too disappeared. Malik Meholic (MBO) and Azem Begic (SDA) were arrested by the Montenegrin police in the port of Bar and disappeared thereafter. At least seven other Muslims leaders from the municipality of Srebrenica also disappeared in Bar.⁵⁸⁹ Before this development, local SDS hardliner, Miodrag Jokic, issued an almost open invitation to eliminate the so-called Muslim 'extremists' who had fled Srebrenica, during his interview with the Belgrade weekly, Ilustrovana politika. "The murderers are among us," he declared and subsequently cited the names and places of residence of various Muslims hiding in Serbia. Among those he mentioned were Malik Meholic as well as Sabit Begic, member of the Social-Democrat Party (SDP), whom Jokic labeled a tough fundamentalist.⁵⁹⁰

These people, however, had played no role whatsoever in the now ever-increasing Muslim ambushes or (counter) attacks on Serb villages. On 6 May 1992, Muslims attacked the Serb hamlet of Gniona (north of the town of Srebrenica). Gniona was the first Serb village in the municipalities of Srebrenica and Bratunac to be attacked and burned down by Naser Oric's forces. The village was strategically important because it gave Muslim forces free passage to Sucevka, another centre of Muslim resistance. On the same day, Muslim forces also attacked Serb houses in the village of Bljeèeva (Bratunac municipality); after they took the village, they abandoned it again because it was so close to Potoèari. Several Muslims and Serbs were killed during these attacks.⁵⁹¹ Muslim forces also began striking back in Srebrenica, especially after Serb paramilitaries burned down Muslim houses in the town's centre on 4 and 5 May. Eighty houses were destroyed and thirty Muslim inhabitants were killed during these actions. One or two days later, Serb paramilitaries tried to do the same in Stari grad, the upper part of town, which led to the first open clashes with local Muslim militia. This became known as the 'Battle of Srebrenica'. On 7 May, several Serbs were killed in these actions. The Serbs were prevented from entering Stari grad, and three days later, they were completely expelled from the town. Muslims then took control of the town.⁵⁹²

Other events prepared the way for this major Muslim success. On 7 May, they ambushed a Serb truck near Osmace (on the road between Zelene Jadar and Skelani). According to Muslim sources, the truck was loaded with Serb plunderers from Srebrenica. Serb sources, by contrast, claim these were civilians. At least seven were killed (Muslim sources claim two or three Muslim casualties and dozens of Serb victims). Wherever the truth lies, the event was crucial because the road connection between Srebrenica and Skelani was now considered unsafe by the Serbs. After blocking the main road connection through Potoèari, on 20 April, Muslims now cut off a second important road linking Srebrenica to the outside world. Serbs in town felt that Srebrenica was being isolated and encircled by Muslim forces.⁵⁹³ The ambush in Osmace, however, also marked the beginning of a huge series of attacks on Muslim villages, which were part of the new Serb 'municipality' of Skelani. Organised by the local branch of the SDS and its president Dane Katanic, the attacks began on 8 May and continued for several days. Two dozen Muslim settlements were attacked, almost eight hundred houses were burned down, and the entire Muslim population was expelled. Over 1,300 Muslims were transported off to Serbia and Macedonia, and almost 900 fled to Muslim villages in the direction of Srebrenica. Seven Muslim men were shot in the presence of women and children. Near the bridge in Skelani, seventeen ⁵⁸⁸ For a list, see Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 37-38.

⁵⁸⁹ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 24,37-38,57. Interview: Sefkija Hadziarapovic 22/05/1998.

⁵⁹⁰ Milanovic, 'Ubice su medju nama', p. 15.

⁵⁹¹ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 45; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 50, 57, 144-145; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 43, 69-71; Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 42-43, 71, 200, 258-61; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 93-94.

⁵⁹² Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 71

⁵⁹³ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 46; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 143; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 41, 59, 71.

Muslims were taken out of a bus and also executed. According to Muslim sources, a total of fifty-five Muslims died during Serb actions in and around Skelani.⁵⁹⁴ ⁵⁹⁴ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 57-58, 84-87; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 39-40. Human Rights Watch, War Crimes, pp. 60-62.

Chapter 7

The Rise of the Muslim Enclave of Srebrenica

Photo of Goran Zekic (1956-1992), in army uniform, on his gravestone in Srebrenica

The assassination of Goran Zekic

Despite the massive military force mobilised by the Serbs in their attempts to ethnically cleanse eastern Bosnia, the morale of Muslim fighters in and around Srebrenica received a major boost with the death of Srebrenica's SDS president, Goran Zekic, on 8 May 1992. The official version of the event, which is confirmed by Muslim and Serb publications alike, is that Zekic was killed in a Muslim ambush near Vidikovac (between Srebrenica and Zalazje).⁵⁹⁵ According to this version, Zekic had been to the funeral of a Serb soldier who was killed during clashes in Srebrenica the day before. On his way back to Bratunac, he drove into a Muslim trap. However rumours have also persisted that Zekic was not killed by Muslims, but by SDS hardliner, Delivoje Sorak, commander of the Serb Territorial Defence. Sorak travelled together with Zekic in the same car. Although he was injured in the incident, he survived it, giving rise to speculations that he might have actually carried out the assassination. Speculations have it that a private dispute or argument over money lay behind the murder.⁵⁹⁶ This 'unofficial' version is corroborated by the statements that both Delivoje Sorak and Miodrag Jokic, the other major SDS hardliner in Srebrenica, gave to the press. For one thing, these statements were issued immediately following Zekic's death. What is more, they contained major inconsistencies and are, therefore, not entirely credible.⁵⁹⁷ Two informants claim that both Sorak and Jokic were arrested after the incident and placed in pre-trial detention in Bijeljina, only to be released again.⁵⁹⁸ Muslim spokesmen never contradicted the official Serb account because they could trumpet Zekic's assassination as a major Muslim victory to boost their troops' morale.

⁵⁹⁵ Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 72, 165, 203; Toholj, Crna knjiga, vol. 2, p. 210; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 47; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 145. Interview: Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999.

⁵⁹⁶ Interviews: Boban Vasic 06/07/1998; Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998; Mitko Kadric 17/01/1998; Munib Hasanovic 14/09/1999. Apparently, Zekic's assassination was a taboo subject in discussions with Sorak. Interview: Delivoje Sorak 20/10/2000. If the rumours are correct, then this case is similar to that of Stanko Pecikoza in Visegrad, a wealthy sawmill owner and SDS official, who was assassinated by Serb gunmen in an ambush in June 1992. He was reportedly killed because he did not pay the 'blood money' he had promised as a compensation for the executions of Muslims by Milan Lukic's paramilitary gang (Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p. 355).

⁵⁹⁷ In an interview with Ilustrovana politika, Jokic claims to have thrown a hand grenade at the Muslim attackers, killing two of them. He claims (inaccurately as we have seen from Ibisevic's account) that Zekic had been always the target of Muslims in

Whatever the truth may be, the fact that most Serbs believed that Zekic was killed in a Muslim ambush meant that a third major road connection, that between Srebrenica and Bratunac (via Sase), was now off limits to them. Zekic's death shocked the Serbs by demonstrating that even their main leader was not invulnerable. What is more, it spread panic because the town was now almost isolated and surrounded by Muslim forces. In the night between 8 and 9 May, they fled the town en masse. All that remained behind were some thirty people (some Serbs, Macedonians, Croats, and a few individuals from mixed marriages).⁵⁹⁹ Fearing Serb vengeance, most Muslims also fled the town the morning after the killing. Soon, dozens of Muslim houses were, in fact, burned down, and some of the occupants who had decided to stay were shot or burned alive in their homes. By this stage, the town was almost completely abandoned. In the afternoon of the next day, Akuf Ustic entered the town and took control. In the days that followed, Muslim inhabitants, who had spent several weeks in the forests, returned to Srebrenica, where they stayed for the next three years. They removed bodies from the streets and buried them near the mosque.⁶⁰⁰

The Muslims of Bratunac and surrounding villages immediately suffered the consequences of Goran Zekic's assassination and the humiliating defeat of the Serbs in Srebrenica. On 9 May, the Muslim village of Glogova, which lies between Kravica and Bratunac, was surrounded. The Serbs then carried out a pogrom on the population. About sixty Muslim men were executed in a field near the village mosque.⁶⁰¹ On Sunday 10 May, thousands of Muslims from Bratunac and various suburbs and villages to the west and north of the town were rounded up in one huge operation and brought together in the FC 'Bratstvo' (Brotherhood) sports stadium in Bratunac. On the previous evening, several had been warned by Serb neighbours that something bad was going to happen the next day, and that it was better to leave. Some Muslims decided to flee into the forests. This entire population of Muslims were rounded up by Serbs from Bratunac and Srebrenica, who searched the streets and drove people out of their homes. Muslims were given almost no time to collect their personal belongings. They were taken to the stadium, where they ordered to hand over money, other valuables, ID cards and car keys. Using megaphones, they called the names of well-known, prominent Muslim men and summoned them to step forward and identify themselves. The men were then taken to the gym of the Vuk Karadzic elementary school. The school, which was located near the stadium, was now used as a Serb drumhead court.⁶⁰² After the Serb takeover of Bratunac, on 17 April, several prominent Muslims were sentenced and executed there. According to Muslim sources, the head of the court was Veljko Macesic, the hospital paediatrician from Bratunac.⁶⁰³

Srebrenica (Milanovic, 'Ubice su medju nama', p. 14). In Revija 92, Sorak claims to have shot at the Muslim attackers, but makes no mention whatsoever of the fact that he killed two of them. The writer of this article also emphasises (and rightly so) that Zekic was quite well respected among ('honest') Muslims in Srebrenica. He spoke to Zekic just a few days before his death, and at that time, Muslims from Srebrenica who had fled to Tuzla were calling him, begging him to help them return and to join forces against the extremists (Mitric, 'Otac zamenio sina junaka'). Zekic made an appearance on TV Novi Sad in which he invited Muslims to discuss their return. Interview: Marinko Sekulic 10/11/1998.

⁵⁹⁸ Interviews: Boban Vasic 06/07/1998; Marinko Sekulic 10/11/1998.

⁵⁹⁹ Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 41.

⁶⁰⁰ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 47; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 145; Rifatbegovic, Ratni mir, pp. 54-56. Interview: Damir Skaler 06/02/1998.

⁶⁰¹ For the events in Glogova, see: Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 53, 79; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 50-51, 90-91; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 43-44, 68, 70; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 34-38; Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a, pp. 74, 141. Interview: Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999.

⁶⁰² Throughout the rest of Bosnia, public places, such as schools, factories, sports arenas, mines, and warehouses were also converted into camps and prisons, where the civilian populations were detained before being displaced. Control of these camps lay in the hands of different parties. Some were run by the army, and others by local authorities, the police, various paramilitary groups and local armed militias, or combinations of these. (Bassiouni, Final report, pp. 51-55).

⁶⁰³ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 33. See also the eyewitness account of Mehmedalija Hadziarapovic in Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 92-97.

By late afternoon, four to five thousand Muslim civilians gathered in the sports stadium.⁶⁰⁴ In the early evening, they were taken outside to transported elsewhere. At this point, all men of military age were separated from the women and children at the entrance of the stadium. Women and children were put on buses and transported to Tisce, from where they walked to Muslim-held territory. The men, about six to seven hundred of them, were lined up in rows guarded by soldiers and paramilitaries. They were brought to the gym of the Vuk Karadzic School, where one of the cruellest and bloodiest episodes of the war took place.⁶⁰⁵ Many of them later recounted that when they entered the gym, they saw the dead and mutilated bodies of those who had gone before. The dressing rooms to the left and right were covered in blood. Some thirty to fifty people were lying on the floor of the gym itself, many of them unconscious. They were asked to stand up and move. Those who could not comply were shot in the neck. After the dead were removed, all the men were pressed inside and forced to stand in one half of the gym, which was too small for them to breath. During the first night, nine people died of suffocation. The prisoners were offered extremely salty food without any water to drink. Then, on the second day they received nothing to eat or drink at all.

On the first evening, paramilitaries, most of whom had come from elsewhere, started to kick and beat the Muslim prisoners. The first victim was a priest, Mustafa Mujkanovic, who was killed in front of the other prisoners. He was forced to cross himself, to lift his hand and raise three fingers in the Serb manner (he lifted only two) and to drink beer (which he refused). Then he was beaten with various objects until he lost consciousness. He was finally killed off by a gunshot through the head.⁶⁰⁶ This orgy of violence continued for the next three days until 13 May at midnight. In the gym were also Muslim men from Srebrenica and Potoèari who had ended up in Bratunac. They were personally targeted in order to avenge the attack on the Arkan Tigers and the murder of Goran Zekic. Zekic's father reportedly entered the gym to order the murder of all men from Srebrenica as retribution for the killing of his son.⁶⁰⁷ Others, who also had private accounts to settle, entered and selected their own candidates to be assaulted. In most other cases, however, the victims were chosen more or less at random through certain 'games' the Serbs played. Men wearing green shirts (the colour symbolising the Islamic faith) were certain to be selected. Prisoners had to sing Chetnik songs, and those who refused to do so were killed. Basketballs were thrown into the air, and any prisoner hit in the head by one would be sentenced death. Some prisoners were taken into an 'investigation' room, one of the dressing rooms in the gym, where they were interrogated and tortured. Another dressing room was used to kill people off. Others who were already half dead were carried outside in front of a hangar behind the school building to be killed there.

There, the dead bodies of Muslim prisoners were collected, and trucks came to transport them away. Prisoners were forced to carry bodies out of the school to the hangar, and throw them into a ditch or load them on the trucks. In some cases, those who had carried the bodies were then killed themselves and thrown on top of the pile. Others were put to work removing bloodstains and human remains. Most prisoners who were brought to the school later, and who did not belong to the first group of six to seven hundred men, were killed in front of the hangar. The bodies of all those killed were dumped in mass graves or thrown into the Drina.⁶⁰⁸ According to eyewitnesses, at least three hundred Muslims were liquidated in the school. Several of the perpetrators were not from Bratunac and for that reason were often known by their nicknames only: 'Bane' (reportedly a paramilitary and member of the White Eagles, who was said to be from Sabac in Serbia), 'Makedonac' (probably from Vranje), Dragan Maric (who was from Milici), Novak 'Krke' Stjepanovic (originally from Vukovar but ⁶⁰⁴ At least one Muslim family was allowed to go back home. They hid for the next twelve days before they acquired a permit to leave the town. Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998.

⁶⁰⁵ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 61-196; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 51-53, 102-107, 122-127; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 44-52; Bassiouni, Final report, Annex III.a, pp. 140-141; Mazowiecki, Situation of human rights, par. 65.

⁶⁰⁶ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 95-98.

⁶⁰⁷ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 159-161; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 126.

⁶⁰⁸ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 48-52.

living as a miner in Sase), and Milan 'Rocko' Trisic (who was from Bratunac).⁶⁰⁹ They also used mock Muslim nicknames among themselves such as Huso, Haso, and Mujo.

According to one Muslim account, they used lists of people to be liquidated, which they received from the local SDS. They were said to have been paid by Sreten Radic, who reportedly gave them 500 Deutsch marks for every Muslim they killed. They also had a video of the Muslim demonstration on the streets of Bratunac in late August 1991 when the Yugoslav Army attempted to confiscate the army card files. Using that video, they were able to identify Muslims who had been on the forefront of these demonstrations.⁶¹⁰ One of their victims was a local Serb, Milutin 'Moler' Vuksic, who was taken into the school and killed because he had been hiding a Muslim family.⁶¹¹ He was one of the very few local Serbs who helped Muslims and resisted the massive expulsion of the Muslim population. Many other Serbs took part in it, becoming complicit in the act of ethnic cleansing without fully anticipating the brutality with which it was carried out. Many were convinced that Muslims would not suffer much harm, and that most of them would be transported to Kladanj as part of an exchange between Muslim and Serb territories. They were told, "Muslims have to go and Serbs will come here". The paramilitaries, however, made sure that things were much worse than anyone could imagine. There were some Serbs, including individuals participating in these actions, who tried to assist or rescue former Muslim friends. They did this, for instance, by trying to help them to flee, giving them money, or making sure that they escaped any harm from extremists. Some were horrified and very distressed about what was happening.⁶¹²

At midnight on 13 May, the torturing in the gym of the Vuk Karadzic School stopped. All remaining prisoners were put on buses to Pale to be exchanged for Serb prisoners. The exchange took place a few days later. In the other parts of the municipality of Bratunac, Serbs continued to round up Muslims, including in the villages along the main road to Konjevic Polje. The Muslim populations of these villages were taken to Kravica. Polom served as the main collection point for villages north of Bratunac. Some men ended up in the prison camp Susica, while women were deported to Muslim-held central Bosnia. Several dozen Muslims from the villages of Gradina and Sase were imprisoned in a building of the Sase mine, from which most disappeared.⁶¹³ Muslim villages south of Bratunac along the Drina (such as Bjelovac, Voljavica, and Sikiric) came under attack from Bratunac and the Serb stronghold of Fakovici.⁶¹⁴ Instead of surrendering to the Serbs, most villagers took refuge in the hills and forests or went to Muslim villages near Srebrenica that had not yet been assaulted. These people were to form the first large group of refugees to enter the enclave. They received help from Muslim fighters (including the group led by Osman Malagic), who had taken refuge in the hills as early on as April. These fighters assisted Muslim civilians to flee to safer territory, and also helped them return to their villages during the night to collect food and other belongings. Almost all of these Muslims ended up in the town of Srebrenica, where they were accommodated in apartments and houses that had been abandoned by their previous occupants.⁶¹⁵

These large-scale Serb operations raged from the beginning up through the end of May. During that time, over three quarters of the entire Muslim population in the Bratunac municipality (seventeen thousand people) was cleansed from the area. At least five hundred people were killed. Almost five ⁶⁰⁹ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 101-107, 116-120.

⁶¹⁰ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 18-119.

⁶¹¹ Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 166-167.

⁶¹² Interviews: Mitko and Mevla Kadric 17/01/1998; Mirsada Bakalovic 15/06/1998, 17/06/1998 and 19/06/1998.

⁶¹³ Probably most prisoners were killed and buried in an earthen dam near the mine. Only eleven people survived. Girls were raped. For an eyewitness account, see Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 98-101. See also Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 55-57. Interview: Edina Karic 20/10/1997.

⁶¹⁴ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 53-55; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 51-54; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 53-57, 74-75; Omeragic, Satanski sinovi, pp. 57-59. Orlica, a Roma settlement near Tegare, was also attacked and cleansed by Serb forces on 16 May 1992 (Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 56).

⁶¹⁵ See Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 51-56; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 115-16. Interviews: Mehmed Malagic 22/10/1997 and 14/06/1998.

thousand people (less than a quarter of the Muslim population) stayed in their own villages. This was because those villages were under Muslim control; about 3,300 in and around Konjevic Polje, as well as 1,500 Muslims in Blječeva, Joseva and Jagodnja. Of those displaced, about nine thousand were deported to central Bosnia. Another eight thousand fled to villages that were part of the Muslim-held territory of Srebrenica.⁶¹⁶ Although these large population movements were the result of massive expulsions, local SDS leaders made it appear in the Serbian press as though these people had left their homes out of free choice. On 14 May 1992, Vjèernje novosti, a daily newspaper, quoted Miroslav Deronjic as claiming that many Muslims had fled the area on their own initiative. According to Deronjic, they did this out of fear of Serb reprisals after Muslim extremists had killed Zekic and carried out massacres against the Serb population. He claimed that roughly one hundred Serbs had been slaughtered in Srebrenica.⁶¹⁷

First wave of coordinated Muslim attacks on Serb villages

Naser Oric, main commander of the Muslim forces in the Srebrenica enclave.

Groups of armed Muslims in and around Srebrenica responded to these massive ethnic cleansing operations with a wave of coordinated attacks on Serb villages, which started in all earnest on 15 May. The villages initially targeted were Viogor, Orahovica and Osredak. These first operations were intended to link up various centres of Muslim resistance and create a compact Muslim-controlled territory in a semi-circle west of Srebrenica (at the perimeters of which lay Potocari, Srebrenica, Suceska, and Zeleni Jadar).⁶¹⁸ During these attacks, Serb villages were plundered and burned down, and several Serbs were killed. Generally, however, the number of Serb casualties was low because most of the population (particularly women and children) had already taken refuge in Bratunac or elsewhere. On 16 May, Serb forces carried out a counterattack from Milici, trying to raid the Muslim stronghold of Suceska west of Srebrenica. But local commander, Zulfo Tursunovic, managed to overcome the Serbs, a victory that cost both Serb and Muslim casualties.⁶¹⁹ Serb forces retaliated by encircling the village of Zaklopača, a few miles west of the town of Milici. There, they carried out a massacre the very same day, ⁶¹⁶ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 57-58, 113.

⁶¹⁷ Sobot, 'U Srebrenici pobijeno sto Srba'.

⁶¹⁸ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 88-89; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 145; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 72, 162, 172-3.

⁶¹⁹ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 59; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 142.

killing at least eighty-three Muslims.⁶²⁰ A second series of Muslim attacks on Serb villages and hamlets was carried out between 16 and 18 May. These attacks were launched from strongholds near Kragljivoda and Osmace, in the hills between Zeleni Jadar and Skelani. Several armed Muslim groups had emerged there, who still had no ties to similar groups in and around Srebrenica. In the following days, Serb forces carried out a counterattack from Skelani, raiding a number of Muslim settlements and killing several Muslims.⁶²¹

Soon, Muslim forces in Potočari, Srebrenica and Sućeska succeeded in linking up. On 20 May 1992, at a meeting in the village of Bajramovići, all groups in the municipality were brought under the command of Naser Orić. Akif Ustić became the deputy commander. The headquarters of what was now called the Territorial Defence of Srebrenica was located in Srebrenica's post office in. Despite these measures to organise and coordinate the resistance, however, the situation remained chaotic due to the enormous lack of trained and experienced officers.⁶²² In May, the military authorities opened a war hospital in the town of Srebrenica, where a handful of doctors did their best to revive healthcare. They collected medicines from people's houses.⁶²³ The post office also returned to operating; fortunately the Serbs had not destroyed the telecommunication system, which was soon restored. For security reasons, all private telephone service was cut off. Military leaders, however, retained one phone and one fax line to the outside world for army purposes. In addition, a radio link in the PTT building was used to transmit official and codified messages as well as to exchange private messages.⁶²⁴ Ordinary people depended mainly on radio amateurs to help them contact relatives outside the Srebrenica enclave. The police force, which was reinstated, introduced a curfew that lasted from sunset to dawn. The only factory in operation during the first months of war was the Vežionica' textile factory. It produced clothes for the army and the civil defence. It took several weeks to re-install some form of civil administration. On 1 July, the War Presidency of the Municipality of Srebrenica was established in the PTT building. Hajrudin Avdić stepped up as its president, and Hamdija Fejzić as chairman of its Executive Board. Orić's position as commander of the Armed Forces of Srebrenica was confirmed.⁶²⁵

In late May 1992, many Muslim refugees who had been hiding in the forests started to flood into the enclave, bringing cows and everything else they had managed to take with them. Others ended up in the nearby Muslim pockets of Zepa, Konjević Polje, and Čerška, to the southwest and northwest of Srebrenica. They came from all sides, from Muslim villages near Bratunac, Milici, Skelani, and Vlasenica. In Srebrenica, only three to four hundred original inhabitants remained in town; the rest had left.⁶²⁶ Even though most of Muslims in the municipalities of Bratunac, Srebrenica and Vlasenica were on the move, cleansing operations in the area had not achieved what the Serbs expected. They were now confronted with the threat of an ever-expanding Muslim enclave, which was joining forces with other pockets of Muslim resistance in Konjević Polje, Čerška, Luka, Zepa, and villages to the south-east of Srebrenica. Serb frustration over this state of affairs expressed itself in acts of revenge, which were carried out mainly when Muslims achieved military successes. These acts of revenge were often ⁶²⁰ Orić, Srebrenica, pp. 62-63. Human Rights Watch, War Crimes, pp. 50-55. Mazowiecki, Situation of human rights, par.37. Interviews and conversations with Hasan Nuhanović 16/06/1998 and Omer Subašić 17/06/1998. The massacre in Zaklopača was included in the indictments against Momčilo Krajišnik and Biljana Plavšić at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), under case numbers IT-00-39-I and IT-00-40-I, respectively.

⁶²¹ Masić, Srebrenica, pp. 58-9,96; Orić, Srebrenica, p. 58; Ivanisević, Hronika, pp. 72, 160, 165, 266-7.

⁶²² Interview: Damir Skaler 31/01/1998.

⁶²³ Interview: Abdulah Purković 94/02/1998.

⁶²⁴ Interview: Hasan Nuhanović, 19/06/1998.

⁶²⁵ Masić, Srebrenica, pp. 49-52. The War Presidency, a council of seventeen members, replaced the municipal council. Because the municipal council could not meet regularly (as most councillors were outside the enclave) and many decisions had to be made quickly, the council's work was suspended. The War Presidency continued to exist until August 1994, when the municipal council was reinstated, albeit without including its SDS members. Interview: Fahrudin Salihović 04/02/1998.

⁶²⁶ According to Boban Vasić, a list was drawn up of all original inhabitants who had returned to the town. The list contained 366 names. This information was provided by his mother, Dragica Vasić, who stayed in Muslim-held Srebrenica throughout most of the war. Interview: Boban Vasić 06/07/1998.

disproportionate in terms of their scale and intensity of violence. On 21 May 1992, Serbs took thirty-two inmates from the Susica camp and executed them after they had failed to seize Nova Kasaba (part of the pocket of Konjevic Polje). Of these prisoners, all of whom originated from villages north of Bratunac, three survived.⁶²⁷ The executions in Glogova (9 May) and Zaklopača (16 May), which were discussed earlier, were also part of this pattern. Moreover, in Bratunac, the death of Srebrenica's local SDS leader, Goran Zekic, was used as pretext to start a wholesale assault on the town's Muslim population (10 May).

We should not forget, however, that the Serbs suffered important losses during the first two months of the war. Several of their leaders were injured or killed. Aside from Zekic, some Serb leaders and commanders were killed in Konjevic Polje and Kravica. There, Serbs tried continually to take control of the road junction linking the towns of Bratunac, Zvornik, and Vlasenica. Muslim forces in Konjevic Polje had managed to block these connections. All Serb attacks were unsuccessful and they led to serious casualties. For instance, Raso Milanovic (commander of the local defence in Kravica) was heavily injured on 26 May. The next day, Serbs attempted to open up the road to Milici with a convoy of trucks from Boksit Milici. Five drivers were killed during this operation, and all the trucks were burned. Two days later, on 29 May, Golub Eric (World War Two veteran and member of the Serb crisis committee of Kravica) and Milutin Milosevic (police commander of Bratunac) were also killed in heavy fighting near Konjevic Polje as they tried to remove Muslim barricades. The Serbs retaliated by executing almost ninety men of military age in Drinjača the following day.⁶²⁸ Finally, Radomir 'Raso' Milosevic (one of the commanders of the Serb defence in Kravica) was killed in an ambush in Glogova on 1 June. These losses formed a serious blow to defence in Kravica. The morale of local Serb forces improved only after two buses with volunteers from Nova Pazova in Serbia arrived.⁶²⁹

In early June, the Serbs were also hit hard near Zepa, where a Serb army convoy was ambushed and completely destroyed by Muslim forces, killing at least thirty-nine soldiers. Dozens of Serbs were taken prisoner. The Bosnian Serb leadership was shocked, because most soldiers who had been killed were actually from Pale, the seat of the war-time government of the Republika Srpska (Radovan Karadzic was later present at the funeral). In the days that followed, Zepa was pounded by Serb artillery, while Yugoslav Army jets bombarded Muslim hamlets in the enclave.⁶³⁰ During the summer of 1992, Muslim attacks on Serb-held territory only intensified, including from the enclave of Srebrenica. This was partly due to the fact that Muslims who had taken refuge in the hills near Srebrenica were now returning to their villages to take food and other belongings. Starting in July, they were joined by many other refugees who had ended up in Srebrenica and who were suffering increasingly from hunger. The villages along the Drina were often targeted by groups of refugees since they possessed the most fertile land in the region. That is where most people went to look for food.

Initially, only men went to these villages in search of food. Women and children soon joined, however, to carry back as much as possible in bags. At times long columns were formed of several thousand people. People gathered at the usual locations, such as Mocevici, Pirici, and Jagodnja. Serbs tried to prevent these raids by ambushing them or by putting mines along the tracks used by these so-called torbari ('bag-people'). Several people were killed. In June, for instance, four Muslim torbari were shot in Zalazje. In July, eleven people died in a minefield near Magasici. And in September, thirteen people were killed and twelve were taken hostage in Tegare and never seen again. Serbs also carried out ambushes on tracks leading to Konjevic Polje and Zepa, for instance, in Podravanje where dozens of ⁶²⁷ Masic, Srebrenica, p. 80; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 55-56,66; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 55-56,108-110,146.

⁶²⁸ Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 80-82

⁶²⁹ For details on the clashes around Konjevic Polje and Nova Kasaba, see Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, pp. 45-49,161; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 57,66-68,77-78,80-82; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 146-147,161-64,166; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 73,126; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 60-61, 330-332.

⁶³⁰ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 115-117. Masic, Srebrenica, p. 72; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 68-69. Interview: Omer Subasic 17/06/1998, Hasan Nuhanovic 16/06/1998.

Muslims were killed during the war. The road to Konjevic Polje was also dangerous. Muslims usually tried to bring homemade tobacco from there to exchange for corn and other foods.⁶³¹

Military forays into Serb territory continued, the main aim of which was to eliminate Serb positions around the town and link up various pockets of Muslim resistance. The attacks were often carried out on Serbian-Orthodox holidays, such as Sveta Trojica (8 June) and Vidovdan (28 June), when the Serb defences were usually less alert because of the celebrations. Another well-known example of this pattern was the attack on Zalazje on Petrovdan (12 July). During June and early July, Muslim forces tried repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, to take this Serb outpost, which was located on a hill overseeing Srebrenica town. On that particular day, however, Oric carried out a surprise attack. After one day of fighting, he succeeded in taking the village, killing at least forty Serbs, some of whom were burned alive in their homes. Among the victims were three members of the Rakic family, one of whom had been best friends with Naser Oric (Mile Rakic). As the story goes, Oric desperately tried to convince his friend to surrender. He stubbornly refused, killing himself with a hand grenade.⁶³² Another victim of the battle at Zalazje was army officer and commander of the prison camp in Sase, Miroљub Todorovic. At least six Serbs, including Mile's uncle Miodrag, were taken hostage. They were then transported to the prison in Srebrenica, never to be seen again. According to Ivanisevic, a unit of Gypsies from the Srebrenica suburb of Kazani was among the attackers. In Voljavica, Muslims ambushed and killed a large number of Serb reinforcements, which were on their way to Zalazje and never arrived at their destination.⁶³³

The Muslim territory expands

The terrible, salvation-bringing truth

⁶³¹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 116-118. Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 128, 132-133, 135, 166.

⁶³² Before the war, Mile Rakic ran a café in Bratunac. In November 1991, on the family's slava (the family's patron saint day), a group of Muslim hoodlums entered the café and demolished it. Oric later forced them to pay back the damage. After the battle in Zalazje, Mile's body was the only that was exchanged with the Serbs. Conversations with Goran Rakic 20/06/1998 and 25/06/1998.

⁶³³ For the battle in the village of Zalazje, see: Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 49, 68, 78-79, 145, 172-3, 201, 285-88; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 107-110, 268-69; Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, pp. 51-52; Toholj, Crna knjiga, vol.2, p. 216. Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 80, 86; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 86. Oric, Srebrenica, p. 161. Westerman and Rijs, Het zwartste scenario, pp. 73-75; Interviews and conversations with Ljubo Rakic 09/06/1998, Goran Rakic 20/06/1998 and 25/06/1998, Momčilo Cvjetinovic 11/06/1998, Staka Cvjetinovic 10/06/1998, Mile Stanojevic 15-16/09/1999; Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999. One Muslim document found by the Serbs after they took Srebrenica in July 1995 mentions that ninety-six Serbs were killed and nine taken prisoner during actions in Zalazje, Spat and Sase. NIOD, Coll Momčilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

Map of Serb villages in the district of Srebrenica destroyed by Naser Oric's Muslim forces, printed on the front page of Nasa Rijec, Bratunac, June 1995.

The Muslim attacks on Serb villages continued throughout the summer and autumn of 1992. On 30 June, Muslims took Brezani, a Serb stronghold in the hills southeast of Srebrenica (near Zeleni Jadar). Nineteen Serbs were killed during this attack. This victory enabled Oric's forces in the Srebrenican enclave to link up with armed Muslim groups in Osmace and other Muslim villages to the east. According to Serb sources, Muslims took all livestock (over two hundred cows) and mutilated the bodies of the Serbs killed. One of the victims had his ear cut off, another was crucified, and several others burned in their homes. At the time of the attack, some sixty men were present in the village, thirty of which were capable of fighting. Women and children had already left Brezani.⁶³⁴ In July and August, attacks on Serb villages between Kravica and Bratunac intensified, and there were frequent Muslim ambushes in Glogova. On 25 July, Muslims took Hranèa and subsequently blocked the road connection between Kravica and Bratunac. Cut off from the ten-kilometre asphalt road, Serbs now had to make a thirty-kilometre detour to get from Kravica via Sopotnik and take the macadam road along the Drina to Bratunac, or vice-versa. After three days, Serbs re-conquered Hranèa. Nonetheless, the fact that the Muslims had been able to take control of it made it all too clear that Kravica and Bratunac were now in an extremely precarious position.⁶³⁵ Serb authorities in Bratunac pushed for negotiations with Muslims in Srebrenica in order to bring about a cease-fire and an exchange of prisoners. Initially, the Serbs held talks with Zulfo Tursunovic. When Naser Oric was expected in Bratunac to continue the discussions and negotiate a deal, he failed to appear.⁶³⁶

In late July, the Muslims received reinforcements from outside. Nurif Rizvanovic, who, as mentioned earlier, had tried to set up a paramilitary group in Bratunac the year before, returned to the scene. Before his return, however, Nijaz Dubièic, the former mayor of Bratunac, had talked to him in Tuzla to engage him in the war. Rizvanovic formed a Muslim Brigade of 450 men, consisting of refugees from Bratunac and the Podrinje area. They walked through the Serb lines to Konjevic Polje and Srebrenica. One of his companies, well equipped and in ABiH uniforms, arrived in Srebrenica on 7 August. They received an enthusiastic welcome from the population of Srebrenica, who saw the ABiH uniforms for the first time.⁶³⁷ The next major Muslim operations took place in autumn 1992, when Muslims attacked the Serb stronghold of Podravanje and villages along the Drina, burning numerous houses and killing dozens of Serbs. The attack on Podravanje occurred on 24 September and was carried out by a force of two to three thousand Muslims. It cost the lives of at least thirty-one Serbs, many of whom died brutal deaths. Some were burned alive; others were decapitated or dismembered. Podravanje was taken by the Muslims. As a result, Srebrenica was linked with Zepa, as well as with the villages of Luka and Krusev Do. The Muslim forces captured two T55 tanks and other weaponry, and took huge numbers of cattle with them. They also attacked the nearby surface mine of Bracan, where they eliminated a Serb artillery post located there. Muslims used a tank in this attack, during which seven Serbs were killed. Two days later, Muslim forces carried out attacks on villages near Milici and ⁶³⁴ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 94-95; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 160; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 47, 76, 172-3, 191, 272-277; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 110-112, 267; Toholj, Crna knjiga, vol.2, p. 215.

⁶³⁵ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 83; Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, p. 53-62.

⁶³⁶ Interview: Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999. Deronjic also refers to these negotiations in an interview he gave to the local paper, Nasa Rijec. He defends himself against accusations that he was trading off Bratunac. Anonymous, 'Neka mi neko od vas pokaze'.

⁶³⁷ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 79-80, 86-87. Nurif Rizvanovic, who was based in Konjevic Polje, was assassinated in November 1992. It is rumoured that he was killed by Oric's men. Oric may have feared Rizvanovic's influence. See: Delalic, 'Rizvanoviceva majka'; Mrkic, 'Predsjedništvo', p. 8. Interviews: Almir and Zahira Ramic 6-10/11/1999, Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998 and 18/09/2001. After the war, ABiH commanders from Srebrenica denied that Oric was behind the assassination of Rizvanovic. See: Mandzic, 'Zlatni Ljiljani', p. 37.

Konjevic Polje, killing thirty-seven Serbs. Serbs retaliated with air raids on Srebrenica, causing huge material damage though no casualties.⁶³⁸

On 5 October 1992, Muslims launched massive attacks on Fakovici and other Serb villages along the Drina, killing at least twenty-four Serbs and burning down 120 houses. The villages were looted, and in Fakovici the church was desecrated. The attackers seized huge amounts of food, and also shot at Serbs at the other (i.e. Serbian) side of the Drina. Serbs fled with small boats over to Serbia. Muslims now controlled most villages along the Drina River, from where they could shell Bratunac.⁶³⁹ At this stage, the attacks on Serb villages became increasingly brutal. Soldiers were joined by hundreds of hungry civilians in search of food and revenge. This proved to be an extremely effective tactic, as Serbs could not defend themselves against such overwhelming numbers. They were terrified by such attacks, which usually started with the deafening noise of baking utensils being banged by women to create panic among the Serb defenders. The Serbs could take on small groups of armed soldiers, but hundreds, or even thousands, of torbari were invincible. They set up mines and booby-traps in fields, but were unable to stop the massive raids. Because such staggering numbers of torbari took part in the attacks, there were no real civilians in Srebrenica as far as the Serbs were concerned.⁶⁴⁰

Most Muslim commanders were unable to keep this overwhelming force in check. The result was often acts of uninhibited violence and cruelty. Bodies of Serbs killed in battle became the object of deliberate mutilation by the torbari. Ivanisevic gives details of this: bodies of Serbs were found which bore the marks of torture and burnings, with cut throats, heads cut off, eyes cut out, skulls smashed, arms and legs broken, and men castrated or circumcised. Sometimes, a capital 'U' (the symbol of the Ustashe) was carved into bodies.⁶⁴¹ One of the most notorious perpetrators of such acts was Kemal 'Kemo' Mehmedovic, who is said to have decapitated Serbs and carried their heads through the town of Srebrenica. According to Ivanisevic, a few dozen psychopaths of this calibre lived in the enclave. During the first year of the war, almost ten percent of Serb victims were not simply killed, but were also tortured, burned or mutilated in various ways.⁶⁴²

Most civilians were refugees. Not only were they suffering from hunger, they were also driven by a thirst for revenge. Many had been expelled from their homes when the war began. One Muslim document, a war diary of a local ABiH soldier, clearly demonstrates that revenge played a role. Found when the Srebrenica enclave was taken by the Serbs, this diary describes the soldier's thoughts. Watching his unsuspecting Serb victims working the fields from the hills near Fakovici, just before his unit attacks them, he writes: "Now a terrible and bloody revenge will come over them, carried out by people whose possessions have been taken away and destroyed".⁶⁴³ The numbers of hungry, embittered civilians only increased after a new wave of refugees entered Srebrenica in September 1992. These were people displaced after Zepa came under relentless shelling, attacks and bombardments by the Yugoslav Army. In mid September, Zepa seemed to lie at the brink of falling. At that point, many Muslims refugees decided to go to Konjevic Polje, Cerska and Srebrenica, from where they hoped to continue to Tuzla. On 9 September 1992, a large column of about six thousand refugees were ambushed and shelled by the Serbs. They killed many of them and captured several hundred. An even greater tragedy was averted when Muslim forces intervened the next day. The refugees were forced to go back to Konjevic Polje, Cerska, and Srebrenica. In the Srebrenica enclave, they roamed through villages in ⁶³⁸ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 51-53, 82-83, 160, 172-3, 179-80, 213, 294-305; Toholj, Crna knjiga, vol.2, p. 218-19; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 112-117, 275. Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 164-65; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 72, 100, 124.

⁶³⁹ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 85, 88; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 166-67; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 102-03; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 53-54, 84, 173, 199, 305-313; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 276; Anonymous, 'Ustaski pir u Fakovicima'; Cvjetinovic, 'Granatama po djeci'. NIOD, Coll Momčilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

⁶⁴⁰ Interviews and conversations: Mile Stanojevic 15-16/09/1999, Muhamed Durakovic, 21/11/1999, Milivoje Ivanisevic 03/02/1998.

⁶⁴¹ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 96-101.

⁶⁴² Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 102. Mehmedovic was taken out of the enclave and brought to Tuzla at the beginning of 1993. Conversation: Luka Bogdanovic 15/09/1999.

⁶⁴³ NIOD, Coll Momčilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

search of food. While some peasants shared the little food they had, others did not for fear they too would soon go hungry.⁶⁴⁴

The need for food raids grew more pressing. It would have been difficult for the Muslim commanders to prevent the worst of the violence even if they had wanted to. (Moreover, it is unlikely that they would have had any such desire since they could make good use of the torbari). Usually, the news of impending attacks spread quickly from the mouths of soldiers, most of whom stayed with their families. They told their relatives to follow the army at a short distance and to take as much food as they could. It was impossible to keep military actions secret for long.⁶⁴⁵ Yet some Muslims refused to participate in the raids on Serb villages out of fear that they would lead to Serb retaliations. Nobody was allowed to say that openly, and anyone who did express concern was told in no uncertain terms to keep silent.⁶⁴⁶ The attacks were led by Naser Oric, Zulfo Tursunovic, Akif Ustic and Hakija Meholic, although Meholic did not always participate. According to one Muslim document, he decided, for instance, not to take part in the attack against Serb villages along the Drina (the Fakovici area) in early October 1992.⁶⁴⁷

On 3 November 1992, the forces of the Muslim-held enclaves of Srebrenica, Konjevic Polje, and Cerska were brought under one unified command. Once again, Oric stepped up as commander-in-chief.⁶⁴⁸ Although all groups were under Oric's command, it is clear that he was not always able to impose his decisions on other commanders. This was especially true of Zulfo Tursunovic and Hakija Meholic. Some units wanted to remain more or less independent, such as Meholic's company. Initially, he called his unit the HVO (Croat Council of Defence), but was forced to drop the name by the War Presidency.⁶⁴⁹ During the first year of the war, Meholic commanded a unit of fifty soldiers, who were much more disciplined than other units. Unlike members of other units in the enclave, they did not sleep at home but stayed in Hotel Domavija. The Hotel was their kasarna, and they had their own kitchen. From there, they provided their own families with food, which was usually taken from Serb villages during the raids. They had two trucks to transport whatever they seized during raids.⁶⁵⁰ Tensions between Oric and Meholic continued throughout the war, partly due to their very different views on the objectives of their armed struggle. Oric was fighting for the Muslim cause and also wanted to expand his territory at the cost of the Serbs. Meholic wanted to protect the town and did not exclude future cooperation and coexistence with Serbs. Later during the war, Meholic was appointed head of police. In that capacity, he did his best to fight crime and the mafia, to protect the very few Serbs and Croats left in the town, and to save the Orthodox church from destruction. This placed yet another strain on relations between Oric and Meholic.

Aside from these frictions, political opposition was developing in the enclave. It was led by Ibran Mustafic as soon as he returned to Srebrenica in December 1992. Mustafic had been in Sarajevo when the war broke out, and stayed there until November. He managed to leave Sarajevo and walked to Gorazde through the forests. From there, he continued on to besieged Srebrenica, where he arrived on 12 December 1992.⁶⁵¹ At the time, the SDA was completely marginalized in the enclave. Since most SDA leaders left Srebrenica at the beginning of the war, Oric dissolved the party. This situation was not unique. Often, in parts of Bosnia most affected by the war, the SDA lost its power to local warlords, who managed to organise the defence that the SDA had failed to establish before the war started.⁶⁵² Local SDA leader, Hamed Efendic, lost all his influence. Moreover, once Srebrenica was proclaimed a safe ⁶⁴⁴ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, pp. 132-134; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 81; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 72, 98; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 69, 70, 137, 163-64; Ćekić, The aggression on Bosnia, p. 170.

⁶⁴⁵ Interview: Hasan Nuhanovic 19/06/1998.

⁶⁴⁶ Interviews and conversations with Omer Subasic 19/10/1997 and 20/10/1997, and Vahid Hodzic 04-05/07/1997.

⁶⁴⁷ NIOD, Coll Momčilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

⁶⁴⁸ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 88-89.

⁶⁴⁹ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 139-42.

⁶⁵⁰ Interview: Hasan Nuhanovic 19/06/1998, Damir Skaler 31/01/1998.

⁶⁵¹ Interviews: Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998 and 18/09/2001. Anonymous, 'Glasna sutnja'.

⁶⁵² Interviews: Mehmed Pargan 16/06/1998, Almir and Zahira Ramic 6-10/11/1999.

area, he was even imprisoned several times. Mustafic claimed a special position as the only locally elected Muslim representative in the Bosnian parliament. However, he was ignored by all the military and civil leaders in the enclave. Mustafic survived two assassination attempts, the first of which took place in April 1993 and the second in May 1995. During the second attempt, Mustafic was seriously injured, but his close SDA affiliate, Hamed Salihovic, was killed.⁶⁵³ A third attempt to kill him occurred right after the fall of Srebrenica in July 1995, when he claims he was attacked again by political opponents.⁶⁵⁴

Mustafic arrived in the enclave during Srebrenica's first – and harshest – winter in the war. Many were starving due to the constant lack of food and humanitarian aid. The first UNHCR convoy entered the enclave only after seven months of war, on 28 November 1992. Several previous attempts had failed due to Serb obstruction. It took three days of negotiations with the Serbs for the first convoy to get through. Tim Judah, who joined the convoy, wrote, “[p]eople tumbled down the hills to greet the first United Nations aid convoy to breach Serbian lines since the war began. Cheering and waving, crying and laughing, thousands lined the roads as the UN convoy rolled in. (...) The joyous reception was in stark contrast to that given to the convoy as it passed through Serb-held Bratunac where locals spat and jeered”. Judah described how the inhabitants of Srebrenica were without electricity, running water or communications. He also sketched an impression of the appalling conditions in the hospital: “[...] torch bulbs have been taped to the walls, powered by lorry batteries. [...] old alcohol [is] still being used to distil water. Operations are carried out without anaesthetic, and the hospital has no medicines”. A local doctor told Judah they had no disinfectants, bandages, infusions, power, or antibiotics, and informed him that medicines were even more urgently needed than food. Over three hundred people had died in the hospital, who could have survived had the proper medicines been available. To the astonishment of the hospital staff as well as the journalists accompanying it, the convoy carried no medical supplies. After just one hour, the UN lorries rolled back into Serb-held territory. A second convoy arrived on 5 December, carrying medicines, blankets and detergents.⁶⁵⁵

Inspired by previous military successes, and driven by hunger and the will to survive, Oric's forces and auxiliary troops of torbari launched a new offensive along the Drina in December. Once again, they captured a number of villages. The Serbs countered these attacks using aviation and artillery from Serbia. Despite these efforts, however, Muslims succeeded in expelling the Serb populations of the villages of Bjelovac, Voljavica, Loznica, and Sikiric on 14 December 1992. Almost seventy Serbs were slaughtered in these attacks; many others fled across the Drina. Serbs who witnessed the attacks also saw women carrying guns and shooting Serb civilians, and others carrying large bags in which to haul plundered goods. After being shot, some victims were hacked with knives or blunt objects. Pigs were slaughtered and carried away in pieces, which was a clear indication of how desperate Muslim refugees were for food. Oric's forces were now in control of all villages on the left side of the Drina, from Voljavica to Zlijebac. They also seized a considerable supply of arms, ammunition, and food. They also commandeered another tank, pieces of artillery, and a few hundred rifles. They paraded these war trophies through the centre of Srebrenica, where the population went wild in jubilation.⁶⁵⁶ Ten days later, Glogova was also taken by the Muslims, i.e. by Ejub Golic's unit (consisting of Muslims expelled from Glogova in May). As a result, the road between Kravica and Bratunac was completely blocked to the Serbs. During the heavy fighting, at least eighteen Serbs and twelve Muslims were killed. In ⁶⁵³ Interviews: Ibran Mustafic 16/04/1998 and 18/09/2001, Besim Ibisevic 24/05/1998.

⁶⁵⁴ Anonymous, 'Glasna sutnja'.

⁶⁵⁵ NIOD, Coll UNHCR, Mission report on convoy (Jolles) 30/11/1992; Report on second humanitarian convoy (Jolles) 06/12/1992; Judah, 'UN brings hope'. See also the report on the first convoy in Nasa Rijec, 22/12/1992, p. 3. Interviews: Tim Judah 09/12/1997 and Zoran Kusovac 01/11/1997.

⁶⁵⁶ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 46-47, 54-55, 174, 90, 267-272, 282-283, 313-323; Jevtic, 'Ponovo ustasko pirovanje'; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 101-104, 277-78. Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 89; Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 164, 168; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 73, 105-110; Judah 'serb forces move south'. See also Mazowiecki, Situation of human rights, par. 42. NIOD, Coll Momčilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

addition, Jovan 'Jole' Nikolic, one of Kravica's commanders, was seriously injured. Although the Serbs received reinforcements from Milici, they generally suffered from a lack of manpower.⁶⁵⁷

Bratunac comes under Muslim threat

Graves of Serb victims of the Muslim assault on the village of Fakovici, October 1992

Now, Muslim forces had virtually reached the perimeters of Bratunac. The town's situation was clearly becoming extremely precarious. Militarily, the situation deteriorated to such an extent that many Serbs feared that Bratunac might fall into Muslim hands. Bratunac was surrounded from three sides and the town's defenders were pushed into a corner.⁶⁵⁸ When journalist, Tim Judah, visited Bratunac in late December, the Bosnian Serb Army was bringing in reinforcements from the Krajina (north-western Bosnia). The Panthers, a paramilitary group led by Ljubisa Savic 'Mauzer', were also brought in from Bijeljina. They were shocked by the state of Bratunac's defences, which were in serious disarray, and had little regard for the disorganised locals. They said that they were not really willing to die for Bratunac if the locals were not prepared to fight for it. As one soldier told Judah, "The Serbs aren't fighting hard enough because they have got somewhere to run to" [over the Drina into Serbia - gd].⁶⁵⁹

Various sources confirm that morale among local Serbs was at a historical low point. Soldiers felt demoralised by the fact that many local Serbs had gone to Serbia (or remained in Serbia if they had jobs there) to avoid being drafted. Those who refused to take part in the defence undermined the morale of those who did. The soldiers felt they were now risking their lives and that those hiding in Serbia were among the people who stood to benefit. The local press ran a good deal of bitter commentary about these 'deserters' and 'traitors.' Among the commentators was Momèilo Cvjetinovic in Nasa Rijec, a local newspaper. According to Cvjetinovic, many of these 'career Serbs' went to Serbia before the war even started, and had given their arms to Muslims who were now killing Serbs with them. He mentioned some by name, including Major Miodrag Stanisavljevic, the former head of Srebrenica's Territorial Defence, and Savo Aleksic, the former head of police. He also criticised ⁶⁵⁷ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 61-62; Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, pp. 64-72, 101; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 90; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 169; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 110-111.

⁶⁵⁸ Interviews and conversation with Miodrag Josipovic, 14/09/1999, Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999, Momèilo Cvjetinovic 10/06/1998.

⁶⁵⁹ Judah, 'serb forces move south' and Judah, 'Hardline Serb Generals'. For the Panthers see the local paper, Nasa Rijec: Jovanovic 'Mi ratujemo'; M.Dj. 'Mi idemo'; Cirkovic, 'Pjesmom'.

Srebrenica's urban youth, who were now living safely in large towns in Serbia, while young people from villages, such as Podravanje and Skelani, were risking their lives to fight the enemy.⁶⁶⁰ In his opinion, these draft dodgers added insult to injury by boasting about their nationalist credentials in Serbia's cafés after having put the lives of their fellow Serbs in jeopardy. Kravica had similar problems. There, local Serbs expelled several deserters who had had the audacity to return to their village in December 1992, after several months of absence.⁶⁶¹

Despite their enormous contempt for deserters, the authorities called on Serbs living in Serbia to return to Bratunac to defend their town. In December 1992, Rodoljub Djukanovic, Chairman of the Executive Board of the Municipality of Bratunac, made such an appeal in Nasa Rjeca. Interestingly enough, he added that they would be recruited as regular army soldiers into a regular army unit. He also promised that they would no longer be commanded by unprofessional people as had happened before, but by the best officers the Serb nation had.⁶⁶² This statement indicates that at least some Serbs were critical about the way military operations had been conducted before. When the war began, Serb defences were structured according to the territorial principle, i.e. on the basis of TO units placed under the authority of local branches of the SDS and the SDS crisis committees. Local SDS leaders, some of whom had little or no army experience, were appointed to commanding posts (as was the case with Miodrag Jokic). Although unqualified for these posts, they were able to conceal their incompetence by relying on the Yugoslav Army and scores of paramilitary forces. However, when these forces pulled out in spring 1992, the local TO forces were left on their own. At this stage, the Bosnian Serb Army had yet to form. There was also a huge dearth of trained army officers capable of organising the town's defence. Consequently, most of the responsibility lay in the hands of dilettantes. Subsequent fights during the summer and autumn of 1992 clearly showed that they were incompetent for the task at hand. Local Serbs struggled with a tremendous sense of frustration about the way local defence forces functioned.⁶⁶³ Some people held the SDS responsible for this state of affairs, and refused to enlist in units led by SDS party officials and SDS crisis committees.⁶⁶⁴

Aside from the loss of confidence in the SDS, there were also clear signs of popular discontent with the paramilitaries. They had entered the place and plundered it, taking all the booty they were able to. (The fact that Muslims had been expelled in the process was less of a concern). Local Serbs were left with nothing, and although the town was now under firm SDS control, Muslims were still there in great numbers as refugees in the nearby Muslim enclaves. Even at the time Goran Zekic was killed, there were tensions between the local Serbs and the paramilitaries from Serbia.⁶⁶⁵ This discontent shines through in a small portrait of everyday life in Bratunac, which Nasa Rjeca, a local newspaper, published in October 1992. The author, who wrote anonymously, describes the terrors of war that reigned at night in Bratunac:

The days are bearable to some extent, although there is shooting on all sides. The inhabitants are able to discriminate between the sounds of arms, and they recognise precisely when and from which positions our fighters are shooting. They know when soldiers are testing their arms and when they are engaged in fighting. The alarm sirens cause general chaos and panic among the people, yet somehow, this is still bearable during the daytime. But when night falls, and the first evening hours begin ... [p]eople hurriedly rush into their houses, because the police curfew starts. Everything becomes quiet, and then the numerous barking stray dogs start to make a deafening noise. The noise is excessive ⁶⁶⁰ Cvjetinovic, 'Bjezi, ne okreci se' and Cvjetinovic, 'Pobjegli od naroda'.

⁶⁶¹ Djukanovic, 'Takvi nam ne trebaju'; For Kravica's problems with recruitment and desertion, see also Djukanovic, 'Nas tri brata'; M.Dj. 'Dobrovoljci i dezerteri'; Miljanovic, Krvavi Bozic sela Kravice, pp. 106, 123. Kravica's situation improved when volunteers, arrived from Croatia, Serbia and Bosnia. Among them was at least one (former) Arkanovac.

⁶⁶² Anonymous, 'Narod treba da zna', p. 3.

⁶⁶³ B.S. and M.P. 'A Drina teèe'. Conversation: Novak 'Krke' Stjepanovic 19/10/2000.

⁶⁶⁴ A reference was made to this during an interview with Miroslav Deronjic in Nasa Rjeca, where he defends himself against criticisms about the SDS's role. Anonymous, 'Neka mi neko od vas pokaze'.

⁶⁶⁵ Interview: Munib Hasanovic 14/09/1999.

because these dogs became stray dogs only recently, abandoned by the people who left their homes. Their barking sound also signals the beginning of the frequent noise of motors, cars, and 'nightly campaigns'. People lock themselves up in their homes, while the war profiteers do their work. They contemplate whether to switch on the light or to sit in the dark, because the surrounding hills are bristling above the town, which gives them the feeling that the enemy can follow every detail of their movements from the nearby hills. The next day, the small thieves will also find something for themselves on the remaining trash heaps.⁶⁶⁶

Popular discontent about this state of affairs was aggravated by the great sense of dissatisfaction among the troops. Ordinary soldiers experienced problems because of their ill-defined status. Republika Srpska had not declared a state of war, which meant that soldiers were not recognised as being on active combat duty. Consequently, their rights and those of their families would not be guaranteed in case of invalidity or death. For all practical purposes, they had nothing to rely on. On the other hand, they saw many petty and major war profiteers, paramilitaries as well as RS politicians, who were profiting shamelessly, while they themselves were forced to survive on meagre wages.⁶⁶⁷

This situation changed only gradually after Mladic was appointed as chief commander of the Bosnian Serb Army in early May 1992. He moved the BSA headquarters to Han Pijesak, and started to reshuffle the Bosnian JNA troops into new BSA structures.⁶⁶⁸ During the summer of 1992, when most of Bosnian territory had come under Serb control, the leaders of Republika Srpska pressured paramilitary groups from Serbia to leave Bosnia. They had outworn their usefulness and, even worse, they were poisoning the political situation for the SDS.⁶⁶⁹ Local paramilitary groups and other 'special forces' were integrated into the regular army. In Bratunac, the army did not begin organising the town's local defence until after the devastating attack on Zalazje on 12 July 1992. Svetozar 'Ceto' Andric, commander of the Birac brigade, played a particularly pivotal role in this. In November 1992, the Bratunac brigade was established. It was part of the Drina corps, which was commanded by General Milenko Zivanovic.⁶⁷⁰ It was not until 1993 that the BSA as a whole developed a more centralised command structure.

Despite these efforts, continuing recruitment problems formed a major obstacle in building up local defence in Bratunac. Local Serb forces were unable to ward off assaults by Muslim troops, who outnumbered them by far. These assaults culminated in the attack on Kravica during the Orthodox Christmas, on 7 January 1993. It was carried out by several thousand Muslims. (Some estimates place the figure at as high as three to four thousand attackers, including torbani). Serb defenders, by contrast, numbered no more than a few hundred. At least forty-six Serbs were killed in the attack and over five hundred houses were burned down. Since the attack took place during Christmas, Serb defenders of Kravica received no help or reinforcements from Bratunac or Milici. In the end, they were forced to retreat.⁶⁷¹ Local commander, Lazar Ostojic, ordered soldiers and civilians to abandon their homes and retreat towards the Drina. They went through the snow via a small forest road to Sopotnik. The column of Serb refugees arrived in Sopotnik in the middle of the night. Some elderly people stayed behind in their homes. Most were killed next day, while Muslims plundered Kravica and other nearby

⁶⁶⁶ Anonymous, 'Besane noci ratne'.

⁶⁶⁷ B.S. and M.P. 'A Drina teèe'.

⁶⁶⁸ JNA personnel born in Bosnia were redeployed into the BSA, and huge supplies of arms and equipment were transferred from the JNA to the BSA. See: Burg and Shoup, The War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, p. 101.

⁶⁶⁹ Interview: Filip Svarm, Dejan Anastasijevic and Aleksandar Ciric 03/11/1997; conversation: Dejan Anastasijevic 06/02/1998.

⁶⁷⁰ See articles about the Bratunac brigade in local newspaper, Nasa Rijec: R.J. 'Formirana Bratunaèka brigada'; B.M. 'sad Srbi gledaju'; Cirkovic 'Za postignute rezultate'. See also Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, p. 52. Interview: Miroslav Deronjic 03/11/1999.

⁶⁷¹ Serbs from Kravica have defended themselves against suggestions made by others that Kravica fell because the population was celebrating Christmas and many were drunk. Miljanovic writes that it was not the Serbs from Kravica, but those from Bratunac who were celebrating, and who failed to come to Kravica's rescue (Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, p. 106).

settlements. According to Miljanovic, a chronicler of local events in Kravica during the war, the Muslims even opened up fresh graves in search of cloth, cigarettes and rakija. Some Serbs returned to their houses in the days that followed, but were expelled, killed, or arrested and taken to the prison in Srebrenica.⁶⁷²

The fall of Kravica produced a shockwave among Serbs in eastern Bosnia and beyond, particularly because the village was seen as a symbol of Serb national perseverance. Panic broke out in Bratunac, and the authorities were forced to close down the bridge over the Drina and introduce other measures to prevent the population from fleeing en masse to Serbia.⁶⁷³ For the Muslims, the take-over of Kravica was a crucial victory. Oric could now link up directly with Muslim forces in Konjevic Polje and Cerska, which was a serious blow to Serb war efforts in eastern Bosnia. The enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa, Konjevic Polje and Cerska were now linked into one huge Muslim-controlled territory. The call for revenge was strong among the Serbs. As Miljanovic writes, Serbs were awaiting their moment to avenge this humiliating defeat and to finally settle accounts with the Muslims. And they firmly believed that it would happen one day. They retaliated with an air raid on Srebrenica, hitting the mosque in the town's centre and killing three Muslims. Among the victims was Dr. Nijaz Dzanic, the head of the war hospital.⁶⁷⁴

The Muslim attacks still continued, however. Instead of taking Bratunac, which was his ultimate ambition, Oric decided to carry out an attack on Skelani. His aim was to destroy the bridge over the Drina river and to prevent Serbs from sending reinforcements from Serbia. Two Muslim attempts to mine the bridge had already failed in November.⁶⁷⁵ The attack on Skelani took place on 16 January 1993. It resulted in at least forty-eight Serb deaths, including those of some civilians trying to escape over the bridge to the other side of the Drina. Once again, however, the Muslim plan failed, and Skelani remained in Serb hands.⁶⁷⁶ After heavy fighting and huge personal losses in the days that followed, Muslim forces took the strategic height of Jezero, which overlooks the Perućac hydroelectric plant and Serbia on the other side of the Drina.⁶⁷⁷ Oric's forces now controlled the largest area ever (nine hundred square kilometres), encompassing most of the territory of the municipalities of Srebrenica and Bratunac as well as parts of Vlasenica, Zvornik, Han Pijesak and Rogatica.⁶⁷⁸ On 20 January, new front lines were established. Only Skelani and a few other villages along the Drina remained in Serb hands. Hopes were increasing that Srebrenica could be linked up with Tuzla and the rest of central Bosnia in a matter of days. Serb public sentiment in Republika Srpska and in Serbia was in a state of alarm. The Bosnian Serb Army as well as the Yugoslav Army prepared for massive intervention. The attack on the bridge in Skelani was a welcome pretext for the Yugoslav Army to justify military operations on Bosnian territory. January witnessed the launching of a large-scale military campaign. Led by Ratko Mladic, this campaign marked the beginning of the collapse of Oric's forces and almost the end of the existence of the enclave.

On the Serb side, the numerous Muslim attacks became a source of deep humiliation and indignation. The Serbs viewed these attacks as yet another confirmation of their lot as a nation of continual 'suffering', a nation threatened with genocide and extinction. Although this view took absolutely no account of the immeasurable suffering the Serbs themselves had inflicted on the Muslim population when the war first began, it was somehow understandable. After nine months of Muslim attacks, the Serbs were completely pushed back in a corner. Only around ten Serb villages in the area of ⁶⁷² Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 50,55-56,88-89,160,172-3,323-329; Miljanovic, Krvavi Božić sela Kravice, pp. 73-90, 99-106; Jovanovic et al, Iskorenjivanje Srba, pp. 279; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 72,112-113; Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, pp. 90; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 169. See also the reports and interviews in the local Serb newspaper, Nasa Rijec, 05/02/1993, pp. 1 and 5.

⁶⁷³ Petrovic, 'Ono malo zivota'.

⁶⁷⁴ Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 72,73; Oric, Srebrenica, p. 164

⁶⁷⁵ Cvjetinovic, 'Most je siguran'. NIOD, Coll Momèilo Cvjetinovic, War diary of Vahded Huseinovic.

⁶⁷⁶ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 91; Masic, Srebrenica, p. 115; Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 56-57,161.

⁶⁷⁷ Masic, Istina o Bratuncu, p. 91; Masic, Srebrenica, pp. 114-117

⁶⁷⁸ Sudetic, Blood and vengeance, p. 136.

Srebrenica and Bratunac had remained in Serb hands. Another thirty Serb villages and seventy hamlets had fallen under Muslim control. By January 1993, over one hundred Serb settlements had been attacked. Only Bratunac, Skelani, and a few villages along the Drina were still in Serb hands.⁶⁷⁹ In addition, Serbs had suffered enormous material damage. Ivanisevic estimates that 5,400 out of a rough total of 8,000 Serb households in the municipalities of Srebrenica and Bratunac lost part or all of their property. Most of their houses were plundered, burned, and destroyed. Huge numbers of livestock (cows, goats, and poultry) were also taken away.⁶⁸⁰ Bratunac and Milici accommodated thousands of refugees from Srebrenica as well as from central Bosnia (particularly Zenica). They destroyed the surrounding Serb villages. Living conditions for these refugees were usually bad, and they received little help from humanitarian relief organisations. Most had to solve their own housing problems. Many Serb refugees, including those from Srebrenica, were not very satisfied with their reception in Bratunac.⁶⁸¹ For that reason, some who had friends or relatives in Serbia decided to go there and join them. In early 1993, thirteen thousand Serbs from the municipalities of Srebrenica, Bratunac, Skelani and Milici were registered as refugees in Serbia, mainly women and children (comprising 45% of the total Serb population of these municipalities).⁶⁸²

Most bitterness, however, was caused by the high number of casualties that the Serbs suffered during the first year of the war. According to Ivanisevic, who has documented all cases, at least one thousand Serb civilians were killed between April 1992 and January 1994.⁶⁸³ By far, the largest number of casualties fell between the onset of the war and the creation of the Safe Area; see the chart below:

Source: Ivanisevic, Hronika nasseg groblja, p. 102.

After April 1993, the number of casualties dropped drastically. Serb sources estimate the total number of Serbs killed in the area between April 1993 and July 1995 (i.e. throughout the over two-year period of war) at roughly one hundred to one hundred and fifty.⁶⁸⁴ The Muslim attacks during the first year of the war appear to have caused the most resentment among the Serbs, who felt deeply humiliated by Oric. It is primarily defeats in places such as Zalazje, Podravanje, Fakovici and Kravica that Serbs wanted to avenge. Probably, that thirst for vengeance was one of the main driving forces behind the ⁶⁷⁹ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 40-42.

⁶⁸⁰ Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 106.

⁶⁸¹ Conversation Stevo Milivojevic, 11/11/1998.

⁶⁸² Ivanisevic, Hronika, pp. 109-111.

⁶⁸³ Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 67. In an earlier draft of the text published in the local newspaper, Nasa Riječ, Ivanisevic mentions 1,200 Serb victims (Ivanisevic, 'Genocid kao sudbina'). Ivanisevic's information is probably misleading, as he appears to include not only civilians, but also soldiers and paramilitaries who died in combat or during plundering expeditions. He includes, for instance, the names of four Serbs killed in Potočari on 20 April 1992. In all probability, these four were members of the Arkan Tigers or policemen who were ambushed there by Oric (Ivanisevic, Hronika, p. 71). Ivanisevic's work has been widely publicised in the Serbian and Bosnian Serb press, e.g. in Borba (from 26/05/1993 to 04/06/1993) and Veernje Novosti (from 13/06/1994 to 26/06/1994). The articles he published in Nasa Riječ (between July and December 1993) contain the lists of names of victims and perpetrators for every Serb village attacked by Muslims. See also the interview in Nasa Riječ in April 1993 (Jovanovic, 'Genocid').

⁶⁸⁴ Interview: Milivoje Ivanisevic 03/02/1998. See also: Srpska vojska, 25/08/1995, pp. 24-25.

massacres in July 1995. It should be noted, however, that while the Serbs suffered high casualties during the war, the number of Muslim casualties in Srebrenica and Bratunac, even before the July massacre, was probably considerably higher. Most Muslim sources claim that by July 1995, some two thousand Muslims had been killed in and around the enclave.⁶⁸⁵ ⁶⁸⁵ Oric has claimed that between April 1992 and April 1993, 1,860 Muslims were killed in Srebrenica (Kamenica, 'Predali pokvareno oruzje'; see also Masic, Srebrenica, p. 215). His book presents a list of 1,912 victims, who died between April 1992 and September 1994 (Oric, Srebrenica, pp. 195-251). Hazim Osmanovic, one of the Muslim commanders in the enclave, claimed in an interview with Ljiljan that some two thousand Muslim soldiers were killed before July 1995 along with a similar number of civilians (Rizvanovic, 'Ubijanje zrtve'). Fahrudin Salihovic, former President of the War Presidency in Srebrenica, cites the following figures: 1,860 soldiers and 3,500 civilians died, and around 150 people disappeared before July 1995 (Omeragic, 'Nakon 10 hiljada ubijenih', p. 13).

Final Remarks

“...I am very much inclined to a kind of relativism, i.e. to the notion that things did not really depend on us so much. These are historical sways, the movement of nature and of physical and spiritual matter...”

Miroslav Deronjic, president of the SDS of Bratunac, in an interview in Nasa Rjeva, 6 October 1992.

This book seeks primarily to present an historical and anthropological background account of eastern Bosnia, devoting special attention to the municipality of Srebrenica and surrounding areas. As explained at the beginning of this report, this book was not intended as a comprehensive history. Rather, its focus lies on highlighting certain episodes, as well as investigating the social and cultural realities of the region that are important in understanding the events of July 1995. I have concentrated especially on certain historical episodes. These are the episodes actively remembered and used by the actors in the July 1995 events in their efforts to understand their world and what happened during the late 1980s and early 1990s. In fact, some even exploited these episodes in justifying their political aims and actions. In this respect, the emphasis in this report was bound to lie on the violence and turbulence in the region's history, i.e. on events etched deeper in historic memory. Despite the prominence of violent events, it is remarkable how much periods of relative peace and coexistence have become 'blank spaces' in present-day collective memories, and even in official historiography. They only seem to have been retained in vague remnants of people's private accounts.

So as to avoid ignoring these elements of peaceful coexistence entirely, I have included a chapter on the communist period, which still fresh in people's minds. As a corollary, I have invested much effort in trying to describe the process of transformation from the relatively peaceful conditions under socialism to the outbreak of ethnic and nationalist violence in the 1990s. A major problem in describing this recent period has been the existing multiplicity of 'histories' and 'memories', which are often at odds with one another. Views differ radically between the members of different groups, including ethnic groups, supporters of different political ideologies (e.g. communists and nationalists), and the 'traditionalist' rural and 'modernist' urban layers of society. The most remarkable finding, however, was that views even conflict within the self-same individuals in their attempts to resolve all these contradictions and construct coherent stories for themselves. The different views on Srebrenica's history appear to be incompatible, particularly with regard to events during World War Two and the most recent war. Although I do not wish to claim that there is only one single historical truth, I have done my best to shape a more inclusive and 'truthful' interpretation of events, which does justice to all sides.

It is clear that memories, often welded into historical interpretations of the past, have played a prominent role during the war. I need only to refer to Ratko Mladic's reference to the first Serbian uprising when he entered Srebrenica in July 1995, to his Kosovo speech just days before the attack was launched, and to the numerous statements included here as vignettes at the beginning of most chapters. My efforts to gain an understanding of the recent conflict have departed from the premise that we cannot fully understand the war, and such events as the Srebrenica massacre, by leaving history aside, or more especially, by ignoring the fact that people live and perceive their place in history in their own unique ways. As I noted in the beginning, historical narratives shape people's cognition and perceptions. Consequently, those narratives help to motivate and justify actions, as well as to place them in context. People 'make' history by imagining and constructing the past in ways that are relevant to the present and by acting accordingly. It is important to acknowledge that 'history' (i.e. the historical facts) as such does not necessarily have a direct impact. It is through their culturally elaborated and mediated representations that historical facts influence people's actions.

Thus, claims (such as the one above by local SDS politician, Miroslav Deronjic) that the brutalities of the war were the product of inevitable historical forces, like ‘movements of nature’, are in effect, denials of personal involvement and responsibility. I have tried to demonstrate that, even if events and developments are beyond people’s actual control, they are always based on the choices and decisions of individuals, who should always bear responsibility for their actions. A major undercurrent in my account is that there is no historical inevitability in the way the recent conflict developed. Although this view may seem compelling when we examine all the evidence of repeated violence and brutality in the region, I think that history is never decided in advance. As I observed earlier, history is the work of people, who act and interact with different motives and interests in mind, the chemistry of which leads to results that are often unintended in their final outcome. I have tried to demonstrate that people in eastern Bosnia have justified their actions by pointing to the past in ways simplistic and unrefined. I also have attempted to juxtapose these crude versions of the past with alternative understandings that are more inclusive and try to do justice to the complexities of historical processes.

Let me leave these programmatic statements behind, and try to highlight some of the issues that have come light in this study. For one thing, this study appears to have demonstrated that historical consciousness is considerably stronger among the Serbs than among Muslims. Over the last two decades, the Serbs have drawn on and made use of history much more than have other groups. The memories of the centuries-old struggle against the Turks, symbolised in the Kosovo myth and the epics about the first Serbian uprising, have played a crucial role in the Serb perception of the recent war. That war was often seen as one waged between Christians and Muslims, between Serbs and ‘Turks’. Related to this is the theme of continuous national suffering, under the Ottomans, the Austrians, the Ustashe, Tito, the Albanians and the Bosnian Muslims. The Drina is one of the key nationalist symbols that represents this history of constant struggle and suffering. The Serb’s enemies – the 19th-century Ottoman Turks, the Austrians between 1878 and 1914, and the Ustashe during World War Two – are seen to have turned the Drina River into a frontier to divide the Serbs as a nation. During the first Serbian uprising and World War One, the Serbs fought their enemies at the Drina in heroic battles meant to rectify what they saw as the injustices of history.

The recent conflicts have been perceived in very similar terms. For Serb nationalists, the border at the Drina has been an important symbol of the lack of Serb unity, of the division of the Serbian people, and of the oppression the Serbs have suffered in Bosnia under the Muslims. Serbian war efforts in eastern Bosnia – particularly the 1992 Drina offensive and subsequent actions against Muslim enclaves – were meant to redress this situation and to return eastern Bosnia to Serbian territory once and for all. A member of a special VRS unit, who participated in the July 1995 attack on Srebrenica, recalled Mladic’s address to his unit before the attack. In it, he told them, “The Drina must become our own, internal river, and not a border. The main obstacle today is Srebrenica with which the Germans and Americans, who defend it, want to fix Serbia’s border at the Drina... It is your task to prevent this...”⁶⁸⁶ Serb nationalists have seen eastern Bosnia’s return to Serbian territory as a matter of national survival. The feeling has been that the Drina should be a river that flows through Serbian lands – ‘the spine of Serbia’ – instead of a border with territories under foreign power.⁶⁸⁷ Serb nationalists have regarded it as their sacred duty to avenge the injustices of Kosovo, and re-conquer the territories once lost to the Turks. It is no coincidence that the myth of Kosovo has been a major source of inspiration for Ratko Mladic and the Bosnian Serb Army, who were in the forefront of this struggle. The parallels between the first Serbian uprising at the dawn of the nineteenth century and the recent war in Bosnia, and the similarity in objectives and aims, and even in the methods on the ground, have reinforced this almost mythical perception of history.

Looking at history and the politics of memory is just one way to understand the recent conflicts in eastern Bosnia. Another is by examining the realities of today, even if they are also understood in terms of the past. History does not explain very much, it is only important to the extent it is transmitted, mediated and made relevant to the present-day context. For this reason, my analysis has focused largely on contemporary developments themselves, the dramatic economic and political crisis of the 1980s after Tito's death and the ways these affected the situation on the ground in a small area, such as Srebrenica. In all practical terms, the economic crisis was dramatic, reducing salaries to a fraction of what they were only a decade earlier, and leaving people unemployed and deeply insecure about their existence and future. From the Serb perspective, the economic crisis was exacerbated by the threat of political marginalisation resulting from the demographic growth and social and political emancipation of the Bosnian Muslim nation. Local Serbs were highly susceptible to propaganda from Belgrade, which subsumed all these processes under the label 'Islamic fundamentalism'. However, it was the fight over the economic assets, in times of uncertainty and economic crisis, which formed the crucial background to many of the conflicts. History was a symbolic resource. Retrieved from nationalist folklore, it was the most effective tool in mobilising the population.

⁶⁸⁶ Kolendic, ‘Milan iz Drvara’, p.61.

⁶⁸⁷ Interview: Boban Tomic, 11/11/1999.

If any period in the region's modern history left real traces in people's personal and collective memories, it is probably World War Two. The history of that war is vivid and part of people's actual experiences in ways that cannot be claimed of other periods, where history consists primarily of clichés. But since the war was a bloody and complicated civil war, with various groups fighting each other along different and shifting lines of division, the Communists decided that it was better to forget what had happened and to focus on a bright, socialist future. Most of the chaotic wartime experiences were suppressed and simplified in terms of the fight between the good guys, the Partisans, and the bad guys, the Ustashe, Chetnik and Fascist forces. Consequently, World War Two history was not addressed properly in public debate. What is worse, the victims were probably right in feeling that their persecution had gone unrecognised and the perpetrators unpunished. The non-addressed traumas of the former and the legal impunity of the latter placed the future under a heavy strain. Some of the memories of what happened during World War Two, memories that no one had been allowed to discuss, resurfaced with a vengeance during the 1990s. The Ustashe massacres against the Serb population and the Chetnik massacres against the Muslims became the focus of nationalist commemorations that did little to relieve the traumas, but much to foster new conflict.

Some have argued that the violence and massacres in the most recent war were driven by the desire for historical revenge for the events of World War Two. It has been said that Serbs, in Srebrenica for instance, were only waiting for their opportunity to avenge the suffering they felt the Muslims ('the Ustashe') had inflicted on them two generations ago. In my opinion, this is too simplistic a view. It is also one that has been advocated by Serb nationalists, who needed historical justification for the ethnic cleansing campaigns they planned and carried out against the Muslim population. Although I do believe that experiences in World War Two hold a very prominent place in the perceptions of Serb suffering in Bosnia, I believe that this in itself was not sufficient to make ordinary Serbs kill their Muslim neighbours. In the beginning, the architects of a greater-Serbia were forced to rely primarily on other methods. Before the onset of the war, their methods included the unremitting spread of propaganda and speeches inciting people to hatred. Once the war began, they resorted to paramilitary force with its potential for unspeakable violence. These methods made it possible to drive a wedge between groups that had been living in a relative - though not always easy - peace since World War Two. As anthropologist, Cornelia Sorabji, noted, the forms of personalised violence that occurred at the beginning of the war helped to deconstruct and disentangle the legacies of shared life and common existence in the minds of victims and perpetrators alike, and to establish unambiguous identities and undivided loyalties.⁶⁸⁸

If we were to try to understand the July 1995 massacre of Muslim men in Srebrenica, we would probably agree that there are certain historical legacies and memories of similar violence in the past. However, those are not sufficient to explain the orgy of violence and revenge that took place. Most importantly, I feel we need to focus on contemporary events themselves, especially when the war first broke out and Serb attempts to conquer eastern Bosnia and cleanse it of its Muslim population marked the beginning of a vicious cycle of violence, revenge, and retribution. The Serbs' drive for revenge in 1995 was inspired primarily by events in 1992 and 1993, when over a thousand Serbs were killed by Muslim forces. Despite Serb nationalist plans for ethnic cleansing in eastern Bosnia, Muslims who had been expelled from their homes and had already suffered tremendously, managed to resist the Serb onslaught and to carve out a territory under their own control. They started attacking and looting Serb villages. These attacks intensified in frequency and violence during the autumn and winter of 1992-1993. As a result, many Serbs were killed or driven from their homes. Numerous Serb villages were also destroyed. This left the Serbs feeling victimised and deeply humiliated, particularly after the fall of Kravica in January 1993. Largely blind to what Serb politicians and militiamen had inflicted on the Muslim population when the war began, most Serbs felt Srebrenica had become 'an epicentre of genocide'. They had already suffered genocide once, and were determined to settle the accounts as soon as the opportunity presented itself.

⁶⁸⁸ Sorabji, 'A very modern war'.

Appendix V

Western Perceptions and Balkan Realities

Author: B. Naarden

Foreword

During the past decade, an overwhelming amount of material encompassing a wide variety of approaches and analyses has been published on the crises in Yugoslavia. When attempting to elucidate the part played by image-forming in this matter, it is important to consider two diametrically opposed standpoints. One views the wars as the result of political conflicts. The tiny differences between the various population groups could not, however, have generated such conflicts, even though they were artificially stirred up and ruthlessly exploited by political adventurers. The opposing view is that the war can only be understood by recognizing that Yugoslavia is part of the Balkans, and that Yugoslavs are therefore fundamentally different from ourselves. The countless atrocities and war crimes were the result of ancient ethnic contrasts, which are so pronounced because the area is bisected by the border between civilized Europe and the primitive Balkans.

These two viewpoints, which have been formulated and expressed in a variety of forms and numerous nuances, are at the heart of this essay. They also determine the kind of books and articles under discussion. It has been my objective to investigate to what extent such conflicting opinions about Yugoslavia are generated by traditional concepts concerning the Balkans.

The first chapter explores the problems associated with the study of image-forming processes. Chapters II and III sketch the historical development of the image of the Balkans in the West, and in the Netherlands in particular. In this context, the association between image-forming and decision-making during the western intervention in the recent Yugoslavian conflicts has been investigated. The final chapter focuses on the relationship between image and reality.

My thanks go to Nena Tromp, who greatly facilitated my search for relevant literature, and to other colleagues, especially Marius Broekmeyer, Hans Renner and Ger Duijzings, who reviewed and criticized previous versions of this text.

Chapter 1

Introduction

“Hamlet: Do you see yonder cloud that’s almost in shape of a camel?”

Polonius: By the mass, and ‘t is like a camel indeed.

Hamlet: Me thinks it is like a weasel.

Polonius: It is backed like a weasel.

Hamlet: Or like a whale?

Polonius: Very like a whale.”¹

1. Holbrooke and the Rebecca West Factor

At a 1998 international conference organized by the Institute of Eastern European Studies of the University of Amsterdam, the Bosnian lawyer and eminent scholar of Bosnian history, M. Imamovic, described various contacts that he had had with foreigners in Sarajevo during the past several years. He remarked that the majority of these individuals had only a meagre knowledge of the historical background of the conflict. In general, those that had taken the trouble to do some research had all consulted the same books, namely those by Rebecca West, Robert Kaplan and Noel Malcolm. In To End a War Richard Holbrooke specifically cited these three books when proposing that a ‘misreading of Balkan history’ was one of five factors that might explain the failure of the West in Yugoslavia.² He alludes to ‘Bad History’ or the ‘Rebecca West Factor’, asserting that West’s pro-Serb stance, together with her view that Muslims were an inferior race, had influenced two generations of readers and politicians. ‘Thus arose’, writes Holbrooke, ‘an idea that ‘ancient hatreds’ [...] made it impossible for anyone outside the region to try to prevent the conflict.’³

Prior to Holbrooke’s arrival, Lord Owen had attempted (in vain) to mediate between the warring parties. Owen described ‘callousness’ as ‘the most distinctive feature of the fighting’, referring to a ‘culture of violence within a crossroad civilization where three religions, Orthodox Christianity, Islam and Roman Catholicism, have divided communities’. Owen admitted that, before he had departed for the peace conference in Geneva, he had ‘dipped into rather than reread Rebecca West’s account of her travels in Yugoslavia’⁴. According to Holbrooke, however, the idea that ethnic groups in the Yugoslavian region had always been after one another’s blood was mainly derived from Balkan Ghosts by the American author Robert Kaplan. Furthermore, in his book, Kaplan himself emphasized that he had been largely inspired by Rebecca West. Holbrooke confirmed that Clinton, after reading Kaplan’s book, was even more hesitant to intervene in Bosnia. Bosnia: A Short History, by Noel Malcolm, was published in 1994. This was a much more balanced book, which repudiated the view that Bosnia ‘was forever seething with ethnic hatreds’.⁵ However, Holbrooke felt that it had been published too late to bring about a rapid change in American policy.

Other authors feel that it is not Kaplan or West who are primarily responsible for western vacillation in the Yugoslavian conflict, but rather the elderly yet still influential George Kennan. This American diplomat, celebrated historian and widely recognized expert in East-West relations had written an introduction to The Other Balkan Wars. This was the rather odd title of a book that was republished in 1993. The original, which had been written by a committee working for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, was published in 1913. It dealt with the horrors of the First and Second Balkan Wars. Kennan felt that this report was still topical, since nationalism in the Balkans ‘drew on deeper traits of character inherited, presumably, from a distant tribal past [...] And so it remains today'.⁶ In addition, centuries of Turkish rule in the Balkans had created a separate world 'which had continued to the present day to preserve many of its non-European traits'.⁷ In 1993, Kennan felt that none of the Western powers was either prepared or able to occupy 'the entire distracted Balkan region'⁸ in order to calm the agitated population groups there. In 1994, the American historian and leading specialist on Yugoslavia, Ivo Banac, therefore indignantly concluded that 'Western aloofness and indifference to the area itself and to any action or involvement in it' derived from the view of authorities such as Kennan, that the Balkans diverge too widely from Western civilization.⁹

In this way, adverse images and prejudices about the Balkans that were propagated by a few best-sellers and some authoritative authors are supposed to have had a major influence on the current policy of leading world powers. The best-seller Balkan Ghosts (a superficial book, written with very little objectivity) does indeed contain some rather crass statements about the character of the inhabitants of the Balkans. Kaplan even felt that 'Nazism [...] can claim Balkan origins'¹⁰. He saw in Serbia 'a spirituality and primitivism that the West knows best through the characters of Dostoyevsky'.¹¹ To further underline the exotic character of the Serbs, on the same page Kaplan cited the work of the Polish-British writer Joseph Conrad and that of the British thriller writer, Eric Ambler. Although their books are populated with sinister figures of Russian or Bulgarian origin, like Dostoyevsky neither of these authors has ever visited the Balkans, nor indeed have they carried out any in-depth research into the region¹². Literature dealing with the Balkans frequently characterizes the inhabitants of that region as being both spiritual and primitive. These are therefore clichés, and as such they are of dubious veracity.

Clinton was not the only example of a politician who, in Holbrooke's view, may have been influenced by Balkan literature. Holbrooke also cites a statement made by the former American ambassador to Yugoslavia and later Secretary of State, Lawrence Eagleburger: 'until the Bosnian Serbs and Croats decide to stop killing each other, there is nothing the outside world can do about it'¹³. However, this statement was made in 1992, a year before the publication of Kaplan's book. It is also rather farfetched to attribute such a great influence to the erudite, exuberant and exorbitantly long (1200 pages) literary masterpiece by Rebecca West. Although it was reprinted several times from 1968 onwards, Black Lamb and Grey Falcon was originally published in 1942. At that time it was quite normal for people to state their views about other peoples and cultures in a rather frank and impressionistic way, entirely unencumbered by political correctness. West was primarily interested in the more exotic aspects of the kingdom of Yugoslavia. She did indeed have a weak spot for the Serbs, but she gave no indication of a systematic contempt for the Turks or for the Bosnian Muslims, or that she considered them to be an inferior people or race. She showed great admiration for the remnants of Turkish architecture in Yugoslavia, and in Sarajevo she also attempted (without success) to learn the art of belly dancing. She felt that the enormous empires of the Habsburgs and the Ottomans had had a lethal influence on the Balkans. She wrote, 'I hate the corpses of empires, they stink as nothing else.'¹⁴ However, her wrath at German and Austrian meddling, and their lust for power, was far greater than any feelings she might have harboured against similar actions by Turkey in the past. It is scarcely realistic to ascribe the Western powers' lack of boldness to feelings of sympathy for the Serbs or contempt for the Bosnian Muslims that may have been generated by West's work. Holbrooke admits that as long ago as 1992 the American government had reached the conclusion that ninety percent of all atrocities in Bosnia were the work of Serbs. Although it was of little help to those involved, world opinion was nevertheless very sympathetic to their Islamic Bosnian victims.

In his book, Holbrooke emphatically distanced himself from the ethnic prejudices about the Balkans that, in his view, were too often aired in books of this type. He refuses to condemn Serbs, Croats or Bosnians as a group, but instead blames the conflict on the political leaders and their hysterical nationalism¹⁵. Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic are the main culprits, immediately followed by Slobodan Milosevic and, at some distance, by Franjo Tudjman and Alija Izetbegovic. He shares this 'politically correct' view with many other authors on Yugoslavian events. However, in describing how he intervened during a quarrel between the latter two leaders, Holbrooke was unable to desist entirely from comment. He pointed out that 'An aspect of the Balkan character was revealed anew: once enraged, these leaders needed outside supervision to stop themselves from self-destruction'¹⁶. So even Holbrooke was not fully able to shake off a belief in the primitive features of a character supposedly typical of the Balkan peoples.

Holbrooke admitted that Kaplan himself had opposed the imputation that Balkan Ghosts contained a justification for ethnic cleansing.¹⁷ Nor indeed does Kaplan's book contain any advice to the Western powers to refrain from intervention. Nevertheless, both Banac and Holbrooke create the impression that America's passivity prior to 1995 was partly the result of an incorrect view of the Balkans. While not denying that many other factors were involved, Holbrooke suggests that the United States only started to play a more active role once he and other like-minded politicians were able to shape policy. Since they had not read any inferior history books, such politicians were unhindered by prejudice. They were therefore able to take a common-sense approach to the situation in Yugoslavia. However, is it really plausible to imagine that the US only started to play a more active role in 1995 because American policy-makers either read other books or no books, ignored authorities such as Kennan or modified their views concerning the inhabitants of the Balkans? Is it not much more likely that, given the situation that had arisen in 1995, America's prestige as the only remaining superpower would be irreparably damaged if it failed to act with more resolve? And had America really been so passive up until then? And what of the Washington Agreement of 1993 between the US, Bosnia and Croatia, which had been prepared by American diplomats other than Holbrooke? Clearly this was a significant condition underpinning the American success that was achieved 18 months later. Was Kennan wrong when he said that the Western powers' would continue to have very little appetite for a long-term occupation of this entire, problematic region? Although a protracted air war was finally waged against Serbia, the sluggish aversion that characterized Western governments' approach to the Yugoslavian situation emerged once again in 1998, during the Kosovo crisis.

The statements made by Holbrooke, Banac and others correctly alert us to the role that opinions and prejudices about other countries and other peoples can play in international relations. Indeed, Holbrooke's 'slip of the tongue' concerning Tadjman and Izetbegovic, occurring as it did in a book that had been very carefully edited and screened by a large team of co-workers, shows how ineradicable such views are. At the same time it seems difficult to establish the exact effect of image-forming on current developments in international relations. It is remarkable that so much importance is attached to the views of an individual author or to the content of a single book, even when written more than fifty years ago. Passing over the many authors who published works on the subject of Yugoslavia before and after West, Holbrooke says that she caused two generations of authors to be misinformed about the Balkans.

Holbrooke's view regarding the innocence of Yugoslavian peoples and his remarkable statement about the Balkan mentality of the political leaders of Bosnia and Croatia give rise to a number of questions. The same is true of Kennan's opinion about the non-European character of the inhabitants of the Balkans, and Banac's indignant response to this. Are these irresponsible generalizations the product of Western image-forming, bearing no relation to reality? Or are there still traces of reality left in such images, even though they partly stem from clichéd views? Then there is 'political correctness', the refusal of those involved in Western decision-making to take into account, openly and clearly, any ethnic, cultural and mental differences between population groups. Might this have been equally responsible for the fateful developments in Yugoslavia? We will return to these questions later, especially in the final section of this study. However, we will first attempt to find a better basis for distinguishing between the 'politically correct' and the 'prejudiced' points of view in the broader context of imagology.

2. From essentialism to constructivism

It is implausible that widespread prejudices and ideas about countries and peoples are entirely due to good sales figures for a few authors. Why should so many readers of a travel book assume that it contains the entire truth about a foreign country which they have never visited? The success of such books can best be explained by the Aba-Erlebnisse that they generate. The pre-existent views of a large group of readers presumably corresponded to the contents of such books. It is extremely likely that the authors also harboured pre-conceived ideas before undertaking their journeys. Image-forming almost never involves the creation of a new image, instead it is all about the continual dusting-off and freshening-up of old images.

In the last two or three decades, imagology has evolved into a specific field of study within the discipline of comparative literature. Imagologists have published a considerable amount of material, in which they show that the distinctions we draw between nations and ethnic groups are largely determined by literary traditions. They do not assert that all people and groups of people are entirely identical to one another. Cultural differences, however, are considered to be much less relevant than the images presented to us by literature.

In this respect the imagologist Joep Leerssen speaks of an 'important epistemological shift, which has taken place over recent decades: the shift from essentialism to constructivism. What is 'typical' of a given nation is no longer considered to emanate from a characteristic essence inherent within that nation, but rather from a specific way of perceiving that nation.'¹⁸ Or, as couched in different terms by the same author, 'national images are a largely self-referential and self-perpetuating poetical system which is only marginally determined by social or political reality.' The characteristics ascribed to a given people in the literature 'are determined by intertextual rather than empirical factors.'¹⁹

It goes without saying that the acceptance of such views drastically changes our perception of reality. It clearly contradicts the age-old belief that different peoples have distinct characteristics. In the glory days of Western European nationalism, the existence of national characters was accepted as an irrefutable truth. During the 1960s, American social psychologists were still publishing studies on the Russian 'national character', based on questionnaires given to Russian immigrants entering the United States.²⁰ This material allowed the British psychiatrist Henry Dicks to conclude that the 'oral character structure' (i.e. restless, impulsive, aggressive, resentful, demanding, tending to gluttony and obesity, but also showing a considerable appetite for reading) is typical of Russians.²¹ At the time other scientists refuted such conclusions. However, modern imagologists would emphasize that, at best, questionnaires of this kind simply reflect the views of the Russian immigrants in question about their national character. They do not provide hard facts about the way in which Russians actually behave, as a people.

Whether the approach to such a remarkable phenomenon as the character of peoples has been subject to a general switch from essentialism to constructivism is, nevertheless, very debatable. After all, the converse can also be asserted. During the Soviet period, the Communist authorities took every opportunity to deny that irreconcilable differences existed between various nationalities within the USSR. The same went for the situation in other Eastern bloc countries and certainly for Tito's Yugoslavia. In the declining years of Communism, and especially after its fall, there was a perceptible change in this approach. Throughout Eastern Europe the character of peoples was no longer denied, instead it was embraced. Modern Russians still believe (or, more accurately, have rediscovered) that there really is such a thing as a national psyche. At the same time, they violently disagree with one another concerning the characteristics to be ascribed to their collective character. This also applies to Russian scholars, who are making every effort to link up once again with recent developments in Western scholarship. In the course of theoretical-historical debates about 'the Russian mentality', much is made of the enormous problems and obstacles met by those attempting to conduct research into this phenomenon. Nevertheless, the virtual, imaginary and constructivistic aspects of this topic are omitted²².

In the West, however, there is a clear interest in these specific aspects. Nonetheless, this interest does not solely derive from the activities of literary imagologists, since their approach is not exactly novel. It was the great nineteenth-century sociologist Durkheim who first drew attention to the constructivistic element in the self-image of human groups, which he referred to as 'collective representation'. In the wake of the Second World War, social scientists applied themselves as never before to studying and combating social and ethnic prejudices.²³ Historians have also been occupied with image-forming processes for quite some time. It is probably no coincidence that even more emphasis was placed on this when nationalism became passé and was reduced to sporadic eruptions of 'football chauvinism'. As the national past declined in importance, historians opened the assault on the patriotic elements contained therein. Many long cherished 'images' had become unworkable or even offensive. For example, it could no longer be said of the populations of former colonies that they could never measure up to the inhabitants of Europe in terms of civilization and intellect. It is this more critical stance with regard to various expressions of Western ethnocentrism that accounts for the success of Edward Said's Orientalism. Western conceptions of the Orient. Published in 1978, this work portrays the predominantly negative view of 'the East' as a construction of modern western imperialism.²⁴ In a situation in which a war between France and Germany had become unthinkable, it no longer made sense to keep going on about the irreconcilable contrasts between the civilizations of 'Latin' and 'Germanic' peoples. In addition, the transfer of ever more national power to supranational organs in Brussels makes traditional and flattering views about the greatness and uniqueness of one's own country look rather dated.

However, critical historical literature on the subject of nationalism has remained the preserve of Western European scholars studying the history and culture of Western Europe. Their writings are in stark contrast to the enormous stream of recent publications on the amazing vitality of ethnic, religious and nationalistic phenomena in the rest of the world. The term 'ethnicity' first appeared in handbooks and reference works in the latter part of the 1970s, when imagology was starting to develop into a distinct discipline. American scholars in particular started to write on the subject. Back in 1975, in his Idols of the Tribe: Group Identity and Political Change, Harold R. Isaacs predicted that states and peoples would split into ever smaller units, 'bursting like big and little stars from exploding galaxies.'²⁵ Another pioneer in the area of ethnicity studies, the prominent American senator Pat Moynihan, said of his own country: 'The notion that the intense and unprecedented mixture of ethnic and religious groups in American life was soon to blend into a homogenous end product has outlived its usefulness, and also its credibility... the point about the melting pot is that it did not happen'²⁶ He believes that ethnicity has an enormous influence in the arena of international politics. The effect of this is summarized in the title of this book, Pandemonium, which means uncontrollable chaos.

His fellow countryman, Samuel Huntington, believes that the end of the Cold War did not signify the end of the east-west conflict. On the contrary, Western standards and values concerning democracy, human rights, the division of church and state, and free enterprise are encountering considerable resistance elsewhere in the world. The situation in the world can best be summarized by the phrase 'the West versus the rest'. It can only be understood if one is aware of certain time-honoured and virtually unchanging cultural differences. Such differences are determined by religion and have become associated with ethnic entities. This is why conflicts primarily erupt in the areas where different civilizations share a common border. 'The fault lines between civilizations will be the battle lines of the future.'²⁷ Yugoslavia is a perfect example of this, as the country is divided by two fault lines. One line runs between Islam and Christianity, while the other separates the Orthodox Church and Catholicism. Thus something had to go wrong.

Huntington has been subjected to a great deal of criticism because his model does not provide a definitive explanation for the development or absence of violent conflicts in the world. The most murderous genocides and the bloodiest wars of the past century all occurred within a single civilization, that of the West. He is accused of blowing up cultural differences into sharp contrasts, thereby contributing to a unilateral image-forming process that is far more likely to cause conflicts than to avert them. There is no such thing as irreconcilable differences between civilizations. After all, modern civilizations are highly complex and extremely diffuse affairs that have never before existed in unmixed form anywhere on Earth, nor do they do so today. The fault lines between civilizations are also man-made, and are largely a product of the imagination.²⁸

However accurate such comments may be, they do not prove that authors such as Moynihan or Huntington entirely lack a sense of reality. In 1993, in response to the conflict in Yugoslavia, imagologists organized a conference in Leiden. The conference theme was 'ethnic stereotypes', and those invited included Serbs, Croats and Bosnians. However, none of these scholars attended the conference, nor could any of them be persuaded to submit written work on this topic.²⁹ This was quite understandable. Imagologists usually assume that nations are artificial things. At that time, in the Balkans, this was a highly unpopular, even dangerous standpoint. Although some courageous Yugoslavian intellectuals attempted to turn the rising tide of nationalism, another section of the intelligentsia emphasized that essential differences had existed between Yugoslav peoples for centuries. Although such assertions aggressively enhanced the existing tensions and contributed to the outbreak of war, they cannot be said to be patently false in all respects.³⁰

However, the attempts by intellectuals from the former Yugoslavia to construct separate ethnic-national identities did not always denote a lack of responsibility on their part. This became clear at the above-mentioned conference at the Institute of Eastern European Studies, in September 1998. There, the representatives of ten different Eastern European countries conducted a debate on the theme of history and identity. A historian from the former Yugoslavian federal republic of Macedonia, now an independent state, gave a presentation to the conference on the subject of his national identity. He constructed this by referring to Alexander the Great as a Macedonian. Yet, unlike the current inhabitants of Macedonia, the language spoken by this king from the fourth century was not a Slavic one. This historian also annexed Cyril and Methodius, the apostles of the Slavic peoples from the 9th century, as Macedonians. Both missionaries came from Saloniki, a city located in present-day Greece, but in an area that modern Macedonians consider to be part of the original land of Macedonia. It was at this point that a Bulgarian delegate at the conference politely but firmly objected. This is because most Bulgarians believe Macedonia to be a part of Bulgaria, asserting that the language spoken by Macedonians is really just a Bulgarian dialect. It would therefore seem that, in reality, Cyril and Methodius are figures from Bulgarian history. The delegate immediately conceded, however, that his Macedonian colleague was well within his rights in following the path taken by Bulgarian historians a century ago, when Bulgaria obtained its independence. He admitted that the creation of a new state virtually compels historians to construct something approaching a national identity, and to use historical myths as tools. A state will not be able to survive unless its national identity is given form and content. Of itself, this is neither wrong nor offensive, it is simply a question of national duty.

The Belgian anthropologist Roossens explored this process of creating ethnicity, not in the Balkans but among Indian tribes in Canada and allochthonous groups in Belgium. He found that strong ethnic feelings do not need to be based on genuine culture which has had a lengthy and uninterrupted existence. Ethnicity always leans heavily upon an idealized past. In this connection, the truth is often the first victim. Roossens wrote "The feelings of the masses are not troubled with historical accuracy."³¹ At the same time, people do not have carte blanche to allow their imaginations to run wild. Although culture and history have a certain inherent elasticity, they are by no means completely arbitrary realities. "With very little one can obtain very much [...]but there is always a minimum of incontestable and noninterpretable facts necessary..."³² And even that is sometimes not enough. Russia, for example, has a thousand years of a highly eventful history, more than enough heroic and illustrious incidents, or so one might think. And yet the current population of that country is suffering from a severe identity crisis, one that no amount of stories about a glorious past can exorcise. Sometimes, nations simply lack the will to adopt an identity of their own. Belarus is currently an independent country. It has its own language and history, and is led by a dictator who is prepared to propagate any and all nationalistic myths, no matter how fantastic they may be. However, both the head of state and the majority of Belarusians would much rather return to the arms of Mother Russia. The disappearance of Communism in Eastern Europe has by no means resulted in a universal eruption of nationalism or to a strengthening of national and ethnic identities, as was the case in Yugoslavia.

Identities can be created and repaired, they are also malleable and degradable. However, the extent and tempo of these processes vary from people to people, and are subject to circumstances. What determines peoples' resistance to a given identity or their desire for it, and their degree of susceptibility to nationalistic propaganda? In commenting on this, J.Krecí, a British historian and political scientist of Czech origin, pointed out that "The so-called awakening of national consciousness for which philosophers, historians and poets were largely seen as responsible was in fact the awakening of something which had for a long time been potentially present and had for some time been in the process of maturation as a result of combined processes of communication and imitation.³³ Historians of nationalism, such as Anthony Smith and John Armstrong believe that nations emerge from a previously existing ethnic identity.³⁴

What then is the difference between a peoples' character and such a pre-existent ethnic identity capable of developing into a national identity? In what ways does such an identity differ from the 'mentalities', 'the collective unconscious' or 'ouillage mental', that are studied by the history of mentality? And if such things do indeed have an 'objective' existence, then how can we come to understand them? The imagologist, Joep Leerssen, considers the attempts by social scientists such as Hofstede to establish the content of national identities through empirical research to be regrettable. Leerssen feels such attempts to be evidence of a 'naive essentialism'. His main objection concerns the 'inescapable informant-dependence' that is inherent in all characterizations of national characters. 'It is impossible to make the jump from the discursive world of informant-dependent sources to a non-discursive objectivity [...]. We will never be truly independent of our sources. All too often, research that uses informant-dependent sources while professing to enquire into reality is only really investigating informant-dependent opinions [...]'³⁵

Scholars such as Hofstede and Huntington might be open to criticism when they greatly overestimate the degree of reality and the durability of cultural differences or national characteristics. But should they be reproached for continuing to research phenomena that are, at the very least, connected in some way to numerous conflicts in today's world?³⁶ After all, knowledge is based on observation. Leerssen himself acknowledged that informant dependence is inherent to all descriptions of the past. The question remains, however, of whether this dependence is also 'inescapable'. Historians are always trying to escape from the 'prison of their sources' into historical reality. That is their profession, and despite all of the ontological, epistemological or heuristic objections to their activities, they remain industrious escapees.³⁷ Why then should social scientists remain chained to the 'informants'? The literary imagologists could, in fact, be accused of not wanting to escape from this prison. They give little or no consideration to the historical circumstances that led to the creation of nations or to the socio-psychological mechanisms that resulted in the formation of ethnic groups. They generally restrict themselves to the study of literary texts. 'The merit of the imagological approach to stereotypes such as linguistic phenomena is that it points out topoi, but it either falls short or overshoots the mark because it fails to take account of reality.'³⁸

The literature on nationalism, nations, national identities, ouillages mentales or the character of peoples is liberally strewn with 'conceptual dichotomies'³⁹, contrasts between 'objective' and 'subjective' views, and either 'essentialistic' or 'constructivistic' approaches to these topics.⁴⁰ Many imagologists tend to focus on one side of the question, while political scientists and sociologists such as Huntington or Hofstede mainly point to the other side. There are no simple solutions to these intellectual dilemmas. There remains a yawning gap between finding out how literary constructions of national identities develop and using existing ethnic contrasts to explain the outbreak of a war. Both approaches require text, but while this can be used to show that national and ethnic identities are artificial matters, it can equally well be used to demonstrate that people perceive these as absolute realities, which have far-reaching effects on their behaviour.

It is difficult to distinguish between reality and people's opinions about reality. Without the lens of prejudice, no collective differences between people can be observed.⁴¹ Aside from the language, a Dutch person can only be recognized as Dutch by those who are already familiar with what constitutes (or should constitute) a Dutch person. Even when not inspired by xenophobia or racism, images such as these (which derive from the cultural traditions of the observer) remain crude generalizations. They are never reliable or innocent, but we have little else to go on. It follows from this that it is inadvisable to allow the political relations with another nation to be determined by currently fashionable prejudices about that people. On the other hand, such prejudices often contain a grain of truth. Although the 'politically correct' standpoint seems to be the safer option, this is not the case. One would be exceptionally naive to assume that the image has no relation to reality, and that all peoples and ethnic groups are identical to one another. This is not to say that one should believe that the character of a people is incapable of change, condemning all the members of a nation to follow the same patterns of behaviour for centuries.⁴²

Chapter 2

Western image-forming

1. The image of barbarism

Anyone wanting to know whether or not ‘the Balkan type’ really exists, or whether there are really any differences between Serbs and Croats, will first have to explore the problem of image-forming. After all, it is the image that obstructs a direct view of reality. Even if the image is an accurate reflection of reality, it is by no means the same thing. For many centuries, the West has had a marked tendency to blame the changing fortunes of Eastern Europe on the character of its indigenous peoples. Depending on the circumstances in question, this resulted in favourable or adverse characteristics being attributed to the peoples in question. Although this tendency can be perceived in a very large number of texts on Eastern Europe, no systematic study of this phenomenon has ever been carried out. As has already been pointed out, virtually no research has been carried out on the image of Yugoslavia in the West, and the literature pertaining to the image of the Balkans is very limited. In addition, few books have been published on Eastern Europe’s image in the West. Imagologists tend to focus mainly on literary texts. They often deal with relatively minor topics, ones that are clearly demarcated in time and place. In addition, they have not paid very much attention to Eastern Europe. The same goes for the social scientists, who have been intensely preoccupied with ethnocentrism, a phenomenon that is closely related to image-forming. The only national image whose historical development can be traced is that of Russia, because so much has been written on the subject by social scientists, historians and historians of literature. Conversely, the literature on other countries and areas is fragmentary at best. Nevertheless, existing studies on image-forming in general and on Eastern Europe in particular enable us to draw some broad conclusions that are also applicable to Yugoslavia.

Eastern Europe’s image in the West, as well as our modern-day ideas about the Balkans, can be seen as variations in the clichéd ideas that Europeans have traditionally held about the world and the peoples outside Europe. They are the result of traditional European reactions to the centuries-old contrast between east and west, and between north and south. The sheer continuity of these reactions is astonishing. Some of these images contain thoughts that the Ancient Greeks harboured about peoples who did not speak Greek. Because they perceived these people to be babbling something like ‘bar-bar’, the Greeks referred to them as barbarians. We are unable, here, to offer more than a thumbnail sketch of the long historical development that spans the years between Thucydides and Holbrooke.

The occupants of the Ancient World tended to associate climate with the character of a people. This tendency can be traced back to Hippocrates who, in 400 BC, published a relatively elaborate theory on the subject. Aristotle drew a distinction between the wild, primitive people found in the cold lands of northern Europe, who were fiercely independent, and the inventive and intelligent inhabitants of balmy Asia, who had a slave-like mentality. Living in the intermediate, temperate climes, the Hellenes were both civilized and free and independent. This ‘tripartite division of the oecumene’ is an extremely persistent idea. Having adapted to changed circumstances, it is still in use. During the Middle Ages, the inhabitants of the West perceived the temperate regions to correspond to the territories occupied by Christians. This was the continent allotted to Noah’s third son, Jafeth – in other words, Europe. By contrast, the continents given to Noah’s other sons, Sem and Cham (Africa and Asia), were occupied by heathens, slaves and barbarians.⁴³ The idea that the inhabited world was divided into three climatological zones enjoyed renewed popularity during the Renaissance, and persisted until the Age of Reason. Zacharasiewicz felt that the climate theory was a ‘Lieblingsidee’ of the 18th century.⁴⁴ However, the frontier separating extreme from temperate climates, and civilization from Barbary no longer lay between Europe and the other continents, now a line was being drawn within Europe itself. Political theoreticians such as Bodin or Montesquieu explained the despotism in Asia and Africa, the autocracy of the Czar in northern Europe and that of the Sultan in southern Europe, in terms of the heat or cold that prevailed in those regions. The monarchy was associated with the temperate climate of Western Europe.⁴⁵

At the same time, some parts of this western region were more temperate than others. Initially it was mainly the Italians, Spanish and French who claimed to belong to the privileged peoples of the centre. Later, the same claim was made by the more northerly English and the Germans. Still imitating Aristotle, people assumed that the peoples of the Centre had the best of both worlds. They possessed the finer qualities of the inhabitants of the north (such as perseverance and bravery) and the south (such as mobility of mind and body). At the same time, they were not prone to the former peoples' more extreme and negative characteristics (such as the melancholy, insensitivity and rigidity of the north and the laziness and passionate sensuality of the south). In W. Stanzel's descriptions of the 'Völkertafel' (the 18th century paintings depicting representatives of the main European peoples, as well as their good and bad characteristics), the lowest ranking peoples were the Poles, Russians, Hungarians, Greeks and Turks.⁴⁶

Throughout the 19th century and the first half of the 20th century, climate was still considered to exert a major influence on the development of civilizations and on the characteristics of peoples.⁴⁷ Individuals such as the positivistic historian Henry Thomas Buckle (1821-1862) and the deterministic geographer Ellsworth Huntington (1876-1947) considered it to be self-evident that England's political and economic success was linked to the country's temperate climate.⁴⁸ Although heavily criticized by fellow professionals, the work of such scholars was incredibly popular at the time. However, they are not solely responsible for the fact that people still see 'the perfect European' as a sort of 'Mittelzohnenbewohner'.⁴⁹ This study covers other historical and imagological factors that account for the apparent ease with which Central-European countries such as Hungary, Poland and the Czech Republic are admitted to the Western world, while there is as yet no place for the more northerly Russia and the more southerly Balkans.

While the climatic theory enabled the barbarian realms to be geographically defined, the ambivalent attitude of 'civilized' peoples towards barbarians was even more stubbornly maintained through the centuries. This involves three mutually contradictory emotional complexes: contempt, fear and admiration for the barbarians.⁵⁰ In ancient times, the strongest emotion was contempt, and this remains the case to this very day. According to the Greeks, the barbarians were at a lower level of civilization and were therefore unworthy of respect. The same was true of the later Euro-centric approach to peoples who were considered to be un-European or non-Western.

Nevertheless, the barbarians were also feared because they were brutal, savage and belligerent, and because their incursions threatened the continued existence of Western culture and freedom. Throughout history, various events have rekindled the fear of the Untergang des Abendlandes as a result of assaults by barbarians. The Persian wars of the Greeks were followed by the fall of Rome and the Byzantine empire and assaults by Arabs, Mongols and Turks. Next there was the expansion of the Russian empire under the Czars, followed by the Soviet Union. In this context, China and Japan (the Yellow Peril) are also seen as a possible threat. East-West or North-South divides existed as long ago as the Middle Ages. During the first half of the 19th century, the fear of continued Russian expansion generated a tense atmosphere in Western Europe, not unlike the one which prevailed during the Cold War. By contrast, there were also protracted periods of Western military ascendancy. Such periods saw the flowering of the Roman Empire, Byzantium, the German Drang nach Osten, European colonial expansion and the Great Powers' continual intervention in the Balkans.

In those situations that were not dominated by fear, it was also possible for people to develop admiration for the barbarians. Although they held the barbarians' lack of political freedom in contempt, people developed a certain respect and admiration for despotic dominions. This was based on their power, stability, order and justice, and on their ability to implement large-scale, rational reforms. The Greeks had just such an ambivalent attitude to the eastern despots of their era, and they were not alone in this. The same attitude prevailed in the West during the Middle Ages, this time with respect to the Arabs and the Mongols. During the 16th and 17th centuries there was a firm rejection of the autocracy of the Muscovite Czar and the Turkish Sultan. In the 18th century, however, there was a certain amount of veneration for despotic but reforming rulers such as Peter I and Catherine II of Russia. In this regard, Voltaire and Diderot can be seen as the predecessors of the 20th century 'fellow travellers' and western Communists who would not brook any criticism of Lenin or Stalin. As long ago as the 15th century, in addition to the usual fear and contempt, there was also a certain degree of respect for the Turks. They were seen as born rulers, able to allow their Christian and Jewish subjects freedom of religion without causing any disruption to the law and order of the enormous Ottoman empire. Respect for the Turks continued well into the 19th century, even though the Ottoman empire was regarded as the sick man of Europe at the time.

In addition, there was general admiration for the unspoiled, primitive and free character of the barbarian lifestyle. It was thought that their lack of civilization enabled the barbarians to be more relaxed about maintaining social contacts, while giving them more direct access to nature and the supernatural, as well as to the world of art. It was for these reasons that the Greeks admired the nomadic Scythians, a fierce people from the region to the north of the Black Sea. However, the motto ex oriente lux continued on into later eras. During the Middle Ages, the Germans exhibited enthusiasm for the moral purity of the Slavic peoples, while at the same time subjugating them. During the New Age, people were captivated by the American Indians, who were seen as bons sauvages, even if they did live to the west of Europe. This appreciation did not, however, stop the Indians from being exploited and exterminated. In the 18th century, the cult of China and all things Chinese was even given a special name: Chinoiserie. During the 19th century, Russian writers such as Dostoyevsky and Tolstoy were venerated as modern Scythians, while admiration for the savage but noble Balkan peoples gave rise to a distinct literary genre.

Current literature shows for how long and to what extent the western perspective of the rest of the world was restricted by such emotions. The attitude of 'non western' peoples towards Europe was no less complex nor contradictory, however. Although the same feelings were involved, their exact role and the sequence in which they occurred were different. This was because the relationship between east and west, or between north and south if you will, was never particularly well-balanced. From the 16th century on, the West was increasingly in the ascendancy. Contacts with peoples from outside or from Eastern Europe were often characterized by a clashes between 'our' self-satisfied feeling of superiority and 'their' inferiority complex. The dominant feelings of fear and admiration were accompanied by insecurity, frustration, envy and wounded pride. Here too, this jumble of sentiments settled out into prejudices and traditional patterns of response which proved to be extremely persistent. Both on the 'eastern' and the 'western' side, the complex of image-forming factors contained so many internal contradictions that the attitudes of one party relative to the other varied enormously in intensity, depending on the circumstances. The images that people constructed of one another were even able to switch from black to white, and vice versa.

2. The image of Eastern Europe

The existence of an east-west dividing line within Europe itself was a complicating factor in these already complex image-forming processes. For a long period of time, Eastern Europe – in the form of Greece and, later on, Byzantium – was the most civilized part of our continent. The Greeks looked down on the Romans, and the Orthodox Byzantines considered the Latin Christians to be semi-barbarians at best. The roles were reversed, however, when the entire Balkan region and a large part of Hungary were occupied by the Turks. At about the same time Western Europe was establishing the first contacts with Muscovite Russia. From the very beginning, the Europeans considered it to be a barbaric and Asiatic country. The subjugation of the Czechs by the Habsburgs in the 17th century, and the decline and fall of Poland in the 18th century brought about a change of attitude. The whole of Eastern Europe, from north to south, could now be seen as a backward region where poverty, bondage and despotism were indissolubly bound together. The entire region was therefore quite alien to the real (i.e. Western) Europe.⁵¹ At about this time, the concepts of Oriental Europe and l'Europe orientale started to appear in travellers' tales. From that time onwards, Europe had an East all of its own. A sort of semi-Asia right in its own backyard. Every positive and negative stereotype and prejudice about the orient that the West had cherished since time immemorial could now also be applied to Eastern Europe.⁵²

In geographical terms, Eastern Europe was still part of Europe, but in economic, political and cultural terms, it was no longer part of the continent. The general belief was that the gap between East and West in Europe could only be bridged by subjecting Eastern Europe to a protracted and intensive process that - nomen est omen - was referred to as westernization, Europeanization or modernization. Although that process started as long ago as the 18th century, and radically changed the face of Eastern Europe, the fact that terms such as Eastern Europe remain in common use today indicates that this region is still seen as backward and non-European. However, backwardness was not always seen as a drawback. In Eastern Europe, attempts to replace 'authentic' and 'original' regional cultures with modern western civilization have met with virtually constant resistance. Furthermore, conservatives and romantics in the West occasionally like to believe that in Eastern Europe the best European traditions were preserved from change and corruption. During the first half of the 19th century people were very envious of the Russians as they were reputed to live in accordance with the standards and values of the ancien régime. In the second half of the 19th century the rural population of the Balkans were considered to be very fortunate, in that they were still innocent of the ways of the modern world. They were thought to live in a sort of reservation, an 'open-air European peoples museum'.⁵³

This 'otherness' of Eastern Europe was not always viewed as backwardness. Following the development of the Soviet Union, Western progressives went on a pilgrimage to this workers' paradise and declared that they had seen the future.⁵⁴ The system of worker participation in management that was introduced in Tito's Yugoslavia also drew pilgrims and inspired positive reactions.⁵⁵ In addition, there were regular disagreements about the most extreme manifestations of 'otherness' in Eastern Europe. Did they spring from typical Eastern European traditions, mentalities or circumstances, or were they actually the product of unnatural westernization? A nationalistic Russian like Solzhenitsyn, for example, believes that Marxism and Communism were imported from the West and forcibly imposed on the Russian people. The extremely violent nationalism that was ignited by the disintegration of Yugoslavia can also be seen as a result of western influence. The Bulgarian historian, Todorova, wrote that 'It may well be that what we are witnessing today, wrongly attributed to some Balkan essence, is the ultimate Europeanization of the Balkans.'⁵⁶

The eternal question as to whether the differences between East and West really are so great and so fundamental, is being posed once again. In 1994 Willy Claes, the Secretary General of NATO, welcomed the Baltic states, Poland, the Czech Republic, Hungary, and Slovenia as candidates for integration into Europe. He also included Croatia, with the words 'and let's hope'. These candidates were either already sufficiently 'European', or were rapidly becoming so. Claes then referred to Russia, Belarus, Ukraine, Romania and Serbia as countries 'of Byzantine influence'. He felt that they were not yet ready for incorporation into Europe, due to their 'Oriental world view' and 'the latent mentality of those areas'. Vesna Goldworthy, who was raised in Yugoslavia, added: 'Ironically for an exponent of the moral virtues of the Occident, Claes had to resign from NATO over serious allegations of corruption in Belgian politics.'⁵⁷ The New York Times expressed astonishment at the influence of Middle Age history on Serbian nationalism and commented that, in the West, it would be unthinkable for people to slaughter one another because of something that happened five hundred years ago. The Bulgarian historian Todorova responded by pointing out that 'In Europe, with a longer span of civilized memory, they were killing because of something that happened 2,000 years ago. One is tempted to ask whether the Holocaust resulted from a 'due' or 'undue' predominance of barbarity.'⁵⁸

The West could also experience the need to place greater emphasis on affinity with Eastern Europe, rather than on the region's strangeness. This usually occurred in times of war, when alliances with Eastern European states were seen as essential for the survival of western nations. This was especially true of Russia, which from time to time was seen either as a deadly danger or an indispensable ally. Anti-Russian and pro-Russian groups, that were clearly identifiable as such, existed as long ago as the 18th century. They were responsible for a deep division of public opinion in most Western countries. Curiously, depending on the circumstances, views sympathetic towards that country were alternately expressed by conservative and progressive circles. In this regard, prevailing attitudes towards Russia often largely determined the attitude that was adopted towards other Eastern European nations. In the 19th century, anyone who was anti-Russian was often also pro-Polish and pro-Turkish. However, Russia was widely admired as ‘the saviour of Europe’ in the battle against Napoleonic France. The western allies also considered Russian support during both world wars to be of vital importance. As a result, there was a decline in the traditional Russophobia of the French and British. It was for this reason that Serbs were able to count on their sympathy during the First World War, as were Yugoslavian partisans during the Second World War.

During the first half of the 19th century, the most extreme forms of Russophobia existed within left-wing circles in Germany. At that time, however, it was the conservative historian Leopold von Ranke who came up with an argument for definitively placing Russia outside the borders of Europe. He put forward the view that free, civilized Europe was the result of feudalism, the Renaissance and the Reformation. These were things that the German and Latin peoples had in common. Not having participated in any of these developments, Russia could justifiably be considered un-European.⁵⁹ In August 1914, it was the fear of the ‘Russian steamroller’ that united the German nation behind its government. During the First World War, German propaganda presented the Russians as dangerous barbarians. Nevertheless, German-Russian relations were not exclusively determined by mutual rejections and differences of opinion. The conservative-aristocratic elite in the Germany of Kaiser Wilhelm were aware of a kinship with the other Militärmonarchie in the east, Russia. Furthermore, as a group, Germans in Russia wielded considerable political and economic clout and German culture and science had an exceptionally large influence, as did the workers’ movement. After 1918, Germany saw Russia as a partner. These two countries felt themselves to be victims of the Treaty of Versailles, and they signed a treaty with one another in 1922, at Rapallo. At the time, German intellectuals such as Thomas Mann pointed out the fundamental cultural kinship between the two nations.

This was, however, a deviation from the dominant historical pattern. The German-speaking peoples generally attempted to strengthen their central position in Europe by seeking a rapprochement with the peoples of Eastern and South-Eastern Europe, with whom they had had strong ties ever since the Middle Ages. Since the early 19th century people have attempted to give Central Europe an identity of its own. To a varying extent, some were even in favour of making it an economic and political unit. The argument in favour of such a solution rested on assumed affinities between Hungarians, Romanians and Western and Southern Slavs who were supposedly in favour of linking up with the German-speaking peoples. This new area could then shed its connections with advanced Western Europe and backward Russia. Once the bisection of Europe into East and West had been replaced by the classical triad, Central Europe would form a separate unit, under German hegemony. This idea was undermined, however, by the disagreement concerning the formation of a Greater or Lesser Germany⁶⁰, and by the nationalism of the non-German peoples. Nevertheless, for a long time, Germans were attracted by the concept of a peaceful Central Europe, based on the harmonious collaboration of all peoples in the area. Evidence of this was the success of Mitteleuropa, a book on this theme by the liberal politician Friedrich Naumann, published in 1915. Ultimately, the achievement of this dream was permanently prevented by the de facto outcome of both world wars.⁶¹

In the period between the wars, non-Germans were the main proponents of the ideal of Central Europe. During the First World War, the Czech T.G. Masaryk devoted himself to a democratic, Střední Evropa, which would be predisposed towards the West. His Central Europe was to consist of a number of small, independent states. This concept met with little enthusiasm in the camp of the Entente. Versailles granted independence to a variety of small countries in Central Europe, but this was merely a consequence of the collapse of the Ottoman and Habsburg empires. A note of caution was sounded concerning the admission of these new states to Europe. In the years between the wars, they were seen as a ‘squabbling mixture of races’ that represented a danger to peace on the continent. At the time, in British government circles, no distinction was drawn between Central Europe and the Balkans. Even though democracy was working rather well in Czechoslovakia, the British ambassador considered the Czechs to be 'arrogant pigs... suffering from persecution mania.'⁶² The continuing strength of public opinion regarding the strangeness of that country was illustrated by a radio address given by the British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, during the Munich crisis of 1938. Chamberlain commented 'How horrible, fantastic and incredible it is that we should be digging trenches and trying on gas-masks here because of a quarrel in a far-away country between people of whom we know nothing.' Other members of Chamberlain's cabinet felt equally strongly that what happened in Czechoslovakia had little or nothing to do with England. That country was simply 'an unstable unit in Central Europe', 'a modern invention, a very artificial creation with no real roots in the past.'⁶³ Similarly, contemporary British opinion concerning Poland and Hungary was equally negative⁶⁴.

This changed during the Cold War, when Hungary (in 1956), Czechoslovakia (in 1968) and Poland (in 1980-81) aroused enormous sympathy as a result of their revolts against soviet dictatorship. From that time on, each of these nations was seen as some kind of western outpost. This situation was aptly described as 'a captive nation syndrome, often accompanied by a glorification of dissent'⁶⁵. It ensured that, during the 1970s and 1980s, the West was extremely open to members of the intellectual opposition in these countries, who presented Central Europe as a region that had been forcibly ripped from the bosom of the West by the Soviet Union. The view taken by the Czech Milan Kundera and his sympathizers was that the dictatorial Communist regime that had been thrust upon his people was 'eastern', different and repugnant, while their native culture should be seen as 'western' in all respects. Although the shortcomings inherent to this view of things were expertly revealed by historians such as Dittrich⁶⁶, Central Europe was back on the map. Since that time, Poles, Czechs and Hungarians have been given preference by the West. As a result, Europe was once again divided into three. Following the fall of the Berlin Wall, this situation was perpetuated by the real need of these three countries to rid themselves of the stigma attached both to Communism and to Eastern Europe. In the words of Václav Havel, they wanted to 'to go home to Europe'.⁶⁷ They have indeed made rapid advances in the process of transition, joining NATO and gaining the prospect of being the first former Communist countries to be admitted to the European Union. Thus the concept of Central Europe has well and truly taken hold. This region is now generally seen as being fundamentally distinct from Eastern and South-Eastern Europe.⁶⁸

3. The image of the Balkans

In the Western image of the Balkans we can once again see the traditions and ambivalences, the shifting standpoints and differences of opinion and especially the glorification and abuse of the barbarians that derive from the Western view of Eastern Europe. For Western Christians, the orthodox faith was, of course, one of the most striking features that South-East Europe and Eastern Europe had in common. From the Great Schism between Rome and Byzantium in 1054, right up to the present day, differences between the Latin and Greek churches have been presented as the major cause of divergence between Western and Eastern Europe, in terms of the development of the state, of society and of peoples' mentality. Western literature on the subject of Russia and the Balkans consistently displays a lack of understanding of the particular nature of Eastern Christianity and contempt for its 'heretical' or 'superstitious' views. Another commonly expressed view is that orthodox clergy lack theological insight and an adequate knowledge of the Bible.

Nevertheless, this is just one side of the picture. There were also various counterweights to this rejectionist and often hostile attitude. There was sympathy for the fate of fellow Christians under the Turkish yoke, and Rome often tried to restore unity between Catholicism and Orthodoxy. Protestants too have favoured an anti-Catholic alliance with the Greek church. Orthodoxy has been praised as the only true form of Christianity, by humanists such as Melanchton in the 16th century, as well as by 18th century Pietists and by 19th century Romantics⁶⁹. Western views of the Ottoman political regime and the characteristics of the peoples of South-East Europe are no less ambivalent. Thus, sharp differences of opinion about the Balkans are a common Western European phenomenon. However, the polarization of these views varied from country to country, as did the way in which this issue was resolved. This situation was influenced by the extremely varied situations in South-East Europe, and by the relationships between the Great Powers. Since the 18th century, these countries had been forced to fill the power vacuum that had resulted from the decline of the Ottoman empire. They sometimes collaborated in this endeavour, while at other times they opposed one another. Each country had its own particular stake in the Balkans.

Since the fall of Constantinople in 1453, the Russians had felt that their fate was linked to that of Orthodox Christians living under Ottoman rule. They had been engaged in a centuries-long struggle against Islam in all of the areas to the South and East of Muscovy.⁷⁰ As far back as the 17th century, the Croatian monk Juraj Krizanic travelled to Moscow to request the Czar's support for the oppressed Slavic peoples of the Balkans.⁷¹ Well over a century later, in 1774 the peace treaty of Kuchuk Kainarji compelled the Ottomans to recognize Russia's right, from then on, to act as the protector of Orthodox Christians in the Balkans. In the 19th century, a number of prominent Russian intellectuals became obsessed with pan-Slavic ideals. The Bulgarians particularly became their 'pet nation'. At the same time, however, these same Russians adopted the attitude of 'civilized Europeans' with regard to the 'Asiatic' peoples of the Balkans. They occasionally succeeded in engaging Russian public opinion in their solidarity with the Christians who were supposedly 'groaning under the Turkish yoke'. However, knowledge of the Balkans among the Russian political, military and intellectual elite remained very limited. High-ranking Russians were much more interested in Western Europe.⁷²

During the 'eastern crisis' of the 1870s, it emerged that even an autocratic government was sometimes compelled to pay heed to public opinion. As a result, Russia went to war with Turkey, in order to liberate Bulgaria. Generally, however, Russian foreign politics in the 19th century were primarily focused on Western Europe, Central Asia and the Far East, and not on the Balkans. In addition, the Russian government was handicapped in the extent to which it could intervene in South-Eastern Europe, since it was also an outspoken advocate of the principle of legitimacy. On this basis it was compelled to oppose local rebelliousness. In the interests of restoring law and order, the Russians felt obliged to collaborate with Turkey, Austria, France and Great Britain. Although it had snapped up the northern part of the Danube principalities, Russia had no ambitions to annex the Balkans as a whole. Instead, it attempted to behave as the natural ally of the Greeks, Romanians, Serbs and Bulgarians. However, these peoples often perceived Russian assistance in winning and perpetuating their national independence as clumsy, inadequate or contrary to their interests and turned instead to Austria for protection.⁷³

The house of Habsburg compensated for its loss of power in the Low Countries, Germany and Spain by extending its influence at the cost of the Ottoman empire. In the Balkans, Russia took on the role of the powerful head of the family, who was not prepared to take the trouble to properly get to know the poorer, dependent relatives. Meanwhile, Austria played the part of the expert and extremely dominant neighbour. As far back as the 16th century, the Austrians were publishing remarkable detailed and accurate descriptions of South-East Europe, and of the peoples who inhabited that region.⁷⁴ From the modern viewpoint, the majority of the Habsburgs' non-German subjects were westerners. They were also Catholic and belonged to peoples who, to a greater or lesser extent, had been exposed to the influences of Humanism, Reformation, Counter Reformation and Enlightenment.⁷⁵ Nevertheless, considerable incompatibility remained between the Emperor's German-speaking civil servants and the Slavs, Hungarians and Romanians.⁷⁶ The statesman Metternich, who came from the Rhineland, served as chancellor to the Habsburg emperor. He thought that there was nothing to be done about the problem, due to its fundamental nature. In his opinion the larger portion of the empire he ruled was outside Europe. The 'fault lines of civilizations' drawn by Metternich differed considerably from those that were later to be set out by Huntington. In 1820, the Austrian chancellor is reputed to have remarked that 'Asia starts at the Landstrasse' (the road that runs between Vienna and Budapest).⁷⁷

The Hungarians did indeed represent a considerable danger to the empire's stability. It was only able to suppress their 1848-49 revolt with Russian help. Nor, of course, did the Austrian government have any sympathy whatsoever for the liberation struggles of the Balkan peoples. In 1867, Emperor

Franz Joseph was compelled to share the empire's power with the Magyars. His negotiator, Friedrich Ferdinand von Beust, must have commented to his Hungarian counterparts 'Keep your barbarians under control and we'll do the same with ours.'⁷⁸ This meant that the Austrians would deal with the Poles, Czechs and Slovenians, leaving the Hungarians to handle the Croats, the Slovaks and a section of the Serbs and Romanians. Much to the distaste of Serbia and Montenegro, from 1878 onwards, Bosnia-Herzegovina was groomed to be Austria's very own colony in the Balkans. In 1895, the Austrian administrator of those areas, the Hungarian Beni Kállay von Nagy-Kállay, wrote in a London newspaper that: 'Austria is a great Occidental Empire charged with the mission of carrying civilization to Oriental peoples.'⁷⁹ The occasionally impressive modernization that was implemented in the southern areas of the Habsburg empire, did nothing to improve the popularity of the local Austrians and Hungarians. Their arrogant 'divide and rule' policy aggravated the tensions in the Balkans and undermined peace in Europe. The Habsburg authorities were fearful of a revolt in Bosnia, and lacked the courage to make major changes in rural areas. As a result, large numbers of orthodox Serbian farmers continued to be the serfs of a small group of Muslim land owners.⁸⁰ Given the continued existence of social and political differences in the area, with all that this implied, historians later viewed the occupation and subsequent annexation of Bosnia as a fatal form of imperial overstretch.⁸¹

The Balkans was something familiar to Russia. Although the region fell within the natural sphere of influence of Russia's foreign policy, it was not vitally important. The continued existence of Russia as a Great Power was not dependent on the Balkans. The area was of vital importance for Austria but, despite its proximity, it remained very foreign. The remaining Great Powers considered the Balkans to be odd and insignificant. Their only involvement in the region was related to the international complications associated with the decline in Turkish power and with the competition between Russia and Austria. The anti-Turkish crusade mentality that had made such a mark on Russian and Austrian history was much weaker in Germany, France and England. Thus, they were able to be more candid in their appreciation both of the Ottomans and of the Balkan peoples' struggle for freedom.

In addition to the rebellious Poles and Hungarians, the Greeks enjoyed considerable support in liberal circles throughout Western Europe. Furthermore, such support was by no means limited to moral platitudes. Germans made up the majority of the philhellenes who joined the Greeks in their struggle for liberation. This was characteristic of the swing in German mentality that had taken place under the influence of the French revolution and the Romantic Movement. In his Hyperion (1797), the poet Hölderlin had already shown himself to be a philhellene avant la lettre. Schiller and Beethoven were inspired by the rebellious Greeks. In Faust, Goethe splendidly illustrated the Germans' self-satisfied views concerning the Balkan wars of the 18th century.⁸² He himself was deeply impressed by Byron's life, and his death for the resurrection of Greece. Goethe also showed great interest in and admiration for Serbian culture and rebelliousness. He was not alone in this, Jakob Grimm, Ranke and others felt the same way.

Sharply divergent views were held by Marshall Von Moltke, who at the start of his career, had spent a considerable amount of time in Turkey, as a military instructor. In his well known Briefe aus der Türkei, Molke had declared himself in favour of the reformation of the Ottoman empire. The German liberal and orientalist, Jakob Fallmerayer, supported Greek independence. Nevertheless, in 1830, he put the damper on the romantic philhellenism to which those with a classical education were so attached. Fallmerayer asserted that 'auch nicht ein Tropfen echten und ungemischten Hellenenblutes in den Adern der Christlichen Bevölkerung des heutigen Griechenland fließet.'⁸³ He stated that modern Greeks were of either Slavic or Albanian origin, and were certainly not the decedents of Homer and Plato. Marx and Engels also attempted to curb the 'poetic' enthusiasm in their circles for 'edle Räubervölker' such as the Serbs, Bulgarians or Albanians. Such 'Völkerabfälle', 'Völkerruinen', 'gebrochene Barbarische Reste' or 'unhistorische Völker' were simply tools in the hands of Russian pan-Slavists. Nevertheless, they later experienced a growing appreciation of the Serbs. However, this was outweighed by their Russophobia and, in the Russo-Turkish war of 1876, they allied themselves with the Ottomans.⁸⁴

The Balkans was mainly important to the Germany of Kaiser Wilhelm because of his relationship with Austria. Bismarck, who took on the role of “ehrlicher Makler” at the Berlin Congress of 1878, had not the slightest understanding of the liberation struggles of the Balkan nations. ‘Diese Hammeldiebe’s role was simply to adhere, in every respect, to the arrangements of the Great Powers. They were still not worth ‘die gesunden Knochen eines einzigen pommerschen Musketiers’ to him.⁸⁵ While the German academic world boasted respectable Eastern-Europe experts, the image of the Balkans owed more to a popular author such as Karl May than it did to these scholars. Although he never visited the region, his In den Schluchten des Balkan (published in 1892) was just as popular as his other adventure novels. Books of this type served to enhance the exotic image of the Balkans that had taken root. This image could also be found in the pages of the authoritative Brockhaus encyclopaedia.⁸⁶

French foreign policy had a long tradition of being anti-Austrian, anti-Russian and pro-Turkish. The writings of French travellers from the 16th century onwards initially showed an appreciation of the effective administration and religious tolerance of the Ottomans. This was gradually replaced by critical reports about despotism and corruption. Yet, throughout this period, political, economic and cultural relations became ever more intensive.⁸⁷ It was especially the brief period of Napoleonic administration in Dalmatia that served to enhance French expertise concerning the Balkans and the peoples who inhabited that region. There was considerable sympathy for the Greek freedom fighters. In their imaginations, French travellers saw the rocky terrain of Greece inhabited by ancient gods. They visualized Demosthenes and Socrates strolling under the plane trees and olive trees. Leading writers such as Victor Hugo and Chateaubriand expressed their sympathy for the Greek cause. In 1824, the fashionable Delacroix painted Scènes des massacres de Scio (which depicted the bloodbath that the Turks inflicted on Chios in 1822). In 1826 he created La Grèce sur les ruines de Missolonghi to commemorate the defenders of Missolonghi, who had blown themselves to smithereens, along with the besieging Turks who had entered the city. However, a far greater number of drawings and paintings produced by this artist drew upon the exotic, martial and voluptuous Muslim Orient. This was a topic that very much occupied peoples’ imaginations during the Romantic period.⁸⁸

In his well-known Voyage en Orient, the poet-diplomat Alphonse de Lamartine showed that he was very much against the artificial preservation of the Ottoman empire. He expressed great admiration for the Serbian and Bulgarian peasants, indicating that he thought them capable of sustaining independence, nor were his views about the Turks -as a people - dismissive. The poet Prosper Mérimée published a collection of Serbian epic poetry from his own pen. The novelist Honoré de Balzac also incorporated Serbian themes into his work. While it appealed to the romantic imagination, such literature had little influence on the shaping of political opinion.⁸⁹ French meddling in the Balkans was not based solely on its considerable interests in the Mediterranean region. There was also a hope that the Eastern question might lead to a revision of the decisions taken at the Vienna Congress, which held out to France the prospect of revenge and of strengthening its position in Western Europe. Critics of France wrote that while the French were shouting about Greece, what they really meant was Belgium and the banks of the Rhine.⁹⁰ Despite the great enthusiasm for the banditry of rebellious peasants (known in the Balkans as klephts, armatoles or hayduks), as a Catholic country, France had its reservations about the schismatic, orthodox faith of the Balkan peoples. French diplomats did not have a particularly high opinion either of the Ottoman administration, or of the reigning princes of Serbia or Montenegro. Unlike Britain, public opinion concerning participation in the Crimean War was half-hearted and divided. Nor, later on, was there much support for the rebellious peoples of the Balkans.⁹¹

It was the United Kingdom, more than any other country, that made its mark on the Western image of the Balkans. In Britain, the Balkan issue caused more political division and inflamed emotions than anywhere else. Nevertheless, it was not until the second half of the 19th century that the British really became interested in the Balkans. This interest derived solely from a much older preoccupation with Russia and Turkey. In England, from the 16th century onwards, these countries had been seen as despotic and barbarian powers. Throughout the entire 18th century and up until about 1820, British government circles saw Russia as an important trading partner, a friendly power and a natural ally for Britain. Numerous travellers tales show that during this period, and even later, the British had more respect for the Turks, as a dominant power, than for the peoples they had subjugated.⁹² In 1800, interest in Greece derived mainly from the traditions of the Grand Tour and from a classical education. When the Elgin marbles were brought to Britain in 1812, British tourists saw the Greeks as ‘ignorant, superstitious, factious, venal, obsequious, lazy, dirty and ungrateful’⁹³ This applied to the Turks either to a much lesser extent or not at all. Even philhellenes such as Byron had similar opinions about Greeks and Turks. However, such people were passionate about freedom, they also tended to focus on the good qualities of the Greeks and on the injustices of the Turkish administration. The philhellenic craze soon petered out, however. The main protagonists were a small group of angry young men from the British elite, mostly of Scottish descent. The most prominent members of English society were ‘violent anti-Greeks’ and they received the support of powerful men such as Castlereagh and Wellington. In 1830, the young Benjamin Disraeli joined the Turkish Grand Visier in Albania on a campaign against local rebels. In letters to his family, he wrote about ‘the delight of being made much of by a man who was daily decapitating half the province.’⁹⁴

Russophobia was a more important factor in the development of the image of the Balkans than was philhellenism. Anti-Russian feelings arose in Whig circles at the end of the 18th century. At the start of the 19th century, this spread out to include ever wider circles of the aristocratic elite and the well-to-do. Throughout Europe, contemporary left-wing circles were overcome by such sentiments. Those on the European mainland were fearful that the Cossacks might invade and put an end to European freedom. In England, there was an equally unfounded fear that Russian expansion in central Asia and in South-East Europe threatened British India, or the routes leading to it. Public opinion was exceptionally anti-Russian. It was mainly pressure from this quarter that caused the British government to undertake the Crimean War (1853-1856). Although the war served to highlight Russian weakness, this did nothing to assuage the exaggerated British fear of that country.⁹⁵ Since Palmerston’s government had sacrificed 25,000 British lives in the Crimea and had spent seventy million pounds to get the Turkish empire back on its feet, the Balkans continued to be an important focus for foreign policy even after 1856⁹⁶. Although the war with Russia was not a response to the repression of the Balkan peoples, further British support for the Ottoman empire was provisional upon the Turks implementing certain reforms in order to greatly improve the lot of their Christian subjects. Failure to take this action would give the other Great Powers, with Russia at their head, an excuse to intervene. Since the Turks failed to implement significant reforms, the British shifted their focus for the first time to the Balkan peoples.

The British had long been inclined to dismiss the rebellions in the Balkans as an adverse phenomenon caused by Russian intrigues. In the 1860s and 1870s, however, many became convinced that by supporting ‘the unspeakable Turk’, the British were partly responsible, possibly even partly to blame, for the barbarities taking place in the Balkans. In their book, published in 1867 and entitled Travels in the Slavonic Provinces? of Turkey-in-Europe, Georgina Mackenzie and Adelina Irby informed many of their fellow countrymen about ‘the sullenness, the poverty and the squalor of the Christian Slavs’. While both ladies remained firmly convinced of British superiority in all things, it was for this very reason that the British should be concerned about these peoples’ fate. They set a good example and remained in Bosnia, where they carried out many good works despite the fact that they viewed the Bosnians as barbaric, dishonest and lazy.⁹⁷ In the period from 1875 to 1878, British public opinion was shocked by the so-called Eastern Crisis. This involved rebellions in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria and Thessaly, wars in Serbia, Montenegro and ultimately a conflict between Russia, Romania and Turkey. There was great anxiety about the savagery inflicted on the Bulgarians by irregular Turkish troops known as Bashi-Bazouks. The press devoted little attention to the slaughter of Turkish and Slav Muslims by the rebels.

However, Disraeli’s conservative government continued to pursue an anti-Russian policy. Such was the importance of a safe route to India that the British Empire would, if necessary, go to war to defend it. Given the weakness of France, the three conservative empires of Russia, Germany and Austria were capable of dominating the continent. Britain’s aim was to drive a wedge between them. As far as Disraeli was concerned, Turks and Christians were mere pawns on his chessboard. He tended to see rebellions in the Balkans as a 'throwback to barbarism', and he dismissed the accounts of Turkish atrocities as exaggerated. Disraeli's imperturbability resulted in an unprecedented explosion of moral indignation among the opposition and large sections of the population. This took the form of numerous meetings, committees and pamphlets.⁹⁸ This movement gained enormous political significance when Gladstone, Disraeli's main liberal adversary, took on the role of spokesman for protesting intellectuals, artists, nonconformists and many ordinary citizens, who had just been given the right to vote. In September 1876, he wrote his famous pamphlet Bulgarian Horrors and the Question of the East. Two hundred thousand copies were sold within one month. This did not lead to any changes in foreign policy, however. The presence of British warships in the Dardanelles prevented the Russians from profiting from their successful operations in the Balkans. Thus, when the Great Powers met at the 1878 congress of Berlin to settle the 'eastern crisis', 'der alte Jude' (the term used by Bismarck when referring to Disraeli) triumphed.⁹⁹ Todorova takes the view that the discovery of the oppressed Christian peoples of the Balkans coincided with the discovery of the 'Victorian poor' in Britain itself. The domestic 'moral issue' gave rise to the foreign one. 'If there is any lesson to be drawn from the Bosnian crisis of 120 years ago, it is more about the domestic imperatives in Great Power foreign policy than about 'ancient enmities'.¹⁰⁰

4. Balkan writers and Balkan literature

The 'Eastern crisis' of the 1870s gave definite shape to the image of the Balkans, not just in Great Britain but in the continent of Europe as well. The Balkans was to remain a crisis area until 1914, so this image was confirmed and reinforced over and over again. Despite all of the agitation about Turkish atrocities, there was little evidence of racially or religiously motivated prejudice against Turks or Muslims. People no longer wrote about an undifferentiated mass of Christians who, because of their faith, were all conveniently labelled as Greeks. From that time on national stereotypes were used, such as 'suffering Bulgarians, wild Albanians, martial Serbs and proud, brave Montenegrins.' At the same time, public opinion was concerned about Russian manipulation of the Balkan peoples, who were generally considered to be incapable of independence and of conducting an efficient administration.¹⁰⁰ The numerous reports of revolutionary terror, revolts, coup d'états, political assassinations and widespread corruption in the Balkans only served to reinforce these views. Like the image of Eastern Europe and the even older image of barbarism, however, the image of the Balkans retained certain Janus-like features. Adverse, deprecatory aspects were balanced by the positive, romantic impressions that were chiefly presented in that period's extensive imaginative literature and travel literature on the Balkans.

The legendary figure of Byron, his selfless efforts on behalf of the Greek cause, and his death at Missolonghi in 1824 remained symbolic of ethically inspired, western interference in the Balkans. The landscapes of Greece, Macedonia and Albania reminded him of the Scottish Highlands, and the fierce clans that used to inhabit the region. The repercussions of his lyrical poetry on this subject continued for many years. The glorification of wild and noble mountain dwellers was a familiar theme in European literature.¹⁰² The untouched mountainous areas of the Balkans, whose primitive inhabitants apparently still followed a tribal way of life, therefore had considerable magnetism for western visitors. In the midst of all the uproar in England about the 'Eastern crisis', the poet Alfred Lord Tennyson (egged on by Gladstone) dedicated a verse to Montenegro. His poem describes a 'rough rock-throne of freedom' where 'a race of mightier mountaineers' dwelt. There was much about the numerous peoples and regions of the Balkans that appealed to the imagination. In addition to an eventful history, they had a colourful folklore, revolutionary movements, secret societies, ethnic and religious contrasts, agricultural poverty, a violent political culture and political instability. Balkan royalty was an equally exotic subject. This applied both to the native royal families of Serbia and Montenegro and to those of Greece, Romania and Bulgaria, which had their origins in Western Europe. The western yellow press gave extensive coverage to the frivolous behaviour of some of these monarchs and to the bloody deaths of others. As the 19th century neared its end, Scotland, the Iberian peninsula and post-unification Germany and Italy, had lost much of their appeal for writers seeking new material for a novel. The Balkans appeared to be a region that had somehow managed to escape the tedium and bourgeois values that were gradually taking hold elsewhere in Europe.

The Prisoner of Zenda by Anthony Hope was published in 1894. It was a novel about a British aristocrat who closely resembled the king of an obscure Balkan country named 'Ruritania'. Their close resemblance to one another enabled this Byronic hero to save the fictitious monarch, and his imaginary kingdom, from a national crisis. Several hundred thousand copies of this novel were sold. The story was also used as the basis for plays and films. The success of this novel led to the production of dozens of adventure novels, castle novels, thrillers, detective stories, comedies, operettas and films. These were often set in imaginary Balkan states such as Syldavia, Dardania, Kedaria, Kravonia, Drynia, Vulgaria, Carpathia, Pottibakia, Herzoslovakia, Moesia, Mlavia or Silaria. Most of these are long forgotten, but some enjoyed more lasting fame. Some examples of the latter are: Bernard Shaw's play Arms and Men (1894); Dracula, Bram Stoker's Gothic novel (1897); Franz Lehar's operetta Die lustige Witwe (1905); The Thirty Nine Steps, John Buchan's spy novel (1915); Agatha Christie's detective story, Murder on the Orient Express (1934); Eric Ambler's thriller, The Mask of Demitrios (1939); Hergé's cartoon strip, Kuifje en de scepter van Ottokar (1947) and the film The Prince and the Showgirl (1957), starring Laurence Olivier and Marilyn Monroe.¹⁰³

Amusements of this kind reached broad sections of the general public, and served to confirm the image of the Balkans as one of a mysterious, exotic and semi-Asian corner of Europe. Usually, their authors or producers had never set foot in that region. Their only goal was to offer Western readers a pleasant and exciting escape from their day-to-day troubles. On the other hand, some novels attracted attention because they were based on personal experiences, and were truer to reality. One example is Evelyn Waugh's comical and critical Unconditional Surrender (1961), about his experiences with Tito's partisans. Another is Olivia Manning's autobiographical Balkan Trilogy (1960-1965), about mundane life in Bucharest and Athens just before and during the Second World War. In the Anglo-Saxon world, however, Mary Edith Durham and Rebecca West already had insuperable reputations as writers on the subject of the Balkans.

Durham arrived in the Balkans in 1900, at the age of 37. She was to remain there for most of the next 25 years. She wrote a series of travel stories, as well as stories with an anthropological component, about Serbia and Albania. She worked in field hospitals during the Balkan wars. She also had a distinct preference for desolate, mountainous regions such as Montenegro. She saw this as 'the Lhasa of Europe', peopled by 'fearless heroes straight from the pages of Homer'. She can be seen as 'the last of the Victorian travellers in the Balkans', one of those 'English spinsters who go about adopting small countries' who, convinced of their British superiority, were on a mission to spread the light of civilization. She attempted to learn Serbo-Croat and Albanian, and spared no effort to further her knowledge and understanding. Nevertheless, she became convinced of the region's complexity, the incomprehensibility of its inhabitants and the complexity of the 'Balkan tangle'. She continued to see herself as an objective observer and eternal outsider. Her compatriots, however, saw her as increasingly Balkanized, feeling that she identified too closely with the region. In the period between the World Wars, she became a fierce advocate of Albanian independence. As a result, she also became extremely anti-Serbian.¹⁰⁴

Whereas Durham was a Spartan and seasoned inhabitant of the Balkans, West was a woman of letters. She restricted herself to three short and extremely luxurious trips to Yugoslavia in 1936 and 1937. In the introduction to her Black Lamb and Grey Falcon, she wrote disparagingly about countrymen who travelled to the Balkans, only to return 'with a pat Balkan people' for pampering. She referred specifically to 'Miss Durham who had been led by her humanitarian passion to spend almost all her life in the Balkans' and, as a result, had become the undisputed champion of the Albanians, one who was inclined to believe even the most unlikely of anti-Serbian stories. West made brief observations in the field, which were subsequently embellished and extended at great length after she had returned home. However, she was just as concerned as Durham about the enigmatic and incomprehensible nature of the Balkans. Even though she considered herself to be an objective judge of Yugoslavian relations, she had in fact already sided with the Serbs.

In terms of her attitude to the peoples of the Balkans, Durham remained a sort of Victorian school teacher and do-gooder. West, who completed her book while German bombs were raining down on London, adopted a more humble attitude. She believed that, in their struggle against the Turks, the Serbs had shown Europe how Christian civilization must be defended against the despotic and immoral powers that were once again menacing our continent. This view turned her travel stories in Yugoslavia into 'an inward journey of self-discovery and a spiritual quest'. Yugoslavia seemed to offer her the key 'to the understanding of all mankind, all human history and God.'¹⁰⁵ In this, West was a great deal less unique than is often assumed to be the case. The belief that only primitive barbarians were capable of holding up a mirror to the civilized world, one in which people could see their true selves, dates back to Ancient Greece. She had entertained Slavophilic views for many years. In the period between the wars, like many others in Western Europe before and since, she greatly admired Dostoyevsky and Tolstoy. She tested feelings and thoughts of this kind during her pilgrimage to Yugoslavia, and in the course of her subsequent studies of that country. Other artists and intellectuals had previously seen a journey to Czarist or Communist Russia as a sort of spiritual rebirth, a liberation from the spiritual narrow-mindedness of the West.¹⁰⁶

Although many works of fiction and non-fiction have been published on the subject of Russia and other Eastern European countries, Balkan literature is quite astonishing in terms of its volume and diversity. It not only gives the impression of a region torn by centuries of enmity and hate between the various inhabitants. Its image of the Balkans is complex, and contains too many contradictory elements for this to be the case. Although ethnic differences and conflicts are regularly addressed, the majority of authors do not see these as wholly or partly responsible for the specific characteristics of the area. Indeed, they are not usually interested in explanations. A systematic analysis of the strange, unknown, exotic and Eastern nature of the Balkans would dispel its attractive mysteriousness. Nevertheless this literature often presents a marked contrast between the corrupt world of the Balkan capital cities, with their numerous political intrigues, and the purity, nobility and heroism of people in rural and mountainous areas. The real, original Balkans lay outside the cities. This was seen as 'Europe in its cradle', as a 'genuine unspoilt Europe'.

The romantic and anti-modernist tendency of much of the more dated Balkan literature is remarkable when seen against the light of contemporary literature dealing with the recent Yugoslavian civil wars. The latter highlights the contrast between the civilized, multinational, Western character of urban society and the primitiveness and ethnic contrasts of the agricultural areas. In her book on English-language Balkans' fiction, Vesna Goldsworthy notes that there was an additional tension in these older images of the Balkans. This was the discrepancy 'between the idea of the centrality of the region and that of its total marginality in the world of European politics'. The Balkans was represented as either irrelevant to Europe, or fatal to it. For the political and military elite in 1900, however, the potential hazards of the Balkans were all too clear. In 1893, a group of British military experts wrote a scenario for the outbreak of a world war. This document was entitled, The Great War of 189.: A Forecast. The document contains a description of the murder of a Bulgarian prince, by a Russian spy dressed as a priest. The Serbs use the ensuing confusion to create a border incident. As a result, the Austrians rapidly occupy Belgrade, which in turn leads to a Russian invasion of Bulgaria etc. The Great War of 189. was a popular book, especially in its German translation. This inspired Shaw to write Arms and men. Prior to 1914, it also caused many other authors to describe the Balkans as the powder keg of Europe.

¹⁰⁷

While the hazardous and negative aspects of the Balkans cannot be denied, the most striking feature of former Western perceptions of the region is a positive evaluation. Since contemporary opinions and prejudices about the Balkans reveal no trace of this former appreciation, it is inaccurate to assert that they are simply a continuation of past views. In the literature on the Yugoslavian conflicts, various factors have been associated with the views and attitudes of the 'international community'. Traditional views of the Balkan peoples were only one of many issues. Some importance has also been attached to the 'traditional' character of the relations that the Great Powers maintained with the Balkan states, especially Yugoslavia. It is for this reason that, in the next section of this historical sketch of images of the Balkans and of Yugoslavia, the greatest emphasis will be placed on international relations, both past and present.

5. Traditional friendships

Writing about relations between the independent Serbia and other states, prior to 1914, the Polish-British historian, Sir Lewis Namier, stated: 'Hardly another rising, or renascent, nation had so great an array of enemies and so few friends. Habsburg, Austrians, Magyars, and Italians, were fully united in their hostility to the Serbs. [...] Russia might have been expected to befriend the Serbs: but the Bulgars, her vanguard against Constantinople, were her favourites.[...] In Great Britain [...], there were more pro-Turks and pro-Bulgars (as in 1876-8), but very few pro-Serbs.¹⁰⁸ Indeed, despite admiration for the primitive inhabitants of the Balkans, British political circles at the turn of the century mainly saw Serbia as a 'thoroughgoing nuisance' and a 'nest of violent barbarians'.¹⁰⁹ Great Britain (and the Netherlands) broke off diplomatic relations for several years, following the horrifying murder of the Serbian king and queen in Belgrade in 1903. From then on, until 1914, events only served to make Serbia even less liked in the West. Existing prejudices were confirmed by the wholesale slaughter carried out by the Serbs in Kosovo in 1913, as well as by the assassination of the successor to the Austrian throne in Sarajevo in 1914. There were exceptions, however. The renowned British historian, G.M. Trevelyan, who visited Kosovo in 1913 as a guest of the Serbian army, was receptive to the historical myths that were being used to justify the struggle to create a Greater Serbia. Thanks to the support of Russia and France, the Great Powers permitted Serbia to retain the conquered territory of Kosovo. However, the establishment of an independent Albania meant that the Great Powers were not prepared to concede to Serbia's intense desire for some Adriatic coastline.

During the First World War, the countries of the Entente developed considerable sympathy for their only true allies in South-Eastern Europe, the heroic Serbs, who were making considerable sacrifices for the common cause. In addition to the St Vitus days that were celebrated in Britain and America¹¹⁰, other campaigns were used to familiarize the populations of western countries with Serbian history. The Kosovo myth was seen as the source of inspiration for the admirable behaviour of the Serbs. They were applauded as 'the thoroughbreds of the Balkans', as 'magnificent specimens of humanity' and as 'the guardians of the Gate' of civilized Europe.¹¹¹ To some extent, the Central Powers also amended their opinion of the Serbs, who they primarily saw as regicides. Wendel, a socialist representative in the German Reichstag, stated that the Serbs were 'the most slandered people in Europe'. Germans, in particular, had made fun of them 'until 1914, when everyone suddenly stopped laughing'. During the Balkan campaigns, the Serbs proved to be highly energetic and tenacious opponents. Virtually every Serbian village was found to contain a normal school, and their inhabitants were people who conducted themselves in a civilized and dignified way.¹¹²

Nevertheless, the creation of a Yugoslavian state and the demarcation of its territories were ultimately due to the considerations of power politics and to the outcome of the war.¹¹³ The continuing Serbian outrages in Kosovo caused the American president, Woodrow Wilson, to resist Anglo-French plans for an expansion of Serbia at the cost of Albania. However, those who drew up the treaty of Versailles favoured a degree of Serbian predominance within the new Yugoslavian state, whose primary role was to act as a bastion against future German expansionism in the Balkans. Accordingly, another influential British historian, R.W. Seton-Watson, stated that 'the potent Serbian wine should not become overly diluted with weak Yugoslavian water'. During the war, this authority on Central and South-Eastern Europe had done a great deal for the Serbian cause. At the same time, he became intensely irritated by what he saw as the 'Turkish' political culture of Serbian statesmen like Nikola Pasic. In the period between the wars, Seton-Watson made even more critical statements about the dictatorial tendencies of the Serbs in Yugoslavia. Several prominent French journalists and politicians, such as Charles Rivet and Robert Schumann, had warned about this, both during and after the war.¹¹⁴

At the peace negotiations, there was a sharp conflict between Italian and Serbian interests. Any sympathy for the Serbian cause at Versailles was prompted by a desire on the part of France and Great Britain to retain a reliable ally in South-Eastern Europe. In this, they were to be disappointed. France had become a weak power and its attempts to prop up Yugoslavia with a system of alliances (the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente) met with failure. Neither France nor Great Britain were able to grant the kingdom economic prosperity or military protection. By the 1920s, Yugoslavia was primarily oriented towards Germany, Austria and Italy. Most Yugoslavian exports went to those countries. This tendency became still more pronounced during the 1930s.¹¹⁵ In 1935, a French observer noted that ‘Germans are everywhere in Belgrade these days. French is never spoken. Merchants and waiters can neither speak nor comprehend the language, but nine out of ten of them speak and comprehend German.’¹¹⁶

Such elementary facts passed unnoticed by Rebecca West, who was extremely anti-German, when she visited Yugoslavia two years later. At that time the economic and political life of the country, which was still dominated by Serbs, was almost completely dependent on Nazi Germany. West finally published her book in 1942, five years after her journey. In it she states that she saw marked similarities between Great Britain in the ‘appeasement’ period and this so-called ‘neutral’ Yugoslavia under premier Stojadinovic and the prince regent Pavel Karadjordjevic. West stated that in her own country the ‘springs of national will [were] locked fast in frost’, while members of the British upper class flirted with Hitler and Mussolini. She felt that it was only the return of Churchill to public office in 1939 that saved Great Britain’s honour.

According to West, a similar event occurred in Yugoslavia two years later. In 1941, when the treaty confirming Yugoslavia’s alignment with the Axis Powers was signed, the Patriarch condemned it as being contrary to the spirit of Kosovo. This statement was immediately followed by an anti-fascist coup d’etat led by a group of officers. The coup was supported and even inspired by the British.¹¹⁷ This coup provoked the German bombardment of Belgrade, and the kingdom’s subsequent conquest, occupation and downfall. However, West felt that the Serbs had followed the example of the British in showing their true face to the world, thereby revealing the similarities between them. Even the difference between Britain in 1939 and Serbia on the eve of the Battle of Kosovo in 1389 ‘lay in time and place and not in the events experienced, which resembled each other even in details of which we of the later catastrophe think as peculiar to our nightmare.’¹¹⁸

West was unaware that the Nazi interpreter and diplomat, Dr Paul Otto Schmidt, had made an altogether different comparison in the German press, several years previously. Schmidt claimed that there was a substantial moral affinity between the Germans and the Serbs as their age-old struggle against the Turks had caused the latter to become virtuous, militant and chivalrous. This convinced Hitler of the desirability of a close alliance between both peoples. In fact, Yugoslavia was to become the stage both of large-scale collaboration with the Italian and German occupiers, and of equally large-scale resistance to them. Serbs, Croats and the other nationalities worked closely together during the war, but they also slaughtered each other as well. In 1942, the annual commemoration of the Battle of Kosovo was held in occupied Belgrade. The collaborating press celebrated this occasion with attacks on the Communist resistance which, of course, was presented as a betrayal of the Kosovo tradition. West, as an ardent anti-Communist, continued to support the Serbian royalists during the war. The British government decided to support Tito’s partisans, since they could offer more effective resistance to the Germans than the Serbian royalist Cetniks. The king of Yugoslavia was in exile in London and, for a while, the allies attempted to match up his interests with those of Tito. But Churchill was not really interested in the political future of Serbia or Yugoslavia.¹¹⁹

In the post-war years, the Communist authorities made every effort to suppress the annual commemoration of the Battle of Kosovo. They used the defeat of the partisan movement at the battle of Sutjeska as a new Kosovo, one that was not exclusively Serbian and which could be celebrated by the whole of Yugoslavia.¹²⁰ It was indeed Communist Yugoslavia, rather than Serbia or Croatia, that acquired a good reputation in the West. As a result of Tito’s rift with Stalin, Yugoslavia was able to adopt a unique position between East and West, which made that country extremely significant and interesting to us. Over a period of four decades, it was the only Communist country with which the West was able to maintain relatively normal and intensive contacts. Foreign labourers from Yugoslavia made an important contribution to West European prosperity. Large-scale American and international financial support generated an artificial blossoming of the Yugoslavian economy.

Yugoslavia became more acceptable to right-wing political movements in the West when it firmly distanced itself from the Soviet bloc. At the same time, the country remained the focus of attention for left-wing and progressive circles as a result of its role in the group of 'non-aligned' countries and the 'breathtaking boldness'¹²¹ of the experiments with worker self-management. Other factors were the unorthodox Marxism of some Yugoslavian theoreticians and the excellent, extremely readable books produced by members of the opposition, such as Djilas. Many Western European tourists were attracted by Yugoslavia's countryside, its climate, music, food and low prices. This was of much greater importance to the country's wider popularity. Post-war Western news coverage and scholarly literature prior to 1980 therefore projected a predominantly positive image of Communist Yugoslavia. Although the country's problems were not completely glossed over, for a long time they appeared to be less serious or more solvable than those in the rest of Communist Europe. In the divided but stable world of the Cold War, the Balkans was no longer seen as a powder keg. It seemed that the old clichés about a barbaric, violent, exotic and semi-Asian Yugoslavia were wearing rather thin. For a long time, Tito's state was seen as a relatively westernized country. It was broadly comparable to other Mediterranean countries such as Greece, Spain or Portugal, if not more prosperous. From 1948 to 1988, it occupied the position that is currently occupied by the Central European countries.¹²²

It became increasingly clear that the Communist government had not succeeded in eliminating regional antipathies. There was a distinct possibility that the republic would fall apart after Tito's death.¹²³ Foreign governments viewed such a possibility with deep concern. Military authorities even thought that this might trigger a Third World War. In spite of all this apprehension, however, no scenarios were developed to prevent the disintegration of the Yugoslavian federation.¹²⁴ No commentators, other than those in Yugoslavian emigré circles, would even consider expressing a preference for Croatian independence or the formation of a Greater Serbia, as this might reveal the unavoidable bankruptcy of the Yugoslavian state. Commentators in the West continued to sympathize with dissident groups and individuals. Their nationalism was seen as a sign of burgeoning pluralism rather than one of impending disintegration.¹²⁵

When the political and economic situation in Yugoslavia sharply worsened during the 1980s, the West's attention was no longer specifically focused on that country. The remarkable developments in the Soviet bloc and the reduction of tension between East and West caused Yugoslavia to be seen as much less important and interesting. It lost both its privileged position and American protection. The requirements that the IMF now imposed on loans accelerated the country's economic downfall and worsened the social circumstances of large sectors of the population. After 1989, Yugoslavia found it more difficult to obtain support from the European Community than did former Eastern Bloc countries such as Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary. This was because the latter countries complied with all of the current definitions of European civilization, whereas Yugoslavia was unable to satisfy some of the criteria. This encouraged the separatist tendencies of Croatia and Slovenia. These Catholic countries, which before 1918 had been part of the Habsburg empire, took pride in their European roots.¹²⁶ Meanwhile, the central government had already weakened considerably. Although it was granted European financial support, this was contingent upon keeping the country in one piece and implementing economic reforms. The introduction of a market economy forced the population to tighten their belts and eroded political support for the federal government still further.

It was only on the eve of war, in 1991, that international attention once again focused on the southern Slavic region. The West felt compelled to intervene, but deep differences of opinion arose between the European powers as soon as the Yugoslavian conflict broke out. These came to a head in the autumn of 1991, when Germany (with the support of Austria) expressed a desire to recognize the independence of Slovenia and Croatia as soon as possible. Germany's intentions generated passionate reactions among those in the war zone. Slovenians and Croats used every channel made available by the modern communications media to express their heartfelt gratitude. Conversely, the Yugoslavian defence minister expressed the view that this was the third time that Germany had attacked his country.¹²⁷ Serbian leaders and intellectuals claimed that this was the rise of the 'Fourth Reich', a resurgence of the Danube monarchy and a new German Drang nach Osten.

The historical undertone in both Serbian and Croatian wartime propaganda was quite striking. There were continual, emotional references to a past with which the general public was only vaguely familiar or with which it had yet to come to terms. This mainly applied to the period of the Second World War. There was a strong tendency to think in terms of historical friendships and enmities. The Serbian media, for example, expressed their aversion to the Pope, who they saw as a traditional friend of the Catholic Croats and enemy of the Orthodox Serbs. Serbian nationalists had a similar role in mind for Islamic countries such as Turkey, Iran or Libya. They felt that these countries were the mainstay of the Bosnian, Kosovars and Macedonian Muslims. At the same time, they praised their renewed, time-honoured ties with the Russians.¹²⁸ Vehement reactions of this kind are entirely consistent with the war psychosis that had seized the Yugoslavian peoples. More surprising was the immediate focus in the West on reminiscences about the period prior to 1945. This development was not sparked by the actions of Germany and Austria alone. Western critics of the stance taken by the USA, Britain and France accused these countries of renewing their traditional alliance with the Serbs, or of practising the appeasement politics of the 1930s.¹²⁹ Warren Christopher, the American Secretary of State during Clinton's first term as President, described the war as 'a humanitarian crisis a long way from home, in the middle of another continent'¹³⁰. This did indeed revive memories of Chamberlain's comments during the Munich crisis.¹³¹

The impression that old times were being revisited owed more to the ambiguity of the West's policies on Yugoslavia than to the past itself. The responses of foreign powers to the outbreak of the Yugoslavian conflict, and the motives that underpinned them, were contradictory and complex. The intervention by the 'international community' was insufficiently related to the immediate interests of the states and supranational agencies involved. Since no country was prepared 'to take mortal risks to bring about any particular outcome', Western policies up until 1995 remained extremely obscure and hesitant.¹³² The literature on the Yugoslav crises contains a wide range of explanations and views of the West's actions (or lack of action). Many books and articles point out that the differences of opinion between the Great Powers (and between the members of the European Community) contained 'echoes of nineteenth and early twentieth century European politics'.¹³³ It is therefore necessary to investigate whether patterns of Western image-forming, as well as historical traditions in Western policies on the Balkans were involved.

Prior to the outbreak of hostilities, and even for some time afterwards, the United States and the European countries (including Germany) saw the preservation of the Yugoslavian state as their main task. They feared that the disintegration of Yugoslavia might have a domino effect, leading to the destabilization of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. They probably felt that unity within the Yugoslav federation could only be enforced by Serbia and the Serbian-dominated federal army. In this case, it would be necessary to take the Serbian view into consideration. As far as France and Britain were concerned, this would have meant returning to the politics of the period from 1914 to 1941. References are often made to the pro-Serbian stance of the French president, Mitterrand.¹³⁴ The record shows that, at that time, both the Quai d'Orsay and the Élysée repeatedly brought up the historic alliance between Serbia and France.¹³⁵

The past could indeed serve as an example. In the years between the wars, French diplomacy was primarily directed at the Serbian politicians who dominated Yugoslavia. The French considered the Croats, who opposed the centralism of Belgrade, to be difficult and unreliable. King Alexander Karadjordjevic, a Serb, was assassinated in 1934, during a state visit to France. The French Foreign Minister, Barthou, was also killed in the attack, which took place in Marseilles. Those behind the assassination were the Croatian Ustashe and fascist Italy. However, Mitterrand indicated that he was mainly referring to the period of the Second World War. In an interview with the Frankfurter Allgemeine

Zeitung, he said ‘As you know, unlike Croatia, Serbia was not part of the Nazi bloc.’¹³⁶ This is a rather odd comment since Serbia, under the government of general Nedic, was collaborating with the Nazis during that period. It was no more a part of the Allied camp than was Petain’s Vichy France. Under Nedic, Serbia and Belgrade were the first European country and capital to be made completely Judenfrei.

It is remarkable that Mitterrand should have such a poor memory of historical events, especially in view of his own war record (when he maintained close contacts with collaborators in Vichy as well as with the Resistance). This socialist politician can hardly be accused of naivety. However, many French people had an inaccurately positive image regarding the stance taken by Serbia during the last world war. Some authors have remarked that the French even displayed ‘représentations collectives non seulement fausses, mais totalement inversées’.¹³⁷ It is therefore quite conceivable that the President primarily used these perceptions as a useful weapon against the pro-Croat critics of his Yugoslavian policy.¹³⁸ The ‘historic’ friendship between France and Serbia is unlikely to have had any real significance in shaping official policy. The current ‘friendship’ between France and Germany - generally regarded as the basis of European integration - was of much greater importance. France was apprehensive that the absorption of the DDR would result in a much stronger Germany. It was attempting to find a way to counterbalance this. French foreign policy was primarily aimed at maintaining le rang de la France at a high level. This was primarily achieved by, whenever possible, adopting a highly distinct standpoint in international discussions. Other countries would then have to take this standpoint into account. Within this policy of différence, as with Iraq on the eve of the Gulf War, it was appropriate for France to maintain contacts of its own with Belgrade. The French standpoint shifted in the course of 1991. From being to some extent pro-Serbian, the country switched to advocating international action against Serbia, including military action if necessary.¹³⁹

For this reason, the assertion that ‘French and British governments, as well as the media, engaged in a veritable orgy of Croatia-bashing’¹⁴⁰ would appear to be a gross exaggeration of the facts. In Britain also the Serbs continued to enjoy the image of ‘a noble and faithful ally’ during the Second World War. Some authors felt that this was because British observers such as Fitzroy Maclean had depicted the military actions of Tito’s partisans as ‘a crusade headed by Serbs’.¹⁴¹ This was not the case. In Eastern Approaches (1949), Maclean repeatedly mentioned the multinational nature of Tito’s forces, as well as Serbian collaboration with the Germans.¹⁴² The novelist Evelyn Waugh was also part of the British military mission in Yugoslavia during the war. His Sword of Honour trilogy (1952-1961) is outspokenly critical of Tito and the Communist partisans. As a devout Catholic, Waugh was inclined towards an anti-Serbian, pro-Croat standpoint. The successful writer, Lawrence Durrell revealed even stronger anti-Serbian sentiments in his well known book White Eagles over Serbia (1957).¹⁴³ In 1991, and for some time afterwards, the British government maintained an extremely reserved stance. In view of its experience in Northern Ireland, it had no desire to get involved in a similar conflict in the Balkans. Nevertheless, the British government unreservedly criticized Serbia. Those defending or, like Margaret Thatcher, attacking British policy paid no heed to the traditional ‘friendship’ with that country.¹⁴⁴ It is quite possible that, at the start of the 1990s, French and British government circles were somewhat influenced by Serbian propaganda and by pro-Serbian experts on Yugoslavia. In Britain, two individuals often linked to this are Nora Beloff and John (later Jovan) Zametica, who first advised the British government, and then Radovan Karadzic.¹⁴⁵

Equally, the possibility cannot be excluded that American government officials were similarly influenced. In July 1990, John D. Scanlan, the former ambassador to Belgrade, expressed concern about ‘the bad public image that Yugoslavia in general, and Serbia in particular, now tends to receive in the American media.’ Scanlan was of the opinion that glasnost was actually invented in Yugoslavia. The Serbs had for many years been the most important advocates of democratization. It was not until the end of the 1980s that they were overtaken by the Slovenes and the Croats. But, according to authorities such as Djilas, even under the current authoritarian regime of Milosevic ‘the intellectual atmosphere in Serbia [is] freer than it has ever been.’¹⁴⁶ Lawrence Eagleburger, the Deputy Secretary of State and former US ambassador to Yugoslavia, had views similar to those of François Mitterrand. At the start of the war in Bosnia in 1992, he admitted that the Serbs were most to blame. Nevertheless, he reminded journalists of 'the very close historical relationship' between America and Serbia, dating from the Second World War, when both countries were 'allies'.¹⁴⁷

Statements of this kind were meant to counteract anti-Serbian sentiment in the Western media. The literature that has been investigated does not provide a definitive answer concerning the exact development of public opinion (about the belligerents) in each and every Western country. In 1991, most Western Europeans felt that the democratic right of self-determination for all Yugoslavian peoples was more important than the artificial maintenance of Yugoslavia.¹⁴⁸ Thus there was a considerable difference of opinion between public opinion and the stance of some Western governments. This was to reveal itself once again during the war in Bosnia. Long before 1995, most members of the general public in America and Western Europe were in favour of vigorous military intervention by the West.¹⁴⁹

In addition to sharp criticism of Serbian actions, the Western media also tended to overestimate the democratic content of political developments in Croatia. This tendency was most pronounced in Germany, where many Croats lived. Such a short time after the reunification of Germany, many Germans felt very sympathetic towards countries such as Croatia and Slovenia, that had managed to free themselves from Communist dictatorships. Meanwhile, in Milosevic's Serbia, it seemed to be business as usual for the old Communist style of government.¹⁵⁰ The German government yielded to this pressure and devoted itself to the speedy recognition of the independence of Slovenia and Croatia. In doing so, they thwarted the policies of negotiators who were working on behalf of 'Europe', such as Hans van den Broek and Lord Carrington. They wanted to achieve a compromise between the combatants with the aim of preserving the unity of Yugoslavia or, if this proved impossible, to at least prevent further bloodshed. The German policy toward Yugoslavia caused great commotion, not least because there was great uncertainty concerning the results of German reunification in terms of the situation in Europe. Ruling circles in Europe, afraid of a German 'Alleingang', realized that the Yugoslavian state was beyond salvation and were repelled by Serbian atrocities. This caused the governments of Britain and France, which had previously been rather deaf to Slovenian and Croatian arguments, to rapidly shift to the German standpoint.¹⁵¹

The emotions that this aroused are well illustrated by a confrontation between the British journalist Misha Glenny and a Serbian reservist, during January of 1992, in the Krajina region of Croatia. The Serb asked 'Why did you fucking English capitulate to the fucking Nazis?'¹⁵² Such statements only serve to highlight the escalating national hysteria that was a major cause of the outbreak of war. In Croatia, there was probably a rekindling of warm feelings towards former Second World War allies. However, this was not the case in Germany. The same was true of the government of Austria. Major interests were at stake for the latter country, which shared a common border with Yugoslavia. It had been the first to alert its European partners to the dangerous developments that were taking place in the south. Austria had strong historical links with Slovenia and Croatia. However, these sprang from a much more remote past than the time of the Second World War, and were by no means entirely amicable in nature. Hungary was in a similar position, since it saw Serbian political developments as a threat to the Hungarian minority in Vojvodina. From the outset, Denmark had supported the policies of Germany and Austria towards Yugoslavia, although it had no direct interests or traditional relationships in the area.

In Italy, Greece and Russia, segments of public opinion exhibited clear pro-Serbian inclinations. In the early part of the 20th century, Italy was certainly no friend of either Serbia or Yugoslavia. However, the country did have an interest in the wellbeing of the Italian minority in Croatia, and Serbia was seen as a guarantor of 'law and order' on the other side of the Adriatic. Nevertheless, the Italian government took a different stance and, together with Germany and Denmark, was one of the first to advocate the swift recognition of Croatia and Slovenia within the EU. Obviously, this can scarcely be seen as a renaissance of Mussolini's foreign policy.¹⁵³ Greece adopted a somewhat less responsible attitude. This was not solely due to a feeling of kinship with fellow Orthodox Christians, after all the history of Greco-Serbian relations includes a number of conflicts. Greece, the most southerly of the Balkan countries, opted to join the West following a bloody and brutal civil war (1944-1949). In addition to indirect support from the Soviet Union, Greek Communists received direct military aid from Albania, Bulgaria and especially Tito's Yugoslavia. They were nevertheless defeated, as their opponents enjoyed the support of Britain and the United States. Greece has, however, retained a somewhat ambivalent attitude towards the United States and to the relatively distant 'Europe'. In addition, the Macedonian question impinged directly on Greece's interests. Historical factors had a large part to play in Greek attitudes towards the Yugoslavian conflict. Yet there was no restoration of emotional alliances from the Second World War.¹⁵⁴

The same was true of Russia. Russian feelings of religious and political kinship with Serbia date back to the 15th and 16th centuries.¹⁵⁵ Yet Russia and Serbia have not always been close allies since then. The 19th century Serbian politician, Ilija Garasanin, was one of the first to designate Greater Serbia as a political objective. He set out the details in a pamphlet, entitled Nacertanije (Sketch, 1844). In this treatise, he also admits that it is difficult to combine such political ambitions with acceptance of Russian leadership in Balkan affairs.¹⁵⁶ Indeed, in the 19th and 20th centuries, Russian support for Bulgaria occasionally caused Serbia to orient itself more towards Austria.¹⁵⁷ In 1914, the prominent Russian statesman Sergei Witte was opposed to Russian participation in the First World War on behalf of 'that vain Balkan people, the Serbs, who are not Slavs but Turks rechristened under a false name.'¹⁵⁸ The kingdom of Yugoslavia was notorious for its persecution of Communists. That country, which was a refuge for Russian émigrés, had poor relations with Soviet Russia.¹⁵⁹ It was not until 1940 that Yugoslavia recognized the USSR. Following the rift between Tito and Stalin in 1948, socialist Yugoslavia was reviled throughout the entire Eastern Bloc. After 1968, the threat of invasion and domination by the Soviet Union led Tito to stockpile vast amounts of weaponry and to create a large federal army, supported by strong regional people's militias. As a result, the disintegration of Yugoslavia quickly degenerated into large-scale, very bloody conflicts. President Gorbachev was extremely concerned about the disintegration of Yugoslavia, because of the possible repercussions for his own country. The relationship between Yeltsin's Russia and Milosevic's Serbia was never exactly open and cordial. This was largely due to Serbian support for the anti-democratic, pro-Communist coup that took place in Russia in August 1991. The affection for Serbia expressed by Russian nationalist politicians in the Russian parliament was mainly a result of anti-Western feelings¹⁶⁰ and of the opposition's desire to thwart the government. Traditional links with fellow Orthodox Christians and Slavs, as well as sympathy for Milosevic's policies, were relatively minor factors here. Russian specialists on the Balkans could not agree and were divided into pro-Serbian and anti-Serbian camps.¹⁶¹ Gradually, the Yeltsin government began to pay more heed to the wishes of the Opposition, but they continued to contribute to the Western interventions in Yugoslavia, and never seriously obstructed them. On the contrary, the West gained considerable benefit from the influence that Russia was able to exert in Belgrade.¹⁶²

Religious connections did not lead to powerful and effective alliances. Even the link between Muslim peoples, the 'green transversal' so feared by the Serbs, proved to be mainly a phantom. In 1968, the Communist regime recognized the Bosnian Muslims as a fully-fledged ethnic and national group. From that point on, Tito proceeded to exploit them, in order to intensify relationships with Islamic states. The Libyan dictator, Gaddafi, contributed funds for the construction of mosques in Yugoslavia. Young Bosnian Muslims completed their theological education in Arab countries. In July 1991, President Izetbegovic toured Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. Ankara subsequently opened an embassy in Sarajevo. The close and centuries-old ties with Albania played a decisive role in the recent Kosovo crisis. However, the upheaval in Yugoslavia failed to produce a powerful alliance between Islamic states and the Muslim inhabitants of Bosnia or Kosovo. During the war, Bosnia was only able to reap very moderate benefits in the form of weapons and volunteers from Muslim countries. In addition to Bosnia, Turkey also established diplomatic relations with Macedonia. Since the Muslims in Bosnia spoke a different language from those in Kosovo, there had never been much contact between these two groups. This situation remained unchanged. Even as recently as the past decade, developments in both areas proceeded quite independently of one another. During and after the wars, the fate of these two countries was almost entirely decided by the US and the European powers.¹⁶³

Chapter 3

Dutch policy on the Balkans and Yugoslavia

“Greater Serbia! Why not? A more deserving people you could not imagine. A vital and productive country inhabited by sturdy, lively and tough people. A land so rich in natural sources of life that even if the present population were to double, there would still be space and food aplenty.

Throughout the centuries, inch by inch, the Serbs have shed their blood to regain that land. They were subsequently placed in bondage by foreigners, and dishonoured. Yes, they have seen that land abused by indolent Asians.

Greater Serbia!

No desire for expansion prompted by monarchs hungry for new lands. No kings with a Napoleonic lust to expand their demesne. After all, Serbia is ultra democratic. Both the Crown and the Government must comply with the will of the people.”¹⁶⁵

1. Prior to 1800

Following the presentation of a historical sketch of image-forming in Europe as a whole, separate consideration will now be devoted to the Netherlands. With the exception of the first half of the 17th century, the Netherlands had far less to do with developments in the Balkans than the countries referred to in the second chapter of this essay. In the period prior to 1800, most of the literature on this region that was printed and read in the Netherlands was of foreign origin. Even after this time, translated books continued to play a major role. In view of this, it is hardly surprising that the image of the Balkans in literary works produced by Dutch authors¹⁶⁵ largely followed the European pattern. Nor did the Dutch stand out from the rest in terms of a markedly greater distancing or disinterest. Since the start of the 16th century, the Dutch have commented continually (and usually favourably) on the culture of the inhabitants of South-East Europe. This historic continuity over a period of almost five centuries, which is remarkable in itself, merits further consideration.

At the start of the Early Modern Period, the reputation of the Turks was as bad in the Northern and Southern regions of the Netherlands as anywhere else in Christian Europe.¹⁶⁶ But here, the usual cries of opposition were equally absent. In 1529, when the Turks were at the gates of Vienna, Erasmus felt compelled to comment. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he felt that the Turks' success did not stem from their limitless courage and savagery, nor was it a result of mutual antagonisms among the Orthodox peoples of the Balkans. Instead, Erasmus attributed the triumph of Islam to the sins of 'all' Christians.¹⁶⁷ The European humanists had great respect for the Byzantine scholars and for the Orthodox faith, with which they shared a great love for the fathers of the early Christian church. This reduced the medieval enmity for the 'heretical' Greeks. In the Netherlands, from then on, there was considerable sympathy for the Orthodox Christians in South-East Europe.

This in no way precluded an appreciation of the Turks. An early example of this was the aristocrat Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq (1522-1592), from the south of the Netherlands, who travelled through the Balkans to Constantinople. Once there, he negotiated with the Ottoman court on behalf of the Habsburg emperor. He published letters about his journeys, in which he compared the bad traits of Christians with the good characteristics of the Turks. Busbecq discovered important ancient inscriptions and studied the Turkish language. He also described a wedding and a caravanserai in Serbia. Besides bringing back tulip bulbs to the West, his company also introduced the lilac and the chestnut. They were in contact with Clusius, the founder of the botanical gardens at Leiden, who was the first to produce a scientific description of the tulip.¹⁶⁸ De Busbecq's interest in the fate of the Orthodox Christians later led to him being described as the first of the philhellènes.¹⁶⁹ Religious and scholarly interest in the area was to blossom still further during the Netherlands' Golden Age. While this, of course, generated more knowledge, better insights and even appreciation, at the same time the clichéd images continued to exist.

The Dutch rebels who opposed Philip II were greatly encouraged by the Turkish actions against Spain in the Mediterranean area. The slogan of the 'Gueux' or 'Beggars' was 'Better a Turk than a Papist!', and Dutch Calvinists wore silver crescent moons as jewellery. Neither, however, indicated that these groups had any real sympathy for the Turks. On the contrary, the whole point was to suggest that the regime of the Spanish king was even worse than that of the Sultan. The same unflattering comparison was made with the French foe in the 17th century, with the British in the 18th century (during the fourth English War) and with the German occupier in 1940-45. In the Netherlands and in the Balkans, the Rebellion focused attention on the kinship between the oppression of Protestants by the King of Spain and of Orthodox Christians by the Ottoman Sultan. This was why Prince Maurits of Orange, during the 'Twelve Years' Truce' (when, as commander of the State army, there was apparently little for him to do), was approached several times by Orthodox clerics and dubious adventurers from those parts. They wanted his support in their intrigues and struggles against the Turks. Although the Protestant Republic hadn't quite shed the last vestiges of the crusader mentality, the stadholder (always highly circumspect when it came to war and matters of state) did not comply with these requests. Because of the growing importance of trade with the Levant, the Dutch republic was eager to establish normal diplomatic relations with the Ottoman empire.¹⁷⁰

Nevertheless, commerce was not the only motivation for seeking such contacts. Other stimuli were studies of Ancient Greece or the collection of antiquities. The first Western history of the Byzantine Empire was written in 1652, by Jacob van Oort, an amateur historian from Zaltbommel. The early relationships with Istanbul were not strictly economic in nature, since Dutch and British Calvinists saw in the Orthodox church a potential ally against the Catholic Counter-Reformation. Cornelis Haga, a lawyer from Schiedam, was the first Dutch ambassador to the 'sublime Porte'. In one particular matter, he received great support from Cyril Lucaris, the Patriarch of Alexandria, who usually resided in Constantinople. This concerned the refutation of the rumour that Prince Maurits was assembling a great fleet with which to drive the Turks from the Peloponnese. Lucaris, who had studied in Italy, was closely associated with the Orthodox church's efforts to counteract the increasing influence of the Pope and the Jesuits. In the disputed areas (Poland, Lithuania, the Ukraine and Transsylvania), the approach adopted by the Orthodox church was to seek closer ties with local Lutherans and Calvinists. Lucaris and his supporters among the Greek clergy therefore tended to look for doctrinal similarities between Orthodoxy and Protestantism. They also emphasized the common differences of both faiths with Catholicism. Lucaris also hoped that contacts with the British and the Dutch would improve the level of knowledge within the Orthodox clergy. He aimed to make the leadership of his church better able to resist Catholic influences in the court of the Sultan, primarily in the form of the French and Austrian ambassadors.

At Haga's request, various theological books, including works by Calvin and Melancthon, were purchased in the Netherlands. The ambassador presented these books to Lucaris. Revius, a Dutch poet and theologian, sent Lucaris a Greek translation of the Dutch Calvinistic creed and the Heidelberg Catechism (published by Elzevier). For his part, Lucaris began to correspond with Dutch theologians such as David le Leu de Wilhelm and Johan Uytenbogaert, the leader of the Remonstrant Church. In this correspondence, Lucaris expressed his sympathy for Protestantism. These contacts assumed great political significance in 1620, when Lucaris was elevated to the position of Patriarch of Constantinople, thereby becoming the leader of all Orthodox Christians. Together with the British ambassador and Antoine Leger (chaplain to the Dutch embassy), Haga now attempted to develop a programme that he hoped would contribute to the Protestantization of the Orthodox church. A Modern Greek translation of the New Testament was printed in Geneva, at the expense of the Dutch parliament. In an attempt to further strengthen ties with the Protestants, Lucaris wrote a rather unorthodox creed that was also published in Geneva, in Latin. These documents caused a great commotion within his extremely traditional church. The Catholic diplomats and clergy in Constantinople, as well as those Orthodox bishops with closer ties to Rome, seized the opportunity and began plotting various intrigues against Lucaris. The Patriarch was twice deposed, exiled and (with financial support from Haga) subsequently reinstated. The Sultan ordered his arrest in 1638, however, and Lucaris was subsequently strangled by his jailors.¹⁷²

The premature demise of 'the Calvinist Patriarch' coincided with Haga's departure from Constantinople. Nevertheless, the struggle between Catholics and Protestants for the favours of the Eastern Church was continued for a time by the Congregatio de propaganda fide in Rome and by the University of Leiden. In the 1640s, prominent Orthodox clergy and students of Lucaris studied theology at Leiden. They translated important Calvinist writings into Greek, and their expenses were partly reimbursed by the Dutch parliament.¹⁷³ Modern research has shown that Dutch and British Protestants had got rather carried away concerning the chances of an alliance with Orthodoxy. For a time, the Greek Church saw Calvinist Europe as a very interesting political option that had to be explored. However, the ties with Rome were never broken. The writings of clergy residing in Leiden reveal that, despite their public professions of solidarity with Calvinism, they continued to cling to the doctrine of their own church. These lively contacts with western Christendom were, however, not an isolated phenomenon in the history of Orthodoxy. In fact, the Eastern church has been a much less introverted institution than is often thought in the West.

In Leiden, the Eastern clergymen were also able to assist Golius, the renowned orientalist, in his studies of oriental languages. Haga had supplied Erpenius, Golius's predecessor, with model letters and manuscripts. Golius himself resided at Haga's embassy for two years. In addition to writing a Turkish-Latin dictionary, he also introduced the study of Turkish at the University of Leiden. Levinus Warner, one of Golius's students, succeeded Haga as the ambassador in Istanbul. He proved to be more successful as a scholar than as a diplomat. Nor, indeed, did any subsequent ambassadors from the Netherlands measure up to Haga in terms of status and influence. The study of Turkish at the University of Leiden was not maintained at the level set by Golius. Haga had suggested that a course of study in the languages and geography of the Near East be established for young Dutch people. He felt that this would benefit trade and diplomacy in the Islamic regions. However, this suggestion was never taken up by the Dutch Parliament or the Directorate of Levantine Trade. Such courses were set up in Paris and Vienna, where the study of orientalistics reached greater heights and achieved greater continuity than in Leiden.¹⁷⁴

In the Netherlands, there was a gradual improvement in the public understanding of Balkan geography. Austria's wars against the Sultan were followed with interest. The Dutch wrote panegyrics about the exploits of Eugenius of Savoy in which Belgrade was even described as a city 'without equal in Europe'¹⁷⁵. Yet the traditional, negative image of all things Turkish persevered in the Netherlands. In the 17th and 18th centuries, the characteristics attributed to Turks were generally more bad than good. Jan Luyken, who had never visited any part of the Ottoman empire, made splendid pictures of Turkish atrocities such as the impaling or crushing of condemned prisoners. Cornelis Calkoen, the Dutch ambassador to the Sultan's court in the second quarter of the 18th century, took a different approach. He collected the work of the French artist Jean Baptiste Vanmour, who resided in Istanbul. These paintings gave an accurate picture of life in the capital of the Ottoman empire.¹⁷⁶

Turkish influences can also be seen in Dutch prints and paintings, ceramics, clothing and architecture. However, as the Ottoman threat declined in the course of the 18th century, other countries became much more receptive for 'turquiserie'. Following the publication of Mille et une nuits by Antoine Galland in Paris, the image of the Turks became increasingly shaped by fantasies about harems. Such lusty imagery did not appeal to the Dutch. The ancient religious objections to Islam continued to hold sway. The collections and lotteries that were regularly held to buy the freedom of Dutch people held in slavery in North Africa only served to exacerbate these views.¹⁷⁷ A less dismissive view was taken by the Amsterdam aristocrat, Joan Raye van Breukelerweert, in letters describing his stay in the Ottoman and Habsburg empires from 1764 to 1769. He even asserted that he had personally visited the Sultan's harem, however unlikely this may have been. Remarkably, he described the Serbs that he met as carefree 'noble savages'. Whenever he charitably threw money into their hovels, the coins were flung back out again.¹⁷⁸

There was one individual, however, who flew in the face of prevailing opinion towards the end of the 18th century. This was the independent-minded physician Pieter van Woensel, who published a great deal of material about his stay in Ottoman and Russian regions. He thought that the outcry in the Netherlands about Muslim slave-keepers was extremely hypocritical, given that the Dutch were major contributors to the international slave trade. Furthermore, he asserted that slavery in the Ottoman empire was considerably less harsh than his countrymen imagined. The atrocities committed by the Turks were greatly exaggerated. The government of Turkish regions was nowhere near as despotic as the government of Russia. Despite the dismissive stories about polygamy, the Turks were also much more chaste and virtuous than the Dutch thought. Although the Koran permitted Muslims four wives, this was a luxury that most Turks could not afford.¹⁷⁹

Ancestry, the absence of modern civilization and the fate of the Greeks were recurring themes in travel literature published and read by the Dutch after 1500. Such literature also repeatedly mentions the fierce Maniots on the Peloponnese, who were reputedly descended from the ancient Spartans and had never been fully subjugated by the Turks. It is known that the De Hochepeid family, who for many generations served as Dutch consuls in Smyrna (Izmir), sometimes hid Greek rebels who were on the run from the Turkish authorities.¹⁸⁰ In 1741, Calkoen (the Dutch ambassador) and his British colleague provided a Greek archimandrite with letters of recommendation so that he could collect funds in Protestant regions. The funds were to be used to buy the freedom of Greek Christians who had been enslaved after the Turkish-Venetian war. Then also, Western sympathizers continued to assert that the Orthodox faith had more in common with Protestantism than with Catholicism.¹⁸¹ Half a century later, Van Woensel stated that any resemblance between his Greek contemporaries and their renowned classical ancestors was limited to their appearance only. Although the prevailing view was that their cultural and intellectual degeneration resulted from the Turkish yoke, Van Woensel attributed it instead to the dim-witted, superstitious Orthodox clergy.

2. The 19th century

As mentioned in Chapter II, Western Europe's appreciation of the Turks and its lack of interest in the rebellious Balkan peoples was initially closely associated with the enormous increase in Russophobia during the first half of the 19th century. During this period, however, there was hardly any anti-Russian sentiment at all in the Netherlands. The Dutch kingdom, which had been established in 1814-15, was very dependent on the support of the Great Powers, of which Russia was a prominent member. The dynastic link of the Dutch House of Orange and the Romanovs, created by the marriage of the Crown Prince to Anna Pavlovna, appeared to be an important guarantee for the continued existence of the new state. In addition, the Dutch and the Greeks had enjoyed continuous bilateral relations since 1600, and Amsterdam has had a small Greek community since the 18th century. One of the intellectual pioneers of the Greek national revival, Adamantios Korais, had had numerous contacts with Dutch people in Smyrna. In 1771, he travelled to Amsterdam, where his Dutch friends instructed him in the concepts of the Enlightenment. Seven years later he departed for Paris, but he continued to correspond with various Dutch acquaintances. At first glance it would appear that there was little to prevent the development of a powerful philhellenic movement in the Netherlands during the early years of the 19th century.

Nevertheless, unlike Germany and Britain, no movement of note came into being. A few leading liberals and clergymen wrote pro-Greek poetry and brochures. There was a Greek Committee that met from time to time, and which managed to collect 46,000 guilders. Gijsbert Karel van Hogendorp allowed his name to be used by the committee, although that was the limit of his involvement. In 1825, the siege of Missolonghi and the death of Byron led people in the southern part of the Netherlands to suggest that a 'Liberal legion' be set up, but nothing came of this. A small number of Dutch people participated in the conflict as individual volunteers, and at least three of them died there. Three Dutch people were later decorated by the first Greek king, for their services to the Greek cause. At home, the Dutch philhellenes had emphasized that the Greeks were our 'Christian brothers'. They also, quite naturally, drew parallels between the Greeks' struggle for freedom with the Dutch rebellion against Spain.

This tactic did nothing to silence their opponents, however. Willem Bilderdijk opposed those liberals who extolled the Greeks as heroes. In his opinion these compatriots collaborated with 'filthy thieves' who were 'the foul spawn of a wicked race of slaves'. His pupil, Isaïc Da Costa, entertained more moderate views. Nevertheless, he had little sympathy for the 'Jacobite' mentality of Greeks who 'fleece their friends and helpers, sending them home without a penny'. In 1826, Guillaume Groen van Prinsterer (another of Bilderdijk's followers) published 'Bedenkingen tegen de Oproeping tot ondersteuning der Grieken' (Objections to the call to support the Greeks). In this publication he asserted (four years before Fallmerayer¹⁸²) that the intermingling of races down through the centuries meant that the contemporary Greeks could not be seen as the descendants of the Ancient Greeks. Their faith had become so watered down that it could no longer be described as Christian. The Turks were more civilized than the Greeks. 'Mohammedanism' had been a blessing to humanity, and there was no threat to Christianity under Ottoman rule. Nevertheless, Groen felt that a reasonable solution should be found for the conflict between Greeks and Turks. He took the view that this was a job for governments rather than private individuals. In this he was pinning his hopes on Russia, and many of his fellow countrymen felt the same way.

The Dutch government was shocked by the actions of the philhellenes. The ministers of Justice and of the Interior advised the king to inform the Sultan that decrees had been passed to prevent the funds that had been collected from ever reaching the Greeks, but these measures were largely ineffective. Dutch citizens were warned that they would be stripped of their citizenship if they took up arms in Greece. For the first time since the days of Haga, a top diplomat was dispatched to Constantinople in the person of Baron Van Zuylen van Nijevelt. Although Van Zuylen did indeed contribute to the search for a solution to the Greek crisis, he had already left Constantinople when the Russian troops approached the city in 1829. Jules Polignac, the French foreign minister, then proposed to the court of St Petersburg a radical solution to the Eastern Question. Russia would have the Danube princedoms, Austria would take Serbia, Belgium would be given to France, the Netherlands would be given to Prussia and the southern portion of the Balkan peninsula would be given to king William I of Orange. None of this came to pass, but for some time thereafter those in international diplomatic circles seriously considered prince Frederick (the second son of William I) as a possible king for an independent Greece. Frederick was far from disappointed when Otto, the seventeen-year-old son of the extremely philhellenic king of Bavaria, was chosen instead.¹⁸³

As a result of the philhellenic movement, the idea of the Balkans gradually took root in the Netherlands. The imagination was stimulated by the fierce mountain peoples of that region. This period of the Romance Movement saw the publication of books such as Abdul-Ali of De vluchteling in het gebergte van den Balkan (Abdul-Ali or the fugitive in the Balkan mountains) by J.E. de Witte van Heemstede, which was published in 1829. N.G. van Kampen, who published several books in and around 1837, was probably the first Dutch author to adopt a more academic approach to the ethnic and religious diversity of South-East Europe. He had been one of the most ardent philhellenes. Later, he became a lecturer in German at Leiden University, and Professor of Dutch Literature at the Amsterdam Athenaeum. One of many critics, Van Kampen was the only Dutchman who sought to counter Fallmerayer's views with linguistic arguments. Yet his views about the Greeks were no longer entirely favourable. 'Modern-day Greeks still have many attributes in common with their renowned ancestors, yet the good ones have been corrupted and the bad ones are given greater emphasis.'¹⁸⁴

After an intensive study of recent western literature on the subject, Van Kampen was a great deal more positive about the other Balkan peoples. He felt that, while underdeveloped, the Bulgarians were also 'soft-natured and applied themselves to agriculture, cattle-rearing and commerce'. The majority of the Bosnians were Muslim, but were 'nothing like Turks'. They were monogamous and had 'no unmanly vices; they are seldom low and open to bribery, nor are they cowardly, yet in the face of the enemy they are often barbaric.' The Montenegrins were among 'the most courageous of mountain peoples'. Although they had never been subjugated by the Turks, they were 'averse to European civilization'. Their lives consisted of 'battle and thievery [...], while the people swear on the Bible and even kiss it, they never read it'. While Albanians in Greece had been pacified 'by a milder climate and less desolate mountains', the tribal leaders in Albania were locked into a state of eternal warfare. The population of that country was permanently prepared for battle, and was satisfied with an extremely frugal life. A widespread rebellion in Albania could pose a considerable danger to Turkey.¹⁸⁵

In imitation of Lamartine, Van Kampen saw the Serbian nation as 'most remarkable', because 'its history must be sung, not written'. Serbian was the 'purest and most beautiful Slavonian dialect'. Their recently collected and published folksongs were quite exquisite. They contain 'songs full of grace, naivety and deeply moving poetry'. Many of these poems make reference to the vila and other evil spirits of nature that make people's lives miserable. This reflects the 'dark' superstition of the Serbs. However, the women mainly sang charming and virtuous love songs. The lengthy heroic songs were performed by the men. In the oldest of these, which dates back to the 14th century, the main character is Marco Kraljewitsch (Prince Marko), the 'serbian Hercules'. The most recent recounted the deeds of Black George, the leader of the Serbian revolt of 1804. Van Kampen praised the Serbs' struggle for independence, describing them as patriarchal and freedom-loving. He saw their agricultural community as extremely egalitarian and receptive to education and modernization.¹⁸⁶

Van Kampen's work marks the transition to modern Dutch literature on the Balkans and Yugoslavia. In the next one hundred and fifty years, the positive image would achieve greater dominance than it had ever done in centuries past. For the time being, however, little of substance was written about the region. The Crimean War produced an anti-Russian mood among Dutch liberals and their leader, prime minister Johan Rudolf Thorbecke. They had not become friends of the Turks, but they did support British and French policy. In his dissertation on the Eastern Question (Utrecht, 1869), August von Daehne van Varick also adopted an anti-Russian standpoint. Europe had to oppose that country's expansion and keep the Turkish empire intact.¹⁸⁷ The Protestant Anti-revolutionary Party and its leader, Guillaume Groen van Prinsterer, remained loyal to Russia. The very Protestant Tijdgeest praised the noble strength of character of Czar Nicholas I. The lack of similar qualities in the Sultan was ascribed to his 'premature life in the harem'.¹⁸⁸

Unlike Britain, in the Netherlands, the 'Eastern crisis' of the 1870s did not result in an explosion of emotions. The Netherlands remained as neutral as possible in the conflict. In 1877, the government only expressed official concern in Istanbul about atrocities being carried out by irregular Turkish troops.¹⁸⁹ The Dutch government was very concerned about rumours that the Great Powers planned to ask the Netherlands and Belgium to base troops in certain parts of the Turkish Balkans. They undertook diplomatic action to prevent such an invitation from being offered.¹⁹⁰ One outsider in terms of Dutch neutrality was Jeanne Merkus, the extremely wealthy daughter of Pieter Merkus, former Governor-General of the Dutch East Indies. She travelled to Bosnia where she used her wealth to purchase Krupp munitions for the rebels. Unaided, she attempted to blow up Turkish reinforcements in Herzegovina using dynamite. She also participated in the assault on Trebinje. She was captured by the Austrians, but following her liberation in 1876 she was honoured in Belgrade as a Serbian Joan of Arc. When she died in Utrecht in 1897, she was penniless and her family refused to pay the funeral expenses.¹⁹¹

The only book to be published on the conflict in the Balkans was In den Kruiddamp (In the gun smoke; 1880) the first novel to be translated directly from Russian into Dutch. In the book, Karazin, its second-rate author, describes the actions of Russian volunteers in Serbia in 1876. He portrayed the Serbs as extremely superstitious and unheroic.¹⁹² (They did indeed lose this war against Turkey, but their defeat was partly due to the amateurism of the Russian detachment.) This work was translated by Hendrick Wolfgang van der Mey, the pioneer of Dutch Slavonic Studies.¹⁹³ Five years later Van der Mey restored the Serbs' positive image in a long article about Serbian folk poetry, which was published in the magazine Nederland. He admired this epic oral poetic art because he felt that it represented the true synthesis of realism and idealism, something that was sadly lacking in the anaemic Western literature of his day.¹⁹⁴

One year after that, he wrote an even longer and entirely uncritical article about Montenegro, which was published in De Gids. Van der Mey felt that 'Europe was better acquainted with the Zulus and the inhabitants of the Congo than it was with this fascinating mountain people' in 'the unknown interior of European Turkey'. Their 'heroic deeds are at least equal to those attributed to the Ancient Greeks' and their literature is 'the product of a Homeric spirit'. This was followed by a story about the Montenegrin resistance to the Turks, spanning many centuries. The unspeakable atrocities were simply seen as a source of beautiful poetry, and the folk poetry itself was taken to be a faithful and accurate account of the past.¹⁹⁵ Other Dutch commentators repeatedly imitated Van der Mey's example, producing lyrical descriptions of Montenegro.

Pure literary works decorated with impressions from the exotic Balkans were also published in the Netherlands. In 1894, the same year that Anthony Hope unleashed a minor avalanche in western fantasies about Balkan princedoms with The Prisoner of Zenda, Louis Couperus published Majesteit. This 'royal novel' was about a melancholy crown prince by the name of Othomar, who reigned over the imaginary country of Liparia. The sequel, Wereldvrede (World Peace), was published in 1895. Both novels, neither of which are the best of Couperus's works, give rise to reminiscences of the Romanovs, the Habsburgs and the royal families of the Balkans. They could just as well be situated in that area, as in Italy or in the Slavic regions of the Austrian empire.¹⁹⁵

3. The 20th century

Couperus never visited the Balkans. In 1901, the naturalistic novelist and playwright, Marcellus Emants visited Bosnia and Herzegovina. He later published a series of beautifully illustrated articles about the region in Het Vaderland (The Fatherland), one of the newspapers of The Hague. Emants was an accurate observer, but his artistic focus was primarily on the beautiful landscape, the Eastern characteristics of the population and their primitive lifestyle. While playing the tourist, Emants was not entirely unaware of the social and political tensions within the country. From time to time he found the trip to be rather hazardous and spine-chilling. Nevertheless, he mainly emphasized the geniality with which the Austrian civil servants and gendarmes saw to it that the highly disparate religious groups were able to peacefully coexist. Emants was impressed by Austria's modernization work in Bosnia. However, he regretted the fact that this would swiftly result in the loss of that country's exotic and picturesque nature.¹⁹⁷

The assassination of King Alexander Obrenovic and his wife Draga by Serbian officers in 1903 was a major shock for the general public throughout Europe. However, the only countries to break off diplomatic relations with Serbia as a result of this were the Netherlands and Britain. In 1906, the government of the Netherlands informed Queen Wilhemina that Britain had restored diplomatic relations, as the assassins had been discharged from the army. It was recommended that the Netherlands follow Britain's example.¹⁹⁸ Catherina Alberdingk Thijm (1848-1908), inspired by the death of the royal couple, produced a work of literature. She was the daughter of the renowned Catholic writer and critic, J.A. Alberdingk Thijm, and the sister of the famous Eighties figure, Lodewijk van Deyssel. Catherina wrote a great deal, and had a very broad readership. She had specialized in romantic books about royal figures. Some examples of her work are Het geheim van den Czaar [The Czar's Secret], Een vorstelijke doornenkroon [A Regal Crown of Thorns], Een Koninklijke misdaad [A Royal Crime], etc. At the start of Koningsliefde (Het drama in Serbia) [Royal Devotion (The Tragedy in Serbia)] the writer stated that she had spent many years travelling in Eastern Europe. She claimed that she had friends there who 'because of their position, had been able to provide her with unprecedented details concerning the relationships at the Serbian court.¹⁹⁹ Indeed although her book has all the appeal of an up-market pulp novel, it does provide the reader with an impression of the inner lives of Alexander and Draga, as well as the passionate conflicts between Alexander's parents, King Milan and Queen Nathalie. In addition, as promised on the cover, the book is indeed 'illustrated with photographs'. One shows Queen Draga's boudoir after the assassination or Queen Draga's bedroom; on the table lies the boa that she put on as she fled. However, the book reveals very little of substance about Serbia itself. The following book from Ms Alberdingk Thijm's pen bore the title Den harem ontvlucht: een Turksch verhaal uit onze dagen (Escape from the harem: a tale of modern-day Turkey).

It was not by chance that people were so fascinated with Balkan royalty. In 1902, De Balkan-keizerin [The Balkan Empress] was translated and used as the basis for a stage play. This historical drama is set in the late 15th century, during the Turkish expansion into the Balkans. Using rather stilted verse, it deals with resistance, collaboration and treason within the medieval Zeta or Montenegro. The work was written by the reigning monarch of that country, Prince Nikita Petrovic Njegos. According to a contemporary article in the Dutch newspaper NRC, Nikita I was 'not only Russia's only friend and the only popular monarch of Slav blood, but also a man of letters and a journalist, who is currently just as skilled with a pen as he was formerly with a sword.'²⁰⁰

Just before the outbreak of the First Balkan War, Henri van der Mandere visited that small mountainous country. He wrote an account of his travels in what had now become a kingdom. According to the writer, the Montenegrins still displayed all the virtues and vices of the peoples described in the songs of Homer. The men's militant behaviour, their bandit-like appearance and their aversion to everyday work were closely associated with this people's biblical simplicity. Bishop Petar II (Petar Petrovic Njegos), who became the country's ruler in 1830, outlawed banditry and the decapitation of enemies, practices that had hitherto been quite common. He also initiated the construction of a modern state. Petar II had been an even greater poet than Nikita, the present king. However, The Mountain Wreath, the long epic poem that he produced in 1847, showed that the barbaric and noble character of the people had remained virtually unchanged. Nevertheless, their vices had been moderated and there was even a competent and free educational system. Yet women still had an extremely subservient role and pursuit of vendettas continued virtually unabated. Autocracy was therefore the best form of government for this essentially mountain-dwelling people. One advantage was that direct contacts between the king and his subjects were not obstructed by the red tape of a professional bureaucracy. Van der Mandere saw his visit to Montenegro as a dream.²⁰¹ This derived from his view of Montenegrins as an un-European people, whose folk poetry was accompanied by a 'fierce romanticism without the frills' and whose 'child-like, kindly naturalness' was coupled with 'unequaled pride and self-assurance'.

Dutch authors who published details of their first-hand experience of the bloody Balkan wars were somewhat more critical. Responding to a request for help from the Montenegrin Red Cross, H. Koppeschaar travelled to the region in 1912. There he worked as a surgeon, either at the front or at improvised hospitals in nearby towns. He was shocked by the unlimited power exercised by the sovereign. Without the personal intervention of King Nikita it was impossible to do anything. Military discipline was unknown, as was martial law. There was no administration, nor was there medical care of any kind. Everywhere people lived in filth and utter poverty, and the food was awful. The Montenegrins were suspicious and idle. Blood feuds made it impossible to lead anything resembling a normal life. What little military success they were able to achieve was entirely due to the support of the Russian monarchy, which meant that the army was at least well dressed and well equipped. They were by no means squeamish about pain, and most operations could be carried out using little or no anaesthesia. The women were just as valiant as the men. Montenegrins never complained about their fate. With better leadership they could have achieved much greater prosperity. They might even have turned their beautiful and fertile land into a version of Tyrol or Switzerland.

During the Second Balkan War, Koppeschaar served in Serbia, which he considered to be well on the way to becoming a western country. It compared favourably to Montenegro in every respect. Belgrade was an entirely modern city. The army was well organized. The Serbs were industrious farmers and manufacturers. He developed a deep respect 'for the inner strength that emanates from this people'. He felt that because of 'its high level of development, its courage and viability it should play a leading role' in South-East Europe. For this reason, Koppeschaar heartily approved of their aspiration to found a Greater Serbia. Koppeschaar had nothing but contempt for the Bulgarians. Describing them as the 'ex-Prussians of the Balkans' and 'accomplices of the Austrians', they had made a failed attempt to establish a sort of new Byzantine empire.²⁰²

No Dutchman was more volubly enthusiastic about Serbia and its aspirations to create a Greater Serbia than the journalist Gosinus de Voogt. He visited the country in 1913, together with an industrialist from Amsterdam, to scout around for potential trading opportunities for the Netherlands.²⁰³ Thanks to the efforts of physicians like Koppeschaar, the Netherlands enjoyed an excellent reputation in Serbia. This was an opportunity that had to be seized with both hands. The Serbs were 'a good race', they were honest and candid, yet they were 'better smoking companions than wartime allies'. He disregarded the internal political situation, focusing instead on the Serbs' indomitable urge to 'unify the race', which he felt was unstoppable. 'Whenever they are driven out of Serbia, the Serbs eventually return just as surely as night follows day [...] Serbs may sometimes bend, but they can never be broken'. He provided a detailed summary of the country's economy, and reported that the 'Hungarian' plums on sale in Dutch delicatessens actually came from Serbia. His conclusion (printed in bold typeface) was: 'serbia will never perish while there is a good corn and plum harvest.'²⁰⁴

Jan Fabius was a Dutch artillery officer who worked as a journalist on the Bulgarian front during the First Balkan War. He was less unequivocally pro-Serbian. He described the Bulgarians as a young, energetic and courageous people with a great future. However, he found their rigorous military censorship intensely irritating. Fabius discovered that there was a mutual hatred between Bulgarians and Serbs. Furthermore, the Bulgarians looked down on the Serbs, who they considered to be less civilized than themselves. However, he considered the Serbs to be more candid and jovial, and altogether more pleasant company. In December 1912, Fabius travelled to northern Albania, where the Montenegrins had laid siege to the town of Skutari (Shkodër). He rapidly reached the same conclusions about this people as Koppeschaar, who he met while he was there. As a military man, Fabius certainly respected these 'fierce chaps in their fantastic uniforms' who, despite the anarchic state of the army, were nevertheless well able to use modern canon and a telegraph.²⁰⁵

These Dutchmen did not express much concern about the crimes and ethnic cleansing that took place during these wars. Fabius's reports have a tough, flippant tone. It may well be that this was what his readers expected of him.²⁰⁶ Nevertheless, in 1913, the Dutch government dispatched the warship Gelderland to Istanbul, in order to guarantee the safety of its embassy staff. The Great Powers found it extremely difficult to get a grip on the conflicts that were constantly erupting between the Balkan countries. At the same time, they themselves had to reconcile all manner of conflicting mutual interests. In 1913, the Russian Foreign Minister, Sazonov, proposed to give Queen Wilhelmina the casting vote in the matter of the dispute between Romania and Bulgaria, should it prove necessary. In the end it did not come to that, but the Netherlands was asked to intervene in Albania.²⁰⁷

That country's independence was recognized by the Great Powers in December 1912. An international force of naval and army units assembled by Great Britain, France, Italy, Austria, Russia and Germany compelled Serbia, Montenegro and Greece to relinquish the Albanian territory that they had conquered. The Great Powers also appointed a six-member International Monitoring Committee. This resulted in the selection of a captain in the German army, Wilhelm, Prinz zu Wied, as the future mbret (monarch) of Albania. He was a blood relative of the German Kaiser, of Queen Wilhelmina and the queen of Romania. The International Monitoring Committee had asked the Netherlands to take control of the establishment of a native gendarmerie, the purpose of which was to bring law and order to the chaos that was Albania. As a result, fourteen Dutch officers were sent to Albania at the end of 1913 and the beginning of 1914. Their leader was a former liberal member of parliament, Lodewijk Thomson. The team included Jan Fabius. Abraham Kuyper apparently warned the queen that this affair would end in tears.²⁰⁸ De Voogt was also opposed to it. He was appalled that Serbia's access to the Adriatic Sea should be blocked by an independent Albania. Why was it so important that a new gendarmerie be established to tame this backwater country of highwaymen and kleptomaniacs? ‘Our Dutch officers have better things to do!’²⁰⁹

The new monarch did indeed prove to be incapable of dealing with the court intrigues of the Albanian elite and of foreigners. Various groups of rebels roamed the countryside, sometimes with support from Italians, while Greeks and Montenegrins continued to make trouble in the border areas. Furthermore, the members of the International Monitoring Committee were often unable to agree with one another. The Dutch officers became involved in skirmishes in various regions of Albania during which some of their Albanian gendarmes deserted and joined the enemy. It cannot be said that the Dutch were lacking in terms of courage. Fabius described how, under enemy fire, he commanded his battery of field artillery while calmly sipping from a glass of cold champagne. Thomson was killed by an Italian sniper and one of the other officers was wounded. Their adventure, which had involved more bravura, romance and exoticism than many a Balkan novel or operetta, was brought to a sudden end by the outbreak of the First World War.

The Dutch were proud of their officers. Two statues were erected in memory of Lodewijk Thomson. In The Hague, an avenue and a square were named after him. Fabius later wrote that their deeds had generated so much respect in international circles that this contributed to the maintenance of Dutch neutrality during the First World War. However doubtful this claim may be, it is a fact that Edith Durham accorded the Dutch officers great respect in her book about ‘plots and counterplots’ in the Balkans.²¹⁰ Fabius had first met her in Montenegro, and they encountered one another again in Albania. In addition to an admiration for the work that she did in field hospitals, he respected her detailed knowledge of the complex web of relations in the Balkans. However, he did not share her admiration for the Albanians. He considered them to be cunning and thirsty for knowledge, with a type of crafty-merchant mentality, but also entirely untrustworthy. With the exception of the Kossovars among them, at decisive moments they generally refused to fight. Their cowardice also revealed itself in the vendetta, which usually involved assassination. Hired assassins were two-a-penny. It was only by chance that Fabius himself avoided an ambush that had been prepared for him.

In 1915, a surgeon by the name of Van Tienhoven wrote a book about his experiences in Serbia in 1914, during the First World War. He published photographs of serious war crimes committed by the Austrians at the start of the war against the Serbian civilian population. Another ‘modern means of propaganda produced by the Central European Culture’ were their explosive bullets, which caused ghastly wounds. Van Tienhoven admitted that he had developed a great fondness for the Serbs. They were anything but the ‘people of savages and murderers’ that the Austrian press made them out to be. They were ‘simple farmers who just wanted to be left in peace’. There were no large landowners in Serbia. The farmers farmed their own land and were usually illiterate. They lived in patriarchal families, and were both brave and patriotic. They were usually big men with few needs, who only used strong drink in moderation. This is why their militias were able to manage with very light equipment in contrast to the heavily loaded Austrians. They were also tougher. Among Van Tienhoven’s patients, the Serbs had a much higher survival rate than the Austrians. ‘It may sound odd, but it is much easier to operate on Serbs.’ The Serbian elite was highly civilized, and their physicians made an excellent impression. On the other hand, the middle-class, the lower-ranking officers and the civil servants were often corrupt schemers who cow-towed to their superiors and walked all over their inferiors. Yet, all things considered, the Serbs were nevertheless an ‘extremely pleasant people’ with an ancient culture. Their folk songs ‘sung in the evening, to the accompaniment of a single-stringed musical instrument resonate [...] to the depths of one’s soul.’²¹¹

In 1914, Woislav Petrovic, an attaché at the Serbian embassy in London, translated an extensive anthology of Serbian folk poetry into English. In 1915, this collection was also published in Dutch.²¹² In the years between the wars, Dutch people were inclined to be somewhat pro-Serbian. This is exemplified by Felix Rutten’s highly detailed and lyrically adorned travel story about Yugoslavia, which was published in 1937. This account describes 19th century Serbia as ‘the predominant power in the Balkans’. There ‘burns the holy flame that ignites the hope of other Slavic peoples’. At the end of the world war, this young country was 'bursting with resilience, and ready to assume the leadership' of the new Yugoslavia. Following the death of 'the genial king' Alexander in 1934, the regency fell to Prince Paul, 'the astute thinker' who was also 'highly artistic' and was adored by his subjects. King Petar, who was still under age, was 'used to the most exacting discipline' and was 'tutored by eight professors'. In this modern Serbia 'everything is different. Here a different civilization was carving a notch in the Turk-like Muslim area.' The Serbs were 'a people who had achieved some prosperity, but who were not afraid of austerity and who always had something of the soldier about them.'²¹³

Nevertheless, Van Rutten actually preferred the more exotic Bosnia. Rather trifling Balkan romance also featured in the stories published by the art critic, J.B. de La Faille, about simple and superstitious people in Yugoslavia. The same was true of the perceptions of G. Monnick, who toured wild and vendetta-ridden Montenegro and Albania alone, equipped with nothing more than a bicycle and a small tent.²¹⁴ S.A. Reitsma also expressed a 'great admiration for everything Balkan'. Writing for the magazine Spoor en Trammwegen [Track and Tramways], he reported extensively about the narrow gauge trains that he used during his many travels in this region. Reitsma had once written a short study on Jeanne Merkus. He regretted that Serbian folk songs were virtually unknown in the Netherlands while the German public had been familiar with them for many years, thanks to the efforts of Goethe and Jacob Grimm. Nevertheless, he was extremely critical of the nationalism exhibited by Balkan peoples and of the atrocities committed in its name. He acknowledged that the Serbs bore their share of guilt in this respect. While tourists were largely unaffected, 'those who travel in the Balkans cannot help but notice the widespread risk of eruption, the almost palpable tensions and the highly charged atmosphere.' With the author's permission, he illustrated the point by quoting extensively from the works of his 'old friend' Edith Durham, who he had visited in London, in 1937.²¹⁵

In his published work, Reitsma repeatedly made reference to the work of A. den Doolaard. This was the literary pseudonym of Cornelis Spoelstra (1901-1994).²¹⁶ While wandering through France in the early 1930s, Den Doolaard's attention was caught by newspaper headlines such as 'Belgrade ... Bombings ... Bulgarian border ... shoot-outs'. As a result, he could no longer resist the call of the Balkans.²¹⁷ He subsequently visited the area at regular intervals, and Yugoslavia eventually became his second home. Den Doolaard had no preference for any given Balkan people. In novels such as De herberg met het hoefijzer (1933) [The Inn with the Horseshoe], De Oriënt Express (1934) [The Orient Express], De bruiloft der zeven zigeuners (1938) [Marriage of the Seven Gypsies] of Het land achter Gods rug (1956) [The Country Behind God's Back], which were all set in south Slavic mountain areas, he attempted to portray what he felt was the true nature of the inhabitants of the Balkans. These books reveal to the reader the simplicity, generosity, hospitality, passion, bravery and violence of the southern Slavs. Like many Dutch authors before him, Den Doolaard propagated traditional, clichéd images of the Balkans. He also idealized the mountain dwellers. He didn't get too carried away, however. In his work, his own perceptions and extensive knowledge of the area are always interwoven with an apparently sober, seemingly typically Dutch view of people and events.

While not possessing great literary quality and often lacking in character development, these novels were written with journalistic flair and pace. They appealed to a wide readership and were often reprinted. As a result of his realistic yet sympathetic approach, Den Doolaard made a greater contribution than any other author to the maintenance of a positive image of the Balkans and Yugoslavia in the Netherlands. In his non-fictional work Het land van Tito [Tito's Country] (1954), Den Doolaard emphasized the unique character of the southern Slavs. He concedes that, of course, not every individual Yugoslavian possessed these characteristics in equal measure. He was not entirely uncritical of these qualities. There were some very rough edges to their quick-tempered nature, and Den Doolaard did not attempt to gloss over the cruel and bloody aspects of their history. Even in the peaceful round of daily life, he found that they were not always easy to deal with. 'No, I'm not completely blind – they are no saints. Their lethargy and slovenliness and dirty habits are often intensely irritating. You often wonder whether they have any brains at all. In the same way, they must sometimes wonder whether we have any hearts ... they are simply different.'

Den Doolaard was often critical of their inability to organize, of their naive idealism in some respects and of the cult of personality associated with Tito. Nevertheless, he did see some advantages to the irrational tendencies of the Yugoslavs. These included their excessive sense of independence, their tough nonconformism, their amazingly original artistic sense and especially their natural humanism and innate love of their fellow man, which meant that they preferred to give rather than to receive. Since the people were unburdened by Dutch pettiness and small-minded materialism, socialism seemed to have a better future in impoverished Yugoslavia. This was all the more so since the country was governed by Communists like Tito, who were the very embodiment of these unbourgeois tendencies. He was well aware that Yugoslavia was not exactly a parliamentary democracy. Nevertheless, he felt that 'social democracy' in that country was better developed than in the Netherlands or Britain, where 'a bureaucratic semi-dictatorship mitigated by ingrained parliamentary habits' held sway.²¹⁸

Den Doolaard was an influential and authoritative author, but he cannot be held responsible for the positive publicity about the Balkans in the Netherlands between 1950 and 1980. While not totally uncritical, this literature projected a more or less identical and highly optimistic vision of Yugoslavia.²¹⁹ Hans Alma was almost strangled in his sleep by Albanian thieves while staying at a shabby, dilapidated hotel in Novi Pazar. Nevertheless, in 1953, he noted that 'Even if I had started out with the intention of blackening Yugoslavia's name with my writing, I would have been quite unable to do so.'²²⁰ Marinus Schroevers thought that Tito was 'the friendliest dictator in the entire world.' In 1961 he wrote 'In Yugoslavia one can actually believe in the dream that one has found paradise.' Affluent western countries had their 5-day working week, 'but paradise, the poor destitute paradise is there...'²²¹ This image was confirmed by more than fifty guide books (and cook books) published in the Netherlands between 1955 and 1990. Naturally, these devoted little or no attention to Yugoslavia's political and economic problems.²²²

However, even when such matters received extensive coverage, the criticism was circumspect and the tone sympathetic. This was true of the first Dutch scholastic study of post-war Yugoslavia published in 1955 by the Slavist Tom Eekman. He believed that the Slavs' ancient 'collective instincts' were probably at work in contemporary Yugoslavia and could explain the people's support for Tito's socialist experiment. The Communist regime appeared to have found a workable and lasting solution to the nationalities issue. Thus, any assessment of Tito's dictatorship could not be based on western standards alone. Before the Second World War, the parliamentary system that had been adopted from Western Europe had never worked properly in this region. Even now it would be quite unable to unite the diverse peoples of the area.²²³

The left-wing journalist Anton Constandse, although more superficial, adopted the same approach to Yugoslavia in his biography of Tito (1962) and in his book on country, people and culture (1964). In view of the peasants' resistance to the collectivization of agriculture, Constandse found it inadvisable to account for the suitability for a life under Communism in terms of what was frivolously referred to elsewhere as a 'people's character'.²²⁴ Since Yugoslavia contained twelve different nationalities, the construction of such a character was a hopeless task, but 'it should not be forgotten that large areas of Southern Europe (Portugal, Spain, southern Italy, Greece) were quite backward in comparison to Yugoslavia.'²²⁵ Of course, comparisons were more often made with the USSR and other Eastern Bloc countries, which were of course advantageous to Yugoslavia. During the repression of the Prague Spring in 1968, Milo Anstadt had reported from Yugoslavia, Romania and Czechoslovakia. He commented that while rebellious students had become a normal phenomenon in capitalist and Communist countries, it was only in Yugoslavia that the head of state was actually on their side.²²⁶

Western admiration for the Balkans arose from a nostalgic and romantic longing for an idealized past, for a world that was as yet untouched by modern civilization. People felt that such a place still existed, in South-East Europe. However, once it became clear that our dreams of the future could no longer be projected onto the Soviet Union, many 'political pilgrims' headed for Cuba, China and Yugoslavia in search of solutions for major current issues. Yugoslavia's system of worker participation in management in particular seemed to point the way for many wealthier and more highly developed capitalist societies. In the Netherlands, during the 1960s and 1970s, a great debate arose concerning the further democratization of society. As a result, many Dutch people began to look at Yugoslavia quite differently. Of course the country retained its charm as a poor and backward – thus cheap and exotic - tourist destination. In addition, it began to be seen as a model and an example. This view was not restricted to left-wing intellectuals, it began to be shared by trade unions, politicians and even some captains of industry.²²⁷

In 1965, the Productivity Committee of the Socio-Economic Advisory Council visited Yugoslavia to find out whether the increased productivity of Yugoslavian enterprises was linked to the powers wielded by their workers. The committee, which also included delegates from employers' organizations, concluded that the circumstances in the two countries could not be directly compared. Nevertheless, it felt that the Netherlands should imitate Yugoslavia's greater willingness to implement socio-economic experiments. It was essential that the Netherlands find out more about Tito's socialist system. To this end, a Dutch social scientist would be permanently stationed in Yugoslavia. The Institute of Eastern European Studies and the Industrial Democracy Working Group of the University of Amsterdam were encouraged to intensify their studies of Yugoslavia.²²⁸

However, that country's system of worker participation in management proved to be a very difficult subject to study. The situation differed from one industrial sector or geographical region to the next. It was affected in various ways by legislation, the party apparatus and market mechanisms. Furthermore, the shape of the Yugoslavian political and economic system was constantly shifting. A member of the Institute of East European Studies, the slavacist Marius Broekmeyer, was very enthusiastic about Yugoslavia in the 1960s. According to him South Slavic Communism was moving 'above and beyond a form of economic democracy, to the start of political democracy'. Nevertheless, in his 1968 thesis, Broekmeyer revealed how overly complex the system was and how poorly it still functioned. Worker participation in management was, in fact, totally incompatible with a one-party regime that still exhibited dictatorial tendencies. Reforms in Yugoslavia were sabotaged 'by an elusive, invisible but nevertheless highly influential opponent who was everywhere and nowhere at the same time'.²²⁹ Broekmeyer did not believe that the Yugoslavian model could be successfully transplanted into the Netherlands. Nevertheless, in 1969, he co-authored a book with Igor Cornelissen which compared the situation in Yugoslavia to that in the Netherlands. This was because both authors were convinced that the democratization of companies in both socialist and capitalist countries had become an unstoppable process.²³⁰ At the time, this view was shared by Labour Party politicians such as Van Lier or Dankert, trade union leaders like Boon, Hugenholtz or Kloos and many other Dutch people.²³¹

In 1970, Broekmeyer organized an international symposium on Yugoslavian proletarian self-management in Amsterdam. This was attended by well-known experts on Yugoslavia and prominent Western scholars such as Jan Tinbergen, T.B. Bottomore and Shlomo Avineri. At this meeting, the entrepreneur A. Stikker of AKZO asserted that many western companies were also keen to promote 'participative management'. He professed to having the greatest respect for Yugoslavia, where this concept was first developed.²³² Since 1967, the Dutch trade unions NVV, NKV and CNV had engaged in regular contacts with their Yugoslavian counterparts. Delegations also visited each other's countries. In 1970, a delegation from the Consultative Committee of Netherlands Trade Union Federations travelled to Yugoslavia to study the system of worker participation in management. Eleven of the sixteen delegates who went on this trip were from denominational trade unions. The delegation returned home with the 'distinct impression that Yugoslavia's economic democracy exerted a democratizing effect on social and political relations outside the realm of industry. There is reason to expect that the achievement of worker participation in management in the Netherlands would have a reanimating effect on that country's fossilized political democracy. [...] The trade union movement in the Netherlands will have to make the achievement of worker participation a clear priority.'²²³

Accordingly, the trade union movement must make more frequent trips to Yugoslavia, in order to carry out further studies of the Yugoslavian system. The delegation also emphasized the need for extensive documentation of this system in the Netherlands. The Institute of East European Studies did indeed set up a catalogue of more than 10,000 titles on this very subject. With the support of the ZWO

(the Dutch Organization for Academic Research) the Netherlands Universities Institute for Co-ordination of Research in Social Sciences (SISWO) began a long-term research project. The work was carried out by R.M. Boonzajer Flaes and J.J. Ramondt. In 1974, however, they concluded that, in Yugoslavia, there existed 'a total discrepancy...between the stipulated degree of worker participation and its realization'. There were numerous strikes, particularly in poor companies, and labour conflicts were often brutally suppressed.²³⁴

At the start of the 1970s, Broekmeyer became increasingly convinced that worker participation in management in Yugoslavia simply did not work. His critical stance was not appreciated by the Dutch trade union movement, and he was no longer invited to give lectures. Boonzajer too accused him of cynicism, although in his 1978 dissertation he was forced to conclude that there was no such thing in Yugoslavia as 'genuine worker domination of decision-making'²³⁵ One industrial trade union, the NVV, which was headed by Arie Groenevelt, stayed true to the ideal of worker participation in management for many years. However, at the start of the 1980s, a worsening economic situation in the Netherlands and the desertion of members from its ranks compelled Groenevelt's successor, D. Visser, to switch the union's policy to 'those things that the members believe to be really important.'²³⁶

Times had changed and, in the Netherlands, it was also necessary to change the idealized image of Yugoslavia. On Christmas Day 1973, Slobodan Mitric killed three of his compatriots in Amsterdam. He was sentenced to a term of 18 years in prison. Mitric, alias Karate Bob, was a professional assassin who had deserted from the Yugoslavian secret service. Three years later, he had his sentence reduced when it emerged that he had acted in self-defence, in an attempt to prevent his own execution. At the time, the story was in all the papers. In 1982, Mitric was once again in the news, as a result of some books that he had published while in prison. One was an unremarkable manual on karate, but the other two were strange books about his sexual escapades and about the bloody operations carried out by Tito's security services, both inside Yugoslavia and abroad.²³⁷

At that time, however, Dutch public opinion was more captivated by the struggles of Solidarity, the Polish trade union, than by developments in Yugoslavia, which had long ceased to be a source of good news. This was highlighted by a study published by the Utrecht-based geographer De Rijk, in 1980, shortly before the death of Tito. He felt that the experiment with worker participation in management had petered out, without producing any increased political freedom. Unemployment in Yugoslavia was the highest in Europe. The policy of decentralization had revived nationalism among the various peoples of Yugoslavia. Although the federal government had made an attempt to restore its authority, it appeared to have completely lost its grip on the economy. De Rijk was unable to answer the question Quo vadis Yugoslavia? The country could go in any of a variety of directions,²³⁸

In a book published in 1985, Broekmeyer asserted that prognoses were still dangerous, since developments remained contradictory, while Yugoslavia was passing through 'the deepest and most severe crisis since 1945'. According to him, the greatest villains were the Communist leaders of the various republics and provinces. They had dismantled the federal state, were responsible for the economic chaos and countered all forms of opposition with the machinery of a 'totalitarian state'. While the state of Yugoslavia had almost no friends beyond its own borders, dissident members of the intelligentsia did receive considerable moral support from the West. Amnesty International immediately offered its support to Alija Izetbegovic who, as the author of a relatively moderate Islamic declaration in Sarajevo, was a candidate for persecution.

Amnesty also supported Vojislav Seselj, a young Sociology professor in the Bosnian capital, who had criticized the corrupt practices of the authorities, thereby incurring their wrath. Seselj was advocating a Greater Serbia and the division and annexation of Bosnia by Serbia and Croatia. Broekmeyer emphasized that regional nationalism was rapidly gaining momentum in Yugoslavia, however this worrying development was also connected with attempts to achieve greater openness and democracy. Various influential figures such as Djilas, the authoritative Serbian novelist Cosic and the Croatia politician and historian, Tudjman seemed to be in favour of 'national reconciliation'. If this could be achieved, the dictatorship of the party would fade away.²³⁹

Very few copies of this study (which was published by Clingendael, the Netherlands Institute of International Relations) were sold.²⁴⁰ Following Gorbachev's rise to power in the Soviet Union, interest in Yugoslavia declined even further. At the time, no Western observers could foresee the roles that Izetbegovic, Tudjman or Seselj were to play. During this period, most Yugoslavia-watchers thought that the omens favoured a hopeful political multiformity rather than violent disintegration. Two years later, when the USSR and the entire Eastern Bloc were in the same situation as Yugoslavia, there was still much optimism among most of the experts on Russia and Eastern Europe. The dramatic turn of events in 1989, when the countries of Central and Eastern Europe regained their independence, caused general euphoria in the Western world. The subsequent disenchantment was all the more bitter as a result. 'Just a short while ago', wrote journalist Raymond van den Boogaard at the start of 1992, 'Yugoslavia was a rich and variegated country, full of different peoples and landscapes, virtually a modern Arcadia. Now most of it lies in ruins, and the budding democracy has become a playground for those who worship violence.'²⁴¹

The necessary brevity of this essay precludes a detailed account of how the disintegration of Yugoslavia was covered in the Dutch media. That in itself would require a separate study. However, it can be determined that this caused a huge shift in Dutch views about the region. The admiration (often bordering on glorification) for the inhabitants of that region had persisted for almost five hundred years, but the savagery and duration of the wars in southern Slavia, coupled with the incessant and sometimes highly detailed reporting of these events, shattered this positive image forever. Some things remained the same, though. Dutch public opinion about Yugoslavia was still strongly influenced by other countries. For the first time, the Netherlands had an intimate, large-scale political and military involvement in western interventions in the Balkans. Dutch journalists were in the area to collect information, but the European and American press and television remained of overriding importance. Flemish and Dutch writers produced excellent books about the latest developments in Yugoslavia. Yet their contribution was a mere trickle, compared to the torrent of primarily Anglo-Saxon literature that washed over European readers.²⁴²

Accordingly, the Dutch image of Yugoslavia in particular and of the Balkans in general again largely conformed with Western ideas on the subject. Since the previous chapter examined the extent to which more traditional modes of thought concerning the Balkans influenced recent image-forming and decision-making, such trends should also be investigated in the Netherlands. Did the Netherlands take sides in the conflict? What remained of past sympathies for Serbia? In the 1980s, Broekmeyer was still able to appreciate the position of the Serbs within Yugoslavia, both during the Tito era and thereafter. In 1991, Europe was initially in favour of retaining the political integrity of Yugoslavia. This position favoured the Serbs much more than it did Slovenia and Croatia. The western world feared that, if it conceded to every nation's (or ethnic group's) desire for independence, there would be disintegration and chaos throughout Eastern Europe. With the Netherlands holding the chairmanship of the European Union, the Dutch Foreign Secretary, Hans van den Broek, was scarcely in a position to deviate from the general viewpoint. Within his ministry there were few illusions about the chances of keeping Yugoslavia in one piece.²⁴³ While no one sympathized with Milosevic's efforts to build a Greater Serbia, there might have been a more pronounced antipathy towards the Croats.

This possibility was examined by Norbert Both, in his book on Dutch involvement in the Yugoslavian crisis. He wrote that 'In 1991, West European politicians and diplomats looked at Croatia with little or no more sympathy than they reserved for the Serbs'. The Dutch in particular were influenced by the legacy of the Second World War, during which Nazi Germany had occupied the Netherlands for five years and murdered most of its Jewish population. For decades after the war, anti-German feeling ran deep among the Dutch. The fascist Croatian Ustashe regime had been a staunch ally of Nazi Germany and had methodically murdered hundreds of thousands of its Serb, Gypsy and Jewish inhabitants. [...] From the Dutch point of view, Croats and Serbs were equally bad. Hence, the communis opinio inside the Dutch Foreign Ministry at this stage was that for any solution to be both effective and fair, it would have to be even-handed.'²⁴⁴ Both offers no evidence in support of this interpretation. To some extent, it contradicts the previous few pages of his book, in which he shows that reports by Eastern European experts at the ministry and diplomats at the Dutch embassy in Belgrade during 1990 and 1991 continually urged the Netherlands to take a stand. In their view, taking a stand for or against the disintegration of Yugoslavia was tantamount to expressing a preference either for a future democracy in Slovenia and Croatia, or for maintenance of the authoritarian government in Belgrade. In 1991 and 1992 Henri Wynaendts, Van den Broek's right-hand man, conducted negotiations with all of the parties in Yugoslavia. He considered Milosevic's Greater Serbia policy to be the main cause of Yugoslavia's disintegration. Nevertheless, without referring to the Second World War, he made some ascerbic statements concerning Tadjman's dubious policies.²⁴⁵

Nina Peternel also asserted that there was 'an anti-Croatian campaign in 1991-92 [...] that centred on Croatia's collaboration during the Second World War'. She also claimed that the western and Dutch media served as 'an extension of Milosevic's propaganda mills'.²⁴⁶ This author, once a Dutch Yugoslav, had been converted, becoming a Dutch Croat. Her book played down the less palatable aspects of Croatian nationalism. A similar trend was also apparent in Dutch journalism. Milo Anstadt asserted that Dutch journalists also laboured under the misapprehension that the combatants could be neatly divided into reactionary Serbian Communists on the one hand and democratic Slovenes and Croats on the other. In this context, he referred to an article written in 1991 by Paul Scheffer pleading for the recognition of both northern republics. Anstadt felt that Croatia's democratic credentials were 'no better than those of Syria, for example'. He actually attempted to shield the Serbs, to some extent, from the more virulent attacks.²⁴⁷ Any investigation of the Dutch reports and analyses produced during the wars in Yugoslavia will doubtless reveal subtle nuances and differing opinions. While there was certainly criticism of Tadjman and Croatia, there was no predominantly anti-Croatian tendency fuelled by Dutch experiences during the German occupation.²⁴⁸ In the Netherlands, as elsewhere in the world, the general tenor of opinion was anti-Serbian. Milosevic and his adherents in Serbia, Bosnia and Croatia were picked out as the principle villains in the conflict. They were held mainly, but not solely, responsible for the outbreak of the war and for the bloody way in which it was fought. In the Netherlands, as elsewhere, the greatest sympathy was for the Bosnian Muslims. This did not mean, however, that writers simply turned a blind eye to the Muslims' actions. In the Netherlands it also created a general groundswell of public opinion in favour of humanitarian intervention and peacekeeping in Bosnia, to prevent any further ethnic cleansing or exacerbation of human suffering.

The Dutch soldiers in Srebrenica, whose job it was to implement this national intention, were a striking exception to this pattern. Their isolation, coupled with an almost total dependence on Mladic and his henchmen, played no small part in this. Nevertheless, a parallel can be drawn between the views of a Dutch physician like Koppeschaar in 1913 and the views of the Dutchbat soldiers in 1994 and 1995. Koppeschaar's favourable opinion of the Serbs and the Dutch soldiers' appreciation of the Bosnian-Serb army were mainly based on a respect for the other party's discipline, good organization and military capabilities. Koppeschaar's contempt for the Montenegrins and the Dutchbatters' contempt for the Bosnian Muslims in the enclave stemmed largely from an aversion to the disorderly, chaotic, dirty and impoverished conditions under which both autochthonous population groups lived. In earlier times, as now, this was considered to be the result of an ethnic culture that deviated from European norms.²⁴⁹ In both cases, such Dutch short-sightedness is quite astonishing. Nevertheless, any similarities between 1913 and 1994-95 are mainly coincidental. They do not indicate the existence of a continuous tradition of pro-Serbian sympathies in the Netherlands.

Vacillation on the part of the international community, and limited Western involvement during the first four years of the conflicts worked primarily to the advantage of the Serbs. But it cannot be said of the Netherlands or of other Western countries that ancient emotional bonds with a particular ethnic or national group influenced image-forming and decision-making with regard to the conflicts in Yugoslavia. Of much greater political significance, both in the Netherlands and elsewhere, is the switch from a positive to a negative image of the Balkans. Peternel indignantly described an 'immense arrogance and condescension' towards the 'primitive, blood-spilling' Balkan peoples. She quoted C.J. Visser who, writing in the Dutch daily NRC Handelsblad, described the situation as a 'tribal settling of scores'. Another quote was taken from Anet Bleich and Ewoud Nysingh who reported in De

Volkscrant that: ‘serbs and Croats have been enthusiastically smashing one another’s heads in for more than six months’.²⁵⁰ In addition to well-known foreign examples such as Kaplan and Kennan, the journalist and academic expert in international relations, Bart Tromp, quoted from a radio interview with Joost Hilterman in which the latter described ‘the pent-up hatred of tribes who refuse to live together any longer.’ Tromp also made reference to the views of Dutchbat veterans who thought that the best solution would be to fence in this ‘country fit only for goats, and populated by chicken slaughterers’.²⁵¹ Statements of this kind are common, and many more examples can easily be found. Even a diplomat like Weynandts wrote about Milosevic: ‘Le côté suicidaire, présent chez tant de Serbs, semble l’avoir emporté.’²⁵² In 1993, Van den Boogaard stated that ‘all of the warring parties [...] display an apparently indestructible, almost irrational belligerence.’ They ‘want war, there is no other possible conclusion’.²⁵³ Anstadt talked of a specific ‘southern Slav mentality’, of people who ‘still need danger to feel truly alive’ for whom ‘the lust for survival [...]’ had become ‘a lethal adventure’. He therefore scoffed at Dutch people such as Mient Jan Faber who represented the peace council of the Dutch churches and wanted to send western soldiers and civilian personnel to the Balkans ‘to provide real help in solving the underlying problems’.²⁵⁴

Tromp was also a fervent advocate of more effective western intervention and saw these views of the former Yugoslavia as patently transparent excuses for doing nothing. Together, these formed the ‘myth of Balkan man’, a clearly identifiable mode of thought in public opinion, which was also exhibited by politicians, commentators and diplomats. According to this reasoning, the wars in Yugoslavia had broken out simply because the inhabitants of the Balkans are uncivilized barbarians. Such catastrophes were unthinkable in our society. Since the southern Slavs were not open to reason, any attempt to intervene in their mutual conflicts would be quite pointless.²⁵⁵ Tromp disputed such views by denying that there was any such thing as ‘Balkan man’.

Nevertheless, those who opposed such prejudices were still able to put forward a series of reasoned arguments in support of intervention. In addition, both politicians and the media appealed to our compassion for our fellow man, in the form of the southern Slavs. There was no systematic campaign by the anti-interventionists to propagate this view of the bloodthirsty Homo balkanensis. These and many other like-minded individuals made all sorts of superficial, arbitrary statements about the less palatable aspects of the inhabitants of the Balkans. However, they rarely or never took the trouble to provide a more detailed description of ‘Balkan Man’ nor did they carry out a thorough psychoanalysis of this modern barbarian. Not long ago, however, detailed discussions of the Dutch national character, or that of other peoples, had by no means been unusual. Initially, contemporary statements about the ‘fierce’ inhabitants of the Balkans were simply the rudiments of a much older image. As the previous pages have shown, in times past the Dutch took great delight in characteristics that these days give people the shivers. Whatever the case, ‘Balkan Man’ was not simply a concept invented during the last decade of the 20th century to prevent Western intervention in Yugoslavia. Only at the end of the 1990s was a comprehensive explanation conceived for the adverse course of events in eastern and South-Eastern Europe. This led to a new image of Eastern Europe, one in which far greater importance was attached to the mentality of its population. In the first chapter of this essay I explained how the images of other peoples consist of peculiar combinations of observations, opinions and emotions. They cannot simply be dismissed as ‘a pack of lies’. Such images are in fact reflections of reality in a series of distorting mirrors. Although this is not always the case, they often contain elements of the truth. Image and reality can never be completely separated. Images should nevertheless be subjected to critical analysis, and their level of truth assessed. In the next chapter, we shall attempt to do so.

Chapter 4

Image and reality

1. Eastern Europe, its modern image and its past

The previous chapters have primarily focused on the historical development of the western image of Eastern Europe and the Balkans. This chapter is entirely devoted to contemporary views of the situation that has developed in eastern and South-Eastern Europe. We will focus mainly on the emphasis (or lack thereof) given to the connection with what, in the past, was openly referred to as race or as the character of a people. These days it is more euphemistically described as ethnicity, culture or, most candidly, as mentality. That connection is most apparent in the currently prevailing perception of Eastern Europe. The present-day image of the Balkans and the adverse views of the region's inhabitants are all part of this.

Religious differences in particular have been identified as the main cause of the many and varied developments that have taken place since the fall of the Berlin Wall. This primarily concerns differences between Western and Central Europe on the one hand and Eastern and South-Eastern Europe on the other. According to many observers a rather fundamental contrast exists between two types of people. One has emerged from the Latin Christian tradition while the other is the product of the Orthodox Christian ideology. The latter finds it more difficult to keep up with the rapid pace of change in our modern world. Many reasons can be found, however, for rejecting this interpretation as either too one-sided or just plain wrong. Accordingly, we will go on to review explanations for the disintegration of Yugoslavia in terms of factors that have nothing to do with ethnicity, mentality, religion or the existence of a type of 'Balkan Man'. Next it will be the turn of those authors whose views cannot be directly linked to traditional prejudices about the Balkans but which, nevertheless, subtly draw our attention to the important part that may have been played by collective mind-sets in the outbreak and development of the Yugoslavian conflicts.

Yugoslavia and its people, which were once held in such high esteem, are now largely viewed with contempt. On the other hand, there is Central Europe, which has undergone a complete facelift since the 1980s and has once again been elevated to the status of a distinct European zone. As we have seen in previous chapters, there have been many such changes in the history of western image-forming with regard to Eastern Europe. In the past, as now, these changes were always prompted by major current events. At the same time, people usually felt the need to search for more profound explanations, by re-examining the past. This is now happening all over again. The events that have occurred in Central European countries since 1989 have been relatively favourable, certainly when compared to the vicissitudes of other former Communist states. However, the course of the process of transition in Central Europe cannot only be explained by the situation that has prevailed during the past decade, but also by re-vitalizing 19th century views about the special position of this region. After many years in obscurity, such traditional interpretations were suddenly very topical once again, because they seemed to provide a convincing explanation for very recent events.²⁵⁶

During the last few years it has often been asserted that Communism concealed the 'real' dividing line between Eastern and Western Europe for the past fifty years. With the fall of Communism, this line has once again become visible, it is none other than the 'ancient' border between Rome and Byzantium, between Latin and Orthodox Christianity.²⁵⁷ To the west of this line, the Central European countries have, during the past decade, largely completed the transition to a market economy, democracy and a multiform society. To the east of this line, in regions where the Orthodox faith holds sway, the economic situation is worsening rather than improving. Power is increasingly gravitating into authoritarian or criminal hands. Such a disparity in terms of development is explained by the difference in faith and by the associated mentalities of the populations involved. According to this view of things, Orthodoxy is a religion of rigid rules and rituals. It is a church entirely lacking in social engagement, which slavishly submits to any type of political authority. The Orthodox regions were never oriented towards the West. As a result, they were left untouched by feudalism, the Gothic age, Humanism, the Reformation and the Age of Reason, all defining aspects of our civilization. This is why the current process of modernization and westernization is making such faltering progress in this region.

This, in brief, is the latest image of Eastern Europe.²⁵⁸ Any attempt to formulate criticism of this image will take up considerably more space. After all, it is not reasonable to assert that society has been entirely unaffected by at least one thousand years of exposure to a given form of Christianity.²⁵⁹ The main objections focus on the way in which this long and highly complex history has been reduced to a simple formula, which can then supposedly be used to provide the only true insight into the past, present and future. It would seem that the civilized, politically correct approach is to explain current situations in terms of ancient cultural differences. Nevertheless, such 'culturistic' views are no less repugnant than older concepts which identified race as the cause of the differences between East and West. The arguments that are being used to re-orientalize Eastern Europe and to permanently demote its 250 million inhabitants to the status of second-class citizens of our continent are far from sound. Nevertheless, they have gained wide acceptance. This is probably because they fit snugly into the long tradition of western ethnocentrism, and because they seem to explain away so many problems. As part of this, the Balkans are firmly placed within the sphere of the Byzantine East. Since Serbia is usually labelled as the greatest villain of the Yugoslavian wars, the latter can simply be attributed to Serbian Orthodoxy and to the character of the Serbian people, which has been shaped by their faith.

After thinking it through, almost everyone will acknowledge that this is too simple an explanation to be true. For this reason it is important to judge the 'culturistic' image of Central and Eastern Europe on its historical merits, even though this has already been dealt with above, in a different context. The previous chapters contain comments that are intended to put the contemporary use of Ranke's cultural 'canon' and Huntington's fault line theory in perspective. Mention is also made of the arbitrary way in which our continent was divided up in the past, into two or three parts. We have seen how the position of the 'centre' was always shifting. As a consequence of this, during the Cold War, Yugoslavia was an exception to the east-west divide, and was valued as a small, separate Central or 'in-between' Europe.

There is little reason to attach such enormous importance to the symbolic dividing line between 'Rome' and 'Byzantium'. During the five centuries that separated the fall of Constantinople (1453) and the fall of Communism (1989-1991), this border only played a minor part in European history. It is certainly true to say that the Orthodox world made little or no creative contribution to the spiritual movements in the West that mark the transition between the Middle Ages and the early modern period. However, East and West were not separated by watertight bulkheads. As the main repository of Greek classical civilization, Byzantium was an extremely important source for the western Renaissance and Humanism. The difference between Orthodoxy and Catholicism is smaller than that between Protestantism and Catholicism. The contrast between Eastern and Western Christianity did not generate a bloody and destructive series of conflicts like those that arose within Western Christianity itself. It can also be concluded that the Age of Reason, the Romantic movement, and subsequent movements in western spiritual life did not leave the Orthodox regions untouched, but rather had an ever increasing effect on them. This is why, in cultural terms, these countries are less strange and foreign than is generally thought.

It is by no means unusual to see relationships between religious and economic developments. Few historians will deny that Britain and the Netherlands became the leaders of Europe because the flowering of their economic and political systems was fostered by voyages of exploration and by the Reformation. However, the Central European countries did not benefit from this and, as a result, they failed to keep up with Western Europe. The Reformation and the Counter Reformation had disastrous repercussions for Germany, Bohemia, Slovakia and Hungary. It is therefore odd that this religious past is now proudly put forward as proof of the European character of the Central European countries. Countries such as Spain, Portugal and France also sustained economic damage by expunging religious minorities such as Jews, Moriscos and Huguenots from their societies. Conversely, the economy of the Ottoman Empire profited from the religious tolerance that was permitted by the Sultans. Even the Czarist government, which practised the repression of non-Orthodox religions, never adopted an expulsion policy. As a result, the activities of Muslims, Jews, Armenians, Catholics, Protestants or religious separatists such as the Old Believers continued to be of decisive importance to the economic development of the Russian empire. Thus the adverse economic effects of religious conflict and intolerance were greater in the Catholic western and central regions of Europe than in the Orthodox east or south-east.

However, it is difficult to demonstrate the existence of a connection between a population's religious mentality and the process of economic growth or decline. During the first half of the 20th century, many western historians and sociologists were fascinated by the idea that the Calvinistic mentality was one of the major driving forces behind modern capitalism. This was the best explanation for the post-1600 economic prosperity of the Protestant North of Europe and the decline of the Catholic South. Nevertheless, even Max Weber (the leading writer on this issue) did not dare to put into words the idea that the religious mentality directly influenced the economy. He described the relationship between both phenomena as a 'Wahlverwandschaft'.²⁶⁰ The doubt surrounding this issue has continued to grow since Weber's time, since a given religious mentality can also have an economic background.

For these reasons, the low level of economic development in the Orthodox regions can not simply be ascribed to the religion or religious mentality of the population. During the past few centuries, their faith never stopped Greek merchants, ship-owners and seamen from playing a dominant role in the economy of the whole of south-east Europe and the Near East. Within the European Union, modern-day Greece – which is still extremely Orthodox – is equal in rank to Catholic Portugal. Nor did Orthodoxy impede the amazingly rapid take-off of Russian industrialization in the 1890s.

Historians often commented that serfdom has been a hindrance to the rise of modern forms of capitalism, which are highly dependent on a free labour market. From this point of view in particular, as has already been pointed out in this study, the dividing line between East and West was previously situated much further to the west. After 1500 it was mainly serfdom that caused Central Europe to appear so different to western eyes. Bondage, however, did not exist in the Balkan countries of Greece, Bulgaria, Serbia and Montenegro. Farmers in Croatia were bound to the land from the 16th century onwards, whereas Serbian immigrants in the Krajina region of Croatia – while no less poverty-stricken – were free and armed.²⁶² A fawning, subservient attitude to authority was more typical of the Habsburg Slavic areas than of the Ottoman Slavic areas. It characterized the societies of Austria, Poland, Bohemia and Slovakia for much longer than it did those of Serbia or Montenegro.²⁶²

The relationship between governments and Orthodoxy, between political culture and religious mentality is also less one-sided and simple than that which is put forward in 'culturistic' debates. The Eastern church is indeed conventional and conservative. It had a tradition of anti-western and anti-intellectual movements, and this is still true today. However, it was never a religious community that attempted to shut out the outside world completely. As in the West, the Orthodox church could not escape the influence of society. It was even more exposed to the power of the state which in the post-1800 East, was usually oppressive and arbitrary in nature. Nevertheless, the balance of power between church, society and state authority in Eastern Europe has also been very unsettled and changeable. As defenders of the faith, the emperors of the Eastern Roman Empire had considerable influence on the administration of the church. In the final centuries of Byzantium, however, their influence was on the wane while the prestige of the patriarch and the power of the church was on the rise. Even under the millet system of the Ottoman empire, the Patriarch of Constantinople continued to exert a relatively autonomous authority over all Orthodox Christians. Under Turkish rule, the patriarchate remained in contact with Catholic and Protestant circles in the West.²⁶⁴

In Russia, the church was indeed subjected to worldly authority by Peter the Great. Prior to that, however, it had played a major role in the process of shaping the state. Prominent clergymen had forcefully resisted the government, had functioned as heads of state in times of crisis and even aimed to render the state subordinate to the church. On occasion, the Serbian church had also been highly critical of Serbian politics. The national churches and monasteries played a major part in the independence struggles of Serbs, Greeks, Bulgarians and Romanians. Priests and monks joined in the fight against the Turks.²⁶⁵ As has already been mentioned, at that time western public opinion strongly sympathized with the rebellious Balkan peoples, who were seen as being oppressed by an Islamic Turkish (thus, non-European) regime. At that time the emphasis was on the fact that these countries were Christian and that they therefore had an affinity to the West. These days, the main emphasis is on their Orthodox character, and their consequent 'otherness'.

In terms of the relationship between church and state, there is less difference between East and West than is often alleged. In the West also, there was a distinct inclination towards Caesaro-Papism (the state dominates the church). Medieval monarchs wanted the right to nominate their own bishops. Even after the Reformation, worldly governments attempted to retain their power over religious affairs. In 1555 the Religious Peace of Augsburg was based on the rule cuius regio eius religio (whose the region, his the religion, in other words, subjects are obliged to accept their monarch's faith). All British monarchs since Henry the Eighth have been the head of the church. There is also a long tradition of state churches in Western Europe. In the Republic of the Seven United Netherlands, where the Reformed Church was the dominant faith within the state, many within the reigning bourgeois elite felt that this church also should be subjected to their political authority. Intellectuals like Hugo Grotius provided a suitable legal and political doctrine for this point of view. In all Western countries, the division between church and state occurred quite late and was generally never fully completed. In the Danube Monarchy, the state quite forcefully imposed Catholicism on the Protestant segment of the population. Hungary was the only country where the Habsburg rulers were less than completely successful in this regard. However, they continued to use the Roman Catholic state church as 'an instrument of spiritual control, yes – as a sort of auxiliary police force'²⁶⁶. There was a very good reason why Stjepan Radic (leader of the Catholic but anti-clerical Croat Peasant Party in the years between the wars) opened all of his political speeches with the slogan 'Hvaljen Isus, dolje s popovima' (Believe in Jesus, get rid of the priests).²⁶⁷

On the other hand, education in Orthodox countries was mainly a secular activity before it became so in the West. Nor did denominational political parties ever play a major role in Eastern Europe. It is also doubtful that the faith of the Russian or Serbian peasant ever had much to do with the official religions of their respective countries. They often adhered to one of the many religious sects and had little respect for the Orthodox village priests and the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Although religion underwent something of a revival following the fall of Communism, it is doubtful whether the mental attitude of more than 250 million East Europeans is still so strongly influenced by religious traditions. Eastern Europe has been equally affected by the processes of individualization and secularization.

It is easier to summarize the deficiencies of the current image of Eastern Europe than to briefly point out the actual roots of the differences between Eastern and Western Europe. If one was forced to single out one historical factor, then the discovery of America would rank above the Byzantine or Orthodox mentality. This event caused the economic centre to move from the Mediterranean areas to the coasts of the Atlantic Ocean and the North Sea. The resultant economic gap between the wealthy West and the impoverished East proved difficult to bridge.

It is even more difficult to identify the deeper historical roots of various current developments in Central and Eastern Europe. Even in centuries past, the eastern half of Europe was no less varied than its western counterpart. Nevertheless, it should be noted that, throughout the 17th and 18th centuries, the Jesuits worked hand in hand with governments to provide an effective and modern educational system in Catholic regions. In this regard, they contributed to the creation of a Western-minded elite in Central Europe. Miroslav Hroch stated that, at the start of the 19th century, the average level of literacy of the population (including all of the German-speaking peoples) in this area was higher than in the rest of Europe.²⁶⁸ Prior to 1900, in Orthodox regions, neither the church nor the state was able to make any substantial impact on illiteracy within the population. Serfdom was retained in Russia for decades after it had disappeared elsewhere. In that country, as in the Balkans, social modernization was slower and less complete than in large areas of Central Europe. Furthermore, any changes in those regions took place under Habsburg and Prussian authority. While these regimes also had authoritarian qualities, unlike the Russian and Ottoman empires after 1800, they had accepted the rule of law and their civil service was generally more competent and less corrupt. However, the lead that Central Europe enjoyed over Eastern and South-Eastern Europe at the start of the 20th century was of little benefit to that region in the years between the wars. Things went badly wrong in the Centre, the East and the South. The worst affected country was the most western of all, Germany.

The relatively favourable situation currently enjoyed by Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary can perhaps be better understood by examining the more recent past. They were the only Eastern Bloc countries where there was resistance to Soviet domination, on a national scale. After the Second World War, these states were characterized by an ethnic homogeneity that was quite exceptional in the Eastern part of Europe. This may well have made it easier to stage such revolts.²⁶⁹ The revolt and opposition was fuelled by the rejection of Communism as foreign and 'Eastern'. This, in turn, served to reinforce existing national solidarity and the perception of their national identity as a western people. Poles, Hungarians and Czechs were determined to be Western. The possibility cannot be excluded that, after 1989, this mentality contributed substantially to the development of a socio-psychological climate in which economic and political changes were able to proceed at a faster pace than in other formerly Communist European countries. The majority of the population and the political elite in Russia, Ukraine and most Balkan countries had little or no interest at all in becoming Western. It is difficult to describe this as anything other than a mental phenomenon, but it is impossible to prove that such a mentality is closely linked to religious traditions. If this were true, it would imply that the situation is virtually unchangeable. Temporary circumstances probably played a more important role. In 1945, Greece differed little from countries such as Bulgaria or Serbia. Taking advantage of the more favourable circumstances in which it found itself, however, it has been able to modernize. The country's position today is quite different from what it was then.

Conceivably, the current transition might have been much easier in the Eastern Europe of three or four decades ago. At that time there was much talk of a 'convergence between East and West', as represented by the welfare state and the construction of a 'mixed' economy in the West, and by powerful reformist tendencies in the post-Stalinist East. Modern neo-liberal Capitalism, together with the exacting demands imposed on former Communist countries by supra-national financial institutions and the EU make it difficult to implement the changes that are required. It may also be that, a few decades into the future, Central European countries will still not have caught up with the West because the international economic climate has worsened while the European Union has been weakened by administrative impotence. Disappointment with the Western course, which is already being experienced by large sectors of the Central European population, may lead people to conclude that the gap between Central and Eastern Europe has narrowed while that between Central and Western Europe has widened. The perception of Central Europe as a region radically different from the Orthodox East, which is now popular in the West, may then have to be modified once again, to take the changed situation into account.

2. Are circumstances alone the deciding issue?

Circumstances change drastically over time. It is hard to identify a moment in the past on which to base the mythology of the current image of Eastern Europe, which presupposes a profoundly significant border between regions using either the Cyrillic or the Latin alphabet. During the Soviet era, all Communist countries were pretty much alike. Although the Central European countries have all made great efforts to distance themselves from that past reality, they have still not been able to convince either themselves or the West of their European credentials. For reasons that have already been discussed, the part of the 20th century that preceded the pre-Communist era was equally unsuitable in this regard. The same goes for the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries. In order to prove their western character and essence, the Central Europeans had to make a great leap back in history, to the years leading up to 1500 and shortly thereafter.²⁷⁰ Only in that period does Leopold von Ranke's argument about the common heritage of Western and Central Europe (feudalism, Gothic architecture, the Renaissance, Humanism and Reformation) seem to have any validity.

However, such a leap back in history says as much about the similarities between Central and South-Eastern Europe as about their differences. After all, in shaping their national identity, the Serbs also used historical myths from a dim and distant past, before the time of Turkish rule. We seem to consider it quite normal when we use the Middle Ages and the Early Modern Period to identify ourselves as Central or Western Europeans. At the same time, however, we view the Serbian preoccupation with the late Middle Ages as unhealthy. We even point to it as one of the causes of their excessively violent actions during the Yugoslavian conflicts. This observation should make us cautious. We may well be wrong to attempt to construct or de-construct links between behaviour in crisis situations and the history, culture, religion or mentality of a nation. If we want to explain the origin and course of the Yugoslavian crisis, it would be wiser to first look for other, more objective causes. In the following pages we will discuss literature in which the question of guilt is not linked to ethnic, religious or mental factors. Although this examination is far from complete, an attempt has been made to demonstrate the validity of a 'politically correct' point of view.

Firstly, there is constant confirmation of the observation that the use of force is a general human behaviour, and that it is not restricted to particular ethnic groups. This is borne out by the socio-psychological experiments of researchers such as Milgram and Zimbardo in the United States, and Mees and Raaijmakers in the Netherlands. Their work has shown that people of all levels of intelligence, educational achievement, character, social standing or national background can be induced to cause severe injury or pain to their fellow human beings. Such behaviour can be evoked within a short period of time and without the use of any physical coercion. To the astonishment and dismay of the researchers, only a small minority of the test subjects totally refused to engage in such activity.²⁷¹ As it was made increasingly clear to the test subjects that their behaviour could well lead to unpleasant repercussions (such as the possibility of legal liability), more of them refused to engage in such activity.

Given that the anticipation of punishment or correction has an important part to play here then it is not so surprising that the Netherlands, one of the oldest and most stable constitutional states in the world, should also be one of the least violent countries in the world. Murder and manslaughter are far less common here than in the United States, Russia or Brazil. Nevertheless, in 1994 there were 65,900 crimes of violence in the Netherlands. According to official estimates, there is a hard core of 23,000 young people between the ages of twelve and eighteen who regularly commit acts of violence.²⁷² How would the size of these groups and their activities be affected if, within a period of ten years, the economy were to collapse almost completely, the central government became incapable of maintaining law and order, the state disintegrated and power devolved into the hands of local potentates who openly encouraged the use of force? In other words, if the same were to happen in the Netherlands as happened in Yugoslavia from 1980 to 1991, could we be so sure that no 'serbian'-type events would take place there?

In addition, it has often been pointed out that modern wars are almost always accompanied by crimes and atrocities against the civilian population. This argument, also, makes it much more difficult to ascribe the excesses of the war to specifically Yugoslavian circumstances or to a sort of primitive Balkan mentality. The horrors of war can also be explained by the authoritarian command structures that are the mental and organizational essence of any army. These can cause soldiers to become totally estranged from the prevailing standards and values of civilian society. Under such circumstances, the principle of Befehl ist Befehl has a much greater influence than nationalism, ethnic hatred or other ideological motives. There are many examples that can be used to illustrate this point. When reporting the Bosnian wars, the Western media devoted a considerable amount of time to reporting the case of a Sarajevan soldier by the name of Borislav Herak. He learned how to cut throats by practising on pigs. Later, when ordered to do so, he exercised this 'skill' on Muslims. His father was a Serb, his mother a Croat, and his sister was married to a Muslim for whom he had the greatest respect. In the course of several interviews, he stated that he had nothing against Muslims.²⁷³ H. Tromp was certainly not the only person to conclude from this that: ‘The mass murders of Croats by Serbs in Vukovar in 1992, or the mass murders of Muslims by Croats in Ahvinici in 1993 are not the symptoms of a specific Balkan culture – neither are the mass murders by Germans in Lidice or by Americans in My Lai symptomatic of the degree of civilization in Germany or the United States’. [...] It is the culture of war that prescribes such killings, and committing ‘war crimes’ is therefore inevitable.’²⁷⁴

We can add to this that there was more to the wars in Yugoslavia than the slavish obedience of soldiers like Borislav Herak. Disobedience was no less important, in fact it may well have been even more significant. Even under the most trying conditions, some intellectuals and journalists continued to resist disinformation and incitement to ethnic hatred and violence. ‘Ordinary’ people did more than just shoot at one another, they also held peace demonstrations.²⁷⁵ Several instances were reported of Yugoslavs who attempted to prevent the ill-treatment, deportation or liquidation of their fellow villagers or neighbours, even if the former were people of a different ethnic group. Such courageous people were frequently murdered by people of their own ethnic group. There was wholesale evasion of national service. One hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand young men either went into hiding or emigrated. Many others were coerced into joining up, and it was common for men to be violently pressured into service. As a result the Yugoslavia army was eighteen divisions short at the start of the war against Croatia.²⁷⁶ This meant that the only action that the army could take against towns such as Vukovar was to subject them to protracted artillery barrages. In order to capture towns and to carry out ethnic cleansing, it was necessary to use irregular troops.

It was primarily bands of this type that were responsible for widespread crimes against the civilian populations of Croatia, Bosnia and Kosovo. Such actions were responsible for the extremely violent character of these wars. As early on as June 1991, when it became clear that the normal process of conscription would not yield sufficient numbers of recruits, the army decided to train paramilitary forces in special training centres and to deploy them in battle. The Croat and Bosnian armies also used units of this type to carry out their dirty work. In all, some 40 to 60 units of this type were active at that time. The most infamous were the ‘Tigers’ headed by Arkan (a criminal wanted by Interpol, who had worked as a hit man for the Yugoslavian secret service) and the Cetniks headed by Seselj, a pathological intellectual. Ratko Mladic, the Bosnian Serb general, often worked with these groups. The literature on this topic often emphasizes the ‘lower class’ content of these units: criminals, marginal figures, the Lumpenproletariat of the towns and cities and especially boys from peasant families with no work and no future, who were used to handling weapons. Joining these bands gave them a purpose in life, considerable power and ample opportunities for plunder. Accordingly, enrichment by terror is the sole motive attributed to these men.²⁷⁷

A much larger group of people played no part, either as volunteers or as conscripts, either in the battles or in ethnic cleansing. Yet it was this group that, either as demonstrators or voters, supported Milosevic or Tudjman. They represented the power base of such politicians, and it was they who made the violent dismemberment of the Yugoslavian state possible. Their behaviour is often explained in terms of ‘a switch in mass psychology’. This was supposedly brought about by the virtually absolute control of the media, together with all the other techniques of mass mobilization that Communist regimes had always used. These tools were now successfully applied by the new rulers in post-Communist Croatia and Serbia. Television had an almost hypnotic effect. This was particularly so in Serbia, where the population became too poor to buy newspapers. In the course of the media war, viewers were bombarded with propaganda day after day. This included images and messages exploiting ancient nationalist myths and Second World War events with which people had not come to terms. The primary objective was to demonize the enemy. Impartial observers were staggered by the one-sidedness of the news coverage. Nevertheless, sixty percent of the viewers considered such propaganda to be completely true. The ‘dizzying repetition of pseudo-patriotic terminology’ had a ‘shamanistic’ and ‘paralyzing’ effect on a population that was ‘trapped in radically deteriorating economic, cultural and social conditions’. Almost ten years of confinement in the ‘media gulag’ had made these people completely apathetic.²⁷⁸

This supports the view (which crops up time and again in the literature) that the various population groups had managed to live together for the greater part of the 20th century in spite of the considerable differences in language, religion, culture, regional development and a protracted series of internal conflicts. The only large-scale violence occurred as a result of the highly exceptional situation caused by the Second World War. At the start of the 1990s, it was a unique combination of circumstances that brought them into conflict again. This involved the crisis and downfall of the Communist system, economic decline, the loss of Yugoslavia's exceptionally favourable international position and, primarily, manipulation by unscrupulous politicians. These rulers wanted a state of their own, with a population whose composition would be as homogeneous as possible. This would, of course, entail a certain amount of ethnic cleansing. This activity was left to the criminal and antisocial elements that are present in any population, and it was facilitated by the dehumanizing effect that results from war. Other countries with multinational societies, such as Belgium or Switzerland, have not suffered Yugoslavia's fate only because they were able to develop under much more favourable circumstances. The collapse of the Yugoslavian federation was not an inevitable consequence of ancient ethnic animosities.

Authors who hold this point of view tend to emphasize the cosmopolitan and multicultural character of cities such as Sarajevo and Belgrade. Such commentators also point out that, in most rural areas, different ethnic groups managed to live peacefully alongside one another (even if not, generally, in the same village) for long periods of time. Experts who regularly visited Tito's Yugoslavia, concluded that the country at that time gave the impression of being a single, national entity. This was not only due to the collaboration between different ethnic groups during the partisan struggle and to Tito's charismatic leadership. At that time, the inhabitants of Yugoslavia were also very proud of their country's independence, of its unique position between East and West, of the relative freedom that they enjoyed, of their increased prosperity and of the Yugoslavian variant of socialism that was worker participation in management. The antagonism between Serbs and Croats appeared to have subsided to the level of 'a harmless local patriotic rivalry'.²⁷⁹

During the 1980s, more and more people in multi-ethnic regions such as Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia and Vojvodina felt that they were first and foremost Yugoslavs. Young people in particular increasingly found that interethnic contacts posed no insuperable problems. Cohen concluded that 'such Yugoslavism indicated the existence of a reservoir of support for the country's cohesion at approximately the same time that ethnic tensions and economic problems throughout Yugoslavia were becoming more serious.'²⁸⁰ No referendum was held about whether or not Yugoslavia should continue to exist, possibly in the form of a new confederation.²⁸¹ It is by no means certain that the majority of people would have been opposed to the retention of the united state.

3. The importance of ethnic mentalities

The views set forth above make it clear that the Yugoslavian conflict cannot simply be described as inevitable. The problem with the 'politically correct' standpoint, however, is that while it is based on various indisputable facts, it is still open to contention and is one-sided in nature. Taken as a whole, the literature on Yugoslavia does not support the conclusion that the disintegration of Yugoslavia was entirely due to the specific circumstances of the 1980s and 1990s. The opinions expressed are too contradictory and varied to support the view that all statements about profound ethnic tensions and the special mentality of the region's inhabitants are entirely the product of western prejudice and of inaccurate images of the Balkans.

Firstly, a number of authors feel that the population as a whole did not have a strongly Yugoslavian identity. No more than 6.6% of citizens ever registered themselves as Yugoslav, a high point that occurred during the 1991 census. These individuals were generally the children of 'mixed' marriages.²⁸² As long ago as the 19th century, Serbs and Croats were expressing ideas and feelings about their strong mutual relationship, and about the desirability of unity. However, Jugoslavenstvo was a relatively recent phenomenon, and could not be compared to the much older and highly charged ‘emotional poignancy’ of Italianità among Italians or Deutschtum among Germans.²⁸³ Subsequently, neither the kingdom nor the Communist republic were able to create a form of ‘Yugoslavianism’ that was attractive and convincing to all of the country’s citizens. As a result, few Croats, Serbs and Slovenes gave up their own, pre-existing national identities. Among Macedonians, Bosnian Muslims and Muslim Kosovars, regional and ethnic consciousness gradually increased in strength. Yugoslavia is by no means unique in this regard. Multiethnic populations elsewhere in 20th century Europe were confronted with the same difficulties when they tried to create a unified state and nation.

Andrej Simic states that a modern nation has a common ethical code that gives its citizens a clear idea about what is good, decent, natural or God-given. This code, that Simic dubbed a ‘moral field’, only governs behaviour within the group. Different nations inhabit different ‘moral fields’, while mutual behaviour between nations falls into the ‘amoral’ realm. Ramet took Simic’s concept and applied it to Yugoslavia, concluding that the Yugoslavian veneer that the Communist regime had used to paper over the gaps of ethnic diversity (the mythology of the partisans, or the projects for worker participation in management) was too thin, and wore out too quickly. ‘The Titoists failed to create a common moral field in which all the Yugoslavs would be included. Instead moral fields remained coincident with ethnic communities, heightening the risks and dangers of political disintegration.’²⁸⁴

Wachtel also emphasizes the major repercussions of faulty Yugoslavianism. The country would not have disintegrated ‘had a robust vision of the Yugoslav nation been in place’. This was predominantly the case in rural areas. Socio-psychological studies carried out during the 1970s showed that city dwellers, and especially the well-educated young people among them, were less susceptible to ethnic nationalism. However, it was already clear that the best approach for power-hungry, nationalistic politicians was to appeal to the poorly educated, rural elements of the population. ‘An autocratic party with strong ties to the church and to traditional values would be able to garner significant support for a programme based on Serbian nationalism, particularly in the countryside, the provinces and among the lumpen-workers of Belgrade. Anti-Croat, anti-German propaganda would work as well.’²⁸⁵

At that time, such developments were blocked by the existence of a Communist one-party state, but fifteen years later this obstacle disappeared and events swiftly followed their predicted course. Wachtel feels that the wars that subsequently occurred were probably conflicts between country and town, rather than between ethnic or national groups. ‘It was to my mind the successful challenge to any supranational Yugoslav vision by particularist nationalist ideals that drove the country to destruction and led to the rise of figures such as Milosevic and Tadjman, rather than the other way around.’²⁸⁶ Statements of this kind just serve to demonstrate how any number of facts can be interpreted in many different ways. A slight shift of emphasis is all that is needed to reach an entirely different set of conclusions.

The wars conducted by Milosevic and Tadjman in the media were not necessarily successful attempts to gain support for criminal policies from uninformed and gullible citizens. They were only successful because the views of such political leaders coincided with those held by large sectors of the population, or with ideas that had been long dormant. So these bloody and highly destructive wars were not only the result of recent developments. The mentality of certain sectors of the population may have played a more fundamental role. This even applies to the gangs that were guilty of the most vile forms of ethnic cleansing. In the literature on this subject they are not only presented as a random bunch of criminals and riffraff of the kind that occur in all societies, but reference is also made to their primitive nationalism and ethnic racism. They delighted in expressing this by their speech, behaviour, exotic costumes and enthusiasm for ‘turbo folk rock’ and all other forms of ‘ethno-kitsch’. Some authors also point out that many of these individuals were from doslavi families. These immigrants from mainly mountainous areas had colonized other areas or cities in post-1945 Yugoslavia. They were reputedly more receptive to ethnic paranoia than the starosedeoeci, people who had lived in the same place for generations.²⁸⁷

It is no simple matter to evaluate the true merit of such statements. There have been no in-depth socio-psychological studies on the contemporary Balkan mentality or the national character of the Serbs. There is a general recognition of the important role played by historical myths in the ethnonationalism of Serbs or Croats. However, there is also a marked tendency to deny the existence of a relationship between the violence of the Yugoslavian wars and the existence of a type of 'Balkan Man'. Few recent academic studies have attempted to characterize the inhabitants of mountainous regions of the Balkan peninsula, but Dennis Hupchick for instance stated that they are characterized 'by extremes in their expression – communal generosity and stubborn territoriality; overt hospitality and brutal atrocity, bouts of fun loving enjoyment and irrational violence. All exhibit one common characteristic: a sense of passionate, tenacious, microcultural pride'.²⁸⁸ Such a characterization is strongly reminiscent of Jovan Cvijic's 'Dinarian Man'. Cvijic (1865-1927) was a famous Serbian geographer who taught at the Sorbonne and who was highly respected throughout Western Europe. According to Cvijic, the Dinarians (the original inhabitants of the Dinaric Alps) were a distinct human race, to which the Serbs belonged. They were energetic and impulsive, devoted to the traditions of their ancestors, filled with patriotic zeal, prepared to kill large numbers of Turks and to recapture Kosovo. Cvijic used his academic studies to 'prove' the rightness of the Serbian claim to Macedonia.²⁸⁹

As we have already seen, Cvijic's enthusiasm for the southern Slav mountain-dwellers was shared by many contemporary Western travellers and writers. It is strange, however, that around 1900 the same combination of extreme traits of character was also attributed to the Russians, who lived in wide open spaces. The latter were said to possess a 'sirokaja natura' or 'wide nature'.²⁹⁰ Cvijic's racist and nationalistic theories, together with contemporary Western attempts to construct a sort of Homo balcanicus influenced serious scholarship up to and even after the Second World War²⁹¹. Although such concepts also had their critics,²⁹² the literature on Yugoslavia published in the decades before its disintegration reveals that 'a Balkan mentality' is not only an academic construct, a literary topos or an imaginary image, but that it does to some extent really exist.

A number of serious historical and ethnographic studies of the clans or extended families of living Serbs and Montenegrins described their martial behaviour (junastvo) and their code of honour (obraz), part of which was their tremendous hospitality. The harshness of their impoverished and constantly threatened existence produced a society with markedly egalitarian values where only the males' abilities as warriors counted. These extended families were much larger than our modern nuclear families and were ruled by a system of patriarchal authority, with women and children at the bottom of the pecking order. Infanticide, patricide and fratricide occurred on a regular basis. In certain parts of southern Serbia, the practice of lapot persisted into the 20th century. This was the public liquidation, at the hands of their own children, of parents who had become surplus to requirement.²⁹³ Like Albania, Montenegro also had a strong tradition of blood feuds. The Serbs' and Montenegrins' long history of extremely violent raids and rebellions is well known, as are their activities in haiduk gangs or as mercenaries in the pay of Byzantium, the Ottoman Empire, Venice, the Habsburg Empire and Russia. Their lengthy folk poetry endorsed their militant lifestyle. These poems kept alive the hatred for the Turks, the traditional enemy, and the memory of regions such as Kosovo that had once been inhabited and administered by Serbs. They also inspired individuals to acts of manly heroism (coistvo). In this vein the Montenegrin poet, prince and bishop Petar Petrovic Njegos wrote his Gorski vijenac (The Mountain Wreath, 1847). This epic poem is a glorification of the 18th century mass murder of fellow-countrymen who had converted to Islam.²⁹⁴ It is still venerated as the most important literary product of the Serbs and Montenegrins.²⁹⁵

It remains difficult, however, to determine the significance of Serbian social habits and culture, and its influence on the history of the Balkans. Other Balkan peoples were also the victims and perpetrators of terror and barbaric instances of ethnic cleansing. Although no precise figures are available, it is estimated that the victims and refugees of the 1875-78 crisis numbered about one and a half million. With regard to the 1912-1970 period, a figure of 12-14 million out of a total population (for Yugoslavia, Romania, Greece and Bulgaria) of about 50 million has been mentioned.²⁹⁶ The Bulgarians, Greeks, Albanians and Croats also had an agricultural lifestyle coupled with a tradition of folklore dominated by the struggle against the Turks and sometimes also the same heroes (such as Prince Marko). However, the literature consulted gives the impression that ancient oral epic traditions have not shaped the latter countries' national consciousness to the same extent as they have that of the Serbs and Montenegrins.

The only other European people to have been so deeply influenced by such folk poetry are the Finns. A comparison between Finland and Serbia in this respect is instructive. The region of East Karelia, which since the Middle Ages, has been a part of Russia has had the same emotional significance for Finnish nationalism as does Kosovo for the Serbs. The Kalevala, the Finnish national epic poem published in 1835, was a compilation of epic songs sung by illiterate Finnish bards in Russian Karelia. It was only here, among Finnish Orthodox Christians, that this oral tradition was still alive and kicking as recently as 1800. In the western areas, among Lutheran Finns, the tradition had largely been lost. For this reason, the Finns have come to see East Karelia as the cradle of Finnish culture. Such was the power of the Kalevala's romance and the myth of Karelianism that the Finns allied themselves with the Germans in both world wars in an attempt to recapture this region from the Russians.

The differences between Serbian and Finnish nationalism are no less striking. Prior to the disintegration of Yugoslavia, Serbian nationalists complained that their people always tended to win the war but lose the peace. The Finns lost both wars for East Karelia, and for many years after 1945 their sovereignty was restricted by the Soviet Union (Finlandization). However, they did manage to win the peace. Finland had been one of the poorest countries in Europe, it received no Marshall aid and was also obliged to pay substantial reparations to the Soviet Union. The successful modernization of the country was therefore a victory of political realism over romantic nationalism. This may have been easier for the Finns than it was for the Serbs, since their folk poetry was not permeated with hate for the Swedes or the Russians, who had ruled over them for so long. In the Kalevala, heroes such as Ilmarinen and Väinämöinen are just as dominant as the robber prince Marko or Obilic the sultan-slayer in Serbian folk poetry. However, the epic poem of the Finns lacks the excessive savagery of its Serbian counterpart. Its leading themes are sorcery and animism, rather than battle and violence. Furthermore, the events take place in a vague and unrecognizable past.²⁹⁷

How can we account for this difference? North-West Europe is a region of great linguistic diversity. Here, extremely divergent families of languages exist in close proximity to one another. Orthodoxy has existed alongside Catholicism and Lutheranism for centuries. Political boundaries in these regions are the result of centuries of power politics and sabre rattling. The criminal politics of Stalin and Hitler have left an indelible mark here. Yet this region's history contains few, if any, episodes of ethnic cleansing. It is far from being the regularly repeated phenomenon that it is in the Balkans. The Finns have never been guilty of this. This may be due to the fact that most of the peoples in the north-west have lived in a given area for thousands of years, and they still inhabit these areas today. This territory was thinly populated, and the subsequent penetration of Germans into the Baltic countries and of Russians into Finnish-Ugric-speaking regions meant that the original population was not driven out en masse.²⁹⁸

If any such stability was ever present in the Balkans it was destroyed by the Turkish conquests and, later, by Austrian military campaigns. Ottoman rule resulted in the destruction of the native aristocracy, thereby compelling Serbian and Montenegrin peasants to adopt new social structures, such as tribes or clans. The large-scale displacement of populations as a result of warfare is a particularly characteristic feature of Serbian history. Even though the Serbs later tended to exaggerate the scope and drama of these events, this may nevertheless be the root cause of their militant attitude and folk culture. The Montenegrins also adopted such characteristics, because the only way in which these mountain-dwellers could hold out against the Turks was by permanent military mobilization.

The differences between Finnish and Serbian folk poetry are easier to understand when the divergent histories of North-West and South-East Europe are examined. It may be true that, as a result of this, the Finns do indeed differ from the Serbs in some ways. However, we would be confusing cause and effect if we were to take genocidal actions as evidence of Balkan peoples' savage and warlike nature and the lack of such actions as proof that northerners are essentially peace-loving. In general, the waves of ethnic cleansing that occurred in the Balkans during the 19th and 20th centuries were not spontaneous initiatives undertaken by the local population. They were state-sponsored campaigns prompted by imported western notions of romantic nationalism, which presupposed a homogeneous population within the borders of a state.

Nevertheless, it can at least be concluded that the mentality and culture of a people like the Serbs certainly did not help to moderate the violent developments in the Balkans.²⁹⁹ It is no coincidence that Gavrilo Princip, the man who assassinated Archduke Franz Ferdinand in 1914, had learned Njegos's Mountain Wreath by heart. At that time, most Serbs lived in rural areas, with a lifestyle that had not changed in generations. Even Princip, a young intellectual, had this type of background. The Montenegrin peasants lived in a harsh and cruel world, and were always armed. They were still around during the youth of Milovan Djilas, who was just 17 years younger than Princip, and his memoirs contain accurate descriptions of these soldier/brigands.³⁰⁰ This Communist leader also knew The Mountain Wreath inside out and wrote a reverential study about Njegos. In addition to personally cutting prisoners' throats and showing himself to be a passionate proponent of executions without trial, he made black marketeering and similar offences punishable by death.³⁰¹

Of course, examples of such unusual characters shed little or no light on the behaviour of all Serbs or Montenegrins. Although Den Doolaard reported that portraits of Njegos still adorned many a farmhouse wall, and that even humble shepherds read his poem,³⁰² their characteristic lifestyle was a reaction to a given set of temporary circumstances. It was, therefore, subject to changes and swings in intensity, especially during the 20th century, under the influence of urbanization, industrialization, the mechanization of agriculture, increased social mobility, contact with Western tourists and trips abroad. All of these, together with the propaganda for Yugoslavian and Communist versions of national values, myths and symbols, resulted in the erosion of traditional local cultures and ways of doing things. The literature that has been examined contains contradictory reports concerning its magnitude and extent. According to Eekman, by the start of the 1950s 'oral epic poetry was as good as dead', even though many elderly village peasants were still able to recite many of these songs. Eekman expressed the view that the ancient squabbles between Serbs and Croats had become quite harmless.³⁰³ However, Doder writes that the inhabitants of Serbian villages in the Krajina region immediately started arming themselves during the 'Croatian spring', the nationalist revival of 1971, which was forcefully suppressed by Tito.³⁰⁴

Studies of Serbian and Montenegrin villages, carried out by Boehm and Halpern during the 1960s, reveal the persistence of ancient social patterns and nationalist sentiments. Even though the size of peasant households in the Sumadija³⁰⁵ almost halved between 1860 and 1960 (from an average of 8.3 to 4.5 family members), this did not amount to a real dissolution of the extended family. The ancient songs about Kosovo were still known (or had been rediscovered) by young and old. Furthermore, most families held the traditional annual celebrations in commemoration of their ancestors (the slava), although this sometimes occurred in the guise of the May Day celebrations. Among villagers there was still an intense patriotism (an 'ongoing sense of pride') and a need to identify themselves with a tradition of heroic struggle. They retained lively recollections of the tragedies that had taken place during the Second World War. Sound fieldwork carried out by the anthropologist Mart Bax drew attention to the mali rat (the little war) between Serbs and Croats (and between Croats themselves) in Medjugorje, the Bosnian place of pilgrimage. This consisted of long-established and virtually uninterrupted traditions of rivalry, vengeance and murderous violence.

The increasing similarity between urban and rural societies not only resulted in the disappearance of a 'distinctive rural subculture'. The 'urbanization of the villages' was accompanied by the 'peasantization of the towns', caused by the massive movement of rural populations to the cities, a phenomenon also characterized as 'rurbanization'. There was a drastic reduction in the influence of magical practices and religious customs, while daily life became more modern, more commercialized and more luxurious. Many people found this less satisfying than their previous existence and, during the 1960s, they started to rediscover their own past. At first this was all quite innocent, involving the opening of museums, the setting up local monuments and the more frequent singing of ancient songs. 'Kinship and ethnicity, never discarded and now reinforced, remained vital.'³⁰⁷

Thus there was a revival of traditional standards and values among the Serbian population, together with renewed interest in their own culture and history. This all took place twenty years before the nationalistic ‘backlash’ by Serbian intellectuals in the 1980s that features extensively in virtually every book on the disintegration of Yugoslavia. This whole development tends to reinforce the above-mentioned interpretation by Wachtel. In the intervening years, Tito’s state had given up its attempts to create a single, unified national culture. The Communists had to accept that Yugoslavia was genuinely multicultural in nature. Naturally, they made a virtue of necessity and presented cultural variety as a sign of strength under the slogan ‘unity in diversity’.³⁰⁸

However, in reality this led to a huge increase in the autonomy and mutual rivalry of the various Yugoslav states. All government posts were carefully assigned in accordance with an ethnic key. At the same time the individual prosperity that had been so laboriously achieved began to unravel, and life became increasingly uncertain. As mentioned above, these developments caused some people to realize that they were Yugoslav, first and foremost, but it is more logical to assume that the majority of their countrymen were inclined towards the opposite reaction. In that case, Serbian intellectuals made no attempt to push the people in a new direction. They simply reflected the widespread ethnic consciousness that had returned after a long period of absence or had, perhaps, always been present.

Their activities were nevertheless of crucial importance, since they smashed the Communist-Yugoslavian taboos. Ivo Andric, who won the Nobel Prize for Literature, was elevated by Tito’s regime to something of a national cultural icon. It didn’t matter that he wasn’t a Communist and that his work dealt primarily with the painful, tragic and often violent aspects of a society driven by ethnic differences. He was considered acceptable because he incorporated ‘a central, nation-building message’ into books such as The bridge over the Drina. Andric suggested that it would ultimately prove possible to overcome the differences and that the unpleasant past could be accepted in a de-mystified form through ‘the existence of an overarching truth that links peoples and groups who think they have no common ground’. Initially, virtually all Croatian and Serbian writers conveyed this type of Yugoslavian message. From the 1970s onwards, however, they developed into nationalists who were devoted to the destruction of supra-ethnic values. That was the end of the Communist ideal of ‘brotherhood and unity’. From then on their own people came first.³⁰⁹

Serbia went further than the other nations in this regard. Its literature came to be dominated by themes such as the violence and injustice that had been inflicted on Serbia (especially between 1941 and 1945), the Croats’ hatred of the Serbs (which was exceeded only by that of the Yugoslavian Muslims) and the glorification of ancient Serbian traditions. The novel Nož (Knife), by Vuk Draskovic, resembles a version of The Mountain Wreath set in the Second World War, although it lacks the literary quality of the original. Such books were well received by a wide range of ‘low- and middle-brow readers’. This was especially true of the work of a well-known and established novelist like Dobrica Cosic. He also played a leading role in the infamous, ultra-nationalistic statement issued by the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1986. In works like The Chazar Dictionary, typically ‘high-brow authors’ like Milorad Pavic demonstrated, in a veiled and post-modernistic way, the impracticability of Yugoslavian unity. Draskovic and Cosic were soon to occupy important positions in Serbian politics, and even Pavic openly expressed his support for Milosevic.³¹⁰

In this way, the tables were turned and times changed in the Serbian cultural and political landscape. To use Simic’s terms, a new ‘normative zone’ had been created, which was used to determine who was ‘good’ and who was ‘bad’. Here was the entire gamut of past nationalistic traditions, symbols, attitudes, political views and mythological interpretations of the past, all restored to their former glory. Culture and power, the elite and the common people were united with one another by favourable sentiments concerning their own ethnic group and by unfavourable views concerning outsiders. The objective was a larger, more powerful Serbia. The minority who opposed this development were politically and socially marginalized. Anyone expressing a dissenting view encountered an increasingly unpleasant backlash. This climate favoured the fomentation of a hysterical mood in response to the perilous position of the Serbs in Kosovo. This in turn helped to bring Slobodan Milosevic to power.

The new political leader and his cronies made use of their supporters in the population to seize power in Kosovo, Vojvodina and Montenegro, and to strengthen their control of the federal army. Serbian society was whipped into a state of national psychosis by a series of events, most of which were carefully staged. The simultaneous victory of nationalist/separatist movements in Croatia and Slovenia made war virtually inevitable. Large-scale, highly intensive political manipulation was required to achieve a situation in which all parties were prepared to resort to force. However, this would not have achieved the desired effect if citizens had been less receptive to the ethnic/nationalistic message.

The Serbs and Croats had a marked propensity for distancing themselves, as civilized Europeans, from the 'semi-Asian' Serbs. However, this was more than equalled by the way in which the Serbs, as Christian Europeans, wanted to distinguish themselves from the 'barbaric' Yugoslavian Muslims.³¹¹ At the same time, the Serbs continued to impress upon foreign visitors that Serbian identity and history were just too different to be comprehensible to Western Europeans. 'Obstinate otherness', or the deep-seated need to be different from other ethnic groups³¹², was widespread among Serbs. It must therefore be accepted as a major element in the fatal developments that occurred prior to 1991, and thereafter. During the 1980s, the erosion of the totalitarian system in Yugoslavia meant that citizens could no longer be compelled to toe the line. The Yugoslavia one-party state was in an advanced stage of decay. Strong public support was needed if the country was to discard this system and switch to an entirely different political situation. Appeals to ethnic solidarity proved to be an extremely effective means of winning over a majority of voters in Serbia, Croatia and Slovenia.

The release of accumulated ethnic tensions in Yugoslavia, in eruptions of excessive violence, was by no means unique in the history of this peninsula. The fact that this has occurred at regular intervals to some extent justifies statements about 'ancient hatreds' and 'deeper traits of character presumably from a distant tribal past'³¹³. In a sense, it also supports the 'Balkan Man' school of thought. However, such generalized qualifications tend to gloss over both the complexity of the region's past and the elusive phenomenon of ethnic identity. Many Western observers consider merciless nationalism to be the true characteristic of the Balkans. History shows, however, that this phenomenon usually 'has only ever been sustainable for brief periods by governments before it begins to soften, then fragment and finally decay.'³¹⁴ In other words, from time to time, violence-prone Balkan Man suddenly pops up all over the place, only to disappear again. During the intervals between these upheavals, the various ethnic groups live relatively peacefully with or alongside one another.

For this reason, the notion that ethnicity is purely a question of a rigid tradition, unalterable dependence and deep conviction on the part of numerous, clearly demarcated groups of people needs to be amended. The enormous contrasts and fluctuations that characterize the history of the Balkans result from the complex distribution of different population groups throughout the area, from the Ottoman heritage and from the incomplete Europeanization of the region. In comparison to Western Europe, the Balkans has remained a poverty-stricken region, most of whose inhabitants are condemned to a harsh, hand-to-mouth existence. Although the state assumed Western parliamentary forms, a truly democratic civil society failed to develop, and the citizens lacked a decent system of legal security. They were confronted with the dictatorial abuse of power, with suppression, clientelism, patronage, bribery, corruption, extortion, incompetence and inefficiency. The mainly peasant population therefore had to pay a very high price for the poorly implemented modernization of the Balkan countries.³¹⁵ Respectful civil obedience is based on the confidence that the government is serving the general interests of the nation. This characterized the pillared and segregated society of the Netherlands during the first half of the 20th century, but could not develop in the Balkans. The population of South-Eastern Europe continued to display the characteristics that so typified people's relationships with the official bodies of church and state during the Ottoman period: bachsıs (distrust), iavaslık (lethargic submissiveness) and kismet (fatalism).³¹⁶

The uncertainty of everyday existence caused people to identify strongly with the interests of their own family and to adopt a defensive, if not xenophobic, attitude to outsiders. Loyalty to one's own small group of relatives was always more important than ethnic solidarity. Ethnicity was very strongly rooted in some groups, while others had only a faint awareness of it, or paid it lip service for utilitarian reasons. Dishonesty, deception, lies and deceit were all permissible tools in the struggle to survive in a hostile outside world. In practice, ethnic and religious boundaries were sometimes frayed and vague. Many marginal groups arose who had integrated the habits and practices of various cultures into their daily lives. Religious syncretism was much more common than doctrinal piety. Among the Serbs there was also a striking mixture of heathen magic and Christian practices. The church served as the most important repository of national culture, but its saints could also offer protection to Muslims, Catholics or gypsies. The literature repeatedly makes reference to the fact that, as a religious institute, the church played a rather insignificant role in the spiritual life of Serbs and Montenegrins during the 19th and 20th centuries. Village churches were unobtrusive and small, and they were not regularly attended. Village priests had little authority, and people were as distrustful of the senior incumbents of the state church as they were of worldly authorities. An opinion poll held in 1985 showed that no more than eleven percent of the population of Serbia, Montenegro and Vojvodina stated that they were religious.³¹⁷

In times of profound change, increasing uncertainty and danger, people seek any means of protection and tend to 'go with the flow'. Large groups of citizens are immediately prepared to renounce the symbols and practices of a discredited regime or leader, and to offer their support to a new patron, preferably the most powerful individual. 'In modern conditions, with the mass media, this means that they will carefully emulate what the 'most' authoritative voice – His Master's Voice – tells them to think and believe.'³¹⁸ This results either in a greater emphasis of dependence on traditional ethical values or a more ostentatious display of adherence to a given religion. In order to avoid persecution or being driven away from their village, people will (if possible) adopt an entirely different ethnic or religious identity. This behaviour does not necessarily have much to do with these people's genuine feelings or religious conviction: '... the more menacing the power, the thicker the mask.' Such chameleon-like behaviour has been a regularly-recurring feature in the history of the whole of Eastern Europe. Elsewhere also, sudden changes at the top of the political pyramid were associated with the continuation of despotism, poverty and dependence. It was essential to make the correct political choices, and to do so quickly.³¹⁹

It seems, therefore, that many inhabitants of the Balkans are capable of considerable adaptive flexibility. However, anyone who supposes that this characteristic would enable the rapid reconstruction of healthy, multicultural societies in Kosovo, Bosnia and Macedonia under international supervision would probably be in for a disappointment. The ability to use ethnic and political mimicry is directly related to the destruction and violence that characterized so many Balkan conflicts. Nothing is more important in this world of pretence and sham than the national symbols, ethnic marks and religious beacons. It is these things that delineate and fill the 'normative zone'. They provide direction and clarity. It is imperative that both this abstract territory and the nation's actual physical territory be clear and pure. They must be free of any confusing or contaminating elements. This is why Serbs are not permitted to live on Croat land and why all mosques on Serbian soil must be destroyed. Many individuals were willing and able to demonstrate their loyalty to their fatherland by assisting with the cleansings. They have seldom been carried out as thoroughly as in the most recent of the Yugoslavian conflicts.

These conflicts were much worse than many previous eruptions of ethnic violence, primarily because they lasted much longer. The Balkan wars at the start of the 20th century were bloody, but the first lasted only for a couple of months and the second for no more than a month. In terms of their nature, duration and scope, only the events of the Second World War were of a comparable order of magnitude. The population was never given the opportunity of properly coming to terms with the tragic events that occurred between 1941 and 1945. This would have required lengthy and thorough historical research. Such studies were initially impeded by the Communist regime, and subsequently by the nationalist hysteria that succeeded Tito's administration. However, the Second World War taught all Yugoslavs that ethnicity can be a very perilous thing indeed. Half a century later the ongoing fear of a possible repetition, coupled with the need to be permanently alert to such developments, had the effect of a self-fulfilling prophecy. Now people have to come to terms with the repetition of these events as well. This is an enormous barrier to the restoration of normal social and political relations.

At the end of this account, the break-up of Yugoslavia appears to have been caused by a remarkably tangled series of diametrically opposed forces. These included the conflicts between traditional indigenous cultures, the unbridgeable gap and constant interplay between mountain dwellers, rural and urban populations, or between doslaci and starosedeooci, as well as attempts to introduce westernization and modernization in all these population groups. Other factors were the interweaving of internal political conflicts and international meddling, or the significance of political manipulation of the population by unbridled political powers on the one hand and the dependence of such rulers on the mentality and opinions of their common supporters on the other. Finally, closely-knit family life and ancient village communities existed within an extremely dominant state. This led to a situation in which highly stable forms of ethnic dependence and political loyalty existed side by side with highly changeable, bizarre variants of these characteristics.

We will just have to be satisfied with the fact that determining the origins and effects of complex events is not the strong suit of the historical profession. In the Netherlands, four centuries of historical study have failed to identify the 'real' causes of the Dutch rebellion against Spain. In this context, one commentator pointed out that 'Large-scale historical events are generally so complex and polysemantic that causal explanations are not merely inadequate, they are utterly pointless. The only thing that we can do when confronted with phenomena of this kind is to study those factors that seem to have contributed to the development of the historic event. It is wrong to give the impression that we can indicate whether they caused the event in question and, if so, the extent to which they were responsible.'³²⁰ Accordingly, it has never been my aim to identify all of the riddles of the Yugoslavian conflict, let alone solve them.

Similarly, I do not believe that it would be useful - or even possible - to cut through the Gordian knot of image and reality once and for all. I have thus attempted to unravel these tangled webs a little bit. I also trust that I have been able to make clear that it is not necessary to decide whether or not to accept the existence of 'Balkan Man', or whether or not to accept the existence of 'ancient ethnic hatreds'. What is vitally important, however, is to realize exactly what we want such terms to mean. The distinctive history of the Balkans has led to the development of sharp ethnic contrasts. It has also given rise to a mentality (or mentalities) in large sections of the population that differs from the Western European frame of mind. In attempting to visualize this, we usually fail to allow for their enormous range of variation and for the fact that they are in a state of constant flux. The image is reality fossilized into a stereotype. Whenever those using a particular image feel that it has been overtaken by events, and is therefore unsound, they simply opt for a new cliché. However, such choices are also determined by certain habits and historical traditions. Although direct observation of objective reality remains impossible, the study of image formation allows one to recognize such clichés as platitudes, and to distinguish between them and genuine attempts to adopt a more candid approach to reality.

Notes

¹ Shakespeare, Hamlet, Act III, Scene II.

² Holbrooke, War, 21.

³ Ibidem, 22.

⁴ Owen, Odyssey, 3, 5.

⁵ Ibidem, 23. Western observers were not alone in believing Bosnia's ethnic conflicts to be unbridgeable. Long before the outbreak of the Bosnian conflict, Yugoslavs referred to this area as 'krava Bosna' or 'Bloody Bosnia'.

⁶ Other Balkan Wars, 7.

⁷ Ibidem, 13.

⁸ Ibidem, 14.

⁹ Quoted by Todorova, Balkans, 185.

¹⁰ Kaplan, Ghosts, xxiii.

¹¹ Ibidem, xvi.

¹² For details about Ambler see: Goldworthy, Ruritania, 109.

¹³ Holbrooke, War, 23.

¹⁴ West, Black Lamb, 280. See also pages 288, 302, 309 and 316-7.

¹⁵ Holbrooke, War, 23-24, 366-68.

¹⁶ Ibidem, 165.

¹⁷ Ibidem, 22.

¹⁸ Leerssen, 'The allochronic periphery', 285.

¹⁹ Leerssen, 'L'effet de typique', 131.

²⁰ See: Bauer, Soviet system, 157 onwards

²¹ Ibidem, 161.

²² See Gorskij, Mental'nost'. (also for additional references)

²³ The notion that our understanding of reality is based on a construction, was popularized by Berger and Luckman in Social Construction.

²⁴ See: Said, Orientalism and Said, Culture. For a reliable follower see: Kabbani, Myths. For a different vision, see: Sharafuddin, Islam. Said's one-sided position and indignant tone generated a great deal of criticism. See, for example: Daniel, 'Edward Said', 211-222. My main objection is that Said restricts himself too much to the 19th century and to the Near East, and that his interpretation of the concept of orientalism is too narrow. Said tends to gloss over the fact that 'orientophilia' existed even in Ancient times. He also passes over the fear of Eastern barbarians that has existed ever since. He does not appreciate that Eastern Europe was also orientalized by the West, and that in the case of Russia (which was never subjugated by the West) the connection between orientalization and imperialism is hardly relevant. For details of this, see Chapter II below. For details of the inadequacy of Said's views, in terms of providing a better understanding of the Western image of the Balkans, see: Allcock, 'Constructing the Balkans', 173 onwards.

²⁵ Cited by Friedman, Bosnian Muslims, 1, 5.

²⁶ Moynihan, Pandaemonium, 22.

²⁷ Huntington, 'Clash of civilisations', 22-49.

²⁸ See, for example: Naarden, 'Het Westen' ('The West'), 331-2; Boer, 'Reactie' ('Reaction'), 390-1.

²⁹ See: Barfoot, Beyond Pug's Tour, 2.

³⁰ The following statement by Tudjman is symptomatic. 'The Yugoslav experience showed that the cultural and geopolitical divides and constraints turned out to be decisive - so strong that the common state proved not viable. The current fault-line overlaps with those of the Roman Empire (Theodosian line), between Rome, Byzantium, and Islam, as well as with the region where this divide of civilizations is most palpable, Bosnia-Herzegovina, which produced one of the most serious power crises of today.' Views concerning the superior, Catholic and western civilization of a country such as Croatia were rivalled by the opinions of Serbian intellectuals such as Milorad Pavic, concerning the excellence of the Orthodox culture. Similar sentiments were being expressed by Islamic clergymen and intellectuals in Bosnia. See: Tindeman's, Unfinished Peace, 16. See also Kaplan's account of his conversation with the Croat journalist Slavenka Drakulic about the clash of civilizations in Yugoslavia. (Kaplan, Ghosts, 6-7).

³¹ Roosens, Creating Ethnicity, 123.

³² Ibidem, 156.

³³ Cited by Kamp, 'De weg naar complementariteit' ('The road to complementarity'), 176.

³⁴ Formulation of Benthem van den Bergh, 'De kracht van het symbool' ('The power of symbols'), 228. Leerssen, 'Over nationale identiteit' ('On national identity'), 420.

³⁶ Hofstede achieved this with his Institute for Research on Intercultural Co-operation at the University of Limburg, the Netherlands. The same was true of Tilburg University where, in 1990, a European values study was carried out into the cultural similarities and differences between 16 countries. See: Stokvis, 'Beeldvorming, stereotypen en karakteristieken' ('Formation of images, stereotypes and characteristics'), 279-288; Schnabel, 'God in vele landen' ('God in many countries').

³⁷ It is no coincidence that objections of this kind are mainly made against the history of mentality, which examines topics that are related to the common character of a people or to national identity. This is 'one of the most difficult branches of historiography', because it 'requires empathy [...] a deliberate attempt to set aside one's own cultural assumptions that is not easy to attain.' Furthermore, mentalities are extremely 'volatile' research topics, and cannot be measured directly. The source material provides only their 'partial and coloured reaction to culture'. See: Frijhoff, 'Impasses en beloften' ('Impasses and promises'), 407 and 409. See also: Bertels, 'skepsis' ('scepticism'), 155-166. The importance of the study of mentalities is also recognized by socio-economic historians, who work with 'hard' data. One of the comments made on this issue by David S. Landes, the author of the book The wealth and poverty of nations, was 'If we have been able to learn anything from the history of economic development, it is that culture makes an enormous difference (in this regard, Max Weber was quite right).' Witness the entrepreneurial zeal of exiled minorities - the Chinese in East and South-East Asia, the Indians in East Africa, the Lebanese in West Africa, Jews and Calvinists throughout almost the whole of Europe, etc. Academics tend to be deterred, however, by culture in the sense of the inner values and mentality that direct a people. It reeks of race and origins - as if nothing can ever be changed [...] The technicians prefer the concrete approach: changing interest rates and exchange rates, freeing-up trade, changing political institutions, governance. In addition, when we criticize someone's culture they may feel that their ego, identity and self respect are under attack.' David S. Landes, Arm en Rijk, (The wealth and poverty of nations) 542-543.

³⁸ Stokvis, 'Nationale identiteit' ('National identity'), 287.

³⁹ Van den Kamp, 'De weg naar complementariteit' ('The road to complementarity'), 180-1.

⁴⁰ Benthem van den Berg, 'De kracht van het symbool' ('The power of symbols'), 228-230. With regard to Anderson's view of nations as an 'imagined community' Daniel Kofman comments that: 'However 'creative' imagination can be, an underlying assumption lingers that there is a 'real' substratum of nationless individuals against which one 'imagines' the mental construct of national identity. But one would have to imbibe a heavy dose of materialism [...] to take nationless individuals as less 'imaginary' than the thickly described and self-identifying people we know.' D. Kofman, 'Israel and the War in Bosnia', 120.

⁴¹ One work that provides a unique and instructive attempt to examine Russia without such prejudice is Kontakt met de vijand (Contact with the enemy) by Kees Verheul.

⁴² Leerssen once appealed to E.H.Kossmann to be able to describe a people's characteristics as 'historical artefacts'. It is therefore remarkable that the latter also points out actual differences between the Belgians and the Dutch. During a series of lectures dedicated to the Belgian, Johan Fleerackers, he denied that a national identity can arise spontaneously from history. He also made the following remark about Fleerackers 'if he had been Dutch he would perhaps have been caught up by that people's longstanding, supreme optimism that the state would be able to fundamentally reform society by means of legislation. He was Belgian, however, and he knew that Belgians have good historical reasons for distrusting the government. As a highly placed administrator in the civil service he considered such a distrust misplaced, but accepted that it was compellingly present. E.H.Kossmann, Een tuchteloos probleem (An unruly problem), 10.

⁴³ Hay, Europe, 2, 5, 10, 14, 21. According to the English chronicle writer, William of Malmesbury, on the occasion of his call for the First Crusade Pope Urbanus II addressed the faithful as follows 'You inhabitants of temperate regions'. (Vos estis gens in temperationibus mundi provinciis oriunda). Hay, Op.cit., 32.

⁴⁴ See: Zacharasiewicz, Klimatheorie (Climate theory), 16.

⁴⁵ Febvre, Terre, 2-10, 108-111. Martin and James, All possible Worlds, 102-105.

⁴⁶ Stanzel, Europäer, 28-33, 44-55.

⁴⁷ See: Febvre, Terre, 12-34, 58-73, 112-135. Claval, Geschiedenis aardrijkskunde (Historical geography), 29-36.

⁴⁸ For Huntington see: Martin, Huntington. For details of his ideas about climate and Britain, see: Huntington, Principles, 408-416, 722-723, for example.

⁴⁹ Stanzel, Europäer, 95-99.

⁵⁰ For a summary and further references, see: Naarden, Socialist Europe, Chapter 1, and Naarden, 'Dutchmen', 1-20.

⁵¹ It should be noted here that serfdom prior to 1800 was still common in the Habsburg countries and in parts of Europe to the east of the Elbe. It was far less common in the Balkans, however. Todorova mentions 'the existence of a relatively free peasantry' as one of the beneficial results of Ottoman rule, which was characteristic of all Balkan societies on the eve of their independence. She cites Romania as an exception, but Bosnia should also have been included, since bondage continued to exist in that country right up until its incorporation into Yugoslavia. Todorova, Balkans, 172. See also note 81.

⁵² See: Wolff, Inventing Eastern Europe.

⁵³ Jahn, Russophilie; Todorova, Balkans, 111.

⁵⁴ See: Hollander, Political pilgrims.

⁵⁵ See, for example: Soergel, Arbeiterselbstverwaltung; Schrenk, Yugoslavia. Self-management Socialism; Lilge, Arbeiterselbstverwaltung; Meister, Où va l'autogestion yougoslave? For details of the responses in the Netherlands, see Chapter III below.

⁵⁶ Todorova, Balkans, 13.

⁵⁷ Goldworthy, Ruritania, 9.

⁵⁸ Todorova, Balkans, 6.

⁵⁹ See: Malia, Russia under Western Eyes, 127-130.

⁶⁰ In other words, the difference of opinion that existed in the 19th century between the proponents of a future united Germany without Austria, and those who opposed this view, who felt that the Habsburg empire should also be included.

⁶¹ See: Droz, Europe centrale; Schöpflin, In Search of Central Europe; Lord, Central Europe.

⁶² He also wondered 'Can we get back to the state of affairs in which the Slovaks return to their natural job of scrubbing windows, the Romanians are confined to the exercise of their only national industry (which, according to Lord D'Abernon's statement in an official memorandum, is fornication), the Poles are restricted to piano playing and the white slave traffic, and the Serbs are controlled in their great national activity - organizing political murders on foreign territory?' Cited in: Burgess, Divided Europe, 54-55.

⁶³ Haslam, The Soviet Union and the Struggle for Collective Security, 190. Simms, 'Bosnia', 74.

⁶⁴ About Poles: 'J.M. Keynes, the theorist of modern capitalism, called it 'an economic impossibility whose only industry is Jew baiting'. [The historian] Lewis Namier called it 'pathological'. [The historian] E.H. Carr called it 'a farce'. [The former British Prime Minister] Lloyd George talked of 'a historic failure'. [...] In 1939 he announced that 'Poland had deserved its fate'.' Davies, God's Playground, Vol. II, p. 393. See also: Forster, 'Britain and East Central Europe', 112 onwards.

⁶⁵ See: Craig Nation, 'Balkan Images', 30, 32.

⁶⁶ Dittrich, Midden-Europa? See also: Naarden, 'De identiteit van Centraal-Europa' ('The identity of Central Europe'); Roobol, 'Central Europe'.

⁶⁷ See: Kinsky, 'Central Europe', 155 and Renner, 'Midden-Europese paradoxen' (Central European paradoxes).

⁶⁸ For further details, see Chapter IV below.

⁶⁹ See, for example: Ebels-Hoving, Byzantium. Petkov, Infidels. Naarden, Spiegel, 15, 17.

⁷⁰ See, for example: Naarden, 'Education' and Naarden, 'Ljev Goemiljov'.

⁷¹ For Krizanic see: Eekman, Slavische dromen (Slavic dreams); Eekman, Juraj, Krizanic

⁷² See: Milokovic-Djuric, Panslavism. Todorova, Balkans, 83-88.

⁷⁴ Jelavich, Establishment; Thaden, Russia.

⁷⁵ Todorova, Balkans, 69.

⁷⁶ For further details on this matter, see Chapter IV below.

⁷⁶ See: Kann, Peoples, 3-22, 476-492.

⁷⁷ Taylor, Habsburg monarchy, 11. According to Alan Palmer, Metternich liked to repeat this 'slightly tedious joke' in various forms. He even considered his own summer residence, which was situated in an eastern suburb of Vienna, to be the 'ultimate frontier of civilized Europe'. Palmer, Metternich, 286. In a letter to Princess Mélanie written in 1836 he made the following statement about Hungary: 'Les pays, les lois qui le régissent, les moeurs, les usages sont en arrière de plusieurs siècles du reste de l'Europe.' Erzébet Andics who uses this quote, comments: 'Eine der Hauptquellen von Metternichs Irrtümern in Bezug auf Ungarn war die irrealer Wertung, d.h. die überstiegene Geringschätzung des Landes.' Andics, Metternich, 82.

⁷⁸ Dittrich, 'Oost-Europa' (Eastern Europe), 421-2.

⁷⁹ Donia, Islam, 14.

⁸⁰ The extent to which actual serfdom existed in Bosnia, in the formal and legal senses, is a matter of debate for historians. There is no discussion, however, concerning the burden of the kmets' obligations to the begs, and the backwardness of agrarian relationships. See, for example: Donia and Fine, Bosnia, 75-79, 96.

⁸¹ Other historians, however, feel that the fall of the Habsburg empire, like its German and Russian counterparts, was a result of the First World War, rather than a consequence of ethnic contrasts. See, for example: Goudoever, 'Nationaliteiten vraagstuk' (The issue of nationalities), 440-441.

⁸² J.W.von Goethe, Faust, I Theil:

Vor dem Tor: ANDRER BÜRGER:

Nichts Bessers weiss ich mir an Sonn- und Feiertagen,

Als ein Gespräch von Krieg und Kriegsgeschrei,

Wenn hinten, weit, in den Türkei,

Die Völker auf einander schlagen.

Man steht am Fenster, Trinkt sein Gläschen aus

Und sieht den Fluss hinab die bunten Schiffe gleiten;

Dann kehrt man abends froh nach Haus,

Und segnet Fried' und Friedenszeiten.

⁸³ Leeb, Fallmerayer, 55.

⁸⁴ Todorova, Balkans, 70-3; Rosdolsky, Engels.

⁸⁵ Craig, Deutsche Geschichte, 108; Dittrich, 'Bismarck und Rumänien', 38.

- ⁸⁶ Grimm, 'Balkan-Bild des Brockhaus'.
- ⁸⁷ See: Müge Göcek, East Encounters West.
- ⁸⁸ See: Delacroix, 62-81.
- ⁸⁹ Todorova, Balkans, 73-82; Goldsworthy, Ruritania, 23-4.
- ⁹⁰ Bartstra, Handboek, deel III, 93; Sas, 'Europese statenstelsel' (European state system), 243.
- ⁹¹ Cobban, History of modern France, Vol. II, 172; Pattinger Saab, Crimean Alliance, 146-7.
- ⁹² Anderson, Britain's Discovery, 124; Todorova, Balkans, 90-5.
- ⁹³ Woodhouse, Philhellenes, 37; See also: Angelamatis-Tsougarakis, Greek Revival, 85-100.
- ⁹⁴ Blake, Disraeli, 65.
- ⁹⁵ Gleason, Russophobia in Britain, 164-204.
- ⁹⁶ Thomson, England, 158.
- ⁹⁷ Todorova, Balkans, 97-8; Hadziselimovic, 'Two Victorian Ladies', 1-7.
- ⁹⁸ '...there occurred in Britain one of the deepest, most varied, and most prolonged outbursts of public feeling ever to manifest itself in a people not usually given to extravagant display of private feeling.' Millman, Britain and the Eastern Question, 176.
- ⁹⁹ See: Seton-Watson, Disraeli; Shannon, Gladstone.
- ¹⁰⁰ Todorova, Balkans, 103.
- ¹⁰¹ Ibidem, 102.
- ¹⁰² Stanzel, Europäer, 29.
- ¹⁰³ For a more extensive discussion of this literature see Goldsworthy, Ruritania, passim.
- ¹⁰⁴ Ibidem, 161-171; Todorova, Balkans, 120-1; Hodgson, 'Edith Durham. Traveller and Publicist' and June E. Hill, 'Edith Durham as a Collector' in: Allcock, Black Lambs, 8-35.
- ¹⁰⁵ Hall, Impossible Country, 9.
- ¹⁰⁶ Goldsworthy, Ruritania, 171-184; Naarden, Spiegel (Mirror), 26-27.
- ¹⁰⁷ Goldsworthy, Ruritania, 71.
- ¹⁰⁸ Namier, Facing East, 53-54.
- ¹⁰⁹ Crankshaw, Fall of Habsburg, 377.
- ¹¹⁰ The Serbian day of remembrance (28 June), which commemorates the defeat by the Turks at the Battle of Blackbird Field in Kosovo, in 1389.
- ¹¹¹ The Entente camp glossed over the fact that Serbian detachments (and even a Serbian Field Marshal) fought on the Austrian side. Grmek, Nettoyage ethnique, 23; Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 149, 153; Malcolm, Kosovo, 253-4; Other Balkan Wars, 151; Jelavich, Establishment of Balkan States, 191; Emmert, Serbian Golgotha, 121 onwards.
- ¹¹² Seleskovic, Serbie dans l'opinion allemande, 8.
- ¹¹³ See, for example: Dutton, The Politics of Diplomacy.
- ¹¹⁴ For details of Seton-Watson's views, see: H. and Ch. Seton-Watson, Making of a New Europe, 61, 121, 140, 152, 175, 212-215, 300-302, 312, 323, 341. For France, see: Grmek, Nettoyage ethnique, 135-149.
- ¹¹⁵ For details of this, see: Grenzenbach, Germany's Informal Empire.
- ¹¹⁶ Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 155.
- ¹¹⁷ Rothschild, East Central Europe, 8-11, 201 onwards; Tomasevich, The Chetniks, 3-21; West, Black Lamb, 1115-1117.
- ¹¹⁸ West, Black Lamb, 1119.
- ¹¹⁹ Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 156; West, Black Lamb, 1115 onwards; Maclean, Eastern Approaches, 102 - 103.
- ¹²⁰ Emmert, Serbian Golgotha, 140-141. However, in 1947, a commemoration was held to mark the one hundredth anniversary of the publication of Gorski vijenac (The Mountain Wreath). The renowned epic poem by Petar Petrovic Njegos about the 18th century slaughter of southern Slavs who had converted to Islam. The fact that Njegos was a Montenegrin rather than a Serb or a Croat made it possible for this work to be honoured and annexed as the most important book in Yugoslavian literature. Furthermore, Tito's partisans could be portrayed as 'updated versions' of Njegos's freedom fighters. See: Wachtel, Making a Nation, 142-146. See also Chapter IV, below.

¹²¹ Rijk, Yugoslavia, 7.

¹²² Stojan Cerovic, the renowned journalist employed by the Belgrade weekly Vreme, commented that in many ways Communist Yugoslavia was closer to Europe than the republics that succeeded it, 'however much these may take pride in their democracy and European orientation.' Paul Panin quoted Cerovic in describing Tito's state as 'politisch, kulturell und ideell von dem durchsetzt, was Mitteleuropa ausmacht.' Europa im Krieg, 31.

¹²³ See: Ströhm, Obne Tito, for example.

¹²⁴ See: Hackett, Third World War. See also: Both, From Indifference to Entrapment, 80.

¹²⁵ Broekmeyer, Joegoslavië, 38-42, 46-48; Allcock, Yugoslavia, 119-120, 167-168, 294-296, 437-440.

¹²⁶ Tudjman's party saw its victory in the 1990 elections as the decisive step for the inclusion of Croatia in Central Europe, 'the region to which it has always belonged', except in the most recent past, when Croatian territory was subjected to 'an Asiatic form of government'. The same rhetoric was employed in Slovenia: 'We Slovenes have difficulty identifying ourselves with the pro-Asian or pro-African Yugoslavia. We cannot identify with such a Yugoslavia so long as we have the character that we have acquired in a thousand years of history. The symbolic fact that the rulers of the Slovenes were Charlemagne, Charles V, and Napoleon is less important: it is more important that we embodied the way of life that was created in central-western Europe.' For details of these and other citations, see: Bakic, 'Orientalist Variations', 10-11.

¹²⁷ Tindemans, Unfinished Peace, 19.

¹²⁸ Silber, Death of Yugoslavia, 198; Glenny, Fall, 26-27; Vasic, 'Black Hand, White Rose', 38.

¹²⁹ Furguson, 'Europa Nervosa', 127-132; Meyer, Jugoslawien verspielt, 423; Sadkovich, 'American Media and Balkan', 134; Mestrovic, Balkanization, 43,51; Conversi, 'Moral Relativism' 244-281; Ramet, Balkan Babel, 22, 24, 259, 264; Hoffman, 'Yugoslavia: Implications for Europe', 114-115; Woodward, Balkan Tragedy, 104-195, 156-157, 176-177; NRC, De verwoesting (The devastation), 7, 36-37; Rohde, Endgame, 24-25.

¹³⁰ Cited by Merrill, Old Bridge, 12.

¹³¹ See above, in the section entitled 'The image of Eastern Europe'.

¹³² Ullman, 'The Wars in Yugoslavia', 16.

¹³³ G.F. Treverton, 'The new Europe', 105.

¹³⁴ See: Mestrovic, Genocide After Emotion, 18-19, 170; Mestrovic, Balkanisation, 31; Holbrooke, War, 65; Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 161; Franchet, Casque bleu pour rien, 126; Glucksman, 'Le Rouge et le Brun', 69.

¹³⁵ Howorth, 'The debate in France', 112; Lukic, Europe from the Balkans, 266-267.

¹³⁶ Cited by Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 161. The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, one of the most important newspapers in Germany, is considered to be largely responsible for creating a pro-Croatian and anti-Serbian mood there. See: Woodward, Balkan Tragedy, 149.

¹³⁷ Grmek, Nettoyage ethnique, 190, note 2.

¹³⁸ One of them, Alain Finkelkraut, was – with good reason – referred to as 'Finkelcroat'. Europa im Krieg, 69.

¹³⁹ Gow, Triumph of the Lack of Will, 158-166. Mitterrand's famous lightning visit to Sarajevo in 1992 was also intended to stimulate the international community to greater activity. It was certainly not an anti-Serbian gesture. His visit coincided with St Vitus' day and the President had originally planned only to meet with Izetbegovic. The Croats and the Bosnians might have taken that as a deliberate affront. At the insistence of the UN commander (General L. MacKenzie, a Canadian who was also accused of being sympathetic to the Serbs), shortly before his departure, Mitterrand shook hands with Karadzic and Koljevic. Silber and Little, Death, 225.

¹⁴⁰ Mestrovic, The Balkanisation of the West, 46.

¹⁴¹ Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 158-159.

¹⁴² Maclean, Eastern Approaches, 293, 326-331, 448, 447, 494, 517, 523, 527.

¹⁴³ For an extensive discussion, see: Goldsworthy, Ruritania, 137-159.

¹⁴⁴ Gow, Triumph of the Lack of Will, 174-183.

¹⁴⁵ Conversi, 'Moral relativism and Equidistance', 258-260. The evidence that Conversi puts forward in this article, to support the existence of a pro-Serbian tradition in Great Britain, is very flimsy indeed. With regard to Zametica, see also: T. Judah, The Serbs, 220, 222.

¹⁴⁶ 'Banquet Address by U.S. Ambassador to Yugoslavia John D. Scanlan July 22, 1990' in: Dragnich, Serbia's Historical Heritage, 111-115. This book is an undeniably pro-Serbian publication, produced by elderly Serbian academics in the US. However, their patriotic writings preceded the outbreak of war, and express no support for Milosevic's policies. According to V. Meier, American policies were undeniably pro-Serbian until W. Zimmerman arrived in Belgrade. Scanlan became a branch manager in Belgrade for the Serbian-American businessman Milan Panic, who became Prime Minister of the new Yugoslavia in 1992. Meier, Jugoslawien verspielt, 77. Many other, more objective, authors, put forward the notion that glasnost was originally conceived in Belgrade rather than Moscow. See, for example: Udovicki, Burn this House, 82. Ramet also confirms that Milosevic initially 'restored grace to many Serbian dissidents, including Milovan Djilas' (who was not actually a Serb). Ramet, Balkan Babel, 27.

¹⁴⁷ See: Mousavizadeh, The Black Book, 134. For a summary of the activities of Serbian groups in the US (who were generally rather amateuristic and not particularly influential) see: Blitz, 'serbia's War lobby', 187-243. It must also be said that, in 1991, the Croatian authorities were highly incompetent in their use of the western media. The Slovenes had a better feel for such matters. See: Bennett, Yugoslavia 's Bloody Collapse, 162-163 and Gow, 'After the Flood', 457-458.

¹⁴⁸ See: Cohen, Broken Bonds, 235. For America see: Bert, Reluctant Superpower, 79 onwards.

¹⁴⁹ Sobel, 'U.S. and European Attitudes', 146.

¹⁵⁰ According to Bogdan Denitch, an American sociologist of Serbian extraction who was highly critical of Serbian policies, the image of Serbian culture and history that was presented in the German media could 'only be described as racist.' Denitch, Ethnic Nationalism, 52. See also Gow, Triumph, 166-174. According to Van den Boogaard, the Yugoslavia specialists at the German embassy in Belgrade opposed the recognition of Croatia. See: R. van den Boogaard, 'The civil war cannot be ended' in: NRC, Verwoesting (Devastation), 57.

¹⁵¹ For critical evaluations of the German position, see, for example: Wynaendts, L' engrenage, 187; Walsum, Verder met Nederland (Further with the Netherlands), 65-66; Glenny, Fall, 112, 188-190, 280; Woodward, Balkan Tragedy, 183 onwards. For the opposing standpoint, see: Meier, Jugoslawien verspielt, passim.

¹⁵² Glenny, Fall, 25.

¹⁵³ For Italy see: Italy and the Balkans. See also: Both, From Indifference to Entrapment, 104, 120, 132, 134, 135.

¹⁵⁴ For a brief summary and for modern literature on the Greek civil war, see: Klok, 'Griekse burgeroorlog' (Greek civil war), 392-396, 414. For a Greek response, see: Veremis, Greece, the Balkans and the European Union.

¹⁵⁵ 'The Serbian kingdom, during its golden age under Stephen Dushan (1331-55), represented in many ways a dress rehearsal for the pattern of rule that was to emerge in Muscovy' (Billington, The Icon and the Axe, 56). In the Archangelskij Sobor, a 16th century church inside the Kremlin, the Czars preceding Peter the Great are buried. The church contains frescos depicting the ancestors of Ivan the Terrible, as well as four foreign rulers and saints. The latter include the Byzantine emperor Michael VII Palaeologos and three Serbs, including Saint Sava and Saint Lazar (the hero of Kosovo). Lazar and Kosovo also occupy a prominent place in Muscovite chronicles. Conversely, in Serbia at that time, the cult of Lazar was localized to the area around the monastery of Ravanica where his relics are housed. See: Mihaljcic, The Battle of Kosovo, 58-60.

¹⁵⁶ Romanenko, 'Russia in the Balkans', 32.

¹⁵⁷ Jelavich, Establishment of Balkan States, 185 onwards.

¹⁵⁸ Hersh, Verraad, Lafheid en Bedrog (Treachery, Sloth and Sham), 186-187.

¹⁵⁹ Djakov, Slanjanskaja ideja, 37.

¹⁶⁰ See: Romanenko, 'Erfenis van het verleden' (Legacy of the past), 40-48. Such Russian views are, to some extent, reinforced by Western attitudes and prejudices. For example, by Huntington who sees Russia as an un-European power and a natural quality in the 'Orthodox Slavic alliance', an alliance between Russia and its congenators, such as Serbia. See: Kardelj, 'Huntington's Clash', 25-41.

¹⁶¹ One outspoken defender of the Serbian standpoint is Elena Guskova of the Institute of Slavistics and Balkanistics at the Russian Academy of Sciences. See, for example, her work Jugoslavenskij krizis.

¹⁶² See, for example: Gobble, 'Dangerous Liaisons', 182-197. For a more extensive study see: Lukic, Europe.

¹⁶³ Dania, Bosnia and Hercegovina, 172, 178; Friedman, Bosnian Muslims, 223; Woodward, Balkan Tragedy, 176-177; Ramet, Balkan Babel, 185-186.

¹⁶⁴ Voogt, In den Balkan, 10-11.

¹⁶⁵ I have not investigated any other sources. The only study on this subject that has been completed to date is the dissertation of Novakovic-Lapusina, Srbi i Jugoistocna Evropa.

¹⁶⁶ Theunissen, 'Barbaren en ongelovigen' (Barbarians and infidels), 37.

¹⁶⁷ Petkov, Infidels, Turks, and Women, 185-186.

¹⁶⁸ See also: Wijnands, 'Tulpen naar Amsterdam' (Tulips to Amsterdam), 97-106.

¹⁶⁹ Theunissen, Topkapi, 40; Roding, 'Die met dit zoort van volk wil verkeeren' (Who mixes with people like that), 56-57; Novikovic, Srbi, 30-34; Koster, To Hellen's Noble Land, 44; Huussen, Ogier Ghislain de Busbecq.

¹⁷⁰ Theunissen, 'Barbaren en ongelovigen', 43 (Barbarians and infidels), 53; Westerink, 'Liever Turks dan paaps' (Rather Turkish than Papist), 75-80.

¹⁷¹ Groot, Ottoman Empire and Dutch Republic, 181-189.

¹⁷² Groot, Ottoman Empire, 202-205; Heeringa, De eerste Nederlandsche gezant (The first Dutch envoy), 116-139; Runciman, The Great Church, 259-288; Hadjianthoniou, The Protestant Patriarch, 47 onwards.

¹⁷³ See: Rozemond, Archimandrite Hierotheos Abbatios.

¹⁷⁴ Groot, Betekenis Nederlandse ambassade (Significance of the Dutch embassy).

¹⁷⁵ Novikovic, Srbi, 107.

¹⁷⁶ Luttervelt, 'Turkse' schilderijen ('Turkish' paintings).

¹⁷⁷ Boon, Westfriesse zeeman (West Frisian sailor).

¹⁷⁸ Flinkenflögel, Entre perruques et turbans, 42-43.

¹⁷⁹ Woensel, Staat der geleerdheid (The level of scholarship); Wesselo, Pieter van Woensel; Reve-Israël, 'Een Hollandse arts (A Dutch physician)', 91-111; Novikovic, Srbi, 96-97; Topkapi & Turkomanie, 51-52; Koster, To Hellen's Noble Land, 120.

¹⁸⁰ Topkapi & Turkomanie, 15.

¹⁸¹ Koster, To Hellen's Noble Land, 104, 108.

¹⁸² For details about Fallmerayer, see Chapter II.

¹⁸³ For details of Dutch philhellenism see: Koster, To Hellen's Noble Land, 8-10, 164-195; Renting, 'Nederland' (The Netherlands), 21-50.

¹⁸⁴ Kampen, Griekenland en Europeisch Turkije (Greece and European Turkey), 62-63.

¹⁸⁵ Ibidem, 294, 300-307.

¹⁸⁶ Ibidem, 295-300.

¹⁸⁷ Daehne van Varick, Bijdrage (Contribution).

¹⁸⁸ See: Naarden, 'Nederlanders' (The Dutch), 22-23.

¹⁸⁹ Woldring, Bescheiden (Documents), 447-448.

¹⁹⁰ Ibidem, 343-344.

¹⁹¹ Reitsma, 'Jeanne Merkus'; West, Black Lamb and Grey Falcon, 271-273.

¹⁹² Karazin, In den kruiddamp (In the gun smoke). Original title: V porochorom dymu.

¹⁹³ For details of Van der Mey, see: Willemsen, 'Hendrik Wolfgang van der Mey'.

¹⁹⁴ Mey, 'servische Epos' (Serbian epic poetry).

¹⁹⁵ Mey, 'Montenegro'.

¹⁹⁶ For details of a study on these books, see: Koch, Koningsromans (novels about royalty). According to Koch, the numerous 'novels about royalty' in French literature were the main source of inspiration for Couperus. She failed to notice the similarities to the romantic Balkan genre initiated by Hope.

¹⁹⁷ Emants, In Bosnië (In Bosnia).

- ¹⁹⁸ Smit, Bescheiden (Documents), Third Period, Second part, 723-724.
- ¹⁹⁹ Alberdingk Thijm, Koningsliefde (Royal Devotion, The Tragedy in Serbia), 5.
- ²⁰⁰ Balkankeizerin (The Balkan Empress), 101.
- ²⁰¹ Mandere, Montenegro, 194.
- ²⁰² Koppeschaar, Montenegro en Servië (Montenegro and Serbia), 68-71.
- ²⁰³ See the quotation at the start of this chapter.
- ²⁰⁴ Voogt, In den Balkan, xii, 9,11, 13, 107, 178, 195.
- ²⁰⁵ Fabius, Met Bulgaren en Montenegrijnen (With Bulgarians and Montenegrins).
- ²⁰⁶ Bartstra wrote the following about this: 'The newspaper-reading public in Europe derived frivolous enjoyment from the sensational reports about the Balkan war: a result of the dimming of their humanitarian ideals. Victories, charges with fixed bayonets, it was all great fun, but nobody realized how little was needed to kindle the flare-up in the Balkans into an inferno that would engulf the entire world'. Bartstra, Handboek, deel IV, 299.
- ²⁰⁷ Smit, Bescheiden (Documents), Third Period, Third part, 695, 830, 989, 993. Smit erroneously states that the Netherlands was not officially involved in sending the Dutch officers to Albania. He was also mistaken about the number of officers involved.
- ²⁰⁸ Goslinga, The Dutch; Fabius, Albanië (Albania).
- ²⁰⁹ Voogt, In den Balkan, 200.
- ²¹⁰ Durham, Balkan Tangle, 258, 261-262, 264-265, 268, 274- 275.
- ²¹² Petrowitch, Heldensagen (Sagas). The book has 388 pages.
- ²¹³ Rutten, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), viii-xi, 172.
- ²¹⁴ Faille, Flitsen (Flashes); Monnink, Gastvriend (Guest friend).
- ²¹⁵ Reitsma, Zwerftochten (Wanderings), 80, 82, 83, 87, 88, 119,128-132.
- ²¹⁶ For details of Den Doolaard, see: Doolaard, Gesprekken (Conversations).
- ²¹⁷ Doolaard, Wilden (Savages), 69.
- ²¹⁸ Doolaard, Land van Tito (Tito's country), 8, 32, 55, 76, 121, 149, 152, 163, 164, 166, 171, 214, 250.
- ²³⁹ This also occurred in books by foreign authors that were sold here in the Netherlands. Four years before the publication of Het land van Tito (Tito's country), a Belgian, Paul Speyer, asserted that the party and people of that country were 'fearlessly blazing new trails towards the fulfilment of their ideal'. See: Speyer, Zuid Slavië (Southern Slavia), 127. The British Yugoslavia expert, Bernard Newman, believed that the regime had become extremely liberal, following the breach with the USSR, and could therefore depend upon the genuine support of the population. See: Newman, Rood Joego-Slavië (Red Yugoslavia).
- ²²⁰ Alma, Waar Europa eindigt (Where Europe ends), 53.
- ²²³ Schroevers, Op zoek (Searching), 24, 113, 114.
- ²²² Here also, Den Doolaard was something of a trend-setter. He wrote three travel books. See: Doolaard, Joegoslavië. Kaleidoskopisch reisland (Yugoslavia – kaleidoscopic destination); Doolaard, Dit is Joegoslavië (This is Yugoslavia) and Doolaard, Vakantieland Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia – holiday destination). Prior to the Second World War, most tourists visiting the area were from Central European countries. In 1933, about 1000 Dutch people visited Yugoslavia, while in 1932 German tourists to the country numbered about 79,000. In 1954, 8,000 to 9,000 Dutch people visited the country (source: Eekman, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 249). During the 1960s and 1970s, huge numbers of Dutch tourists visited Yugoslavia. They mostly spent their holidays on the Dalmatian coast, and got to know only a small part of Croatia, in a very superficial way.
- ²²³ Eekman, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 143, 144, 175, 186, 200, 211, 218.
- ²²⁴ Constandse, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 209, 210.
- ²²³ Constandse, Josip Broz, 97.
- ²²⁶ Anstadt, Yugoslavia, 50.
- ²²⁷ This is shown, for example, by the critical focus on Yugoslavia in an extensive study produced by the former KVP (Catholic People's Party) minister, Van den Brink, who was one of the architects of Dutch post-war industrialization: Brink, Zoeken naar een Heilstaat (Searching for Utopia), 277-297.

- ²²⁸ Samenwerking (Collaboration), 72-75.
- ²²⁹ Broekmeyer, Arbeidersraad (Worker's council), 360 onwards.
- ²³⁰ Broekmeyer, Arbeidersraad of ondernemersstaat (Worker's council or entrepreneurs' state), 13.
- ²³¹ Ibidem, 9; Interlinks, 13, 28, 73.
- ²³² Broekmeyer, Yugoslav Workers' Self-management, 196, 198.
- ²³³ Baas in eigen bedrijf (Being the boss in your own company), 2, 3, 50, 51.
- ²³⁴ Boonzajer Flaes, Autoriteit en democratie (Authority and democracy), 268, 269, 285, 287. Studies by leading Yugoslavian intellectuals whose work was translated into Dutch also had a very critical tone. See: Vidakovic, Het tweede decennium (The second decade); Markovic, De revolutionaire weg (The revolutionary path). A comparative study of the steel industry in the Netherlands and Yugoslavia came to the conclusion that there was actually very little basis for comparison. See: Dekker, Planning, 172 onwards.
- ²³⁵ Boonzajer Flaes, Macht in overvloed (Power in abundance), 9, 231.
- ²³⁶ Cited by: Brink, Zoeken naar een heilstaat (Searching for Utopia), 297.
- ²³⁷ Mitric, Geheim agent (Secret agent); Mitric, Tito 's moordmachine (Tito's murder machine).
- ²³⁸ Rijk, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 7, 54, 55, 58, 68, 100, 143, 185-189.
- ²³⁹ Broekmeyer, Joegoslavië in crisis (Yugoslavia in crisis), 12, 14, 17-18, 38, 47, 57, 61, 63-64.
- ²⁴⁰ In the course of an interview, Joris Voorhoeve, the Dutch Minister of Defence during the tragedy of Srebrenica, stated that: 'When I was the director of the Clingendael Institute, I found piles of books in the cellar - all of which predicted the current tensions. That warning was given in 1984 [in fact it was 1985]' See: NRC, 7 March 1995.
- ²⁴¹ Boogaard, Gewijde grond (Consecrated ground), 178.
- ²⁴² Dutch or Flemish books on the recent history of Yugoslavia (such as: Stallaerts, Afscheid (Parting); Heuvel, Het verdoemde land (The cursed country) or Detrez, De sloop van Joegoslavië (The break-up of Yugoslavia) were, of course, largely based on secondary, foreign literature. For discussions of a somewhat arbitrary selection of these, see: Naarden, 'Het Joegoslavisch labyrint' (The Yugoslavian Labyrinth); Gow, 'After the flood'; Kent, 'Writing the Yugoslav Wars'.
- ²⁴³ Walsum, Verder met Nederland (Onward with the Netherlands), 69-78. Van Walsum, who at the time was the Director-General, Political Affairs at the ministry, put forward the concept of modifying the internal borders of Yugoslavia to comply with the ethnic proportions of the population. However, the European community wanted to retain the existing borders and the ideal of a multi-ethnic society (which had meanwhile become unattainable in Yugoslavia). Nevertheless, it is scarcely conceivable that it would have been possible to create a just and practical division of Yugoslavia along ethnic lines, without armed conflict and only as a result of peaceful pressure by Europe.
- ²⁴⁴ Both, From Indifference to Entrapment, 106.
- ²⁴⁵ Wynaendts mistakenly assumed that the red and white chequered flag, the symbol of Tudjman's Croatia, was derived from the coat of arms of Ante Pavelic's fascist Croatia. In fact, it is a traditional Croatian symbol. Wynaendts, L'engrenage, 33.
- ²⁴⁶ Peternel, Voorheen Joegoslavië (Previously Yugoslavia), 103, 105.
- ²⁴⁷ Anstadt, Scheuren in de beksenketel (Cracks in the cauldron), 128.
- ²⁴⁸ The Netherlands-Croatia Foundation gave Dutch people a clear opportunity to express criticism. See: Dosen, Verlangen naar Vrijheid (Yearning for freedom).
- ²⁴⁹ Some sources of information on the attitude of Dutchbat are: Honig, Srebrenica, 187; Westerman, Srebrenica, 14, 121, 123, 225.
- ²⁵⁰ Peternel, Voorheen Joegoslavië (Previously Yugoslavia), 97, 105.
- ²⁵¹ Tromp, Verraad (Treason), 209.
- ²⁵² Wynaendts, L'engrenage, 57.
- ²⁵³ NRC, Verwoesting (Devastation), 88.
- ²⁵⁴ Anstadt, Scheuren in de beksenketel (Cracks in the cauldron), 38, 42, 43.
- ²⁵⁵ Tromp, Verraad (Treason), 209.
- ²⁵⁶ For a critical discussion of this debate, see: Todorova, Balkans, 140-160.

- ²⁵⁷ See, for example: Schöpflin, 'Central Europe. Definitions Old and New' in: Schöpflin, In Search, 10-15. Or, more recently: Michielsen, 'Rome versus Byzantium'; Garton Ash, 'The Puzzle of Central Europe'. For an opposing view see: Detrez, 'Over de grootspraak van Europa' (About Europe's bragging).
- ²⁵⁸ During the Cold War, views of this kind were common among conservative Central European émigrés in America. See, for example: Wagner, 'Introduction to the History of Central Europe' and Buc, 'Croatia'. For a contemporary and highly detailed account, which is undoubtedly presented as a correct depiction of reality, see: Hupchick, Culture and History.
- ²⁵⁹ See: Dittrich, Uitgestelde bevrijding (Delayed liberation), a book which emphasizes the similarities between the Catholic and Orthodox countries in Eastern Europe. See also: George Schöpflin, 'Discontinuity in Central and South Eastern Europe' in: Lord, Central Europe, 57-66.
- ²⁶⁰ See: Tellegen, Max Weber, 33-37.
- ²⁶¹ See Chapter II above, notes 52 and 81. See also: Kann, Peoples of Habsburg Lands, 92, 97, 175, 259; Wandycz, Lands of Poland, 6-7, 13, 16, 18-19; and Udovicki, Burn this House, 17.
- ²⁶² See Dittrich, Uitgestelde bevrijding (Delayed liberation), 18.
- ²⁶³ This was the system introduced by the Ottomans, under which the Christian and Jewish religious communities could be autonomously administered by their own spiritual leaders.
- ²⁶⁴ For details of these contacts, see Chapter III.
- ²⁶⁵ See, for example: Ramet, Balkan Babel, 169 onwards.
- ²⁶⁶ Dittrich, Uitgestelde bevrijding (Delayed liberation), 28.
- ²⁶⁷ Rijk, Yugoslavia, 14.
- ²⁶⁸ Hroch, 'Central Europe: The Rise and Fall of an Historical Region' in: Lord, Central Europe, 30.
- ²⁶⁹ In 1920, Hungary was compelled to relinquish two thirds of its territory, with the result that one in three ethnic Hungarians ended up living outside Hungary proper. These three countries almost completely lost their important Jewish minority during the Second World War. Aside from this, Poland was ethnically cleansed as a result of Stalin's re-drawing of frontiers and the resultant mass migrations. After 1945, the Czechs and Slovaks kicked out their German fellow citizens. In 1993, they agreed on a friendly parting of the ways. This vision can of course be countered by the observation that there were no such national revolts in ethnically pure East Germany. In post-1945 DDR, however, a native national-socialist system was replaced by a totalitarian Communist one. Furthermore, only a minority of the German nation lived in the territory of the DDR.
- ²⁷⁰ In other words, to the time when Poland-Lithuania was the most important political formation in East Europe (long before it was wiped off the map in the 18th century), when the Bohemian-Czech nation had not yet been subjugated by the Habsburgs at the beginning of the 17th century and before most of Hungary was conquered by the Turks at the beginning of the 16th century.
- ²⁷¹ Milgram, Grenzeloze gehoorzaamheid (Limitless obedience); Zimbardo, 'The human choice'; Zimbardo, 'On the ethics of intervention'; Mees, Gewoon gehoorzaam (Simply obedient).
- ²⁷² See: Hoogerwerf, Geweld in Nederland (Violence in the Netherlands), 8, 34, 36. See also: Bolen, Racistisch geweld (Racist violence).
- ²⁷³ See works such as: 'Banislav Herak: Ik draaide me om en haalde de trekker over' (Banislav Herak: I turned round and pulled the trigger) in: NRC, Vernoeving (Devastation), 95.
- ²⁷⁴ Tromp, 'On the Nature of War', 118-131.
- ²⁷⁵ See, for example: I. Torov, 'The Resistance in Serbia' and S. Bala, 'The Opposition in Croatia' in: Udavicki, Burn this House, 245-278.
- ²⁷⁶ Udovicki, Burn this House, 109, 142, 188, 195, 203.
- ²⁷⁷ Denitch, Ethnic nationalism, 74-75, 153; Udovicki, Burn this House, 141; Silber, Death, 246; Benett, Yugoslavia 's Collapse, 164; Judah, Serbs, 186-187.
- ²⁷⁸ Milosevic, 'The Media Wars: 1987-1997' in: Udovicki, Burn this House, 108-129.
- ²⁷⁹ Verbal communication from Dr M. Broekmeyer to the author. See also: Eekman, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 58, 252.
- ²⁸⁰ Cohen, Broken Bonds, 49.

²⁸¹ In March 1991 such a plebiscite did take place in the Soviet Union, which had comparable political-economic problems and similar ethnic conditions. Eighty percent of the voters (almost 149 million people) voted and 76.4 percent voted in favour of retaining the union. Nevertheless, on 8 December 1991, the presidents of Russia, the Ukraine and Belarus declared the dissolution of the Soviet Union. Thus the actions of nationalist politicians meant that this state suffered the same fate as Yugoslavia. See, for example Gorbatsjov, Mijn Rusland (My Russia), 143.

²⁸² Hall, Impossible Country, 9.

²⁸³ Lederer, 'Nationalism', 398. With regard to this problem see also: Jelavich, South Slav Nationalisms.

²⁸⁴ Simic, 'Obstacles to Development', 31. Ramet, Balkan Babel, 321-322.

²⁸⁵ Wachtel, Making a Nation, 196.

²⁸⁶ Ibidem, 17, 192-197, 229.

²⁸⁷ Van de Port compares their 'barbarian' appearance with the 'wild' poses and 'savage' scenarios of ordinary citizens out of control in the gypsy cafés of Vojvodina. See: Port, Einde van de wereld (End of the world), 311. In my view, Denitch's characterization is a better one, when he speaks of a 'bastardized version of the new post-modern youth culture' and about the western influence of skinheads, motorcycle racists, Rambo and ninja films. This all tended to make these young people resemble the Second World War Cetniks in some ways. See: Denitch, Ethnic nationalism, 74-75, 178. However, Judah states that Arkan was very insistent that his troops have a neat appearance. See: Judah, Serbs, 184-190, 256, 274. See also: Udovicki, Burn this House, 141, 150, 207, 213, 288. Bennett, Collapse, 164, 165, 183, 211. Glenny, Fall, 5, 8, 10, 107-108, 168-170.

²⁸⁸ Hupchick, Culture and History, 48.

²⁸⁹ The 'Dinarians' were primarily identified as Serbs, however Cvijic considered Montenegrins, Bosnians, Macedonians, Slovenes and Croats to be Serbs, to a greater or lesser extent. He acknowledged that each population group was able to make its own contribution to a higher form of the Yugoslavian-Dinarian culture. The Serbs were full of idealism, imagination and intuition. They tended to favour self-sacrifice, but were entirely without discipline. The Croats were more highly developed, more self-controlled, and they excelled in art and science. The Slovenes were rational, hard workers, etc. The Bulgarians and Albanians, on the other hand, were non-Dinarian. This distinction was not inspired purely by the concept of Greater Serbia, to which Cvijic subscribed. In comparison to Serbia, Bulgaria circa 1900 was richer and more bourgeois. The Bulgarians had no lengthy revolutionary tradition, nor were the peasants used to handling guns. They regarded themselves as hard working, thrifty, sober and well-organized in comparison to the 'reckless, romantic' Serbs, who lived in accordance with the Haiduk tradition. They also felt that the Romanians and Greeks were 'sly and unreliable', with a much more commercial mentality. Foreigners referred to the Bulgarians as 'The Prussians of the Balkans' or the 'Japanese Slavs'. While there were marked similarities between the lifestyles of Albanian and Montenegrin mountain dwellers, Albania was more poverty-stricken and more primitive than Serbia. Rothschild describes King Zog's regime in the years between the wars as 'a mixture of the styles of a tribal chieftain, a haiduk brigand, an Ottoman pasha and a modernising despot'. This characteristic would also have applied to the rulers of Serbia one hundred years previously, but it did not apply to Zog's contemporary, Alexander Karadjordjevic. See: Rothschild, East Central Europe, 331-332, 366; Glenny, Balkans, 117-120. For details about Cvijic see: Grmek, Nettoyage ethnique, 127-132; Judah, The Serbs, 65-66; Wachtel, Making a Nation, 92-93.

²⁹⁰ See, for example: 'Breite Natur — heute' in: Mehnert, Sonjetmensch, 45 onwards.

²⁹¹ For example, in the work of Gerhard Gesemann during the 1930s and 1940s on 'Dinarier' and 'der montenegrinische Mensch', in which reference is also made to Cvijic. Gesemann emphatically rejected racist views, instead adopting a strictly academic, literary-sociological approach. As a result, during the Nazi period, he was compelled to accept early retirement. Gesemann's work was still valued in academic circles after the war, and his principal work was republished in 1979. See: Gesemann, Heroische Lebensform.

²⁹² See, for example: Todorova, Balkans, 181.

- ²⁹³ The Serbian director and writer Zivojin Pavlovic wrote about this phenomenon in a novel entitled Lapot. See: R. van den Bogaard, 'Wie niet jagen kan, gaat moorden' (Those who can't hunt, murder) in: NRC, Vernwoesting (Devastation), 85.
- ²⁹⁴ See, for example: Boehm, Montegrin Social Organisations; Halpern, Serbian Village; Vucinich, 'serbian Military Tradition' in: Kiraly, War and Society; Djordjevic, Balkan Revolutionary Tradition; Jelavich, South Slav Nationalisms; Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 45-68; Judah, The Serbs, 29-48, 81-85, 121-125; Agoston-Nikolova, Immured Women; Popovic, Prince Marko; Mihajcic, Battle of Kosovo; Emmert, Serbian Golgotha.
- ²⁹⁵ For details of Dutch responses to Njegos, see above Chapter III. See also note 120.
- ²⁹⁶ Sundhaussen, 'Nation und Nationalstaat'.
- ²⁹⁷ Concerning the history of Finland and Finnish folk poetry, see for example: Mazour, Finland; Kirby, Finland; Vosschmidt, Kalevala; Ahonen, Kalevala; Kalevala 1835-1985; Naarden, 'Kalevala'; Branch, Uses of Tradition.
- ²⁹⁸ The compact and large scale emigration of Russians to the Baltic countries after 1945 was something of an exception in this regard. Even today, this still generates considerable tension.
- ²⁹⁹ This is convincingly demonstrated in documents collected by individuals like Gmrek in Nettoyage ethnique.
- ³⁰⁰ Djilas, Land without Justice.
- ³⁰¹ Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 61-63. See also: Broekmeyer, Joegoslavië in crisis (Yugoslavia in crisis), 27-28.
- ³⁰² Doolaard, Land van Tito (Tito's country), 50.
- ³⁰³ Eekman, Joegoslavië (Yugoslavia), 58, 252.
- ³⁰⁴ Doder, Yugoslavs (Yugoslavs), 37-38.
- ³⁰⁵ The region south of Belgrade and the area in which the first successful rebellions against the Turks took place, at the start of the 19th century.
- ³⁰⁶ Bax, 'Medjugorjes kleine oorlog' (Medjugorje's little war) and Bax, Medjugorje: Religion, Politics and Violence.
- ³⁰⁷ Boehm, Montegrin Social Organization, 73-75; Halpern, Serbian village, 26, 43, 64, 66, 74, 110, 118, 123-124.
- ³⁰⁸ Wachtel, Making a Nation, 174.
- ³⁰⁹ Ibidem, 156, 174, 176. See also: Bakic, 'Orientalist Variations', 18-20.
- ³¹⁰ Wachtel, Making a Nation, 197-220. Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 99-146. Judah, The Serbs, 75-80.
- ³¹¹ See: Bakic-Hayden, 'Nesting Orientalisms'; Norris, Islam in the Balkans. 257 onwards.
- ³¹² In particular, see: Port, 'It takes a Serb'.
- ³¹³ See above Chapter I.
- ³¹⁴ Glenny, Balkans, 241-242.
- ³¹⁵ See, for example: L.S. Stavrianos, 'The Influence of the West on the Balkans' in: Jelavich, Balkans in Transition, 184-222.
- ³¹⁶ See: W.S. Vucinich, 'some Aspects of the Ottoman Legacy' in: Jelavich, Balkans in Transition, 61-114; Vucinich, Ottoman Empire, 120-121.
- ³¹⁷ Duyzings, Religion and Politics, 1-36; Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, 26-27; Boehm, Montenegrin Social Organisations and values, 87; Halpern, Serbian Village, 114; Vucinich, 'Ottoman Legacy', 96; Allcock, Explaining Yugoslavia, 366-376.
- ³¹⁸ Duyzings, Religion and Politics, 35-36.
- ³¹⁹ Dittrich, Uitgestelde bevrijding (Delayed liberation), 19, 29.
- ³²⁰ Kossmann, 'Volkssouvereiniteit' (Sovereignty of the people), 59.

References

- Agoston-Nikolova, E. Immured Women. Representations of Family Relationships in Balkan Slavic Oral Narrative Poetry. Diss. Groningen, 1994.
- Ahonen L. and Schot-Saikku, P. Kalevala, Lönnrot en Finse Volkspoëzie. Amsterdam, 1985.
- Alberdingk Thijm, Catherina. Koningsliefde (Het drama in Servië), 2nd edition, Amsterdam, 1909.
- Allcock, John B. 'Constructing the Balkans' in: J.B. Allcock & A. Young (eds.), Black Lambs and Grey Falcons. Women Travellers in the Balkans. Bradford University Press, 1991.
- Allcock J.B. a.o. (eds.), Yugoslavia in Transition. New York, Oxford, 1992.
- Allcock, J.B. Explaining Yugoslavia. London, 2000.
- Alma, H. Waar Europa eindigt. Tussen derwischen en trolleybussen in het land van Tito. Amsterdam 1953.
- Anderson, M.S. Britain 's Discovery of Russia, 1553-1815. London, 1958.
- Andics, E. Metternich und die Frage Ungarns. Budapest, 1973.
- Angelomatis-Tsougarakis, H. The Eve of the Greek Revival. British Travellers' Perceptions of Early Nineteenth-Century Greece. London, 1990.
- Anstadt, Milo. Joegoslavië, Roemenië, Tsjecho-slowakije nu. Amsterdam, 1969.
- Anstadt, M. Scheuren in de heksenketel. Een historische schets van Joegoslavië en de Balkan. Amsterdam, Antwerp, 1993.
- Anzulovic, B. Heavenly Serbia. From Myth to Genocide. London, 1999.
- Baas in eigen bedrijf. Verslag van het bezoek in 1970 aan Joegoslavië van een delegatie uit het Overlegorgaan der Vakcentrales ter bestudering van het arbeiderszelfbestuur. s.l., s.a.
- Bakic-Hayden, M. 'Nesting Orientalisms: The Case of Former Yugoslavia', Slavic Review, () 917-931.
- Bakic-Hayden, M. and Hayden, R.M. 'Orientalist Variations on the Theme "Balkans": Symbolic Geography in Recent Yugoslav Cultural Politics', Slavic Review. 51, N.1, Spring 1992.
- Balkan-keizerin, De. Historisch drama in drie bedrijven van Z.K.H. Nicolaas I, vorst van Montenegro, naar de Hoog-Duitsche bewerking van Hugo Marck voor het Nederlandsch Tooneel bearbeid door F. Smit Kleine. Amsterdam, 1902.
- Barfoot, C.C. (ed.) Beyond Pug's Tour. National and ethnic Sterotyping in Theory and Literary Practice. Amsterdam, 1997.
- Bartstra, J. Handboek tot de staatkundige geschiedenis van de landen van onze beschavingskring. 's-Hertogenbosch, 1960.
- Bauer, R.A., Inkeles, A. and Kluckholm, C. How the Soviet system works. Vintage Books, New York, 1961.
- Bax, M. 'Medjugorjes kleine oorlog. Barbarisering in een Bosnische bedevaartsplaats' in: Amsterdams Sociologisch Tijdschrift (Vol.20, June 1992)3-25.
- Bax, M. Medjugorje: Religion, Politics, and Violence in Rural Bosnia. Amsterdam, 1995.
- Bennett, Chr. Yugoslavia's Bloody Collapse. Causes, Course and Consequences. London, 1995.
- Bentham van den Bergh, G. van. 'De kracht van het symbool' in: K. Koch and P. Scheffer (ed.), Het nut van Nederland. Amsterdam, 1996.
- Berger, P. and Luckman, Th. The Social Construction of Reality. Penguin Pockets, 1967.
- Bert, W. The Reluctant Superpower. United States Policy in Bosnia 1991-1995. New York, 1997.
- Bertels, C. P. 'skepsis tegenover de "geschiedenis van de mentaliteit"', Tijdschrift voor Geschiedenis, Vol.86, 1973.
- Billington, J. H. The Icon and the Axe. An interpretative History of Russian Culture. London, 1966.
- Blake, R. Disraeli. London, 1969.
- Blitz, B. K. 'serbia's War Lobby: Diaspora Groups and Western Elites' in: Th. Cushman and S.G. Mestrovic (eds.), This Time We Knew. Western Responses to Genocide in Bosnia. New York, 1996.
- Boer, Pim den. 'De reactie van een historicus', Internationale Spectator. July-August, 1997. No.7-8.
- Boehm, Chr. Montenegrin Social Organizations and Values. New York, 1983.

- Bolen, M.W. and Wiersma, E.G. Racistisch geweld in Nederland. Gouda, 1997.
- Boogaard, R. van den. Gewijde grond. Amsterdam, 1992.
- Boon, P. (ed.) Een Westfriese zeeman als slaaf in Barbarije. Verslag van de belevenissen van Jan Cornelisz Dekker in Marokko, 1715-1743. Schoorl, 1987.
- Boonzajer Flaes, R. and Ramondt, J. Autoriteit en democratie. Arbeiderszelfbestuur in rijke en arme Joegoslavische ondernemingen. Rotterdam, 1974.
- Boonzajer Flaes, R. M. Macht in overvloed. Ontwikkelingen in het Joegoslavische arbeiderszelfbestuur. Alphen aan den Rijn, 1978.
- Both, N. From Indifference to Entrapment. The Netherlands and the Yugoslav Crisis 1990-1995. Amsterdam, 2000.
- Branch, M. and Hawkesworth, C. The Uses of Tradition. A comparative Enquiry into the Nature, Uses and Functions of Oral Poetry in the Balkans, the Baltic and Africa. London. Helsinki, 1994.
- Brink, J. R. M. van den. Zoeken naar een 'Heilstaat'. Opbouw, neergang en perspectief van de Nederlandse welvaartsstaat. Amsterdam, 1984.
- Broekmeyer, M. J. De arbeidersraad in Zuid-Slavië. Meppel, 1968.
- Broekmeyer, M. and I. Cornelissen, Arbeidersraad of ondernemersstaat. Amsterdam, 1969.
- Broekmeyer, M. J. (ed.), Yugoslav Worker's Self-Management. Proceedings of a symposium held in Amsterdam, 7-9 January, 1970. Dordrecht, 1970.
- Broekmeyer M. J. e.a., Joegoslavië in crisis. The Hague, 1985.
- Buc, St. 'Croatia and Central Europe' in: F. S. Wagner (ed.), *Toward a New Central Europe. A symposium on the Problems of the Danubian Nations (Astor Park, Florida, 1970. Reprint: Hamilton, Ontario, 1991)*59-68.
- Burgess, A. Divided Europe. The new Domination of the East. London, 1997.
- Claval, P. Geschiedenis van de aardrijkskunde. Utrecht-Antwerp, 1976.
- Cobban, A. A History of modern France, Penguin Books, 1973.
- Cohen, L.J. Broken Bonds. Yugoslavia's Disintegration and Balkan Politics in Transition. Oxford, 1995.
- Constandse, A. L. Joegoslavië. Land, Volk, Cultuur. Baarn, 1964.
- Constandse, A. L. Josip Broz. Tito. Portret van een staatsman. The Hague, 1st edition, 1962, 2nd edition, 1977.
- Conversi, D. 'Moral Relativism and Equidistance in British Attitudes to the War in the Former Yugoslavia' in: Th. Cushman and S. G. Mestrovic (eds.), This Time We Knew. Western Responses to Genocide in Bosnia (New York, 1996) 244-281.
- Craig, G. A. Deutsche Geschichte 1866-1918. Vom Norddeutschen Bund bis zum Ende des dritten Reiches. Munich, 1985.
- Crankshaw, E. The Fall of the House of Habsburg. London, 1963.
- Craig Nation, R. 'Balkan Images in the West', Balkan Forum. Vol.3, No.3, Sept.1995.
- Daehne van Varick, A. von. Bijdrage tot de geschiedenis van de Oostersche kwestie. Diss. Utrecht, 1869.
- Daniel, N. 'Edward Said and the Orientalists', Mélanges de l' Institut dominicain d'études orientales du Caire. Vol. 15, 1982.
- Davies, Norman. God's Playground. A History of Poland. New York, 1982.
- Delacroix, La naissance d'un nouveau romantisme. Rouen, 1998.
- Dekker, H. C. e.a., Planning in a Dutch and a Yugoslav Steelworks. A comparative study. s.l., s.a.
- Denitch, B. Ethnic Nationalism. The Tragic Death of Yugoslavia. Minneapolis - London, 1994.
- Detrez, R. De sloop van Joegoslavië. Relas van een boedelscheiding. Antwerp, Baarn, 1996.
- Detrez, Raymond. 'Over de grootspraak van Europa', Nieuw Wereldtijdschrift, June, 2000.
- Dittrich, Z. R. 'Bismarck and Rumänien. Die turbulenten Jahre 1866-1868' in: A.P.van Goudoever (ed.), Romanian History 1848-1918. Groningen, 1979.
- Dittrich, Z.R. Midden-Europa? Een anti-nostalgie. Utrecht, 1987.
- Dittrich, Z. R. Uitgestelde bevrijding. Volkeren van oostelijk Europa na de Tweede Wereldoorlog. Zeist, 1991.

- Dittrich, Z.R. 'Oost-Europa tot circa 1870-1880' in: L. H. M. Wessels & A. Bosch, Veranderde grenzen, Nationalisme in Europa, 1815-1919. Open Universiteit, Heerlen, 1992.
- Djakov V. A. (ed.), Slavjanskaja ideja: istorija i sovremennost. Moskou, 1998.
- Djilas, M. Land without Justice. New York, 1958.
- Djordjevic, D. and S. Fischer-Galati, The Balkan Revolutionary Tradition. New York, 1981.
- Doder, D. The Yugoslavs. New York, 1978.
- Doolaard, A. Den. De wilden van Europa. Amsterdam, 1932.
- Doolaard, A. Den. Het land van Tito. Portret van mijn tweede vaderland. Amsterdam, 1954.
- Doolaard, A. Den. Joegoslavië: kaleidoskopisch reisland. Amsterdam, 1956.
- Doolaard, A. Den. Dit is Joegoslavië, Amsterdam, 1957.
- Doolaard, A. Den. Vakantieland Joegoslavië, Amsterdam, 1963.
- Doolaard, A. Den. Gesprekken over zijn leven en werk. Amsterdam, 1982.
- Donia, R. J. Islam under the Double Eagle: The Muslims of Bosnia and Hercegovina 1878-1914. New York, 1981.
- Donia, R. J. and Fine, J.V.A. Bosnia and Hercegovina. A Tradition Betrayed. London, 1994.
- Dragnich A.N. (ed.), Serbia's Historical Heritage. New York, 1994.
- Droz, J. L'Europe centrale. Evolution historique de l'idée de 'Mitteleuropa' Paris, 1960.
- Durham, M. E. Twenty Years of Balkan Tangle. London, 1920.
- Dutton, D. The Politics of Diplomacy. Britain and France in the Balkans in the First World War. London, New York, 1988.
- Duyzings, G. Religion and Politics of Identity in Kosovo. Diss. University of Amsterdam, 1999.
- Ebels-Hoving, B. Byzantium in Westerse ogen 1096-1204. Assen, 1971.
- Eekman, T. Joegoslavië: Opstandig stiefkind van Europa. Meppel, 1955.
- Eekman, T. Slavische dromen. De figuur van Juraj Krizanic. The Hague, 1962.
- Eekman, T. and A. Kadic (eds.). Juraj Krizanic (1618-1683). Russophile and Ecumenic Visionary. The Hague, 1976.
- Emants, M. In Bosnië en Herzegovina (compiled and introduced by Top Maas). Nijmegen, 1984.
- Emmert, Th. E. Serbian Golgotha. Kosovo, 1389. New York, 1990.
- Europa im Krieg. Die Debatte über den Krieg im ehemaligen Jugoslawien*. Frankfurt am Main, 1992.
- Fabius, Lieutenant J. Met Bulgaren en Montenegrijnen. Brieven van een oorlogscorrespondent. Utrecht, 1913.
- Fabius, J. Zes maanden in Albanië. Met een nawoord van Boudewijn Büch. Amsterdam, 1991.
- Faille, Dr B. de la. Flitsen uit het Joegoslavische volksleven. Leiden, 1941.
- Febvre, Lucien. La Terre et l'Evolution humaine. Paris, 1922.
- Flinkenflögel, W. N. Entre perruques et turbans. De reis van een Amsterdamse edelman naar de Levant, 1764-1769. (Doctoral thesis UB UvA) Amsterdam, 1987.
- Forster, A.J. 'Britain and East Central Europe 1918-48' in: P.Stirk (ed.), Mitteleuropa. History and Prospects. Edinburgh, 1994.
- Franchet, Commandant. Casque bleu pour rien, Ce que j'ai vraiment vu en Bosnie. S.1., 1995.
- Friedman, F. The Bosnian Muslims. Denial of a Nation. Boulder, Cal., 1996.
- Frijhoff, Willem. 'Impasses en beloften van de mentaliteitsgeschiedenis', Tijdschrift voor Sociale geschiedenis, Vol. 10, 1984, No.36.
- Ferguson, Niall. 'Europa Nervosa' in N. Mousavizadeh (ed.), The Black Book of Bosnia. The consequences of Appeasement. New York, 1996
- Garton Ash, T. 'The puzzle of Central Europe', The New York Review of Books, March 18, 1999.
- Gesemann, G. Heroische Lebensform. Zur Literatur und Wesenskunde der Balkanische Patriarchalität. Berlin, 1943 and Neuried, 1979.
- Gleason, J. H. The Genesis of Russophobia in Great Britain. A study of interaction of policy and opinion. Cambridge, Mass., 1950.
- Glenny, M. The Fall of Yugoslavia. London, 1996.
- Glenny, M. The Balkans 1804-1999. Nationalism, War and the Great Powers. London, 1999.

- Glucksman, A. 'Le Rouge et le Brun', Erewhon. N. 1, 1994.
- Gobble, P.A. 'Dangerous Liaisons: Moscow, the Former Yugoslavia and the West' in: Richard H. Ullman (ed.), The World and Yugoslavia's Wars. New York, 1996.
- Goldworthy, V. Inventing Ruritania. The Imperialism of the Imagination, New Haven, London, 1998.
- Gorbatsjov, M. Mijn Rusland. De dramatische geschiedenis van een grootmacht. Amsterdam, 1999.
- Gorskij, A. A. a.o. (ed.), Rossijskaja mental 'nost': metody i problemy izucenija. Moskva, 1999.
- Goslinga, Gorrit T.A. The Dutch in Albania (A history of the first Albanian gendarmerie organized and directed by Dutch officers 1913-14). Roma, 1972.
- Goudoever, A. P. van. 'Het nationaliteitsvraagstuk in Oostenrijk-Hongarije, 1867-1918' in: L. H. M. Wessels & A. Bosch, Veranderde grenzen, Nationalisme in Europa, 1815-1919. Open Universiteit, Heerlen, 1992.
- Gow, J. Triumph of the Lack of Will. International Diplomacy and the Yugoslav War. New York, 1997.
- Gow, J. 'After the flood: Literature on the Context, Causes and Course of the Yugoslav War - Reflections and Refractions', Slavonic and East European Review (Vol. 75, No. 3, July 1997) 446-484.
- Grenzenbach Jr, W. S. Germany's Informal Empire in East Central Europe. German economic policy toward Yugoslavia and Romania, 1933-1939. Stuttgart, 1988.
- Grmek, M. a.o. (Eds.) Le Nettoyage ethnique. Documents historiques sur une idéologie serbe. Paris, 1993.
- Grimm, G. 'Das "Balkan-Bild" des "Brockhaus" im 19. Jahrhundert' in: J. Elvert (ed.), Der Balkan. Eine europäische Krisenregion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Stuttgart, 1997) 59-75.
- Groot, A. H. de. The Ottoman Empire and the Dutch Republic. A History of the Earliest Diplomatic Relations 1610-1630. Leiden, Istanboel, 1978.
- Groot, A.H. de. De betekenis van de Nederlandse ambassade by de Verheven Porte voor de studie van het Turks in de 17^{de} en de 18^{de} eeuw. Leiden, 1979.
- Guskova, Elena. Jugoslavenskij krizis i Rossija. Moskva, 1993.
- Hackett, John. The Third World War. London, 1980.
- Hadjianthoniou, G. A. The Protestant Patriarch. The Life of Cyril Lucaris (1572-1638) Patriarch of Constantinople. Richmond, Virginia, 1961.
- Hadziselimovic, O. 'Two Victorian Ladies and Bosnian Realities, 1682-1875' in: G.M. MacKenzie and A.P. Irby' in: J.B. Allcock & A. Young (eds.), Black Lambs and Grey Falcons. Women Travellers in the Balkans. Bradford University Press, 1991.
- Hall, B. The impossible Country. A Journey through the last Days of Yugoslavia. London, 1994.
- Halpern J.M. and Kerewsky Halpern, B. A Serbian Village in Historical Perspective, New York, etc., 1972.
- Haslam, J. The Soviet Union and the Struggle for Collective Security in Europe 1933-1939. London, 1984.
- Hay, D. Europe. The Emergence of an Idea. Edinburgh, 1957.
- Heeringa, K. De eerste Nederlandsche gezant bij de Verheven Porte. Utrecht, 1917.
- Hersh, E. Verraad, Lafheid en Bedrog - Leven en dood van de laatste tsaar. Amsterdam, 1992.
- Heuvel, M. van den. Het verdoemde land. De Joegoslavische tragedie vanaf 1900. Haarlem, 1993.
- Hill, J. E. 'Edith Durham as a Collector' in: J.B. Allcock & A. Young (eds.), Black Lambs and Grey Falcons. Women Travellers in the Balkans. Bradford University Press, 1991.
- Hodgson, John. 'Edith Durham. Traveller and Publicist' in: J.B. Allcock & A. Young (eds.), Black Lambs and Grey Falcons. Women Travellers in the Balkans. Bradford University Press, 1991.
- Hoffman, Stanley. 'Yugoslavia: Implications for Europe and for European Institutions' in: Richard H. Ullman, The World and Yugoslavia's Wars. New York, 1996.
- Hoogerwerf, A. Geweld in Nederland. Assen, 1996.
- Holbrooke, R. To End a War. New York, 1998.
- Hollander, P. Political pilgrims. Travels of Western intellectuals to the Soviet Union, China and Cuba 1928-1978. Oxford, 1981.

- Honig, J.W. and N. Both, Srebrenica. Reconstructie van een oorlogsmisdaad. Utrecht, 1996.
- Howorth, Jolyan. 'The debate in France over military intervention in Europe' in: L. Freedman (ed.), Military Intervention in European Conflicts. Oxford, Cambridge, 1994.
- Hroch, M. 'Central Europe: The Rise and Fall of an Historical Region' in: Lord, Chr. (ed.), Central Europe. Core or Periphery. (Copenhagen, 2000) 21-34.
- Huntington, E. Principles of Human Geography. New York, 1960.
- Huntington, S. P. 'The clash of civilisations', Foreign Affairs. Summer, 1993.
- Hupchick, D.P. Culture and History in Eastern Europe. London, 1994.
- Huussen sen., A.H. Het leven van Ogier Ghislain de Busbecq. Leiden, 1949.
- Interlinks. 6 December 1969: 'sluiten, bezetten, beheren'.
- Italy and the Balkans. The CSIS Press. Washington, 1998.
- Jahn, P. Russophilie und Konservatismus. Die russophile Literatur in der deutschen Öffentlichkeit 1831-1852. Stuttgart, 1980.
- Jelavich, Ch. South Slav Nationalisms. Textbooks and Yugoslav Union before 1914. Columbus, Ohio, 1990.
- Jelavich, Ch. and B. (eds.) The Balkans in Transition. Essays on the Development of Balkan Life and Politics since the Eighteenth Century. Berkeley, Los Angeles, 1963.
- Jelavich, Ch. and B. The Establishment of the Balkan National States, 1804-1920. A History of East Central Europe. Vol. VIII. Seattle-London, 1993.
- Judah, T. The Serbs. History, Myth and the Destruction of Yugoslavia. New Haven, London, 1997.
- Kabbani, R. Europese mythen over de Orient. Amsterdam, 1991.
- Kalevala 1835-1985. The national epic of Finland. Helsinki, 1985.
- Kamp, R. van den. 'De weg naar complementariteit. Historici, sociale wetenschappers en de begripsbepaling van nationalisme.' Theoretische geschiedenis. Vol. 18, 1991.
- Kampen, N.G. van. Griekenland en Europeisch Turkije volgens de nieuwste ontdekkingen. Haarlem, 1837.
- Kann, R.A. and David, Z.V. The Peoples of the Eastern Habsburg Lands, 1526-1918. A History of East Central Europe. Vol. VI. Seattle, London, 1984.
- Kaplan, R. D. Balkan Ghosts. A Journey through History. New York, 1994.
- Karazin, N.N. In den kruitdamp. Nijmegen, 1889.
- Kardelj, P. 'Huntington's "Clash of Civilisations", Russia and the Balkans', Balkan Forum (vol.4, no. 1, March 1996) 25-41.
- Kent, S. 'Writing the Yugoslav Wars: English-language Books on Bosnia and the Challenges of Analyzing Contemporary History', American Historical Review (October 1997) 1087-1114.
- Kinsky, F. 'Central Europe Facing a Union in Crisis' in: Chr. Lord (ed.), Central Europe. Core or Periphery. Copenhagen, 2000.
- Kiraly, BK. and Rothenberg, E. (eds.), War and Society in East Central Europe. New York, 1979.
- Kirby, D. Finland in the Twentieth Century. London, 1984.
- Klok, K. 'De rampzalige Griekse burgeroorlog 1943-1949'. Spiegel Historiae. Vol.34, N.9, Sept.1999.
- Koch, J.E. De koningsromans van Louis Couperus. Diss. Leiden 1989 / Naples, 1989.
- Kofman, D. 'Israel and the War in Bosnia' in: Th. Cushman and Stj. G. Mestrovic(eds.), This Time We Knew. Western responses to Genocide in Bosnia. New York, London, 1996.
- Koppeschaar, H. Een en ander over Montenegro en Servië. Amsterdam, 1913.
- Kossmann, E.H. 'Volkssouvereiniteit aan het begin van het Nederlandse Ancien Régime' in: E.H.Kossmann, Politieke theorie en geschiedenis. Verspreide opstellen en voordrachten. Amsterdam, 1987.
- Kossmann, E.H. Een tuchteloos probleem. De natie in de Nederlanden. Leuven, 1994.
- Koster, D. To Hellen's Noble Land. Dutch accounts of travellers, geographers and historians on Greece. Groningen, Athens, 1995.
- Landes, David S. Arm en Rijk. Waarom zijn sommige landen erg rijk en andere erg arm. Utrecht, 1998.

- Lederer, I.J. 'Nationalism and the Yugoslavs' in: P.F. Sugar and J.J. Lederer (eds.) Nationalism in Eastern Europe. Washington, 1969.
- Leeb, Th. Jacob Philipp Fallmerayer. Publizist und Politiker zwischen Revolution und Reaktion, 1835-1861. Munich, 1996.
- Leerssen, J.Th. 'Over nationale identiteit', Theoretische Geschiedenis. Vol.15, 1988, No.4.
- Leerssen, J. 'The allochronic periphery: towards a grammar of cross-cultural representation' in: C.C. Barfoot (ed.), Beyond Pug's Tour. National and ethnic Stereotyping in Theory and Literary Practice. Amsterdam, 1997.
- Leerssen, J. 'L'effet de typique' in: A. Montandon (ed.) Moeurs et images. Etudes d'imagerie européenne. Clermont-Ferrand, 1997.
- Lilje, H.G. Arbeiterselbstverwaltung. Das Beispiel Jugoslawien. Bern, Stuttgart, 1978.
- Lord, Chr. (ed.), Central Europe. Core or Periphery. Copenhagen, 2000.
- Lukic R. and Allen Lynch, Europe from the Balkans to the Urals. The Disintegration of Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union. Oxford, 1996.
- Luttervelt, R.van. De 'Turkse' schilderijen van J.B. Vanmour en zijn school. De verzameling van Cornelis Calkoen, ambassadeur by de Hoge Porte, 1723-1743. Istanbul, 1958.
- Malcolm, N. Kosovo, A Short History. London, 1998.
- Malia, M. Russia under Western Eyes. From the bronze Horseman to the Lenin Mausoleum. Cambridge, Mass., 1999.
- Mandere, H. van der. Montenegro. Amsterdam, 1913.
- Markovic, M. De revolutionaire weg van bureaucratie naar zelfbestuur. Groningen, 1972.
- Martin, G. J. Ellsworth Huntington. His Life and Thought. Archon Books, 1973.
- Martin G. and James P.E. All possible Worlds. A History of Geographical Ideas. New York, 1993.
- Maclean, F. Eastern Approaches. London, 1950.
- Mazour, A.G. Finland between East and West. New Jersey, 1956.
- Mees W.H.J. and Raaijmakers Q.A.W. Gewoon gehoorzaam. Een sociaal-psychologisch onderzoek naar gehoorzaamheid. Diss, Utrecht, 1984.
- Mehnert, K. Der Sowjetmensch. Frankfurt a.M., 1961.
- Meister, A. Où va l'autogestion yougoslave? Paris, 1970.
- Merrill, Chr. The Old Bridge. The Third Balkan War and the Age of the Refugee. Minneapolis, 1995.
- Mestrovic, S.G. The Balkanization of the West. London, 1994.
- Mestrovic, S.G. (ed.) Genocide After Emotion. The Postemotional Balkan War. London. New York, 1996.
- Mey, H. W. van der. 'Het Servische Epos', Nederland (1885) 1-34.
- Mey, H. W. van der. 'Montenegro', De Gids (IV, 1886) 230 -267.
- Meyer, V. Wie Jugoslawien verspielt wurde. Munich, 1996.
- Michielsen, P. 'Rome versus Byzantium', NRC-Handelsblad, 30 October 1999.
- Mihaljcic, R. The Battle of Kosovo in History and Popular Tradition. Belgrade, 1989.
- Milgram, S. Grenzeloze gehoorzaamheid. Een experimenteel onderzoek. Utrecht-Antwerp, 1974.
- Milokovic-Djuric, J. Panslavism and National identity in Russia and the Balkans, 1830-1880. Images of the Self and Others. New York, 1994.
- Millman, R. Britain and the Eastern Question 1875-1878. Oxford, 1979.
- Mitric, S. Geheim agent van Tito. St. Willebrod, 1982.
- Mitric, S. Tito's moordmachine. St. Willebrod, 1982.
- Monnik, G. Gastvriend van Vrije Volken, Amsterdam, 1938(?).
- Mousavizadeh, N. The Black Book of Bosnia. The consequences of appeasement. New York, 1996.
- Moynihan, D.N. Pandaemonium. New York, 1994.
- Müge Göcek, F. East Encounters West. France and the Ottoman Empire in the Eighteenth Century. Oxford, 1987.
- Naarden, B. De Spiegel der Barbaren. Socialistisch Europa en Revolutionair Rusland (1848-1923). Diss.Groningen, 1986.

- Naarden, B. 'Nederlanders en het Europese Ruslandbeeld voor 1917' in: Rusland in Nederlandse ogen. Een bundel opstellen. Amsterdam, 1986.
- Naarden, B. 'De identiteit van Centraal-Europa', Spiegel Historiae (Vol.27, No.11/12, 1992) 477-481.
- Naarden, B. Socialist Europe and Revolutionary Russia. Perception and Prejudice, 1848-1923. Cambridge, 1992.
- Naarden, Bruno. 'Dutchmen and the European Image of Russia' in: J. Braat a.o.(eds.), Russians and Dutchmen before 1917. Groningen, 1993.
- Naarden, B. 'Kalevala: folklore en nationalisme in Finland', Spiegel Historical (Vol.29, No.9, Sept.1994) 351-361.
- Naarden, B. 'Het Westen en de zevenentwintig van Eurazië', Internationale Spectator. July/Aug 1994, No.7-8.
- Naarden, B. 'Ik ben een genie, maar ook niet meer dan dat. Ljev Goemiljov (19 12-1992), de etnogenese en de wereldgeschiedenis', Tijdschrift voor Geschiedenis (Vol. 108, No.4, 1995) 519-549.
- Naarden, B. 'Het Joegoslavisch labirint', Amsterdamse Boekengids (No.9, March 1997) 18-27.
- Naarden, B. 'Education: bridge or minefield? Russians and Tartars before 1917' in: Th.J. Siskens and L.E. Beijlsmit (Eds.), Crossroads in Russia. Experiences in Educational co-operation (Leuven, Leusden, 2000) 91-114.
- Namier, L. Facing East. Essays on Germany, the Balkans, and Russia in the Twentieth Century. New York, s.a.
- Newman, B. Rood Joego-Slavië. Tilburg, 1954.
- Norris, H.T. Islam in the Balkans. Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab world. London, 1993.
- Novakovic-Lopusina, J. Srbi i Jugoistocna Evropa u Nizozemskim izvorima do 1918. Belgrade, 1999.
- NRC-Handelsblad, De verwoesting van Joegoslavië. Rotterdam, 1993.
- Other Balkan Wars, The. A 1913 Carnegie Endowment Inquiry in Retrospect with a New Introduction and Reflections on the Present Conflict by George F. Kennan.* Washington, 1993.
- Owen, D. Balkan Odyssey. London, 1995.
- Palmer, A. Metternich. London, 1972.
- Peternel, N. Voorheen Joegoslavië. De achtergronden van de Balkanoorlog. Amsterdam, 1993.
- Petkov, K. Infidels, Turks, and Women: The South Slavs in the German Mind, ca. 1400-1600. Frankfurt am Main, 1997.
- Petrovitch, W.M. Heldensagen en legenden van de Serviërs. Zutphen, 1915.
- Popovic, T. Prince Marko. The Hero of South Slavic Epics. New York, 1988.
- Port, M. van de. Het einde van de wereld. Beschaving en redeloosheid en zigeunercafés in Servië. Amsterdam, 1994.
- Port, M. van de. 'It takes a Serb to know a Serb. Uncovering the roots of obstinate otherness in Serbia' in: Imagining the Balkans. Press now. Balie, Amsterdam, Jan. 1999.
- Pottinger Saab, A. The Origins of the Crimean Alliance. Charlottesville, 1977.
- Ramet, S. B. Balkan Babel. The disintegration of Yugoslavia from the death of Tito to Ethnic War. Oxford, 1996.
- Reitsma, S. A. 'Jeanne Merkus, een Hollandsch-Servische Jeanne d'Arc' in: Haagsch Maandblad (Vol. XV, 3, 1938) 279-288.
- Reitsma, S. A. Zwerftochten door den Balkan. 1937. The Hague, 1938.
- Renner, H. 'De Midden-Europese paradoxen', Internationale Spectator (Nov.1999) 582-585.
- Renting, R.A. 'Nederland en de Griekse vrijheidsoorlog' in: Tijdschrift voor Geschiedenis (Vol. 67, 1954) 21-50.
- Reve-Israë1, J. van het. 'Een Hollandse arts in Rusland: Pieter van Woensel' in: Rusland in Nederlandse ogen. Een bundel opstellen (Amsterdam, 1986) 91-111.
- Rijk, G. de. Joegoslavië. Haarlem, 1980.

- Roding, M. 'Die met dit soort van volk wil verkeer... , het beeld van de Turk in de Nederlandse grafiek' in: H. Theunissen e.a.(ed.), Topkapi & Turkomanie. Turks-Nederlandse ontmoetingen sinds 1600. Amsterdam, 1989.
- Rohde, D. Endgame. The Betrayal and Fall of Srebrenica, Europe's worst massacre since World War II. Boulder Colorado, 1998.
- Romanenko, S. 'Russia in the Balkans: Eternal Allies or Eternal Interests', Balkan Forum. Sept. 1996.
- Romanenko, S. 'Erfenis van het verleden. De achtergrond van de Russische Balkanpolitiek' in: Vrede op de Balkan. Voormalig Joegoslavië voor en na 'Dayton'. Oost-Europa Verkenningen Special (December, 1996) 40-48.
- Roobol, W. H. 'Central Europe - Concepts and Reality' in: L. Marácz (ed.), Expanding European Unity - Central and Eastern Europe. Yearbook of European Studies (Amsterdam, Atlanta, 1999) 1-15.
- Roosens, E. E. Creating Ethnicity. The Process of Ethnogenesis. London, 1989.
- Rosdolsky, R. Engels und das Problem der 'geschichtslosen Völker'. Detroit, 1949.
- Rothschild, J. East Central Europe between the Two World Wars. A History of East Central Europe. Vol.IX. Seattle-London, 1974.
- Rozemond, K. Archimandrite Hierotheos Abbatios, Leiden, 1966.
- Runciman, S. The Great Church in Captivity. Cambridge, 1992.
- Rutten, F. Joegoslavië. Landschap — Volksleven. Amsterdam, 1937.
- Sadkovich, J. J. 'American Media and Balkan Nationalisms' in: S.G. Mestrovic (ed.) Genocide After Emotion. The Postemotional Balkan War. London, 1996.
- Said, E. W. Orientalism. Western conceptions of the Orient. Penguin Books, 1991.
- Said, E. W. Culture and Imperialism. London, 1994.
- Samenwerking in de Joegoslavische onderneming. Commissie Opvoering Produktiviteit van de Sociaal Economische Raad. The Hague, 1966.
- Sas, N.C.F. van. 'Het Europese statenstelsel, 1814/1815-1870' in: L.H.M. Wessels & A.Bosch, Veranderde grenzen, Nationalisme in Europa, 1815-1919. Open Universiteit, Heerlen, 1992.
- Schnabel, P. 'God in vele landen'. NRC, 12 Dec.1998.
- Schöpflin, G. and Wood, N. In Search of Central Europe. Cambridge, 1989.
- Schöpflin, G. 'Discontinuity in Central and South Eastern Europe' in: Chr.Lord (ed.) Central Europe. Core or Periphery (Stockholm, 2000) 57-66.
- Schrenk M. a.o., Yugoslavia. Selfmanagement Socialism. Challenges of Development. Baltimore, London, 1979.
- Schroevers, M. Op zoek naar Joego-Slavië. The Hague, 1961.
- Selesković, M.T. La Serbie dans l'opinion allemande contemporaine. Paris, 1919.
- Seton-Watson, H. and Ch. The Making of a New Europe. R. W. Seton-Watson and the last years of Austria-Hungary. London, 1984.
- Seton-Watson, R.W. Disraeli, Gladstone and the Eastern Question. New York, 1972.
- Shannon, R. Gladstone and the Bulgarian Agitation of 1876. London, 1963.
- Sharafuddin, M. Islam and Romantic Orientalism. Literary Encounters with the Orient. London, New York, 1994.
- Silber, L. and Little, A. The Death of Yugoslavia. London, 1996.
- Simic, A. 'Obstacles to the Development of a Yugoslav National Consciousness: Ethnic Identity and Folk Culture in the Balkans', Journal of Mediterranean Studies. Vol.1, 1991, No. 1.
- Simms, B. 'Bosnia: The Lessons of History?' in: Th. Cushman and Stj. G. Mestrovic (eds.), This Time We Knew. Western Responses to Genocide in Bosnia. New York, London, 1996.
- Smit, C. (ed.), Bescheiden betreffende de buitenlandse politiek van Nederland. Derde periode 1899-1919. Tweede Deel: 1903-1907. The Hague, 1958.
- Smit, C. (ed.), Bescheiden betreffende de buitenlandse politiek van Nederland. Derde periode 1899-1919. Derde Deel 1907-1914. The Hague, 1961.
- Sobel, R. 'U.S. and European Attitudes toward Intervention in the former Yugoslavia: Mourir pour la Bosnie?' in: Richard H. Ullman (ed.), The World and Yugoslavia's Wars. New York, 1996.

- Soergel, W. Arbeiterselbstverwaltung oder managersozialismus? Munich, 1979.
- Speyer, P. Zuid Slavië 1950. Noch Stalin, noch Marshall. Antwerp, 1951.
- Stallaerts, R. Afscheid van Joegoslavië. Achtergronden van de crisis. Leuven, Apeldoorn, 1992.
- Stanzel, Franz K. Europäer. Ein imagologischer Essay. Heidelberg, 1997.
- Stokvis, RD. 'Beeldvorming, stereotypen en karakteristieken. Het debat over de nationale identiteit', Theoretische geschiedenis is, Vol.24, 1997, No.3.
- Ströhm, C.G. Ohne Tito. Kann Jugoslawien überleben? Cologne, 1976.
- Sundhaussen, H. 'Nation und Nationalstaat auf dem Balkan. Konzepte und Konsequenzen im 19.und 20.Jahrhundert' in: J. Elvert (ed.), Der Balkan. Eine europäische Krisenregion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Stuttgart, 1997) 77-90.
- Taylor, A. J. P. The Habsburg monarchy. A History of the Austrian Empire and Austria-Hungary. Penguin Books, 1964.
- Tellegen, E. De sociologie in het werk van Max Weber. Meppel, 1968.
- Thaden, E.C. Russia and the Balkan Alliance of 1912. University Park, Penns.,1965.
- Theunissen, Hans. 'Barbaren en ongelovigen: Turcica in de Nederlanden 1500-1800' in: H. Theunissen e.a.(ed.), Topkapi & Turkomanie. Turks -Nederlandse ontmoetingen sinds 1600. Amsterdam, 1989.
- Theunissen H. e.a.(ed.), Topkapi & Turkomanie. Turks -Nederlandse ontmoetingen sinds 1600. Amsterdam, 1989.
- Thomson, D. England in the Nineteenth Century, 1815-1914. Penguin Books, 1962.
- Tienhoven, A. van. De gruwelen van den oorlog in Servië. Het dagboek van den oorlogs-chirurg. Rotterdam, 1915.
- Tindemans L. (ed.) Unfinished Peace. Report of the International Commission on the Balkans. Washington D.C., 1996.
- Todorova, M. Imagining the Balkans, New York, Oxford, 1997.
- Tomasevich, J. The Chetniks. War and Revolution in Yugoslavia, 1941-1945. Stanford, 1975.
- Treverton, G.F. 'The new Europe', Foreign Affairs. Vol. 7- No.2, winter 1991 / 92.
- Tromp, B. Verraad op de Balkan. Nieuwegein, 1996.
- Tromp, H. 'On the nature of war and the nature of militarism' in: R.A. Hinde and H.E. Watson (eds.), War, a Cruel Necessity? The Bases of Institutionalized Violence (London, 1995) 118-131.
- Udovicki, J. and Ridgeway, J. (eds.) Burn this House. The Making and Unmaking of Yugoslavia. London, 1997.
- Ullman, RH. 'The Wars in Yugoslavia and the International System after the Cold War' in: R.H. Ullman(ed.), The World and Yugoslavia's Wars. New York, 1996.
- Vasic, M. 'Black Hand, White Rose. An Inquiry into the Political Uses of Conspiracy Theories', Erewhon. 1995, No.3.
- Veremis, Th. Greece, the Balkans and the European Union. Discussion Paper C 9, 1998. Zentrum für Europäische Integrationsforschung.
- Verheul, K. Kontakt met de vijand . Amsterdam, 1975.
- Vidakovic, Z. Het tweede decennium van arbeiderszelfbestuur. Het verslag van een historische ervaring. Introduced and translated by M. Broekmeyer. Amsterdam, 1972.
- Voogt, G. de. In den Balkan na den vrede. Servië en de Serviërs. Mededelingen en gegevens betreffende den Handel, Industrie en het land in het algemeen, verzameld ter plaatse na den oorlog. Amsterdam, 1913.
- Vosschmidt, L. Das Kalevala und seine Rezeption im 19. Jahrhundert. Frankfurt a.M.,1989.
- Vucinich, W.S. The Ottoman Empire. Its Record and Legacy. New York, etc., 1965.
- Wachtel, A. B. Making a Nation. Breaking a Nation. Literature and Cultural Politics in Yugoslavia. Stanford, 1998.
- Wagner, F.S. 'Introduction to the History of Central Europe' in: F.S. Wagner (ed.), Toward a New Central Europe. A symposium on the Problems of the Danubian Nations. (Astor Park, Florida, 1970. Reprint: Hamilton, Ontario, 1991)1-12.

- Walsum, P. van. Verder met Nederland. De kritische terugblik van een topdiplomaat. Amsterdam, 2001.
- Wandycz, P.S. The Lands of Partitioned Poland 1795-1918. A History of East Central Europe. Vol. VII. Seattle, London, 1993.
- Wesselo, J.J. Pieter van Woensel. Amurath-effendi, Hekim-bachi. Zutphen, 1974.
- West, R. Black Lamb and Grey Falcon. A Journey through Yugoslavia. Penguin Books, 1982.
- Westerink, K. 'Liever Turks dan paaps: een devies tijdens de Opstand in de Nederlanden' in: H.Theunissen e.a.(ed.), Topkapi & Turkomanie. Turks -Nederlandse ontmoetingen sinds 1600. Amsterdam, 1989.
- Westerman, F. and Grijs, B. Srebrenica. Het zwartste scenario. Amsterdam, Antwerp, 1997.
- Wijnands, D.O. 'Tulpen naar Amsterdam: plantenverkeer tussen Nederland en Turkije' in: H. Theunissen e.a.(ed.), Topkapi & Turkomanie. Turks -Nederlandse ontmoetingen sinds 1600. Amsterdam, 1989
- Willemsen, C. 'Hendrik Wolfgang van der Mey (1842-19 14), first Dutch slavist. A forgotten pioneer' in: J. Braat e.a. (ed.), Russians and Dutchmen. Essays (Groningen, 1993)183-206.
- Woensel, P. van. Staat der geleerdheid in Turkijen (1791). Bezorgd door M. Broecheler. Leiden, 1995.
- Woldring J.(ed.), Bescheiden betreffende de buitenlandse politiek van Nederland, Tweede periode 1871-1898. Tweede deel 1874-1880. The Hague, 1965.
- Wolff, L. Inventing Eastern Europe; The Map of Civilisation on the Mind of the Enlightenment. Stanford Cal., 1994.
- Woodhouse, C. M. The Philhellenes. London, 1969.
- Woodward, S.L. Balkan Tragedy. Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War. Washington, 1995.
- Wynaendts, H. L' engrenage. Chroniques yougoslaves, juillet 1991- août 1992. Paris, 1993.
- Zacharasiewicz, W. Die Klimatheorie in der Englischen Literatur und Literaturkritik. Von der Mitte des 16. bis zum frühen 18. Jahrhundert. Stuttgart, 1977.
- Zimbardo, P.G. 'The human choice: Individuation, Reason and Order versus Deindividuation, Impulse and Chaos.' Nebraska Symposium on Motivation (s.l., 1969) 337-307.
- Zimbardo, Ph. G. 'On the ethics of intervention in human psychology: with special reference to the Stanford prison experiment', Cognition (1973 No.2) 243-256.

Appendix VI

The Background of the Yugoslav crisis: A review of the literature

Author: N. Tromp

Introduction

There is no consensus among experts about the causes and even the course of the conflict, and the factual details of this conflict and their interpretation are still under discussion. The British Yugoslavia expert James Gow¹ pointed out in his review of the relevant literature entitled “After the Flood: Literature on the Context, Causes and Course of the Yugoslav War - Reflections and Refractions” that the publications devoted to the former Yugoslavia often reveal a situation in which each fact, claim or interpretation given by one author is refuted by another: “It is clear that not only was the Yugoslav war hideously complex in its detail and in the variety of issues raised, but comprehension of it was made more difficult by the welter of competing narratives seeking to explain it.”² Another important remark by Gow referred to the many factual errors and dubious interpretations in the literature on both the history of Yugoslavia and the current crisis. Gow concludes that: “Mistakes and important omissions are common in the literature - and both inevitable and understandable, given the complex nature of the subject and the period in question. There is a danger for the non-expert reader (or even for the expert reader who may have happened to have missed something) that, where a mistake is repeated from one author to another, it will be taken as correct.”³ In “Instant History: Understanding the Wars of Yugoslav Succession,” four Yugoslavia experts review recent English-language publications dealing with the war in the former Yugoslavia.⁴ On the basis of a limited number of books, they try to find answers to a series of questions which have been regularly posed since the start of the conflict: “While the peoples of the former Yugoslavia have suffered and died, a horrified but nevertheless fascinated world has wondered how it was possible that a seemingly prosperous and stable country could collapse into such brutal internecine war. Was this caused by “ancient ethnic hatreds” breaking loose? Who was at fault, the Yugoslav communists or ethnic nationalists, western financial pressures or indecisive western policy? Could the wars have been prevented? What to do now?”⁵

The literature on the history of the Yugoslav state and the crisis of the nineties is vast but of variable quality. The authors of “Instant History...” point out a wide diversity of themes and a lack of theoretical orientation in the literature they select. They distinguish between books written by academics (historians, political scientists, sociologists, etc.) and those by non-academics (journalists, diplomats and other writers). The American historian Sarah A. Kent also stressed the problem of the lack of a proper theoretical framework in the publications about the recent war in the former Yugoslavia in her review article “Writing the Yugoslav Wars: English-language books on Bosnia (1992-1996) and the challenges of analysing contemporary history”.⁶ She considered that “The challenge for historians is how to employ the distinctive analytical tools of our discipline to evaluate the basically ahistorical body of work on a current event”.⁷ While she also stressed the distinction between publications written by scholars and those by non-scholars, she pointed out that the three best books on the crisis in the former Yugoslavia were actually written by non-scholars.⁸

¹ The main books by Gow on this topic are Legitimacy and Military: The Yugoslav Crisis (London 1992) and Triumph of Lack of Will: International Diplomacy and the Yugoslav War (London 1997).

² Gow (1997) 477.

³ Ibid., 481.

⁴ G. Stokes, J. Lampe, D. Rusinow, J. Mostow, ‘Instant History: Understanding the Wars of Yugoslav Succession’ Slavic Review 55 (Spring 1996). 138-162.

⁵ Ibid., 136.

⁶ Sarah Kent, A Writing the Yugoslav Wars: English-language Books on Bosnia (1992-1996) and the Challenges of Analyzing Contemporary History; American Historical Review (October 1997) 1087-1114.

⁷ Ibid., 1086.

⁸ Kent means the books by C. Bennett, Yugoslavia’s Bloody Collapse: Causes, Course, and Consequences (New York 1995). B. Magas, Destruction of Yugoslavia: Tracking the Break-up, 1980-92 (London 1993), and L. Silber and A. Little, Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation (New York, 1996)

On this basis, Sarah Kent warned against looking for the “truth” in the literature on the Yugoslav crisis: “A general reader’s principal task in approaching these books, like those produced by similar contemporary conflicts, is therefore to develop a critical perspective: that is, to examine authorial intent, to reconstruct the context of the author’s experience, and to assess the strengths and weaknesses of an author’s interpretation.”⁹ In other words, it is important not only to understand the claims made in the books but also to consider who wrote them. A clear impression that the authors are very closely involved with their topic may lead the reader to suspect that they are biased. Most of the authors who have written about the former Yugoslavia - especially those writing about the recent war - have been accused by their colleagues, book reviewers or the parties involved in the conflict of being biased or of favouring one particular side, of being pro-Serb, pro-Croat or pro-Muslim. For example, critics accuse the American Yugoslavia expert Susan L. Woodward of defending Serb policies in her book Balkan Tragedy - but they still regard this work as an indispensable contribution to the debate.¹⁰ Other authors have openly taken sides, such as the Austrian writer Peter Handke who is now regarded as pro-Serb. When anti-Serb feeling was at its height in Europe, he travelled through Serbia to gain a better understanding of Serb political viewpoints, after which he adopted an extreme stance by depicting the Serbs as innocent victims. On the other hand, the British historian and commentator Noel Malcolm is regarded by some as a supporter of the Bosnian Muslims. His book on the history of Bosnia appeared in 1994, when the foreign mediators involved in the negotiations had arrived at a position of extreme doubt about the future of Bosnia-Herzegovina as a unitary state. In his book, Malcolm defended the historical legitimacy of Bosnia-Herzegovina as an independent state, in line with the official position of the Bosnian government under Alija Izetbegovic.¹¹

The British author Rebecca West gave a telling description of the lack of objectivity and tendency to take sides exhibited by her compatriots in their writings about the Balkans more than half a century ago¹²: “English persons, therefore, of humanitarian and reformist disposition constantly went out to the Balkan Peninsula to see who was in fact ill-treating whom, and, being by the very nature of their perfectionist faith unable to accept the horrid hypothesis that everybody was ill-treating everybody else, all came back with a pet Balkan people established in their hearts as suffering and innocent, eternally massacree and never a massacer.”¹³

A typical example of bias in modern times is provided by the scientific staff of the Institute for Slav and Balkan Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences in Moscow. Most of the researchers there were experts in one particular region such as Croatia, Slovenia and Serbia. Great disagreement arose between these various regional experts during the Yugoslav war, each specialist showing a very marked tendency to defend the political stance adopted by “his” or “her” republic. The publications produced by the staff of the institute during this period show for example that the Croatia expert Sergej Romanenko was critical of Serb policy concerning Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, while the Serbia expert Elena Guskova defended this policy.¹⁴ This type of bias could be regularly observed in similar institutes in other countries during the recent war.

⁹ Kent (1997) 1087-1088.

¹⁰ Susan L. Woodward, Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War (Washington, 1995). It is stated in ‘Instant History...’ e.g. that she avoided writing about Kosovo and that she found countless ways of defending the policies of Milosevic (146-147).

¹¹ Peter Handke, A Journey to the Rivers: Justice for Serbia (New York, 1997). Noel Malcolm, A Short History of Bosnia (London, 1994).

¹² West herself was (and still is) regarded as pro-Serb and anti-Croat.

¹³ Rebecca West, Black Lamb and Grey Falcon - a Journey through Yugoslavia (Harmondsworth, 20th edition, 1994). This book was first published in 1942. Since then, it has gone through many editions and been translated into many languages.

¹⁴ Elena Guskova had a big colour photograph of the Serb general Ratko Mladic (who has been accused of war crimes) on the wall of her room in the Russian Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1998. When asked why it was there, she replied that she had a great admiration for him as a soldier, and that it was not his fault that his political masters had adopted such a catastrophic policy.

As a by-product of this trend, authors with roots in the former Yugoslavia were often regarded a priori as biased. Even though some of them had worked abroad for many years (or had even been born abroad), there was a tendency to think that they could not be objective because of their ethnic origin.¹⁵ For example, if authors of Serb descent were critical of Serb policy in their writings, no one will think of accusing them of doing this because they are pro-Croat or pro-Bosnian. At most, they could be characterized as “traitors” by Serb ideologists. But if these same authors expressed criticism of Bosnian policy, their criticism ran the risk of being disregarded as biased.

This problem is made more complicated by the fact that some authors of Yugoslav descent do support the policies of the ethnic group to which they belong - or would like to belong. A well known example is John Zametica¹⁶, a political scientist who worked in Great Britain before the war. He was the author e.g. of the study The Yugoslav Conflict in the authoritative Adelphi Papers, which appeared in the summer of 1992. Though not of Serb origin, he acted as the spokesman of the Bosnian Serb government in Pale in 1993. In his analysis of the political crisis in Bosnia-Herzegovina, he questioned the concept of Bosnia-Herzegovina as a ‘republic of burgers’. His argument that the Serbs would always be voted down as a minority by the other two population groups in such a state agreed with the line followed by nationalist Serb politicians from Bosnia.¹⁷

A separate group is formed by the authors who played an active role in formulating nationalist ideologies and in fomenting inter-ethnic intolerance. Some of them were respected as experts in their own field before the conflict started, such as the Bosnian historian of Serb descent Milorad Ekmecic who has written a number of standard works on the history of the South Slav people.¹⁸ He was however also one of the founder members of the nationalist party of the Bosnian Serbs, the SDS (Serbian Democratic Party). He fled from Sarajevo to Belgrade in 1992, and has since written a number of political pamphlets about the risks posed by Muslim fundamentalism in Bosnia.¹⁹

1. Selection criteria

It remains difficult to find a clear, comprehensive explanation of the disintegration of Yugoslavia. This is certainly not due to a lack of literature about the region. Even before the start of the Yugoslav crisis, there was a vast literature about the history, politics and culture of Yugoslavia available in many languages, especially in English. The main problem, however, is that there are hardly any good works reviewing the field and summarizing the different views expressed by the various authors. The objective of the present text is to collect as many representative views as possible concerning the above-mentioned topics.

This text is based in the first instance on an analysis of the English, Serbian, Croatian and Bosnian literature. The English-language literature on the history of Yugoslavia and the recent war predominates in terms of both quality and quantity. The great advantage of the English-language literature is that it is accessible to an international audience and that it is read world-wide by journalists, ¹⁵ A few more of the many examples of such authors are the British journalist of Croatian descent, Christopher Cvijic (known in Croatia as Krsto Cvijic), the American historian of Croatian descent Ivo Banac, the British historian of Serbian descent Stevan Pavlowich and the American diplomat and historian of Serbian descent Alex Dragnich.

¹⁶ John Zametica is an example of how ethnic origin need not always imply political loyalty. He was a child of an ethnically mixed marriage and is half Slovak and half Muslim. His original name was Omer. When the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina broke out, however, he took the side of the Bosnian Serbs and now calls himself Jovan Zametica.

¹⁷ According to the Serb journalist Slavko Curuvija, Zametica offered his services to the Bosnian Serbs in London in 1992. It has been claimed that he influenced public opinion in Great Britain in favour of the Bosnian Serbs even before the war broke out (see the article ‘Dzon Vejn na Miljacki’, in Borba, 10-11 April 1993).

¹⁸ M. Ekmecic, Stvaranje Jugoslavije, 1789-1918 (Belgrade, 1989). One of Ekmecic’s best known works is the book Ratni ciljevi Srbije (Belgrade, 1973), which won him international acclaim.

¹⁹ For example, he published two long essays in the weekly Nedeljni Telegraf under the title ‘Islamerika’, in which he accused the USA of giving worldwide support to Islam (25 February and 4 March 1998).

diplomats, politicians, military personnel, scholars and students. In addition, major works not originally written in English are regularly translated into this language.²⁰

In addition to the English-language literature, it is essential to study the literature in the languages that are spoken in the region if one wishes to have an optimum understanding of the history of the region and of the political developments in the recent past. This literature is only accessible to a limited audience outside Yugoslavia, viz. the regional experts and a few journalists and diplomats. For the purposes of this review, in particular the relevant Serb, Croat and Bosnian sources have been consulted, as has the Dutch, French, German and Russian literature (albeit to a much lesser extent).

The various themes found in the literature concerning the former Yugoslavia and the recent war have been collected in two chapters, entitled:

- The history of the Yugoslav state
- Theories concerning the disintegration of Yugoslavia.

Some details concerning the content of these two chapters are given below.

(Chapter I). The main themes concerning the history of Yugoslavia in the 19th century are the development of the South Slav national question and the power struggle in the Balkans during this period. The following books have been analysed in this context: National Question in Yugoslavia: Origins, History, Politics, (Ithaca, 1983) by Ivo Banac; Stvaranje Jugoslavije, 1790-1918, (Belgrade, 1989) by Milorad Ekemčić; and Jugoslavenska ideologija u hrvatskoj i slovenskoj politici: Hrvatsko-slovenski politički odnosi 1848-1870, (Zagreb, 1986) by Petar Korunić.

The following books dealing with the creation and dissolution of the Yugoslav state in the 20th century have been analysed: Ivo Lederer, Yugoslavia at the Paris Conference: A Study in Frontiermaking (New Haven, 1977). D. Djordjević and S. Fisher-Galati (eds.) The Creation of Yugoslavia 1914-1918 (Santa Barbara, 1980). A. Dragnich, The First Yugoslavia (New Brunswick, 1974). - Serbs and Croats: The struggle in Yugoslavia (New York, 1992). Dusan Bilandžić, Historija SFRJ: glavni procesi, 1918-1985, (Zagreb 1985). Branko Petranović, Istorija Jugoslavije, 1918-1988, 3 vols, (Belgrade 1988). Vladimir Dedijer et al., History of Yugoslavia (New York 1974). John Lampe, Yugoslavia, Twice There was a Country (Cambridge (UK), 1996); Stevan K. Pavlowich, The Improbable Survivor: Yugoslavia and its Problems 1919-1988 (London, 1988) and Catherine Samary, Yugoslavia Dismembered (New York, 1995).

The literature on the history of the Yugoslav state tends to concentrate on Serbo-Croat relationships. Much less attention has been (and still is) paid to the other South Slav peoples, in particular the Slovenes, the Montenegrins, the Macedonians and the Bosnians.²¹ The Kosovo Albanians could also be considered to belong to this group of peoples, but the problems of Albanian nationality fall outside the scope of the present study. Interest in Montenegro and Macedonia since the disintegration of Yugoslavia has been limited, however. Most of the literature on the history of these regions appeared before Yugoslavia split up in 1991. Ivo Banac's book Yugoslav National Question gives a good overview of the growth of national awareness in Montenegro and Macedonia and the attitude of their inhabitants to the South Slav union. His work has provided a basis for more recent studies of these regions. For example, the British commentator Hugh Poulton cites extensively from Banac's work in his book Who are Macedonians? (London 1995); however, Poulton's book is still a useful addition to the existing literature since it places the recent confused political developments relating to Macedonia in a wider historical perspective.

Interest in Bosnia-Herzegovina has grown since the war broke out there, and dozens of books about the history of this region have appeared since 1994. The following (mainly) English-language books about the history of Bosnia-Herzegovina which were published since the outbreak of war there will be analysed in the present study: Noel Malcolm, Bosnia - A Short History (London, 1994). Mark

²⁰ See e.g. Catharine Samary, Yugoslavia Dismembered (New York, 1995), translated from the French by Peter Handke, and A Journey to the Rivers: Justice for Serbia (New York, 1997), translated from the German.

²¹ Gow refers to these peoples as 'uncharted territories'.

Pinson (ed.), The Muslims of Bosnia-Herzegovina: Their Historic Development from Middle Ages to the Dissolution of Yugoslavia (Cambridge, Mass, 1994). R. Donia and J. Fine, Bosnia and Herzegovina: a Tradition Betrayed (London, 1994). J-M. Calic, Der Krieg in Bosnien-Herzegowina: Ursachen, Konfliktstrukturen, Internationale Lösungsversuche (Frankfurt, 1995). Franciene Friedman, The Bosnian Muslims: Denial of a Nation (Boulder, 1996).

In 2000, the historian Robert Donia published a review of four books on the history of Bosnia and the Bosnians published after the recent war, under the title “The New Bosniak History”. The four books in question are Ahmed Alicic, Pokret za autonomiju Bosne i Hercegovine od 1831. do 1832. godine, (Sarajevo, 1996); Sacir Filandra, Bosnjacka politika u XX.. stoljecu., (Sarajevo, 1998); Mustafa Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, (Sarajevo, 1996); Behija Zlatar, Zlatno doba Sarajeva (Sarajevo, 1996).²² Donia describes the significance of these works as follows: “Although these studies build upon several propositions advanced by Bosniak scholars in the 1960s and 1970s, they reflect substantial additional research and are characterized by originality, boldness, and a concern with the historical antecedents of contemporary Bosniak identity. Therefore, they are substantial contributions to a new Bosniak history, which may be defined as recent works written by Bosniak authors about the Bosniak past.”²³

The review in the present study of the historical roots of Bosnian identity is based on analysis of the following historical studies: Vera Krzisnik-Bukic, Bosanski identitet izmedju proslosti i buducnosti, (Sarajevo, 1997) and Mustafa Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, (Sarajevo, 1998).

(Chapter II). This chapter deals with the various theories about the disintegration of Yugoslavia and the various interpretations and definitions of the recent war. According to Gow, one of the main characteristics of this war was the general disagreement about its nature: “It was variously typified as, inter alia, ethnic, nationalist, historic, religious, genocidal or aggressive”.²⁴ Gow himself considered all these definitions relevant, but none of them decisive. He defines the war as “a clash of state projects”.²⁵ A very wide selection of books will be analysed in this chapter, varying from highly specialized regional studies giving details of the escalation of the conflict, to more theoretical works giving an insight into the theories about e.g. ethnic conflicts and nationalism. This selection includes the following books: Yugoslavia: The Process of Disintegration, (New York, 1993) by the Yugoslav sociologist Laslo Sekelj; The Destruction of Yugoslavia: Tracking the Break-Up, (London, 1993) by the British journalist of Croat descent Branka Magas and Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation by the journalists L. Silber and A. Little (London, 1995). The theoretical insights into the causes of the disintegration of Yugoslavia are underrepresented compared with the works dealing with the reconstruction of the escalation process. In the book The South-Slav Conflict: History, Religion, Ethnicity, and Nationalism, edited by R. Frieman and R. Thomas (New York, 1996), the authors analyse the Yugoslav conflict from various theoretical viewpoints. Another book with interesting theoretical insights is War and Religion in Bosnia, edited by Paul Mojzes, (Atlanta, 1997), in which the authors deal with the historical and religious background of the war. The book Unfinished Peace: Report of the International Commission on the Balkans, edited by Leo Tindemans (Washington, 1996) gives an interesting survey of perceptions in the former Yugoslavia and abroad about the causes of the war. An extensive analysis is also given of the involvement of the international community, in particular the policies of the EU member states, Russia, the USA and the UN.

²² See: Robert Donia, ‘The New Bosniak History’, in Nationalities Papers, (Vol. 28, No. 2) 2000: 351-358.

²³ Ibid., 351.

²⁴ Gow (1997) 446.

²⁵ Ibid., 447.

Chapter 1

The history of the Yugoslav state

1. South-Slav national ideology

The South-Slav or Yugoslav national question is the name given to the question as to how a feeling on national identity developed among the South-Slav peoples²⁶ This topic is of great importance for the history of the 20th century and for the origin of the Yugoslav state. Right from the beginning, it comprised two diametrically opposed concepts of state formation, one arising from nationalist ideologies and aiming at the creation of separate Serb and Croat national states within their 'historical and ethnic boundaries' and the other arising from South-Slav unitarism and envisaging the formation of a joint state embodying both national entities.

The history of the 19th and 20th centuries shows a continual alternation between nationalist and unitarist state projects. The historian Ivo Banac lays the main stress on the development of the Serb and Croat national ideologies which have been advocating the formation of national states for each group since the 19th century; he contrasted these with the 'unitarist' and 'integrationalist' ideologies which made a plea for the formation of a joint South-Slav state. Banac describes the Yugoslav national question as arising from a conflict between the various ideologies: "Yugoslavia's national question was the expression of the conflicting national ideologies that have evolved in each of its numerous national and confessional communities, reflecting the community's historical experiences. These ideologies assumed their all but definite contours well before the unification and could not be significantly altered by any combination of cajolery or coercion. The divisions inherited in the national movements of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, the three principal nationalities of Yugoslavia, were not, however, sufficient to forestall the rise of a single southern Slavic state. The credit for this feat must be ascribed to the ideology of unitaristic Yugoslavism. It captured the imagination of the southern Slavic intelligentsia in Austria-Hungary and could be accepted by the Serbian elite without any significant departures from all the traditions and trappings of Serbian statehood."²⁷

The Serb historian Milorad Ekmecic distinguishes four periods in the development of the 'south-Slav national question':

- a period of belief (1790-1830);
- a period of culture (1830-1860);
- a period of politics (1860-1903);
- a period of violence (1903-1918).²⁸

The period of belief was characterized by the predominant role of religion and the church, especially in Serbia, in the growth of a proto-national identity.

The period of culture saw the secularization of national identity, with language as the main criterion of nationality. The prominent Serb intellectuals Dositej Obradovic (1739-1811) and Vuk Karadzic (1787-1864) introduced linguistic criteria for determination of Serb ethnic identity. According ²⁶ See e.g. I. Banac, The National Question in Yugoslavia: Origins, History, Politics, (Ithaca and London, 1984). W.D. Behschnitt, Nationalismus bei Serben und Croats 1830-1914: Analyse und Typologien der nationalen Ideology (Munchen, 1989). V. Cubrilovic, Istorija politicke misli u Srbiji XIX veka, (Belgrade, 1958). M. Ekmecic, Stvaranje Jugoslavije 1790-1918, 2 vols., (Belgrade 1989). F. Gerstin and V. Melik, Slovenska zgodovina od konca osemnajstega stoletja do 1918 (Ljubljana, 1966). P. Korunic, Jugoslavenska ideologija u hrvatskoj i slovenskoj politicians: Hrvatsko-slovenski politicki odnosi 1848-1870, (Zagreb, 1986). Viktor Novak, Antologija jugoslavense misli i narodnog jedinstva (1390-1930) (Belgrade, 1930). Carole Rogel, The Slovenes and Yugoslavism 1890-191 (Boulder, Col., 1977). Ferdo Sisic, Jugoslavenska misao. Istorija ideje jugoslavenskog narodnog ujedinjenja i oslobocjenja od 1790-1918 (Belgrade, 1937).

²⁷ I. Banac, The National Question in Yugoslavia: Origins, History, Politics (Ithaca and London, 1984) 406-407.

²⁸ Milorad Ekmecic, Stvaranje Jugoslavije, 1790-1918, 2vols. (Belgrade, 1989).

to these criteria, all South Slavs who spoke the sto dialect belonged to the Serb nation.²⁹ In 1836, Karadzic wrote in an essay entitled Srbi svi i svuda (Serbs All and Everywhere) that 5 million people spoke the same language, though they were divided over three different religions (Orthodox, Catholic and Muslim). According to Karadzic, only the Orthodox Serbs were really 'serbs': the Muslims who spoke the same language regarded themselves as 'Turks', while the Catholic Serbs belonged to other groups such as the Slavonians, Dalmatians and Bosnians. He was surprised that the Muslims and Catholics who belonged within the Serb linguistic group did not wish to be called Serbs, while for examples Hungarians and Germans of the Catholic, Lutheran or Calvinist faith still regarded themselves as Hungarians and Germans.³⁰ Karadzic made a plea for a common Serbo-Croat language based on the sto-ije dialect, which was spoken by the Serbs, the Croats, the inhabitants of Bosnia (Muslims, Catholics and Orthodox) and the Montenegrin. This was also the dialect in which the oral folk literature had been created, and in which the Renaissance literature of Ragusa was written. In Karadzic's opinion, this dialect was the most suitable one for general use because apart from its rich literary tradition it was already spoken by the majority of South Slavs. Banac regarded Vuk Karadzic's 'linguistic nationalism' as the basis for the Serb territorial expansion in the second half of the 19th century. In 1844, Ilija Garasanin (1812-1874), at the time minister of Internal Affairs, drafted a secret political programme that became known as Nacertanije (The Plan), in which he stated that the boundaries of the new Serbian state should be such as to enclose the regions occupied by the Serbian population. Banac writes that in adopting this approach, Garasanin had distanced himself from the ideas of the religious traditionalists, who regarded the Orthodox faith as the main criterion for the determination of Serbian ethnic identity. By accepting Karadzic's linguistic criteria, he had created a much wider basis for the expansion of the Serbian state. However, this approach reduced Croatian ethnicity to the regions where the ca dialect was spoken (Istria, Primorje and the islands off the Adriatic coast). During the recent war, Garasanin was often called the evil genius behind the Serbs' aggressive nationalism. It should be noted, however, that the text of Nacertanije was not published until 1906, and that opinions about Garasanin's political intentions have been deeply divided since then. The Croat historian Ferdo Sisic, writing in 1926, saw no evil intentions in Nacertanije and regarded this document as the basis for innovations in Serb national policy in the second half of the 19th century. Other Yugoslav and in particular Serb historians regarded Garasanin as the founder of 'Yugoslavism', and Nacertanije as a political programme for South-Slav union with Serbia as the main political driving force behind the movement.³¹ It was not until 1937 that Nacertanije was first linked with Serb expansionist policies, when the Serb historian J.D. Mitrovic wrote that Nacertanije embodied a plea for a Greater Serbia rather than for a South-Slav state. Banac pointed out that there was a tendency in Serbian and Yugoslav historiography to regard any attempt at South-Slav union as Yugoslavism: "What precisely is the meaning of Yugoslavism? There is a tendency, especially in Serbian historiography but not only there, to view any attempt at southern Slavic conglomeration as Yugoslavism. And since the ideology of Karadzic and the policy of the Serbian state did take an expansive direction, their Yugoslav character is frequently assumed."³²

The Communist historiography manifests the same dilemmas: was Garasanin the 'spiritual father of Yugoslavism' or the evil genius behind the idea of a Greater Serbia?³³ Any judgement about ²⁹ The Serbo-Croat system of dialects comprises four main dialects: torlak, kajkavian, cakavian and stokavian, which are further subdivided into the sub-dialects ikavian, ijekavian and ekavian. The stokavian-ijekavian combination is the most highly developed, with four accents, seven cases etc., and is spoken by the largest number of South Slavs, including the Serbs, Croats, Bosnian Muslims and Montenegrins. The stokavian-ekavian combination is only used by the Serbs of Vojvodina and Sumadija. The kajkavian dialects are spoken in the north of Croatia and Slovenia, and the cakavian in the coastal regions of Dalmatia, Primorje and Istria. See e.g. Asim Peco, Pregled Srpskohrvatskih dialekata, (Belgrade, 1980).

³⁰ See N. Tromp, 'servo-Kroatische talenstrijd', Oost Europa Verkenningen 123 (1992).

³¹ Mirko Valentic, 'Prva programska formulacija velikosrpske ideje' in Boze Covic (ed.) Izvori velikosrpske agresije (Zagreb, 1991) 41-64.

³² Banac (1984) 108-109.

³³ See Valentic (1991).

Nacertanije as a manifesto for the formation of a Greater Serbia can never be complete, however, without taking the time when the document was written into consideration. The formation of a strong state occupied a central position in Garasanin's geopolitical ideas, as it did in the currents of geopolitical thought throughout Europe at the time. A strong Serbian state was intended as a counter-balance against the power politics of the European great powers in the Balkans, which is why Garasanin was sometimes called the Serbian Bismarck.³⁴ Garasanin's political plans, and in particular the concept of Serbian 'linguistic nationalism', did not give rise to violent reactions from the other South Slav peoples at the time. The Illyrianists had their hands full with problems of internal politics: the repressive policies followed in Vienna with respect to the Slav peoples after 1848 did not change until 1867.³⁵ Between 1866 and 1867, the Croatian supporters of political union of the South Slavs under the leadership of Bishop J.J. Strossmayer even had talks with followers of Garasanin about the form of a joint state.³⁶ The dominant idea among Croatian adherents of Yugoslavism at that time was that the current political and economic developments meant that union would have to be realized in two phases. The first phase would comprise unification of the South Slav regions within the Habsburg Empire (i.e. Slovenia, Croatia and Vojvodina). Unification with the other South Slav regions (i.e. Serbia) would take place in a subsequent phase.³⁷ Garasanin did not intend to relinquish the Serbian leadership, but his discharge as minister in 1867 meant an end to his ambitious plans for radical restructuring of the Balkans under Serb leadership.³⁸

The 'period of politics' was characterized by the dominant role of political parties in the formulation of national interests. Ekmecic sees the political changes in the Balkans following the Congress of Berlin (1878) as decisive for the formation of modern political parties in Serbia. After 1882, Serbian politics were controlled by the Serbian Radical Party (SRS). The charismatic leader of this party, Nikola Pasic, was an active supporter of the idea of a strong Serbian state. It was not until the First World War that he changed his political strategy and began advocating a joint South-Slav state. The founder of the Serbian Socialist Party, Svetozar Markovic, who was the first to use the term "Greater Serbia" as criticism of the expansionist Serb policies, was in fact the supporter of the formation of a Serbian state, which he believed however should ultimately develop into a multi-ethnic supranational federation.³⁹

In Croatia, the traditions of the Illyrianist movement were continued by an influential group of liberal intellectuals round Bishop Josip Juraj Strossmayer (1815-1905) and his disciple Franjo Racki (1828-1894). Strossmayer financed projects intended to pave the way for the political unification of the South Slavs. It was considered that the new state should have a neutral name, which would be acceptable to everyone. The group chose the name Yugoslavia, and their ideology came to be known as Jugoslavenstvo (Yugoslavism). Strossmayer founded the Yugoslav Academy of Arts and Sciences in Zagreb. Thanks to his efforts, Zagreb became the centre of activities aimed at the cultural and political unification of the South Slavs in the second half of the 19th century. One of Strossmayer's most important initiatives was his attempt to end the religious schism between the Roman and Orthodox churches, which in his opinion had had disastrous consequences for the Slavic peoples in particular. The political instrument of this influential circle of intellectuals was the National Liberal Party. The short-term political goal of this party the unification of the South-Slav peoples in Croatia, as a federal unit within the Habsburg Empire. Its long-term political goal was the formation of a great South-Slav state after the collapse of the Habsburg Empire, in which the South Slavs from the Habsburg regions would join up with the Serbs and Montenegrins. However, Strossmayer found no political allies in Serbia who were prepared to work with him for a South-Slav federation.

³⁴ Zie b.v.: S. MacKenzie, Ilija Garasanin: Balkan Bismarck (Boulder Col., 1985)

³⁵ Banac (1984) 85.

³⁶ Korunic (1986) 24.

³⁷ Ibid.

³⁸ Jelavich (1990) 11.

³⁹ Banac, (1984) 109.

One of the first critics of Karadzic's linguistic nationalism was the Croat Ante Starcevic (1823-1896), who together with Eugen Kvaternik (1825-1871) was the founder of a Croatian national ideology which contrasted sharply with that of the Illyrianists. They started from the assumption that the Croats were a 'political people' who had the right to a state of their own. On the basis of their interpretation of old historic sources, they concluded that the Croatian state should extend from the Alps in the west to the River Drina in the east, and from Albania in the south to the Danube in the north. Starcevic moved the eastern boundary of the state to the River Timok, thus leaving only the Croats and the Bulgarians as South-Slav peoples. He called the Slovenes 'mountain Croats' and the Serbs a 'mixed race' whose name was derived from the Latin servus (which means slave).⁴⁰ He also regarded the Bosnians as belonging to the Croatian nation, and he showed his admiration for Islam by calling it the 'oldest and purest nobility of Europe'.⁴¹ Starcevic and Kvaternik founded the Party of Right, whose goal was the complete independence of Croatia from the Habsburg Empire. They hoped that all South Slavs, with the exception of the Bulgarians, would become croatized on the basis of this Pan-Croatian ideology. The role that Starcevic played in the development of the Pan-Croatian or Greater Croatian idea is comparable with that of Garasanin for the formulation of the Pan-Serbian or Greater Serbian idea. Opinions about Starcevic are also divided among historians. Communist historiography regarded him as the evil genius behind the Croatian extreme nationalist Ustaša regime (1941-1945), while he is seen as the father of the nation in nationalist Croatian historiography. A more obvious choice for the role of evil genius behind Croatian extreme nationalist movements would however seem to be his successor Juraj Frank (1844-1911), who founded the Pure Party of Right in 1895 and formulated an extreme nationalist ideology which preached hatred against Serbs. Since the second half of the 19th century, a deep split has existed in Croatian political life between those who believed in South-Slav unification such as Strossmayer's National Liberal Party and their opponents such as Starcevic's Party of Right.

The 'period of violence' was dominated by factions which used violence in the conflict with their political opponents. The best known example of such a faction was the Serbian organization Ujedinjenje ili smrt (Unification or Death), whose aim was to unite all Serbs in a single state. Violence was used to deal with political opponents. It is noteworthy that the violence in this period was not directed against ethnic groups, but was generally used to settle political scores, and in response to domestic political issues. Deep political division existed in Serbia at this time between the three main pillars of the establishment: the royal house (the Obrenovic dynasty up to 1903 and the Karadjordjevic dynasty thereafter), the Serbian government under Nikola Pasic and the Serbian army (which also pursued the aim of a Greater Serbia and was the most radical of the three). The hard core of Ujedinjenje ili smrt consisted of Serb army officers; it was this organization that planned the assassination of the last Obrenovic king in 1903, and that of Archduke Franz Ferdinand in 1914.

2. The history of the Yugoslav state (1918-1992)

It is clear from the literature concerning the South-Slav national question that there were different forms of Yugoslavism (the idea of political unification of the South Slavs), varying from Pan-Serbism and Pan-Croatism to Austro-Slavism and Yugoslavism. Ivo Banac introduced the term 'political Yugoslavism' to denote the final phase in the development of the Yugoslav idea. He ascribed these developments to the students and youth movements that were active at the beginning of the 20th century. Although various student and youth groups were active abroad, e.g. in Vienna and Prague, it was the National Youth Movement on home soil which did most to define political Yugoslavism. The members of the National Youth Movement were young intellectuals from Croatia, Dalmatia and Slavonia who propagated the theory of national unity (narodno jedinstvo). They regarded the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes as all belonging to one and the same nation - an idea that is also known as 'Yugoslav unitarism'. The creators of this theory believed that the differences in linguistic and literary traditions, and the religious differences between the various South-Slav peoples, could be overcome by the political will to form a unitary state; they expected that each of the peoples in question would have to make concessions relating to their national identity in order to create a common Yugoslav identity.

⁴⁰ Ibid., 87

⁴¹ Ibid., 108.

The National Youth Movement was active in the period between 1909 and 1914. The First World War created new political realities: the Habsburg Empire collapsed in 1918, Slovenia and Croatia were liberated and the politically weakened Serbian government looked for new ways of uniting the Serbs in a single state. The formation of a common South-Slav state seemed one possibility.

The first common South-Slav state was founded in 1918, under the name 'the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes'. Its name was changed to 'the Kingdom of Yugoslavia' in 1929.⁴² The Kingdom of Yugoslavia collapsed in 1941 as a result of the military attack by the Axis powers. A new Yugoslav state was founded in 1945, this time as a communist federation, the official name of which was initially 'the Federative Peoples' Republic of Yugoslavia' (FNRJ - Federativna Narodna Republika Jugoslavija). The name was changed in 1963 to 'the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia' (SFRJ - Socijalistička Federativna Republika Jugoslavija). This state would remain in existence for more than 45 years, but collapsed in 1991. In 1992, Serbia and Montenegro founded the third Yugoslav state, the Federative Republic of Yugoslavia.⁴³

3. The legitimacy of the Yugoslav state

Artificial?

Yugoslavia was founded three times, and collapsed twice. This has led to many studies of the legitimacy of the Yugoslav state, especially after the disintegration of Yugoslavia in 1991. The French journalist Catherine Samary wrote a book about the disintegration of Yugoslavia in 1995, in which she devoted a great deal of space to a discussion of the legitimacy of the Yugoslav state.⁴⁴ Her book rejected the thesis often put forward in the early nineties, that the common South-Slav state was 'artificial' and was 'imposed' on people who in fact could not and did not wish to live together. The following words, written by a Dutch journalist, are typical of such analyses: "In this artificial country, built in 1918 on the ruins of the Habsburg and Ottoman Empires and dominated by Serbia, (...) the various peoples have always treated one another with suspicion - even in the time of Tito. For 73 years, these peoples have been more separated by centuries of historical, economic and cultural differences than united by common characteristics (...). The deeper reasons for all these inequalities are hidden in the dark wood of history and in an illogical economic development."⁴⁵ These and similar arguments are supported by political theories which claim that ethnically homogeneous states are more stable and longer-lasting than multi-ethnic or multi-national ones.⁴⁶ The adherents of these approaches are surprised not so ⁴² Yugoslavia means South Slavia (the land of the South Slavs).

⁴³ For the history of the Yugoslav state see: Ivo Lederer, Yugoslavia at the Paris Conference: A Study in Frontier-making (New Haven, 1977). D. Djordjevic and S. Fisher-Galati (eds.) The Creation of Yugoslavia, 1914-1918 (Santa Barbara, 1980). A. Dragnich, The First Yugoslavia (New Brunswick, 1974). - Srbs and Kroats: The struggle in Yugoslavia, (New York, 1992). A. Dilas, The Contested Country: Yugoslav Unity and Communist Revolution, 1919-1953 (Cambridge, 1991). Dusan Bilandzic, Historija SFRJ: glavni procesi, 1918-1985, (Zagreb 1985). Branko Petranovic, Istorija Jugoslavije, 1918-1988, 3 vols, (Belgrade 1988). Vladimir Dedijer et al., History of Yugoslavia (New York 1974). L.B. Valev, G.M. Slavin and I.I. Udal'cov (eds.), Istoriia Jugoslavii, 2 vols, (Moscow, 1963).

⁴⁴ Catherine Samary, Yugoslavia Dismembered (New York, 1995).

⁴⁵ Peter Michielsen et al., Verwoesting van Joegoslavië (Rotterdam, 1993) 9.

⁴⁶ Susan Woodward used this argument, referring to the works of Robert A. Dahl, 'Dilemmas of Pluralist Democracy: Autonomy vs. Control' (1982) and C. Tilly: 'Reflections on the History of European State-Making' in Charles Tilly, (ed.) The Formation of National States in Western Europe (1975). See: Woodward (1996) 21, 427.

much by the violent disintegration of Yugoslavia as by the fact that it managed to stay in existence for so long.

The centuries of foreign domination are regarded as the main explanation for the 'unbridgeable' conflicts arising between the South-Slav peoples, who were divided between two strongly opposed great powers - the Habsburg Empire (with Slovenia and Croatia) and the Ottoman Empire (with Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina). The above-mentioned Dutch journalist also stated this idea, in a rather popularized form, as follows: "This separate development has turned the Serbs and Croats into different peoples, despite the bond of a common language. Serbia is Orthodox, used the Cyrillic alphabet, and directs its gaze to the south and east. Croatia is Catholic, uses the Latin alphabet and looks westward and northward. But there is more. The Croats - in the Serbs' opinion, at least - have felt quite comfortable throughout their history as subjects of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. While the Serbs fought to the death, were impaled on stakes, while their wives were murdered and their children abducted, the Croats lived in comfort and enriched themselves."⁴⁷

Ethnic similarities

Some authors, on the other hand, regard ethnic differentiation based on relatively minor differences as artificial, and believe that a common South-Slav state is the most pragmatic solution for a region where related ethnic groups live in close proximity. According to this approach, it was precisely the disintegration of the Yugoslav state in 1941 and 1991 and the formation of separate national states after the latter date that caused the civil war, because these processes inevitably lead to boundary conflicts. The adherents of this view regard the formation of the Yugoslav state as the realization of a centuries-old dream of the South-Slav peoples to free themselves from foreign domination and found a state of their own.⁴⁸ They see the legitimacy of Yugoslavia as based on the common ethnic descent of the Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Bosnians and Macedonians, who all belong to the South Slav peoples. The differences and similarities in ethnic descent between the various South-Slav peoples have been the subject of discussion in intellectual circles for more than a century, but this debate has not produced a final conclusion. What is clear is that there are certain marked similarities, and certain marked differences, between these peoples. In reality, these and similar arguments about similarities and differences have always been subordinated to the political aims of the moment and the desire of certain political groups either to create political union at state level or to get out of existing multinational states. In any case, the union of the South-Slav peoples in 1918 would have been impossible without the political will of the political representatives of the peoples in question. When the joint Yugoslav state was founded, the main stress was laid on the similarities between the national groups that went to make it up; in 1991, on the other hand, the differences were emphasized.

The foreign diktat: the Versailles Peace Conference

The authors who describe Yugoslavia as an 'artificial state'⁴⁹ argue that a variety of different peoples were forced to live together in this country against their will, and that Yugoslavia had no historical legitimacy because it was thought up and imposed on the peoples concerned by the Great Powers during the Versailles Peace Conference (1918-1919).

The criticism of the legitimacy of the Yugoslav state was based in particular on the failure to hold a referendum in 1918 in which the population concerned could express its opinion about the formation of the South-Slav monarchy. Mihailo Crnobrnja, a former Yugoslav diplomat, disagrees ⁴⁷ Michielsen (1993) 10.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Branka Prpa-Jovanovic, 'The Making of Yugoslavia', in J. Udovicki & J. Ridgeway (eds.), Burn This House, (London, 1997) 49.

⁴⁹ 'A (...) It was an artificial country, (...), the refrain goes, which never deserved to last its seventy-three years.' Cited in Woodward (1996) 21.

however with the idea that the foundation of the South-Slav state occurred against the wishes of the majority of the population: “First and foremost, Yugoslavia was created out of, and one could say in spite of, strong national ideologies and national policies. Though blended into a new state, these did not cease to exert some centrifugal force, even when the official and dominant ideology became centralist. But it would be wrong to say it was created against the will of the people. The people in the proper sense of the word were never asked. No one can say with certainty what the verdict would have been had a referendum on the proposition tested the will of the people. Political decision-making at that time did not take account of popular expression, and not only in Yugoslavia was this true. The people involved in politics, the unchosen representatives, clearly made the decision to unite of their own free will and without overt pressure. If there was implied pressure, especially from the big powers, that was a part of the game at the time, not entirely unlike current events.”⁵⁰

According to Ekmecic, support for the unification of the South Slavs was growing steadily among the general population towards the end of the First World War. It varied from 100 % in Dalmatia to 60 % in Croatia, Slovenia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁵¹

Another historian, Stevan K. Pavlowich, wondered whether the mainly agrarian population was really able to give a well considered answer to this question: “The declarations of politicians had been full of good intentions; for the population at large it corresponded to vague feelings rather than to a clearly expressed national will. Modern scholarship has yet to consider the question of peasants’ consciousness of their common ‘ethnicity’ before 1914, or that of the common person’s view of the future over the war years to 1918.”⁵²

According to Dragnich, the arguments for doubting the legitimacy of the Yugoslav state could be applied equally well to all the other states built up on the ruins of the Ottoman and Habsburg Empires in 1918. The new system of states in Central and South-East Europe was in theory based on the right to self-determination of the peoples concerned, as defined by the American president Woodrow Wilson in his Fourteen Points. But the people were rarely consulted. Dragnich describes Wilson’s intentions with regard to the South-Slav peoples as follows: “Conveying confidence and idealism, President Wilson, in January 1918, announced his Fourteen Points as the basis of an honourable peace. Although he did not use the word ‘self-determination’, his reference to the indigenous rights of peoples within Turkey and Austria-Hungary made his meaning unmistakable. Of the Balkan states he mentioned only Serbia, Montenegro, and Romania by name (along with Poland, not then in existence independently). (...) The reason for this omission is simple: the victorious Allies had not yet agreed on the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Only when they did so, about mid-1918, was it realistic to think that peoples in the territories of the Dual Monarchy could attempt to form independent states.”⁵³

The domestic diktat: the Corfu declaration

The idea that the joint South-Slav state would never have been possible without international pressure is countered by those authors who have followed the creation of this state from the perspective of the negotiations between Serb and Croat politicians. They point out that a basic agreement about the future state was concluded as early as the summer of 1917. This document, known as the Corfu Declaration, represented a compromise between the Serb and Croat positions regarding the political structure of the future state. It was agreed that the new state would be a monarchy, ruled by the Serbian royal house of Karadjordjevic. No concrete agreements were made about further details of the state’s constitution, due among other things to the great differences of opinion between the Croats and the Serbs. The Croats were in favour of a confederation in which each ethnic group would have a high degree of political and ⁵⁰ M. Crnobrnja, Yugoslav Drama (London, 1994) 48-49.

⁵¹ Ekmecic (1989) 829-832.

⁵² S. K. Pawlowich, The Improbable Survivor: Yugoslavia and its Problems, 1918-1988, (London, 1988) 1.

⁵³ A. Dragnich, Srbs and Kroats: The struggle in Yugoslavia, (New York, 1992) xix.

cultural autonomy; the Serbs, on the other hand, wanted a centralized state. “Serbs claimed that centralized control by the government under the Serbian monarchy was necessary to keep the fledgling multi-ethnic state together in its formative stage.”⁵⁴

The Corfu Declaration was however criticized by other historians, who doubted whether the Croat politicians involved had any real authority to enter into these negotiations. These politicians were representatives of an informal political organization known as the Jugoslavenski odbor (Yugoslav Committee), which operated in exile and had no political basis in Croatia.⁵⁵ The members of the Committee were political émigrés from Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina who maintained contacts with intellectuals and politicians in the European capitals in order to convince them that the Habsburg monarchy had no future and that a joint South-Slav state would be the best political solution for all the peoples concerned. They were supported by the British commentators Robert Seton-Watson and Wickham Steed, who were powerful advocates of South-Slav political union among Western European politicians. Another weak point of the Corfu Declaration, according to some, concerned the motives of the Serb politicians and intellectuals who were actively working towards the creation of a South-Slav state: “However, the vision of South Slav unity for many Serbian intellectuals usually implied an inclusive Greater Serbia, where all Serbs would be incorporated within a single state. In other words, the uniting of the South Slavs was secondary to the uniting of the Serbs.”⁵⁶

The significance of the Corfu Declaration was also appreciably lessened by the fact that the Montenegrins and Slovenians were not directly involved in the negotiations (with the exception of the Slovenian politician Antun Korosec), though they were intended to be part of the joint state. The Montenegrins would lose their separate ethnic status, and their king, in the new state. The Montenegrin Committee (consisting of Montenegrin émigrés in Paris) reacted positively to the Corfu Declaration. King Nikola of Montenegro was less enthusiastic, however, since the new state would mean the end of his rule. As soon as the collapse of the Habsburg monarchy was announced, the Croatian parliament (the Sabor) created the National Council of Slovenians, Croats and Serbs, which then decided to form a joint state together with the Slovenians and Serbs.

The unification of the South Slavs was thus not imposed by Versailles, but was the result of the unitary ‘Yugoslav ideology’, which had developed during the First World War and had gained a steadily increasing number of adherents in Serbian, Croatian and Slovenian political circles during the war. No foreign power would have been able to impose this unification without the support of the local politicians and political parties.

The influence of external factors on the political unification of the South Slav peoples was nevertheless of great significance. It became known in 1917 that Italy had signed a secret treaty in London in 1915, under the terms of which it undertook to fight on the side of the Entente in exchange for major territorial gains at the expense of Austro-Hungary and Turkey, including large parts of Slovenia and Croatia.⁵⁷ The threat of Italian domination speeded up the decision-making process about the formation of a joint state among the Slovenian and Croatian politicians: “It should be strongly emphasized that the South Slavs of the monarchy were under extreme pressure, and they had no real practical alternatives. Austrian-Germans and Hungarians were in the process of organizing republics on a national basis. The imperial framework no longer existed. The realistic alternatives appeared to be either the establishment of a South Slav state or a possible partition of Croatian and Slovenian lands among Italy, Serbia, and perhaps even Austria and Hungary.”⁵⁸

The Serbian side was also under pressure from the international political developments. Czarist Russia ceased to exist in 1917, and the communist government of the new Soviet Union withdrew from ⁵⁴ R. Thomas ‘History, Religion, and National Identity’, in R.G.C. Thomas & H.R. Friman (eds.), The South-Slav Conflict: History, Religion, Ethnicity and Nationalism (New York-London), 22.

⁵⁵ See M. Paulová, Jugoslavenski odbor (Zagreb, 1925).

⁵⁶ Thomas (1996) 21.

⁵⁷ D. Zivojinovic, America, Italy and the Birth of Yugoslavia, 1917-1919 (Boulder-New York, 1972).

⁵⁸ Barbara Jelavich, History of the Balkans Twentieth Century (Cambridge (UK), 1982) 125.

the war. In addition, the Slovenian and Croatian representatives in the Austrian parliament had already drawn up a declaration (the May declaration) in May 1917, advocating the unification of the South Slavs in the Habsburg monarchy – including the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia. Alarmed by this, the Serbian government speeded up their negotiations with the Yugoslav Committee. Hence, the Corfu Declaration is often interpreted as a tactical move on the part of the Serbs, which merely postponed the implementation of Serb plans for the creation of Greater Serbia. However, some Serb historians such as Ekmečić consider that the Serb war objectives were already defined in the Nis Declaration of 1914, which stated that the main Serb war aims were liberation from Habsburg occupation and unification of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenians in a joint South Slav state.⁵⁹

Although Serbia's European allies did not accept the Nis Declaration, the Serbian parliament secretly ratified it a year later.⁶⁰ After the creation of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenians, Serb politicians did all they could to impose a centralized, Serb-dominated state on the other peoples. The first constitution, the Vidovdanski ustav (Saint Vitus Constitution), adopted in 1921 despite strong opposition from Croatian politicians, did indeed make the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenians a centralized state dominated by Serb politicians.

4. The legitimacy of the Yugoslav state and the Serbo-Croat conflict

The majority view in the historical literature is that the Yugoslav state, and particularly its stability, was closely linked with Serbo-Croat political relationships. These two, the largest ethnic groups involved, were the first South Slav peoples within the Yugoslav state in whom a sense of national identity had developed and who had already formulated their national interests in the 19th century. Indeed, the conflict between Serbs and Croats could be thought of as starting with the schism of 1054 that divided the South Slav peoples, despite their common language, into two separate religious camps, thus justifying to a certain extent the idea that this 'century-old' conflict was almost 'insoluble', it should be remembered that the Serb and Croat kingdom had never fought against one another throughout the Middle Ages. Dominated by foreign powers for centuries they had never had any independent foreign policy and could thus have no direct conflicts.

An important background factor in the Serbo-Croat political conflict was the presence of large numbers of Orthodox Slavs (not called Serbs until the 19th century) in Croatia as a result of the migrations caused by Ottoman expansion towards the north-west. The Orthodox refugees who escaped the Ottoman forces received protection from the Habsburg Emperor. A large part of Hungary fell under Ottoman occupation after the Battle of Mohacz in 1526. In 1527, Ferdinand I set up a new defensive system, known under the name of the 'Military Border Zone' (Vojna Krajina).⁶¹ This militarized zone extended from Transylvania in the north-east to the Istrian Peninsula in the south-west. The defence line consisted of a series of small villages and fortifications where the Orthodox refugee population was offered sanctuary, adult males from this population being recruited as frontier guards. The Military Border Zone was abolished in 1881, the idea being that the Serb population there should be integrated into Croatia (the part known as 'Civil Croatia'). The period between 1878 and 1903 is known in the literature on the South Slav question as the period of South Slav conflict, characterized by deterioration of the relationships between the Croats and the Serbs living in Croatia. Political conflicts between the Croatian Serbs and the Croats were intensified after the abolition of the military border zone, and were exacerbated by the 'divide and rule' policy adopted by the Hungarians with respect to the Croatian Serbs and the Croats. The Hungarian governor (ban) of Croatia, Karoly ⁵⁹ Ekmečić, Ratni ciljevi Srbije (Belgrade 1974).

⁶⁰ A. Dragnich (1992) 23.

⁶¹ See G. Rothenberg, The Military Border in Croatia, 1740-1881 (Chicago, 1966).

Khuen-Hedervary (1883-1903), was notorious for his anti-Croat policy. He gave the Serbs a preferential position, rewarding them with important functions in Croatian public life.⁶²

Tensions between Serbs and Croats at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century alternated with periods of political rapprochement and co-operation. Drago Roksandic, a Croat historian of Serb descent, wrote as follows in this connection: “This same history also demonstrates that the periods in which the fundamental national interests of both communities were reconciled were also periods in which Croatian society moved forward, modernised, and in which Croatian as well as Serbian national identity were preserved and developed. An example for this was the Illyrian movement of 1835-1848, which was an important phase in the national integration of the Croats, but also of the Serbs in Croatia and Slovenia. Other instances were the period of revolutionary upheaval in 1848-49, the period of renowned constitutionalism from 1860 to 1868, as well as the period of the Serbian-Croatian coalition from 1905-1918.”⁶³

Authors like Thomas and Dragnich believe that the Serbo-Croat political conflict did not arise until after the formation of the Yugoslav state. The kingdom of Yugoslavia did not meet Croat expectations, and a power struggle arose between the Serb and Croat politicians right from the beginning. Dragnich, who has described the history of the Yugoslav kingdom from the perspective of Serbo-Croat relations, disagrees with the usual interpretations involving Serb domination and suppression of non-Serb peoples. According to him, it is wrong to argue that the state was dominated by a block of Serb politicians who did their best to marginalize the non-Serbs, and whom the Croats opposed in vain: “Through all political events of the First Yugoslavia ran a two-stranded thread: Serbian politicians did not have a determined political line directing their relations with Croats; the Croats had a constant Croatian line. The Croats reduced their five or six political parties of relatively equal strength to one, a Croatian national party. The Serbs moved from two major parties to about ten, to say nothing of the factions that developed within some.”⁶⁴

Serbo-Croat political relations radicalized at the end of the 1920s. In 1928, the leader of the Croatian National Peasant Party Stjepan Radic was murdered by a Serb nationalist from Montenegro on the floor of the Yugoslav parliament (the Skupstina). King Aleksandar reacted by dissolving parliament and suspending the Vidovdan constitution. His personal dictatorship exacerbated ethnic tensions.⁶⁵ According to Banac, in this period Yugoslav unitarism turned into a totalitarian ideology with anti-Marxist, anti-liberal, anti-conservative, anti-urban and anti-catholic traits – all characteristic of fascism.⁶⁶ Some Croat nationalist politicians, intellectuals and artists fled the country in the 1930s. An extreme-nationalist Croatian terrorist organization, the Ustase, was set up in Italy under the leadership of a Croatian nationalist, Ante Pavelic, a lawyer of Bosnia-Herzegovina descent. Pavelic received political and financial support from the Italian fascist regime. His political aim, and that of the Ustase, was to liberate Croatia from the Serbian kingdom and to create a Greater Croatia.

The permanent political crisis in the kingdom of Yugoslavia was resolved by the Sporazum (Agreement) of 1939, which gave Croatia a great degree of cultural and territorial autonomy. The Croatian province, known as Banovina Hrvatska, included parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina where the Croatian population was in the majority, and also Srijem province (without East Srijem) and Dalmatia (without the Bay of Kotor).

Many historians regarded the Sporazum as the real solution to the Serbo-Croat conflict. Recent studies of the history of the Yugoslav state have been more critical, however. Mustafa Imamovic writes ⁶² The Croat historian Mirjana Gross points out that the Serbs played an important social role in Croatia even in the time of Hedervary's predecessor Ivan Mazuranic who was known as a Croatian nationalist. Serbs occupied the following important positions under Mazuranic: Speaker of the Croatian parliament (Sabor); Ministers of Internal Affairs (and Vice-Governor); and President of the Croatian Supreme Court. See Drago Roksandic, Srbi u Hrvatskoj (Zagreb, 1991) 100.

⁶³ Drago Roksandic, “The Myth of ‘Historical Conflict’” in Labour Focus on Eastern Europe, (1992) 18-20.

⁶⁴ Dragnich (1992) 179.

⁶⁵ See e.g. J. B. Hoptner, Yugoslavia in Crisis, 1934-1941 (New York, 1963).

⁶⁶ Banac (1992) 13.

that the Bosnians initially supported the agreement between the Serbs and the Croats because it was seen as an important compromise that could lead to stabilization of the political situation. The division of Bosnia-Herzegovina was soon found to involve major drawbacks, however, to which the Bosnians responded by setting up a movement for the territorial autonomy of Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁶⁷

The Serb historian Branka Prpa-Jovanovic likewise believes that the Sporazum did not offer a lasting solution to the Serbo-Croat conflict: "But a federal Yugoslavia might have had a better chance at another time. It was now too late - not only because the Serbian-Croatian agreement was reached on the eve of the World War II, in difficult international circumstances, or because the other Yugoslav nations were bitter about being left out, but also because the solution satisfied neither the Serbs nor the Croats. Croatian politicians were angered by the limited nature of autonomy and Serbian politicians by loss of their domination, the abandonment of centralism, and the new division of administrative powers."⁶⁸

A low point in the Serbo-Croat conflict was reached during the Second World War. The kingdom of Yugoslavia disintegrated in 1941, as a result of the invasion of the Axis powers. King Petar Karadjordjevic and his government fled to London. Germany, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria and Italy then occupied large areas of Yugoslav territory, and what was left was divided between the Serb and Croat Nazi satellite states. The subsequent civil war was waged between different ethnic groups. The Croatian extreme nationalist movement, the Ustase, founded the Independent Croatian State (NDH - Nezavisna Dr'ava Hrvatska). The Ustase wanted an 'ethnically clean' Greater Croatia; the Serb population were the main victims of their activities. The Serb nationalist extremists, the Cetniks, fought in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia for the creation of a 'Greater Serbia'; it was mainly the Bosnian Muslims from the east of Bosnia-Herzegovina who fell victim to their ethnic cleansing.

5. The legitimacy of the Communist Yugoslav federation, 1945-1992

The legitimacy of communist Yugoslavia was based on the role played by the Communist resistance movement under the leadership of Josip Broz-Tito (1892-1980) during the Second World War.⁶⁹ The Communists had clearly formulated war objectives: the expulsion of the foreign occupying forces, social revolution modelled on the example of the Soviet Union and the recovery of the Yugoslav state. Alongside the guerrilla war against the German and Italian occupiers, they were also engaged in a power struggle with their ideological enemies, in particular the Cetniks and the Ustase. The Yugoslav Communists emerged from the Second World War as victors. They also won the political and diplomatic struggle after the war, by preventing the return of the king and his government in exile.

The legitimacy of the Communist federation was based on the following arguments. Firstly, the Communists had established themselves as the protectors of the civilian population, no matter what their ethnic origin. The civilian population, that had been a target of extreme nationalist aggression, regarded the Communist resistance fighters as their protectors; this was the case e.g. with the Croatian Serbs, who had been exposed to Ustase terror for four years. They joined the Communist resistance, and remained very loyal to the Communist system after the war. The Communists stressed the ethnic similarities between the South Slav peoples, while the ethnic polarization that had manifested itself so prominently during the Second World War seemed to become less important in the light of the proclaimed supra-national character of the Communist ideology. Nationalism was regarded as anachronistic and reactionary, and the proponents of nationalist ideologies were tried by the courts as 'enemies of the people' or driven into exile. National identity was supposed to give way gradually to a Yugoslav identity based on the Yugoslav language - the lingua franca for all the peoples concerned, to be based on a combination of the Serb and Croat standard languages.

⁶⁷ M. Imamovic, Historija Bosnjaka, (Sarajevo, 1998) 520-521.

⁶⁸ Prpa-Jovanovic (1997) 57.

⁶⁹ See Bogdan Denich, Legitimation of a Revolution: The Yugoslav Case (New Haven, 1975).

Many historical studies have been written on the role of the Communist resistance to the Axis powers and the civil war between the different nationalist movements. A great deal of attention was paid in this context to the role of the Cetnik⁷⁰ resistance to the Axis powers. Were they fighting for a Greater Serbia or for the kingdom of Yugoslavia? Were they patriots who organized the resistance to the Nazis, or collaborators who worked together with the enemy to defeat their common enemy, the Communists? Other important themes concern Ustase violence and the place of their extreme nationalist ideology in Croatian history.⁷¹ The questions about the collective guilt of the Croats and national reconciliation between the Yugoslav peoples who adopted opposing positions during the war received little attention after the war. According to the Communists, the national question had been solved: "During a war with all the features of a religious and ethnic war, the Communists offered - at the time when the renewal of Yugoslavia seemed entirely impossible - a new vision of Yugoslavia, expressed in the slogan 'Brotherhood and Unity'. Yugoslavism was reborn in blood, but on new foundations. The Communists hoped not to repeat the errors of their predecessors."⁷²

The first step towards establishing the legitimacy of Yugoslavia in the post-war international system of states was taken when the Allies recognized of the Yugoslav communist guerrilla forces as the official resistance movement in 1943. Nora Beloff regards Great Britain's decision to drop Draza Mihailovic's Cetniks and to support Tito's Partisans as a big mistake on the part of the Allies. While Great Britain and the USA opposed the formation of a Communist Yugoslav federation after the war, the recognition of Tito as the leader of the resistance contributed to his political victory over his domestic enemies. Tito's greatest political rival was King Petar. Great Britain, supported by the USA, assumed that the Yugoslav king would return after the war. Stalin, on the other hand, planned to set up a Communist Balkan federation including Yugoslavia, Albania and Bulgaria. It was decided by way of compromise during the Yalta conference that Yugoslavia would be divided into two spheres of influence – a Communist half and a capitalist half. Tito managed to ensure, however, that the new Yugoslavia became a Communist federation in 1945, and that the king did not return. The initial fear of the western countries that Yugoslavia would end up in the Soviet sphere of influence turned into euphoria in 1948 when the split between the Yugoslav Communists and Stalin led to complete cessation of contacts between the two states. Yugoslavia acquired a special position as 'no man's land' in European politics during the Cold War'.

Communist Yugoslavia was set up as a federation, within which the Slovenes, Croats, Montenegrins, Serbs and Macedonians were recognized as the constitutive nationalities. Bosnia-Hercegovina became one of the six Yugoslav republics, but the Bosnian Muslims did not acquire the status of constitutive nationality until the 1960s.⁷³ The other nationalities – including the large numbers of Albanians in the Serbian province of Kosovo – were classified as national minorities. The main constitutional difference between a people (narod) and a national minority (narodnost) was that the former had the right to self-determination and got a republic of its own. This also gave it the formal right to secede from the federation, if the other constitutive nationalities agreed. The national minorities did not have this right. Bosnia-Hercegovina received a special status within the federation because the three constitutive nationalities who lived there, the Serbs, Croats and Bosnians, were all placed on an equal footing. Bosnia-Hercegovina was therefore often called 'Yugoslavia in miniature'.

⁷⁰ See Jozo Tomasevich, The Chetniks - War and Revolution in Yugoslavia, 1941-1945 (Stanford, 1975) and Matteo Milazzo, The Chetnik Movement and the Yugoslav Resistance (Baltimore/London, 1975). Fikreta Jelic-Butic, Cetnici u Hrvatskoj 1941-1945 (Zagreb, 1986).

⁷¹ See Bogdan Krizman, Ante Pavelic i Ustase (Zagreb, 1978). - NDH između Hitlera i Mussolinija (Zagreb, 1980). - Ustase i Treci Reich (Zagreb, 1983). Fikreta Jelic-Butic, Ustase i Nezavisna država Hrvatska 1941-1945 (Zagreb, 1978).

⁷² Prpa-Jovanovic (1997) 59.

⁷³ For details of Yugoslav federalism see e.g. P. Shoup, Communism and the Yugoslav National Question, (New York, 1968). P. Lendvai, Eagles in Cobwebs: nationalism and communism in the Balkans (London, 1970) S. Ramet, Nationalism and Federalism in Yugoslavia, 1962-1991 (Bloomington and Indianapolis, 1992).

6. The demystification of Communist history

The Communist rulers saw the history of the Second World War in black and white and the historiography of this period provided the basis for an important part of Yugoslav Communist ideology, leading to the creation of new historical myths. The Communist intellectual elite even produced a myth of Tito's leadership while the Second World War was still continuing. This myth bore striking resemblances to those dealing with the epic heroes in folk tales: a poor Croatian boy becomes the leader of an important state, fights against social injustice and powerful foreign enemies, and even becomes a respected world leader thanks to his role in the movement of non-aligned nations. Other historical myths created and fostered by Communist historians and ideologues dealt with the role of the Communist anti-Fascist resistance in the liberation of Yugoslavia, Tito's 'historic no' to Stalin, the 'brotherhood and unity' of the Yugoslav peoples, and workers' self-rule as an alternative to the capitalist and Communist political systems.

Although these myths were thought up by the Yugoslav Communists, western historians and regional experts made an important contribution to their popularization and propagation beyond the boundaries of Yugoslavia. An influential group of intellectuals was writing sympathetically about Yugoslavia in the West. The British authors Stephan Clissold, Fitzroy McLean and F.W. Deakin, who had been liaison officers with the task of maintaining contact with the Yugoslav Partisans on behalf of the British government, wrote a number of influential books about the Communist resistance and Tito after the war. These publications made a big contribution to the formation of the positive image of Tito's Yugoslavia held by the West.⁷⁴ Another group of authors who contributed to the positive image of Communist Yugoslavia consisted of young westerners who had helped in the rebuilding of war-ravaged Yugoslavia as members of international youth brigades in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s. Some of them later became influential scientists, writers and politicians. One of these was the British historian and regional expert Fred Singleton who subsequently played an important role in the setting up of the department of Yugoslav studies at the University of Bradford, where many generations of young historians have been trained.⁷⁵ The former Swedish premier Olaf Palme also belonged to this group.⁷⁶

The world first began to hear dissident voices from within the Yugoslav Communist Party itself in the 1950s. Milovan Djilas, one of the five most important Communist politicians, made furore with his criticism of the privileges of the Communist rulers, whom he called the 'new class'. He did not, however, distance himself from Communist ideology or the Yugoslav state. His criticism was aimed at the Communist elite and the way they dealt with power. He belonged to this elite himself, and initially believed that the solution for these shortcomings was to be found in liberalization of Yugoslav society.⁷⁷ Those at the top of the party, and in particular Tito, had no wish to consider such criticism and Djilas ended up in prison. After his release, he began a successful career as an author and political commentator whose publications played an important role in bringing about a change in the perception of Communist Yugoslavia abroad.

Critical works on the history of Communist Yugoslavia originated mainly from the circles of anti-Communist political émigrés, who came from widely differing ideological backgrounds. Some of them, for example, had a liberal-democratic viewpoint: they accepted the idea of the Yugoslav state, but ⁷⁴ See S. Clissold, Whirlwind; An Account of Marshal Tito's Rise to Power (London, 1949). Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union 1939-1973 (London, 1975). F.W.D. Deakin, The Embattled Mountain, (London, 1971). F. Maclean, Eastern Approaches, (London, 1949). Disputed Barricades: the Life and Time of Josip Broz Tito, Marshal of Yugoslavia, Cape, (London, 1957). Tito: A Pictorial Biography, (New York and London, 1980).

⁷⁵ See e.g. F. Singleton, Twentieth Century Yugoslavia (New York, 1976) and A Short History of the Yugoslav Peoples (Cambridge, 1985-1993).

⁷⁶ The group also included many young people from the Netherlands who went on to occupy important positions in society, such as Marius Broekmeyer the expert on Yugoslavia and Russia, and the former minister of Defence Relus ter Beek.

⁷⁷ See e.g. M. Djilas, Conversations with Stalin (New York, 1962). The Imperfect Society, (New York, 1969). Memoirs of a Revolutionary (New York, 1973). The New Class (New York, 1974). Wartime (New York 1977). Tito: The Story from the Inside (New York, 1981). Rise and Fall (New York, 1984).

were critical of Communism. The nationalist émigrés, on the other hand, were against both Communist ideology and a shared Yugoslav state.⁷⁸

In the 1970s, the 'Praxis' group of Marxist humanist philosophers attracted a great deal of attention outside Yugoslavia. Their main criticism of Yugoslav society was that the Communists paid too much attention to life in the ideal society of the future. They wanted to investigate the real face of Communist society.⁷⁹

The demystification of the historiography of Yugoslavia in the Second World War came from an unexpected source. In 1985 the Yugoslav émigré Bogoljub Kocovic, who had left Yugoslavia in 1943, published a statistical study of the demographic losses in Yugoslavia during the Second World War - a very sensitive issue in Communist circles. He distinguished between demographic losses in a wider and in a narrower sense, the latter including actual war victims only while the former included losses due to emigration and the drop in birth rate as well. Kocovic estimated the total demographic losses in the wider sense at 2 million, including between 900 000 and 1 150 000 war victims.⁸⁰ His final estimate of 1,014,00 war victims included 478,000 Serbs, 207,00 Croats, 86,000 Muslims and 60,000 Jews. Another book published in 1989 by Vladimir Zerjavic, a Croat economist and demographer, and entitled Gubici stanovništva Jugoslavije u Drugom svjetskom ratu, showed similar results. According to Zerjavic, the total number of war victims on Yugoslav soil was 1,027,000, including 271,000 from Croatian territory and 316,000 from Bosnia-Hercegovina.⁸¹ He further calculated that the total number of victims in all concentration camps within the territory of the NDH was 92,000.⁸² These figures differed widely from the estimates put forward by the Communists and by the nationalist émigrés. According to Communist sources, the Ustase-run Jasenovac concentration camp alone was responsible for between 350 000 and 700 000 deaths, while the 1959 edition of the Yugoslav General Encyclopaedia gave a figure of 350,000 victims in the article on "Concentration camps". The 1950 edition of the same encyclopaedia stated that the exact number of victims was impossible to estimate, but it was sure to exceed 700,000. The lack of exact data on war victims made it possible for a myth to grow up around Jasenovac, which according to some Croat historians and intellectuals have led to the stigmatization of the Croatian people. A heated public debate about the past was held in Yugoslavia in the 1980s. Despite Communist claims that an open-hearted reconciliation process had taken place between the various ethnic groups in Yugoslavia soon after the Second World War, in fact there had never been a widely based discussion involving all layers of society about how people had dealt with the traumatic events of the war. According to official Communist historiography, the Serb and Croat versions of extreme nationalist ideology were regarded as opposite poles of the same evil. Historical studies of the Cetnik movement published outside Yugoslavia reveal a different picture, however. The American historian of Yugoslav descent Jozo Tomashevich wrote in his book on the history of the Cetnik movement that this movement was not a homogeneous political/military organization. The main Cetnik movement was that of General Draza Mihailovic (1893-1946), which may be regarded as the official resistance movement of the Yugoslav government in exile. Mihailovic was loyal to the king, and officially his Cetniks fought for the restoration of the kingdom of Yugoslavia. There was, however, another Cetnik movement in Croatia which was led by an Orthodox priest, Momcilo Djuic, and which collaborated with the Italian Fascists. Bands calling themselves Cetniks, but not under the direct authority of Mihailovic, also operated in Bosnia, Kosovo and Serbia. The public debate was extended to cover the role of the Cetnik movement in the anti-fascist resistance and the 'collective guilt of the ⁷⁸ See Mirko Galic, Politika u emigraciji: demokratska alternativa, (Zagreb, 1990). Mustafa Imamovic, Bosnjaci u emigraciji, (Sarajevo, 1996).

⁷⁹ See e.g. S. Stojanovic, Between Ideals and Reality (New York, 1973). S. Cohen and M. Markovic, Yugoslavia: the rise and fall of socialist humanism (Nottingham, 1975)

⁸⁰ Bogoljub Kocovic, Zrtve drugog svjetskog rata (London 1985). Details of the discussion about the number of victims are given by Franjo Tudjman, Bespuca povijesne zbiljnosti (Zagreb, 1990).

⁸¹ Vladimir Zerjavic, Gubici stanovništva Jugoslavije u Drugom svjetskom ratu (Zagreb 1989).

⁸² Vladimir Zerjavic, Opsesije i megalomanije oko Jasenovca i Bleiburga (Zagreb 1992)..

Croats' in connection with the past deeds of the Ustase. A discussion also arose about whether Mihailovic had had a double agenda and had been fighting for a Greater Serbia right from the start. It is known that the Cetniks were responsible for the slaughter of groups of Muslims in Sandzak and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Historians still cannot agree whether Draza Mihailovic knew about these atrocities. Serb historians and commentators like Vladimir Dedijer, Velimir Terzic and Vuk Draskovic resisted the idea of 'equal responsibility' and 'symmetry' of the crimes committed by the Serbian Cetniks and the Croatian Ustase. While they conceded that the violence committed by the Cetniks could be regarded as genocide, they defended it as necessary in the struggle against the terror of the Partisans and the Ustase. In Draskovic's opinion, these were rare cases of vengeance, 'for which the Serbian people have often expressed regret and condemnation after the war.' The accusation of a Greater-Serbian hegemony in the kingdom of Yugoslavia was rejected as a fabrication by the Comintern. Franjo Tudjman (1922-1999), a historian as well as a former general, also took part in the public debate about the Second World War. Tudjman had been one of the first communist intellectuals to state, as early as the 1950s, that an anti-fascist movement including non-Communists had been active in Croatia since 1941. According to official Communist historiography, anti-fascist resistance in Croatia had not got going till 1943 and before then the communist resistance movement in Croatia had consisted mainly of the Serbian populace.⁸³ Tudjman, however, claimed that the Cetnik movement actively supported the formation of a Greater Serbia. According to him, the crimes of the Cetniks in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia were part of this policy aimed at shifting Serbia's western border. He saw this as a proof of the genocidal character of the Serb nationalist Cetnik movement, which could thus certainly not be regarded as just a reaction to Ustase terror.

Another very critical book about Communist Yugoslavia, by the British journalist Nora Beloff, appeared in 1985.⁸⁴ This book represents one of the best argued attempts to revise Yugoslav communist historiography. She showed up the falsity of the historical myths about the great leader Tito and the heroic Communist anti-Fascist resistance. Her sympathy for the Cetnik movement made her the target of criticism from those who accused her of viewing the history of Yugoslavia through Serb nationalist spectacles.⁸⁵ According to Beloff, Draza Mihailovic was a misunderstood resistance fighter who had been betrayed by the Allies. However, Beloff's book had a great influence on western thought and set the tone for a growing group of historians and regional experts who were very critical of Communist historiography.

The Serb historian Miso Lekovic wrote the book Martovskin pregovori (The March negotiations), about the controversial contacts between the Communist Partisans and the German occupiers, in the same year.⁸⁶ The Communists always claimed that they had used all means at their disposal to combat the foreign occupiers – unlike the Cetniks, who are known to have collaborated with the Germans. While rumours existed that the Partisans had also negotiated with the Germans about a cease-fire, official Communist historiography was silent on this point.⁸⁷ Lekovic's treatment of this politically sensitive theme led to a heated public debate about the Communist anti-fascist resistance, which had always been treated as a sacrosanct ideological dogma by the Communists.

Yugoslav media were flooded with historical debates. After nearly forty years of Communist censorship, it was suddenly possible to write about historical topics that had been taboo until recently. This led to great public interest in everything to do with the past, especially the recent past. Critical analyses of the Communist era and revelations about topics that had been closely guarded secrets until ⁸³ Tudjman wrote at length about his quarrels with Communist historians, and his interpretation of this topic is highly subjective. Nevertheless, his book offers interesting insights into the discussions of the history of the Second World War that were carried out in the 1980s. See Franjo Tudjman, Bespuca povijesne zbiljnosti (Zagreb, 1990).

⁸⁴ Nora Beloff, Tito's Flawed Legacy: Yugoslavia and the West (London, 1985).

⁸⁵ See e.g. C. Bennett, Yugoslavia's Bloody Collapse: Causes, Courses and Consequences (New York, 1995) 253.

⁸⁶ See Miso Lekovic, Martovskin pregovori (Belgrade, 1985).

⁸⁷ Pavlowich (1988) 129-157.

recently, such as over Tito's private life, turned historical research into media hype.⁸⁸ There was also wide media attention for topics from the pre-Communist era that had been regarded by the Communists as 'contra-revolutionary' and dangerous, such as stories about the proponents of extreme nationalist ideologies and nationalist leaders from the Second World War. The Dutch Slavist Willem Vermeer expressed his surprise about the attention paid to history in the Yugoslavia of the 1980s, commenting that it looked as if the past had become more important than the present: "To an outsider, it is quite astonishing to see that the popular press in Yugoslavia is full of interviews with historians and similar people, evidently not because the public is really interested in what happened in the past, but because it is thought that past facts are somehow more important than present reality. (...) since the past is considered more important than the present, there is a tendency to treat reality not as something ethically neutral to be managed, but as something essentially undesirable to be changed back into a situation that is assumed to have existed at some selected period in the past and that is held to represent an ideal.(...)"⁸⁹

There was resistance to this new historiography from orthodox Communist circles, especially the leadership of the Yugoslav Federal Army (JNA). However, the settling of accounts with Yugoslavia's Communist past was not restricted to incidental publications. These changes also led to another trend: the new critical approach to history which made it possible to discuss many controversial themes also facilitated the publication of studies with a nationalist tinge. The political climate changed, and post-Communist nationalist ideologies were born. The neo-nationalists in Croatia began to formulate a new interpretation of the role of the NDH and Ante Pavelic in Croatian history; for example, some intellectuals and politicians described Ante Pavelic's Ustase as a progressive Croatian national movement. The conservative politician Ivan Gabelica stated in an interview printed in the weekly Globus that Pavelic was the Croatian George Washington. The Croat commentator and historian Zvonimir Kulundzic said in another interview that Pavelic was a democrat of the British type. Kulundzic regarded Pavelic's links with Hitler and Mussolini as political miscalculations based on Pavelic's belief that fascism was going to come out on top throughout Europe.⁹⁰

Thomas writes that nationalist interpretations of history led each ethnic group to develop its own 'truths', which came to play an important role in the struggle against political opponents. Before the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina broke out, the Serb nationalist ideologists tried to prove on the basis of 'historical facts' that co-existence with the other 'ethnic groups' there was impossible. Thomas explains this tendency as follows: "Nationalist interpretations of history influence contemporary domestic and regional politics, which then leads to violent conflict. Selective and manipulative versions of history are then used to advance nationalist objectives of secession from the existing state. Similarly, nationalists usually seek to house their narrow concept of 'nation' within a state that is all-inclusive of their ethnic group and, in the same time, exclude other 'nations' from the state or reduce them to secondary status."⁹¹

The Communist era was nearing its end, but instead of looking to the future the post-Communist politicians sought inspiration in the past. The old ideological polarizations were reborn through the setting up of political parties based on the old ideological inheritance.

⁸⁸ A good example of this is a historical work on the life of Tito by the well known historian Vladimir Dedijer. His book, entitled Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita (Rijeka, 1981), was sold out in a few days.

⁸⁹ Willem Vermeer, 'Albanians and Serbs in Yugoslavia' in J.G. Siccama and M. van den Heuvel (eds), The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Amsterdam-Atlanta, 1992) 104.

⁹⁰ See e.g. the interview with Zvonimir Kulundzic in the weekly Globus (7 May 1993). He was working on a study entitled 'Pavelic was no fascist' at the time.

⁹¹ Thomas (1996) 16.

7. The ideological background of extreme nationalist movements and political parties

In 1991, at the height of the war in Croatia, a group of Croat intellectuals compiled a book from source material intended to give a survey of the development of the Greater-Serbian nationalist ideology since the 19th century.⁹² The compilers saw Ilija Garasanin's Nacertanije as the first major political manifesto serving as a basis for Serbia's expansionist policies. In addition to the Nacertanije, the book contained a reprint of Vuk Karadzic's Srbi svi i svuda, which was presented as the basis for Serb linguistic nationalism. Texts relating to the well known secret organization Ujedinjenje ili smrt (Unification or death) were also reprinted.

Of course, this collection also contains less well known texts such as Do istrage nase ili vase (Till our extermination, or yours), by the Serb lawyer and commentator Nikola Stojanovic (1880-1965), which was initially published in Zagreb in 1902. Stojanovic argued in this text for absorption of the Croats in the Serbian people: "The Croats...are not and cannot be a separate nation, but they are on their way to becoming - Serbs. By taking Serbian as their national language, they have taken the most important step towards unification. Also, the process of merging continues apart from the language. By reading every single Serbian book, any folk song, by singing any Serbian song, an atom of fresh Serbian democratic culture is passing into their organism (...) This struggle must be fought until extermination, yours or ours. One party must succumb."⁹³ The Croats in Zagreb reacted to the publication of Stojanovic's article with indignation, and the leader of the Croat extreme nationalist "Pure party of Right" Juraj Frank organized (with support from Budapest) the plundering of Serb houses and shops, which lasted for three days and nights. On the fourth day, the Hungarian authorities announced a state of emergency to put an end to the riots.

The interest in Serb nationalism was generated by the large-scale atrocities committed in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina between 1991 and 1995. People tried to find an explanation in the historical continuity of Serb nationalist ideology for the slaughter of Croats and Bosnians by the Serb army and various paramilitary organisations. For example, the text by the historian Vasa Cubrilovic from 1937 on the plans for expelling the Albanian population of Yugoslavia to Albania and Turkey was regarded as a consequence of Serb nationalist ideology. Cubrilovic was inspired by Hitler's successful expulsion of the Jews and Stalin's suppression of undesired population groups. He proposed that systematic intimidation and terror should be used to make the life of the Albanians impossible, so that they would flee to Albania or Turkey. His proposal also included the deployment of various paramilitary groups, such as the Cetniks, in order to carry out violent actions against Albanian villages and neighbourhoods in collaboration with the government.

The compilation also includes the pamphlet Homogena Srbija (Homogeneous Serbia) by Stevan Moljevic, one of the leaders of the Cetnik movement in the Second World War. This brief manifesto included full details of the boundaries of the Serbian state to be set up after the war. Moljevic's Greater Serbia was to include parts of Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Albania. The formation of this Serbian state was to be followed by a federative alliance with Slovenia and Croatia. This manifesto was used as a proof that the Cetnik movement during the Second World War was fighting for a Greater Serbia and not for the kingdom of Yugoslavia.

The main attention in the book was focused, however, on the Memorandum written in 1985 by a prominent group of academics from the Serbian Academy of Sciences (SANU) in reaction to the political and economic crisis that had been plaguing the Yugoslav federation since the 1960s. The compilers of Izvori velikosrpske agresije share the opinion of most commentators that the SANU Memorandum formed the basis for the nationalist policy followed by the Serbian Communists under ⁹² See Boze Covic (ed.), Izvori velikosrpske agresije, (Zagreb 1991). Philip Cohen, Serbia's Secret War: Propaganda and Deceit, (Texas, 1996). M. Grmek, M. Gjidara, N. Stimac, Le nettoyage ethnique: Documents, historiques sur une idéologie serbe (Paris, 1993).

⁹³ This translation is taken from P. Cohen (1996) 4.

Slobodan Milosevic. It consists of two thematic parts, the first of which contains general considerations about the socio-economic, cultural and political crisis suffered by Communist Yugoslavia. The blame for the faulty policies followed in Yugoslavia is laid on the shoulders of the Communist rulers. The second part deals with the position of Serbia within the Communist federation, as defined in the 1974 Constitution. The main argument here is that the Serbian people had not been given the right to a state of their own. Serbia itself was divided administratively into three parts: Serbia proper, and the two autonomous provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo. The political steps derived from this analysis were aimed in the first instance at re-uniting Serbia administratively by abolishing the autonomous status of the two other provinces. Although the SANU Memorandum did not mention any explicit links between the policies it proposed and Serb national ideology in the tradition of Garasanin or the Cetnik movement, Serbian policy under the leadership of Slobodan Milosevic was placed in the tradition of 19th century Serb nationalism because both were aimed at uniting the Serb population (including that from other republics) in a single state.

It is noteworthy that while many books about the background of Serb nationalist ideology have appeared since 1991, there have been no systematic analyses of the ideological background of Croat extreme nationalist movements and political parties.⁹⁴ The Croatian share of war atrocities is generally related to the Croat extreme nationalist ideology of Starcevic and Frank. While Starcevic regarded the Habsburg monarchy as the greatest enemy of the formation of the Croatian state and warned against co-operation with Budapest and Vienna, Frank was notorious for his anti-Serb attitude. He did not hesitate to work together with Budapest to intimidate the Croatian Serbs. Frank's ideological legacy was continued by the lawyer Ante Pavelic (1899-1965), the founder of the Ustase movement. Pavelic fled the kingdom of Yugoslavia after having been found guilty in absentia of incitement to armed rebellion against the state. He sought refuge in Mussolini's Italy, where he set up the Ustase (Rebels) terrorist group. Pavelic was convinced that the political future of Croatia lay in the hands of the Croatian peasants and he gained a great deal of support in Lika (Knin-krajina) and Hercegovina, where the peasant population lived under very poor conditions and where the royal police were given a free hand to terrorize the non-Serb population. The Ustase's support for the poor and socially disadvantaged groups led initially to such confusion about their ideological background that even the Yugoslav Communist Party though they had gained a new ally.⁹⁵ This was a big miscalculation, because the main aim of Ustase ideology was the formation of an ethnically pure Greater Croatian state. The Ustase government unleashed a reign of terror in 1941, with the promulgation of the "Decree for the Defence of the People and the State", in which it was stated that whoever damaged the vital interests of Croatia was guilty of high treason, the penalty for which was death.⁹⁶ The "Decree for the Protection of Arian Blood" promoted the Slav Croats, by way of exception and with the implicit approval of Hitler, to the Arian race and made it an offence for them to have dealings with Jews. The Serbian question was dealt with in the "Decree concerning Conversion from one Religion to another". The Serbs were defined as 'Eastern Greek Orthodox', and Catholic priests were encouraged to convert them to Catholicism.⁹⁷ After the restoration of political pluralism in Croatia in 1990, a number of new political parties claimed an ideological affinity with the Party of Right, the Pure Party of Right and the Ustase. The winner in the ⁹⁴ See e.g. Branimir Anzulovic, Heavenly Serbia, (New York, 1999). Norman Cigar, Genocide in Bosnia: The Policy of Ethnic Cleansing (Texas A&M, 1996). Philip J. Cohen, Serbia's Secret War: Propaganda and Deceit of History (Texas A&M, 1996/1999). TH. Cushman and S. Mestrovic, This Time we Knew: Western Responses to Genocide in Bosnia (Texas A&M, 1996). Boze Covic (ed.), Izvori velikosrpske agresije (Zagreb 1991). M. Grmek, M. Gjidara, N. Stimac, Le nettoyage ethnique: Documents, historiques sur une idéologie serbe (Paris, 1993). Stjepan. Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide After Emotion: The Postemotional Balkan War (London, 1996). Michael Sells, The Bridge Betrayed: Religion and Genocide in Bosnia (Berkley, 1996).

⁹⁵ A. Djilas, The Contested Country: Yugoslav Unity and Communist Revolution, 1919-1953 (Cambridge, Mass, 1991) 109-110.

⁹⁶ Z. Löwenthal (ed.), The Crimes of the Fascist Occupants and their Collaborators against Jews in Yugoslavia (Belgrade, 1957) 6.

⁹⁷ P. Cohen (1996) 88-92.

1990 elections was the HDZ (Croatian Democratic Union), a neo-nationalist party with one main aim: the creation of an independent Croatian state. Anything that stood in the way of this aim was considered to be ideologically unacceptable. HDZ policy was a combination of anti-Yugoslav, anti-Communist and anti-Serb elements.⁹⁸ Unlike the Ustase, HDZ ideologists no longer regarded the Muslims from Bosnia-Herzegovina as 'natural allies' but as political opponents on the way to a great, independent Croatian state.

⁹⁸ See e.g. Franjo Tuđman, Izabrana djela, 3 vols. (Zagreb 1990).

Chapter 2

Theories concerning the disintegration of Yugoslavia

Introduction

After the outbreak of war in 1991, many studies of the background of the war were published. Most of these included a reconstruction of the events leading up to the disintegration of Yugoslavia. In parallel with a step-by-step description of the escalation process, an attempt was made to trace the causes of the disintegration of the state. The most recent publications have tended to concentrate mainly on the question of the succession after the death of Tito, the economic crisis and the crisis of the federal system as the fundamental causes of the disintegration of Yugoslavia. In addition, authors have tried to assign responsibility for the violent escalation of the conflict: was this perhaps due to the secessionist policies of Slovenia and Croatia, who decided to leave the Yugoslav federation in 1991? Or were these policies merely a reaction to the Serb nationalist policies of Slobodan Milosevic, who had been mobilizing the Serb population in other republics since 1987 in order, as he claimed, to 'save' them from the genocide others were planning to carry out on them?

In order to explain the causes of the violence, and in particular the escalation of violence in Bosnia-Herzegovina, it is necessary to start off by analysing the various definitions of the conflict. Was it historical, ethnic, religious, ideological or political in nature? Or was it a confirmation of the theory of a 'clash of civilisations' that had suddenly become so popular in the 1990s?

1. The question of succession: Tito after Tito?

For more than three decades, the political leadership of the Yugoslav federation was in the hands of one single person: Josip Broz Tito. He was the State President, the Federal Premier and the Supreme Commander of the army. He fulfilled all these functions till the end of his life, and was accepted as impartial by all ethnic groups.⁹⁹

Tito started to arrange his succession in the 1960s. It was ultimately decided that he would be succeeded by a Presidium with eight members, representing the six republics and the two autonomous provinces. It was later realized, however, that such a collective presidium would be unable to save the federation if the one-party system should cease to exist. Democratic centralism provided a vital basis for the solution of political problems in Communist Yugoslavia: once the party had taken a decision, this should be followed at all levels.

The historian Stevan Pavlowich believes that Tito was not really interested in arranging his succession, and offers as evidence the fact that he expelled a whole generation of competent politicians from the party in the 1970s. In Pavlowich's opinion, these clean-ups were aimed not so much at removing deviant 'nationalist' and 'liberal' elements from the party as at dealing with his succession: "This was intended both to prevent a struggle for the succession, and anyone ever again wielding such power as he had - in order to keep his achievements and his memory intact and unique."¹⁰⁰

The question as to what would happen to the Communist Yugoslav federation after Tito's death was also of great importance for European security. The first scenarios for the future of ⁹⁹ See e.g. P. Auty, Tito: A Biography (New York, 1970). N. Belloff, Tito's Flawed Legacy: Yugoslavia and the West since 1939 (London, 1985). V. Dedijer, Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita (Rijeka, 1981). M. Djilas, Tito: The Story from the Inside (New York, 1981). S.K. Pavlowich, Tito, Yugoslavia's Great Dictator (London, 1992). J. Ridley, Tito: A Biography, (London, 1994). R. West, Tito and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia (Cambridge, 1994).

¹⁰⁰ Pavlowich (1988) 26.

Yugoslavia after the death of Tito appeared in the 1970s.¹⁰¹ A frequently recurring theme was the warning that this event was likely to lead to the loss of Yugoslav neutrality. The doom scenarios included the possibilities of regional destabilization, Soviet expansion to the South-East of Europe, and ethnic tensions: “The scenario could be grim: Tito successors are unable to impose their will on the feuding republics; nationalism, the historic bane of the Balkans, explodes with new strength, fuelled by Kosovo Albanian irredentists and the Croat clamour for more autonomy; the TDF (Territorial Defence Force, N. Tromp), the pride of Yugoslavia’s military planners, splits up along national lines; armed bands of Ustashi and Cominformist Soviet agents cross the borders, spreading terror and chaos.”¹⁰²

The German commentator and Yugoslavia expert Carl Gustaf Ströhm pointed out that radical Croatian and Serbian nationalist émigrés were waiting for the chance to topple the Communist system. An underground war had been raging outside Yugoslavia between the Yugoslav secret service (UDBA) and these groups for years. The general assumption was that Communist Yugoslavia would disintegrate along ethnic fault lines after Tito’s death, opening the door to the return of political émigrés with very radical views.¹⁰³

European diplomatic circles devoted a great deal of attention and energy to maintenance of the status quo during the Cold War years. Any rapprochement between the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia could disturb the precarious balance of power in Europe. But unlike the prediction made in most doom scenarios, Yugoslavia did not fall prey to Soviet expansionism. The disintegration of Yugoslavia did not happen until the Communist system in Europe had collapsed in 1989, closely followed by the crumbling of the Soviet Union in 1991.¹⁰⁴

From 1980 onwards, the Yugoslav political elite tried to keep Tito’s legacy alive under the motto ‘Tito after Tito’.¹⁰⁵ In fact, however, the bankruptcy of Communist ideology, the economic malaise and social and ethnic tensions caused the Communist elites in the republics to distance themselves more and more from Tito and his political legacy. Various republics were on the look out for a new ‘strong man’, for Yugoslavians had never known a political system that did not derive its authority from a strong leader. This was generally explained with reference to the patriarchal traditions of the region, where democratic political institutions remained underdeveloped and all political systems in the past had rested on the power and authority of a strong leader. The Serb geographer and anthropologist Jovan Cvijic explains the tendency of the population of the Balkans to submit to the authority placed above them by the centuries of suppression undergone by the region which had forced the populace to an extreme form of adaptation if they were to survive.¹⁰⁶ Paradoxically enough, the Communist system was the most liberal political system in the history of the South Slav peoples despite all its shortcomings and its repressive character. Anyone who followed the rules could become a member of the Communist party and advance in society on that basis. But the Communist system also depended on the strong leadership of one person, Tito. It appeared with hindsight that the system could not survive without a new strong man. It has been said of Slobodan Milosevic that he was the ¹⁰¹ See e.g. Carl Gustaf Ströhm, Ohne Tito: Kann Jugoslawien überleben? (Graz-Vienna-Cologne, 1976). Andrew Borowiets, Yugoslavia after Tito (New York, 1977). Gavril Ra’anen, Yugoslavia after Tito: Scenarios and Implications (Boulder, 1977). Slobodan Stankovic, Tito’s Erbe: Die Hypothek der alten Richtungskämpfe ideologischer und nationaler Fraktionen (Munich, 1981) and, by the same author, The End of Tito Era: Yugoslavia’s Dilemmas (Stamford, 1981).

¹⁰² Borowiec (1977) 103.

¹⁰³ ‘Für jede ausländische macht, die an einer Desintegration des jugoslawischen Systems interessiert ist, stellt dieser Untergrundkrieg im kroatischen und serbischen Exil einen günstigen Ansatzpunkt dar.’ (This underground war between Croat and Serb exiles is a useful point of attack for any foreign power interested in the disintegration of the Yugoslav system.) Cited from Ströhm (1976) 295.

¹⁰⁴ See A. Lynch and R. Lukic, Europe from the Balkans to the Urals, the Disintegration of Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union (Oxford, 1996).

¹⁰⁵ L. Sekelj, Yugoslavia: The Process of Disintegration (Boulder, 1993) 145.

¹⁰⁶ Wayne Vuchinich, ‘some Aspects of the Ottoman legacy’, in Charles and Barbara Jelavich (eds.), The Balkans in Transition. Essays on the Development of Balkan Life and Politics since the Eighteenth Century (Berkeley- Los Angeles, 1963) 89.

only politician in the former Yugoslavia who had understood that Tito was dead and who wanted to become the new Tito. His problem, however, was that he was not accepted by the non-Serbs, the Serb liberal intelligentsia and the liberal Communists. His power in Serbia was based on the support of the Serbs from the other republics, in particular Kosovo and Croatia.

After the death of Tito, the new generation of Communist leaders promised never to 'depart from his ways'. However, the rise of nationalism in the Yugoslav republics at the end of the 1980s led to increasing criticism of Tito. In Croatian post-Communist historiography, he is generally described as a tyrant who used Communist ideology as an effective means of repression to hold the South Slav peoples, in particular the Croats, together against their will. In post-Communist Serb historiography, Tito is said to be responsible for splitting Serbia up into three (administrative) units, Serbia proper and the autonomous provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo. It is claimed that he did this because he believed that Yugoslavia could only be strong if Serbia was weak.

The bloody disintegration of Yugoslavia led to renewed interest in Tito and his times. The British commentator Jasper Ridley wrote a biography of Tito in 1994, in which he gave a more positive assessment of the Yugoslav leader. Ridley stated that Tito had long had doubts about the future of the Yugoslav federation; he apparently said as early as two years before his death that Yugoslavia no longer existed. Ridley believed that Tito was less unpopular in post-Communist Croatia than in post-Communist Serbia. The Croatian president Franjo Tudjman always showed respect for Tito, whom he praised e.g. for his creation of a federal Yugoslavia in the 1970s, which was very good for Croatia. In another biography of Tito, the British historian and Yugoslavia expert Richard West described how the inhabitants of Bosnia carried Tito's portrait through the streets and called his name during parades held in Sarajevo and Mostar on the eve of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Many inhabitants of the ethnically mixed regions where the memories of ethnic violence from the Second World War were still fresh saw Tito and his Yugoslavia as guarantees of peace.¹⁰⁷

2. The economic crisis

One of the first books describing the escalating disintegration of Yugoslavia as the result of economic, political and ethnic tensions appeared in 1993.¹⁰⁸ Branka Magas, a British historian and journalist of Croatian descent, had initially been interested in the direction in which Yugoslav socialism and 'workers' self-rule' was going to develop in the 1980s. She soon realized, however, that not only the Yugoslav socialist system but also the continued existence of the state itself was at risk.¹⁰⁹ In the early 1980s, shortly after Tito's death, signs of a deep economic crisis in Yugoslavia became evident. The Communist rulers tried to deal with it with the aid of a series of economic measures. A Long-term Programme for Economic Stabilization and Development was introduced in 1982. The main measures this programme contained involved large-scale cuts in expenditure in all segments of society. In the view of Yugoslav economists, however, the crisis was structural and could not be solved by the proposed economic changes. Industry depended on imported raw materials and technology, and the facilities for agriculture, transport and energy were systematically neglected. Despite the strict measures taken to reduce expenditure, the foreign debt continued to rise: "In 1983 alone $900 million were added to the country's $20 billion foreign debt. To service this debt, and in order to be able to borrow more, the government has been cutting down imports and stepping up exports 'at all costs'. Import reductions have in turn produced a great shortage of essential materials. The result has been great industrial ¹⁰⁷ West (1995) 392.

¹⁰⁸ B. Magas, The Destruction of Yugoslavia: Tracking the Break-up 1980-92 (London, 1993). L. Sekelj, Yugoslavia: The Process of Disintegration, (Boulder, 1993). L. Cohen, Broken Bonds: The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Boulder-Oxford, 1993).

¹⁰⁹ Magas (1993) Introduction.

stagnation: depending on the branch, only between 30 per cent and 60 per cent of industrial capacity is at present being utilized. This means that enterprises are increasingly operating at a loss (...)”¹¹⁰

The foreign experts who saw the crisis in Yugoslavia as basically economic in nature believed that it was a result of the oil crisis that had hit all developing countries in the early 1980s. In the opinion of the American financial expert Martin d’Andrea, the Yugoslav economy had adapted well to the consequences of the oil crisis. Susan Woodward believed, however, that the most liberal Communist country could never make a successful transition to the market economy because of its internal economic development and the monetary policy of other countries at the time of the global debt crisis. According to her, the international financial crisis led to the economic crisis in Yugoslavia, which meant that the federal government could no longer function properly; and this then led in its turn to collapse of the socio-political system. Woodward ascribes the failure of the reform process in the 1980s to the international monetary organizations, which did not consider the political consequences of their policy and which kept on making new demands on the Yugoslav government. The Yugoslav sociologist Laslo Sekelj notes that the Yugoslav crisis was long regarded simply as an economic crisis which had to be solved by appropriate ‘stabilization policies’ on the part of the federal government. Yugoslav experts, on the other hand, saw the economy as only part of the problem. The main problem, according to them, was the execution of the stabilisation programmes at republic level. Sekelj believes that the economic disintegration of the federation had already begun in the early 1980s as a result of the ‘consensus economy’ which had led to six national economies.

The emphasis of the Communist leaders on the economic aspects of the crisis led to prolonged underestimation of its political consequences. Jovan Miric, Professor of Political Science at the University of Zagreb, was the first to point out the political aspects of the crisis. According to him, the causes of the economic crisis should be sought in the fact that the administrative rules and the political control of the economy were informal in nature and not laid down by law. In other words, political involvement in the economy was anonymous and intangible; no one could be held responsible for it.¹¹¹ This politicisation of the economy led to ‘political investment’, an ironic euphemism for the building of vast industrial conglomerates in economically under-developed regions. Founded on political considerations and not on economic calculations, they suffered enormous losses.¹¹²

The economic and social crisis also manifested itself at other levels. Ever since the creation of the Yugoslav state in 1918, great economic inequality had existed between its various regions. Slovenia and Croatia already had an industrial infrastructure, while society in Macedonia and Kosovo still showed feudal traits. This economic inequality continued under Communism and even got an added ethnic dimension since the allocation of economic resources within the federation was decided at republic level. Kosovo and Macedonia were regarded as under-developed regions and Slovenia and Croatia as rich, developed ones. Simmie and Dekleva concluded that the war was due to “economic wars between the richer northern republics and the poorer southern ones.”¹¹³ According to some calculations, Slovenia was 7.5 times as rich as Kosovo.

The economist Milica Zarkovic Bookman took an interesting approach to the importance of the economy in the disintegration of the Yugoslav federation¹¹⁴. She studied the relationship between economic stagnation and nationalism in the former Yugoslavia. It is generally assumed that modernization of society leads to weakening of the forces of nationalism, and on the other hand that nationalism is reinforced when the economic situation deteriorates. Some authors believe that the consequences of the economic crisis for the population of Yugoslavia led to the disintegration of the state. The standard of living dropped: in the mid-1980s, only 16% of Yugoslav households could live from their monthly income while by 1987 this figure had dropped to 5%. The population had lost all

¹¹⁰ Ibid., 95.

¹¹¹ Sekelj (1993) 160-162.

¹¹² See e.g. Marius Broekmeyer, Joegoslavië in crisis (in Dutch) (The Hague, 1985).

¹¹³ J. Simmie and J. Dekleva, Yugoslavia in Turmoil: After Self-Management? (Londen, 1991) xvii.

¹¹⁴ M. Zarkovic Bookman, Economic Decline and Nationalism in the Balkans (London, 1994).

confidence in the Communist leaders. By the end of the 1980s, Communism had completely lost the respect of the populace and was only associated with corruption, nepotism and incompetence. Steven Burg pointed out that populist movements and political demagogues used the economic crisis to gain political support among the population by promising quick, radical solutions to complex socio-economic problems.

Zarkovic Bookman also saw a clear relationship between the economic stagnation, the rise of nationalism and the resulting demands for secession from multi-ethnic communities.¹¹⁵ She based her analysis on the theories of authors like Karl Deutsch and Samuel Huntington¹¹⁶, who claim that modernization increases the chance of assimilation and hence reduces the risk of ethnic conflicts. It also raises the level of civilization and education or training in a society. As a result, more people come to regard themselves as members of the civil society, and identify themselves less with their ethnic descent. The contrary view is that modernization increases the competition between different peoples, as a result of which ethnic groups actually want to distinguish themselves from others. Other experts, such as Immanuel Wallerstein,¹¹⁷ believe that it is precisely the richer regions that tend to make more extreme demands such as secession. Experience in Yugoslavia actually seems to confirm both these views. The first demands for secession came from Kosovo, the least developed region in Yugoslavia. At the end of the 1980s, however, it was precisely the richest Yugoslav republic, Slovenia, that used economic arguments to legitimize its secession from Yugoslavia. The Slovene economist Joze Mencinger called the arguments about the economic exploitation of Yugoslavia's rich northern republics 'economic demagogy'¹¹⁸, which was used for political ends to legitimize secession from the federation. In fact Slovenia, which though relatively small was economically the best developed region of Yugoslavia, profited from the large market for its products offered by the rest of Yugoslavia. Slovenian complaints at the end of the 1980s referred to the execution of the federal economic policy.

The last hope for economic recovery was placed in the 'shock therapy' instituted by the last Yugoslav federal premier Ante Markovic, who started an ambitious programme of measures aimed at correcting the economic and monetary imbalance in the federation in 1989. His efforts were however continually frustrated by the republican leaders in Slovenia and Croatia, who refused to pay the customs and tax income they received into the federal chest. Serbia also refused to cooperate with the reforms at federal level. In December 1990, just before the first multi-party elections in Serbia, the Serb President Slobodan Milosevic had 1.7 billion US dollars worth of dinars printed without authorization from the federal government or the Central Bank. This measure won the elections for him in Serbia, but the monetary consequences for the rest of the federation were catastrophic. The federal government lost any credibility it still had, and Slovenia and Croatia saw it as justification for their declaration of independence.

3. The crisis of the federal system

Apart from the question of the succession to Tito and the economic crisis, the literature on the disintegration of Yugoslavia devoted a great deal of attention to the crisis of the federal system. One of the paradoxes of Yugoslav society was that while official Communist ideology sketched nationalism as ideologically dangerous and socially unacceptable, ethnic criteria were still used as starting point for the formation of the Yugoslav federal system. Sabrina Ramet used the 'balance of power' theory from ¹¹⁵ 'The greater the underdevelopment, deterioration and stagnation of regional economy, the greater the efforts of the ethnic group to differentiate itself from the union.' in Zarkovic Bookman (1994) 8.

¹¹⁶ See K. Deutsch, Nationalism and Its Alternatives (New York, 1969). S. Huntington, Political Order in Changing Societies, (New Haven, 1968). Cited in Zarkovic Bookman (1994) 8.

¹¹⁷ See I. Wallerstein, Africa: The Politics of independence, (New York, 1961). Cited in Zarkovic Bookman (1994) 8.

¹¹⁸ See J. Mencinger, 'Costs and Benefits of Secession' in D. Fink-Hafner and J. Robbins, Making a New Nation: The Formation of Slovenia (Dartmouth, 1997).

international relations to analyse the disintegration of the Yugoslav state.¹¹⁹ The relations between the republics and the federation were laid down in the Yugoslav Constitution, the last version of which (from 1974) contained provisions for decentralization of the federation. The republics were given greater independence, and could stand up for their own rights. At the same time, there was less incentive for the republics to make compromises with one another and the relations between them changed into what one author described as ‘combative federalism’.¹²⁰ Although ethnic tensions had also occurred regularly in the past, they had according to Ramet never led to eruptions within the federal system as long as the authority of the Communist party remained unchallenged. Tito acted regularly as the ultimate arbitrator in disputes between the republics right up to his death.

Many books on the crisis of the 1980s contain descriptions of the bankruptcy of Communist ideology in Yugoslavia well before the major upheavals in Eastern Europe. The Constitution of 1974 caused the Yugoslav Communist party to be split up into national Communist parties, which demanded changes in the federal system. The conflict between the Yugoslav republics was largely regarded in the late 1980s and early 1990s as one between the centre and the disobedient republics. The Dutch researcher Koen Koch describes the power struggle as a collision between ‘conflicting visions of state and society’ and distinguishes the following pairs of opposites in this context: ‘centralization vs decentralization’ (‘federation vs confederation’), ‘democracy vs communism’ and ‘pluralism vs nationalism’.¹²¹ Koch refers to the analysis by Milovan Djilas, who saw the struggle of the 1980s as a conflict between the national elites of the various republics, who used nationalism as a ‘technique for domination’.¹²² Ramet distinguishes the ‘national liberals’ (Slovenia and Croatia), and the ‘conservative anti-reformers’ (Serbia and Montenegro). The former wanted more autonomy for the republics and further decentralization, while the latter actually wanted centralization of the federation. The Serb preference for a centralized federation was thus diametrically opposed to the Slovene and Croat demands for further decentralization. In addition, Slovenia and Croatia presented themselves as proponents of democratic change while Serbia and Montenegro were not prepared to give up Communism.

When the nationalist parties came to power in Slovenia and Croatia in 1990, this marked the start of what Robert Hayden called a period of ‘constitutional nationalism’, characterized by a constitution and a legal system in each new republic that was intended to guarantee the dominance of the largest ethnic group.¹²³ The other ethnic groups were declared ethnic minorities, which led to violent reactions since no one wanted to belong to a minority. The new political elites in Slovenia and Croatia applied the principle of ‘total national sovereignty’ by claiming the right to self-determination, which led eventually to their secession from Yugoslavia.¹²⁴

During the final phase of the conflict before major violence erupted, there was a heated debate about the meaning of the term ‘self-determination’. In the Communist vision of the federal system, each people had the right to self-determination - including the right to secession - on condition that the other constitutive nationalities agreed. Slovenia and Croatia derived the legitimacy and legality of their decision from the results of the preceding referendum. In fact, however, this referendum had not given them the backing of the other nationalities or of the federal government, which had declared the independence of these republics illegal.¹²⁵ The Croatian government was not worried about the boycott of the referendum by the Serb population of Croatia. In their opinion, the right to self-determination applied to the republics within their existing boundaries – often called the communist boundaries. This ¹¹⁹ Sabrina P. Ramet, Nationalism and Federalism in Yugoslavia, 1962-1991 (Bloomington, 1992).

¹²⁰ Sekelj (1993) 247.

¹²¹ Koen Koch, ‘Conflicting visions of State and Society in Present-day Yugoslavia’ in M. van den Heuvel and G. J. Siccama, The Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Amsterdam-Atlanta, 1992) 189.

¹²² Ibid., 200.

¹²³ See R. Hayden, ‘Constitutional Nationalism in the Former Yugoslav Republics’ Slavic Review (51), 654-673.

¹²⁴ Ibid., 665.

¹²⁵ Samary (1995) 75.

difference of opinion was, however, of no importance for the resolution of the crisis, for no matter whether the self-determination of peoples or of republics was at issue, the results of the referendum meant the end of the Yugoslav federation in both cases.¹²⁶ As early as 1991, a democratic Yugoslavia was no longer a realistic possibility. The Italian minister of Foreign Affairs Gianni de Michelis said in 1991 that “According to its present constitutional structure, Yugoslavia could be either united but undemocratic, or democratic - but in pieces.”¹²⁷

Despite his rhetoric, however, the Serb president Milosevic did not appear to be willing to grant the right to the self-determination of nationalities to anyone but the Serb population. In his opinion, the Serb population of Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia should have the chance of expressing their opinion about the disintegration of the Yugoslav state and of deciding whether they wanted to remain in Yugoslavia. He has never explained why he was not prepared to grant the rights he claimed for the Serb minorities in the other republics to the Kosovars in Kosovo, the Muslims in Sandzak and the Hungarians in Vojvodina. One of the causes of the fighting that broke out in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina was that the Serb population there had set up Serb “autonomous regions”: according to the Serb nationalist politicians, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina could become independent – but without the regions which they (the Serb politicians) regarded as Serbian. The Croat politicians followed the Serb example, and in 1992 the Croat ‘autonomous region’ of Herceg-Bosna was proclaimed, with the intention of incorporating it into Croatia later.

4. The question of the responsibility for the disintegration of Yugoslavia

The power struggle between the various Yugoslav republics in the period from 1990 to 1992 was followed closely by foreign journalists, diplomats and politicians. The official EU policy was that Yugoslavia had to be saved. When this proved impossible, a discussion flared up about the responsibility for the disintegration of Yugoslavia. While the Serb president Slobodan Milosevic has always claimed that he wanted to save Yugoslavia, he is generally considered to bear most of the blame for its disintegration. Initially, Milosevic’s claim that he was in favour of the preservation of Yugoslavia was believed in European political circles. European policy in 1991 was also aimed precisely in this direction. Things changed after the failure of the conference held in The Hague in the autumn of 1991, where a Draft Proposal for a Yugoslav confederation was presented to the leaders of the various republics. According to this proposal, the republics would get a great deal of autonomy and would be joined together in a confederation; the national minorities in each republic would have a large measure of self-government. Milosevic was the only participant at this conference to reject this proposal, because he was not prepared to grant the Kosovo Albanians a wide degree of autonomy.¹²⁸ This is the main reason why Milosevic is regarded as having prime responsibility for the violent disintegration of Yugoslavia; a subsidiary reason is that he was the first Yugoslav politician to introduce nationalist rhetoric into his discourse. The main lines of Serbian policy under Milosevic were based on the SANU Memorandum (see section 1.6 above), a manifesto produced in 1986 by a group of leading members of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences (Serbo-Croat abbreviation SANU). According to them, the 1974 Constitution was the cause of many problems in Yugoslav – and in particular in Serbian - society. They blamed the crisis on the political and economic domination of Slovenia and Croatia in Communist Yugoslavia, because these two republics had formed a kind of anti-Serb coalition during the rule of Tito and his right-hand man, the Slovene Edvard Kardelj. But the strongest criticism concerned federal policy in Kosovo: “Everyone in this country who is not indifferent has long ago realized that the genocide in Kosovo cannot be combated without deep social (...) changes in the whole country. These changes are unimaginable without changes likewise in the relationship between the ¹²⁶ See V. Gligorov, Why Do Countries Break Up: The Yugoslav Case (Uppsala, 1994).

¹²⁷ Sekelj (1992) 245.

¹²⁸ Little and Silber (1995) 213.

Autonomous Provinces and the Republic of Serbia (...). Genocide cannot be prevented by the (...) gradual surrender of Kosovo and Metohija to Albania: the unsigned capitulation which leads to a politics of national treason.”¹²⁹

The word ‘genocide’ had been uttered, with the implication that the Serb population in Croatia was also at risk. This kind of language also awoke memories of the Second World War, which had far-reaching consequences for the relations between the Serbs and the non-Serb nationalities in Yugoslavia. The suggestion of a planned anti-Serb policy and the threat of genocide led to a sort of existential crisis among the Serb people. This ‘propaganda of threat’ turned all kinds of Serbs – rich and poor, Communist and non-Communist, with or without a religious belief – into political allies in a broadly based national movement.¹³⁰

Although Milosevic claimed to support the preservation of Yugoslavia, he rejected all proposals for reformation of the Yugoslav federation: the Slovenian-Croatian proposal for a confederation; the Izetbegovic-Gligorov proposal, and finally that made by Lord Carrington in October 1991. After the rejection of the last-mentioned proposal, the international community was powerless to save Yugoslavia. Slovenia and Croatia were recognized as independent states by the EU countries shortly thereafter.

While Robert Hayden and Susan Woodward recognized that Serb nationalism had had negative effects, they did not think that Milosevic bore most blame for the disintegration of Yugoslavia. In their opinion, Slovenia shared the blame. The political scientist Phil Nel (1994) considers that Croatian policy under Franjo Tudjman has most to answer for, since this led to the revolt of the Croatian Serbs against the new Croatian government in August 1990.¹³¹

Although there was much criticism of Croatian policy under Tudjman, Croatia was generally held to bear a smaller share of the blame than Serbia. The mistakes made by the Croatian government relate to the treatment of the Serb population in Croatia after the elections in 1990. The new Croatian political elite did little to rebut the claims that the demands for independence in 1990 bore a striking resemblance to those made for the independent Croatian Ustase state (NDH) in 1941. Tudjman has never unconditionally condemned the Croats’ Ustase past. In fact, he made things worse by stating that even though the Ustase movement with its fascism and ethnic cleansing was reprehensible, the independence of Croatia in the period between 1941 and 1945 had been a valuable historical fact.

In the new Croatian constitution adopted in 1990, the Serb population of the state was defined as a ‘national minority’. No new legislation was passed to protect the rights of the Serb population, even though they had an absolute majority in 11 municipalities and made up nearly 12% of the overall population of Croatia. This led to increasing uncertainty among the Serbs, and finally to resistance to the new Croatian government. A majority of the Croatian Serbs voted in 1990 for the SDP (Party of Democratic Change - the old Communists, who were in favour of reformation of the federation). After the defeat of this party, however, they showed increasing support for the Serb nationalist parties. With the approval of Slobodan Milosevic, the Croatian Serbs designated a series of areas as ‘serb Autonomous Regions’ in 1991; these areas became no-go areas for the Croatian authorities.

The international community is often blamed for the outbreak of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. They recognized the independence of various parts of the former Yugoslavia too quickly. This claim is difficult to substantiate, however. After the declarations of independence of Slovenia and Croatia, it would have been hard to justify leaving the population of Bosnia behind in a Serb-dominated Yugoslavia. Moreover, if the EU had not recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina, two ethnic groups (the Croats and the Muslims) would have revolted. But when Bosnia-Herzegovina was recognized, it was the Bosnian Serbs who revolted. The political leaders of the Bosnian Serbs had repeatedly stated before

¹²⁹ Magas (1993) 49.

¹³⁰ See Z. Tomac, ‘Ozivotvorenje memorandumskih ciljeva’ in B. Covic, Izvori velikosrpske agresije, (Zagreb, 1991).

¹³¹ P. Nel, ‘Who is to Blame? International Responses to Serbian Fears and the Conflict in Yugoslavia’, in F. Pfesch (ed.) International Relations and Pan-Europe, (Munster-Hamburg, 1994) 389-417.

April 1992 that they did not wish to live in a state where the Muslims together with the Croats had a parliamentary majority and could always outvote the Serbs.¹³² The Bosnian Serbs had therefore designated a series of areas in Bosnia-Herzegovina as 'serb Autonomous Regions' before September 1991, in preparation for a territorial division of Bosnia-Herzegovina. In January 1992, these regions were proclaimed the Serb Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina (Republika Srpska). This provocation exacerbated the ethnic divisions.¹³³ Thereafter, the Bosnian Serbs boycotted the referendum on the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina. They wanted the Republika Srpska to become part of the new Yugoslav state formed in April 1992 as a federation between Serbia and Montenegro.

An authoritative assessment of the causes of the disintegration of Yugoslavia was made by the Badinter Commission, set up by the EC Member States in 1990. This commission consisted of the presidents of the constitutional courts of the Western European countries, and was chaired by the French judge and head of the French Constitutional Court Robert Badinter. It concluded that the Yugoslav federation had already ceased to function before Slovenia and Croatia made their declarations of independence.¹³⁴ The judgement of the Badinter Commission had far-reaching consequences for the way the crisis was dealt with in international law: Slovenia and Croatia did not end up in the dock, and the new Yugoslav federation set up by Serbia and Montenegro could not assume the mantle of the former Yugoslavia. All debts and assets of the former Yugoslavia were divided proportionately between the five states that had succeeded it: Slovenia, Croatia, Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia.

5. Definitions of the nature of the conflict

As we have just seen, the discussion about the responsibility for the disintegration of Yugoslavia generally assigned most of the blame to Slobodan Milosevic. According to the authors who have applied conflict theory to the Yugoslav crisis, however, all parties share the responsibility for the violent escalation of the conflict, because they all played according to the rules of the 'zero-sum game'. They were prepared to use all available means, including military force, to achieve their political objectives. None of the parties was willing to compromise: the aim was winning. The content of the discussion of the background of the conflict also changed after the outbreak of war. The violence in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina was played out on a world stage, and evoked first astonishment and then outrage. How could people who had lived together peaceably for more than forty years suddenly become enemies? Arguments involving the economic and constitutional crisis of the Yugoslav federation might explain why the mechanism of the federation no longer functioned, but threw no light on the intensity of the violence between the ethnic groups in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina after the disintegration of the Yugoslav federation.

The causes of the war have been studied and explained from many different perspectives. Practically all authors try to find support for their theories in the history of the South-Slav peoples, no matter whether the recent war is defined as ethnic, religious, economic, ideological or political in nature. One group of eminent intellectuals who studied the causes and consequences of the conflict saw a clear relationship between the current crisis and the history of the region. Inspired by the work of the Commission of the Carnegie Endowment for Peace which investigated war crimes during the Balkan wars of 1912-1913, they decided in 1994 to engage in a similar fact-finding mission: "As the Commission travelled the length and breadth of the Balkans during the second half of 1995 and the first half of 1996, its members were often struck by parallels between their impressions and the insights of the first Carnegie Commission of 1913-14.”¹³⁵ They wrote in the report of their investigation that in broad lines three historical explanations of the causes of the recent Balkan wars could be distinguished.

¹³² J. Zametica, The Yugoslav Conflict Adelphi Paper 270 (Summer 1992).

¹³³ See Cohen (1993).

¹³⁴ See K. Begic, Bosna i Hercegovina: of Vanceove misije do Daytonskog sporazuma, (Sarajevo, 1997).

The first explanation sees the present conflict as a continuation of the power struggle between foreign powers: the Habsburg and Ottoman Empires and czarist Russia. In the post-Cold War era, Germany, Turkey and Russia may be regarded as trying to create a new balance of power in the international system by increasing their own political influence in the Balkans. Since the outbreak of the war, the parties involved in the combat have made repeated attempts to blow new life into the old alliances with European countries: Croatia with Germany, Bosnians from Bosnia-Herzegovina with Turkey, Serbia with Russia. According to the authors, this explanation is a good example of the overestimation of the geopolitical significance of the Balkans for Europe.

The second is the historical explanation of the war, which is particularly popular in Europe. Here the eruption of violence in the former Yugoslavia is seen as a resurgence of the ‘centuries of hate’ between the peoples in question. This explanation suggests that the findings of the 1914 Commission can throw light on the recent crisis. The violence between the Balkan peoples in 1914 was ascribed to the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire, which was no longer able to control the conflicts between these peoples. It is suggested that the collapse of the Communist system led to the same consequences in 1990, causing the old ethnic conflicts to flare up again.

The third explanation, which according to the authors had many adherents both in the western world and in the Balkans, was that the war was the result of the existence of cultural and religious ‘fault lines’ running through the region. The American political scientist Samuel Huntington referred to this idea in 1993 as the ‘clash of civilizations’.¹³⁶

According to Huntington, the fault lines between the civilizations correspond to the differences between the religions, and the boundary between the three major civilizations in Europe runs right through the Balkans: “In the Balkan this line, of course coincides with the historic boundary between the Habsburg and Ottoman empires. The peoples to the north and west of this line are Protestant or Catholic; they shared the common experiences of European history - feudalism, the Renaissance, the Reformation, the Enlightenment, the French Revolution, the Industrial Revolution; they are generally economically better off than the peoples to the east; and they may now look forward to increasing involvement in a common European economy and to the consolidation of democratic political systems. The peoples to the east and south of this line are Orthodox or Muslim; they historically belonged to the Ottoman or Tsarist empires and were only lightly touched by shaping events in the rest of Europe; they are generally less advanced economically; they seem much less likely to develop stable democratic political systems.”¹³⁷ According to the current map of the Balkans, Slovenia and Croatia (which are mainly Catholic) may be regarded as belonging to the western civilization and Bosnia-Herzegovina to the Muslim, while Montenegro, Macedonia and large parts of Serbia belong to Orthodox Christian civilization which has its roots in the old Byzantine empire and is perhaps the one most commonly associated with the Balkans. In Unfinished Peace..., the authors state that the idea that the Yugoslav war was a ‘clash of civilizations’ is shared both in the Balkans and other countries.

Even before Huntington wrote his article, Slavenka Drakulic, a well known Croat commentator, had described the various dimensions of the conflict as a ‘clash of civilisations’ in a conversation with Robert Kaplan. Kaplan cites her in his book as follows: “Here (...) the battle between Communism and capitalism is merely one dimension of a struggle that pits Catholicism against Orthodoxy, Rome against Constantinople, the legacy of Habsburg Austria-Hungary against that of Ottoman Turkey - in other words, West against East, the ultimate historical and cultural conflict.”¹³⁸ Slovene and Croat politicians have repeatedly stated that they did not belong to ‘the Balkans’, but to western Christian civilization. The Croat president Franjo Tudjman put this into words as follows: “The Yugoslav experience showed ¹³⁵ L. Tindemans (ed.), Unfinished Peace: Report of the International Commission on the Balkans (Washington, 1996) 3.

¹³⁶ Samuel Huntington, ‘The Clash of Civilisations?’ Foreign Affairs, 72 (Summer 1993) 29-30.

¹³⁷ Ibid., 30.

¹³⁸ R. Kaplan, Balkan Ghosts: A Journey Through History (New York, 1993) 74.

that the cultural and geopolitical divides and constraints turned out to be decisive - so strong that the common state proved not viable. The current fault-line overlaps with those of the Roman Empire (Theodosian line) between Rome, Byzantium, and Islam, as well as with the region where this divide of civilisations is most palpable, Bosnia-Herzegovina, produced one of the most powerful crises of today."¹³⁹ A number of well known Serb intellectuals and artists, including the post-modern author Milorad Pavic, have contributed to the glorification of the Byzantine civilization which they consider to be superior to western civilization. At the same time, Serb politicians have stated that the fear of the return of Islam provided a key motivation in their policy regarding in the conflict about Bosnia-Herzegovina. Radovan Karadzic has said, for example, that the Serbs would never allow Turkey to return to the Balkans.¹⁴⁰ On the other hand the spiritual leader of the Bosnians, Reis-ul-ulema Mustafa Ceric, regarded the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina as a Crusade aimed at driving Islam from that part of Europe.¹⁴¹

6. Historical alliances and rivalries

An important aspect of the debate on the clash of civilizations in the Balkans was the revival of the historical and cultural links between the Balkan peoples and other countries. The involvement of the EU (or the EC, as it was then) as a mediator in the crisis between the Yugoslav republics led all parties to strengthen the old ties with the European great powers. Serbia claimed exclusive rights to friendship with Great Britain and France. The Croats expected support from Austria and Germany. There was even talk of a 'Balkanization' of Europe. Great Britain and France wanted to prevent the disintegration of Yugoslavia, which led to their policies being regarded as pro-Serb. Present-day political considerations were related to old geo-political alliances and friendships. After the proposal for a Yugoslav confederation had been turned down, Germany announced in the autumn of 1991 that it was prepared to recognize Slovenia and Croatia as independent states. This step was seen by many as a restoration of the Second-World-War alliance and as a result Germany was regarded as pro-Croat, even within the EU. This also led to the dramatic statement by the Yugoslav minister of Defence, Veljko Kadijevic, in the French Le Monde that Yugoslavia had been attacked by Germany for the third time this century.¹⁴²

At the same time, the rival political elites within Yugoslavia did not know how to interpret US policy with regard to the Yugoslav crisis, and in the early 1990s it was far from clear who was whose 'traditional ally'. One of the best known examples of the contradictory interpretations that can be given to a contemporary event concerns the visit of the American Secretary of State James Baker to Belgrade on 21 June 1991 - four days before the outbreak of war in Slovenia. It may be stated that the official American policy was to support the Yugoslav federal government of premier Ante Markovic, and America made diplomatic efforts to save the Yugoslav state from collapse. During his meeting with Markovic, Baker pointed out the consequences of the unilateral declaration of independence by Slovenia and Croatia: Yugoslavia's borders would be at risk and it would be necessary to deploy the federal army (JNA). This was later interpreted as giving the 'green light' for the military intervention of the JNA in Slovenia and Croatia. Baker himself, however, regarded his statement that America disapproved of any form of violence as his main message in this dialogue with the Yugoslavs.¹⁴³ The ¹³⁹ Tindemans (1996) 16.

¹⁴⁰ Ibid.

¹⁴¹ Ibid.

¹⁴² Ibid, 19.

¹⁴³ Baker explained in his memoirs that US policies were aimed at preservation of the Yugoslav state. While he disapproved of the Slovene and Croat desire for independence, he was also aware of the dangers of the Serb policies which aimed at achieving Serb domination under the pretence of furthering the preservation of the Yugoslav state. He warned Milosevic that Serbia would become an 'international pariah' if he continued to make claims on territories outside the boundaries of Serbia. See James Baker, Politics of Diplomacy, Revolution, War, Peace 1989-1992 (New York, 1995).

balance of opinion after the event was nevertheless that his visit had delivered 'mixed signals' and that each party could interpret the American diplomatic rhetoric in its own way. For example Stipe Mesic, the last Croatian representative in the federal presidium, cited Baker's farewell speech, in which he said that the US was against the disintegration of Yugoslavia, in his memoirs. Mesic regarded the US as an opponent of Croatia, on the basis of the principle that who is not for us is for our enemy.¹⁴⁴ The Croat commentator Tomislav Sunic similarly concluded that the American pro-Yugoslav stance was by definition regarded as anti-Croat in Croatia.¹⁴⁵ Most Serb politicians, on the other hand, were far from regarding American policies as pro-Serb or pro-Yugoslav. The Serb politician Borislav Jovic, the penultimate president of the federal presidium who had the reputation of carrying out Slobodan Milosevic's political plans, accused the US of pro-Slovene and pro-Croat policies in his book.¹⁴⁶ General Veljko Kadijevic, the Yugoslav minister of Defence in 1991, was even sharper in his criticism. He went so far as to write that American politicians had a well thought out plan to destroy Yugoslavia.¹⁴⁷

The international community, which was trying to play the role of a mediator in the Yugoslav crisis, was in this way made part of the crisis. All individual states were continually accused of bias, as were the individual negotiators who were exposed to all kinds of provocations and accusations.¹⁴⁸

After the outbreak of war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, new life was also blown into the old alliances based on religion: the north-western or Catholic alliance, the south-eastern or Orthodox alliance and the Green Transversal which united the Bosnian Muslims with the Muslims from Sandzak, Kosovo, Albania and Turkey.¹⁴⁹ Velikonja called such alliances 'hereditary alliances'. 'Hereditary' allies were supposed to protect their friends against their 'hereditary enemies'. The Croats look for such allies in the West, where they see themselves as belonging in a 'historical and cultural' sense. The Serbs look towards the Russians and Greeks, their brothers in Orthodoxy. This has led to the 'Bosnjaks' (Bosnian 'Muslim') had come to count on the support and empathy of their 'richer' co-religionists from near and far."¹⁵⁰ In other words, when conflicts arise with other countries, 'hereditary allies' should always back one another up, no matter whether they are directly involved in the conflict. For example, during the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina the Bosnian Muslims received support from Muslim countries in the Far and Near East, even though they had had hardly any contact with these countries in the past and despite the fact that these countries, with the exception of Turkey, had no geo-political interests in the Balkans. Not only the 'hereditary allies' but also the 'hereditary enemies or rivals' are an important factor in this equation, however. Velikonja describes the 'hereditary enemies' of the Serbs as follows: "The Serbs for example, consider the Pope to have been a permanent malignancy from time immemorial, even though the man who sat on the throne of St. Peter during the medieval period invariably collaborated with the Serbs. The second 'enemy' are the Muslims. 'Christian' Serbia and Montenegro try to present themselves as defenders of the faith against the 'Istanbul-Tirana-Sarajevo green crescent of Islam' and the 'Macedonia-Bulgaria-Romania-Albania-Bosnia axis of Turkish affinity'. (...) The third of Serbia's 'historical' enemies are the Germans together with their 'Drang nach Osten'

¹⁴⁴ See Stipe Mesic, Kako smo srusili Jugoslaviju (Zagreb, 1992).

¹⁴⁵ See Tomislav Sunic, Americka ideologija (Zagreb 1993).

¹⁴⁶ See Borislav Jovic, Komadanje Jugoslavije (Belgrade, 1992).

¹⁴⁷ See Veljko Kadijevic, Moje videnje raspada (Belgrade, 1993).

¹⁴⁸ The Canadian general Lewis McKenzie was accused of having visited Serb-controlled brothels. Thorsten Stoltenberg was regarded as a great friend of the Serbs since the time when he worked as a diplomat in Belgrade, and many authors wrote that he was unsuitable to be a negotiator because his children had been taught by their Serb nurse to say that they were Serbs too during that period. A great deal of malicious gossip about Carl Bildt also appeared in the media, including the completely fictitious story that he had had an affair with a Serb woman from Pale which had led to his divorce.

¹⁴⁹ Tindemans (1996) 21-22.

¹⁵⁰ Mitja Velikonja, 'Liberation Mythology, the Role of Mythology in Fanning War in the Balkans' in Paul Mojzes (ed.), Religion and the War in Bosnia (Atlanta, 1998) 40. See also the same author's book Masade duha: Razpotja Sodobnih Mitologij (Ljubljana, 1995).

(eastward push) project (not to mention Austrian-German ‘meddling’ in Serbia’s affairs which directly led to World War I).¹⁵¹

One of the main points of criticism of Huntington’s ‘clash of civilizations’ theory is the fact that most clashes actually take place within a single civilization. One of the most irreconcilable political conflicts of the 19th and 20th centuries in the Balkans was the rivalry between the two neighbouring Orthodox countries Bulgaria and Serbia, which led to a series of wars about competing claims to Macedonian territory. When the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia became independent in 1992, however, Bulgaria did not become involved. In the power struggle between the different ethnic groups within Yugoslavia in the 1980s and 1990s, power-political motives and geo-political interests were usually intentionally concealed. For example, the Serb political leaders never admitted that they wanted to found a state that would also include Serbs from other Yugoslav republics. They preferred the argument that it was (and is) impossible to co-exist with ‘hereditary’ enemies: the existence of Serb population groups in Kosovo, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina would be threatened by their Muslim and Catholic compatriots.¹⁵² There is however no proof of the existence of a Muslim alliance (the ‘Green Transversal’) in the Balkans. It is true that the Bosnian Muslims have close political ties with the Muslims from the Serb province of Sandzak – indeed, they consider themselves to be a single people. They have no political links with the Kosovars, however, and do not even speak the same language. Turkey was politically very active in the Balkans during the Yugoslav crisis; however, it supported not only Muslim Albania, Kosovo and Bosnia-Herzegovina but also Orthodox Macedonia.¹⁵³ Alija Izetbegovic did strengthen the political links with the Muslim countries that provided humanitarian aid and weapons during the war, but it was the support of the United States that was decisive in preserving Bosnia-Herzegovina as a sovereign state, and in ending the genocide of the Bosnian Muslims.

7. Hereditary alliances: Russia, Serbia and Montenegro

In particular Russia is recognized as Serbia’s historical ally. The American Russia specialist Paul Goble, who in 1996 wrote an interesting study of Russian policies in connection with the crisis in the former Yugoslavia, believes that the importance of the historical links between the Russians and the Serbs has been overestimated, and that both Russia and Serbia blew new life into the old idea of Slav brotherhood and solidarity for reasons of self-interest.¹⁵⁴ After the end of the Cold War, Russia had to secure a new place for itself in the international system and at the same time restore political authority at home, while Serbia was looking for political allies with reasonable standing in the international political world. Soviet politicians were initially worried about the comparisons that were regularly made between the Soviet Union and communist Yugoslavia, implying that the disintegration of the Soviet Union could also lead to a series of ‘Bosnias’ in its wake. The Croatian Russia specialist Radovan Vukadinovic concluded that the disintegration of Communism had made both Russia and Serbia considerably less powerful, and that the collapse of the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia had had adverse consequences for both the Russians and the Serbs because the new boundaries had been fixed in such a way that a large part of the Russian and Serbian population had been left outside their respective countries.¹⁵⁵ Goble pointed out however that the role of Russia in the Soviet Union differed appreciably from that of Serbia in the Yugoslav federation. This is certainly true if we consider the position of Russia in world politics after the fall of the Soviet Union as compared with that of Serbia after the disintegration of Yugoslavia. Goble went on to observe that both countries had their own ¹⁵¹ Ibid., 39.

¹⁵² ‘Memorandum SANU’ in Nase teme 33 (Zagreb, 1989) 128-163.

¹⁵³ Tindemans (1996) 31.

¹⁵⁴ Paul A. Goble, ‘Dangerous Liaisons: Moscow, the Former Yugoslavia, and the West’ in R. Ullman (ed.) Yugoslavia’s Wars (New York, 1996) 182-197.

¹⁵⁵ Radovan Vukadinovic, ‘Yugoslavia and the East: From Non-Alignment to Disintegration’ in J.G. Siccama and M. van den Heuvel (eds). Disintegration of Yugoslavia (Atlanta-Amsterdam, 1992) 156-163.

ideas about the nature of their political co-operation: “Regular contacts between Moscow and Belgrade seem to be enabling Russia to play the role of mediator between the West and Serbia as well to show to the opposition at home its international influence.(...) Unfortunately we can speak now not only about Moscow influencing Belgrade but also Belgrade and Pale influencing Moscow’s politicians for their own ends.”¹⁵⁶

According to the Russian historian Sergej Romanenko, the current Russian political involvement in the Balkans is based on Russia’s geo-political interests, as it always has been: “It considered the Balkans as an arena, and the national movements of the Balkans and their states as tools (means), for achieving Russia’s own political, military or economic goals. These interests sometimes contradicted, and sometimes partly coincided with the interest of the Balkan peoples.”¹⁵⁷

Initially, the Serbs and the Montenegrins in the 19th century sought – and received – support from Russia in their struggle against the Ottomans. When Serbia became an independent state in 1838, however, this ushered in a new phase in Russo-Serbian relations and the two countries became rivals. The Serbian minister of Foreign Affairs wrote in the notorious ‘Nacertanije’ that the formation of a strong Serbian state would lead to conflicts with Russia: “Great Serbia inevitably led to a conflict with Russia, because the entire Serbian political thought was based on non-acceptance of pan-Slavism and Russia’s leadership.”¹⁵⁸

The diplomatic involvement of Russia in the war in Bosnia-Hercegovina led to much debate among Russian historians and Balkans experts about the background of Russo-Serbian relations. During a conference on the history of the ‘slav idea’ held in Moscow in 1994, the historian Pavel Gracev stressed that the idea of Slav solidarity was not thought up by the Russians but arose among the Slav peoples living under Ottoman and Habsburg domination.¹⁵⁹ The 17th- century Croatian thinker Juraj Krizanic was the first to ask the Russian Czar for support for the Slavs in the Balkans. A small group of Russian intellectuals founded the pan-Slavist movement in 1858. They saw the political future of Russia in an alliance with other Slav peoples who shared the same Orthodox Christian belief, i.e. the Bulgarians, Serbs and Montenegrins. It was not until the 1870s that pan-Slavist ideas found official recognition in Russian foreign policy. When Serbia and Montenegro declared war on the Ottomans in 1876, these two countries got a lot of support from Russian public opinion. Russian volunteers travelled to the Balkans to join the fight. The Russian involvement in the war had little to do with political idealism, however, and much to do with Russian political ambitions in the Balkans. The protection of the Slav population offered a plausible basis for Russian power politics.¹⁶⁰ In line with this, most historians regard the period between 1878 and 1903 as a low point in Russo-Serbian relations. Despite the pan-Slavist rhetoric, Russia did not support Serbia during the peace negotiations in San Stefano (1878) but preferred the formation of a Bulgarian state. When the peace negotiations were continued during the Congress of Berlin, Russia allowed Bosnia-Hercegovina to be made an Austro-Hungarian protectorate – to the great frustration of the Serb politicians. In fact, the Serbian Obrenovic dynasty maintained close relations with Austro-Hungary in this period. It was not until 1903 that King Petar Karadjordjevic restored the good relations with Russia. When Russia stood up for Serbia in 1914, thus taking part in the First World War, a number of prominent Russian politicians and intellectuals openly expressed their doubts about this decision. Sergej Witte put his anger at the Russian involvement in the war into words as follows: “This war is idiocy! Why should Russia fight? To maintain our prestige in the Balkans, because of our holy duty to help our blood brothers? That is a romantic, old-fashioned delusion. No one here – no one of any intelligence at least – cares a tinker’s ¹⁵⁶ Goble cites the daily Kommersant (29 June, 1995) here; see Goble (1996) 182.

¹⁵⁷ Sergej Romanenko, ‘Russia in the Balkans: Eternal Allies or Eternal Interests’ in Balkan Forum (September 1996) 32.

¹⁵⁸ Ibid., 34.

¹⁵⁹ V.P. Gracev, ‘Ideja Slavjanskoi vzaimnosti...’, in V.A. Djakov (ed.) Slavjanskaja ideja: isstorija i sovremennost (Moscow, 1998) 37-39.

¹⁶⁰ See e.g. M.B. Petrovich, Emergence of the Russian Panslavism, 1856-1870 (New York, 1956). D. MacKenzie, Serbs and Russian Panslavism (New York, 1967).

cuss for those excitable, vain Balkan folk, the Serbs, who don't even have a drop of Slav blood in their veins but are simply Turks christened under a false name. We should let the Serbs undergo the punishment they so richly deserve."¹⁶¹

Serbia lost the support of Russia through the outbreak of the revolution in 1917 and the separate peace Russia made with Germany in 1918. This was one of the factors that forced Serbia to give up the hope of the formation of a Greater Serbia and to acquiesce in the formation of a joint South-Slav state. The Russian historian Romanenko writes, however, that czarist Russia was never in favour of the union of the South Slav peoples in a single state. The Russian politicians were afraid that the new state would not maintain a pro-Russian foreign policy. Moreover, a great Slav state in the Balkans would be a direct rival of Russia.¹⁶²

The relations between the Soviet Union and the kingdom of Yugoslavia were far from good. Yugoslavia was the last Balkan country to recognize the Soviet Union officially, which it did in 1940. According to the historians A.N. Gorjainov and E.P. Aksenova, the Russian Communists initially went so far as to consider 'slavic studies' socially and scientifically unacceptable, since in their eyes they made no contribution to the class struggle.¹⁶³ They were moreover extremely critical of the role of Serbia in the kingdom of Yugoslavia. The Soviet Union openly criticized Serb oppression of other nationalities in the kingdom of Yugoslavia in the 1920s. "During the inter-war period, and especially in the 1920s, the SKP(b) and the USSR took advantage of the national movements of the Yugoslavs against the Serbian monarchy, which had granted asylum to many Russian emigres and to the Orthodox Church, as well as against the Versailles system. Centralist Yugoslavia, based on the foundations of Serbian statehood, followed a clear anti-Soviet policy."¹⁶⁴

The historiography concerning the relations between the Soviet Union and Communist Yugoslavia also deals with the break between Tito and Stalin in 1948. Relations were restored after Stalin's death, but Tito continued to steer an independent course. Belgrade expressed disapproval of the Soviet Union's interventionist foreign policy in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Cambodia and Afghanistan, because the Yugoslav Communists feared Soviet intervention in Yugoslavia. The Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev paid an official visit to Yugoslavia in 1989, to normalize relations between the two countries. In Yugoslavia, Death of a Nation, L. Silber and A. Little describe in detail how Serbia sought support from abroad during the late 1980s in the struggle for the preservation of Yugoslavia. When the Western European countries were not prepared to give such support, Yugoslav and Serb diplomacy turned to the Soviet Union (still in existence at this time). In March 1991, on the eve of the disintegration of Yugoslavia, General Veljko Kadijevic (still the Yugoslav minister of Defence) travelled to the Soviet Union to discuss the Yugoslav crisis with his colleague Dimitri Jazov. Word would later leak out about Karijevic's mysterious trip to Moscow. Kadijevic came back believing that President Mikhail Gorbachev would not last long and that, if they could hold out just a bit longer Communism would be shored up in the Soviet Union which, in turn, would save them."¹⁶⁵

A coup d'état aimed at toppling president Gorbachev did indeed take place in August 1991. This was openly welcomed by the political and military leaders in Belgrade, since they hoped that the new Soviet rulers would support the Serb policy of a centralized Yugoslav state. However, when Boris Yeltsin subsequently became president of Russia he approved the independence of the Baltic states, thus giving the starting signal for the rapid and largely non-violent crumbling of the old Communist empire. Yeltsin's subsequent pro-western foreign policy was a great disappointment to the Yugoslav and Serbian Communists.

¹⁶¹ Elisabeth Hersh, Verraad, Lafheid en Bedrog - leven en dood van de laatste tsaar [Betrayal, Cowardice and Deceit – The Life and Death of the last Czar; in Dutch] (Amsterdam, 1992) 186-187.

¹⁶² Romanenko (1996) 35.

¹⁶³ See V.A. Djakov (ed.) Slavjanskaja ideja: isstorija i sovremennost (Moscow, 1998).

¹⁶⁴ Ibid., 37.

¹⁶⁵ L. Silber and A. Little, Yugoslavia, Death of a Nation (Hammerworth, 1997) 127.

The Russian expert on the Balkans Pavel Kandel writes that the disintegration of Yugoslavia was seen in Communist hardliner and Russian nationalist circles as a dangerous precedent for a possible fragmentation of Russia itself.¹⁶⁶ The Russian parliament made repeated pleas for a 'pan-Slavist' approach in Russian foreign policy towards the Balkans, which implied support for the Orthodox Serbs and Montenegrins. The Russian Communists and nationalists were supported in their struggle for a pro-Serb policy by an influential group of intellectuals, including a number of staff members of the Institute for Slavist and Balkan Studies of the Russian Academy of Arts and Sciences. For example the Balkan specialist Elena Guskova, who has been the head of the department for study of the Yugoslav crisis since that crisis broke out, has written a series of publications defending Serb policies.¹⁶⁷

The differences of opinion about Balkan policy in Russian politics and public opinion are by no means unique, however. As Goble has pointed out, governments and public opinion in the West also show internal divisions concerning just about every aspect of the recent wars in the former Yugoslavia.

8. Traditional geo-political alliances: England, France, Germany

Apart from 'hereditary alliances and rivalries', commentators in this field often speak of 'traditional political friendships and rivalries'. The term 'traditional' implies the continued existence of long-term historical relations between various states or peoples. The question is what forms the basis for such alliances and rivalries. Apart from the above-mentioned religious basis for some alliances, it goes without saying that geo-political interests played an important role. From a geo-political viewpoint, the fate of the South Slav peoples since the 19th century has been closely linked to international political developments. International relations in the 19th century were characterized by varying political and military alliances, which often had little to do with religious or ideological affinities. The peoples of the Balkans found themselves in the middle of a great power struggle about the 'Eastern Question', which Barbara Jelavich describes as follows: "The whole cluster of issues surrounding the decline of the Ottoman Empire, the revolt of the subject people, and the European intervention became known as the Eastern Question. This problem was to become the single most important cause for diplomatic controversy among the powers and was to lead to the only two general wars in the century after the Congress of Vienna - the Crimean War and World War I."¹⁶⁸

The geo-political and hereditary criteria for the definition of traditional alliances are conveniently mixed up in Serb collective memory. Alongside Russia as an important Orthodox power, the Serbs often count western countries such as France and England among their traditional allies. The Serbs see themselves as the defenders of European Christendom during the many centuries of Ottoman domination – even though Serbia did not start to become integrated into European politics until the 19th century. Serbia has steered a highly variable and unpredictable course in its relations with the European great powers. Velikonja gives a number of examples which could serve as evidence of a traditional friendship between Serbia, Austro-Hungary and Germany: the Austrian army supported the Serbs in 1691 and 1739 in their struggle against the Ottoman Empire; Austro-Hungary was the main political ally of the Obrenovic kings in the 19th century, in 1917, the Serb government in exile tried to sign a separate peace agreement with the Central Powers; and during the Second World War there was a Serb Nazi satellite state led by General Milan Nedic.¹⁶⁹ Philip Cohen mentions the Serb historical revisionism about the Second World War which was intended to conceal Serb collaboration with the Nazis while Nedic had worked so hard in the service of the holocaust that there were hardly any Jews left in Serbia in 1942.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁶ See e.g. the contributions of Pavel Kandel and Sergej Romanenko in Rossija na Balkanax (Moscow, 1996).

¹⁶⁷ See Elena Guskova, Jugoslovenska kriza i Rusija (Belgrade, 1996). Uregulirovanie na Balkanax: ot Brioni do Deitona - mirnye plany 1991-1995 gg. (Moscow, 1997). Jugoslavskii krizis i Rossija (Moscow, 1993).

¹⁶⁸ Barbara Jelavich, History of the Balkan: Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, (1 vol.) (Cambridge, 1983) 186.

¹⁶⁹ Cohen (1996) 39.

¹⁷⁰ Ibid., 63-84.

The alliance between Serbia and France was geo-political in nature. France's 'historical links' with Serbia go back to the First World War. France was one of the countries that had supported the formation of the Yugoslav state. French politicians saw Serbia as the most important political factor in Yugoslavia, and when France started to play a important role in the Balkans in the interbellum years it supported the centralist regime in Belgrade and regarded Croatia as troublesome and unreliable because Croat politicians, including Stjepan Radic, had been campaigning abroad since 1918 for the federalization of Yugoslavia while French diplomacy clearly favoured a centralized Yugoslavia. Relations between France and Serbia were particularly close during the personal dictatorship of the French-speaking king Aleksandar Karadjordjevic, but the assassination of king Aleksandar in Marseille in 1934 led to a marked change in Franco-Yugoslav relations. The regent Pavle, one of Aleksandar's brothers, was pro-British while the Serbian government under Milan Stojadinovic sympathized with Nazi Germany. The Second World War put an end to Serbian diplomacy, and after the war France maintained fairly good relations with the Communist regime in Yugoslavia. It is questionable whether one can speak of a 'traditional alliance' between Serbia and France on the basis of such short-lived and unstable relations, and it may further be asked what arguments there are for calling French policy with respect to the wars in the former Yugoslavia pro-Serb. It is true that the French were regularly accused of being pro-Serb during the war in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina because they were against the recognition of Croatia, the ending of the UN weapons embargo for Bosnia-Herzegovina in order to give the Bosnians the chance of defending themselves, and military intervention to end the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Nevertheless, François Mitterrand did pay a symbolic visit to Sarajevo under siege in June 1992 – right on the Serbian national holiday, Saint Vitus Day. This led to the reopening of Sarajevo airport, permitting the supply of humanitarian aid to the war zone to start up again. French policies were mainly the result of their own national agenda, in which reinforcement of France's role in European politics played an important part. France was concerned about the political influence of a united Germany in post-Communist Europe; this consideration made it support an independent European security policy for Yugoslavia, free from NATO and US control.¹⁷¹ The tendency of some French officers in Bosnia-Herzegovina to accuse all parties of crimes against the civilian population ('symmetry of blame') changed in 1995, however, when the Bosnian Serbs also took French UN troops hostage. This even led to a radical swing in French policy as regards a possible military intervention. There was no longer any trace of the 'traditional alliance' between France and Serbia: France supported the American initiatives, and the Dayton Agreement was signed in Paris.

Similar questions may be asked about the background of the 'traditional alliance' between Great Britain and Serbia and the influence of this on British policy towards Yugoslavia. It has been claimed that the political links between Serbia and Great Britain from the First and Second World Wars laid the basis for a 'historical friendship'. The fact that British policies in Yugoslavia during the Second World War made it possible for the Communists to seize power and prevented the return of the Serbian king to Belgrade are apparently disregarded as unimportant in this connection. British foreign policy during the Yugoslav crisis of the 1990s was regarded as pro-Serbian because the British government was against military intervention and 'imposed' solutions. In fact, it was the Bosnian Serbs who were determined not to accept a compromise: in view of their military superiority, they thought they were in a position to dictate the future of the Bosnian state. The question was therefore whether John Major's government was against military intervention in the Bosnian conflict because of Britain's historical friendship with Serbia (i.e. because they wanted the Serbs to win) or because British policy was based on an incorrect assessment of the nature of the conflict and underestimation of the consequences of the war for the civilian population. There is little reason to believe that John Major's view of Britain's 'historical friendships' in the Balkans would differ substantially from those of his predecessor Margaret Thatcher, who was decidedly in favour of military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina to put an end to Serbian aggression.

¹⁷¹ Tindemans (1996) 61.

9. A historical conflict

The foreign politicians, military personnel and diplomats who came to Yugoslavia after the outbreak of the war as observers and mediators were regularly confronted with emotional and mutually contradictory stories about the background of the war. The reply to each question about the conflict usually involved long stories about what terrible wrongs the one ethnic group had done to the other at some time in the past. This sometimes gave foreign diplomats the impression that the roots of each problem went right back to the dawn of history.¹⁷² Historical tales were even served up at the negotiating table. During the first peace conference on Yugoslavia in the autumn of 1991 in the Peace Palace in The Hague, the Serbian president Milosevic reminded the delegates of the crimes committed against Serbs in the Second World War in order to show that the Serbian population could not expect decent treatment at the hands of an independent Croatian state. He clearly believed that such arguments could help to prevent the recognition of Croatia as an independent state. During the negotiations, the representatives of each ethnic group told long stories about the tragic fate that ethnic group had suffered in the past. Foreign diplomats, military and journalists were expected to react appropriately to such stories and to display a greater understanding of the speaker's political standpoint. Before negotiating with a delegation of Bosnian Serbs, the American mediator Richard Holbrooke therefore told the Serbian president Milosevic that no references to history should be made during the discussions.¹⁷³ He refused to attach any special significance to the 'historical' arguments that were regularly used by the nationalist politicians to influence the current political situation, because they made it difficult to reach any reasonable practical solution. The Bosnian Serbs wished to live apart from the Muslim and Catholic inhabitants of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which led them to lay claim to more than 70% of Bosnian territory. It appeared in the final analysis that their historical arguments only served as a means of winning the conflict. Mitja Velikonja tried to explain this remarkable way of dealing with history from an anthropological perspective: "Any research into history of collective conceptions must always include both an historical and sociological perspective. Whilst the former reveals the sequence of occurrences, the latter reveals their position in the stormy firmament of social conception and the ways in which authority repeatedly tries to manipulate them. Accepted historical facts are not indispensable, necessary, or even important in the construction of social conceptions. The function of society "is possible" merely if it believes in its own story, and to do that it isn't even necessary for it to be familiar with that story."¹⁷⁴

The politicians from the former Yugoslavia also used their history, the unpronounceable names and the topographic concepts as a means of gaining an intellectual edge on the foreign mediators. It regularly happened that foreign mediators who did not have a good knowledge of the history of the region were not taken seriously: "How can they command our respect and guide our negotiations if they don't know what they are talking about?" and "he can't even point to our country on a map!"¹⁷⁵ At the same time, the foreign partners in the discussions who did have some factual knowledge of the history of the South Slav peoples were often discouraged by such remarks as: "You can't learn our history from the history books, you need to be one of us to understand it!" The Dutch anthropologist Mattijs van de Port, who was carrying out an investigation in Novi Sad (Vojvodina) when war broke out in 1991, has had personal experience of such attitudes: "You don't know our history'. I don't know how many times I heard this remark. Sometimes it was whispered with fatigue, sometimes hurled at me

¹⁷² The Dutch diplomat Marco Hennis, who was involved in the first peace negotiations in the former Yugoslavia, stated that it initially looked as if all conflicts there started 'round about the time of the birth of Christ'.

¹⁷³ '(...) they must not give us a lot of historical bullshit, as they have with everyone else. They must be ready for serious discussion.' In: How End a War (New York, 1998) 148.

¹⁷⁴ Velikonja (1998) 20.

¹⁷⁵ See e.g. the interview with the former American ambassador to Croatia, Peter Galbraith, in the Croatian weekly Globus (18 December 1998: 31). He referred to a remark by the Croatian politician Ivic Pasalic describing the American senator Paul Simon, the leader of the OVSE observers at the Croatian elections at that time, as someone who would not be able to point to Croatia on a map.

in a quarrelous tone of voice. 'You don't know our history' would usually follow a news report saying that some figure of international standing or some human rights committee had once more read Serbia a lecture about its misbehaviour in the war zones or its violation of the rules of diplomacy and international communication. Sometimes it would follow a remark from me that, according to my informant, was too critical. 'What do you know? You don't know our history!' (...) Don't bother, is what the phrase seemed to imply, you are not going to find out, for if you really want to find out what our history is all about, learning our language, reading our books or knowing the facts doesn't suffice."¹⁷⁶

The question as to whether the recent war was due to age-old disagreements was highlighted by the appearance of Balkan Ghosts: A Journey Through History by Robert Kaplan. In this book, Kaplan offered a fairly obvious but rather over-simplified explanation of the causes of the ethnic violence in the former Yugoslavia by describing it as a prolonged conflict that was incomprehensible to outsiders and that had its roots in an equally incomprehensible past. One of the main participants in the Yugoslav conflict, Radovan Karadzic, the leader of the Bosnian Serbs during the recent war, appeared to share this view. He claimed that Serbs find it impossible on the basis of past experience to co-exist with other ethnic groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina: "Mr. Karadjic, mingling historical and biological determinism wants us to believe that history has created two very different Serbo-Croatian speaking animals - sort of a Balkan version of natural selection - and that the world is foolishly 'trying to put cats and dogs in the same box'."¹⁷⁷

Another important aspect of the discussions on the relationship between history and the current conflict was the debate about the utility of drawing parallels between the past and the present in order to permit a better understanding of the background of the war. The core of this debate was that while comparisons with the past might be enlightening, they were not considered to be 'politically correct' if they confirmed stereotype images of the Balkans as being 'non-European' and 'violent'. The British author Tim Judah put this dilemma into words as follows: "It is unfashionable to link the past and the present when writing about the wars in the former Yugoslavia. One stands the risk of being accused of implying that somehow the peoples of the former Yugoslavia are more predisposed to war than anyone else in Europe or that they went to war because they were led into it by their leaders. But these leaders drew on the malign threads of their people's history to bind them and pull them into war. If Serbian history had been different, today's generations could not have been manipulated in the same way. In the most obvious case, there might have been no Serbs in Croatia or Bosnia."¹⁷⁸

The American historian H. R. Friman describes how links are established between history and the present, and distinguishes two approaches which he calls 'throwback' and 'blowback'. "Throwback approaches seek explanatory parallels in the past. This selective use of history argues for interpreting current events as the latest manifestation of past dynamics. In contrast, blowback approaches seek to explain current dynamics as the result, often unintended, of past policies. As in the case of throwback arguments, this approach relies on the selective and simplistic use of history."¹⁷⁹ Friman cites as the best example of blowback argumentation the analysis in which links are laid between the recent conflict and the long-term 'ethnic hate' between the peoples concerned, and summarizes this argument as follows: "The war in the former Yugoslavia, the extent of violence between Serbs, Croats, and Muslims, the ethnic-cleansing, rapes, and camps, therefore, all stem from a long, continuous history of atrocity and counter-atrocity in the region."¹⁸⁰

¹⁷⁶ Mattijs van de Port, Gypsies, 'It takes a Serb to Know a Serb: uncovering the roots of obstinate otherness in Serbia' in Imagining the Balkans Press Now Reader 13 January 1999). See also the same author's Wars & Other Instances of the Wild (Amsterdam, 1998) 97-98.

¹⁷⁷ G. Walters, 'The Future of History in the Balkans', in Thomas and Friman (eds.) (1996) 3.

¹⁷⁸ Tim Judah, The Serbs, History, Myths & the Destruction of Yugoslavia (New Haven, 1997) xi.

¹⁷⁹ Thomas and Friman (1996) 3-4.

¹⁸⁰ Ibid., 4.

The history of the South Slav peoples and in particular that of Yugoslavia is indeed often described as an endless succession of violent incidents and ethnic conflicts. It is true that the South Slav peoples did provide several items of world news during the 20th century involving wars and spectacular political assassinations: the assassination of the last Serbian king from the royal house of Obrenovic (1903), the Balkan wars (1912-1913), the assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand, the successor to the Habsburg throne, in Sarajevo (1914), the assassination of the Croatian political leader Stjepan Radic in the Yugoslav parliament (1928), that of the Serbian king Aleksandar Karadjordjevic during an official state visit to France (1934), and two civil wars (1941-1945 and 1991-1995).

Not all authors regard South Slav history as particularly violent, however. Janusz Bugajski plays down the long history of ethnic conflicts in the Balkans by pointing out that class conflicts and agrarian disputes were also important.¹⁸¹ Thomas plays down both the intensity and the frequency of violence in the Balkans: "The history of the Balkans is not one of prolonged and enduring conflict among Serbs, Croats and Slav Muslims. Before the creation of the kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in 1918, there was little conflict among these groups. Certainly, conflict among these groups in the centuries before 1918 was not much greater than in similar regional conditions elsewhere. Oppression of the poor Serb peasants by more privileged Slav Muslims, who tried to be 'more Turkish than the Turks', did not lead to extensive bloody conflict. Since the Serbs fell under the Ottoman Empire and the Croats under Austro-Hungarian empires, the two communities were largely separated through much of their recorded history. Even when the Serbs were brought in to settle the Krajina region of the Austro-Hungarian lands, their role was to defend Austrian-controlled territory from encroaching Turks, not to fight Croats."¹⁸²

The references to violent incidents from the past did however influence international politics, especially through the 'sarajevo metaphor'. Sarajevo achieved international fame in 1914 as the site of the assassination of Franz Ferdinand, the successor to the Habsburg throne, by a Serb nationalist which eventually led to the First World War. Since that time, this event in Sarajevo is regarded as a warning that a conflict at the periphery of Europe can have fatal consequences for European security.¹⁸³ Translated into political terms, this fear of escalation of the Yugoslav crisis initially led to a containment policy: the conflict had to be isolated to prevent it from spreading to neighbouring countries.

Though it is generally agreed that a knowledge of history is important for a proper understanding of the background to the Yugoslav conflict, it is very difficult to explain the wars solely on the basis of historical analogies without taking the recent power struggle between the political elites into account. It is clear, however, that the various parties have (mis)used history to justify their aggressive policies towards other ethnic groups and to cloak the real political objectives – which generally involved boundary changes at the expense of their neighbours.

10. Montenegro, Macedonia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and the disintegration of Yugoslavia

It is paradoxical that the peoples who had nothing to say about the formation of the Yugoslav state in 1918 later came to regard it as the best solution to their own national questions. There is ultimately a feeling of regret that Yugoslavia ceased to exist in 1991.

¹⁸¹ J. Bugajski, Balkan Myths and Bosnian Massacres in Thomas and Friman (1996) 121-122.

¹⁸² R. Thomas (1996) 22.

¹⁸³ See e.g. Jacques Rupnik (ed.), De Sarajevo á Sarajevo: L'échec yugoslave, (Brussels, 1992). Charles Gati, 'From Sarajevo to Sarajevo', Foreign Affairs, Fall 1992, pp. 64-78. In the Netherlands, the article 'Europa wentelt zich in zijn Sarajevo-complex' (Europe wallows in its Sarajevo complex), by Alfred Pijpers led to a heated debate about the utility of repeated references to the image of Sarajevo in European history in connection with the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina from 1992 to 1995. See also H.J.A. Hofland 'Het Sarajevo-complex' (The Sarajevo complex), NRC Handelsblad (22 March 1995) and H.L. Wesseling 'sarajevo-complex', NRC Handelsblad (30 March 1995).

The Pax Jugoslavica had kept a number of 'explosive' Balkan conflicts under wraps for half a century. It was clear that little Montenegro would have great difficulty continuing to exist as an independent state after the disintegration of Yugoslavia: it was afraid of being swallowed up by Serbia. Bosnia-Herzegovina was regarded as a miniature Yugoslavia and it was generally believed that the disintegration of Yugoslavia would inevitably cause it to crumble too, with the result that the Bosnians would lose their right to self-determination. It was further feared that making Macedonia independent would revive the old territorial claims of the neighbouring states, which had already gone to war with one another in the past about Macedonian territory.

Since the Montenegrins, Macedonians and Bosnians had not defined their national identity until the 20th century, they lagged a long way behind the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in the development of their national awareness. This is reflected in what James Gow calls the 'uncharted territories' in their historiography. He puts Slovenia, about which there is still relatively little historical literature, in the same class.¹⁸⁴

