The ball was set rolling when the newspaper De Volkskrant reported on 26 July 1995 that Dutchbat Commander Th. Karremans and the Commander of the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs, R. Mladic, had signed an agreement on 12 July 1995 about the evacuation of refugees from Potocari.²⁴⁹³ De Volkskrant went on to say that Karremans had conceded to Mladic's demand that the Bosnian Serbs would be permitted to subject men of able-bodied age to a 'debrief'. The current affairs programme Nova also featured this item that evening. The next day De Volkskrant presented a follow-up article containing a spectrum of opinion as to whether or not Karremans had been right to accept this agreement.²⁴⁹⁴ The controversy surrounding the agreement prompted Minister Voorhoeve on 27 July to write a letter to Parliament and also to hold a press conference. In the letter to Parliament and during the press conference Voorhoeve was adamant that the Dutchbat commander had not signed any document whatsoever. One day later, on 28 July, Voorhoeve was informed by Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff M. Schouten and Head of the Directorate General of Policy Matters J.H.M. de Winter that a statement that had already been signed on 17 July by Major R.A. Franken had come to light. The next day the newspaper NRC Handelsblad revealed the discovery in a critical article²⁴⁹⁵ and things snowballed from there. For over a week, it was the hot topic in the press.²⁴⁹⁶ The reporters almost instantly latched on to the fact that Voorhoeve had apparently been in the dark; the actual statement provoked much less controversy. On 4 August Voorhoeve called De Winter and instructed him to find out why the statement had been brought to his attention so late in the day. The inquiry was conducted in collaboration with the Defence Crisis Management Centre.²⁴⁹⁷ The following reconstruction is largely based on the results of the inquiry that De Winter and his staff started up on 4 August.

The statement of 17 July was a document that had been signed by representatives of the Muslim population and the Bosnian Serbs on the compound in Potocari. It was the written confirmation that the Bosnian Serbs wanted in order to prove that the evacuation of the refugees from Potocari as arranged in the so-called 'agreement of 12 July 1995' had been effected without any problems. The third signatory was the Deputy Battalion Commander of Dutchbat III, Franken, who, against the will of the Bosnians, had inserted a restriction. After the statement had been signed, it was put to one side for the time being.²⁴⁹⁸

Following a talk that Dutchbat Commander Karremans had on 18 July with Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army A.P.P.M. van Baal about the safety of the local personnel who were employed by Dutchbat and who were to travel with them to Zagreb, a letter was sent to Van Baal at 10:50am. This letter described the transfer of the local personnel and referred to the statement that was enclosed as an addendum. Van Baal sent the documents on to the head of the Legal Affairs Section, Colonel A.C. Zuidema, so that he could deal with them. In his absence the documents finally ended up on the desk of Lieutenant Colonel K.R. Lo Fo Wong, the Deputy Head of the Bureau of Constitutional, Public Administrative and International Law. He decided that the transfer of local personnel was a UN matter and that no action was necessary on the part of the Ministry of Defence or the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Lo Fo Wong consulted with Lieutenant Colonel J.A.C. de Ruiter of the UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo. They decided that De Ruiter would take the transfer of the personnel upon himself. Lo Fo Wong finalized the matter administratively by sending an internal memorandum to the acting Deputy Head of Operations at the Army Crisis Staff, Colonel P.H. Smeets. In the afternoon Lo Fo Wong once again personally talked through the handing over of the personnel with Pollé. The memo said nothing about the statement and they did not raise the issue either.

After the current affairs programme Nova on 26 July and the article in De Volkskrant on 27 July, the personnel at the Central Organization found that nothing was known there about the agreement. Consequently the Defence Crisis Management Centre and S. Reyn of the Directorate of General Policy Matters contacted the Deputy Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Colonel P.H. Smeets. He too had no knowledge of the matter.

Meanwhile the reports about the agreement had prompted others to look elsewhere. On the morning of 27 July the head of the International and Legal Policy Affairs Department, G.F.J. van Hegelsom, instructed his assistant B. van Lent to make enquiries about the existence of such an agreement. Van Lent also phoned Lo Fo Wong who said he knew nothing about an agreement between Karremans and Mladic concerning the evacuation of refugees. That same afternoon however, Lo Fo Wong rang back to say that he had found a statement from a representative of the civilian population about the way in which the population had been evacuated. This statement had reportedly been signed on 17 July in the presence of a representative of UNPROFOR, the Deputy Commander of Dutchbat, Major R.A. Franken. Lo Fo Wong offered to the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Army Crisis Staff, Col. B. Dedden, and Colonel Smeets, to make further enquiries about other documents. At Van Lent's request he faxed the statement shortly afterwards to the Legal Affairs Department. Around four o'clock Lo Fo Wong spoke to Dedden and Smeets on the phone, telling them about the statement and the request from the Legal Affairs Department to send it to them. No further documents were known at the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff incidentally.

At 4:20 pm Smeets called the head of Operational Affairs of the Defence Staff, Colonel R.S. van Dam, who attended Voorhoeve's press conference to inform him of the statements and the fax to the Legal Affairs Department. After Van Dam had called Van Lent, the latter immediately rushed to the press room at the Ministry where he gave the fax to Van Dam, Reyn and Commander P.P. Metzelaar. But it never reached Voorhoeve's hands during the press conference. This compounded the Minister's loss of face. De Winter had asked Karremans about the existence of the statement just before the start of the press conference but he had answered in the negative.²⁴⁹⁹ After the press conference the statement ended up in the hands of the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff M. Schouten and the Director of General Policy Matters De Winter. They, however, did not tell the Minister about the statement until the next day. The Minister only sent the statement with comments to Parliament on 3 August. In the covering letter, containing 31 pages, Voorhoeve also mentioned several matters that had emerged during the operational debriefing in Zagreb. As described in Part IV Chapter 7, Parliament was not satisfied with the information that Voorhoeve had given them.

The reconstruction makes it clear that a serious error of judgement was made here after the statement rolled from the fax at the Netherlands Army Headquarters in The Hague. In this case nothing went wrong with the communication. The statement had been sent into the 'line' and was read by several military officers who were extremely familiar with the Srebrenica problem. In this case no one had the slightest inkling of how media-sensitive this issue was. On 15 August Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Van Baal was confronted at the office of Deputy Secretary-General H.H. Hulshof with the results of De Winter's enquiries. Again Van Baal said that he: 'had judged the statement in the first place as a document indicating that Mr Mandzic had fulfilled a certain formal role as representative of the refugees around the Potocari compound'.²⁵⁰⁰ Van Baal also again came to the conclusion that: '...the document is no more than a factual report of the events on 12 and

13 July, drawn up retrospectively (on 17 July), which in the light of the task of UNPROFOR is without significance'.²⁵⁰¹

The criticism in political circles and the media continued to focus on how the statement had been handled at the Ministry of Defence. In this sense there was a connection between this issue and the series of incidents that made the headlines after Zagreb. It prompted Voorhoeve to publicly announce measures designed to achieve more centralized coordination of the peacekeeping operations.²⁵⁰² How this was to be given shape was only unveiled in a long letter from the Minister of Defence to Parliament on 20 October 1995.²⁵⁰³ Before then however several other incidents would occur to underline even more forcibly that strong measures were imperative.

3. The list of 239

On 26 August 1995 De Haagsche Courant and De Volkskrant featured two articles mentioning a list of 239 Muslim men that had suddenly surfaced at the UN in Zagreb. Both articles claimed that the existence of the list had surprised the Minister of Defence. A feverish weeklong search had been undertaken to find it in The Hague, Tuzla and Zagreb.²⁵⁰⁴

The 'list of 239' was drawn up on 13 July 1995 in Potocari. It was an initiative of the Deputy Commander of Dutchbat, Major R.A. Franken. Until the very last moment there was talk of Muslim men being evacuated by UNHCR or the ICRC. When it became clear that Mladic would not allow this, two refugee representatives feared the worst. Franken thought he could give the able-bodied male refugees who were still there at least some guarantee of survival by putting them on a list. It was basically a concession to the fears of two refugee representatives. The idea of making a list of names had incidentally been raised before and it was not unusual to do this at international organizations. However, not all men wanted their name on the list because they were anxious about what would be done with it; they feared it would fall into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs. It eventually turned out that the list did not contain 239 but 251 names of refugees. When the list was ready, it was signed by Franken and sent to various addressees in Bosnia and the Netherlands. The Netherlands Army Headquarters also received a copy.²⁵⁰⁵ A reconstruction of what happened to the list after it was signed is given below. A memo describing the search for the list at the Ministry of Defence provides the basis for the reconstruction. This memo was prepared for the Minister by the Directorate of General Policy Matters.²⁵⁰⁶

Earlier on the 16th of August, Karremans had pointed to the existence of the list during a conversation with Commodore C.G.J. Hilderink of the Defence Crisis Management Centre, Colonel R. van Dam, Head of Operations of the Defence Staff, S.J.G. Reyn and F.J.J. Princen of the Directorate of General Policy Matters and Colonel B. Dedden of the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. At the time he said that he had sent the list to the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. The report made of the conversation with Karremans had also been given to Voorhoeve. On 20 August Voorhoeve sent a hand-written memo to the Head of the Directorate of General Policy Matters and the Chief of Defence Staff, asking what had happened to the men mentioned on the list and what had happened with the list.

Meanwhile Dedden who worked at the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had no recollection of ever having seen such a list. But he promised to look into the matter. Dedden was subsequently able to inform Van Dam on 18 August that a list of 239 names had in fact been received at the Army Crisis Staff and that several members of staff had seen it at the time. Dedden then also remembered having seen the list himself. As far as he could recall, the fax had come in without a cover page so that the nature of the list had been unclear. Meanwhile the efforts to trace the list continued at the Crisis Staff.

Later, on the 18th a staff member of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs gave a letter from a Belgian non-governmental organization to Van Dam and Reyn asking for a list of '293' names.²⁵⁰⁷ Reyn and Van Dam concluded that this actually referred to the list of 239 mentioned by Karremans on the 16th. Van Dam called Dedden and heard that the list had still not been located at the Crisis Staff. Van Dam asked Dedden to send the list to the Central Organization if it was found.

On 21 August the list had still not surfaced. It was suggested that if all else failed Karremans and/or Franken should be asked for clarification. By now the Netherlands Army was looking everywhere and at all levels. The Army Staff and the Defence Staff were in constant touch with each other. When the list had still not been tracked down on the 22nd, it was decided at the instigation of the Defence Crisis Management Centre to contact the Deputy Commander of UNPROFOR's Sector North-East in Tuzla, Colonel C. Brantz, and Lieutenant Colonel J.A.C. de Ruiter of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo. Brantz said he had never heard of such a list until 19 August when ex-Dutchbat interpreter Hasan Nuhanovic had told him about it. To add to the confusion, Brantz thought Nuhanovic had said there were 793 names on the list. De Ruiter knew nothing of the list. Meanwhile the Directorate of General Policy Matters and the Defence Staff had put a number of questions on paper for Karremans and Franken. Both were approached by telephone the next day through the Netherlands Army Staff.

The answers of Karremans and Franken were documented in a report that was sent to the Defence Crisis Management Centre on the morning of 24 July.²⁵⁰⁸ The report said that the Crisis Staff had failed to find the list and that an initial investigation of the battalion records of Dutchbat III in Assen has also been fruitless. The answers of Karremans and Franken also suggested that Karremans accepted responsibility for the composition of the list of names. Due to linguistic problems, the composition of the list had been entrusted to representatives of the Muslims in the encampment. The presence of Bosnian Serbs outside the encampment meant it was genuinely dangerous for the interpreters and the Muslim representatives to register people there. For this reason, the registration process had been confined to the male refugees in the compound. The list was reportedly then sent to the headquarters of UNPROFOR's Sector North-East and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. Evidently Franken then filed the list in the battalion's records.

In the evening of 22 August there was a dawning recognition of the serious publicity risks surrounding this affair. Princen discussed his concerns with Hilderink, M. Schouten and Van Dam, and during that conversation the Secretary-General was alerted. Later that evening Voorhoeve was also informed by Princen who sent a fax to his home address.

Franken smuggled the list out of the enclave attached to his body when Dutchbat left for Zagreb on 21 July. After arriving in Zagreb the list was handed on 23 July to Major C.A.T.M. Bourgondiën of the Information Section of UNPF. He made multiple photocopies of the list and then saw to it that copies were at least sent to the Civil Affairs Department of the UNPF Headquarters as well as to staff members of the UN Commission on Human Rights. He also gave a copy to General Bastiaans who had come to Zagreb for the debriefing. In addition, Bourgondiën faxed the list to the Defence Crisis Management Centre in the Netherlands.²⁵⁰⁹ Various people later confirmed having received the list. These included M. Bossel-Lagos who was attached at the time to the Centre for Human Rights at Zagreb and cooperated with the investigation of Tadeusz Mazowiecki.²⁵¹⁰

When it transpired that the list was nowhere to be found in the Netherlands, enquiries were made at the UN offices in Tuzla and Zagreb. Thanks to the fact that Bourgondiën had disseminated the list widely, it was relatively easy to find a copy. On 25 August the Defence Crisis Management Centre was finally faxed a list from the office of the UN's Special Rapporteur for Human Rights, Tadeusz Masowiecki. The list that Bastiaans received from Bourgondiën was never found.

The Minister was primarily interested in information about the fate of the men on the list. In late September the list was handed via Foreign Affairs to the United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross. The Red Cross was also requested to compare the list with their databases. One hundred and sixteen names with birth dates corresponded with the ICRC database. Family members claimed that, of this number, 103 men had been taken prisoner by the Bosnian Serbs, 7 had reportedly reached the Bosnian lines in safety and 5 had been found by the ICRC in the detention camp at Batkovic. As for the rest, 50 names did not occur in the ICRC database at all, 65 names occurred in the database but with different birth dates, two names possibly matched the records though there were minor spelling discrepancies, and finally three names matched the records but, in the opinion of the ICRC, were not the true names of the people in question. The ICRC also noted that the list included the names of an unknown number of men who had been released from the Batkovic detention camp at the end of September as the result of an exchange of prisoners.²⁵¹¹

After August 1995 the 'list of 239' refugees remained at the centre of public attention in the Netherlands, not least because Hasan Nuhanovic, one of the Dutchbat interpreters in Potocari, did not shy away from publicity in his efforts to find out what had happened to his family. In his quest to establish the fate of his family, Hasan also explored the events surrounding the 'list of 239'.

Meanwhile there were plenty of other matters in the summer of 1995 to keep Dutchbat and Srebrenica firmly in the public eye. The press lapped up all the news on the subject that came their way. But some news items proved more newsworthy than others.

4. 'There's nothing on it'. A ruined roll of film.

Introduction

The photos that Lieutenant J.H.A. (Ron) Rutten took after the fall of the Srebrenica Safe Area in and around Potocari²⁵¹² were to play a remarkable role in the media. But for a totally different reason than he had intended when he took them. Shocked by what he was seeing and hearing, Rutten had taken photos on 13 July 1995 in, among other places, a house where terrified Muslim men had been herded together and were evidently being interrogated (at least one of them was handcuffed to a stairway) and, later that day, also of nine bodies. He had heard about executions and had gone to the place in question with Lieutenant E.C.M.J. Koster and Sergeant-Major F. van Schaik to investigate. To prove the presence of the UN, Rutten got Koster to take up a position among the bodies for one of the photos. Though the Bosnian Serbs had forbidden any pictures to be taken out of the enclave, he (and he was not the only one, incidentally) had smuggled out his roll of film. His hope was that once back in the Netherlands the photos would help him to give forceful expression to his horror at and the gravity of what, in his firm conviction and according to his own observations, had happened.

How differently things turned out! The roll of film, which Rutten had on 25 July sent along with an officer of the Intelligence and Security Section of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army so that it could be developed and printed, was destroyed during development. The photos consequently never saw the light of day: not the men in the house, nor the bodies or anything else he had photographed, such as the separation of men and women during the evacuation of the population from Srebrenica. This caused a great deal of commotion, both immediately and later at periodic intervals, in many different places in the army, at the Ministry of Defence and the government in general. But, above all, in the media. Not rarely, the official explanation, i.e. human error with fatal consequences, was brushed aside. This, so it was claimed, must have been done on purpose. Viewed in this light, the ruined roll of film could easily develop into a tangible symbol of a much more widespread cover-up, i.e. manipulation by the government in general, and Defence in particular, to conceal potentially embarrassing information. This was to make waves in the media, and high waves at that. In the summer of 1998 the storm grew to gale strength and until 2001 the wind was to return intermittently in varying degrees of intensity.

The fact that the controversy refused to die down compelled the NIOD, despite several earlier inquiries, to conduct its own investigation of the matter and bring out an extensive report. The findings of earlier inquiries were naturally taken on board in this connection.

One central problem must be made clear from the outset. If the roll of film was deliberately destroyed, then the fact that no group or person has claimed or admitted responsibility implies that there must have been some form of conspiracy, i.e. surreptitious activity with a view to preventing the disclosure of the pictures. If the conspirators did their work successfully, then their activity has indeed remained undetected. This gives rise to serious problems in terms of evidence, both for the proponents and opponents of the cover-up hypothesis.

The usual and, to all intents and purposes, only way to get round that problem is to reconstruct the events and circumstances as accurately as possible on the basis of available sources, in this case documents and persons. In addition, it is extremely important to answer the ‘why?’ question: what are the explanations and possible motives and what evidence is there to suggest these are the true, or at least plausible, explanations and motives? This chapter, therefore, is an attempt to reconstruct the events as accurately as possible and to discuss the plausibility of the explanations and motives given, both for the ‘human error’ and the ‘deliberate intent’ versions.

For the sake of clarity, the most important prior investigations are briefly discussed beforehand. This simultaneously allows us to mention a large number of the sources and put them in their true context. The first investigation was carried out by the investigation department of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, South Holland Section, which was started up immediately in the afternoon of 26 July 1995, the day on which the roll of film was destroyed. The investigative team formed under the direction of Captain P.H. (Peter) Rutten (no relation of the maker of the photos, incidentally) and called the Kodak team was provided that same afternoon with a brief report made immediately after the event by R.J.S. Schmöll, head of the photo section of the Military Intelligence Service of the Dutch Navy which had been entrusted with the development of the film. The assistance of the Forensic Laboratory was also immediately called in. A technical investigation was carried out and the persons most closely involved were heard. The investigators did not see the matter as a complicated affair. The investigation was rounded off by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee on 31 July with an official report (P 11/1995). The technical report of the Forensic Laboratory was signed on 11 August 1995²⁵¹³.

For an understanding of the wider context of this affair it is also important to know that the Kodak team had agreed with the leadership of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee and the Public Prosecutor not to confine their investigation to what had happened in the dark room. Partly in view of the evidence to be presented to the Yugoslavia Tribunal, Lieutenants Rutten and Koster, Sergeant Major Van Schaik and two other Dutchbat soldiers were heard about their observations of possible war crimes committed by Bosnian Serbs. The results of these interviews were recorded in a written report (P 13/1995) dated 2 August 1995.

The interviews with these five Dutchbat soldiers also touched on various matters other than Serb war crimes. The investigative team was particularly struck by the extremely emotional manner in which the witnesses spoke about the role played by Dutchbat in general and certain Dutchbat soldiers in particular. Mention was made of misconduct and/or what the interviewees considered an incorrect interpretation of the battalion's mission in the days after the fall. There was also a strong sense of frustration, so the Kodak team found, about the fact that many Dutch military and civil authorities underestimated the gravity of the situation. The leader of the investigation, P.H. Rutten, recorded these findings in what he called a 'Management Report' which could have a signalling function to all sorts of authorities. This document also became well-known because it was overlooked in certain places and originally had little impact. It is therefore extensively discussed in Part IV, Chapter 7 of this report.

As soon as word of the ruined film reached the media, they were naturally quick to pick up the story. But at this stage the journalists did not yet actually start doing their own fieldwork. The next investigation that devoted attention to the film was the major debriefing in Assen. But the destroyed film played only a subordinate part in this case and no new facts emerged. As the previous chapter has shown, the primary focus of the debriefing was on what had happened in Srebrenica.

The next moment that merits our attention occurred almost two years after the event when a Nova programme of 28 April 1997 rekindled interest in the subject. David Rohde, author of a successful book about Srebrenica entitled Endgame, voiced sharp criticism both of the actions of Dutchbat in the enclave and the subsequent publicity policy of the Dutch authorities. In general he considered the debriefing report as incomplete. As for the roll of film, he said he had heard that it had been deliberately destroyed.

This, among other things, led to talks between the photographer Rutten with, initially, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, General M. Schouten, and the Director of Information of the Ministry of Defence, H. van den Heuvel, and later with the Head of the Directorate of General Policy Matters, J.H.M. de Winter, about Rutten's experiences and grievances. The roll of film was not the sole subject of discussion, but it was raised. Apart from adding a few documents to the departmental archives²⁵¹⁴, this also led to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee being instructed to carry out another investigation into the roll of film. The ministry particularly wanted to know more about the involvement of the officers of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army. For this reason, apart from a further interview with Lieutenant Rutten, Major R.F.J.H. de Ruijter and his chief officer Lieutenant Colonel A. Bleumink were also heard. This time the inquiry concentrated both on the collection of the roll of film on 25 July 1995 and on the contacts that Rutten had with De Ruijter and Bleumink after the film was ruined. The interviews were conducted by Lieutenant K. van Dijk and warrant officer J.B. Vochtelo, both also members of the Kodak team in 1995. The investigation did not lead to fresh insights or the instigation of criminal proceedings. But the roll of film remained a sensitive issue even though it caused no further public outcry in the year 1997.

In 1998, by contrast, a media frenzy erupted and this time, unlike in 1995, the journalists did their own sleuthing. It all started quietly enough on 10 July 1998 in the relatively low-profile VPRO radio programme Argos. In an hour-long documentary the failure to develop the film was set against the background of the atrocities in and around Srebrenica and viewed from the perspective of a deliberate removal of information, in this case pictures, which was disagreeable to the authorities. In August Nova took over the torch. A series of broadcasts called various issues relating to Srebrenica into question. Recurring themes included the alleged cover-up in a broad sense. The roll of film caught the imagination as a telling example²⁵¹⁵.

The ensuing commotion in the media and therefore also in political circles was such that F.H.G. de Grave, the brand new Minister of Defence in the recently inaugurated second coalition government of Prime Minister Kok, was forced to cut his holiday short. On 13 August 1998 he ordered an in-depth investigation to find out whether any facts 'had been suppressed or carelessly handled, or if the truth finding process in this connection had in any way been obstructed or limited in scope'. This investigation was led by J.A. van Kemenade, who completed his report Omtrent Srebrenica (About Srebrenica) on 28 September. The investigation is discussed at length elsewhere in this chapter, and in the appendices to Van Kemenade's report which contain the transcriptions of the hearings the integrity of the truth finding process is an often recurring theme.

Van Kemenade's report did not provide the conclusive clarification that had been envisaged, particularly not in relation to the roll of film. The media especially took him to task for leaning too heavily on earlier inquiries and for not having done sufficient investigative work of his own, so that he could hardly have come up with anything other than the 'unsatisfactory' official version. As a result, the media attention for the roll of film continued unabated. In Intermediair of 8 and 22 October 1998 it was even emphatically argued that the portrayal of events as accepted by Van Kemenade was simply not possible.

In this way, the roll of film continued to attract attention, especially in 1998 but also later. On a few occasions it was even the subject of limited further research²⁵¹⁶. Several additional questions from 1998 long remained unanswered at the Forensic Laboratory, which in the meantime had been reorganized and renamed Netherlands Forensic Institute. In 2000, however, one of these questions was finally answered²⁵¹⁷. This sluggishness of response played a certain part in a new Nova programme about the roll of film on 19 June 2001 where a partially new variant of the cover-up hypothesis was put forward. The statement that members of the former Kodak team were also having second thoughts in turn prompted the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee to carry out some further investigation (a report of P.H. Rutten and a brief investigation by two retired officers). Still more sources for the NIOD, in other words²⁵¹⁸.

The NIOD could have restricted its own investigation of the ruined film to the dossiers of these earlier studies. But there were several good arguments for holding its own interviews with the people involved (including the investigators). First of all, it is in principle always preferable to do your own direct investigative work rather than rely on third-party investigations (even though efficiency considerations often prevented this), and all the more so if others have so emphatically cast doubt on the existing investigations. Secondly in this case even the investigators had their doubts about certain aspects of some of these investigations. Thirdly, while granting that there were few, if any, new facts to be considered, direct contact in the form of interviews offered an opportunity to talk over the events again with those involved as well as later investigators and experts with all the documents on the table. The arguments could be weighed up in these conversations and put in their proper context²⁵¹⁹.

All these considerations did indeed contribute to the following reconstruction of the events and the weighing up of the arguments for and against the competing interpretations. Very briefly put, it is 'human error' against 'deliberate intent' (in several variants). This chapter discusses as matter-of-factly as possible the failure to develop the roll of film that J.H.A. Rutten had handed in. The wider context must be taken on board as otherwise certain matters would either remain obscure or be capable of misinterpretation. But this context is not described in extenso. The events in the enclave, for instance, or the reception of Dutchbat in Zagreb and the press conference they are relevant, but have already been appropriately dealt with in other parts of this report. The same goes for the management report and the debriefing in Assen. It is no coincidence therefore that the following reconstruction starts with an exact chronological account of the route followed by the roll of film and the discussions held in this connection from 23 July 1995 when the photographer Rutten had contact about this matter with General H. Couzy, among other people. This part is rounded off with the conclusion of the Kodak Team on 31 July. Subsequently, various aspects are discussed on a more thematic basis, but without ever losing sight of the chronological sequence of events. Though often difficult to prove, the motives underlying the actions of the various people involved and the various peculiarities in the story (the 'background noise' in the dossier) are also given ample attention.

From 23 through 28 July 1995

During the limited debriefing activities at Zagreb, Lieutenant J.H.A. Rutten was also interviewed. In his contact with the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, General Couzy, on Sunday 23 July 1995, Rutten also mentioned the photos that he had taken in the house and of the bodies. He did this to underscore the serious nature of the matter. At the time he said little or nothing about the separation of men and women. His attention was mainly focused on the executions. Couzy displayed an interest in the photos and Rutten agreed to provide him with prints.²⁵²⁰

During the press conference towards the end of that Sunday afternoon, which was relayed live in the Netherlands in a special broadcast of NOS-Actueel, Couzy also mentioned these executions and the photos of the bodies. It was one of the examples of evidence that war crimes had been committed. But to the great annoyance of Rutten and some other Dutchbat soldiers Couzy also declared, and this received more attention, that the provisional impressions from the debriefing provided no indications of genocide. Even during the live broadcast Couzy's statement was set against statements by Ministers Pronk and Voorhoeve. The latter, who was also in Zagreb, struck a much more sombre note on the grounds of stories of refugees in Tuzla and the fact that several thousands of men were still unaccounted for. When pressed to explain these different readings of events, Couzy and Voorhoeve maintained there was no question of conflicting statements. Couzy had spoken exclusively about what he knew on the grounds of Dutchbat soldiers' observations; Voorhoeve had spoken on the basis of information received from international sources. Later in the programme the fact that pictures had been taken was again mentioned in an interview with a member of Dutchbat.²⁵²¹

The next day, on Monday 24 July 1995, Dutchbat departed for the Netherlands. A chaotic arrival at Soesterberg followed. Rutten (with his roll of film) went home with his wife fairly quickly. Those who had come to pick people up at Soesterberg included Major R.F.J.H. de Ruijter of the Intelligence and Security Section of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army. He was there to welcome the contact officer of this department in Dutchbat III, Sergeant Major E.A. Rave, who was also a friend of De Ruijter. Though he had come to collect him purely for social reasons, the roll of film with the bodies soon cropped up²⁵²².

De Ruijter asked where the film was and whether it would not be advisable to get the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army to develop and print it which was a perfectly normal procedure for films containing interesting information from an intelligence point of view. Rave said that he had said the same thing in Zagreb but that the commander, who knew about it, had felt it was private property and had agreed with Rutten that he would make prints available. De Ruijter insisted that this was not wise and that it was important both for the commander and the intelligence work to ²⁵²⁰ Rutten and Couzy made statements about this on various occasions. Apart from virtually all other dossiers already mentioned. See also interviews H. Couzy 04/10/01 and J.H.A. Rutten 13/09/01.

²⁵²² In retrospect it is no longer clear who brought this up first. As far as De Ruijter is able to recollect, it was Rave who started. But Rave thinks De Ruijter was the first to mention it. Nor was Rave surprised by this as he had also reported the existence of the film to others (certainly in Zagreb) and that information could quite easily have reached De Ruijter. Either way, the roll of film was mentioned in the course of the conversation. Interview R.F.J.H. de Ruijter 27/06/01 and 01/08/01 (additional telephone call) and interview E.A. get the photos as soon as possible. What's more, there was also a certain risk that someone else would make off with the photos. After all, they would be worth a fortune in the media world²⁵²³.

Though this prevented Rave from going straight home, De Ruijter and he started to look for Couzy. The latter acknowledged the advantages of getting the Military Intelligence Service to develop and print the film (fast information also for him). He gave De Ruijter permission to ask Rutten to hand the film over to him. Rutten would naturally receive excellent prints free of charge. But Rutten had already left. De Ruijter therefore called Rutten the next morning, Tuesday 25 July 1995, and the latter was perfectly happy to hand over the roll of film: 'it was, after all, with that aim in mind that I had taken the photos, and also to serve as evidence and support for my observations'²⁵²⁴. That same afternoon De Ruijter picked up the film at Rutten's home. On this occasion they extensively discussed Rutten's experiences and their emotional impact on him. In this way, De Ruijter obtained an even more accurate picture of what could be expected to be on the photos. That evening and night he kept the roll of film at his own home.²⁵²⁵

Meanwhile De Ruijter had arranged for the film to be developed and printed first thing the next morning, on Wednesday 26 July 1995.²⁵²⁶ He could then bring the prints into the organization without further delay and present them to the commander. This would also allow him to return the photos and negatives to their rightful owner, Rutten, in the evening of that same day. De Ruijter asked warrant-officer H. Winkelman, head of the photo and video department of the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army, to make sure that the film he was bringing with him on the Wednesday morning would be attended to immediately. As the development machine in the photo lab of the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army was out of order, Winkelman asked his colleague of the Military Intelligence Service/Dutch Navy to help out. This was housed in the building of the Admiralty at the same barracks as where the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army was based. These buildings at the Frederik Barracks in The Hague, 35A and 32 respectively, were at walking distance from each other. R.J.S. Schmüll, head of the photo section of the Military Intelligence Service/Dutch Navy, was unable to be present early the next day but arranged for the laboratory technician H.J.W. van Boetzelaer to be present at 8am to develop the roll of film. Winkelman himself would then make the prints.

The first steps in the early morning of Wednesday 26 July 1995 still went according to plan. Around eight o'clock De Ruijter arrived with the film at the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army. Winkelman was waiting for him and took the roll of film. De Ruijter proceeded to his other work and Winkelman immediately made his way to the dark room of the Military Intelligence Service/Dutch Navy. Van Boetzelaer was waiting there as arranged. He had already made the preparations that were necessary with this particular development machine of the Mafina brand. Van Boetzelaer then took over the roll of film and carried it to the wet area of the dark room where the development machine was placed. Winkelman stayed behind in the front area. Van Boetzelaer continued the preparations, placed the film – according to his statement that same day to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee: a Fujicolor 100, type Super G, 36 colour exposures - together with a roll of film handed in by the Navy (a Kodak Gold 200, 36 colour exposures) in the machine and started the process shortly after 8am.

The rest of the development process was automated, so to pass the time until the process had been completed Van Boetzelaer returned to the front area where he had a cup of coffee with Winkelman and Schmüll who had arrived in the meantime. During the conversation, they mentioned the possibility that the photos that Winkelman had brought might have something to do with Yugoslavia. Until then, all they knew at the Military Intelligence Service/Dutch Navy was that it was a 'rush job' and that, in itself, was nothing special. Nor was it unusual in intelligence work not to know what was on the films being developed. Winkelman had heard from De Ruijter what it was about in general terms. The main thing that had impressed him, incidentally, was the fact that the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army himself was evidently involved. That was unusual. He said that the photos had in fact been made by a Dutchbat soldier in Srebrenica. But at the time he himself did not know exactly what was on them.

At about a quarter to nine the signal that the development process had been completed went off and Van Boetzelaer went to the dark room to collect the developed rolls of film. To his amazement and dismay, he found himself confronted with the result of the mini chemical disaster that had taken place in the past 35 minutes. 'There's nothing on it' were the first words the others heard him say²⁵²⁷. It was immediately clear to everyone there that something with far-reaching consequences had occurred. The senior officers were informed straightaway. Schmüll alerted the head of Intelligence and Security Department at the Navy Staff (also deputy head of the Military Intelligence Service/Dutch Navy), Naval Captain W.Th. Lansink. Winkelman, who took the blank roll of film with him, went to inform De Ruijter. He too was shocked and then told Winkelman that the film had contained nothing less than the photos of the bodies that Couzy had spoken about at the press conference. De Ruijter took the empty film from Winkelman, mindful of his promise to return the photos and negatives that evening to R.J.A. Rutten.

Schmüll also quickly drew up a short report of what had happened. In essence, he already formulated what subsequent investigations repeatedly confirmed. Some serious error must have been made during the preparation of the development process, causing the developer to become contaminated with fixer. And as is clear, if something like that happens, the film is irreparably damaged and cannot possibly be developed.

The chief officers responded very alertly. Everyone was immediately informed right up to the highest level. It was decided that the Investigation Department of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee would launch an investigation. That same afternoon an 'embargo team' was installed by the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, General D.G.J. Fabius, himself. This was the Kodak Team under the direction of Captain P.H. Rutten. Its task was to establish whether the failure of the development process was the result of deliberate intent. Given the circumstances, a fast answer was clearly called for. The investigation was started immediately afterwards. The cooperation of the Forensic Laboratory was requested and granted²⁵²⁸. The first interviews were then held.

Meanwhile De Ruijter faced a dilemma: how do I tell the photographer, who had handed over his roll of film in good faith, assuming it was in safe hands? Also in view of the promise he had made and after speaking with his chief officer Lieutenant Colonel A. Bleumink, he saw no option other than to break the news to J.H.A. Rutten that same evening. Later that day the Kodak Team tried to trace the roll of film which, as was only logical, they wanted for their investigation. It soon transpired that De Ruijter had it. He was asked to come and hand in the roll of film at the building of the staff of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee on Raamweg, The Hague. On arrival there he found that the Marechaussee not only needed the film but, in the interests of the investigation, also objected to J.H.A.

²⁵²⁷ OM Arnhem, KMar, P 11/1995, Interview R.J.S. Schmüll.

²⁵²⁸ For this support from the Forensic Laboratory, apart from the dossier at the NFI 95.07.27.040, see also interviews with A.P.A. Broeders and H. van den Heuvel 27/07/01 and E. van Zalen 20/07/01.

Rutten being informed. De Ruijter's intention to inform Rutten was a matter of dispute right up to senior level. At the Marechaussee's building on Raamweg, strong words were also exchanged between De Ruijter and his opponents of the Marechaussee. De Ruijter did hand over the roll of film but would not be dissuaded from subsequently heading in the direction of Duiven (where Rutten lived), on the understanding that he would visit Bleumink, who lived nearby in Westervoort, from whom he was to receive further instructions.

The dispute as to whether De Ruijter could honour his promise to Rutten at least to the extent of being allowed to inform him of the failure or whether the interests of the investigation as perceived by the Marechaussee should prevail was resolved in the most unfortunate manner conceivable, namely with the following compromise. Instead of visiting J.H.A. Rutten together with Bleumink and telling him frankly what had happened, De Ruijter, on instructions from The Hague, was allowed to do no more than call him to say that he could not keep their appointment and that there were problems with the roll of film. But he was to say nothing about the nature and extent of the problems. After the telephone conversation with De Ruijter, Rutten also received a call from Bleumink who, without being able to enter into details, tried to convince Rutten that nothing fishy was going on. It is hardly surprising that these telephone calls made Rutten feel uneasy. It was precisely the vagueness of what was said to him that gave him the impression that the photos did exist. This impression was partly based on the fact that De Ruijter evidently knew what was on them. That De Ruijter had acquired this knowledge by other means (namely mainly from his conversation with Rutten himself the previous day) evidently did not occur to him at that time. In retrospect, it is clear that on this evening a sense of distrust was irreparably instilled in Rutten about the whole course of events.

On Thursday 27 July 1995 the Kodak Team continued their probe. An in situ investigation was carried out by the Forensic Laboratory, represented by two chemical experts, E. van Zalen and J.W. van Wilsem, and a forensic photographer H. van den Heuvel. They took away all sorts of samples of the chemicals present as well as the destroyed roll of film. Van Wilsem promised to give a provisional result the next day, Friday 28 July 1995. This result, the official report of which is dated on 11 August 1995, confirmed what Schmöll had already said. The reason for the failed development was that 'The roll of film was developed with a contaminated developer that possibly consisted of roughly 30% fixer and/or bleach'²⁵²⁹.

The Forensic Laboratory was also requested on 27 July to assist with a second film which warrant officer B.J. Oosterveen had already handed over in Zagreb so that it could be developed and printed and which in the meantime had reached the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army.²⁵³⁰ Oosterveen, too, had photographed bodies. It was not clear whether this concerned the same location that Rutten had photographed. Rather than developing these photos itself, the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army chose to avoid all risk and entrusted the film, via the Marechaussee, to the Forensic Laboratory. This institution was also wary of the situation. After discussing the matter, it was decided to follow the most normal procedure possible, i.e. the film was to be given to a professional development centre for the daily development session with the results being checked just before and just after the film in question. As an extra precaution, permission was asked and received to attend the development. The result was that most of the photos on the film were of excellent quality. This indicates that the film had been correctly developed. But precisely the photos of the dead bodies were very poor because of incorrect exposure and the great distance from which they had been photographed. Efforts to enhance the quality by means of technical tricks helped to a certain extent but you still needed to be very well-intentioned to make out bodies on the prints²⁵³¹.

²⁵²⁹ One noteworthy point about this report is that it contains a < sign which is both illogical and in conflict with the text. The draft report in the complete dossier at the current Netherlands Forensic Institute (no. 95.07.27.040) does contain the logical > sign. What is evidently a typing error made during the production of the definite report has been overlooked when checked.

²⁵³⁰ In the course of time these two films were sometimes mixed up, even by those closely involved. There are in actual fact two separate films which were also separately discussed. No evidence whatsoever has been found to confirm rumours about the existence of further films that were destroyed or disappeared.

Another noteworthy activity of the Kodak Team that day was a second interview with the laboratory technician Van Boetzelaer who was now a suspect. While on 26 July the primary focus had been on the technical process, this time the investigators wanted to know how this could have happened to such an experienced laboratory technician as Van Boetzelaer. This question was all the more pressing as he, by his own admission, had noticed irregularities during the preparation of the process. These irregularities concerned the colour of the developer, which had initially been rather dark but had then turned very light. With hindsight he felt this should have made him conclude that something was wrong and that he should therefore have taken corrective action. He admitted that this was a culpable act and that he was guilty of destroying the film. By way of explanation, he said that due to personal circumstances he had had little sleep during a number of consecutive nights and that he had been very emotionally involved with the problems of a relative. This had possibly made him less accurate and attentive than he should have been. He emphatically denied destroying the film with deliberate intent.

Technically speaking a logical explanation was thus given for what had happened, the central cause being human error. No matter how clumsy and rare such an error may have been, it could have happened that way and all statements given pointed in that direction. It is important to state for the record that everyone involved, including both Van Boetzelaer's colleagues, the investigators of the Marechaussee and others who spoke to him later about the subject, regarded him as reliable and trustworthy. To this very day, most of them categorically rule out a deliberate cover-up. In the words of a few of the then investigators of the Marechaussee: he must be (or have been) a really fabulous actor if he took us all in.²⁵³² The dossier as a whole certainly makes a convincing impression.

And so the investigation of the Kodak Team drew to an end on the evening of 27 July. The next day, Friday 28 July 1995, the matter was basically rounded off insofar as the roll of film was concerned. On the 27th contact had already been sought with the Public Prosecutor for Military Affairs in Arnhem because, on the Minister's instructions, the investigation had now been given judicial status. This meant that an official report would be made and sent to the Public Prosecutor. On the 28th this led to further consultation with A.P. Besier. As far as the roll of film was concerned, this had virtually no further consequences as the dossier presented no grounds for prosecution (the cause, after all, was human error). After consulting with the press officer and the Ministry of Defence, Besier prepared a press release. But Besier was also the contact officer with the Tribunal and, as such, was interested in information on the observations of the makers of the photographs. He therefore asked for an official report of the findings in this connection.²⁵³³ This fired the starting shot for the aforementioned second part of the activities of the Kodak Team.

In the meantime a solution also still had to be found for properly informing J.H.A. Rutten, the maker of the photographs on the ruined film. After the Kodak Team and Lieutenant Colonel K.J.C. Leupe, Head of Staff of General Fabius, had consulted with Bleumink and De Ruijter, it was decided that Bleumink would explain by telephone what had happened. De Ruijter would then fill in the details in a personal talk with Rutten, after which the Kodak Team would hear him at the Arnhem brigade about his observations in Srebrenica. This, in fact, is what took place and the first interview was held, at Besiers' request, that same Friday on 28 July.²⁵³⁴

However, the explanation failed to dispel Rutten's suspicions regarding the events surrounding the roll of film. Confronted with the evidence in documents and later repeatedly in talks with the people involved and investigators, he was prepared to admit that he had little option other than to accept this version of the events. Besides, he did not have any proof for a different version. But every time he would say: And still I feel there's something wrong. In this connection it was not any help that the Kodak Team (which had been informed by De Ruijter who, in turn, had been told by Rutten himself) had such an accurate idea of what should have been on the photos. But apart from the unfortunate piecemeal manner in which Rutten had been notified and informed of the incident, this also had a lot to do with Rutten's overall dissatisfaction with the way in which the events in and around Srebrenica were being dealt with in the Netherlands.²⁵³⁵ The suppression of pictures with evidence fitted in with a broader pattern of concealing and downplaying information.

²⁵³¹ The Forensic Laboratory initially made no report of this activity. It was not until 1999 that H. van den Heuvel drew up a statement from memory in which he recorded the events (also dossier no. 95.07.27.040). A chronological account of these events can incidentally be found in the Journal of the Kodak Team and in several official reports.

²⁵³² See in particular the interviews mentioned in note 34.

Nevertheless on 28 July the Kodak Team had basically completed its investigation into the ruined film. The 'Official Report of the findings relating to the destruction of a roll of film' was drawn up immediately after the weekend on 31 July 1995. The publicity that followed was naturally embarrassing for the people involved and particularly the Minister, as the politically responsible person, was forced to eat humble pie. The only avenue open to him was to admit that he was responsible for stupidities that really went beyond the pale. In Nova he spoke of 'utter clumsiness' and 'a daft mistake'.²⁵³⁶ At the same time he insisted categorically that human error really was the cause and that there was no question of ulterior motives. Sceptical noises were of course heard in the press and among political circles about the fact that such a rare accident could have happened to such an important roll of film that surely should have been handled with the utmost care. The suggestion of 'deliberate intent' was made, but finally in the summer of 1995 there appeared on balance to be a willingness to accept that such things do happen. Subsequently, however, this 'daftness' continued to feature prominently in a succession of blunders that were regularly dished out to the Ministry of Defence.

Deliberate intent after all? Motives and clues

Like the investigation in late July 1995 and various subsequent investigations, the reconstruction in the above section concludes that human error was the cause. As time went by, the 'deliberate intent' hypothesis was set against this with increasing insistence, particularly in 1998. The central thrust is always the same: the roll of film was deliberately destroyed. But there are a few different variants of the theory²⁵³⁷. Originally the emphasis was on the deliberate destruction in the dark room and Van Boetzelaer, as direct perpetrator, was the prime suspect. But naturally he would have been operating on someone else's instructions. The immediate command must thus have come from the 'the Military Intelligence Service/ the Royal Netherlands Army' (with De Ruijter in a central role) which, in turn, may have been acting in collusion with or on the instructions of others, such as the military leadership, the Ministry or the Minister himself.

A later and less common variant postulates the earlier destruction of the material by De Ruijter in the hours that the roll of film was in his possession (from Tuesday 25 July 1995 at the end of the afternoon when he took the roll with him until early the next morning when it was handed in at the dark room)²⁵³⁸. In this variant the fact that even more went wrong during the development process can evidently be seen either as an attempt to cover up the earlier destruction as well as a coincidental unplanned circumstance (leaving open the possibility that Van Boetzelaer ruined the film in good faith).

An even more complicated variant involves a double operation. In that hypothesis the roll of film handed in at the dark room was not Rutten's film at all but a random substitute intended to divert attention. In this version the real film was developed elsewhere in the deepest secrecy. That ‘elsewhere’ might very well have been the Audiovisual Department of the Dutch Navy in Valkenburg South Holland. This, after all, had been mentioned more than once as the actual scene of events rather than the dark room in the building of the Admiralty: was this by mistake, as some claimed, or a momentary lapse of someone in the know? When the Military Intelligence Service (and possible accomplices) viewed the pictures, they were so shocked by the incriminating nature of the images that they were immediately destroyed. This variant explains the ‘remarkable’ knowledge of De Ruijter and the Kodak Team of what had been photographed. In all variants, incidentally, the investigation of that Kodak Team must be seen either as a cover-up of the operation to destroy the film or as serious blundering.

²⁵³⁵ J.H.A. Rutten frequently vented this dissatisfaction. In the course of time he was heard or interviewed in numerous investigations and this issue was raised very frequently either as the central subject or as a side issue. Here, we only make reference to the interview with J.H.A. Rutten 13/09/01.

The assumption that the Audiovisual Department of the Navy in Valkenburg South Holland was involved in a conspiracy found no corroboration in the sources. The reason why the story was able to come into circulation was that many people immediately associated ‘a dark room of the Navy’ with ‘Valkenburg’. That was a well-known institution, whereas the dark room of the Military Intelligence Service of the Dutch Navy was not. Even people who were closely involved in the investigation but were not actually out in the field (such as the leader of the investigation P.H. Rutten) took this for granted for some time and also informed others accordingly.²⁵³⁹ With this third variant, therefore, the destruction of the roll of film must have taken place at another, as yet unnamed, location.

Either way, particularly the second and the third variants assume fairly complicated conspiracies involving many people and consequently a high risks of leaks. There is no concrete evidence for any of these variants. What initially looked like evidence failed to stand up to verification. However, given the secrecy in which the events took place according to the hypothesis, the absence of clear leads is not surprising. Its persuasiveness must therefore be sought in other arguments. The first thing to be pointed out in this connection is that it is very hard, if not impossible, to believe that an experienced laboratory technician would make such an utter mess of precisely this roll of film. “Totally incredible” Elsbeth ETTY succinctly wrote in 2001 in the middle of her column and then, mincing no words, continued in the certain assumption that a cover-up had taken place²⁵⁴⁰.

The notion of ‘deliberate intent’ is also persuasively supported by a much broader and more deeply rooted conviction that the Dutch government, and the defence authorities in particular, were systematically withholding and manipulating information: the cover-up theory in other words, which is considered particularly plausible in relation to the debriefing. This issue is discussed extensively elsewhere in this report.²⁵⁴¹ The destruction of an incriminating roll of film fits in well with such a cover-up theory. To some, it goes without saying that ‘the Military Intelligence Service’ (virtually no distinction is made between the various departments that still existed in 1995) played a role in this case. That, after all, is precisely the sort of thing you would expect of such a department. In a sense you could say that the army has this department precisely for such secret operations. Even so, all this is largely based on impressionistic conjecture that provides a ‘ready and willing’ background rather than concrete corroboration of the suggested course of events.

Consequently, we must turn our attention to two particular aspects: peculiarities and weaknesses in the dossier that support the ‘human error’ version and the question about the motives. First, let’s look at the ‘background noise’ in the dossier. A few minor points, such as dates in statements that are ²⁵³⁹ Interview P.H. Rutten and S. de Wilde 30/07/01. To make absolutely sure, the NIOD also looked for evidence at the Audiovisual Department of the Dutch Navy (which in the meantime had relocated to Amsterdam). The administrative records of work assignments for this period are no longer present. Material, particularly classified material, was always returned to customers after the assignment had been carried out. The then head of the photo department and the person in charge of the photo workshop rule out the possibility that the film in question was developed there. If it had been, they would certainly have remembered. What’s more, they weren’t able to develop colour film there. Interview A. Zagers 03/10/01 and report of interview with the Audiovisual Department of the Dutch Navy 06/08/01. The suggestion that ‘Valkenburg’ referred to an intelligence officer is also untenable. obviously inaccurate, can, in retrospect, easily be recognized as understandable mistakes (certainly where the statements are of a later date) or typing errors made when transcribing rough notes to a clean copy.²⁵⁴² The suggestions concerning 'Valkenburg' have already been discussed. Far more important are the question-marks that can be placed with hindsight behind what exactly was investigated in that first week (and how thoroughly) and what was not. You obviously need to be careful when assessing a dossier years after the event from a hypercritical perspective and with a lot of knowledge that was not available at the time. Even so, it is telling that both the Kodak Team and the Netherlands Forensic Institute have made critical comments about the investigation conducted in July 1995 regarding this aspect.

When the media were emphatically pursuing allegations of deliberate destruction in the summer of 1998, the Kodak Team showed no signs of doubting their own investigation. In 2001, however, some slight doubts were expressed and these were made public in the Nova programme of 19 June. The leadership of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee asked the leader of the investigation P.H. Rutten to make a report about this. That report of 24 June in turn led to a request to two retired Royal Netherlands Marechaussee Officers, retired Colonel A.M. van Dijk and retired Captain H. Boersma, to investigate any such doubts. They reported on 3 July 2001.²⁵⁴³ In this connection they heard the members of the Kodak Team who, incidentally, were also interviewed by the NIOD around that time.

The conclusion of Van Dijk and Boersma, which corresponds with that of the NIOD, is that there were no doubts among the members of the Kodak Team regarding the investigation as carried out by them in July 1995. Only a few placed some professional question-marks, resulting from retrospective knowledge, behind the limited scope of the investigation. These are recorded in Rutten's report. In conformity with instructions, the investigation had concentrated entirely on what had happened in the dark room. All maintained that this had been carefully investigated and the outcome was beyond doubt, even though you could perhaps wonder why the development process had not been immediately simulated as accurately as possible from start to finish. At the time, the investigators had been content to take samples for further investigation. But what was even more remarkable was the failure to devote attention to the phase preceding the dark room, i.e. to what had happened to the roll of film after J.H.A. Rutten had handed it over. In other words, the role played by De Ruijter and the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army had been disregarded. It was not until 1997 that attention was briefly devoted to this aspect following questions from the ministry, but these interviews had not amounted to much.

As it happens, a plausible explanation can be given for the course of events in 1995. In that week of 24 July 1995 it looked like a pretty cut-and-dried case to the members of the Kodak Team who were also expected to deliver a fast result (and they still maintain that their conclusion of 'human error' was in itself well-substantiated). That's why they were also able to report quickly. They did not leave it at that, however. But as explained earlier, the widening scope of their investigation did not lead them to the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army (whose role only acquired a certain urgency as a result of later pressing questions) but to what had happened in Srebrenica, what Dutchbat soldiers had seen of this and what role they had played themselves. These were the compelling questions of the time and that was the trail that the Kodak Team followed up. Reading serious professional errors into this or assuming that the Kodak Team fell into the trap of a decoy is really taking things rather far.

The absence of an attempt to simulate the entire process that caused the destruction of the film takes on significance against the background of the statement that the story as told by Van Boetzelaer simply was not possible. In 1998 *Intermediar*²⁵⁴⁴ had done tests at a professional company with a Fuji development machine and had found that such errors were precluded by the nature of the process. The problem with that test, however, was that it was carried out with a fully automated machine while the Mafina machine used on the morning of 26 July was not automated in every respect. Several operations had to be performed manually at the beginning of each development round and all those involved agree that such a blunder was therefore theoretically possible. With hindsight, it would have been better to simulate the process as accurately as possible. No one incidentally has any doubts about the effects of fixer in the developer: disastrous and irreparable. No tests are needed to prove that.

This matter focuses attention on the Forensic Laboratory. In an evaluation report commissioned by the NIOD, the head of the Handwriting, Speech and Document Examination Department of what is now the Netherlands Forensic Institute (NFI) was critical of the investigation carried out by the Forensic Laboratory in 1995.²⁵⁴⁵ Strictly speaking, this investigation did not satisfy the requirements for professional forensic investigations, which incidentally have been considerably tightened up over the past years. The failure to carry out a ‘replication investigation’ (simulation of the process) is one of the arguments in this connection. Later questions as to whether the film may have still contained latently present images and whether it really was a Fuji film were answered very late in one case and not at all in another. Evidently the seriousness of the matter was not (or had not been made) clear to the investigator in question.

Against this, the response in 1995 had been fast and, in addition, ‘there is no reason to believe that further investigation will change the essence of the investigation carried out by Van Wilsem into the composition of the developer used as stated’.²⁵⁴⁶ In response to the NIOD’s question as to whether the asserted version of events could be regarded as plausible, the report gives the following answer: ‘If the assumptions concerning the origin of the investigated photo chemicals can be considered correct, then technically speaking a more than plausible explanation has thus been given for the failure to develop the roll of film. However, for the sake of completeness a test could be carried out to replicate the effect’.²⁵⁴⁷

Given the desirability in this controversial case to leave no investigative channels unexplored, and also in view of this self-critical report of the NFI, the NIOD requested this institute to carry out a further three investigations or attend these investigations as an observer and to report on the findings.²⁵⁴⁸ Firstly, the above-mentioned replication investigation seemed desirable. Secondly, it seemed advisable to carry out a more thorough investigation into the possibility, as mentioned in 1998 by C. van Rij, of using a special chemical procedure to see whether images might be produced after all. Thirdly, the question as to whether the investigated roll of film was a Fuji film from Rutten’s camera seemed worth exploring further.

The replication investigation was carried out in January 2002. The outcome was that there was a ‘great deal of support’ for the assertion that the developer had been mixed with fixer on that morning of July 1995 and, more specifically, in a concentration rendering all information (including edge coding) invisible.²⁵⁴⁹ This, in other words, confirmed the conclusion drawn from the earlier evaluation report and thus supported the outcome of the investigation of the Kodak Team in 1995.

²⁵⁴⁵ NFI, dossier 1995.07.27.04. Report 07/09/01 made to the NIOD. Also NIOD archives. In this report some “remaining questions” were asked in addition to the issues to be discussed below. When read by the NFI of OM Arnhem, KMar P 11/1995 (which was originally not known there) it turned out that these questions “were easy to answer or even lost all relevance”. See NFI, dossier 1995.07.27.040. Additional report, 28/01/02.

²⁵⁴⁸ The NFI is the institution most eligible to conduct this kind of investigation in the Netherlands. The NIOD did ask itself whether, in the light of the doubts raised about the investigation of the NFI’s precursor, the Gerechtelijk Laboratorium (Forensic Laboratory), it was desirable to entrust this follow-up investigation to the NFI. It was however precisely the highly critical attitude evident in the evaluation report that made the NIOD confident that the questions would be answered with integrity. Added to this, the head of the department had had nothing to do with the whole affair before the NIOD approached him.

²⁵⁴⁹ NFI, dossier 1995.07.27.040. Additional report 28/01/02, p. 10 and 11.

At the test designed to try out the suggestion of C. Van Rij, the NFI acted as observer because Mr Van Rij, who had been found willing to cooperate, wanted to keep a promise he had made to Nova. The makers of this TV programme had managed to trace him and had invited him to carry out the experiment exclusively for their cameras. If images were indeed produced, a programme would be devoted to it. Despite this exclusivity Nova had no objections to a NIOD representative attending the proceedings. The experiment failed to produce any results, however. And so it never reached the TV screen.²⁵⁵⁰

As regards the third question, unpublished journalistic investigative work again proved important. In 2001 two journalists from NRC Handelsblad had investigated whether the roll of film had come from the camera of J.H.A. Rutten. For this purpose the latter had provided them with strips of the film, which he had managed to retrieve with a great deal of effort, and his camera which had not been used since Srebrenica. Their conclusion was that the strips of film and camera unmistakably belonged together.²⁵⁵¹ Using the brief report of this investigation, the NFI looked at this question more closely and also carried out its own tests. The conclusion was that Rutten's camera 'can be considered as the possible cause of the traces in the strips of negatives'. This supports the improbability of the film having been exchanged for malicious reasons. The wording is less conclusive than that of the editors of NRC Handelsblad because the unavailability of cameras of the same make and type meant that 'the individual character of the scratch lines caused by the camera' could not be determined in greater detail.²⁵⁵²

In this way the further analyses of the 'background noise' in the dossier and the technical investigation performed in this connection lead to the partial conclusion that, certainly with hindsight, the investigation could have been better. But they do not cast serious doubt on the 'human error' explanation and provide no concrete evidence whatsoever for deliberate intent.

Finally, the motives. What considerations could have led to the destruction of the film? Who could have expected to benefit? That is not very clear. During the press conference on 23 July in Zagreb Couzy had referred with some emphasis to the photographs and what would be on them. So it was widely known that these pictures could be expected. Couzy had also emphatically asked Rutten for these pictures. So an initiative on his part is really highly unlikely. The failure to publicize the photos could only be to his disadvantage. This applied in almost equal measure to the other persons involved. In general both the civil and the military leadership showed great interest in observations and evidence of any war crimes and/or genocide.

For this reason the suggestion that Minister Voorhoeve had an interest in the disappearance of the photos because their circulation around the world would have tainted his reputation to the extent of forcing his resignation²⁵⁵³ is not only purely speculative but also in conflict with his perception at the time. He in fact was particularly keen to obtain information. From the Netherlands too every effort was made to provide the Tribunal with all possible material. The extremely direct interest, and occasionally even involvement, in the investigation into the roll of film on the part of the authorities is also understandable and explicable given their understanding of the sensitivity of the subject matter and the desire to be informed as well and as quickly as possible.

Looking back in 2001, the leader of the Kodak Team P.H. Rutten was annoyed by the fact that when the 'photographer' J.H.A. Rutten was heard on 28 July 1995 about what he had seen in Srebrenica, General Fabius had called several times to hear at first hand what the outcome of the interview had been. According to Fabius, the Minister had been listening in on these calls. In 2001 P.H. Rutten saw this as a reason for having suspicions vis-à-vis the Minister.²⁵⁵⁴ But it was not the Minister who had taken the initiative. It was Fabius who had contacted the Minister, who was actually on holiday, to invite him to come to the Raamweg in The Hague so that he would be informed as directly as possible.²⁵⁵⁵ It would appear that the retrospective reservations of P.H. Rutten mainly grew out of suspicions and suggestions of a later date.

So did the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army itself have any interest in the destruction of the material? Nothing convincing has emerged to affirm this. But why then was this department so 'eager' about this issue, as again P.H. Rutten later put it? Something can be said in this connection. Two phases must be distinguished. The first phase preceded the destruction. It was the task of the Intelligence and Security Section to be informed as well as possible of all relevant events surrounding army operations. This of course applied in particular to what had happened in Dutchbat III's final phase in the enclave. The Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army needed accurate and fast information to adequately fulfil its role as provider of information to the military leadership. Speed was invariably of the essence to prevent the military (and political) leadership from being surprised by actions of opponents or, as is naturally relevant in this case, the media. In this sense it was logical that there was a certain habit of taking over visual material from military personnel arriving in the Netherlands for rapid development and printing. So you could say that De Ruijter's idea on 24 July at Soesterberg was in line with the 'departmental reflexes': make sure you get the material quickly, so that you at least stay one step ahead of the press (you never know) and inform the commander. Better safe than sorry. Viewed from this perspective, De Ruijter's statement about his initiative to pick up the film and develop and print it at the Military Intelligence Service fits in with a wider pattern and thus gains greater plausibility.²⁵⁵⁶

The second phase occurred after the destruction. It is mainly in relation to this phase that P.H. Rutten later complained about the pushy presence of the Military Intelligence Service. This complaint was no doubt also fed by the quarrel between De Ruijter and the Kodak Team or, more widely, between the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army and the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. As explained, this quarrel pitched two more or less valid arguments and interests against each other: De Ruijter's need to set things right with J.H.A. Rutten and the Kodak Team's need, in the interests of the investigation, either to make no statements or only to issue these statements themselves when the time was right. This alone is sufficient to explain a regular, 'eager' and persistent presence of de Ruijter. It can be assumed that he, having been put in such an embarrassing situation vis-à-vis J.H.A. Rutten, had a special interest in knowing how this could have happened and made no secret of this towards the Kodak Team. In short, here too a plausible construction can be put on events. This explanation also fits in with the effect that the compromise about informing J.H.A. Rutten had on the latter.

Because it is so difficult to find a motive for the destruction of the film in relation to what was known at the time in July 1995 about the content of the photos – the bodies in particular played a role as 'evidence' for war crimes²⁵⁵⁷ – suspicions of alternative grounds arose later. The roll of film also contained shots of the separation of men and women and the role of the Dutchbat soldiers in this connection. These in other words were extremely incriminating photos for Dutchbat, the Netherlands and, above all, for the responsible authorities in the country, who were actually trying to salvage a little glory for the role played by Dutchbat and, failing that, to at least portray them as victims and not as ²⁵⁵⁵ Interview D.G.J. Fabius 19/10/01. According to Fabius the main topic of discussion between the minister and himself was the need to prepare a press release about the events. In view of the media sensitivity of this matter, the minister had to be properly informed, also about how J.H.A. Rutten had responded to the explanation of the ruined film. P.H. Rutten mainly remembers having shown interest by telephone in what J.H.A. Rutten had to say about what had happened in Srebrenica. These two recollections are not mutually exclusive.

²⁵⁵⁶ Interview R.F.J.H. de Ruijter 27/06/01 and interview E.A. Rave 13 and 14/12/00 and 11/07/01 (additional telephone conversation).

²⁵⁵⁷ It should be noted in passing that certain accounts are based on the opinion that the destruction of the photos caused the loss of evidence for war crimes. This, however, is a misunderstanding. In criminal law the evidential value of eyewitness statements is superior to that of photos.

accomplices. In this line of reasoning the disappearance of these photos most definitely served the interests of the authorities, or at least could be viewed as such.

At first sight there appears to be more in this than in the same reasoning in relation to the photos with bodies, even though the absence of direct and concrete indications remains a handicap. On closer inspection, however, there is also a serious problem here. For this reasoning assumes that those who took the initiative to destroy the film knew it contained pictures of Dutchbat soldiers assisting the separation of men and women. That is not very probable. J.H.A. Rutten has declared several times that in this initial phase his attention was entirely absorbed by the events in the house and the executions (i.e. photos of dead bodies). In his conversations about the contents of the photos, he had never mentioned the separation of men and women.²⁵⁵⁸

So to accept this motive as the actual reason for the destruction, you really have to assume that the photos had been seen first either by the person who destroyed them or the person on whose instructions he was acting. This only fits in with the extremely complicated variant where many accomplices take part in a double destruction, with a 'decoy film' being substituted for the real film in the dark room of the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army. But this variant is at odds with the result of the investigations into the origin of the strips of film returned to Rutten. It also assumes a certain blind spot among the 'perpetrators' for the corrosive effect of persistent media attention seeking to expose an unbelievable story about human error as the cause of the failure to develop the photos whose existence was known. As this motive could also not be demonstrably attributed to anyone, this explanation too must be seen as highly unlikely.

Conclusion

The roll of film of Lieutenant J.H.A. Rutten never produced photos. A painstaking reconstruction of the events based on various investigations from the day of the failed development of the film until very recently has led to the conclusion that human error was the cause. In retrospect, critical comments can be made about the investigation in the initial stage, but these do not detract from the validity of the conclusion. Plausible explanations can be given for a number of peculiarities in the story and their context (the 'background noise in the dossier').

Despite this conclusion, suspicions of deliberate destruction have never completely gone away. This is basically a serious accusation which was directed not only at 'defence' in general and the army in particular but also at individuals who in some cases were even publicly mentioned by name²⁵⁵⁹. In a state governed by the rule of law like the Netherlands you would expect such accusations to be supported with concrete evidence. But that is not the case. Assumed motives for (ordering) the deliberate destruction do not stand up to critical scrutiny either. Identified weaknesses in the reasoning leading to the conclusion of human error (indirect evidence in other words) turn out on closer inspection to be inaccurate or highly implausible.

The persuasive power of the deliberate intent hypothesis lies mainly in the combination of the incredibility of the trivial blundering in the dark room precisely with this important film, the imaginative appeal of an intelligence service cast in a conspiratorial role and the perfect manner in which that fits in with a much broader cover-up theory. But in the absence of concrete evidence, all this cuts no ice. Set against the ‘human error’ explanation, which is based on strong foundations, this hypothesis is untenable.

In one respect, however, the story of the film does fit in with a wider context. The officer of the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army who proposed to have the film developed within the organization itself later explained that this was the obvious procedure. In doing so, he referred to the tasks as assigned to and interpreted by his department: always get information quickly (preferably as the first) so that the commander can be informed as early and adequately as possible, thereby allowing him to respond optimally and if required to take preventative action. This interpretation of the tasks echoes the aspiration of the army, as discussed elsewhere, to manage and control any information flows about its own organization that reach the outside world.

The irony in this specific case of the ‘roll of film’ is that the attempt to be the first to see these important photos failed so blatantly and thus actually triggered an ultimately uncontrollable avalanche of publicity. And all this resulted from a human error nobody wanted.

5. The Smith – Mladic agreement

In the same period as the debriefing an incident occurred that put the Minister in a very embarrassing situation. On 11 September De Volkskrant carried an article headlined ‘Voorhoeve zweeg over VN-akkoord met Mladic’ (‘Voorhoeve kept silent about UN agreement with Mladic’).²⁵⁶⁰ The thrust of the article was that the Minister of Defence had failed to mention the agreement signed between Generals Smith and Mladic on 19 July 1995 during the consultation with the Permanent Parliamentary Committees of Defence and Foreign Affairs on 31 August and 5 September. One of the sources for the article was a letter dated 8 September from an anonymous military member in which the Minister and his staff were accused of withholding information, meddling with the UN operation and incompetence. It was implied that the existence of the Smith – Mladic agreement completely overshadowed Franken’s statement of 17 July about the properly conducted evacuation of the population. In addition, it was claimed that the Dutch Navy and Air Force were over-represented in the Defence leadership, leading to less understanding for Army operations as well as suppression of the fact that the ‘roll of film’ was ruined in a Navy laboratory.²⁵⁶¹ The anonymous author of the letter had also enclosed a copy of the agreement, a memo of a close aide to Smith about the meeting on 19 July when it was signed and a copy of the Proceedings of the Dutch Parliament.

What exactly was it all about? On 19 July 1995 an agreement was concluded at Sarajevo by Generals Smith of UNPROFOR and Mladic of the VRS (Bosnian-Serb army) about a number of points concerning the situation in Srebrenica, Zepa, Gorazde and Sarajevo. This agreement was prepared on 15 July 1995 when Milosevic, Bildt and Stoltenberg had held political consultations in Belgrade about the situation in Bosnia and Hercegovina. Smith and Mladic had also attended the consultation in Belgrade. The text contained 9 points in which arrangements were laid down for such matters as access to the various regions for the Red Cross and UNHCR, the evacuation of the remaining women, children, elderly and wounded, and Dutchbat’s departure from the enclave. In Part III, Chapter 9 of this report, the Smith – Mladic agreement was already discussed at length in the context of Dutchbat’s departure from the enclave.

In an article in De Volkskrant Defence spokesman B. Kreemers said that Parliament had not been informed, ‘..because the document was not believed to be relevant to the Dutch responsibility in Srebrenica’. The next day De Volkskrant devoted an indepth article to the agreement: ‘VN bielden akkoord met Mladic geheim ('UN kept agreement with Mladic secret').²⁵⁶² This article quoted extensively from the memo of Smith's aide while Defence said that the agreement had not been mentioned because it was intended to improve the UN's relationship with Mladic. The UN had strongly recommended secrecy and Voorhoeve had felt bound to observe this. Once again spokesman Kreemers was drummed up to give the official reaction. He declared that '...the agreement between Smith and Mladic was not relevant to the account that the Minister had given Parliament'.

Even in their initial reaction politicians expressed shock and clearly felt bypassed. On the evening of 11 September several MPs were asked to comment on TV. Sipkes (GroenLinks; Green Left Party) questioned the Minister's credibility; Hoekema (D66; Democrats) said he felt bypassed and saw it as yet another mistake in what was – unfortunately – a catalogue of errors and blunders; and Valk (PvdA; Labour Party) said that the Minister had had sufficient time and opportunity during the debates to mention the agreement.²⁵⁶³ That same evening on a different programme MP De Hoop Scheffer said that the Minister's failure to mention the information about the agreement was a 'fairly dubious intermediate step' en route to the 'final debate'.²⁵⁶⁴ As far as he was concerned, the answer given by Voorhoeve's spokesman that morning was merely an attempt to 'fob everybody off'. The impact of these revelations in political circles was predictable and should indeed be seen in the light of the growing number of errors and incidents surrounding Srebrenica in which the Ministry of Defence and the Royal Netherlands Army had been involved since the middle of July 1995. What's more, only recently there had been two marathon debates with Parliament about Srebrenica – on 31 August and on 5 September – and on 31 August the Minister had affirmed categorically that 'Janvier or Rupert Smith never negotiated with Mladic in person after Srebrenica fell'.²⁵⁶⁵

It was not a complete surprise that the press had got wind of the Smith – Mladic agreement. On Sunday 10 September De Volkskrant editor Hans Moleman had contacted Bert Kreemers at home to get a reaction to the anonymous letter. That same evening Kreemers tried to get advice from his bosses during the dinner that had been organized for the visiting NATO Military Committee at the Binnenhof. Not everyone recognized the serious nature of the problem.

I really needed advice from Van den Heuvel and Van den Breemen as well as Voorhoeve's view of the situation. The chaotic conclave between two corridors produced no results. Henk van den Breemen took offence when he saw his name associated with the ruined film. Voorhoeve did not even give the possible consequences of this anonymous attack a second thought: 'Just say it's a load of nonsense'. Hans van den Heuvel kept a cool head. We read through the text together and tried to formulate a reaction: the agreement had no relevance to the assessment of the aftermath of the fall of Srebrenica.²⁵⁶⁶

Because Voorhoeve was travelling to Bratislava and Prague on 11 September, Prime Minister Kok was answerable in the first instance in his capacity as deputy Minister of Defence. Voorhoeve did have input in a letter to Parliament that had been drafted by the Directorate of General Policy Matters and was signed and sent by Kok on 12 September.²⁵⁶⁷ According to Kreemers, Kok was careful not to get his fingers burnt and during question time on 12 September he stayed miles away from Voorhoeve.²⁵⁶⁸ The letter itself reiterated the arguments that the Defence spokesman had used in the two De Volkskrant articles. Nothing was said, however, about the time when the ministry had first heard of the existence of an agreement. In addition, only the formal aspects of the agreement were looked at and no response was given to the actual content.²⁵⁶⁹ The Prime Minister had little else to say during question time. He told the critical MPs Sipkes and Heerma that if they had any further questions, the real minister would be happy to answer them.²⁵⁷⁰ However, Kok did promise to try to get a copy of the Smith – Mladic agreement from the UN. Meanwhile Voorhoeve, who was in Bratislava, saw the storm looming ahead. A meeting with the Permanent Parliamentary Committee on Defence had already been arranged for Thursday 14 September. Shortly afterwards, he ordered an inquiry into the origin of the leak via the Secretary-General.²⁵⁷¹ On 14 September another letter was sent to Parliament; this time signed by Voorhoeve himself. Meanwhile the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had been sent the text of the agreement from the UN Headquarters in New York and this was attached to the letter. But the UN did not release the memo with the agreement that a close aide of Smith had written after the meeting of 19 July.

Apart from the enclosed text of the agreement, the letter that Voorhoeve sent to Parliament on 14 September contained no new insights. On the basis of a few points from the agreement, the Minister tried to indicate that when the agreement was signed on 19 July it was no longer relevant to Dutchbat's role in Srebrenica. He said that access to the enclave for the Red Cross and the release of the Dutchbat personnel being held in Bratunac had already been arranged on 15 July in Belgrade during the discussion between Milosevic, Bildt and Stoltenberg. The arrangement for the evacuation of women, children and elderly people was emphatically intended for those still in the enclave after the actual evacuation, i.e. after 13 July.²⁵⁷² In the General Consultation that followed on 14 September the criticism of the MPs had already subsided. What did not go away, however, was the criticism that the Minister should have given Parliament timely information and that he had had ample opportunity to do this. The point of reference remained the General Consultation of 31 August, where several MPs had asked specifically about negotiations with Mladic at a level higher than Dutchbat. As is known, the Minister had answered these questions in the negative.²⁵⁷³ In his answer the Minister also pointed to a press release of the Ministry of Defence of 20 July in which mention was made of an agreement in the light of Dutchbat's departure from the enclave. While acknowledging that a press release was not the same thing as a letter to Parliament, the Minister said, 'There was no need to discuss the Smith – Mladic agreement any further. What's more, detailed information from the Dutch government about that confidential meeting would have been out of order. In any case, the information given by the Ministry of Defence to the media shows that, contrary to what the author of the anonymous letter wants to lead us to believe, there was no intention whatsoever to conceal the meeting of the two generals on 19 July'.²⁵⁷⁴

The most important argument remained that an individual country could not decide unilaterally to violate the confidentiality of a UN classified document. The next day De Volkskrant devoted a small article to the General Consultation. The article, headlined 'Kamer toont begrip voor minister' ('Parliament shows understanding for Minister'), briefly summed up the situation surrounding the agreement:

'Assuming he had no alternative, Minister Voorhoeve of Defence should at least have informed Parliament confidentially about the existence of a secret agreement that the UN signed on 19 July with the Bosnian Serb General Mladic after the fall of the Bosnian enclave Srebrenica. But Parliament understands that Voorhoeve felt bound to secrecy and draws no political consequences from his failure to disclose the information'.²⁵⁷⁵

After the General Consultation on the 14th, the sting had been taken out of the debate. The subject was raised later in a general sense, but the Minister's skin had been saved for the time being. From a political/public perspective, the matter had thus basically been dealt with. However, at the Minister's instigation, a criminal investigation was initiated to find out who had sent the letter to the press and for what reasons. The anonymous letter, the series of newspaper articles, the criminal investigation and the political aftermath came to be known in September 1995 as the affair of the 'leaking colonel'. An investigative team of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee dubbed the 'Pleinteam' was formed on 13 September. On the basis of the copies of the anonymous letter with annexes that they received from Kreemers – one had been sent to De Volkskrant and one to NRC Handelsblad - the investigators soon came to the conclusion that the writer should be sought near the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army. The addresses on the documents and the legalistic language of the letter indicated that the author was probably to be found at the Legal Affairs Department of the Royal Netherlands Army. In addition, certain fonts and a stain on the text of the agreement quickly led them to the word processor and copier that had been used.

Each and every person whom the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee interviewed in the course of their investigation confirmed the extreme frustration that existed within the Royal Netherlands Army about the relationship with the Central Organization. The immediate cause mentioned was the problems that had arisen in relation to the statement of 17 July that Franken had signed, the missing list of 239 names and the ruined film.²⁵⁷⁶ So it was no coincidence that one of the main conclusions of the anonymous letter was that Franken's statement of 17 July was virtually meaningless in the light of the statement signed by Smith and Mladic.²⁵⁷⁷ To help restore the tarnished image of the Royal Netherlands Army, the anonymous letter writer had wanted to put the ball in the Minister's court by saying that he had withheld information; information which, if published, would certainly have focused attention on the Minister. After the Pleinteam had spoken with several members of the Legal Affairs Section of the Royal Netherlands Army, a colonel of that department, whose office was near the Cabinet of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, came forward.

The Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee reported to Voorhoeve in a confidential memorandum after the completion of the investigation. During its exploratory investigation among staff of the Royal Netherlands Army, the Pleinteam had noted a negative attitude towards the Central Organization and the Minister. During the investigation on 15 September witnesses had spoken extensively and had frequently consulted among themselves. This had continued into the evening when Colonel Zuidema, Director of Legal Affairs of the Royal Netherlands Army, spoke to 'a' colonel of Legal Affairs by telephone. In the course of this conversation Zuidema expressed his suspicion that a fellow lieutenant colonel had done it. Later that evening another colonel of Legal Affairs came forward and identified himself as the author of the letter.²⁵⁷⁸ The Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee concluded from this that in confessing his guilt the colonel had hardly been acting 'voluntarily'. The ideas expressed in this letter were shared by most of the officers of the staff. Both Kreemers and Fabius later reported attempts to thwart and manipulate the investigation of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. First of all, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had tried to remove the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee investigators from the Juliana Barracks immediately after the colonel had come forward. This had only been prevented by the direct intervention of General Roos, the Deputy Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee.²⁵⁷⁹ Evidently the army's reasoning was: the guilty person has been found, hasn't he? So why look further? After this, pressure was allegedly exerted on witnesses to give a particular statement or even no statement at all. The investigators of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee had found proof of this and the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee reported this as follows in the earlier-mentioned memo to the Minister: 'In the course of the investigation it became clear during a conversation with a witness that the investigation was being manipulated. Evidently the manipulation had taken place by putting a few officials under pressure to make a particular statement or no statement at all'.

What, in fact, had happened? General Nicolai, who was working in Sarajevo as UNPROFOR Chief of Staff at the time of the fall of the enclave, suddenly announced that he wanted to make a voluntary statement about the Smith – Mladic agreement. In doing so, he intended to say that the secret classification assigned to the agreement had been superseded by time. The implication was that the 'leaker' had not committed a punishable offence in sending the agreement to the newspapers. During the investigation of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, Nicolai found himself facing pressure from two sides. On the one hand, the Central Organization did not want him to make a statement because their main line of defence to the outside world was based on the undertaking to keep the agreement secret. In the weekend of 23 – 24 September 1995 a conversation with Nicolai did in fact take place. On the Minister's instructions and in the presence of Secretary-General Barth, the Chief of Defence Staff Van den Breemen convinced Nicolai by telephone that the agreement had not been declassified.²⁵⁸⁰ This conversation persuaded Nicolai not to make his statement.

In a hand-written note about the leaking of the Smith – Mladic agreement, Couzy partly confirmed this reading of events. According to Couzy, the Secretary-General had called him on 22 September and had asked him to speak to Nicolai in order to dissuade him from making his statement. During that conversation, so Couzy claims, he pointed out to the Secretary-General that this could be construed as manipulation. After consultation with Van Baal, it was decided that he should talk to Nicolai. On Monday 25 September Couzy heard from his Chief of Staff that during the weekend the Chief of Defence Staff had threatened Nicolai not to make a statement. According to the note, Van Baal did not speak to Nicolai until the 25th and the latter had promised only to speak about his term as Chief of Staff at the BiH Command.²⁵⁸¹

The Royal Netherlands Army, for its part, was pressuring Nicolai in exactly the opposite direction. They wanted him to make the statement on the grounds that this argument had lost its force as a new line of defence. When the efforts to make the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee abort the investigation proved fruitless, the Royal Netherlands Army Staff started to look for new arguments. The defence of the Colonel was now aimed at demonstrating that the agreement between Smith and Mladic was no longer classified in any way and that the colonel had therefore not committed a punishable offence.²⁵⁸² The Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had used this argument when the Pleinteam interviewed him on 20 September.²⁵⁸³ The notion that the agreement was no longer classified had been formulated earlier in an internal memo marked 'strictly confidential' (dated 18 September) from the Director of Legal Affairs of the Royal Netherlands Army, Colonel Zuidema, to the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army. The tone of the memo was clearly one of irritation and impatience towards the Minister: 'I am writing to point out that, as you may already know, the Minister has still not given any notification of Directive 2/95 of General Smith, particularly point 7 of the Directive. (Essential for the role of Dutchbat.)²⁵⁸⁴ Point 7 of the Directive says, among other things, that: ‘fulfilling the mandate is secondary to the safety of UN personnel’. A little further on, the memo reads: ‘Already on 12 Aug. last the Directive and the agreement were faxed by Lt. Col. De Ruiter to the Defence Crisis Management Centre!’. Zuidema struck a strikingly indignant note in his memo. Apart from this, it was basically an analysis of the elements that the Staff was putting forward to defend the anonymous letter writer.²⁵⁸⁵ For the rest, the main line of defence of the Commander and the Director of Legal Affairs of the Royal Netherlands Army was that the agreement was no longer classified. The statement they wanted from Nicolai was intended to support this line of defence with evidence from an officer who had filled a key position at UNPROFOR.

As things turned out, only internal measures were taken against the colonel. He was transferred to a different post at a completely different department and was informed that he would not be considered for further promotion. It could not be proven that the colonel was guilty of betraying state secrets; but he was guilty of betraying official secrets. The maximum penalty for this offence was one year but the Public Prosecutor held that, in view of the disciplinary measures already taken and his irreproachable record, he already had been sufficiently punished.²⁵⁸⁶

One pressing question that remains, finally, is: when did the Minister know of the talks between Milosevic, Bildt and Stoltenberg – that were also attended by Generals Smith and Mladic – which resulted in the Smith – Mladic agreement? It is clear that as early as 15 July General Nicolai reported several times on this matter from Sarajevo to the Defence Crisis Management Centre. In the chronology of his diary the Chief of Defence Staff, Van den Breemen, indicated that during a telephone conversation that day at 11 o’clock in the morning he heard from Nicolai that a meeting would be held on the same day with Milosevic, Mladic, Akashi, Bildt and Stoltenberg. That evening the Chief of Defence Staff received ‘important’ news via the bunker from Nicolai about the results of the talks in Belgrade on a tape:

‘Dutchbat can leave with the vehicles and equipment and weapons at the end of next week. The first part is better than I expected, the second part, the timescale, is disappointing. All the wounded can be evacuated tomorrow. Restocking can take place if necessary. The Commander of Dutchbat must calculate how many convoys are involved and what he needs in the way of additional vehicles. The Red Cross will be given access to the Muslim men whom the Serbs consider to be prisoners of war. Free access to the enclaves (except Bihac) by UNHCR is permitted. The Kiseljak route will be opened by UNHCR (the modality is still to be elaborated). The details of other matters are also still the subject of negotiation. Which is why Nicolai is urging not to make anything known yet. Secondary reaction after joy, let’s see it happen first before we celebrate. I consult with Hans Couzy. We agree with Nicolai’s wish. Next I contact the Minister. We too rapidly agree on the line to be followed. After some further talk, we agree that the preparations for the meeting next Friday must be very thorough. At 10.30pm the Minister calls me to say we will be meeting the next day at 3pm at the home of the Minister of Foreign Affairs.’²⁵⁸⁷

This makes it clear, first of all, that the Minister had detailed knowledge of what was going on. The same applies to Couzy. On 19 July the Chief of Defence Staff again received a report from Nicolai. That same day the Chief of Defence Staff saw to it that this important information about the Smith – Mladic agreement was passed on. According to the notes in his diary, he gave a rough indication of what was recorded in the treaty. Again there can be no doubt that the Minister and others knew what was going on. The Chief of Defence Staff gave the impression that he was constantly liaising with everyone.

The negative feelings among the staff of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army about how the Minister handled Srebrenica and the consequences are known and were discussed earlier in Part IV. Nevertheless this attack on the Minister was unexpected. In view of the frequent consultations between all parties over the telephone and in various meetings, the Minister must have assumed that no problems were to be expected. After all, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had indicated to the Chief of Defence Staff that he too felt that the agreement should be kept under wraps.

The perspective changed as soon as Dutchbat had safely left the enclave. Now the agreement was purely of historical interest. After the return of Dutchbat III, the leadership of the Royal Netherlands Army was confronted more and more with severe criticism about the way they handled information; information that invariably put the Royal Netherlands Army in a bad light. In this atmosphere the defence mechanisms were activated, eventually resulting in the type of ill-considered actions just described. In this way the Smith – Mladic agreement became an instrument in the battle that the Royal Netherlands Army was waging against what it saw as unfair treatment. The UN statement presented by the Minister to the effect that the secret classification status was still in force did not impress Couzy. He stated to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee that this had been ‘arranged’ by the Netherlands.²⁵⁸⁸ The colonel who leaked the information had merely been a mouthpiece for expressing the general feelings prevailing among the Royal Netherlands Army Staff. The poor relationships between the Central Organization and the Royal Netherlands Army that were described earlier in this chapter thus received yet another sequel in the public domain.

6. The Bunker Leak

Two months after the affair surrounding the Smith – Mladic agreement, information was again leaked to the press. This time, it was a leak in the true sense of the word. Not only were classified documents passed on to the press, but the content of confidential talks was also revealed, frequently verbatim. These talks had taken place during a closed and secret meeting on 1 November 1995 in the ‘bunker’ under the Ministry of Defence.

On 11 November 1995 an article of Frank Westerman appeared in NRC Handelsblad. This article alleged that the fall of Srebrenica was partly attributable to differences in opinion and misunderstandings between high-ranking Dutch officers in the UN line of command concerning UN permission for air support.²⁵⁸⁹ This, so Westerman claimed, was the outcome of secret talks held on 1 November in the bunker under the Ministry of Defence in The Hague. He reported that four officers from the UN line of command of UNPROFOR had been heard at this meeting. Westerman followed this up with a second article in the Saturday Supplement where he summarized the problems that the Minister of Defence was struggling with. First of all, communication between The Hague, the UN and NATO in Italy had been poor. Secondly the debriefing report contained ‘too many loose ends’ about the air support issue. Thirdly, it had to be investigated whether there were any indications that General Janvier had possibly sacrificed the enclave as part of a wider-ranging peace plan. This could explain the refusal to support Dutchbat with air strikes. The further implication was that Dutchbat had been knowingly and willingly left to fend for themselves. Finally Voorhoeve was under pressure because his possible intervention in the UN command structure made it look as if he had called off the air strikes.²⁵⁹⁰ The day after the debriefing report appeared, The Independent had published an article arguing that Janvier had already urged the UN to abandon the enclaves in May 1995. Taking this as his basic starting point, Westerman translated the matter to the Dutch arena.

²⁵⁸⁸ NIOD, Coll. Couzy. Hand-written notes, undated.

²⁵⁸⁹ ‘Onenigheid bij VN-officieren’ (‘Discord among UN officers’), NRC Handelsblad, 11/11/95.

The immediate reason for the meeting mentioned in NRC Handelsblad of 1 November was to establish the exact sequence of events surrounding the requests for air support by the battalion in Srebrenica.²⁵⁹¹ That next day Ministers Voorhoeve and Van Mierlo were to have a General Consultation with the Permanent Committee on Defence and Foreign Affairs.²⁵⁹² Two items that would definitely be on the agenda were the role of the UN and the air support issue. Only two days previously, on 30 October, the report on the major debriefing had been made public and presented to Parliament by Voorhoeve. The Minister and the leadership of the Defence Staff were of the opinion that the problems surrounding the air support had not been addressed, or at least not sufficiently. In his presentation letter to Parliament, Voorhoeve had already devoted extensive attention to the air support issue.²⁵⁹³ But he had not gone so far as to give a precise reconstruction. At the press conference held on the occasion of the presentation, Voorhoeve was unable to answer the question as to whether the UN had sacrificed the enclave. It was also clear that Parliament would sink its teeth into this issue. On 19 October NRC Handelsblad had already reported that public statements made by Dutch UN Commanders had prompted the Christian Democrats (CDA) to press for a parliamentary hearing.²⁵⁹⁴ The central focus of the matter under investigation was to be 'the attack that never came'. Given the prevailing atmosphere among parliamentarians, the article concluded that other parties would not oppose the Christian Democrats' request.

In view of the General Consultation, the coming parliamentary questions, and the subsequent debate, Voorhoeve had decided to hold the meeting in the bunker with those directly involved. According to Deputy Chief of Defence Staff Schouten, who led the debate, two questions were central in this connection: 'first, what were the thoughts of C-UNPF (Janvier) concerning air strikes and the enclaves in general and did these thoughts influence his actions and decisions during the fall of Srebrenica on 11 July 1995? and, secondly, how were the events surrounding the theme of the air strikes experienced at the various echelons?'²⁵⁹⁵ The best and most logical way of clarifying these subjects was to hear the four Dutch officers who had served in key positions at UNPROFOR. In view of the mounting pressure from Parliament to hold a hearing on this subject, it was important to do this as quickly as possible. There were too many things that remained unclear and still needed to be unravelled. Another concern in the back of people's minds was that the Minister had to be spared yet another embarrassing situation.²⁵⁹⁶ To achieve this, everyone had to follow the same line, and all the more so considering the fact that the four UN officers regularly answered questions from the press about various issues. Their willingness to speak to the press did not come to a temporary end until their debriefing in Assen in late September. Van der Wind had urged all persons involved not to have any further contact with the press until the final report appeared.

Notes of the deliberations show that – apart from the former UNPROFOR officers Nicolai, de Jonge, Brantz and de Ruiter – the meeting was also attended by: Metzelaar, Couzy and Smeets of the Royal Netherlands Army, De Winter and Princen of the Directorate of General Policy Matters and Verboom on behalf of the Directorate of Information. The two central questions of Schouten basically concerned the possible role of Dutch officers in relation to the request for air support. Another matter that needed looking into was whether the United States had foreseen the Serb attack and whether UN General Janvier had possibly allowed the enclave to fall on purpose. During the deliberations, the debriefing and the final reports were also extensively discussed insofar as the air support was concerned.

While the deliberations were still in progress, Deputy Director of Information, Bert Kreemers, returned from a meeting where journalists had been given an opportunity to exchange thoughts with Minister Voorhoeve. On arriving back at his office, he was called by Frank Westerman who asked him about the outcome of the secret meeting in the bunker that was still taking place at that very moment. Accompanied by the Chief of the Defence Staff, Kreemers went to the bunker where the deliberations were drawing to a close. He informed those present that Westerman knew of the meeting.²⁵⁹⁷ When Schouten closed the meeting, he appealed to everyone to keep everything within four walls. Kreemers also said that if anyone was approached by the press, they should contact him first.²⁵⁹⁸

The matter would certainly attract press attention. Another tricky problem was the fact that, as two months earlier with the leaking of the Smith – Mladic agreement, the press now also had a number of classified documents in their possession. In Westerman's case this was not limited to the documents used for his article of 11 November. As was clear from an article of 21 October, he had also had access to classified UNMO reports and, in addition, possessed a copy of parts of the logbook of the UNPROFOR sector headquarters in Tuzla. In response to questions from the Minister about this, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General Schouten, had carried out an investigation revealing that Westerman had received these documents from and through Dutch UN officers.²⁵⁹⁹ Subsequent talks that various persons involved had with Westerman showed how widely ramified his sources were in general, including long-standing close contacts and extensive written documents.²⁶⁰⁰

To discuss the consequences of the bunker leak, a meeting was held on 13 November between the Deputy Secretary-General, the Chief of Defence Staff, the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff and the Deputy Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, Roos. It was decided here that the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee should instigate an 'exploratory investigation'. The conclusions of the inquiry as reported by the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee were as follows:

- '(a) the journalist possesses classified documents which he, without any doubt, received from defence personnel.
- (b) the content of the article is so 'exact' that it is beyond doubt that one or several participants in the "bunker" meeting on 011195 must have spoken to the journalist.
- (c) the 'bunker' meeting was classified.
- (d) there are suspicions/indications that one of the participants in the 'bunker' meeting keeps his own private 'departmental records' which include the documents in question.
- (e) given the situation, there are three possible 'suspects' namely BG N, Col B and Lt Col De R.

The foregoing would appear to offer sufficient grounds for a ‘judicial inquiry’.
Ultimately the Public Prosecutor in Arnhem must decide on this matter.²⁶⁰¹

The exploratory investigation of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee most certainly did provide grounds for a judicial inquiry and this was initiated on 20 November under the direction of Royal Netherlands Marechaussee Captain P.H. Rutten. Very soon it transpired that two of those present at the secret meeting had had contact with Frank Westerman very shortly afterwards.²⁶⁰² Both were Netherlands Army officers who had served in staff posts at UNPROFOR. In addition, it was found that one of the two kept private records which probably contained the documents quoted by Westerman.²⁶⁰³ The inquiry extended over all those present at the meeting as well as senior civilian and military officials who could be expected to know what had been discussed at the secret meeting. Many did not shirk from trying to discredit others and lay the blame elsewhere.²⁶⁰⁴

The judicial inquiry was rounded off at the end of January 1996. Despite strong indications that a punishable act had been committed, the Directorate of Legal Affairs of the Ministry of Defence was advised: ‘..that in the case concerning the leaking of secret/confidential information from the ‘bunker meeting’ of 1 November 1995, which was published in NRC Handelsblad of 11 November 1995, it is not possible to prove legally and convincingly that one of the participants in this meeting passed on this information.’²⁶⁰⁵ The Public Prosecutor therefore concluded that none of the participants would be prosecuted. This decision prompted no in-depth analyses and the matter was given short shrift in the media. The investigation into this matter within the context of the present report also failed to establish who was the guilty party.

It was not until the beginning of 1997 that the bunker leak affair received a brief sequel. In the Netwerk programme of 24 January it was revealed that Voorhoeve had had virtually all senior civilian and military officials of his Ministry interviewed in 1995 in connection with the ‘bunker leak’ investigation that was carried out by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. Netwerk also claimed that the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee had bugged the telephone and fax of NRC Handelsblad journalist Frank Westerman. The first accusation sparked a certain amount of speculation in the press about the relationship between the Minister and the military leadership.²⁶⁰⁶ The PvdA (Labour) MP G. Valk said he would ask in Parliament whether the Minister could trust his top military personnel.²⁶⁰⁷ The Ministry categorically denied the second accusation and Voorhoeve delegated that question to the Ministry of Justice.²⁶⁰⁸ But no genuinely new insights emerged from this renewed digging into the affair in 1997. What, in fact, had prompted Netwerk’s sudden interest in this subject was the publication in mid-January 1997 of the book ‘srebrenica, het zwartste scenario’ by Frank Westerman and Bart Rijs.

In 1995 Voorhoeve had attached great importance to finding out in detail what the attitude in the UN line had been towards the Srebrenica enclave. After receiving the final report of the debriefing early in October, he concluded there was nothing to reproach Dutchbat for.²⁶⁰⁹ The problem now facing the Minister was that – disregarding the Bosnian Serbs – the guilt for what had gone wrong in Srebrenica rested with the UN and the international community. This had already led to a heated exchange with Kok, Pronk, Dijkstal, Van Mierlo and Borst during the discussions about the presentation letter accompanying the final report in the Ministerial Council on 20 and 27 October.²⁶¹⁰ They thought Voorhoeve was shirking his responsibility. Moreover Van Mierlo argued that the relationship with the UN would be damaged if all the blame were pinned on them.

The ‘bunker leak’ almost certainly arose because one of the persons involved felt the need to defend himself against the possible accusation that his actions made him partly guilty of the fall of Srebrenica. This person was one of the four officers who had filled key positions in UNPROFOR. By opening up the discussion and placing it in a broader context, it would be less relevant to probe the actions of individuals. In addition, shifting the action and responsibility to the more senior UNPROFOR level also relieved the pressure on Karremans and the battalion in relation to the air support. Viewed in this light, the same motives seen earlier in relation to the Smith-Mladic affair were again involved to a certain extent. The effect of this affair was indeed to bring the role of the UN under much closer scrutiny. The personal motive of the perpetrator was to delegate the blame to the other UN officers and the UN. He certainly succeeded in this aim.

In this sense the bunker leak came at a propitious time for Voorhoeve. After all, his conclusion that there was nothing to reproach Dutchbat for implied that the UN and the international community were to blame for the failure to provide air support. Because the discussion in political circles and the media concentrated on this aspect, the final report was viewed with a less critical eye. This was convenient, for the final report of the debriefing displayed quite a few shortcomings. But the question on everybody’s mind remained: was air support deliberately blocked to promote a peace arrangement involving the sacrifice of the enclaves?

The stir surrounding the possible guilt of the UN also distracted public attention from the final report of the debriefing, and therefore from the Royal Netherlands Army. Considering that the general conclusion was that Dutchbat was not to blame, Voorhoeve’s efforts will have been viewed with approval by the Royal Netherlands Army. The desire to restore the disturbed relationship with the Royal Netherlands Army probably also played a role with Voorhoeve. The vigour with which he defended Dutchbat certainly suggests as much. The most obvious reason for this, as was also repeatedly mentioned by Members of Parliament in the course of 1995, was that the Armed Forces were undergoing a sweeping reorganization and that the Royal Netherlands Army was having to make the greatest sacrifices. Srebrenica and its aftermath had put further pressure on the already strained relationship between the Central Organization and the Royal Netherlands Army. To bring the reorganization to a successful conclusion, it was absolutely vital to restore a relationship of mutual trust. Whether the perpetrator had also envisaged this effect is very much open to doubt.

7. The promotion of Karremans

Early in 1996 ‘srebrenica’ once again provided the media with an occasion for highlighting the stressed relationship between the Central Organization and the Royal Netherlands Army. On Saturday 13 January a VNU journalist asked Junior Minister J.C. Gmelich Meijling, who was in Eindhoven to send off Dutch military personnel, what he thought of the promotion of the Commander of Dutchbat III, Karremans, to the rank of colonel. Meijling had been informed about this that morning by J. Veen of the Directorate of Information: it turned out that neither he nor his Minister had been consulted by the Royal Netherlands Army in the decision-making procedure. A report to this effect appeared that same day in several regional newspapers.²⁶¹¹

It transpired that Karremans had been nominated for the new post of Netherlands Liaison Officer at the Training and Doctrine Command (Tradoc) in Norfolk (Virginia) as from mid-1996 in the United States.²⁶¹² The rank of colonel was attached to that post. It had been necessary to find a new job for him because he was handing over the command of the 13th airmobile battalion on 9 February of that year.

The political leadership felt bypassed, given the obviously sensitive nature of the promotion of this controversial commander. The pictures of the commander raising his glass with the Bosnian Serb General Mladic had gone round the world. His statement that there were no 'good guys and bad guys' in the conflict in Bosnia and his praise for the strategic qualities of Mladic had not gone down very well with a lot of people.

Even so, no formal breach of procedure had occurred. Transfers and promotions of colonels are ministerial decisions that are mandated to the Royal Netherlands Army. This means that the Minister and the Junior Minister need not be personally informed of promotions up to and including the rank of colonel. That authority has been mandated to the Royal Netherlands Army. The political and civil service leadership must only be informed of appointments concerning higher ranks of the Royal Netherlands Army, namely flag officers, general officers and defence attachés.²⁶¹³

Initially the issue failed to create any great publicity stir, despite the articles mentioned in the regional newspapers and, a little later, a publication in Elsevier on 27 January.²⁶¹⁴ However, G. Valk and K. Zijlstra, both members of the PvdA (Labour Party), did want to know why the Minister and Junior Minister had known nothing of the promotion. On 1 February they submitted their parliamentary questions. That evening De Volkskrant journalist Ewoud Nysingh had been invited to attend the festive installation of the new staff of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army at the Princess Juliana Barracks.²⁶¹⁵ With the information gathered there, he published two articles on 2 February headed 'Couzy bevordert Karremans tegen zijn van Voorhoeve' ('Couzy promotes Karremans against Voorhoeve's will') and 'Defensie verwijt Couzy slecht politiek inzicht' ('Defence condemns Couzy's lack of political insight'). A day later Nysingh continued his series of reports, claiming that Meijling, according to insiders, had insisted on tougher action against both Couzy and Karremans. The Junior Minister was opposed to Voorhoeve's plan to maintain Karremans as Commander in Assen for another few months.

According to Van Baal a large ally like the United States had been deliberately chosen: "They know how to handle things like this. And that has been proven too. In the three years that Karremans spent in America, nobody ever made any below-the-belt remarks about his time in Srebrenica. Not because they did not dare to; after all, he brought the matter up himself. But the way they saw it was: imagine it happening to you.' Interview A.P.P.M van Baal, 12/12/01.

He had wanted to give Karremans a different post earlier (in November); Voorhoeve, on the other hand, had intended to postpone the commander's promotion a little longer and offer him a new (regional) post in the Netherlands later in the year, a plan that Couzy had thwarted with this proposal, according to Nysingh.²⁶¹⁶

These articles unleashed a storm of indignation in the media.²⁶¹⁷ In the first place the criticism concerned this renewed manifestation of a lack of political Fingerspitzengefühl in top military circles in general and Couzy in particular. He, after all, had failed to gauge the political leadership's opinion before proceeding with the appointment. Secondly, it was in their eyes yet another instance of Voorhoeve's manifest failure to control his ministry. The PvdA (Labour) MP M. Zijlstra condemned Couzy's behaviour as 'more or less a provocation' vis-à-vis the Minister by leaving him in the dark about the promotion. 'This once again proves that the army is politically inept,' so the PvdA spokesman claimed.²⁶¹⁸ In the TV programme Buitenhof on 4 February former Defence Minister A. Stermerdink said that Voorhoeve should dismiss Couzy without notice. If he did not, he would '[give] the military leadership a free hand to side-step political authority'.²⁶¹⁹ The Minister was thus putting his credibility on the line.

Responding to this, Zijlstra reproached Minister Voorhoeve for lacking the guts to fire the commander: 'Voorhoeve should take tough action, but evidently he is not that kind of man'.²⁶²⁰ His party (PvdA; Labour) also pressed him to sack Couzy but the VVD (Liberals) did not want their own party member to go. The CDA (Christian Democrats) did not want that either, but was unsure whether the Minister still had a strong enough grip on his ministry. D66 (Democrats) refrained from expressing an opinion on the grounds that Couzy's behaviour was a matter of personnel policy, 'and that's none of our business', according to the Defence Spokesman for Personnel Affairs, M. de Koning.

Voorhoeve and Gmelich Meijling answered the parliamentary questions on 5 February. They wrote that the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had that day been told in a personal interview that it would have been wiser to have held prior consultation about Karremans' appointment and promotion. Couzy, who would be leaving a few months later upon reaching the prescribed retirement age, had then offered his apologies.²⁶²¹ The parliamentary questions also asked about the date that Couzy would be handing over his command. Though the answers did not actually go into this, another ill-considered fact emerged during the interview mentioned above: the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had initially planned to hand over his command

According to Van Baal, a discussion took place early in January 1996 between CDS Van den Breemen with the CO with a view to replacing Couzy before his official retirement because of the criticism levelled at the BLS in connection with the promotion affair, among other things. Van Baal blocked this, with the support of the army council. Interview A.P.P.M. van Baal, 12/12/01. Junior Minister Meijling was also in favour of Couzy's early departure. Interview J.J.C. on 11 July, exactly one year after the fall of Srebrenica. The significance of this date had not occurred to Couzy and the ceremony was brought forward to 4 July.²⁶²²

Zijlstra accepted the answers. The underlying intention of his questions had been to awaken greater political awareness among the military leaders: 'I hope that Schouten [Couzy's successor] learns something from this incident. But it would be rather bad form to insist on Couzy's departure at this stage. He'll be leaving shortly anyway'. D66 (Democrats) Defence spokesman J.Th. Hoekema agreed and expressed the hope that the relationships between the Central Organization and the Royal Netherlands Army would improve.²⁶²³

NRC Handelsblad regretted this stance: 'Given the man's repeated lapses, Couzy should have been given an official reprimand. He could then have done the honourable thing and resign. The fact that Couzy's retirement is only a few months off takes nothing away from this. At least his successor would then have known where he stood with this minister.' Het Parool agreed. It was after all the umpteenth time that Couzy had embarrassed a minister without censure.²⁶²⁴ The media consequently placed the incident in the broader context of the problematic relationship between the political and military leadership, in this case Voorhoeve and Couzy (see also Part IV, Chapters 5-7).²⁶²⁵ Apart from Karremans' blunders in the media, many papers referred to Couzy's remark after the fall of Srebrenica that there had been no question of genocide, despite assertions to the contrary from the Minister for Overseas Development J. Pronk and Voorhoeve. The clumsy and conflicting remarks illustrated the poor communication and erratic working relationship between the leadership of the Central Organization and that of the Royal Netherlands Army.

The army vehemently opposed the criticism. Their line of argumentation rested, as so often, on the notion that the politicians were trying to offload the entire responsibility for the fall of Srebrenica on the military, with Couzy and Karremans in the role of prime scapegoats. The mandate and equipment with which Dutchbat had been sent on their way had been completely inadequate, so the retired Lieutenant General G.C. Berkhof fulminated in De Haagsche Courant. And he went on to add that Parliament, which for that matter knew nothing whatsoever about the art of warfare, had no business meddling with the personnel policy of the Royal Netherlands Army.²⁶²⁶ Couzy was admired within the Royal Netherlands Army as a man who always stood right behind his men and continued to support them in times of criticism and tension. And that was certainly necessary when accusation-happy politicians were turning their backs on the military. What's more, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had successfully orchestrated a complicated and incisive reorganization resulting from the Defence White Paper and, subsequently, the Priorities Policy Document.²⁶²⁷

²⁶²⁵ Couzy had also already had problems with Ter Beek at the time of the decision to send Dutchbat. But Srebrenica was not the only matter that showed up the difficult relationship and cultural differences between the political and military leadership. Examples from 1996 include the differences in Couzy's thoughts about the timing of the abolition of military conscription as expressed to the CO and the Royal Netherlands Army and the presentation of his book upon retirement. ²⁶²⁷ The voice of the Royal Netherlands Army could be heard in e.g.: A. van der Horst. Berkhof's article was to have minor repercussions because of his claim at the end that Voorhoeve had had the proposal on his desk and had signed it (either with or without reading it). This turned out to be false. However, this article did prompt Christian Democrat H. Hillen to demand a clarification of the procedure which Voorhoeve and Meijling set forth in a letter of 8 February. Voorhoeve wrote Berkhof a personal letter expressing his

This was why Voorhoeve had protected Couzy.²⁶²⁸ It was important for the reorganization of the Royal Netherlands Army to be a success and the commander's cooperation was necessary to achieve that aim. There was to be no rocking the boat in public.²⁶²⁹ In a letter of 8 February to Parliament, in which the course of events was reiterated one more time, Voorhoeve and Meijling wrote:

‘The Royal Netherlands Army is currently making a major contribution to the Dutch participation in IFOR, the implementation force in Bosnia-Herzegovina. At the same time, this part of the armed forces is undergoing extensive restructuring. Lieutenant General Couzy is giving competent leadership to these changes within the army organization and to the army's conduct of various peacekeeping operations.’

They added that differences in opinion, such as about the fall of Srebrenica, ‘had been thoroughly discussed and corrected where necessary’.²⁶³⁰

The other side of the coin was that Voorhoeve's position had come under pressure: the media were already saying he himself should go.²⁶³¹ But he did not do that either.

So what exactly had happened and what role had the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army played in this connection? Though the media had directly attacked Couzy²⁶³², it later became clear that his deputy A.P.P.M. van Baal had made most of the preparations for the promotion. The Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, as Van Baal's immediate boss, was of course responsible.

The Royal Netherlands Army had already felt for a number of years that Karremans was eligible for the rank of colonel: on 27 January 1994 he was found suitable to fill colonel-level positions. He was personally informed of this on 18 March of that year.²⁶³³ In Srebrenica he had fulfilled his third Lieutenant Colonel posting, making promotion to the rank of colonel the logical next step. As noted, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army was authorized to decide on this matter.

Fairly soon after the enclave fell – presumably already in August 1995 – the question was raised as to what Karremans's new position would be. In October Van Baal discussed a colonel's position with Couzy but the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army felt the time was not yet right.²⁶³⁴ Srebrenica and the battalion commander were still the subject of fierce debate. They decided to put off their decision until 19 December 1995 when Parliament was to give its ‘final’ verdict on the fall of Srebrenica and the way in which Dutchbat had conducted itself.

The conclusion of that parliamentary debate was that the international community had been unable to avoid this disaster and that there was nothing to reproach Dutchbat for.²⁶³⁵ Van Baal immediately latched on to this line of reasoning and concluded, also in view of the extreme circumstances under which Dutchbat had had to operate, that the same applied to Karremans.²⁶³⁶ It was emphatically clear that a position was to be found in the longer term and with a low profile. The Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army contacted the Deputy Head of Personnel Affairs, Brigadier General E.M.L.H. Termont, and asked him on 21 December to set in motion the proposed appointment attached to the promotion.²⁶³⁷ As Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Van Baal was entrusted with the direction of the Advisory Committee for Management Development (MD). This council advises on career development and its advice serves as the basis for personnel placement plans.²⁶³⁸ Whenever necessary, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army is duly informed of the proposed placements. The same applies to the army council which also has the power to make amendments. Karremans himself was informed of the proposal that day. On this subject, Van Baal said in 1998 that this by no means meant the matter had been finalized.²⁶³⁹

The next meeting of the army council was on 9 January 1996. At this meeting, the transfers and appointments proposed at the time, including that of Karremans, were dealt with. Couzy chaired the meeting.²⁶⁴⁰ Van Baal described the position he had in mind for Karremans as low-key: he would be out of the public eye and have a chance to unwind and collect his thoughts. As the post was only to be filled halfway through the year, it also accommodated Couzy's wish to wait a while. There was a dominating sense of satisfaction about the proposal. According to Van Baal, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army and Lieutenant General R. Reitsma even congratulated him: 'What a great find. Good thinking'.²⁶⁴¹ The proposal also fitted in with the army council's desire to 'move forward' after the parliamentary debate. 'Let that be the end of the matter. This will stay with us for the rest of our lives [but] we can make a new start. The Minister stays. The Commander stays. Karremans gets a new post,' so the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army said to the NIOD.

Army spokesman P. Hartman was present at the army council meeting and informed the Deputy Director of Information, Kreemers, the next day on 10 January.²⁶⁴² With G. ter Kuile, Head of the Minister's Staff, they tried in vain to reconstruct the course of events. As things stood, they assumed that the promotion had been put to the Minister and the Junior Minister – who at that moment were both absent because of the Christmas recess. Shortly afterwards Van Baal called ²⁶⁴¹ According to Van Baal the army council supported this line of reasoning. The fact that neither the Minister nor the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army resigned was sufficient reason for Van Baal not to raise any further questions about Karremans' performance. Interview A.P.P.M. van Baal, 12/12/01.

Kreemers to inform him of the approved promotions, including that of Karremans.²⁶⁴³ Two days later, on 12 January, the spokesman received a call from the aforementioned VNU journalist who wanted confirmation of her suspicion that was based on information from ‘military circles’.²⁶⁴⁴ That evening Kreemers informed his minister who had returned from the Christmas recess.²⁶⁴⁵ Voorhoeve was furious when he heard the news.

So the main reason for the Minister’s anger was the fact that none of those present had realized the sensitivity of the appointment-cum-promotion or had thought of consulting him. Not Couzy; nor his deputy, Van Baal. ‘We just all misread the situation. It’s that simple, ‘ so the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army commented.²⁶⁴⁶

But was it that simple? Whatever the truth was, Van Baal stuck to the formal line. In 1994 he had promised Karremans promotion and he was honouring that promise. According to the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Karremans regularly called the office of Management Development to ask what he would be doing in the future. Van Baal saw nothing strange in that question: ‘If you are told in 1994 that you are eligible to be promoted colonel and the moment that you will be handing over the command of your battalion is drawing near, then surely it’s perfectly normal to ask: ‘What about my future? Where am I going?’²⁶⁴⁷

But the question remained whether Couzy knew about this. The Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army himself has always denied knowing about the nomination before 9 January 1996. He said that he agreed to the nomination at the time because the position (low-profile) and the effective date (not earlier than mid-1996) were in accordance with the line thought out in October. He was however irked by the fact that Karremans had already been informed, which in his view made the process irreversible. In his autobiography the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army wrote: ‘That bothered me, but such things happen in a large organization. I had been intending to inform the Minister of this promotion. Now it was too late.’²⁶⁴⁸

In 1998 the matter again reared its head when Couzy suggested in public that Van Baal had pushed the promotion through without his knowledge. ‘I was able to block that [Karremans’ promotion] once, but later my deputy General Van Baal went ahead with it behind my back. It was Karremans’ turn and that was that. That’s how military people think sometimes’.²⁶⁴⁹ Van Baal tried to set this straight towards Van Kemenade (see previous chapter). He repeated his version of events that it simply had not occurred to anyone to inform the Minister:

²⁶⁴³ According to Van Baal he had contact a day later, on 11 January, with Kreemers about the promotion of Karremans. NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Hand-written letter from Van Baal to Kreemers, 02/02/96.

The Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army described his failure to inform the minister as an ‘error’ and condemned this as yet another breakdown in communication. He told the same version of events to Elsevier, where he said: ‘Before I could write my note to the minister, a journalist was already on the phone to him’. B. Bommels, ‘Srebrenica was de waanzin ten top’ (‘srebrenica was the height of madness’), Elsevier, 06/07/96. ‘And that was obviously wrong. He [Couzy] subsequently had to offer his apologies for that; he also took responsibility for the matter (...). But in my eyes it’s not done to start exclaiming afterwards: it all happened behind my back. Because that is simply not the case (...) This is beginning to get very annoying. Couzy is starting to throw mud’²⁶⁵⁰

It certainly seems hard to believe that Couzy knew nothing of the promotion before January 1996. After all, as early as October 1995 plans were already made with his involvement to give Karremans a position at colonel level. He wanted to put it off at the time, but not call it off – nor did he grasp the opportunities for doing that in October and January. What the actual position would be (in terms of content) and as from when, he probably did not know before 9 January; but that Karremans would be made a colonel, could, in the words of Van Baal, ‘no longer be a surprise’ for Couzy.²⁶⁵¹

Be that as it may, the proceedings surrounding the promotion certainly testified to the lack of political insight among the leadership of the Royal Netherlands Army. Their awareness that the promotion of the controversial commander would meet with resistance evidently did not prevent the military leadership from going ahead with the promotion. Van Baal stuck to the formal line and saw no reason to do otherwise; not on the grounds of Karremans’ actions (what’s more, formally speaking, he had never received a negative performance appraisal), nor in response to the stance taken by the political and military leadership who, after all, had stayed put. Whether there were any other reasons for going ahead with the promotion, such as a counter-move against the political leadership, is hard to say. This is certainly possible but there is no hard-and-fast evidence for it.²⁶⁵² Presumably the military leadership wanted to manifest their support for Karremans who, as the scapegoat, had taken the brunt of the criticism.²⁶⁵³ Another factor, no doubt, was the army’s desire to keep the matter in their own hands.

The affair highlighted in no uncertain manner the poor communicative relations and the untransparent procedures within the defence apparatus.²⁶⁵⁴ There was great mistrust between the military and politicians, and the unwillingness of the military leadership to comply with the Minister taking supreme responsibility for the actions of the Royal Netherlands Army was equally great. Or as Nysingh wrote in 1997 ‘at the time of handing over the command, Schouten had already subtly hinted that he would not continue to tentatively test the limits of the primacy of the political leadership, as Couzy had done’.²⁶⁵⁵ Though Couzy’s departure on reaching the prescribed retirement age marked the exit of one heavily criticized protagonist in the Srebrenica tragedy, Srebrenica continued to hang over the ministry like an oppressive blanket of cloud.²⁶⁵⁶ It was not until 1998 that a minister felt compelled to take tough measures in an effort to restore the damaged integrity of the Ministry of Defence.

²⁶⁵³ See, for instance, the idea of retired General Major Bruurmijn: ‘Dutchbat Commander Karremans was used as a scapegoat. That was convenient for both Couzy and the minister. Karremans also drew the fire towards himself and in doing so covered others. He was rewarded for this later when he was promoted to colonel. 8. The OP-Mike incident

What came to be known as the ‘OP-Mike incident’ played an important role in the aftermath of the events in Srebrenica. Here we propose to explore how allegations that a Dutch armoured vehicle ran over a number of Muslims developed into a full-blown incident and the effects that this had on those involved. In this connection, of course, it is important to establish the extent to which the great commotion caused by this incident was, in retrospect, justified by the facts. The history of the incident is largely also the history of the manner in which the information about it reached the outside world. But what was the core of the matter?

Part 3 already dealt with the difficult circumstances under which the troops manning OP-Mike started to pull back to Potocari on 11 July.²⁶⁵⁷ The Dutchbat soldiers had seen two men being liquidated before their eyes by the local Muslim commander ‘Envir’ for trying to prevent the departure of the Dutch. Subsequently, mutual fighting had broken out and more people had been killed.²⁶⁵⁸ The group of over one hundred refugees from the village of Jaglici, where the OP was located, then slowly moved in the direction of Potocari together with the Dutch. En route large numbers of civilians from the surrounding villages and hamlets joined the column. At 8.10pm the soldier on duty recorded in the register of the Ops Room: ‘OP-M goes back, but thousands of refugees head in this direction with them. ‘Huge problem’.²⁶⁵⁹

The YPR was laden with refugees. Everybody was trying to get themselves a place. The OP-commander, who was also the driver of the YPR at the time, sergeant M.A. (Martijn) Mulder, ‘kicked’ anyone who could walk normally off the vehicle. Mothers were throwing their children onto the YPR; some fell off again. Very soon, wounded people, victims of the earlier Bosnian Serb mortar shootings, were also lying ‘three layers thick’ on the armoured vehicle. Some were therefore at risk of asphyxiation. The medic did what he could. At a certain moment Mulder heard that a woman was in labour on the hatch of the armoured vehicle.²⁶⁶⁰

Mulder was in the YPR together with his liaison officer and the gunner. Two soldiers were walking behind the vehicle and one in front. Progress was very slow and Mulder feared being cut off from the compound, also because fuel was running low: ‘It was drive, stop, drive, stop’. Captain Matthijssen had ordered him to keep the refugees behind him, but at a certain point this was no longer possible as more and more people were continuing to join the column. Mulder stopped now and then just to show them his face, to reassure them.²⁶⁶¹ On one of these occasions he saw several dozens of refugees ahead of his vehicle, mostly women, young children and elderly people. Behind him he saw countless refugees as far as the eye could reach.

Around midnight a crisis situation arose. The YPR was on the road running between the village of Susjnari, just south of Jaglici, and Potocari, just beyond the village of Milacevici. At that point of the route there was a steep rock face on the south side and, on the north side, water with a steep slope behind it. Mulder had just climbed back onto the front of the armoured vehicle when he heard a burst of fire. The column was being fired at from the north with .50 tracer bullets. Great panic and chaos immediately ensued. Refugees fell from the YPR; it was not clear to the soldiers whether they had been hit or were scrambling for cover. Mulder had to decide instantly what to do. He thought the white YPR was attracting the fire and that there would be even more victims if he were to stay put. He ordered his men to get into the armoured car and go under armour. Then he switched on the lights of the YPR and blew his horn. He then accelerated.

²⁶⁶¹ Interview M.A. Mulder, 06/10/98.

Though Mulder had looked when he drove off and the road appeared to be fairly free, he was partly unsighted because he was driving under armour. He had the impression that he had run over people. But under armour his view was restricted. This impression was however confirmed by his gunner who was responsible for keeping an eye on the driver's blind spot from his gun turret on top of the YPR. He was certain they had run over refugees. He saw how people were pressed against the rock face and pushing others away. It all went very quickly. There was no time to warn Mulder. The gunner saw at least three people end up under the tracks on the right-hand side of the YPR.

Mulder quickly drove on for another three hundred metres or so. After a bend in the road, where both the YPR and the refugees found cover, he brought his vehicle to a halt. The YPR was level with the Mosque on entering Potocari (the actual village is situated in east-west direction along the road to Susjnari, which leads to the north-south road from Srebrenica to Bratunac on which the factory complexes and the Dutchbat compound were situated). The crew discussed what had just happened. They also reported the shooting to the Ops Room of C company. Meanwhile the refugees were approaching, still in a state of great panic. No one came up to the Dutchbat soldiers to say refugees had been run over. Together they drove on to the blocking position of B Company at the T-junction with the road between Srebrenica and Bratunac. There they were met by their colleagues who told them they were to proceed to the compound; the refugees would be led onto the bus yard. Two sick people stayed on the YPR and were taken to the compound in Potocari.

After Mulder had parked the YPR in the factory hall, colleagues came out to meet them. Six of them then spoke in the bunker about the incident in order to form a clear idea of what had actually happened. The gunner knew for certain that they had run over people. Mulder then reported the incident to his Commander, Captain Matthijssen. Shortly afterwards the YPR crew heard (probably from colleagues) that blood and remains of flesh could be seen on the tracks and that these had had to be hosed down. Not everyone dared to go and look. Mulder consoled himself with the idea that this could also be the remains of a cow. The animal, that had probably been taken out of the stable by refugees, had crossed the path of the YPR when they had started to pull back. Mulder had been unable to avoid the animal and had run over it.²⁶⁶²

In Zagreb, after the battalion had returned on 22 July, Mulder was debriefed by Generals Couzy and Bastiaans. It is not clear from the written report of that interview whether the running over of the refugees was mentioned.²⁶⁶³ According to Mulder he had talked about it with Couzy, albeit briefly. This was confirmed by one of his colleagues who had already heard this in Zagreb from Mulder. Couzy himself later confirmed that Mulder had reported the incident to him, but that he had not given it any further thought. The Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had been more interested in the mutual fighting between the Muslims that Mulder had witnessed.²⁶⁶⁴

During the debriefing in Assen in September 1995, Mulder was for unknown reasons the only person who mentioned the incident involving refugees being run over. On that occasion he said that 'quite a lot of people' had ended up under the YPR²⁶⁶⁵, but added that this was not based on personal observation. Because he had not read the report carefully, he had failed to notice that this was the impression he had conveyed. The story was not included in the debriefing report that appeared in October 1995.

All personnel who had manned OP-Mike left the military. The events in Srebrenica had made a deep impression on them. Most of them could not rid themselves of the memory. When the humanist chaplain of Dutchbat III, then Major L.W.A. (Bart) Hetebrij, heard in a roundabout way of the problems that the incident had caused among some of the soldiers, he managed to contact two of them, including Mulder, in the autumn of 1995.²⁶⁶⁶ They told him the story of the refugees being run over.

Early July 1996 Hetebrij received a telephone call from the Deputy Director of Information, H.P.M. (Bert) Kreemers. He had been approached early in May by the American journalist David Rohde, who had won the Pulitzer Prize for his reports in 1995 about the execution sites where the men from Srebrenica had been killed. Rohde was now writing a book about the fall of the Safe Area and had asked the Ministry of Defence to cooperate. Kreemers had promised the Ministry's cooperation. In June Rohde sent him a list of questions, including one about the soldiers who had manned OP-Mike. The journalist wanted to know what they had seen of the Muslims' departure. Kreemers tried to put Rohde in touch with them but heard that all the soldiers involved had in the meantime left the Royal Netherlands Army. He was given the name of Hetebrij who had evidently maintained contact with the ex-soldiers.²⁶⁶⁷

In the first week of July Kreemers called Hetebrij and put Rohde's request to him. The humanist chaplain's urgent advice was to keep Rohde away from the soldiers who had manned OP-Mike. The commander of the YPR had been compelled to decide to drive through a crowd of people, including women and children. Kreemers understood from Hetebrij's words that some twenty to thirty people may have been involved. The decision to start driving had been taken in a panic and on arrival at Potocari it had been necessary to hose down the tracks of the YPR because human remains were sticking to them. Two ex-soldiers now felt the incident weighing heavily on their conscience. According to Kreemers Hetebrij said that the crew had sworn secrecy to one another, but Hetebrij later denied this when speaking to investigator Van Kemenade in 1998.²⁶⁶⁸

Since the fall of Srebrenica Deputy Director of Information Kreemers had been the most important Defence spokesman on the subject. He had tried to keep the publicity as favourable as possible for Defence, but not everyone appreciated his approach. He gradually gained a reputation among journalists of being a spin doctor. They suspected him of trying to keep the lid on the cover-up. Some only changed that opinion when it became clear after the publication of all sorts of documents that much had also been unknown to Kreemers.²⁶⁶⁹ But even within the Defence organization not everyone was enamoured with the way he went about things. Many members of the Royal Netherlands Army saw him as the mouthpiece of Voorhoeve and felt he mainly served Voorhoeve's interests.

Kreemers recognized the great political risks attached to the OP-Mike story, at least if the version he had heard was true. There was no reference to the incident in the debriefing report as the Minister might then be accused of having failed to give Parliament full information. "I will resign within five minutes flat if it turns out that Parliament has been wrongly informed and the matter is not rectified", I said two or three times in my office to those present,' said Voorhoeve.²⁶⁷⁰ One of these occasions was when the OP-Mike incident was announced. On 9 July 1996, after the telephone conversation with Hetebrij, Kreemers informed Voorhoeve, in the presence of his Head of Staff, G. (Gijs) ter Kuile. The Minister was shocked when he heard about the incident and said he would resign if it was true.²⁶⁷¹ The highly charged nature of the affair was also significant from the fact that Lieutenant General M. Schouten, Couzy's successor, already had an order lying on his desk to disband the 13th Battalion of the Airmobile Brigade. Whether the order would actually be given depended on the outcome of an inquiry that Voorhoeve had requested.²⁶⁷²

²⁶⁷² Interview H.P.M. Kreemers, 18/03/99.

The decision to this effect was taken in a conversation with Junior Minister J. Gmelich Meijling, some senior officials and the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, D.G.J. Fabius, in which Voorhoeve repeated his statement about a possible resignation. Those present decided to ask the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee to conduct an inquiry. Voorhoeve wanted to know whether the OP-Mike story had been reported during the debriefing in 1995 and whether there had been any contact with the Public Prosecutions Department.²⁶⁷³ Fabius first called Hetebrij who was shocked to hear the news. When Kreemers called him he had assumed that the story about OP-Mike was known in The Hague. Now he realized that his statement about something he had been told in confidence had acted as a wake-up call for The Hague. So Hetebrij was furious with Kreemers. When Fabius called him, he refused to cooperate on the grounds that what he knew had been told in confidence.²⁶⁷⁴ The Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee then sent two of his investigators, P.H. Rutten and C.A. Martens, around to see him. Faced with this pressure, Hetebrij promised to contact one of the persons in question and ask him to cooperate. The chaplain called Mulder who gave him his permission. Hetebrij then passed his name and address on to the investigators.

Shortly after midnight, Rutten and Martens visited Mulder to pick up his debriefing report. Mulder handed it over on condition that only the Minister would receive a copy.²⁶⁷⁵ Meanwhile, Brigadier General O. van der Wind, the former leader of the debriefing in Assen, had received a request from senior ministerial level to carry out an inquiry into the OP-Mike incident. Van der Wind instructed two members of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army, F. Pennin and Captain Triep, to take the confidential statements out of the debriefing archive. On the basis of the statements, they formulated a draft reply which they took back to Van der Wind who drew up the definite reply.²⁶⁷⁶

On Friday 11 July Kreemers was told by Minister Voorhoeve that the inquiry of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee had led to a version of the story which, certainly in terms of numbers, diverged strongly from that of Kreemers.²⁶⁷⁷ What remained unclear was whether the number he believed he had heard from Hetebrij was correct. What had transpired was that it had been mentioned during the debriefing and that there had been contact with J. Besier of the Public Prosecutions Department at Arnhem about the possibility that refugees had been run over. He, however, saw no grounds for criminal proceedings. The incident had not featured in any other statement and, even if true, it had taken place under circumstances of war.

The reference to the inquiry of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee by Voorhoeve was remarkable. As Kreemers himself noticed in 1998, that consisted of nothing more than the official report of the contacts that Rutten and Martens had with Hetebrij and Mulder on 9 July 1996. What's more, that report had merely quoted what Mulder had said about the refugees being run over in his debriefing statement.²⁶⁷⁸ The conclusion that there was no question of a new fact was drawn after comparing his statement with those of the other YPR crew members. It turned out that they had said nothing about the matter.

At the internal meeting where Voorhoeve reported the outcome of the inquiry, Kreemers received sharp criticism. He recalled that the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General A.P.P.M. van Baal, had said in no uncertain manner that this should 'on no account happen again'. It was said that the information officer had wrong-footed the Minister. In future such matters were to be handled through the Commander. Kreemers was also reproached for having caused unnecessary panic.²⁶⁷⁹ Later Van Baal declared to the NIOD that he ‘fully understood’ that Kreemers had gone directly to the Minister: “The relationship [of the Central Organization] with the Royal Netherlands Army was determined by the relationship between Voorhoeve and Couzy. So it was evident that the people at the Plein no longer wanted to have any dealings with the Royal Netherlands Army.” At the time Van Baal had shown little understanding for this: ‘so I was annoyed with him [Kreemers] about that: “(...) Bert, I see you often. I fail to understand why you did not bring this phenomenon immediately to the Army so that we could have looked into it straightaway.” Well, he didn’t do that. And then the relationship takes on a whole new dimension that can never be put right.’²⁶⁸⁰ Shortly afterwards, colleagues advised the information officer to lie low for a while. He took parental leave.²⁶⁸¹

Two years later, in 1998, the OP-Mike affair flared up violently again. The efforts to lay Srebrenica to rest seemed doomed to fail, with new or reportedly new incidents constantly coming to light. Every year, around the anniversary of the fall of Srebrenica on 11 July, the publicity would swell into a crescendo. ‘The S is in the month again’, people would say within Defence.²⁶⁸²

One of the main Srebrenica news-chasers was the current affairs programme Nova, with reporter T. Huys playing a particularly prominent role. In the summer of 1995 the editors had singled out Srebrenica as a journalistic spearhead and since then the programme had regularly caused controversy.²⁶⁸³ By now a great many parties with diverse interests had become involved with the Srebrenica affair, so that Huys, but also the other journalists who had sank their teeth into the dossier, had a field day. The people involved found that selective disclosure of information to the media was an effective way of promoting their own interests or damaging those of others.

Nova, too, made clever use of this. In the evening of 12 August 1998, Huys sent a fax to Kreemers in which he invoked the WOB (Freedom of Information Act) to request the disclosure of ‘Report 003/1996 JD’, drawn up by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee on 19 July 1996. The precise reference to this confidential document makes it clear that the reporter had been tipped off.

While preparing a reaction, Kreemers set eyes on the document for the first time. To his amazement, it appeared to confirm Hetebrij’s story about the part Mulder had played. On 13 August the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, Fabius, went to deliver the report from 1996 in person to Secretary-General D.J. Barth, who allowed Kreemers to see it. The document contained the relevant passages from Mulder’s debriefing statement. Fabius said that he had called the Chief Public Prosecutor in Arnhem, De Wit. The Public Prosecutions Department was taking over the case and the documents were already on their way to serve as a basis for a new criminal inquiry.²⁶⁸⁴ For this ²⁶⁸⁴ The OM was to investigate whether any punishable acts had been committed. The decision to carry out the inquiry was taken by the Chief Public Prosecutor in Arnhem after new material became available. Since 13 August the OM had had a report of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee from 1996 about OP-M. This had reached them after Defence had started to deal with the WOB (Freedom of Information) request from Nova. The OM would then also check the entire debriefing report again for any indications of alleged punishable acts. In e.g.: ‘Onderzoek OM naar Dutchbat’ (Public Prosecutor investigates Dutchbat); ‘Onvolledige weergave incidenten Srebrenica’ (‘Incomplete account of incidents in Srebrenica’), NRC Handelsblad, 14/08/98; ‘Toch onderzoek optreden Dutchbat’ (‘Dutchbat inquiry after all’), Trouw, 14/08/98; TK, session 1997-1998, 26 122, no. 1 (13/08/98). The Ministries of Defence and Justice together with the OM had incidentally announced in a press statement on Wednesday 12 August that, as in 1995, the recently received management report gave insufficient grounds for a criminal investigation. The reason for this statement was Nova’s claim that the management report had never reached the OM. The content had been made known to the OM in 1995 but the document had never been sent. The proviso was that this decision would be reviewed if the current inquiries revealed new facts. A day later this proved to reason the request to access information under the WOB (Freedom of Information Act) was refused. Huys was furious when he heard this. In view of his personal involvement in 1996, Kreemers decided to stop acting as a spokesman in relation to this subject.²⁶⁸⁵

Still on 13 August dr. J.A. van Kemenade and his Chief of Staff D. Bijl were at the Ministry of Defence, where they were drawing up a press release about Van Kemenade's appointment as independent investigator. He was to ascertain how Defence had handled information in this connection (see Part IV, Chapter 8). This initiative was the consequence of all sorts of painful revelations, the main source of which was the Nova TV programme. De Grave was unwilling to inherit the blot that Srebrenica had left on his predecessor's image and had therefore decided to act immediately.

Elsewhere in the ministry, De Grave and Korthals (Justice) were at that moment meeting with their respective secretaries-general and several civil servants. De Grave repeated his instructions to review all dossiers on Srebrenica once again to find out whether there were any other matters that needed to be made public or handed over to the Public Prosecutions Department. The two ministers decided to write a letter about this as quickly as possible to Parliament.

This intention was thwarted by a telephone call from the NOS News. An anonymous source had come forward with a story that dozens of Muslims had been run over by a Dutch YPR at OP-Mike. The News was planning to give the story 'big' coverage and was inviting the Minister to respond in the programme. De Grave gratefully used this opportunity to announce that a criminal inquiry was to be carried out into the events at OP-Mike and that Van Kemenade would conduct an independent inquiry.

That same evening on 13 August 1998 the parliamentary parties expressed 'shock and sadness' at the NOS News report (which was based on a 'source within the defence organization that wished to remain anonymous') that a Dutch YPR had run over and killed twenty to thirty Muslims in July 1995. 'This is a blow to the Netherlands and to the Ministry of Defence,' said MP J. Hoekema of D66 (Democrats).²⁶⁸⁶ The great political nervousness created in The Hague by the steady stream of publicity about Srebrenica since July also had a visible effect on Prime Minister Kok. On returning from holiday a few days after the NOS News report, Kok stated, without having any other information, that he was 'dismayed' and that there could be 'no question of understanding' if the reports proved to be true.²⁶⁸⁷ He was later criticized for these overhasty and strong words.

The number of people that had been run over according to the NOS News (twenty to thirty) was the same number that Deputy Director of General Policy Matters L.F.F. Casteleijn had heard in 1996 from the mouth of Kreemers and had laid down in a memo.²⁶⁸⁸ The identity of the person who had leaked the information to the NOS News remained unclear, as did the motive. Huys claimed that the 'revelation' was designed to distract attention from his journalistic digging into this issue and other sensitive matters.²⁶⁸⁹ That is possible. Now Defence was one step ahead of him. Minister De Grave could demonstrate that he had immediately taken every step to get to the bottom of the matter and had thus avoided sustaining political damage at such an early stage in his career as a minister.

The media also raked up other incidents of people being run over, some of which had long been known. Amidst the commotion, the various stories were sometimes confused or mixed up. The inquiry in 1998 by the Sebra-team of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, which had been specially set up to investigate all Srebrenica-related matters that could lead to criminal prosecution, looked into these incidents as well as OP-Mike.²⁶⁹⁰

The findings of the Sebra-team concerning OP-Mike illustrated how two years previously Defence had become convinced that Hetebrij's story was inaccurate. It also became clear from the official reports how Defence had arrived at that conclusion. Due to the description of the activities of Van der Wind and his colleagues in 1996, the inquiry unintentionally cast light on the way in which intelligence was gathered in times of political emergency. This also made it clear that the conclusion drawn in that year was essentially the same as the conclusion of the compilers of the debriefing report: Mulder's story was 'hardly' corroborated by 'supporting statements'. Nor was this outcome particularly strange. After all, both in Assen in 1995 and in 1996 General Van der Wind had been involved in the inquiry and in both cases the conclusions had been exclusively based on material from the debriefing statement; no new facts had become available. In the course of the inquiry of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee in 1998, the truth did come to light: during his interview one of the other crew members admitted having seen the YPR run over people, although in his opinion only over a small number of people. Because of the severe psychic problems that this event had caused and a number of other distressing incidents, he had kept silent about this matter all these years. He told the inquiry team that he was relieved to have told the story now. The same applied to his colleagues who made additional statements.

The Public Prosecutor decided not to prosecute the driver of the YPR, the former sergeant Mulder. Wilful intent and guilt could not be proven. In view of the critical situation – the YPR was under fire; there was great panic – the crew had taken the right decision in driving off; they had done what was to be expected to avoid casualties. There had been no violation of criminal law.²⁶⁹¹ To him and his five colleagues, the verdict that their decision had been understandable formally drew a line under a deeply distressing event. OP-Mike was a traumatic event for all Dutch parties involved and an example of the impossible dilemmas that some Dutchbat soldiers had faced. Shortly after the NOS News programme one of the former crew members of OP-Mike spoke anonymously in the press:

'shit, (...) I want to forget it all. It was all a shambles. You have no idea what we went through. Every day we were exposed to the madness of war. And now the press coolly isolates each incident and magnifies it out of proportion. Man, when you are fleeing under mortar fire [sic] you don't stop to wonder what's going on around you. You just think: how can I survive this hell? Will I ever make it back home?'²⁶⁹²

Apart from these indirect victims, there were also the refugees who had been run over and shot at. It never became clear how many there were. The media outcry in the Netherlands about the OP-Mike incident also alarmed the Bosnian press. Some media and interest groups responded with outright hostility to what they considered to be yet another instance of the anti-Muslim attitude among the Dutch military. They certainly fanned the flames. But there were also journalists who undertook serious investigative work. One of them was the former UNMO interpreter Emir Suljagic, who had come out of the enclave together with Dutchbat. He later became a journalist for the independent weekly Dani. In the summer of 1998 Suljagic also went after the story of refugees being run over, but found no confirmation.²⁶⁹³ A colleague of the daily newspaper Dnevni Avaz managed to trace a few people who

9. About Van Kemenade

The media, with the politicians in their wake, would not let go of ‘srebrenica’ after the concluding parliamentary debate in December 1995. Every year the fall of the enclave received broad coverage around 11 July. Existing reports issued by Defence, such as the debriefing report, had not yet given satisfactory answers to the events surrounding the fall of the enclave. The subjects that made the news were virtually identical, but each time the accents were different. What’s more, the object of the exercise was not just to find out exactly what had happened and who was responsible. Many assumed, or even became convinced, that the defence organization had willingly and knowingly swept unpleasant matters under the carpet to prevent putting the Ministry of Defence and the Royal Netherlands Army in a bad light. The Netherlands, so it was claimed, had covered up information on Srebrenica. In the summer of 1998 the lowest ebb in this affair was reached: the integrity of the Defence organization, and thus of the ministry, was explicitly called into doubt.

The brand new Minister of Defence, F.H.G. de Grave, promised improvements and announced that everything would be done to get everything out in the open. One of his actions was to initiate an inquiry into the collection and dissemination of information concerning the fall of the enclave.²⁶⁹⁵ The Royal Commissioner of the Province of North Holland, J.A. van Kemenade, agreed to carry out this task. The appointment of this political heavyweight was a clear indication that the government was taking the criticism seriously and that concrete action was being undertaken to bring the ongoing discussion about Srebrenica to a close.

Van Kemenade concluded that there had been no question of a cover-up in the sense of a deliberate obstruction of truth-finding efforts. He did immediately add that since July 1995 the flow of information on Srebrenica had often been muddled, sparse, haphazard, late and amateurish. Defence had also reacted rather forced to incidents.²⁶⁹⁶

De Grave heaved a sigh of relief²⁶⁹⁷. This was understandable considering there was so much at stake. In his own words: ‘I could not have continued in the job if there was any suggestion that Defence was During interviews of NIOD investigators in Bosnia after the summer of 1998, the general reaction was one of surprise and acceptance; these things happen in wartime.

²⁶⁹⁵ Several more measures followed that summer. On 13 August 1998 De Grave also announced that the OM would carry out a renewed inquiry into allegations that Dutchbat soldiers had run over Muslims (see elsewhere in this chapter). Then on 18 August 1998 the decision was taken that a parliamentary working group, later the Blaauw Committee, would investigate whether a parliamentary inquiry was necessary. The findings of Van Kemenade and the OM were awaited first. The Blaauw Committee then concluded that a parliamentary committee should investigate how the political decision-making on peacekeeping operations could be improved. This task was entrusted to the Bakker Committee which started its work on 24 March 1999. Mainly proponents of a parliamentary inquiry complained in the media about the long succession of (partial) inquiries into ‘srebrenica’ alongside the ‘major’ NIOD inquiry which, in view of the length of the project, could not yet answer any questions. In their eyes the political leadership was using all these inquiries as a means to avoid a parliamentary inquiry. In e.g. editorial, NRC Handelsblad, 14/08/98; J.A.A. van Doorn in HP/De Tijd, 21/08/98.

²⁶⁹⁶ Van Kemenade used these words at the press conference when the report was presented. In e.g. Het Parool and NRC Handelsblad, 29/09/98.

²⁶⁹⁷ The press made a big thing of De Grave’s relief. The headline in Het Parool speaks volumes: ‘De Grave haalt opgelucht adem. (‘De Grave heaves sigh of relief’), Het Parool, 29/09/98.

obstructing the truth-finding process'.²⁶⁹⁸ And: 'A minister can only do his job properly on the basis of full and correct information. Only then can he carry political responsibility'.²⁶⁹⁹

The inquiry had a calming effect; De Grave's position and that of the Ministry were no longer on the line. De Grave was praised for his incisive initiation of the inquiry and Van Kemenade for the speed with which he had reached a conclusion. Nevertheless critical noises were also heard. Van Kemenade, so it was said, had overhastily arrived at conclusions that were 'not too unfavourable' for the ministry.²⁷⁰⁰ In certain circles the decisiveness with which he presented his findings also fed, rather than removed, the feelings of mistrust.²⁷⁰¹ All this undermined the credibility of the inquiry. Doubts remained. The media frequently reproached Van Kemenade that he himself was part of the cover-up.

This reproach, in combination with the fact that the conclusions of the NIOD differ from those of the Van Kemenade report concerning the handling of certain matters (such as the debriefing, the Smith-Mladic agreement, the 'leaking' colonel, the 'Franken statement'; see elsewhere in this chapter), formed the reason for taking a closer look at Van Kemenade's inquiry in this report. How did he arrive at his conclusions and do they correspond with the sources at his disposal? Was his report motivated by the desire to close the book on Srebrenica? Why did the calls for answers continue after the inquiry?

Run-up to the inquiry

Early in August 1998 great unrest arose at the Ministry of Defence due to the persistent media attention for 'srebrenica'. The VPRO radio programme Argos and, inspired by this, Nova again made critical comments about the ruined roll of film. Parliamentary questions followed.²⁷⁰² From then onwards the subsequent Nova programmes 'impacted like meteorites on the Ministry of Defence', according to Defence spokesman Kreemers.²⁷⁰³ The question as to whether the 'missing' diary of a Dutch soldier who had served in Angola had been deliberately lost added fuel to the flames. The diary contained incriminating information and had disappeared without trace in mid-1997 after the completion of an inquiry into possible misconduct of Dutch troops on peacekeeping missions between 1992 and 1997.²⁷⁰⁴

On 11 August a crisis meeting took place at the office of the Secretary-General of Defence, D.J. Barth.²⁷⁰⁵ Something had to be done to end the persistent flow of rumours that was discrediting the ²⁷⁰² On 14 and 17 July and 11 August 1998 H. Hillen (CDA) posed written parliamentary questions about the ruined film. The questions in July came after the Argos programme on 10 July, those of 11 August after a broadcast of Nova on 8 August. Van Hillen together with M. Verhagen (CDA) posed a second series of questions on 11 August about both the ruined film and the Angola diary. <http://www.overheid.nl>

Apart from the News it had no competition to fear and could easily win a leading position. The editors often took their time to flesh out the various Srebrenica items; sometimes entire programmes were devoted to the subject. Interview T. Huys, 08/07/00.

²⁷⁰⁴ The second inquiry into the lost Angola diary is not discussed here. Van Kemenade adopted the conclusion of the IGK, Vice-Admiral J.L.A. van Aalst, that the disappearance of the diary had not resulted in the loss of the incriminating information. The relevant data could also be found in the statement of the owner of the diary. The IGK also concluded that when the inquiry was completed the diary 'had, with probability verging on certainty, been destroyed by mistake' together with material that was found to be irrelevant. integrity of the defence organization. Since the fall of Srebrenica, when the tragedy in Bosnia became a controversial affair in the Netherlands, the idea had grown among the civil service leadership that something had to be done to wipe the slate clean. Things had come to such a pass that the Minister and his staff were no longer able to do their job properly.²⁷⁰⁶ The unrest of ‘the summer of 98’ made action imperative; the political situation (a new minister on the scene) provided scope for this. Proposals along the lines of a lengthy letter with an explanation, as was Voorhoeve’s customary practice, or a parliamentary inquiry, were rejected by Barth and De Grave. The first method did not work and the second would lead to ‘an endless series of leaks and media clamour’, as the Minister put it.²⁷⁰⁷ De Grave decided to initiate an independent inquiry into the question as to whether defence personnel had impeded the truth-finding process in relation to Srebrenica. ‘such an inquiry is now necessary to cast light on the affair and clear Defence of all blame’, De Grave wrote on 18 August 1998 in a letter to Parliament.²⁷⁰⁸ If any ‘serious’ shortcomings on the part of defence officials were found, then these too must be disclosed and appropriate measures taken’. If no cover-up was discovered, trust had to be restored.

The search for a suitable leader of the inquiry first led to former Minister of Justice J. de Ruiter. He himself hesitated for health reasons; others questioned his suitability on account of his involvement as external advisor in the debriefing at Assen. The media also grumbled that this was not the right man. On 12 August De Ruiter solved the problem himself by not making himself available ‘for purely personal reasons’.²⁷⁰⁹ A talk with former Minister of Defence and former Vice-Chairman of the Council of State, W. Scholten, produced no results. De Grave then turned to Van Kemenade. The request was also made on behalf of the Prime Minister who made an ‘urgent appeal’ to the Commissioner.²⁷¹⁰ According to Van Kemenade this clinched the matter,²⁷¹¹ and on 13 August Defence announced his appointment as independent investigator. The media greeted this experienced public administrator with open arms.²⁷¹²

The first effect of De Grave’s decision was to silence the call for a parliamentary inquiry into the aftermath of Srebrenica which had been very loud in the summer of 1998. A parliamentary majority could no longer be found for this. The PvdA (Labour Party) which was initially in favour now decided to await the results of the Van Kemenade inquiry. Together with the VVD (Liberal Party), which had been opposed from the outset, the party blocked the proposal (the D66 Democrats and CDA Christian Democrats had wanted to go ahead with a parliamentary inquiry).²⁷¹³

Nature and set-up of the inquiry

The exact wording of the assignment that Minister De Grave gave Van Kemenade was: ‘to establish whether there are any indications that personnel of the Ministry of Defence and/or the defence organizations withheld or carelessly handled any facts or statements relating to the events surrounding the fall of Srebrenica or obstructed or restricted the truth-finding process in any manner.’²⁷¹⁴

There was therefore no intention to make an analysis of the events in Srebrenica before, during and after the fall. That task, after all, had been assigned to the NIOD. Van Kemenade incidentally also had a say in the formulation of his assignment. He deliberately sought to draw a clear dividing line between his inquiry and the NIOD inquiry so as not to get in the way of the latter’s work.²⁷¹⁵

In his written instructions De Grave imposed no restriction whatsoever on the manner in which the inquiry was to be carried out. As for the timescale, the Minister asked Van Kemenade to hand over his recommendations ‘as soon as possible but not earlier than permitted by the required investigative rigour’.²⁷¹⁶ The report would then be sent without delay to Parliament, as well as to the Public Prosecutions Department, so that the latter could decide for themselves whether criminal proceedings needed to be initiated.²⁷¹⁷ In view of the time pressures, Van Kemenade decided to carry out the inquiry alone, i.e. not within the context of a committee. He did receive the support he required from the civil service.²⁷¹⁸

On 28 September 1998, six weeks after he had accepted the assignment, Van Kemenade presented the 55-page report entitled Omtrent Srebrenica. Rapport over de verzameling en verwerking van informatie door de defensieorganisatie over gebeurtenissen rond de val van de enclave Srebrenica (‘About Srebrenica. Report on the gathering and handling of information by the defence organization on events surrounding the fall of the Srebrenica enclave’)²⁷¹⁹. A bulky appendix with the reports of all the interviews held and several documents was included. The report contained a reconstruction in broad outline of the events from the preliminary debriefing in Zagreb on 21 to 23 July 1995 up to and including a number of controversial issues that kept cropping up (in the media). Then the rapporteur summed up his findings, followed by a number of recommendations.

In the introduction Van Kemenade explained his method. He pointed to the importance of the context in assessing the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. He added that the main significance of his inquiry lay in the possible lessons for the future and ‘not so much’ in any justification or condemnation of those involved. He also emphasized that the inquiry and the report had no scientific pretensions.

The inquiry was based on archive material and interviews with 35 persons involved, the rapporteur continued. In this connection, he had received full cooperation and all information that he had deemed necessary from the Ministry of Defence, personnel of various parts of the armed forces and the Public Prosecutions Department.²⁷²⁰

The minister’s memo stressed the pressing nature of Van Kemenade’s inquiry in more urgent terms than the ‘letter of engagement’. In the memo De Grave asked for clarity “in the short term”.

²⁷¹⁷ The OM undertook no steps following the Van Kemenade report; as noted, a judicial inquiry into whether Muslims had been run over was already under way during ‘Van Kemenade’.

²⁷¹⁸ The support from the civil service consisted of: L.F.M. Verhey, W.J.G. Oosterveen, J. Rademaker (staff members of the Ministry of Justice), D. Bijl (Chief of Staff of Van Kemenade), J. Bos and Ms C. van Wijk of the CAOP (Centre of Labour Relations). Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica (‘About Srebrenica’), Part 1, p. 4; interview J.A. van Kemenade, 09/07/01.

In view of the confidentiality of the debriefing interviews from 1995, the rapporteur was not given access to the individual interview reports. Therefore, in order to obtain relevant first-hand information, he asked De Grave to send letters to the Dutchbat soldiers involved, the members of the debriefing and analysis teams of the debriefing in Assen, and all persons in the defence organization, requesting them to get in touch with Van Kemenade if they had any further statements to make in relation to the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. Responses were received from 28 people. Their information, in many cases obtained by telephone, provided a lot of insight into the events and circumstances in the enclave and the subsequent information gathering, handling and dissemination process. The truthfulness of these statements was not verified however, nor was anyone given an opportunity to make a counter-statement. The statements were added to the report anonymously and summarized as an appendix. Subject to the approval of those involved, this information (including name and contact address) was handed over to the NIOD. The other information was destroyed.

Findings

The general conclusion of the report was that it 'has not been found that the truth-finding process was deliberately impeded, obstructed or restricted by persons in the defence organization'.²⁷²¹ However, the rapporteur did establish 'that the information gathering, handling and dissemination process was marred by remarkable shortcomings and acts of carelessness in relation to certain points'. He particularly reproached 'Defence' and the Public Prosecutions Department (at Arnhem) for having failed on several occasions to give sufficient attention to reports of possible misconduct by some Dutch soldiers.

Next Van Kemenade went into a number of matters that had had a negative influence on the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. He describes, for instance, the time pressures under which this process had taken place in 1995 (the debriefing) and the shifting focus of attention over the years which had meant that certain aspects were not given due weight. He also stressed the changes that had occurred in the field of defence after the end of the Cold War in 1989 (and the ensuing reorganization). As a result, Defence found itself more emphatically in the spotlights of publicity and public opinion. But the organization was insufficiently familiar with or prepared for this and had taken insufficient account of the consequences – both internally and in its relations with the outside world. Outsiders were too quick to read cover-up scenarios into this 'incompetence', so the investigator asserted.

More specifically, the poor mutual relations between the various parts of the defence apparatus had adversely affected the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. Van Kemenade spoke of 'poor lines of communication and difficult relations' between the Central Organization of Defence and the Royal Netherlands Army, as a result of which the Minister 'did not consistently receive timely and sufficient information'. This had negatively influenced the image presented to the outside world.

The role of the media was also touched on. Despite their share in the truth-finding process, they had contributed to the creation of the (incorrect) impression that Defence had systematically and deliberately withheld facts and that soldiers in Srebrenica had been guilty of misconduct. The reason for ²⁷²⁰ In this connection Van Kemenade had been able to make use of the collection of copies that Defence had kept of the documents that the NIOD had requested for its inquiry. The rapporteur thus received relatively rapid access to a large number of documents.

²⁷²¹ Unless otherwise indicated, the quotes from the Findings section are from the chapter with the same title in Van Kemenade's report, Omtrent Srebrenica ('About Srebrenica'), Part 1, pp. 37-51.

this was that ‘in some cases’ incidents and situations had been presented as new facts or had not been shown in their full context.

The inquiry also highlighted the influence of the press on the political arena. Parliament had been frequently informed and MPs had also regularly requested information on their own initiative. Nevertheless on many occasions they had noticeably allowed themselves to be led by the publicity. The ‘confusing and fragmented’ flow of information caused by this made it difficult to form a complete picture of the events in and around Srebrenica. Public statements made by Dutchbat soldiers had also influenced the course things had taken after the fall. Military personnel had regularly spoken to the media out of discontent over the lack of recognition received during the debriefing, in the media and from politicians. The rapporteur therefore advocated greater understanding for Dutchbat soldiers in general, regardless of the question as to whether everyone had conducted themselves properly.

Van Kemenade was extremely critical of the stance taken by the Public Prosecutions Department, which he rebuked for showing no thorough or systematic involvement in the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. It was true that the supply of information from ‘Defence’ (i.e. the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee) to the Public Prosecutions Department had been limited and no follow-up steps for criminal proceedings had been arranged. But the Public Prosecutions Department had also been too passive. It had not taken sufficient initiatives to obtain and process information on possible punishable acts by Dutch soldiers in a timely and adequate manner.²⁷²² One of the reasons was the initial fixation on testimonies of war crimes allegedly committed by the belligerents themselves.²⁷²³

The Public Prosecutions Department argued that its restraint was deliberate. Van Kemenade found it understandable ‘up to a certain point’ that they had not wanted to trouble the soldiers who had just returned with inquiries of this nature. Even so, this had been an ‘unfortunate and unwise’ course to adopt given the Department’s duty to ensure a sound judicial procedure. Considering that signals of possible misconduct had already been heard shortly before the debriefing, heightened alertness to relevant types of behaviour during the debriefing would have been appropriate.

Van Kemenade had noted a similar attitude of restraint on the part of the Public Prosecutions Department in the first months of 1995, i.e. also before the fall of the enclave. The preliminary judicial inquiry into, for instance, the Esbit tablets affair (which incidentally occurred in the Dutchbat II period; see Part II, Chapter 9) had only been started in May 1995, even though the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee had information about this matter months earlier.²⁷²⁴ According to the rapporteur it was ‘hard to understand that no judicial inquiry of any kind was initiated’ after the Ministry of Defence received new reports of possible misconduct on 1 May 1995. The Minister had informed Parliament in a general sense about these reports and inquiries in May and June. But more specific information would have been desirable.

²⁷²² DJZ. 95000856, memo from PDJZ G.H. de Keizer to Voorhoeve, 29/08/95. She concluded that it was clear that Dutch soldiers were guilty of misconduct. This inquiry had been prompted by a report in the Haagse Courant of 12/08/95 about misconduct by Dutchbat soldiers in Lukavac (i.e. not in Srebrenica). Due to the limited scope of the inquiry, De Keizer had been unable to assess the scale of this misconduct. She believed that some of these instances of misconduct were in principle punishable and therefore concluded that the OM in Arnhem had evidently not been able to successfully prosecute the perpetrators. She emphasized, however, that it had not been made sufficiently clear that absence of criminal proceedings did not automatically entail that nothing improper had happened. Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica (‘About Srebrenica’), Part 1, p. 24.

²⁷²⁴ This preliminary judicial inquiry had started on 9 May 1995 after Voorhoeve, who had only been informed of this at the end of April, had initiated an internal inquiry on 1 May and reports had appeared in the media. The OM had already been informed in February of the aforementioned Royal Netherlands Marechaussee inquiry (20/01/95), but saw no grounds for criminal proceedings. Van Kemenade summed up a number of inquiries into possible misconduct and noted that these did not always concern the same reports of possible misconduct. On the basis of the internal inquiry mentioned, PBLs Van Baal advised the minister on 12 May not to submit a request for the initiation of a judicial inquiry. Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica (‘About Srebrenica’), Part 1, pp. 22-23 and 41; Bstas 519. 95/012, letter from Van Baal to Voorhoeve, 12/05/95.

Omtrent Srebrenica ('About Srebrenica') then singled out a number of issues which had attracted a lot of media interest. Van Kemenade concluded for instance that the development of the roll of film had 'simply been bungled on account of an unfortunate concurrence of circumstances'.²⁷²⁵ A report to the effect that Defence may have had a hand in the loss of other rolls of film had not been corroborated. A further point he made was that the information from the management report that was not related to war crimes perpetrated by the belligerents had 'not been adequately forwarded to the relevant parties'. Moreover, the inquiry into what came to be known as the YPR incident had taken place 'overhastily for reasons of political urgency'.²⁷²⁶ A more thorough inquiry would have been wiser to bring all the facts out into the open.

Another subject that attracted severe criticism from the rapporteur was the major debriefing operation in Assen. The criticism concerned both the set-up and implementation as well as its presentation in the accompanying report (see for a full description of the debriefing operation, Part IV, Chapter 7). The shortcomings of the debriefing report were attributed to the high level of abstraction with which the individual interview reports were drawn up. In addition, the elaboration of certain concrete aspects had been 'insufficiently explicit', such as the running over of refugees, the separation of men and women and the 'medical issues'. As a consequence, in some cases the debriefing report portrayed events in an 'incomplete or overly favourable' light. The exchange of information with the Yugoslavia tribunal was up to standard in so far as crimes of belligerent parties were concerned.

The follow-up to the debriefing was also flawed. Further inquiry into alleged punishable acts would have been desirable immediately after the publication of the debriefing report. 'Neither Defence, nor the Public Prosecutions Department took sufficient initiatives in this connection'. In that light Parliament in its capacity as controlling body was also rapped over the knuckles. After a lengthy debate in December 1995, the debriefing report had received broadly-based support from Parliament. But the shortcomings that Van Kemenade criticized had largely escaped their notice. Particularly the (poor) lines of communication between the debriefing organization and the Public Prosecutions Department had been completely overlooked.

Working method and points of criticism

Van Kemenade's report was thorough, informative and critical of certain aspects of the truth-finding process within the defence organization, particularly the way in which the debriefing was organized and the role played by the Public Prosecutions Department in Arnhem.²⁷²⁷ However, the interview reports in the appendix give the reader the impression that the entire information gathering, handling and dissemination process surrounding Srebrenica, the organization of this process and the time and places where it went wrong were much more widely ramified and complex than suggested in the Van Kemenade report.

As noted, Van Kemenade took six weeks to conduct his inquiry and write his report. In that short space of time he did a lot of work and gathered a large amount of information. The rapporteur, by his own admission, had been acutely aware of the time pressures. The crisis atmosphere at the ministry had to be dispelled as soon as possible. In his opinion the inquiry could be rounded off as soon as he and his staff ‘could make a statement to the Minister in a responsible manner’.²⁷²⁸ Evidently that moment arrived after six weeks.

²⁷²⁵ At the press conference Van Kemenade said resolutely: 'Please. Forget about the roll of film'. And: 'We must accept it. However improbable it may seem, the development of the film was simply bungled'. In e.g.: 'De Grave haalt opgelucht adem' ('De Grave heaves sigh of relief'), Het Parool, 29/09/98; "'Hoe onwaarschijnlijk ook, het rolletje is gewoon mislukt'" ('However improbable, the development of the film was simply bungled'), De Volkskrant, 29/09/98. He wrote in his report that his opinion about the roll of film was based on the 'available information'.

²⁷²⁶ Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica ('About Srebrenica'), Part 1, pp. 19-21 and 50-51.

²⁷²⁷ Questions about the debriefing focused on the structure and aims. The interviewees were also consistently asked about their involvement in such incidents as: the roll of film, the management report and the YPR incident, the relationship between the CO and the Army at meta level and 'lessons learned'.

Alongside admiration for the speed with which Van Kemenade completed his report, it is legitimate to wonder about the consequences of this hasty approach. It is reported that as the inquiry progressed the need arose for a more thorough exploration of certain matters. The option of postponement was even mooted, but Van Kemenade would not hear of it. However, a significant qualifying remark was added to the principal conclusion (i.e. that there were remarkable shortcomings and acts of carelessness in the information gathering, handling and dissemination process).²⁷²⁹

Time constraints will certainly have influenced the choice of interviewees. Though Van Kemenade spoke to many people involved, a number of pivotal figures were absent. These included the leader of the debriefing in Zagreb, Brigadier General G. Bastiaans, the ‘photo developer’ H.W.J. van Boetzelaer, Prime Minister Kok, Brigadier General W.F. Vader, Naval Captain H.G.J. Hegge and/or First Lieutenant L.C. van Duijn. Initially Colonel C.L. Brantz and Colonel Doctor G.D. Kremer were also not on the list, but they approached Van Kemenade on their own initiative.²⁷³⁰ Major R.A. Franken, who had not been called up either, did not come forward voluntarily because he was unwilling to cooperate with a ‘political inquiry’.²⁷³¹ Van Kemenade justified the omissions on the grounds of the limited scope of his inquiry (in relation to Hegge/Van Duijn) or the availability of material from earlier inquiries which in his view precluded the need for renewed interviews with the persons in question (in the case of Van Boetzelaer and Vader).²⁷³² It is unclear to what extent Van Kemenade’s opinion was decisive in selecting the people who were heard.

Van Kemenade largely held the interviews with the 35 people heard, with occasional assistance from his staff. All the interviewees had the opportunity to make confidential statements that would be processed anonymously. The reports of the interviews were incorporated in full in Van Kemenade’s reports, but the interviewees were given a chance to read them through and make changes or further confidential comments if they so desired. Only limited use was made of these options according to Van Kemenade.²⁷³³ It is no longer possible to find out exactly where and how such changes or further comments were made, as all this material was destroyed before the report was presented.

The rapporteur opened each interview with the standard remark: ‘I do not want to know any confidential information that I am absolutely unable to use’.²⁷³⁴ It was also impossible to establish whether Van Kemenade missed any information because of this. He himself was not under this impression; the interviewees all spoke fairly extensively in his opinion. However, the question remains whether such a restriction has consequences for an inquiry into a truth-finding process. It may have inhibited the interviewees from speaking freely. Chief of Staff of the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Colonel J.M.J. Bosch, questioned the value of the inquiry in the light of that initial remark: ‘From that moment on you can almost throw the report in the wastepaper basket’.²⁷³⁵ As the interviews progressed and Van Kemenade acquired more knowledge of the affair, he visibly got into his stride and manifested himself as a critical interviewer. In at least three follow-up interviews ²⁷³⁵ Interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99. Bosch wondered how much confidential material Van Kemenade had received on paper and how much had been destroyed. He regretted the fact that Parliament had not asked the rapporteur this. He himself was one of the persons who had been approached in writing on account of the talk with Couzy. Bosch was given the choice: if he wanted his information to remain confidential, it would be destroyed. Otherwise it would be incorporated in an appendix.

(with Voorhoeve, the Public Prosecutor at Arnhem A.P. Besier and debriefing leader Brigadier General O. van der Wind) the interviewees faced tougher questioning from him. Mostly this concerned the verification of statements made by others. Even so, the rapporteur regularly failed to persist where information clearly required further explanation. The lack of systematic and probing questioning left statements hanging in the air. He did not always seize opportunities to ask for more detail. Director of the Directorate of General Policy Matters, J.H.M. de Winter, for instance, once mentioned two examples of matters that in his view had been ‘deliberately omitted’ from the debriefing report, namely the leadership of Dutchbat and the medical affairs. When he added: ‘And I could mention a few others’, Van Kemenade let the matter rest.²⁷³⁶ In his report Van Kemenade also repeatedly passed over differences in opinion that could be heard in the reports and disregarded the complexity of causes and consequences. When asked about this by the NIOD, he pointed to the written questions that had been put to almost half of those heard after the oral interviews in order to fill this gap.²⁷³⁷ Though many subjects were touched upon in these questions, they were not thoroughly investigated.

What were the principal issues that Van Kemenade focused on? In his inquiry the rapporteur concentrated mainly on issues that were attracting a lot of media attention. Interestingly, a memo about Van Kemenade’s inquiry from De Grave dated 18 August 1998 to the chairman and the members of the Ministerial Council reconstructs the incidents that had proved particularly media-sensitive since the fall: the roll of film, the management report and the YPR incident.²⁷³⁸ In addition, it discussed the arrangements that the debriefing team had (not) made with the Public Prosecutions Department.

The choice of subjects in this memo corresponded largely with those in the subsequent Omtrent Srebrenica (‘About Srebrenica’) report. Kemenade had seen the memo: he received it at his own request when the inquiry was still in progress.²⁷³⁹ It is striking that Van Kemenade’s report hardly ventures outside the contours of the focal issues identified in the memo. In other words: the inquiry was confined to a fairly ‘narrow’ scope. Many subjects remained untouched despite their relevance to the information-gathering process.

The most striking subjects hardly paid attention to from Van Kemenade’s report were: the problems with and within the battalion leadership and the functioning of the Ministry of Defence’s internal information gathering, handling and dissemination system. Van Kemenade recognized in his report that the debriefing report should have devoted more attention to the battalion leadership. But he failed to explain why that had not happened. The functioning of the Ministry’s Directorates of Information, General Policy Matters²⁷⁴⁰ and Legal Affairs²⁷⁴¹ was also left out of the picture. Moreover, the tensions between the Crisis Staff of the Royal Netherlands Army and the Defence Crisis ²⁷⁴⁰ Informing DAB was not standard procedure, e.g. DAB was not informed of the management report. De Winter said it was a given that: ‘Certain matters were conducted between the minister and those directly involved’ and pointed in this connection to the minister’s ‘discretion’ which prevented him from telling DAB certain things. The letter contains a directive about information gathering, handling and dissemination in relation to punishable acts. DJZ had knowledge of the anonymized version of the KMar inquiry into observations relating to the roll of film (PV 13/95) with a presentation letter from Besier to J.J. Buirma of DJZ. This dossier also went to the ICTY. In order to protect the witnesses and not to jeopardize the handling of the matter by the ICTY, Besier prohibited publication of the content of the dossier. The content of the PV (official report) showed strong similarities with that of the management report. Director DJZ S.B. Ybema acknowledged to Van Kemenade that the contact between DJZ and the minister concerning the fall and during the aftermath of Srebrenica had shown severe shortcomings. DJZ. Fabius, p. 4; S.B. Ybema, p. 8.

Management Centre were not mentioned as such in the report, though this point was clearly raised in the interview reports.²⁷⁴²

'Communication flows' on a number of subjects that apparently fell outside the scope of Van Kemenade's inquiry were also relevant, but these too were not taken on board. For instance, the rapporteur failed to investigate whether the radical change (from positive to negative) in the press's opinion concerning Dutchbat's role had been partly due to the (poor) communication about and (incorrect) impression conveyed of the events in Srebrenica by the political and military leadership in The Hague. The same applied to the discussion as to whether a speaking ban had ever been imposed on the soldiers – this supposition fuelled suspicions of a cover-up among many people.

Furthermore, not all aspects that Van Kemenade did describe in his report received exhaustive treatment. Certain aspects relating to the debriefing operation and the accompanying report remained underexposed, despite being mentioned in the interview reports. For instance, he offered no opinion on the functioning of the reading and analysis teams; he confined himself to a description of their composition and tasks. The divergent working method of the 'green' team, however, had been mentioned in the reports. Van Kemenade also did nothing with comments claiming that third parties had interfered with the editing of the debriefing report.²⁷⁴³ In addition, his report focused on the YPR incident (where Muslims were run over by an armoured vehicle driving away from an OP; see elsewhere in this chapter). The interview reports, however, mentioned another, similar incident where refugees had fallen from overcrowded vehicles and been run over on the road between Potocari and Srebrenica. What is more, he asked not a single question about the first operational and psychological debriefing in Zagreb of the group of 55 and the KHO-5 (Army Hospital Organization) on 16 and 17 July 1995, though it was precisely there that many disconcerting noises and indications of incidents had been heard (see Part IV, Chapter 5). The criticism that Van Kemenade vented about the flawed judicial process was mainly levelled at the role played by the Public Prosecutions Department. The entire connection with the Defence organization was left out of consideration. It was, for instance, the obligation of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee to inform the Public Prosecutions Department, as indeed was also indicated by the Deputy Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee K.C. Roos.²⁷⁴⁴

Unwillingness or incompetence?

One of the explanations for the poor lines of communication and the difficult relations between the Central Organization (CO) and the Royal Netherlands Army, according to Van Kemenade, was the incompetence with which Defence went about its new tasks. But Van Kemenade did not mention the fundamental cultural differences between the Royal Netherlands Army and the Central Organization at the level of information gathering, handling and dissemination. Nor did he mention the army leadership's distrust of political interference and the lack of political awareness within the Royal Netherlands Army.

In the interviews however it was precisely these factors that were pinpointed as the causes of the disjointed communication. The tendency of the Royal Netherlands Army not to wash their dirty ²⁷⁴² See e.g. Voorhoeve's remark about the Sitsen of the Army that there had been an indication in the reports of the KL, and particularly of the Sitsen to the DCBC, that the consequences of the fall of the enclave had initially been seriously underestimated. This was due to the slow information gathering, handling and dissemination process and the trivialization of the events to 'really nothing special'. Excessive trivialization of these events was particularly noticeable among officers who had served for a longer period in Bosnia. Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, ('About Srebrenica'), Part 2, Appendix 4, J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 2nd interview, p. 3.

²⁷⁴³ Brantz (to Van Kemenade) and De Winter (to the NIOD) also referred to interference by J. de Rooter (buffer stocks/medical affair). P.H. Rutten mentioned the possibility that the YPR incident had been omitted from the debriefing report with the approval of the OM. Interview J.H.M. de Winter, 20/07/00; Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica ('About Srebrenica'), Part 2, Appendix 4, C.L. Brantz, p. 10; P.H. Rutten, p. 13.

linen in public had impeded the information gathering, handling and dissemination process. Requested material was not released, not even if the Minister asked for it. Voorhoeve was striving for openness but was thwarted in this endeavour. Deputy Director of the Directorate of General Policy Matters L.F.F. Casteleijn spoke in this connection of the ‘tunnel thinking’ and ‘isolation’ of the Royal Netherlands Army. He did not call their attitude insincere but was surprised to note that the Army people would sometimes say that ‘they did not see the point or necessity of reporting certain things to the Plein’.²⁷⁴⁵ Voorhoeve’s heartfelt cry about the differences in judging situations that existed between the Central Organization and that of the Royal Netherlands Army is telling: ‘It is staggering to note this and, at the same time, when you transport yourself back to that period and the psychology of the time, you can only conclude: yes, that’s how things go in such situations’.²⁷⁴⁶ As an example he mentioned the fact that the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, A.P.P.M. van Baal, had received Franken’s statement of 17 July about the deportation of the population but had laid it aside. It was only after persistent queries from the Directorate of Legal Affairs that the document surfaced one and a half weeks later.

Other glaring examples of ‘miscommunication’ between the Central Organization and the Royal Netherlands Army are the aftermath issues surrounding the Smith-Mladic agreement and the ‘bunker leak’ (see elsewhere in this chapter). Van Kemenade had been told of a concrete case where a deliberate attempt was made to obstruct the truth-finding process in relation to the Smith-Mladic agreement. But he was unable to obtain confirmation that Nicolai had been forced to refrain from making a statement that the documents in question were no longer classified. This conclusion appears to be a simplification. The readings of those involved (Van Baal, H.G.B. van den Breemen, H.A. Couzy and C.H. Nicolai) were by no means unequivocal. Nicolai, for instance, had to make an effort to recollect the advice from Van den Breemen to ‘exercise restraint’ in providing information to the press in view of the debriefing inquiry.²⁷⁴⁷ He said that he had never felt pressurized. As for statements that Couzy himself had tried to stop or impede the inquiry of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee after the identity of the leaking colonel was known, Van Kemenade simply let them lie.²⁷⁴⁸

Inveterate habits obviously cannot be changed overnight, but the Royal Netherlands Army had shown little flexibility when it came to improving the communication flows. It was found that new procedures were rarely implemented in practice.²⁷⁴⁹ A genuine cultural change was thus difficult to realize.²⁷⁵⁰ This applied, for instance, to Defence’s continuous interference with the inquiries of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee that was noted in the reports. But since the reorganization of 1990/1991 only the Public Prosecutor was empowered to start up an inquiry, and not Defence.²⁷⁵¹ Referring to this subject in his recommendations, the rapporteur merely expressed the general desirability of further reflection on the consequences of the investigative authority of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee vis-à-vis the Public Prosecutions Department, on the one hand, and vis-à-²⁷⁴⁹ DJZ. CST92/011 92001833, letter from the SG of Defence to the BLS, 27/01/92, in which the Royal Netherlands Army was requested to report matters that were politically and media sensitive to the DJZ, who would then inform the minister. Van Kemenade made a reference to this letter in his Recommendations, where he raised the question whether the recommendation of the SG possibly required any modification. ²⁷⁵⁰ See e.g. Warlicht to Van Kemenade. He said that opinions differed within the army regarding the approach to a future debriefing; openness as soon as possible versus ‘dampening things a little’. The calls for the former approach were growing louder according to him. Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, (‘About Srebrenica’), Part 2, Appendix 4, E.E. Warlicht, p. 7.

vis the political leadership, the different parts of the army and the Military Intelligence Service, on the other.²⁷⁵²

The description of the function and tasks of the Military Intelligence Service in the information gathering, handling and dissemination process was insufficiently clear, so Van Kemenade observed. That was all he had to say about the Military Intelligence Service's involvement in 'srebrenica'. Among the things he disregarded was the inquiry conducted in 1996 by the Military Security Department of the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army into extreme right-wing behaviour. This inquiry came to light in the summer of 1999 and caused a lot of commotion because the Military Intelligence Service had reportedly failed to inform the Minister of it. De Grave saw the incident as a 'crucial error of judgement' and not as a cover-up.

The matter had far-reaching consequences for the then incumbent leadership of the Military Intelligence Service.²⁷⁵³ What set the ball rolling was the statement of an officer of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, G. Klomp, on 22 June in Nova about an unpublished secret Military Intelligence Service report containing indications of alleged punishable acts. The then Deputy Head of the Military Intelligence Service/Central Organization, R. Wielinga, denied the alleged involvement of the Military Intelligence Service to the Secretary-General. Klomp had got two things mixed up. These were, first of all, the activities of Major H. Stumpers who was a member of the Operational Actions LA team for the major debriefing in Assen and who was also personally collecting information for the Lessons Learned Bureau of the Royal Netherlands Army. Debriefing leader Van der Wind ordered the discontinuation of this activity as soon as he learnt of it (see Part IV, Chapter 7). Secondly, it concerned the separate debriefings of Dutchbat soldiers by the Military Intelligence Service/Royal Netherlands Army after the debriefing operation. Klomp had learned this information from hearsay. It was true that an inquiry had been conducted into alleged right-wing extremism about one and a half years after the fall of the enclave but, in contrast to what Nova had suggested, this had not produced hard-and-fast evidence of politically inspired right-wing extremism; racist and fascist forms of behaviour were confirmed.

After frank talks between De Grave and the incumbent leadership (which incidentally had only taken office in 1997), the latter decided to resign. The 'rotten apple' had thus been removed according to the Minister. The Military Intelligence Service felt hard done by and explained the course of events to De Grave in a letter of 20 July.²⁷⁵⁴ In his letter to Parliament the Minister had, among other things, failed to mention that alleged acts had been known to the political, civil service and military leadership as well as to Parliament. Moreover, at the time it was not customary practice to report 'unevaluated information or finalized matters pertaining to the commander' to the Secretary-General or the Minister.

Van Kemenade could have learned of the alleged acts. But he had exclusively asked the Military Intelligence Service for outgoing information reports. Consequently he had not received the internal document about alleged right-wing extremism. Nor had the rapporteur been informed of such a ²⁷⁵² Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica ('About Srebrenica') Part 1, p. 54.

²⁷⁵³ Klomp's statement may have been partly inspired by the presence of the MID/KL at the debriefing. De Volkskrant observed at the time of the departure of the MID leadership, that De Grave was shielding the Army leadership. The MID leadership was not the first casualty. De Volkskrant and Trouw reported, for instance, that Srebrenica had cost Fabius promotion to Brevet Lieutenant General while the promotion of Roos to Commander of the KMar had been blocked because of his failure to deal with the misconduct of soldiers in Angola. Before then Defence spokesman Kreemers had been relieved of his duties and transferred in 1999 to a new post at Clingendael because his reputation as a spin doctor had made his position untenable. document because until the Nova programme the Deputy Head of the Military Intelligence Service had not known of the existence of an internal document comprising interview reports on this matter. According to the Deputy Head of the Military Intelligence Service, the information contained in this document had been explained during the debriefing, incorporated in the debriefing report and the account of facts, and mentioned in Voorhoeve's presentation letter with the debriefing report. Van Kemenade was in the possession of the account of facts.²⁷⁵⁵

Responsibilities

Van Kemenade's conclusion that the cooperation and communication within the defence organization was not functioning properly was correct but very general.²⁷⁵⁶ Flaws in the organizational structure had been accurately identified but this was not enough to explain the full cause of the problems. Precisely in situations where things went wrong, individual responsibilities could not be shirked. A closer look at incidents like the bunker leak and the Smith-Mladic agreement and the statement of 17 July would have revealed to what extent certain people determined, or at least tried to determine, the course of events.²⁷⁵⁷

For instance, the report contained no reference whatsoever to the criticism directed at the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Couzy by several people (including people from his own leadership circle) in their interviews with Van Kemenade.²⁷⁵⁸ Even so, apart from being responsible for his own actions, he also carried the ultimate responsibility for the Royal Netherlands Army. The reports suggested that Couzy had repeatedly impressed, or at least tried to impress, his stamp on the course of events. The report made no mention, for instance, of the dominant role that Couzy had played vis-à-vis the Minister of Defence in relation to the organization of the debriefing. Voorhoeve indicated in his interviews however that he had placed the responsibility for this with the Royal Netherlands Army in order not to disown them (see Part IV, Chapter 5).²⁷⁵⁹

Generally speaking, various parties sought to shirk their responsibility. This could be done by shifting the responsibility to their superiors or deputies – people with the greatest responsibility were often on holiday at critical times, e.g. during the handling of the roll of film, the management report and the YPR affair. The Commander of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee D.G.J. Fabius for instance referred in his absence to his deputy Roos and placed the entire responsibility for initiating criminal proceedings in the hands of the Public Prosecutor Besier. If the Public Prosecutor saw no grounds for prosecution, then Fabius endorsed that decision. He undertook no initiatives in this ²⁷⁵⁶ See e.g. Voorhoeve's critical remark about Sitcen Landmacht that there had been an indication in the reports of the Royal Netherlands Army, and particularly of the Sitcen to the DCBC, that the consequences of the fall of the enclave had initially been seriously underestimated. This was due to the slow information gathering, handling and dissemination process and the trivialization of the events to 'really nothing special'. Excessive trivialization of these events was particularly noticeable among officers who had served for a longer period in Bosnia. Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, ('About Srebrenica'), Part 2, Appendix 4, J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 2nd interview, p. 3.

²⁷⁵⁷ Also in Ko Colijn and Paul Rusman, 'Nederland heeft nog steeds een begrafenisritueel nodig' ('The Netherlands still needs a funeral ritual'), Vrij Nederland, 03/10/98. The authors blame the failing information gathering, handling and dissemination process at Defence on the power that officials had built up simply because they had a knowledge advantage and not so much because of flaws in the rules and structure. By way of example, they mention the tug of war between Voorhoeve and Couzy for the reins of power during the days before the fall.

The criticism referred to the actions and subsequent explaining and justifying by Couzy. Van Baal was extremely critical of Couzy. Schouten pointed to the element of incompatible natures which no rules can remedy. In this connection, he also pointed indirectly to Couzy. Ibid, M. Schouten, p. 7.

connection to carry out further investigations with a view to providing the Public Prosecutions Department with more information.

The long delay before the probe into the YPR incident got under way illustrated how little effort was made at various levels to address disconcerting signals in earnest. Besier expressed his surprise to Van Kemenade that Van der Wind had not informed him at the debriefing of the armoured car story (though he had mentioned other incidents where people may have been run over).²⁷⁶⁰ The Public Prosecutor only remembered the debriefing leader calling him to say that no evidence of punishable acts had been found during the debriefing. According to Van der Wind, he had informed Besier of a statement concerning an incident where people had been run over but had added that there was no material to substantiate the story. The Public Prosecutor therefore saw no grounds for a criminal investigation. According to Roos this gave the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee ‘something to hold on to’, as they were not allowed to start up an inquiry of their own accord.²⁷⁶¹

Van Kemenade naturally asked the interviewees for an explanation of the sketched problems. Many criticized the information gathering, handling and dissemination process at Defence but miscommunications were seen as human error with no malicious intent. They sprang from an inadequate organizational structure. According to the Director of Legal Affairs S.B. Ybema, Deputy Secretary-General H.H. Hulshof and Casteleijn, the defence organization was insufficiently prepared for the problems that it was confronted with. There was no organizational control structure or ‘countervailing power’. Ybema did not believe ‘in any deliberate intent or machinations’.²⁷⁶² Hulshof said that the course steered after the debriefing - ‘nothing new under the sun’ – had been decisive for the reaction to the subsequent issues: ‘The tone had been set’. It is worth noting, incidentally, that P.H. Rutten of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, Hulshof and Defence Chief of Staff and Protocol G.J. Ter Kuile did not rule out the possibility of new issues coming to light.

Several persons told Van Kemenade more concretely that information had been withheld. This concerned both the content of the individual interview reports in the debriefing report and the communication of alleged punishable acts to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee and the Public Prosecutions Department.²⁷⁶³ Kremer, humanist chaplain L.W.A. Hetebrij and De Winter were explicit in their criticism that a deliberate attempt had been made at the debriefing to present certain matters to the outside world in the most sanitized and non-confrontational manner possible or to smooth the rough edges. ‘They certainly made every possible effort to do that’, according to Kremer.²⁷⁶⁴ He described the passages about the KHO (Army Hospital Organization) team in the debriefing report as a ‘cover-up’, because ‘in these passages certain matters are omitted or expressed differently from the way ²⁷⁶⁰ There were several alleged incidents of people being run over (see elsewhere in this chapter). The interview reports do not make it clear who of those directly involved at the investigative level (Besier, Fabius, Van der Wind) knew about what incident and when. Even they got the facts mixed up. Van Kemenade made no distinction between the incidents and said in a general sense that military vehicles may have driven over dead or living refugees. As an example of the friction between the KHO team and the debriefing leaders, which had been ‘glossed over’ in the debriefing report, Kremer mentioned the handing over procedure between the KHO teams. In his eyes the battalion leadership had lied about the decision-making process in this connection. Moreover, the refusal to obey the command to wait in the bunker at the time when wounded refugees were coming in had, according to him, been deliberately omitted from the debriefing report.

they were originally said. If the Minister knows nothing about that, then I would say there is something seriously wrong with the communication between the Secretary-General and the Minister'.²⁷⁶⁵

P.H. Rutten and C. van Dijk of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee were critical of the fact that neither the management report nor the debriefing report had led to criminal proceedings. P. Rutten: 'The statements of Lieutenant [Ron] Rutten and the commander of Post M surely make it crystal clear that punishable acts may have been committed'. In this connection he pointed to Van der Wind and Besier who had done nothing with the information.²⁷⁶⁶ To many, the outstanding piece of evidence for the defence organization's failing policy, if not assumed cover-up, was 'the ruined film', even though there was no motive for ruining it (its contents after all were already known)²⁷⁶⁷ and too many people would have been involved to keep it secret (see elsewhere in this chapter). To Van Kemenade's question as to whether any facts had been withheld in a broad sense during the truth-finding process, Van Dijk replied: 'Yes, look, the facts are simply there. (...) If you just place the facts next to each other, facts have obviously disappeared. These were not disclosed to him [Besier]'. Rutten added: 'Defence at least has appearances against it'.²⁷⁶⁸ Brantz, too, was critical. He thought that certain things had been 'systematically suppressed' by the Royal Netherlands Army (as for the Defence Staff, he was unable to judge). The mere fact that the Minister had been caught unawares several times by bad news pointed to this. Van Kemenade did not press further for concrete examples.²⁷⁶⁹

Assignment with political-administrative focus

In 2001 the rapporteur still stood right behind his conclusions from 1998 that information had not been systematically withheld. He summed up his opinion as follows:

'Inaccuracies were rife due to poor lines of communication, the bad relationship between the military organization and the central defence organization, and above all with the Public Prosecutions Department. The fact that the Public Prosecutions Department was not involved in setting up the debriefing, that was totally wrong. But the impression I got through all the interviews was that this was really mainly due to inaccuracy, carelessness, [a consequence of] time pressures, an organization in transition that was totally incapable of handling its increased exposure to the public eye since the changes. They had no idea of how to deal with publicity. (...) It was a relatively closed organization where things like that do not speak for themselves. But to say: [there was] deliberate obstruction or opposition? No.'²⁷⁷⁰

What's more, he thought his criticism went pretty far. In response to the criticism that he had let certain matters lie, he pointed to the nature of the engagement, the time pressures and the fact that he had not wanted to encroach on the NIOD's territory.

Van Kemenade thus focused on the organizational structure of Defence and spotted a number of flaws. These observations are correct but do not completely cover the content of the reports. This raises the question: why did Van Kemenade accept, or in fact impose upon himself, the extremely constrained scope of his inquiry? It would seem that he allowed the need to set things right as soon as possible prevail over the truth-finding process. Viewed in this perspective, Van Kemenade's engagement had a political-administrative focus and he accepted and executed it as such.

The reactions of De Winter and Hulshof to the inquiry suggest that there was an important underlying aim: give Defence the chance to break with the past. De Winter said to the NIOD:

‘Van Kemenade could do nothing but conclude what he concluded. He is a decent and intelligent man who agreed to carry out the inquiry. But he obviously could not have come to the opposite conclusion. It would have been totally destructive for him to say: ‘I have come to the conclusion that the debriefing report is at odds with the truth’.²⁷⁷¹

The Director of the Directorate of General Policy Matters said that Van Kemenade had carried out a good inquiry but also pointed to the discrepancy with the reports: ‘If people read all these reports for a few days in succession, they will say: ‘Yes, there is more to this than meets the eye.’” There were also suggestions in the media that Van Kemenade's friendship and shared party membership with Prime Minister Kok also led him to tone down his conclusions.²⁷⁷²

Deputy Secretary-General Hulshof said that the findings could have led Van Kemenade to a different conclusion, without actually claiming that people at the top had contrived to suppress the facts. The Minister of Defence and his people were dogged by ‘srebrenica’ and they wanted to rid themselves of the problem. The main objective was to clear the air. Hulshof: ‘Of course you have to stop and think about the things that went wrong, but you also have to move forward. Van Kemenade gave us the chance to make a fresh start. To say: Yes, we made mistakes. We must do things differently’.²⁷⁷³ The Deputy Secretary-General spoke to Van Kemenade about the shape his inquiry would take: ‘At the time we had every opportunity to say: what is the best way to shake off that [negative] image?’

Van Kemenade made that possible by criticizing Defence, without actually accusing it of acting in bad faith.²⁷⁷⁴ He formulated his criticism in such a way that Defence could embark on a process of change with a view to adjusting its policy to the new needs of the times.²⁷⁷⁵

Conclusion

In the short term Van Kemenade's report certainly had the envisaged effect: calm was restored. His opinion about certain aspects of the information gathering, handling and dissemination process was well-founded and firm: particularly the debriefing operation and the Public Prosecutions Department in Arnhem received sharp criticism, as did the communication to the political leadership. De Grave termed the rapporteur's conclusions ‘tough and, with regard to certain aspects, serious’.²⁷⁷⁶ He promised to act on the conclusions. The big chill was over; the integrity of Defence was no longer fundamentally open to question. The ministry no longer laboured under the burden of the past and a window to the future had been opened.

But elsewhere, cracks were soon noted in the picture that Van Kemenade had sketched. Despite positive responses, his report was not regarded as absolutely convincing. De Volkskrant wrote: ‘Whilst containing useful recommendations, it turns a blind eye to far too many things²⁷⁷⁷ The report did not give a satisfactory answer to the underlying cause of the problems. NRC Handelsblad said that the border line between incompetence and unwillingness ‘was very thin indeed’.²⁷⁷⁸ And so the calls in the media for a parliamentary inquiry started to grow louder once again.²⁷⁷⁹ New incidents (such as the report of the Military Intelligence Service made in 1996 and released in 1999 about right-wing extremism and the publication of the Account of Facts in 1998) sowed further doubt about the value of the inquiry.²⁷⁸⁰

The central question in 1998 was whether the failing information gathering, handling and dissemination process was the consequence of deliberate intent (unwillingness) or of the sketched circumstances (incompetence). This question cried out for a speedy answer. It was essentially an administrative problem that could not be solved without an inquiry into the truth-finding process. But such an inquiry was, strictly speaking, a means rather than an end. The motive for asking this elder statesman to accept the assignment was rooted in that priority.

It was for this reason that Van Kemenade imposed a tight time schedule upon himself, interpreted the assignment very narrowly and aimed for a speedy conclusion. The inquiry itself, particularly the interviews, yielded a remarkably large amount of information and insights in that short space of time. The rapporteur concluded from this that the failing information gathering, handling and dissemination process was due to incompetence. The conclusion that could also be clearly distilled from the reports was that the efforts to keep painful matters outside the glare of publicity were aimed at damage control. In other words: identify the damage and then limit it as far as possible. This attitude sprang from a collective desire not to wash the dirty linen in public and that formed a natural part of the defence organization’s inward-looking culture. The material thus contained concrete indications for the further conclusion that a strong measure of unwillingness was also involved (as argued in the NIOD report). By ignoring critical comments about the information gathering, handling and dissemination process by and for the Army Staff in The Hague and the Ministry of Defence, both the political and military leadership of Defence escaped censure. Van Kemenade, however, guided as he was by the objective to create a new start, did not explore the unwillingness variant any further. As a result, emphasis was placed on the failure of the Public Prosecutions Department and the debriefing organization. Bypassing the responsibilities of individuals, Van Kemenade focused on the flawed organizational structure. He was thus able to arrive at a politically anodyne conclusion: there was no question of deliberate intent. It was the system that had failed.

Even so, organizations are partly made by people. As Hulshof put it: ‘We always claim that people cannot change the systems, the bureaucracy. But that, of course, is nonsense. This [Srebrenica] is a good example of how these people made these systems serve their own ends. The Royal

As an explanation of the annual resuscitation of the Srebrenica dossier (“Despite or really thanks to Van Kemenade’s inquiry”), she pointed the finger at Van Kemenade for missing an opportunity to (help) close the dossier. In her weekly column Elsbeth Etty criticized the system of setting up committees to reassure rather than to reveal. In doing so, she referred to the investigative committees headed by Oosting (fireworks disaster in Enschede), Alders (fire in Volendam bar) and Van Kemenade: the ‘elitist system where members of the governing class carry out non-committal inquiries into the administrative failings of their fellow governors’. This leads to ‘untruthfulness and murkiness, not to say downright deceit and mendacity’. She denounced the system where the government conducted inquiries into its own affairs as their independence was open to question. Netherlands Army did not want to be led and the Central Organization did not want to lead. They did not fulfil the very purpose for which they were created²⁷⁸¹ As it was not inconvenient for some of the people involved to keep certain matters out of the public eye, unwillingness was definitely also at work. The information gathering, handling and dissemination process therefore failed due to a combination of incompetence and unwillingness.

The administrative priority had led to the acceptance of a hybrid assignment: restore calm in the short term and an in-depth inquiry. It was predictable that the effect would not be long-lived. A critical report is obviously not the solution to the problem of persistent attention for and criticism of 'srebrenica'. This must be followed up by concrete measures and recognition of errors in order to meet society's need for accountable political and military leadership. A greater willingness on the part of Van Kemenade to expose the full scale of the problem could in the longer term have helped to dispel the mistrust. The inquiry failed to do this, particularly in the public domain. The wound was too deep and this suture too thin to silence the discussion once and for all.

Chapter 9

The fate of the other eastern enclaves

1. Introduction

After the fall of Srebrenica two of the three eastern Safe Areas remained alongside the Safe Areas of Sarajevo, Tuzla and Bihac. These were: Zepa and Gorazde. Zepa was the next enclave to be lost with the international community looking on powerlessly. The fall of Srebrenica did however set a process in motion that led to the London Conference on 21 July 1995, where the international community took a decisive stance regarding a possible attack on Gorazde. The 'dual key' command system was modified to permit the more forceful deployment of air power. The new system was put into practice almost immediately afterwards when a mortar attack on the Markale market in Sarajevo killed a great many people. This triggered Operation Deliberate Force during which NATO and the UN conducted extensive air attacks. After the fall of Srebrenica and the discovery of the massacres perpetrated there, this marked a new turning point in the war in Bosnia.

Though the events in Zepa displayed many resemblances with those in Srebrenica, they were to take a very different course. Gorazde was ultimately saved as a Safe Area. The international community managed to draw a single line under the leadership of the British (who were responsible for Gorazde) to stop a further advance of the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs. This too was agreed upon during the London Conference. International political intervention came too late for Zepa. Evidently the Bosnian Serbs knew only too well that the international community would not act before the London Conference. This gave them time and space to direct their attentions to Zepa, Gorazde and the western enclave of Bihac.

The loss of Zepa will be described in more detail to implicitly provide material for comparison with the circumstances in Srebrenica as described in Part III and in this Part. The London Conference itself and the subsequent events in Gorazde are only sketched in outline, as is the role of the Dutch in this connection and the events in Bosnia until the Dayton Agreement. The fighting in Bihac, where no less than five warring factions were involved but which ultimately had no consequences for the map of Bosnia, has already been dealt with in Part II and is not discussed here. This had its own long prehistory and had no influence on the fall of Srebrenica.

Strictly speaking, Zepa did not fall. The Bosnian Serbs did not capture the enclave in the way they had overrun Srebrenica. Rather, it was abandoned by the Bosnian Muslim military forces and the population after which the latter made their way as Displaced Persons to Tuzla via Kladanj.²⁷⁸² The geographical and military circumstances at Zepa were also different from those in Srebrenica. The territory favoured the resistance that the Bosnian Muslim troops were able to offer and they were also better organized than their comrades in Srebrenica. What's more, there was less cause for revenge-taking fed by events in the earlier years of the war and by Bosnian Muslim actions outside the Safe Area.

There were various protagonists. Alongside the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims, General Smith and his opponent Mladic were prominent players, while Milosevic and negotiator Bildt also had a crucial hand in preventing victims in Zepa. Wherever possible the differences with the fall of Srebrenica and the lessons learned from this tragedy will be indicated. The Netherlands played a part in the background owing to concerns over the safety of Dutchbat soldiers held by the Bosnian Serbs and fears that Dutchbat, which was awaiting the Bosnian Serbs' permission for departure, would be taken hostage after all.

²⁷⁸² Interview Hagrup Haukland, 03/05/99.

2. After Srebrenica, next objective: Zepa

After the fall of Srebrenica the UN leadership was deeply pessimistic about the possible fate of the other Safe Areas. Boutros-Ghali and Akashi detected a pattern in the behaviour of the Bosnian Serbs. The UN had been saddled with a mission impossible and not only Zepa and Gorazde would come under threat, but the Bihac area was also at risk. Apparently Boutros-Ghali was so pessimistic that he expressed the fear that Sarajevo too might be taken by the Bosnian Serbs.²⁷⁸³ On the evening of 11 July 1995 Janvier did not even rule out the possibility of the Bosnian Serbs seeking to force the UN to evacuate Zepa and Gorazde by threatening to refuse humanitarian aid into Srebrenica.²⁷⁸⁴ The Security Council was also aware that Zepa and Gorazde might be the next target but had been unwilling to include references to Zepa and Gorazde in Resolution 1004 of 12 July about the restoration of the Safe Area of Srebrenica on the grounds that the talks about this would have taken too long.²⁷⁸⁵

The fall of Srebrenica had again made the problem of the demilitarization of the Safe Areas acutely pertinent. Boutros-Ghali had already pointed to the flaws in the Safe Area concept and on 16 June 1995 the Security Council had again underlined the need for demilitarization in Resolution 998, but so far no concrete steps had been taken in this direction.²⁷⁸⁶ After the fall of Srebrenica, however, the Contact Group stressed that calls for demilitarization needed to be supported in order to promote the policy aimed at protecting the population.²⁷⁸⁷ The Russians were also of the opinion that one of the lessons to be learned from Srebrenica was that the Security Council should finally clarify the Safe Area concept. The only way to make these areas safe was to achieve a form of demilitarization acceptable to both parties.²⁷⁸⁸ The Russians incidentally believed at this stage that the demilitarization of Zepa and Gorazde was no longer feasible because the Bosnian government was opposed to it.²⁷⁸⁹ The British also regretted that the demilitarization was not supported by the Bosnian government, but added that this was still no justification for Bosnian Serb actions.²⁷⁹⁰ Stoltenberg therefore received instructions from New York to attempt to negotiate an end to the Bosnian Serb attacks on the Safe Areas as well as an official demarcation of borders and demilitarization.²⁷⁹¹ Time was beginning to run out. For the Bosnian Serbs had already set their sights on Zepa.

The Military Information Branch of the UN headquarters in Zagreb saw the frustration of the Bosnian Serbs regarding the demilitarization and the continuation of traffic between Srebrenica and Zepa as the prime motive for the attack.²⁷⁹² At the same time as launching the attack on Srebrenica on 6 July, the Bosnian Serbs had also commenced hostilities against the villages around Zepa. On 11 July the Ukrainian company came under fire from Bosnian Serb mortars and artillery and the unit was urgently requested to leave the enclave.²⁷⁹³ The Ukrainian company increasingly found itself caught between two fires. By way of a countermove, the Bosnian Muslims took over three OPs from the Ukrainians in Zepa to seize the weapons there. This tactic had already been recommended for Srebrenica but had not actually been carried out there. The Ukrainian company however had partly destroyed or disabled its weapons and armoured vehicles. Unlike in Srebrenica, the Bosnian Serbs had already emptied the UN Weapon Collection Point on 8 July but this contained little more than sixty miscellaneous weapons, only one 82 mm mortar and, most notably, two Strela ground-to-air missiles.²⁷⁹⁴

The commander of the Ukrainian battalion (who was not stationed in Zepa) was in favour of concentrating his troops in the village of Zepa. General Gobilliard, the sector commander of Sarajevo, which included Zepa, preferred to concentrate the troops at the OPs. He thought that was safer in view of the experiences at Srebrenica.²⁷⁹⁵

As usual, the Bosnian Muslims were deployed near UN positions, giving rise to the risk that the positions would come under Bosnian Serb fire and have to be abandoned. Shortly afterwards eighteen Ukrainian peacekeepers were in the hands of the Bosnian Muslims and the Bosnian Serbs in turn threatened to kill the others if NATO aircraft attacked their positions.²⁷⁹⁶ So the UN had to walk a tightrope in Zepa and there was little scope for warning off the Bosnian Serbs with the kind of tough talk used when taking up blocking positions in Srebrenica.

3. Reinforcement and air support?

With only eighty peacekeepers in Zepa and 280 in Gorazde, there was little UNPROFOR could do. From a military perspective Zepa was relatively easy to take and, after the fall of Srebrenica, the Bosnian Serbs were expected to start up an operation sooner rather than later. The UNPF headquarters in Zagreb estimated the Bosnian Muslim force in Zepa at 700 to 1300 men.²⁷⁹⁷ The location of the eastern enclaves was a complicating factor. Remote and surrounded by Bosnian Serb territory, it was virtually impossible to reinforce them with military equipment. Kofi Annan pointed out that the limited resources available to UNPROFOR meant that little could be done militarily to prevent Zepa and Gorazde from falling. Zepa was particularly vulnerable.²⁷⁹⁸

Pleas from Bosnian Prime Minister Haris Silajdzic to send more troops to Zepa merely elicited indications from New York that the tasks in the eastern enclaves could not be credibly continued and that withdrawal to central Bosnia might be unavoidable.²⁷⁹⁹ Janvier had actually been thinking along those lines for some time. The first phase of a withdrawal from Zepa had already been set in motion with the abandonment of the observation posts. This regrouping enabled the UN to negotiate a possible departure from Zepa. A number of unarmed observers could then take their place without creating a supply problem. In making this proposal to New York Janvier tried in vain to breathe new life into his old plan to abandon the eastern enclaves, which had been torpedoed earlier by the Security Council.²⁸⁰⁰

Janvier and Deputy Force Commander Ashton had explored military options for retaining the remaining eastern enclaves but Janvier had seen a largely political problem in the fact that a decision to reinforce or defend the enclaves would mean UNPROFOR fighting with the Bosnian Muslims against the Bosnian Serbs.

From a military perspective an attempt could be made to block a Bosnian Serb advance to Zepa and Gorazde, but that was likely to fail as the heavy terrain made it easy to circumvent defensive positions.

A second option was to bring in reinforcements to make the Bosnian Serbs pay a heavier price for capturing the enclaves. Ashton, however, saw no point in sending more troops as this would only worsen the supply problems and increase the vulnerability. More viable options in his eyes were the deployment of aircraft, armed with Precision Guided Munition, and land mines. Visible preparations combined with the resolution of the Bosnian Muslims to defend themselves and of the civil population to resist deportation might dissuade the Bosnian Serbs from attacking. Negotiations at all levels, together with the prevention of Bosnian Muslim raids launched from the Safe Areas, should accompany the military measures. If these steps failed, then the Security Council had to decide between peace enforcement and withdrawal, so Janvier concluded.

The only constant factor that Janvier had been able to distil from the resolutions of the Security Council was that the population had to be protected, but military action had so far failed to achieve this. In his view the UN's failure in Srebrenica had made the choice clearer than ever: side with the Bosnian Muslims or withdraw -²⁸⁰¹ Janvier had already opted for withdrawal.

The Rapid Reaction Force, which was on the point of becoming operational, could conceivably have been used to reinforce Zepa. However, this would have required opening up a corridor by force to get these troops into Zepa and that option was simply not on the table. On the contrary, in fact: Janvier took the view that it was impossible to send reinforcements and that defending the enclave was 'out of the question'.²⁸⁰² The sole option was a negotiated withdrawal. Only Gorazde offered possibilities for using the 'srebrenica model' involving a blocking position and pre-planned Close Air Support. The only practicable route was to keep crisis teams on stand-by and inform commanders of the lessons learned during the fall of Srebrenica.²⁸⁰³

In a Directive to General Smith, Janvier confirmed on 14 July that reinforcing Zepa was not feasible. It was impossible to open up an overland corridor. If the departure of the UN contingent could not be negotiated, Janvier wanted to make the UN troops less vulnerable and let them assist with the evacuation of the refugees.²⁸⁰⁴ Janvier added that the OPs in Zepa that were still manned should be abandoned in order to avoid a repeat of the situation in Srebrenica, where the Bosnian Muslims prevented withdrawal. Troops had already been pulled back from the OPs in Gorazde. The decision for Zepa was up to General Gobilliard who, as the commander of the Sarajevo sector, was also responsible for Zepa and Gorazde.²⁸⁰⁵

Zagreb did consider whether UNHCR staff should already be stationed in Zepa ahead of a possible fall of the enclave to avoid chaos, but the UNHCR representative feared that the Bosnian government would throw up a dam to prevent this.²⁸⁰⁶

Faced with the threat against Zepa, the UN took no further initiatives to step up the use of air power. Such initiatives did come from NATO. The fall of Srebrenica prompted the Military Committee to study ways of making air support to the UN more effective. After all, the fall of that Safe Area had brought the withdrawal of UNPROFOR closer. Apart from this fact, the threatening outbreak of hostilities on Croatian territory had also put the subject of air support back on the agenda. In the eyes of the Military Committee, the greatest stumbling block to the more effective deployment of NATO air power was the fact that the military leadership of UNPROFOR was still not empowered to authorize its use.²⁸⁰⁷

In addition, with further attacks on the Safe Areas in prospect, the North Atlantic Council had already concluded on 12 July that the execution of the extraction plans (Oplan 40104) had to be speeded up and the opportunities for assisting UNHCR explored.²⁸⁰⁸

Then the discussion flared up as to whether Zepa should be declared a Military Exclusion Zone; Gorazde already had this status. On 22 April 1994 the North Atlantic Council had determined that a Military Exclusion Zone could be set up in the case of attacks with heavy weapons or the threat of such attacks. In that event, Bosnian Serb attacks could provoke air strikes. But NATO could not do this of its own accord. Consultation with the UN was necessary as otherwise a 'single key' situation would arise. However, as the UN was unlikely to embrace the idea of declaring Zepa a Military Exclusion Zone, NATO did not pursue the matter. Moreover, it was uncertain whether the NATO countries would be prepared to take action and, if so, what could be done and with what means. Zepa could not be defended: this was the inevitable conclusion and there was no point in inducing a counter-reaction from the Bosnian Serbs elsewhere. The UN did not request NATO action either.²⁸⁰⁹

Air support for Zepa could therefore be ruled out for the time being. Janvier had already decided that no permission would be given for Close Air Support above Zepa as long as Dutchbat had not left Srebrenica. Air support, for that matter, was also impossible for procedural and technical reasons: there was no Forward Air Controller in Zepa and it was not possible to work with an airborne Forward Air Controller as the Ukrainians lacked the required radio equipment. Little could be done beyond maintaining an air presence (circling above the enclave). The demand of the Permanent Representative of the Ukraine to the UN to support his compatriots with Close Air Support would only endanger the lives of the UN troops and was not feasible, according to the analysis in Zagreb.²⁸¹⁰ It was made clear to the Ukrainian representative that the Rules of Engagement did not permit Close Air Support under these circumstances.²⁸¹¹ The Ukrainian Defence Minister, V. Shmarov, then approached General Smith personally. Smith replied that he had ordered an air presence above the enclave and indicated that he was prepared to recommend the use of Close Air Support as soon as UNPROFOR troops were attacked.²⁸¹²

According to the Bosnian Minister for UN affairs, Hasan Muratovic, the UN troops in Zepa had submitted a request for air support. He said that the Bosnian Muslims had recorded this on tape. At the same time Muratovic said he no longer put the blame on UNPROFOR but on individuals; next he tried to damage General Nicolai. That was a name to remember, he said, because Nicolai had lost precious hours proving he had not received a request for air support. Nicolai had reportedly received such a request in the afternoon of 18 July and had requested an air presence, but the Dutch general had not given the order to bomb. According to Muratovic he had asked Nicolai why he had not yet given that order but Nicolai had then come up with 'all sorts of elaborate tales'. Muratovic consequently suspected Nicolai of waiting for darkness to fall so that he could then say it was too late: in his eyes this was tantamount to thwarting aid to Zepa and according to him thousands of lives were thus in the hands of Generals Nicolai and Janvier.²⁸¹³

However, NATO's Supreme Allied Commander Europe (SACEUR), General Joulwan, argued in a briefing to the North Atlantic Council that Close Air Support was not feasible for Zepa which, in his view, had little chance of survival. Nevertheless Joulwan sent Admiral Smith to Zagreb to discuss cooperation with Janvier and to see whether Zepa could thus be spared the same fate as Srebrenica. Janvier told Admiral Smith, however, that Zepa was doomed to fall because he could not reinforce it.²⁸¹⁴ Janvier therefore indicated in a directive to Smith that, given these circumstances, he was unwilling to consider air support.²⁸¹⁵

Even though air power had virtually no role to play in the case of Zepa, the Netherlands also took specific steps to avoid becoming involved in any air operations above Zepa. Chief of Defence

Staff Van den Breemen was against Dutch F-16s becoming engaged there. After the Close Air Support at Srebrenica and as long as Dutchbat was effectively held hostage by the Bosnian Serbs, his main priority was not to provoke the Bosnian Serbs. Major General C.J. van den Burg, Director of Operations of the Royal Netherlands Air Force, was instructed to arrange this with NATO. Van den Burg was unhappy with this assignment: on the one hand, the aircraft were not allowed to fly below 10,000 feet anyway; on the other hand, he could not guarantee that they could be identified as not being Dutch aircraft. From an operational point of view, the withdrawal of the Dutch aircraft was not a big problem for NATO: there were enough aircraft to maintain an air presence above Zepa.²⁸¹⁶

The Netherlands also included a proviso in the North Atlantic Council about the creation of an Exclusion Zone in Zepa. It would not oppose the initiation of the procedure agreed in this connection but if any danger to the Dutch hostages in Bratunac were to arise as a result, the Dutch government would feel compelled to contact the UN to call a halt to the air operations. SACEUR Joulwan promised he would bring the Dutch position to the attention of Admiral Leighton Smith.²⁸¹⁷ It was a fairly far-reaching and exceptional step that was prompted by concerns over the safety of the Dutchbat soldiers being held hostage.²⁸¹⁸ Or as Prime Minister Kok said, 'at the present moment we do not feel immediately called upon to be the first to help protect one of the two other enclaves while we are still up to our necks in trouble with four hundred men.'²⁸¹⁹

The impression that the negotiators Stoltenberg and Bildt, like General Smith, had got from their contacts with the Bosnian government was that the Bosnian Muslims assumed that Zepa was lost but would nevertheless protest vociferously.²⁸²⁰ The UN headquarters in Zagreb started to realize that plans already needed to be made in case aid to refugees from Zepa and Gorazde was necessary.²⁸²¹

Faced with the unavoidable fall of Zepa, Minister Van Mierlo wondered in the General Council of the EU on 17 July whether it wouldn't be wise to consider evacuating the population. 'Knowledge creates responsibility', Van Mierlo said in reference to Srebrenica. In his view such a decision was morally justifiable even though it entailed the risk of being accused of cooperating with ethnic cleansing. After it became clear that both President Izetbegovic and Prime Minister Silajdzic had responded positively to evacuation, EU negotiator Bildt was instructed to work out the details, assuming there was still enough time to implement this option.²⁸²² At an earlier stage UNHCR had already made preparations for the evacuation of the population but at that time the Bosnian government was still opposed to such a step.²⁸²³ As far as the Netherlands was concerned, the Dutch/Belgian transport battalion could be used for this purpose.²⁸²⁴ In any case, one of the lessons learned from Srebrenica was that refugees needed proper accompaniment and that every effort had to be made to ensure that UN observers, UNHCR and the International Red Cross were present from the word go.²⁸²⁵

Muslim lines on the north side of Zepa. At that time such an action fitted in with the objective stated in relation to Srebrenica, namely to separate the enclaves and restore the dominance of the Bosnian Serbs in the area between the two enclaves.²⁸²⁶ On the same evening as the fall of Srebrenica, General Mladic announced that the attack on Zepa would be launched and appointed General Krstic as the commander of the operation.²⁸²⁷ But the Bosnian Serbs could not immediately set this plan in motion because the column of men fleeing from Srebrenica to Tuzla was taking up a lot of their attention and even forcing Bosnian Serb units that were already near Zepa to return. In the second instance the units were to be ready to advance on 17 July.²⁸²⁸

Initially, incidentally, the Bosnian Serbs had tried to seize the enclave without a fight. On 13 July the Bosnian Serbs tried to persuade the Bosnian Muslims to lay down their weapons, after which the population could choose to stay or leave. No answer was given; it was the Bosnian Muslims who wanted to fight.²⁸²⁹

The Bosnian Serbs, unlike the UN, estimated the initial Bosnian Muslim force at around 1200 men, who had subsequently been joined by a further seven hundred to one thousand soldiers from Srebrenica. In addition, the Bosnian Serbs were worried about groups of Bosnian Muslims who could still be anywhere between Srebrenica and Zepa and who could disturb the preparations for an attack. Drina-Corps Commander General Krstic unfolded a plan according to which the Milici and Bratunac Brigades, the 1st Vlasenica Brigade and the 1st and 5th Podrinje Brigades were to attack Zepa along several routes. Most of these troops had been engaged in the fighting around Srebrenica and, so the general reasoned, that success would no doubt have strengthened their motivation to capture Zepa too. The population and UNPROFOR were not to be targeted. Both groups were to be collected and placed under protective guard. Warning was given, however, that armoured UNPROFOR vehicles might have been stolen by the Bosnian Muslims and were consequently a legitimate target. The Bosnian Serbs' acute shortage of fuel is evident from the instruction that fuel tanks were not to be filled more than halfway.²⁸³⁰

On 15 July the Bosnian Muslim Army Commander Rasim Delic issued orders to defend Zepa with all possible means. There was no alternative. He believed that any hesitation in offering resistance could have only one outcome: wholesale massacre. Negotiations with the Bosnian Serbs had to be avoided at any price as those could merely lead to an exodus and certain death. Delic pointed out that none of the men from Srebrenica aged between 16 and 60 had reached Tuzla. Everything had to be done to block the work of UNPROFOR and seize their weapons for the Bosnian Muslims' own use. In addition, panic among the population was also to be avoided. The command had obviously learned from the events in Srebrenica. In this connection, Delic referred in particular to the actions of the military and civil leadership there, the actions of the Bosnian Serbs and what he called UNPROFOR's cooperation in the genocide. In addition, Delic gave military instructions to relinquish part of the enclave to shorten the lines of defence.²⁸³¹

Meanwhile, the Commander of the 2nd Corps of the ABiH, Sead Delic, who was in charge of the area in which Zepa was located, exerted pressure on Brigadier General Haukland, the Commander of Sector North East, to stop the Bosnian Serb attack and bring in humanitarian aid. In doing so, he ignored the fact that Zepa was not in the latter's area of command. Delic said that if Haukland failed to meet this request, he would be held personally responsible and Delic would be unable to prevent acts of revenge against his person.²⁸³²

To prepare for the reception of new flows of refugees into Tuzla, Haukland made an urgent appeal to the Minister of UN affairs, Muratovic, not to send still more refugees to Tuzla Air Base, which was already overcrowded with refugees from Srebrenica, but to look for reception facilities in Zenica. Muratovic had not wanted to make this undertaking but the Minister for Refugee Issues, Cero, had made this pledge.²⁸³³

5. Negotiations and battle

In the estimation of the UNPF headquarters at Zagreb, Zepa's chances of survival were very small. On 15 July Zagreb thought that the Bosnian Serbs could start advancing at any moment and that the Bosnian Muslims would lack the will and motivation to defend the enclave. The prognosis therefore was that the Bosnian Serbs would achieve the same result as in Srebrenica but in a much shorter space of time.²⁸³⁴

The Bosnian government was also gloomy about the prospects. At the express request of President Izetbegovic, General Smith and he met on 17 July to discuss the options for evacuating the population of Zepa in an emergency. Izetbegovic divided the population into two categories: the sick, wounded and elderly and the rest. He made no mention of soldiers. Smith did not so much foresee logistical problems but was unsure whether the Bosnian Serbs would grant permission.

Izetbegovic then asked Smith to contact Mladic in order to find out whether he would grant permission. Mladic did not appear averse to the idea and was prepared to discuss it with Smith. However, the Bosnian Serbs were wary of 'Muslim tricks' and proposed that, as a mark of good will, two representatives of the Bosnian government should attend the meeting with Smith at a location of Mladic's choice. Mladic offered a guarantee of safe conduct.

Izetbegovic agreed and appointed a Bosnian Muslim general and a civil servant as his representatives. Mladic was satisfied with the names given and arrangements for the meeting were set in motion. The Bosnian government had second thoughts, however, arguing that a meeting should take place on neutral territory. Smith, now acting as messenger between the two, continued his efforts to arrive at some sort of agreement. Mladic demanded unconditional surrender, after which arrangements could be made for the evacuation of the population. But before the population left, all fighting had to stop and all weapons handed over to the Bosnian Serbs. The Bosnian government turned down the demand to surrender all weapons before the negotiations. A proposal for a meeting without prior conditions was indignantly rejected by Mladic. He suspected the Bosnian government of playing for time. He stuck to his condition of unconditional surrender and a meeting at a location of his choice. Izetbegovic turned this down.²⁸³⁵

The next surprising twist came on 19 July when Mladic told Smith that a Muslim delegation in Zepa had surrendered to him; in his view, this meant that Zepa had fallen. At the same time, Mladic asked Smith to meet him and a representative of the International Red Cross the next morning in Rogatica and to send fifty trucks and fuel in case the population wanted to be evacuated to the region of the Federation. In addition, Mladic asked Smith to let the Muslim representatives know that he was willing to work together with them to ensure the entire operation proceeded safely. The wounded could be brought to Sarajevo in UN vehicles and the population could be taken to Kladanj.²⁸³⁶

Mladic did incidentally stipulate that only he would decide who of the men could leave and who would be placed in detention. Nor would Mladic tolerate British Joint Commission Observers (JCOs), who acted as the eyes and ears of General Smith, being present in Zepa.²⁸³⁷ Mladic said all this to General Nicolai in Bratunac during the departure of Dutchbat. However, there were no JCOs in Zepa anyway, as the British government considered the situation in Zepa to be so dangerous that they would not allow General Smith to send a JCO team there.²⁸³⁸

Meanwhile, no one really knew whether Zepa had fallen or not. The UN in New York was unable to confirm this on 20 July. Mladic had already spoken with Civil Affairs in Sarajevo about the exchange of prisoners of war and the prisoners of war still to be captured in Zepa – if this was refused, the shelling of Zepa would resume – and sixty Bosnian Serb buses had been observed on the edge of the enclave, but Mladic's statement turned out to be premature.²⁸³⁹

In the evening of 21 July the fighting had started up again, but the Bosnian Serbs were in two minds whether to launch an infantry attack or not. They were worried that losses could be heavy in the inhospitable territory. Zepa was much more difficult terrain for the attacking force than Srebrenica. The Bosnian Muslims managed to hold the lines because the Bosnian Serbs did not press the attack. The local authorities let the Ukrainian commander know that they were intending to confiscate all UN equipment in order to facilitate their flight from the enclave.²⁸⁴⁰

On 24 July the seven thousand inhabitants of Zepa were surrounded by the Bosnian Serbs, who were constantly shelling and attacking the village. There were heavy casualties, with dozens of people being killed or wounded on both sides every day. The Bosnian Muslim lines had not yet been broken anywhere, but this seemed only a matter of time. A conversation between the Bosnian Muslim Chief of Staff in Zepa, Hamdija Torlak, and General Bjelajac in Sarajevo revealed that the defenders feared suffering the same fate as their comrades in Srebrenica; these apprehensions were fuelled by stories told by a group of 150 men who arrived from Srebrenica and a group of 53 men, some of whom were wounded, who were exhausted and shocked by what the Bosnian Serbs had done to the people in Konjevic Polje. It was said that one thousand men had been massacred.²⁸⁴¹ The defenders were running out of ammunition and soon none would be left. The scene appeared to be set for the Bosnian Serbs' next massacre, particularly as there were no international observers in the region. The commander of the disarmed Ukrainian peacekeepers had sought protection from the Bosnian Serbs.²⁸⁴²

This situation remained on a knife-edge for several more days. The London Conference held in response to the fall of Srebrenica on 21 July gave short shrift to Zepa. The central issue there was the prevention of the fall of Gorazde (see below). In New York too the attention was mainly focused on preventing the larger and strategically more important town of Gorazde from falling into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs.²⁸⁴³ Or, as Janvier noted, though the fall of Zepa was not yet a reality, international public opinion and the governments of the troop-contributing nations had already accepted and sanctioned this.²⁸⁴⁴ All this elicited an angry response from the UN representative for Human Rights, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, who said that the world leaders should look into the eyes of the citizens of Zepa who were facing the same tragedy that had befallen Srebrenica.²⁸⁴⁵ During the conference Van Mierlo pointed to his earlier suggestion of a 'pre-emptive evacuation' of the population of Zepa on the grounds that the UN would have to withdraw from indefensible areas.²⁸⁴⁶

Smith was unable to contact Mladic at the agreed meeting point in Rogatica.²⁸⁴⁷ It was not until 25 July that Mladic and Smith met, at the latter's request, to speak about the situation in Zepa. The meeting took place in Han Kran.²⁸⁴⁸ This time Mladic did bring along an agreement signed by the Chief of Staff of the Zepa Brigade of the ABiH, Hamdija Torlak. The agreement set forth arrangements for a ceasefire and an evacuation of the population, except for men of military age. These were to be exchanged for Bosnian Serbs under the supervision of UNPROFOR.²⁸⁴⁹ The International Red Cross was not happy with the situation and wondered whether sufficient safety guarantees were in place. Both the VRS and the Bosnian authorities had been offered assistance for the evacuation of the population provided that both parties agreed and the population clearly also wanted this.²⁸⁵⁰

The agreement with Hamdija Torlak depended on three conditions which, according to Smith, none of the parties could satisfy. The ceasefire had to be enduring, the Bosnian Muslims had to lay down their arms and accept prisoner of war status until an exchange took place, and the Bosnian government had to agree to an exchange of prisoners of war. Smith had accepted the agreement as a fait accompli. It was not clear to Smith whether the local Bosnian representatives were authorized to conclude such an agreement or whether the Bosnian government endorsed it; Minister Muratovic, for instance, said that he had no knowledge of the agreement. Hamdija Torlak was not a representative of the Bosnian government and had no authority. Muratovic assumed that this was another Bosnian-Serb trick, comparable to the one a week earlier when Mladic had told Smith that Zepa had surrendered. The Bosnians would however accept an evacuation from Zepa provided it was carried out by UNPROFOR in order to prevent a repetition of Srebrenica where people had been pulled from the buses.²⁸⁵¹

Even so, there appeared to be a good chance that an arrangement for the evacuation of the population would be reached and implemented. In a letter to the chairman of the Security Council, Izetbegovic requested that the evacuation of the population would take place under the protection of UNPROFOR and that General Smith would be permitted to use force to protect the convoys. After the fall of Srebrenica and after the Security Council had failed to make even the slightest attempt to defend Zepa, surely the UN could at least undertake to save the women and children of Zepa. Izetbegovic made no mention of the men.²⁸⁵²

Mladic was subsequently unwilling to do business with the Bosnian government because Minister Muratovic had drawn his good intentions into doubt. Mladic did however accept a talk with Muratovic to organize the exchange of prisoners. In order to ensure the smooth implementation of the agreement, a liaison group and a company of French UNPROFOR soldiers had been transferred from Sarajevo, and the presence of the International Red Cross and the media had been arranged to deter the Bosnian Serbs from committing crimes. Furthermore, UNPROFOR was responsible for registering and assisting refugees who wanted to leave the enclave and was available to act as an intermediary in the exchange of prisoners of war.

After this meeting with Mladic, Smith went on to Zepa to continue the talks with Mladic, review the situation and set the evacuation of the wounded in motion. At that moment representatives of the International Red Cross and UNHCR were already in Zepa. As in Srebrenica, the train of events swept along at a speed that UNPROFOR and the Bosnian government were unable to keep up with.²⁸⁵³

The evacuation was already under way before Smith arrived in Zepa. The Dutch TV news even reported how Mladic had generously offered Smith buses and trucks to transport the wounded when it became clear that the UNPROFOR ambulances and vehicles would need another two and a half hours to reach Zepa.²⁸⁵⁴

Smith also made the same demand that he had made earlier to Mladic, i.e. that UNPROFOR personnel would be allowed to escort the buses transporting the population to Kladanj. A further sixty French soldiers arrived at night for this purpose. Mladic also agreed to allow organizations like UNHCR and the International Red Cross to travel freely to Zepa and raised no objections to the arrival of a CNN TV crew. The world could then witness how things were being done, said Mladic.²⁸⁵⁵

On 25 July a convoy with wounded civilians and relatives left for Sarajevo. That evening the first convoy of refugees also departed for Kladanj. The Bosnian Serbs had provided 21 buses for this. Each bus was escorted by UNPROFOR soldiers. A second convoy was planned for the morning of 26 July.²⁸⁵⁶ The population, excluding the men of able-bodied age, came down from the mountains to await the arrival of the buses that would take them to Kladanj. Many houses were on fire, evidently set alight by the people themselves.²⁸⁵⁷ UNPROFOR representatives got the impression that the Bosnian Serbs were intending a less aggressive ethnic cleansing than in Srebrenica.²⁸⁵⁸

As things turned out, the evacuation of the civilians of Zepa led to few problems despite the constant changes in circumstances and moods. Muratovic did claim, however, that two women and an estimated thirty men had been pulled from a bus. Also, there was no one within UNPROFOR who could give assurances that all buses that had left Zepa had actually arrived in Kladanj.²⁸⁵⁹ The refugees had received better treatment and they also looked less exhausted and anxious than the refugees from Srebrenica. Reports from UNHCR and in the media confirmed this impression²⁸⁶⁰ even though, unlike in the case of Srebrenica, the Bosnian authorities did not allow journalists to speak with the refugees.²⁸⁶¹

6. Departure of the men from Zepa

The biggest problem was the departure of men of military age from Zepa. This group comprised 1500 to 2000 men. They were staying in hiding while awaiting guarantees for their departure. On 26 July the Bosnian Serbs were in all population centres and it did not look as if they intended to continue fighting.²⁸⁶² Mladic confirmed in talks with Bosnian Muslim representative Hakija Torlak that those who handed in their weapons would be registered by the International Red Cross. However, unless the Bosnian government backed this plan, the men would be afraid to act upon it. But the surrender of weapons was a matter for the Bosnian Muslim Commander Avdo Palic. Mladic therefore proposed that Smith and Muratovic should clear up this point the next day. Mladic said that as 'a professional soldier

he had a code of honour' but could not be held responsible if the men tried to cross the Drina or break out.²⁸⁶³

Later in the night of 25 July, Smith met Izetbegovic and Muratovic to give his report. It turned out that Izetbegovic had already obtained a copy of the agreement through Bosnian Serb channels and declared that he was prepared to exchange five hundred Bosnian Serb prisoners of war for two thousand men from Zepa. Izetbegovic feared however that Mladic would change his mind and not honour his part of the agreement. Another problem for the Bosnians was that they too suspected that Hakija Torlak had been forced to sign the agreement and that he had not been acting with the approval of the Bosnian Muslim Commander Avdo Palic or of the Bosnian Muslim army in Zepa. The extreme difficulties that Smith faced as he tried to operate in the heat of the moment are evident from the reproach he received from Muratovic that UNPROFOR was assisting in the evacuation from Zepa and even without the approval of the Bosnian government and that UNPROFOR was therefore responsible for the registration of the population and the checks in Kladanj.²⁸⁶⁴

Apart from the talks between Smith and Mladic, negotiations were in progress at the airport of Sarajevo about an exchange of prisoners of war and the role to be played by UNPROFOR in this connection. These talks however became deadlocked over the question as to which party was to take possession of the weapons. The Bosnian Muslims wanted to hand the weapons over to UNPROFOR, the Bosnian Serbs wanted to take the weapons themselves. Another sensitive issue concerned the question what to do with the group of men (estimated by UNPROFOR at three thousand men) who had reportedly been taken prisoner at Srebrenica. The Bosnian Serbs refused to hand over lists of these men – in reality they had already been murdered.

Chief Civil Affairs Officer David Harland, who was chairing the talks, believed that the Bosnian government had by now accepted that the Bosnian Muslims had been defeated at Zepa but did not rule out that groups would fight on. The 'srebrenica option', a military solution followed by a humanitarian disaster, thus remained a possibility.²⁸⁶⁵

All hopeful thoughts about a speedy settlement of the fall of Zepa were thus almost immediately dashed to the ground. UNPROFOR was also becoming increasingly concerned about other Safe Areas. The results of the London Conference had hardly filled the Bosnian Serbs with awe. Mladic publicly announced that the autumn would not only see Zepa and Gorazde in Bosnian Serb hands but also the Bihac area and, finally, Sarajevo, thus bringing the war to an end,²⁸⁶⁶ though Mladic did add to journalists that he would not need to attack Gorazde if the Bosnian Muslims handed over their weapons.²⁸⁶⁷ Meanwhile the situation in Gorazde remained tense and fierce fighting in the Bihac area had set a large flow of refugees in motion.²⁸⁶⁸

The hostilities around Zepa were beginning to subside, however. Regular combat units of the Bosnian Serb army had been pulled back and replaced with reservists. These seemed unlikely to start up operations to drive the Bosnian Muslims out of Zepa. Smith expected them to continue the siege and prevent the men from escaping. Smith had to decide whether the UNPROFOR personnel should stay on in Zepa. The Bosnian Serbs were refusing to let supplies through and UNPROFOR personnel were becoming mixed up with Bosnian Serb troops in their efforts to track down civilians still in the enclave. The Bosnian Serbs gave no guarantees for their safety and they could easily be taken hostage. Smith was particularly worried that something might happen to the French soldiers. There were still an estimated 1500 Bosnian Muslim troops and 2800 civilians left in Zepa and these would only be prepared to surrender if guarantees were given for a safe departure. Smith was worried that in this case it would be very difficult to separate the soldiers from the civilians.

The Bosnian government insisted that UNPROFOR should stay and help the people to reach safety. Mladic reportedly continued to demand surrender to the Bosnian Serbs and was unwilling to compromise. Smith felt that for moral reasons UNPROFOR should stay in Zepa for as long as civilians remained there. Withdrawal would be tantamount to abandoning them to their fate. It would also undermine the credibility of UNPROFOR and saddle the UN with negative publicity as well as difficulties with the Bosnian government. The risk of hostage-taking had to be taken, but Smith did put the matter to Akashi and Janvier.²⁸⁶⁹

The Croatian offensive changed the mood among the Bosnian Serbs in the days thereafter. At the next meeting that Smith had with Mladic, again at the former's request to resolve the Zepa issue, he found Mladic a changed man. Mladic made a tired and harassed impression. He was visibly strained by the serious military and humanitarian situation that had arisen in the Livno valley where the Bosnian Serbs were confronted with fifty thousand refugees as a result of the Croatian offensive. Zepa was no longer as high on Mladic's agenda as a few days previously. An exchange of prisoners of war had still not been arranged and Mladic remained unwilling to make concessions on that point. He claimed that the evacuation of the population had been completed but did not allow Smith to have patrols carried out to check whether anyone had stayed behind. According to Mladic, the Bosnian Muslim army was breaking out in the direction of Gorazde and Kladanj and to Serbia. Mladic offered a free conduct for the withdrawal of UNPROFOR but had no objection to UNHCR and the International Red Cross staying. Evidently certain things had also gone wrong: men who had been promised safe conduct to Kladanj had been taken prisoner. This was a matter of great concern to Smith, particularly as it would make the Bosnian Muslim soldiers still roaming around in the hills totally unwilling to surrender, while also doing little to encourage sympathy for the refugees that the Bosnian Serbs were confronted with. These arguments cut no ice with Mladic.²⁸⁷⁰

Talks about an exchange of prisoners continued but the standpoints of the warring factions remained as far apart as ever. The Bosnian Serbs would not budge and continued to demand the surrender of the men in Zepa. After this, an exchange could take place. The Bosnian Muslims too held on to their demand that the men should be evacuated and kept out of the hands of the Bosnian Serbs. They would be freed anyway after an exchange, so they argued. Mladic, for his part, stepped up the pressure by setting a deadline, after which any men who had not surrendered would be attacked. Muratovic countered by saying that the Bosnian Muslims would not surrender but that negotiations should continue nevertheless. UNPROFOR tried to work out a solution other than total surrender and the Bosnian Serbs appeared to hope that continuation of the fighting would lead to a fait accompli. The conclusion of UNPROFOR was: 'we appear to be in a mess'.²⁸⁷¹

On 30 July the talks between the Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims about the evacuation of the Bosnian Muslims came to an end. Neither party had any new proposals to make. The Bosnian Serbs appeared to have abandoned the idea of a negotiated evacuation and were intending to cleanse the area at their own pace. Zepa was no longer a priority for Mladic now that he had his hands full with the Croatian offensive. The senior members of the General Staff had travelled to Banja Luka and Mladic let Smith know that he was no longer interested in an exchange of prisoners. It also meant for

In the inaccessible area around Zepa the Bosnian Muslims ensconced on the mountain slopes and in the caves continued the struggle. The Bosnian Serbs were unable to achieve a victory but were combing the area to flush out any remaining Bosnian Muslim fighters. The road to the north via Srebrenica was cut off and the routes to Muslim areas at Gorazde and Sarajevo were far away and dangerous. One of the few escape routes left entailed crossing the Drina River to Serbia. Smith had already asked Bildt to persuade Milosevic to exert pressure on Mladic to give UNPROFOR better access to Zepa. Bildt also received the request from Muratovic to ask Milosevic whether the safety of the Bosnian Muslim soldiers crossing the Drina River could be guaranteed.

The flight across the Drina appeared to give a sudden twist to the situation and offer a way out of the morass. Bildt feared however that if Mladic were informed of the organized flight or found out about it himself, this could lead to a renewed massacre similar to the one that had taken place at Srebrenica. Secrecy was therefore essential. Milosevic could possibly be persuaded to see cooperation with the plan as a political investment. This, in fact, proved to be the case; the flight of Bosnian Muslim soldiers to Serbia prompted Milosevic to write letters calling upon Izetbegovic and Mladic to stop the war and bring the hostilities to an end. Remarkably enough, Milosevic wrote directly to Mladic, thus bypassing Karadzic. In his letter Milosevic referred to the images of the refugees from Srebrenica and Zepa who were fleeing to Tuzla and of the Serbian refugees who had fled to Banja Luka after the Croatian offensive.²⁸⁷³

The Bosnian Muslim army was instructed via the surviving radio lines with Sarajevo to make its way to Serbia.²⁸⁷⁴ Six hundred men from Zepa and a smaller contingent that had originally come from Srebrenica swam or rafted across the Drina at Bajina Basta.²⁸⁷⁵ Not all men fled across the Drina, incidentally: many escaping from Zepa (the exact number is not known) took the same route as the column of men from Srebrenica to Tuzla. This journey too was a horrific ordeal with no food. On the way they encountered a great many bodies lying around Konjevic Polje. The bodies had started to stink because of the warm weather and the Bosnian Serbs were trying to round up the men with dogs and guide them back to the road. Some did not arrive in Tuzla until 12 October.²⁸⁷⁶

Around Zepa there was no evidence of mass murders. Nor had any digging machines been observed in the surroundings. One notable victim was the local Bosnian Muslim Commander, Colonel Avdo Palic. Smith's Military Assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Jim Baxter was one of the last to see Palic alive. At the time he was in the company of the Bosnian Serb General Tolimir. An hour later Baxter saw Tolimir again, this time without Avdo Palic.²⁸⁷⁷ Mladic boasted that he had been shot because the surrender talks had not led to a result.²⁸⁷⁸ This was a severe blow to the negotiations as Palic was the only man in Zepa who was authorized by the Bosnian government to negotiate.²⁸⁷⁹

The Serbs said 400 of their soldiers were killed -- their bloodiest defeat of the war.' Pomfret did not link this to the situation in 1995, but such a connection cannot be ruled out.

7. Conclusions about Zepa

The warring factions and UNPROFOR appeared to have learned their lessons from the events at Srebrenica. On the one hand the Bosnian Serbs were willing to come to an arrangement in an evident attempt to avoid a repeat of Srebrenica, which had been extremely damaging to their position. The same applied to the Bosnian government which in the first instance was considering an evacuation of the population and then recoiled when confronted with Mladic's demand for unconditional surrender, but which ultimately did not resist the evacuation of the population and at a certain moment even insisted on it. The UN responded alertly and talks were held under the direction of UNPROFOR to arrange an exchange of prisoners and so spare the lives of the able-bodied men. These talks, incidentally, failed to produce results due to mistrust over the intentions of the Bosnian Serbs, but at any rate no mass murder took place at Zepa.

On 19 July 1995 Mladic had made generous promises to Smith concerning access to Zepa, but little came of these in practice. After 3 August there would be no UN presence in Zepa as the withdrawal of the Ukrainian garrison would then be completed. Though Mladic had agreed to the presence of two Civil Affairs Officers, the military authorities in Pale refused them permission to travel to Zepa. UNHCR now also failed to gain access to Zepa and it was no longer known whether the International Red Cross or other NGOs were present or not. The International Red Cross had been able to visit no more than 44 men while the total number of detainees was unknown. Estimates put the figures at several hundred men in addition to the group that was making its way to Serbia.²⁸⁸⁰ On 10 August the Security Council adopted Resolution 1010 demanding that UNHCR and the International Red Cross be granted access to Srebrenica and Zepa. This time, the scope of the resolution was restricted to humanitarian affairs. Unlike in the case of Srebrenica, there were no longer vigorous calls for a restoration of the Safe Area of Zepa.²⁸⁸¹

It was striking that Mladic went to a lot of trouble in Zepa to get Smith there as quickly as possible and also that he tried to use Smith as a link between the Bosnian Muslims and UNPROFOR. He also promised Smith that he would supervise the proceedings in person to ensure everything went in orderly fashion. It looked as if Mladic wanted to be personally involved to avoid a repetition of the events in Srebrenica.

Other factors also played a part: Mladic was losing the strategic initiative and he knew it. The operations in Krajina were going badly for the Bosnian Serb forces. Mladic made a hasty departure in the midst of the negotiations to go to Krajina. He placed the negotiations in the hands of Tolimir who, so Smith suspected, had been instructed to 'get it over quickly'. All sorts of demands regarding Zepa then suddenly proved acceptable to the Bosnian Serb negotiators and a lot could be arranged.²⁸⁸² This was in stark contrast with Srebrenica, where Mladic had denied negotiators access, thus leaving Karremans to fend for himself. Another marked difference was that in Zepa Mladic was prepared to permit the arrival of the International Red Cross and UNHCR as well as journalists at an early stage. The fact that nothing came of the proposed exchange of prisoners was due to a lack of trust over the intentions of the Bosnian Serbs, but was also because the Bosnian Muslims and UNPROFOR did not know how many men the Bosnian Serbs were still holding at Srebrenica. For this reason, the Bosnian Muslims were unwilling to conclude a comprehensive arrangement for the exchange of prisoners. That these men had already been murdered was not yet known at the time.

The grim reality behind the fact that no men from Srebrenica had arrived in Tuzla needed no further explanation in Zepa. Around 700 men from Srebrenica had reportedly fled to Zepa, including 109 Bosnian Muslim soldiers. Many of them could bear witness to the horrors that the column of men had encountered during their flight to Tuzla before heading for Zepa. The spectre of Srebrenica led to stiff resistance against the Bosnian Serbs in Zepa.

²⁸⁸² Interview R.A. Smith, 12/01/00.

The local government in Zepa also appeared to have a better grip on things than their counterparts in Srebrenica. Compared with Srebrenica, Zepa was an enclave with fewer internal conflicts. After their initial refusal to assist the UN with the evacuation, the local representatives of the SDA (Muslim's Party of Democratic Action) were quickly able to indicate what was necessary to help the refugees. Evidently this had been carefully planned beforehand.²⁸⁸³ A reported 1245 Bosnian Muslim troops were in Zepa and these were better armed and organized than their comrades in Srebrenica. The Bosnian Muslims were able to put up a better and longer defence and when resistance was no longer possible they managed to stay out of the hands of the Bosnian Muslims by retreating in a well-organized manner to the mountains and caves. The Bosnian Serb army was reluctant to engage the enemy in such terrain, where its heavier equipment offered fewer advantages. In this way, time could be won to reach a political arrangement which allowed the majority of the men to cross the Drina to safety in Serbia. It was striking that Milosevic lent his support to this, thereby seizing the opportunity for a political initiative to move towards a peace settlement. It was also striking that, unbeknown to Karadzic, he turned directly to Mladic and Izetbegovic in this connection.

Lessons appeared to have been learned from Srebrenica. UNPROFOR was prepared for the fall of Zepa and, unlike in Srebrenica, it was not caught off guard by a stark and paralyzing reality. General Smith was able to play an active role and Mladic allowed him to do so. As a result, the International Red Cross could be involved at an early stage and arrangements could be made to remove the wounded and evacuate the population without leaving all initiative to the Bosnian Serbs. The Bosnian government had been cooperative up to a certain point and the political intervention of Milosevic through the intermediation of Bildt had prevented escalation when an arrangement for the exchange of men failed to materialize. Though this was not an easy process, it at least did not lead to the enormities on the scale of Srebrenica.

8. Gorazde: military plans are hatched

After the fall of Srebrenica and the threatening and unavoidable loss of Zepa, all the signs were that Gorazde, the only remaining Safe Area in Eastern Bosnia, would be the next target for the advancing Bosnian Serbs. Though Mladic had said on 15 July during talks in Belgrade that he had no intentions to take Gorazde and had given assurances to this effect, no one took his word at face value.²⁸⁸⁴ The UN, the French and the British set to work in a bid to find measures that would prevent Gorazde being taken. Gorazde was protected by a small Ukranian contingent and somewhat larger British contingent of peacekeepers. Skirmishing between the warring factions around Gorazde had already been going on for some time. The UNPROFOR presence had become almost totally ineffectual. The Bosnian Muslims had largely disarmed the Ukrainians. The British had pulled back from their observation posts to their compound.

After their earlier but hardly fruitful ideas for recapturing Srebrenica, the French turned their attention to Gorazde. They requested the US to air-lift a thousand French troops in US helicopters to Gorazde as the advance force of a brigade being sent to reinforce the town. The French exerted pressure on the Americans by saying that failure to meet their request would leave them with no option other than to withdraw from UNPROFOR. The Americans incidentally did not treat this French plan as a ploy to withdraw from Bosnia. After the rather unrealistic French plans for recapturing Srebrenica, the Americans did take the French proposals seriously this time, but opinions in Washington were divided over how to respond to the French request.²⁸⁸⁵

The French proposal put Washington in a difficult position. Not only was it perceived to be risky – Holbrooke called it 'Dien Bien Gorazde' – but it also entailed the danger of sucking the Americans further into the conflict in Bosnia than they were willing to go; a flat rejection, however, was not really an option now that Chirac had managed to put the ball in Washington's court. Washington therefore decided not to reject the proposal but to try to replace the idea of reinforcing Gorazde with ground troops by a consensus on the strategic use of air power if Gorazde were attacked. Secretary of Defence William Perry was a particularly strong proponent of air strikes. He saw the fall of Srebrenica as providing the long-awaited opening to persuade the allies of the merits of an air campaign. President Clinton decided to send the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to London in order to arrive at a realistic military proposal with his British and French colleagues, Admiral Lanxade and Field Marshal Sir Peter Inge, giving due attention to the option of a NATO air campaign.²⁸⁸⁶

The Chiefs of Defence Staff of France, the United States and the United Kingdom met each other on 15 July in London to see whether they could reach agreement on a military reaction.²⁸⁸⁷ At this meeting there was a clash of views between the United States, France and the UK. The United States regarded reinforcing Gorazde as virtually unfeasible. After all, they argued, the Bosnian Serb air defences would have to be destroyed first to ensure the safety of the helicopters and aircraft. The Americans therefore favoured massive bombardments from the air to deter an attack on Gorazde; the French however stuck to their idea of a greater military presence in Gorazde. The British were prepared to reinforce UNPROFOR but believed that air strikes would lead to the departure of the British troops from Bosnia.²⁸⁸⁸ Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander General Smith was also opposed to bombardments but if these were to be carried out, he wanted the UN troops removed from Gorazde first. In his eyes SACEUR General Joulwan exaggerated the signals that the intelligence services were giving about Gorazde. But according to the American Gorazde awaited the same fate as Srebrenica.²⁸⁸⁹

The question was not only whether the United States was prepared to provide an airlift but also whether other countries were willing to take part. The Dutch UN ambassador Biegman saw room for Dutch participation after the release of the Dutch hostages in Bratunac on 15 July.

The British were not keen on sending reinforcements to Gorazde, mainly on technical military grounds.²⁸⁹⁰ The British Chief of Defence Staff, Field Marshal Sir Peter Inge, was indeed against military action. Speaking to Admiral Leighton Smith, the British Foreign Secretary, Malcolm Rifkind, expressed fears that Gorazde could not be saved from the air either: the Bosnian Serbs had assembled 12,000 troops there.²⁸⁹¹ The British appeared more inclined to withdraw their contingent from Gorazde than to send in reinforcements. Even if reinforcements could reach Gorazde, this would still offer no prospect of a successful defence of the enclave. More was needed to achieve that. The Russians felt little good would come of using military units to avert the fall of Gorazde. In their viewpoint UNPROFOR had a peacekeeping and humanitarian mission and they felt it was not desirable for UN troops to become embroiled in hostilities.²⁸⁹²

The Department of Peacekeeping Operations in New York also studied the military options for preventing Gorazde being taken by the Bosnian Serbs. If the international community failed in this endeavour, so New York feared, then the French would in all probability leave Bosnia and the Americans would lift their arms embargo. The only military option open to the UN was to station the Rapid Reaction Force units already in Bosnia in Gorazde. New York was not yet ready for the massive deployment of air power: that would trigger outright war with the Bosnian Serbs. What's more, it was also worried that any fighting between UNPROFOR and the Bosnian Serbs could jeopardize the release of the Dutchbat soldiers still being held in Bratunac.²⁸⁹³

Janvier was not very happy with the ideas from New York to transfer Rapid Reaction Force units to Gorazde. It was true that this might deter a Bosnian Serb attack, but Janvier feared an outcome similar to Srebrenica. NATO air strikes would represent an attack on the Bosnian Serb air defences. This could be interpreted as an act of war and the possible consequences of this were unclear. Janvier had already expressed this fear before. Moreover, the Bosnian Serbs would see the sending of reinforcements to Gorazde as a decision of UNPROFOR to fight along with the Bosnian Muslims. Also, Janvier argued, it was hard enough getting supplies through as things were and more troops in Gorazde would only aggravate this problem. Janvier wanted to follow the same tactics as in Srebrenica, namely to set up a blocking position with the units already in Gorazde, only this time with well-prepared defensive positions. Janvier realized that such a step would have little effect if these positions were circumvented in difficult and inaccessible terrain. That's why he also wanted to deploy mines and armed helicopters. Janvier saw this as a more viable option than the route that New York had chosen, i.e. sending reinforcements. He pointed out once again that in his opinion the objective of the resolutions of the Security Council was to protect the population and not the enclave as such.²⁸⁹⁴

In a lengthier analysis of the plans from New York, Zagreb reiterated the need to protect the population. Zagreb pointed out that New York had not defined the protection of the population as a clear objective of the UN efforts. Zagreb believed that there were ways other than purely military ones to protect the population. The deployment of military means would merely endanger the population and bring UNPROFOR into conflict with the Bosnian Serbs, thus exacerbating the danger for the population even further. The proposal from New York was dangerous, full of risk and 'smacks of military adventurism', so Janvier said. First of all, light had to be shed on the objective that the international community, and the UN as its mouthpiece, had set themselves. If New York issued military orders, then these had to fit in with the strategy that the UN proposed to pursue, Janvier concluded.²⁸⁹⁵

9. The London Conference

After the fall of Srebrenica and after a large number of men had been deported to an unknown destination, according to General Smith the British government panicked and was gripped by fears that the same thing could happen in Gorazde. Given the British presence in Gorazde this had to be avoided at all costs.²⁸⁹⁶ The British decision to organize a conference of the Foreign Affairs and Defence ministers of the most important troop-contributing nations had actually already been taken before the mass murders were made known (see Chapter 3 of this Part). On 14 July London announced its intention to organize a conference on 21 July. The French and Americans were not entirely happy with this British proposal: the French would have preferred to see a prior political commitment to defend Gorazde and the Americans wondered why it was necessary to wait an entire week before holding the conference. That would give the Bosnian Serbs a free hand to capture what they could in the meantime. The British however said they needed a week to think about the best course of action.²⁸⁹⁷

The French wanted the meeting in London to result in a consensus approach, consisting of a credible military signal to stem the advance of the Bosnian Serb army combined with a political signal, i.e. continuation of the negotiations on the basis of the Contact Group's plan and recognition of Bosnia by Belgrade. Presidents Chirac and Clinton at least agreed that a line had to be drawn before Gorazde also fell into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs. But Washington and Paris did not agree about how that line was to be drawn. The French objected to a defence of Gorazde in combination with bombardments of strategic targets: the Bosnian Serbs could interpret this as an act of war and respond to it accordingly. The French also pointed in this connection to the vulnerable position of Dutchbat which was still in Potocari.²⁸⁹⁸

'Drawing a line in the hills' was also the advice that Boutros-Ghali received from the UN Secretariat in connection with his preparations for the conference. According to the UN, a status quo could no longer be maintained in Bosnia. The limitations of Close Air Support had now become sufficiently clear and further humiliation of peacekeepers could not be tolerated. Urgent changes were necessary otherwise the UN mission would lose the support of the United States, France and the Bosnian government, and that would herald the end of UNPROFOR. A – symbolic – reinforcement of Gorazde should make Mladic think twice before attacking. The underlying intention was to strengthen the deterrent rather than to fight. The Secretariat held the view that this could go some way towards restoring the credibility that the Security Council had lost, even though it was not completely without risk. Military adviser Van Kappen added that in this case it was desirable to already send a Forward Air Controller (in a Tactical Air Control Party) and a Fire Support Coordination Center to Gorazde so that air and artillery support could be given. In addition, a decision was needed to choose the side of the Bosnian Muslims. In the words of Van Kappen it basically meant that: 'the Bosnians will do the fighting and dying and we (NATO) will provide the firepower'.²⁸⁹⁹

The conference convened on 21 July. The ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence of the countries of the Contact Group and of the most important troop-contributing nations, the Secretaries General of the UN and the NATO and representatives of the European Commission took part. Generals Janvier and Smith were also invited.

While the fighting around Zepa continued, several options came up for consideration. These were partly a reiteration of the options that Boutros-Ghali and Janvier had put to the Security Council in May 1995: withdraw from vulnerable positions and write Gorazde off as a lost cause, withdrawal of UNPROFOR, or draw a line at Gorazde.²⁹⁰⁰ During the conference there was a growing awareness that such a line should indeed be drawn and that a further advance of the Bosnian Serbs to other Safe Areas had to be avoided. The fall of Gorazde would mark the beginning of the end for UNPROFOR. But how exactly could the fall of Gorazde be avoided? This was the burning question that remained unanswered. The Bosnian Serbs were told straightaway that 'any attack on Gorazde will be met with a substantial and decisive response, including the use of air power'.²⁹⁰¹ This stance was at least a good deal tougher than Akashi's earlier warning on 9 July to the Bosnian Serbs to discontinue their advance against Srebrenica. What's more, this warning had the full weight of the international community behind it.

Though that international community had not yet reached a consensus opinion, military measures to protect the Safe Area of Gorazde had now come a good deal closer. The differences that had existed before the conference had not been resolved, however. The United States wanted 'a decisive commitment' to defend Gorazde with a campaign from the air. General Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, made no secret of what the Americans wanted: the abandonment of the proportionality principle by the UN, suppression of Bosnian Serb Air Defences, and modification of the dual key system. The French pointed out however that air power and ground troops were inextricably linked. The British stance was 'again essentially non-committal'. The Russians pressed for diplomatic action and did not support an air campaign. There was however consensus about the fact that withdrawal of UNPROFOR was not an option or as EU negotiator Bildt put it: 'withdrawal was not a policy, but the abandonment of policy'.²⁹⁰²

The motto that General Smith had given his speech for the conference, 'the dilemma of killing the injured animal or allowing it to die in agony', appeared to have been resolved. Smith did raise a warning finger however: robust action might meet a 'pressing emotional need by nations who are outside the Balkans, it does little to solve the dilemma of the UN within the borders of Bosnia-Herzegovina, whilst carrying considerable risks for the longer term'.²⁹⁰³ Smith also found it worth noting that only the Safe Area of Gorazde had been mentioned in connection with the bombardments. During the conference both Janvier and Smith had to stand up and say that there were still UN soldiers in Zepa and that that enclave had not yet fallen. The politicians appeared to take little account of this and Smith had also felt compelled to explain that there were still other Safe Areas and that he was also responsible for troops from countries that were not represented at the conference, such as Bangladesh.²⁹⁰⁴

Janvier emphasized the need for a realistic and pragmatic approach in London. In view of the limited resources at his disposal, there were no military solutions. In his view, the taking of hostages had demonstrated that the use of air power would be of only limited value. UNPROFOR was not able to defend the enclaves, so Janvier said.²⁹⁰⁵

10. The Dutch attitude towards Gorazde

The Netherlands Military Intelligence Service also predicted that the Bosnian Serbs were intending to seize all the eastern enclaves. It therefore seemed probable that the Bosnian Serbs would attempt before long to gain control of Gorazde too. For this enclave was of even greater strategic importance than Srebrenica,²⁹⁰⁶ and the Safe Area was also bigger in terms of size and population (60,000 inhabitants).

There were 10,000 well-armed Bosnian Muslim troops in Gorazde. Foreign Affairs therefore assumed that the Bosnian Muslim army would be capable of defending the enclave on its own. In that scenario the British UNPROFOR troops would have little option other than to leave. The British had already pulled back from the OPs and were now in the shelters. If the Rapid Reaction Force were deployed to reinforce the military presence in Gorazde, then the Netherlands could not avoid involvement: the Netherlands were represented in this Rapid Reaction Force with a mortar company of the Royal Netherlands Marine Corps and a mortar location radar unit of the Royal Netherlands Army. At the same time, the civil servants of Foreign Affairs believed that the enclave was not viable in the long term and that a negotiated solution had to be found for it. In addition, the Netherlands was to speak out in favour of maintaining a UN presence in Bosnia for as long as the UN played a principal humanitarian role.²⁹⁰⁷

In London, Minister Van Mierlo made this standpoint conditional on the departure of Dutchbat from Srebrenica. This was planned for 21 July, the day of the conference. Van Mierlo still appeared uncertain about the departure of Dutchbat after the tough language levelled at the Bosnian Serbs before the conference. Van Mierlo also took the view that the UN should abandon indefensible areas. Van Mierlo reasserted the standpoint that he had taken earlier in the EU concerning Zepa: the population should be evacuated in that case. If Gorazde could be defended, then that is what had to be done, according to Van Mierlo. But even if Gorazde could not be defended, this did not, in his view, rule out an attempt to repel a Bosnian Serb attack. Though the eastern enclaves were indefensible, they were still counters in the political game. Nevertheless Van Mierlo was now prepared to look at plans for a 'realignment' of UNPROFOR in order to make this force less vulnerable. Before the fall of Srebrenica, he had rejected proposals for a realignment.²⁹⁰⁸

Voorhoeve asked Janvier in London how Gorazde could be protected by an air campaign if that was to be combined with a UNPROFOR presence; no clear answer was forthcoming.²⁹⁰⁹ Voorhoeve also asked Janvier whether the dual key system should be maintained, considering that the Americans had their doubts about this. Janvier calmly answered that the dual key was working well. As an example he mentioned the air support that had been given to Dutchbat on 11 July: on that occasion a decision had been taken in Zagreb within five minutes.²⁹¹⁰

11. The ball in NATO's court

No real decisions were taken in London. It was only after the conference that NATO and NATO commanders also became involved in the efforts to find adequate military measures to save Gorazde. The Military Committee of the NATO pressed for a reconfirmation of the decision whereby Gorazde had been declared a Military Exclusion Zone. Under this decision of April 1994, Bosnian Serbs were forbidden to possess heavy weapons within a 20 kilometre radius around Gorazde. In this way the Military Committee wanted to avoid a repeat of the situation where tough talk failed to lead to concrete actions; it would merely further undermine the credibility of the UN and NATO if there were any doubts about the existence of the political will to take tough measures even when faced with the threat of hostage-taking.²⁹¹¹ Consultation between the NATO headquarters in Mons (SHAPE) and the UN headquarters in Zagreb to map out plans for Gorazde initially yielded few results. Without being granted specific powers by the UN in New York, Zagreb did not feel authorized to make plans.²⁹¹²

Meanwhile the Americans had launched a diplomatic offensive to enable NATO to translate the decisive response achieved in London into deeds. In the first instance use could be made of massive Close Air Support and after further escalation an air campaign could be directed against strategic targets. The Americans preferred the key for this to be placed in the hands of General Smith. In view of the experiences with Srebrenica, a system of 'triggers' (see below) had to be put in place to achieve the envisaged deterrent effect. Once under way, an air campaign should be prosecuted until the end, regardless of the risks involved. By this time there was also a growing realization that the measures should not be confined to Gorazde; after all, it was by no means certain that this would be the Bosnian Serbs' next target. The Safe Area of Bihac was another possible target.²⁹¹³

The Americans were worried that the commitment to the consensus achieved in London about a decisive and substantial response was weakening. They met with resistance from the British: the British merely wanted to target the heavy weapons of the Bosnian Serbs, while the Americans believed that a disproportionate response was required to achieve a deterrent effect. Both the British and the French were hesitant about expanding the scope of the deterrent actions to Bihac and Sarajevo. While the countries all agreed that the authority to call in air power should be delegated to the military personnel within UNPROFOR, they failed to see eye to eye about the question whether this authority should be placed with Janvier or Smith. The French preferred to leave the authority in the hands of Janvier.

There was also the threat that the progress made by Bildt on the diplomatic front would be lost. In these negotiations Milosevic had been prepared to recognize Bosnia in exchange for the lifting of the sanctions against Yugoslavia. The Bosnian government, however, had mixed feelings about this. The Americans, unlike the British and French, felt that after the events in Srebrenica it was no longer appropriate to exert pressure on the Bosnian Muslims to accept Bildt's proposal: Bildt reacted by threatening to quit.

On the American home front Senator Dole had condemned the results of the conference in London as an invitation to the Bosnian Serbs to continue their advance. Dole again pressed for lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian Muslims, but President Clinton vetoed this on 9 August.²⁹¹⁴

12. Modification of the 'dual key'

One of the effects of the London Conference was a growing realization that the dual key system needed to be modified. After the bombardments at Pale late in May 1995, Boutros-Ghali had drawn the authority to call in air strikes towards himself. He was fiercely opposed to giving up the dual key.

After the conference, the American UN ambassador, Albright, called the military adviser to Boutros-Ghali, Van Kappen, from the White House about the modification of the dual key. Van Kappen was told: 'General, you really have to do something now, because your boss Boutros-Ghali must give up that dual key!' In her eyes the dual key system was ripe for a major overhaul. Albright felt that it was up to Van Kappen, as the Secretary-General's military adviser, to point this out to him. Van Kappen agreed and asked Kofi Annan to help. He thought that the UN was barking up the wrong tree; New York had to give up the dual key and meet with NATO to draw up a plan for the deployment of air strikes and the Rapid Reaction Force. An old, but still relevant, problem in this connection was that the safety of the units on the ground had to be guaranteed, even if this meant moving them elsewhere. Otherwise UN personnel might be taken hostage again.

But the UN Secretariat found the member states unwilling to shift their units. A talk between Boutros-Ghali, Kofi Annan, Undersecretary-General Goulding and Van Kappen was arranged to find a solution. This was not easy, because Boutros-Ghali set great store by the dual key. He also had a clear preference for limiting the use of air power to Close Air Support. The vexed relationship between the UN and the NATO plus the fact that neither organization empathized with the other's position and culture, as well as the circumstance that the two Secretaries General did not get on very well also played a part. Moreover, Boutros-Ghali was under great pressure from the troop-contributing nations to avoid casualties and new hostages. He stressed this point during the talk, but found himself facing a closed front²⁹¹⁵

Boutros-Ghali finally conceded his 'key', but not before NATO Secretary-General Claes had renewed his assurances that NATO would not go it alone. Boutros-Ghali had first wanted clarification of the concrete shape that the decisive and substantial response agreed in London was to take and he also wanted to know what NATO had in mind regarding further Bosnian Serb military adventures against the surviving Safe Areas.²⁹¹⁶

Earlier Boutros-Ghali had kept his distance from NATO (see Chapter 2 of Part III) but when it became clear that NATO would still collaborate with the UN if air power were deployed, he pledged his support to NATO's plans. When Boutros-Ghali was reluctant to allow air strikes across the whole of Bosnia without Security Council approval, NATO was briefly worried that proposals could then be vetoed by the Russians. Boutros-Ghali did however agree to a delegation of powers: from 26 July the authority to decide on air strikes was placed in the hands of Janvier. Janvier, in turn, was allowed to delegate the authority to call in Close Air Support to General Smith. Within NATO this was seen as a major step forward, provided that Janvier, as a French General, would follow the tough line taken by Paris, which he had not done in the case of Srebrenica.²⁹¹⁷

After lengthy meetings the North Atlantic Council had in the meantime decided to permit pre-emptive air strikes if Gorazde came under threat. Suspension of the air strikes would only be possible in exceptional cases. The Dutch had helped to persuade the British that troop concentrations should be included among the 'triggers' for an air strike. The British had a deep aversion to the kind of air strikes that had killed so many Iraqi soldiers during the Gulf War. They had therefore insisted that strikes on troop concentrations should be conditional on the approval of the North Atlantic Council. The Dutch argued however that the council's authorization could not possibly be obtained at such short notice. Another US wish was also fulfilled: authority was granted to suppress the Integrated Air Defence System of the Bosnian Serbs.²⁹¹⁸

In an exchange of letters the two Secretaries General laid down that 'graduated air operations' could be initiated as soon as NATO and UN commanders agreed that military preparations threatening Gorazde were under way. The same applied to Bosnian Serb attacks or shelling.²⁹¹⁹ This represented an enormous step compared with the situation during the Bosnian Serb attack on Srebrenica. It was NATO which, with an attack on Gorazde in prospect, was the motor behind the expansion of the scope to deploy air power. The North Atlantic Council decided that air strikes could be used against troop concentrations and concentrations of heavy weapons if these constituted a threat to Safe Areas and in the case of a direct attack. This decision led to an agreement between General Janvier and NATO Admiral Smith. The purpose of this agreement was not only to breathe new life into the idea of deterrence, but also to offer a concrete opportunity for responding sharply to attacks. The first step in this direction consisted of the identification of targets that were eligible for attack; the second step was to reduce the vulnerability of UNPROFOR (this included plans for an evacuation of the Safe Area). Only then could air operations be started up. The exchange of information formed part of the agreement between Admiral Smith and Janvier. One special aspect concerned the arrangements regarding a Zone of Action. This was the name for a large area with sufficient targets that could be related to a threat or attack, such as command centres, logistical installations and supply lines.

The agreement thus did away with the smoking gun principle, which had imposed restrictions at the time of Srebrenica. Air strikes were no longer limited to a small area such as the Srebrenica enclave, where aircraft had too little room to operate effectively and where there were hardly any targets. If air strikes were approved, Air Defences throughout Bosnia could be targeted. Admiral Smith's long-cherished wish was thus fulfilled. As soon as the military commanders agreed, an operation could be initiated. As a result, Akashi or Boutros-Ghali were excluded from the decision-making process.²⁹²⁰

Though the agreement marked an important new step towards strengthening the deterrent effect, certain automatic reflexes within the UN had not yet wholly disappeared. Janvier reiterated that the attacked party could see a NATO action as a declaration of war to which the UN would thus also become a party. Most UNPROFOR compounds were within range of Bosnian Serb mortars and artillery. Hostages could be taken and supplies would have to be air-dropped, humanitarian aid would grind to a halt and countries would want to pull out their troops. That would spell the end of

UNPROFOR and lead to a request to NATO to assist with the withdrawal. Janvier asked Admiral Smith to remind the NATO authorities of this yet once again.²⁹²¹

Boutros-Ghali was particularly worried about overhasty action against the Bosnian Serb air defences. He wanted no such strikes until these were genuinely necessary to protect the Safe Areas.²⁹²² NATO, for its part, pointed to the reduced number of flights that was currently possible over Bosnia because of the threat of Bosnian Serb air defences.²⁹²³ It was an old argument and Janvier saw no option but to accept the limitations.²⁹²⁴ Boutros-Ghali also repeated to Claes that the resolutions of the Security Council did not permit pre-emptive action.²⁹²⁵ The Netherlands – again – labelled the NATO demand to suppress Bosnian Serb air defences as exaggerated. It was unacceptable not to use air power because there were risks. The effectiveness of air power could very well be improved without NATO carrying out pre-emptive air strikes.²⁹²⁶

While the use of air power was being revitalized, UNPROFOR made arrangements with NATO about what exactly was to be defended in the Safe Area. This clarified another point that had long remained unclear and gave NATO the triggering mechanisms that it had always wanted. The arrangements incidentally were not intended to determine the exact borders of the Safe Areas, which was an old point. The Safe Areas were subdivided from the inside out into three zones. The inner zone, covering several kilometres that ‘can realistically be protected’, was the area with the largest population concentration. Around this, there was a tactical zone, outside the range of direct and indirect fire where troops could be brought in for reinforcement or evacuated, but where fighting could also be conducted. The third zone was the periphery of the Safe Area. The crossing of any zone line could act as a trigger. The fact that the attention was primarily focused on a small area was to be kept a close secret.²⁹²⁷

The commanders of the warring factions received a ‘formal notification’ from Janvier: any threat against or attack on a Safe Area would meet with a response and the reaction ‘will not necessarily be proportional, nor will it be limited to the area immediately surrounding the Safe Area’. The action would continue for as long as was necessary to eliminate the threat.²⁹²⁸

13. Measures ‘beyond Gorazde’

While the attention of the international community was firmly focused on Zepa’s downfall and the threat against Gorazde, concerns over a possible Bosnian Serb action against Bihac started to grow in late July. This could prompt the Croatians to spring to the rescue of the Bosnian Muslims living in Bihac. The Croatian government had said that Bihac was vital to Croatian safety and would not tolerate the area being overrun by the Bosnian Serbs. What’s more, it appeared to be only a matter of days before the Croatians would launch an offensive against Krajina, the self-proclaimed Republika Srpska Krajina on Croatian territory which was inhabited by Serbs. No one knew how the Bosnian Serbs and Milosevic would respond to this.²⁹²⁹

General Smith feared UNPROFOR being sucked into the war before a clear political policy line had been mapped out for Bosnia. In that case UNPROFOR would actually be part of the problem rather than the solution. What was needed was a decision allowing the Rapid Reaction Force and UNPROFOR to cast off their role as neutral peacekeepers and take sides with the Bosnian Muslims. Smith expressed this expectation on 11 August in a meeting with Akashi and Janvier, among others. Janvier believed however that the UN would be unwilling to choose between peace and war, though he too was worried that UNPROFOR would become mixed up in the fighting. He was particularly apprehensive about incidents that could trigger air strikes. Janvier also vented his earlier frustration: in May 1995 Boutros-Ghali and himself had sketched the opportunities for UNPROFOR, but the international community had not wanted to make a clear-cut choice then.

Smith summed up the new options in case no political arrangement was found in the short term: 'to join the fighting; to withdraw; or to reduce the force in strength'. If the UN opted to fight on the side of the Bosnian Muslims, then Smith wanted to send his 'white troops' home. Many UNPROFOR units had little to do, were not suitably trained or equipped for combat and would only be a nuisance. The Rapid Reaction Force could then be deployed and the operation possibly handed over to NATO. Meanwhile agreement had been reached with NATO about the possibility of large-scale air strikes but Janvier continued to struggle with the negative consequences of this for the troops on the ground and the mission.²⁹³⁰

In mapping out a new course for UNPROFOR Janvier assumed that all Serbs, whether they were living in Croatia, Bosnia or Serbia, were still aspiring to establish a 'Greater Serbia'. In Janvier's opinion, Pale and Belgrade had taken brilliant advantage of crises and had perfectly timed their offensive to gain more territory. General Smith disagreed with Janvier's analysis, asserting that the Bosnian Serbs merely wanted to end a threat – as in Srebrenica – in order to free troops for employment elsewhere.

UNPROFOR was gradually losing its impartiality but Janvier also now saw this as inevitable and felt that it should no longer be considered a problem. He quoted the words of the French Prime Minister Alain Juppé who had said that it could no longer be accepted that peacekeepers were passive witnesses to ethnic cleansing and the separation of men and women. Smith, however, said that if that was the case, he wanted the mandate to be changed first.

Janvier also changed his mind about Close Air Support. If the decision was taken to deploy air power, this should no longer be intended 'to disable a tank poking out of the woods'. Such a message would not get across to the Bosnian Serbs. Only substantial damage to their military potential would make it clear that the international community was determined to stop the Bosnian Serb army. This meant that air strikes were necessary.²⁹³¹ Though the UNPROFOR mandate had not been changed, this new strategic concept was nothing short of a revolution in Janvier's thinking. NATO, in fact, had already marched ahead of Janvier: strict impartiality of UNPROFOR was no longer a first requirement. Granting air support against a tank (a textbook example of Close Air Support according to Janvier at the time of Srebrenica) was now dismissed as inadequate.

On 2 August the North Atlantic Council addressed the question whether the decisions taken to deter an attack on Gorazde could be extended to the other remaining Safe Areas: Sarajevo, Tuzla and Bihac.²⁹³² The NATO military staff saw no objections to expanding the scope of the decisions for Gorazde to Sarajevo and Tuzla. Bihac was more problematic because the borders of that Safe Area had not been demarcated and because of the large number of warring factions.²⁹³³ Janvier therefore excluded Bihac from the arrangements, also in view of the fact that the Croatian advance in Krajina had altered the situation there.²⁹³⁴ The threat against Gorazde thus appeared to have lessened. Now that the Bosnian Serbs had their hands full with West Bosnia, the UN no longer believed that an attack on Gorazde was likely.²⁹³⁵

14. Troops for Gorazde

The British had announced that they would be withdrawing their 180-strong military contingent from Gorazde on 22 August. Unlike the Netherlands in Srebrenica, they were unwilling to send fresh troops to relieve them. In trying to find a country willing to take the place of the British, the UN experienced more or less the same problems as those that had occurred in the case of Srebrenica. The main difference was that the British Defence Minister said it was not his concern and had placed the problem on the UN's plate. Not a single country was prepared to take over that task; nor, for that matter, did anyone seriously believe that the British would dig in their heels and persist in their refusal.

After all, if anyone was eligible for being relieved, it was the 90 Ukrainian troops: after their experiences in Zepa and Gorazde, Ukraine was only willing to provide troops as part of a multinational contingent of troops. This same wish had been expressed when there was question of Ukrainian troops relieving Dutchbat, but it had not proved an insurmountable obstacle on that occasion.

In the end the Russians offered to fill the gap in Gorazde; the Bosnian Serbs would not object to this, but the Bosnian Muslims presumably would. New York therefore exerted pressure on them not to frustrate the Russians' passage to Gorazde. Another concern of the UN was to get a Tactical Air Control Party in Gorazde; a Forward Air Controller would then be brought in from one of the NATO countries. Without their presence, Close Air Support was impossible.²⁹³⁶

On 9 August the military adviser to the Secretary-General of the UN, Van Kappen, asked if the Netherlands would be willing to contribute troops for Gorazde. Van Kappen not only asked for a Tactical Air Control Party, but also for the transfer of the Dutchbat IV company stationed in Simin Han to Gorazde as well as a Dutch Commander for the Safe Area. Ambassador Biegman was in favour of this, arguing that it would help to restore the Netherlands' image which, after the fall of Srebrenica, had become severely tarnished in the media. In view of the experiences in Srebrenica, Minister Voorhoeve was by no means keen to embark on a new adventure. What's more, he foresaw that Parliament would create problems if the government decided to send troops to Gorazde. He thought it would be more logical to send observers.²⁹³⁷

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs did seriously explore the possibility of dispatching Dutch troops to Gorazde, but the results were negative: 'if you're too eager to help, people will take advantage', was the official verdict. The Netherlands was still nursing the wounds of Srebrenica and, given the recent discovery of the first mass graves, the debate about the role played by the Netherlands was only just starting. Foreign Affairs was also worried that the Royal Netherlands Army would oppose deployment in Gorazde. Moreover Parliament had only recently been told that any units dispatched in the future to Central Bosnia would have to be more heavily armed. So it would be very hard to explain to them why a lightly armed company was now being transferred from Simin Han to Gorazde.²⁹³⁸

The matter did not go beyond a draft memorandum from Defence about a Dutch presence in Gorazde for the Ministerial Council. On 15 August, during a personal meeting with Prime Minister

Kok in the latter's office, Minister Voorhoeve advised against this.²⁹³⁹ The draft memorandum also indicated that the Netherlands should not honour the requests; it pointed out that the Netherlands had already been performing tasks in Srebrenica under difficult circumstances for a year and a half. Voorhoeve considered the 'need for rehabilitation' an invalid argument: in his opinion the Netherlands' reputation had not been tarnished and so there was no need for rehabilitation.

A further argument was that according to the 'framework of assessment' for dispatching Dutch troops, which had already been submitted to Parliament, troops would only be sent if the operation was considered feasible. The experiences in Srebrenica and the situation in Gorazde suggested that the objective for this mission was unfeasible. The framework of assessment also stipulated that the troops had to be suitably armed for the circumstances; this was a further indication that a Dutch unit could make little or no contribution to an effective defence. A recent UN study had demonstrated that a whole division was necessary to defend Gorazde. NATO had worked out plans for the deployment of air power but this would never be enough to halt a large-scale Bosnian Serb attack. The circumstances in Gorazde would be the same as in Srebrenica: the troops would be a plaything for the warring factions, deprived of supplies and exposed to the risks of artillery fire and hostage-taking. It was telling that even the French, who were previously in favour of bringing reinforcements into Gorazde, now refused to supply troops. Members of Parliament had also commented negatively on a Dutch role in Gorazde.²⁹⁴⁰

The subject of Gorazde was later raised in conjunction with the Ministerial Council. Minister Van Mierlo was intending to send a Code to the Dutch representative at the UN, Biegan, in response to his request for the deployment of Dutch troops in Gorazde. The draft of the Code said that a decision on this subject would be difficult, but that in a first exchange of thoughts in the Ministerial Council the matter had not been dismissed out of hand. Voorhoeve objected to this wording as well as to the strong emphasis placed on the need to retain Gorazde. After all, if the Netherlands thought Gorazde was so important, why wasn't it prepared to defend the town itself? Voorhoeve did agree with the recommendation to send UN observers to Gorazde. The only option that made sense in Voorhoeve's eyes was to secretly reinforce the Bosnian Muslims with anti-tank weapons. This however was a task for the larger Western countries, and not for the UN or the Netherlands. Voorhoeve warned Prime Minister Kok that he expected problems both in Parliament and in the Defence organization if the government were to ignore the advice of the Defence people and send Dutch troops to Gorazde after all.²⁹⁴¹

In his letter to Parliament of 1 September about the situation in former Yugoslavia, Minister Van Mierlo made no further reference to Gorazde. It was still too early to draw lessons from the experiences in Srebrenica. The Netherlands would assess UN requests for contributions to peace operations on a case-by-case basis in a 'constructive-critical' manner and no contribution whatsoever was ruled out beforehand.²⁹⁴² The letter did not mention the fact that an informal request from the UN to contribute troops for Gorazde had been turned down.

The UN's search for a replacement proved fruitless. The British, for their part, had repeated that after eighteen months in Gorazde they were calling it a day. They were at most prepared to supply a few UN observers. Belgium, France, Germany and the United States had also refused to send troops. The planned multinational force of Russians and Ukrainians, which was to be supplemented (at the instigation of Kofi Annan and Van Kappen) with contingents from Malaysia and Pakistan, was thus put in jeopardy. After all, without the support of a Tactical Air Control Party from a NATO country, such a multinational contingent was not a workable solution. All the UN could do was station a number of

UN observers in Gorazde.²⁹⁴³ The UN Secretariat regretted this and, after the tough talk spoken in London, said it was a humiliation for the UN and NATO.²⁹⁴⁴

The last British troops left Gorazde on 30 August after first having to repel a Bosnian Muslim attack evidently launched in an attempt to steal weapons.²⁹⁴⁵ The Bosnian Serbs gave the British a free passage: even before Srebrenica fell General Smith had agreed with Mladic that the British would be allowed to leave Gorazde before the Bosnian Serbs started their attack. He had also agreed that UNPROFOR would not start air attacks before the British had left the enclave.²⁹⁴⁶

Boutros-Ghali was concerned on learning from the press that the UN were abandoning the enclave of Gorazde to its fate. The UN had no alternative, but UN spokesmen were to emphasize that the UN remained bound to its mandate to deter attacks on the Safe Areas in close collaboration with NATO.²⁹⁴⁷ The Americans feared that the Bosnian Serbs would occupy the enclave as soon as the British had left. This meant that, as had happened earlier in Srebrenica and Zepa, another bargaining counter or means of exchange for future peace negotiations had been lost.²⁹⁴⁸

15. Mortar shells on the Markale market in Sarajevo

The problem of Gorazde was swept from the public eye when five mortar shells exploded near the Markale market in Sarajevo on 28 August, with a single grenade killing 37 people and wounding 87 others. In February 1994 68 people had been killed and 200 wounded at the same spot. The Bosnian Serbs denied all guilt, but UNPROFOR concluded that their troops were the only ones who could have fired the 120 mm mortar shell.²⁹⁴⁹

UNPROFOR's conclusions were called into question, however. The Russians in particular raised objections. The Chief of Staff of Sector Sarajevo, the Russian artillery officer Colonel Andrei Demurenko, refuted the findings on the basis of his own analysis. In his opinion, the grenade could never have been fired from Bosnian Serb positions.²⁹⁵⁰ Russian intelligence officers told author Ljiljana Bulatovic that the Bosnian Muslim Commander Rasim Delic had organized the attack.²⁹⁵¹ But the British intelligence services also had doubts and thought that the Bosnian Muslims, rather than the Bosnian Serbs, were the perpetrators.²⁹⁵² US intelligence officers, too, admitted that the Bosnian Muslims had been responsible.²⁹⁵³ The US colonel J.E. Sray, who was an intelligence officer at the time in Sarajevo, also claimed in a publication in Foreign Military Studies that the Bosnian Muslims had been responsible.²⁹⁵⁴ This issue is dealt with more extensively in the intelligence appendix to this report.

On that same day of 28 August, Janvier, thinking of Gorazde, had informed New York that a single mortar shell, irrespective of its consequences, could not be interpreted as a threat to a Safe Area. This could not provoke the substantial or decisive reaction that had been agreed in London; in his eyes, a single shell did not justify the deployment of NATO air power.²⁹⁵⁵ But the mortar shell that hit the Markale market was to bring about a radical change in this standpoint on that very same day: on 30 August NATO started a bombing campaign. NATO aircraft and the Rapid Reaction Force attacked the Bosnian Serb positions around Sarajevo in coordinated action involving Close Air Support and air strikes as well as artillery and mortar fire. The UN headquarters and NATO had acted on their new powers with extraordinary alacrity. The UN Secretariat was caught unawares and wondered why there had been a six-hour delay before it was informed of 'this momentous decision'. New York also wondered whether an investigation had been carried out into the mortar attack.²⁹⁵⁶

On 28 August Janvier was in Paris, so Admiral Leighton Smith arranged the matter with General Rupert Smith: they directed their sub-commanders, Lieutenant General Mike Ryan (AFSOUTH Air Commander) and Major General of the Royal Marines David Pennyfather (commander of the Rapid Reaction Force), to set up a Joint Targeting Board for the selection of targets. After having contact with General Smith, Janvier turned the key for air strikes from Paris. Smith had only asked for a 24-hour delay to give him time to warn his troops that air strikes were imminent.

Janvier returned to Zagreb on 29 August and was startled when he saw the list of targets; after Srebrenica this gave Admiral Smith another occasion to tell Janvier that 'there are things you have to learn about air power'. Janvier would not stand for that: he refused permission for a number of targets and told Admiral Smith he would be writing a letter to say he had overstepped the mark. Things were patched up, however, after it had been explained to Janvier that bombing a barracks did not entail destroying the buildings but only the fleet of vehicles.²⁹⁵⁷

The subsequent Operation Deliberate Force had been conceived without political input. The planning had actually started at the beginning of the summer under the name Dead Eye. The initial objective had been to destroy the air defences and command structure of the Bosnian Serbs. All military targets relevant to this objective were identified. During the London Conference of 21 July there had already been indications that such a plan existed and this had also been briefed to Secretary-General Claes and SACEUR General Joulwan on 2 August.

Admiral Smith's idea was to split Bosnia into two parts. If the Bosnian Serbs attacked Gorazde, he wanted to attack all targets in the east of Bosnia. If the Bosnian Serbs attacked near Banja Luka, he intended to attack all targets in the west. But Janvier did not approve this plan, pointing out that the Total Exclusion Zone only had a 20 km radius. Deadlock ensued.

Janvier spoke about this with NATO in Brussels and – again – was apprehensive about overly overt NATO aggression as proposed by Admiral Smith. A new map was made, on which a triangle around the Posavina corridor near Brcko in North Bosnia was excluded from attacks. It was also agreed that the list of targets had to be approved by Janvier; Janvier agreed to thirteen targets. What NATO had omitted to say, however, was that these targets each consisted of a large number of separate targets. For Smith, this was yet further proof that Janvier understood little about the deployment of air power.²⁹⁵⁸

On 29 August Janvier informed New York that he had turned the key. The mortar attack constituted a clear threat to a Safe Area as perceived by NATO. General Smith pointed out that the situation was not essentially different to the attack in February 1994 which had also caused a large number of casualties. NATO then set an ultimatum for the withdrawal of heavy weapons. The warring factions were warned. Smith had initially considered deploying the artillery of the Rapid Reaction Force, but then opted for the impact that an air strike could have, also on the assumption that this would effectively deter retaliatory action from the Bosnian Serbs. While Mladic denied all involvement in the mortar attack on the Markale market, Smith remained convinced that the Bosnian Serbs were guilty.²⁹⁵⁹ Janvier informed Mladic that the UN had established that it was the Bosnian Serbs who had fired the shell. The British had also left Gorazde in the meantime, thus substantially reducing the Bosnian Serbs' opportunities to take hostages in a bid to prevent air strikes.²⁹⁶⁰

Operation Deliberate Force thus got under way on 30 August 1995. After Srebrenica, it was to prove a new turning point in the Bosnian war. Aircraft attacked the Air Defence system of the Bosnian Serbs, the Rapid Reaction Force attacked artillery and mortar positions.²⁹⁶¹ Mladic was required to remove all his heavy weapons from the Heavy Weapon Exclusion Zone with a 20 kilometre radius around Sarajevo. When New York found out that the Rapid Reaction Force was also taking part, it had to be withdrawn as it was exclusively supposed to operate as a defensive force. Admiral Smith termed this stance 'stupid'.²⁹⁶²

On 1 September there was a pause in the bombing to give Janvier an opportunity to meet Mladic and enable the Bosnian Serbs to withdraw the weapons. Admiral Smith later admitted it was a mistake to permit that pause. His NATO superiors were not happy about it. But the UN standpoint was that Janvier would recommend that the air strikes be suspended as soon as Mladic agreed not to threaten any further attacks on Safe Areas.²⁹⁶³ Mladic was prepared to withdraw the heavy weapons around Sarajevo on condition that this would not affect the military balance of power and that the parties would receive equal treatment. At the same time Mladic wanted to see another older wish fulfilled: an immediate ceasefire. Getting the Bosnian Muslims to agree to this would be a virtually impossible task for the UN. Janvier therefore dismissed this as unacceptable and required Mladic to immediately start withdrawing the heavy weapons from the Exclusion Zone and to refrain from further attacks on Safe Areas. Unless substantial progress had been made by 4 September, the bombing would be resumed.²⁹⁶⁴

After a fruitless meeting with Mladic lasting thirteen hours, and after consultation with the UN and NATO, Janvier stepped up his demands. UNPROFOR's freedom of movement was to be restored, as was the unimpeded use of the Sarajevo airfield. If Mladic failed to meet these demands, then the bombings would recommence. This was the case on 5 September.²⁹⁶⁵

Janvier and Admiral Smith established that the Bosnian Serbs had not fulfilled the demands. New York was dismayed to learn that a UNPROFOR spokesman had said that the objective of the resumption of the bombings was 'to cripple the BSA [Bosnian Serb Army] war machine and render its capabilities so devalued that General Mladic is forced to negotiate': according to New York the mandate went no further than ensuring the safety of the Safe Areas. Boutros-Ghali had always insisted that the UN was not at war with the Bosnian Serbs and even his NATO counterpart Claes had not claimed that the objective was to bomb the Bosnian Serbs to the negotiating table. Bosnia negotiator Holbrooke had also emphasized that this was not the intention. Janvier reiterated that his strategic objective was to achieve an end to the attacks on the Safe Areas, withdrawal of the heavy weapons, Freedom of Movement and an unhindered use of the airport of Sarajevo. He would subsequently be prepared to support any peace process that could provide a solution to the conflict. Janvier had agreed with Admiral Smith when he wanted to resume the bombings and had been 'very supportive' but Janvier 'got beaten up by the UN', according to Smith.

Smith had wanted to escalate further and transfer F-117 Stealth aircraft to Italy in order to target radar systems but Italy withheld permission in a bid to lend force to its efforts to become a member of the Contact Group. Smith was allowed to launch thirteen Tomahawks (Sea-Launched Cruise Missiles) from ships in the Adriatic Sea. This enraged the Russians in the Security Council as Resolution 836 exclusively permitted the use of air power and not sea power. According to Admiral Smith the Tomahawks had mainly had a political impact in Belgrade. It had reportedly prompted Milosevic to urge Mladic to exercise restraint in relation to the Rapid Reaction Force and air operations.

After Karadzic and Mladic had signed an agreement on 14 September for the withdrawal of the heavy weapons, NATO suspended its operations and Holbrooke was able to start negotiating a peace settlement on 15 September. Holbrooke had already been in the region for some time, though he was still on the sidelines when the bombing started. The American UN ambassador Albright had expressed concerns as to whether UNPF had been keeping him sufficiently informed of developments after the air strikes started.²⁹⁶⁶ Holbrooke himself said however that the air strikes were to be effected without taking any account of the negotiation process.²⁹⁶⁷ In the first days of the fighting around Srebrenica this had been different, when the UN headquarters in Sarajevo had been wary of providing Close Air Support because of the mission of EU negotiator Bildt (see Chapter 7 of Part III).

The air strikes had a considerable impact on the Bosnian Serb Air Defences but left the ground forces largely unaffected because the Bosnian Serbs had taken protective measures.²⁹⁶⁸ The results that NATO achieved with the bombings were initially meagre: less than 50% of the targets were hit. The Bosnian Serbs managed to restore their communications system fairly quickly and the Integrated Air Defence System remained in operation. It was only towards the end of the campaign that no activity was detected on the Bosnian Serb target indication radars and substantial damage had been inflicted on the Air Defence and communication system. The Bosnian Serbs, incidentally, did succeed in bringing down a French Mirage.²⁹⁶⁹ The Netherlands played a sizeable part in the NATO actions, contributing 18 F-16s which conducted 5.6% of all sorties. The Dutch contribution thus came directly behind the efforts of the United Kingdom (9.3% of the sorties) and France (8.1%). The Americans accounted for the lion's share, with 65.9%.²⁹⁷⁰ The Dutch F-16s gave Close Air Support to the Rapid Reaction Force, carried out an air strike against a munitions factory and flew damage assessment missions. In addition, the mortar company of the Royal Netherlands Marine Corps fired at Bosnian Serb artillery and mortar positions around Sarajevo.²⁹⁷¹ territory as a result of the Croatian actions. Operation Storm sparked a massive flight of Croatian Serbs to the Republika Srpska and Serbia. It also aggravated the differences between Karadzic and Mladic. Karadzic took over the command of the Bosnian Serb Army from Mladic as supreme commander, with Mladic acting as his 'special adviser'. However, opposition from the General Staff meant that Mladic's position effectively remained intact.²⁹⁷²

The collapse of the army of the Republika Srpska Krajina, the Armija Republike Srpska Krajina (ARSK), also affected the Bosnian Serb Army. The undermanned Bosnian Serb Army was beginning to tire of the struggle and morale was sinking. Though the Bosnian Muslim efforts to break the siege of Sarajevo had failed, severe damage had been inflicted on the Bosnian Serbs. The large number of wounded totally disrupted the medical-logistical system. Bosnian Serbs who had fled to Serbia to evade conscription in the Republika Srpska were now forced to fulfil their military service after all and these newcomers hardly boosted the overall morale of the Bosnian Serb Army. UNPROFOR even thought that Bosnian Serb morale was so low that parts of the front would crumble if the Bosnian Croats and Muslims were to launch a concerted attack.²⁹⁷³

These were signs that change was in the air; the balance of power between Belgrade and Zagreb was shifting. The Serbs were no longer perceived to be invincible. The defeat of the Croatian Krajina Serbs and the fact that Milosevic did not lend them assistance, and possibly never would if the Bosnian Serbs found themselves with their backs to the wall, opened up fresh hopes of successful peace negotiations. Dialogue was also necessary to dampen the risk of a war between Croatia and Yugoslavia. The danger was that a Croatian invasion of Serb-inhabited Eastern Slavonia, which was located on the border with Serbia, would draw Yugoslavia into the war. This area had been captured from the Croats in 1991 after the bloody battle for Vukovar.²⁹⁷⁴

Milosevic was the crucial factor. Though his most important objective was the suspension of sanctions against Yugoslavia, he was not the kind of man to operate without a strategy for the longer term. What that strategy was remained unknown to the UN. For the short term, however, the UN foresaw no great change in Bosnia. It was true that 30–40,000 soldiers of the Armija Republike Srpska Krajina had entered Bosnia with their weapons and would probably soon be pressed into Bosnian Serb service, but defeat had strongly diminished their usefulness as a fighting force.²⁹⁷⁵

The situation in Croatia had been settled following the Croatian victory in Krajina, but a solution for the conflict in Bosnia was still a remote prospect. While the UN were struggling to map out a course in former Yugoslavia without directing – unwarranted – criticism at the Security Council, the Americans took the lead with the 'Lake initiative' to establish whether the altered landscape presented opportunities for restarting the peace process. In this connection National Security Advisor Anthony Lake went on a tour of Europe to gauge the level of support for his proposals. The core of his proposal consisted of mutual recognition between Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and Bosnia; a ceasefire; suspension of sanctions against Yugoslavia in exchange for the willingness to sit down at the negotiating table; a solution for Eastern Slavonia on the basis of the existing 'Z-4 plan' in which the UN would take the administration of Eastern Slavonia upon itself for a five-year period, after which the area would be handed over to Zagreb. As for a peace settlement in Bosnia, the Lake initiative provided for a modification of the map of the Contact Group. This was not only an old wish of the Bosnian Serbs but, after the loss of Srebrenica and Zepa, had also become a sensitive issue for the Muslim-Croatian Federation. Gorazde could no longer be negotiated or bartered away by the international community.²⁹⁷⁶

Thus on 28 August, even before the bombardments around Sarajevo began, the Americans were already engaged in intense efforts to get the derailed peace process back on track. 'With a blitz of shuttle diplomacy which appears to have swept all adversaries onto the bandwagon of the peace process', Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke had embarked on a new mission. Even the formerly intransigent Bosnian Serbs were now prepared to take steps on the road to peace. They agreed to the proposal to form a joint negotiating team of Bosnian Serbs and Serbs under the direction of Milosevic and agreed in principle to the US initiative. Milosevic's voice would be decisive during the negotiations. The participation of Milosevic had also been a demand of the Bosnian government.

Milosevic felt the time had come that the Serbs could achieve more at the negotiating table than on the battlefield. This augured well for the US efforts. The Foreign Ministers of Croatia, Bosnia and Yugoslavia also met each other for the first time in a long time. According to UNPROFOR, thanks to the US initiative and – after the loss of Srebrenica and Zepa – the strong resolve of the international community, an atmosphere conducive to peace talks was beginning to emerge.²⁹⁷⁷

The Bosnians, for their part, raised objections to the US proposals. Both President Izetbegovic and Bosnian Muslim Commander Rasim Delic levelled criticism at the proposals. Evidently the Bosnian Muslims still felt that precisely at this juncture they stood to gain more by fighting on than by sitting down at the negotiating table.²⁹⁷⁸ The Bosnian Serbs, by contrast, saw negotiations as the best way to keep the Bosnian Muslims at bay and were therefore keen to stop the hostilities.²⁹⁷⁹

On 29 August the Contact Group chaired by Holbrooke discussed the US 'Lake initiative' which, incidentally, dated from before the bombardments. The Netherlands was miffed at being refused a place at the table, particularly as Canada, Spain and Italy were allowed to take part. Only these three countries were admitted to the talks, however.²⁹⁸⁰

The negotiations hardly got off to a propitious start. The warring factions would not budge from their irreconcilable standpoints. The Bosnian government wanted an undivided Bosnia with a strong central government and as little autonomy as possible for the Bosnian Serbs. The Bosnian Serbs wanted as few political ties as possible with the Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Croats. They demanded equal status for the Republika Srpska and the Federation and the right to maintain their own international contacts. The Bosnian Muslims regarded this as hardly realistic. Attitudes hardened as the real negotiations drew nearer.²⁹⁸¹ As an additional condition for a peace agreement, President Izetbegovic demanded that NATO troops would be stationed on the entire territory of Bosnia as a further safeguard against the separation envisioned by the Bosnian Serbs.²⁹⁸² The only really tangible result to date was a the ceasefire commenced on 12 October, which was reasonably well observed.²⁹⁸³

17. Dayton

On 1 November 1995 peace negotiations started at Dayton under the auspices of the United States. The parties remained entrenched with little indication of willingness to compromise. The Bosnian Serbs were sharply divided. The star of Mladic and the Bosnian Serb Army had lost its lustre; he had not flinched during the NATO bombardments, but now the political leaders were ready to make concessions. The infrastructure of the Bosnian Serb Army had been heavily damaged. Hopes that Karadzic and Mladic would disappear from the political stage did not materialize.²⁹⁸⁴

Assertions by the Bosnian Muslim Commander Delic that a failure of Dayton would reignite the hostilities and open up prospects for him to capture more territory suggested that the Bosnian Muslims still preferred to continue fighting. Progress could be achieved by strengthening the Muslim-Croatian Federation through more cooperation and a joint military structure. It also meant the end of Herceg-Bosna as a Croatian entity in Bosnia.²⁹⁸⁵

The fall of Srebrenica and the subsequent mass murder also dogged the Dayton negotiations. The Bosnian Foreign Minister, Sacirbey, accused Milosevic of complicity and argued he should therefore not be invited to Dayton. Holbrooke doused the flames with the words: 'you cannot sign peace with your friends. Milosevic is one of the key people in achieving peace and all the others agree that [he] should take part in the talks in Dayton'.²⁹⁸⁶

Srebrenica and Zepa played a very modest role in the negotiations. President Izetbegovic realized that these places could no longer be returned, but demanded suitable compensation.²⁹⁸⁷ An agreement was reached in Dayton on 21 November.²⁹⁸⁸

The Mission Chief of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, the Spanish diplomat Antonio Pedauye, studied the map of Bosnia after the Dayton agreement. He concluded that though the Bosnian government had been allocated less territory than in earlier peace plans, they had been granted the whole of Sarajevo – the jewel in the crown – and a corridor to Gorazde. For the rest, the confrontation lines that existed on 12 October when the ceasefire started had been maintained as the lines of demarcation between the entities. The biggest change compared to the plan of the Contact Group was that Srebrenica and Zepa had been retrospectively 'exchanged' for parts of Sarajevo. In this way a settlement was reached which had been prevented earlier in the war by resistance from what Pedauye termed local hardliners.²⁹⁸⁹

After comparing the Dayton agreement and the Vance-Owen Plan, former EU negotiator Lord Owen expressed disappointment over the results that came out of Dayton: Dayton gave 6% more land to the Bosnian Serbs and was only achieved at the cost of two more years of war and many more dead.²⁹⁹⁰

18. Conclusion

The fall of Srebrenica, the loss of Zepa and the threat of losing Gorazde did not herald the end of UNPROFOR, but did painfully highlight the weakness of the UN mandate for the Safe Areas. Their impact, however, was not sufficient to make the troop-contributing nations and the permanent members of the Security Council consider the time ripe to withdraw UNPROFOR. Nor did the fall of Srebrenica bring the end of the war any nearer. The enclave was simply too insignificant in the Bosnian theatre of war to have such repercussions. Nor did the changes in Eastern Bosnia alter the strategic objectives of the warring factions or the military balance of power. Srebrenica and Zepa did show that the warring factions no longer respected Security Council resolutions or threats from NATO and the UN admonishing them to stop fighting. These instruments had been brandished so often that their value was hardly more than symbolic.

Air power had lost its magic. The UNPROFOR agenda was increasingly being driven by public opinion on the home front in the participating countries and the Bosnian government gratefully exploited every chance to accuse the international community of doing too little too late. Differences within the international community also gave the Bosnian government an opportunity to pin blame on UNPROFOR. The refugees packed together at Tuzla Air Base presented an excellent opportunity to remind the world of the ineffectuality of the UN and the depravity of the Bosnian Serbs.²⁹⁹¹

The mass murder committed by the Bosnian Serbs after the fall of Srebrenica created a new situation, however. Their brazenness and total disregard of what the world would think made it possible for the Security Council, the United States and the UN to resort to force at a later stage. The massacre rocked institutions such as NATO and the UN to their very foundations. The bankruptcy of existing methods of crisis control had been exposed with stark and startling clarity. The executions in the wake of the fall of Srebrenica were, in the words of the American UN ambassador Albright, a clearly identifiable ‘trigger’ in the change in US policy.²⁹⁹² US Foreign Secretary Warren Christopher expressed himself in similar terms: ‘The overrunning of Srebrenica and Zepa created a circumstance that in some ways tragically enough makes the shape of the peace simpler than it would have been in the past.’²⁹⁹³

Without these murders, so General Smith said with hindsight, Mladic might have got away with the capture of Srebrenica.²⁹⁹⁴ But Mladic had miscalculated the reaction of the international community. According to General Morillon, Mladic had thought his attack on Srebrenica would accelerate the withdrawal of UN troops; this, so Morillon claimed, had always been his objective. (See Chapter 1 of Part III.) Mladic’s expectation that UNPROFOR would withdraw had apparently been strengthened by the reports he read in the international media and the continuous announcements of the US Congress that the arms embargo was to be lifted.

What Mladic had not bargained on, however, was the vehement public outrage over the manner in which Bosnian Serbs had treated the population of Srebrenica like animals. Mladic, so Morillon believed, was not aware that he had crossed a line in the sand that would ultimately enable President Clinton to overcome the resistance of Congress and authorize the deployment of US ground troops.²⁹⁹⁵

This was not achieved overnight however. For the time being the line in the sand was drawn at Gorazde. This was the unanimous signal that the international community gave the Bosnian Serbs at the London Conference: Gorazde was the line. The concrete military implications were not filled in at the conference, but these soon followed. The most important thing was that the UN Secretariat understood that the status quo could no longer be maintained and that the UN, faced with the prospect of imminent disaster at Gorazde, had to abandon the strict neutrality of UNPROFOR that it had maintained for so long.

Peacekeepers would be unable to defend Gorazde, their supplies would not be allowed through and it would be impossible for them to do their job. Both warring factions could take the UN contingent hostage there. This, incidentally, was a lesson that the UN had been slow to learn from Srebrenica. Its initial intention had been to send fresh troops to Gorazde to replace the British, but not a single NATO country was prepared to dispatch a Tactical Air Control Party to Gorazde. As a result, the UN was forced to restrict itself to sending UN observers. This idea was not new either and had been advocated earlier by Generals Smith and Janvier and later Boutros-Ghali. UN observers lived among the population and were therefore less vulnerable to supply problems and hostage-taking.

The Netherlands, under the direction of Minister Voorhoeve, had drawn the lesson from Srebrenica that no more troops were to be sent to an enclave. Pressure on The Hague from the UN Secretariat and its own mission in New York to send Dutch troops to Gorazde were resisted. It was unusual for the Netherlands not to make the UN an offer when requested for support. A few weeks later Minister Van Mierlo was again planning to make an offer in conjunction with the General Assembly of the UN. This consisted of two infantry companies which could be ready to be sent to Gorazde from 1 November after being equipped with tracked APC armoured cars with 25 mm cannons and which had earlier been earmarked to relieve Dutchbat in Srebrenica (see Chapter 4 of Part III). Defence was not keen, however: UNPROFOR was already in the process of not replacing units in order to increase efficiency and reduce vulnerability. Moreover if the US peace initiative was successful, a NATO-led implementation force would be deployed and UNPROFOR would cease to exist.²⁹⁹⁶ As things turned out, no Dutch troops went to Gorazde.

Gorazde received no military reinforcements; this enclave simply could not be defended by reinforcing the local international garrison. NATO therefore took the lead to revive the idea of deterrence. It was aided in this endeavour by an international stance that was much clearer than at the time of the Bosnian Serb attack on Srebrenica: if a Safe Area was fired upon, this was sufficient reason to deploy air power. UNPROFOR now no longer required a demonstrable need for self-defence to call in air support. In addition, even initial indications of preparations for an attack could trigger air strikes: a 'smoking gun' was no longer necessary. Earlier, UNPROFOR had been restricted to adopting a wait-and-see attitude and merely responding to Bosnian Serb actions. From now onwards, it could act proactively. This was a world of difference compared to the situation at Srebrenica barely six weeks earlier. In the previous situation, an undermanned battalion had been considered a sufficient deterrent to keep the Bosnian Serbs in check.

Another important change was that the dual key for authorizing air strikes had been placed back in the hands of the military. What is more, Janvier largely overcame his earlier qualms about deploying air power. When shells hit the Markale market on 28 August, the military responded swiftly and used their new powers to implement the measures devised for Gorazde. After the fall of Srebrenica, the mass murders and the Croatian advance, this was another decisive turning point in the Bosnian conflict.

The UN was now in a position to turn the screws on the Bosnian Serbs and did this vigorously in cooperation with NATO. NATO was thus handed an opportunity to suppress the Bosnian Serb Air Defences. By virtue of powerful military activity, both from the air and ground, the safety of the remaining Safe Areas was finally secured and a credible deterrent against the Bosnian Serbs was put in place. This also helped to create the right climate for peace negotiations. As SACEUR General Joulwan said: 'Mladic was a good tactician but as a strategist he misjudged NATO.'²⁹⁹⁷

Appendix I

Dutchbat III and the population: medical issues

Author: D.C.L. Schoonoord

Introduction

This appendix deals with how Dutchbat III handled the provision of medical care. The central theme is the battalion's intense exposure to medical problems during the fall of the enclave (the period from 6 to 11 July 1995), in particular to the question of whether a stock of medical supplies reserved for the treatment of possible wounded members of Dutchbat should after all be used for the treatment of the local population, which was in acute need of medical care.

First of all, however, the organization of medical aid in the Srebrenica enclave needs to be described. Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) and the staff of the local hospital were jointly responsible for the medical care of the population. When Dutchbat contributed to this care, this generally occurred under the aegis of and in support of MSF. This form of aid was under pressure even before the fall of Srebrenica, owing partly to the stagnation in the supply of medical supplies which made the provision of aid more difficult and partly to a conflict which arose in the spring of 1995 between the Opstina (municipal council) and MSF. While Dutchbat tried not to get involved in this conflict it did lead to internal problems and to a certain amount of forced inactivity in the Field Dressing Station.

Existing problems were aggravated as the Bosnian Serbs continued to seal off the enclave more and more hermetically from the outside world. This seriously hindered personnel changes, which had repercussions on morale and personal relationships. The transport of supplies to the enclave, which had long been a problem, got steadily worse, even before the Bosnian Serbs started actively interfering with the supply route. The consumption of medical supplies at Dutchbat was so high that the UN had difficulty replenishing the stock of these materials up to the proper level. The humanitarian aid provided to the local population gradually caused the medical supplies to fall to a level at which it was feared that it might be impossible to give wounded Dutchbat soldiers adequate treatment in the event of a calamity. This grew to be a source of tension between Dutchbat and the medical services, and also internally between individual members of the medical services.

All these factors exposed the existing tension between the mandate, i.e. the formal rules governing its deployment laid down by the UN, and the Dutch desire to be of as much service as possible to the population. The poor supply of medical materials ultimately led to the laying down of a stock of such materials for emergencies which came to be known as the 'emergency stock'. These supplies, which never reached the desired level, were later the cause of much controversy. The establishment of such emergency stock led to countless practical and ethical problems related to the question of whether these supplies could be used to treat the local population or should be reserved for the treatment of wounded Dutch troops if the need should arise. This proved to be an almost insoluble problem. The present appendix is thus largely devoted to a description of how this dilemma developed in practice.

Before these questions can be dealt with in depth, however, the organization of the medical units supported by Dutchbat must first be sketched and consideration must be given to the way the locally available resources were organized. To this end, a brief description of the medical organization of Dutchbat is first given, followed by a sketch of the medical aid provided to the local population, an impression of how this medical aid was temporarily halted by a conflict between Médecins Sans Frontières and the Opstina and the consequences of this situation for Dutchbat. Further details are then given of the problems associated with the above-mentioned 'emergency stock' of medical supplies, the rules governing the establishment of this stock and the relation between the UN regulations for medical aid to the local population and the maintenance of adequate supplies of medical materials.

An attempt is then made to give as clear a picture as possible of the medical aid provided by MSF and Dutchbat to the local population during the fall of the enclave. Next, attention is turned to the problems associated with the transport of wounded, first from the hospital in Srebrenica and subsequently from the enclave as a whole. This subject matter is dealt with in successive sections: the evacuation of Srebrenica hospital on 11 July, the attempt to send a convoy of wounded to Kladanj on 12 July and the transport of the remaining wounded from Potocari by the International Red Cross on 17 July. A picture is given of how these matters were dealt with in the report of the debriefing of Dutchbat and of the attempts to gain a better insight into what actually happened in the enclave, often in reaction to statements or comment from the media.

The second part of this appendix is mainly devoted to matters arising after the fall of Srebrenica and after the repatriation of Dutchbat, such as the internal problems which came to light within Dutchbat and the criticism from the media of the medical action of Dutchbat during the Bosnian Serb attack. This criticism concerned in particular the failure to treat a severely wounded Muslim woman brought to the Dutchbat compound on 10 July, a case which was later investigated both by the Military Health Care Inspectorate and by the Dutch Public Health Care Inspectorate. These investigations led to a discussion of the ethics of maintaining medical supplies for one's own use. The appendix closes with a summary of subsequent opinions on this matter.

The following comments may be made about the sources of information about the matters discussed in this appendix. Dutchbat reports for June 1995 contain little information about the situation of the population after the VRS (the Vojska Republika Srpska, military forces of the Bosnian Serbs) started its attack. The main emphasis lay on operational tasks, reports of the battle between VRS and ABiH insofar as this could be appraised by Dutchbat, and the situation at the various observation posts (OPs). The description given in this appendix of the efforts made to provide the local population with humanitarian and medical aid at the time of the fall of Srebrenica draws on reports by Médecins Sans Frontières, statements made during the debriefing of Dutchbat, subsequent investigations of the medical action taken by Dutchbat, internal investigation and interviews with the local population and other persons involved in the events described.

Chapter 1

The medical organization of Dutchbat

Three medical units within Dutchbat, with a total of 69 personnel in July 1995, were responsible for the primary and secondary health care: the Medical Platoon, the Field Dressing Station and the surgical team. The Medical Platoon, which formed an integral part of the Airmobile Battalion, provided the primary care. Ten men from this platoon were stationed in the compound at Potocari and manned a number of vehicles intended for the transport of the wounded. The battalion's first aid post and the remaining personnel of this platoon were situated with the company stationed in Srebrenica, with the Dutchbat company at Simin Han near Tuzla and at the Support Command in Lukavac. In addition, a number of soldiers received training in first aid for the wounded. One of these paramedics was present at all times at various observation points within the enclave and on patrol.¹

A Field Dressing Station for secondary care was also assigned to the battalion.² This composite unit had a total of 46 personnel and comprised a reception group, a group manning the crash room, a radiological and laboratory group, mortuary group, nursing department, blood supplies group, dispensary and operating theatre.³ The third medical unit was a team of usually ten specialists,⁴ working in the operating theatre and sent out by the Armed Forces Hospital Organization (KHO) for a three-month duty period. The Field Dressing Station had a maximum capacity of twenty beds, including four for intensive care. In addition there was the operating theatre and a space where the wounded could be stabilized, reanimated and given artificial respiration. Medical supplies were stored at various locations in the compound at Potocari. A second operating theatre for use in calamities was fitted out in a bunker, and provided with the appropriate medical supplies. This made it possible to continue to perform operations in the case of bunker alarm.

The dentist could make use of a treatment room within the Field Dressing Station. The equipment there was not up-to-date, and not all necessary functions were operative; for example, the dentist had to work with an improvised suction system. Better equipment had been promised from the Netherlands, but never reached the enclave. Dental treatment in the compound was reserved for Dutchbat personnel, other UN personnel and the local workers present in the compound. Patients from other parts of the enclave were treated in the hospital in Srebrenica, but once they were in the compound they did receive dental treatment if required. After the introduction of new measures to reduce fuel consumption on 11 May 1995, the Battalion Staff gave orders that local workers within the compound should no longer receive dental treatment. The dentist did however continue to treat these people in special cases, when he considered it necessary. Unlike the rest of the Field Dressing Station staff, the dentist had a good supply of medicaments. During the last few weeks of Dutchbat's stay in Srebrenica, the dentist worked in the hospital in Srebrenica one Monday morning a week.⁵

The Field Dressing Station had its own commander – not a physician – with the rank of captain. The surgeon, who had the rank of colonel, bore the final responsibility in medical matters but was functionally under the command of the Field Dressing Station commander. The normal procedure was that the latter reported on matters concerning medical organization in consultation with the surgeon to the deputy commander of Dutchbat, Major Franken. These differences in ranks and responsibilities within the Field Dressing Station sometimes led to friction.

⁵ Debriefing statement by J.T.M. Huijgens, 14/09/95.

There were also great cultural differences between the personnel of the Airmobile Battalion and the part of the medical personnel that normally worked in hospitals. The medical specialists had a duty period differing from that of the battalion, which meant that few close links were built up between the two. These differences left a clear imprint on many of the matters discussed below.

The rotation of the surgical teams was a problem, since the Bosnian Serbs refused to give permission for this. As a result, one of the teams was forced to stay in the enclave much longer than planned; this led to the presence of two surgical teams in the enclave at the time of the attack.

After 1 April 1995, the Field Dressing Station was under the operational command of Dutchbat's Commanding Officer. This replaced the previous arrangement in which the station had been under the command of the Commander of Support Command in Lukavac, which was situated outside the enclave; when the Bosnian Serbs sealed off the enclave, this arrangement was no longer useful.

A physician was present as staff officer at the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff in The Hague. He advised the RNLA Crisis Staff and maintained contact with the medical staff in the enclave.⁶

A version of this report from which all personal details had been removed to preserve anonymity was also available for inspection in the documentation department of Parliament.

Chapter 2

Medical aid for the local population

The hospital in Srebrenica was poorly equipped, and could not possibly provide the local population with adequate medical care. It was not much more than an outpatients' clinic run as a hospital. The conditions there were very primitive – appreciably worse than those in the compound at Potocari. Electricity, from the hospital's own generator, was only available a few hours each day. The canteen had been turned into an operating theatre. The operating table was of poor quality, and the level of hygiene in the operating theatre was abominable. A dentist was sometimes present; the only dental equipment available was an old barber's chair, a selection of pliers and a dental treatment unit the water cooling of which was defective.

The hospital was dependent on the arrival of UNHCR convoys for medical supplies and dressing material. As long as the Bosnian Serbs controlled access to the enclave, and as such the situation in practice, a regular flow of these medical supplies and dressing material was not guaranteed. Accommodation was inadequate, as a result of the enormous flood of refugees coming to Srebrenica in 1993: there were only five physicians and one surgeon to treat 35,000 people.

A team from the Belgian branch of Médecins Sans Frontières supported the hospital staff. Since the Opstina had no separate Public Health department, the hospital management was also responsible for general public health matters in the enclave.⁷

The Bosnian state committee responsible for maintaining contact with UNPROFOR asked Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in February 1995 for help in attempts to get medical teams into the eastern enclaves and to do something about the shortage of medical staff. However, the Bosnian Serbs refused these teams access to the enclave, and sometimes took them prisoner.⁸ It is true that the Bosnian Muslims did manage to get a helicopter carrying a group of medical personnel into the air en route for Srebrenica in May 1995, the group in question seems to have been forced to make the trip, but the VRS shot the helicopter down in the hills round Zepa. Apart from the Chief of Staff of the 28th Division of the ABiH, Ramiz Becirovic, the physician Dzevad Džananović was one of the few survivors. After the incident, he was present in the hospital practically exclusively as a patient. He only started to learn how to walk again a week before the fall of Srebrenica. Standing on one leg, he tried to help as best he could in the treatment of the patients who had been wounded in the attack on the town.⁹

The de facto head of the hospital was the physician Ilijaz Pilav. He was also the only one to do any surgical work, though he had only received partial on-the-spot surgical training from a Médecins Sans Frontières surgeon. Avdo Hasanović was the titular head of the hospital. He only worked a few hours a day, during which time he did little more than perform (crude) abortions for high fees. MSF staff member Emira Selimović reported that he was mainly interested in money, and that he had refused to cooperate with the chief physician.¹⁰ She was not alone in this opinion: the Dutchbat surgeon Colonel G.D. Kremer characterized the man as a charlatan who earned large sums of money by performing circumcisions.¹¹ The relationship between MSF and Hasanović was problematic. Hasanović, a member of the circle surrounding Naser Oric wanted MSF to allow him to distribute medicines that were provided free by that organization. It was rumoured that he sold them on the black market.¹²

The situation in the hospital was not new. As early as September 1994, the Civil Affairs Officer of Sector North East in Tuzla, Ken Biser, reported the existence of many problems that had been observed since the creation of the enclave. UNPROFOR or UNHCR officials had promised to clear up these problems, but tended to forget about them in the course of time. Biser was also confronted with Srebrenica's problems in Tuzla when he met the ministers of the Canton of Tuzla and the heads of the international organizations in the region. Biser commented that at these meetings, people tended to approach him according to a standard pattern. The existing problems were described in great (almost exaggerated) detail, after which radio and TV reporters asked the representatives of the international community what they intended to do about them. In fact, however, according to Biser the conditions in the enclave were not as dramatic as they were sometimes painted: no one was starving, and the people were not without shoes and clothing. Medical care was available, though Biser also knew that the hospital was plagued by corruption. Medicines and care could be bought by people who possessed hard currency.¹³ Local doctors even asked for money to refer people to the Dutchbat Field Dressing Station.¹⁴

Dutchbat I provided medical care by taking over operations from the local hospital three times a week and by holding an outpatients' clinic three times a week at regular times.¹⁵ Dutchbat doctors looked after two of the six ambulancias manned by MSF, and Dutchbat surgeons also helped to perform complicated operations. MSF brought patients to the Field Dressing Station three times a week for echography and X-rays, and the Dutch X-ray technician came to Srebrenica twice a week to take X-ray photos there.¹⁶ The hospital staff needed in particular the services of a clinical chemistry technician and an X-ray technician.¹⁷

'Monthly Morbidity Reports' gave an overview of the numbers of patients treated for certain categories of complaints. Only one example was found in the UNPROFOR archives, for the month of April 1994. In that month, Dutchbat I treated the following numbers of new cases in the morbidity categories heart (1), respiration (18), abdominal (33), genito-urinary (5), neurological (10), dermatological (55), rheumatological (69), ophthalmological (20), internal (23), psychiatric (7), dental (8) and one gunshot wound.¹⁸ Dutchbat sent reports of wounded patients to the Medical Logistical Officer and the Force Medical Office at UN headquarters in Sarajevo and Zagreb. These reports contained records of the persons treated and what was wrong with them, which would be used as a basis for determination of the clinical pictures that could manifest themselves in the enclave. Sarajevo did not often react to these reports, however.¹⁹

When Dutchbat left the enclave, the battalion's records contained data on about one thousand local people who had been treated at the Field Dressing Station. There were also medical files on about 300 patients who had undergone operations or been admitted for treatment.²⁰ Dutchbat took these documents with them when they left the enclave. They ended up in Zagreb, but no one knew exactly what to do with them; after the files had been lying about in Zagreb for some time, a captain there reported that he had a box of 'confidential medical information' in his possession about local people who had been treated at the Field Dressing Station. The Medical Service staff officer of the RNLA Crisis Staff, Lieutenant Colonel W.J. Wertheim, then proposed that the data about Bosnian patients should be made available to the International Red Cross.²¹ For unexplained reasons, this did not happen. Instead, the box full of information arrived at the Headquarters of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff in October 1995. Inspection of the contents there did not reveal any major new findings. It did show, however, that Dutchbat I, II and III had played a greater role in arranging medical transports from Srebrenica to Tuzla than had been previously thought.²² In February 2000 enquiries made by the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation (NIOD) revealed that the documents were stored in Dutch military medical archives. They would have been able to play a role in the determination of ante mortem status in the framework of the identification of victims by the ICRC or Physicians for Human Rights. They were finally handed over to the Yugoslavia Tribunal later that year.

Dutchbat II continued the aid to the local population that had been started by Dutchbat I. Dutchbat II also made its own Field Dressing Station capacity available. In connection with the number of patients calling on the ambulantas, consideration was given on a case-by-case basis of whether Dutchbat surgical capacity should be made available. As a result, many local persons underwent operations or were admitted for treatment in Potocari. Dutchbat II managed, with a great deal of effort and after the necessary negotiations with the Bosnian Serbs, to get 30 civilians with serious illnesses or life-threatening injuries transported to Tuzla or Sarajevo. A few patients were transported by helicopter and the rest in a convoy. Dutchbat II also supplied both the local hospital and MSF with limited amounts of medicines. The Bosnian Serbs in Bratunac were also provided with medicines in emergencies. The institute for the mentally handicapped was provided with electricity via a line laid for the purpose from the compound in Srebrenica.²³

OPs often acted as links in the health care network for the more remote villages. Wounded Muslims turned up regularly at the OPs, where they received treatment from the paramedic present. In some cases, Dutchbat then took care of transport to the Field Dressing Station for further treatment. The same held true for pregnant women; one even gave birth in an APC.²⁴

During the period that Dutchbat III was present in Srebrenica, it continued to hold consultations at the ambulantas in the enclave till the end of May 1995. In addition, surgical consultations were held once a week at the compound in Potocari. An average of 15 patients attended each of these consultations. The numbers attending the consultations at the ambulantas were higher. Depending on their complaints, patients received treatment on the spot or were transferred to the Field Dressing Station or the hospital.²⁵

Dutchbat also provided incidental aid in repairing the medical equipment in the hospital in Srebrenica, or in keeping this equipment running.²⁶ Nurses assisted in the outpatients' clinic. During the early days of Dutchbat III's stay, First Aid lessons were also organized for the local population.²⁷ Children in the primary schools in Srebrenica and Potocari received such lessons with the aid of interpreters. The medical personnel took toothbrushes along to these lessons as presents, in order to promote personal hygiene.²⁸ The hospital staff prepared a weekly survey of the sick or wounded present in the hospital in Srebrenica or attending the consultation for those wishing to be evacuated. Accordingly, the surgeon selected a number of people for transfer to the compound in Potocari for further treatment. The transport to the compound was provided by members of the local population or by MSF. The return transport was provided by members of the local population or by a Dutchbat ambulance.²⁹ Dutchbat III performed an average of two operations per day. Patients outside the compound were also visited in exceptional cases. Humanitarian aid was not provided to ABiH soldiers if they were recognizable as such.³⁰

Dutchbat's medical personnel were more respected by the ABiH than the military. Civilians were also friendlier to the medical personnel who took care of the wounded. A certain amount of self-interest seems to have played a role here. Conversely, the Chief of Staff of ABiH's 28th Division, Ramiz Becirovic, twice received medical aid at the compound despite the ruling in force at the time that such aid should no longer be provided to inhabitants of the enclave. X-ray photos were taken of Becirovic after he had been wounded in May during the shooting down of a helicopter. The orders to have the X-ray photos taken were motivated by goodwill. These orders were given by Major Franken, at the suggestion of the liaison officers Major Boering and Captain Melchers.³¹ Radiology technician Warrant Officer A. Wiehink received the request from the leadership of the battalion via the Field Dressing Station commander to take X-ray photos and echograms of Ramiz Becirovic. He did so, but was surprised because the request was not in line with agreements that had been made previously.³²

Medical aid as an instrument of war

Defence Minister J.J.C. Voorhoeve visited Dutchbat on Sunday 11 September 1994. It was his first visit to the enclave. He summarized his impressions in a letter to his colleague Jan Pronk, Minister of Development Cooperation. The population of the enclave, estimated to amount to 37,000 persons (including 20,000 refugees), was living under miserable conditions: there was a lack of good housing, and medical provisions were extremely limited. Exchanges of fire, initiated first by one side and then by the other, occurred regularly at the borders of the enclave, as did kidnappings and murders. The population reacted apathetically to their hopeless position. Voorhoeve observed that humanitarian aid was only reaching the inhabitants of the enclave in limited amounts. Dutchbat would be glad to help the people more, but could do little in the face of the continued refusal of the Bosnian Serbs to allow medical supplies into the enclave.³³

Since there were hardly any Dutch soldiers requiring treatment in the Field Dressing Station, the staff there considered in consultation with MSF whether there was anything the staff of the nursing ward could do to help the local population. The bottleneck proved to be the supplies of dressing material held by Médecins Sans Frontières. Since these supplies were so low, patients' dressings could not be changed often. This led to frequent infections which in their turn had to be treated with antibiotics – which were also in extremely short supply. This vicious circle had already been in existence for some time.

Médecins Sans Frontières were also dependent on the Bosnian Serbs for their supplies. Their supply of fuel, which was kept at the UN compound in Potocari, fell and, like that of Dutchbat, was not replenished. The Bosnian Serbs argued in discussions with MSF that they were not bombarding the enclave, so no one could be hurt by their actions. They were not particularly interested in any wounded there might be among the Muslim population. That being the case, why did MSF need so much in the way of medical supplies, the Serbs asked suspiciously. These supplies fell, and since Dutchbat's supply lines had also been cut it was only possible to help MSF out in cases of utmost need; and even then, only tiny amounts of the most essential supplies could be given. The Bosnian Serbs were not interested in arguments, and opposed clearances for the transit of convoys.³⁴

Dutchbat did sometimes let MSF have medical supplies of which adequate amounts were available, or which were near their 'use by' date (though still usable). The medical service did this on its own initiative, without consulting the battalion staff.³⁵ Conversely, MSF supplied medicaments, especially in children's doses which Dutchbat did not keep in stock. Gifts of medicaments were also used to ease negotiations with local authorities, both Muslim and Bosnian Serb.³⁶

In order to solve the problem of the shortage of medical supplies, these had to be smuggled in from February 1995. The Bosnian Serbs kept a close check on all medical supplies and equipment received, and assumed that Dutchbat only used these for its own personnel. Permission was also sometimes given for supplies that the Bosnian Serbs could use too; much of this material disappeared at checkpoints on Bosnian Serb territory. Dutchbat had to keep on improvising and shifting materials from one location to another in order to be able to continue to provide its own personnel with the necessary treatment.³⁷

In the meantime, the Bosnian Serbs complained that the Muslims got all the humanitarian aid, while they got none. The Civil Affairs section of Sector North East countered that the Bosnian Serbs did not ask for humanitarian aid, and did not allow UNPROFOR access to their territory.³⁸ Dutchbat did however get requests for medical supplies from time to time from the hospital in Bratunac, which was poorly equipped and suffered from a lack of medical supplies. Such requests were the subject of negotiations on a number of occasions. When asked for clearance for the delivery of such supplies, the Bosnian Serbs only gave a conditional 'yes'. Approval could only be 'arranged' if Dutchbat agreed in advance that more than half of the supplies delivered would be left at the hospital in Bratunac. Even then, it was by no means certain that the administration in Pale would approve the clearance.³⁹ Dutchbat did offer assistance to the Bosnian Serbs in Bratunac, but no medical supplies were actually delivered there up to the fall of the enclave.⁴⁰

A special form of assistance provided during the Dutchbat III period was the evacuation of elderly and vulnerable people. However, Bosnian Serb promises were not always realized on the ground. For example, General Mladic had said on 15 February and again on 7 March 1995 that he would agree to the evacuation of 450 persons from Srebrenica. President Izetbegovic also gave General Smith his approval for this on 20 March. The Opstina of Srebrenica had already asked UNPROFOR a month before to evacuate 450 to 1000 persons. However, no agreements about this evacuation had yet been made, no criteria had been laid down nor had it been decided who would draw up the list of persons to be evacuated. Experience had shown that this should be done by NGOs, to avoid corruption. However, this procedure could lead to confrontations with the local authorities who liked to retain control over their own people.

Since the media was already mentioning the possibility of evacuations, UNMOs in Srebrenica were instructed to avoid this issue in their contacts with the local authorities and to play down its importance by saying that negotiations were under way but no agreement had been reached yet. If such matters were discussed in too optimistic terms and no evacuation finally took place, UNPROFOR could be blamed for the failure.⁴¹ In fact, no results were achieved in this field, even though Dutchbat continued to urge the VRS up till the end of April to allow the evacuation of 30 persons (accompanied by 17 escorts) who were in a critical condition; however, no permission was given, as a result of which one of the persons died.⁴²

In May, 21 patients from the list of persons needing evacuation (the number of whom had in the meantime risen to 36) could be transferred to Sarajevo. Fifteen of the 17 attendants were allowed to go too.⁴³

Lack of guidelines

The situation in the enclave deteriorated very considerably in June 1995, after the NATO air strikes on Pale of 25 and 26 May. Dutchbat, which was also a victim of the block on the transport of supplies imposed by the Bosnian Serbs, no longer felt able to do anything to improve matters. The situation was threatening, and it did not take long for the expected escalation to occur: on 3 June, the VRS captured the southernmost point of the enclave, near OP-E. This led to temporary closure of the smuggling route to Zepa. The food shortage was exacerbated by the fact that UNHCR convoys were no longer allowed access to the enclave. The water mains system was no longer working either, and the hospital was hardly able to offer the population any medical services because of its ageing equipment and lack of medicines. MSF could do nothing to improve the situation, and neither could Dutchbat because of the block on the transport of fuel and other supplies.⁴⁴ Dutchbat's deployability and general scope for action were drastically reduced on all fronts.

There were no clear Dutch or internal guidelines or instructions about the provision of humanitarian aid to the local population. Dutchbat's Standing Orders went no further than giving some vague criteria for the provision of support for refugees (or 'non-combatants' in military terms) in need, if they were wounded or seriously ill and requested admission to a UN facility.⁴⁵ Hence, aid for the population largely developed on an ad hoc basis. Lieutenant Colonel Th.J.P. Karremans, Dutchbat's Commanding Officer, gave KHO-5 a free hand in this form of aid. The surgical teams (KHO-5 and KHO-6 during the Dutchbat III-period) were told nothing about the UN guidelines in this field before being sent out to Srebrenica. The surgeon in charge, Colonel Kremer, and his successor Naval Captain H.G.J. Hegge, did not learn of the existence of these UN guidelines until they had returned to the Netherlands.

In practice, they followed the line that had already been laid down by their predecessors, for which many arguments could be given: few soldiers required treatment at the Field Dressing Station, while the hospital of Srebrenica was overloaded and inadequately equipped to treat relatively large numbers of sick and wounded. The provision of humanitarian aid helped to prevent boredom among the medical staff and allowed them to maintain their practical skills, to learn to work as a team and to learn to work under special circumstances. The provision of humanitarian aid was also seen as a means of improving the relations with the local population.

Kremer made agreements with MSF about medical assistance on his own initiative. At the request of MSF, the KHO-5 team would provide assistance to the hospital. The possibility of holding consultations in Srebrenica was also discussed. It would then be decided in consultation with the local doctor whether a given patient should go to Srebrenica or to the compound at Potocari. The compound was regarded as the preferred destination for seriously wounded patients, since the Field Dressing Station had better facilities. Kremer did not consult the leadership of Dutchbat about this arrangement; this was to become a source of conflict between him and the battalion staff later.⁴⁶

In the 'good old days' when there were adequate medical supplies, the Field Dressing Station made no distinctions in medical treatment between Dutchbat personnel and civilians. The only difference was one of priority: Dutch soldiers received treatment before local civilians. Later, civilians were only treated if they were suffering from a life-threatening condition while Dutch soldiers received treatment at all times.⁴⁷

The shortage of fuel played an important role in limiting the extent of humanitarian aid. Restrictions had to be placed on the transport of wounded civilians, as a result of which it was no longer permitted to pick up wounded from the enclave and transport them to the Field Dressing Station or the hospital. Dutchbat did however continue to look for ways for patrols to pick up wounded from near a patrol route.⁴⁸

The conflict between Médecins Sans Frontières and the Opstina

Low levels of supplies were not the only reason why humanitarian aid had to be limited. Solidarity with Médecins Sans Frontières also played a role. MSF got into a conflict with the municipal council (Opstina) of Srebrenica at the end of March 1995, which was based on a long-standing difference of opinion between the two about legal competences. The municipal council wanted to employ a number of experienced Bosnian staff members of MSF for other tasks, but the coordinator of MSF objected. To give force to the MSF position, she temporarily closed a number of ambulant treatment stations (ambulantas).⁴⁹ The situation then arose that the Opstina rescinded these staff members' work permits, while MSF would not allow anyone else to do their work.

The liaison officer of Sector North East, Major Guy Sands Pingot, approached the MSF authorities in Tuzla, in an attempt to exert pressure on the organization to resume work in Srebrenica.⁵⁰ The local MSF coordinator, Catherine Vandeneede, 'refused to budge, however'.⁵¹

The Opstina then asked Médecins Sans Frontières to make their medical supplies available, so that the municipal council could carry out the current health care programmes itself. MSF categorically rejected this proposal too as long as its local workers were not allowed back to work. The conflict got so heated that the police were ordered to arrest one of the local MSF staff members in question if he was found to be continuing his work for MSF.

In the meantime, the Belgian coordinator of Médecins Sans Frontières, Catherina Vandeneede, was succeeded by the German Christina Schmitz. The latter requested urgent consultation with the Opstina, but this was turned down. The director of the hospital, Avdo Hasanovic, supported the Opstina in this conflict. Christina Schmitz wanted to put an end to the situation she had inherited from her Belgian predecessor as quickly as possible. The work pressure in the hospital was high due to the closure of the ambulantas, and Schmitz found it unacceptable that the population should suffer as a result of the conflict with the Opstina.

Finally, the Opstina did agree to talk to Médecins Sans Frontières. It argued that the MSF staff were needed for work in the schools, and that others in Srebrenica should also be able to profit from the salaries paid by MSF. Furthermore, the Opstina made it clear that it was not happy that the MSF coordinator reported to the outside world about all kinds of matters concerning the enclave, which in its opinion could just as well be assessed and dealt with at local level. The Opstina continued to claim that it was authorized to commandeer the services of any member of local MSF staff it chose to. According to the Opstina, the population was suffering from the stubbornness of Médecins Sans Frontières; if the organization left the enclave, the Opstina was confident that it could manage things on its own, as it claimed it had demonstrated during the first year of the war.⁵²

Since the Field Dressing Station was working under the MSF flag, Dutchbat also stopped its humanitarian activities at this point;⁵³ only emergency aid was still provided. An underlying consideration was that Dutchbat and in particular its medical staff did not want to get involved in the conflict between the Opstina and MSF, which was in fact being fought out at the expense of the aid to the local population.⁵⁴

The Medical Officer of B Company in Srebrenica, Captain R.A. Buijs, took a slightly different view of the matter: he thought that Médecins Sans Frontières had exceeded its competence by refusing to treat the local population in response to the stance adopted by the Opstina that it was empowered to order specified staff members of MSF to do other work in the enclave. Captain Buijs agreed with MSF's standpoint, but not with its consequences.⁵⁵

The Opstina then raised the stakes a notch by calling up two members of MSF's logistics personnel for military service. This was in line with the policy adopted by the Bosnian Government of putting locally recruited personnel of international organizations into the army and replacing them with 'ones better suited to the work'. This idea was not new, and had raised its head elsewhere in Bosnia; UNPROFOR opposed it strongly.⁵⁶ There were also examples in Srebrenica of attempts to send people working for MSF to the front;⁵⁷ according to UNPROFOR, this contravened the Status of Forces Agreement concluded with the Bosnian Government. The Bosnian Ministry of Defence was the main force behind this new initiative, according to which only men aged 45 and over, and women, could be employed by UNPROFOR and UN agencies.⁵⁸

Since the humanitarian aid activities had been stopped, the staff of KHO-5 had little to do. This enforced inactivity of the Field Dressing Station personnel irritated other Dutchbat personnel, who were having to do their work under increasingly difficult conditions because of the shortage of fuel. This led once more to conflict between the medical personnel and battalion staff, in particular between Colonel Kremer and Major Franken. Franken ordered Kremer to resume the humanitarian work; but Kremer was only prepared to work for MSF and not for the hospital since he was afraid that if the conflict between the Opstina and MSF led the latter to withdraw, he would become responsible for the health care of the population of the enclave.⁵⁹

Members of the Opstina then asked Dutchbat senior staff to provide the health care that was lacking. The leadership of Dutchbat was initially willing to accede to this request, but the members of the KHO team believed that this would undermine MSF's position. Colonel Kremer thought that it would be unjustified to assume responsibility for the health of 40,000 people with his small staff. Lieutenant Colonel Karremans 'could feel the force of this argument' but Major Franken could not, according to Colonel Kremer.⁶⁰

This indecisive situation continued for two weeks. Major Boering, who maintained the contacts between Dutchbat and the hospital, asked Karremans urgently to cut the Gordian knot so that he could announce a decision to the hospital staff. Franken appeared to be furious about Karremans' procrastination, and announced that he would settle the matter himself. He discussed the situation with Kremer, but this did not lead to the desired result.

Major Boering now by-passed the two fighting-cocks and approached the hospital on his own initiative, together with Warrant Officer Tops who was acting as Deputy Commander of the Field Dressing Station after the Commander, Captain R.E.L. Sweens, was unable to return to the enclave after having been away on leave.⁶¹ Once Tops had been convinced that the local population did need medical support, he made a number of internal ‘arrangements’.⁶² As a result, when Lieutenant Colonel Karremans gave orders on 9 May 1995 for an investigation to be carried out into alleged misconduct in Dutchbat (as discussed in Chapter 9 of Part II of the main report), he included the provision of medical aid to the local population without knowledge of the Commanding Officer as one of the items of alleged misconduct of Dutchbat III. It is not clear whether there was a connection between this and the conflict between the Opstina and Médecins Sans Frontières, nor whether this matter was ever actually investigated.

Karremans wanted this investigation because there had been accusations in the press which also involved Dutchbat III, and he wished ‘to clear Dutchbat III’s reputation’; the investigation would show that the misconduct had been not so much in Dutchbat III but during the Dutchbat II period, in the Transport Battalion, the Signals Battalion and Support Command, i.e. not in Dutchbat II itself (see Chapter 9 of Part II).⁶³

The ultimate decision, in consultation with the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, was to follow the line laid down by the representatives of Médecins Sans Frontières, since this organization had the primary responsibility for medical aid to the local population while Dutchbat only played a supporting role.⁶⁴ This in its turn led to an accusation by the War President of the Opstina, Osman Suljic, and Mayor Fahrudin Salihovic that Dutchbat was doing nothing, and had failed to convince MSF of the need for cooperation. Karremans responded by demanding written apologies from the Opstina. He received a letter to this effect and the apologies were repeated in the course of a meeting, after which Dutchbat considered the incident to be closed.⁶⁵ Medical specialists from Dutchbat resumed their aid to the hospital on 12 June.⁶⁶

The 'emergency stock'

Definitions

The concept of 'emergency stock' (a minimum stock of certain specified supplies maintained for use in emergencies) ceased to apply in formal terms within the Royal Netherlands Army. The rule that such supplies should not be used without the permission of the higher commander dates from the 1950s, and was rescinded long ago. However, the idea continued to lead a life of its own. For example, even Lieutenant Colonel Karremans believed that permission from a higher level of command was required before a battalion could break into its emergency stock.⁶⁷ However, he also believed that a battalion command was always empowered to define minimum stock levels and to regulate the way in which supplies were used. This notion was based on tradition, and not on formal regulations: commanding officers can order part of the supplies to be set aside, though such a practice is not laid down in the Armed Forces' logistic regulations.⁶⁸

The idea of emergency stock was mainly used in Srebrenica in connection with medical supplies.⁶⁹ Dutchbat also kept a minimum stock of diesel fuel, for use in emergencies, the operational implications of which are discussed in Chapter 4 of Part III of the main report. It was never the subject of later controversy, however, as the emergency medical supplies were.

Procedures

The logistic supply of UN units is a UN matter, but exceptions can be made to this rule by means of a Letter of Assist. This allows a unit to be supplied by another country, which is paid for these services, if the UN lacks the necessary experience or if the items to be supplied are only available from the country in question (e.g. spare parts for equipment made in the Netherlands). The UN has its own system for more general supplies such as food, fuel and medical requisites: the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff thus played hardly any role in the supply of medical goods. Dutch battalions normally ordered goods from Bosnia-Herzegovina Command via Dutch Support Command.

Unlike the Dutch logistic system, the UNPROFOR supply system did not have minimum, maximum and warning stock levels. The UN did not stipulate what stock levels should be maintained. Scrutiny of UN regulations from 1994 did not reveal anything about the maintenance of medical supplies, though the possibility exists that these regulations were not complete - the Netherlands was not included in the list of recipients. The regulations only specified what a battalion should take with it for the first 60 days of deployment.⁷⁰

The supply of medical articles was associated with many problems. Bosnian Serb blockades were only one of these; the use of UN supply channels was another frequent cause of difficulties. 'Resupply that depends on the UN is doomed to failure,' said the special staff officer for medical services in the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim. This led to much irritation,⁷¹ to which the inflexible UN bureaucracy, with its sometimes ambiguous policies and regulations, contributed. UNPROFOR procedures were cumbersome, complicated and time-consuming. Funds were sometimes found to be suddenly exhausted; when UNPROFOR could not meet its financial obligations in this way supplies dried up and the Netherlands had to make extra contributions to ensure that Dutch units got their supplies. The procedure for requesting supplies under the UNPROFOR system took between five and eight weeks. In view of the long delays, requests were made from time to time from Srebrenica for the Netherlands to deliver goods that were in short supply. Dutchbat was used to a better supply system in the Netherlands, and the goods could usually reach the field of operations from the Netherlands within one to two weeks. In extreme emergencies, supplementary supplies were sent directly from the Netherlands; later, it became customary to permit goods to be ordered in the Netherlands when the supply time would otherwise be excessive, if it could be shown with reference to a UN order form that delivery via the UN was taking too long.

If a particular medicament prescribed by a doctor was required urgently, this was also sent from the Netherlands because supplementary supplies took too long to arrive via UN channels. Another factor was that the medicaments supplied by the UN were not always known to the Dutch physician, in which case he would sometimes order medicaments with which he was familiar from the Netherlands. In addition, 10% of the articles supplied by UNPROFOR did not meet Dutch quality standards; such articles also had to be obtained from the Netherlands. As a result of the combination of all these factors, the majority of the medicaments required by Dutch units came from the Netherlands. The Hague complied with practically all requests for medical supplies and goods for humanitarian aid for the local population, though neither the UN nor the Netherlands were completely happy with this arrangement – the former for reasons of protocol, and the latter for financial reasons.⁷² Since the Ministry of Defence paid for such shipments, requests for extra deliveries sometimes encountered resistance from the Logistics section of Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff.⁷³

Dutch inspections showed that supplies and consumption in the enclave were properly administered. What no one had a good overview of, however, were the amounts of supplies in the pipeline to Srebrenica. One undesirable aspect of medical stock formation that developed during Dutchbat's initial period was the build-up of supplies at too many different sites: doctors had their own individual stock, Dutchbat's Field Dressing Station had its stock and the dispensary kept a store of medical supplies. There was also a distribution point at Support Command. When this duplication of stock was recognized, the organization was streamlined: in particular, the distribution point for medical supplies was coupled with the UN depot in Zagreb.⁷⁴

UN bureaucracy in Zagreb was one of the very factors contributing to this undesirable situation. When Dutchbat put in an order, it never knew how much it would get, or when the goods would arrive. The amounts delivered sometimes differed from those ordered for budgetary reasons. It was known in Zagreb that a considerable proportion of the goods requested were intended for humanitarian aid; the UN administrators seem to have accepted this fact, but they were not happy about it.

The Bosnian Serbs did not accept this fact, however. They did not wish to permit the provision of humanitarian aid by UNPROFOR units, and used this as an argument to block transport of medical supplies for Dutchbat. Since the need for supplies for humanitarian aid to the local population was quantitatively much greater than that for Dutchbat's own troops, there was no way of disguising orders for medical supplies that were not intended for the battalion's internal consumption.⁷⁵

Supplies of blood were a separate issue. This required special attention, since the supply of blood was a national responsibility. The UN did not arrange this, and did not pay for it either.⁷⁶ While deep-frozen blood could be stored for a long time, ready-to-use blood always had to be available for operations. This meant that fresh supplies of deep-frozen blood were needed once every ten weeks on average.⁷⁷

Procedures and practice

The generous approach to humanitarian aid adopted by the Netherlands was a thorn in the flesh for the UN bureaucrats. UNPROFOR's Medical Logistic Officer spoke of 'excessive quantities requested'. Dutchbat was not very good at sticking to the UN catalogue of medical goods in its requests for new supplies, but it was in particular the 'enormous quantities of medical supplies' it requested that caused all Dutch orders to be examined under a magnifying glass. Requests for large amounts of supplies by Dutchbat had to be approved by senior staff. It had been noticed that Dutchbat often requested twice the normal amounts, sometimes even three times, and that was against the rules. The UN therefore wanted the amounts requested to be related to the number of UNPROFOR personnel requiring treatment: Dutchbat was explicitly informed that medical supplies provided by UNPROFOR were only to be used for UN personnel, and not for the treatment of refugees or for training purposes.⁷⁸ This edict did not cause Dutchbat to think again or change its ways, however.

Two senior Dutch medical officers, Colonel E.G. van Ankum and Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim, visited Srebrenica in January 1995 to study the procedure for maintaining medical supplies. The doctors working with Dutchbat had stated that they were not getting enough medical supplies to do their work properly, because of the cumbersome procedure for requesting new supplies, the limited range of supplies available from the UN and the fact that some medicaments the Dutch doctors were accustomed to using were not available at all via the UN, as well as the limitations on supply from the Netherlands. Both visitors observed that the procedure for ordering new supplies was in essence quite simple. Contingents requested supplies from UNPROFOR's Medical Provision Point (MPP). If they were not available from stock, the MPP ordered them. If the supplies requested had not been delivered within ten days, the contingent could order them in its country of origin and the UN would meet the costs. The failure of this system to work well in practice was due to poor management and administrative shortcomings at the MPP. The MPP used its own product numbers, while the Netherlands worked with NATO stock numbers; a separate administrative procedure was thus needed to process the requests. It sometimes took six months to obtain medicaments that had been requested. Moreover, all payments had been stopped due to the UN's disastrous financial situation. Any budgetary resources still available were used by the UN to guarantee supplies for 'poorer' UN contingents.

However, deliveries from the Netherlands were also subject to delays: when medical supplies were requested, the batch was only sent off when it was complete. The Commander of the Field Dressing Station in the enclave, Captain Sweens, recognized that supplies were too limited. He initiated a campaign aimed at tracing containers which should have contained stock destined for Dutchbat I during the initial stages of its deployment, but which never reached the enclave; this search was without results, however. Sweens conceded that blockades had not been the only factor adversely influencing stock levels and that the battalion had also been at fault in certain respects: the users of medical supplies were not well disciplined when it came to ordering new supplies; they often waited too long before submitting their requests and did not always follow the correct procedures.⁷⁹

In the judgement of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, humanitarian aid still had a low priority when Dutchbat I was sent to Bosnia, but grew steadily in importance during the duty periods of Dutchbat I and Dutchbat II. Moreover, the Minister of Defence had stated that he regarded the provision of humanitarian aid by Dutchbat as important. Even after the changing situation caused by the ceasefire at the end of 1994, international opinion continued to stress that guaranteeing humanitarian aid could be regarded as UNPROFOR's primary function. This was even truer at a local level. The Royal Netherlands Army believed that the Netherlands should find its own ways of supporting humanitarian aid, and should bear the costs of these measures itself.⁸⁰

An estimated 90% of all medical consumables were used in the treatment of the local population, and the remainder in the treatment of Dutchbat's own personnel.⁸¹ On arrival in the enclave, Lieutenant Colonel Karremans regarded the stopping of support to the local population, or a reduction in this support, as a serious threat to his mission. He believed, moreover, that it would damage the good relations with the local administration and population that had been built up with such great care and effort. He urged the maintenance of medical aid at its existing level.⁸²

The Netherlands Armed Forces had no guidelines for the provision of aid to third parties.⁸³ It was UNPROFOR policy that, except in emergencies, the provision of medical aid was a matter for non-governmental organizations and not for the military. The comment by General Rupert Smith when he took up his position as Commander of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command that humanitarian aid would become one of the troops' main objectives thus merely sowed confusion, since he had no say in logistic matters. When Minister of Defence Voorhoeve visited the enclave, he also welcomed the provision of medical aid to the population of Srebrenica: since the capacity of the Field Dressing Station was only partially used for the treatment of Dutchbat's own personnel, he saw aid to the local population as a useful way of maintaining the medical staff's skills at the proper level.

The Royal Netherlands Army wanted an unambiguous decision as to whether the provision of medical aid to the local population was or was not permissible: the aid given to the local population had made big inroads into the medical supplies, and after 1 January 1995 Dutchbat could no longer charge the UN for the costs of providing the local population with these supplies – which amounted to NLG 94,000 (about \square 42,500) per month. While the previous estimate had been that 90% of the consumption of medicaments and dressing materials had been for the purposes of humanitarian aid, this estimate subsequently rose, possibly to a figure as high as 98%.

Another cause for concern in the Netherlands was that the Bosnian Serbs were very well informed about Dutch activities in this field. This could be concluded from the refusal to grant permission for the supply of medical requisites. In this way, the Bosnian Serbs could regulate or block the provision of aid to the local population. At a given moment in February 1995, 30 pallet-loads of medical supplies were waiting for dispatch; this reinforced Dutch fears that a complete blockade, which might cover other categories of goods too, might be imminent.⁸⁴ These 30 pallets were in fact never dispatched, and Karremans asked the Commander of Sector North East to arrange for airdrops⁸⁵ if stock levels did not improve.

No supplies at all had been received since 5 February. Dutchbat had started using its back-up stock, and was also making use of medicaments that were past their use-by date; there were only enough supplies for the treatment of one single intensive-care patient; all the fresh blood had been used up, and there was only enough deep-frozen blood left for two patients, and while blood donation equipment was available, there were no means of testing it; there was only enough film left for 25 X-rays; there were no means of stopping an epidemic of diarrhoea if one should break out, and there was a shortage of dressing material and spare parts for medical equipment. All these supplies had been ordered, and were standing in Zagreb and Lukavac ready for dispatch.⁸⁶

Dutchbat had already sent a report to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo about the 'critical state' of the medical supplies in March 1995, and Commanding Officer Karremans had expressed his concern about stock levels to The Hague; as a result, these problems were brought to the attention of Minister of Defence Voorhoeve in March 1995.

The roots of such problems lay however in the conduct of Dutchbat I who, with the permission of the previous Minister of Defence Ter Beek, had started providing the local population with medical aid. This had been done at the expense of the medical supplies that Dutchbat I had brought with them for the treatment of the Dutch troops, and it now appeared that UN regulations did not permit the supplementation of supplies that had been used for humanitarian aid: as mentioned above, UNPROFOR stated that humanitarian medical aid was a matter for non-governmental organizations. In view of UNPROFOR's need to maintain an impartial stance, it was however unlikely that it would ever give formal permission for the provision of medical aid to civilians in the enclave.

The dilemma faced by The Hague was that a de facto situation had arisen in which the population of the enclave had become used to receiving medical aid from Dutchbat. Stopping this aid would not be good for the credibility and acceptance of Dutchbat, and could even lead to disruption of the medical care in the enclave. Chief of Defence Staff, General H.G.B. van den Breemen and Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Lieutenant General H.A. Couzy therefore adopted the standpoint that the aid had to be continued, on condition that the aid to civilians should be without prejudice to the primary responsibility, which was the medical care of Dutchbat personnel.⁸⁷ However, it is not clear whether Dutchbat was ever informed of this condition.

Van den Breemen and the Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Brigadier General F.J.A. Pollé, promised during a visit to the enclave in April 1995 that new supplies to be used for humanitarian aid would be sent.⁸⁸ At the same time, the Defence Staff tried to find a way out of the impasse as regards stock levels by investigating whether the flow of medical supplies to the enclave could be divided into two streams: a UNPROFOR supply channel for Dutchbat and a separate supply channel for the local population run by UNHCR, which would then have to assume responsibility for the medical aid in the enclave. The Defence Staff appears not to have been doing its homework properly, however: the memo did not mention the medical activities of Médecins Sans Frontières in Srebrenica, or the fact that UNHCR was already taking care of supplies for the population in general.

The memo went on to say that if UNHCR lacked the funds for these medical supplies, then 'official channels in International Development Cooperation' would not be averse to making a contribution. The Defence Staff added, in a somewhat patronizing tone, that such a contribution would be earmarked for medicaments and dressing materials intended for the population of Srebrenica; in this way, UNHCR would not have the option of determining the destination of these medical supplies itself.

The Defence Staff was, by the way, well aware that such a construction was dependent upon Bosnian Serb consent; if this was not given, the only alternative was to supply the goods in question by air. Even this route depended on Bosnian Serb consent, however, according to the Defence Staff; that this was indeed the case in practice is explained in the appendix 'Resupply by air'.

⁸⁸ DJZ. IMG (H.J.M. Groenhout) to the minister and the junior minister, 15/12/95, No. 95/27/515.

The only way the Defence Staff thought these solutions could be put into practice was by approaches made via representatives of the Netherlands at various levels: the Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Nicolai; the military advisor of the Dutch Permanent Representative to the UN; the Dutch UNHCR liaison officer in Zagreb; it was even suggested that the VRS might be approached with respect to this matter. The Emergency Aid Bureau of the Dutch Ministry of Development Cooperation was also informed of these ideas.⁸⁹

An approach was indeed made at the very highest level: Yasushi Akashi, the special representative of the Secretary-General of the UN, wrote a letter to Radovan Karadzic, the President of the Republika Srpska, about the serious nature of the lack of medical supplies in the eastern enclaves. He pointed out that permission for the transport of new supplies had been constantly refused since November 1994, while most medical convoys had been blocked since 19 January 1995. He went on to draw Karadzic's attention to Security Council Resolution 771 from 1992, according to which all parties were obliged to honour the terms of the Geneva Convention. Akashi urged Karadzic most strongly to draw up instructions to permit resumption of the transport of medical supplies; if this was not done, he would feel obliged to put the matter before the Security Council.⁹⁰

On 10 April 1995 the transport of medical supplies was resumed, greatly improving the situation as regards the stock of these goods. There were hardly any more shortages at that moment; indeed, supplies of some articles were actually much too high.⁹¹ All worries about the level of medical supplies were completely resolved. In a reply to questions in Parliament, Minister of Defence Voorhoeve stated that the supplies were once again sufficient to permit medical care both for civilians and for the Dutch soldiers. Medical aid to the local population was indeed resumed at full capacity, with an average of two operations per day.

According to Voorhoeve, the low levels of supplies in January and February had only led to a temporary reduction of the support for the local population. He ascribed this to a change in the position adopted by UNPROFOR, which no longer wished to bear the responsibility for the financing and transport of medical supplies. Voorhoeve stated further that humanitarian aid to the local population was not strictly speaking part of Dutchbat's mandate: according to the Minister, UNHCR was the organization responsible for this.⁹²

In practice, therefore, Dutchbat III took care of keeping the medical supplies needed for the population of the enclave at the right level and also took care of transport of the supplies needed for this purpose, while the Ministry of Defence paid the bill. However, the supply of medicaments and dressing material remained difficult, and not all batches that had been requested actually arrived.

Building up the emergency stock

From 10 April 1995, the supplies were again sufficient for the battalion's own estimated consumption for about 30 days, in line with the prevailing norm. Dutchbat III determined at that time that the warning level at which new supplies should be requested should be set at the size of the 'crash stock' required for the treatment of 30 patients with wounds caused by a single calamity, while supplies for seven days' consumption should be maintained at all medical posts (such as the Field Dressing Station and Dutchbat's various first aid posts).⁹³ The Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had wanted to go further by setting aside enough supplies for three months' treatment of Dutchbat's own troops, which should not be used for the purposes of humanitarian aid.⁹⁴

Dutchbat II had already started taking steps to build up emergency medical supplies at the end of 1994. At that time, surgeon K. Snabel and anaesthetist F. Kamerling reported that supplies were much too low, in particular for humanitarian aid to the local population; even the care of Dutchbat's own soldiers was at risk. Dutchbat II had therefore also set aside emergency stock for operations on the battalion's own personnel. Maintaining these supplies already gave rise to problems at this time, however, because of the unreliability of the supply channels.⁹⁵ The emergency stock at that time was calculated to be sufficient for operations on 20 wounded patients and their care for five days. These figures were based on the workload the operating-theatre team could handle and on the capacity of the nursing ward.⁹⁶

During the Dutchbat III period, the surgical team (KHO-5) also initially set aside stock of 20 operation packets, to permit operations on Dutchbat personnel in emergencies. By April 1995, however, it came to be realized that the high frequency of operations was making a considerable dent in these supplies again. The surgeon, Colonel Kremer, therefore decided, partly on advice of the pharmacist Captain L.A.J. Chin,⁹⁷ that the stock should be extended to comprise 30 operation packets. This figure was arrived at with the aid of a guideline from the staff manual, which stated that an estimated 8% of the battalion's troops might be expected to be wounded in the case of armed combat. Even at that time, however, not all the emergency supplies required were actually present: there was not enough dopamine, intravenous antibiotics and material for intensive-care treatment. There was enough material for amputations, however. It was assumed in this context that the wounded could be transferred to the American UN hospital in Zagreb after stabilization.⁹⁸

The Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff used the data provided by Dutchbat to determine stock levels that could be used as a basis for decisions about forced transport of supplies or even evacuation of Dutchbat from Srebrenica. The Crisis Staff defined two logistic levels for answering these questions: the warning level, at which UNPROFOR would still have seven days to take measures to replenish stock, and the safety level, at which it could be decided either to continue the mission for a short period (about seven days) in a restricted form or to evacuate the unit. The warning level for medical supplies was set at enough material for 14 days' consumption, and the safety level at seven days.⁹⁹

There are no indications that Dutchbat consulted the Crisis Staff about minimum stock levels during the period after April 1995. The term 'emergency stock' (ijzere voorraad) does not occur in the memoranda and letters exchanged during this period; the Crisis Staff's logistics officers were not even aware that Dutchbat was maintaining emergency medical supplies. There was, however, regular consultation about which supplies could be sent with which convoy, assuming that the convoy in question could reach Srebrenica.¹⁰⁰ Major Franken, Dutchbat's Deputy Commander, took a different view of the matter. In fact, he believed that Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim, the staff officer in charge of medical services at the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, had given an order that a stock of medical supplies should be set aside in order to guarantee medical aid to Dutch soldiers, and that this stock should be maintained at a certain level. Franken also believed that the Crisis Staff was consulted on this matter during the VRS attack in July, and that it was stated that medical treatment of the Dutch soldiers should be given priority. According to Franken, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had informed Dutchbat that it was not allowed to use the minimum supplies for any other purpose.¹⁰¹

Composition of the emergency stock

The Statement of Facts (Feitenrelaas) produced on the basis of the debriefing of Dutchbat in Assen in October 1995 does not provide an answer to the question as to the precise contents of the emergency stock. A number of conflicting statements were made in this connection. It should be realized that the internal communication was not optimum at the time, and that various statements contained in the Statement of Facts were based on hearsay.

Several Dutchbat soldiers stated that the minimum stock level was set at the supplies needed for 30 patients requiring nursing and 15 requiring intensive care. They did not know who had decided on this level. Others stated that, as mentioned above, the number 30 was taken from a scenario that had been drawn up¹⁰² within the Field Dressing Station. Thus, it referred to a calculated numbers of patients rather than to a stock of medical supplies that was set aside.

A stock inventory was performed on 7 July 1995, after which the Battalion Staff decided that operations should henceforth only be performed on wounded UN soldiers. There was a shortage of materials for X-rays and for anaesthesia. Six members of Dutchbat personnel stated that a minimum level was decided on in consultation with the Field Dressing Station staff. According to them, support for non-UN personnel would automatically be stopped as soon as this minimum level was reached. As far as they knew, the leadership of the battalion had never been involved in determining the minimum stock level or in deciding under what circumstances the medical staff should start using these supplies and had not known the precise details of the actual course of events.¹⁰³ This testimony conflicts with a statement by Lieutenant Colonel Karremans, the Commanding Officer of Dutchbat III, who said that the 'emergency stock' levels were determined by the leadership of the battalion themselves in order to ensure that medical treatment would be available for the battalion's own soldiers in the case of a calamity.¹⁰⁴ As mentioned above, Major Franken also stated that he knew about this decision.

During the period of the attack, a conflict about the emergency stock arose between the two surgical teams (KHO-5 and KHO-6). The question at issue was whether it was a good idea to maintain such supplies. Roughly speaking, KHO-5 thought it was not while KHO-6 thought it was. This discussion took place mainly after the first few days of the VRS attack, when it became apparent that not many Dutch soldiers had been wounded. In the days before that, it had been feared that an appreciable number of Dutch casualties could occur: the explosions in the enclave and near OPs in the first few days of the VRS attack had increased the risk of serious casualties. If a large number of soldiers had been wounded, the shortage of medical supplies would have made proper medical treatment impossible.

It may be noted that the view that the 'emergency stock' of medical supplies should be reserved for the treatment of UN personnel was not only held by the surgeon Naval Captain H.G.J. Hegge at whom much of the subsequent criticism was directed (this criticism will be dealt with later on in this appendix); the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, Captain R. van Hoogwaarden, and staff nurse Major R.E. Ros joined with him in drafting a memorandum to Dutchbat's Commanding Officer on 10 July about the operational status of the Field Dressing Station, in which they adopted this standpoint.¹⁰⁵

This scenario was formulated for a calamity, i.e. more than four wounded presented for treatment at the same time. The scenario spoke of medical supplies for 30 wounded patients.

This memorandum was also addressed to the inspector of Medical Services of the Royal Netherlands Army and the Medical Officer of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim. Despite a request to this effect from Hegge, however, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station never sent this memo off,¹⁰⁶ though Hegge did inform the leadership of the battalion verbally about the conclusions. In this way, The Hague was deprived of information which would later prove to be crucial. The contents of this memorandum will be given in detail here, in view of the fact that they are not generally known and because other descriptions of the shortcomings of the operational situation at the time are often less complete.

The memorandum stated that as a result of consumption in the past, and also because many of the supplies were past their 'use by' date, the medical supplies available for use were reduced 'to a negligible amount'. Routine narcosis could be performed, but it was hardly possible to treat complications like arrhythmia and anaphylaxis. Surgical masks were in short supply and could no longer be used for operations on non-Dutch patients. Respirator capacity was limited: only two respirators were available, one of which was really only intended for emergency use. Most oxygen cylinders were more than three-quarters empty. The necks of tracheostomy tubes were porous, and most of them were past their use-by date. There was only enough material to stabilize patients for 48 hours, and only enough developer for 50 X-ray photographs. The laboratory had limited facilities for blood-gas analysis, while glucose tests could no longer be performed at all. The supplies of plasma substitutes and glucose solutions were also exhausted. There were 54 bags of O+ deep-frozen blood, and 12 bags of O-. This deep-frozen blood could not be used in the case of a bunker alarm; direct transfusion would have to be used in this eventuality, and there were only 40 blood-donor sets available for this purpose. Supplies of intravenous antibiotics were also limited. There were 29 ampoules of metronidazole (an anti-infection agent), and enough zinacef (an antibiotic) for five patients. The supplies of oral painkillers were practically exhausted.

In conclusion, the memorandum stated that the Field Dressing Station was unable to perform its duties in an adequate manner. Dutchbat personnel could be treated, as long as the casualty rate remained limited, and this should be the first priority. Medical supplies were being reserved for this purpose, as far as possible. The provision of humanitarian aid would however have to be kept to the minimum, and the available medical supplies should only be used selectively, and to a very limited extent, for this purpose.¹⁰⁷

The Field Dressing Station treated a Bosnian woman for seven weeks in the months of April and May 1995. She had been admitted with serious infection after a self-administered abortion. The consumption of medical supplies required for her heavy demands on the stock.¹⁰⁸ The attempts to keep the woman alive were recounted with appropriate professional pride in Dutchbat in Vredesnaam (an account of the Dutchbat III peacekeeping activities in Bosnia, the title of which may be freely translated 'Dutchbat, for goodness sake'). Since the hospital staff were unacquainted with this type of case and Médecins Sans Frontières had almost run out of medical supplies, an appeal was made to the know-how of Dutchbat's surgical team.

The hospital had asked Dutchbat for a second opinion on 5 April, after which the patient was transferred to the compound in Potocari, where she was stabilized and prepared for transport to Sarajevo. Although permission had already been granted for this transport, the Bosnian Serbs at Zvornik refused passage to the unit from the Norwegian medical detachment in Tuzla which was to fetch the woman. Since the woman would die if she was not given medical treatment, Dutchbat decided to continue to look after her. An entire team was needed for her intensive care; which meant that the programme of humanitarian operations had to be completely stopped. Her condition (sepsis and Acute Respiratory Distress Syndrome) would normally have been treated in a university hospital, and even there the chances of survival would have been low. The materials required for her treatment had been in short supply to start with and were soon exhausted; the medicaments she needed then had to be smuggled in by convoys of Dutchbat personnel returning from leave, oxygen had to be made from atmospheric air, and her nutrition had to be improvised. After six weeks' treatment, however, the woman died of an intestinal infection which had affected many people in the compound from time to time.¹⁰⁹

One of the things that had to be smuggled into the enclave for the woman's treatment was a particular type of muscle relaxant. The Norwegians in Tuzla did not have it in stock, and so would not have been able to supply it even if they had been allowed access to the enclave. Naval Captain Schouten then contacted the American hospital in Zagreb. The Americans had limited supplies of this muscle relaxant, but stated that they were only prepared to provide it if it was required for Dutchbat and not for the general population. Schouten had replied that he needed it for a member of Dutchbat personnel, but still used it for the woman.¹¹⁰

Since the woman's general health, and her prognosis after curettage, were good, intensive care was continued. However, as mentioned above, her care up to the time of her death made great demands on the medical supplies: dopamine and intravenous antibiotics were completely used up, as were the drip feed supplies, though the pharmacist managed to make up a replacement mixture from tinned protifar, obtained by making an appeal to all bodybuilders in Dutchbat, and peanut butter.¹¹¹

As a result of the shortage of medical supplies caused by the woman's treatment, the members of KHO-6 (Major Ros, Captain Van Hoogwaarden and Naval Captain Hegge) agreed not to treat any more civilians if this would necessitate breaking into the emergency stock. According to Major Ros, all the medical staff were aware of this agreement.¹¹²

Major Franken was cognizant of the data compiled by Ros, Van Hoogwaarden and Hegge.¹¹³ The priority for medical treatment was determined in consultation with Major Franken, UN personnel being given first priority and the local population second priority.¹¹⁴ The standpoint that the treatment of Dutchbat's own personnel should come first was not regarded as a matter for discussion at the time.¹¹⁵ For this reason, Major Franken said that he was surprised later about the way people subsequently judged Hegge, how he was accused by others and had to justify his actions, while Hegge had been informed when he took up his duty of the boundary condition that the 'emergency stock' must be regarded as inviolable.¹¹⁶ This point will receive further attention later on in this appendix; the dilemma of whether or not to help civilians came under the spotlight again after commotion arose in connection with the case of a wounded Muslim woman who was refused treatment on 10 May after she had been brought to the compound in Potocari.

In order not to interrupt the chronology of the events, however, consideration will now first be paid to the provision of humanitarian aid to the local population by Médecins Sans Frontières and Dutchbat after the Bosnian Serbs started attacking Srebrenica.

Humanitarian aid in the period from 6 to 13 July 1995

The book Srebrenica: Getuigen van een massamoord (Srebrenica: Witnesses of a Massacre) published by Bob van Laerhoven contains, among many others, the story told by Christina Schmitz, the coordinator of the Médecins Sans Frontières team in Srebrenica. This organization played a major role in the provision of medical aid to the population before and during the fall of the town. Schmitz's account offers an insight into the local conditions and the medical aid activities during this period; extracts from her story are used to preface the following day-by-day accounts of the events during the fall of Srebrenica and to throw light on certain key aspects. The picture is one of confusion and much improvisation, but also of the problems that arose between Médecins Sans Frontières and Dutchbat concerning the transfer of patients from MSF to the latter.

The account presented by Van Laerhoven is supplemented here by information from other sources, in particular telex messages sent from the enclave by MSF, statements made by members of Dutchbat during debriefing and interviews with Bosnians who were involved in the events described. Dutchbat and UNMO reports offer little assistance in building up a picture of the humanitarian aid provided during the hostilities.

6–12 July 1995

The attack proper starts on 6 July. Six rockets fall on the UN base shortly after midnight, two of them explode. The southern part of the enclave, in particular the village of Slapovic, comes under heavy fire between 4.30 and 7.30 am. We go to alarm phase red, and will remain in this condition till the 12th. The Muslim authorities will only react in response to a ground attack. (...) There is no ground attack during the following days, but the bombardment becomes heavier and heavier. It is becoming very dangerous to pick up the wounded from the streets without an APC. The local doctors are doing splendid work. Our radio has broken down, but the Muslim authorities refuse to give the local technician permission to repair it. (...) Since our medical supplies are limited, we have to ask Dutchbat if they will take over a couple of patients from us. They refuse. The local surgeon, who has been trained by Médecins Sans Frontières, is completely overloaded. He is at the end of his tether. We urgently need help from outside, but under the circumstances an international surgeon will doubtless be refused permission to enter the enclave. (...) We hear that four tanks penetrate the outer suburbs and cold-bloodedly fire into the overcrowded streets. And yet we still see people outside on the streets, even playing children. It is incredible how apathetic the years of isolation have made these people.¹¹⁷

Dutchbat had hardly anything to do with medical matters concerning the local population at the start of the attack on Srebrenica on 6 July 1995. Like all other personnel, the Field Dressing Station staff went to the shelters. There were few reports of victims at this stage; Dutchbat's liaison team merely reported that a rocket hit near the 'Belgian container village' had seriously wounded a girl and that one person had been killed.

When the report arrived that a wounded non-combatant had to be picked up, a discussion arose between Major Franken and the Commander of Dutchbat's Medical Platoon, Captain De Bruijn. Franken wanted the wounded Muslim to be taken to the hospital. However, reports of shells falling in the neighbourhood could be heard on the radio. De Bruijn therefore determined that the wounded person should be brought to the compound, especially because the victim was less than a kilometre from there in the first place.¹¹⁸

As soon as the shelling started, the KHO-6 team (which had only recently arrived) started making preparations to receive any Dutch soldiers who might be wounded.¹¹⁹ The transfer of tasks from KHO-5 to KHO-6 had already taken place, and had gone fairly smoothly.¹²⁰

The medical staff at the hospital had their hands full that day. They panicked when the attack started, and tried to improvise ways of regaining control of the situation. The hospital employees panicked too, and some members of staff did not turn up for work. Those who did show up, worked 24 hours, grabbed a little rest and then worked another 24 hours. The physician Ilijaz Pilav and the others operated 24 hours at a stretch. As a result of this hectic work tempo and the shortage of personnel, hygiene in the hospital started to fall to deplorable levels: the floor was covered with blood, and wounded patients were left lying on the ground. The amputations were a terrible sight. Pilav and hospital director Avdo Hasanovic asked MSF to make their physician available. MSF was working in the basement of the health centre and had a shelter there, where some basic supplies had previously been laid up and which was in telex contact with Belgrade and Dutchbat.¹²¹

According to Pilav, the cooperation between himself and Dutchbat's surgical team had always been good, but this stopped at the moment when the Bosnian Serb attack began. The previous relationship changed in many ways from that moment. Pilav heard via the Opstina that Dutchbat could no longer help, for example by providing medical supplies for the hospital's use or by treating civilians on Dutchbat premises. Secondment of Dutchbat personnel for (part-time) assistance in the hospital was also excluded. This seemed to mean an abrupt end to the previous cooperation in the medical field – just when, according to Pilav, it was needed more than ever before.¹²²

After the start of the attack, MSF faxed requests for treatment of a number of patients to Dutchbat from the hospital in Srebrenica. One request sent to Naval Captain Hegge on 6 July concerned a woman with severe abdominal and thoracic wounds. The hospital did not have the capacity needed for her treatment. Hegge concluded, after consultation with the anaesthetists of KHO-5 and KHO-6, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station and the Battalion Staff, that there would be no point in treating this patient. On the basis of the description of her condition, it was concluded that her case was hopeless, and the request for Dutchbat to take over her treatment was turned down.¹²³ The Dutch Parliament was subsequently told that medical treatment would not have been able to save her life.¹²⁴

The telegrams exchanged between Dutchbat and Médecins Sans Frontières concerning this case show another side of the picture. In fact, Hegge replied that the patient could not be treated because of a shortage of intensive care capacity and material.¹²⁵ His reply did not refer to the patient's condition. Conversely, the fax sent by MSF did not refer to an offer by MSF to supply Dutchbat with medicaments, which were available in adequate amounts in the hospital. In any case, the questions concerning this patient had nothing to do with the subsequent controversy about the refusal to treat a woman brought to the compound on 10 July with similar wounds and wounds to her legs.

Six wounded patients died on 6 July. While Pilav could not say with any certainty whether they would have survived if a medical team from Dutchbat had supplemented the medical staff at the hospital, he did state that the treatment of these patients had been a 'terrible experience' for him and had left him 'totally shocked'. He had to make life-and-death decisions by choosing whom he would treat first. It remained incomprehensible to him that Dutchbat had flatly refused to provide medical assistance in such a situation. It was not a question of medical supplies, as he had sufficient supplies himself, but only of extra manpower, while Dutchbat medical staff were sitting in the bunker doing nothing.¹²⁶ MSF interpreter Emira Selimovic confirmed that the organization did not need medical supplies, of which they had enough, but the assistance of a surgeon. She regarded medical assistance at that time as primarily an ethical question. Women and children were bleeding to death in the corridors of the hospital or needed amputation. Unlike Pilav, Selimovic believed that more people might have been saved if more medical manpower had been available. As it was, patients had to be left in the corridor to die.¹²⁷

The situation in the enclave stabilized somewhat on 7 July. Apart from 30 shots fired over the compound at Potocari, intimidatory shelling of OP-M and OP-F and mortar fire directed at Srebrenica, Dutchbat had little to report about the situation of the civilian population.¹²⁸ A 14-year-old boy with a shrapnel wound in his upper leg was transferred to Potocari by APC after consultation with MSF.¹²⁹ Karremans mentions in his book Srebrenica: Who Cares? that in a talk with Dutchbat's liaison section on this day, Opstina War President Osman Suljic requested support for MSF in the hospital, in connection with an increase in the number of wounded to be treated.¹³⁰ Karremans does not mention, however, that Dutchbat's response was in the negative. It may be noted in passing that Karremans' book makes no further mention of medical matters after this incident.

The inventory of Dutchbat's medical stock, which had been disturbed by the shelling, led the recently arrived surgical team to express its 'extreme concern' about the low stock levels. The results of this inventory have already been given above. The surgeon of KHO-6 concluded on the basis of this information that it was practically impossible to guarantee optimal medical care of wounded Dutch soldiers – who in his opinion should be given the first priority when it came to treatment. He recommended further that a reliable rapid evacuation chain allowing Dutchbat casualties to receive treatment outside the enclave should be present.¹³¹

On Saturday [8 July], Dr Ilijaz [Pilav] is completely exhausted. He can no longer handle his workload. The bombardment becomes so intense around noon that we count one shell every minute. More and more wounded are brought to the hospital. The International Red Cross tries to get permission to enter the town via the 'Yellow Bridge' but has to turn back without achieving its objective; I have never been able to find out whether it withdrew of its own free will because of the risks involved, or whether it was refused permission to continue. In the meantime, the local authorities have stated on both Radio Tuzla and Radio Sarajevo that they are glad to have Médecins Sans Frontières here.¹³²

The International Red Cross tried to gain access to the enclave on 8 July, but without success.¹³³ It is not clear whether the Bosnian Serbs refused them access to Srebrenica or whether the ICRC delegates, who were bringing 30,000 letters and parcels with them, turned back of their own accord because of the fighting and shelling they witnessed.¹³⁴

On this day, MSF was advised by its own organization in Belgrade not to pick up wounded in the enclave itself: in view of the shelling, the risk to its own personnel should be reduced to a minimum. MSF tended to regard the transport of wounded as a task for Dutchbat, because the latter had armoured vehicles, though no one at MSF had any idea how much scarce fuel this would consume. As long as MSF had sufficient supplies of fuel at its disposal, there was no reason why it should not supply Dutchbat with fuel. The UNHCR supplies of fuel, which were stored in the compound at Potocari, comprised about 6000 litres of diesel at that moment.¹³⁵

After the shelling and the lifting of the 'siege' of the first OPs, orders were given at Dutchbat to prepare the operating theatres for use;¹³⁶ for operations on Dutch soldiers. Field Dressing Station staff did all they could to save the life of Private Van Renssen on 8 July.¹³⁷ The circumstances under which he was wounded are dealt with in Chapter 6 of Part III of the main report. An X-ray photograph showed about 150 small metal fragments in his head, from neck to cranium, with a small entry hole in the back of his head. The surgeon, Naval Captain Hegge, concluded on the basis of this evidence that he had been shot at close range with a shotgun. Hegge gave this as the cause of death on Van Renssen's death certificate, though he was aware that he was not a munitions expert.¹³⁸

Apart from the death certificate, Sergeant First Class J. Zwiers of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee investigated Van Renssen's death on the orders of Major Franken. Zwiers prepared a report of his findings, with a report by experts from the Explosives Disposal Service as an appendix. On the basis of the findings of these explosives experts, among other things, Zwiers considered that Van Renssen died as the result of the explosion of a hand grenade which landed on the edge of the APC in the gap round the turret of the 50-millimetre gun unit before exploding.¹³⁹ The Battalion Staff also informed UNPROFOR that Van Renssen was hit by a fragment of a hand grenade.¹⁴⁰ As mentioned in Chapter 6 of Part III, however, witnesses stated that he had been shot with a shotgun. According to them, Van Renssen had been wearing his helmet, but had been hit on the small unprotected part of his head.

Although Major Franken made transport available for further investigation, the location where the incident took place could not be revisited because it was considered to be unsafe there and there were probably VRS soldiers in the vicinity. It was impossible to identify the persons who had carried out this shooting. Zwiers identified the body together with Captain Groen and another member of Dutchbat, and the appropriate authorities in Bosnia and the Netherlands were informed.¹⁴¹

The Social Services department of the Ministry of Defence had the task of informing the next of kin. Even here, unfortunately, confusion abounded: there was no one at home at the first address given. Further inquiries revealed to be the address of a former partner of Van Renssen's; the relationship had been broken off shortly after he had left for Bosnia. Only a phone number had been given for the alternative next of kin. When the address belonging to this phone number had been traced with the aid of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, this proved to be that of Van Renssen's mother.¹⁴²

Van Renssen seemed close to death for a few minutes on the way to the Field Dressing Station; however, after he had been given artificial respiration at the Field Dressing Station and an infusion system had been set up to administer the necessary drugs, his condition was judged to be stable. According to Soldier M.E. Klaver, there was general relief at the thought that he would pull through with surgical aid.¹⁴³ This proved to be wishful thinking, however: although the KHO-6 team did their utmost best to treat him, the serious nature of his head wound meant that there was no chance of success.¹⁴⁴ Van Renssen was the first Dutchbat soldier to die in the enclave.

It may be noted that the calamity plan formulated by KHO-5 proved to work excellently. The objective of this plan was to ensure that the deployment of personnel and resources was streamlined, and that the personnel did not get in one another's way.¹⁴⁵ The KHO-6 team worked well together.¹⁴⁶

The body was then laid out and made presentable so that members of the OP-F team could pay their last respects. Problems were encountered in getting the body into the coffin, which was too small. Warrant Officer L.P.E. Knapen was very angry about this; according to him, Defence had been guilty of similar slip-ups in the past. Knapen was also annoyed that no members of Dutchbat's senior staff came to pay their last respects. He saw this as a sign of lack of involvement.¹⁴⁷

Van Renssen's death gave rise to both anger and sadness in Dutchbat, and to the realization that this was the logical consequence of the situation in which Dutchbat found itself: completely defenceless, caught between two completely unscrupulous rival parties. A funeral service was held on the day after Van Renssen's death, only interrupted by those who chose to record the ceremony on film or photos. It had been planned to transfer the body to Zvornik at about 8.45 am; a UN helicopter would transport the body onwards from there. It was then learnt, however, that the Bosnian Serbs had withdrawn their permission for the transport of the remains of the deceased: as one of the persons involved put it, 'Of course, indignation did not help to improve the situation'.¹⁴⁸ Refrigeration of the body then caused problems, since the supplies of diesel were all but exhausted. Colonel Kremer was annoyed at Major Franken's refusal to authorize use of some of the precious reserves of diesel for this purpose.¹⁴⁹ 'If things go on like this, we'll end up burying him here,' wrote Naval Captain Schouten in his diary.¹⁵⁰

On the evening of the day when Van Renssen died, an emergency message from the Ops Room in Srebrenica led to the establishing of an exceptional direct link with Colonel De Jonge at UN headquarters in Zagreb, to cut through the red tape surrounding the transport of the body. Colonel De Jonge worked late that Saturday night to complete all the necessary formalities.¹⁵¹ Since the transport to the Netherlands was routed via Split, the Croatian authorities were also involved. After General Nicolai had intervened on 9 July to remind VRS General Tolimir that permission for transport of the body via Zvornik had been granted the day before, the Bosnian Serbs finally agreed to confirm the permission. General Tolimir promised to give the necessary instructions immediately.¹⁵² As a result, the guard of honour could finally line up at about half past three. Many Dutchbat soldiers cried as they said farewell to their comrade.

One last hitch was that the four-ton truck that had been chosen as the transport vehicle was found to have a leak in the brake line, and a new truck had to be prepared for departure. At long last, after so many hindrances, Van Renssen's body could finally depart for Zvornik on the first leg of its last voyage back to the Netherlands.¹⁵³

When the convoy arrived in Zvornik, a Bosnian Serb army information officer tried to get the convoy commander to make a statement about who was responsible for the death of Van Renssen. He refused to do so.¹⁵⁴ A Dutch group commander who was being held hostage in Bratunac did make such a statement after some pressure from VRS Major Nikolic. While this OP team member had not actually witnessed what went on near OP-F, he had followed events on the radio. He had to read out a statement, which was recorded on a tape recorder, in the presence of a VRS information officer. When asked to do the same in front of a video camera, he refused.¹⁵⁵

As soon as the report that Van Renssen was seriously wounded came through, Hegge appealed to Franken: 'Medical transport must be arranged immediately to a hospital with neurosurgical capabilities.' Franken passed this request on via UN channels, but never received a response.¹⁵⁶ In fact, the request never got further than Pale. According to Hegge, the UN was apparently afraid to make forceful demands, though it had been agreed that immediate medical evacuation by air could be arranged for UN personnel when necessary.¹⁵⁷ The fact that this did not occur led Hegge to believe that the UN had simply left them in the lurch.¹⁵⁸

After Van Renssen's death, Hegge tried to confront the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff with the fact that the medical aid that could be provided in serious calamities was inadequate. It cost him considerable effort to obtain permission to phone the Netherlands about the medical situation; when he did so, he failed to contact the staff physician of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim. He therefore turned to Colonel Herweijer of the Royal Netherlands Army Medical Inspectorate and sketched the problem that would arise if Dutchbat became involved in a conflict: the combination of inadequate medical supplies and the impossibility of airlifting wounded personnel to a suitable facility for further medical treatment could lead to fatalities among Dutchbat personnel.¹⁵⁹

Hegge said that he did not receive much understanding for the situation, though Herweijer did finally call back to suggest that Hegge should contact Major Van Empel of the medical staff of the First Army Corps in Apeldoorn. All that the latter could say, however, was that 'if there were multiple casualties or other serious problems, Hegge should call Colonel Brantz of the Sector North East staff in Tuzla.' Brantz was not able to do much to help, however. Hegge had the feeling that he was back to square one: he finally realized that he had landed in a hopeless situation, and that Dutchbat, after having existed on half rations for months, with everyone at the end of their tether, were completely dependent on the goodwill of the Bosnian Serbs. Rations were exhausted, personnel were no longer getting proper food and drink, and there were not even any decent bathroom facilities. The VRS captured one OP after the other, and Dutchbat could no longer count on outside assistance. They seemed to be in a classical medieval state of siege.

As a newcomer in the enclave, Hegge had the impression that the members of Dutchbat hardly realized that they were to all effects in a war zone; and he found it deeply ironic that, while Dutchbat was suffering all this misery, Parliament was holding a barbecue in the inner courtyard of the parliamentary buildings in The Hague to celebrate the start of the summer recess.¹⁶⁰

On Sunday 9 July, we have a meeting with the UN and the mayor in the post office building. The mayor requests aid for the 4000 refugees from Slapovic, who have been given temporary accommodation in a school building. We would like to visit the building, but the heavy bombardment makes this impossible. The UN troops tell us that the Serb army already has the southern part of the enclave in its hands. It is rumoured that they have set fire to the villages of Borovac, Slapovic and Bucje. The shells keep on falling. One of them makes a direct hit on a room full of people. Fortunately, our radio has been repaired, so we can discuss our medical problems and safety precautions with Belgrade.¹⁶¹

Médecins Sans Frontières and the Opstina had not had any contact with one another since the previous conflict about local employees. The Opstina's War President Osman Suljic therefore wanted to re-establish communications on 9 July. On this occasion, he asked for protection for the local hospital from Dutchbat. MSF did not want this, however, as they feared that the military presence might give rise to a military response.¹⁶²

A kidney operation scheduled for 9 July on a woman who had already been treated for kidney stones for some time at the Field Dressing Station was cancelled, on the grounds that this was no longer the right moment for such an operation. The woman did not take the decision badly, though she did deduce from it, as she said later, that Dutchbat knew the enclave was going to fall.¹⁶³

Dutchbat's logbook also mentioned that a wounded civilian from Budak was transported to the compound.¹⁶⁴

The medical team goes on working throughout the night of Sunday 9 to Monday 10 July. By 7 am, the hospital is completely overcrowded. Wounded, bleeding people, patients screaming and crying. We hear on BBC radio that the Bosnian Serb Government denies that the army has launched an attack on Srebrenica.(...) About 10.30 am, a shell falls on the road just opposite the hospital. Daniel [the Australian surgeon Daniel O'Brien] and I [Christina Schmitz] are in the bunker at that moment. The noise of the explosion is deafening. We realize that the hospital is a target too now. A little while later, a new shell falls a bit further along. Many windows are broken in the dispensary and the hospital. We check the patients' condition and telex information about the situation to Dutchbat and our team in Belgrade, who immediately send a press release to the world media (...) In the course of the afternoon, we hear salvos of explosions (which experts tell us come from rocket launchers) and heavy machine-gun fire. We may thus assume that the front line is moving in our direction, and a little later nine wounded (mainly civilians) with heavy shrapnel wounds and limbs ripped off are brought to the hospital. It is a bloodbath. I repeat my request for surgical assistance. Even while I am sending the telex, I know what the answer will be. I was right: they turn our request down. But we will get an APC to bring wounded from the town centre to the hospital.¹⁶⁵

The situation in Srebrenica on 10 July was confused and chaotic. The inhabitants of the Swedish Shelter Project had left their houses and sought shelter in the overcrowded schools in the town. MSF staff heard on BBC radio that the Bosnian Serbs had denied that they were engaged in an offensive against Srebrenica. ‘How cynical,’ they commented. The wounded, brought to the hospital by the municipal refuse collection truck and an MSF pick-up truck, were mainly young men who seemed to come from the front.¹⁶⁶

The Bosnian Serbs were in complete control of the southern part of the enclave, and were preparing to continue their advance on the town. Dutchbat had in the meantime taken up blocking positions to the south of the town with six APCs, to stem any further Bosnian Serb advance. There was great uncertainty about future developments and the expected number of casualties among the Dutch troops.¹⁶⁷

The sound of the APCs moving south early in the morning to the blocking positions led MSF staff to ask Dutchbat if they could send an APC to assist in evacuation of the hospital if this should prove necessary. Dutchbat agreed. UNMOs counted over a hundred impacts round the town in the morning of 10 July. Two of these, probably 155 mm shells, exploded near the hospital, shattering windows and sending glass fragments flying into walls and rooms. This did not make the care of the wounded any easier. It was impossible to give an accurate estimate of the number of casualties that morning. The UNMOs asked MSF to provide figures, while the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff asked whether the Dutch representative at UNHCR in Zagreb knew already how many people had been killed or wounded by the shelling.¹⁶⁸

The artillery shelling of the town that afternoon wreaked terrible damage. There was hardly anyone to pick up the dead from the streets.¹⁶⁹ Nine wounded were brought to the hospital, with limbs torn off and countless shrapnel wounds. It was at this moment that Pilav again asked Dutchbat for assistance, via Christina Schmitz. She sent a telex to Dutchbat, knowing it to be a hopeless attempt. It did not take long for Dutchbat to refuse.¹⁷⁰ Major Franken did however offer an APC to transport the wounded to the hospital. The promised vehicle arrived at the hospital 10 minutes later, and was kept in readiness at the B Company compound.¹⁷¹ Dutchbat supplied a vehicle for transport of wounded on four occasions; they were used to bring a total of seven wounded to the hospital.¹⁷²

MSF Headquarters sent a desperate message to Yasushi Akashi (the special representative of the Secretary-General of the UN), General Smith, UNHCR, the ICRC and the press, pointing out that the hospital in Srebrenica was full to overflowing, with 50 wounded.¹⁷³ The Headquarters also tried to make personal contact with the representative at UNHCR in Zagreb, A.W. Bijleveld, while the organization’s Belgrade office approached the ICRC and the VRS.¹⁷⁴

The Opstina’s War President asked the UNMOs to visit the wounded, but the UNMOs replied, ‘the shelling of the town is nothing to joke with’ and declined to do so. The Senior Military Observer in Tuzla stated on the basis of UNMO reports from the enclave to Sarajevo that if things went on in the same way as they were at that moment, a bloodbath could be the result. Relations with the local population deteriorated, and the UN lost its credibility. UNMOs operating elsewhere in Bosnia were already hearing angry comments about the situation in Srebrenica: the enclave had first been demilitarized in the belief that the UN would provide protection and food, but in the words of a UNMO report, 'now people die first by starvation and the rest by bullets. UNPROFOR is observing how it looks when helpless people die, then starts counting dead bodies and destroyed houses as part of [their] duty'.¹⁷⁵

The situation at the hospital after the shelling was just as desperate as on 6 July. After hospital director Avdo Hasanovic had informed Ramiz Becirovic, the commander of the ABiH's 28th Division, that Dutchbat refused to accept sick and wounded patients at the compound in Srebrenica, Becirovic went to the compound. He said later, in a statement made in 1998, that a Dutchbat officer explained to him that they could not accept any wounded because he had not received permission for this from his superiors.¹⁷⁶ The Bosnian author Sefko Hodzic wrote that Becirovic had gone to the compound in Srebrenica with Dr Pilav to ask Dutchbat to accept wounded patients. Becirovic said that he had to stay in the compound between from 3 till around 5 pm because of heavy VRS shelling of the town during that period. He felt that he had been taken hostage by Dutchbat, believed that Dutchbat would not allow him to leave the compound, and got the idea that weapons would have been aimed at him if he had tried to leave at all costs. His reasoning is difficult to follow; Becirovic apparently left the compound without any trouble once the shelling was over.¹⁷⁷ There are no Dutchbat data on this incident. Neither the Dutchbat logbook nor that of B Company makes any mention of a visit by Becirovic to the compound in Srebrenica.

Wounded were admitted to the compound in Srebrenica again on 11 July, as described in the next subsection. Beirovic visited the compound of B Company on the afternoon of that day, but then it was compound Commander Groen's turn to be afraid that he was being held hostage (this incident is described in Chapter 6 of Part III).

Everyone in the hospital was crying out for help. There were patients whose arms had been torn off, and many with other serious wounds. Four patients were lying on operating tables, with the surgeon Ilijaz Pilav running from one to the other. Other doctors were looking after the rest of the wounded.¹⁷⁸ Pilav saw himself confronted with a hopeless situation: there were 25 wounded patients, seven of them with very severe wounds. He could only deal with five or six at most. Since Dutchbat had two surgical teams, he faxed a request to Dutchbat via Médecins Sans Frontières, asking whether it would be possible for members of the medical team to come to Srebrenica to render assistance, or alternatively if some of the wounded could be transferred to Potocari for treatment.¹⁷⁹ Up till 10 July, there were only two patients in Dutchbat's sickbay: a UNMO and a sergeant with back complaints. It may be mentioned in passing that it proved possible, with a great deal of difficulty, to get the sergeant out of the enclave with an ambulance on that day.¹⁸⁰

In fact, the two Dutchbat surgeons never even heard anything about MSF's request for the transfer of patients with shrapnel wounds: the request never reached them. Captain Hegge did not know who had replied to the request on behalf of the hospital. Colonel Kremer later found out from Pilav and the coordinator of MSF that the fax had been sent to Major Franken. That was correct: Franken had simply not consulted his surgical staff before replying.¹⁸¹ Minister of Defence Voorhoeve later explained to the Dutch Parliament that the fact that the battalion command did not show the fax to the staff of the Field Dressing Station, or even consult them about the request, could be explained by the hectic situation at the time.¹⁸² Franken had replied to the fax without consulting anyone: he had answered with a 'troubled mind' that Dutchbat was not in a position to provide medical aid. 'Although really very willing,' he pointed out that it was his responsibility to ensure that his soldiers received medical treatment and that the medical supplies were already at a minimum. The only assistance that Franken could offer, despite the poor fuel situation, was (as mentioned above) an APC fitted out for medical transport to pick up wounded in the town, but even there the restriction applied that his own soldiers had to be given priority in cases of emergency,¹⁸³ since at that time Dutchbat was seriously considering the possibility that there could be casualties at the blocking position the Dutch troops had occupied to the south of Srebrenica.

Different views on this rejection of the request for help have been expressed. Ilijaz Pilav stated that he had said explicitly that he did not need more medical supplies, but more medical manpower. According to him, the Dutchbat medical team knew that MSF, unlike Dutchbat itself, was not short of medicaments at that moment. Pilav did not hear until later that the medical team had not even been consulted about the reply to his request: indeed, Franken had sent off his rejection within 20 minutes of receiving the request.

Apparently, Colonel Kremer heard of Major Franken's answer by chance from a Dutchbat soldier, two hours later. This made him so angry that he threw his helmet and flak jacket away and declared his intention to walk the four kilometres into Srebrenica to provide help after all – until he was forcibly restrained.¹⁸⁴ This version, which Pilav said he heard from Kremer himself, differs from Kremer's own version and from the view of the events expressed subsequently by The Hague.

Kremer said in this connection that he had promised Pilav, round about the time of the conflict between the Opstina and Médecins Sans Frontières, 'that if he was up to his neck in it, he could always call on me'. However, Major Franken rejected Pilav's call for help: he was not prepared to allow the wounded to be brought to the compound, and he told Kremer 'that I should go to the hospital. When I asked who I should go with, he replied, "no one; just go on your own." It was clear that he wanted me out of the way. The whole thing left a very nasty taste in my mouth'.

The only operating theatre in the hospital was at the rear of the building, facing the hills where the Bosnian Serbs had taken up their position and from where they could fire right into the operating theatre. 'It was deadly dangerous', Kremer went on. The Dutch Ministry of Defence later asked Kremer, after he had stated that he had been afraid that Franken's motives for sending him to the hospital were not purely humanitarian, whether his refusal to go to the hospital 'had perhaps been motivated by fear, or cowardice'.¹⁸⁵

The version constructed by The Hague after the event was different again: during the Bosnian Serb attack on the town, Dutchbat command had decided that a surgeon should go to the hospital in Srebrenica. The surgeon in question was of the opinion, however, the situation there was too hazardous to justify carrying out operations there. He had therefore suggested that the wounded should be transferred from the hospital to the compound in Potocari where the conditions were more suitable for proper treatment.¹⁸⁶

The coordinator of Médecins Sans Frontières, Christina Schmitz, tried to contact the MSF office in Belgrade that day, and also to talk to Dutchbat to obtain further instructions about what to do in these turbulent circumstances. Pilav wanted guarantees for the medical staff from Schmitz, so that they could remain with their patients. He also asked Dutchbat to guarantee his safety. Pilav had said in this connection that he did not want another Vukovar (where Serbs had killed the wounded men from the hospital) and that he therefore wanted to evacuate the wounded; if this was not done, the medical staff would consider themselves obliged to get themselves out, leaving the patients behind. It was, however, impossible to guarantee the safety of the Bosnian doctors. Neither Schmitz nor Dutchbat were in a position to guarantee anything.¹⁸⁷

This evening, the people start to leave the centre [of town] and collect round the hospital. Our local members of medical staff crowd into the bunker with their relatives. The bunker is intended for a maximum of 5 people; at the moment, there are 80 people in it. We can hardly move, and radio contact is made very difficult by the crying children. The people refuse to leave the bunker: they are at their wit's end, and almost hysterical with fear. They want to leave this open-air prison and live in peace. I understand their situation and their fears only too well, but we can't work or find any rest like this. After a lot of palaver, I manage to persuade them to go and sleep in the hospital. (...) The night of 10 July is relatively quiet, and we manage to catch a few hours of rest towards the morning. In the morning, the rumour has spread that NATO bombardments are on the way, and when the UNPROFOR liaison team and the British soldiers who direct the air strikes leave the Post Office building, people flee in all directions from fear of air strikes. In consultation with the local doctors, we decide to move the operating theatre to the basement, and we discuss the evacuation of about 80 patients. The local doctors urgently want to move the patients to Potocari this morning because they are afraid of a repetition of the events of Vukovar, where Bosnian Serb troops forced their way into the hospital and murdered all the patients. We would prefer to leave the patients in the neutral zone of the hospital, but we accept the decision of the Muslim doctors, who will organize the evacuation with the aid of two trucks. (...) In the meantime, the situation has become very tense. Armed Bosnian soldiers have forced their way into the hospital and refuse to leave; but they really have to if the hospital is to retain its status as neutral zone.¹⁸⁸

Many ABiH soldiers suffered severe wounds on this day too. Soldiers carried their dead and wounded comrades for hours till they reached Srebrenica. ABiH officer Sadik Vilic decided to call briefly on his wife to let her know that all was well and that she did not need to worry about him. Shells falling just as he was entering his house wounded him and his mother-in-law, among others. Vilic suffered shrapnel wounds and burns. There was only one truck available, and the driver was brave enough to drive round collecting the dead and wounded. A few hours later, Vilic arrived at the hospital which was full of civilians.¹⁸⁹ Something like a ceasefire arose when the VRS approached to within a short distance of the town; the inhabitants waited to see what would happen next day.

In the night of 10 - 11 July, Dutchbat made preparations for the reception of any Dutchbat wounded at the compound in Potocari.¹⁹⁰ It was agreed that KHO-6 would take care of these wounded soldiers, while KHO-5 staff would be mainly engaged in organizing humanitarian aid to the refugees.¹⁹¹ Dutchbat had also prepared for the arrival of refugees at the compound in Potocari (see Chapter 4 of Part IV). That same night, Muslim men started to get ready to move out of the enclave on foot; but the big exodus did not actually begin until the next night (for further details, see Chapter 1 of Part IV).

Sergeant First Class H.M.W. Geurts, who took the above-mentioned woman who did not receive medical treatment at the compound in Potocari back to the hospital in Srebrenica (this affair is discussed at length later on in this appendix), saw large numbers of boxes being carried out of the MSF building. These boxes were opened, and the contents put into bags and rucksacks – mainly belonging to soldiers and armed men. Geurts was surprised to see this, since the organization had often complained in the past about how few supplies it had; and now they were being distributed to none other than ABiH soldiers. This was not a case of plundering according to Geurts, but a well organized affair. MSF's cook, Abdulah Purkovic, was in charge and was distributing the supplies. Purkovic was a former teacher better known under his nickname of Dule; he was not only the cook at Médecins Sans Frontières but also their general factotum and a great organizer.¹⁹² Geurts had once seen Purkovic coming out of the mountains carrying a weapon, and was now quite indignant at what he had seen.¹⁹³

It remains relatively calm till the early afternoon, when the bombardment breaks out again in full force. We can hear aircraft flying overhead from our bunker, and can only guess whether they are carrying out air strikes or not. We hear that most of the patients are on their way to Bravo Company, the Dutchbat compound, which is about 500 metres away from here.¹⁹⁴

A stream of refugees started to move towards Potocari and the compound in Srebrenica on the morning of 11 July.¹⁹⁵ There was great uncertainty about how the situation would develop in the course of the day. The APCs from the blocking positions, which had withdrawn to positions round the marketplace in Srebrenica during the night, went south again in the morning in order to ascertain how far the Bosnian Serbs had advanced into the enclave.

During a shooting incident near Potocari shortly after noon on 11 July, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, was asked for medical support near the former bus stop opposite the zinc works. Van Hoogwaarden asked Naval Captain Hegge to send medical personnel there, but Hegge did not want to send members of the surgical team outside the compound at that time, since shots were being fired and there was a risk that Dutchbat soldiers could be wounded. Captain Van Hoogwaarden therefore went himself, together with Captain De Bruijn and a few soldiers. They encountered an armed patrol of six ABiH soldiers, who adopted an aggressive attitude towards the Dutch team trying to help. Van Hoogwaarden and De Bruijn returned to the compound with a 16-year-old girl.¹⁹⁶

The town of Srebrenica was subjected to artillery shelling (others say a mortar bombardment) about 1.30 pm, in the course of which a projectile hit B Company's vehicles park. It was not clear where it came from. The projectile landed between two APCs and four trucks. A Dutchbat soldier stated that he had seen a ball of fire approaching, followed by an enormous bang. According to him, the ball of fire had come from a mine shaft situated some distance away in terrain occupied by the ABiH; the Dutchbat soldier therefore concluded that the ABiH were bombarding their own people – probably, in his opinion, to blame the VRS for the incident and to sow confusion among the Dutch soldiers.¹⁹⁷ Another soldier also stated that this hit had been caused by a shell fired by the ABiH from hill 522 (near OP-H).¹⁹⁸ Yet others saw this as a deliberate attempt by the VRS to drive the refugees towards Potocari.¹⁹⁹

This hit caused the refugees to panic and to empty the compound, but they soon returned when it appeared that no further hits were coming. The transport of these refugees to Potocari was a slow affair. It was carried out with the aid of four-ton trucks which had really been earmarked by B Company for the transport of sick and wounded to Potocari.²⁰⁰ Attempts were also made to provide some assistance from Potocari in moving the refugees. After the report of the hit on the compound in Srebrenica had reached Potocari, Sergeant Zuurman (who had accompanied a group of refugees towards Potocari the previous evening) suggested that he should set off for Srebrenica with a couple of four-ton trucks. The masses of people making for Potocari made it impossible for the two trucks to get through, however, and they stranded a kilometre from Srebrenica. Refugees heading for Potocari were then given a place on the trucks, which returned to their home base.²⁰¹

The report of Dutchbat's initial debriefing in Zagreb mentions a number of casualties (at least one dead and a number of wounded) among the refugees at the compound in Srebrenica as a result of the above-mentioned hit.²⁰² The subsequent debriefing in Assen provides no evidence of any fatalities as a result of this incident, but does mention eight or nine wounded.²⁰³ The wounded included an old woman with shrapnel wounds, an old man with a wounded jaw and a girl with an open wound in her thigh.²⁰⁴ The severity of the wounds ranged from a few scratches to serious but not life-threatening injury.²⁰⁵ Compound commander Captain Groen had the wounded brought into the compound buildings, where the company's medical team gave four of them medical treatment.²⁰⁶ They were treated and given accommodation in a dormitory fitted out for this purpose.

A number of local MSF staff members were hard at work in the compound's bar. They had left the hospital with a number of sick or lightly wounded patients,²⁰⁷ and were also given the task of looking after the wounded who had been treated earlier by Dutchbat medical staff. After the local population had been persuaded, with the aid of interpreters, to go to Potocari, another five severely wounded patients were brought to B Company compound. All the remaining wounded from Srebrenica hospital were brought to Potocari later in the afternoon, bringing the total number of patients transferred in the course of the day to about 30.²⁰⁸

Captain Groen said that it did not bother him whether a wounded patient had been brought from the hospital or had been wounded in the vicinity. Anyone who had been wounded and needed treatment received treatment. It had not happened often before that wounded people had presented themselves at the gate of the compound: the hospital was not far away, and people knew they could be treated there. B Company's medical capacity extended no further than primary medical care for the company's own personnel.²⁰⁹

On 11 July, round about 3 pm, we see NATO aircraft carrying out air strikes. A long column of people is fleeing northwards, probably to Potocari. After a brief radio conversation with our colleagues in Belgrade, we decide to follow the refugees. We pack all valuable supplies. The Australian doctor Daniel O'Brien sets off with a truck, together with the local staff and our supplies, for Bravo Company. We try to get the remaining patients – about 20 people – into two trucks. We manage to deliver them to Bravo Company, after which I return in a pick-up truck. More patients have left their wards in the meantime. I have to leave 6 old people behind, as the UN's tanks have already withdrawn beyond the hospital. Such chaos! What a mess!²¹⁰

During the Close Air Support in the afternoon, the APCs of the blocking positions were in the vicinity of the compound again. The problem was that if the blocking positions were withdrawn any further, the compound in Srebrenica would have to be evacuated as otherwise it would run the risk of being surrounded by the VRS.

After Captain Groen had given the order to take the wounded to Potocari, Captain Buijs (a doctor from the medical team), Sergeant Major Thijssen and a corporal collected them from where they were lying all over the compound – in the dining room, in the TV room, in the bar, and loaded them into a truck.²¹¹ Surrounded by refugees and mortar and rifle fire, the four-ton truck, the canvas cover of which had been removed, set off at a walking pace towards Potocari. Sergeant Major Thijssen sat at the steering wheel. A Muslim man stood on the loading platform, shouting at the refugees to get out of the way. The portion of the route near the football field came under mortar fire as the truck passed; some shells landed no more than 50 metres from the vehicle.²¹²

When the last vehicles had left the compound, the buildings were checked one last time to see, among other things, if there were any remaining refugees. The medical records of Dutchbat personnel and local patients were not destroyed before departure; there was no time for this.²¹³ One wounded person was found near the rear gate, and helped into a Mercedes. A few more children and one old woman were taken on board the truck halfway to Potocari.²¹⁴

On the way to Potocari, B Company personnel saw a bloody corpse with shoes on. It was unclear whether it had been there for some time, had been run over or had been killed by an exploding shell. The bodies of two older women also lay by the roadside. Refugees simply walked over them.²¹⁵ The cause of death could not be determined with any certainty, but it was likely that they had died from exhaustion. Several people were sitting exhausted by the roadside.²¹⁶

The men of B Company did their best to take as many people with them as they could on their way to Potocari: on the bonnet of the Mercedes, in a wheelbarrow, on the opened backwash deflectors on the deck of the APCs. Dutchbat soldiers made room to lay wounded in the APCs.²¹⁷ People, especially older people who were unable to walk any further, were given a seat in or on top of the APC. In fact, B Company did not encounter large groups of refugees, only a few individuals lying exhausted or lifeless by the roadside. As many of these people as possible were given a lift, but it was not possible to take all of them.²¹⁸ The vehicles were overloaded with people sitting on them or hanging on to them. Some people fell off because they were too tired to hang on.²¹⁹

Apart from the personnel of the returning blocking position APCs, 30 men from B Company were engaged in accompanying refugees to Potocari that afternoon.²²⁰ B-Company vehicles transported a total of 54 persons, most of whom were elderly, undernourished people, with no injuries.²²¹

There were, however, a number of cases in which Dutchbat personnel did not offer any transport assistance. One APC fitted out for the transport of wounded persons travelling from Srebrenica to Potocari did give a lift to three Dutchbat soldiers but refused to help a woman with a child. When she attempted to get inside, a paramedic kicked in her direction (without actually hitting her). The driver of the APC speeded up so that the woman had to let go. She was refused a lift in order to keep the APC on stand-by to pick up Dutchbat personnel in cases of emergency.²²²

In the night of 11 - 12 July, the troops manning a new blocking position camped near the compound, while part of B Company camped to the south of the refugees near Potocari. The platoon sergeants were largely responsible for organizing things, giving the necessary orders without the need for much intervention by superior officers. The paramedics of B Company were independently engaged in caring for the wounded in the neighbourhood.²²³

It is hot, and the streets are overcrowded. People are fleeing in panic, with their crying children holding their hands and with a few possessions in plastic bags. UN personnel accompany the refugees on foot while the shells continue to rain down from the hilltops. A truck is stalled in front of us. The UN soldiers get it on the move again, but it stops soon after to pick up people. I see people almost killing one another to gain a spot on a truck. (...) We finally reach the UNPROFOR base. The UN soldiers have already set up an emergency hospital. We still have 55 patients with us, but our medical supplies are used up. We request new supplies from Belgrade, knowing all too well that they will never arrive. Outside, some 20,000 people are trying to find shelter round the UN compound. The UN compound is not big enough to offer shelter to all, and the refugees take shelter in ruined houses. The shells keep on falling. Major Franken, Dutchbat's Deputy Commander, is trying to reach an agreement with the Bosnian Serb army that will allow us to go into the town to fetch supplies, but General Mladic sends a reply that all supplies are gone. (...) While Médecins Sans Frontières Belgrade proposes the setting up of a 'humanitarian corridor' to Central Bosnia, we keep on asking for external replacements for the medical team. In the meantime, the shells keep on falling till about 10 pm.²²⁴

A big stream of refugees had already been expected at the compound in Potocari on 10 July. Dutchbat Commanding Officer, Lieutenant Colonel Karremans, got the compound Commander, Major Otter, to draw up a plan for their reception then. Since the road passing along the side of the compound lay within the field of vision of the VRS artillery, a hole was cut in the perimeter fence to create an access route under cover, along the stream flowing behind the compound.

On 11 July, before the flood of refugees arrived in Potocari, Dutchbat personnel in the compound were warned to prepare themselves for the reception of the refugees. The original plan had been to use the corridor of the accumulator factory for this purpose. In view of the large numbers of refugees arriving, it was decided to offer them accommodation in the big hall of the factory instead.²²⁵

Dutchbat personnel were ordered to leave the bunker and to be ready to receive the refugees as they arrived.²²⁶

As a result of the continuing shelling, the Dutchbat personnel remained in the shelters; hence the local population received very little assistance from the compound in Potocari until the shelling stopped. According to MSF, Major Franken had ordered Dutchbat personnel to remain within the compound even when it was no longer under fire. It therefore looked very much to MSF as if the VRS wanted to keep Dutchbat in the compound.²²⁷

The surgeon Colonel Kremer said later that he did not feel like sitting in the bunker wearing his flak jacket; he wanted to get out and help the wounded who were arriving from the B Company compound in Srebrenica. He said, however, that he received an order from the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, to stay where he was. Colonel Kremer believed that this command came from Major Franken.²²⁸ Kremer said he uttered a four-letter word, and went anyway. Only a lieutenant from the commandos (Van Klinken), who had had no medical training, was prepared to help him. Kremer was convinced that the Bosnian Serbs only fired at the compound to keep Dutchbat inside, but others were afraid and unsure of the Bosnian Serbs' intentions. Some members of Dutchbat personnel did believe that the Bosnian Serbs really were aiming to wound or kill them.²²⁹

It appeared that some form of selection had been made before the inhabitants of the enclave and the patients reached the compound: the ones who arrived tended to be among the more prominent members of the population.²³⁰ A tally kept of the refugees arriving at the compound yielded a count of about 4800 persons,²³¹ most of whom were women and children. It was estimated that five per cent of the arrivals were men of military-service age.²³² (For further considerations on this topic, see Chapter 4 of Part IV).

A few of these refugees wore ABiH uniform, but were unarmed. There were also some men who had previously been seen in uniform in Srebrenica, but who arrived at the compound after 11 July in civilian clothing.²³³ Some looked like soldiers, in view of their age and the type of footwear they wore.²³⁴ Conversations with an interpreter indicated that a number of these men had carried out operations outside the enclave.²³⁵ These men gave the impression of being particularly fearful.²³⁶ The Field Dressing Station personnel made no distinction between possible soldiers and civilians in the treatment of the wounded, and the fact that they had an impression that a particular person might be a soldier did not stop them from treating him.²³⁷

Around 30 members of Dutchbat personnel were involved in the initial reception. They formed small groups and brought the refugees to the vehicle hall. When the hall was full, only the sick and wounded were allowed in.²³⁸ Twelve to 15 members of Dutchbat were involved in administering First Aid after this initial period.²³⁹

The wounded were kept apart from the other refugees²⁴⁰ and were accommodated in the passageway in the middle of this hall. Personnel without specialized medical training performed general tasks such as ushering the refugees to the appropriate spot, carrying children and personal possessions, fetching and carrying the wounded and sometimes even giving assistance in childbirth. The conditions in the hall were abominable. While sanitary facilities were provided outside (seven 'Dixy' toilets were available, and latrines were also dug), many people urinated and defecated in the hall (possibly from fear in some cases).²⁴¹ The sewer to which the toilets were connected overflowed.²⁴² Dutchbat personnel did their best 'to clean the shit', as Médecins Sans Frontières put it, but the compound was completely overcrowded.²⁴³

The situation was harrowing, and the stench in the warm surroundings was terrible. Unpurified water could be obtained from the stream flowing behind the compound, but the refugees declined the offer of spraying them with water from a hosepipe to cool them down or allow them to wash themselves. According to a Dutchbat doctor, there would have been no point in using showers because they would soon have become unhygienic. Dutchbat soldiers gave up their towels, which were moistened and brought into the hall. All these measures helped very little. Nevertheless, this group of refugees was better off than the much larger group outside the compound: they had more water, and received better medical treatment. There was a shortage of water outside the compound, especially in the beginning, and little possibility of sheltering from the blazing sun. The people in the compound were peaceful on the whole, because they felt safer than the refugees outside.²⁴⁴

As shells fell round the compound, people panicked and the crowd outside begged to be let in.²⁴⁵ A rumour also spread at a certain moment that the VRS was advancing with tanks from the direction of Bratunac towards Potocari.²⁴⁶ This was not true: there was little sign of the VRS in Potocari that day.

The MSF team had seen the VRS advance into Srebrenica, and during its journey to Potocari had witnessed an exodus interspersed with skirmishes. The last patients left the hospital at 3.30 pm;²⁴⁷ the evacuation of the hospital is described in the section below. The MSF staff arrived in Potocari at the same time as the main mass of refugees.²⁴⁸

The staff of the Field Dressing Station, now transferred to Potocari, had not been informed about the evacuation of the hospital in the afternoon of 11 July: 'We looked up at a given moment, and there they were'. The MSF and hospital staff and the patients were housed as well as possible under the circumstances.²⁴⁹ At about 5 pm, there were 65 wounded in the compound being cared for by MSF and Dutchbat staff. The total number of refugees in and around the UN compound was about 20,000.²⁵⁰

The Médecins Sans Frontières office in Belgrade did its best to draw the world's attention to the flight of the population to Potocari and the effects of the VRS offensive by sending press releases to various press agencies, radio and TV stations and newspapers in different countries. The organization made a plea for an immediate ceasefire. Its Belgrade and other offices were in close contact with the UN, and lobbied for an active search to be made for solutions. MSF had two scenarios in mind in this connection: a humanitarian corridor to Central Bosnia or, if negotiations on this point could not be brought to a successful conclusion, the granting of clearances for aid convoys and extra personnel.²⁵¹

Médecins Sans Frontières in Belgrade instructed the team in Potocari to take steps on the following day, if the shelling had stopped by then, to set up an aid post for the treatment of the wounded and of dehydrated children, and to try to provide some form of shelter from the sun for children and pregnant women. They also gave the team the good advice to try to get some sleep.²⁵²

Christina Schmitz had a meeting with Warrant Officer Tops early that evening. According to her, Dutchbat's medical team was prepared to help, but she was not convinced that everyone in Dutchbat was happy about their arrival; she did not give reasons for this feeling, however. The organization had not managed to bring medical supplies with them from the hospital. MSF surgeon Daniel O'Brien drew up a list of things the team required. Schmitz was convinced that their requests would be met, though she knew that Dutchbat was short of supplies itself.²⁵³

Médecins Sans Frontières looked after its own patients from the hospital.²⁵⁴ Agreement about responsibilities was reached between Naval Captain Hegge on the one hand and Christina Schmitz and Daniel O'Brien on the other when the MSF team arrived: the patients from the hospital were in the compound as guests, under the medical responsibility of MSF, though Hegge did express his willingness to help: 'If you need something, or if there is anything that can be done to help, just let us know.' Captain Hegge had chosen this stance on the basis of his previous experience in dealing with Médecins Sans Frontières in Cambodia. In his view, NGOs tended to adopt a fairly anti-militaristic attitude, and in such a case he thought it better not to force help on them but rather to let them ask for the things they needed. Dutchbat was already in a dependent situation, and if it started laying down the law to others this could be wrongly interpreted.²⁵⁵ The Commander of the Field Dressing Station, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, told his personnel that the construction chosen was that MSF's chief physician (Daniel O'Brien) and coordinator (Christian Schmitz) were in charge of the medical activities, and they would receive support in the provision of aid to the refugees.²⁵⁶

That same evening, Christina Schmitz reported that, unlike the situation on previous days, contacts with Major Franken had been 'quite good' and that Dutchbat, in particular the old KHO-5 team, had been cooperative. Dutchbat personnel went outside the compound every hour to see whether any new patients had arrived. Sleeping accommodation for 16 local nurses was arranged within the compound. Schmitz reported to the MSF office in Belgrade that Dutchbat provided small amounts of important medicaments such as infusion fluids, penicillin and dressing materials that day.²⁵⁷

Although limits were set on the level of humanitarian aid that could be provided, mainly because of the shortage of the materials required for intensive care as explained in the previous section 'The emergency stock', this did not mean that orders had been given prohibiting humanitarian aid altogether.²⁵⁸ However, not much aid could be given in view of the lack of medical supplies. At a certain point, however, it was decided to start using up the 'emergency stock'; this meant that more aid could be offered.²⁵⁹

As mentioned above, the concept of 'emergency stock' was not clearly defined. The Commander of the Field Dressing Station took the viewpoint that the total amount of medical supplies should be considered rather than special stock set aside for emergency use.²⁶⁰ Others did use the term 'emergency stock', applying it to practically all of the medical supplies, which could only be used freely for humanitarian aid to the local population at a later date. Opinions differed as to the exact moment when this could be done; this point will be discussed in detail later on in this appendix.

Lieutenant Colonel Karremans had, given orders, after consultation with Naval Captain Hegge, that no operations should be performed on refugees. The operating theatres should be reserved for Dutch wounded, and the supplies required for operations should not be used for other purposes. This material was only freed for use on the wounded present after all the OP personnel were back at the compound and all shelling had stopped. It has been suggested, however, that there were no urgent cases during this period. KHO-6 only performed one operation on a refugee during this period, on a boy who had lost part of one of his thighs.²⁶¹ MSF, on the other hand, spoke of two urgent cases.²⁶²

Most of the wounded were old people with signs of exhaustion, or people with bullet or shrapnel wounds.²⁶³ There were a few simulators, however. One man took off his artificial limb in the hope of being evacuated. The Bosnian Serbs were also aware of this. For example, one wounded person was hit on the leg with the butt of a rifle to check whether he really was wounded. In general, however, the Bosnian Serbs did not hinder Dutchbat in the provision of medical care.²⁶⁴

Seven children were born during the first night in the compound, one of them being a stillbirth. The next day the mother in question was allowed onto one of the buses deporting refugees to Tuzla. The conditions under which the mothers had to give birth were abominable: lying on a stretcher in a dark corridor in unsanitary surroundings, without any privacy and in full view of anyone who might be passing.²⁶⁵

The accommodation in the compound allowed no separation between men, women and children. Some of those present had been driven mad or suffered panic attacks as a result of all they had been through. Some refugees stated later that there had been little medical care or dispensation of medicines during the first few days. A woman who had been wounded in both legs said that she had been seen by two doctors, but had received no treatment. There were no toilets. There was no bread either, but sometimes the wounded were given biscuits. Later, the above-mentioned wounded woman was allowed to wash her very dirty legs herself.²⁶⁶

In the opinion of the wounded ABiH officer Sadik Vilic, who arrived in Potocari between 5 and 6 pm on 11 July, Dutchbat personnel were unfriendly towards the wounded and threw them roughly on the dirty ground in one of the halls of the factory. He stated that one doctor dealt with the wounded in a very rough, careless manner. Dutchbat medical staff gave little assistance according to him, and provided no medicines or injections. Vilic claimed that the wounded were only given soup once in the following three days. Dutchbat soldiers did come in and out from time to time, but gave little assistance, shouted, did not listen to the wounded and did not touch them. Médecins Sans Frontières, on the other hand, did provide assistance.²⁶⁷ According to MSF staff member Abdulah Purkovic, all the wounded were crying out for help simultaneously.

The chaos and misery in the compound were unlimited. Young Dutchbat soldiers looked worried or stood crying. The Dutchbat medical staff were in a state of panic, and seemed to be concentrating on looking after themselves. Abdulah Purkovic also stated that in his view, Dutchbat doctors did little to help during the first day in the compound. Christina Schmitz and Daniel O'Brien did what they could, but were exhausted after working a couple of 24-hour days.²⁶⁸ Colonel Kremer, unlike other Dutchbat doctors, received general praise. 'He provided an enormous amount of help, and did what he could', said Purkovic; Kremer was in fact the first Dutch doctor to provide active assistance for the wounded.²⁶⁹

Since Médecins Sans Frontières did not have enough staff to deal with all the medical needs, Dutchbat did continue to provide assistance.²⁷⁰ The Field Dressing Station staff took over most of the work from MSF, looking after the wounded especially during the evening and at night.²⁷¹

Dutchbat medical personnel also patrolled the area outside the compound at night. They provided medical assistance, or ensured that a number of paramedics brought wounded to the MSF unit in the compound.²⁷² People who developed symptoms of shock were given an infusion.²⁷³ Dutchbat infusion material and saline, which were in ample supply, were used for this purpose where necessary.²⁷⁴

The members of the KHO-5 surgical team took on the lion's share of the work in caring for the wounded during the first few days.²⁷⁵ Since the new surgical team had taken over the task of ensuring that medical care for Dutchbat personnel was available when needed, the old team took responsibility for the general medical supervision of the wounded, sick, women and children in the compound. When the risk for Dutchbat personnel had receded, a working timetable could be drawn up in which the members of KHO-6 also played a part.²⁷⁶

Water supplies within the compound were found to be adequate in the first instance. Conditions outside the compound were worse, especially as regards the water supply.²⁷⁷ Dutchbat had a water purification plant capable of producing 7000 litres of water per day from the stream behind the compound. That was inadequate, amounting to not much more than one litre per person per day just for the people in the compound. Besides, Dutchbat did not have enough fuel to keep the installation running. In addition, Dutchbat had supplies of bottled water sufficient for ten days' consumption.²⁷⁸ The refugees initially got their drinking water from the local fire-fighting mains, but this proved to be not so suitable. Refugees complained that the water, which they were given in plastic beakers, was not pure.²⁷⁹ The refugees were subsequently also given water from the purification plant.²⁸⁰ Later still, the VRS allowed Dutchbat to repair the water station to provide the refugees with water.²⁸¹ Dutchbat set up a water supply system for the refugees,²⁸² and placed the battalion's water trucks outside the compound.²⁸³ The Bosnian Serbs also sent two tankers full of water from Bratunac, as early as 11 July. This water was of good quality, and the people seemed to get enough drinking water in these days. There were no queues at the water distribution points.²⁸⁴ The number of people with signs of dehydration was not a cause for concern. Christina Schmitz did not at this point find any children with signs of severe dehydration, either inside or outside the compound, and no diarrhoea epidemic broke out. It is true, however, that the people were debilitated and the children apathetic.²⁸⁵

General Mladic offered to supply food and medicine from Bratunac.²⁸⁶ In practice, this offer remained restricted to a little food. The provision of adequate food supplies for the refugees was a practically insurmountable problem. The kitchen staff used 500 tins of soup²⁸⁷ to make 1000 litres of soup for the refugees when they arrived at the compound. This seemed like a lot, but it meant no more than a mug of soup for each of the 4800 refugees in the compound. This was distributed to the refugees, together with the biscuits from the combat rations, in the evening of 11 July between 9 pm and midnight.²⁸⁸

Conditions in the enclave were somewhat calmer on 12 July. The fighting had stopped, and the VRS had declared a ceasefire up to 10 am that morning. However, this did not bring much change in the uncertain situation the refugees found themselves in. Médecins Sans Frontières made use of the relative calm to ask Dutchbat to erect three tents outside the compound and to set up a First Aid post in them; this would facilitate the selection of patients requiring treatment most urgently and the treatment of patients with signs of dehydration. Most of the patients were apathetic after having spent a night in the open.²⁸⁹ Nevertheless, MSF was busy that morning giving sedative injections to people who had woken up with hysteria. They did not have much chance to do their work in peace, as the VRS resumed the shelling shortly before the end of the ceasefire.²⁹⁰

Still, the overall picture of the day was completely different from that of the day before. Dutchbat's logbook states that only two wounded patients presented themselves at Potocari during the day: a man who had been bitten by a dog and a man who had hit himself on the head with a stone. They received treatment in the compound.²⁹¹

In response to the MSF request mentioned above, a First Aid post was set up outside the compound, and used to select wounded patients urgently requiring treatment who were transported to the compound in a four-ton truck.²⁹² MSF distributed sheets of plastic which the refugees could use to make makeshift tents, and patients were provided with blankets, buckets and towels.²⁹³

Members of the KHO-6 team also helped outside the compound in the distribution of bread and water and in taking people who had been overcome by the heat to the First Aid post where they could receive the necessary treatment. Dutchbat medical personnel set up watches to check on the condition of the refugees during the night and to dress wounds, provide food, administer sedatives or assist in the delivery of babies as required; this started on the first night that the refugees were in the compound (the night of 11 to 12 July).²⁹⁴ After the medical staff of B Company arrived in Potocari, they also helped the Medical Platoon there to care for and treat the sick and wounded and the other refugees, and provided support for the First Aid post set up by MSF.²⁹⁵ Dutchbat personnel helped Médecins Sans Frontières there in the application of plaster casts and changing of dressings, and also assisted in the medical care of the patients in the hall of the factory.²⁹⁶

In fact, Dutchbat personnel at all levels spontaneously offered to help. Everyone did so, without much need for guidance from the senior ranks. The personnel of C Company also provided various forms of assistance without being commanded or encouraged to do so; this included washing, caring for and feeding patients and other refugees, and in general doing all they could to make the situation of all the refugees as tolerable as possible. They also put up tents for women and small children outside the compound, at the request of MSF.²⁹⁷

Dutchbat medical staff received an order on 12 July, in response to a demand from the Bosnian Serbs, to go and set up a medical aid post in Bratunac in preparation for transfer of the wounded from Potocari to there. Bratunac, the major centre of Bosnian Serb activities in the area with a hospital of its own, had been demanding various forms of medical aid from the UN forces for some time, as mentioned above. This order was rescinded later the same day²⁹⁸ - again in response to a demand from the Bosnian Serbs, who had apparently changed their minds; it will be clear that the whole situation was extremely fluid at this time. While the order was still in force, Naval Captain Schouten volunteered to take what seemed to him to be the necessary steps to this end. He collected some supplies, with the aid of the Medical Platoon. However, plans changed every ten minutes, and were then scrapped. The consensus was finally that the wounded would be sent to Tuzla instead.²⁹⁹

As indicated above, General Mladic had initially wanted to start moving the wounded from Potocari first, with the football stadium in Bratunac as their destination. Christina Schmitz tried to argue against this decision when Mladic visited Potocari, but he told her to mind her own business.³⁰⁰

It is not known whether Christina Schmitz's arguments had more effect than appeared at first sight or whether the Bosnian Serbs changed their minds for other reasons. In any case, nothing came of the idea of moving the wounded to Bratunac and setting up a medical aid post there for them. Instead, it was decided to move both the wounded and the refugees outside the compound to Kladanj, roughly halfway to Tuzla, from where further transport to Tuzla could be arranged as the Bosnian Serbs saw fit. The transport of the refugees to Kladanj started about 3 pm on 12 July, and is described in Chapter 4 of Part IV of the main report. A convoy carrying some of the wounded left at 6 pm. This convoy failed to get through the confrontation line, however, and some of the wounded it carried were returned to Potocari. The story of this abortive move is told in section 13 below.

An unusual case of medical aid was provided on this day by two members of Dutchbat medical personnel, Captain R.A. Buijs and Sergeant First Class F.C. Erkelens, who had accompanied the refugees during their journey to Kladanj. On the way back later that evening, they provided first aid to a number of VRS soldiers who had driven a stolen Dutch APC off the road into a ravine near Vlasenica. They took one severely wounded and one lightly wounded soldier to the hospital in Vlasenica, while the body of a third VRS soldier who had died in the accident was picked up by the Bosnian Serbs.³⁰¹

Return to Srebrenica

At a meeting with the VRS on the afternoon of 11 July, Dutchbat had asked the Bosnian Serbs whether Médecins Sans Frontières and a UNMO could return to Srebrenica to pick up the six remaining patients from the hospital and the 10 to 20 old people who were understood still to be in the Social Centre. Major Franken managed to reach agreement with the VRS on this matter on the evening of the same day: they would be allowed to go back to Srebrenica to pick up patients who were still there.³⁰² Major Franken had also wanted to return to Srebrenica to try to pick up MSF supplies there,³⁰³ but General Mladic told MSF that everything had already been removed.³⁰⁴

Dutchbat considered it safe to return to Srebrenica because the town was completely in the hands of the VRS. An exhausted Christina Schmitz was not so sure.³⁰⁵

There was no time to arrange the return to Srebrenica on 11 July after the VRS had agreed to it. Christina Schmitz spoke briefly to General Mladic on 12 July, and she also asked whether MSF could pick up the remaining patients and bring them back to the compound. He agreed.³⁰⁶

At 4 pm on 12 July, Warrant Officer Tops was ordered to report to Lieutenant Rutten in order to pick up the remaining wounded and old people with a four-ton truck and three members of medical staff. Tops followed Rutten, who was driving a Mercedes jeep, in the direction of Srebrenica. The VRS stopped both vehicles after they had driven 1500 metres, and confiscated Lieutenant Rutten's jeep. It was only at this point that Warrant Officer Tops learned that they were making for Srebrenica to pick up patients who had been left behind there. The group was allowed to continue its journey in the four-ton truck. A distended corpse was observed lying in the B Company compound, to the north of the encampment building, and two other corpses in military uniform were seen later in Srebrenica near the UNHCR warehouse and Dom Kultura. The group picked up a total of nine refugees, old people who had been too exhausted to go any further. The many Bosnian Serbs in the town did not molest these refugees. They were too busy looting and collecting the vehicles present in the enclave.³⁰⁷

Christina Schmitz did not go back to Srebrenica till 13 July. When the Bosnian Serb delegation inspected the compound in Potocari, she took the opportunity to return to Srebrenica with a VRS escort and a UNMO. She found three old people in the hospital, in the same place where they had been left behind two days ago; they were still in good condition. One person was sitting on the pavement outside the Social Centre, and three more were found inside the building. The VRS soldiers who were accompanying them were very nervous, because they had expected ABiH soldiers to be hiding in the building. The town was however completely empty, apart from a few looters struggling under the weight of TVs and washing machines, and driving cattle in front of them towards Potocari.³⁰⁸

Three other patients who had been left behind during the flight from the hospital could not be found; Christina Schmitz had no idea where they could be. They were not allowed any more time to look for people left behind in the ghost town of Srebrenica.³⁰⁹

The refugees who were crowded together, waiting for transport, were close to despair at the end of the day on 12 July. It did not look as if the VRS were going to continue the evacuation that evening, which meant that the refugees who were forced to camp outside the compound would have to spend another night in the open air or in improvised shelters.³¹⁰ The conditions outside the compound were appreciably worse than those inside. Some MSF nurses from the hospital were among the refugees outside. They stated later that they thought they would be safer there than with the wounded, where they were afraid that the VRS would treat them in the same way as the ABiH soldiers.

The refugees tried to find temporary shelter in all kinds of places outside the compound. The nurses mentioned a dark, dirty, windowless shed as one of these places. There was practically nothing to eat, and nothing at all for babies. It was claimed that the Bosnian Serbs did not allow the UN soldiers to give them food or water.

One refugee spoke of spending two days at a spot where there was no room to sleep and no food or water; another said that he had lain on the ground in a factory for two days, also without any water. He stated that that he had asked Dutchbat soldiers for water, but they had not given him any. A woman said, "The UNPROFOR soldiers were bad. They treated people like animals. (...) My husband asked them for protection but they did nothing. I think there was cooperation between the UNPROFOR and the Cetniks. The UNPROFOR soldiers gave them their uniforms and nobody could know who was who."³¹¹ There is an element of truth in the last statement, since the VRS acquired an appreciable number of UNPROFOR uniforms when they occupied the Dutchbat OPs. As a result, it became increasingly difficult for the refugees outside the compound to distinguish Dutchbat soldiers from the VRS.³¹²

The Bosnian Serbs continued the deportation of the refugees with the aid of buses and trucks early in the morning of 13 July, from about 7 am. Christina Schmitz and Daniel O'Brien of MSF were horrified at the scenes they witnessed:

UN soldiers are controlling the desperate crowd. Everybody who could have stopped this mass exodus, should be forced to feel the panic and desperation of the people, leaving even their belongings behind they managed to bring to Potocari. (...) Everybody should see the violence in the faces of the BSA [VRS], directing the people like animals to the buses, children are screaming on the arms of their mothers, everybody runs for his/her life into an uncertain future.³¹³

Major Franken and Christina Schmitz agreed in the course of the morning that after the failure of the attempt to send a convoy of wounded to Kladanj the previous day (as described in section 13 below), there was no point in trying to send another medical convoy; instead, all attention should be concentrated on the departure of the refugees.³¹⁴

MSF and Dutchbat continued to be active in caring for the sick outside the compound during the morning of 13 July. Dutchbat doctors selected patients for transfer to the compound; the main indications were hysterical reactions or invalidity. The total number of patients transferred in this way during the day was 22. Patients were given water or fruit juice if necessary. Severe diarrhoea was still not observed, even among children. The breast-feeding of children did yield difficulties, however, since some mothers experienced problems with their milk production due to the stress they were under. The situation of the refugees inside the compound also started to deteriorate. As mentioned above, there were too few toilets, and the ones there were starting to overflow. The refugees outside the sheds could move around more freely now that the threat of VRS shelling had receded.³¹⁵

The food situation

Médecins Sans Frontières reported that there was some food left in the compound in any case, in the form of bread, potatoes and biscuits, though not enough; but that water was more important. It was not clear to MSF whether the refugees outside the compound were getting any food.³¹⁶

UNMOs reported on 12 July that the food situation was starting to get critical. Major Franken stated that Dutchbat could give the remaining refugees two meals a day, but that there were not enough supplies to permit this to go on after 13 July.³¹⁷ Some Dutchbat personnel stated during debriefing that refugees were given two meals a day and that the UN personnel were sharing their emergency rations with them,³¹⁸ but the refugees outside the compound did not seem to be getting any of this.

³¹⁸ Confidential debriefing statement (14).

It is not clear how much food Dutchbat actually had. As mentioned above, the UNMOs reported that the rations of food would be exhausted by 13 July. However, Dutchbat reported after the departure of the refugees on 13 July that the battalion still had ample food to last them for a week. Dutchbat also received some rations from MSF, but the nature of these rations was not mentioned. It would thus appear that the expression ‘for a week’ must have referred to the roughly 400 soldiers who were left, along with the sick and wounded.³¹⁹

The last logistic report from Dutchbat, dated 10 July, stated that the battalion still had enough combat rations to last them for eight days. There had not been any fresh food for some considerable time. That meant, roughly speaking, that the battalion had about 4000 rations left when the refugees reached Potocari. In line with this, Yasushi Akashi reported to New York on 12 July that there was enough food for less than 24 hours for the estimated 27,000 refugees in the vicinity of Potocari. The UNHCR had stores of food in Belgrade and Tuzla, but they would only provide relief if adequate transport could be found and if freedom of movement was granted for this purpose. In anticipation of such permission from the VRS, a Dutch convoy was already on the way from Zagreb to Belgrade in order to shorten the reaction time. This convoy comprised two fuel tankers and 15 trucks loaded with fresh and tinned food.³²⁰

If the figures for 10 and 13 July are correct, and the reported stock data did show appreciable variation, then it may be concluded that (in contrast to later reports) relatively few rations can have been shared with the local population. In theory, after allowing for Dutchbat’s own requirements, about 2000 rations were available to feed about 10,000 people for a day (from 11 to 12 July) and another roughly 10,000 people for two days (from 11 to 13 July), not to mention the practical difficulties of dividing the packed rations fairly.

In the opinion of MSF, the people still seemed to have enough food on 12 July, taking into account the fact that most had probably taken small amounts of supplies with them when they left home.³²¹ Emira Selimovic, the MSF interpreter, disagreed with this assessment however. She believed that the refugees had practically exhausted all their supplies of food and water before they reached the compound.³²²

According to a report by two UNHCR field officers, two VRS trucks with food had been sent to the refugees and this food had been distributed immediately to the refugees outside the compound. Dutchbat also reported that bread was brought to the refugees from Bratunac every day, but the UNHCR field officers could not confirm this.³²³ There had however been negotiations with the VRS about the provision of humanitarian aid, and the VRS had agreed to lend a helping hand with food and water.³²⁴ The extent of this assistance was not precisely known (see also Part IV, Chapter 4).

Some reports suggested, however, that this aid was intended to create an image of compassion for the Bosnian Serb cameras rather than being motivated by a real desire to help the refugees. A truck carrying 200 loaves of bread arrived on the morning of 12 July. The Bosnian Serbs distributed this bread, together with chocolate and cigarettes, under the eyes of the cameras. General Mladic was filmed patting a boy on the head. It goes without saying that 200 loaves were not enough to feed the 15,000 people waiting for transport outside the compound.³²⁵

Convoys

A UNHCR food convoy left Belgrade for Potocari on 12 July but had to spend the night at the Yugoslav border because the Bosnian Serbs did not give permission for it to continue its journey to Potocari. The VRS had started hunting the column of men from Srebrenica who were making for Tuzla through the mountains and forests. Even at that time, UNHCR was receiving reports that the situation in the area was serious: roads were blocked, and there was no freedom of movement even for local people.³²⁶ The VRS argued that it could not give the convoy clearance to pass because of the presence on ABiH troops in the neighbourhood who might open fire on the convoy and give the VRS the blame.³²⁷ General Mladic confirmed, however, that the arrival of the convoy did not represent a problem for the VRS. The convoy carried 20,000 combat rations, 15,000 litres of water, 36,000 litres of diesel, toilets and cleaning materials.³²⁸

MSF was also trying to get permission for a convoy carrying 30 tons of medical and logistic supplies, together with three persons to supplement its staff, to go to Potocari on this day, but the Bosnian Serbs refused permission on the same grounds as for the UNHCR convoy: the ABiH was still in the neighbourhood, and might open fire on the convoy.³²⁹

Director General P. Bernard of Médecins Sans Frontières discussed the situation with Kofi Annan, the UN Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping, who told him that General Mladic had given his assurance that the UNHCR convoy would be granted clearance and that all the refugees – including the men, would be brought to Tuzla.³³⁰

However, the UNHCR convoy and the fresh personnel for MSF did not get further than the frontier at Zvornik. UNPROFOR tried to get a UN helicopter to Potocari.³³¹ It was rumoured that Ken Biser, the head of Civil Affairs for Sector North East in Tuzla, intended to go there too. Since Médecins Sans Frontières had found it impossible to get extra personnel to Potocari, the organization reacted ironically to Biser's plans by commenting that he would 'doubtless get there on horseback'.³³² In a later comment, MSF conceded that travel by horse might not have been such a bad idea after all, since a helicopter certainly ran a high risk of being shot down.³³³ As it turned out, Biser never actually made the trip.

General Mladic finally gave the promised permission for the UNHCR convoy to proceed to Potocari about noon on the 13th. The convoy arrived at the Yellow Bridge about 3 pm.³³⁴ The UNHCR Field Officers Andrei Kazakov and Rosanna Sam observed a great deal of movement among the refugees there, who were being taken out of the enclave by bus. In fact, the convoy arrived in Potocari at just about the same moment as the last refugees were being taken out of the former enclave: 'how cynical,' was MSF's comment on this event.³³⁵

The UNHCR field officers met the Bosnian Serb Kekic (of the Coordination Board for Humanitarian Aid) and the president of the Opstina (municipal council) of Bratunac, Ljubo Simic, at the Yellow Bridge. The field officers and Kekic tried to enter the Dutchbat compound while the convoy waited. Kekic wanted to get into the compound to ensure the safety of the local UNHCR staff and to check the situation of the refugees. Dutchbat refused access to Kekic, however, since he had a TV team from Pale in his wake. The field officers discussed the situation with Dutchbat and MSF.³³⁶

The remaining population

The Bosnian Serbs completed the deportation of the refugees who had been outside the compound about 4 pm. The transport of the refugees from inside the compound started half an hour later. All male patients who were able to walk, along with the remaining nurses, left in these last convoys.³³⁷

At a certain moment, the VRS brought along a man with a year-old baby. The man had no one to take care of the baby. Christina Schmitz had to separate the baby from the crying father, while the VRS took the latter away with them;³³⁸ she got the feeling that the father would never see the baby again.³³⁹ Warrant Officer Knapen described this event slightly differently: when the men were being separated from the women at the orders of the VRS, a young man was found with a 15- to 16-month-old child. Knapen took charge of the child, noted its name and the name of the father and handed the child over to Christina Schmitz of MSF.³⁴⁰

Only those with more serious wounds were left in the compound. The arrival of a film crew from Pale did not go unnoticed inside the compound. Wounded patients said that it was announced at a given moment that the patient accommodation in the bunker was going to be filmed.³⁴¹ A question about this to MSF's interpreter elicited the response that a CNN team was expected.³⁴²

One person who was confronted with a film crew outside the compound was MSF's cook, Abdulah Purkovic. He had to repeat a message dictated to him by the Bosnian Serbs in front of the Serbian TV cameras; he had to say that they were being treated well. Purkovic played his own role in helping the refugees. He was walking round in MSF uniform he had managed to get hold of at the last moment, which allowed him considerable freedom of movement. This led the people around him to believe that he was a doctor, and they appealed to him in panic. Many were in need of help, mothers had lost their children; everyone asked him to help.

Purkovic started to draw up a list of missing children and he went outside the compound looking for them. He managed to re-unite a few children with their mothers. Dutchbat personnel asked him to organize the distribution of food; he agreed, on condition that Dutchbat would help in the actual distribution. Soup was taken round in thermos flasks; 15 Dutchbat soldiers helped him to distribute this. A food queue was formed, but not without problems. People were fighting to get a bit of food; Purkovic found it a frightening experience to see this. In particular children and babies had practically nothing to eat or drink. Dutch soldiers brought a few biscuits round, but it was practically impossible to distribute them properly because people were in such a state of panic.³⁴³

After his enforced appearance on Serbian TV, Purkovic announced that he was so ashamed that he was going to commit suicide. In preparation for this, he performed ritual ablutions. The MSF interpreter Emira Selimovic asked for two Dutchbat soldiers to keep a watch on him to prevent him from carrying out this deed.³⁴⁴ After it had been confirmed that there was indeed a possibility that Purkovic might commit suicide, Dutchbat provided two men for such guard duty.³⁴⁵

Purkovic's feelings of insecurity increased even further when a group of VRS officers entered the compound and made a round of inspection. He told Dutchbat's physician Colonel Kremer about this and asked him for poison, since he did not want to be tortured or murdered. Colonel Kremer told him that he had a 50% chance of survival if he stayed in the compound, and an equal chance if he tried to escape to Tuzla through the woods at night. If however he hung himself or took poison, his chances of survival would be nil. Purkovic replied that he did not want to die, but that if he had no choice he would rather kill himself than be killed. In response, Kremer said that he did not have the poison Purkovic wanted.³⁴⁶

There was yet another reason why Purkovic's life was at risk: he had been an ABiH soldier before he started working for Médecins Sans Frontières. This put both Major Franken and Christina Schmitz in a difficult position. Major Franken intended to ask Purkovic to leave the compound, as he was afraid that Purkovic's presence there could put others at risk.³⁴⁷ After consultation with Franken, Christina Schmitz invited Purkovic to accompany her in her vehicle when she left Potocari. This was not without risk either: if the VRS apprehended him, this could put all the other men in the convoy at risk. Something similar had happened during the attempt to take a convoy of wounded to Kladanj (see below). Purkovic was however only willing to accept this offer if Christina Schmitz gave him poison, so that he could commit suicide in full view of everyone if he was discovered. It did not make things any easier for Christina Schmitz that she disapproved of Purkovic: he had been trying to steal things, had been trying to mislead her, and had been chasing after another member of MSF personnel with an axe. All these facts, however, did not dissuade her from trying to get him out of Potocari.

An even greater problem was that he also wanted to kill his sister to prevent her from falling into VRS hands. She was already sitting in a truck, waiting to be evacuated. At that time, it was difficult to intervene because of the large numbers of VRS soldiers who were in the vicinity. Nevertheless, soon after that she appeared at the Field Dressing Station with clear signs of an attempted strangling. She needed protection; she wanted to get away from Srebrenica. Médecins Sans Frontières was afraid that Purkovic would make another attempt on her life. A Dutchbat soldier was therefore posted as a guard next to her bed.³⁴⁸

Later, when he was on the point of departure, Purkovic got terrible pains in his legs and could no longer walk. The medical staff ascribed this to depression. They gave him some pills and put him in a wheelchair. They wheeled him into the open where it was extremely hot, but after two to three hours in the sun he could walk again.³⁴⁹ Dutchbat also intervened in other cases of attempted suicide.³⁵⁰ When a wounded ABiH soldier tried to hang himself, he was saved by the medical staff.³⁵¹ One case of hanging outside the compound was reported, though not observed directly.³⁵² However, some Dutchbat soldiers who were outside the compound all the time did report that a man had hanged himself behind the bus station in Potocari.³⁵³

Dutchbat made no distinction between possible ABiH soldiers and civilians when treating patients.³⁵⁴ As a result, up to 60 ABiH soldiers may have been treated in the compound.³⁵⁵ While the

The VRS inspection

The Bosnian Serb military police (MUP) had wanted to search the compound on 13 July, but VRS Colonel Radoslav Jankovic refused to give permission for this because the MUP was known to have looted the compound in Srebrenica and to have removed UNPROFOR material.³⁵⁷

However, a Bosnian Serb delegation did arrive at the compound about 5 pm on 13 July. They were accompanied by a UNMO and Major Franken. Elmira Selimovic, the MSF interpreter, and a couple of Dutchbat soldiers also went round with them. The surgeon Daniel O'Brien and a Dutchbat surgeon were with the wounded during the inspection. ABiH officer Sadik Vilic, who was one of the patients, knew some members of the VRS delegation from before the war. He was afraid of being recognized, and averted his head as much as possible. Ljubisav Simic, a former teacher from Bratunac and now mayor, was one of the members of the delegation. The Bosnian Serb commander said that he wanted the exact name of all patients together with the name of their father. They did not ask Vilic anything, but they did ask his mother-in-law whether she was Esma, a former teacher at the primary school in Bratunac. A Dutchbat medical technician and a coloured Dutchbat soldier did ask Vilic afterwards whether he was an ABiH officer.

Sadik Vilic concluded from the whole proceedings that the Bosnian Serbs told Dutchbat exactly what they wanted done, and that Dutchbat followed all their orders. 'Dutchbat was scared', he commented.³⁵⁸ The VRS delegation stayed no longer than ten minutes in the compound: 'devastated by the shit and smell and the look of the patients they left quickly', MSF reported.³⁵⁹ The Bosnian Serbs took a list of the patients with them;³⁶⁰ this is discussed in greater detail below.

A Bosnian woman stated that there had been three or four Bosnian Serb checks on the compound during the seven days she was there. The nursing staff warned the patients of such inspections beforehand. The woman was scared, and pulled a blanket over her head. A Bosnian Serb pulled the blanket down and said, 'I have been looking for you.' This was Major Nikolic, who said he recognized her and believed her to be the above-mentioned Esma. Nikolic was looking for this former teacher at the primary school in Bratunac because she was suspected of having killed Bosnian Serbs. Her husband, who had died before the war, had been chief of police. The woman said that no members of Dutchbat personnel accompanied the Bosnian Serbs during these inspection rounds, because they were scared. On the other hand, the same witness stated that Dutchbat never left the wounded alone and that she had never seen the Bosnian Serbs taking wounded away from the areas where the patients were lying. She had further never heard any negative comments about the behaviour of Dutchbat.³⁶¹

Dutchbat and MSF were still left with a large number of patients in the compound in Potocari after the deportation of the population. Major Franken gave up the idea of transporting these patients to Kladanj in Dutchbat vehicles, as he was convinced that this would simply cause the VRS to confiscate all the vehicles used for this purpose. He now preferred evacuation by the International Red Cross. Médecins Sans Frontières had no objection to this idea, but hoped that it would not take too long as otherwise the VRS might start developing their own initiatives. However, the ICRC announced on the evening of 14 July that they would carry out this task and were now simply waiting for permission to do so.³⁶²

The involvement of the ICRC in the transport of the wounded on 17 July is dealt with in section 14 below. The next point on the agenda once all the patients had been taken away was the departure of MSF, but so far there was no clear idea about how this was to be arranged.

Once the compound was empty of refugees, the opportunity arose to move the patients to somewhere with a bit more light and better hygiene. All the wounded who had come from the hospital were moved from the wet corridor in the plant to the bunker, where they were re-examined, washed and given the necessary treatment.³⁶³ Any gaps in the patients' documentation were filled in, and schedules were drawn up for the administration of medicaments and for the guarding of the patients. General Mladic announced that he was going to visit the compound, but in fact he never did.³⁶⁴

The wounded also reported that they were washed and given cigarettes, fruit and other food, and blankets. The use of paper pyjamas (which tore very quickly) made quite an impression on them.³⁶⁵ Some of these wounded subsequently suggested that the better treatment they were given was connected with the arrival of the film crew outside the perimeter fence of the compound on 13 July. This was not true, however: the real reason for the improved treatment was that a convoy had arrived, and that the departure of the refugees meant that all attention could be concentrated on the remaining sick and wounded.³⁶⁶ There were moreover ample medical supplies now, because all the goods that had been stockpiled in Zagreb for a considerable time, waiting for dispatch, had arrived.³⁶⁷

The convoy with supplies for Potocari that had been waiting in Belgrade for clearance finally arrived on 14 July, too late to be of any benefit to the refugees. One could never be sure in advance whether a convoy would be allowed through. Even in the present case, the VRS only permitted a few trucks with combat rations, water, fresh fruit and medical supplies to pass.³⁶⁸ According to Christina Schmitz, it was a clever move of the VRS to give clearance for these large amounts of medical supplies: there was so much that Dutchbat would have to leave most of it behind when they left.³⁶⁹

The surgical team continued their activities at the Field Dressing Station. A boy about six years old had an abscess lanced on the morning of 14 July, while in the afternoon the wound of the boy who had been operated on 6 July underwent secondary closure. The KHO-6 team also performed three operations on 15 July, to treat a multiple fracture of the leg, an ankle wound and an abscess on a leg.³⁷⁰ A KHO-6 nurse described these operations as noteworthy, especially because in the preceding period so little had been done. He doubted whether these operations were strictly necessary from a medical point of view. He had the idea that they were performed mainly in the interests of the peace of mind of KHO-6's surgeon, Naval Captain Hegge.³⁷¹ A wounded ABiH soldier and a wounded VRS soldier were also treated after the refugees had left the compound. Both were discharged after treatment.³⁷²

Five deaths were registered at the compound during the period from 13 to 15 July: a stillborn baby and two men aged about 70 and 75 years, whose names were not known, who died on 13 July; a young woman who died in Bratunac (due to lack of insulin) on 14 July and who was brought to the compound by Naval Captain Schouten in a Dutchbat ambulance; and an old woman called Behara Delilovic who died on 15 July at the age of about 70. Captain Van Hoogwaarden, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, ordered compound Commander Major Otter to make arrangements for the burial of these persons and the burial was performed under the supervision of Sergeant First Class J. Zwiers and Sergeant Major M. Moek of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. All the persons concerned had died a natural death and had been examined by the medical service of Dutchbat and MSF.

The mortal remains were buried in a common grave measuring 12 x 3.5 x 1.80 m, dug behind the compound.³⁷³ No material specifically intended for burials was available. Private Raghoebir (a conscript serving with Dutchbat) observed that a baby had been stillborn, and that the midwife (a member of MSF local staff) had put the body in a refuse bin. He took it out and placed it in a plastic bag, in which it was buried; the other bodies were placed in the ground as they were.³⁷⁴

Sergeant Zwiers arranged for the driver of the shovel to fill in the common grave. The driver could not look into the grave from his driver's seat. Thanks to this procedure, the team charged with looking after the burial were spared the task of manually shovelling hard earth on to a bin liner containing the body of the baby and on to the uncovered body of a man.³⁷⁵ The grave was marked with plates bearing the names and probable dates of birth of the persons concerned, in Serbo-Croatian.³⁷⁶ Sergeant Zwiers made an official report of the burial.³⁷⁷

On 15 July, the KHO-5 team was finally able to leave the enclave, after long postponement of its rotation. It travelled with the logistic convoy that was returning to Zagreb. A discussion between Dutchbat, VRS, UNMOs and MSF about the fate of the remaining wounded remained inconclusive. It was necessary to await the results of discussions at high political and military level that were to be held in Belgrade on that day concerning the access of the International Red Cross to Potocari and the departure of Dutchbat.

The care of the patients in the compound did not give rise to problems. Médecins Sans Frontières was still seen as bearing the responsibility for all patients, but according to Christina Schmitz Dutchbat was ‘more than willing to help to cope with the daily workload’. Another operation took place on 16 July. This involved several surgical interventions on the same patient, for treatment of a shrapnel wound and a urological complaint.³⁷⁸

On 15 July, Bosnian Serbs brought another five older people to the compound in Potocari. The VRS had found these women in Suceška, in the southwest corner of the enclave; they had been trying to get to Potocari but had been unable to do so unaided.³⁷⁹

A remarkable incident is reported to have taken place when these women arrived at the compound. When the Deputy Commander of the Field Dressing Station, Warrant Officer Tops, asked the doctors for help they are supposed to have refused, saying ‘Let them just go on to the next place; if we help them, the battalion won’t be able to get away on time.’³⁸⁰ However, the women did receive the necessary treatment and were later given transport from with the other wounded.³⁸¹ Queries about this incident during subsequent interviews of a number of doctors failed to produce any confirmation of the above-mentioned remark. There would have been no reason to refuse treatment to these women alongside the other sick and wounded who were already present in the compound. MSF made no mention of this incident either.

Afterthoughts about provision of medical aid by Dutchbat for the refugees

It is difficult to give a simple, clear answer to the question as to whether Dutchbat did all it could to supplement the efforts of Médecins Sans Frontières in helping the refugees, within the scope available to it and making use of the supplies at its disposal. After the fall of the enclave, Dutchbat had taken upon itself a subsidiary rather than a leading role with respect to medical care. The answer to this question must be based on the judgement of Dutchbat itself, of Médecins Sans Frontières, of UNMOs and refugees and of UNHCR personnel who were only briefly present in the enclave. No other independent sources are available. One problem in this connection is that differences of opinion arose within Dutchbat at the time about the refusal to treat a wounded Muslim woman on 10 July and about a few other incidents that came to light later. In particular the case of the Muslim woman monopolized the subsequent discussion for all kinds of reasons and made it difficult to take due cognisance of other efforts that had been made. The discussion about the failure to treat this woman and the other incidents is dealt with separately below. The opinions given in the present section date from shortly after the fall of the enclave, or were expressed during the debriefing in Assen.

The humanitarian aid given to the refugees inside and outside the compound was initially limited by concern that this could lead to exhaustion of the limited supplies available. When it was judged that Dutchbat personnel were no longer at risk, Dutchbat felt able to give more generous aid. Opinions differed about precisely when the supplies were released for general use.

According to Major Franken, the embargo on the use of the emergency stock was lifted on 11 July when the first refugees reached Potocari. The fall of Srebrenica meant that Dutchbat was no longer in immediate danger, and all restrictions on use of the emergency stock could be lifted.³⁸² Captain Van Hoogwaarden, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, believed that the restrictions on the use of the emergency stock were lifted when the OPs were no longer at risk and agreements had been made with the VRS. According to him, the decision to lift these restrictions was made jointly by the leadership of the battalion and the doctors.³⁸³

The moment at which it was decided to lift the restrictions on the use of the emergency stock was later than that suggested by Major Franken. Lieutenant Colonel Karremans, was not quite clear about the precise moment; he merely indicated that after the fall of Srebrenica it was decided, in consultation with the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, that the emergency stock could be used to give as much medical aid as possible.³⁸⁴

Other members of Dutchbat personnel expressed divergent opinions. Some believed that the restrictions were lifted relatively late in the day on 11 July, when it was clear that the battalion's own men were safe. However, one member of Dutchbat personnel linked this moment with the time when it was known that the refugees would be taken away and the Bosnian Serbs left Dutchbat in peace. That was not until 12 July, and was announced on the radio.³⁸⁵

Christina Schmitz of MSF put the time when the restrictions were lifted late in the morning of 12 July. This was when Dutchbat decided to switch to a 'non combat situation' and to make all medical facilities and supplies available. Fluids, antibiotics, analgesics and dressing materials, which were in very short supply at Médecins Sans Frontières, were passed on at that time.³⁸⁶

Naval Captain Hegge said that he had discussed the lifting of restrictions on use of the supplies with Major Franken on his own initiative, and that this discussion had taken place about noon on 13 July when the OPs were no longer occupied and no more Dutch personnel were outside the compound. From that moment, there was no risk that Dutch personnel could not be given any treatment they might need, so any Bosnian Muslims remaining could be given the best treatment possible. Little could be done for the Dutchbat soldiers held hostage in Bratunac.³⁸⁷

The Commander of the Medical Command of the Netherlands Armed Forces, Brigadier General W.F. Vader, subsequently informed the Dutch Defence Staff that the restrictions were not lifted until 14 July when supplies started coming through again.³⁸⁸ Minister of Defence Voorhoeve stated in a letter to the Dutch Parliament that the restrictions were lifted when it had been determined that the risk of casualties among Dutch soldiers was reduced.³⁸⁹ Voorhoeve's letter did not mention who decided precisely when the restrictions should be lifted, or when this decision was taken.

In addition, it can be concluded from the Statement of Facts (Feitenrelaas) derived from the debriefing in Assen that several members of Dutchbat personnel stated that there was no shortage of medical supplies in the Field Dressing Station. C Company in Potocari had ample supplies of medical materials over and above the minimum stock. These dressing materials and infusion supplies would have been enough to give 120 wounded persons first aid treatment. A standard package of First Aid supplies for a company consisted of 60 sets and two of these packages (comprising a total of 120 sets) were available.

There was also enough infusion fluid for the treatment of two times fifteen severely wounded patients. In brief, something could have been done for the refugees without breaking into the emergency stock. KHO-5 had used material from these standard packages, and knew how much was available. However, there are some indications that KHO-6 may not have wanted to know that the total supplies were larger than those present in the Field Dressing Station.³⁹⁰ Communication within the Field Dressing Station and between the old and new surgical teams may have been less than optimum, as a result of which KHO-6 was not fully aware which supplies were present where.³⁹¹

These communication problems and ignorance of which materials were stored where probably meant that the wounded did not always receive the medical material that was available. One example of this is that wounded patients lay for days in disposable operation clothing even though it was subsequently discovered that boxes full of military pyjamas were in stock. Another example concerned a severely wounded Muslim man who was discharged from hospital with a catheter attached to a dirty urine collection system. A new catheter had to be improvised with the aid of a length of plastic tubing and an empty bottle. When the stocks were cleared up, however, at least a hundred catheter bags were found.³⁹²

Large amounts of medical supplies were left behind on Dutchbat's departure. This was partly due to the above-mentioned fact that three tons of medical material that had been waiting in Zagreb for

When he volunteered to give evidence, one of the officers in charge of his unit told him that he would be called up to testify if this was considered necessary. Geurts himself suspected that he was intentionally kept out of the debriefing because of what he knew about the failure to treat the wounded Muslim woman on 10 July, whom he had subsequently taken to the hospital in Srebrenica. Geurts' statement about the presence of enough material to treat 120 patients is confirmed in the Statement of Facts (Feitenrelaas § 4.1.6).

³⁹¹ SMG, Debrief. Feitenrelaas, § 4.1.6.

clearance from the Bosnian Serbs did not arrive in the enclave till 14 July.³⁹³ Dutchbat took the medicines in this batch with them when they left, but some of the dressing material was left behind.³⁹⁴ Goods worth about NLG 2,000,000 (roughly □ 900,000) were left in Potocari in this way. An echoscope system worth NLG 700,000 (somewhat more than □ 300,00) was donated to the hospital in Bratunac on humanitarian grounds.³⁹⁵

MSF interpreter Emira Selimovic denied comments by witnesses on the Bosnian Muslim side that Dutchbat did not provide good medical care in the compound. Such stories might have come from people who were outside the compound. Médecins Sans Frontières did treat wounded outside the compound, but was unable to reach everyone there and offer the necessary aid.³⁹⁶ Dutchbat itself could do little, and was equally a victim of the circumstances. It may be noted, however, that Colonel Kremer said later that he was sorry that he had been able to do so little, but a ‘command decision’ in the days of the fall of Srebrenica had prevented him from doing any more.³⁹⁷

The Bosnian Serbs did not engage in any form of care for wounded refugees,³⁹⁸ though a few cases were reported in which the wounds of Muslim men held captive in Nova Kasaba were dressed.³⁹⁹

When Christina Schmitz arrived at the compound, she was still aware of the problems that had previously existed between Dutchbat and Médecins Sans Frontières, but these were a thing of the past and played no further role. She reported on 16 July that her many contacts with Dutchbat had convinced her that the battalion was well aware of its responsibilities with regard to the persons still present in the compound and their evacuation.⁴⁰⁰ As mentioned above, she had already stated on 11 July that the contacts with Major Franken were good, and that cooperation with Dutchbat was also experienced as good. Schmitz thus had no criticism of Dutchbat. MSF and all its patients could never have left the enclave safely without Dutchbat. Dutchbat had supported the organization well in the crisis following the fall of Srebrenica.⁴⁰¹ Schmitz did not change her mind on this matter, and said that on the whole she had nothing but praise for Dutchbat’s stance during the fall of the enclave: ‘The UN personnel, and in particular Major Franken, were always ready to lend a helping hand.’ The main point of which she was critical was Dutchbat’s refusal to accept any wounded on 6 and 10 July.⁴⁰²

Conversely, Christina Schmitz’ contribution met with general appreciation in Dutchbat. She had had previous experience in Chechnya, though she commented that Srebrenica was much more difficult to deal with. ‘They only way we could keep going was to work flat out and not think too much about the things we saw’.⁴⁰³ When MSF left, UNMOs also expressed their great admiration for the activities of the organization in general and of Christina Schmitz and Daniel O’Brien: they were constantly ready to serve, 24 hours a day, and had continued their work during the shelling of Srebrenica.⁴⁰⁴

Some Bosnian witnesses, on the other hand, said that Daniel O’Brien was the wrong person in that situation and that he was unable to cope: ‘Daniel was completely lost’. The interpreter Muhamed Durakovic spoke to him during a meal at Médecins Sans Frontières shortly before the VRS attack. Durakovic had the feeling that something was going to happen, and he wanted to be prepared for any eventuality. He therefore asked O’Brien for some morphine and syringes, in case he or someone else got wounded. He knew that anyone who was wounded and was unable to continue because of the pain would be finished. This request from Durakovic seemed to shock O'Brien awake: he became pale, and said that he was unable to help.⁴⁰⁵ This request seems to have touched a sensitive nerve. O'Brien had wanted to be replaced when the VRS attack began, because he was afraid the local population would be massacred. He did not want to witness this himself, and was afraid that he might share the same fate.⁴⁰⁶

Within Dutchbat, the Commander of the Medical Platoon, Captain De Bruijn, considered that his personnel had delivered 'more than 200 percent' performance under the extreme conditions of July 1995. The refugees who were hit by shell blast in the B Company compound in Srebrenica on 11 July received excellent treatment and care from the personnel there. When the big flood of refugees started moving, the Medical Platoon arranged reception centres and places where the sick and wounded could get treatment, both in the compound and at the bus station, and at a later stage they transferred the wounded to the bunker in the compound.⁴⁰⁷

Everyone in the Field Dressing Station worked well, though one Sergeant Major was not very well suited to his function. He was 'the wrong man in the wrong place'.⁴⁰⁸ According to one Bosnian patient, one Dutchbat soldier completely lost control in the period between 11 and 13 July. He ran around, shouting continually 'the UN are Mafia'.⁴⁰⁹

A member of the Field Dressing Station staff considered that the medical personnel had functioned well and had done their utmost best at all times. Their morale was good, unlike that of the Dutchbat soldiers who had landed in a situation that made it impossible for them to perform the task set them.⁴¹⁰

There was however no one in the Field Dressing Station whose performance in the reception and medical care of the refugees stuck out head and shoulders above the average. Short-term personnel and in particular ex-conscripts performed well in the reception of patients, though a few showed a drop in performance in the final days before the fall of the enclave, as a result of the intense stress and emotions they were subject to.⁴¹¹ The local UNHCR representative Almir Ramic had special praise for the efforts of Colonel Kremer and Corporal C.J.M. Govaers. The latter was a (female) member of the quartermaster's platoon.⁴¹²

Dutchbat medical personnel showed that they had been adequately trained for the tasks demanded of them, though the training might have laid greater stress on the application of dressings and on triage, to prepare them for the treatment of large groups of wounded patients.⁴¹³

The evacuation of the hospital on 11 July

Minister of Defence Voorhoeve wrote to the Dutch Parliament on 28 September 1995, ‘The humanitarian efforts on behalf of the refugees from the Srebrenica enclave continued till the last moment. This is underlined by the evacuation by the Dutch UN personnel of the hospital in Srebrenica as it lay under Bosnian Serb fire’.⁴¹⁴ Careful study of the sources shows that there is no basis for this representation of the events.

A previous statement to the Dutch Parliament, on 3 August, based on debriefing talks held with a number of members of Dutchbat’s cadre in Zagreb, said that Dutchbat had evacuated 58 wounded from the hospital in Srebrenica.⁴¹⁵ Karremans had written in a personal report intended for the eyes of the Minister that ‘the hospital is evacuated to Potocari’ with support from the battalion.⁴¹⁶ Even earlier, on 14 July, the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs had sent a memorandum to various Dutch embassies mentioning the praise of Dutch actions in Srebrenica from the international community, with special reference to the request for Close Air Support when soldiers had already been taken hostage, and to ‘the evacuation of a hospital under artillery fire’.⁴¹⁷

The debriefing report also mentions that Dutchbat managed to evacuate the hospital, and states that this called for a fair degree of improvisation because of the large numbers of refugees climbing on to the vehicles intended for the evacuation of the hospital.⁴¹⁸ When this report was presented to the Parliament it was again stated that Dutchbat had evacuated 58 wounded from the hospital in Srebrenica to Potocari.⁴¹⁹

Even before the main debriefing operation started in Assen, however, the Military History Section (SMG) of the Royal Netherlands Army Staff had pointed out during an initial briefing for the leaders of the debriefing, the Generals Van der Wind and Roos, that an attempt to evacuate the hospital had failed due to the growing chaos. This conclusion presented by the Military History Section reflected the picture built up by a number of its staff members during the short debriefing in Zagreb (see Chapter 5 of Part IV of the main report).⁴²⁰

The report of the operational debriefing in Zagreb does indeed give another picture. It is stated there that 58 patients had to be evacuated, but that this was impossible because the patients could not be loaded on to the four-ton trucks from B Company that were intended for their transport, as these trucks were stormed by the refugees.⁴²¹ This previous report seems to have been forgotten later, since the main debriefing report states further that Médecins Sans Frontières initially assisted in the evacuation ⁴¹⁷ ABZ, DAV, 999.241. Memorandum DVL/BZ, 14/07/95, No. 619/95. There were many more confusing and incorrect reports concerning the evacuation of the hospital. The Dutch newspaper De Volkskrant stated on 12/07/95 that there had been many fatalities, and that more than 70 Muslims had been wounded, during a bombardment of the hospital. Similarly, the Algemeen Dagblad reported on the same day, citing an interview with Hans van Oort, project manager of MSF in Bosnia, that two Dutch members of MSF staff had tried to guide the fleeing masses towards the North on 11 July. MSF had no Dutch staff members in the enclave, however. The broadsheet also quoted Van Oort as saying that all patients left the hospital on foot and that MSF had only managed to arranged transport to Potocari for the ten most severely wounded patients.

but that when the mass exodus of refugees started, Dutchbat largely took over. A passage from a statement made during the debriefing was intended to illustrate this: 'since MSF personnel were in the bunker at the time, it was decided that the wounded would as far as possible be carried in Dutchbat vehicles.'⁴²²

Later reports from Médecins Sans Frontières and Bosnian witnesses give yet another picture of the course of events during the evacuation of the wounded. These sources state that MSF rather than Dutchbat evacuated most of the patients from the hospital.

It may be commented that it cannot have been an easy task for the compilers of the debriefing report to reconstruct the events in question. The picture is complicated by the fact that some wounded were taken to Potocari from the B Company compound in Srebrenica, while others were transported to Potocari from the hospital, either directly or via the B Company compound. These complications may have confused the debriefers and interfered with the debriefing process. Some statements made during debriefing contradict others. In several statements, it is said that Dutchbat evacuated the hospital, while others said that local MSF staff brought the wounded to the B Company compound in Srebrenica. The available information is however insufficient to be able to state definitely that Dutchbat took charge of the evacuation of the hospital.⁴²³ Careful weighing up of the statements of persons closely involved in these events could have led to a different picture. According to such sources as Sergeant Major Koreman and Sergeant Gillessen, MSF actually rejected the assistance offered by these members of Dutchbat personnel in the evacuation of the hospital and said that the organization could handle matters on its own.⁴²⁴

The picture will now be pieced together first on the basis of Dutchbat sources, and then with reference to MSF and local sources.

The Dutchbat version of the evacuation of the hospital

According to the view of the Commander of B Company, Captain Groen, Médecins Sans Frontières did want to evacuate the hospital after it came under fire on 10 July. He therefore gave orders for four-ton trucks to be held in readiness to permit an immediate response to any request that might be made.⁴²⁵ Other sources also confirmed that the possibility of transferring the sick and wounded from the hospital to some other location had already been considered on 10 July, though the vehicles were not actually used until 11 July.⁴²⁶

Médecins Sans Frontières did make a request, via B Company, at 12.58 pm on 11 July for the wounded to be moved from Srebrenica to Potocari because of shelling in the vicinity of the hospital. MSF was afraid that the ABiH would not be able to maintain its resistance to the VRS for more than a further half-hour. There were about 50 to 60 wounded who required transport at that moment. The battalion staff then asked whether MSF had transport available to take the wounded to the compound in Potocari. MSF answered in the affirmative: the organization would arrange the move itself, and would get to Potocari making use of its own resources.⁴²⁷

The Debriefing report also mentions differences of opinion between the doctors at the compound and MSF about who was supposed to evacuate the wounded from the hospital in Srebrenica (Debriefing report, § 5.10). The precise nature of these differences of opinion remains unclear. Further investigation at the Ministry of Defence revealed no details of this issue (TK session 1995-1996, 22 181, No. 136, p. 9-10). According to the commander of the Field Dressing Station, the surgeon of KHO-6 interfered in the matter, which led to a row between him and the doctor from MSF (Confidential debriefing statement (18)). MSF does not mention this, however.

The Commander of the Field Dressing Station, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, also stated that the agreement with MSF was that that organization's own doctors would take care of their own patients and would evacuate them in their own vehicles.⁴²⁸ Shortly after this agreement had been reached, the UNMOs reported that the wounded could not be moved to Potocari because a cannon held the road under fire,⁴²⁹ despite the fact that Dutchbat had informed the VRS about the movement of the wounded and had requested them not to fire on the vehicles entering the compound because they were carrying patients from the hospital.⁴³⁰

Despite the agreements that appeared to have been made between MSF and the Field Dressing Station, the four-ton trucks from B Company were still held in readiness. They were drawn up in such a way as to allow them to drive off northwards and were intended, as mentioned above, to carry the 58 wounded who were in the hospital. However, these trucks could not be used as ordered because of the flood of refugees that had washed over the compound in Srebrenica.⁴³¹ The situation in the compound was completely chaotic at that moment: the refugees appeared to think that the trucks were intended to take them northwards, and more than a 100 frantic people climbed on to each truck and could not be persuaded to get off again.⁴³² Drivers had to pull people out of the vehicles in order to get into the cab.⁴³³ Major Franken also admitted that it had been the intention to use these four-ton trucks to evacuate the hospital, but that this was simply not possible because the mass of refugees took them over.⁴³⁴

Dutchbat did however play a role in the evacuation of the hospital in the afternoon, after the period of Close Air Support, when the blocking position APCs took up their position near B Company compound. The blocking positions commander, Captain Hageman, discussed the transport of the wounded with MSF.⁴³⁵ The latter wanted to know whether the route was safe, as they wanted to get the patients away. Lieutenant Egbers made as much room as possible for the wounded in his vehicles, and got his soldiers to get out and walk the five kilometres to Srebrenica. Egbers had been given orders to drive the APCs along with the column of refugees and set the column in motion, but he remained near the hospital while MSF brought patients out and laid them in his vehicles so that he could bring them to the Field Dressing Station:

Then you get situations like babies being handed to you. If the mother's not there, at the end of the day you're left with a baby that can't do anything. So I took the mother along too, and people from the mental home, those crazy people walking around, completely confused. We took them along too. And in that way, you collect a whole lot of people. Everyone wanted to come along.

They took about 20 wounded with them.⁴³⁶ Although others did not mention any numbers, they did confirm the picture that the Dutchbat soldiers accompanying the column of refugees helped to take wounded from the hospital to Potocari.⁴³⁷

Lieutenant Egbers continued to wait for MSF at the blocking position assigned to him, while MSF staff kept on asking him whether it was safe to return. When Médecins Sans Frontières announced that they were finished, Egbers drove off in his APC.⁴³⁸ Christina Schmitz reported to the MSF office in Belgrade that the evacuation of the hospital was completed at 3.30 pm. At that moment, the MSF team saw the VRS advancing into the town.⁴³⁹

The MSF and Bosnian Muslim version of the evacuation of the hospital

Dutchbat did not play such a big role in the version of the evacuation of the hospital derived from MSF and Bosnian Muslim sources. In the morning of 11 July, Médecins Sans Frontières and the doctors from the hospital discussed how they could adapt to the increasingly threatening situation. Various measures, such as moving the hospital's operating theatre to the shelter in the basement, were considered. The local doctors insisted, however, that the patients should be evacuated to the compound in Potocari. They were afraid of a repetition of Vukovar if the Bosnian Serbs should force their way into the hospital: there was a risk that the patients might be killed under these circumstances.

MSF, on the other hand, preferred the idea of keeping the patients in the hospital. That was neutral terrain, and Christina Schmitz did her best to keep uniformed men outside even though that seemed an impossible task. It was however difficult for her to resist the determination of the doctors. It was consequently agreed that the doctors would arrange the transport of the patients in two trucks.⁴⁴⁰

The evacuation of the hospital took place in an atmosphere of extreme panic. No one knew precisely what was going on in Srebrenica or where was the best place to go to. Meanwhile, the local medical personnel continued to do their best to help the patients. The latter were scared to death though they reacted in different ways. They asked what they should do, 'but we were scared too, and did not know what to tell them', according to the doctor Dzevad Džananović. He had no more answers to these problems than anyone else, though he did not really think that anything serious would happen because the UN would protect them; he did not believe that so many people would be handed over to the Bosnian Serbs. It was nevertheless decided that the hospital would be evacuated. Džananović suspected that Ilijaz Pilav, had been in contact with Dutchbat in connection with this issue.⁴⁴¹

ABiH Commander Ramiz Bećirović wrote in a subsequent report that the director of the hospital, Avdo Hasanović, had started to transport the wounded to Potocari on his own initiative because the VRS were already in the town.⁴⁴² MSF interpreter Emira Selimović, on the other hand, thought that Ilijaz Pilav had given the order to evacuate the patients from the hospital.⁴⁴³

According to Pilav's own account, he was in contact with B Company about the evacuation of patients. In the chaotic situation prevailing in Srebrenica at that time, Pilav saw transport of the wounded to the compound in Potocari as the only solution. The basic MSF team consisted of no more than two persons, and could not do much. There were not enough people taking care of the wounded, some of whom were in hospital while others were in private homes. Pilav therefore went to B Company compound in Srebrenica. He stood in front of the gate, which was closed off with barbed wire, and asked via the soldier at the gate to speak to the officer in charge. This request was initially refused, but when Pilav said that he knew that there was an officer there, one did finally come.

He said, however, that he could not help to transport the wounded. This made Pilav very angry, 'upset, revolted' and he told the officer that he had already loaded some of the wounded into two trucks and marked these trucks with a Red Cross emblem. These trucks would drive into B Company compound, whether the gate was open or not. In response to this threat, 'he knew I was speaking the truth', said Pilav, the officer promised that B Company trucks would help to transport the wounded to Potocari; the vehicles had been standing in readiness for this purpose since 10 July. Pilav did not want to wait for this, however; in his opinion, something had to be done in a matter of minutes. He had information that the Bosnian Serbs were already no more than 800 metres from the hospital.⁴⁴⁴

There was little fighting round the town till the early afternoon. There was some shelling of the town after that, but no one was wounded so the medical personnel of the hospital could stay in their shelter. The patients then left the hospital en route for the B Company compound (a distance of no more than 500 metres) in accordance with the plan of the Bosnian doctors. The situation changed however round about 1.30 pm when a shell landed on B Company compound. MSF staff seem to have lost track of events at this point: 'The patients return and all of a sudden are gone to Potocari', Christina Schmitz writes in her report.⁴⁴⁵

The Mayor, Fahrudin Salihovic, then informed MSF of the deterioration of the situation, though he did not know exactly where the front line was. MSF was in radio contact with the UNHCR representative, who was in the compound in Srebrenica, but there are no records of any exchange of operational information. The situation changed again when aircraft arrived over the town to provide Close Air Support. The MSF representatives hurried to the hospital to see how many patients were left there. They also observed the start of an enormous movement of refugees in the direction of Potocari.⁴⁴⁶

After all the wounded had been carried out of the hospital and laid on the platform in front of the hospital, the doctors made a final round and left the patients behind. Doctor Džananović said that he did not leave the hospital until all the wounded had been brought out. No Dutchbat personnel were in sight when he left the hospital. People were in a state of great panic and fear, and the streets were full of people milling about in various directions, without any well-defined objective.⁴⁴⁷

Schmitz consulted the MSF office in Belgrade by radio, and it was decided to follow the column of refugees. Daniel O'Brien left in one car, taking little more than the radios and computers with him, while some of the local staff went first to the compound in Srebrenica and then to Potocari. In the meantime, as many patients as possible went along in two other vehicles.⁴⁴⁸

In fact, MSF had already arranged for vehicles to be in readiness for the transport of the patients. Someone had got hold of a truck and a tractor to transport the wounded; unfortunately, however, there were no drivers. MSF driver Ibrahim had hidden himself and Abdulah Purković, the MSF cook and general factotum, had to ask a certain Hajrudin for help in getting the wounded into the vehicles. The wounded were lying on the asphalt in front of the hospital waiting for transport. According to Purković, there was no one apart from the wounded to be seen at that moment, and the Bosnian Serbs were only a short distance away. The wounded were placed in the truck, the tractor and a MSF Toyota pickup. There was so little room available that they had to be piled on top of one another in the truck.⁴⁴⁹

Envir 'Zeke' Dožić, one of the wounded who had had a hand amputated, managed to drive the truck; there was no one else available. Purković himself drove the Toyota. An unknown person drove the tractor. It had been the intention to make a couple of trips and to come back, as there was not enough room in the vehicles for the wounded. However, Christina Schmitz arranged for the remaining group of wounded to be transported in Dutchbat vehicles.⁴⁵⁰ A group of 20 patients had been left behind at the hospital.⁴⁵¹ These are the 20 that were transported by Dutchbat.

These patients, in particular those who could still walk to a certain extent, were then transferred to Potocari in Dutchbat vehicles. (A small number of old people who had been left behind were picked up in the next few days.) MSF interpreter Emira Selimovic saw the driver of one of these trucks crying at the sight of all the misery around him.⁴⁵² The wounded were among the last to leave the town.⁴⁵³

The patients seem to have expected that Dutchbat would move them. A woman who had only recently been admitted to the hospital said that she knew they would be evacuated by UNPROFOR.⁴⁵⁴ Another patient, Sadik Vilic, also said that Dutchbat had announced that they would evacuate the wounded, though in fact this did not happen. Friends of his who later went up into the mountains carried him to the truck, where the wounded lay stacked on top of one another like sandwiches.⁴⁵⁵

All the doctors and some of the nurses from the hospital, insofar as they were not MSF employees, disappeared into the woods as soon as all the patients had been taken out of the hospital. It was an emotional moment. While artillery shells burst round about, the patients begged them not to leave.⁴⁵⁶ The local doctors wanted to take the opportunity to escape from the enclave. The patients were thus left in the care of Daniel O'Brien and Christina Schmitz of MSF and a few local nurses.⁴⁵⁷ The local doctors had apparently not consulted MSF before leaving, since on the evening of 11 July Christina Schmitz expressed surprise that there were no local doctors in the compound at Potocari.⁴⁵⁸

According to Abdulah Purkovic, a conflict arose with Dutchbat Major Boering on arrival in Potocari. Purkovic knew Boering, who had often brought him good wishes and messages from old acquaintances in Bratunac, where Purkovic had worked in the Fontana Hotel and where many of his pupils lived. When Purkovic and the group of wounded from the hospital arrived at the Dutchbat compound in Potocari, Major Boering refused Purkovic admission. This elicited the comment 'Boering again!' from the Muslims. Purkovic showed his MSF pass and said in German that he wanted to get into the compound with the wounded. Major Boering replied that he might perhaps allow Purkovic in without the wounded, but the latter insisted that he wanted to stay with the wounded. In the end, Purkovic was admitted to the compound after Dutchbat had discussed the matter internally. Once he was inside, Purkovic saw that a lot of old people, sick people and children were already there.

Christina Schmitz did not mention any problems about gaining access to the compound. According to Purkovic, Dutchbat had taken the wrong decision of putting the wounded in a corner and a corridor of a windy factory hall where there was mud and water on the ground.⁴⁵⁹

It may be noted that Dutchbat soldiers from the B Company compound in Srebrenica were initially allotted space in the factory hall under the same conditions. They slept there for one or two nights, with the wounded on one side of the factory hall and the Dutch soldiers next to them. It is true that it was draughty, unhygienic and dirty, but the wounded were put there because it was considered that this would provide them with some shelter from the firing that was still going on outside. Besides, Dutchbat wanted to keep the wounded out of sight, under the motto 'out of sight is out of mind'.

Comments had been heard on the Bosnian Serb radio that the VRS did not want to refugees to be admitted to the compound.⁴⁶⁰

The wounded in the hall were laid on stretchers and given blankets. More and more wounded were brought in. Some members of MSF medical staff stayed with the wounded and did what they could, according to Purkovic. One Dutchbat soldier burst into tears as he was following the first group of wounded.⁴⁶¹

After the patients had been unloaded in Potocari, Christina Schmitz turned back towards Srebrenica. She noted that some patients reached the compound by other routes than that followed by MSF. She was unable to get back to the hospital, however, as the last APCs that had previously formed the blocking positions had already withdrawn past the hospital. Schmitz therefore returned to the compound, leaving a few old people behind in the hospital.

She described the situation she saw on the way back to Potocari as follows:

What a mess and chaos! People run in panic, carrying screaming children and their small bags, UN personnel walking with the fleeing population, shelling continues from the mountains, it is very hot, the road very overcrowded and dusty. A truck in front us is stuck in the mud; UN troops move it manually. Then this truck stops and people are allowed to climb on it. We are just behind the truck and have to witness, how people almost kill each other in order to get a lift for the 4 km ahead. Finally we arrive in the compound of UNPROFOR. The UN soldiers have already set up a makeshift hospital in a dark corridor. 55 patients have arrived here, mostly war wounded. We have no medical supplies with us.⁴⁶²

As described in Section 7 above, Major Franken made arrangements on 11 July for Dutchbat soldiers and MSF staff to return to Srebrenica to pick up patients who had been left behind, while Christina Schmitz made similar arrangements on 12 July. Dutchbat picked up nine refugees on 12 July – mainly old people who had been too exhausted to get any further.⁴⁶³ Christina Schmitz went back to Srebrenica on 13 July, and found three old people in the hospital and four persons by the Social Centre.⁴⁶⁴ Three other patients who had been left behind in the hospital could no longer be found.⁴⁶⁵

For Christina Schmitz, the fall of the enclave and the move of the refugees to Potocari had been ‘the most terrible week in my life’. It may be concluded from her remark that she saw many big soldiers crying that a considerable number of Dutchbat personnel had likewise not been left unmoved by these events.⁴⁶⁶

There was initially some confusion about the precise number of wounded in the compound on 11 July. Different reports within less than an hour mentioned first 25, then 80 and then 70. UNMOs reported early in the evening that there were 50 patients with severe wounds,⁴⁶⁷ while later the same evening the Commander of the Field Dressing Station reported the presence of 88 wounded, including

Convoy of wounded destined for Kladanj fails to make it (12–13 July)

Following the commencement of the deportation of the populace on 12 July, a solution also had to be found for the relatively large number of patients present in the compound in Potocari. On 12 July it appeared possible to transfer a number of the less seriously wounded to Tuzla. It was said that better facilities were available in Tuzla to take care of the wounded than in the overcrowded compound.

However, the arrangements made with the Bosnian Serbs did not appear to be foolproof. Close to the front line, the convoy was unable to transfer the wounded to the Muslim area or to arrange further transport for them to Tuzla in an orderly fashion. In the dark of night the convoy became a plaything of the Bosnian Serbs, who selected patients at will, allowing them through or sending them back, and who molested the accompanying nurses. The Bosnian Serbs sent the more seriously wounded back with the Dutchbat convoy of wounded. They themselves returned a number of the wounded to the hospital in Bratunac. Some of the wounded were able to cross the front line on their own steam. To make matters worse, the Dutchbat convoy of wounded was not allowed to return to the compound in Potocari and patients had to be dropped off at the hospital in Bratunac. All of this occurred against the backdrop of highly confusing and chaotic circumstances, in respect of which documentation is scarce and later statements do not accord with each other in all respects. This section provides as accurate a description as possible of the fate of this convoy and the patients.

Once Mladic and Karremans had agreed on the departure of the population of Potocari, General Nicolai contacted General Gvero of the VRS. Nicolai informed Gvero that UNPROFOR was busy arranging helicopters to transfer the wounded for treatment elsewhere as soon as possible. The helicopters could also be used to bring in medical supplies. Details were worked out at that point in time and a formal request was soon to reach VRS headquarters. However, in anticipation of this, Nicolai asked Gvero to order his troops to cooperate in the meantime.

After venting his anger about the deployment of airpower the day before, Gvero stated that it was not possible to use helicopters in a war zone. Moreover, the VRS had offered to open its hospitals for the treatment of the wounded and they could be taken there by road. Further insistence on the part of Nicolai and a proposal to arrange a meeting came to naught. Gvero was only willing to consider the arrival of a convoy carrying fuel and food to Potocari.⁴⁶⁹

Following a previous offer made by the VRS to treat the wounded in Zvornik under UN supervision and a possible evacuation of the wounded through the town,⁴⁷⁰ at about midday on 12 July⁴⁷¹ Dutchbat made arrangements with the VRS for the evacuation of the sick and wounded. The idea was that vehicles would transport the wounded close to the front line and that further transport to Tuzla would be arranged by the Sector North East on the Bosnian side of the line.⁴⁷² The Norwegian medical company would be able to assume responsibility for the wounded at Kladanj and to drive them to Tuzla.⁴⁷³

Transporting the wounded separately appeared to be a good idea. It fitted in with the departure of the populace, a process that had already commenced, and sending the wounded in the bustle of the refugee convoys seemed to be less desirable. Tuzla was a better place for further treatment and it was difficult for Médecins Sans Frontières and Dutchbat to continue caring for them in the compound.⁴⁷⁴

Following consultations with the VRS, it was decided to depart despite the fact that it was evening.⁴⁷⁵ The order to ready the convoy for departure was given by Major Franken.⁴⁷⁶ The latter wished to make use of the opportunity provided, as soon as possible and sent notice to Colonel Lazar Acamovic of the VRS, who was responsible for the rear in the Drina Corps.⁴⁷⁷

In Sarajevo UNPROFOR was not aware of these developments.⁴⁷⁸ This also applied to a certain extent in the case of the Sector North East in Tuzla. Karremans only gave notice of this command relating to the composition of the convoy at 6 pm, and asked that it be met on the other side of the front line.⁴⁷⁹

The convoy's departure

The wounded began to be loaded at about 6.30 pm but the convoy was only able to leave at 8.30 pm. It was not an easy matter to load the wounded. The four-tonne vehicles first had to be positioned. Many Muslims stood around them and a lot of people crawled into the body of the trucks when they were opened. Except in the case of the first vehicle, which was intended to be used for seating wounded people, the tarpaulins around the body of the truck were rolled up to provide ventilation and views. There was water and some food on each vehicle. The drivers parked the vehicles one by one at the entrance to the plant where the team of nurses brought the wounded outside.⁴⁸⁰

The Médecins Sans Frontières doctor, Daniel O'Brien, selected the wounded in the plant. It was not clear to the members of Dutchbat what criteria he used for the purposes of his selection.⁴⁸¹ The selection process deteriorated into chaos and the young Australian had no control over the situation. When he pointed to one patient, dozens of people began to run and shove in order to get away.⁴⁸² Dutchbat left this job to O'Brien but he felt most unhappy about this. Everyone wanted to leave.⁴⁸³ One man threw away his prosthesis in order to have a better chance of being evacuated.⁴⁸⁴ A man sat in one of the trucks with a bloodied bandage, as though he had just had an amputation. However, the rest of his healthy appearance did not match the image of someone who had just undergone an amputation. For this reason he was removed from the convoy while it was still in the compound.⁴⁸⁵

Many other people emerged from the plant, who believed that they were eligible for evacuation: 'Many families had made their own selection and felt that their grandfather, grandmother, father or sick brother should be eligible'. Young boys suddenly started walking with crutches in order to have a chance. There was a suspicion that men in particular had put on bandages in order to be taken away as wounded individuals. After they were refused, some of them therefore became furious and had to be calmed down. Muslim onlookers showed that they understood that they were being turned down.

One woman wanted her baby of a few months given to its father in the plant. Intervention on the part of Dutchbat ensured that this did not happen, because the father was incapable of looking after the baby. The desperate mother then tried to hand her child to another woman on a truck. Finally, the baby was properly wrapped and assigned a place on a mattress next to the mother and one of the Médecins Sans Frontières nurses took care of both mother and child.

The sick and the wounded were loaded into the bodies of the four-tonne vehicles on the stretchers or mattresses on which they lay. Weeping and hysterical family members took their leave of each other and sometimes had to be forcibly removed from the vehicles. 'It was a hectic and heartrending event with many people crying and begging, thinking that this was their best chance of leaving this place', said one of the Dutchbat members involved. Only the number of people in the convoy was recorded. Registering names was an impossible task due to the language barrier and the fact that several of the wounded could not speak.⁴⁸⁶

A Bosnian witness said that those wounded people who could not move, were allowed to go and that a Dutchbat doctor also took part in the selection process. A man without an arm who had previously evacuated wounded individuals from Srebrenica thereby putting his own life in danger, begged to be allowed to leave otherwise he would not survive. The Dutchbat doctor is reported to have said that it was an old wound and he could therefore not be allowed to go.⁴⁸⁷ It was possible to identify the Dutchbat doctor as Naval Captain Schouten but the latter denied involvement in a statement to the NIOD.

When another Dutchbat doctor (it was not possible to identify this one) ordered a man who could not move, to accompany the convoy, and another patient, Sadik Vilic, made it clear that he disagreed with this, he was led to understand that he should also leave. This was not possible and the doctor finally gave Vilic permission to stay. The man who could not move, did go. This was because an interpreter with Médecins Sans Frontières, Emira Selimovic, who knew that Vilic was an officer in the ABiH, had told him that it would be better for him to stay in Potocari, as she expected the situation to improve there over time.⁴⁸⁸

The Commander of the Medical Platoon, Captain M.J.L. de Bruijn, commanded the convoy and manned the first vehicle. The convoy consisted of seven vehicles and 64 wounded people (the debriefing report referred to 54). The wounded were distributed across five four-tonne vehicles and the compound ambulance. All but one vehicle bore the Red Cross logo.⁴⁸⁹

Dutchbat had expected the VRS to provide an escort but this did not occur. The VRS had only stipulated the route. Following the customary control at Yellow Bridge, a number of wildly gesticulating and screaming Bosnian Serb troops stopped the convoy at Kravica. They revealed that fighting was ensuing between the Muslims breaking out en route to Tuzla and the VRS, and that they were not happy to be exposed in the glare of the convoy's headlights. The convoy was held stationary and, after Captain Schouten, the driver of one of the vehicles, had opened his window, he had a firearm pressed against his nose. Only after the man called out, 'Pantsir, Pantsir', did it become clear that he was interested in the bullet-proof vests worn by Dutchbat personnel. Schouten felt compelled to surrender his vest: 'In view of the shooting going on around me, I began to feel somewhat unprotected'.⁴⁹⁰

Arkan fighters seemed to be involved here. One could conclude this from their long hair, headbands and black clothing. Once the bullet-proof vests had been taken, the convoy was allowed to drive on with its lights off. Thanks to the moon's rays it was not entirely dark. Along a section of the road extending for about two kilometres Bosnian Serbs lay on the shoulder positioned in ones or twos at 25-metre intervals, waiting for any ABiH soldiers who wished to flee the enclave.⁴⁹¹ After buses with their lights on approached from the opposite direction, the vehicles turned on their own lights again.⁴⁹²

Arrival at the front line

The convoy's destination was a place close to Tisca seven kilometres east of Kladanj, where the refugees had to cross the front line on foot. There the convoy came across Lieutenant Caris of the 108th Commando Company. Caris acted as a liaison officer on the ground. Sergeant E. Klinck was also present at some distance from the place where the buses had stopped. Klinck had notified the Operations Room (the Dutchbat command post) whenever a convoy arrived. Following consultation with the commandos, he had decided to wait until the last convoy of the day arrived. This was the convoy of wounded, which arrived at about 11 pm.⁴⁹³

Caris was there because that morning he had escorted the second convoy of buses to Tisca. Colonel Radoslav Jankovic, the Intelligence Officer for the VRS General Staff, and an interpreter had accompanied him. Jankovic had been making a brief stopover in Tisca and left after this. Caris remained behind and kept an eye out for the arrival of the buses. No one from Dutchbat was in command at that time. The place where the refugees were required to leave the buses was critical. Major Boering and Captain Voerman, who had accompanied the first convoy of wounded, had already left Tisca at the time and were heading towards the front line. It seemed strange to Caris that both of them had gone and that neither had thought it important to remain at the destination. Both had been ordered by the battalion command staff to accompany the refugees from the place where they had alighted. However, neither Boering nor Voerman were equipped with a radio in order to consult others, nor did they have any contact with the ABiH on the other side of the front line. Boering and Voerman did not return to the destination venue.⁴⁹⁴

Lieutenant Caris had notified the Dutchbat Operations Room that he was remaining at this venue, because the Bosnian Serbs behaved reasonably well as long as there was a blue beret in the vicinity. With the exception of an isolated incident and verbal abuse, they conducted themselves properly. When a young VRS soldier felt that an elderly woman carrying a large number of bags was not walking fast enough and loaded his weapon, a VRS company commander took action to rectify this.

When the convoys arrived, VRS soldiers entered the buses to send the people out. The Dutch did not understand what was said in the process. Later the Bosnian Serbs checked the buses to see if nothing had been left behind. In one incident a young man had remained lying in a bus. The VRS also ran alongside the column en route to Kladanj to remove several men. Sometimes elderly people were left lying. Caris was not clear as to who was actually in charge of the VRS in Tisca. There was a major, perhaps Major Sarkic, the chief of staff of the 1st Milici Brigade, and a major who was the local area commander. The latter commanded his area as he saw fit and was not interested in what his headquarters wanted. This commander was present throughout the period in question.

When the convoy of wounded arrived, the Bosnian Serbs did not want it to drive through to the front in the dark. Sarkic informed Caris that he feared the Muslims would fire on the convoy and the VRS would be given the blame. However, Caris noticed that the two majors discussed the issue. Caris was under the impression that Sarkic was interested in making some arrangement but that the area commander was not.⁴⁹⁵

Caris had contact with the battalion's Operations Room via OP-C. Because Tisca was situated in a valley, it was not possible to have direct radio contact with Potocari. Shortly before the convoy departed, Caris was notified of its impending arrival. The VRS was also aware that a convoy of wounded would be arriving.⁴⁹⁶

Before the convoy left, its commander, Captain De Bruijn, was aware that it would not be able to cross the front line.⁴⁹⁷ Even while en route the convoy received a radio message that problems could arise at its destination in relation to those of the wounded who were unable to walk.⁴⁹⁸ In his contact with the Operations Room it was suggested to Caris that he do all in his power to secure transit. In response, Caris revealed that he was mainly sending people along to help the wounded in the event that they had to continue on foot but a great many hands would have been required to carry the 60 wounded individuals whose presence had been announced.⁴⁹⁹

Some 20 VRS soldiers greeted the convoy in Tisca. A number of them loaded their weapons. At the end of the road the vehicles were required to turn around one by one and drive back several 100 metres.⁵⁰⁰ 'A gang of sinister looking VRS guys reeking of alcohol have decided that were not allowed to continue,' was how Schouten, one of the escorts, summarized the situation.⁵⁰¹ The VRS had apparently stopped the convoy because the local commander had not been notified of its passage, according to a report by the UNMOs.⁵⁰² However, the VRS was certainly aware of their arrival and Caris had not noticed that alcohol played any role.

The presence of men of fighting age in the convoy caused those VRS soldiers who were present, to see red. When they noticed this and knew that they would be crossing the front line, nothing further could be arranged. The VRS soldiers who were present, fell on the four-tonne vehicles and the men were dragged out accompanied by loud screaming. It had to happen that the first vehicle which arrived, contained the seated group of wounded. Although the wounds of many of them were readily apparent, this had little impact. There was a man with an amputated foot, one with an amputated leg, one with an amputated arm and another with a leg in plaster. These amputations gave the VRS personnel the impression that they were ABiH troops who had been involved in battle. The VRS soldiers wished to settle a few scores. At that point Dutchbat had no further role to play and the convoy escorts were forced to retreat.⁵⁰³

Threatened with weapons, the Dutchbat troops were forced to stand behind the last vehicle.⁵⁰⁴ All the vehicles had to be opened, again under threat. The wounded were forced to stand, to state their names and to describe their wounds.⁵⁰⁵ The Bosnian Serbs checked these details against a list.⁵⁰⁶ The people in the first four-tonne vehicle, the one containing the seated group of wounded, were required to exit it, even those who were virtually unable to walk. They were ridiculed and several had to remove their bandages to allow their wounds to be examined.⁵⁰⁷ At least one of the wounded men was severely beaten.⁵⁰⁸ An elderly man with a broken leg and one wounded by shrapnel were required to walk a long distance. De Bruijn and Caris tried to halt this misconduct but with a weapon trained on them they were forced to watch the men being made to sit separately.⁵⁰⁹

The Bosnian Serbs said that they wanted to separate the lightly from the seriously wounded. The VRS personnel pulled the lightly wounded people (all were men between 20 and 40 years of age) from the convoy. In fact, they separated wounded men between the ages of 20 and 40 years from the others, paying hardly any attention to their wounds. There were about 30 men.⁵¹⁰

The Dutch, positioned together at the side of the road, were forced to look on in the light of the headlights as the VRS soldiers dragged the wounded from the vehicles, especially those they felt were capable of walking.⁵¹¹ Pushing and prodding the wounded with their rifle butts, five VRS troops violently drove them out of the vehicles and kicked them in the direction of Kladanj. They also kicked their legs. From a medical point of view, this was irresponsible and it was feared that many would not reach Kladanj. Some of the wounded involved in this, went crawling on their way. The VRS personnel rejected attempts to accompany the wounded or carry them on their backs. Those of the wounded whom the VRS felt were able to move in some way or another (about 16), they sent into the valley.⁵¹²

Amongst those of the wounded who were required to walk further, there were several on crutches and a woman who had given birth shortly beforehand.⁵¹³ The staff escorting them were not given a chance to supervise the selection and remained together behind the vehicles acting on the advice of Naval Captain Schouten. In the meantime, Lieutenant Caris and Corporal Smit kept an eye on the vehicles.⁵¹⁴

It was disgraceful that the wounded were required to walk another seven kilometres to the front line. If this had been known beforehand, the number of wounded to be evacuated would certainly have been smaller.⁵¹⁵ Only those seriously wounded individuals who were unable to move, remained behind in the vehicles.⁵¹⁶

Negotiations conducted with the Bosnian Serbs about the supervision and treatment of the wounded were thus in vain. They wanted everything to be done on their terms and they made the demands. De Bruijn was ordered to turn his convoy around. When he refused, he was threatened. Caris too was given to understand that he should leave. He was not allowed to take one of his vehicles with him.⁵¹⁷ When Sergeant Klinck wanted to drive his vehicle off, the VRS commander told him to leave it behind for Major Boering and Captain Voerman. This seemed to be an easy excuse to appropriate a vehicle. The latter was indeed left behind, under duress. Klinck was also required to leave behind his bulletproof vest and FAL rifle.

The VRS had now appropriated two Mercedes vehicles: that of Klinck and Verhaegh, and that of Captain Buijs, the B Company doctor. All Dutchbat personnel who were still in Kladanj, returned with the convoy of wounded.⁵¹⁸ The more seriously wounded had to return, because intensive care was only available in the compound in Potocari.⁵¹⁹ After one o'clock in the night of 12 to 13 July the convoy turned in the direction of Bratunac.⁵²⁰

After spending an hour or two in Tisca, the convoy returned via Vlasenica, Milici and Konjevici. The VRS stopped the convoy in Konjevici. This was not accompanied by violence. The VRS merely asked Caris what he was going to do and where he wished to go, after which the convoy was allowed to continue on its way. During the trip the Dutchbat troops saw many armed VRS soldiers and heard a great deal of firing, including that of mortar shells.⁵²¹ The only delay occurred while evading VRS troops sleeping on the road.⁵²²

Those who stayed behind in Tisca

After the Dutch vehicles returned to Bratunac with the more seriously wounded, no Dutchbat personnel witnessed what happened to the people who had been forced to remain behind in Tisca. Wounded in the war in 1993, Sabit Ahmetovic was in the front truck with his wife and son. He was required to remain in Tisca, while his wife and child were taken to the hospital in Bratunac. When a Bosnian Serb doctor noticed that they were not injured, in the morning he stopped a bus in one of the refugee convoys that had left from Potocari to allow this woman and her child to leave. In this way they still managed to reach Kladanj.

A total of about 15 VRS troops were in Tisca, under command of someone nicknamed Voljvoda. Those who remained behind in Tisca, had to hand over their money and valuables, placing them on a rug in the middle of the group. The group was then searched. While doing this, the VRS soldiers repeatedly inquired after Naser Oric and the group was told that they had allowed themselves to be misused by Oric, because he had enriched himself at their expense. In addition, the VRS soldiers asked who was wounded where and when, and if any of them were former JNA officers or residents of towns such as Potocari and Osmace, where Oric had built up his power base. At around three in the morning a friendly VRS soldier came to hand out blankets and bread. He remained with the group for the night. That night six VRS soldiers managed to rape one of the nurses who were accompanying the group.⁵²³

At the beginning of 1996 Médecins Sans Frontières also tried to reconstruct events in Tisca by interviewing its former personnel and hospital staff.

After the convoy reached Tisca an unidentified VRS soldier asked why it had not gone to Bratunac. He was unable to do anything for these people in Tisca, even though he did not care. A VRS soldier threatened people with a hand grenade in order to get them out of the trucks. Another climbed into a truck and shone his torch in their faces. The woman who had just given birth, was ordered to get out. He frightened her and insulted the others.

Other VRS troops also threatened and insulted the patients, hitting some on their legs and asking them where they came from and what they knew about the ABiH. Valuables such as gold, money, papers, and handbags were confiscated. One of the nurses recognized several VRS soldiers as her former neighbours. One of the VRS majors recognized her, asked her a large number of questions, and wanted to send her back to Srebrenica. She asked if she could continue on her way and that they should definitely not send her back. In response, the major became angry and ordered a soldier to guard her. However, one of her former neighbours gave her moral support by talking to her for two hours. The group remained in Tisca throughout the night.

The following morning at about 10 am two red Volkswagens containing three Bosnian Serbs arrived, two men in a black uniform and one in an army uniform. They ordered everyone to stand up. They were looking for Naser Oric's sister and had a woman from Srebrenica with them who was supposed to be able to recognize Oric's sister.⁵²⁴

A wounded man could no longer stand and was beaten until he stood up again. The soldiers issued threats. A major then began to divide the patients into two groups. The medical staff had to stand between them. Women and men with old wounds, mainly amputees (about ten) stood on one side. Men with fresh wounds who could recover so as to be able to fight again (approximately 30) stood on the other side. The Médecins Sans Frontières technician, Abdulkadir Velic, and a woman from Potocari were also put into this group.

Throughout the selection process the major and other Bosnian Serbs instilled fear in them by making comments such as 'What shall we do with you? Shall we murder you or rape you?' The first group consisting of nurses and people with old wounds was sent to Kladanj. They were also threatened that they would be killed if they reported what had happened to them, on television. In Kladanj Pakistani UN troops then took them to the Tuzla airfield.⁵²⁵

The fate of the assistants

When the convoy left in the direction of Kladanj, nine Médecins Sans Frontières nurses were present. Médecins Sans Frontières employed 13 local people in Srebrenica, while the hospital had 128. All the Médecins Sans Frontières nurses wanted to go with the convoy of wounded to Kladanj. This tallied with the overall view that the residents who had fled to Potocari, wished to leave the enclave as soon as possible.

Sergeant Geurts assigned two nurses to each vehicle. When the VRS stopped the convoy for the first time at Kravica, nothing happened to the Médecins Sans Frontières assistants. Upon their arrival in the valley near the front line, the Bosnian Serbs also removed all the assistants from the trucks.

Dutchbat personnel only partially witnessed how the VRS dealt with these assistants. Two of them were taken into the bushes and what happened to them remains unclear. This was also true for the other female Médecins Sans Frontières staff from the time they disappeared from sight.⁵²⁶ Another Dutchbat observer confirmed that, when the VRS isolated the men, VRS soldiers took two female members of staff with them to their barracks. They could be recognized by their Médecins Sans Frontières shirts. They were not seen again.⁵²⁷

Someone else saw an armed man walk 50 to 60 metres into the forest with a female Médecins Sans Frontières assistant. However, he did not hear anything further out of the ordinary.⁵²⁸

Bosnian witnesses declared that a car with more Bosnian Serbs arrived between 1 am and 2 am. One of them took a nurse from the group and left with her. She returned within 15 minutes, apparently without having experienced any difficulties. After this, these Bosnian Serbs took another woman, a cleaner from the hospital, with them and held her for about two hours. The woman returned in tears and was incapable of speaking. Various people have confirmed that she was raped by several VRS soldiers. The following morning she tried to commit suicide.⁵²⁹

According to Sergeant Klinck, three female members of Médecins Sans Frontières staff were permitted to cross the front line but they did not dare to do so, because it was dark. When the men had to seat themselves on a small grass field, these women went to sit with them.⁵³⁰ So that night eight nurses remained with the wounded. Without blankets in the open air, they were very cold. At about four o'clock in the morning a UN vehicle appeared, driven by two Bosnian Serbs. They selected one of the nurses and took her to VRS quarters located close by. The two alleged that one of the other nurses was a sister of Naser Oric and wished to confirm this. The nurse who was taken, said that she did not know. She was returned to the group without being harmed. Nevertheless, the two men took the alleged sister of Oric with them. After two hours she was returned in tears and said that she had been beaten and raped.⁵³¹

After the two Volkswagens carrying the three Bosnian Serbs arrived at about ten o'clock, a man in a black uniform inspected those that had remained behind, and took several of them aside, including the male Médecins Sans Frontières technician. Other vehicles then took the rest to Bratunac. The people concerned were 12 seriously wounded individuals, including some who were missing limbs, two elderly men, seven nurses and the woman who had been raped.⁵³²

A UN report from Tuzla also revealed that one of the female assistants who had been violently removed from the group, returned utterly beside herself after several hours and said that she had been raped. This report confirmed that a new group of Bosnian Serb soldiers had arrived early in the morning on 13 July. This group selected 13 patients and seven medical staff, and let them go to Kladanj. Those who remained behind, including two nurses and the medical technician, were sent back to Bratunac.⁵³³

The numbers referred to in this Civil Affairs report differ from those mentioned in a previous UNPROFOR human rights report. At any rate, the statement concerning the medical technician was incorrect. He did not survive the trip to Tisca. The person concerned was Abdulkadir Velic, a 20-year-old student of medicine who was helping out in the Srebrenica hospital. He was also in the convoy of wounded. A VRS major took him aside, refusing to believe that he was a Médecins Sans Frontières technician. He said that Velic was either an ABiH soldier or could become one: 'It is best that I kill you. Whatever way you look at it, you are a Muslim'.

A witness stated that Velic had again been sighted near Tisca, where he was tortured and then killed. However, one of the nurses who later arrived in Tisca again as part of a refugee convoy, saw him standing there amongst several wounded people and surrounded by VRS personnel.⁵³⁴

None of the Médecins Sans Frontières nurses returned with the Dutchbat convoy. However, seven nurses returned with the wounded whom the VRS had dropped off at the hospital in Bratunac.⁵³⁵ One of these nurses was in a truck with two women who had just given birth. She took one of these babies to give the VRS soldiers the impression that she was a civilian. According to her, the VRS placed nurses in the same category as soldiers. After the wounded were dropped off at the Bratunac hospital, these nurses returned to Srebrenica, where they joined the refugees who were being evacuated to Kladanj, without being noticed.⁵³⁶ Later Dutchbat learned from Médecins Sans Frontières that all the nurses had arrived safely in Tuzla.⁵³⁷

The VRS refuses to permit the return of wounded individuals to Potocari

Back at Yellow Bridge, at about 2.30 am on 13 July the local commander, Jovan Ivic (nicknamed Jovo) refused to grant the convoy of wounded access to the enclave. According to him, no permission had been given for their return. Captain De Bruijn tried to persuade Ivic but to no avail. The convoy returned with 34 wounded people but no Médecins Sans Frontières personnel.⁵³⁸ The wounded were counted twice. Sergeant Major Ritsema counted the wounded and arrived at 34.⁵³⁹

There were individuals present who urgently required additional medical care. People were dying in the trucks. However, Ivic refused to budge, denied them access to Potocari and ordered the convoy to wait. According to the convoy commander, De Bruijn, no Dutchbat delegation arrived to help with negotiations, even though the staff were aware that the convoy also contained seriously wounded individuals.⁵⁴⁰ Although there was radio contact between the convoy and the Operations Room, the escort, Lieutenant Caris, did not consider using the radio to call the battalion for assistance.⁵⁴¹ As it happened, Dutchbat woke Christina Schmitz during the night after receiving news that the patients who had been sent back, needed to be taken care of. At that point in time no one knew why they had been sent back.⁵⁴²

Through the UN interpreter, Petar Usumlic, Dutchbat sought contact with the VRS in order to break the impasse in respect of the transit of convoys but the Bosnian Serbs remained intractable.⁵⁴³ Jovo had telephone contact with the barracks in Bratunac but he was informed that no permission had been given to allow the convoy through. In response to this, Captain De Bruijn asked whether Jovo was prepared to accept responsibility if the wounded Muslims did not survive the wait. However, Jovo refused to budge and merely stated that he had his orders.⁵⁴⁴

Lieutenant Caris denied that Dutchbat personnel were required to remain in their cabs and they were not allowed to tend the wounded, only to be allowed out of their cabs at 9 am when they discovered that one of the wounded (an old man) lay dead in one of the vehicles.⁵⁴⁵ Caris maintains that he said that the wounded should be checked regularly and that he had also spoken to Naval Captain Schouten about this. For the rest, Caris was preoccupied with security and posted a sentry.⁵⁴⁶

In the morning the convoy saw various empty buses again going in the direction of the enclave to collect refugees.⁵⁴⁷ That morning General Mladic came to the enclave again. Caris walked towards Mladic, shook his hand and explained the situation. In response, Mladic decided that the wounded were allowed to go to Bratunac. However, several lightly wounded individuals were permitted to go to Potocari to travel on the buses to Kladanj if possible. The convoy then turned in the direction of Bratunac and Colonel Jankovic of the VRS accompanied the convoy. Jankovic was a man of authority and managed to keep the populace at bay.⁵⁴⁸

When the convoy arrived in Bratunac, the people reacted quite aggressively.⁵⁴⁹ The press were present but again Jankovic revealed that he had considerable standing and that he could persuade people to step back with just a few words.⁵⁵⁰ According to Franken, Jankovic did everything in the interests of Dutchbat's return. In his view, this was also the reason why Jankovic involved himself in the speedy removal of the wounded.⁵⁵¹

At the hospital the wounded had to be dropped off at a side building. A VRS soldier approached Caris and, pressing a machine gun against the latter's bullet-proof vest, ordered him to remove it. Jankovic intervened and the VRS soldier left Caris alone. The man who had not survived the trip, was not taken to the mortuary, because Bosnian Serbs were being held there. The dead Muslim was taken to a building next to the hospital and placed on the ground in the shade at the back of the building.⁵⁵²

Those Dutchbat personnel who had escorted the convoy of wounded were rather shaken by their night-time adventure. According to Caris, they stood there like whipped hounds and had to be urged into action.⁵⁵³ After this the Dutchbat troops placed most of the wounded on beds in the side building. Ten people had to wait outside on a stretcher, because there was no more room at that point in time.⁵⁵⁴

Once they were in Bratunac, the sick and the wounded were treated well in the circumstances. After lengthy negotiations one of the Dutchbat troops was allowed to remain behind with the wounded.⁵⁵⁵ According to Caris, General Mladic had ordered that someone from Dutchbat should remain behind as some type of guarantee for safe passage. Caris was surprised that the medical staff wanted a corporal to remain behind. He intervened and assigned Naval Captain Schouten.⁵⁵⁶ The latter accepted this duty. In his book, Karremans writes that Major Nikolic heard that Schouten had remained in the Bratunac hospital to keep an eye on the situation.⁵⁵⁷ Apparently, Karremans was not aware that this had happened at Mladic's instigation.

After the convoy's return, Major Franken informed Christina Schmitz that the VRS had checked the bandages of the men in the convoy. It appeared that some were not wounded. That had made the VRS personnel angry, after which they had removed 30 men from the convoy. Some of the patients had been beaten. Two or three people were reportedly injured in the process. Franken said that he had notified senior UNPROFOR commanders and the International Red Cross about the VRS's actions. After this, Franken and Christina Schmitz agreed that in the case of the next convoy, as it happens, there was none, all the male patients should be checked by the VRS to prevent a repetition of what had happened in Tisca. When Schmitz made inquiries of O'Brien, it appeared that he had been unable to control who boarded the trucks.⁵⁵⁸

The wounded and Médecins Sans Frontières: who was where?

Early in the afternoon of 13 July it was clear that some of the patients and the medical staff of Médecins Sans Frontières were in the vicinity of Tuzla, while others were in Bratunac. The reports paint a somewhat remarkable picture of events. UNMOs reported that the convoy which had been stopped near Kladanj and which had returned to Yellow Bridge, was now en route to Bratunac with a special VRS escort acting according to instructions personally given by Mladic, and that the latter had given his assurance that the convoy would not encounter any problems. At the same time the UNMOs reported that the wounded at Yellow Bridge were still awaiting evacuation. Negotiations on the matter proceeded with difficulty, although the UNMOs hoped that they might be able to make their way directly to Tuzla by road.⁵⁵⁹

Médecins Sans Frontières itself reported that the medical convoy was en route to Tuzla with a VRS escort and that General Mladic had personally issued instructions for its safety.⁵⁶⁰ There was more to report later on about undertakings given in respect of the safety of the wounded. Helsinki Citizens' Assembly governor, Mient-Jan Faber, stated in October 1995 that several of the wounded had shown him documents and that Dutch officers had signed statements, which were said to reveal that on account of their injuries they were to be transferred to the Tuzla hospital with a Dutchbat escort and would not be handed over to the Bosnian Serbs. However, no evidence has been found to support the existence of such documents and statements.⁵⁶¹

By this stage Dutchbat had absolutely no idea of the location of the wounded or the numbers involved. There was still a group of patients in the compound who had undergone surgery during the preceding days, 14 of them men, six women and five children younger than five years of age. In addition, there were 18 other patients, 14 of them who had been admitted to the compound on 13 July. Most were old, exhausted or worn out. A five-year-old girl with a lung infection had also been admitted on the same day. In the preceding 24 hours seven children had also been born, one of them stillborn. In addition, 33 people had come back with the convoy of wounded on its return. Dutchbat had counted 34 but one had died on the way.⁵⁶² It was expected that of those patients who had since been admitted to the Bratunac hospital, another four or five would die within 48 hours if they did not undergo surgery.⁵⁶³

In the afternoon of 13 July O'Brien received confirmation from UNPROFOR that all the nurses and the wounded men who had been removed from the convoy in Tisca, had crossed the front line.⁵⁶⁴ The UNMOs added that of this group 15 wounded individuals were being treated in the hospital in Kladanj.⁵⁶⁵ Only the next day it was reported that the VRS had taken 16 patients from Tisca to the Bratunac hospital but Captain Schouten, who had remained behind in Bratunac, was not permitted to visit this group.⁵⁶⁶

Other reports paint a confusing picture. There are major discrepancies in respect of the number of patients involved. Sector North East reported to Zagreb that 88 wounded people had been transported to Kladanj and that 35 had returned to Bratunac. On 13 July Sector North East again addressed an urgent appeal directly to the UNPF headquarters in Zagreb to proceed with evacuation as soon as possible in order to save lives.⁵⁶⁷ A UNHCR report on the convoy to Kladanj indicated that there had been problems with 80 patients. Dutchbat doctors had urged an evacuation to Tuzla on medical grounds but the VRS had said that this was impossible to do with vehicles. However, it was possible to do so on foot but Dutchbat had turned this down, according to the UNHCR report, because the patients could not walk and because their mandate ordered them to protect the refugees. This was why the convoy had returned to Potocari. Nevertheless, 32 patients had gone on foot. The remaining 48 were subsequently admitted to the hospital in Bratunac.⁵⁶⁸

There are some grounds for doubting the accuracy of the figures that are cited. Originally there were 88 patients in the compound. Of this number 64 went to Kladanj with the convoy that failed to make it. Thirty-four of the people in this convoy returned in Dutchbat vehicles and one of them died. The VRS took 17 patients back to Bratunac and 15 succeeded in crossing the front line. This leaves a difference of two, which may mean that mistakes were made during counting, babies may or may not have been counted, or that 13 and not 15 patients – as reported by the UNMOs – had managed to cross the front line under their own steam.

In the Bratunac hospital

On 14 July UNHCR Field Officer Andrei Kazakov managed to visit the Bratunac hospital and the wounded who had returned from Kladanj. He recorded the names and diagnosis for a list of people who required evacuation on medical grounds, on behalf of the medical desk in Sarajevo. Kazakov noted that Schouten was positive about the assistance which the hospital staff provided. The Bosnian Serbs did what they could. Nevertheless, two patients died over the next few days due to a lack of surgical facilities. Kazakov also reported that 18 of the patients were said to be soldiers. He had obtained this information from Schouten.

The Bosnian Serbs forced Kazakov to leave again. On 15 July he returned to Zvornik in a new attempt to reach Potocari. However, the VRS did not give him permission to do so on account of the poor security situation, and cited as their reason for this the fact that there were groups of armed Muslims en route from Srebrenica to Tuzla. Various roads were blocked and four Bosnian Serb civilians and ambulance personnel were said to have been killed near Konjevic Polje.⁵⁶⁹ Schouten also noted that fighting was going on. During his stay in Bratunac from 13 to 19 July he had seen three dead VRS soldiers and 12 to 13 lightly and seriously wounded ones brought to the hospital.⁵⁷⁰

The Bratunac hospital staff were not really happy with the enormous amount of work which came their way in the form of these wounded refugees but, as Schouten observed, they nevertheless cheerfully went to work.⁵⁷¹ Staff mentioned that they did not have enough supplies. In response to the question whether UNPROFOR could provide any, an answer was received from Dutchbat to the effect that this was not possible. However, General Mladic had informed Dutchbat's Commanding Officer that, once the logistics convoy arrived, medicine should be supplied by Dutchbat to the Bratunac hospital.⁵⁷²

When sufficient resources were available the following day after the arrival of this logistics convoy and a Dutchbat ambulance had taken various items to the hospital, the Bosnian Serbs attacked the escort vehicle. It seemed to be an act on the part of local irregular troops. With the aid of an interpreter, UNMOs managed to arrange a police escort to have the items delivered to the hospital. Due to the delay of the convoy's arrival a diabetes patient experienced difficulties.⁵⁷³ She died because no insulin was available in Bratunac. Four men were also in a relatively poor condition because they urgently required an operation. The facilities needed for this were unavailable in Bratunac. In this case the question was who could do what.

Schouten urged the director of the Bratunac hospital, Milan Vujic, to obtain assistance from the Red Cross and Médecins Sans Frontières or another aid organization, because no surgeons were available in Bratunac.⁵⁷⁴ Naval Captain Hegge raised the problem with Christina Schmitz but she first wished to discuss it with Franken. The latter then arranged for a Dutchbat ambulance escorted by Major Nikolic of the VRS to go to Bratunac to collect these patients but the ambulance returned empty. The VRS did not wish to relinquish these patients, who apparently had a history of involvement in the ABiH. This ambulance, one of the few that the VRS had not confiscated, took an ultrasound device and more medical supplies, which were supplied to the hospital in Bratunac.⁵⁷⁵

On the first day of his stay Schouten surveyed the wounded. He did this together with the polyclinic's staff. Schouten also acted as a guard by sitting on a chair in front of the entrance to the side building which housed the patients. On various occasions he was accosted by VRS soldiers who used threats and verbal abuse to create the impression that they 'wished to solve the problem of the wounded once and for all'. It was possible to prevent this thanks to intervention by Schouten and support from the nursing staff and two guards assigned to this post.⁵⁷⁶ At one stage two armed soldiers were standing inside. Screams from female staff raised the alarm and it was possible to remove the two with some difficulty. On at least two other occasions armed VRS soldiers attempted to enter the clinic. Schouten suspected that the patients included 18 ABiH troops.⁵⁷⁷

Later on Schouten got the impression that express orders had been issued by some authority that the wounded should not be interfered with.⁵⁷⁸ Nevertheless, the hospital staff did not entirely succeed in keeping Bosnian Muslims and Serbs apart. In the course of interviews conducted by the UNHCR protection officer in Tuzla with several patients later transferred there, it was revealed that VRS soldiers and civilians had entered a number of rooms in the Bratunac hospital, where they had kicked and beaten patients. A 60-year old man was said to have been hit on the chest with a rifle butt.⁵⁷⁹

Schouten was accommodated in the doctors' room on the top floor of the main building. At six o'clock in the morning of 14 July he was woken up by heavy fire from automatic weapons. Schouten wondered whether the Serbs were busy shooting the Muslims dead. However, this was not the case. From the balcony he saw that there was no panic and that the beds were full in the hospital ward. Everyone was still present in the (stinking) side building. The patients were terribly scared and mimed shots being fired at their heads. When he asked, Schouten was told that a number of Muslims had attempted to break out through Bratunac but were being restrained by the Bosnian Serb police. However, Schouten suspected that it was an execution.⁵⁸⁰

On 15 July the Bosnian Serb police used two teams to interview the patients. One was an anti-crime unit, while the other was a vice squad. This team was investigating the rape of Bosnian Serb women by Muslims. Schouten was allowed to be present during the interviews and to inspect the files. He fully availed himself of this opportunity and did not observe any intimidation or improper behaviour. He was told that those in question were people who could testify to the perpetration of war crimes committed by the ABiH. He spent the rest of his time treating and caring for patients. His attention was also drawn to the fact that the main building also housed a number of patients who had left Kladanj on a previous occasion. It turned out that there were 17 of them.

On 17 July the most seriously wounded were transported by a convoy of the International Red Cross. They had been selected on medical grounds. Schouten suspected that they also included several ABiH soldiers but the VRS did not impede their selection or transport. Another 17 wounded remained in the hospital after the International Red Cross had left. On 18 July little happened and Schouten was able to do his rounds and hand out cigarettes. On 19 July Colonel Radoslav Jankovic of the VRS announced that he wished to take the patients to the military hospital in Zvornik. Schouten was asked whether he had any objections to this on medical grounds. Schouten did not, provided that sufficient facilities were available to allow people to lie and sit down. Jankovic obtained a large truck. The Bosnian Serb police selected the wounded. The truck left, escorted by two armed military vehicles. This was curious because the truck was not full and seven patients had been left behind.

Two days prior to this Schouten had received an invitation to have lunch with a female nurse at her home. He accepted the invitation partly because there was hardly any food for him in the hospital. Schouten had been left at the hospital with one combat ration and had to buy his own food during the days he stayed there.⁵⁸¹ The VRS and local civilians supplied the clinic and collected the most diverse types of food.⁵⁸² Many local organizations (seven) were involved in feeding the patients but few results were achieved owing to a lack of coordination.⁵⁸³

During Schouten's lunch Colonel Radoslav Jankovic also arrived half an hour later. Because Jankovic was not in a rush now, Schouten began to scent trouble. Back at the hospital the seven patients appeared to have disappeared. Schouten demanded an explanation and indicated that he would not accept silence or evasive replies. However, the nurse in question led him to understand that such questions were not wise, were bad for one's health and were not appreciated by the VRS. Schouten assumed that his patients had been executed without any form of trial.⁵⁸⁴ However, it appeared that this was not the case. Nevertheless, widespread discussion was to ensue in the Netherlands about the fate of the wounded men who had been left behind. This is dealt with in greater detail further on in this appendix.

In the night of 13 to 14 July Jankovic had already notified the Drina Corps Intelligence Service that at the request of the Bratunac hospital staff a UNPROFOR doctor had remained behind to see that everything proceeded properly. At that time already Jankovic had announced that he intended to use a pretext to get Schouten out of the way and to say that he was no longer required. This was the same Jankovic who at 8 pm on 13 July, when the evacuation of the refugees had been completed, wrote that he was of the opinion that, if the Bosnian Serbs wished to take Gorazde and Zepa in the same way, the VRS would need to show through the media that they treated the populace properly, including soldiers of the ABiH who had surrendered.⁵⁸⁵

Conclusions pertaining to the convoy of wounded

To a large extent, the futile trip of the convoy of wounded to Kladanj appears to illustrate the uncertainty about the course of events and the chaos that reigned after the Bosnian Serbs captured the enclave. It appeared to be in the interests of the Bosnian Serbs, Dutchbat and the patients to transfer the latter to Tuzla as soon as possible. Better treatment was available in Tuzla than in the compound in Potocari and the Bosnian Serbs preferred to be rid of the residents of Srebrenica.

The Kladanj convoy was not only a victim of circumstance but also of inadequate preparation both on the part of Dutchbat as the Bosnian Serbs, and a lack of familiarity with the situation prevailing at Tisca, where the front line was to be crossed. There were insufficient guarantees that this could be effected without difficulty, even though the responsible VRS staff officer of the Drina Corps had approved matters.

It was not possible to transfer the wounded from Potocari to a convoy from Tuzla on the front line. This meant that the wounded would also be required to make the trip to Muslim territory on foot.

What then occurred was also typical of the hunt which the Bosnian Serbs commenced on 12 July for those Muslim men who tried to escape from Srebrenica. When the presence of men of fighting age was detected in the convoy, the VRS soldiers present in Tisca saw red. In the dark of night it led to a disgraceful situation in which the Dutchbat escort no longer had a role to play. Later on it appeared that some of the wounded had managed to cross the front line. Those who were unable to do so, were sent back with the Dutchbat convoy or appeared to have been dropped off at the hospital in Bratunac by the Bosnian Serbs. The latter denied the returning Dutchbat convoy access to Potocari, following which there was little left to do but drop the wounded off in Bratunac with the VRS's consent. It was remarkable that the hospital staff requested that a Dutchbat representative supervise the wounded in order to protect them against the VRS, who at that time had begun to execute the Muslim men whom they captured. The wounded were at any rate spared this fate.

Chapter 14

Involvement of the International Red Cross

Introduction

After the people were deported, Dutchbat and Médecins Sans Frontières remained behind in the now deserted enclave of Srebrenica with a number of wounded individuals. The previous failure of the Dutchbat convoy of wounded to reach Kladanj did not encourage it to make any further attempt to move the wounded to Tuzla. This would only have been possible once arrangements had been made between UNPROFOR and the Bosnian Serbs at the highest level, and the only organization that would merit consideration for the implementation of any agreement, was the International Red Cross.

This section describes the departure of the wounded and can be broken down into two main sections. First an attempt will be made to reconstruct the role of the International Red Cross in this connection, the key issue being the efforts that were required to obtain permission for this organization to go to Srebrenica. Consideration is then given to the manner in which the wounded were collected on 17 July.

After this attention is devoted to subsequent discussions about the removal of the wounded. An extraordinary aspect of this discussion is found in the compilation of lists of the wounded who were to be evacuated, and the presentation of these lists to the Bosnian Serbs. According to comments made in the Netherlands, this would have made it easy for the Bosnian Serbs to select seven prisoners of war from amongst the wounded and to remove them from the International Red Cross convoy.

The International Red Cross and its access to Srebrenica

By adopting Resolution 1004 on 12 July the Security Council demanded unimpeded access for the UNHCR and humanitarian organizations in order to alleviate people's suffering.⁵⁸⁶ Attempts were also made locally to obtain access to Srebrenica. Early in the morning of 12 July Médecins Sans Frontières floated the idea in Belgrade of entering into negotiations about access to Srebrenica. They felt that this could be done through various channels. In Belgrade the International Red Cross would be able to establish contact with the organization's office in Bijeljina, in Pale the UNHCR could undertake action on behalf of the International Red Cross office in that town, and in Belgrade the UNHCR could consult Nikola Koljevic, the vice president of the Republika Srpska.⁵⁸⁷

Major Franken maintains that he also sought contact with the International Red Cross through Médecins Sans Frontières.⁵⁸⁸ Already on 11 July Hatidza Hren, a local female Red Cross assistant, had asked a Dutchbat soldier stationed at the edge of the area which Dutchbat had cordoned off around the compound, if she could phone the office in Tuzla. The Dutchbat soldier had refused to allow this because she was a local and not a foreign member of staff. However, no International Red Cross officials were stationed in the enclave. Hren made a renewed attempt the following morning. She was again refused permission by an officer. On both occasions Hren had shown her International Red Cross identification card and an interpreter was present on both occasions.⁵⁸⁹

After the International Red Cross had futilely demanded access to Srebrenica from the Bosnian Serb authorities on 13 July, the local Bosnian Serb medical authorities in Bijeljina and the security authorities in Bratunac in turn alerted the International Red Cross.⁵⁹⁰ These local authorities sought the evacuation of a number of seriously wounded to Tuzla via Kladanj on medical grounds. This was separate from the previous description of the convoy of wounded to Kladanj.

At the UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo the medical officer updated a delegation from the International Red Cross in the same city: an evacuation of war-wounded from Potocari and Bratunac on medical grounds could be provided on 16 July. The Red Cross delegation in Sarajevo had received a statement from Médecins Sans Frontières that 59 patients were in the compound in Potocari and 49 were in Bratunac, 24 of whom urgently needed to be evacuated. The International Red Cross planned a medical convoy to Tuzla. The operation was to be coordinated by Sector North East in Tuzla, because the International Red Cross was reported to be dependent on the Norwegian medical company in Tuzla. If this plan were to succeed, any wounded Dutch soldiers who were still in Potocari, would be able to accompany this convoy. However, there were no wounded Dutch soldiers.⁵⁹¹

Apart from a convoy of wounded, which was not yet envisaged at that point in time, once the refugees had been deported from Potocari, Major Franken and Christina Schmitz devised a plan on 13 July to enter into negotiations with the VRS to obtain a bus to remove those elderly people who did not need to be transported in a medical convoy, from the enclave. The Médecins Sans Frontières medical staff would be at liberty to accompany them. However, Christina Schmitz insisted that male staff should remain behind to accompany the convoy.⁵⁹²

In the evening of 13 July a rumour was also doing the rounds to the effect that the sick and the wounded would be transported by helicopter or road. According to Médecins Sans Frontières, Major Franken was very busy also investigating this and insisted that the patients who were present in Bratunac, would be taken with them at the time.⁵⁹³ Franken contacted the International Red Cross and told them he would prefer it if they would conduct the evacuation, because he feared that UNPROFOR would again fail to reach Kladanj in vehicles. This was because it soon became clear that no helicopters would be coming and that there was still a delay in arranging a medical convoy to collect the patients.⁵⁹⁴

The VRS in the person of Colonel Radoslav Jankovic had already wanted the wounded evacuated on 14 July. Jankovic had proposed that the wounded be transferred to Zvornik on condition that UNPROFOR would provide first-aid materials. However, Major Franken had already assured him that he would do all in his power to make arrangements through international channels for them to receive further treatment in Yugoslavia.⁵⁹⁵

The International Red Cross had five trucks and a fleet of ambulances ready in Bijeljina to collect all the patients and was only awaiting permission. Both the International Red Cross and the UNHCR brought pressure to bear in an attempt to obtain this permission.⁵⁹⁶ In Potocari too Franken was, in Christina Schmitz's words, 'pushing like hell'. General Mladic wrote a letter saying that he would personally be visiting the compound in Potocari to consider the evacuation proposal. Dutchbat had to be patient.⁵⁹⁷

On 14 July the confusion grew because the UNHCR was also making preparations in Tuzla to get an evacuation underway, with the result that new arrangements had to be made as to who was going to be doing what.⁵⁹⁸ In Sarajevo General Nicolai had already made a futile attempt to agree with the VRS on an evacuation of patients by helicopter. Andrei Kazakov, the UNHCR field officer present in Bratunac, also wanted to try and take the patients on to Sarajevo by helicopter after this. This plan was evolving parallel to that of the International Red Cross, which was already prepared for an evacuation by road.⁵⁹⁹

Christina Schmitz felt that the UNHCR plan was ‘messy’, more so because Kazakov did not have any contact with the VRS. Every organization was trying to do things its own way. For the purposes of his plan Kazakov wanted a list of the patients and their details from Médecins Sans Frontières. Based on the fact that Christina Schmitz said that this would take more than two hours to prepare, one can conclude that no list was yet available at that point in time.⁶⁰⁰

Contact with the hospital in Bratunac, which was routed through Naval Captain Schouten, revealed that the wounded included various ‘ABiH soldiers with a good record from the past’ and that the VRS did not simply wish to allow these soldiers to go. A similar time bomb was ticking in the compound. Dutchbat personnel recognized one of the patients as a lieutenant in the ABiH and Christina Schmitz had since learned that her cook, Abdulah Purkovic had an ABiH past. What surprised her was that the VRS had apparently not yet discovered this. On the other hand, by now the entire world knew how many wounded people were lying in the compound, with the result that the VRS could not simply have them disappear. The outcome appeared to be that no one would receive permission to enter the enclave for the time being. Franken was of the opinion that Mladic, who had announced his intention to visit the compound, would not be coming before this problem had been solved.⁶⁰¹

Médecins Sans Frontières learned from the Bijeljina office of the International Red Cross that the latter had submitted an offer to the Republika Srpska to assume responsibility for the evacuation of the wounded to Kladanj. The International Red Cross had not yet received a response to this offer. A meeting of UNPROFOR, the UNHCR, Médecins Sans Frontières and the VRS was first scheduled to occur on the afternoon of 14 July.⁶⁰²

Frustratingly little was happening in relation to this matter. Koljevic, the vice president of the Republika Srpska, and Jo Marie Fecci, the head of the UNHCR mission in Bosnia, were to travel to Bratunac to inspect the situation and to negotiate a solution. Koljevic said that he did not know what was happening because contact between Pale and Bratunac was impossible. However, the delegation failed to arrive on account of ongoing fighting involving the column of men fleeing to Tuzla. Consequently, there was further delay in replying to the request for permission submitted by the International Red Cross.⁶⁰³

In Potocari Christina Schmitz informed the Médecins Sans Frontières office in Belgrade, which maintained constant contact with the International Red Cross and the UNHCR and acted as a source of pressure, that the International Red Cross should be allowed to perform the evacuation and not the UNHCR, because the latter did not have a mandate to deal with prisoners of war.⁶⁰⁴ On the other hand, the International Red Cross would certainly encounter difficulties performing an evacuation without being able to inspect the situation. It would also be unwilling to provide any undertaking in respect of Purkovic’s position as a former ABiH soldier. In Belgrade Médecins Sans Frontières merely hoped that the presence of ABiH troops would not cause any problems. It was believed that the local Médecins Sans Frontières staff were not aware of this and would treat them normally.⁶⁰⁵

Personally, Christina Schmitz felt that the VRS knew who was a soldier but that it did not want to do anything until such time as an evacuation got underway. Although the VRS was aware of the ABiH patients in Bratunac, nothing had happened to them until then. The most serious problem as Médecins Sans Frontières saw it, was that the VRS would be able to delay the convoy of wounded for this reason and that the problem of the ABiH soldiers who were present, needed to be discussed openly with the VRS.⁶⁰⁶

In the morning of 15 July Minister Pronk (Development Cooperation) informed Karremans that considerable international pressure was being exerted to ensure that the International Red Cross was given permission to collect any wounded people who were still present. Negotiations were being conducted at all levels, albeit without success so far.⁶⁰⁷

Nevertheless, by 15 July the International Red Cross had still not contacted UNPROFOR or Médecins Sans Frontières in Srebrenica to obtain information about the nature of the wounds, nor had any preparations been made to accommodate the wounded in the hospital in Tuzla.⁶⁰⁸ However, the VRS, UNPROFOR, Médecins Sans Frontières and the UNMOs did have contact with each other. The VRS said that they were aware of the gravity of the situation but that no decisions had yet been made. However, the VRS was said to agree that the International Red Cross would perform the evacuation. The destination would not be Kladanj on account of fighting in the vicinity and was yet to be determined.⁶⁰⁹

Access to the area was the topic of discussion in Belgrade on 15 July, when Milosevic, Stoltenberg (in his capacity as the special representative of the UN Secretary-General) and the EU negotiator, Bildt, reached agreement in general terms. The details of the International Red Cross's access to the area was to be worked out by Generals Smith and Mladic, who were also present in Belgrade. Smith had a major fallout with Mladic on the access he sought to Muslim prisoners on behalf of the International Red Cross. Until then, it was thought that they were being held in Bratunac. Initially, Mladic refused and said that they had been imprisoned because they had been soldiers. After Smith stated that they could not all be soldiers, Mladic held himself in check and gave his permission.⁶¹⁰

In the evening Bosnia-Herzegovina Command informed Karremans that permission had been granted for the transfer of Dutchbat to Central Bosnia and also for the evacuation of the wounded. The Norwegian Medical Company in Tuzla was to assume responsibility for this. Médecins Sans Frontières personnel were required to try and join this convoy. The International Red Cross was also given permission to visit the wounded in the meantime. The details for this were to be finalized on 16 July.⁶¹¹

The plan adopted by the UN headquarters in Sarajevo was to get the wounded out of Potocari as soon as possible. Sarajevo maintained contact with the Bosnian Serb authorities in Pale in this connection and with the VRS liaison officer, Major Indic. Contrary to the procedures, it had been agreed that an application for permission would be submitted afterwards. Vrolijk, a Dutch Lieutenant Colonel, agreed to this with Major Dudic, the VRS liaison officer with the staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command. The VRS were prepared to cooperate in this respect. On 14 July the International Red Cross in Bijeljina had already declared that they were willing to assume responsibility for this task. They could leave immediately and could reach the area via a checkpoint which was normally not open. However, the ABiH fired on the convoy en route, after which it returned without accomplishing its objective. Initially, Sarajevo was not aware that the ABiH had a hand in this and Major Dudic had the book thrown at him.⁶¹²

The vehicles of the Norwegian medical company which were to be used for the Red Cross convoy, ran into an ambush near Zvornik on 16 July. Miroslav Deronjic, the newly appointed civil governor of Srebrenica, had just told Dutchbat that the convoy had passed Zvornik but something strange appeared to be happening: five minutes later a report was received from Tuzla that the convoy had been fired on.⁶¹³ Zvornik was considered to be a safe zone behind the front line. This led to speculation that the ABiH party which was on the way from Srebrenica to Tuzla, was shooting at anything that moved.⁶¹⁴ This was certainly not a strange idea, because also the VRS feared that this group on the run would attack Zvornik. It was also possible that the Norwegian medical convoy had run into VRS units that were engaged in the hunt for the Muslim men. General Nicolai submitted a complaint to the VRS headquarters that the convoy had been fired on by their forces.

Nicolai was put through to Colonel Markovic, the most senior officer. He denied that an agreement had been reached on the transfer of the wounded. At that point in time General Gvero was holding discussions with the UNHCR about the destination of the wounded and the route that a convoy would need to take. According to Markovic, it would be best to have the convoy return behind the front line and to contact the VRS again once an agreement had been reached.⁶¹⁵

Major Franken was not aware of the plans of the International Red Cross by the evening of 16 July. However, on that day staff from the International Red Cross were present in Bratunac and Dutchbat had expected the delegation to visit Potocari as well. In Belgrade Médecins Sans Frontières received a request from its people in Potocari to find out what the plans of the International Red Cross were.⁶¹⁶ The latter was in Bratunac to consider the problems of the wounded prisoners of war in the hospital. As yet, little progress had been reached in respect of the prisoners of war. For this reason discussions were held between representatives of the UNHCR and the International Red Cross, and the Bosnian Serb authorities in Pale that afternoon. The UNHCR representative did appear to be unaware that an evacuation on medical grounds was envisaged. Because war-wounded were involved, the UNHCR representative to these discussions felt that the matter fell under the jurisdiction of the International Red Cross. It was agreed that UNPROFOR would transport the sick and the wounded from Potocari to Bratunac and that the International Red Cross would then assume responsibility for all the patients in Bratunac and transport them to a suitable location in Serbia or to Tuzla.⁶¹⁷

There was not a great deal of consultation with the Bosnian Serb authorities on the situation in Potocari. The lengthy meeting in Pale focused mainly on access to Sarajevo. Srebrenica was only discussed towards the end of the meeting and the VRS had told the International Red Cross that it could not remove the patients from Potocari and Bratunac, leaving it little choice in this respect. This would then have to occur in Bratunac. No access to prisoners of war was permitted. For this reason the International Red Cross sought permission in respect of the civilian patients. Apparently, it was not yet clear who had been designated a prisoner of war in Bratunac and Potocari. The International Red Cross inquired about numbers and the condition of the patients. This was already known in respect of Bratunac, because local doctors had already supplied this information. In Belgrade Médecins Sans Frontières expressly stated that no names were required in this connection but only a list of seated or bedridden wounded and their condition. However, earlier that day the Belgrade office of Médecins Sans Frontières had inquired whether Dutchbat had already provided the organization with a list of names.⁶¹⁸ Transferring the patients from Potocari to Bratunac presented no problems for Dutchbat. Christina Schmitz had already discussed the possibility with Major Franken.⁶¹⁹

Initially, the International Red Cross planned to accommodate the seriously wounded in hospitals in Serbia but, because several patients refused to go to this country, this plan was abandoned.⁶²⁰ Médecins Sans Frontières considered it more likely that the Yugoslavian officials would not permit this. It also seemed to be better to reunite the families in Tuzla as soon as possible.⁶²¹ The most direct route to Tuzla had been closed for security reasons. One would need to move along secondary routes crossing Serbian terrain along the Drina (Bratunac, Ljubovija, Zvornik, Zepak and Bijeljina) and proceed to Tuzla from there.⁶²² General Milan Gvero of the VRS gave his approval for the operation.⁶²³

On 16 July Dutchbat had made preparations for the transfer of the sick and wounded to the International Red Cross.⁶²⁴ On 17 July the latter's convoy arrived in Bratunac after some delay due to problems crossing the front line at Tuzla.⁶²⁵ Contrary to what the International Red Cross had envisaged and what had been agreed with both the VRS and Dutchbat, the latter had not moved the wounded from Potocari to Bratunac.⁶²⁶

The International Red Cross subsequently stated that Dutchbat could not be blamed for anything, because the battalion was not aware of the agreement of Jahorina, which it had entered into with the Bosnian Serbs the day before. This agreement stipulated that UNPROFOR was responsible for transferring all the sick and wounded from Potocari to Bratunac by midday on 17 July.⁶²⁷ Apparently, other organizations had also not been informed of this. The UNHCR explained that this had not happened due to Dutchbat's lack of capacity to transport the 87 patients to Bratunac.⁶²⁸ Médecins Sans Frontières explained this by referring to an attitude of restraint on the part of Dutchbat: the organization had detected a reduction in the latter's willingness to assist since Dutchbat had started packing up preparatory to its own departure.⁶²⁹

The International Red Cross did not have any objections to going to Potocari but would need permission from the VRS to do so, because the latter had previously stated that Potocari was a war zone to which it could not receive access.⁶³⁰ However, it was possible to obtain access to Potocari on-site and without the intervention of UNPROFOR.⁶³¹

The wounded are collected

When the Red Cross delegates arrived in Bratunac, they were asked to go to Potocari in order to report to a special committee at the VRS headquarters for the purpose of visiting the wounded and separating the prisoners of war from the rest.

According to Franken, the mood was rather tense and the female coordinator of the Red Cross convoy was irritated by problems experienced en route. The convoy had been forced to leave a vehicle containing medication destined for the hospital in Bratunac on the Serbian side of the border. When Colonel Jankovic of the VRS heard about this problem, he managed to solve it with a single telephone call and he was able to inform the International Red Cross delegation that the truck was on the way.

This was followed by difficulties encountered parking the Red Cross vehicles in Bratunac. The International Red Cross was opposed to this. They had to go on to the enclave, although this meant that they were governed by the VRS's convoy regulations with an inspection and all its attendant problems and sources of irritation, which was apparently not something the International Red Cross had to put up with on a daily basis.

The mood prevailing during the meeting between the International Red Cross, the VRS and Dutchbat was equally unpleasant, partly due to difficulties experienced in relation to a declaration that the people had been properly evacuated. Franken had signed this declaration, because he feared that it would be impossible to remove the wounded from Srebrenica if he did not.⁶³² (In this respect see Part IV, Chapter 4.)

During the discussions held with the International Red Cross, Major Nikolic checked to ensure that the available lists of wounded included all the information he required. He wanted something added to it but, following a brief discussion with Colonel Jankovic and Major Franken, he was given to understand the list contained information which the VRS had dictated in a previous meeting and that there would be no deviation from it. It contained the names of the people in question, their date and place of birth, the name of their father and the nature of their injuries. The latter was included, because there were quite a few men who used bandages to simulate wounds.⁶³³ Recording wounds represented a lesson learned after the failure of the convoy of wounded to reach Kladanj.

The International Red Cross convoy then left without any problems and consisted of 15 Land Rovers, two trucks and 30 delegates, including medical teams from Pale, Bijeljina and Belgrade. After it left Bratunac without incident, the convoy crossed the Serbian border. In Bijeljina the Bosnian Serb police stopped it in the middle of the night. The police wanted it to take a different route from the one that had been agreed. After a liaison officer intervened, the convoy was able to proceed on its way to Tuzla, where it arrived in the morning of 18 July.⁶³⁴ This did not apply to the wounded ABiH soldiers. They did not accompany the International Red Cross convoy and remained behind in Bratunac as prisoners of war.

Prisoners of war

The VRS designated a total of 23 wounded individuals prisoners of war. They consisted of a group of 16 in the Bratunac hospital, one of which was said to have been recognized to be a war criminal,⁶³⁵ and an additional group of seven in the compound in Potocari. The Bosnian Serbs asked the International Red Cross to take these 23 people to the hospital in Bijeljina. However, the International Red Cross refused to do this, because the transfer of prisoners of war had not been provided for in the agreement it had concluded with the Bosnian Serbs in Jahorina, and also because such a transfer entailed a certain amount of risk for it. More importantly, the International Red Cross did not want to confuse the transport of the sick and wounded, because two different categories were involved.⁶³⁶ As detailed below, this approach was to place Dutchbat in a difficult position.

The International Red Cross did indeed view the 23 as prisoners of war and recorded their identity, so as to be able to visit them at a later stage.⁶³⁷ However, the organization was not permitted to formally register prisoners of war as such and to notify their families. The delegates had to do with an undertaking given by the local VRS commander that it would be possible to visit all the prisoners in hospital or a POW camp in the near future.⁶³⁸

The International Red Cross assured Franken that they would continue to monitor the men who had been designated prisoners of war. According to Franken, he was told that the seven men in Potocari had themselves confessed to being soldiers.⁶³⁹ He said that he had also indicated that he was not prepared to hand over the wounded in the compound to the Bosnian Serbs but only to the International Red Cross. He had categorically refused to hand them over to the VRS. However, in Sarajevo UNPROFOR had consented to the VRS questioning them in the compound, subject to the condition that a UN representative would be present at all times and that no one was permitted to be handed over.⁶⁴⁰ On 17 July the International Red Cross delegation also consented to the Bosnian Serbs visiting the wounded.⁶⁴¹

Major Franken, Major Nikolic and the Médecins Sans Frontières doctor, Daniel O'Brien, visited the patients. Nikolic had a brief discussion in Serbo-Croatian with a number of them, and it was consequently not clear what was said.⁶⁴² Nikolic had previously been in the compound, had had a good look around, had had a chat, had handed out cigarettes, and had then left again. The patients are reported not to have been afraid at the time. Only the Médecins Sans Frontières assistant, Purkovic, crept away at the time and concealed his presence. Apart from Major Nikolic, five Norwegians from the Norwegian medical company were present during the selection but they did not say anything. Nothing had been said to the Dutch who were present in the plant, with the result that they were not prepared for what was about to happen.⁶⁴³

Dressed in the blue and purple uniforms of the Special Police and green camouflage uniforms, Bosnian Serbs walked around with a camera and a camcorder. They talked to the wounded and took photographs of some. They also pointed to several Muslim men, whose names were then checked against a list. If a name appeared on the list, the person in question was drawn aside from the rest of the wounded.⁶⁴⁴ The Bosnian Serbs also spoke to a Dutchbat interpreter from B Company, who was asked to state his name and rank but was barely believed. One of the interpreters was a former ABiH soldier. The Bosnian Serbs were in the compound for half an hour and were guarded by Dutch commandos.⁶⁴⁵ Franken had assigned Lieutenant Caris to perform security duties with a number of his men during the visit.⁶⁴⁶ Finally, Major Nikolic designated seven relatively young men as prisoners of war.⁶⁴⁷

The ABiH officer, Sadik Vilic, spoke about this episode. For some four to five days the situation was very good for the wounded and there was an abundance of everything. After not knowing what had been happening outside for five days, Vilic wished to have a look. He managed to make it outside on his own steam but was sent back inside again. One could sense that there was tension within Dutchbat and the MSF interpreter, Emira Selimovic, warned that a Bosnian Serb delegation was coming. This delegation, headed by Major Nikolic who was armed with a pistol, began to check the men and ask them their names while Dutchbat personnel looked on. Nikolic wrote down the names and dates of birth of seven men and spoke to Vilic's mother-in-law, because they again thought she was Esmā. Vilic mentioned his name, because he thought that they had already recognized him but this only happened once he had stated his name. He was given to understand that the VRS had been searching for him for three years already. The Bosnian Serbs then gave the list to the doctor, Daniel O'Brien. Vilic did not know what they said to O'Brien. They then left and half an hour later a message was received that the Red Cross vehicles were coming to evacuate the wounded to Tuzla. Dutchbat personnel entered to carry the wounded out. According to Vilic, O'Brien gave the list of seven men to a Dutchbat officer and told him to take the men to a Dutchbat truck.⁶⁴⁸

The interpreter, Emira Selimovic, stated that the VRS had said that International Red Cross trucks were waiting in Bratunac to take the seven from the Dutchbat trucks. The VRS commander had told one of his men that the seven should enter the trucks last, so as to make it easier to keep them separate from the rest of the wounded. This already happened in the plant within the compound.⁶⁴⁹ According to Médecins Sans Frontières, the Bosnian Serbs allowed the International Red Cross to take the seven men to the hospital in Bratunac but the latter organization was not further concerned about them. At any rate, the names of the seven were known to both the International Red Cross and Médecins Sans Frontières.⁶⁵⁰ In reply to a questions from Franken as to whether it was not too risky to let the seven go to Bratunac, the International Red Cross delegate responded by saying that someone from their organization in the town would monitor the men.⁶⁵¹

In the course of the meeting with the International Red Cross, Major Franken had given orders for a four-tonne vehicle to be prepared to transport the seven wounded men but whether this occurred at the instigation of the International Red Cross or Dutchbat, was unclear to those who implemented this decision.⁶⁵² Captain De Bruijn then ordered Sergeant Major H. Ritsema to transport the seven men to Bratunac in the four-tonne vehicle. The reason cited for this was that the International Red Cross had too few vehicles at its disposal.⁶⁵³ Because wounded individuals were involved, this had to be done under medical supervision. Apart from the wounded, the following people were present in the four-tonne vehicle: UNMO Major De Haan to keep an eye on things and Naval Captain Schouten. De Haan had been asked by Major Franken to remain with the vehicle to see that the wounded were properly treated.⁶⁵⁴ Schouten had briefly returned to the compound from Bratunac to pick up medicine. Ritsema lined up his vehicle as the second in the column of the hastily departing Red Cross convoy, in order to ensure that it did not leave without him.⁶⁵⁵

Schouten went to sit at the back of the four-tonne vehicle with De Haan in order to prevent one or more of the wounded from jumping out of the vehicle on the way. Most of the patients were not confined to bed and sat on benches. If they did, they were likely to be shot and killed, and this would also cause difficulties for their escorts.⁶⁵⁶

According to Ritsema, the Bosnian Serbs in the person of Colonel Vukovic undertook to use their own transport to take the seven wounded to a military hospital in Zvornik after their arrival at the hospital in Bratunac. There was nowhere to put the seven in Bratunac. Before they could enter the hospital, the side building where the wounded had been held whom the International Red Cross had taken away that day, was being cleaned and disinfected. This only occurred at 9 pm. Until that time the seven were treated as patients and their treatment did not occasion any fear for their lives or to doubt Vukovic's words. Although the Bosnian Serb police guarded the hospital, the seven were not transferred to their custody but to the care of the medical staff.⁶⁵⁷

Upon arrival in Bratunac, quite a few civilians gathered around the Dutchbat four-tonne vehicle in front of the medical centre. They threw stones at it. Several old men in the area were told to remove the wounded from the truck and to guard them. Because the wounded included several sturdily built men, the UNMO and Dutchbat personnel helped remove the stretchers from the truck in a decent fashion.⁶⁵⁸ Escorted by the Bosnian Serb police, Ritsema then returned to the compound together with Major De Haan.⁶⁵⁹ Schouten remained behind and only returned to the compound on 19 July, brought back by the hospital's medical superintendent.⁶⁶⁰

Sadik Vilic saw that some of the wounded taken from the hospital in Bratunac to the Red Cross vehicles, were people he knew from Potocari. That took half an hour, after which the Red Cross vehicles set off for Tuzla. The seven men remained behind and were then removed from the truck and taken inside. After the seven men were dropped off, the two Dutchbat military escorts left. The hospital was guarded and stern warnings were issued against attempting escape. Another 16 wounded men who had been evacuated from Kladanj five days earlier, were brought in to join the seven. A number of them wept and said, 'We are the only ones left.' The guards cursed and shouted things such as, 'We killed everyone in the forest,' an unmistakable reference to the executions which the VRS had perpetrated in the past few days following the hunt for the column of men who had tried to reach Tuzla.

However, Colonel Vukovic told them that he was using all the resources at his disposal in his struggle to get the men out of Bratunac alive. They were transported again a day later on 18 July. The Bosnian Serbs placed the wounded in trucks with temperatures between 35 and 40 degrees. The trucks drove for three hours and stopped a number of times when stones were thrown at them en route. Then they arrived at a field that had been fenced off with barbed wire. It appeared to be a Bosnian Serb POW camp located near Camp Batkovic in the vicinity of Bijeljina. After three months Vilic and other camp inmates were exchanged for VRS soldiers. There were 35 wounded individuals in the camp. Of those present, 55 had already been there for up to three years and 15 had not even attained the age of 18. Conditions were poor, no medical care was available and they were mistreated.⁶⁶¹

Because a Dutchbat four-tonne vehicle was used to transport the seven wounded men, it appeared as though this action had not occurred under the auspices of the International Red Cross. Sadik Vilic said that he wondered why Dutchbat had handed over the seven wounded men to the Bosnian Serbs. This question was his only criticism of Dutchbat.⁶⁶² Purkovic's subsequent view was that the wounded had even been selected and sent with the VRS without Médecins Sans Frontières or the International Red Cross being present.⁶⁶³ However, this was not the case. The men were transferred to the custody of the VRS as prisoners of war with the consent of the International Red Cross and in accordance with international law, and an undertaking was given that they would be placed in a POW camp, where they could be visited by the International Red Cross.

Lists of names

The question was how the Bosnian Serbs were able to designate the seven men in the compound in Potocari as prisoners of war. This raises the question as to whether the Bosnian Serbs had received any lists, which could serve as the basis for selecting these seven.

The Bosnian Serbs used a list which was not drawn up or signed by anyone from Dutchbat in 1995 according to Major Franken. However, Médecins Sans Frontières had drawn up a list of names of 59 wounded individuals. In his view, this was nothing more than a routine procedure, which was required in order to take people out of the enclave in a convoy. The Bosnian Serbs demanded a list of all the names of the people being transported in the case of every convoy. No specific request was made for such a list. His 'list of 59' also included the names of local Médecins Sans Frontières staff as well as five elderly people whom the VRS had dropped off at the camp after the people had been evacuated. This list was later passed on to the Red Cross and Franken. The latter stated that he did not witness the transfer of a list. He himself had not given a list to the VRS nor had he arranged for this to be done.⁶⁶⁴

A closer investigation of the question as to who provided a list to whom, is important because discussions later ensued on this point. Dutchbat would have made matters very easy for the Bosnian Serbs to select prisoners of war based on any list.

The various statements made about the provision of lists of names to the Bosnian Serbs do not paint a picture that is entirely clear. Several lists appear to have been drawn up on different days. Christina Schmitz refers to 15 July as ‘the day of the lists (I can’t hear the word anymore)’. Together with the UNHCR, she prepared a list of all the patients in the compound and their diagnosis. She also drew up a list of local Médecins Sans Frontières staff. These lists were then distributed to the UN and also the VRS.⁶⁶⁵

During a meeting with the VRS on 16 July Médecins Sans Frontières presented a list containing the names of its local staff but only the number of patients.⁶⁶⁶ However, the organization confirmed in Belgrade on 17 July 1995 that it had sent a list containing patients’ names to the International Red Cross.⁶⁶⁷ Almir Ramic, the local UNHCR staff representative had drawn up this list on 17 July and had handed it to Médecins Sans Frontières. He was certain that the Bosnian Serbs had also received a copy of this list but he did not know who had given it to them.⁶⁶⁸ The International Red Cross confirmed that it had received two lists containing patients’ names. The organization received one list from Médecins Sans Frontières in Potocari and one from the local hospital, Dom Zdravlja, in Bratunac.⁶⁶⁹

It is remarkable that the VRS had already reported in the evening of 13 July that UNPROFOR had provided it with a list containing the names of 54 wounded individuals who were held in the compound in Potocari.⁶⁷⁰ A Dutchbat serviceman stated that at about 9 pm on 13 July after the refugees had left, one person, whom he thought was Mladic’s interpreter, appeared at the compound and requested a list. He suspected that this referred to a list containing the names of wounded people. He waited at the gate for some time and received a list. The Dutchbat member did not know who provided this list.⁶⁷¹

This incident closely resembles that referred to in another statement made by a Dutchbat serviceman, although the latter referred to the event as having occurred a day later. Towards evening this member of the battalion had been ordered by Franken to prepare a list of the names of injured refugees. He was told that it was urgent. Together with a female Médecins Sans Frontières staff member this Dutchbat serviceman prepared a list. Franken also ordered him to draw up a copy of this list and to present it to him. He was to wait for him at the gate to the compound. There stood Karremans, Franken, Major Nikolic of the VRS, another VRS soldier and an interpreter. A Dutchbat sentry was also present. The Dutchbat serviceman in question stated that he saw Franken hand the list to Nikolic.

In this respect the VRS is also reported to have said that they were certainly willing to remove the wounded if they were to receive diesel from Karremans for this purpose. Karremans clearly showed that he did not wish to help them with this. Consequently, no deal was struck. Nikolic left taking the copy of the list containing the names of 59 wounded individuals.⁶⁷²

The compound commander, Major J. Otter, understood that there was a discussion about a list. A female member of Médecins Sans Frontières staff was busy writing down the details of the wounded. One of the questions was whether surnames should be listed or not. Otter thought that this list was destined for internal use by Médecins Sans Frontières. The list was changed at least twice because people arrived. Otter did not know whether the Bosnian Serbs had received a copy.⁶⁷³

Emira Selimovic, the Médecins Sans Frontières interpreter, had indeed drawn up a list of the wounded in the compound. This list was handed to Dutchbat. Whether the latter in turn handed it to the VRS, Selimovic did not know.⁶⁷⁴ On the other hand, a Dutchbat soldier said that he had heard from Médecins Sans Frontières that the names of the sick and wounded had been given to the Bosnian Serbs with a view to their transport.⁶⁷⁵

Karremans believed he could recall that a list of the wounded was drawn up by the commander of the Field Dressing Station. He also said that this list was required to transport people. He was not aware of any lists prepared by Médecins Sans Frontières. Karremans was of the opinion that the wounded had ultimately left the enclave based on a destination arranged by the International Red Cross.⁶⁷⁶

The Field Dressing Station staff had prepared a medical file for all the patients in the compound, which stated in English what their condition was along with the policy proposed for their treatment. A list of names was also provided to the staff of the Norwegian medical company, which helped the International Red Cross with transport on 17 July. The list prepared by the Field Dressing Station was not revealed to the Bosnian Serbs.⁶⁷⁷

After studying photographs of the departure of the wounded from Potocari on 17 July, which had been presented in the course of the debriefing, on 18 October 1995 the Directorate of General Information in the Ministry of Defence ascertained that an International Red Cross assistant could be seen holding a list.⁶⁷⁸ This coincided with a statement made by a Dutchbat soldier, who said that the men whose names appeared on a list provided by the VRS, were separated from the rest and that Christina Schmitz had read out the list of names.⁶⁷⁹

Nevertheless, it is difficult to unravel the clues because, in addition to the lists summarized above, there were also others doing the rounds. Already on 14 July while visiting the wounded who had been brought back from Kladanj by Dutchbat and the VRS, in the hospital in Bratunac, the UNHCR field officer, Andrei Kazakov, had noted down their names and diagnosis for the purposes of a medical evacuation list for the UNPROFOR medical cell in Sarajevo.⁶⁸⁰

Even the local staff in the hospital in Bratunac drew up a list of the patients there. This list was typed with two carbon copies. Naval Captain Schouten briefly had this list in his possession. However, an interpreter did not feel that it was a good idea for him to have it and asked him to return it. In addition, there was also a 'hospital treatment register' containing the patient's names. The representatives of the International Red Cross also noted down the details of all the sick and wounded who were present in the hospital.⁶⁸¹ During a meeting with the International Red Cross, Médecins Sans Frontières staff, the civilian governor of Srebrenica Miroslav Deronjic, and the VRS, amongst others, it was decided to give the International Red Cross permission to record names.⁶⁸² The UNMOs also possessed a list of the names of the wounded. On 17 July they sent this list to the UNMO headquarters in Tuzla.⁶⁸³

There were thus many lists doing the rounds but this does not answer the question whether or how the Bosnian Serbs obtained any and if it served as an aid in the selection of prisoners of war.

Subsequent discussions about lists of names

There was an extraordinary twist to the events concerning what came to be called the 'list of 59' after the journalist, Frank Westerman, published an article in NRC Handelsblad on the issue on 22 September 1995 following the completion of the debriefing interviews in Assen. According to Westerman, Dutchbat had a list of wounded Muslims drawn up on the orders of the Bosnian Serbs. This was said to be evident from the statements made by the UNMO, Major De Haan, and Christina Schmitz. Minister Voorhoeve had not informed Parliament about this matter. A Defence spokesman could only confirm the transfer of the 59 wounded individuals and concede that the Bosnian Serbs were aware of their identity. According to De Haan, in the course of various discussions the VRS had demanded a list of personal details including age, place of birth and nature of injury. The VRS were said to want to compare it to their own lists in their search for war criminals. De Haan, who was present at the discussion, maintains that the Dutchbat leadership did not protest. They also agreed to a demand to screen the wounded. 'We literally had our backs to the wall. The Serbs [sic] dictated everything,' said De Haan. Médecins Sans Frontières staff then recorded the names preparatory to transport.

Nor was it Christina Schmitz' intention to help the Serbs: 'At that point in time I did not realize that I would be endangering the patients'.

Once the list was completed, Major Nikolic and other military personnel visited the wounded. Nikolic asked them their names and selected seven: 'We want this one, and this one and this one'. The panic was reported to have been considerable and the patients who were most afraid, were given sedatives. Schmitz added that the seven who had been selected, were taken away by Dutchbat and that Major Franken had offered a Dutchbat truck for this purpose. They are reported to have still been alive at the end of July but nothing has been heard of them since.⁶⁸⁴

Westerman wrote about the matter again four days later. This time he wrote that the Médecins Sans Frontières doctor, Daniel O'Brien, had already been ordered by an unnamed Dutchbat official to prepare a list of the wounded people on 13 July. He was told that the Bosnian Serbs had requested it. The VRS subsequently selected all the men they were under the impression might ever be able to hold a rifle, according to O'Brien. The Ministry of Defence conceded, according to Westerman's article, that when the patients were handed over to the International Red Cross on 17 July, the Bosnian Serbs appeared to know their identity. The Ministry of Defence also stated that the list even included the names of 66 exhausted elderly people, hysterical men and women, and children with bullet wounds.⁶⁸⁵

On 28 September the CDA (Christian Democrats) Member of Parliament, De Hoop Scheffer, posed questions in person in response to the first article in NRC Handelsblad. In a nutshell, these questions sought to ascertain whether Dutchbat had prepared a list of wounded men. The question was whether the Minister knew about this. If not, the Member of Parliament wanted to know why the Minister did not.⁶⁸⁶ In response, from abroad Minister Voorhoeve directed his officials to find answers to a large number of questions about the fate of the seven wounded men.⁶⁸⁷ This was ultimately what the issue was all about.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs approached the International Red Cross. The latter stated that it had no knowledge of a list containing the names of the wounded. According to a source at Médecins Sans Frontières, the MSF in Belgrade had provided one on 17 July. The situation was not entirely clear. On 17 and 18 July 87 people had been transported from Bratunac to Tuzla for medical reasons. When the International Red Cross counted on 23 September, it arrived at 87 evacuees, 28 of whom came from Bratunac, 58 from Potocari and there was one whose origin was unknown. A child who had just been born and who was probably not registered anywhere, brought the total to 88. Indeed, on 18 July 1995 the International Red Cross released a figure of 88 evacuees.⁶⁸⁸

The Bosnian Serbs had originally given the International Red Cross permission to transport 110 sick people to Tuzla but at the last moment this was withdrawn for 23 of them, including the seven men from Potocari. The International Red Cross drew up a list of these people. 22 of these 23 individuals were found during a visit to Camp Batkovic on 19 September. The missing person was said to have died in the hospital in Bijeljina.⁶⁸⁹ Prior to this, on 26 July, Rosanna Sam, the Field Officer for the Bosnia-Herzegovina desk at the UNHCR in Belgrade, reported that 22 wounded individuals had been taken from the clinic in Batkovic to the hospital in Bijeljina and other hospitals.⁶⁹⁰

Consequently, only 22 wounded people may have arrived in Batkovic and the Bosnian Serbs may have managed to mislead the International Red Cross with regard to the whereabouts of the person who died in Bijeljina. Of the group of 23, the VRS had transferred Osman Halilovic to the custody of the CSB (Security Service) in Zvornik. According to the Intelligence Department of the Bratunac Brigade, Halilovic had himself confessed to participating in the mass slaughter of civilians.⁶⁹¹

Observations made by Naval Captain Schouten appear to confirm that there was something going on with Osman Halilovic. This was because Schouten managed to remember the name of one of the wounded men: Osman. The only Osman cited in the list of the 23 wounded individuals was the 32-year old Osman Halilovic. As Schouten recalls, Osman was not one of the seven prisoners of war who were taken to Bratunac in a four-tonne Dutchbat vehicle on 17 July. He had already been there for a longer period of time and must therefore have been one of the patients in the convoy of wounded that failed to reach Kladanj. Schouten had his doubts about the fate of this person. Osman was young and only lightly wounded. Schouten was under the impression that his wounds were self-inflicted in order to be considered for evacuation. He walked quite normally when he thought that no one was looking but limped when he was being observed. The local populace used the name, 'butcher' to refer to this Osman, based on his preference for slitting the throats of Serbian men, women and children with a knife in order to conserve ammunition. He was said to have lived in Bratunac before the war and was therefore very well known.⁶⁹²

Schouten had good reason to entertain doubts about the fate of this person. However, these doubts were challenged by a report from the ABiH to the effect that a certain Osman Halilovic of the 28th Division had survived the VRS executions and had already reported to another ABiH unit on 18 July.⁶⁹³ However, it is impossible to confirm with any certainty that the same person was involved.

The International Red Cross in Geneva was able to check this again following the appearance of the list of 59 wounded people via Zagreb after a Dutch UN soldier had handed it to an assistant of the UN special human rights investigator, Mazowiecki.⁶⁹⁴ The preliminary findings of the investigation conducted by the International Red Cross were that, while it was true that the list contained 59 numbers, it only cited 56 names. In so far as these names were legible, one could conclude that there were 55 people in the medical convoy to Tuzla which the International Red Cross had organized. Two names were illegible, two were not listed in the International Red Cross's files, and one name was that of someone who had been taken prisoner by the Bosnian Serbs according to that person's family. It was known that five people had been taken prisoner. They were being held in the POW camp in Batkovic.⁶⁹⁵

This investigation conducted by the International Red Cross did not provide a great deal of clarity about the fate of the prisoners of war. Based on these findings, which were anything but clear, the Ministry of Defence resorted to delaying tactics. Defence Department spokespeople were instructed to say that the transfer of the wounded Muslims would be dealt with as part of the extensive debriefing process in Assen.

In view of the fact that several parts of the debriefing statements were already in the Ministry's possession contrary to what had been agreed in Assen, it was improper to assert the need to await the outcome of the debriefing process. The argument to the effect that the information could change on the basis of the findings of the investigation encompassing the current round of debriefing was weak.⁶⁹⁶ The debriefing sessions had already been held. How the Bosnian Serbs could be aware of the identity of the Muslims was apparent from at least one of the debriefing statements.

On the other hand, Major Franken had emphatically denied that Dutchbat had transferred the wounded to the VRS. Dutchbat had transferred them to the International Red Cross and the latter had undertaken to continue to monitor those persons designated as prisoners of war.

Parliamentary questions

When answering the questions about the lists of wounded posed by the Member of Parliament, De Hoop Scheffer (CDA-Christian Democrats), Minister Voorhoeve was advised by his officials not to go into detail. This was risky because a great deal was still unclear. There were objections to this approach in that it only raised expectations about the outcome of the debriefing process. In the interim Naval Captain Schouten tried to have the medical superintendent of the hospital in Bratunac send him a copy of the names listed in the patients' register but no reply was forthcoming.⁶⁹⁷

In Parliament Minister Voorhoeve replied that a list had indeed been prepared but that it was possible that different lists had been prepared by different people. The situation was not clear to the Ministry. According to Voorhoeve, the list of 59 had been prepared by Médecins Sans Frontières and had been handed to a representative of the special UN human rights investigator and the Red Cross. In stating this, the Minister was rather free in his approach to time, because the list had only been handed over in Zagreb upon departure from the enclave and the International Red Cross only received it on 28 September. The Minister said that he had not known about the list. The Ministry had only come into possession of the 'list of 59' on the day of the relevant question time (28 September 1995). Voorhoeve incidentally found it 'a normal procedure' that lists of wounded individuals were drawn up to record their identity and what happened to them. For the rest, the Minister presented an accurate record of details provided by the International Red Cross. Voorhoeve suspected and hoped that the seven wounded men were amongst the wounded who had been found in Camp Batkovic.

De Hoop Scheffer did not appear to be satisfied. The Minister and Parliament should have known about the matter. The debriefing process had at any rate started too late. He wanted to know who had given the list to the International Red Cross and whether it had passed through the hands of the Dutchbat commanding officers. The Minister did not really consider these questions, only saying that he had doubts about a number of points raised in the article that had appeared in NRC Handelsblad on 22 September. According to him, this article did not entirely coincide with the information that the Ministry had at its disposal but, as it happens, he did not indicate which information he was referring to.

In the second session the Member of Parliament, Hoekema (D66), asked the Minister whether the Red Cross had checked the identities and whether he had yet ascertained how the Bosnian Serbs had established the identity of the wounded. In his response to the article in NRC Handelsblad, Minister Voorhoeve had said that this was to be investigated. By way of reply, Voorhoeve again referred to the fact that lists of names had been required for the transport of people through Bosnian Serb territory. With regard to checking identities, it appeared to Voorhoeve to be a good idea to ask the International Red Cross to do this when it again visited the camps where the men were being held. Voorhoeve added that, without being asked, the International Red Cross had revealed that it had no criticism of the manner in which Dutchbat had dealt with the wounded and the refugees.⁶⁹⁸ This statement was somewhat exaggerated as it did not represent an observation by the International Red Cross itself. In its discussions with witnesses the International Red Cross had not heard of anything negative about Dutchbat.⁶⁹⁹

On 4 October 1995, the day on which the debriefing report was ready, the International Red Cross announced the findings of a new investigation. The International Red Cross had had contact with 22 of the 23 prisoners of war that it had not been allowed to transport. One of them had died in the hospital of Bijeljina. The International Red Cross had had contact with five of the people who were also mentioned in one of the Médecins Sans Frontières lists. However, at the end of September prisoners had been exchanged on two occasions in Camp Batkovic. People whose names were on the list of 23 could have been involved. There was a problem in that the International Red Cross had not been present during one exchange, with the result that it was impossible to provide a conclusive answer.⁷⁰⁰

The International Red Cross had shown itself to be particularly helpful but did not wish to go as far as permitting a subsequent investigation in the course of which Ministry of Defence officials would be allowed to approach International Red Cross staff with lists of questions or requests for additional information in person. After all, it would not be possible to deny others whatever was permitted in the case of the Netherlands. It would make it difficult if not impossible for the organization to work in the region.⁷⁰¹

The Directorate for General Policy Affairs in the Ministry of Defence then tried to reach a conclusive decision itself based on the findings of the International Red Cross and a comparison of the lists containing 23, 59 and 239 names respectively. The latter list contained the names of those men who had allowed themselves to be registered in the compound prior to their deportation (see Part IV, Chapters 4 and 8). The International Red Cross had previously examined the list containing 239 names and had compared it with its databases and statements made by family members. This list contained 236 rather than 239 names because three had been crossed out. 50 names could not be traced in the files of the International Red Cross. 65 of the 236 names coincided with those in the organization's files, albeit that their dates of birth differed. Two names might have coincided if it were not for minor differences in spelling. Three names could have coincided but the question remained as to whether they referred to the same person. 116 names and dates of birth coincided perfectly with the International Red Cross database. According to reports made by the relevant family members, 103 of these 116 men had been taken prisoner. Seven were said to have escaped to areas under the control of the Bosnian Government. The International Red Cross had registered five people in Batkovic. One person was said to have been seen there.⁷⁰²

The complex comparison performed by the Directorate for General Policy Affairs revealed that seven names coincided and not five as the International Red Cross had concluded. In all cases they involved men of fighting age. The man who had died in Bijeljina was not reported to be one of the seven wounded selected in Potocari. These seven were said to have been alive on 19 September 1995. One was later reported to have died of unknown causes. Three or four of the six survivors were said to have still been alive following the exchange of prisoners. The remaining two or three could have been involved in the second exchange, in which the International Red Cross was not involved.⁷⁰³

It is not clear what the basis was for these assumptions made by the Directorate for General Policy Affairs. The International Red Cross did not mention any numbers in connection with the exchange of prisoners. Nevertheless, the Directorate for General Policy Affairs asserted that the Minister could disclose its findings publicly if necessary. This occurred in virtually identical words when the debriefing report was tabled in Parliament on 30 October.

The Ministry of Defence subsequently remained reserved in connection with the seven wounded people whom the Bosnian Serbs had selected in Potocari. The reason for this lay in the fact that the investigation performed by the Directorate for General Policy Affairs had revealed that the depiction of the events surrounding the removal of the sick and wounded from Bratunac in the debriefing report differed significantly from the version of the International Red Cross. According to the debriefing report, 17 wounded individuals had remained behind in Bratunac. This was said to have been due to negligence on the part of the International Red Cross and insufficient capacity to transport all the wounded. Moreover, the International Red Cross wanted to leave the area as soon as possible because it was getting dark. It was reported that there had not been any consultation about the manner in which the remaining wounded were to be removed. As a result, ten (an inaccurate number) wounded people remained behind in Bratunac in addition to the seven designated as prisoners of war in Potocari, according to the debriefing report.⁷⁰⁴

The version presented by the International Red Cross was that the Bosnian Serbs had originally granted it permission to transport all 110 of the sick and wounded but that they revoked this in respect of 23 of them at the last moment, and the latter therefore remained behind.⁷⁰⁵ As revealed in the course of debriefing in Zagreb immediately after Dutchbat's departure from the enclave, the explanation for this could be found in the fact that the VRS had compiled files on these people.⁷⁰⁶

Criticism of the International Red Cross

While it may not be very diplomatic to air criticism about the actions of the International Red Cross, not everyone within Dutchbat was positive in his assessment. The arrival of a delegation from the International Red Cross was the first time Dutchbat personnel had a glimpse of the world outside the enclave again. It was an utterly different world that was entering the enclave: there were people who had washed and shaved, women who were properly clothed and men wearing suits. After a week of unpleasantness and misery, this seemed 'less than brilliant' to those who were involved. Apparently, this nurtured the idea and the stories that in Dutchbat's view the International Red Cross did not act properly in the sense that the delegates thought: within several hours we will be back in our hotel in Bratunac and tomorrow we will be here again. Within the battalion this led to the following attitude: 'You will not be leaving the compound until we make arrangements for the wounded, so you may as well stay for a while'.⁷⁰⁷

In the course of the meeting in the compound in Potocari the female representative of the International Red Cross had managed to cause so much irritation with the VRS that a temporary halt to proceedings was required. She had to be taken aside to have the position of the VRS following its capture of the enclave explained to her.⁷⁰⁸

Yet there were also other types of criticism. At the end of the afternoon on 12 July Captain V.B. Egbers saw a white vehicle belonging to the International Red Cross in Nova Kasaba containing two men and two women from Switzerland. Egbers thought that this was a response to the fact that people in Nova Kasaba were in the middle of a battle between the VRS and the ABiH forces fleeing to Tuzla. He asked the International Red Cross delegates whether they wished to see the prisoners of war whom the VRS were holding on the football field, but this did not appear to be the case. The delegates had come from Pale and wanted to go to Belgrade via Zvornik. They merely asked whether the road to Belgrade was safe. The vehicle turned around and drove off. 'Then you feel that you have been left reasonably to your own devices, whereas the Red Cross is precisely an organization which is impartial and which could be looking after people,' said Egbers.⁷⁰⁹ The latter's remarks found their way into the debriefing report.⁷¹⁰ The president of the International Red Cross, Cornelio Sommaruga, responded to this by informing Minister Voorhoeve that the staff in question had not been alerted to the presence of prisoners at that point in time.⁷¹¹

Two representatives of the International Red Cross were busy in Bratunac from late in the morning until early in the evening of 17 July trying to arrange the departure of patients from the hospital. Naval Captain Schouten found it strange that they did not once contact him. They selected the wounded without asking him for advice. Schouten felt that the representatives were aloof and chaotic in the way they performed their work. He also commented on the inadequate transport capacity of the International Red Cross.⁷¹² He was not alone in this. Sergeant Major Ritsema of the Medical Platoon which drove the four-tonne vehicle containing the seven prisoners of war from Potocari to Bratunac, assumed the same: a lack of capacity on the part of the International Red Cross. The convoy soon left Bratunac but the four-tonne vehicle containing the seven men remained where it was. There was no explanation or consultation.⁷¹³

Dutchbat was not alone in its judgement of the International Red Cross. Christina Schmitz of Médecins Sans Frontières described the evacuation as 'very unorganized and messy'. It gave one the impression that the delegates on site did not have their heart in their work. On 17 July the International Red Cross was to be present for an inspection of the patients by the VRS and everyone waited for them. The organization had set a deadline of midday for itself but its representatives only arrived at 3.30 pm. According to Schmitz, they were only interested in getting away as soon as possible. Consequently, Médecins Sans Frontières had to join Major Nikolic to inspect the patients together with a UNMO, in the course of which the seven men were selected. Schmitz called this a 'disgusting' task.⁷¹⁴

Later Schmitz said that Major Franken had resisted the VRS's inspection of the last wounded people in the compound. According to Schmitz, the Bosnian Serbs were only prepared to agree to an evacuation subject to an inspection. Franken's opposition was futile. The Bosnian Serbs simply did as they pleased.⁷¹⁵

After that confusion ensued. First, news was received that the International Red Cross had not been given permission to enter the enclave. However, suddenly it was possible for the International Red Cross to start the evacuation and its representatives told the doctor, Daniel O'Brien that he had to leave the patients behind because it was then too late. Nevertheless, in one way or another the patients began to be loaded and the convoy left Potocari at 6.15 pm. According to Schmitz, the International Red Cross was permitted to transport the seven men to the hospital in Bratunac themselves but the organization was not concerned about them.⁷¹⁶ Similarly, Franken was also irritated by the fact that transport was not available for everyone, even though the numbers were known and the male prisoners of war would have to remain behind in Bratunac without adequate supervision.⁷¹⁷

These were the critical remarks uttered by Dutchbat, which partly and in a modified form found their way into the debriefing report.⁷¹⁸ In his letter presenting the debriefing report to Parliament, Minister Voorhoeve distanced himself from the criticism levelled at the staff of the International Red Cross. They merely reflected the personal views of the Dutchbat soldiers involved. According to Voorhoeve, the Dutch Government had a great deal of admiration for the International Red Cross and its activities in the former Yugoslavia.⁷¹⁹

The 'list of 59' revisited

Finally, in a letter addressed to Parliament on 30 October 1995 in relation to the list of 59 wounded people, Minister Voorhoeve wrote that it had not been established whether they had been handed over to the Bosnian Serbs and, if so, by whom.⁷²⁰ This is remarkable because the debriefing report is clear and forthright in this respect. Both of the Dutch statements cited in connection with the handover of lists to the VRS are reported in anonymous and somewhat abstract form but are presented in detail in the debriefing report. However, this report does indicate that it was impossible to obtain confirmation for the statement about the handover of the list to the VRS.⁷²¹

An investigation conducted by the Ministry in reply to questions posed by Minister Voorhoeve revealed that the list of wounded referred to in the article by Frank Westerman in NRC Handelsblad, had been drawn up on 17 July. This occurred following a meeting which involved Médecins Sans Frontières, the International Red Cross, Dutchbat and the Bosnian Serbs. In each case this list stated the name, date and place of birth, the name of the person's father and the nature of his injuries. Médecins Sans Frontières passed on this list to the Red Cross and Major Franken. As far as is known, UNPROFOR, the Defence Crisis Management Centre and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff were not informed of the existence of this list. It remains unclear how many other lists had been circulating.⁷²²

According to the debriefing report a list had already been handed to the VRS on 14 July.⁷²³ In a report prepared at the end of July 1995, Christina Schmitz of Médecins Sans Frontières wrote that a list of patients had been handed over on as early as 13 July when a VRS delegation had paid its first visit to the compound. However, the report does not mention whether this was done by Médecins Sans Frontières or Dutchbat.⁷²⁴

More lists had indeed been prepared. In itself, it was not all that remarkable that lists were drawn up. The transfer of the wounded on 17 July without a list would have raised more questions, because there would not have been any way of checking matters afterwards. The question in this respect is whether lists were handed to the VRS which could have made it easier for them to pick out possible ABiH soldiers amongst the wounded. While this is likely, the VRS could also have got this far without any lists. The Bosnian Serbs themselves interrogated people of fighting age and used cameras and video equipment. It would not have been too difficult to recognize people with the aid of images, because the people knew each other from before the war.

In its preparations to answer the parliamentary questions, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff failed to obtain any clarity on the policy governing lists of names from the UN in Zagreb or the Netherlands Red Cross. At any rate, it was customary to hand over lists of sick and wounded people to the warring factions when they were to be transported. This procedure was followed by UNPROFOR, the UNHCR, NGOs and also local authorities.⁷²⁵

Another question which Minister Voorhoeve posed to his officials was whether Dutchbat had sought guarantees for the safety and medical treatment of the seven wounded Muslim men. This did not appear to be the case. Dutchbat had only transported the seven men to Bratunac at the request of the International Red Cross. To be absolutely sure, a UNMO had been sent along to monitor whether any irregularities occurred.⁷²⁶

The last time that the issue of lists of wounded was raised in the Dutch press, was in Vrij Nederland on 28 October 1995. The editors, Ko Colijn and Paul Rusman stated that, even if it was unclear whether Dutchbat was responsible for those lists, a list of wounded should never have been allowed to find its way into Serb hands.⁷²⁷

In February 1996 Christina Schmitz of Médecins Sans Frontières revisited the issue on the occasion of the publication of the book, Srebrenica: Getuigen van een massamoord (Srebrenica: Witnesses of a Massacre), published by Bob van Laerhoven. She was astonished by the commotion that had arisen in the Netherlands in connection with the preparation of lists of wounded. She did not find anything strange about the preparation of such lists. In this connection she referred to the Geneva Conventions which, according to her, required that such lists be drawn up in cases of this nature and that they be handed to all the parties concerned, including the occupying force, in this case the Bosnian Serbs.⁷²⁸ Questions may be raised about Schmitz's interpretation but she is right when she states that the Conventions provide for the preparation of lists and the presentation of names, albeit that if this is applied to the situation prevailing in Potocari, it was more a duty of the Bosnian Serbs to prepare lists of prisoners of war. In addition, the Conventions make it mandatory for a prisoner of war to state his name when asked.⁷²⁹

In addition, former soldiers may also be treated as prisoners of war (Art. 4).

The evacuation of the wounded by the International Red Cross: conclusion

Ultimately, intervention was required at the most senior political level in relation to the departure of the wounded from Potocari. Only then was it possible for Generals Mladic and Smith to make arrangements for the International Red Cross to have access to the enclave. With hindsight, the delay before the International Red Cross was granted access to Potocari can be explained by the fact that it was not in the interests of the Bosnian Serbs to allow busybodies into an area where Muslim men were being transported and executed.

The transfer of the wounded to the International Red Cross did not proceed without a hitch but was a hastily executed operation owing to the late arrival of the Red Cross convoy from Tuzla. The transfer of the patients was complicated even more by the fact that the Bosnian Serbs had designated seven of them as prisoners of war. Because these men were not taken in the International Red Cross convoy but had to be transported to Bratunac in a Dutchbat truck, this led to consternation in what was a hectic situation. The International Red Cross did not provide an adequate explanation for adopting such a different approach and many Dutchbat personnel were also left in doubt.

This situation created a breeding ground for subsequent speculation about the fate of these men and for questions about Dutchbat's involvement in it. Part of the discussion concerned the question as to what extent the provision of lists enabled the Bosnian Serbs to select these seven men. This led to as detailed as possible a reconstruction of the preparation of the lists of wounded in various places. However, one cannot conclude from the preparation of such lists that Dutchbat and Médecins Sans Frontières had thus helped the Bosnian Serbs select prisoners of war. Within the reality of Bosnia the question about this, which was mainly posed in the Netherlands, was largely an academic one. Without names or passenger lists it was simply impossible to cross the front line, in this case the border with Serbia.

A request for guarantees addressed by Dutchbat to the Bosnian Serbs at a time when the International Red Cross appeared on the scene, would also have amounted to an overestimation of Dutchbat's role. The evacuation of the wounded was an issue which was dealt with at the highest level and Dutchbat had hardly any idea what transpired there. Beyond the boundaries of the former enclave only the International Red Cross was able to monitor in some way or another the manner in which the evacuation was proceeding and the subsequent fate of the wounded men. Moreover, the International Red Cross recognized that prisoners of war were involved and registered them, so as to be able to visit them at a later stage. The fact that prisoners of war were involved, was not raised in any of the subsequent discussions in the Netherlands. It was also remarkable that these discussions focussed entirely on the seven men and did not cover the sixteen who were present in Bratunac and who had previously left the compound in Potocari with the convoy of wounded that had failed to make it to Kladanj.

What is also striking, is the extent to which the departure of the wounded became a question of improvising in the midst of ongoing chaos, in which an array of organizations with powers that were not clearly defined, intervened in the situation, and in which the Bosnian Serbs constantly made demands in an arrogant fashion, thereby complicating matters even further.

Chapter 15

Dutchbat's internal problems

Introduction

The following sections have been written in the light of penetrating medical, ethical and military issues pertaining to the fall of Srebrenica. Dutchbat plays a central role in this respect. In particular, the Dutchbat medical service is put under the microscope and is considered from within. This is important because many questions were subsequently raised about the performance of this medical service, and it can explain a number of matters referred to in the broader review above.

This section seeks to deal with a number of questions systematically, returning in parts to Dutchbat's organizational structure and medical service, which were raised at the beginning of this appendix. These issues relate to the internal tensions that existed and the situation in which the medical service found itself. The sources cited date from a subsequent period.

The media also devoted a great deal of attention to this. In this connection, it concerns the manner in which the battalion leadership and the surgical teams assigned to Dutchbat, KHO-5 and KHO-6, viewed their duties and the personal conflicts that played a role. The relations between the people involved were not clarified and this rendered their performance additionally vulnerable in the prevailing circumstances.

Relatively soon after the fall of Srebrenica and even before the debriefing report appeared, information was received about the serious breakdown of relations between the Dutchbat leadership and one of the surgical teams (KHO-5) and between both surgical teams (KHO-5 and KHO-6), and the internal relations within the Field Dressing Station.

During the attack on the enclave Dutchbat had two of these surgical support teams, which had been deployed by the Krijgsmacht Hospitaal Organisatie (Armed Forces Hospital Service - KHO) and which, unlike other medical personnel, normally remained in the enclave for three months. Regular relief had fallen considerably behind schedule due to the refusal of the Bosnian Serbs to grant permission for this to occur. When KHO-6 was finally able to travel to Srebrenica after a long wait, the onset of fighting made it impossible for KHO-5 to leave. In normal circumstances, KHO-5 would have left the enclave immediately once they had been relieved and had handed over their duties. However, they did not receive permission to do so and were forced to remain in Potocari. In addition, the day after the arrival of KHO-6 the shelling of the enclave began and the VRS commenced its attack, with the result that tensions rose dramatically.

This led to the exceptional situation where Dutchbat had two surgical teams. The presence of these two KHO teams muddied the already complex waters of the medical service's performance in addition to a lack of clarity as to what was referred to as the 'emergency stock'. It was an unpleasant fact that this situation was largely the result of the policy pursued by the Bosnian Serbs with a view to isolating the enclave. In addition, due to its forced wait in Zagreb for permission to enter the enclave relations within KHO-6 and with the commander of the Field Dressing Station had been disrupted somewhat even before the team arrived in the enclave.

However, the Bosnian Serb policy of isolating the enclave also had an effect on relations between KHO-5 and the Dutchbat leadership. Tensions arose partly because the KHO teams and the staff at the Field Dressing Station had different duty rosters. What was more important, was that, owing to their background and approach to work, the KHO teams had a culture which differed from that of the airmobile battalion. Amongst other things, this was expressed in a more flexible approach to dress regulations.⁷³⁰ The dress code applicable in the Field Dressing Station was more informal than the battalion was accustomed to, and this caused friction between the battalion leadership and the KHO team.⁷³¹

Discord and differences in character played an even greater role in this respect. Forced inactivity owing to a reduction of the humanitarian help provided to the population as a result of supply problems exacerbated by conflict between Médecins Sans Frontières and the Opstina led to a proverbial situation where the devil finds work for idle hands. The Dutchbat leadership was irked by the forced inactivity of KHO-5.

Apart from this, there was also friction between the battalion staff and the medical personnel in relation to medical ethics and patients' rights. The lengthy intensive treatment (lasting seven weeks) of a woman with an infected uterus, who later died, contributed to the friction, because nursing her made draw on scarce supplies of medicine and energy, thereby consuming fuel.

As if that was not enough, the presence of two surgical teams of varying nature boosted tensions further. The failure to treat a wounded woman on 10 July affected the relationship between the two surgical teams at a time when the Bosnian Serbs had commenced their attack on the town of Srebrenica. This matter was to receive a great deal of attention after Srebrenica fell. If the KHO teams had managed to confine themselves to their actual operating room duties, relations may have deteriorated to a lesser extent but after the fall of Srebrenica, these members of staff also had to be deployed for duties outside their actual field of operation. This led to difficulties, because some of them had problems performing such duties. All these circumstances had a profound impact on personal and working relations.

Chain of command

The debriefing process in Assen revealed that there were tensions between the Dutchbat leadership and the personnel of the Krijgsmacht Hospitaal Organisatie. The facts presented in the debriefing report related mainly to KHO-5. With regard to KHO-6 the debriefing report only stated that during the fall of the enclave the commands given by the commander of the Field Dressing Station were not carried out.⁷³²

It had already been stated in the course of the debriefing that the preparation of the surgical teams should have been based on a different approach. The KHO teams should have been more closely matched before they were deployed. The fact that the surgical teams were sent on tour of duty lasting only three months compared to six months in the case of other Field Dressing Station staff, also meant that it would always be impossible to establish a closely-knit team. The Ministry of Defence should have also decided whether to deploy military personnel only or a combination of military and civilian staff but in this case it would have needed to be structured properly.⁷³³ The surgical team also included civilian staff who had been seconded to the military for this purpose. The people involved did not know each other before they were sent on their tour of duty and only met their commander for the first time in Zagreb. This was hardly an encouraging start. Preparations for deployment were rather brief in some cases. In one instance a warrant officer was appointed in the weekend, required to attend a course at the Centrum voor Vredesoperaties (Centre for Peacekeeping Operations) the very next Monday, and was immediately sent on a tour of duty after this.⁷³⁴ The training received by the bulk of the Field Dressing Station staff, those that did not constitute part of the KHO teams, also left much to be desired. Schouten, the anaesthetist, referred to the lack of practical experience as annoying at times.⁷³⁵

Military relations between the battalion and the Field Dressing Station, and also within the latter, were charged. The battalion commander and medical specialists had little contact with each other. Formal contact was routed through the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, a non-medical officer of a much lower rank. Mainly the medical specialists from the Navy had difficulties with this structure. The medical specialist from the Air Force had problems with the battalion leadership for other reasons, which are dealt with below.

In practice, the logistics staff officer and acting deputy battalion commander, Major Franken, managed the Field Dressing Station. The battalion commander was not involved in this. However, communication was strained between the Field Dressing Station and the battalion staff. There was also friction because the latter assumed command of the Field Dressing Station and the Medical Platoon, and because commands were not given by their own commanding officers. This was partly due to the organizational structure of the Field Dressing Station. A captain commanded it. His deputy and the head of the internal service was an warrant officer. Final medical responsibility was borne by the surgeon who, along with the anaesthetist, were both colonels, the highest ranking military personnel in the enclave. Because they normally worked in a hospital, they were used to a different culture. The Dutchbat Medical Platoon that was part of the Airmobile Battalion, was partly unaffected by these problems.

KHO-6 was accompanied by a coordinating staff nurse with the rank of major to mediate between the surgical teams and the commanders. In the opinion of Naval Captain S.J. Zwarts, the KHO-6 anaesthetist, this was an inferior structure from a military point of view. It carried the risk of further undermining what was already a difficult command structure owing to the differences in rank.⁷³⁶

Communication between the battalion staff and the Field Dressing Station was sometimes inadequate. The commander of the Field Dressing Station attended the battalion staff's daily briefing. This commander then informed the members of the Field Dressing Station but the latter were not under the impression that they were always fully informed about the current situation prevailing in the enclave. In particular, questions about supplies of fuel and food were not satisfactorily answered.⁷³⁷

Communication between the Dutchbat Medical Platoon and the battalion staff was also poor. Information, even if it was relevant, was not always communicated. Nevertheless, because the Medical Platoon had access to various communication networks, it still managed to obtain the information it required. However, they felt that they needed to do everything themselves and that little attention was devoted to those points which were raised by medical personnel. While it was true that the battalion staff devoted a great deal of attention to the conduct of tactical issues, it was less attentive to the performance of medical duties. The staff, and this mainly concerned Major Franken, had their own view of the manner in which these medical duties were performed. He interfered in everything. Views expressed in the field received little attention. Orders simply had to be obeyed.⁷³⁸ However, the mood prevailing in the Field Dressing Station was good. Internal communication was fine and a staff meeting was held once a week.⁷³⁹

Communication from the battalion to the Field Dressing Station was routed through Major Franken. The latter acted in a rather dominant fashion in this respect, which sometimes led to a situation in which one could barely work as the medical personnel saw it.⁷⁴⁰ In this connection, Franken commented a great deal about the Field Dressing Station, which gave rise to irritation and had a negative impact on the atmosphere.⁷⁴¹ The cultural differences between the airmobile and medical troops were not divorced from this. Franken simply issued a command and it was a question of 'Forward march'.⁷⁴²

In particular, the strict approach he adopted in his actions to conserve fuel sometimes had a negative impact on their work. From the middle of May 1995 fuel rationing increasingly affected the operations of the Field Dressing Station. For example, there were difficulties running the emergency power supply for the operating room during operations. If any member of staff, and this applied to all the services in the compound, switched on a unit to do essential work for a short period of time without requesting permission from Franken beforehand, the person in question was reprimanded.⁷⁴³ The duty of having to request permission to use power every time, made it impossible for the Field Dressing Station to operate independently. This was also one of the causes of the conflict between the battalion and the Field Dressing Station.⁷⁴⁴ During the ‘minimize’ period, for example, it happened that a soldier switched off a unit on the orders of Major Franken. At that point in time it was providing power to an autoclave (sterilizer) running computer-operated software. As a result, the sterilization process was not completed. The instruments therefore needed to be packed in again and the process started anew.⁷⁴⁵ Fuel rationing is said to have gone so far that Major Franken also said that fuel should be used sparingly when the units were switched on for the operation on Private Van Renssen,⁷⁴⁶ and after the latter’s death Franken found it difficult to use fuel to keep his corpse cold.⁷⁴⁷

If no wounded were brought in or little of the Field Dressing Station’s capacity was utilized, it happened that the KHO team was forced to be inactive while the battalion worked hard. This was an unsatisfactory situation which also led to false positions with the other personnel on the compound and instilled in KHO staff a feeling that they were useless and an undesirable add-on to the battalion.⁷⁴⁸ Because the Field Dressing Station did not have any work in the last few weeks of May 1995, staff were regularly found sunbathing en masse. This greatly displeased Major Franken who had to contend with a battalion that had now fallen well below strength because those on leave were unable to return to the enclave. At a certain point KHO-5 personnel were also assigned to guard duty in order to make up the shortfall in staff. Discussion ensued the first time this occurred, because, according to the Geneva Conventions, medical personnel were only permitted to carry weapons to defend themselves or the sick and wounded in their care.⁷⁴⁹ Ancillary duties for medical personnel remained a subject of discussion between the battalion leadership and the staff of the Field Dressing Station.⁷⁵⁰

During this period Major Franken indicated that he would ensure that the Field Dressing Station could get back to work, even if this merely involved cleaning the local hospital. However, this did not lead to an order being issued to do so.⁷⁵¹ However, some people have indicated that in June Franken did indeed order the KHO-5 staff to go and work in the hospital in Srebrenica. No clear reason was given for this order and Colonel Kremer did not obey it.⁷⁵²

People were angered by the fact that without consulting them Franken announced his decision and is reported to have said, ‘I shall personally see to it that you go and help Muslims in the hospital, even if you all have to sweep the floor together. I don’t give a damn about that’.⁷⁵³ In this respect Kremer said that Franken was ‘tired’ of people doing nothing. He wanted KHO-5 to work. However, Kremer held the view that what he did was none of Franken’s business and, if necessary, he would approach Karremans: ‘It was war between us from that moment on’.⁷⁵⁴

The order to help out in the hospital led to further actions undermining authority in that contact was established with the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff without the knowledge of the battalion staff.⁷⁵⁵

Another reason for the division between the battalion and medical leaders was that some medical officers did not wish to comply with the orders and regulations that applied in the compound. This was expressed in an array of provocative behaviour including the consumption of beer contrary to the regulations governing medical personnel. Applicable military regulations were sometimes dismissed with comments such as 'They [the staff] mustn't go on moaning like that'. This type of provocation in turn had a disruptive effect on lower ranking medical staff.⁷⁵⁶ What also played a role was the fact that, due to the actions of Bosnian Serbs, Captain Sweets, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, was unable to return after being on leave. Prior to this, he had managed matters capably.⁷⁵⁷

The conflict about the enforcement of military regulations culminated in what came to be known as the 'footpath affair'. It was customary for KHO-5 staff to walk round the compound after their evening meal. Part of their route took them past the gate and provided them with a view of life around a small creek. The alternative route went past a two-metre high dam with no view. No one had ever worried about it until a duty officer gave notice that the route past the gate was no longer to be used because otherwise the sentries would no longer be able to perform their duties properly. After a tussle that went on for five weeks, Major J. Otter, the compound commander, issued an order specifying 'alternative routes of varying distances'. This would make it possible to avoid 'undesirable contact at the gate' (that is to say, with the local populace) and sentries and patrols would no longer be hindered.⁷⁵⁸

This order was issued on Karremans' instructions. It was a rather strained response in which differences in culture, rank and also personality played a role. One person was a colonel and the other a lieutenant colonel or major. The compound commander, Major Otter, felt that it should have been possible for people to resolve this together. This incident undermined not only the position of the battalion's Commanding Officer but also that of the medical specialist with the rank of colonel.⁷⁵⁹ The prohibition led to further incomprehension and to conflict which expressed itself in the form of a radio programme in which 'Radio Dutchbat' read out short poems, several of which were offensive to the battalion commander, Karremans, and his deputy, Franken. They were limericks about 'Franco' and 'Karrespoor' and occasioned hilarity in the compound and aroused anger amongst the battalion's leaders. Major Franken announced that if it were to occur one more time, he would personally pull the plug on the radio. As it happens, Franken was not the only person who felt that such radio broadcasts were inappropriate.⁷⁶⁰ Captain Schouten also acknowledged that the limericks were of an offensive nature. Even though Kremer and Schouten received the limericks from the battalion, the latter later said, 'If you have a quarrel with your commanding officer, you should not take the piss out of him on the radio'.

The members of KHO-5 also felt that they were being 'victimized' in that their departure from the enclave had been delayed. The battalion leaders were said to have been guided in this matter by personal feelings of ill will. 'In such a case one is not really capable of leading a battalion,' Schouten said.⁷⁶¹ Kremer defended himself by saying that he only read out poems which others had written and that he was not responsible for their content.⁷⁶²

KHO-5's tour of duty was unintentionally extended by two and a half months. This constituted important grounds for its conflict with the battalion leadership. After this both sides 'moaned and groaned' with the KHO team displaying provocative behaviour. Relations broke down due to cultural differences and responses about trivial issues. This was the reason why, despite being appreciated, criticism of Kremer was also forthcoming from the Field Dressing Station, where it was asserted that he had no understanding of military matters and that he should have abided by the maxim, 'stick to what you know'.⁷⁶³

The mood prevailing within KHO-5 in the first three months was good. Hardly any distinction was drawn between rank and social standing. The announcement that they could not return home after three months brought about a rapid change in mood. Irritation increased because planned holidays had to be abandoned.⁷⁶⁴ Kremer accused Karremans of 'abusing his powers' by halting his team's roster: 'Everyone was allowed to leave except the first-aid team'. The battalion leaders said that this had occurred on the orders of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. Kremer then phoned the latter himself, after which it appeared that this was not true and that it had indeed been a battalion decision. 'Perhaps it was a bet that the colonel would not leave before they did,' said Kremer. This is dealt with in the next section. According to Kremer, Karremans even later tried to intimidate him in the Netherlands after he had filed a complaint about abuse of power: 'You will pay for that!'. When Kremer also lodged a complaint about this, Karremans backed down and said that he had only been bluffing.⁷⁶⁵

Relations between the battalion staff and the Field Dressing Station were strongly influenced by cultural differences between the doctors sourced from other services and some nurses on the one hand, and on the other, the structure and mentality of the airmobile battalion. Naval Captain Schouten, who had been around for some time, said that he did not care much for squabbling between 'the tough guys and the softies' and that he got on well with Karremans and Franken, although he added, 'They are excellent soldiers but they have hardly been blessed with communicative skills'. Another source of irritation lay in the intimidating tone with which Franken issued orders to staff in the Field Dressing Station and the fact that he was a poor listener.⁷⁶⁶

It was primarily the relationship between Karremans and Kremer that caused difficulties. Initially, they got on reasonably well with each other in view of the fact that they both had similar situations at home and spoke about this. Later on, however, Karremans was annoyed with Kremer for publicly trumpeting around his private problems in the Field Dressing Station. This situation deteriorated when it became impossible for KHO-5 to be relieved and for its members to proceed with their holiday arrangements. Estrangement also occurred due to the fact that in the eyes of Karremans Kremer did not conduct himself appropriately as a military officer. Holding the rank of colonel, he should conduct himself accordingly. It must have also annoyed the younger officers in the battalion staff when Kremer turned against them and gave them the impression that he thought his superiors were just a 'bunch of stubborn arseholes'. Karremans felt that it was unacceptable to personalize issues and sneer on the radio. On the other hand, he said that he valued Kremer as a person and a medical practitioner.⁷⁶⁷

Nor was there an optimum relationship between Schouten, the anaesthetist, and Kremer, the surgeon. Schouten did not fully agree with the schedule of operations performed by Kremer for the population. It was argued that it was good to keep staff busy. Doctors who had nothing to do, became grumpy and it was good for people to gain experience in case anything should actually happen. Adopting this approach, it was not difficult to find work. However, Schouten had difficulties with the types of operations that were performed. He felt that operations on hernias and gall-bladders constituted senseless work. This was nothing more than a means of keeping staff busy. Moreover, it imposed a considerable burden on one, because these patients required post-operative care. After lunch the surgeon did something else, while the rest of the first-aid staff spent the entire day providing this care.

In addition, it also drew on stock at a time when there were no incoming supplies. On top of this there was the need to nurse the woman with the infected uterus for seven weeks. Relations between Kremer and Schouten also deteriorated then. The little that was left of the resources was then set aside as 'essential stock'. Schouten imposed restraint by refusing to provide any more anaesthetic. Although there were still large quantities of dressings and certain types of drips, this did not help one all that much in the case of operations. Schouten believed that available stock did not include resources to care for more than three seriously wounded individuals.⁷⁶⁸ The KHO-6 anaesthetist, Zwarts, was somewhat more optimistic, because it would also be possible to improvise. He felt that manpower would be the main limiting factor in the event of a 'multiple casualty'.⁷⁶⁹

However, such matters were seldom discussed with the battalion leaders and one got the impression that it was an issue with which they were preoccupied. If such matters were raised in the course of consultations, it was considered to be the duty of the commander of the Field Dressing Station to raise it. There was a strict hierarchy but the commander of the Field Dressing Station was not the type of person to spend much time discussing such matters. Schouten was used to a shorter chain of command in the Navy.⁷⁷⁰ However, the difficulties between Colonels Kremer and Schouten were subordinate to the problems between KHO-5 and the battalion leadership.

Typical of their relations was a fax which Captain H.A. Folmer sent to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff in the first week of June with Major Franken's approval asking that more fresh food be sent to Dutchbat. In this connection, Folmer pointed to the medical effects which a shortage of fresh food could have in the course of time. A day later this fax was published in Brabants Dagblad and the following day in the national daily newspapers citing Folmer's name. The TV programme, Nova, then called Folmer in the compound. The press seemed to interpret the fax as though medical problems had arisen due to a lack of food. How the fax had been made public was a mystery to Folmer and the staff in the Field Dressing Station. The information had only been provided to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff.⁷⁷¹

Colonel Kremer presented a different version of these events. According to him, the newspaper article was based on a fax which was only allowed to leave the enclave after a week. Kremer was the actual person who had drawn up the communication.⁷⁷² He was unduly troubled by the prevailing health situation and wished to raise the alarm. Karremans was opposed to this. Kremer believed that it was medically irresponsible that troops were on their last legs. They had lost a great deal of weight and were suffering from diarrhoea. Karremans is reported to have then said, 'As long as they do not have scurvy and their teeth are not falling out of their mouths, we can still manage to do with a little less.' Dutchbat's Lieutenant Koster felt that the fax should nevertheless be sent and he faxed it to his father who worked in the communications centre in The Hague. The latter in turn passed it on to Brabants Dagblad. According to Kremer, it was only after it had been published, that Karremans felt a need to send an urgent letter to The Hague and UNPROFOR about the deplorable situation in which Dutchbat found itself.⁷⁷³ This is dealt with in Part III, Chapter 4 of the report proper.

As it happens, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff was already alarmed by reports that amoeba dysentery was threatening to become endemic and requested a list of current sicknesses, hygiene and bodily complaints due to the lack of fresh food and inquired whether the unit's deployment potential had been reduced as a result.⁷⁷⁴ It appeared that amoeba dysentery had only been detected on three occasions but there had been a remarkably large number of diarrhoea complaints, although it was impossible to point to a specific cause. While the lack of fresh food was a source of concern, no symptoms had yet been observed which could be traced back to poor hygiene. However, such complaints could be expected in the long term. However, it was concluded that the battalion's deployment potential had not been reduced. The fax sent to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff only refers to an expected situation which could occur if the existing situation were to persist.⁷⁷⁵

Hegge, the Naval Captain who arrived later on, said that he did not have many problems with Major Franken's leadership. Whatever decision he took, Franken was someone who dared to make decisions and was capable of doing so. However, he gave everyone short shrift and had little patience. Hegge was never involved in any conflict with either Karremans or Franken. Karremans was inaccessible and withdrawn, although this was sometimes true for Franken as well if he did not know how to deal with certain issues.⁷⁷⁶

For his part, Franken said that he experienced few difficulties with Hegge. This had been different with the latter's predecessor. The naval captain was straightforward.⁷⁷⁷ Hegge only saw Karremans at the morning briefing. In addition to the commander of the Field Dressing Station, Hegge also decided to attend these briefings because, as the person responsible for the medical side of things, he wished to obtain information himself.⁷⁷⁸ As it happens, the quality of the information which was received every day from the new Field Dressing Station commander who had arrived at the same time as KHO-6, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, is reported to have been good. Van Hoogwaarden did his best to avoid rumours.⁷⁷⁹

On 8 July, at a time when shooting and fighting had already started, Van Hoogwaarden wrote that the prevailing mood was good, even though the Bosnian Serbs' refusal to permit the rotation of KHO-5 was a pain in the neck to everyone.⁷⁸⁰ Within KHO-6 morale was reasonably high and he was working closely with Major Ros. His working relationship with Hegge is said to have been poor. They did not consult each other properly and Hegge acted rather impulsively. Internal communication was good but that between them and the battalion leadership left much to be desired. Due to its lack of consultation with the battalion leaders, the Field Dressing Station felt that it did not receive enough support. Additional information was available because Captain De Bruijn of Dutchbat's Medical Platoon provided information about the tactical situation in the enclave on a daily basis.⁷⁸¹

One ship, two captains

The two surgical teams (KHO-5 and KHO-6) did not get on well together. When KHO-6 arrived in the enclave on 4 July, the KHO-5 and Field Dressing Station staff focussed all their attention on the newcomers. Their arrival in Srebrenica occurred in less than fortunate circumstances and highlighted the cultural differences between the veterans and newcomers in the enclave. While the team was at the VRS checkpoint at Yellow Bridge for the customary check, the VRS and ABiH fired on each other from opposite hills at the very moment that the KHO-6 team alighted from the vehicle. Just when they arrived in the compound in Potocari, the warring factions again fired on each other, with the result that two people sought cover under the bus, while all the first-aid staff stood waiting for the newcomers. This led to hilarity and comments such as, 'Nothing to worry about. You'll get used to it'.

Shortly after this a bus stop opposite the compound was hit by a shell. Some of the KHO-6 members saw this happen while they were sitting on a small bench close to the Field Dressing Station. They hesitantly asked whether this was normal but now they were told that it was time to move to the shelter.⁷⁸²

On 4 July it was agreed that the new team would adopt a leading role and the old one a supportive one as long as the latter could not leave the enclave. However, according to Schouten, Kremer instinctively found it difficult to accept the fact that he was no longer running the Field Dressing Station and had passed on this duty to his successor.⁷⁸³ Hegge's arrival led to some friction. It concerned Hegge that various resources were not available. This produced the following response amongst the staff in the Field Dressing Station: 'Do you realize under what circumstances we are required to work here?'

As it happens, the staff of the Medical Platoon, which had been in the enclave longer than the first-aid personnel, had observed the same attitude when Kremer had taken over the work of his predecessors.⁷⁸⁴

The two surgeons already had a quarrel about instruments during the changeover. Hegge found it disagreeable to hear Kremer comment that, if there was a need to amputate, one would need to fetch the cook's knife.⁷⁸⁵ He responded by saying, 'Do you think that I have never performed an amputation? I will be the judge of that myself.' However, Hegge stated that he was not aware of any personal argument or competition with Kremer. Others must have started rumours about this. However, they had had a serious disagreement about the treatment of a Muslim woman on 10 July (see the next section). After the fall of Srebrenica they again had a disagreement about the treatment of a small boy with fever and a swollen leg. Kremer wanted to treat the boy with antibiotics. Hegge thought this was incorrect and removed an abscess in an operation.⁷⁸⁶

In the eyes of the incumbent personnel the new team was rather obstinate, with the result that there were constant problems. They are said to have failed to comply with all sorts of existing regulations, yet this team was not given much time to find its feet. For instance, KHO-6 was reproached because, while an operation was being performed during an alert on 6 July someone had to leave the operating room in the bunker five times because an incomplete set of medical equipment was available in the bunker.⁷⁸⁷ The question is whether the former team could also not have been accused of such lapses. When it was noticed that the new team had a different way of working, the incumbent team interpreted this as though there was something wrong with the new team because they did not operate in the same manner as in the past. On the other hand, the new team was not overly charmed at having to hear about the problems the old team was experiencing with the battalion leadership, immediately after their arrival. Yet, like the old team, the new one also had difficulties with the culture prevailing in the Airmobile Brigade. The elitist attitude adopted by the Airmobile Brigade and, in particular, the manner in which the battalion leadership imposed matters without any form of consultation, was also a source of irritation to the new team.⁷⁸⁸

The mood prevailing in the Field Dressing Station is said to have changed significantly following the arrival of KHO-6.⁷⁸⁹ The situation only improved when the old team was able to leave the enclave on 15 July.⁷⁹⁰ Hegge, the surgeon, and Zwarts, the anaesthetist, are said to have had a different perception of their duties than their predecessors, Kremer and Schouten. Hegge had assumed final responsibility for medical matters, and whereas Kremer tried to help people as much as possible while sweating and clothed in a T-shirt, Hegge prepared to perform any operations attired in a neat uniform and polished shoes.⁷⁹¹ Still, comments were also forthcoming from the new team. After the fall of the enclave the KHO-6 team was deployed to provide on-site aid without any consultation. Consequently, medical specialists were taken from the team to lend a helping hand. Hegge wished to be informed about this but was reproached for not wanting to provide humanitarian assistance. Hegge felt that this was wrong, because he was still making allowances for the eventuality that there could still be casualties amongst Dutchbat personnel in the observation posts that were still held. Once the danger subsided, KHO-6 staff also worked inside and outside the compound, and conducted social patrols outside the compound at night.⁷⁹²

Within KHO-6 army staff felt that their naval counterparts did not approach their work 'with the appropriate mentality' and had thereby left their stamp on the Field Dressing Station. One needed to explain to naval personnel that the commander of the Field Dressing Station, the staff nurse and the head of the internal service, all of whom were not medical officers, represented the captain of the ship. In the Royal Netherlands Navy, field hospitals are headed by a medical officer.

Later the commander of the Field Dressing Station also conceded that in circumstances such as those prevailing in Srebrenica, it would have been wiser to have the surgeon or anaesthetist assume this position. A captain from the medical corps could then have acted as his deputy.⁷⁹³

It was reported that naval personnel did not always promptly obey operational orders given by Captain Van Hoogwaarden. Incidentally, there were also examples involving army personnel. An order to serve at a casualty post near the bus station was initially disregarded but later obeyed. The naval anaesthetist is said to have once failed to perform service at a casualty post from 6 am to 10 am. Afterwards it appeared that he had been there but had returned of his own accord. The army personnel considered it strange that Hegge himself had contact with The Hague and continued to insist on obtaining medication, even if it was available in Zagreb, and that he passed on information to the home front telephone network that had been set up for KHO-6.⁷⁹⁴

Afterwards many people cited the cultural differences between the army and navy personnel as an explanation for the differences in their approach which were noticed. Naval Captain Zwarts could not really imagine this. Every person had his own character and this was not overly related to differences between the various armed services. What did make a difference, was that naval personnel were sent on tours of duty together more frequently. The three medical specialists from the navy had worked together both in Cambodia and in the Gulf, and naval staff had learned to operate within a military structure in military conditions. In such cases the commanding officer decided which wounded individuals the medical officers would have contact with. According to Zwarts, the issues at stake were inexperience and the absence of proper leadership. Due to lack of experience, Dutchbat did not know how to deal with the situation. This bothered many people. People had not been trained for this situation. They had been led to believe that nothing serious would happen and that, if anything did, the RNLA organization would be ready to help. In Srebrenica people did not have any certainty and not everyone was able to cope with this equally well. Zwarts felt that this had little to do with cultural differences.⁷⁹⁵ Hegge too pointed out that several nurses had never been on active service before. The difference lay in the fact that naval personnel frequently spent long periods of time away from home and managed to cope with this better.⁷⁹⁶

Problems in Zagreb

After the return to Zagreb, the chain of command again led to difficulties. Command of the Field Dressing Station then shifted from Van Hoogwaarden to the warrant officer, following which a Naval Captain refused to accept any further orders from him.⁷⁹⁷ In the Netherlands Navy officers did not muster and colonels were not marched around. There was said to be absolutely no idea within Dutchbat of how to treat officers of superior rank. While the commander and the head of the internal service of the Field Dressing Station were billeted in single rooms, the Naval Captains had to share a five-person dormitory.⁷⁹⁸ Franken referred to this matter, which occurred upon the falling in of the battalion to hear Force Commander Janvier's address a 'non-incident'.⁷⁹⁹ One and a half years later Captain Zwarts, who had not been involved in the above-mentioned 'incident', spoke to the Director of Personnel in the Royal Netherlands Army and the latter conceded that a number of matters presented in connection with these internal relations had been justified. To Zwarts this was another indication that such matters had little to do with cultural differences but with a lack of experience.⁸⁰⁰

Codes of conduct had led to problems earlier on. On 23 May 1995 Captain Van Hoogwaarden, the Commander of the Field Dressing Station, was sent to Bosnia. He was first introduced to KHO-6 in Zagreb. At the time this team had already spent three weeks in Camp Pleso waiting for permission from the Bosnian Serbs to travel on to Srebrenica. This transit camp near the Zagreb airport was only suitable for brief stays. The behaviour of the officers, some of whom came from the Netherlands Navy, had an effect on other staff, according to Van Hoogwaarden. He was concerned about complaints about their accommodation and resistance to the Royal Netherlands Army's code of conduct.

In the course of time the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff ordered its waiting personnel back to the Netherlands. It was acknowledged that the state of hygiene in Camp Pleso left much to be desired. Respiratory infections which resulted, were said to have been presented in a form more exaggerated than was actually the case in order to force a return to the Netherlands. Four soldiers were sent to an internist in the American UN hospital and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff was informed that there were 11 similar cases. The diagnosis could not be confirmed following examinations in the Netherlands.⁸⁰¹

It subsequently appeared that there had been an abuse of medical authority. No action was taken because it would have been difficult to prove it and it would have happened at an inconvenient time as the KHO team was on the point of being redeployed.⁸⁰² Naval Captain Hegge, against whom this reproach was directed, felt that this accusation was unfounded. He had not made the diagnosis, the Americans had. In this connection, they had noted that it was a pulmonary disease, possibly of epidemic proportions. The return was ordered by the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. Everyone was treated as a precaution and the rules quite simply stipulated that anyone who was receiving medical treatment through the Centraal Militair Hospitaal (Central Military Hospital), was to be repatriated and examined again after the initial treatment.⁸⁰³

⁸⁰³ Interview H.G.J. Hegge, 02/02/00. On another occasion involving the rotation of 42 LBJ who was awaiting their departure for Srebrenica in Pleso, Hegge was asked by the commander of the Zagreb Logbase to state his opinion of long-term stays in Pleso. The camp was only suitable for no more than two overnight stays and 20 people shared a room in the

After spending several days in the Netherlands, the KHO team returned to Zagreb. Again, poor accommodation caused problems. Following consultations between the Camp Pleso staff and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, it was decided to accommodate KHO-6 in a hotel in the city. Van Hoogwaarden and other personnel from the Field Dressing Station remained behind in Pleso. The fact that the members of the surgical team were able to enjoy themselves in the city while the others remained in the less-than-ideal accommodation of Camp Pleso, where a curfew applied, did not help promote good relations. As a result, relations between the KHO team in Zagreb and the staff of the Field Dressing Station deteriorated to rock bottom.⁸⁰⁴

Criticism and action

In a memorandum written after the fall of Srebrenica, Van Hoogwaarden indicated that there had been a resurgence of difficulties in the days before and after the fall. A member of the KHO-6 staff refused to obey an order given by Van Hoogwaarden to go to Srebrenica in order to see if anything could be done for the refugees. He felt it was too dangerous. Staff are said to have categorically refused to provide medical aid to refugees during shellings and had created difficulties in respect of patrols amongst the refugees. There was even a nurse who found it difficult to be assigned duties in the part of the compound where the wounded refugees lay. Partly in view of the fact that other personnel and KHO-5 performed their duties properly, Van Hoogwaarden felt that this amounted to reprehensible conduct which was hardly professional. Within KHO-6 'the sloppiness and negative attitude' stood in sharp contrast to the efforts of others. An example of this contrast was Naval Captain A.A. Schouten, the only name referred to in the relevant memorandum, who had volunteered to assume responsibility for the treatment of wounded Muslims in Bratunac, thereby missing out on his relief scheduled for 15 July. The members of KHO-6 had not been properly prepared for their duties. According to the memorandum, team building had been required outside the hospital where they worked.⁸⁰⁵

The remarks which Van Hoogwaarden had made in his memorandum, led to further action on the part of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff but the Ministry of Defence was not aware of any of these matters. Minister Voorhoeve only saw Van Hoogwaarden's memorandum on 4 December 1995. He described its contents as very serious and wondered what had been done in this respect. He wanted to know how criticism was dealt with, what steps had been taken to improve motivation, training and discipline, and what additional measures were required.⁸⁰⁶

In mid-December Voorhoeve received replies from the chief of Defence Staff to his question as to what had been done with the memorandum of the Field Dressing Station commander. The possible refusal to obey orders was being investigated by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. The Inspecteur Militaire Gezondheidszorg (Military Health Care Inspector) was considering the medical and ethical issues. Other problems concerned the unclear position of and lack of appreciation for a number of medical specialists, inadequate evaluation, excessively protracted absence from specialist practice, and unfamiliarity with some aspects of surgery. The Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army had assured the chief of Defence Staff that the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the commander of the Field Dressing Station had been taken to heart. Training and exercises had been improved. At the request of the chief of Defence Staff, the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army personally went to inspect the personnel of the Field Dressing Station of the Dutch battalion (formerly Dutchbat IV) that was scheduled to participate in IFOR.⁸⁰⁷

A number of issues were definitely tackled. In order to ensure that surgical teams were better prepared, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had immediately launched the idea of setting up the equipment used in the Field Dressing Station in Srebrenica in the Central Military Hospital in Utrecht. This would make it possible to practice and to evaluate the equipment that was available. Following deployment in Srebrenica, it had taken six months before the Field Dressing Station was operating optimally due to the fact that insufficient instruments and equipment had been sent to it.⁸⁰⁸

Later this plan had a proposal added to it entailing that the materials actually be used for three days in the course of preparation to ensure that people were properly prepared when they started a tour of duty.⁸⁰⁹ Although not all surgical teams had experienced difficulties when deployed, in the case of KHO-5 and KHO-6 it appeared that they could partly be traced back to the unclear position of specialist members of staff and insufficient appreciation of them. In the future it would be important to ensure that the battalion leadership and the medical specialists understood each other better. In addition, there were other matters that played a role, such as lack of familiarity with surgical equipment, excessively long tours of duty and inadequate evaluation following deployment.⁸¹⁰

Even before the Minister had posed his questions, the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff had investigated what had been done with Van Hoogwaarden's memorandum. Its Speciale Stafofficier Geneeskundige Dienst (Special Medical Service Staff Officer), Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim, had received Van Hoogwaarden's memorandum on 9 August. He had realized its 'combustible nature' and had immediately forwarded it to the Chief of Staff of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. In addition to the latter, Wertheim also provided a copy of the memorandum to the inspector of the RNLA Medical Service, Brigadier General B.C. Mels. Wertheim had also told the latter, 'This is trouble'. Apart from the ethical and military aspects of the memorandum, something had to be done with it. Mels is said to have passed on the contents of the memorandum to Deputy Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army and the director of Operations Van Baal but this information is said to have got 'stuck' there. Brigadier General Pollé, the commanding officer of the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, is also said to have passed this matter on to his superiors.

Van Baal decided to first await the outcome of the debriefing process in Assen. Wertheim then invited Van Hoogwaarden to provide additional information but this could only occur once the latter had returned to the Netherlands. Van Hoogwaarden provided his explanation on 25 August and this painted a clearer picture of events. Again, Wertheim passed on his findings to Mels. After this, events caught up with everyone in that the matter was publicly disclosed.⁸¹¹

Already in Srebrenica, on 16 June, KHO-5 had approached the professional organizations for military personnel with complaints about the Dutchbat leadership. This team had been scheduled to return to the Netherlands on about 12 May. The team linked the grudge which Major Franken was said to have towards one of its members with his attempts to force people to perform work in the hospital in Srebrenica. However, Médecins Sans Frontières and the team had agreed not to choose sides in the conflict between this organization and the Opstina.

In response, the acting commander of the Field Dressing Station consulted the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. The situation was saved when a message was received stating that no support was to be provided to the hospital until the conflict had been resolved. At the recommendation of a spokesperson for the KHO team, Karremans received appropriate directions from the Royal

Netherlands Army Crisis Staff: orders for the provision of humanitarian aid could not be issued by Dutchbat's Commanding Officer but only by the commanding officer of the Field Dressing Station.⁸¹²

The first evaluation involving the Dutch navy specialists of both KHO-5 and KHO-6 took place on 16 August.⁸¹³ These naval personnel had already filed a complaint with the Director of Personnel in the Royal Netherlands Navy, Rear Admiral J.L.A. van Aalst, about the treatment they had received at the hands of army personnel. This complaint was kept out of the public eye. The three naval captains and one sergeant major said that they had been faced with 'gross discourtesy and improper treatment' but did not enter into detail. However, their most serious grievance appeared to involve their reception in Zagreb, which they experienced as humiliating and insulting. They had not been afforded any opportunity to settle down. These four people had previously been deployed under the auspices of the UN within a naval context and were concerned about the manner in which the army had dealt with them and the fact that it was impossible to arrange a speedy trip home for them.⁸¹⁴

Van Hoogwaarden's memorandum had also already been discussed in the course of a debriefing interview at the Central Military Hospital in Utrecht in the presence of the Commander of the Armed Forces Hospital Service, Naval Captain C. van der Pompe. There was some concern about this document owing to the potentially negative impact it could have. It had been prepared without any consultation and Naval Captain Hegge was of the opinion that it contained several allegations that could not be proved, even though he confined his response largely to what had occurred in Camp Pleso. In his response he referred to the memorandum as 'an emotional kick while the man is down'. KHO-6 had been in Camp Pleso since 9 May when Van Hoogwaarden arrived there on 23 May. After his arrival he is reported to have said that he wished to travel to Srebrenica as soon as possible otherwise he wanted to go home. In this period Van Hoogwaarden is said to have done little to ensure the closer integration of KHO-6 and the Field Dressing Station. He spent most of his time at the UN headquarters in Zagreb which he knew from a period tour of duty as a UN observer. A further source of concern was his failure to conceal his dislike of Croats, Serbs and Bosnian Muslims.⁸¹⁵

The emergence of disquiet in medical circles

Already prior to the debriefing process in Assen on 30 August some indication of the disquiet prevailing in medical circles was publicly revealed. The GPD/Utrechts Nieuwsblad journalist, Henk van Ess, had heard that 12 soldiers of the Armed Forces Hospital Service, amongst them Colonel Kremer, had filed a complaint with the Algemene Christelijke Organisatie voor Militairen (ACOM, General Christian Organization for Military Personnel) about the leadership provided by Commanding Officer Karremans and his Deputy, Franken. They said that they were treated like 'dogs', that the mood was tense and that incidents had occurred. The jokes about the battalion leaders on the Dutchbat radio station run by KHO staff were also mentioned. Major Franken was said to have postponed their relief in response. Colonel Brantz appeared to have confirmed this story commenting only that 'those softies in the medical service should not moan like that'.

Van Ess asked the Ministry of Defence's Directorate of General Information if it was true that Colonel Kremer had spoken to General Couzy in Zagreb. He wanted to know what had been discussed and what had been agreed. The chairperson of ACOM, W.J.G. Gooijers, confirmed that a complaint had been lodged. He had discussed the matter with the Royal Netherlands Army's Director of Personnel and his deputy for personnel matters, Brigadier General E.M.L.H. Termont.⁸¹⁶

General Couzy was indeed aware of the situation. It was already clear at an early stage that there were problems involving the Armed Forces Hospital Service. This matter was raised during discussions involving Couzy and the medical specialists in Zagreb: first of all with Colonel Kremer on 17 July about the approach and attitude of the battalion staff, and then on 22 July with the medical specialists from the navy. It was anticipated that the doctors' experience would be raised in the course of the debriefing process that began in Assen on 4 September. Because Couzy had agreed with Minister Voorhoeve 'in general terms' that no information would be released until the report of the debriefing process had been released, the Royal Netherlands Army and the Ministry of Defence did not respond.⁸¹⁷

Even Gooijers preferred to await the debriefing findings before he was prepared to respond. However, an internal examination conducted by the army revealed that Van Baal, the Deputy Commander-in-Chief, was aware of the contents of Van Hoogwaarden's memorandum. In so far as it was possible to establish, the Ministry had nevertheless not been informed about this affair.⁸¹⁸ The Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff promptly brought this memorandum to the attention of the debriefing centre in Assen.⁸¹⁹

The Utrechts Nieuwsblad published the article on 31 August. It stated that Minister Voorhoeve and General Couzy had given the impression that all was well within the Dutchbat unit. Now this did not appear to be the case. There were differences in opinion about the manner in which humanitarian aid was to be provided. There were conflicts relating to the way in which Franken was providing leadership. These problems were escalating. Limericks were read aloud on the radio in which Franken was compared with Franco. The Dutchbat leadership was said to have rescheduled relief in response to this by order of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff in The Hague. According to the newspaper, none of this incidentally appeared to be true following further inquiry. It was said to be a deliberate campaign of revenge, with the result that, partly due to these circumstances, KHO-5 would only be returning to the Netherlands on 17 July.⁸²⁰

A day after the Utrechts Nieuwsblad had done so, NRC Handelsblad also devoted attention to the matter. Again, it was the KHO-5 anaesthetist, Naval Captain Schouten, who raised his voice. According to him, medical officers and soldiers did not get along together by their very nature. There were cultural differences. Skill counted amongst the medical officers and not the number of stripes. In addition, military specialists received a higher rank without having had a military career. This was due to remuneration and recruitment. Schouten pointed to the navy's different culture. While it was true that the commanding officer was sacred in this service, the moment he stepped into the sick bay, the medical officers were in charge. It was precisely the unique world of the medical officers and the coming and going of patients to and from the Field Dressing Station which fell outside the ambit of military affairs, and this irked the Dutchbat leadership.

According to Schouten, Franken's actions and strong personality had the reverse effect. Franken wanted to bait the medical officers now and then and was delighted when they responded. The result was the emergence of two camps and people ensconced themselves in their own camp. Aid to the populace had been suspended in view of the scheduled relief, with the result that no friction would arise in relation to the transfer of patients. Consequently, KHO personnel were loafing about. Neither

In November 1995 the Royal Netherlands Army's Directorate of Personnel devoted closer attention to the relationship between the battalion leadership and KHO-5. The ACOM chairperson, Gooijers, had requested that attention be devoted to it. According to Brigadier General Termont, the person dealing with it, the fact that the matter was only pursued in November was not due to an official delay but because he wished to have further consultations with Gooijers prior to this.⁸²²

Termont spoke to the people involved on 11 December 1995 and 9 February 1996. The aim of these consultations was to provide a sounding board. Termont felt it was undesirable to have further discussion occur in the media. According to the minutes contained in the report of the meeting, those who were present, agreed with him in this respect. The chief subject of discussion was the irritation felt by the battalion leadership and KHO-5, and the unanswered request to review the decision pertaining to KHO-5's unfavourable rotation. Following discussions with Karremans, Franken and those involved under the auspices of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Termont concluded that 'the incompatibility of character exacerbated by the pressure of the circumstances and events' had led to a situation in which communication had virtually broken down. People were irritated by each other. On the one hand, this produced an uncompromising approach to the question of rotation and the improper handling of a complaint,⁸²³ while on the other hand it led to discussions of matters of a non-medical nature with the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff behind the battalion leaders' backs.⁸²⁴

Criticism of Dutchbat's medical actions

Introduction

In relation to criticism of Dutchbat, this section focuses on what was partly a public debate about the medical aid which Dutchbat did or did not provide to the populace. In this connection one can notice interaction between the internal, within the Ministry of Defence, search for explanations and solutions for the problems that had been detected, and the publicity received by the Ministry of Defence in the period from October to December 1995, some of it highly critical. Here we are therefore mainly concerned with matters which have been dealt with in the form of a reconstruction of events in the preceding sections of this appendix. It also shows that the 1995 parliamentary debate which was to serve as a conclusion, did not mark the end of the criticism levelled at Dutchbat, and that other vital questions arose, which had remained unanswered.

Incidents, the debriefing report and further investigation

On 18 October 1995 the Algemeen Dagblad referred to a report of the Bosnian Government about Srebrenica, which cited an unnamed witness who had been hit by shrapnel on 11 July and had sought medical assistance at about 3 pm. He had been refused assistance on the pretext that Dutchbat was required to hand over its weapons within six minutes. This announcement came from Mevlida Salkic who had previously served as a laundry worker for Dutchbat. As it happens, her name does not appear on the list of wounded admitted to the compound in Potocari.⁸²⁵

Another witness, a patient in the 'hospital of Potocari', stated that the Bosnian Serbs, one of whom was said to be called Goran Erkić, had killed two young men with knives in the presence of two UN doctors on 12 July. Although the doctors protested, they did nothing to stop the murder. Médecins Sans Frontières knew nothing of this witness's story even in the form of a rumour.⁸²⁶ The question is what was meant by the 'hospital of Potocari': the improvised first-aid post operated by Médecins Sans Frontières outside the compound or the plant holding wounded people inside the compound. Admittedly, three VRS soldiers were permitted to inspect the compound briefly in the morning of 12 July but this was done under the supervision of Major Franken and others who were present. There are no indications that anything out of the ordinary happened on this occasion. In response to this newspaper article the issue of medical aid was again raised within the Ministry of Defence and this led to a further examination of this aid.

The debriefing report itself contains a cursory treatment of medical affairs and, in particular, the problem of 'essential stock'. It only states the following: 'It is still unclear if maintaining such "essential stock" led to the death of refugees who needed medical assistance'.⁸²⁷ A member of the debriefing team was not quite as pleased with this state of affairs, because the analytical team had omitted important aspects and background information, amongst other things, about the question of 'essential stock' when it described these operational matters.⁸²⁸ The organization of the debriefing process is dealt with in greater detail in Part IV, Chapter 7 of the report proper.

⁸²⁸ Van Kemenade Commission, Report of telephone conversations following the appeal made by the minister of Defence on 17/08/98, p. 8, § 6.

To Minister Voorhoeve this sentence was reason enough to pose the question as to whether the maintenance of ‘essential stock’ had or had not resulted in the death of refugees.⁸²⁹ The replies to Voorhoeve’s questions had to be assigned a place in the letter he wrote to Parliament covering the presentation of the debriefing report. The latter also raised other questions. For instance, no answer had been given to the question pertaining to the different views as to who was required to remove the wounded from the hospital in Srebrenica. The tension described between the battalion leadership and the KHO also required further elaboration. Similarly, the question as to who was primarily responsible for the wounded, had also not been dealt with. The officials of the Ministry of Defence were given less than three days to produce answers.⁸³⁰

The fact that this was not a simple task, was evident alone in the fact that no answers to these questions were to be found in the covering letter to Parliament. However, the debriefing report had pointed out that the Bosnian Serbs had denied convoys carrying medicine and dressings access to the enclave on several occasions and that, as a result, supplies had diminished to minimum levels and were not enough to allow medicine to be administered to every wounded person in the enclave.⁸³¹ However, the fact that supplies were at minimum levels, needs to be approached with some qualification. As dealt with in detail earlier on in this appendix, in itself it was not Dutchbat’s duty to supply medicine to all the wounded in the enclave but the battalion had nevertheless started to provide the local population with medical aid.

At the Minister’s request, the Commander of the Geneeskundig Commando Krijgsmacht (Armed Forces Medical Command), Brigadier General Vader, who was responsible for the Armed Forces Hospital Service, spoke to six of the medical practitioners involved. The answer that Vader presented, was that one could not say with certainty that the decision not to release any of the ‘essential stock’ for aid to the local population, had resulted in the death of anyone who needed assistance. However, one could similarly not exclude the possibility. In one case it was even probable. Vader also asked if anyone was aware of the incidents referred to in the Algemeen Dagblad. No one had ever heard of them.⁸³²

The Ministry of Defence did not delve any further into the relationship between the ‘essential stock’ and the aid provided to the local population. This only occurred after the current affairs programme, Brandpunt, raised the matter for public scrutiny on 26 November. Four members of the Dutchbat medical service presented their story anonymously in the Brandpunt broadcast. Even though it was not entirely clear about the matter, the broadcast covered two separate sets of facts: a request made by Médecins Sans Frontières for assistance in the hospital in Srebrenica on 6 July and a refusal to help a wounded woman in the Field Dressing Station on 10 July. One of the reasons given for refusing to provide assistance as requested by Médecins Sans Frontières was said to be prompted by ‘essential stock’. According to those who were interviewed, this request should have been honoured, more so because Médecins Sans Frontières had offered them medical supplies. The programme mentioned horse and rider: the person bearing ultimate medical responsibility, Naval Captain Hegge, and the battalion leaders, Franken and/or Karremans, were said to be responsible for the decision to refuse assistance. It was not clear to the Brandpunt informants, which of them was to blame.

It was also not entirely clear what the nature of the wounds were that the woman had suffered. She was said to have had three bullet wounds. Colonel Hegge is reported to have forbidden anyone to treat the woman following some discussion amongst the doctors.

Brandpunt wondered what the debriefing report contained in connection with the refusal to provide aid. It stated the following: ‘The statement made by a Dutchbat soldier to the effect that doctors had not performed an operation on a wounded resident of the enclave, has thus been denied.’

However, Brandpunt failed to quote this in full. A comparison of the transcription of the broadcast and the debriefing report reveals that an essential element was omitted, namely, that it was decided not to operate 'because they did not wish to use "essential stock"'. Similarly, it was stated that the text of the report had not been cited but rather an italicized quotation taken from an individual debriefing statement. Another quotation on the same page stated that the decision not to treat the wounded woman was based on medical grounds and not on the fact that they did not wish to use 'essential stock'.⁸³³ The programme thus exposed a fundamentally weak point in the debriefing process in the sense that contradictory statements were not highlighted in juxtaposition to each other.

As it happens, General Vader was not the first to speak to several of the medical practitioners involved. Following the return of the surgical teams, the KHO commanding officer, Naval Captain C. van der Pompe, had already pointed to the fact that the two surgeons were at odds with each other. Apart from the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, its director of Personnel, Major General E.E. Warlicht, had already been informed of the problems affecting KHO-5, the battalion leadership and KHO-6 by Van der Pompe on 22 September. A meeting had been held at the Armed Forces Hospital Service on 20 September to evaluate KHO-5. The publicity and indications obtained from discussions that had been held, constituted the reasons for this meeting.⁸³⁴

In his letter to Warlicht, Van der Pompe also drew attention to an article published in the Gelders Dagblad. This article quoted an officer in the debriefing organization who, contrary to an agreement not to disclose matters in public, revealed that one of the colonels had refused to obey an order to treat wounded Muslims.⁸³⁵ According to a telephone announcement on 29 September, the Inspector of the Royal Netherlands Army Medical Service, Brigadier General Mels, had also received information about slip-ups in Srebrenica: 'It would be a good idea for the Military Health Care Inspectorate to investigate this as well'. Incidentally, this is followed by the word 'cesspool' on the record of this telephone call at the Inspectie Militair Geneeskundigedienst (Military Health Care Inspectorate). On 3 October the Central Military Hospital announced that Colonel Kremer wished to have a talk with Major General Warlicht. If that took too long or proceeded unsatisfactorily, he wanted to speak to the IMG.⁸³⁶

The Royal Netherlands Army was thus aware of these explosive issues even before the Assen debriefing findings were published and well before the Brandpunt broadcast of 26 November 1995. The Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff and leadership were also aware of the above-mentioned memorandum written by Van Hoogwaarden, which reported the existence of conflict.

KHO-6 was debriefed about medical and other matters on 3 November. Both medical specialists from the Royal Netherlands Navy objected to the evaluation. In their view it was meaningless in the absence of the commander of the Field Dressing Station, who was indispensable for this purpose.⁸³⁷

The outcome of the evaluation has not been recorded. Only a memorandum presented by one of the people involved as a contribution to the discussion has been found. This person said that due to the publicity, which was often negative, discussions and the debriefing process in Assen, he had come to feel sorrow, anger and shame. A certain amount of friction had developed between the two KHO teams in Potocari. Partly as a result of this it had become almost impossible for them to consult and collaborate with each other. Individual actions had dominated the situation. This had exacerbated feelings of disquiet and as a result it had become virtually impossible to provide leadership to this group.⁸³⁸

As Van der Pompe, the KHO Commander, subsequently informed the members of KHO-5 and KHO-6, despite the evaluation, dissatisfaction and frustration had overwhelmed fraternal relations and internal discipline, and they had sought publicity. People's names had been disclosed in public. However, issues and dilemmas needed to be discussed with him in his capacity as commanding officer.⁸³⁹

Van der Pompe had asked General Vader if he would see Colonel Kremer to offer him the opportunity to express the frustrations he felt. On this occasion Kremer related his story of the death of the Muslim woman, which he believed had not been properly investigated. At the time Vader found the accusation so serious, partly because Kremer had announced that he intended to file a complaint about the matter, that he believed he should also consult others. He made notes of these consultations.⁸⁴⁰ However, these notes have not been kept. In 1998 they again played a role in relation to the Van Kemenade Commission as well as in the media. Vader had asked Kremer to join him for a second discussion. According to Vader, this discussion was solely designed to ascertain whether the facts were correct and that the appropriate medical terminology had been used. This was because, contrary to what Kremer stated to the Van Kemenade Commission, Vader was not a doctor.⁸⁴¹ At the time Kremer was critical of the debriefing session because the official from the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee who had drawn up the relevant report, had failed to understand difficult terminology, which had implications for its quality.⁸⁴²

According to Vader, Kremer agreed with the description of events but not the conclusions. This concerned the question as to whether it could be established with certainty that the woman had ultimately died. Kremer was certain that the woman had died, because no further action was said to have been taken in the hospital in Srebrenica,⁸⁴³ even though Ilijaz Pilav is reported to have still done what he could.⁸⁴⁴ Vader felt that one could not draw this conclusion, because no one in Dutchbat had seen the woman die or had been able to determine the cause of her death. Kremer was angered by this line of reasoning. The wording of the report was therefore modified somewhat by adding that it was 'reasonable to assume' that the woman had died. To Vader this did not amount to an unwillingness to modify conclusions but to record the truth as accurately as possible.⁸⁴⁵ Kremer found this modification to be half-hearted: concede a little but not entirely, an answer that was more diplomatic.⁸⁴⁶ As it happens, the Military Health Care Inspector felt that this conclusion went too far, because no one had been able to determine the cause of death.⁸⁴⁷

Vader said that it was not correct that he had put pressure on Kremer to sign the report. That had not been requested but Kremer continued to maintain that Vader had required him to sign a statement.⁸⁴⁸ As it happens, Kremer did not mention this in his statement to Van Kemenade and, according to Vader, this was a conclusion drawn by the television programme, Netwerk, which later ⁸⁴⁰ These consultations are said to have occurred in August 1995 already. The nature of these discussions are said to have been reported in person to the Deputy Commander of the Armed Forces. Because some personnel had been relieved, General Vader was no longer able to say with certainty which person had received a report or whether anything had been done with this information. The request for a further investigation which was made on 18/10/95, was routed through channels other than the Army Staff.

devoted attention to this issue.⁸⁴⁹ Vader had no means of forcing him to sign a report. The Van Kemenade Commission did not hear both sides and Vader was not summoned to appear before it. When he learned that his name had been mentioned, the commission had already been disbanded.⁸⁵⁰

The information supplementing the debriefing report, which Minister Voorhoeve sent to Parliament on 30 October, did not contain any further statements on 'essential stock'. The Ministry of Defence's investigation had only revealed that during the fall of Srebrenica the workload was hastily divided between the various organizations such as Dutchbat, the International Red Cross, Médecins Sans Frontières and the UNHCR, and that this was done on an ad hoc basis:⁸⁵¹ there was little substance to this generalization because the UNHCR did not play a role during the fall and the International Red Cross was not present.

Partly in response to questions posed in Parliament, Air Commodore H.J.M. Groenhout, the Military Health Care Inspector, drew the Minister's attention to the fact that his inspectorate was conducting an investigation into the deployment of medical officers in Srebrenica. He had received unspecified indications in this respect following the release of the debriefing report. It would be possible to have a report ready on the subject by December 1995. Groenhout recommended that reference be made to his investigation when answering the relevant parliamentary questions and that Parliament be given the undertaking that it would be informed accordingly at a later stage. In view of the sensitive nature of his investigation, he assumed that this would occur while maintaining a 'low profile'.⁸⁵²

It soon became impossible to maintain a low profile. The fat was in the fire after Brandpunt, as is stated above, devoted a broadcast to the fall of Srebrenica entitled Dutchbat zou medische hulp hebben geweigerd aan zwaar gewonde Moslimburgers (Dutchbat is reported to have refused aid to seriously wounded Muslim civilians) broadcast on 26 November 1995. The debriefing report did not refer to this.

The Brandpunt broadcast and the debriefing report

The Ministry of Defence was aware that a Brandpunt instalment about Dutchbat was due to be aired. However, the content of this broadcast still appeared to be uncertain. In the event that Brandpunt might request a comment, the Deputy Director of General Information, Kreemers, had been updated by Major Franken. It was suspected that the programme would be devoted to the request of the Opstina of Srebrenica to Dutchbat in April to provide staff and supplies following the emergence of a conflict between Opstina and Médecins Sans Frontières about local personnel. At the time the Belgian coordinator, Catharina Vandeneede, had decided not to deploy any more Médecins Sans Frontières staff, after which Franken had notified the council that he would be unable to satisfy its request. Franken had also said that he resented Médecins Sans Frontières engaging in a conflict at the expense of the local population. Another issue which could be raised, was the time when 'essential stock' were drawn on.⁸⁵³

In response to questions which the Standing Committee for Defence had raised in connection with the debriefing report, the Royal Netherlands Army had already reported on 17 November 1995 that guidelines did indeed exist for maintaining 'essential stock' to cover approximately 30 of the unit's 'own' wounded personnel. However, Dutchbat had disregarded these guidelines when more medicine was required for local residents who had been wounded. Inroads had thus been made into these

‘essential stock’.⁸⁵⁴ This rather general reply was not presented to Parliament along with the other answers on 30 November, because the Minister required further investigation first.⁸⁵⁵

The four affidavits⁸⁵⁶ which Brandpunt held, and which constituted the essence of the programme, also provide an insight into the reasons why these Dutchbat members had sought publicity. What played a role, was that decisions not to provide medical aid were not really discussed, albeit that it was acknowledged that there had not been a great deal of opportunity for discussion owing to the prevailing tension. The staff in the Field Dressing Station only heard the outcome of any decision-making from the mouth of Naval Captain Hegge. They knew that he had consulted the Dutchbat leadership about the matter and that he supported the relevant decisions, but they did not know exactly who took these decisions. It had taken a long time for any decision to be made. Someone suspected that Hegge had disclosed the decision. No one knew whether The Hague had been consulted about this. At any rate, some people had difficulty with the decision not to provide the local population with any further assistance.

What also played a role, was the fact that during the debriefing process in Assen no attempt was really made to elicit the truth. Questions were only asked as to whether any civilians may have died due to the failure to provide medical treatment. One could not answer such a question in the prevailing circumstances. It was impossible to determine this.⁸⁵⁷

Two people who were interviewed by different debriefing teams, found it strange that the latter did not inquire further about their statement that Dutchbat had not provided medical aid to civilians for a number of days at the most critical points in time. No further questions were asked about this. According to the affidavits, someone else was not asked a single question about the events of 10 and 11 July. They therefore felt that the debriefing report was incomplete and inaccurate. Someone had indeed died because they did not draw on the ‘essential stock’. There had been a war going on and, however bad it may be, people died in such circumstances but due to ‘moaning about Srebrenica’ in the media and the ‘carry-on’ about the debriefing report which was incorrect in respect of this matter, attention was again focussed on the image of the woman not receiving treatment, according to the affidavits.

Nevertheless, these matters were most certainly dealt with in Assen. One member of staff in the Field Dressing Station, Warrant Officer F.H. Elbers, stated in the course of his debriefing session that the wounded Muslim woman was not treated owing to the agreement between the medical officers and the battalion leadership to ensure that Dutch soldiers could be treated at all times. On the one hand, this was based on the feelings raised by the death of Private Van Renssen and, on the other hand, by poor communication between KHO-5 and the battalion leadership, and between the two KHO teams about the alternatives still available to the medical officers. Because the shelling of the enclave had already commenced the day after the arrival of KHO-6, the latter was unable to obtain a comprehensive insight into the quantity of medical supplies available. Moreover, due to the lack of communication, the nursing staff and doctors of KHO-6 did not know what and where supplies were available.⁸⁵⁸

Again according to the affidavits, many people knew that a fax had been received from Médecins Sans Frontières requesting assistance for two patients, although they did not know the precise nature of this request. The request became a hot potato in the Field Dressing Station. Later they heard from the ⁸⁵⁶ These affidavits reveal that the junior notary public, M. Bos, had established the identity of the four individuals in question in the office of the notary public, Donker, in Utrecht on 24 November 1995, and that the statements constituted a true record of what had previously been told to the KRO Brandpunt reporter, Bart Nijpels. The questions posed by Nijpels were not included in the affidavits. No names are mentioned. KRO Brandpunt has placed these affidavits at the NIOD’s disposal.

⁸⁵⁷ This is related to the following clause in the debriefing report: ‘that none of the local population died because ‘essential stock’ could not be drawn on’.

⁸⁵⁸ Debriefing statement F.H. Elbers, 14/09/95.

MSF aid worker, Christina Schmitz, that the organization had offered to send along medication, which had not been mentioned in the fax. However, Hegge is said to have announced that aid would be suspended in view of the division of labour and the shortage of supplies. One of the witnesses felt that this line of reasoning was not nonsensical at that point in time. Some of their own number could have been wounded by the artillery shelling of Srebrenica, which had resulted in the death of 11 and the injury of about 30 members of the local population.

Another member of staff felt that supplies should also be set aside for themselves, because they bore initial responsibility but that this should be a minimum quantity. One could not evade one's duty to provide humanitarian aid.

Later on the decision not to help the local population in difficult cases began to gnaw at those involved when they accounted for the supplies that remained. There was indeed a shortage of some types of medicine and as long as Dutchbat personnel were still stationed at observation posts, they had to be used sparingly. While it is true that X-ray equipment, antibiotics and intensive care facilities were in short supply, on 11 July one would have sooner been able to say that it was possible to provide humanitarian aid with limited resources. There was still some leeway because the minimum level of 'essential stock' had not yet been reached in the case of most types of medication. More than enough was available for first aid. Something should have been done, even if only with minimum resources. Yet, when those Dutchbat personnel in the observation posts were no longer at risk, the refugees in the compound were helped where possible.

Conflicts and disagreement between the old and new KHO teams also played a role. Four or five members of the new team were said to be opposed to going to the hospital in Srebrenica and to have felt that it was too dangerous to do so. The others and the old team were reported to be in favour of going. However, another person asserted that the opposite was true: 70% of first-aid staff were said to be opposed to providing aid during the attack while 30% were in favour of doing so.

All these mixed feelings were exacerbated when a wounded woman was not treated on 10 July, particularly by the puzzling manner in which she was dealt with and the fact that she was nevertheless taken to the hospital in Srebrenica without any dressing, where she had to do with treatment by an unqualified surgeon. Hegge is reported to have said that there were not enough supplies available to help the woman. The intensive care treatment she required, would have drawn too heavily on supplies and it was feared that the woman would die anyway. Kremer was however in favour of treating her but the other people who were present, could not assess whether this would be sensible to do or not. At the time none of those present objected and they apparently resigned themselves to the decision not to treat the woman. However, it only appeared to be true that it was worthwhile treating the woman, precisely because little was done for her subsequently and she died.

Chaos reigned amongst the many people in the plant and virtually nothing could be done for the refugees. It was bedlam, an enormous quagmire, and the smell was terrible. There was a great deal of sorrow and misery, and a mild form of panic. With Dutchbat's assistance, Médecins Sans Frontières rearranged part of the hall, setting up a Field Dressing Station and installing lights. Initially, the prohibition against the provision of humanitarian aid was maintained and Dutchbat personnel found it difficult that a single Médecins Sans Frontières doctor had to treat all those wounded people, not understanding why no assistance was forthcoming while Dutchbat had sufficient personnel. It was anticipated that the prohibition against the adapted provision of humanitarian aid was more likely to be relaxed. Something had been done, although this could hardly be described as medical treatment. The odd person ignored the prohibition and fetched dressings to bandage people. Many refugees were dehydrated and required a drip.

Discussions led to tension which discharged itself mainly in the direction of Hegge. Not only was there tension between the old and new KHO teams, and between the surgeons, complaints were also made about a medical officer who refused to follow orders and relieve Kremer, who was caring for wounded people at the Potocari bus terminus. He had refused to do this because shots were being fired and it was too dangerous. A sergeant major refused to join a patrol designed to determine the medical problems encountered by refugees outside the compound, because he felt that it was not his duty to do so. While Srebrenica was being fired on, Major Franken had ordered that a survey be conducted to ascertain what aid could be given to the refugees in Srebrenica. A nurse had then refused to do this, because it was too dangerous and shots were being fired. When others wanted to go some time later, they were refused permission to do so, because it had become too dangerous by then. Because there was not much left in the way of blood supplies, a medical officer was asked to prepare a list of donors. The doctor refused to do this. He did not wish to do so, because he felt it was absurd. To this point, the discussion of the affidavits.

On 28 November De Volkskrant published a report about the Brandpunt programme and several quotations taken from the Dutchbat staff affidavits with a splashy layout. The article also mentioned that a sergeant major had refused to go in search of refugees with medical problems outside the compound and that a medical officer had found it too dangerous to treat the wounded at the Potocari bus terminus. Incidentally, the words uttered by this doctor ('I shall not do that. Bugger off. They are shooting. It is far too dangerous.') were not new and can be found almost literally in the debriefing report.⁸⁵⁹

The fact that a sergeant major had refused to join a social patrol for the purpose of determining the refugees' medical problems because he did not believe that it was his duty to do so, had already been dealt with in the course of the debriefing process. While Srebrenica was being bombarded, Major Franken had ordered the commanding officer of the Field Dressing Station, Captain Van Hoogwaarden, to ascertain what assistance could be given to the refugees in Srebrenica. Van Hoogwaarden had asked a nurse to do this. The latter had refused to do so, arguing that it was too dangerous because shots were being fired. Van Hoogwaarden had then decided to go to Srebrenica himself along with Sergeant Major Rave. Ultimately, this did not happen due to the enclave's rapid fall.⁸⁶⁰

Reactions, investigation and regulations

Responding to De Volkskrant, Minister Voorhoeve felt that, if what the newspaper had written, was true, this was a case of insubordination and cowardice. He wanted this investigated. If it was true, action needed to be taken.⁸⁶¹ The debriefing report had already referred to the possibility that insubordination had occurred. Nevertheless, Secretary-General Barth requested the managers of the debriefing team, Van der Wind and Roos, to ascertain as soon as possible what was known about this matter and to advise him as to what else could be done. The Military Health Care Inspector was ordered to expedite his investigation and to report to the Minister immediately if he came across any new facts.⁸⁶²

Four Members of Parliament, Valk (PvdA-Labour), Hoekema (D66-Democrats), Blaauw (VVD-Liberals) and De Hoop Scheffer (CDA-Christian Democrats) responded during the KRO broadcast. All of them pointed out that one was entitled to expect a debriefing process to deal with such serious matters and noted that it contained gaps. De Hoop Scheffer understood that it was difficult to cover ethical and moral questions in depth during a war but he failed to understand why orders were issued to refrain from providing assistance when medicine and personnel were available. In this respect, Hoekema seemed to be better informed than the higher echelons of the Ministry and the Royal Netherlands Army, when he said that he was aware that discussions had also ensued within Dutchbat about the maintenance of 'essential stock'.

Throughout Dutchbat's stay in Srebrenica the question of 'essential stock' was never discussed at senior levels in The Hague. General Couzy only heard later of the existence of 'essential stock'. He was only informed of this following Dutchbat's arrival in Zagreb, when the affair of the Muslim woman who had not been treated, was raised for discussion.⁸⁶³ One can find an explanation for this in the fact that much of the communication about medical matters was routed through medical channels and consequently did not go through 'the line' and reach the responsible commanders or the minister. Senior officials in the Ministry of Defence first spoke about the problems pertaining to 'essential stock' after replies were given to parliamentary questions about medical treatment in Srebrenica.

The Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General M. Schouten, noted that while one medical officer endeavoured to limit the suffering of civilian patients as much as possible, another was doing the same for the potential military casualties that were anticipated, and that the latter had occurred at the expense of a Bosnian woman. As it happens, the Commanders-in-Chief of the various branches of the Armed Forces remained convinced that the medical facilities of Dutch units should first and foremost be available to treat one's own troops. In the course of these discussions the Director General of Personnel, W. Bunnink, pointed out that it had been agreed that, when troops were sent on tours of duty, they were entitled to a quality of care which corresponded with that available in the Netherlands as far as possible. The Director of General Policy Affairs, J. de Winter, added that UN instructions were based on the assumption that the extent of any care is determined on the basis of military requirements. The provision of care to civilians was the responsibility of non-military organizations. On the other hand, these instructions also referred to the Geneva Conventions, which covered the treatment of seriously wounded civilians if the relevant military facilities were adequate.⁸⁶⁴

The Ministry of Defence had not provided any further written instructions or directions.⁸⁶⁵ No one in The Hague consulted Dutchbat's Standing Orders. The latter stated that a policy of restraint was to be pursued in relation to the treatment of civilian casualties in military medical institutions and that 'in principle no medical aid will be provided'. There were exceptions in the provision of first aid in serious accidents and incidents, following which civilian doctors were nevertheless required to assume responsibility as soon as possible.⁸⁶⁶ In this connection one can only state that Dutchbat apparently did not comply with its own instructions.

The Ministry of Defence's Directorate of Legal Affairs tried to establish whether any regulations provided for the provision of medical aid to the local population. The initial problem was that humanitarian provisions of the law of war did not apply to troops participating in a UN peacekeeping operation, because they were not party to an armed conflict. However, the UN adopted the position that UN troops were bound to comply with the 'principles and spirit of the general conventions applicable to the conduct of military personnel'. This referred to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols of 1977. However, it was not clear in The Hague what was exactly meant by 'principles and spirit'. It was impossible to provide soldiers with clearly defined orders based on such a general approach.⁸⁶⁷

Neither were UNPROFOR's orders clearly defined. The guidelines for urgent medical treatment stipulated that UN personnel bore primary responsibility and that UNPROFOR needed to be cautious about becoming involved in emergencies, as well as that it was self-evident that UNPROFOR would treat wounded individuals until it could transfer responsibility to the local medical authorities.⁸⁶⁸ In addition, there was also a Force Commander's Policy Directive, which stipulated that emergency cases which could not be dealt with locally, could be treated following consultations at a senior level.⁸⁶⁹

Nevertheless, the 'principles and spirit of the general conventions' did not seem to permit one simply to refuse medical aid to civilians, because 'essential stock' needed to be maintained. The Additional Protocol of 1977 stipulated that one was not permitted to distinguish between the wounded other than on medical grounds, and that medical staff were not allowed to be forced to refrain from acting.⁸⁷⁰

On the other hand, UN orders allowed military doctors and commanders considerable scope to exercise their discretion when deciding whether or not to provide assistance to civilians. The relatively broadly formulated UN orders could have been contrary to the 'principles and spirit of the general conventions applicable to the conduct of military personnel'. Nevertheless, The Hague held that an order prohibiting the provision of medical aid did not contravene the applicable regulations. The Additional Protocols did not formally apply to UN personnel. However, assessed in accordance with the moral standards embodied in these 'principles and spirit of the general conventions', at the end of 1995 The Hague held that one was not allowed to refuse medical aid.⁸⁷¹

The Inspectie voor de Militaire Gezondheidszorg (Military Health Care Inspectorate) came to a similar conclusion. Pursuant to the Fourth Convention of Geneva on the protection of civilians in times of war, Dutchbat did not have a legal duty to provide medical aid. Neither was this prohibited, of course. However, based on the 'Martens clause', which is confirmed in the First Additional Protocol, it did have a moral and legal duty to provide medical aid to both civilians and combatants.⁸⁷²

⁸⁶⁸ This refers to Article 19 of the chapter entitled 'Guidance on Emergency Medical Treatment to Locals' to the 'sOP 506 Medical Operations' of 1 September 1993: 'Primary responsibility of medical staff in this Command, is to UN personnel and we must be careful not to become officially involved with local medical emergencies which could take doctors away and jeopardize the lives of our own medical personnel. However, Commanders should be prepared to judge individual cases on their own merits and act accordingly in the circumstances prevailing at the time.' Article 20 provides as follows: 'Naturally BH Command Medical personnel are ready to attend any accident involving UN personnel in their area of operation. If local civilian or military personnel are involved or injured, they will of course attend to these casualties as well until they can be transferred to the local medical authorities.'

⁸⁶⁹ UNPROFOR, Force Commander's Policy Directive, Number (22), Medical (SOP), Part 4 – Personnel, Chapter 8 – Medical, Article 24: 'On occasion, an emergency medical need in the civilian population, which cannot be met by civilian resources, may be identified and treated on an emergency basis by UNPROFOR medical staff after consultation with the Sector/Comd Medical Liaison Officer and the Commander of the Sector/Comd. Due to the operational and diplomatic situation, military assistance may also be required.'

⁸⁷⁰ Additional Protocol of 8/06/97 to the Geneva Conventions, Article 7: 'All the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, whether or not they have taken part in the armed conflict, shall be respected and protected. In all circumstances they shall be treated humanely and shall receive, to the fullest extent practicable and with the least possible delay, the medical care and attention required by their condition. There shall be no distinction among them founded on any grounds other than medical ones.' Article 10(2): 'Persons engaged in medical activities shall neither be compelled to perform acts or to carry out contrary to, nor be compelled to refrain from acts required by, the rules of medical ethics or other rules designed for the benefit of the wounded and sick, or this Protocol.'

See the report of the Health Care Inspectorate dated 12/06/96, p. 11. This report also refers to Section 450 of the Criminal Code, which makes it a criminal offence to fail to provide assistance to someone in a life-threatening situation. However, Dutch criminal law did not apply to offences committed by Dutch citizens abroad.

⁸⁷² IMG. IMG question of 27/11/02 as interpreted by mja/van Diest and a memorandum by J. de Vreese (MJA) and C. Lelkens (military medical care), undated. The Martens clause provides as follows: 'In cases not covered by this Protocol or by other international agreements, civilians and combatants remain under the protection and authority of the principles of international law derived from established custom, from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience.' (Art. 1(2) AP I, see also Clause 4 of the Preamble AP II).

The Dutch legal adviser to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Lieutenant Colonel H.A. van Gameren, also considered the question as to whether a UN unit was entitled to reserve medicine for its own use and whether it was required to provide medical aid to the local population. He concluded that neither the UN mandate, the Force Commander's Policy Directives, nor the Standing Operating Procedures made it a duty for one to provide medical aid to the local population. Van Gameren referred to Force Commander's Policy Directive No. 20, which stipulated that medical facilities were only allowed to be used for UNPROFOR personnel. With regard to UN units, it literally provided as follows: 'They are not manned or equipped to provide humanitarian aid'. The directive only stipulates that people other than UNPROFOR personnel were allowed to be treated in the case of life-threatening situations until such time as they can be transferred to a local medical facility. There was only a duty to treat one's own military personnel. Standing Operating Procedure No. 506, Article 52 stressed that medical supplies were intended for UN personnel. The primary responsibility of medical staff was to treat UN personnel.⁸⁷³

There were however some negotiable aspects to the legal adviser's dogmatic assertions. According to the Dutch staff officers at the UN headquarters in Zagreb, who subsequently studied the relevant documentation, the UN regulations could not be interpreted so unambiguously. Apparently, the Force Commander's Policy Directive No. 20 left something to be desired when it came to clarity. Medical supplies were intended for the treatment of UN personnel except in very serious cases and/or if authorized by the medical officer of the force in question. However, these concepts were open to interpretation.⁸⁷⁴ Similarly, the explanation provided by the Force Medical Officer in Zagreb provided little in the way of certainty. Based on this Policy Directive, Dutchbat was authorized to use all its supplies for 30 days, if the relevant doctor assessed the on-site problem to be 'emergency care'. However, what was to be deemed to constitute 'emergency care', was not defined. On the other hand, a decision to keep some of these medical supplies separate for one's own use was one to be made at the discretion of the commanding officer or doctor on the spot. They were also 'naturally' responsible for their own troops. There were no further guidelines covering this nor historical data.⁸⁷⁵

However, one could find more ambiguity in the UN regulations. The same Policy Directive also stipulated that the provision of humanitarian aid was one of UNPROFOR's primary objectives. While medical units were admittedly intended to support UNPROFOR, they were also required to be 'actively involved' in the provision of humanitarian aid to the extent that this did not prevent UNPROFOR from caring for casualties and patients. This aid depended on the requirements of the local population and the resources at the disposal of the units in question. The medical supplies distributed within UNPROFOR may therefore have been primarily intended for the care of UN personnel but it was permissible to use these resources for patients who would otherwise not be eligible for them, in the event that emergency aid was provided. However, alternative sources of supplies needed to be found for this purpose if units did not regularly provide emergency medical aid, or support mobile services or local hospitals. In such a case the units were entitled to collaborate with the UNHCR, the World Health Organization (WHO), non-governmental organizations in the area covered by their mission, and national organizations.⁸⁷⁶

Elsewhere it was stipulated that medical supplies for humanitarian aid had to be applied for from the World Health Organization, the UNHCR or non-governmental organizations.⁸⁷⁷ The Aide Memoire for Troop-Contributing Nations stipulated that medical supplies and equipment for the treatment of civilians and refugees was to be sourced from the WHO, the International Red Cross and the UNHCR.

Another observation contained in this Aide Memoire was that units needed to maintain medical supplies covering 30 days' consumption in the area in which they were deployed.⁸⁷⁸

When difficult medical questions needed to be answered in November 1995, relations between 'The Hague' and the battalion were at rock bottom. Discussions were strained and there was a mutual distrust and little candour. It was therefore difficult for 'The Hague' to ascertain precisely what the situation was like. This was already the case on the eve of the Brandpunt broadcast. One Sunday Steven de Vogel of Brandpunt called the Deputy Director of General Information, Kreemers, asking whether the minister wished to participate in the broadcast in the evening to comment on the programme about the 'essential stock'. De Vogel mentioned that Brandpunt had a fax from Franken addressed to Médecins Sans Frontières, in which the former stated that no medical aid could be provided to the residents of Srebrenica at that point in time. The Ministry did not accept the invitation but the latter did provide an incentive to determine the precise situation. Kreemers called Franken but the latter said that there was no fax. After the broadcast Franken called Kreemers and again said, 'If you are asked any questions, you can safely say that there was no fax'. This did not make it easy to provide an explanation and led to caution.

However, Franken had apparently made a mistake. This emerged several days later when the Directorate for General Policy Affairs, which was involved in drafting a letter to Parliament, saw the relevant fax from Artsen zonder Grenzen in Brussels.⁸⁷⁹

The day after the Brandpunt broadcast Minister Voorhoeve explained to Parliament that he was conducting a further investigation into a number of questions. The Ministry was already conducting an investigation to supplement the debriefing report. 'All relevant information should be contained in it,' said Voorhoeve. In the meantime contact was made with the humanitarian organizations that had had representatives on the spot during and after the fall of the enclave. In addition, the Minister reported that one of the Dutchbat doctors had presented information about the issues relating to the refugees and the 'essential stock' to the Health Care Inspector, and that he had instructed several Ministry of Defence officials to conduct a more wide-ranging investigation of Dutchbat's provision of medical aid during the fall of the enclave. Voorhoeve also wrote that Médecins Sans Frontières and UNHCR staff had not previously reported that medical aid had been withheld.⁸⁸⁰

Judicial inquiry?

At the request of Secretary-General Barth, the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee analysed the article published in De Volkskrant on 28 November, based on which the Minister could decide to launch a judicial inquiry if necessary. However, it appeared that no legal basis for such an inquiry could be found in respect of the problems that had been raised, and the differences of opinion as to whether medical aid should not have been provided. At best, an inquiry could be ordered based on an assessment by the Military Health Care Inspector (IMG) in accordance with Section 255 of the Criminal Code.⁸⁸¹

The debriefing report, the TV broadcast and the newspaper articles did not provide the Ministry of Public Prosecutions with firm enough grounds to initiate a judicial inquiry into a possible refusal to obey orders. Brigadier General K.C. Roos, who had been one of the heads of the debriefing operation, raised the question as to whether that was an opportune moment to launch a judicial inquiry.

⁸⁸¹ Section 255 of the Criminal Code provides as follows: 'Any person who wilfully places or leaves another person, whom he has a duty to maintain, nurse or care for pursuant to the law or an agreement, in a helpless situation, shall be sentenced to imprisonment'.

It seemed to him that one could not preclude the possibility that such an inquiry would reveal ‘a cesspool’. Publications as well as confidential information obtained in the debriefing statements pointed in that direction. Comparisons would be drawn with the conviction of two non-commissioned officers for insubordination in Sarajevo in 1994, where the personal safety of those involved had also played a role. There was also a danger that those medical personnel who had incited this controversy about the provision of aid, might hide behind the Dutchbat leadership or take out more of their frustrations with the latter in public. Minister Voorhoeve was advised to accord priority to the IMG’s investigation into the medical problems. A decision could be taken about issuing instructions to the Ministry of Public Prosecutions after this.⁸⁸²

Secretary-General Barth shared General Roos’s view that it would be wise to first wait for the IMG to conduct its investigation before making a decision about a judicial inquiry.⁸⁸³ The analysis produced by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee confirmed Voorhoeve’s suspicions. He wanted to know there and then whether insubordination or cowardice had been involved, irrespective of whether or not the issue should be investigated further through judicial channels following receipt of the IMG report. Could insubordination not be dealt with under military disciplinary regulations? Negative publicity should certainly be avoided as this would again tarnish the army’s image but Voorhoeve also did not wish to turn a blind eye to it. This would be bad for the army’s image in the future.⁸⁸⁴

The Commanding Officer of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, Major General D.G.J. Fabius, investigated whether insubordination had occurred. He answered this question in the affirmative. A limited number of cases had been revealed in the course of the debriefing process. Fabius had found at least three instances. One of the cases referred to in the press was not known to the debriefing team. KHO personnel were involved in all cases. The debriefing report did not mention cowardice but in view of the wording that was used, one could conclude that the insubordination was due to cowardice. No conclusions could be drawn about the extent of the insubordination. A more focussed investigation would be required in order to obtain a better understanding of the nature and extent of it. The debriefing report did not offer any firm grounds in this respect and the debriefing statements were not available because of the undertaking not to disclose them. Given Voorhoeve’s view that one could not turn a blind eye to insubordination, only one alternative was available: have the Ministry of Public Prosecutions launch a judicial inquiry. The conduct in question was no longer punishable under military disciplinary procedures because the deadlines for the applicable legal limitations had long since elapsed. It was possible to set one’s own time for the start of an inquiry, if necessary in relation to the completion of the other reports pertaining to Srebrenica. Fabius decided that one could not preclude the possibility that a judicial inquiry would receive publicity.⁸⁸⁵

Official investigation

On the same day as the Brandpunt broadcast a team of officials started investigating precisely what had happened in order to be able to inform Parliament. This investigation was separate from the one which the IMG was already conducting. Initially, a decision was made with the Minister’s approval in favour of an investigation to be conducted by this inspectorate.⁸⁸⁶ At the time the inspector presented a preliminary report (see the section on the IMG below in respect of the various reports). The issues were related to 'essential stock' and the treatment of local wounded individuals. On 28 and 29 November Van Hoogwaarden, De Bruin and Elbers, the Commanders of the Field Dressing Station, Medical Platoon and Arrivals Team respectively, the Surgeons, Hegge and Kremer, and Karremans and Franken were interviewed. The interim report still stated that the information that the officials had collected could only be disclosed publicly by the Minister. The meetings of the official working party and interviews with the people involved really had to remain confidential.⁸⁸⁷

At the beginning of October staff from the Ministry of Defence also approached representatives of Médecins Sans Frontières who had been in the enclave. Some time elapsed before the organization agreed to such contact. In the former Yugoslavia a committee consisting of Lieutenant Colonel H.A. van Gameren, the legal adviser to the UNPROFOR staff in Sarajevo, and Captain D.E.C. Scheffrahn of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, the commanding officer of the UNPROFOR Royal Netherlands Marechaussee Brigade in Busovaca, travelled through the country from 27 November to 4 December with a list of questions that had been drawn up, collecting answers from former Médecins Sans Frontières staff.⁸⁸⁸

In view of the speed at which the Ministry of Defence wished to act, this was not an easy task. Despite an undertaking given by the chief witness, the doctor Ilijaz Pilav, to hand in his answers the following day, it took a further five days and a good deal of insistence before they were available to be translated. Moreover, the response was poor: 15 respondents yielded three statements. The others had not experienced the fall of the enclave, could not be traced, or did not wish to collaborate. Apart from questions about negotiations with the Bosnian Serbs, signing documents, violations of human rights and the separation of men and women, most of them dealt with the treatment of the wounded in Potocari and Bratunac. What was also remarkable, was the inclusion of a question as to whether anyone was familiar with the fate of the family of the UNMO interpreter, Hasan Nuhanovic. No one was.

The answers provided by Emira Selimovic, the interpreter and manager of the Médecins Sans Frontières pharmacy, were the most precise and businesslike. The technician, Purkovic, provided emotional answers. The doctor, Ilijaz Pilav, had not witnessed the care of refugees in Potocari but pointed out that they had always collaborated well with Dutchbat by transferring equipment and providing help in those cases where the hospital could not do so. The most valuable form of assistance had taken the form of diagnosing conditions with the aid of ultrasound and X-ray equipment, and a laboratory. However, absolutely no assistance was received from Dutchbat during the fall of the enclave. Of the 21 people to be wounded in the town on 10 July, 11 required surgical assistance. Six of them died while awaiting an operation. According to Pilav, he had addressed a request to Dutchbat by fax through the Médecins Sans Frontières coordinator to take over five or six (the fax referred to two) of the most serious cases.

In the compound in Potocari Médecins Sans Frontières had been responsible for caring for the wounded. In this respect Selimovic said that she had objected to the place in the plant where they had been placed, but that they had received proper medical care from Dutchbat and Médecins Sans Frontières. This organization had also been responsible for the selection of those wounded individuals who had been transported making up the first convoy of wounded.⁸⁸⁹

The Ministry of Defence completed its initial series of internal interviews on 29 November. The next step was to use them as the basis for drawing up an internal report, presenting it to the Minister and then transforming it into a letter to Parliament. When the report was drawn up, the question was raised as to exactly what the duties of the Field Dressing Station had been. These duties were briefly described as follows: to care for the wounded or dead members of Dutchbat staff in the Srebrenica enclave. While it is true that the centre fell under the command of the Dutchbat Commanding Officer after 1 April, this only meant that the latter and the head of the military logistics division were entitled to issue instructions and even then this was confined to orders for transfers and raising the alarm. Neither the commanding officer nor the logistics officer was entitled to issue orders for the performance of medical tasks.⁸⁹⁰

On 5 December, additional investigative findings arrived at Parliament by way of a supplement to the results of the debriefing process and as a reply to several parliamentary questions that had not yet been answered. The letter stated that the medical care provided during the fall of the enclave had been dealt with 'as comprehensively as possible'. The report of the official working party and the letter to Parliament were identical, albeit that the phrase, 'as comprehensively as possible', was not included in the official report. The officials had pointed out that the supplementary investigation had been performed in a brief period of time and that it may therefore have been incomplete in a number of respects.⁸⁹¹

A week later on 11 December while additional questions were being answered about the debriefing process, Parliament again received some information about medical matters. Headed by the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General M. Schouten, discussions were also held on the provision of medical aid with a number of the people involved, such as Colonel Kremer, Lieutenant Colonel Karremans, Major Franken and Major Otter in his capacity as the commander of the compound in Potocari.⁸⁹²

Although one could understand the haste with which Parliament was informed, it did not help to clarify the issue of medical aid. The IMG had not yet completed its investigation at the time, even though the official working party had had close contact with it. The IMG presented its report on 15 December. Parliament was not provided with any further information about this 'highly confidential' investigation.

The official investigations revealed that the term, 'essential stock' had only gained currency outside Dutchbat following the latter's departure from the enclave. Stock had been maintained at the instigation of Dutchbat's medical leadership.⁸⁹³ It was also clear that because of shortages these supplies had been incomplete from the very beginning. The day after KHO-6 arrived in the enclave on 4 July, the battalion leadership informed the person responsible for medical affairs, Naval Captain Hegge, of the existence of these 'essential stock'.

However, stocktaking revealed that only a limited amount of essential resources were available, after which Hegge came to the conclusion that it would only be possible to treat a limited number of seriously wounded Dutch troops. This was followed by a decision taken in consultation with the battalion leadership that it would be necessary to limit the provision of medical aid to the local population. No order was issued to this effect. Hegge was of the opinion that in each new case one would need to weigh up whether it was prudent to draw on supplies, so as to safeguard their primary task of providing medical care for Dutchbat. The gravity of the situation in both military and medical terms was underscored by the shelling of the enclave on 6 July and the death of Private Van Rensen on 8 July. The deployment of 50 soldiers for a 'blocking position' on 10 July was also not without its dangers. In addition, it was also found that the two surgical teams had different views of their duties, which was also partly due to the prevailing circumstances. KHO-5 had shown itself to be highly concerned about the fate of the local population and had learned to improvise. They imposed few limitations on themselves in relation to the provision of aid. This had partly resulted in inroads being made into supplies. KHO-6 was not familiar with the prevailing circumstances and took over these duties at a time when the security situation was changing drastically.⁸⁹⁴

Naval Captain Hegge felt that his good reputation was being eroded by all the publicity accompanying the replies to the parliamentary questions. He sought a debate with his colleague, Kremer, about the medical and ethical dilemmas during the fall of Srebrenica. He had already contacted the KRO current affairs programme, Brandpunt for this purpose. In addition, Hegge felt that there were no grounds for any accusations directed against the medical officer and sergeant major in relation to their performance. The Deputy Director of General Information Kreemers advised against proceeding with such a discussion. It would simply stir up debate and would undermine the validity of the minister's replies to parliamentary questions. Such a broadcast could serve as a springboard for new questions or even a hearing.⁸⁹⁵

Not long after this the alarm bells again started ringing at the Directorate of General Information. By coincidence it heard that Colonel Kremer was to give a talk to the Vereniging Officieren van de Geneeskundige Dienst (Association of Officers of the Medical Service) entitled 'Potocari versus Hippocrates'. It was agreed with the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army that the Directorate of General Information would be informed about the content of this speech. The Secretary-General was also to be subsequently notified about the publicity risks involved in allowing the talk to proceed. All the ingredients for unfavourable publicity seemed to be present. Médecins Sans Frontières was on the point of publishing a book about medical care in Srebrenica. Ilijaz Pilav the doctor from Srebrenica, who was a friend of Kremer's, was visiting the Netherlands, and Brandpunt was producing a report about this visit. An assistant to the Member of Parliament, Hoekema (D66), and a reporter had already sought information about further investigations which the Health Care Inspectorate was to conduct. Kremer's scheduled talk had caused a commotion in navy circles, with the result that some of Hegge's supporters planned to attend the talk.⁸⁹⁶

The talk went ahead but no incidents occurred. However, there was a discussion, without any clear outcome, about the question as to whether it was or was not permissible to deny medical supplies to civilians, and who was or could be responsible for such a decision.⁸⁹⁷

This was the key question to medical officers in military organizations. That it would continue to demand attention, was self-evident and was a logical follow-on from the investigations that the Ministry of Defence initiated. For the subsequent discussion of ethical questions in relation to medicine, one is referred to the section on 'subsequent opinions about the medical and ethical issues of "essential stock"' further on in this appendix.

Chapter 17

Investigation conducted by the Military Health Care Inspectorate

Introduction

The handling of the questions which had been raised in response to medical performance within Dutchbat was followed by the investigation which the Military Health Care Inspectorate (IMG) conducted into it. This investigation brought new information to light but also led to the question as to what should be done next and whether its findings justified the adoption of further measures. There was one key issue in this connection: the failure to provide medical aid to the wounded Muslim woman on 10 July 1995 as mentioned above. This investigation also revealed several other matters that had nothing to do with Srebrenica, but which pointed to incidents that had occurred prior to arrival in the enclave. On the one hand, they clarified the nature of personal relations at the time and, on the other, they further complicated an already complex situation.

This led to a further investigation conducted by the Public Health Care Inspectorate. This represented a partial repetition of events. It again revealed information about the situation in which Dutchbat was required to operate, and the inadequate preparation for the deployment of medical personnel when faced with the choice between assuming medical and military responsibilities. Again there was the question as to what should be done with the findings of the investigation performed by the Public Health Care Inspectorate and what action should follow.

Both of these investigations are dealt with one after the other. Their conclusions and implications are then summarized in a single section.

The Military Health Care Inspectorate's report

At the end of November 1995 when Brandpunt publicly disclosed a number of issues pertaining to the medical actions of Dutchbat, little headway had been made in the investigation being conducted by the Military Health Care Inspectorate. The term, 'interim report', which was used to describe the document presented to the minister at that time, was somewhat exaggerated. Only one interview had been conducted, namely, with Colonel Kremer. This interim report consequently contained Kremer's views in the main.

Kremer had expressed serious objections to the failure to treat the wounded woman who was brought into the Potocari compound on 10 July. He said that he did not initially intend to express any complaint. However, he had met several Dutchbat members who still had huge difficulties coming to terms with the image of the dying woman and who spoke to him about this. The Military Health Care Inspector, Air Commodore H.J.M. Groenhout, had then invited Kremer to present his story. This was the catalyst for a complaint.⁸⁹⁸ Ultimately, it was Kremer who filed a formal complaint with the Military Health Care Inspector once he had been invited to do so.⁸⁹⁹ In this connection, Kremer did not himself record his complaint in writing. It was only put into words in the IMG report.⁹⁰⁰

What was striking, was that, as in the case of the Brandpunt affidavits, Kremer's complaint was prompted by problems relating to the debriefing situation in Assen. A Military Intelligence Service officer had been present along with someone from the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee and a third person who actually produced the report. It has been noted above that Kremer had been struck by the fact that the latter person had not been taught how to deal with medical terms and that this had had an impact on the quality of the report.⁹⁰¹ According to Kremer, his words were incorrectly recorded in the debriefing report. This related primarily to his conclusion that it had been decided not to treat the woman without a thorough examination. Kremer had wanted to start treating the woman but was forbidden to do so by the newly arrived Hegge who was now responsible for medical operations. The latter felt that there were insufficient supplies and that the few that were left, should be reserved for any Dutch casualties. This occurred on the orders of the battalion staff.

In the meantime the IMG learned from Kremer what difficulties he had encountered with the Dutchbat leadership. He also pointed to the absence of clearly defined guidelines for the treatment of the local population. Because little work was required for the treatment of Dutch soldiers, Kremer had begun to treat casualties amongst them in emergencies and other cases.⁹⁰²

After interviewing 21 people involved, the IMG completed its report on 15 December.⁹⁰³ Although the complaint that had been submitted, only referred to negligence in relation to the treatment of the wounded woman who had been brought in on 10 July, the report could not avoid dealing with an array of other issues as well. The 'bus incident' was also raised in the course of the interviews. Initially, it was only a report of an event which Kremer transformed into an additional complaint against Hegge (even though he was not a witness). The IMG ignored a third fact which was cited in evidence against Hegge, namely, that he had failed to conduct himself in accordance with military standards in Zagreb in that he failed to comply with an warrant officer's order. Investigating such conduct where it involves ignoring the chain of command, is not one of the tasks of the IMG.⁹⁰⁴

The 'bus incident' occurred near Zagreb on 14 May 1995. While on an excursion in the city where it was awaiting permission for departure to Srebrenica, KHO-6 witnessed a traffic accident. A general practitioner who was with Dutchbat, but not part of KHO-6, who was sitting in the front of the bus, provided first aid together with a local neighbourhood nurse. It appeared to involve facial injuries, massive internal bleeding and a collapsed lung. As an experienced surgeon, Hegge should have taken the initiative and should have taken over from this general practitioner. A nurse who was a sergeant major should have provided assistance or first aid to the other injured people. As it happens, an ambulance had already been called and it arrived within ten minutes. Hegge is reported to have said that there would have been little point in providing help on the spot and that it was not very wise to get involved in the case in a strange country. The inspectorate held the view that this argument, founded or unfounded fear, was not enough to justify a failure to help. A captain who was also a doctor, and who had remained seated in the bus, made scornful remarks about the situation but no complaint had been filed in this respect. The IMG deemed this failure to take action and the 'diagnosis at a distance' to be the most reprehensible.⁹⁰⁵

According to Hegge, the 'bus incident' only became relevant after it had been discussed with the IMG in December 1995. It did not have any impact on the KHO-6 team's performance in Srebrenica. For the rest, Hegge viewed the three complaints against him mainly as an attempt to find a scapegoat for what had happened in Srebrenica.⁹⁰⁶

The inspector did not rule on the question as to how one should deal with minimum stock of medical supplies for military units. The minister had been informed by his officials that this was precisely the question the IMG would deal with.⁹⁰⁷ However, upon closer examination the IMG felt that it was not its duty to do so even though, in view of its instructions, it would nevertheless have been in a position to note, for example, that the relevant regulations were incomplete or unclear. What these regulations should stipulate, was an issue for the Directeur Militair-Geneseskundig Beleid (Military Medical Policy Director) and the head of the Ministry of Defence. The establishment and maintenance of 'essential stock' represented a decision of policy which ostensibly had nothing to do with the quality of military health care. The IMG's duty was to assess the quality of medical actions.⁹⁰⁸

The IMG investigation only indicated that Dutchbat had initially assumed it would have a casualty rate of 5%. Because it was impossible to guarantee the removal of patients within 48 hours after their condition had stabilized, a higher casualty rate of 8% was assumed to apply. Due to faltering supplies, the provisions earmarked as 'essential stock' were not enough for lengthy intensive care. At the time KHO-5 based its actions on the assumption that any supplies over and above these 'essential stock' could be freely used for the provision of humanitarian aid to the population. A large proportion of the operational supplies were consumed as a result of the admission of a woman from the hospital in Srebrenica who had an infected uterus, her intensive care, and the refusal on the part of the Bosnian Serbs to allow a Norwegian medical unit into the enclave to transport her to Tuzla.

The IMG wondered to what extent this had been acceptable in view of the halt to the woman's treatment, although it did acknowledge, on the other hand, that one could not stop treatment once it had commenced, as this could result in the patient's death. Responsibility for her treatment lay with the doctor treating her and could not be transferred to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. The exhaustion of supplies had had a negative impact on the mood prevailing in the Field Dressing Station. As it happens, Hegge did not comment negatively about this. According to the IMG, the friction between the two surgeons could partly be traced back to their incompatible characters.

The decision taken by the battalion leadership and the surgeon responsible not to provide humanitarian aid any longer, was one which the IMG considered to be understandable. It appeared that this decision had been implemented with the necessary degree of flexibility. The IMG also deemed it acceptable to have refused to accept patients from the hospital on 6 July. This decision was justified by the shortages, the danger of casualties amongst the battalion's own personnel and the fact that the patients concerned were already being treated by Médecins Sans Frontières. The IMG did not consider the question as to who was entitled to make decisions in this connection, because this had been done by the battalion leadership without consulting the surgeon responsible. The decisions not to tolerate the lengthy use of operating room capacity in the bunker and to permit the further use of essential stock were also held to be acceptable by the IMG.

The IMG was also quite explicit about the failure to treat the woman: it was reprehensible. The situation prevailing at the time could not constitute grounds for not performing a proper medical examination to ascertain the nature of her injuries. There were no other patients at the time and there was ample capacity for an examination. In primitive conditions, even outside the operating room, an experienced surgeon would have been able to install a thorax drain and to determine the extent of the injuries to her abdominal organs within approximately an hour. After this, it would have been possible to make a decision about her further treatment, using makeshift facilities if necessary, or to refrain from this. Owing to the absence of medical data, it was impossible to establish whether such treatment would have saved her life. However, the fact that the woman was still alive many hours later, could have led one to consider performing an operation anyway.

In the absence of corroborating statements by the staff of the Field Dressing Station, it was impossible for the IMG to determine whether Dutchbat personnel had withheld care from patients. This statement pertained in part to the refusal of a medical officer, this referred to Hegge, to provide assistance in and around the compound. The IMG branded this approach 'unprofessional', an attitude that did not reveal any significant involvement in the situation in his capacity as a medical officer. This assessment thus focussed mainly on the attitude of the doctor concerned. An investigation into a refusal to obey an order was not a matter for the IMG.

Without drawing any conclusion from it, the IMG did not have anything good to say about the preparations of the surgical teams. In the course of preparations for deployment at the former Centre for Peacekeeping Operations, the specific duties of a KHO team had barely been referred to. Only a syllabus containing insufficient information for the Field Dressing Station had been handed out. What the precise duties were in relation to the provision of care to UN soldiers and emergency and other humanitarian aid to the local population was not stated or recorded in a medical plan. As a result, there was insufficient clarity about the medical policy to be pursued on the spot and the facilities required for this purpose. Consecutive surgical teams had acted in accordance with the situation as they had found it, with all the attendant consequences.

Nowhere in this syllabus which was drawn up by the Centre for Peacekeeping Operations in July 1994, was there any reference to UN regulations, and where the subject of humanitarian aid was covered, the relevant documentation was contradictory. For instance, it was stated that the Field Dressing Station had a duty to provide humanitarian aid to the local population in consultation with Médecins Sans Frontières. The commander of the Field Dressing Station was responsible for drawing up the programme for the provision of humanitarian aid in consultation with this organization. However, the description of the internal operations of the Field Dressing Station states that the latter could only be used to provide medical care to the residents of the enclave in incidental cases. The Field Dressing Station was only intended for first and second-rank medical care in Dutchbat. The syllabus stated that the prerequisite for this was that the quality of the care provided to the troops was to be identical to what is customary in the Netherlands. This reflected the views held by the Royal Netherlands Army but was barely feasible to achieve in other countries and had not been included in Defence Department policy for this reason.

Similarly, the syllabus failed to cover relations between the captain commander of the Field Dressing Station and the colonel surgeon. The only special duty cited for the surgeon was that he was to act as a mentor for other doctors within Dutchbat. The commander of the Field Dressing Station who was not a medical officer, was responsible for coordinating the performance of medical duties and maintaining contact with the senior commanding officer. Maintaining medical and first aid supplies was both a task for the operating room team, which included a surgeon, and for the distribution team, which included a pharmacist.⁹⁰⁹ The UN regulations governing the supply of medical service goods and humanitarian aid to the local population were thus not covered in the syllabus or the lessons.

In their free time the trainees at the Centre for Peacekeeping Operations could have inspected a field hospital at a far away training ground near Zoutkamp. The members of the KHO-6 team had been recruited from different places and did not know each other. Introductory meetings, discussions about the policy that was to be pursued, and getting used to know each other in training conditions could have had a favourable impact in relation to differences in culture and practice. Although there was contact between the team waiting in Zagreb and the enclave, the situation prevailing on the ground was not explicitly dealt with. The problems associated with delayed convoys were familiar, as was the exhaustion of supplies for the lengthy care of one female patient.

After reaching Potocari in the evening of 4 July following a long bus trip, KHO-6 took over responsibility the following day. The investigations are silent on the question as to why this had to occur so soon in view of the fact that KHO-5 was unable to leave the enclave immediately. On the other hand, everyone was used to a rapid transfer. Hegge did not make an issue of this. Friction arose between the two surgeons immediately in respect of the manner in which leadership was provided and the instruments that were to be used. The people representing the various disciplines within KHO-6 took stock of the potential for the provision of care. They noted that, after setting aside emergency stock, there were hardly any supplies left. This led to the recommendation presented to the battalion leadership to halt humanitarian aid. Major Franken acted on this recommendation. The IMG report is silent about the extent of the shortfall of 'essential stock'.

Follow-up to the IMG investigation

To Secretary-General Barth the IMG's report largely confirmed the familiar 'hardly inspiring impression'.⁹¹⁰ Minister Voorhoeve's response to the IMG's findings was one of fury.⁹¹¹ In particular, Voorhoeve was upset by the 'bus incident', which he described as 'scandalous negligence' on the part of several people. Because the incident occurred as early as 14 May, it must already have been known to a large number of people. Voorhoeve wanted to know to whom it had been reported and who was responsible for covering it up. It appeared that the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff only became aware of the incident following the commotion surrounding the Brandpunt broadcast. It was assumed that the doctor who had provided help, apparently wished to prevent his colleagues from being discredited. He had also failed to mention it to the IMG and was only willing to confirm it once he was confronted with statements made by other people.

In response to Voorhoeve's question as to who was responsible for the poor preparations, an answer was received from Brigadier General Nicolai, by then the commanding officer of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff following his position as the chief of staff of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, to the effect that it was Lieutenant Colonel Wertheim, the special staff officer of the medical service at the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff. However, this was questioned because it bypassed the responsibilities of the commanding officer of the Armed Forces Hospital Service and the next senior commander, the commander of the Medical Command of the Netherlands Armed Forces, as well as the School for Peacekeeping Operations, which was supposed to have received guidelines from the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army for this purpose.

The fact that the order issued by the commander of the Field Dressing Station to a captain of KHO-6 to provide first aid at a bus terminus in Potocari, had been disobeyed, also aroused the Minister's wrath. It finally happened after the order was repeated. However, the matter was subsequently reported to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff and medical bodies without mentioning any names but it remains unclear as to whether any action was then taken within the Royal Netherlands Army.⁹¹²

The final answer that the Minister received to his question about the provision of aid at the bus terminus in Potocari, was that the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff and the relevant medical organizations were of the opinion that the issue would be taken up by the debriefing team in Assen. As stated, the debriefing process had ended by then and the debriefing team had certainly not taken it up. This exposed one of the weaknesses of the debriefing process. The debriefing officials did not confront people with each other's statements. The doctor involved in the bus terminus incident had been debriefed before the person who reported it, and the doctor was not summoned for a second interview. No one reported this criminal offence in the course of the debriefing process. What also played a role was the order to conduct the debriefing sessions in as relaxed an atmosphere as possible and to have everyone present their story as candidly as possible. In addition, the debriefing team felt that there were insufficient reasons to initiate a criminal investigation.

However, in response to the public disclosures made in De Volkskrant and Brandpunt, on 18 December the commander of the Field Dressing Station reported that there might have been a failure to obey an order.⁹¹³ The Royal Netherlands Marechaussee investigated all these cases. In various instances it appeared that no order had been given. The findings of the judicial inquiry were released shortly after the IMG's report was completed.

Naval Captain Hegge had never issued any order which amounted to a prohibition against the provision of aid to civilians. There were two views of another order given by the commander of the Field Dressing Station to prepare a list of blood donors, which was never executed. One view had it that no one insisted on it because the relevant doctor did not believe that it was necessary and two officers, one of whom was not a doctor, had resigned themselves to this view. The other had it that the list had indeed been drawn up after it had been made clear that this had to be done, even though the doctor felt that he did not actually have a duty to do so.

The order issued on 10 July to proceed to the hospital in Srebrenica in order to ascertain what possible aid could be provided to the refugees, which the person concerned had felt was too dangerous, was revoked by Major Franken because shellings were indeed making it too dangerous. A trip to Srebrenica was also not interpreted as an order but as a type of consultation in which the person concerned had indicated that he preferred not to go to Srebrenica because he was not familiar with conditions outside the compound in Potocari. Perhaps it had also been said that it was dangerous at that point in time because shots were being fired.

The doctor who is said to have relieved the person at the first-aid post at the bus terminus, had indeed gone after some hesitation. As a doctor, he believed that he could do more in the compound. He was not aware that he had refused to obey an order and only later understood that the commander of the Field Dressing Station was also his military commanding officer. The concept of an order was alien to this doctor thanks to his lack of military training, which was deficient and had only lasted four weeks. The Navy anaesthetist was definitely at the first-aid post near the bus terminus at 6 o'clock in the morning of 12 or 13 July but had returned to the compound because there was nothing to do. When he was told that no doctor was available at this post, he returned 'spontaneously and immediately'.

The sergeant major carried out a patrol as prescribed for the night. He himself was not aware that he had refused to obey an order after being requested to go on patrol. He had only said that care should be taken when rostering personnel in view of their actual duties in the event that it might be necessary to operate. A soldier of higher rank recalled that the sergeant major initially did not really feel up to it but that the latter had accompanied him on patrol once the object of it had been explained to him. No order had been given. Everything had occurred through proper consultation.⁹¹⁴

The head of the public prosecutor's office in the district of Arnhem came to the conclusion that there had been no refusal to obey an order. While it was true that hesitation had been displayed when the order had been given to prepare a list of blood donors, but this order had been carried out. The same conclusion applied to the sergeant major who is said to have refused to go looking for refugees with medical problems outside the compound. In this case too there had been no refusal to obey an order.⁹¹⁵

Investigation conducted by the Public Health Care Inspectorate

How one should formulate a complaint

After the IMG's report had been completed, Minister Voorhoeve wanted to lodge a complaint with the Medical Disciplinary Tribunal. This did not happen. In the course of discussions held with the Military Health Care Inspectorate and the Deputy Secretary-General H.H. Hulshof, the question was raised as to whether it might not be better to pass on this matter to Staatstoezicht (Government Supervisory Authority). Voorhoeve's advisers wondered if it would be politically expedient for the Minister to drag his own staff before a disciplinary tribunal, because this could result in negative publicity for the Ministry of Defence. Indeed, apart from the Minister of Defence, the Government Supervisory Authority was also entitled to initiate proceedings before a disciplinary tribunal.⁹¹⁶

Formulating a complaint was inevitably fraught with difficulties. Because the Wet Beroepen Individuele Gezondheidszorg (Wet BIG, Individual Health Care Professions Act) had not yet come into force, any case against the sergeant major would not have been covered by the medical disciplinary regulations. It would not be possible to use the IMG report as evidence in support of a decision to institute criminal proceedings. The persons concerned had not been informed beforehand that the statements they were to make, could be used in criminal proceedings. A criminal investigation could only be made contingent to the findings of a disciplinary assessment of the medical actions in question. An additional problem in relation to medical disciplinary regulations lay in the fact that a military order was at issue. Moreover, the territorial operation of medical disciplinary regulations raised the question as to whether a complaint pertaining to Bosnia would be admissible. That would first need to be investigated.⁹¹⁷

On 18 December the IMG, Air Commodore H.J.M. Groenhout, consulted the Hoofdinspecteur voor de Preventieve en Curatieve zorg (Chief Inspector for Preventative and Curative Care) at the Staatstoezicht op de Volksgezondheid (State Supervisory Authority for Public Health), G.H.A. Siemons, about the report he had published. The purpose of this discussion was to establish whether a medical disciplinary tribunal was competent to hand down a ruling. Following internal deliberations in the Public Health Department and consultations with the government attorney, it was concluded that this was certainly the case in relation to the 'bus incident'.⁹¹⁸

On 19 December Minister Voorhoeve then phoned his colleague, E. Borst, the Minister of Public Health, in order to find out whether the Inspectie voor de Volksgezondheid (Public Health Care Inspectorate) wished to pursue the complaint. Siemons had already informed Minister Borst accordingly.⁹¹⁹

Siemons concluded that the IMG report provided grounds for further investigation and assessment by disciplinary tribunal. According to the government attorney, an evaluation was not impossible in itself, because the operation of the Medische Tuchtwet (Medical Discipline Act) was not territorially limited. Moreover, under criminal law a court of law was entitled to judge the actions of any Dutch citizen irrespective of the context or geographical area within which they occurred. There were no grounds to assume that this was different in the case of disciplinary procedure. However, if a court case were to ensue, the jurisdiction of a disciplinary tribunal would be challenged by way of a defence. The relevant disciplinary tribunal would only be able to rule on this in the case itself. The government attorney saw no reason in itself to refrain from filing a complaint because there was a chance that jurisdiction would be denied. The competence of the Chief Inspector to lodge a complaint was beyond dispute. The Minister of Defence could also file a complaint himself but this could give rise to debate.⁹²⁰

By transferring the investigation to the State Supervisory Authority for Public Health, one was indeed subsequently left with some impression that Minister Voorhoeve wished to rid himself of the case but this did not coincide with the view held within the department. It was Voorhoeve's precise intention to tackle this matter with gusto, according to an IMG investigating officer.⁹²¹

Chief Inspector Siemons requested a number of documents in order to draw up a disciplinary complaint, and he asked whether certain issues had been committed to paper. Amongst other things, this pertained to the recommendation made to the battalion leadership to halt humanitarian aid in July, and possible records of the examination of the Muslim woman. This was not the case. Records of interviews previously conducted by the IMG were not handed over, because they were handwritten notes which the IMG held were not to be used by other parties. The available documents were forwarded to the office of the government attorney.⁹²²

In mid-January 1996 Siemons reported that he had studied the IMG's report and other information. He deemed it necessary to conduct a further examination of the facts before he would be able to draw a conclusion as to whether it was advisable to file a complaint against one or more individuals with the medical disciplinary tribunal. Siemons therefore intended to interview a number of people. Before doing so, he preferred to let them familiarize themselves with the IMG's report.⁹²³ Minister Voorhoeve did not wish to consent to this. He did not want to go further than allow them to peruse the relevant passages. He wanted restraint to be exercised when making the report or any part of it available with a mind to possible leaks, so as to prevent unnecessary harm to people. However, should Siemons file a disciplinary complaint, Voorhoeve had no objections to submitting the report to the medical tribunal.⁹²⁴

A complaint of this nature would be unprecedented. After Siemons consulted the chairperson of the Centraal Medisch Tuchtcollege (Central Medical Disciplinary Tribunal), it was agreed that the regional disciplinary tribunal in Amsterdam could consider the matter at a later stage.⁹²⁵

Using the findings of the previous investigation and the names and addresses provided by the IMG, the State Advisory Authority commenced its work. All was quiet in relation to the investigation for some time after this. In February 1996 the specialists in the Armed Forces Hospital Service were somewhat dissatisfied with the fact that the matter had been handed over to the Health Care Inspector, its new commander, Air Force Colonel A.J. van Leusden, revealed. The medical specialists wondered why the IMG had done this, and inquired about the differences in the jurisdiction of the two inspectorates. They also asked what the current status of the matter was.⁹²⁶ Minister Voorhoeve was asking the same question. By this time it was already May 1996. Voorhoeve wanted to know what development could be expected on the part of the Public Health Care Inspectorate.⁹²⁷

The inspectorate was busy drawing up a report, which was to be discussed with the government attorney on 22 May. As it happens, its preliminary conclusions were not quite as incisive as those of the IMG. However, it was clear that its assessment would be that medical performance had been below par. The question whether it must be deemed to be in the general interest to file a disciplinary complaint, would only be considered once the conclusions had been finalized and after a discussion with the people concerned.⁹²⁸ The IMG inspector was under the impression that the State Supervisory Authority was involved in considerable debate about the nature of the conclusions, and that in this connection the question was being weighed up as to whether they constituted grounds for a disciplinary procedure.⁹²⁹

The State Supervisory Authority completed the report of its investigation on 12 June 1996. This report stated that the purpose of the investigation was to determine whether members of the Armed Forces Hospital Service had failed to provide medical care to civilian casualties and whether action needed to be taken against any individuals. The inspectorate had interviewed 13 people who had been involved. The question of 'essential stock' and medical performance during the fall of Srebrenica had been reconsidered in the process. Of all the investigations that were conducted, this one produced the most far-ranging but also the most fragmented report. It should be noted that, like the military inspector, the chief Inspector of the State Supervisory Authority deemed the behaviour of the relevant individuals involved in the bus incident near Zagreb to be more reprehensible than the actions of those in relation to the seriously wounded Muslim woman.⁹³⁰

What follows is a reconstruction of events based on the report of the investigation drawn up by the Public Health Care Inspector.

The day after its arrival in the enclave, the KHO-6 team started to take stock of available medical supplies. The former team, KHO-5, was not involved in this. Impeded by VRS shellings, it took two to three days to complete the stocktaking. Minimal supplies were still available, enough to care for 20 patients who would need to be moved out within 24 hours. Intensive care treatment was no longer possible due to a lack of drip kits, plasma-replacement facilities and antibiotics. Problems caused the supply of blood to stall and artificial respiration was no longer possible. However there was enough drip fluid available and Dutchbat possessed extensive supplies of dressings. It was still possible to make about another 12 X-rays. Hegge knew that there had been a halt in supplies and had himself asked what items he should smuggle into Potocari.

However, the surgeon who had been relieved, Kremer, had the idea that there was still sufficient potential to provide humanitarian aid. It was said that the stocktaking had not been accurate enough due to the considerable pressure of time under which stocktaking occurred. Actual supplies were said to exceed this, although one had to concede that there were shortages and that a great deal of scarce diesel was required to sterilize the instruments.⁹³¹ own initiative these orderlies left the compound and, directed by a lieutenant, made their way along the safe route at the back which had been opened for the refugees. They found the wounded woman on a homemade stretcher of branches and a blanket about one and a half to two kilometres from the compound. Elsewhere it is mentioned that she was found at the third bus shed at the bus terminus about 500 metres from the compound.⁹³³

A Dutchbat soldier was with the woman, as was her husband. The orderlies got the impression that the woman had suffered injuries to her abdomen and legs caused by shrapnel. They returned within 15 to 30 minutes for the most part at double-quick pace with the woman on the stretcher. Her husband remained behind. One of the orderlies subsequently felt that he had risked his life, because he sensed that he had been a target. On the way out two mortars were fired at them and bullets hit close by on their return. There was no discussion about admitting the woman to the compound. The situation prevailing in the Field Dressing Station was confusing, because the bunker alert had been sounded. It was not exactly clear who took care of the woman.⁹³⁴

Apparently, no one was concerned about the orderlies' prolonged absence. The inspectorate attempted to ascertain who had given the order to collect the wounded woman and concluded that it was the acting commander of the Field Dressing Station. According to the Dutchbat logbook, the battalion staff were aware of this and radio reports even refer to the provision of guidance.⁹³⁵

The woman was bleeding on all sides, 'The stretcher was "full",' and she was not bandaged. She was placed in a quiet corner of the plant and not in the bunker, because it had been reserved for wounded soldiers.⁹³⁶

Because Hegge declined to treat the woman, the State Supervisory Authority focussed its investigation on her condition, the manner in which she was examined and the reasons for refusing her treatment. Witnesses were not unanimous in describing what the examination entailed and what the precise reason was for declining to treat the woman. Hegge is said to have failed to examine her thoroughly. Little could be done, because she was going to die anyway, some people felt.⁹³⁷ Kremer, who also examined the woman, was of the opinion that she was not close to death. One could not conclude from her wounds, bullet holes in her thorax, abdomen and upper thigh, that she was going to die immediately. However, she would if she had to wait too long. Kremer felt that the woman should receive assistance. A thorax drain and a minor laparotomy (opening of the abdominal cavity) would in themselves be of help. One would not be able to determine the gravity of her wounds without examining the inside of her abdominal cavity. Kremer offered to operate on the woman himself, because he was of the opinion that the woman could be saved with a minimum of resources. According to him, Hegge would not permit this and felt that any supplies that were then available, should be kept for those Dutchbat personnel still manning the observation posts. Kremer maintains that Karremans supported Hegge: the supplies that were still available needed to be reserved for Dutchbat. Kremer submitted to Hegge as the person who bore ultimate medical responsibility. However, the precise nature of the communication between the two surgeons in relation to the examination and treatment of the woman was not clarified during the investigation.

In December 1995 the commander of the Field Dressing Station had already stated there that Hegge had seen the woman immediately after her arrival but believed that there would not be any point in treating her. Kremer had a different view of the matter, after which a discussion between the two surgeons is said to have ensued as to whether or not to operate on the woman. In his capacity as the ⁹³⁵ The Inspectorate's report is not clear about the precise time. Some people stated that it was somewhere between 4 pm and 5 pm, the orderlies that it was about 8 pm. The Dutchbat logbook contains the following report at 8.01 pm: 'seriously wounded woman, guide for route, stretcher being arranged'. It noted at 8.12 pm that the stretcher team was on its way. person ultimately responsible, Hegge decided against an operation, because subsequent treatment would have required excessive medication drawing on medical supplies that were already limited.⁹³⁸

According to Hegge, his discussion with Kremer had been confined to several comments he had made after Kremer had expressed the view that an operation should be performed on the patient. Kremer had not replied to Hegge's countering questions as to the chance of the time-consuming operation achieving subsequent results and what demands this would make on the availability of the operating room and intensive care facilities.⁹³⁹ Hegge maintains that he had then said the following to Kremer: 'so you want to operate? Go ahead. Those are the rules.' After this, Kremer is said to have walked away without replying. Based on the approach that Kremer had adopted, Hegge believed that he did not wish to accept the consequences yet he had sought publicity.⁹⁴⁰ The IMG inspector, Kloos, also held the view that Kremer's attitude was not entirely clear. He too had asked Kremer why he had not done anything then. It was precisely because Kremer was so involved and felt that something had to be done, that he could have intervened himself and did not need to submit to Hegge's authority, the inspector felt.⁹⁴¹ Captain De Bruijn, another person who was involved, also asked himself years later why Kremer had not acted himself.⁹⁴²

When asked about this, Kremer said that things simply did not work that way once you had handed over responsibility. Hegge simply did not want the operation to be done. Kremer was also unable to operate on his own without an anaesthetist. As it happens, he had not discussed the matter with the anaesthetist, Zwarts, nor had he asked the latter to help him. He had assumed that he would side with Hegge. Kremer also said that at the time he was not aware of any agreement made between Hegge and Franken to limit the provision of humanitarian aid. Nevertheless, in his view a thorax drain should have been inserted in the woman at the least in order to remove the fluid that had accumulated in her chest cavity, and there was no shortage of thorax drains. There were still 12 in stock.⁹⁴³

Hegge told the Health Care Inspectorate that he had examined the woman in the normal manner. He had already been informed as to what her condition was and he merely had to verify the diagnosis. She could not be operated on due to a combination of shock and the nature of her wounds. In the prevailing circumstances her injuries were of such a nature that she would make such demands on the operating room and surgery time – with a probable unfavourable prognosis – that she fell in the category, not treatable. In addition, the shortage of supplies and the impossibility of providing intensive care treatment also played a role. These considerations were of a medical nature. A youth with a mortar wound and another small boy with a large abscess on his lower leg had been helped earlier. Firing had also been going on then. The difference was that their prognosis was favourable and their treatment did not draw on supplies.⁹⁴⁴

A discussion also arose in relation to the administration of morphine. The woman had been kept apart and Hegge had instructed a nurse to tend to her and to fight the pain with morphine as required. A nurse experienced in terminal care was ordered to sit next to the woman in the plant.⁹⁴⁵ Because there was no light, candles were placed next to her. Other individuals stated that the administration of morphine was initially denied and was only permitted after an express request to this effect by a nurse in the knowledge that she could suffer a respiratory collapse as a result. Morphine was administered to her for two hours. She was expected to die within two hours. After two hours she received more morphine. The woman's condition did not deteriorate after the morphine was administered, and remained reasonably stable. The morphine calmed her down and made it possible to speak to her. Hegge saw her once again during this period. He remained of the opinion that the woman did not have a chance. She was in a stable but poor condition. Approximately two hours later, once the bunker alert had passed, an armoured vehicle took her to Srebrenica.⁹⁴⁶

Kremer became angry when he heard that the woman had been transferred to Srebrenica, because he was familiar with the abilities of the caregivers there: 'Her removal would definitely mean her death'.⁹⁴⁷

There were different opinions about who had given the order to have the woman taken to Srebrenica. What is known, is that the Commander of the Dutchbat Medical Platoon, Captain De Bruijn, issued the order after Franken had consented to this. De Bruijn had consulted Hegge about the question as to whether anything could be done for the woman and if it was not possible to operate on her. When Hegge said that no operation was to be performed, De Bruijn wanted to take her to Srebrenica to give her another chance. He asked Hegge if she would survive being transported. Hegge had no objections to this. According to him, this was entirely a humanitarian consideration designed to allow the woman to die in her own surroundings. The woman was taken away contrary to the rules, because shots were being fired.⁹⁴⁸ An ambulance APC left in the night of 10 to 11 July and returned to the compound at 1.23 am.⁹⁴⁹

The orderly who was charged with the transfer of the woman to Médecins Sans Frontières, and who was not interviewed by the inspectorate, made the following statement about this:

A stretcher mounted on an undercarriage was pushed in my direction. On it lay a young woman of about 21 years of age. She was bleeding heavily and the stretcher was covered with blood. Several KHO nurses were with her and Major Ros also stood there. People were speaking and they were a bit giggly, and no one was allowed to do anything for this wounded person: 'she may not be treated here. She has to go to Médecins Sans Frontières'. I felt her pulse. She was suffering severe shock and was semi-conscious. She had had heavy painkillers. I asked again, 'Where is she bleeding?' And the reply was, 'Where isn't she?' I also asked, 'shouldn't you have at least put her on a drip?' However, the KHO-6 surgeon was mentioned as the man who had decided that that should not be done. I saw from the others' response that they did not agree with this. I loaded her into the APC, closed the door and drove a little way outside. There I made a number of attempts to insert a drip in her, in both her left and right arm, and in her right ankle. However, she had lost so much blood that I could no longer find a vein. I looked under her clothes to see what was wrong. Her abdomen and legs were covered with dozens of shrapnel wounds. She had bled a great deal and was lying in a pool of blood from her head to her toes. I thought: 'Do not try to do any more smart things and proceed as quickly as possible to Médecins Sans Frontières'.⁹⁵⁰

Conclusions and consequences of the investigations

Conclusions

The two investigations that were performed, did not differ all that much from each other, albeit that the report of the one conducted by the Public Health Care Inspectorate was more detailed than that of the IMG. For the first investigation the people involved were interviewed more extensively and more thorough research was conducted by exercising greater control over the coherence of the investigation.⁹⁵¹ It also took considerably more time to do.

Nevertheless, the conclusions drawn by the Military Medical Inspectors were substantially tougher than those of the Health Care Inspectorate. Whereas the State Supervisory Authority concluded that there had been a failure to provide a prudent level of care, the military inspector ruled that the medical performance of the KHO-6 surgeon should be deemed to be ‘grossly negligent’, and while the State Supervisory Authority came to the conclusion that three members of the KHO-6 team ‘had felt that they did not need to provide assistance on flawed grounds’ when the road accident occurred in the vicinity of Zagreb, the IMG held that they ‘had acted in a manner that was highly reprehensible and undermined confidence contrary to disciplinary procedure’. The Public Health Care Inspectorate did not draw a separate conclusion in relation to Naval Captain Hegge. The IMG deemed his attitude to be ‘unprofessional’ in several respects. For the rest, it did not appear to the IMG that civilian patients had been denied medical care and/or nursing.

Ruling on the policy in respect of ‘essential stock’, the Public Health Care Inspectorate held that it had been pursued in accordance with UN guidelines. However, in view of the fact that it was impossible to remove patients from the enclave promptly, ‘substantial stock’ of medical supplies needed to be maintained. It remained possible to provide assistance to civilian casualties in dire emergencies and such aid was also provided in a number of cases. The fact that the Bosnian Serbs were able to isolate the Srebrenica enclave at will and could also suspend the supply of medical provisions and diesel, played a significant role in the development of the problems noted by the Health Care Inspectorate. Owing to the growing risk of casualties amongst the unit’s own troops, it was understandable that priority had been accorded to ensuring the availability of medical care for its own personnel.⁹⁵²

The two KHO teams did not have different opinions about this policy and the battalion leadership supported it. However, in practice they did have different interpretations as was manifested in the case of the wounded woman. This was also evident when the woman was fetched so far outside the compound. To the State Supervisory Authority the question was whether this could be accommodated by applicable policy. However, once the wounded woman arrived at the compound, there was a duty to help her based on the rules governing medical ethics.⁹⁵³

Another matter in respect of which the State Supervisory Authority felt that less than appropriate action had been taken even though it seemed that this had occurred pursuant to agreed medical policy, was Major Franken’s refusal to accept patients referred to him by fax by the hospital in Srebrenica without consulting the medical staff responsible.⁹⁵⁴ As it happens, the State Supervisory Authority did not question Karremans and Franken about this.

With regard to Hegge's examination, the inspectorate concluded that it had been too cursory. At the time there was no need to conduct examinations based on the rules of triage⁹⁵⁵ because there were no other wounded individuals. There was adequate time and manpower available to obtain a more reliable prognosis for the woman using simple means. Her blood pressure could have been measured and her pulse taken. A simple laboratory examination would have yielded an overall view of the amount of blood that she had lost. The other surgeon or the anaesthetist could have been consulted. The decision to deny her medical care had been premature. As it happens, Hegge did briefly consult the anaesthetist, Zwarts. In his view, drawing on 'essential stock' did not play a role. He agreed that there would be no point in providing treatment. It would have been impossible to provide the woman with the best possible treatment. According to Zwarts, poor communication played a dominant role.⁹⁵⁶

The State Supervisory Authority deemed it reasonable to assume that the stressful circumstances of the time had an impact on the haste with which this decision had been made. The inspectorate found that there were insufficient grounds to sustain a complaint before a medical disciplinary tribunal. The team's internal division was reflected in its contradictory reasons for transferring her to Srebrenica in dangerous conditions in the middle of the night.⁹⁵⁷ Apart from the nature of her wounds and the shock the woman was suffering, the situation which Hegge experienced as dangerous and threatening, also played a role. Hegge's perception of the prevailing situation is said to have had a dominant impact, which saw him take into account that he might be required to provide aid to Dutch troops at any time.⁹⁵⁸ What was not mentioned in this respect was that Private Van Renssen had died while being treated by KHO-6 on 8 July. Now the team was again facing the prospect that casualties might fall amongst its own troops.

The State Supervisory Authority also concluded that preparations for the deployment of KHO-6 had not been optimum. Its members had been recruited from the three branches of the Armed Forces. Military personnel of varying backgrounds were brought together in a single team. There were also differences in their professional and operational experience in relation to deployment. Several nurses had held an administrative position for years and had insufficient practical experience. The team was poorly prepared for its actual duties in the enclave. It was remarkable that little or no time had been devoted to team development. Nothing had been said about the provision of humanitarian aid to the local population and most members were not familiar with UN guidelines. Due to the major differences in their background, experience and the information they had at their disposal, the members of the team had varying expectations of their duties in the Field Dressing Station. Not everyone had realized that medical and military responsibilities could produce conflicting interests. No attention had been devoted to this problem during the preparations for their deployment. A military doctor could see himself placed in a situation with conflicting interests: the interests of a civilian in a dire emergency and those relating to his duty of care within his own military organization in the sense of providing care to soldiers where necessary, and his responsibility in so far as it related to the creation and maintenance of the medical prerequisites for the performance of Dutchbat's mission. The UN guidelines did not offer a solution for this dilemma. In practice, one was required to make one's own choices, for which one could subsequently be held accountable.⁹⁵⁹

The consequences of the investigations

Informing Parliament about the findings of the investigation conducted by the Public Health Care Inspectorate was a task for the Minister of Defence. A nameless version of the inspectorate's report ⁹⁵⁵ The inspectorate's report defines triage as 'selection and ordering, for example of casualties in a disaster or a war based on the nature and gravity of their wounds' (p.49).

was released for public consumption. Chief Inspector Siemons provided an explanation in Brandpunt. This was expected to generate a positive tenor, as explained to Voorhoeve by his officials. To be sure a number of less fortunate matters were covered but the medical teams had done much for the civilian population.⁹⁶⁰ However, the outcome was different. In particular, the harsh comments that Siemons uttered about the military doctors, were broadcast. However, his remark that ‘Humanitarian aid was provided on a large scale, also during the shellings’, which had been recorded on tape twice, was not broadcast contrary to what Siemons had agreed with Brandpunt.⁹⁶¹

On 14 June Minister Voorhoeve presented the findings of the investigation to Parliament. Voorhoeve shared Siemons’ conclusion that there were insufficient grounds to file a complaint with the Medical Disciplinary Tribunal. In addition, Voorhoeve pointed out that preparations for medical units had since been radically changed. Special attention was devoted to dealing with medical aid in situations of war and its ethical aspects in a medical context. Attention was also devoted to the hierarchical position of medical teams in the military command structure, albeit without specifying what this was. Duties of medical officers were primarily within their military unit. Nevertheless, they had a duty to act in accordance with their professional oath. The UN guidelines offered no means of resolving this dilemma. ‘They only reflect it,’ Voorhoeve stated.⁹⁶²

Virtually all attention was directed towards the assessment of the individual actions of two doctors. The underlying question as to whether one was justified to maintain medical supplies solely for the use of one’s own unit, was not referred to in the letter addressed to Parliament. Incidentally, the Public Health Care Inspectorate had stated in its report that, owing to the increasing chance that the unit’s own troops would suffer casualties, priority had been given to ensuring the availability of medical care for its own personnel for understandable reasons.⁹⁶³ Unlike the Brandpunt programme covering the Public Health Care Inspector’s report, the press hardly devoted any attention to the inspectorate’s report and Voorhoeve’s letter to Parliament following the upheaval six months earlier.⁹⁶⁴

Accountability remained a thorny issue in many respects, even after Parliament had been informed. The Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Navy, Vice Admiral L. Kroon, pointed out that those involved should have understood from the relevant newspaper reports that an investigation had been launched and those around them could have deduced who was its subject. In view of the uncompromising conclusions drawn by the IMG, Vice Admiral Kroon also expressed his concern about the manner in which the IMG had conducted its investigation. Any investigation that had implications for one’s legal position in relation to criminal law and medical disciplinary regulations, needed to be conducted with the necessary procedural guarantees in place and, according to him, this had not occurred adequately in this case. The purpose and status of the committee which performed the investigation for the IMG, had not been fully clarified. The right to hear and be heard had not been respected and the relevant documents had not been presented for inspection. Statements had not been committed to paper and had not been open for perusal. Initially, those involved had not been given the opportunity to seek legal assistance. Similarly, they had not been presented with the opportunity to have the conclusions of the inspectorate’s surgical consultant submitted for a counter-appraisal in the surgical field. The navy personnel who found themselves in the dock, perceived the investigation to be exceptionally unfair. When they were first interviewed by the inspector himself, Air Commodore Groenhout,⁹⁶⁵ only those passages relating to them, which had been taken from a report that had apparently already been completed, were read to them. The surgeon and the assistant doctor who were at the centre of attention, were interviewed on 18 and 19 December, while the draft report had already been presented to the minister on 15 December, albeit on the understanding that some amendments might be required once those involved had been informed of its contents, even though it was not anticipated that this would have any effect on its conclusions. However, according to Admiral Kroon, new facts were raised in that interview, which were 'therefore not' included in the report.⁹⁶⁶

It was also remarkable that in addition to the IMG Groenhout, Siemons, the Public Health Care Inspector, was present at the final discussion of the report with Hegge. One could conclude from this that neither the IMG investigation nor the later one performed by the State Supervisory Authority were conducted independently of each other and that the Public Health Care Inspector was not impartial when he commenced his investigation, a conclusion which the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Navy and Hegge did not come to, as it happens. Siemons had asked the IMG whether the latter had any objections to his presence, so that he could hear both sides of the case before investigating the facts himself. Any barrier separating the two investigations was also breached in that the IMG's full report was sent to Siemons at his request.⁹⁶⁷

Air Commodore Groenhout, the IMG, who felt rather under attack by the Navy,⁹⁶⁸ defended himself by saying that whatever had been published in the press, was not covered by his investigation. In response to the assertion that the investigation was not based on applicable regulations, one of those involved had maintained this, Groenhout argued that it was his duty to assess the quality of medical performance on the part of Defence Department personnel. The IMG had the power to decide to report on this to the minister and the chief inspector for Public Health Care. This had been done in view of the gravity of the matter. Ultimately, the decision to investigate the matter in relation to disciplinary procedures or criminal law would only be taken after this. It was not customary to receive support from advisers at this stage. During interviews held before the completion of the report, those concerned were questioned and presented with facts and circumstances drawn from previous witnesses' testimony.⁹⁶⁹

In his explanation to the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Navy, Secretary-General Barth stated that, together with S. Ybema, the Director of Legal Affairs, W. Bunnik, the Director General of Personnel, and the Military Health Care Inspector, he had pondered how to ensure that the alleged perpetration of reprehensible acts were investigated as carefully as possible. A decision had been taken precisely against an approach involving aspects of disciplinary procedure and criminal law. With the minister's approval it was initially decided that the IMG would conduct an investigation adopting the same approach as that of the State Supervisory Authority. This meant that those involved were presented with statements or documents which they could respond to during an interview with the IMG. Statements did not have to be committed to paper but were incorporated into the report. Formal requirements such as those stipulated in procedural law, only applied in the case of medical disciplinary regulations. It was permissible to use the IMG report in a case heard by a disciplinary tribunal but not in criminal proceedings.⁹⁷⁰ The navy had presented objections against the fact that the IMG report, which had been classified as highly confidential, had been publicly disclosed.⁹⁷¹

Following in the footsteps of the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Navy, Hegge's legal adviser was also critical of the manner in which the IMG's report had been produced. It had only been stated beforehand that this investigation was being conducted by order of the Minister of Defence and that it would cover the performance of the KHO teams. It subsequently appeared that the investigation had focussed on the medical and ethical aspects of the actions of two medical officers. Inspector Groenhout had objected to a written response and the legal adviser was of the opinion that this was due to the fact that the minister had presented the findings of the investigation to Parliament on the same day (19 December 1995).⁹⁷² According to Groenhout, Hegge's view of the investigation was also presented to the Secretary-General on 19 December.⁹⁷³

Although the minister had been informed when the IMG report was released on 15 December, that it was possible that it might be amended, this did not happen. According to the legal adviser, the report did not do justice to the situation and the difficult circumstances, more so because no clear instructions were provided: 'An apparent lack of understanding and experience on the part of the Ministry of Defence in these types of situations was to blame for the fact that the military personnel who were deployed, were sent into war or dangerous situations without adequate preparation'. This was exacerbated by the fact that Hegge, who had experienced such deployment before, had requested clear guidelines. Hegge had held Dutchbat's interests paramount and had sought to ensure their medical care before anything else.⁹⁷⁴

The report that massive air strikes would be launched and that there was a chance that the VRS would fire on Dutch positions as a reprisal for these air strikes, was not stated as a consideration in the IMG's report. Similarly, Hegge could not agree with the IMG's medical assessment. According to him, an incision in the abdominal wall would not shed any light on the nature of any internal injuries and it would have been impossible to conduct another examination on the compound for the purpose of making a diagnosis.⁹⁷⁵

On the other hand, Minister Voorhoeve described the Public Health Care Inspectorate's report as 'thorough and extensive'. He agreed with the report's conclusions and concurred with the conclusion that the medical performance of the surgeon and the doctor assisting him had been deficient.⁹⁷⁶

Bunnink, the Director-General of Personnel also felt that that the report was beyond reproach. The inspectorate had made due allowance for the circumstances in which these actions had occurred.⁹⁷⁷ However, the Ministry of Defence had expressed internal criticism in this respect. The conclusions were cursory precisely in respect of an essential matter such as that of conditions of war. However, the report was there. At the Public Health Care Inspectorate's request, the draft had been discussed with Groenhout, Bunnink, the director general of Personnel, and the Inspector of the Navy Medical Service, Naval Captain E.H.D. Romswinkel.⁹⁷⁸

Again the question was raised as to what needed to be done now. The State Supervisory Authority recommended that no complaint be filed with the Medical Disciplinary Tribunal. In order to do so, the interests of the public health needed to be at stake with the chance of a recurrence. While it was true that the Minister of Defence was entitled to lodge a complaint, its feasibility was a different question. The inspector, the legal adviser to the inspectorate and the state attorney consulted each other about this. The hurdle to be taken remained the question whether medical disciplinary regulations applied in another country. In the meantime those concerned believed that it did but the defence would contest this. In addition, the experts were of the opinion that, based on the inspectorate's findings, it was doubtful whether anyone would be held to be liable, if this was the intention. Bunnink, the Director-General of Personnel, also advised against proceedings before a disciplinary tribunal, more importantly because such a case would make it impossible to close the 'srebrenica file' for a long period of time.⁹⁷⁹

When action had already been considered following the release of the IMG report, the Minister of Defence had contemplated suspension but had decided against this. Given the findings of a report which he felt was more lenient, one could not again opt for a suspension, more so because the State

Supervisory Authority was not overly keen to defend the matter in the courts.⁹⁸⁰ Without a disciplinary tribunal holding someone accountable, it would not be opportune to take legal action.⁹⁸¹

That was not yet the end of the matter to the Ministry of Defence. Allusions were still being made to taking action against others who were the subject of negative conclusions in the report of the State Supervisory Authority. However, no criminal offences were detected. The actions in question had occurred far too long ago for the application of military or other disciplinary regulations and misconduct was required before administrative action could be taken.⁹⁸² No evidence had been presented of any. The State Supervisory Authority saw no reason to file a complaint with a disciplinary tribunal. No negative action or conduct on the part of the persons involved had previously been established.⁹⁸³ After weighing up everything, it seemed best to Voorhoeve that the relevant Commanders-in-Chief speak to the people involved, express disapproval of their actions and inform them that a more humane approach was expected of Defence Department doctors. This was even more relevant in the case of the bus incident, when there had been no threat.⁹⁸⁴ Naval Captain Hegge was informed by the Royal Navy director of personnel that his principles did not accord with those of the Ministry of Defence.⁹⁸⁵

Hegge's legal adviser informed the Public Health Care Inspectorate that he contested the accuracy of the conclusions. Although it had been concluded that culpable actions had been committed, owing to the threat of the prevailing conditions of war this was not enough to bring a case before the Medical Disciplinary Tribunal. These conditions of war should have been considered when dealing with the question as to whether there had been culpable behaviour. Conditions of war did not constitute a defence but were an element to be considered in any decision-making as to whether culpable actions had been performed. However, in any case where the inspectorate had decided not to file a complaint, Hegge did not have an interest in pursuing any action of his own.⁹⁸⁶

However, Hegge did contemplate the possibility of having Siemons' statement considered by a disciplinary tribunal but refrained from proceeding. The conclusions that had been drawn, did not have any legal implications for him. He wanted the matter closed. According to Hegge, there was a feeling within the navy that there had to be a scapegoat. He felt overwhelmed by the inquiries and had landed up in a situation for which no one was prepared. They had not been briefed on UN guidelines and only after their return to the Netherlands did it become apparent that the chain of command for medical matters did not run from Potocari to The Hague, but that there was also a UN chain of command which ran to Sarajevo and Zagreb via Tuzla. This had not been clarified either at the School for Peacekeeping Operations or in the course of exploratory visits to the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff and the UNPF unit in Zagreb. KHO-6 and Major Franken had consulted and agreed with each other on priorities. Hegge had made a choice and had opted in favour of helping potential Dutchbat casualties. This was the essence of the matter to him. He felt that in this respect he had the support of Major Franken and his two naval colleagues. He had made that choice. It was quite permissible to assess this but in the light of the prevailing circumstances.⁹⁸⁷

It was the opinion of the IMG inspector, Kloos, that Hegge and Kremer had adopted a different approach. Something could be said for either. Hegge's approach was better from a military point of view, Kremer's from a human perspective. 'Imagine being in such a situation yourself. It is easy to talk from the comfort of your armchair.' In connection with this assessment one should not lose sight of the fact that the IMG did not so much hold it against Hegge that he had not treated the woman but that he had failed to examine her properly. His suspicion that the woman was bleeding internally and that this would result in her death within several hours, later appeared to have been unfounded.⁹⁸⁸

Further judicial inquiry

The matter still did not end for those involved following the publication of the Public Health Care Inspector's report. In 1998, after debriefing Statement of Facts (Feitenrelaas) became known the Public Prosecutor's Office in Arnhem decided to conduct a preparatory judicial inquiry with a view to determining whether the denial of care to the wounded in Srebrenica and Potocari on about 11 July 1995 constituted a criminal act or situation. This was to be carried out by the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee. The inquiry commenced on 31 May 1999. The following six matters were considered:

1. The death of a Muslim child following the premature removal of a drip due to negligence or incompetence;
2. The refusal to treat or operate on a wounded woman in Srebrenica in connection with keeping 'essential stock' intact;
3. The refusal to accept two seriously wounded people from Médecins Sans Frontières in Srebrenica;
4. The failure to treat a bullet wound in the leg of a Muslim fighter or to provide aid to a large number of seriously wounded individuals in connection with a lack of medical supplies;
5. The failure to amputate a man's leg after it had turned blue due to inadequate blood circulation;
6. The failure of two doctors to provide medical treatment to two road accident victims near Zagreb in May 1995.

With the exception of the last point, all these matters had been taken from the Statement of Facts. In addition, the inquiry also sought to gather information about deaths due to the denial of medical care to injured individuals.⁹⁸⁹

Although the so-called 'sebra [sic] Care Team' of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee interviewed a large number of people in the relevant medical field of operations in the matter of 'withholding care', this yielded little in the way of results. Most of them were not aware of these matters, had heard about them through hearsay, had only heard about them on their return to the Netherlands in some cases, or believed that they had occurred during the fall of the enclave, while this was not the case. Although it was conducted more than four years after the debriefing process and the compilation of the Statement of Facts, this judicial inquiry also confirms that many incidents were derived from secondary sources. There were only two cases where clear-cut answers were given to questions, because people who had been directly involved, were able to present the ins and outs of the matter.

The death of the Muslim child occurred in January 1995 during Dutchbat II's tour of duty. In fact, there were two cases. A nine-year-old boy was accidentally knocked down by a four-tonne vehicle. He was taken to the Field Dressing Station with serious head injuries. Artificial respiration was applied and he received multiple drips but his injuries were inoperable. The boy died the next day and the drips that had been attached to him, were removed.

The second death was that of a baby several months old. KHO-4 took over responsibility from this baby at the request of the hospital in Srebrenica. The baby was unable to eat or drink. A drip was attached to the child but it accidentally fell out at one stage, possibly when its mother took it in her arms. A new drip was then attached to it, which was not an easy matter in view of the child's small blood vessels. After being treated in the compound for two weeks, it appeared that any further treatment was impossible. The child was returned to the Srebrenica hospital in consultation with Médecins Sans Frontières. Its condition was reasonably stable at the time. The drip remained attached during the transfer. However, the child died several days later.⁹⁹⁰

The inquiry made little headway in respect of the failure to treat the ABiH soldier's bullet wound. The problem was that it was often not known whether someone was a member of the ABiH or not. One witness stated that, following consultation between Colonels Kremer and Schouten, it was decided to put the individual's leg in plaster. Someone else believed that there had been an argument about the treatment. Again, another person said he knew that someone with a bullet wound had been brought in but had heard that he had not been treated. The Royal Netherlands Marechaussee did not investigate a statement made by one witness who had heard that several ABiH soldiers had been standing at the gate to the compound in Potocari, one of whom was wounded, and that who had been sent back.

However, the Marechaussee did manage to find out what orders had been issued to the sentries at the gate to the compound in Potocari. They stated that wounded civilians and patients had to remain outside. The Field Dressing Station was then to be notified and a doctor would be sent. The latter would assess the patient's condition. If admission was required, the doctor accompanied the injured individual in question.⁹⁹¹ It was not stated why these orders were appended to the official report. Perhaps this was related to the case of the wounded Muslim woman who was collected and brought to the compound on 10 July contrary to the relevant regulations. However, the Department of Justice did not investigate the failure to treat this woman and were content with a reference to the investigations conducted by the Military Health Care Inspector and the Public Health Care Inspectorate Clarification was also forthcoming in the matter of the failure to amputate a leg that had turned blue. This happened in the hospital in Bratunac. The man in question had a bullet wound and had been treated with antibiotics for four days. Due to the lack of surgical facilities in Bratunac, the people there were faced with the problem as to what they should do next. Although anaesthetics were available, there was no equipment. However, the medical staff in Bratunac was saved from having to decide to perform an amputation themselves using improvised equipment, when an International Red Cross convoy arrived and took the patient to Tuzla.⁹⁹² Apart from several relevant remarks based on UN regulations, the judicial inquiries did not devote special attention to the issue of 'essential stock'. It is also remarkable to note that the battalion leadership was not interviewed. This would have been appropriate in the case of the refusal to accept patients from Médecins Sans Frontières without notifying the medical service. The battalion leaders were also not interviewed as part of the investigations conducted by the Military Health Care Inspectorate and the Public Health Care Inspectorate.

Chapter 20

Subsequent opinions about the medical and ethical issues of 'essential stock'

When Minister Voorhoeve presented the Public Health Care Inspectorate's report to Parliament on 14 June 1996, he pointed out that the 'interests of civilians in a dire emergency and those pertaining to the duty of care within our own organization' represented a dilemma that was as yet unresolved. Military doctors had a primary duty within their military unit. Nevertheless, they had an obligation to act in accordance with their Hippocratic oath. UN guidelines did not provide a solution for this dilemma, with the result that the Dutchbat medical personnel were faced with it.⁹⁹³

In stating this, the Minister was presenting more of a moral than a legal argument. Only the applicable legislation and regulations applied in the case of a legal assessment. At any rate, the aftermath of Srebrenica generated intense discussion of medical and ethical issues, partly because the regulations and professional codes of conduct for individual care givers did not present clear-cut answers. Medical and military duties clashed. Vague chains of command, conflicting interests, chaotic circumstances and panic responses could cause confusion. Different situations could produce different solutions, because the line of reasoning adopted by individual caregivers can play a role, as can different views of ethical matters and a consideration of the risks run by a person or his unit.⁹⁹⁴

Hence, in addition to formal and legal arguments, ethical questions played the primary role in respect of matters such as the maintenance of 'essential stock' of medical supplies for Dutchbat. In 1997, during a symposium held under the auspices of the Stichting Maatschappij en Krijgsmacht (Society and Armed Forces Foundation) Lieutenant Colonel Vermeulen, the Commanding Officer of Dutchbat I, raised a number of such ethical questions based on the reality of Bosnia, namely:

- Should it become the rule that Dutch military hospitals provide medical aid to the local population in order to supplement that given by the hospital of Médecins Sans Frontières, for example?
- How far should a military unit go along with this bearing in mind its limited medical facilities and supplies, which are intended for its own wounded soldiers in principle?
- In view of the impartiality required, how will people view the provision of medical care to wounded soldiers (every healthy man is a soldier) from one of the warring factions?⁹⁹⁵

Vermeulen also pointed to attendant problems which manifested themselves on the spot, such as variations in the views held by military units and NGOs, as well as differences in insight between the leadership of a military unit and the latter's medical staff. The battalion commander was responsible for the welfare of his own personnel and was ultimately held to account for his decisions and policy in this respect.⁹⁹⁶ The problem involved in medical officers being bound by laws of military discipline in addition to their professional oath, was not discussed.

The theologian, A.H.M. van Iersel, and the international lawyer, T.A. van Baarda, pointed out that Hippocratic oath, which is also taken by military doctors, requires that medical assistance be provided irrespective of the person concerned. Based on applicable medical ethics, a military doctor was not entitled to distinguish between military and civilian patients.⁹⁹⁷

However, the question is whether the oath constitutes the norm or is not the law in so far as it may be applicable. Other commentators do not believe it is self-evident that medical ethics did not permit a distinction between military and civilian patients. In a response to the Brandpunt broadcast, Leo van Bergen, an associate of the Studiecentrum voor Vredesvraagstukken (Research Centre for Questions of Peace) in Nijmegen, made it clear that moral indignation at the refusal of aid is an empty gesture. A military medical service is an inseparable part of an army. This was also the reason why a military unit is actually unsuitable for the provision of humanitarian aid. An order not to provide aid to wounded civilians can be explained and be morally unacceptable at the same time. In conflicts military necessity and the oath of allegiance are accorded priority over the pangs of medical conscience. From a military point of view an order not to provide aid could be justified. According to Van Bergen, any doctor who wanted his medical conscience to prevail above all else, was better off pursuing his profession in civilian society.⁹⁹⁸

Jacques de Milliano, who was asked for a response as part of the Brandpunt programme in his capacity as the director of the Dutch branch of Médecins Sans Frontières, felt that as a doctor it was shocking to see aid refused but he simultaneously acknowledged that the safety of the troops was paramount when viewed in a broader context. As long as the troops found themselves in an unsafe situation, it was realistic for them not to use medical supplies for patients but to save them to treat any Dutch casualties. Nevertheless, an area of tension remained.⁹⁹⁹

Looking back, the Dutchbat surgeon, Colonel Kremer, did not appear to agree with such views. While he acknowledged that certain types of medicine had been used up in their entirety or almost so, he felt that reserving medical supplies exclusively for the troops should not have been allowed. UN guidelines provided scope for the treatment of the local population in urgent cases. However, the reality of the situation was completely different as a result of extensive aid provided to the local population. Owing to the utterly conflicting views of various doctors and a confusing chain of command, the provision of medical aid was not a self-evident matter in the chaotic and dangerous situation prevailing in Srebrenica. Nowhere was it stated or assumed that 'essential stock' were only intended for wounded Dutch and UN soldiers. Greater attention should have been devoted to the clash of military and humanitarian interests, according to Kremer. Both military doctors and commanding officers needed to provide input when drawing up policy, so as to prevent any misunderstanding from occurring.¹⁰⁰⁰

Unlike Kremer, his colleague, Hegge, did not get involved in the public debate about medical and ethical issues. However, he did notice that discussions about medical neutrality in the professional publications called for all sorts of measures but that nowhere was any advice provided as to how to act in situations in which one needed to make a choice. There was little understanding for the dual role of doctor and soldier.¹⁰⁰¹ The Defence Department placed medical officers in situations in which they were confronted with dilemmas. In addition to its usual assessments, the Defence Department should therefore also bear responsibility for the choices that were made and not distance itself from them.¹⁰⁰²

Viewed with hindsight, one can conclude that the discussions of the time mainly occurred on a small scale within the Dutchbat medical service in the enclave and that there was relatively little coordination with the battalion leadership. Much of the debate therefore occurred at a later stage. It should have been extended to the political level in The Hague earlier in 1995, precisely because the Ministry of Defence had devoted insufficient attention to the relevant regulations and the provision of information to the medical practitioners about the provision of humanitarian aid to the local population and its implications in the extraordinary circumstances in which Dutchbat had to operate during the last few months of its stay in Srebrenica. This would have made it possible to establish political guidelines or to work through the UN in New York in an attempt to have the guidelines for UNPROFOR stated more precisely or to seek additional ones when the provision of supplies for the medical service ceased. Dutchbat's Standing Orders provided for internal instructions but as such were never raised for discussion in the form in which they were known. These orders do not appear to have played a role once a different practice had evolved in the enclave.

The question therefore arose within the Armed Forces as to whether medical units actually met the stiff requirements stipulated for crisis management operations. While preparations for a scenario such as that of Srebrenica may have been impossible, it was feared that the training of medical officers for crisis situations and teamwork could have been poor. While medical officers did receive military training, it was minimal and this was also a source of concern.¹⁰⁰³ As it happens, preparations for the deployment of medical units were indeed changed. Attention was devoted to team formation as well as work within a hierarchical structure. Supplementary training was provided prior to deployment and attention was also devoted to its medical and ethical aspects.¹⁰⁰⁴

On the other hand, the debate revealed that it was impossible to draw up any protocol that accommodated the requirements of both the commander in the field and the medical officers. In particular, those personnel who were to be deployed, had a need of further discussion which could produce a better understanding of the manner in which military doctors act. Lieutenant Colonel W.J. Wertheim, who worked for the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff at the time, lamented the fact that the media and politicians had come to dominate the issue, taking certain aspects out of context. In Srebrenica the problems had partly been caused by difficulties with supplies which had originated beyond the control of the Dutch military organization. Guidelines issued by The Hague were not much more than a support and could only have an effect if commanders and doctors were familiar with all their provisions relating to the provision of medical care on the spot, and if the logistical operations were able to ensure adequate medical supplies under all circumstances. A military medical unit had to pursue a well-considered policy which accorded with the requirements of both its commanding officer and its doctors. Precise arrangements needed to be made with the local authorities and NGOs for the manner in which action was to be taken in emergencies and, which patients if any would be eligible for treatment in a field hospital. Collaboration with Médecins Sans Frontières in Bosnia and the hospital in Srebrenica represented a contravention of UN regulations.¹⁰⁰⁵

Already prior to Dutchbat's deployment there had been confusion about the extent of the humanitarian aid to be provided, the relevant UN instructions, and the division of professional medical and military operational responsibilities.¹⁰⁰⁶ Medical neutrality, the right of aid workers to perform their duties without any form of duress or obstruction, could be described properly in abstract terms but could barely be operationalized in concrete situations. It was not permissible for health care to be held ransom to political, ideological or military arguments.¹⁰⁰⁷ Yet this is precisely what the Bosnian Serbs did. The VRS used all the means at its disposal to weaken the enclave and deliberately cut Dutchbat's medical supplies, because the bulk of them found their way to the local population. The Bosnian Serbs assumed that the ABiH was also benefiting from this. Since as early as the end of 1992 the VRS had been complaining about the fact that the ABiH had been conducting attacks from Srebrenica since the convoys started and that this pattern of events was repeatedly resulting in the prohibition of UNHCR and UNPROFOR convoys.¹⁰⁰⁸

The clearly defined terminology framework of the Geneva Conventions and Protocols did not simply apply to peacekeeping forces and the collaboration with humanitarian organizations.¹⁰⁰⁹ After all, the UN was not a party to a regional conflict or to the Geneva Conventions. Lars van Troost of Amnesty International was of the opinion that the international norms were not so much a source of confusion as the question of what standards applied to peacekeeping operations. Until then the UN and NATO member states had shown little interest in clarifying the situation. As a result of the confusion an international legal problem became a dilemma for individual medical officers or commanders. Before providing troops for peacekeeping operations, the countries supplying them had to state as precisely as possible which standards they deemed their military personnel would be governed by. This was to be disclosed to the intergovernmental organization that was to make use of the troops, and to the troops themselves. Only in this way was it possible for everyone to know beforehand which standards he was subject to, and for this to be taken into account in training and planning.¹⁰¹⁰

H.D.C. Roscam Abbing, a professor of health-related law, held the view that the Geneva Conventions and accompanying protocols did not draw a distinction between a country's own military personnel and casualties amongst the local population.¹⁰¹¹ The provision of aid was to be determined on the basis of medical emergency criteria. Although it was doubtful whether the Geneva Conventions applied to peacekeeping operations, military medical units needed to rely on the framework of standards which constituted the basis of the conventions. Roscam Abbing called for 'clear, unambiguous and appropriate legal and other prerequisites for the protection and optimum enforcement of human rights with a view to medical care' in the case of deployment for peacekeeping operations. Questions which were important, were those such as the legal significance of the provision of humanitarian aid, UN instructions and how they related to national obligations. Another related question pertained to the breakdown of medical and professional military responsibilities. It was also important to have a clear view of the Dutch Government's responsibilities because it had a duty of care towards the troops it deployed in its capacity as their employer.

In Roscam Abbing's view the government also had a duty of care towards the population on humanitarian grounds. The restraint of the relevant UN instructions did not detract from the fact that the Dutch Government had a duty as an organization providing aid. Apart from its duty to provide the troops it deployed with a responsible level of care, the government was simultaneously required to take into account the fact that it could be necessary to provide medical aid to the local population, unquestionably in emergencies and, where necessary, to supplement any existing facilities and NGOs that may be active on the spot. If any shortage were to occur, one could not resolve this by means of a military order. Professional responsibility was to prevail. According to her, the UN guidelines could not stand up to critical scrutiny in view of the fact that human rights were at stake. The provision of medical aid to the local population could not occur in minimalist fashion and could not be confined to first aid in emergencies. It was not permissible for an armed conflict which occurred in the course of peacekeeping operations, to lead to the adoption of principles other than those that applied in times of peace. To Roscam Abbing the lesson of Srebrenica was that the government had a duty to ensure that sufficient facilities were available in order to 'be able to provide the troops and the civilian population with medical aid in a qualitatively responsible manner under varying circumstances'.

Several comments are in order in relation to Roscam Abbing's argument. For instance, it ignores the transfer of authority for the Dutch units to the UN. The Dutch Government transfers its power to deploy these troops to the UN Secretary-General, who in turn delegates command to the local UN commander. The UN is responsible for supplying medical provisions which, in principle, are determined in relation to the size of the medical unit in question. The fact that the Netherlands provided Dutchbat with some of its medical supplies does not in any way negate UN regulations. Roscam Abbing's argument also ignores the division of duties between the UNHCR and UNPROFOR. The latter was not the organization intended to alleviate need amongst the local population.

If Roscam Abbing's argument is upheld and the Dutch Government was responsible for ensuring that there were sufficient facilities to provide the local population with a responsible level of medical aid, how could this government have succeeded where the UN failed? As described in the appendix, 'Resupply by Air', it was impossible to force through supplies against the will of the Bosnian Serbs. The UN and the relevant national governments were not prepared to risk human lives for this purpose or to endanger the provision of humanitarian aid held elsewhere in Bosnia as a result.

The actions of the Bosnian doctors in the enclave were not covered by the debate on medical and ethical issues. Based on the example of Vukovar¹⁰¹² where patients and hospital staff had been murdered, they did not dare to rely on the protective operation of the Geneva Conventions and Protocols. They left their patients on 11 July and joined the column fleeing to Tuzla.

It was only a number of years later that the Nederlands Militair Geneeskundig Tijdschrift (Military Medical Journal of the Netherlands) devoted attention to medical and ethical questions by publishing an article written by the working party, 'Handreiking voor militair geneeskundige zorgverleners' (Guidelines for Military Providers of Medical Care) of the Joh. Wiers Foundation. This article covered a number of scenarios in which military caregivers could be faced with a dilemma. It elicited responses within the profession, which only revealed that there was little in the way of a common view held by military providers of care, and that the suggestions that had been proposed, failed to provide an adequate guarantee to avoid conflicts such as the question as to which oath should prevail, the Hippocratic or officers' oath. For instance, medical officers with experience of deployment in crisis areas had their doubts about ethicists who took a 'holier than thou' attitude and who threatened to get the Medical Disciplinary Tribunal involved. The name of Roscam Abbing was also cited in this respect. Were the same standards required in relation to the medical performance of Dutch doctors working for NGOs? It should be possible for the interests of the relevant military unit to prevail in a military situation. For example, how should one act if a commanding officer who is not Dutch, were to issue an order which would impose a risk on a medical officer of being disciplined by a Dutch disciplinary tribunal? However, in the case of the ethicists referred to above this appeared to be a cut-and-dried case.

In the case of medical officers the assertion that the principle should apply whereby troops serving a tour of duty should be able to count on receiving adequate medical care under all circumstances, was offset by the view that it needed to be made clear to the troops that this was not all that absolute. 'Cast iron rules' were unacceptable and each case would need to be assessed in order to establish the extent of the aid that could be provided to civilians without drawing on ‘essential stock’.¹⁰¹³

The solution to the problem of ‘essential stock’ which Van Iersel, a theologian, and Van Baarda, a lawyer, proposed by way of a compromise, appeared somewhat too simple. They called for a change to the ‘essential stock’ norm to accord with the practical requirements of humanitarian peacekeeping: a more liberal interpretation of ‘essential stock’ along with a heightened presence of military personnel to ease the dilemma.¹⁰¹⁴

It would be difficult to define such a standard for supplies. There would have been less of a need to maintain ‘essential stock’, if UNPROFOR’s freedom of movement had not been limited and convoys had been granted unimpeded access to Srebrenica.

At the end of 1995 following the Dayton Accord, attention was again devoted to the term, ‘essential stock’, within the Ministry of Defence in the course of preparations for Dutch participation in the NATO implementation force. Maintaining ‘essential stock’ for one’s own troops was not expedient under the terms of the Geneva Convention,¹⁰¹⁵ the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff stated at the time. However, what also played a role was that, contrary to the previous situation in Srebrenica, proper logistics were now guaranteed.¹⁰¹⁶ In December 1995 the Ministry presented guidelines. The director of Military Medical Policy issued preliminary guidelines for the provision of medical aid to the civilian population: all civilian patients who were wounded, had to be helped. In this connection, it did not matter if a NATO soldier caused the medical problem in question.¹⁰¹⁷

The final instructions, which were still geared towards the NATO operation in Bosnia, were issued in January 1996. These instructions, which were also drawn up by the Director of Military Medical Policy, were ratified by the chief of Defence Staff. Now the most senior rank was involved, which had not been the case in Srebrenica. Medical officers had a duty to act in accordance with the Hippocratic oath they had taken. This was an unfortunate statement as the relevant legislation is decisive when assessing medical performance and not the Hippocratic oath.

These instructions drew a distinction between ‘humanitarian medical aid’ and ‘emergency medical aid’. Humanitarian medical aid could be provided to the civilian population if one’s orders, the circumstances and one’s resources permitted this. Only primary essential aid was allowed to be provided to civilians who directly requested access to military medical facilities. One was entitled to select those to be admitted. In the case of emergency medical aid, one needed to alleviate any critical threat to life as quickly and appropriately as possible. The extent of emergency aid that was to be provided, had to be detailed in plans along with the question as to how to ensure continuity.¹⁰¹⁸ This appeared to set a limit to the unbridled provision of humanitarian medical aid. However, no solution was forthcoming at the highest political level to the question which had greatly preoccupied the surgical

Conclusions relating to Dutchbat III and medical matters

The special circumstances which were inherent to the problems besetting the enclave, and the Bosnian Serbs' refusal to permit regular supplies, had a major impact on the performance of both Dutchbat and the medical service. The latter's orders did not unquestionably accord with the principle that the commander of a unit is required to ensure that his mission is not endangered. This means that he is required to ensure that his personnel are capable of deployment for as long as possible or that they can be deployed again. Reasoning in line with this concern, his mission cannot be rendered subordinate to the individual interests of any third party without the express consent of his commanding officer. However, these commanding officers, from the UN commander to the members of the Dutch Government, were not involved in the discussion that ensued within Dutchbat about maintaining 'essential stock' for one's own use. Although these commanding officers were aware of the benefits of providing medical aid to the local population to alleviate need or to win their hearts and minds, UN regulations actually went no further than to permit the provision of aid in dire emergencies. As the authority in command, the UN had thus ensured that there were regulations but scant regard was paid to them within Dutchbat, assuming they were aware of their existence.

When supplies stalled, the limitations on the provision of further aid to the people became painfully obvious. The use of medical supplies for purposes other than one's own unit then appeared to depend greatly on the prevailing situation and the question as to whether there were adequate supplies and alternatives. The primary purpose of Dutchbat medical personnel was not to care for civilians. While it is true that the Dutchbat medical service had acknowledged this problem and that in the course of time it had endeavoured to set aside 'essential stock' for emergencies, the circumstances did not permit them to do so and to maintain them.

Abstract rules and ethical principles presented no solution for situations where critical supplies were exhausted. Military and medical ethics clashed. With hindsight, the Public Health Care Inspectorate therefore held that it would have been desirable if the Ministry of Defence had devoted express attention to the dilemma posed by potentially conflicting interests of a professionally medical nature on the one hand and military and operational on the other. As far as possible, medical units needed to be provided with as much guidance as possible in the form of written instructions and decision-making models which could be used in practical situations. The existing regulations and training provided in the Netherlands did not provide sufficient guidance, nor did the UN guidelines. They needed to be translated and converted into protocols which were geared towards practical situations.¹⁰²⁰

In the event that military rules and ethical principles clashed, it was up to the person bearing final medical responsibility to make a decision for which he had to be held accountable at a later stage. In the case of Srebrenica the decision not to draw on 'essential stock' was a joint one taken by the medical officers and the battalion leadership, although this was not equally clear to everyone in the Field Dressing Station. This decision was not made on the basis of a sound knowledge of UN regulations but was born of necessity when there was a threat to the possibility of providing intensive care to any casualties at a later stage.

The establishment of 'essential stock' was already an issue before the arrival of Dutchbat III and appears to have had its origins in the medical field of operations. Paradoxically enough, it was precisely from the quarters of medical personnel that criticism was eventually expressed of the concept of 'essential stock' once its implications had become painfully obvious and a dying woman had been abandoned. There were no further casualties amongst Dutch troops following the death of Private Van Rensen, with the result that there was no need to draw on critical supplies. This later compounded the remorse felt about the fact that so little had been done to treat the wounded woman.

In this connection, it is remarkable that those involved both in the Netherlands and in Bosnia gave so little thought to the problems involving the clash of military and UN regulations on the one hand, and ethical principles on the other, and that the medical officers and commanders had received so little information about this in the course of preparations for their despatch to Bosnia. Potential supply problems had already been acknowledged prior to Dutchbat's move to Srebrenica and they had already made themselves felt prior to the arrival of Dutchbat III. A greater awareness of UN regulations and an exchange of views between Srebrenica and The Hague, and between The Hague and Zagreb could have created more clarity in relation to the question as to how to act if any problems were to occur.

It does not appear that the battalion leadership and the medical officers made any precise arrangements. Even though the Field Dressing Station later fell under the command of Dutchbat's Commanding Officer, no clear answer was forthcoming to the question as to who had the power to make decisions about medical supplies: Dutchbat's Commanding Officer or the responsible medical officer. While it is true that the battalion leadership and the responsible medical officer had made arrangements by the time the Bosnian Serbs commenced their attack on Srebrenica, they were not properly communicated or presented within the Field Dressing Station.

The Royal Netherlands Army and the Minister of Defence in The Hague were not aware of problems pertaining to 'essential stock' and of conflicts relating to priorities. This only occurred once it was too late. Later on only the responsible medical officer was called to account and not the battalion leaders, who were also party to this policy.

Poor personal relations, problems relating to relief, differing assessments of the gravity of the situation, varying views within the medical service, the breakdown of relations between the Dutchbat command and the medical service, and the coincidental presence of two surgical teams muddied the waters even further. In addition, there was also a lack of familiarity with UN regulations. All these matters played their own independent role.

A further complication occurred when the Bosnian Serbs commenced their attack, in the form of a new surgical team which assumed responsibility for the provision of medical care to Dutchbat without having had much preparation and with little knowledge of the amount of supplies still available, while the old team was unable to leave the enclave. The speed with which duties were transferred is barely comprehensible in the light of the fact that the old team could not leave the enclave, although those involved naturally hoped they would be able to and had already waited a long time to be relieved.

Relations were further strained when a wounded woman was brought to the compound in Potocari on 10 July contrary to the relevant regulations. This led to a clash of views between the two surgeons who were present, at a time when it was not overly clear what had been agreed in relation to the provision of medical aid to people other than Dutchbat personnel. The medical specialists who came from the Dutch navy were more inclined to accord priority to operational interests than the specialist from the Royal Netherlands Air Force, who did not wish to distinguish between military and humanitarian actions.

Following the deportation of the local population, the medical service was still involved in caring for those wounded individuals who had remained behind, until 17 July. The time remaining until Dutchbat's departure from the enclave was spent 'licking their wounds' and preparing for their move. During this period Dutchbat made no move to produce preliminary reports for itself as a whole or its various units. The timely collection of information about the various events and its provision to senior officers could have provided a clearer insight into the relevant issues at an earlier stage. While it is true there was a fear that information which was incriminating or displeasing to the VRS, could fall into the hands of the Bosnian Serbs when the unit left the enclave, it could have been transmitted through the normal communication channels, secure or insecure.

The debriefing process which occurred upon Dutchbat's arrival in Zagreb, was of a highly limited nature, certainly in so far as it pertained to medical performance. The relevant reports were cursory. Nevertheless, various issues relating to the medical field of operations soon became known more or less. General Couzy also conducted interviews with the people concerned while they were still in Zagreb. At a later stage information about the operations of the Field Dressing Station and the surgical teams also reached the Royal Netherlands Army via different routes. Many of these matters, which later became issues, were thus known in general terms but nothing was recorded nor was news about them disseminated to those who bore political responsibility in the Ministry of Defence. The Royal Netherlands Army does not appear to have played a fortunate role in determining the political impact that a number of issues had or could have had. Only in December did the Minister become aware of issues that in some cases were already known prior to the debriefing process. There was hardly any coordination or joint effort on the part of the army and the department to ascertain as much information as possible.

In particular, what also played a role in the medical field of operations was the idea, which was common to both the Army and the Ministry, that it would be wise to await the outcome of the debriefing process in Assen before conducting any inquiry. It was anticipated that virtually everything would be covered in the course of the debriefing process. However, the latter only began in Assen at a relatively late stage, because it was decided to allow staff to go on leave first. In this sense the wait for the outcome of the debriefing process was counterproductive. One could not insist that the media remain silent. Issues continued to be aired and this increased public disquiet.

In addition, the debriefing process failed to provide adequate answers to the questions that were raised. Although the debriefing report devoted attention to the phenomenon of 'essential stock' and the performance of the surgical teams that joined Dutchbat from the Armed Forces Hospital Service, the information it provided in this respect was rather cursory. The disquiet mounted further when it emerged that the debriefing process was unable to meet the high expectations held for it in respect of a number of points. When information was disclosed at the end of 1995 about the refusal to treat the seriously wounded woman on 10 July 1995, the media raised a veritable storm of indignation, more so because this incident was not referred to in the debriefing report.

Because of dissatisfaction with the course of events, their feeling that they had not been properly heard during their debriefing sessions and their irritation about the treatment which Dutchbat had received in the press, several of the unit's medical personnel publicly disclosed a number of matters. These were issues that had not been referred to in the debriefing report or which had been dealt with in an unsatisfactory manner. At the end of 1995 this led the Ministry of Defence to conduct a number of subsequent investigations under considerable pressure of time into numerous aspects of medical aid, so as to be able to inform Parliament accordingly on different occasions. It was mainly the Ministry and Minister Voorhoeve himself who took the initiative in this respect. Unlike the debriefing process in Assen, the central organization assumed direct control. The result was a hasty and fragmented communication of information to Parliament. It produced an impression that smacked of an overestimate of Dutchbat's potential and role.

Once the storm had brewed and refused to subside, more inquiries followed. The social and ministerial indignation that greeted the investigation conducted by the Inspector of the Military Health Care Service, led to another investigation performed by the Public Health Care Inspectorate. These investigations focussed primarily on the medical performance of several individuals. Neither investigation doubted the decision not to provide further humanitarian aid and to accord priority to ensuring the availability of medical care for the unit's own personnel but less attention was devoted to this.

The investigations concentrated on incidents and at a later stage the judicial authorities focussed on the alleged failure of individuals to perform. Although this did reveal many facts, it took little into account of the overall situation pertaining to the provisions of humanitarian and medical aid during the fall of the enclave. Neither did these investigations start out from the problems experienced by

Dutchbat in that it became a plaything of the Bosnian Serbs as a result of the circumstances prevailing in Srebrenica.

1. Acknowledgements

My thanks go first of all to the entire Srebrenica team, the members of which were prepared to read the text contributions critically and to provide them with commentary. I would particularly like to thank my intelligence 'buddy' Dr Bob de Graaff for this. My gratitude is primarily directed, however, to my colleague and fellow Tuzlak, Dr Dick Schoonoord, with whom I have undertaken many journeys and whose definitive texts for the Srebrenica report constitute such a rich and valuable source. His contributions to Part III of the main Srebrenica report were absolutely indispensable to this study.

Due to the specialist nature of this research and the imposed confidentiality, there was very little opportunity to exchange ideas with civil servants, other researchers and authors. I thus valued even more highly the trust shown to me by Matthew Aid, Richard Aldrich, Mats Berdal, Richard Connaughton, Timothy Crawford, Volker Foertsch, Nik Gowing, Alf Jacobson, Jan Kleffel, John Morrison, Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, Lord David Owen, Jeffrey Richelson, Tim Ripley, Erich Schmidt-Eenboom, Katherine Schewering, Michael Smith, Milos Stankovic, Jan-Inge Svensson, Renaud Theunens, Mark Urban, Pasi Välimäki and James Woolsey. In particular I would like to acknowledge Ric Morgan. My thankfulness to him is enormous.

My thanks also go to Michael Herman, who organized a 'Under Chatham House Rules' seminar at St. Anthony's College in Oxford specially for this research project. I must also thank Ted Kelly, the archivist at the Canadian Foreign Ministry in Ottawa and the Department of Peacekeeping of the Ministry of Defence.

Finally, I extend many thanks to all the officers who work or worked for domestic and foreign intelligence and security services and who were prepared to talk to me on a confidential basis. These persons have supported the Srebrenica project in its attempts to track down and clarify vague indications or unclear formulated questions. This applies particularly to the many members of the Netherlands Military Intelligence Service. Without the help of the Dutch and the international intelligence communities this book would not have been written.

3. Introduction

Sarajevo was a nest of spies at the time of the war in Bosnia. Everyone spied on everyone: the warring parties as well as the countries of the UN peacekeeping force.¹

On 3 March 1994, 570 Dutch peacekeepers formally relieved the Canadian soldiers who had been stationed in Srebrenica since 1993. Within the framework of the United Nations peace mission in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dutch unit arrived there as part of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR). The Dutch battalion (Dutchbat) was placed in a small town located in East Bosnia in a deep valley with steep mountainsides, close to the river Drina. Except for a couple of days in April 1992, the Bosnian Muslim Army, the Armija Bosne i Hercegovine (ABiH), had control of the town – which was declared a Safe Area by the UN Security Council on 6 May 1993 – for three years of the war. However, Srebrenica was never completely demilitarized and small-scale confrontations around the enclave would continue to take place for more than two years. A Bosnian-Serb attack on Srebrenica started on 6 July 1995. The ABiH was not in a position to defend the enclave, and the Dutch soldiers had neither the resources nor the mandate for the purpose.

When on 11 July the Bosnian enclave of Srebrenica was captured by the Bosnian Serb Army, the Vojaska Republika Srpska (VRS), under the leadership of General Ratko Mladic, an ethnic cleansing operation began in which a large proportion of the Muslim men would be executed. Between 6 and 20 July, the Bosnian Serbs gained control of 'the safe areas' Srebrenica and Zepa, and drove out tens of thousands of Bosnian Muslims. Under the eyes of Dutchbat, the women, children and elderly were deported to Bosnian territory. Out of view of the Dutch peacekeepers, more than 10,000 men and boys, walking in a long line, tried to get from Srebrenica to the area around Tuzla, which was under the control of the Bosnian government. Several thousands became the victim of encounters with the Bosnian Serbs or fell into the hands of the VRS during that journey. They were killed in a horrifying way.

This study is an appendix to the Srebrenica report by the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation (NIOD). A central position in the study is occupied by the role of national and international intelligence and security services in the war in Bosnia in general and Srebrenica in particular.

From the outset, much remained unclear regarding the fall of the enclave, something, which was also considered on 18 August 1995 in the Dutch Ministerial Council. A minister was of the opinion that more information should be made available about the events before and after the fall of Srebrenica. According to this minister, this also applied to the role of the Western intelligence services prior to the attack on Srebrenica.²

This investigation sets out to satisfy this wish. The study has three objectives. Firstly, it is the intention to present in as much detail as possible the information position of the most important Western intelligence and security services during the war in Bosnia. The relevant question is what opportunities these services had for following the developments in East Bosnia. Secondly, this study sets out to examine whether these services were used in the armed conflict around Srebrenica. Finally, an objective of this investigation is to establish the information position of the Dutch intelligence and security services: were these services in a position to support the Dutch peacekeepers in Bosnia satisfactorily?

These three objectives lead to the question: did the Western intelligence services have prior knowledge of the Bosnian Serb attack on Srebrenica? If the answer is no, the next question is why not? Was it an intelligence failure? However, if there was prior knowledge, the question then is what was done with this information, and whether that intelligence could not have prevented the attack on Srebrenica and the subsequent executions.

It was no simple matter to try to obtain answers to the above questions and to satisfy the above objectives. Foreign intelligence and security services were not prepared to provide the NIOD investigators with direct access to the intelligence they had gathered. Fortunately, some services were prepared to provide some degree of insight into their information position through confidential briefings or background discussions. For the Srebrenica report by the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation (NIOD) more than 900 persons were interviewed. Ultimately, as regards this study off-the-record discussions were held with one hundred people in the Netherlands and other countries: many were officers who were involved in intelligence work in Bosnia. This involved not only many former or still active staff of intelligence and security services, but also responsible ministers, politicians, diplomats and officials that acted as recipients of intelligence products concerning Bosnia.

Inevitably, these one hundred off-the-record interviews did have consequences for the references of this study. This is why in the acknowledgement of sources, this study regularly has to resort to references such as ‘Confidential interview’.³ Staff of foreign intelligence and security services were prepared to speak to the NIOD on condition that their identities were protected in view of privacy considerations, because disclosure of their names and identities could considerably impede their work as analysts or operators in the future, or make it completely impossible, or because the prevailing legislation in their country did not permit it. Anonymity was promised by the NIOD to a large number of current and former staff of services in the Netherlands and other countries for reasons of their own. It was therefore necessary to opt for the footnote form that has been used. The most important consideration in making this choice was that the main issue was to reconstruct a general picture and not to establish the specific influence of individual people on the course of events.

Moreover, there will be regular references to ‘Confidential information’. In general, these are written sources that the archive controller still considers to be confidential, or documents that have been passed to the NIOD privately, but which are still classified as ‘secret’ in the country concerned. It goes without saying that every effort has been made to verify the statements by means of supplementary interviews, background briefings or archival research whenever this was permissible.

History is a discussion without end. This is all the more true for the history of intelligence and security services, the archive material of which is subject to far longer terms than other government archive material before disclosure is permitted. Researchers are generally not given access to catalogues, but have to ask for relevant documents more or less in the dark. Also because of confidentiality agreements imposed on staff does information on intelligence and security services reach researchers, and consequently the public, and then after a much longer period than in other cases. Whereas, with history of other kinds, the picture of the subject generally changes in the course of time only as a result of new points of view. In the case of the history of intelligence and security services, new information can continue to lead to an adjustment of the picture for far longer.

Fortunately this was not the case in the research for this study where Dutch archives were concerned.⁴ Generous access was given to the archives by the Netherlands intelligence and security services, especially the Military Intelligence Service (MIS), where the author was able to make independent selections. In a number of cases, more detailed agreements had to be made for specific sources. These cases were concerned with the unity of the Crown, the private lives of those involved and the Netherlands national security and security of the state. The latter point was especially relevant to sources for the activities of Dutch and other intelligence and security services. In particular, the identity of informants, the origin of information that was gathered by these services and the relationship of trust with foreign counterpart services had to be protected. An additional study of related archives was also carried out in the Netherlands, for example at the Cabinet Office, Foreign Affairs, Defence, and Justice. Comprehensive research in the archives of the United Nations in Geneva and New York sometimes yielded additional background material.

It was also possible to speak freely with a large number of staff of the MIS and the Netherlands National Security Service (BVD). In addition to the usual privacy considerations, the fact that disclosure of their names and identities would impede or make impossible their future work as analysts or operators with intelligence and security services it was necessary to opt for referring to these more than thirty interviews as ‘confidential interviews’.

Finally, we must not omit to mention that much information for this study was obtained from open sources. Historical research is usually based on all available literature on the events to be studied. At the start of this investigation, it was expected that a large number of publications would not be relevant. However, it turned out that articles in daily and weekly newspapers and some books actually contained more information than originally thought. This concerned the history of the Balkans in general and how this was represented, as well as the history of the conflict in Yugoslavia. Some of those involved wrote memoirs. In addition, private and government archive collections in Canada, the United States and several Western European countries were studied. Against this background it is only possible to state that the author has attempted in all good faith to verify the data issued to the institute. The possibility of errors cannot be ruled out. But this should not discourage anyone from writing about the role of intelligence and security services.

Chapter 1

The United Nations and Intelligence

‘If you understand the situation in the former Yugoslavia, you must have been poorly briefed’.⁵

1. Introduction

The final assessment of the UNPROFOR Deputy Force Commander (DFC), the Canadian Major General Barry Ashton, as formulated in his End of Tour Report, did not beat about the bush:

‘Operations were frequently impaired by a lack of credible and dedicated intelligence means. This was the case, in particular, for information concerning Serb offensives against Srebrenica and Zepa and for Croat, Bosnian-Croat, and Bosnian government offensive actions against the Bosnian Serbs in western Bosnia in September. While NATO information was often made available, the caveats placed on it made it awkward to use in a transparent international organization’.

Ashton also pointed to a recent UN operation that had had the same problems.

‘As has been pointed out for other UN missions, for example by Major-General Dallaire in Rwanda, operating in a complex and higher risk peacekeeping environment without adequate means of information limits the ability of UN forces to carry out their mandated tasks, impairs operational capabilities, and places UN personnel at greater risk’.⁶

The Swedish Force Commander, Lieutenant General Lars Eric Wahlgren, had gone before him in 1993, arguing that the UN in New York ‘must rethink the entire approach to information versus intelligence gathering’.⁷ The UNPROFOR Generals Francis Briquemont and Lewis MacKenzie also complained about the problems surrounding the availability of intelligence during their UNPROFOR period.⁸ MacKenzie, for example, had urged the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) of the UN in New York to use Imagery Intelligence (‘Imint’: see below for an explanation of the different types of intelligence) in order to establish who was the greatest culprit of ceasefire violations around Sarajevo. His request was rejected or ignored. He complained that the DPKO in New York just did not understand that the military and police situation in Bosnia was different from that of a normal peacekeeping operation, such as the one in, for example, Cyprus. The rules of the UN had nonetheless not been adapted to the new circumstances. MacKenzie was left empty-handed because ‘an outdated attitude regarding intelligence kept us from gaining the information we needed’. Help was sometimes offered by foreign intelligence services, but, because of the insecure connections, this intelligence often reached MacKenzie too late or not at all.⁹

Lieutenant General Bertrand De Lapresle did not touch upon this sensitive subject at all on his departure. He had been the UNPROFOR Force Commander between March 1994 and February 1995, but opted 'not to raise that substantive subject at this moment'. However, the French general omitted to explain when the right moment was supposed to be.¹⁰ The Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General, Yasushi Akashi, stated likewise that he had no intelligence at his disposal. He had never received anything in the way of intelligence regarding the attack on Srebrenica.¹¹

This might suggest the immediate conclusion that the UN had little affinity with intelligence gathering during peacekeeping operations, and apparently had refused to learn any lessons from earlier operations. There appeared to be no reliable intelligence available in Bosnia, and what was to hand presented great difficulties in terms of dissemination. Consequently, at a lower level the provision of intelligence to the troops on the ground during the UNPROFOR mission in Bosnia would also be woefully inadequate (as had been the case in Rwanda). Intelligence and UN peacekeeping operations would seem to be ill-matched from the outset.¹²

Peacekeeping has been described as 'the prevention, containment, moderation and termination of hostilities between or within states, through the medium of a peaceful third party intervention organized and directed internationally, using multinational forces or soldiers, police and civilians to restore and maintain peace'.¹³ Accordingly, the breaking of sanctions, clandestine weapon deliveries to the warring parties, secret plans for aggression, ethnic cleansing or genocide (Bosnia and Rwanda), and threats on the lives of the peacekeepers need to be discovered as rapidly as possible. Everyone involved will therefore have to recognize sooner or later that the success of a peacekeeping operation demands reliable intelligence.

Another important factor in peace operations in general is that the superpowers sometimes lose their influence over the warring parties and that they 'do not control the clashing parties as much as they used to do'. Because it is becoming more common for peacekeepers to be deployed while an armed conflict is still in progress, the risk to the soldiers on the ground is also increasing. The more complex tasks, which may involve significant ethnic, social and nationalist factors, and ever greater difficulties in properly distinguishing the warring parties in an intrastate conflict, demand an accurate understanding of their strategies, interests and activities. In addition, the UN and other peacekeeping organizations cannot afford 'to have less knowledge of the parties' intentions and activities than the parties themselves if the organizations desire to achieve any political tasks at the negotiating table'.¹⁴ Pär Eriksson even takes the view that a peacekeeping operation cannot be considered impartial because 'it is unable to see to it that all parties follow an agreement on disarmament'.¹⁵

During a peacekeeping operation there is also a need for strategic intelligence to assist in understanding the political and military situation between the warring parties. Strategic intelligence can be defined as an activity undertaken by a state or community with the aim of 'gathering, analysing, distributing and utilizing information and know-how to further its own ends relative to other states, political groups, military powers, movements or individuals'.¹⁶ This is especially relevant in the phase before the direct involvement of the UN. In concrete terms, examples would be asking questions about the origin of the conflict, what is at stake and the strategic political objectives and interests of the international community. Strategic intelligence is often read by the senior-most policy makers charged with setting the objectives of grand strategy and ensuring that military force is exercised for purposes of achieving national interests.¹⁷

In addition, a peacekeeping operation needs operational intelligence, which has to guide the most effective use of resources and manpower for the execution of the mandate. This is especially important in a fairly fluid political and military setting, where it would be concerned with the intentions, plans and capabilities of the warring parties, the nature of the military activities (conventional military actions, guerrilla warfare, ethnic cleansing), the military objectives of the parties, and how their propaganda is organized.

At the same time, tactical intelligence is necessary in support of the troops on the ground, so that they are able to carry out peacekeeping activities, such as monitoring a ceasefire or a suspension of hostilities. Examples might include the locations of ceasefire lines, trenches, minefields and checkpoints. After all, the intentions and capabilities of all warring parties, especially in a local area, must be mapped out if the UN mission is to have any chance of success.¹⁸ Finally, reliable intelligence is a prerequisite for minimizing the risk to troops on the ground and aircraft in the air.¹⁹ In brief, credible and sound intelligence is of great importance, and perhaps crucial, to the success of a peacekeeping operation.

The above arguments would appear to be ample justification for devoting considerable attention to the intelligence component of peacekeeping operations. However, it can be deduced from the quoted statements made by Force Commanders and Deputy Force Commanders that this was not the case. This chapter therefore discusses the difficult relationship between the UN and intelligence, which the peoples' organization has actually wrestled with since its foundation.

Before paying further attention to this issue, Section 2 first defines intelligence, and explains the various categories of intelligence.

Section 3 examines the history of the UN's difficult relationship with intelligence gathering during peacekeeping operations. This is illustrated by the words 'In 1960 it was suggested that the word "intelligence" should be banned from the lexicon of the United Nations', which have been attributed to the commander of the UN operations in Congo at the time.²⁰ Intelligence has apparently been regarded as a 'dirty word' in UN parlance.²¹ Section 4 dwells on the UN culture regarding the use and deployment of intelligence in UN operations. It raises the question of whether there has been any change in the past fifty years.

Section 5 covers the (mainly American) intelligence support of the UN in general and of UN peacekeeping operations in particular. The fact is that some intelligence input was forthcoming, especially when American ground forces were involved. Section 6 presents a view of the war in Bosnia and the UNPROFOR intelligence structure, and discusses the capabilities that the UN forces had available for gathering and disseminating intelligence. Resistance from the UN notwithstanding, the fact that some efforts were made to gather intelligence was not actually so remarkable. As one author remarked:

'The need for intelligence is being increasingly felt by both the UN and by states contributing to peacekeeping operations. Particularly in more complex and fluid situations, intelligence will be crucial in achieving the goals of the mission as laid down by the UN Security Council'.

This need is still growing, because ‘...peacekeepers are liable to find themselves in countries in which no government is in undisputed control, social order has broken down or is on the point of collapse. Sometimes hostilities are under way or imminent, and the use of force against peacekeepers is a manifest possibility’.²²

Finally, a number of conclusions are drawn in Section 7 .

2. A definition of ‘intelligence’

There is no Dutch equivalent of the word ‘intelligence’.²³ But also in the English language, according to CIA historian Michael Warner, there is, even today, no accepted definition of intelligence.²⁴ This therefore raises the question of how best to define intelligence. The overall description ‘gathering information’ is inadequate: intelligence is more than that. There is no lack of English definitions. Webster’s dictionary defines the term as ‘the gathering of secret information, especially for military purposes’. Winn Taplin, an ex-employee of the CIA, agrees and adds that strict confidentiality characterizes intelligence. However, this definition is too limited: it is not only secret information that is gathered, but also data from open sources. According to Taplin, gathering information from open sources cannot be called intelligence, but arguably this is incorrect.²⁵ The same difficulty in this regard I have with the definition of Warner that ‘intelligence is secret, state activity to understand or influence foreign entities’. So, information gathered about terrorists who are US nationals is not intelligence? Furthermore, Taplin’s definition is unusable because intelligence is not gathered for use on a military level alone. However, it is significant that intelligence in this definition is clearly described as a process.

Neither can we be satisfied with the common definition that ‘intelligence is information designed for action’. After all, not all information is destined by definition for taking action. The definition given by a CIA employee, the late John Macartney, as ‘supporting information for government policymakers’, is equally unsuitable.²⁶ This definition leans too heavily towards national decision-makers, and this is not necessarily the case: multinationals or foreign services may likewise be consumers of intelligence. Richelson has another definition, in which intelligence is ‘the product of gathering, processing, integrating, analysing, evaluating and interpreting available information concerning countries and foreign areas’.²⁷ One problem with this definition is that it overlooks the fact that people may also be the subject of intelligence. Furthermore, the focus of attention could well be within a country, and raw information can also be considered to be intelligence. In brief, it is not easy to provide a good definition. It is, as one author once wrote, like ‘making a microscopic portrait of an entire continent’.²⁸

It is important in any case - and this aspect is emphasized by many experts - that a definition should always contain more than one attribute. Intelligence is actually a product that is created in a complex process, and is delivered to one or more consumers. If the consumers are national players or decision-makers, then it is sometimes referred to as ‘national intelligence’. Considering these criteria,

Jennifer Sims's definition is probably the most appropriate. She defines intelligence as information that is gathered, organized and analysed for players or decision-makers.²⁹ The consumers of the product in her definition are therefore not necessarily national decision-makers. Intelligence is a complete product that can be divided into various categories: political, military, economic, scientific, medical, technical and sociological.

Some examples will help clarify this point. Political intelligence is concerned with both the domestic and the foreign politics of a state, because developments not only on the domestic front (for example the civil war in the former Yugoslavia), but also in the foreign sphere (political policy changes) can influence international relations between countries. Military intelligence is important to a state in helping it determine its military needs. It can also be useful in better assessing the current or future bilateral relations between two or more states (for example between Serbia and Albania). Economic intelligence refers to information on, for example, the expansion of a country's Gross National Product, the state of affairs surrounding the production and the prices of strategic and energy resources, or possible problems with the balance of payments. Sociological intelligence relates mainly to relations between various communities within a country, for example, the situation in Kosovo.³⁰

Regarding the forms of intelligence, there are two elements that, strictly speaking, have nothing to do with the activities surrounding the gathering of intelligence, but are closely associated with them nonetheless: counterintelligence and covert action. Counterintelligence (CI) can best be defined as the identification and neutralization of the threat emanating from foreign services, as well as the attempts made to manipulate these foreign services and to use them to one's own advantage.³¹ It is a more specific form of intelligence, which also involves the gathering of information on hostile and friendly foreign services. Counterintelligence also involves the use of open and secret sources to acquire more knowledge of the structure, working methods and operations of these services. As stated, counterintelligence can also involve the penetration and destabilization of such foreign services. Finally, economic counterintelligence has emerged in recent years and is attracting increasing interest. It is used to combat the theft of information and technology by both hostile and friendly foreign powers.³²

In general, covert action is concerned with secret activities intended to influence foreign governments, persons and organizations, or political, economic and military developments, as part of a national security policy. An important point is that a nation's own involvement is kept strictly secret. There are various forms of covert action, ranging from propaganda, paramilitary or political activities that are intended to overthrow or support a given regime, to the secret support of individuals or organizations (trade unions, newspapers and political parties), secret arms supplies, economic destabilization operations, or even lethal attacks.³³ Covert action therefore mainly involves influencing and manipulating an opponent's political policy. Strictly speaking, it is therefore not an activity that falls within the concept of intelligence, although it can contribute to gathering intelligence and always requires substantial intelligence support.³⁴ An example of a planned covert action in the Balkans involving foreign services was the secret arms supplies to the Bosnian Muslim army, which we will return to in Chapter 4.

3. The intelligence cycle

As described above, intelligence is actually a product that is manufactured in a (sometimes complicated) production process. This process is known as the intelligence cycle. The production of reliable and accurate intelligence in such a cycle does not have a precise starting point. It is a continuous process, but, broadly speaking, five phases or activities can be distinguished.³⁵

The first phase consists of surveying the needs of the consumers and planning the entire intelligence operation. In this phase, the 'intelligence needs plan' is drawn up, identifying the special subjects or areas that are of particular interest to the policy makers or military commanders. An example of such tasking could be to discover what military capabilities the supreme command of the Vojska Republika Srpska (VRS, the Bosnian Serb Army) has at its disposal in respect of the eastern enclaves (including Srebrenica) and what its intentions are.

However, the military intelligence requirements during a peacekeeping operation will have more to do with the circumstances surrounding a low intensity conflict than a conventional war. The threat during a peace-supporting operation (or in asymmetric warfare) is generally more diffuse and more difficult to identify than in a conventional war. Regular armed forces play a subordinate role, while controlled or uncontrolled paramilitary 'volunteers' and other obscure conflicting elements - such as criminal factions - have the initiative.³⁶ During a low intensity conflict, intelligence on matters like the overall state of the local population is at least as important as information on the number of tanks in a region.

Furthermore, intelligence will have to be gathered on the ethnic, linguistic, social and religious situation (to avoid cultural blunders, such as offering a lavish lunch to local Muslim leaders during Ramadan) and on the socioeconomic conditions in a given region (for example, by investigating whether a black market exists, and who is in charge). Again, in a low intensity conflict it is important for peacekeepers to take into account the possibility of a confrontation with 'barely controllable ethnic and criminal groups warring over a large area', as was the case in Bosnia. Such a situation has consequences for gathering intelligence.³⁷ Another significant factor in Bosnia was the constant asymmetrical warfare, in which a warring faction attempted to focus on its own 'comparative advantages against its enemy's relative weaknesses'. UNPROFOR was frequently confronted with asymmetric threats, which meant that a warring faction was not in a position 'either due to his own inabilities or the strength of the force opposed to him, of confronting an opponent in a conventional manner', and would consequently resort to 'using similar means or weapons to his opponent'.³⁸ For instance, the obstruction of convoys by the warring factions was an effective weapon for reducing the fighting power of UNPROFOR units.

In a 'traditional' collective defence operation, the emphasis is on studying the (measurable) military capabilities of the opponent (aimed at answering the questions of what the opponent is capable of and where this is possible). In peacekeeping operations and asymmetric warfare, knowledge of the capabilities of the parties is subordinate to a deep understanding of their intentions and motives, without losing sight of the capabilities. The intentions and motives of a warring faction can in some cases appear to be irrational when viewed from the outside.³⁹

The second phase in the intelligence cycle is the gathering of raw data.⁴⁰ This can happen in a number of ways: firstly via open sources, such as newspapers, magazines, books, government studies and radio and television broadcasts. This has also been referred to for a number of years as Open Source Intelligence ('Osint'). It is concerned with everything that appears in printed form or is broadcast on radio or television. Thanks in part to the Internet, most services currently draw a large amount of their information from open sources. It is estimated that (and it is only a guess) that under ideal circumstances, open source information will comprise somewhere around 10%-15% of the intelligence input into an all-source analysis. It is therefore incorrect to equate intelligence with 'espionage', although this mistake is commonly made. Espionage actually refers exclusively to various clandestine ways of gathering information. An example of such a furtive method would be the use of technical resources like film, photography or electronic intercept traffic, typically carried out from stations on land, special ships, aircraft or satellites. We will later deal more extensively with these special forms of intelligence, which include Signals Intelligence ('sigint'), Communications Intelligence ('Comint'), Radar Intelligence ('Radint') and Imagery Intelligence ('Imint').

A second method of gathering intelligence is from human sources, which is known as Human Intelligence ('Humint'). Humint involves intelligence gathering through person-to-person contacts, including through a party's own agents, reports from attachés, other diplomatic reporting and the systematic debriefing of Displaced Persons, emigrants, deserters, captured soldiers, released hostages, and so on. The clandestine part of Humint is concerned in general with the use of case officers or agents, who furnish information that is unobtainable in any other way from open sources. Here, case officers are employees of national intelligence services, and agents are mostly of foreign origin.⁴¹ Humint is particularly important in peacekeeping operations. Both the local population and senior soldiers or politicians may deliver valuable intelligence. Displaced Persons from a Safe Area can often also come up with important information in systematic debriefings, as can the non-governmental organizations that operate in certain areas.

The third and most important step in the cycle is the processing of all received data, from both open and secret sources. The large intelligence services, for example, deal with enormous quantities of intercepted message traffic that has to be decoded or translated. It is also necessary to process data in the first instance using advanced computers. Moreover, photographs, films and other recordings have to be developed before they can be studied and investigated further. Furthermore, Humint reports have to be analysed in more detail and verified against intelligence obtained from Sigint and Imint. In a battalion, this is mainly done by a section known as S-2 and, at UNPROFOR level, G-2. The other sections are dealt with more comprehensively in the main report, whereas this study focuses on the intelligence activities usually designated as such in military organizations.

A low intensity conflict demands that intelligence is appraised differently from intelligence gathered in a war situation, which is what army training focuses on. In a normal war, for example, four tanks on a road would be assessed in the traditional way as 'reinforcement or reconnaissance', whereas in Bosnia it often heralded a large-scale offensive.

On receipt of data, the intelligence would without doubt have been analysed in further detail at sector level (such as Sector North East of UNPROFOR, which included Srebrenica). In this connection, the information provided by the United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) would have played an important role. This was a two-way process: intelligence would have flowed from the higher echelons of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo (later known as UNPROFOR) and the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb (later known as UNPF) to Sector North East and to Dutchbat, and vice versa.

⁴⁰ De Valk points out that the Netherlands National Security Service (BVD) used the word 'gathering' and not collecting. De Valk, De BVD en Inlichtingenrapportages, p. 25.

The fourth step is the analysis, integration, evaluation and production of the gathered material, which ultimately appears as a finished intelligence product. Analysts play a key role in this process, because they have to assess the information and the source for reliability, substance and relevance, and to compare it with data that became available earlier. They process the information. The resulting product can be relevant to the short, medium or (very) long term. Therefore, in this respect too, there is a variety of types of intelligence.

For the short term, Current Intelligence is important. This consists of reports on current developments, such as the changes in a given situation in the last 24 hours. In addition, intelligence as it is produced by the analyst can have a warning function (Warning Intelligence) and can send the consumer a clear signal of imminent crises. Operational Intelligence can also be important in the short term because it is especially relevant in situations involving military tensions or war. Intelligence can therefore also play a supporting role during crises. This short-term importance also applies to raw, unevaluated intelligence (Raw Intelligence). For the medium term, Basic Intelligence, which is also referred to as the 'heart and soul' of the product, is important. This involves more in-depth studies. Other categories can be identified below this, such as Targeting (the identification of military targets), and intelligence that serves to support the observance of accords on arms control (Arms Control Support).⁴²

Products that are generated for the very long term are known as Estimates, in which an analyst - on the basis of a thorough analysis of all available intelligence - expresses an expectation of future developments. An example is the American National Intelligence Estimates (NIEs), which during the Cold War were mainly analyses of the military power and political intentions of the Soviet Union.⁴³

The fifth and last step in the intelligence cycle is the dissemination of the product among the national and international consumers. For instance, every morning in Washington, a daily briefing book containing finished intelligence is sent to the President. Other consumers include the State Department, the Pentagon and the other government departments. An almost identical process takes place every morning in most European and Asian capitals. This results in new questions which in turn cause new needs to be formulated, and so the cycle starts all over again.⁴⁴

4. The intelligence cycle in practice

It is evident that, if the dissemination works properly, the cycle never ends, because a good use of the delivered product is as important as the continuation of the cycle. A significant example is the Suez Crisis of 1956, when, thanks to their having cracked the British, French and Israeli diplomatic and military code traffic, the American National Security Agency (NSA) was fully informed of the attack on Egypt. However, the delivered information, 'the NSA product', was left accumulating dust on a desk in the State Department for too long.⁴⁵ There are clearly pot-holes on the road to a finished product in the intelligence cycle. However, the process described is an academic ideal, not a practical reality. Generally it is too rigid to work very well and requires last-minute adaptation to match fluid situations. As Loch Johnson says: 'so the cycle is anything but smooth; it is bumpy and disjointed and sometimes collapses altogether'.⁴⁶

Some examples will make this clear. Firstly, collected information can be referred to as intelligence even if no finished product is created. Information that has not been processed by analysts can also be or become intelligence. For instance, the predecessor of the National Security Agency (NSA) intercepted more than 17,500 coded diplomatic and military telegrams from the Netherlands between 1 July 1944 and 31 June 1945. The code breakers issued a daily bulletin. Of the almost four thousand messages that were decrypted in 1945, 1857 were included in the bulletin. The messages that were not included can definitely also be considered intelligence because they were immediately available for translation and perusal at the request of the consumers.⁴⁷

In the second place, there are always permanent needs for intelligence (known as standing requirements), which do not have to be constantly re-established in consultation. In conflict situations or wars, as in Bosnia or Croatia, this involves the military state of affairs of the opponent, or the developments at the front. In many Western capitals before the fall of the Berlin Wall it also involved, for example, the political, military and economic developments in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe. Other examples would be relevant political and economic developments in certain regions that are deemed to be of unchanging importance to a state's national security policy.

Again, the intelligence cycle outlined above is a simplification of the reality. Situations will always arise in which this cycle is quickly abandoned. During a political or military crisis, within the framework of crisis management, policy makers will have a greater interest in raw intelligence. There is no time to wait for a fully digested intelligence product at such moments. An example is the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1961, during which information on the positions of the Soviet nuclear missiles and the movements of Russian vessels were crucial to rapid decision-making on the US side.⁴⁸

A final example, which further clarifies the difference between the theory and practice of the cycle, concerns a general problem for secret services, which in a certain sense disrupts the intelligence cycle. This problem is known as the compartmentalization principle. Even in 'ordinary' organizations, problems arise because different departments have interests that do not run in parallel, or staff who pursue their own objectives, which are not immediately beneficial to the objectives of the organization. This is all the more true of secret services, where departments, bureaux and individual staff build walls around their areas of work, and lose sight of the overall organization or policy objectives. This is justified by the need-to-know principle (only someone who needs the information gets it; whoever does not need it, does not get it). This background sometimes creates conflict between the various departments within a service, which can have an impact on the cycle. Not all information then reaches the cycle.

For example, if an intelligence service fails to predict a crisis, invasion, nuclear test, or missile launch, then the service will often claim that it did not have the correct intelligence at its disposal in good time. It is often described as an intelligence failure. However, like the author Russ Travers already said, the system is sufficiently dysfunctional (despite the best intentions) that intelligence failure is guaranteed. Though the form is less important than the fact, the variations of an intelligence failure are endless. Failure may be of the traditional variety: the intelligence community fails to predict the fall of a friendly government or does not provide sufficient warning of a surprise attack against one of the allies or interests. The intelligence community is completely surprised by a state-sponsored terrorist attack or fail to detect an unexpected country acquiring a weapon of mass destruction. Or, as Travers observes, it may take a more non-traditional form: the intelligence community overstates numerous threats leading to tens of billions of dollars of unnecessary expenditures. Database errors can for example lead to a politically unacceptable number of casualties in a peace-enforcement operation or an operation does not go well because the intelligence community was not able to provide the incredibly specific data necessary to support a new generation of weapons.⁴⁹

Others define an intelligence failure as the failure to provide warning to commanders and policymakers where a duty to provide such warning exists. As an example, the Japanese certainly knew of their own plans to attack Pearl Harbor, but for the Japanese, it was not an intelligence failure because they had no duty to warn American commanders. For the Americans, on the other hand, there was such a duty to provide warning of an attack, and none was forthcoming. In this sense, it was an intelligence failure. So, there are three elements of an intelligence failure: failure to provide warning, to commanders and policymakers and where a duty to provide such warning exists.⁵⁰

It must be made absolutely clear that intelligence failures are seldom caused by a lack of information. The cause more often lies in its processing and interpretation. For instance, it emerged after the event that the Israeli intelligence community had a great deal of information on imminent Arab military action prior to the outbreak of the October War in 1973.⁵¹ The same was true of the American intelligence services, which had also received signals that an Arab offensive was imminent. The NSA especially had many intercepts (intercepted message traffic) that pointed to a military offensive. However, the enormous volume of intercepts (several hundreds of reports each week) overwhelmed the service. The analysts simply could not process the growing flood of messages in good time.⁵²

Many authors think, however, that the weakest link is actually the last phase of the cycle: the dissemination and the correct use of the intelligence product. John Macartney points to the Grenada operation in 1983 and the Iran Contra affair as examples in which intelligence was not involved in the operational plan.⁵³ Copley argues that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait too was certainly not an intelligence failure: intelligence was available, but it was not analysed in good time and reached the consumers too late. His assertion was therefore: 'intelligence is only intelligence when it is in the hands of the consumer'.⁵⁴

In the case of the fall of Srebrenica, it is essential to ascertain whether there was an element of intelligence failure that was caused by a lack of information. According to a former employee of Yasushi Akashi, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in the case of Srebrenica there definitely was an intelligence failure. He assumed that if the UN had known what was about to happen, it would have reacted differently. The employee also thought that Akashi's political ambitions would have led him to respond in a different way.

During the war in Bosnia, Akashi had fallen out of favour with the prominent members of the Security Council. According to this source, the fall of Srebrenica was only one more reason to have him ushered off the stage by a side door. It was said to be a form of standard thinking in the UN (and therefore an intelligence failure) that the Bosnian Serbs would have no idea what to do with the tens of thousands of Displaced Persons from the enclave. The greatest intelligence failure, however, was not so much that no one knew whether half or all the enclave would be captured, but that no view had been formed in advance that the VRS would massacre all the men. After all, military logic demands that the worst case is assumed, which in this case was still that the VRS wanted to capture the enclave.⁵⁵ Chapter 8 deals with this subject in more detail.

It can be said in conclusion that intelligence is a product resulting from a complicated and sometimes long-term process and subsequently distributed among its consumers. Typically, this 'production process', which involves many 'employees', takes place in a 'large factory'. The production demands considerable financial investment, which must be used for the purchase of technical resources to acquire the intelligence, to keep the production process running, and to improve it through additional financial and other investments, as well as to pay the hundreds if not thousands of employees for their work. It is obvious that national governments will have such intelligence ‘factories’ at their disposal. Even small states generally have a national intelligence capacity in the form of civil and military intelligence services. However, this was not the case at the UN.

5. Intelligence and UN peacekeeping operations

The author Walter Dorn passes harsh judgement on the relationship between intelligence and peacekeeping operations in a UN context: ‘Many failures in the history of UN field operations might have been avoided had the UN taken a more forthright approach to intelligence and possessed a stronger mandate to gather information and improve its information-gathering system.’⁵⁶

Since 1945, the use of intelligence in peacekeeping operations has always been difficult. All those involved understood well enough that some intelligence input had to exist, but the UN in New York never took any substantial action to improve the existing situation, even though intelligence should be an integrated part of planning and policy. After all, intelligence is essential for the assessment of a political or military situation, and for taking the correct decisions. It can have far-reaching consequences, so that demanding requirements have to be set on its quality.⁵⁷

The only direct experience of the UN with its own intelligence collection capability took place in the 1960 Congo Crisis. In spite of the aversion that existed in New York, UN armed forces (especially at the initiative of Sweden) did set up a rudimentary intelligence cell: the Military Information Branch, which was operational between 1960 and 1964. The negative undertone of the term ‘intelligence’, which inferred all sorts of illegal and shady operations, meant that it was avoided, with preference given to ‘information’, hence the unit’s title ‘Military Information Branch’. During the peacekeeping operation in Congo, use was made of Sigint by intercepting communications traffic, Imint by deploying reconnaissance aircraft and Humint by systematically debriefing and interrogating prisoners via informants and agents. Comint was a source of much valuable information during the Katanga campaign (Operation Grand Slam) in December 1962 and January 1963, the objective of which was to remove foreign mercenaries, to restore freedom of movement, and to bring an end to the secession of Katanga. The Swedish battalion in Congo used Sigint with great success in the period 1961-1962. The communications of the other party, the Katangese units, were always ‘open’, because they assumed, incorrectly, that the Swedish soldiers could not understand Swahili, and therefore they revealed extremely valuable intelligence.⁵⁸ In addition, in November 1962 the Swedish government also made special photographic reconnaissance aircraft and photographic analysts available.

During this operation, the UN had little contact with national intelligence services. There is nothing remarkable about this, because the CIA was operating in Congo with a goal entirely of its own, which did not correspond with that of the UN. According to Dorn, the American, British and French intelligence services supplied little or no intelligence to the UN mission in Congo. This should have helped convince New York of the usefulness of having its own independent intelligence capability, by illustrating that the agenda of foreign intelligence services may well differ from the UN agenda, even if the governments in the Security Council sanction the operation.

In other peacekeeping operations, the UN had more intelligence available, especially because American Imint was shared with the UN. This was shown (not handed over!) to the commander of the UN Emergency Force in the Middle East in the mid-1960s. For instance, a military consultant of the Secretary-General of the UN was shown Imint from the American U-2 espionage aircraft during the Cuba Crisis in October 1962. Similarly, the military command of the UN Disengagement Observer

Force (UNDOF) on the Golan Heights in the Middle East in 1993 was sometimes allowed to study American U-2 photographs.⁵⁹ And in January 2003 two American U-2s were loaned to the UN for gathering intelligence about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. However, former US officials expressed immediately fear that intelligence given to the UN could leak.⁶⁰ During the operation in Somalia in 1993-1994, American services supplied much intelligence through their Intelligence Support Element, but then American ground forces were also participating. Whether this intelligence was shared with Pakistani UN troops is open to question, because on 5 June 1993, 24 Pakistanis were killed in an operation in Mogadishu. Mohammed Sahnoun, an Algerian diplomat and former special envoy to the UN for Somalia, felt that this indicated 'a complete lack of political and military intelligence capabilities'.⁶¹

In several other recent operations, the headquarters of the peacekeeping mission had an intelligence staff (referred to in military terms as 'the G-2', or 'J-2' in joint operations), as is usual in military operations. In Rwanda (UNAMIR) in 1995 (after the genocide) the G-2 cell comprised six intelligence officers. Of all the peacekeeping operations, various authors have stated that the operation in Haiti was the best organized with respect to intelligence gathering and processing, with a total of 29 Canadian officers. There was also an important intelligence component in the UN Special Commission in Iraq (UNSCOM). This monitoring mission was established as an independent agency with the responsibility to inspect and verify the destruction of Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear, and missile programs. Although it was wearing a UN hat, it was in reality a Western operation. In early August 1991 UNSCOM began to create an in-house Information Assessment Unit. As Tim Crawford points out in his excellent paper, its primary purposes were to receive, analyze, and store overhead imagery, liaison with providing nations, the analysis and archiving of inspection reports, and the maintenance of data bases on Iraqi sites and equipment. The first four staff members of the IAU came from Canada, Australia, France, and the US. The nationalities of these expert analysts were no accident.⁶² The mission even had British eavesdropping equipment at its disposal to intercept Iraqi military communication traffic.⁶³ This did not mean, incidentally, that the staff of the UN verification mission in Iraq were provided with a better insight into the Iraqi military program. They constantly complained that they provided all their Sigint to the American and British intelligence services, but seldom saw the results.⁶⁴

The UNSCOM mission realized all too well that the Iraqi intelligence services would try to monitor their communication traffic. UNSCOM therefore made serious attempts to effectively secure the links with New York. Their efforts were in vain: the Iraqi intelligence service was in a position to decipher and read the coded traffic with the UN headquarters in New York. It turned out that the UNSCOM encryption program that was used to code the messages was very weak and easy to break. At that time it was impossible to buy American strong encryption software, because of the stringent export controls imposed by the American government. This also gave the American intelligence services a chance to read the weakly-encrypted messages. After the discovery that Iraq had broken the code, UNSCOM switched to the encryption program Pretty Good Privacy (PGP).⁶⁵

In parenthesis, we might observe that there were other reasons for not setting too much store by the impartiality of UNSCOM as a UN mission. From time to time, the mission included a large number of CIA staff, and furthermore the UN supplied intelligence to Israel, which further undermined the idea that the intelligence was first and foremost for the UN.⁶⁶ The American government also supplied and continues to supply satellite photographs to the International Atomic Energy Authority (IAEA) in Vienna, which ‘monitors’ the nuclear programs of Iraq and North Korea.⁶⁷

However, as Tim Crawford points out, there were various things counting against the IAEA as regards sharing intelligence with this body. One of them was that IAEA officials, steeped in the UN culture of transparency, simply did not have the “mindset” to properly handle and use sensitive information. For example, on one occasion, a senior IAEA inspector was reported to have casually showed sensitive over-head imagery to an official not involved in inspections. On another occasion, that same inspector left overhead imagery out on his desk during a meeting with Iraqi officials.⁶⁸

To summarize, it can be stated that, during peacekeeping operations in a UN context, independent intelligence gathering was sometimes carried out, with the 1960 Congo experience being a highlight, but in general the UN remained completely dependent on what a member state (mostly the United States) was prepared to supply. The exception was UNSCOM, which received intelligence support from a wide array of governments. But this tells us more about the real character of UNSCOM than about intelligence sharing with the UN in general.⁶⁹

6. Intelligence within the existing UN culture

Since the extensive military enterprise in Congo, much has changed concerning peacekeeping operations in a UN context. Until 1992, the mission in Congo with 20,000 peacekeepers was the largest military operation so far, but that record was broken in the same year: UNPROFOR had more than 40,000 personnel, plus the support of a substantial air force from NATO and a fleet from the WEU. It is also significant that the mandate of most peacekeeping operations nowadays is much broader than used to be the case. For instance, missions are now charged with supervising compliance with sanctions, protecting Safe Areas, providing humanitarian relief, supporting Displaced Persons, monitoring local elections, or assisting in the development of the infrastructure.⁷⁰ However, this expansion of tasks triggered neither a new attitude to intelligence within the UN, nor any significant change of organizational culture.

The then Secretary-General of the UN, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, had tried in the late 1980s to improve the flow of intelligence to UN Headquarters but this ran into immediate trouble. He then created an Office for Research and the Collection of Information (ORCI) in the Secretariat. He tasked ORCI with collecting, organizing, and analyzing political information received from all available sources to support his activities and to advise him of threatening developments. ORCI also did not last. According to a UN veteran who served on Cuéllar’s executive staff, ORCI was stymied, not only by ‘insufficient managerial skill’ but also by ‘bureaucratic resistance from other Secretariat departments that were fearful of encroachment on their territory’. ORCI was disbanded in March 1992 by the new Secretary General, Boutros Boutros Gali and its functions were parceled out to other parts of the UN. Like Crawford correctly observed: a central organ for handling and analyzing sensitive information, with direct reporting to the Secretary General, was killed off and was replaced by a fragmented and balkanized system, in a department further removed from the Secretary General's control. This pattern would become a familiar one in the years to come.⁷¹

Working with a Military Information Branch and the large-scale application of intelligence during the 1960 operations in Congo was thus a one-off event. Since Congo, every attempt within the UN to create its own permanent intelligence section has met with resistance. Both individual countries and the various UN departments have great qualms about the idea. Therefore, in no way did the UN prepare effectively for dealing in a systematic and well thought-out way with secret intelligence: neither in the area of gathering, nor of its dissemination within the UN bureaucracy. There are no guidelines regarding the question of how information is to be gathered, what material must remain secret, which classification levels should be attached, and when documents can and should be released. This raises the question of the nature of the background to the resistance.

An important legal and political reason for the UN not to indulge in gathering intelligence is the mandate of the mission and the associated agreement with the local government. This obliges the UN peace mission to respect all local laws and rules. A peacekeeping mission must therefore be executed with great care, with no diversion from the mandate or the original agreement.

A 'splendid' but at the same time tragic example of such sovereignty constraints in the matter of the gathering and disseminating of information is the experience of the UN Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group shortly before Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. The mission had the mandate to supervise the suspension of hostilities between Iran and Iraq. Since July 1990 the observers had observed the movement of large numbers of Iraqi units to the south, towards the border with Kuwait. However, because the troops concerned did not move to the east (in the direction of Iran) the observers were officially unable to report anything. It was not even permitted by the headquarters of the UN mission in Baghdad. In addition, the Iraqi government threatened to expel the mission if the troop movement was reported through UN channels. This was a real threat, because Iraq monitored UN communication traffic.

Nor apparently, were there any reports to New York through informal channels. The then Secretary-General of the UN, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, wrote on this matter in his memoirs: 'The major powers knew in advance that a very large Iraqi force was moving towards the Kuwaiti border. I did not have such knowledge (...). I failed to anticipate [Saddam Hussein's] aggressive intent'. However, he fails to mention the knowledge that his own observers had in their possession, but did not pass on. Nonetheless, he draws another important conclusion:

'The United Nations, and the Secretary-General in particular, should have better sources of information on developments such as large troop movements that pose a threat to the peace. And the United Nations, as much or more than national governments, should have the skill and insight to understand the import of such information and take appropriate preventive action'.⁷²

However, virtually nothing would come of this. The most important explanation, which is often given, is the political climate within the UN, where doctrines of impartiality, transparency and international law are held in high esteem. The gathering of intelligence during peacekeeping operations does not fit in with UN culture, which must be seen as open and transparent. It would mean that the UN would be gathering intelligence about its own members, which is regarded as completely undesirable.⁷³

This attitude could be detected most clearly within the humanitarian part of the UN system, such as in UNHCR, UNDP and UNICEF. The reason is that the humanitarian community is worried that the safety of their personnel is endangered if they are associated with intelligence gathering. Another reason is that the humanitarian agencies are not accountable to the Security Council for their operations.⁷⁴ According to the military advisor to the UN Secretary-General, Major General F.H. van Kappen, who held this position from 1 July 1995, this did not apply to the UN Secretariat, in particular for the two most important departments within the Secretariat, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) and the Department of Political Affairs (DPA). Although these two departments also traditionally uphold the principle that gathering intelligence is undesirable, the thinking there is starting to shift.⁷⁵

Matters are complicated by the fact that the UN member states have no consistent view on intelligence. Furthermore, the discussion is clouded by problems of definition. What one member state sees as gathering intelligence, another describes as collecting information. As became clear, this was to have serious consequences in Yugoslavia. By way of illustration, the Canadian battalion and the French company who were responsible for reopening the Sarajevo airfield in June 1992 were given no insight by the UN into the positions and activities of the warring factions around that airfield. The UN expected the troops to go in 'blind'. Because of the excellent relationship with its neighbour to the south, Ottawa could gather the intelligence it needed by a roundabout route, which was not only necessary for protecting the units, but also to cover an emergency withdrawal strategy.⁷⁶

It can be deduced from this that, at the commencement of the conflict in Yugoslavia, the problems with passing on intelligence to the United Nations had yet to be solved. Indeed, there is still no intelligence culture at the UN. Within UNPROFOR, there was even an emphatic anti-intelligence culture. 'Intelligence, even if it was to be used only for force protection, was still being resisted by some senior military officers in command positions at UNPROFOR in Zagreb', according to an intelligence officer who worked at the headquarters there.⁷⁷

In the summer of 1992, at the start of the UNPROFOR mission in Bosnia, the UN Secretariat rejected the American offer of (military and other) intelligence.⁷⁸ At that time the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague had already concluded that without good intelligence 'the UN operation was doomed to be rudderless'.⁷⁹ The American offer was later repeated under the Clinton administration, but again rejected.⁸⁰ An anti-intelligence culture was also dominant at the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) of the UN headquarters. For example, the head of this department, Kofi Annan, stated suspiciously: 'We have to be careful because the big powers only give us what they want us to know.' There was still a deep aversion to the UN gathering its own intelligence. They preferred to use the term 'military information', and the gathering had to be done by military observers, who were only allowed to report visual observations. When some (mainly American) intelligence was passed on to the DPKO, past experience showed that no feedback was to be expected from New York to the local UNPROFOR commanders.

Another reason for the UN's objections to intelligence is that there is an element of restraint in most countries when it comes to passing on information to the UN. This applies not only to smaller states, but also to the United States, which until now has had the closest intelligence liaison with the UN. This restraint was mainly caused by the 'leaks' within the organization itself, and also because UN personnel were unaccustomed to dealing routinely with classified material. This was an issue not only in New York but also locally in Bosnia, where insecure communication equipment was often used, so that the Armija Bosna i Hercegovina (ABiH, the military forces of the Bosnian Muslims), the VRS and the Vojska Jugoslavija (VJ, the army of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) could listen in on UNPROFOR message traffic without much difficulty.⁸¹ A similar pattern had emerged during the UN operations in Lebanon.⁸²

The Secretariat in New York is notorious for its many leaks ('a leaky organization'), which has thoroughly dampened the enthusiasm among the member states for sharing intelligence with the UN.⁸³ The military advisor to the UN Secretary-General, Van Kappen, was once told by a foreign intelligence officer: 'If you enter this building and even think about something, it is known in 185 different capitals in the world within one hour.'⁸⁴ This is one of the reasons why the Security Council commonly met in 'closed session' to discuss UNPROFOR, with the consequence that some troop-contributing nations, such as Canada and the Netherlands, were kept outside the decision-making process surrounding UNPROFOR.

What is more, smaller countries are fearful that a smoothly running intelligence organization at the UN would damage their national interests and integrity. This risk would arise in particular if such a department were to become dominated (which is not unlikely) by Western intelligence officers.⁸⁵

It is also significant that many UN officials are simultaneously (and primarily) on the staff of foreign intelligence services, and consequently intelligence shared often lands on the desks of a foreign intelligence service. Van Kappen was also occasionally told that certain officials within the DPKO were active in gathering intelligence for various intelligence services.⁸⁶ For instance, many Russians and Chinese at the UN were in fact officials of their country's intelligence services. The Soviet intelligence service, the KGB, had even penetrated to the level of the Undersecretary-General for Political and Security Council Affairs. In the 1970s this was Arkady Shevchenko.⁸⁷

It is true that for intelligence sharing with the UN, a special intelligence liaison official was attached to the American Permanent Representative, but the former Director of the CIA James Woolsey admitted that this arrangement was awkward. The actual sharing of sensitive intelligence only happened there on a bilateral basis, according to the 'quid pro quo' principle. At the lower levels of classification there was broader sharing.⁸⁸ However, another American intelligence official was a bit offended but the complaints from UN officials. The UN was indeed incapable of dealing with the most rudimentary classification controls. However, the American response was to drive the classification to the unclassified level, and send it to the UN. Based on a concerted analytical effort, it was possible to attribute nearly every report to some unclassified newspaper report or openly available information. As long as the US intelligence community was not asked to provide information on sources and methods, the downgrading of extremely sensitive information could be accomplished, usually without threatening the far more frangible sources and methods. Teams of intelligence analysts at various US locations, including Naples, Molesworth, Stuttgart and Washington DC pushed the downgrading limits of published guidelines in an effort to release vitally needed information to the UN at the unclassified level. Usually the intelligence sources themselves were quite sensitive, but a report stripped of the source material, perhaps attributed to press or other open sources, the vital report could reach those who needed it without jeopardizing intelligence sources.

According to this official, the challenge of getting vital information to the UN became a two-step process. First, a truly all-source analytical effort was undertaken in at least four separate locations to generate an all-source perspective. Second, that all-source product was gone through with a fine lens to provide for the fullest possible disclosure to the UN. This resulted in two sets of products, or sometimes even more, for every product produced by these four specialized all-source analytical centers producing daily or twice-daily intelligence reports on developments in the Balkans. The US official complained (perhaps rightly so) that there remain too many individuals who judge the value of a report based on the classification it bears. This was foolishness, and the official hoped that such a perspective will die out soon enough. The US official remarked adamantly that it was such an ignorant perspective by asserting that 'unclassified = worthless'.⁸⁹

Nonetheless, within the UN in New York, there was constant resistance to the use of intelligence in peacekeeping operations. Van Kappen did personally have a strong suspicion that the permanent members of the Security Council do not consider this to be a problem and there is certainly no urge to change the situation.⁹⁰ The question arises, however, as to whether that position is now outdated, and whether the UN needs its own intelligence service and should engage in intelligence gathering. Smith points out that such signals have already been sent. For instance, the Australian Minister of Foreign Affairs has proposed that 'a group of professionals from various countries with expertise in intelligence (...) be recruited and approved by the Security Council'. This unit should have access to classified material, with a view to providing independent advice to the Security Council. However, this suggestion was given a sceptical reception, because it appeared unlikely that the officials of this unit would be able to completely divorce themselves from their national intelligence services. The question that then arises is whether the intelligence to be gathered by this unit would actually be reliable and free from value judgements.⁹¹

In 1992, the European Community, Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Australia, Canada and New Zealand made a proposal to establish an independent intelligence-gathering facility at the UN for early warning purposes, and to give the UN an effective instrument for preventive diplomacy. The proposal 'touched off a furious response from the United States, which appears to be resolutely opposed to any moves that would enhance the UN's ability to gather and analyse sensitive information in an independent fashion'.⁹²

Another problem, of course, is that the UN, with more than 180 members, is unusual in the world of intelligence in that it has no 'national interest' on which to concentrate. The needs among the policy makers in the UN Secretariat are also highly diverse, making it difficult to give direction to such intelligence gathering.⁹³

Provisionally, it would therefore appear that an effective intelligence organization under the DPKO is not to be expected in the very near future. The unwillingness among most countries is still too great, because intelligence would then have to be gathered about the member states. Eriksson therefore asserts: 'peacekeeping organizations (especially the UN) as they exist today cannot maintain an advanced, comprehensive and combined intelligence service of their own at a strategic level'.⁹⁴ The former British permanent representative at the UN, Sir David Hannay, expressed himself in similar terms. His first argument was that member states would not be prepared to pay. Secondly, he suggested that it would form too great a threat to their own national security. And thirdly, the DPKO in New York would not know what to do with all the information gathered, because it had insufficient personnel to process it.⁹⁵

In April 1993, the Situation Centre was established in DPKO, as a 24 hour hub for communications between peace operations in the field and HQ. By the end of the year, the center was staffed by 24 gratis military officers (GMOs) on loan from 16 different member states from Australia to Zimbabwe, Norway to Pakistan, Jordan to Russia. This UN Situation Centre (SitCen) in New York carried out some intelligence-related work, but in practice this centre mainly sucked in all information while releasing little.⁹⁶ The SitCen has also a small analysis section, the Information and Research Cell (I&RC), which employed five officials. This organ was founded in 1994 originally with one American intelligence official, who was rapidly joined by three more staff from Russia, France and the United Kingdom. This organ is completely dependent on input from the national intelligence services, which leaves open the possibility of the manipulation of intelligence.⁹⁷

However, as Crawford observed, this benign view of DPKO's increasing intelligence capacity and the role of intelligence Western officials was not shared by many developing countries, or by most parts of the UN bureaucracy, where both the influence and the concerns of those countries predominate. Indeed, DPKO was increasingly seen by them as a 'beach-head' in the Secretariat for the US, its Western allies, and Russia. This could only mean the intrusion of great power priorities in the Secretariat, priorities, which often conflicted with those of developing nations. The developing nations, under the aegis of the Non-Aligned Movement, voiced major concerns and in the end also this organ was doomed to disappear. Various other attempts were made but, despite various recommendations, there is in 2002 still no coherent and autonomous organ within the Secretariat capable of serious intelligence handling and analysis.⁹⁸

Another major problem appeared to be the rapid turnover of personnel.⁹⁹ The Military Advisor to the Secretary-General of the UN, Van Kappen, confirmed this. In addition he said that he received hardly any reliable intelligence. The quality of the intelligence obtained was variable. Whatever he asked the American representative, he would receive 'no answer, or answers that made no sense.' Van Kappen himself said that his most useful contact was the Russian representative, Sergei Lakonovski, a former KGB officer. The problem with this was that his information could also be used to manipulate Van Kappen, who therefore had to treat it with extreme caution. He also received much information from the French, which, however, he often judged to be unreliable because assumptions were frequently elevated to the status of facts. Van Kappen received rather less information from the British, but what he received was mostly reasonably reliable.¹⁰⁰

Another problem that Van Kappen identified was the large proportion of intelligence that was supplied to him verbally, often with the instruction to share it with only a limited number of officials. Occasionally he was not permitted to inform the official in the DPKO who was responsible for the political aspects of a peacekeeping mission. According to Van Kappen, the management of this department was completely unclear, which resulted in constant friction and discord, both within the DPKO and elsewhere within the Secretariat. Van Kappen also had frequent suspicions that products that were passed to him were intended to manipulate the UN, or at least the DPKO. As an example he mentioned the humanitarian crisis in East Zaire. If a permanent member of the Security Council was in favour of intervention, intelligence would be supplied showing that there were too many Displaced Persons and that they were in a wretched state. If a permanent member was against intervention, then the number of Displaced Persons would be less alarming and their condition would be reasonable. All in all, Van Kappen found it a 'shameful exhibition'.¹⁰¹ A senior German intelligence official confirmed this description. A specific person was pinpointed and this particular person was the only one to receive intelligence from the BND. The official also confirmed that files with national intelligence were designed in order to influence certain UN officials.¹⁰²

American intelligence support to the UN was limited, partly because of the 'varied' composition of this unit. The documents that were handed over were often unclassified. However, the disadvantage of this, as a UN employee explained, was that it was 'dated' and often consisted of a summary of earlier UN reports.¹⁰³ However, as an US official adamantly remarked: it is such an ignorant perspective by asserting that 'unclassified = worthless'.¹⁰⁴

Actually, the UN was constantly confronted with an internal dilemma: they did not want to carry out intelligence gathering themselves, but it was also clear to the organization that intelligence is necessary in peacekeeping operations. For instance, the Military Advisor to the Secretary-General, Major General Maurice Baril, admitted in January 1995 at a meeting of troop-contributing nations, that access to intelligence was important, but that such help would have to be arranged bilaterally, for access to intelligence was, as Lord Owen was able to recall, 'a potentially difficult one'.¹⁰⁵

The reluctant attitude to active and independent intelligence gathering was therefore not a sign that the UN believed that it had absolutely no need of intelligence in its peacekeeping operations. According to Johnston, there were in fact no compelling reasons for the UN not to provide effective intelligence support to its own peacekeeping missions.¹⁰⁶ However, the resistance to intelligence remained a part of the UN culture, and that would also initially be the case with UNPROFOR. In traditional peacekeeping operations, the policy of the troop-contributing nations was to minimize and disregard the military-intelligence component, because they assumed that intelligence gathering could undermine the principle of impartiality.

In addition, New York wanted to avoid awkward questions, such as whether the intelligence that the UN would gather had to be shared with all the warring parties. With respect to 'openness' versus 'confidentiality', the UN was confronted with a dilemma, because there are advantages and disadvantages to both. A potential advantage of openness is that it makes the operation more acceptable and less threatening to all warring parties. It would also reduce the fear of all manner of covert operations, and build trust. A disadvantage of too much openness is the danger of leaks, for which the UN was renowned and which would lead to a sustained refusal among the troop-contributing nations to share more and better intelligence with the UN.¹⁰⁷

An added factor is that states can have different political interests in a peacekeeping operation, which are not necessarily in line with the mandate of the Security Council. This can be a reason for a troop-contributing nation to share gathered intelligence only selectively, or not at all.

Another problem is the diversity of nationalities within a UN operation. The kind of intelligence that can be shared between a Dutch and a British official, for example, cannot be shared with an official from Ukraine. As an example from the practical situation in Bosnia, the first Force Commander of UNPROFOR, Lieutenant General Satish Nambiar, had no NATO intelligence at his disposal because he came from India.¹⁰⁸

The official NATO guidelines on sharing intelligence with non-NATO member states are extremely stringent: intelligence is only intended for the member states, and therefore cannot be disclosed to 'a non-member nation or any international organization containing non-member nations. Whatever different requirements emerge for peacekeeping operations this fundamental principle must be upheld.'¹⁰⁹ In this connection, in a 'lessons learned' article, an Irish peacekeeper outlined a fairly idealistic picture of the relationship between peacekeeping and intelligence. In his opinion, intelligence gathering is essential for all peacekeeping operations, but intelligence operations in a UN context must be carried out by teams of various nationalities. He feels, moreover, that gathering intelligence 'should be controlled and conducted solely at the discretion of the Force Commander'. Consequently, the intelligence must not be gathered for or by the various national intelligence services or the interests of troop-contributing countries. How intelligence would have to be gathered in that case, and what structure is available for the task, this military official at the UN Training School in Ireland does not say.¹¹⁰

Another obstacle within the UN is the divergent general attitude to intelligence from one country to another. Some countries reject intelligence activity by the UN or underestimate the importance of intelligence.¹¹¹ The dissemination of intelligence between parties is sometimes also hindered for political reasons, which, for instance, accounted for the suppression of intelligence on attacks by ABiH snipers in Sarajevo on their own population.¹¹²

In spite of the dismissive attitude and culture within the UN towards intelligence, some reasonably serious attempts have nonetheless been made to provide the UN, and especially the DPKO, with better intelligence in peacekeeping operations.

7. Intelligence support for UN peacekeeping operations

In the summer of 1992, UN Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali launched his Agenda for Peace, which announced a considerable expansion of the number of UN peace operations. Between 1945 and 1988 there were a total of fourteen such operations, but between May 1988 and October 1993 the number had already risen to twenty. The nature of these UN operations changed significantly over the years, with the environment for soldiers shifting from non-hostile to hostile. This also meant an increasing need for intelligence, the importance of which was recognized by the American government.

In November 1992, President George Bush Sr. announced¹¹³ in an address to the UN General Assembly that his government would start intelligence sharing with the UN with immediate effect. He also said that the Security Council would have to play a more central role in such operations. This shift in policy was a recognition that the UN operations needed considerable intelligence support if they were to have even a reasonable chance of success.

'such peace enforcement operations would require strategic military and political intelligence for pre-deployment planning; operational intelligence support to deployed UN forces regarding the disposition, capabilities, and intentions of potentially hostile forces; and tactical intelligence to support UN forces that might themselves be engaged in sustained combat'.¹¹⁴

The first step taken by the Bush administration to put this new policy into effect was the 'launch' of National Security Directive 74, which set down guidelines for more generous intelligence sharing during peacekeeping operations.¹¹⁵ The Americans established a separate structure for the necessary liaison, and also built in levels for the classification of documents that could be handed over to the UN. The Director of the CIA, Robert Gates, designated the Defense Intelligence Agency as the most important channel for the intelligence support to the UN by the United States in peacekeeping operations. This support was not to be permanent but subject to review on a case-by-case basis. The first UN mission to benefit was the UNTAC operation in Cambodia.¹¹⁶

President Clinton inherited this policy from his predecessor, and produced Presidential Review Directive (PRD) 13, in which he expressed support for the more extensive participation of American armed forces in peace operations. Domestic political considerations tripped up this apparent success, however, because the directive met with resistance in Congress and was then withdrawn.¹¹⁷ This again showed the popularity of UN-bashing in Congress.

Congress felt vindicated by the dramatic events of October 1993, when 18 US Rangers were killed and 78 wounded at Mogadishu in Somalia. This even led to a small rebellion in Congress.¹¹⁸ James Woolsey, former Director of the CIA, confirmed that matters had indeed gone wrong in Somalia and there were suspicions that American intelligence had been leaked via the UN, enabling the warlord Mohammed Farah Aideed to strike. The sharing of intelligence between the Americans and the Italians had also been known to go wrong. In the absence of a clear policy underlying the sharing of intelligence, decisions were made on the spot. 'It was a verbal decision with no paper moving around', according to Woolsey. In his opinion, a local Chief of Station (COS) could only share intelligence if he or she was duly authorized.

However, there was no clear policy on this point.¹¹⁹ It would appear that policy was mostly decided in the field, certainly where tactical intelligence was involved. Woolsey suspected that sharing with UNPROFOR was at a low level, going no further than confidential status. He commented that, in the case of a normal peacekeeping operation, there would not actually be very much need for intelligence, but in the case of a war there obviously would. Therefore, according to him, a CIA liaison officer was posted to Zagreb and Sarajevo at UNPROFOR headquarters.¹²⁰ However, a senior US intelligence official remarked that the situation described by Woolsey was Somalia in the early 1990's, not the Balkans in mid-1995. By 1995, there was a clear written US policy, thoroughly understood at multiple levels, on the thresholds of information release from US channels into the UN. According to this official, this new policy was aggressively pursued by the most senior leadership.¹²¹

In any case, the intelligence leaks in Somalia led American Congress one month later to draw up the International Peacekeeping Policy Act of 1993, which among other things proposed curtailing intelligence sharing with the UN. An amendment to the Peace Powers Act of 1994 was also submitted with the same objective in January 1994. It is true that both proposals were never raised for discussion, but the tone in Congress had been set. President Clinton took no notice of this, and in May 1994 he issued Presidential Decision Directive (PDD) 25, which was a revision of his earlier PRD 13. PDD 25 also went against the wishes of Congress by providing for an expansion of intelligence support to the UN.¹²²

After the Republicans gained a majority in Congress in November 1994, they announced in their Contract with America that they would overrule PDD 25. In its place they wanted to tighten the rules of the game for exchanging intelligence, and felt that this should require at least an official agreement between the President and the UN Secretary-General. It goes without saying that the Republicans knew that the UN would never consent to such an agreement.

A considerable curtailment was also provided for in the Peacekeeping Policy Act of 1995, which the Republicans submitted. However, this bill was provisionally rejected by Congress.¹²³ A huge commotion broke out in February 1995 about the sharing of US intelligence with the UN. American personnel discovered large quantities of US intelligence documents and classified Imint in open cabinets at a deserted UN office in Mogadishu. This was top-secret material that had been shared by the United States with the UN, but had been left behind unguarded by local UN personnel. This was grist to the Republicans' mill, and resulted in amendment after amendment to associated legislation. In May and June 1995, entire bills were submitted that would go as far as to make handing over US intelligence to the UN almost impossible. The bills were not raised for discussion, partly because Clinton threatened to use a presidential veto, but it was clear that the tide could not be turned if the UN were to become involved in a new scandal about leaking US intelligence. In that case the Democrats would probably also endorse the curtailment of the intelligence support, and public opinion, which until then had not stirred, would likewise start to move.

It was also clear that the American intelligence community could not be 'involved' simultaneously with every crisis in the world. On 2 March 1995 the Clinton administration therefore issued PDD 35, which was an attempt to set priorities in the matter of the intelligence needs of all American services. It identified four priority levels, the highest of which was the gathering of intelligence on indications or warnings of approaching hostilities, crisis management information and support for military operations. The following priorities related to gathering political, military and economic intelligence about countries that were hostile to the United States. The lowest priority was given to intelligence on countries that were unimportant to the United States. The consequences of PDD 35 are discussed below.

The solution opted for seemed at first glance to be ideal, because giving priority to intelligence needs was in itself an excellent starting point. It gave the intelligence community a handle on what information the political leaders wanted to see and it gave the highest priority to supporting crisis operations. It rapidly became apparent, however, that PDD 35 also had significant disadvantages. The intelligence community turned out to be incapable of predicting serious crises. An American Congress study on the subject stated that the intelligence community had responded to PDD 35 by focusing 'resources on the highest priority issues at the expense of maintaining basic coverage on "lower" tier issues'.

The lowest intelligence levels were therefore more or less ignored, because the entire intelligence community concentrated on the most important priorities. Less important intelligence needs were therefore pushed to the background. Even before PDD 35 was issued, the great emphasis of intelligence on acute security issues had proved to be a problem. PDD 35 served only to confirm this situation. It had become apparent at a much earlier stage that this could create problems, for instance in Rwanda and Somalia. These countries were probably on priority level 4, but when both states suddenly shifted to level 1 because of a crisis, the American intelligence community turned out to be poorly prepared.¹²⁴ For example, after US troops left for Somalia in 1992, the country continued to be the 18th intelligence priority of the nineteen countries in the area under the responsibility of US Central Command. American ground forces there had virtually no intelligence, and the local CIA refused to provide it. CIA staff sent the intelligence required first to their headquarters in Langley, ¹²³ Joseph G. Hays III, 'Oversight of U.S. Intelligence Support to UN Peacekeeping Operations', in: Pickert, Intelligence, pp. 445-449.

¹²⁴ Becker, Coming, pp. 21-23.

Virginia, where it was decided which intelligence could be sent to the ground forces in Somalia. This process would often take between 12 and 72 hours.¹²⁵ A later study of the operations in Somalia indicated that there had been insufficient Humint, and that important 'intelligence indicators were not assessed and analysed from first principles but were rather conveniently tailored to fit around what was wanted to be believed'.¹²⁶

The question now was whether this problem of being unable to handle an unexpected high priority also occurred in Yugoslavia, and in particular with respect to the political and military situation in Eastern Bosnia. Only after Clinton was elected at the end of 1992 was a more aggressive Bosnia policy introduced, moving the region to the top priority level.¹²⁷ The question is whether this happened in time to gather sufficient intelligence. Some experts believe that this was not the case, and that Humint efforts in particular were undertaken far too late. Because building up a properly functioning network often takes months or years, it is likely that this failed to happen in time in Bosnia, and especially in the Republika Srpska. The Humint efforts in Bosnia were only stepped up with the arrival of the first US ground forces.¹²⁸

However, what would appear to have been more crucial were the negative signals from the American Congress, which the American intelligence community would hardly have ignored. In spite of all the measures and President Clinton's attitude, this is bound to have led to a more restrained policy on sharing intelligence with the UN in peacekeeping operations such as the one in Bosnia. As a result, most countries that were involved could not rely on UN intelligence and were obliged instead to arrange their own, which had to be acquired either by their own activities or via liaison with another country. UNPROFOR therefore had an ill-starred beginning to the war in Bosnia: no intelligence culture within the UN; no organizational structure in the UN itself devoted to active and timely intelligence gathering and the analysis of the intelligence gathered; little intelligence contribution from outside; and finally little willingness to cooperate among foreign intelligence services.

8. The Military Information Office (MIO) in Zagreb

Since the UNPROFOR mission, with its peacekeeping character, was essentially a military operation, what is known as a G-2 intelligence staff was set up to provide the Force Commander with intelligence. Zagreb, Sarajevo and Sector North East in Tuzla had similar sections. Because intelligence could not be referred to by name, here too the term 'military information' was introduced. The staff of the Military Information Office (MIO) in Zagreb was a multicultural affair and consisted of a large number of different nationalities, but it had no network of sources or agents of its own, and no autonomous resources for gathering intelligence. They were completely dependent on what the UNMO's and the staff on the various echelons within UNPROFOR reported and on the voluntary intelligence contribution of other states. Initially, this led to intelligence often being gathered along national or allied lines. Informal communication channels were exploited and informal agreements were entered into to gain access to the intelligence obtained.

Even after its wavering start, the MIO never managed to build its own collection capacity: the financial resources, the manpower and the political will were all lacking. In this respect, the MIO could not be considered to be a real intelligence service: the staff were unable to direct the gathering of information. Nonetheless, some collection management was possible, but generally through national or NATO centers and auspices alone, with the exceptions of the unofficial relationship to the UNMO's and the NGO's. But there was no direct tasking authority from the MIO in Zagreb to any collection capacity in the theatre. But nevertheless, some collection did take place under the direction and control of the MIO office in Zagreb, especially through NATO and national resources.¹²⁹

Originally, the UNPROFOR mission was intended for Croatia, and the headquarters were established in Sarajevo. There too, there was absolutely no real intelligence capacity. A staff was hired locally to watch TV and to listen to the news on the radio in order to inform the UNPROFOR command of the latest developments.¹³⁰ Little changed when this mission moved to Belgrade on 17 May 1992. Only after the move to Zagreb and the escalation of the war in the summer of 1993 was there any serious attempt to tackle this deficiency, but even then it remained tough going.

The MIO only really got down to work when the first American Deputy G-2 Officer arrived in Zagreb in March 1994. There were between ten and fourteen members of staff under the Spanish G-2 Officer, Colonel Juan Palomar. As well as the American officer, there were representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Kenya, Denmark, Nepal, Belgium and Sweden. Various other countries, such as Jordan and Poland, were also represented from time to time. The Spanish G-2 Officer was succeeded first by another Spanish soldier Colonel Fidel Ramos and then on 9 January 1995 by the Swedish Colonel Jan-Inge Svensson.

According to a former head of the Military Intelligence Service (MIS) of the Royal Netherlands Army who served in UNPROFOR under Force Commander Jean Cot, it was difficult to obtain reliable intelligence in Zagreb. The American Deputy G-2 Officer in Zagreb had his own office where in the beginning no one was admitted. From the American side, little sharing of intelligence took place, but neither did much intelligence arrive, according to this source. The fact that everyone had a so-called blue-beret mentality (a reference to the blue colour of the UN) reinforced the situation, because intelligence was considered 'dirty'.¹³¹

However, the description of the situation by this Dutch officer pertained to 1994 and this was certainly not the case in 1995. In that period the office of the American Deputy G-2 was always open for other members of the MIO staff. Throughout this period, the Deputy G-2 Officer position was held by Americans. From September 1994 this was LCO Gary Bauleke and from March 1995 onwards (also during the fall of Srebrenica) the officer concerned was Commander Ric Morgan, who had a secure E-mail and secure data net access with the US intelligence community, which kept him thoroughly up-to-date on intelligence. Morgan shared as much as possible of the intelligence acquired in this way with some other staff at the headquarters in Zagreb.¹³² However, this was sharing within limits. According to some Unprofor staff he only shared with fellow Americans or some privileged partners, such as the British and Canadians. This caused resentment, not least among personnel of the non-privileged NATO countries, who sometimes felt they were being sidelined.

However, according to an US intelligence source a distorted picture is painted here. The American Deputy G-2 acted under the specific and detailed instructions of his US superiors, based on broad policy guidance from Stuttgart and Washington. Morgan did share to the very limits of his authority. The US intelligence support flowing to the UN in Zagreb and Sarajevo was far, far better in volume, quality and responsiveness than ever before in any other UN undertaking, anywhere in the world. His orders were to share information on sources and methods only with specific parties, including NATO parties, individuals in leadership positions (including the Dutch Chief of Staff, Canadian Deputy Force Commander, the French Force Commander (and French members of his staff), Mr. Akashi (Japan) and Mr. Annan (Ghana) and select members of their staff.

In many cases, the details regarding sources and methods to those specific individuals, exceeded those which could normally be provided to regular NATO channels under then-existing guidelines. The specific instruction from his superiors was that those key decision-makers were to be provided access to information, exactly as though they were American commanders controlling US troops. Morgan had a dual responsibility to support the leadership as well as the troop contingents. With that in mind, the substantive content of the intelligence was disseminated broadly to other UN parties without any similar restriction. This was done by helping to shape the NATO intelligence flow disseminated via Linked Operational Intelligence Centre Europe (LOCE) network¹³³ (an intelligence system set up by the NATO countries based on a specially constructed highly-secured communication network), as well as the US products flowing directly to the UN. British and Canadian contributions were similarly most substantial. Also the French contributed. As an aside, MIO staff interviewed could not ever remember a single intelligence report from the Dutch. Even the reports from the released Dutchbat soldiers were extensively edited by Dutch debriefers and staff and relinquished only under protest.¹³⁴

Especially during Operation Storm in August 1995 (the Croatian offensive in the Krajina) members of the MIO felt being sidelined. According to one former MIO staff, clear that the Deputy G-2 Officer had special relations with Croatia, and the American officer was said to have known of the attack well in advance.¹³⁵ However, an American intelligence official denied this strongly and some US officials in Zagreb even felt 'betrayed' by the US Military Attaché, Lieutenant Colonel Richard Herrick, who seemed to know in advance about the Croatian offensive but apparently did not share this intelligence with his US colleagues.¹³⁶ The American opinions and intelligence regarding the launch of the Croatian offensive against the Krajina was shared with Unprofor. Zagreb knew on the basis of this that something was about to happen. He pointed for example to the message of July 7th which Akashi forwarded the message to New York. Akashi reported that he was gravely concerned about the dangerous situation in Croatia. The developments could quickly deteriorate in a full scale war. There was an expectation of a renewed Croatian military offensive at 'practically anytime'. And indeed: US intelligence assessments on July 10th indicated that Croatian forces were poised to attack with virtually no advance warning. However, the attack did not actually begin until August 4th. The reason for the delay has never been adequately explained.¹³⁷

According to former staff of the MIO in Zagreb, the quality of the local staff was varied. Some were professional intelligence officers, but others often had no operational or intelligence background at all. Their performance was therefore mediocre. What is more, in common with many other missions, some officers were only interested in the financial rewards, and did little work.

Neither was there a culture of debating opposing perceptions or unusual opinions, which would have been beneficial to forming balanced views. This applied not so much to the MIO but in particular to the debates in the UN staff in general. Furthermore, the intelligence officers would often take heed of the prevailing political and military views in their country of origin, which sometimes led to the production of politicized intelligence, or the deliberate disregarding of certain unwelcome issues.

Originally, no input at all came from the UN DPKO and UNPROFOR itself with respect to building up the necessary facilities. The office of the new MIO received only office furniture, telephone connections and a few old PCs. Standard office items were also issued rather frugally, which led to newcomers being advised to bring their own items with them. Moreover, the MIO originally had no connection with the outside world by modem, so that e-mail traffic and Internet access were impossible. Neither did the MIO have any strongboxes or secure rooms, so it was not safe to leave documents there. The office was accessible to everyone throughout the day. Locally hired cleaning personnel could walk in and out unobstructed. Some of the staff assumed that all rooms were bugged and that most discussions were monitored. Only later this situation at UN HQ in Zagreb improved considerably. In 1995, for example, the personal office of the Force Commander, the personal office of the Deputy Force Commander and the office of American Deputy G-2 were regularly checked and confirmed by competent authority to be free of bugs on a recurring basis.

Moreover, the MIO had no resources of its own to gather intelligence nor the authority to order certain units on the ground, in the air, or at sea to gather intelligence. Most attempts to do so got no further than lower-level UN commanders, who refused on the grounds that the UN does not indulge in intelligence. Some collection management was possible, but generally through national or NATO centers and auspices alone, with the exceptions of the unofficial relationship to the UNMO's and the NGO's. But there was no direct tasking authority from the MIO in Zagreb to any collection capacity in the theatre. The staff also had no secure connections or computer networks for communications traffic, and not even an encrypted telephone for holding secure conversations. The only system was the 'open' UN telephone network, plus a few telephones, which again were connected to the Croatian telephone network. Furthermore, the MIO had no access to external databases. Some members of staff therefore remarked mockingly that they had better access to information at home than in the Military Information Office.¹³⁸

Initially, the MIO had no source of intelligence from outside the region specifically providing a daily or weekly intelligence input. It would even have been impractical to receive daily messages, faxes or telexes from outside the region because the staff had no secure connections at their disposal. For this reason, the field of vision at the MIO remained limited to what arrived from UN sources, and sometimes via national lines. The MIO functioned mainly on the basis of the daily and weekly reporting of the units in the field and from the United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) who were military observers under direct orders from the UN headquarters in New York.¹³⁹ The quality and quantity of the information varied considerably, and depended greatly on the capacities and expertise of the person providing it.

Experience taught the MIO that it took two to three months before a 'fresh' battalion would start to deliver high quality intelligence. In view of the fact that most units were relieved after six months, quality was under pressure. There was also a language problem: the official language was English, but this created difficulties for some units.

The best source of information for the MIO turned out to be the UNMOs, whose headquarters in Zagreb had its own G-2 section. A former prominent UNMO officer went so far as to assert that these UNMO headquarters generally had better intelligence than the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb: 'We were living among the population.' However, this was not the only reason. This UNMO had once compared the information positions with a member of the UNPROFOR G-2 staff in Zagreb and concluded that the UNMOs' information was much more usable than that of UNPROFOR. Filtering took place at many more levels within UNPROFOR: 'I saw documents that had only been through a selection once. At UNPROFOR there were many more layers of selection for information', this UNMO officer said.

Furthermore, the UNPROFOR G-2 staff in Zagreb dealt with the different national capitals, which (whether or not via the UN Security Council) requested a wide variety of information. Answering these requests formed an additional burden. According to a senior UNMO official, this is a permanent problem where intelligence is concerned, and it is exacerbated because political desires may influence the flow of information: 'Information only has an effect if people are open to it.'

At UNPROFOR, according to this UNMO officer, this was definitely the case: 'At UNPROFOR the political reality mainly dictated which information was reported upwards.' As an example he mentioned the observance and reporting of shelling incidents, which was a regular UNMO task. 'If we said that Muslims were shelling themselves, this was not accepted by UNPROFOR, for political reasons.'

As a specific example he mentioned the mortar attack on the water distribution point in Sarajevo on 28 August 1995, which had been the trigger for the later NATO air strikes. The UNMOs had indications that this attack had indeed been carried out by Bosnian Muslims themselves. However, all associated evidence was brushed aside by American officers in Sarajevo. A British colonel of the Special Air Services (SAS), who investigated the matter together with a senior UNMO official, then passed on the contrary findings to a British daily newspaper.¹⁴⁰

At a later stage, the MIO was reorganized in April 1995 by Svensson who also asked New York for more manpower. The UN then approved to strengthen the analyst capacity and the organization in Zagreb was tightened up. Svensson then had a staff of 13 nationalities, which spoke 11 different languages.¹⁴¹ After that the MIO not only observed the military situation, but also assembled information on political, economic and humanitarian matters. According to Smith, a standing joke in the MIO until then had been that: 'If you understand the situation in the former Yugoslavia, you must have been poorly briefed.'¹⁴²

In April 1995, some members of the staff of the MIO were finally given access to the intelligence stored in the Linked Operational Intelligence Centre Europe (LOCE) network. LOCE was used to obtain American Imint and to exchange the results of electronic and other intelligence. The situation in other military information offices was sometimes similarly poor. The G-2 officer at the headquarters of Sector North East in Tuzla, Major Knut Eilertsen of Norway, had absolutely no access to LOCE, and he was the only intelligence officer there. Visits to units or areas were impossible because of the shortage of staff. Eilertsen therefore hoped for a speedy expansion of his G-2 section, as he expressed during a visit by Dutch soldiers. The Dutch Chief of Staff of Sector North East, Colonel J. Engelen, had to admit frankly after this visit that the provision of information in the UN was minimal.¹⁴³

In 1994 and 1995, the access to 'the rest of the world' at the Zagreb office of the G-2 staff consisted of a few daily newspapers and a TV that could pick up the European broadcasts of the news station CNN and the music station MTV. The latest news 'as seen by CNN' and the latest video clips were therefore the only contact with the region outside the Balkans. This is how the MIO discovered that the CNN news was not free of an anti-Serb bias. During the Gorazde crisis in April/May 1994, CNN showed pictures of the VRS attack on the enclave, which surprised the staff, who wondered how CNN could have acquired the pictures. What they found even stranger was that a French APC was visible in the film pictures in Gorazde, because they knew that no French units were stationed there. It transpired later that the pictures concerned had been recorded several years earlier, when the ABiH were engaged in driving out the Bosnian Serbs from the region.¹⁴⁴

Despite the fact that the MIO was inadequately equipped, the staff attempted to make the best of things. The MIO had three departments in Zagreb. One was responsible for keeping an eye on the Orders of Battles of the different warring factions and updating a complete map overview. The second department was responsible for analysing the situation on the ground. This covered a wide spectrum of subjects, such as weapons imports, local skirmishes, food shortages, thefts and attacks on convoys. The third department fulfilled all the administrative functions and was responsible for some degree of management as regards the intelligence efforts. Moreover, there turned out to be no archives from the periods 1991, 1992 and 1993, so that all the experience gained and earlier 'lessons learned' were unavailable to the new MIO team (since 1994).¹⁴⁵

Again the work of the MIO staff only really got under way when the first American Deputy G-2 Officer arrived in Zagreb. The staff then held a briefing every morning between 7.30 and 8.00 for the officer responsible for operations (in military terms known as the G-3). The briefing was open to UNMOs, NGO's and various aid organizations, such as the International Red Cross (ICRC) and the UNHCR, the UN's organization for refugees. They discussed the current intelligence situation and provided an overview of the acts of war. The inclusion of aid organizations was a conscious choice, because they were often an important source of intelligence for the MIO, both through official reports, and unofficially through personal contacts. For instance, in the spring of 1994, the UNHCR representative in Gorazde was the first to report VRS troop movements around the enclave. NGO staffs were therefore briefed on a near-weekly basis and they provided extremely valuable information, both in-theatre and also on strategic issues of importance in areas such as Kosovo, Macedonia, Serbia and Montenegro.¹⁴⁶

In addition, the MIO provided a regular briefing for the Force Commander, which was attended by the Deputy Force Commander, the Chief of Staff, the Head of Civil Affairs and other UNPROFOR staff members. Both a daily and a weekly information report were produced by a British military official. Information from the reports was used in turn by the Force Commander and Akashi in their reporting to the DPKO in New York.

The MIO produced Daily Defense Information Summaries, Information Reports and Information Summaries. The former mostly contained operational information, while the latter were often more analytic in nature. Analyses for internal use could be found in the Inter Office Memoranda. The intelligence input improved considerably as a result of the arrival and working methods of the American Deputy G-2 Officer. Via highly secured communication links and via his embassy in Zagreb, a steadily increasing supply of American intelligence then got under way. The other MIO staff members, in so far as they came from NATO member states, likewise received the American intelligence via the NATO LOCE network and from him, and this intelligence was also handed over to NATO.

Set against this background, the statement made by General Bertrand Janvier is quite remarkable. The French Force Commander claimed during his first hearing before the French parliamentary investigation committee that he received no NATO intelligence, because he was not in Bosnia on behalf of NATO. The question was why he would not have received intelligence from NATO, while the British General Rupert Smith and the Canadian Deputy Force Commander Barry Ashton clearly did. Janvier explained that he was not in the line of command and that he therefore had no access to NATO intelligence. 'That is the sad truth', according to the French general, who did admit to having received intelligence from the French military intelligence service, the Direction de Renseignement Militaire (DRM). This service also made use of French officers in Zagreb who reported to it.¹⁴⁷

Janvier's statement is surprising indeed. We must assume that Janvier, like Akashi's statement above about Srebrenica, was not speaking literally. In fact, the French general definitely received NATO intelligence via the US Deputy G-2 Officer in Zagreb. Actually, what this officer delivered on a daily basis to Janvier was US intelligence, not NATO intelligence. Some of what the Deputy G-2 provided to Janvier may have also been released to NATO channels, but generally he did not spend time telling Janvier things that he would hear from the NATO liaison officer, or his own staff. Janvier's time was always at a premium, and the Deputy G-2 avoided redundancy.¹⁴⁸ Of course, France did not form part of the military structure of NATO, but Paris did participate in the NATO operation over Bosnian air space (Operation Deny Flight) and in so doing gained access to intelligence. At the same time, the French general had permanent and direct access via the national intelligence cell in Zagreb to intelligence produced by the NATO member states.¹⁴⁹ So, Janvier was very economical with the truth when he claimed that he did not receive NATO intelligence.

Alongside the dissemination and analysis of intelligence, the MIO also made recommendations on the securing of links (Communications Security, 'ComSec'), but these were generally ignored. For example, the following is contained in the UNMOs' Post Mission Report on the period 1992-1996 regarding secure links: 'that was a real disaster for UNPROFOR/UNPF' [UNPF was the new name of UNPROFOR after 31 March 1995]. Both the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb and that of the UNMOs used insecure land lines for their daily reporting, and 'for that period UNMO (and UNPF in general) has become unwillingly (let's hope) "the second intelligence agency" for the Croatian Army.'

The satellite links that were used by UNPROFOR were also an easy target for the warring factions' monitoring services. Openness of communication traffic had until that time always been considered one of the essential principles of a peacekeeping operation. One participant remarked: 'It is right for an academic peacekeeping operation, but for such an active operation like UNPROFOR it is not. There is a strong belief that it should be reconsidered on the basis of sad experience of this Mission.' The report again indicated that all the warring factions had captured or confiscated much UNPROFOR communication equipment. The VRS, ABiH and the Army of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia Sigint units were therefore in a position to intercept UNMO communication traffic 24 hours a day, and they regarded it 'as the most reliable source of information'.¹⁵⁰

The attitude of high-ranking UNPROFOR officials towards the MIO was unclear, and differed greatly from one individual to another. Another problem was that some countries wished to maintain command over their own UNPROFOR units through national lines. The result was that 'the overall UNPROFOR command process was deemed disorganized and unable to make use of the information supplied to it by the intelligence process'.¹⁵¹ An MIO intelligence officer agreed with this observation in some areas, but felt that the Dutch G-3, Colonel H. De Jonge, as well as his cadre of Canadian officers understood the importance of intelligence very well, and were able to absorb it effectively for planning and operations purposes. But other elements of the staff did indeed not do nearly as well. The political office, headed by a Russian, Colonel V. Ratso also dealt with the intelligence provided to him very well. Furthermore, the UNMO's, regardless of nationality, always absorbed and utilized the intelligence provided to them exceptionally well.¹⁵² And according to a former MIO staff member, Akashi was an eager consumer of intelligence, and had a preference for consulting personally with the briefer while referring to detailed charts.

There was also useful contact between the MIO and Akashi's Analysis and Assessment Unit, and information was regularly exchanged. The Force Commander in 1994 and 1995, and later advisor to negotiator Carl Bildt, the French General De Lapresle, was also a fervent intelligence consumer, as was the head of the Civil Affairs Department in Zagreb, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and General Rose, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander in Sarajevo.

Others were apparently less interested in intelligence, and some senior officers even openly expressed their opposition to the use of intelligence from outside the mission area. According to a former MIO official, in early 1994 the Canadian Deputy Force Commander General John MacInnes objected to the use of any intelligence from outside. He even told some members of the MIO team that they were only allowed to use information produced by UNPROFOR or UNMOs themselves because he did not permit the use of intelligence from national sources.¹⁵³

The intelligence organization of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo

The Chief of Staff under General Rose, General A.P.P.M. van Baal, confirmed that the UN did not indulge in intelligence. Rose did have his own intelligence channels through the British SAS. Van Baal served from 24 February to 1 September 1994 in Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) in Sarajevo, and formally had 27 positions on his staff for intelligence officers. These were only partially filled, however. When he arrived in Sarajevo, there were still five officers who had little to do. This was evident, for example, from the fact that little had changed in the Order of Battle Book since 1992.¹⁵⁴ Van Baal was directly concerned with the US involvement in Sarajevo and the associated tensions between the British and Americans. He saw many examples of this, sometimes with his own eyes, because the US embassy was based next to his BHC office.

‘suddenly we saw many Americans appear, including the former SACEUR Galvin, who had been engaged to build up the army of the Muslim-Croat Federation. My British intelligence contacts said that the other Americans were CIA. Some of them were in civilian clothes and others in uniform’.

Van Baal also had Americans on his staff, including one who was responsible for the helicopter operations, but also an American who officially worked as a liaison officer for humanitarian operations (food drops), ‘but actually he only watched what we did to pass it on to his counterparts’. There were also CIA officers who had tried to get into Van Baal’s staff, but he had managed to keep them out. American generals were also constantly arriving on visits, which, according to Van Baal, had no other objective than to urge a harder approach. On this point there was a great difference between these generals stationed in Europe and their more cautious colleagues in the Pentagon. According to Van Baal, there was also a difference of opinion with the Americans over the dual key procedure for Close Air Support (for this, see Chapter 2 of Part III of the Srebrenica report): ‘They had absolutely no grasp of the fact that in the event of a wholesale air strike the revenge would be directed at the UN’. According to Van Baal, General Rose once commented: ‘we will bomb as soon as American troops are here on the ground. Then I will skip the dual key.’¹⁵⁵

J.W. Brinkman succeeded Van Baal in Sarajevo and was Chief of Staff of BHC from September 1994 to March 1995. He confirmed the US influence. According to Brinkman, the head of the G-2 section in Sarajevo was an American. ‘It was obvious what his role was’. BHC gathered no intelligence itself but received intelligence from the participating countries. According to Brinkman, some countries, such as the United Kingdom and France, had their own Comint in the region, but they rarely gave away the information obtained.¹⁵⁶

From February 1995, Colonel A. de Ruiter became the new Chief of Staff under General Rupert Smith. He was also able to confirm the heavy US involvement because BHC was still physically located next to the embassy. The ambassador and his staff paid regular visits, during which the staff would almost immediately go through to the G-2 section. De Ruiter actually had a quarrel with an American major, because De Ruiter felt that only blue berets (UN personnel) should be allowed to walk around. According to De Ruiter, all other people were welcome, provided they reported to him. This helped somewhat, but the American officers and diplomats continued to visit the G-2 section all the time.

The head of the G-2 section was also an American, Brian Powers. An interesting development came when Powers had to be replaced, and numerically it was the turn of the French to supply a head of the G-2 section. However, in the end it was another American who took over - the Frenchman was sidelined and appointed second-in-command. This involved considerable discussion between the two countries. De Ruiter felt that the choice had been deliberate.

Since the UN had no intelligence network of its own, the neighbours (the US embassy) were to become one of the key sources of the information that UNPROFOR received. However, that reporting was provided to the UN at large, but rather to specific individuals in positions of leadership in the UN in Sarajevo. Meanwhile, the embassy received information from UNPROFOR on the state of affairs in the operational area. The fact is that, in the intelligence world, the quid pro quo principle (‘this for that’) played an important role. For this reason, the head of the G-2 section in Sarajevo had to continue to be an American.¹⁵⁷

The levels of intelligence at the Military Information Office in Zagreb

The absence of its own intelligence network and the lack of capabilities meant it was possible to distinguish various intelligence levels at the MIO in Zagreb.¹⁵⁸ First there was 'the UN MIO', as envisaged by New York. As stated above, its facilities and resources were limited, which resulted in a second level of activities, based on the links with the nations' own intelligence services and the input from them. Some staff members had direct connections with their home country, usually via the secure links at their own embassies, or their home country had its own intelligence headquarters in the region itself. The United States, France, Canada and the United Kingdom opted for their own National Intelligence Cell in Pleso, close to Zagreb. The staff of the MIO regularly exchanged intelligence with that organization.

A third level of activities was based on allied intelligence liaison relationships. This mainly meant input from the long-established CANUKUS network, whose name is derived from the first letters of the participating countries: Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. If an MIO briefer (who would usually be American, British or Canadian) could not answer specific questions from Janvier or Akashi, there were always resources, which could be queried for a response. This happened (certainly in 1995) when Imint was made available to the highest policy makers in Zagreb, although this was not a regular occurrence.

If the national authorities deemed it necessary, important intelligence was sometimes also passed on without a specific underlying request. According to an insider, some representatives of Western services took this to great lengths, and sometimes exceeded their mandates. However, they did put the importance of a properly functioning MIO first. The MIO also received much intelligence through the Monitoring Close Air Support Centre in Zagreb, the liaison cell for contacts between Zagreb and the Fifth Allied Air Force of NATO in Vicenza. Only MIO staff from NATO member states had access to this operations centre.¹⁵⁹

It is a stubborn myth that NATO has an independent intelligence capacity. NATO's intelligence section is a department that is completely dependent on the intelligence input of the member states. This was evident, for example, from the informal and indirect contacts through a national intelligence line of the MIO with the intelligence staff in the NATO armed forces headquarters (in military terms, SHAPE) in Bergen/Mons. It had already come to the attention of MIO staff that many NATO reports were identical to their own, even down to the choice of words. On a visit to Zagreb, NATO staff officers praised the work of the MIO to the American Deputy G-2 Officer. They were extremely surprised to learn that the daily reporting that they read was produced by a Non-Commissioned Officer with the rank of sergeant, whose spelling was later checked by a captain in Zagreb.

Some troop-contributing nations realized that intelligence officers were badly needed Bosnia and so they sent intelligence personnel to Bosnia themselves. UN headquarters in New York never requested these personnel, but once they were in the area the officers concerned were used intensively. Someone with the appropriate security clearances could gain access to intelligence material that could not have been used otherwise. This did occasionally give rise to bizarre situations within UNPROFOR. For instance, a Canadian peacekeeper with a NATO security clearance received American satellite photos, but he was not allowed to show them to his UN commander, because he was French. However, some are convinced that this must have happened before 1995.

In Sector North East (SNE) of UNPROFOR in Tuzla, this led to the Danish deputy commander being forbidden to share the intelligence that he received through NATO with his Swedish commander,¹⁶⁰ because Sweden was not a member of NATO. The rule within NATO is that some sorts of intelligence are specifically released to NATO channels under the treaty agreement but they will not be disseminated by any NATO member to any non-NATO member. The idea is that if the Danes want to release their intelligence to a non-NATO member, they have to make that decision for themselves, and not have for example the Greeks decide for them. That's exactly the way the treaty reads, and most NATO countries adhere to it. The Swedish colonel G. Arlefalk, who was commander of the Swedish battalion with a Danish tank company in Tuzla from 30 March to 14 October 1995, was later confronted with exactly the same problem. He was extremely dissatisfied with the information that reached him through UN channels, because it was not accurate enough. The news station CNN was the source of information that he used most. Later he could sometimes access additional information that came through NATO channels to his Norwegian deputy, but formally and officially he should not have been allowed to see this intelligence. As a commander he was also not allowed to enter the room where the intelligence it arrived.¹⁶¹ On the other hand: one might wonder why would he need to enter the room where NATO cryptographic equipment was kept? Was this somehow crucial to his performance as a commander? After all, he received the NATO intelligence.

9. Conclusions

The final assessment of the difficult relationship between intelligence and the UN is actually fairly simple to formulate. The UN 'does not collect, process and disseminate intelligence in the directed and comprehensive way that major powers do as a matter of course'.¹⁶² According to the military advisor of the Secretary-General of the UN, Van Kappen, the UN is neither willing nor able to properly produce a sound, reliable and independent intelligence product. This limitation is rooted in the structure of the organization.¹⁶³ Apart from the fact that the UN does not wish to take responsibility for active intelligence gathering in peacekeeping operations, and is therefore completely dependent on what member states are prepared to supply (which by the way also applies to NATO), the aversion to intelligence at the UN sometimes takes on ill-advised forms.

For instance, the events in Rwanda demonstrated that a local commander was not allowed to make use of highly sensitive intelligence.¹⁶⁴ In December 1993, the Canadian Force Commander, General Romeo Dallaire, managed, through Humint, to gain access to highly explosive intelligence on a genocide plan, including information on secret weapons stores. General Dallaire had a Kigali sector commander, Colonel Luc Marchal of the Belgian Army, someone who had served for five years in Zaire. On 10 January 1994, a senior figure made contact with Marchal. He sought political asylum because he had received orders from the Hutu leadership to draw up plans for the extermination of the Tutsis. The source said that although he was a Hutu, he could not carry out his orders because it was against his principles. The informant told Marchal of the location of a major weapons cache containing at least 135 weapons. The man was prepared to go to the arms cache himself that night if he and his family were placed under UN protection. Marchal told Dallaire of his meeting.

Although Dallaire held certain reservations, he informed Major-General Maurice Baril, Military Adviser to the Secretary-General in New York: 'It is our intention to take action (by means of a cordon and search) within the next 36 hours with a possible H Hour of Wednesday (12 January) at dawn (local)'.¹⁶⁵ Dallaire's signal to Baril should have received rigorous attention but it was signed off without any indication of action taken. The immediate effect had been to deny Dallaire permission to conduct the proposed cordon and search. 'They refused', said Marchal, 'because UNAMIR was deployed under a Chapter VI mandate, traditional peacekeeping. New York argued that a cordon and search was an offensive operation for which permission would not be granted'. The Secretary-General was out of UN Headquarters for much of January and was not to learn of the signal and recognise its significance until three years later. New York withheld permission for a military operation to capture the weapons. Once the massacres had started, General Dallaire had neither the resources nor the mandate to prevent the planned genocide.¹⁶⁶ The advisor to the Secretary-General, Iqbal Riza, later explained that this was due to a feeling of 'not Somalia again' in New York, with which he referred to the fear in New York that peacekeepers would be killed.¹⁶⁷

The UN attitude towards active intelligence gathering in peacekeeping operations can be understood in the light of a long-standing anti-intelligence culture, but nonetheless it can hardly be considered responsible. The increasingly complexity of the situations in which peacekeepers have to operate, such as internal conflicts in UN member states, means that there is actually a growing need for intelligence. The author David Charters states in no uncertain terms that 'intelligence is central to the effectiveness of peacekeeping in the new conflict environment'.¹⁶⁸ Van Kappen is convinced that the lack of strategic intelligence was an important cause of the failure of a number of UN operations.¹⁶⁹ In doing so, he raises a problem that the UN, as an international organization, has so far been unable to solve in a structured way.

The anarchic or almost anarchic situations which have created this increasing demand for more and better intelligence are at the same time making it more difficult to acquire and disseminate intelligence. The rapidly changing situations and alliances on the ground are also ensuring that intelligence gathered by observers on the spot is rapidly out-of-date. Even the 'old' established intelligence services have the greatest difficulty in keeping up with these developments. The UN must therefore, according to the author Hugh Smith, formulate a clear answer in the short term to the question of which role intelligence should play in future peacekeeping operations, and perhaps also in preventive diplomacy. After all, he argues, there happens to be a great need for strategic intelligence in order to understand the political and military situation between the warring parties before the UN becomes directly involved. There is also a great demand for operational intelligence, which is needed to ensure the most effective deployment of resources and manpower for the execution of the mandate. This is especially important with regard to issues that have a fairly fluid political or military context. Finally, tactical intelligence is necessary for the support of ground forces in performing their peacekeeping tasks, such as monitoring a ceasefire or a suspension of hostilities.¹⁷⁰ The American Kenneth Allard, who carried out a study of the peacekeeping operation in Somalia, also arrives at the conclusion that 'intelligence is as vital to the success of a peace operation as it is to any other military activity'.¹⁷¹

The brief history of the relationship between intelligence and the UN outlined above shows it to be a relationship fraught with difficulties. In any case, it rapidly became clear to the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army (MIS/Army) that they should expect nothing of the UN. In 1995, the memorandum 'Intelligence Needs of the Ministry of Defence' rightly observed that the lack of sufficient security guarantees caused great reluctance among the countries that participated in UN operations to issue intelligence to the UN or the nations participating in UN operations.¹⁷²

According to the author Paul Johnston, UNPROFOR ultimately enjoyed a 'fairly comprehensive and smoothly working intelligence organization'.¹⁷³ This assessment is debatable, and was not shared by former staff of the MIO in Zagreb.¹⁷⁴ It must be concluded from the analysis presented of the set-up, structure, working method, intelligence input and output, as well as capabilities, resources and infrastructure, that the MIO was never able to function as effectively as a professional G-2 staff would have been able to during an extensive and complex military operation. 'The key to good intelligence output is all source assessment', according to the British author Andrew Rathmell.¹⁷⁵ However, there was no sign of this at the MIO in Zagreb or the other G-2 staffs of the UN organizations in BHC in Sarajevo or SNE in Tuzla. Other former staff of the MIO confirmed this picture in interviews: the MIO never held any all-source intelligence capability at any level during the crisis in Bosnia.¹⁷⁶ This can be explained as follows. All source analysts first require all-source intelligence. This was never available to the analysts at the Zagreb MIO: far from it. Second, all-source intelligence analysts take years to groom and train. This was never envisioned for the MIO at Zagreb. Third, the communications infrastructure must be in place to put such intelligence into the hands of battalion commanders and their subordinates in near real time. No such infrastructure existed. Finally, the consumer must understand the value, and be able to utilize the product effectively. No such awareness existed or was likely to come into being. The UN architecture lacked the communications resources, personnel, training, intelligence sources, development time and awareness to grow anything remotely resembling all-source intelligence. In fact, as has been pointed out, the senior UN leadership had no interest in intelligence at all, much less developing an advanced capability like all source intelligence center.

Johnston neglects to mention many problems and obstacles, such as insufficient financial resources, the unwillingness of most troop-contributing nations to exchange intelligence with non-NATO allies, the question of who determines the tasking, and which official draws up the requirements to be set on the intelligence. A subsequent foreign internal investigation revealed that intelligence efforts for the benefit of the UNPROFOR commanders had been insufficient. As a consequence, the UN was 'rarely able to predict intentions of the warring factions'. Although there is no doubt that much intelligence was available, the intelligence operation of UNPROFOR lacked a communal point of coordination. Much intelligence, especially human intelligence, was therefore lost.¹⁷⁷

The absence of a good intelligence structure within UNPROFOR also deprived the leading political and military policymakers and UN headquarters in New York of a good view of the developments in Bosnia. According to the Military Advisor to Boutros-Ghali, Van Kappen, there were no agreements on exchange with the UN of intelligence gathered by Western countries on Bosnia. In other words, the normal intelligence process was missing. It was hardly surprising, therefore, that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Akashi, later made suggestions to improve this situation in the future.¹⁷⁸

Ultimately the question is whether the use of intelligence and active intelligence gathering in UN peacekeeping missions actually are such formidable hurdles. It is obvious that warring factions will not agree to special operations by UN commandos behind the lines. But there will be less resistance to verification flights by unmanned espionage aircraft, such as Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs), provided the UN monitors all warring factions. The combatants will also find supervision through intelligence easier to accept if they know that all parties are subject to the same strict supervision regime. This can have a stabilizing effect. The situation was more difficult in Bosnia, where UNPROFOR was often seen as an organization that took sides with the Bosnian Muslims. Eriksson points out that the UN's response to ABiH operations from the eastern enclaves was less 'hard' than its response to operations carried out by the VRS.¹⁷⁹

Hugh Smith feels that 'the need for intelligence is being increasingly felt by both the UN and by states contributing to peacekeeping operations. Particularly in more complex and fluid situations, intelligence will be crucial in achieving the goals of the mission as laid down by the UN Security Council.' This need has grown steadily, and Smith believes that it will continue to do so in the future, because 'peacekeepers are liable to find themselves in countries in which no government is in undisputed control, social order has broken down or is on the point of collapse. Sometimes hostilities are under way or imminent, and the use of force against peacekeepers is a manifest possibility'.¹⁸⁰

Several Force Commanders and Deputy Force Commanders who were quoted in this introductory chapter concluded that during their UNPROFOR period they had no usable and timely intelligence at their disposal. They were therefore of the opinion that the UN Secretariat in New York needs an independent intelligence analysis unit, because otherwise the organization will not be able to fulfil its tasks within the framework of preventive diplomacy or peacekeeping. An US intelligence official agreed that the infrastructure in Zagreb was far from ideal in providing timely, useable intelligence. Security was always a pain, and finding some quiet corner to speak to the decision-maker was often very difficult. Apart from that, none of the crucial intelligence came from UN sources, and most of it could not be conveyed within the UN communications architecture. Commanders in Zagreb (and Sarajevo) were unable to convey key pieces of intelligence or even operational information securely to their field commanders who had an immediate need to know it.¹⁸¹

The UN is now sometimes forced to intervene as a result of provocation or manipulation by one of the warring parties (sometimes supported by the press). For instance, an effective disinformation campaign by the Bosnian Muslims in April 1994 during the siege of Gorazde provoked NATO air strikes - an excellent example of manipulation of the UN by one of the warring factions, and one which could possibly have been prevented by independent analysis.¹⁸² The lack of regular intelligence gathering by UNPROFOR in Bosnia led to a situation in which various international and national intelligence and security services took matters into their own hands. The undesirable consequences for the peacekeeping operation briefly outlined above were innumerable.

Chapter 2

The Western intelligence community and the war in Bosnia

‘America’s allies have long complained that it is particularly mean with its intelligence.’¹⁸³

Bosnia was an intelligence theme park’.¹⁸⁴

1. Introduction

The previous chapter contended that the United Nations has always had a wait-and-see or even a dismissive attitude to active intelligence gathering in peacekeeping operations. This was also the case during the war in the former Yugoslavia. It is therefore little surprise that on his departure from Bosnia, the UN commander General Lewis MacKenzie’s experiences with UNPROFOR concerning the application and use of intelligence were, to put it mildly, not particularly good:

‘I was also upset that I had to get my intelligence from the BBC. The UN was still following its outdated rules that precluded our even saying the word ‘intelligence’, let alone producing it. Here we were, almost 300 kilometers from the nearest semi-secure border, and we scarcely had the foggiest notion what was going on around us’.¹⁸⁵

This quotation illustrates again that the UN had not prepared sufficiently in terms of active intelligence gathering for the war in the former Yugoslavia, and in particular, for the war in Bosnia. This chapter raises the question of whether the same was true of the Western intelligence community (the assembled Western intelligence and security services). We will consider whether, after the fall of the Berlin Wall, these services were sufficiently prepared for that war, both mentally and in terms of resources. According to some authors, this was not the case. Andrew Rathmell had the following comment: ‘Western intelligence bureaucracies built up during the Cold War have changed remarkably little since the disappearance of their main enemy, the Soviet Union.’¹⁸⁶ We will discuss whether the picture he outlines is a fair reflection of the reality. Section 2 will deal comprehensively with the position of these services after the collapse of the Soviet Union. Attention was paid for many years to the perceived threat from the East and that was where all technical and other resources were focused. Now, suddenly, a different type of conflict demanded attention, and the question was whether these intelligence services were capable of providing it.

If intelligence services have little or no intelligence on certain political and military developments or on people in a certain region, an appeal is usually made to their fellow services. An exchange of intelligence then takes place: mostly on quid pro quo basis (‘this for that’). Section 3 discusses this international intelligence liaison or exchange. We will discuss what precisely this exchange involves, why states exchange intelligence with each other, what forms of liaison exist and whether such an exchange automatically arises from alliances of many years’ standing, such as between NATO allies. Section 4 will answer the question of whether the intelligence machines of UNPROFOR’s and NATO's most important troop-contributing nations were prepared for the war in Bosnia, and whether UNPROFOR was able to rely on intelligence support from NATO or from individual troop-contributing nations. Consideration will be given to the associated problems and the attempts made to overcome them. Section 5 presents the conclusions to this chapter.

2. The Western intelligence mindset

Publications and interviews indicate that officials of Western intelligence services were confronted with a problem that was recurring and difficult to solve: the general attitude and state of mind with respect to intelligence after the fall of the Berlin Wall. The international intelligence community traditionally had an East-West mentality. The technical infrastructure was also mainly East-West oriented. The intelligence image of the former enemy built up by NATO over these years was 'relatively' simple: the political and military policy of the Soviet Union and its allies was reasonably stable, as was the military doctrine of the Red Army and the Warsaw Pact. For example, if Western intelligence services had located a regiment of soldiers, it was generally not particularly difficult to trace the other regiments that together formed a larger unit. This was also true of the location of the Soviet missile forces and the Soviet air force and navy. This intelligence image had been built up since 1950 mainly by means of technical gathering methods, which led to the Human Intelligence (Humint) activities being neglected: after all, it was no easy matter to set up good penetration operations behind the 'Iron Curtain'. The resultant neglect of Humint in the Western intelligence services may have played an important role in Yugoslavia.

This tendency had been prevalent in the United States since the 1970s. This was to plague the American intelligence services in Bosnia, because it proved to be a Low Intensity Conflict (LIC), in which technical resources often performed inadequately. In a low intensity conflict, Humint is one of the most important sources of intelligence. In 1976, only thirteen per cent of all American intelligence was gathered from Humint, and only one seventh of the total Intelligence budget was devoted to it. During the period of Stansfield Turner (the director of the CIA between 1977 and 1981), even less was invested. In the 1980s, the US intelligence community realized that, in spite of their impressive technical capabilities, Humint could still play an important role in some areas. One such issue was the political intentions and the attitudes of politicians and soldiers.¹⁸⁷

William Casey (the director of the CIA under President Reagan) was a particularly great supporter of the expansion of Humint. This form of intelligence was relatively inexpensive, and more suitable for gathering difficult-to-obtain political intelligence on the intentions and the attitude of leading foreign officials. Furthermore, Humint operations made it possible to gather documents or install sensors. These factors among others led the US Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) and the CIA to devote more attention in the 1980s to Humint, which had until then been neglected.

It would take until 1993 before the United States Assistant Secretary of Defense would resort to founding the Defense Human Intelligence Service, which came to reside under the DIA. It was only on 1 October 1995 that this Service was officially activated by the DIA and it was even later, on 12 September 1996, that the Service was declared fully operational.¹⁸⁸ The Defense Human Intelligence Service would therefore play no significant role during Dutchbat's stay in Srebrenica.

The lack of effective Humint was not the only factor that hindered the services. The complete mindset of Western military and intelligence personnel had often been influenced strongly by the years of threat from the East. The fact that the conflict in Yugoslavia was of a different nature did not stop these officials from viewing the conflict in the 'old' way.¹⁸⁹ Furthermore, certain developments were too complicated for them to understand. That was particularly true of the ever-changing alliances in Yugoslavia. A good example was the Bihac region in the north west of Bosnia. Muslim armed forces there who rejected the regime in Sarajevo and who were led by Abdic, hired tanks from the Krajina Serbs. Abdic's opponent was General Dudakovic of the Armija Bosna i Hercegovina (ABiH). He, in turn, hired tanks from the Bosnian Serbs. Another example was that it was hard for many Western military and intelligence officials to comprehend that the Bosnian Serbs were fighting the Croats in some areas, but at the same time they could be the greatest allies of the same Croats in other areas.¹⁹⁰

In the general Western intelligence perception, alliances and enemies were 'fixed concepts'. However, for the warring factions in Yugoslavia, such concepts were reviewed from day to day, with due regard to potential local advantages that could come from an alliance. This, of course, had consequences for UNPROFOR, because the cooperation of the local warring factions is a condition for the success of a peacekeeping mission. This was hardly possible in an environment of constantly variable alliances.

Obviously, much also depends on the nature of the conflict. If the warring factions are two regular armies, certain patterns may be expected. It is then also relatively simple to gather intelligence. But the less central control and state authority there are, the more unpredictable the developments become, and the greater the risk that the conflict will become uncontrollable and that there will be, for example, outbursts of violence against innocent civilians.

This does not detract from the fact that regular and well-controlled army units are also capable of carrying out operations against civilians, as the Croats did in May 1995 in West Slavonia and in the Krajina in August 1995, and the Vojska Republika Srpska (VRS) in general did in Srebrenica. In general, however, attacks on civilians were usually carried out by irregular units.

Nonetheless, the willingness to collaborate with each other and the assent of all warring factions to the presence of a peacekeeping force are important factors for determining the legitimacy of a peacekeeping mission, together with the question of when force will be used. If there is no such general willingness and there is a vacuum of power, the warring factions - who are mostly more numerous and better armed than the UN troops - will challenge each display of force by the peacekeepers. In such a context, the role of reliable intelligence becomes all the more important. The larger the external influence as a deterrent to the warring factions, the less force will have to be used to protect the civilians. During the conflict in Bosnia, neither these conditions for enforcing the peace, nor the conditions for a deterrent, were present. Therefore, intelligence was badly needed.¹⁹¹

All this led in 1992 to a situation in which Western intelligence services were confronted with an intelligence structure that was generally geared towards the 'old' threat from the East, and not suited to the Balkans. The Western intelligence services had built up a complex set of warning indicators that enabled them to detect this threat from the East in good time.¹⁹² The complete capacity for gathering intelligence was therefore concentrated on analysing a large-scale conflict, which had little to do with the crisis in Yugoslavia. In general, the warring factions did not operate in large units, but mainly in small and decentralized units that undertook no large-scale operations. This war was what is referred to as a low intensity conflict of which NATO (with the exception of a few member states) generally had no experience. However, according to one source the principle US organizational and military policy shifts marking the departure from the 'cold-war mentality' were already completed by February 1993. According to this intelligence official they were certainly in place in Europe by that time. In particular, strategic systems were revamped to ensure operational utilization by theatre users, in Europe and elsewhere around the world. For instance, an American National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) official, who was responsible for Imagery Intelligence (Imint) from satellites, espionage aircraft and unmanned aircraft, confirmed this. He complained that the fall of the Wall had not made the work any simpler: 'There are probably more areas today, in a broader sense, than we had to worry about during the Cold War. There are a lot more places that are volatile...'¹⁹³

¹⁹⁰ Confidential interview (45).

Furthermore, the terrain in which the conflict was being fought was completely different from that of the 'old' threat: woods and mountains severely limited the field of vision of the international intelligence community. This was less true of the Austrian, Italian and Swiss services, which, because of the high altitude of their mountain-top monitoring stations, sometimes did succeed in intercepting message traffic. Many a Western intelligence service was completely unprepared for the outbreak of fighting in the former Yugoslavia. General Michael Hayden, in 1995 EUCOM and later commander of the Air Intelligence Agency at Kelly Air Force Base, Texas, admitted that prior to the war in Yugoslavia there was not a real need for as much experience in that area. His organization was not manned in some of those fields as he would like to be.¹⁹⁴ The intelligence resources and methodology were, as stated, still focused on the enemy in the East, and especially on the timely detection and analysis of large military units operating in a mainly open and flat area. The services were prepared for symmetrical warfare (two equally large armed forces against each other) and the military and economic objectives were reasonably familiar. The armed forces of the Red Army and the Warsaw Pact no longer existed in the same form after the fall of the Berlin Wall, however.

Some intelligence services had paid relatively little attention to Yugoslavia until the outbreak of the war in Bosnia. For instance, only one analyst of the Royal Netherlands Army worked on Yugoslavia at the Intelligence Department of the Military Intelligence Service. He was concerned with the military order of battle, which could also be considered to be something of a subsidiary activity, because his primary focus was on a different subject. His service concentrated especially on Poland and the GDR, and this analyst confirmed that other Western intelligence services in general paid little attention to Yugoslavia, which in a certain sense put him in a unique bartering position.¹⁹⁵ The same perceptions existed in the British counterpart. They had 'a bit of trouble getting up to speed. It wasn't a priority they could quickly get good at. SIS [Secret Intelligence Service or MI-6] and GCHQ [Government Communications Headquarters] needed to improve their expertise in the language.'¹⁹⁶

Within intelligence services there were sometimes only a handful of political analysts who were occupied with Yugoslavia. After all, the country was counted among the 'friendly' communist powers; the expectation was that in the event of an outbreak of an international crisis, the country would take the side of the West. In this respect, Yugoslavia had long been considered to be within the Western sphere of influence, as was demonstrated in the attack on Czechoslovakia in 1968, when Yugoslavia was given backdoor guarantees by NATO.¹⁹⁷

When the conflict in Bosnia finally broke out, the shortage of 'trained personnel' often meant that people would be plucked from anywhere. Analysts who until then had worked mainly on the Soviet Union or Eastern Europe and were therefore new to the job, now had to deal with Bosnia. There was also a lack of staff who spoke Serbo-Croat and who were able to translate large quantities of information. In 1993, the American electronic eavesdropping service, the National Security Agency (NSA), appeared to have a lack of translators and analysts with a command of Serbo-Croat. This originally affected the capacity to read intercepted Yugoslav message traffic. The service thought that this would create problems for them in the event of President Clinton deciding to make a military contribution to UNPROFOR. The NSA consequently decided to place an advertisement in several newspapers to recruit translators.¹⁹⁸

The most important man with responsibility for Bosnia at the British military intelligence service - the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS)- Captain Jonathan Cooke of the Royal Navy, confirmed this picture. According to him, at the start of the war the services had teething troubles, and the pace at which intelligence gathering got up to speed was slow. 'On the frequencies [to be intercepted], GCHQ had to start almost from scratch' in Bosnia. For instance, at the outbreak of the war in the Balkans, the British Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), had only a few Serbo-Croat specialists who were actually fluent in the language. The British had to build absolutely everything from the ground up; the area was really terra incognita for GCHQ.¹⁹⁹ The journalist Michael Smith likewise contended that there were difficulties in the beginning.²⁰⁰ Moreover, the interpreter of the British General Rose and General Smith, Milos Stankovic, argued in his book that in the British Army there were only two people who spoke Serbo-Croat.²⁰¹

The Netherlands also lagged behind in this area. The training for interpreters in Serbo-Croat at the Military Intelligence Service (MIS) did not get under way until early 1994.²⁰² Ultimately, five translators would be appointed, who started a six month training course from May 1994 at the 'MID School'.²⁰³ This slow start naturally had consequences not only for the exploitation of the existing Signals Intelligence (Sigint) in the former Yugoslavia, but also for the opportunities to utilize Open Source Intelligence (Osint) effectively. For this reason it was impossible to adequately exploit daily and weekly newspapers, other periodicals, or radio and television at the start of the armed conflict. UNPROFOR could not handle that information.²⁰⁴

The mental attitude of many Western intelligence service staff was also completely different. A prospective conflict with the Soviet Union and its allies was entirely different in nature from a variety of warring factions in a hilly and wooded area, who would collaborate closely with each other in one area but in another area, sometimes only a few kilometres away, would engage in battle. It was also difficult to become accustomed to the fact that once alliances were made they were often soon broken again. This image was at odds with the static situation (NATO versus the Warsaw Pact) that the Western services had been dealing with for almost fifty years. This also caused a new phenomenon. In the past, military intelligence could often be separated from other forms of intelligence, but in Yugoslavia no such clear distinction could be made. The political forces within the warring factions, the political, financial and economic relationships between the leaders of the warring factions and the black market at the front lines actually necessitated an integrated intelligence picture. And this is precisely what tended to be missing.²⁰⁵

It was for example estimated in a report drawn up by the British intelligence community that about 30 per cent of convoy-borne aid was being diverted to the armies of the warring factions and the black market. UNHCR was particularly worried about this, but was reluctant to quantify the amount. The British estimated that in Sarajevo, where the Muslim military was reported to be moving aid parcels out of the city, the government continued to inflate refugees figures by perhaps as much as a third. However, the Bosnian Muslims of all warring factions would be worst affected if aid was reduced.²⁰⁶

Another problem was that good (not to mention military) maps were hard to come by. It was sometimes necessary to work with Michelin, ADAC or Hallwag maps, which were available from travel agents or motoring organizations. Standard maps with a scale of 1:50,000 were not available in the short term. What is more, the maps produced by the Vojska Jugoslavija (VJ, the Army of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) sometimes led to great confusion. The VJ had actually used a 'different datum point than any other military in Europe'. As a result, grid references used by military and intelligence units on a Yugoslav map were different from those on a comparable European map. 'An eight figure grid reference, plotted on a Yugoslav map would be about 600 to 700 metres away from the exact grid reference plotted on a European or American produced map of the same area', according to a Western intelligence official who worked at UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb and elsewhere in the region.²⁰⁷

The Western intelligence community therefore came up-to-speed 'slowly' and had various teething problems in the area of Sigint, Humint and Imint. One might have expected that collaboration within NATO, as well as bilateral agreements, would have been able to compensate for this shortcoming in the first instance. It would also have been a reasonable assumption that the exchange of intelligence would have been intensified. The reality, however, was different.

3. The problems surrounding intelligence liaison in Western intelligence services

As Michael Herman states in his study: the international intelligence liaison is often 'a patchwork of bilateral and multilateral arrangements of all kinds and all degrees of intimacy'.²⁰⁸ One might add that it may also even hinge on the personalities involved. The responsibility for the coordination of the gathering and exchange of intelligence in the matter of Yugoslavia was not precisely defined in the Western intelligence and security services. Something was done in a NATO context, but, as mentioned in the previous chapter, contrary to what is commonly believed, NATO has no independent intelligence capacity. The treaty organization does not itself indulge in 'intelligence tasking and collection'.²⁰⁹ The only system for this purpose belonging to NATO is the AWACS reconnaissance aircraft. The NATO intelligence section is completely dependent on the input from the member states, and more closely resembles a unit for intelligence sharing. Internally it consisted of various smaller areas, such as the sharing in the areas of anti-submarine warfare, Sigint, Imint and Elint. A further comment in this context is that the main focus of attention was the Eastern bloc: almost everything was taken as read about the Orders of Battle and the military doctrines. In this respect it was difficult to spring any surprises on NATO.²¹⁰

Intelligence liaison between friendly states, even within a treaty organization that has existed for fifty years, cannot therefore be taken for granted. The extent to which services recognize shared risk apparently influences intelligence liaison. Liaison is not something that automatically arises from alliances of many years' standing. Even in an ideal coalition, during the Gulf War, there was a deluge of complaints in this respect. It was not just the European allies of the United States that complained about the uncooperative American attitude to sharing intelligence. Even American and British troops frequently complained about the slow dissemination and poor quality of the intelligence that actually came from their own national intelligence services and was intended for them.²¹¹ One should add that this was frequently a technical issue, hinging on available systems for dissemination. The systems for rapid dissemination was usually very complex, very expensive, and prone to difficulties of various sorts, especially in a deployed field environment. These systems included effective inputs, fluid analysis and dissemination and maintenance of a robust, reliable communications system. Not just a collection of radios: such systems hinged on people, satellites, ground systems and national policies. Many national infrastructures, including the Dutch, could neither afford, maintain, effectively field, nor politically support these systems. It is also interesting to note that the Western intelligence climate in the years surrounding the fall of the Berlin Wall was somewhat subdued, because Western intelligence services increasingly started to spy on each other. The conflict in Bosnia aggravated the animosity between Europe and the United States even further.²¹²

Intelligence liaison covers a wide variety of forms and intensity of collaboration between mostly national intelligence and security services. These services can trade information on operations, provide intelligence support in the form of training, advice and equipment or access to installations. Liaison is not only important for the large services but also for the small ones. International liaison is always cloaked in the greatest secrecy. An ex CIA official once said: 'Liaison secrecy has the sanctity of the Bible.'²¹³ Even more hesitance exists regarding the sharing of intelligence gathered by NATO member states with non-member states. The official NATO guidelines on this point are extremely stringent: the intelligence is only destined for the member states and must therefore not be disclosed to 'a non-member nation or any international organization containing non-member nations. Whatever different requirements emerge for peacekeeping operations this fundamental principle must be upheld.'²¹⁴

Despite all the problems, states do cooperate in the area of intelligence, however.²¹⁵ One of the main reasons for this is that more information is always available than any separate intelligence service (even the largest) can gather independently. The disappearance of the former Eastern European services meant, for example, that the Humint input to Moscow declined by thirty per cent, partly because some services were abandoned and partly because they stopped their input. Another reason is that some states have unique resources at their disposal for gathering unprecedented intelligence; this involves resources and information to which other states have never had and never will have access. The geographical position of a state can likewise be an important reason to resort to liaison. For instance, Norway played a crucial role in following developments in the Russian Kola Peninsula, the most important port of which is Murmansk. Financial aspects also play a role: more can be achieved jointly through the distribution of tasks²¹⁶

Intelligence liaison also has disadvantages, such as the reliability of the information from the partner. It is a fact that there is often an institutional conviction that a service's own analysis or intelligence is better and more reliable than that of another service. There is always a risk associated with sources. Material obtained via liaison can enable one service to discover the other service's sources. Other restraints and dangers are that too close a liaison between two countries can sometimes lead to manipulation of the intelligence that is passed on. Furthermore, a service loses control over the intelligence that is passed on via liaison. For example, it happened within NATO that Dutch intelligence that had been passed on exclusively to a foreign ally suddenly emerged in the NATO circuit a number of weeks later as intelligence from a completely different ally. The greatest danger for a service lurks in the intrinsic possibility of being penetrated by a foreign service. Too close contacts can lead to attempts to recruit the liaison officer.²¹⁷

The special relationship between the United States and the United Kingdom is, with respect to intelligence, unique: there is much collaboration in the area of Humint between the CIA and the Secret Intelligence Service (formerly MI-6). In the military area there is a close relationship between the American DIA and the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS). London and Washington also collaborate in the area of Imint. Satellite photos, espionage aircraft and unmanned aircraft are shared by the American National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) with its British counterpart, the Joint Aerial Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre (JARIC), which is part of the DIS. In the area of Sigint, the American and the British Sigint services, the NSA and GCHQ, have been cooperating closely since World War II. Every British service has a liaison office in the United States that handles the exchange of intelligence. In certain areas, British officers are also attached to American services, and vice versa. No such close collaboration exists between any other European or Asian intelligence or security services. The collaboration in the area of Humint is mainly geared towards the exchange of intelligence assessments and not principally to joint operations.

There are also differences in working methods between the Americans and the British. The British intelligence services are more oriented to working with agents and informants, while the American services devote more energy to the use of advanced technology and the processing and analysis of large quantities of information. This means in practice that collaboration in joint operations is difficult.

The links between the American and British services are maintained not only through practical collaboration, but also through a joint approach to the use of intelligence. For instance, in the United States and the United Kingdom intelligence is said to have more influence on foreign policy than is the case in continental European countries. The explanation for this could be as follows:

‘The Anglo-Saxons use intelligence in an empirical way: it is about gathering facts, and if the facts are significant, the policies may get changed. The view in London and Washington is that the French and other continentals, being essentially deductive in their thinking, develop sophisticated analyses and policies and then draw on intelligence to support them; but that they seldom allow intelligence to shift policy’.²¹⁸

According to a French intelligence officer, this analysis is incorrect, however; in his opinion it is true that in Paris it plays a less influential role in the formulation and execution of the French national security policy, but not because the French political and military leadership ignore the intelligence. Bureaucratic and historical factors offer more likely explanations, such as on the one hand smaller investments in acquiring intelligence, and on the other hand recruitment problems. Furthermore, there is no good intelligence structure that ensures a rapid and efficient dissemination of intelligence among the political and military policymakers.²¹⁹

In today’s world, intelligence liaison still causes many problems. A British analyst recently wrote: ‘America’s allies have long complained that it is particularly mean with its intelligence.’²²⁰ They have often succeeded in gathering intelligence thanks to large financial investments, and generally it is ‘heavily guarded’ within the framework of their own national security. An important White House advisor during the Clinton administration made the following comment on international intelligence liaison: ‘The U.S. intelligence community will never release its intelligence because of methods and sources.’²²¹ A remarkable statement because there is rarely a genuine need to release methods and sources. What is usually needed in time-sensitive scenarios is the intelligence itself, not how the intelligence was acquired.

Nonetheless, even within certain long standing intelligence alliances, such as the so-called UKUSA agreement between the United States, Canada, the UK, Australia and New Zealand, not all intelligence is automatically shared. The British intelligence services, for example, were confronted in 1992 with the aftermath of the open British support of George Bush’s election campaign. The later President Clinton held this against London. Initially this also translated into the intelligence (albeit not Sigint) area, so that some British services more or less ‘ran dry’.²²² There was in particular American concern about General Rose’s alleged sympathy for the Serb cause and there were manifest political differences between the Clinton government and Whitehall about policy regards Bosnia. The animosity mentioned between the US and the British was probably also partly caused by the secret training programmes that the Americans had given to the Muslims in the past, and later to the Croats. Furthermore the Americans did not wish to disclose much to their NATO partners about the clandestine operations that the CIA and DIA carried out behind enemy lines in Serbia.

During the US election campaign Bob Dole lashed out at the British, who were said to be frustrating many American operations, but this was denied on the British side. When Dole paid a visit to London, he was said to have been taken aside and shown a long list of covert operations that the CIA was involved in at that moment in Yugoslavia. The British told Dole that if he were to carry out one more political attack on London, the list would be made public. After that, Dole backed down.²²³

The British intelligence services became increasingly dependent on the United States. For instance, in 1993 approximately 95 per cent of the Sigint dealt with by the GCHQ was, according to Urban, of American origin. Also with respect to financing, monitoring posts and secure transatlantic communication links, the British were completely dependent on the NSA.²²⁴ It should be noted, however, that a senior US intelligence official interviewed by the author rejected this 95 per cent and came to a much lower figure.²²⁵ The American-British intelligence relationship in later years improved again, especially after Tony Blair came to office.

The above example shows that fundamental political and military differences of opinion can influence intelligence liaison. There was a disagreement between America and Britain on Bosnia. The constant US pressure to deploy air power, and Washington’s refusal to deploy ground forces particularly galled London. This ultimately resulted in the partial reduction of American intelligence input to the British. Captain Cooke of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) had the following to say on the subject:

‘They more or less admitted they were holding stuff back from us, not everything but really the bits relating to most pronounced political divide. They didn’t feel we took their information about Serb atrocities seriously enough (...) They pushed the stuff which favoured more punitive action against the Bosnian Serbs’.²²⁶

Mistrust of an ally’s political intentions can strongly influence a liaison. An example of American mistrust was the fact that the CIA’s Directorate of Operations had a special cell of approximately twenty staff whose most important task was to analyse the British reports, in order to establish the identities of agents that SIS (the British foreign intelligence service) had recruited in the former Yugoslavia, and what other sources the British services in Bosnia had at their disposal. From the CIA side, incidentally, this statement was described as complete nonsense.²²⁷ Only in the summer of 1995 were transatlantic relations to improve somewhat, although the Americans persevered in not passing on all intelligence about Bosnia to the British.

The American-Canadian intelligence alliance may probably be described as the most harmonious, in the sense that in this context probably information is shared completely. This close link came about through the very prominent Canadian role in the North American Air Defense Agreement (NORAD), which necessitated the most effective possible intelligence liaison. It so happens that the Soviet Union's intercontinental ballistic missiles and long-distance bombers were, and still are, most easily detected from Canadian territory.²²⁸

This is further reinforced by the unique Canadian geography, the common Anglo-Saxon background, the similar systems of government, an almost identical military culture and the strongly integrated economies. This does not detract from the fact that the Canadian intelligence service was sometimes also cut off from important American intelligence, especially if Ottawa was pursuing a different policy from America. This happened on some occasions during the Vietnam War, the Falklands Crisis and the Gulf War (but not during the war in Bosnia).²²⁹

There is also a large amount of intelligence sharing in Western Europe between European services. This sometimes happens multilaterally within NATO or the Western European Union (WEU). It must be pointed out here that many services are reluctant to share their highest grade intelligence within multinational organizations, because its dissemination then threatens to become excessive. There is a preference for sharing intelligence bilaterally. When intelligence is shared, it usually does not involve agents' reports, intercepts, or satellite photos, but rather analyses derived from them.

The joint approach in the EU on terrorism, the drugs trade and organized crime is also leading to increased collaboration in the area of intelligence. The fact is that effective control demands the exchange of intelligence. The domestic security services, such as the British MI-5, the French Direction de la Surveillance du Territoire (DST), the German Bundesamt für Verfassungsschutz (BfV) and the Dutch BVD, exchange intelligence within the so-called Club of Bern. Most European Union countries have bilateral agreements with each other²³⁰ for intelligence liaison and bilateral agreements with the United States. However, these do not go as far as the American-British-Canadian collaboration.

France is a difficult country with respect to intelligence liaison, because the many French intelligence services seldom keep each other informed of what they are doing. While France has a Comité Interministériel du Renseignement (CIR), which establishes priorities for the various services, there is no central system for the consolidation and analysis of all intelligence gathered. A centrally organized mechanism would also be difficult to achieve, for both the president and the prime minister would want to be at its head. The British and French intelligence services have often worked closely together, which is a tradition that goes back to the beginning of World War II. The French for example assisted in intercepting Libyan arms shipments to the Irish Republican Army (IRA). On the British side, it is admitted that the quality of Humint that is shared with the US services is better than that shared with France, but 'it is the quantity, rather than the quality of the UK-US "human intelligence" trade that is unique'.²³¹

Personal links between the SIS and the French foreign intelligence service, the Direction Generale de la Sécurité Exterieur (DGSE) and the French domestic security service (DST) are supposedly sometimes better than those with the CIA. However, some claim that the relation with the DGSE is not good because the DGSE is 'simply' not good.²³² The collaboration between the GCHQ and the French Sigint organization is less warm. The main reason for this is that close links exist between the NSA and GCHQ, and the fact that the French Sigint priorities lie mainly in France itself and the French-speaking world. However, French Sigint efforts from Guyana were extremely useful to the GCHQ during the Falklands War.

By contrast the allies of Germany remain fearful that the German services (and especially the foreign intelligence service, the Bundesnachrichtendienst) are still infiltrated by Russian and Eastern European agents. There is therefore still a degree of hesitation on the part of some services regarding sharing intelligence with Germany. However, this fear is steadily decreasing. Furthermore, there are different ideas about the quality of German intelligence, but it is generally considered to be mediocre.

Sources in SIS nonetheless asserted that, after the US services, the largest volume of British intelligence sharing takes place with the German services but also the Scandinavian services. The prevailing political climate in Europe also plays an important role. If the German-French political axis is functioning well, the collaboration in the area of intelligence is usually excellent, and joint operations are sometimes executed. If a change takes place in the political climate, this immediately influences the intelligence liaison.²³³

Within NATO, the entire subject of intelligence liaison is much more sensitive than is usually made known to the outside world. It seems in general that member states are prepared to share only the intelligence that they wish to share, and which does not endanger national security in the widest sense. Furthermore, certain member states have already been on a 'war footing' with each other for a considerable time, such as Greece and Turkey. This plays a role not only in the conflict in Cyprus and in certain territorial disputes, but also in the conflict in the Balkans: Athens took the side of Serbia and Srpska, and Turkey the side of Bosnia. This strongly reduced the willingness of other NATO member states to share intelligence on Yugoslavia within the alliance, because Greece and Turkey could 'misuse' it in some way.

There was also a great fear of leaks within NATO. While the war surrounding Kosovo was still in progress, for example, more than six hundred officials at NATO headquarters knew the next NATO bombing targets approximately 24 hours in advance. It was no surprise that the Serbian intelligence services were able to gather intelligence in Brussels and Bergen/Mons. The long-term absence of France in the NATO military committee also did nothing to improve intelligence liaison. In addition, member states will have been more careful with their intelligence because of the Partners for Peace programme (the collaboration between NATO and Russia) and a fear that information would be leaked to some former Warsaw pact countries. The sharing of intelligence in peacekeeping operations is further impeded because permission is always necessary from national headquarters. The bureaucracy means that this can take some considerable time, as a result of which the intelligence to be shared may already be out of date.²³⁴ An US intelligence official who worked in Bosnia dismissed this representation. According to him, US policies were well-defined, and release authority was delegated appropriately to the lowest possible level, to ensure fluid sharing of defined products within acceptable guidelines.²³⁵

Apart from NATO, European organizations played no role whatsoever in the field of intelligence. Although the WEU took part in the sea blockade within the framework of the sanctions, this treaty organization had no intelligence capacity of its own. Neither did the EU. Originally, the conflict was not immediately a NATO problem. A factor for the UN (like the WEU and EU) was that it did not undertake its own intelligence gathering, in the sense that the headquarters in New York and the commanders in the region formulated their own objectives, and were themselves able to deploy the necessary resources.

A well-structured exchange of intelligence within NATO would, in spite of all these problems, nevertheless have been desirable, because a large number of NATO member states also took part in UNPROFOR. In addition, the nature of the crisis in Yugoslavia was of a completely different order from that which NATO was accustomed to. The intelligence liaison regarding Bosnia stands or falls, however, on two things. On the policy decision to share at all. Once that decision is made, the scope of the obligations under the agreement defines the technical, political, financial and intelligence geography of the exchange. Secondly, whether the Western intelligence services were sufficiently prepared for the crisis in Bosnia, and whether there was sufficient intelligence to share.

4. The perception and information position of the Western intelligence services

The extremely complex and chaotic conflict in Bosnia, with its various warring factions and constantly changing alliances, sometimes caused not only confusion within the Western intelligence community, but also internal division. The question arose as to which warring faction to attach credence to, and whether the 'good guys, bad guys' view, which was so often expressed by politicians and in the press, was appropriate. It was not always clear how authentic all the assertions of the warring factions were, and neither were the actual power relationships, nor whether each faction observed the recently agreed ceasefire. A clear, ready and reliable answer to these questions could not always be given by the intelligence sources.

In the United States there were significant political differences of opinion between the American intelligence community, the White House and the State Department.²³⁶ This was evident from various interviews, but also from a top secret Canadian document, which contained a comprehensive analysis of the thinking in the intelligence community in Washington, which reflected the Canadian intelligence view on the conflict. The document, from the late autumn of 1994, offers a revealing glimpse into American foreign policy.²³⁷

The American intelligence and security services adopted the position that all warring factions were guilty of atrocities, and that there were no 'good guys'. All the parties did unspeakably brutal things to all the other parties and this was the collective view of US military analysts throughout Europe.²³⁸ Furthermore, the services felt that the Bosnian Serbs until then were the best at observing the agreement on ceasefires and humanitarian relief. The fighting between the Muslims and Croats in central Bosnia formed the greatest obstacle for the relief. The American services felt that they set down a more balanced view in their reports, but that 'US policy statements do not portray a balanced view of events in Bosnia'. The State Department and President Clinton, according to these services, were consistently pro-Muslim and anti-Serb, and the political statements on the situation in Bosnia were 'generally distortions of the truth which portray the Serbs in a very negative way compared to the other factions. This was generally accomplished by failing to note undesirable activities on the parts of the Croats and Muslims.' Both American and Canadian services knew, for example, that the ABiH harassed VRS positions around Sarajevo almost daily, but this was never reported or confirmed by American policymakers. Furthermore, many of the humanitarian problems in Sarajevo were said to be caused by the Muslims, and a great deal of money was apparently made on the black market. In spite of this 'hard' intelligence, the State Department continued to pin the blame for the conflict on the Bosnian Serbs.²³⁹

This was also true for the negotiations in Geneva. The Croats and Bosnian Serbs had adopted a cooperative attitude, in contrast to the Muslims, who, in the view of the American and Canadian services, caused the majority of the problems in the negotiations. This was partly due to the American political and diplomatic support of the Muslims. Many representatives of the State Department were of the opinion that the Bosnian Serbs must not retain territory that had been gained through 'aggression' against the Muslims. In this, they overlooked that this was a civil war, 'fought by unequal "partners", not an invasion of a sovereign state by a foreign aggressor', according to their Canadian counterparts.

In 1994 the Canadian intelligence community arrived at the conclusion that a disjoint existed between the American intelligence services and the State Department. The latter body conducted a policy of confrontation against the Bosnian Serbs ('bad guys'), and from a Canadian point of view this was an undesirable policy. It appeared as if the Clinton administration was following a strategy oriented towards failure of the negotiations; this policy actually conflicted with the general view within the American intelligence community. Canadian officials who drafted this report were pessimistic about the future. If a peace accord were to be achieved and a peacekeeping mission were to fall under American overall command, then this would prove awkward because of the bias in the American view. 'It is likely that any such mission will be interventionist rather than neutral in nature (anti-Serb sentiments on the US part will continue even after a peace accord).'²⁴⁰

One Canadian intelligence official with considerable experience in Serbia confirmed this picture. Neutral reports came from the Western services in Belgrade, which was theoretically the primary purpose of intelligence. This balanced view was also supplied to the headquarters of NATO. But subtle distinctions should have been picked up by policymakers in Washington and elsewhere, which did not happen, according to this official. The US policy was partisan, and the intelligence community was insufficiently involved. American politicians were stuck in a 'good guy, bad guy' mindset. The Canadian view was that the involvement of the international community made the conflict worse, and that they would have done better to keep out.²⁴¹

Confronted with this view, the then CIA director, James Woolsey,²⁴² agreed that his analysts generally had no black-and-white typology of the warring factions. According to Woolsey it was not the case that the CIA during his tenure was stressing Bosnian atrocities or giving any policy advice against intervention. 'Indeed we were giving no policy advice at all'. What the CIA was consistently saying was that the Bosnians committed a small number of atrocities, the Croats more, and the Serbs a great many. As regards conveying this message to the Clinton administration, he stated: 'it was swimming against the stream.' The CIA also suggested that the killing would not stop without someone's intervening.²⁴³

The Deputy Commander US European Command (EUCOM), US General Chuck Boyd, claimed that EUCOM was the best source of intelligence concerning the Balkans. However, EUCOM officials claimed that when US assessments got to Washington DC the intelligence seemed to go through a metamorphosis into pro-Bosnian statements. Even when US military intelligence exposed many media reports from Sarajevo as little more than Bosnian propaganda, Clinton Administration officials were more likely to believe press reports than EUCOM or the UN. The willingness of Washington's policy elite to base its rhetorical responses on one-sided media reports, dismayed senior US military officials. Boyd also found out how badly informed US Secretary of Defence, William Perry, was.²⁴⁴

That the CIA had a different view was also evident from remarks Woolsey made during his visit to Minister Ter Beek in The Hague on 10 December 1993. The situation in Bosnia was described by Woolsey's staff as a 'postponement of the surrender of the Muslims, so that the conflict was kept going'.²⁴⁵ Woolsey in an interview with the author gave Haiti as an example of a similar situation, where the American government wished to provide full support to opposition leader J.B. Aristide. However, the intelligence community immediately said: 'Hey, wait a minute. He is a problem.' But the politicians did not wish to listen. Woolsey gave another example: according to the political leaders in Washington, a coalition government would be formed in Somalia. The US intelligence community pointed out that this would never happen,²⁴⁶ but again the politicians did not wish to hear the message.²⁴⁷

The American services opposed this political wishful thinking and repeatedly pointed out that the Muslims had close links with various fundamentalist Islamic governments and terrorist movements and were also supplied with arms from Iran. The intelligence services also argued that the Bosnian Muslims had also committed massacres, although there was a difference in scale: the Bosnian Muslims had perhaps murdered hundreds, the Croats thousands and the Serbs tens of thousands, but that did not detract from the fact that ‘there were Bosnian atrocities’. The Clinton administration wanted to hear nothing of this, however. It asserted that it was possible to establish a multi-ethnic society in Bosnia. Again the American intelligence community clearly had a different view: ‘no way and forget about that.’ They expressed great scepticism, but this was a view that was not supported in the White House and at the State Department. Woolsey’s assessment was that some members of the Clinton administration had too easy views about how a century old conflict could be overcome. The CIA’s view was more or like similar to that of General Colin Powell, the chairman of the American Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), who resisted American military involvement in Bosnia.²⁴⁸ The interest in the deployment of small military units, after the tragedy in Somalia, had definitely disappeared. The later chairman of the JCS, General John Shaliskashvili, had identical ideas.

The question arises as to whether the then director of the CIA, Woolsey, had sufficient opportunities to change this view: after all, he was a member of the National Security Council (NSC). Woolsey stated in a response that he was a different CIA director than Bill Casey had been under President Reagan. Casey proposed policy directives to Reagan, but according to Woolsey the situation had changed over the years. The director of the CIA may well have still been a member of the NSC, and in that capacity also attended meetings of the NSC, but he no longer came to the fore as a political advisor. The traditional role that he played had always been to provide the president with intelligence, with politics being kept at arm’s length. This of course did not mean that no recommendations were made to the president, but they were not made independently, only on request.²⁴⁹ As it happens, most recommendations pertaining to Bosnia appeared to fall on deaf ears and the White House and the State Department persisted in their original course.²⁵⁰

As the conflict in Bosnia progressed in 1995, the internal differences of opinion within the American intelligence community increased. Woolsey admitted that there was no such thing as ‘a single intelligence community view’ on the war in Yugoslavia. There were different ideas in the services about the origin and the further progress of the conflict in the Balkans.²⁵¹ Nonetheless, the predominant view within the US intelligence community was that the VJ = VRS. Individual VJ officers and troops were offered VJ benefits and sometimes cash bonuses to return to Bosnia and serve designated stints with the VRS. Sometimes those individuals were from Bosnia, sometimes not. After their stint with the VRS, they would return to the VJ, with seniority, benefits and rank intact. Some officers and troops remained in the VRS out of either personal commitment to the conflict, desire to get combat experience, nationalistic fervour, or various other reasons. In the final analysis, the VJ and the VRS were indistinguishable, except by where they were to be found. If found in Bosnia, they were called VRS, and in Serbia, they were VJ. Other intelligence services did agree that the Yugoslav army (the VJ) provided full support to the VRS, but they also had to acknowledge that this collaboration decreased in the course of time. In confidential interviews it was confirmed time and again that there were no consistent ideas on Yugoslavia within the American intelligence community among intelligence officials.²⁵²

The DIA and the State Department in particular appeared to adopt a less balanced position. A possible role was also played by the fact that Woolsey’s predecessor, Robert Gates, had designated the American military intelligence service (the DIA) as the most important channel for intelligence support to the UN during peacekeeping operations. This support would not be permanent, but would be reviewed on a case-by-case basis.²⁵³ In view of the dismissive attitude of the CIA to becoming involved in the conflict in Bosnia, it is not surprising that the State Department resorted to hiring in a company like Military Professional Resources Incorporated (MPRI).²⁵⁴ This company employed various retired American generals and intelligence officers and had trained the Hrvatska Vojaska (HV, Croatian Army) and later also the ABiH.²⁵⁵

The American services originally adopted a wait-and-see attitude to the conflict in Bosnia. They did not work with black-and-white views on the roles and operating methods of the warring factions; according to the services, the Muslims were also guilty of misdeeds. It was concluded that the Bosnian Muslims were often guilty of frustrating agreements and peace arrangements in the political and military spheres, and that they bore a large responsibility for the poor humanitarian situation in Sarajevo and other areas. At the end of 1994, the CIA in particular performed an about-turn, and the service started to adhere to the Clinton administration's course more closely. According to a senior US intelligence official, Woolsey resigned from the CIA because he had no working relationship with the President. He had only two semi-private meetings with the President in two years and thus no real direct access to Clinton who was more involved with domestic priorities. Apart from that, Woolsey was not an intimate of the Clinton team. Despite the fact that vice-president Al Gore in November 1994 asked him to stay, Woolsey decided to resign.²⁵⁶ There is no doubt that the departure of Woolsey, in early 1995 somewhat contributed to the fact of the CIA becoming more political and more hawkish. Later, the CIA was even accused of releasing 'blatantly distorting' intelligence products to support the Muslims' case.²⁵⁷ However, Woolsey doubts that the CIA was distorting intelligence on this subject but admitted that he had no first-hand knowledge either way.²⁵⁸

Not only the American, but also the Canadian services were originally not alone in having such a nuanced attitude to the Bosnian conflict. The British services had a relatively balanced view of the matter, which in the case of the United Kingdom was supported and adopted by the policymakers. SIS clearly had a non-interventionist attitude, and the general motto was: 'stay out as long as possible.'²⁵⁹ The view of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) was also balanced.²⁶⁰ This was evident, among other things, from a secret operation. At the beginning of 1994 two articles appeared in the conservative magazine The Spectator which railed against the Western policy in Bosnia. This magazine was often used as a front by SIS staff. 'Journalists' worked for The Spectator in Bosnia, Serbia and Moldova. The articles were written in Sarajevo by a certain 'Kenneth Roberts', who had apparently worked for more than a year as a UN advisor in Bosnia. In reality this was SIS worker Keith Robert Craig, who worked for the Balkans Secretariat of the UK Ministry of Defence.

The first article was published on 5 February 1994 and advocated an UNPROFOR withdrawal from Bosnia, because all factions had committed war crimes. The second article, of 5 March, attacked the entire reporting in the British media. According to the unofficial historian of SIS, Stephen Dorril, this was a pro-Serbian approach. 'Without the slightest evidence, the carnage that took place in Sarajevo's marketplace was described as the work of the Muslim-led government, which was alleged to be massacring its own people to win sympathy and ultimately help from outside.' According to Dorril, the SIS operation worked perfectly and the article was carried by the world press. He also suspected that a large part of SIS was pro-Serb. This is probably incorrect: in reality it was an expression of a wider disenchantment. This British view was consistent with the Canadian analysis that there were no good guys and no bad guys in this war. Western services had more balanced ideas than the Western media, who were more emphatically pro-Muslim. SIS presumably used the conservative magazine here as a counterweight to sound a balanced note. For the press this confirmed the image of SIS as pro-Serbian, and from that moment on this service was unreservedly branded as 'pro-Serbian', while many British journalists followed the CNN view ('good guys, bad guys') of the war.²⁶¹

For instance, anti-Serbian reports were shown on television of the battle around Gorazde in April-May 1994, according to the former American head of the intelligence section (in military terms: the G-2 section) in Sarajevo, Lieutenant Colonel J. E. Sray. A British SAS soldier was killed by the VRS and a British aircraft (a Sea Harrier) was shot down. US networks accused General Rose of cowardice and reluctance to deploy NATO air power against the Bosnian Serbs. What was not mentioned on television, however, was that ABiH soldiers had left their positions during the VRS attack and taken up new positions behind the SAS unit, which caught the British in the middle. No one took the trouble to make enquiries of the Public Affairs Officer of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC), or to request an interview with UNPROFOR staff in Sarajevo. In later documentaries this story would indiscriminately be repeated on American television.²⁶² More generally, the press in the crisis around Bosnia was transformed from mere opinion shapers into prominent policy drivers who, depending on the situation, had an influence on the political decision-making that should not be underestimated.²⁶³ This is not the appropriate place to give a comprehensive analysis of the role of and reporting by the press on the war in Bosnia, but it is clear that this helped to shape a manifestly pro-Muslim view.²⁶⁴

Another example of misleading information was probably the mortar attack on the Markale market in Sarajevo, which killed 68 civilians in February 1994. Eleven artillery specialists subsequently spent nine days studying the shell attack.²⁶⁵ The official final assessment was that the attacks were executed by the VRS, but there were serious doubts about this within the Western intelligence community. Various staff of intelligence and security services from Canada, the UK, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Belgium and the Netherlands established independently of each other that this was an act by the ABiH to show the Bosnian Serbs in a bad light.²⁶⁶

A similar suspicion arose when on 28 August 1995 a shell landed on a busy square in Sarajevo. As early as October 1995 journalist David Binder reported in the weekly The Nation that four UNPROFOR specialists (a Russian, a Canadian and two Americans) had arrived at the incontrovertible conclusion that it was an ABiH shell. American intelligence officers admitted that the ABiH had taken responsibility for this incident.²⁶⁷ Sray, head of the intelligence section in Sarajevo, subsequently signalled in a publication that the ABiH was responsible for both shellings.²⁶⁸ Even the most important British policy body in the field of intelligence, the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), came to the conclusion that the shelling of Sarajevo market was probably not the work of the VRS, but of the Bosnian Muslims.²⁶⁹

In a third incident that followed this pattern, the head of the UNMOs (UN Military Observers) in Sarajevo investigated the mortar attack on the water distribution point in Sarajevo, which was the trigger for the later air strikes by NATO, and in doing so demonstrated that the attack was executed by the ABiH itself. However, all the associated evidence was pushed aside by American officers.²⁷⁰ Russian intelligence officers even told the author Ljiljana Bulatovic that the Bosnian General Rasim Delic had organized the attack.²⁷¹

Various interviews reveal that the French intelligence services generally leaned towards to the British position on the war in Bosnia. However, a conflict of competence arose in response to the far-reaching French involvement in UNPROFOR and the conflict in Bosnia between the foreign intelligence service (DGSE) and military intelligence service (DRM). Indeed in October 1994, an official agreement had to be made between these two services to delineate their tasks. This was also necessary because the two directors, Jacques Dewatre and General Jean Heinrich, were constantly at odds with each other. Furthermore, General Jean Heinrich frequently quarrelled with General Raymond Germanos, the Chief of Operations of the French Army, and this would give rise to many problems in Bosnia.²⁷²

The quarrel was ultimately settled to the advantage of the French DGSE, which was given exclusive authority to conduct clandestine operations in other countries and to run agents and sources. From now on the French military intelligence service would have to rely for the gathering of intelligence on the military attachés in the French embassies and uniformed officers, such as those serving with UNPROFOR. Senior officials of the French DGSE confirmed that their service had received an unprecedented flow of foreign requests for intelligence since the outbreak of the crisis in the Balkans. The DGSE was extremely active in Bosnia, and the sharply increased pressure of work had led to the recruitment of five hundred civilians in the five years since the start of the war.²⁷³ Incidentally, the director of the French foreign intelligence service, Dewatre, later had to resign because the service's operations in Serbia had misfired.²⁷⁴

German intelligence services also had a biased assessment: they were pro-Croatian, but leant towards the American anti-Serb position. The foreign intelligence service, the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND), was always very concerned (like the Italian and Austrian services) about the situation in Yugoslavia. These services expected major disturbances already after Tito's death and, according to a former BND official, had a better understanding of the ethnic and cultural problems there, compared to other services. The German service collected much intelligence by operating with special teams who debriefed refugees in Germany or Bosnia itself. There was a serious fear for the German national security in view of the enormous influx of refugees from the Balkan. In particular because there worked in Germany already more than 1 million Yugoslav immigrant workers.²⁷⁵

The BND is said to have also cooperated closely with Croatian intelligence services, such as the Bureau for National Security (Ured za Nacionalnu Sigurnost), the intelligence service of the Croatian Army (OSHV), the intelligence service of the General Staff of the Croatian Army and the Security Information Service. It is noteworthy, incidentally, that these Croatian services operated actively and specifically against UNPROFOR. For instance, Bureau IV of the intelligence service of the Croatian Army was responsible for military Communications Intelligence (Comint) operations against the headquarters of UNPROFOR in Zagreb, which were carried out from the air force base Lucko in Zagreb. This section was said to have maintained close links with the BND and CIA. The Germans made equipment available to both and arranged training and education. In addition, NATO intelligence, including Sigint, is said to have flowed via the BND to the Croatian services, to the great dissatisfaction of the NATO member states, especially because the Serbian intelligence and security services (such as SDB and KOS) had heavily infiltrated the Croatian services. American and German services ended up via this German-Croatian route in Belgrade.²⁷⁶ However, former BND officials strongly denied that this ever took place.²⁷⁷

This close American-German collaboration did not exist in the American relationship with other Western services, including between the British and the Americans, in spite of their special relationship. There was no question of an optimum sharing with the British by the Americans, according to an employee of the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS). In early 1995 the Americans had become 'pretty anti-Serb', and had abandoned their balanced view. This brought them into conflict with the British services, which still had a balanced view of the conflict. This led to the American services adopting an increasingly unfriendly attitude towards the British. The difference of opinion led to a curtailment of American intelligence input to the Defence Intelligence Staff.²⁷⁸ As the then CIA director Woolsey remarked, such a balanced view amounted to 'swimming against the stream' in the American political context. According to a senior US intelligence official there were actually two streams. Those who idealized the Bosnian Muslims and those who blamed them equally with the Serbs. The CIA swam against both.²⁷⁹

American domestic politics were furthermore strongly influenced by the excellent media campaign in the United States by the Bosnian Muslims, who had hired the prominent New York PR firms Hill & Knowlton and Rudner Finn. Sray, who in 1994 was head of the intelligence section in Sarajevo, even stated that this was a pure disinformation campaign. He pointed out that the first firm was responsible for the Kuwaiti government's public relations campaign during the Gulf War, and had successfully spread the outrageous lie that Iraqi troops had thrown Kuwaiti babies out of their incubators. The management of Rudner Finn would later boast that it had succeeded in marshalling a significant part of the American Jewish community behind the Bosnian Muslims, in spite of the fact that the Bosnian Muslims had brought many Islamic fundamentalists into Bosnia who were vehemently anti-Israel.²⁸⁰

The approach of the intelligence services to the crisis in Bosnia

There were different levels of activities within the Military Information Office (MIO) at UNPROFOR in Zagreb. Firstly there was the MIO, as intended by the UN in New York, whose opportunities and resources were limited. This resulted in a second level of activities: the links with the national intelligence services and their contributions. A third level was based on liaison relationships within NATO, which mainly meant contributions from networks that had long been in existence. The most important levels were the second and third.²⁸¹ In Chapter 1 extensive attention was paid to the MIO in Zagreb. Below we will focus attention on the second level: the role of the various national services, and on the third level, the relationships within NATO.

Various troop-contributing nations soon realized that for gathering intelligence in the former Yugoslavia they should not count on intelligence contributions from the UN or the MIO. Because these countries considered it to be absurd 'to send troops to a sensitive area without the capability to analyse the situation properly' this quickly led to the establishment of well-organized national intelligence structures. Although these units were formally under UN command, in reality they were controlled by their national governments. There was a danger attached to this: this national control greatly influenced the policy conducted with respect to the conflict, which officially remained UN policy. UN intelligence needs were not always in agreement with those of the individual troop-contributing nations, which could also interpret the mandate differently or which possibly wanted to avoid conflicts with the warring factions.²⁸² Potentially, the 'grip' of national governments on the UN peacekeeping mission in Bosnia would therefore tighten.

Troop-contributing nations took the gathering of intelligence into their own hands. France, Denmark and the UK, for example, deployed special commando units, which operated behind enemy lines to gather intelligence. In March 1994 a joint covert operation was executed in Bosnia in which various troop-contributing nations participated, such as Canada, the United Kingdom and France. This was because at this point large parts of Bosnia had still not been explored and mapped out.

Another example: one day a group of European intelligence officers reported to the Bosnian government. As a cover they claimed to be members of a European tourist organization, and told the government in Sarajevo that once the war was over, Bosnia was certain to become a major tourist attraction. Therefore the group were keen to explore in particular those areas where UNPROFOR was not yet active. They especially wanted to survey the state of hotels and boarding houses, restaurants, public buildings, ski centres, the landscape, the state of the road network and so on, so as to be better prepared for 'the great tourist invasion'. The Bosnian government in Sarajevo fell for it and gave them permission. In this way, completely outside the knowledge of the UN, a great deal of intelligence was gathered on poorly accessible areas in Bosnia.²⁸³ However, this must have been in a timeframe when UNPROFOR did not control yet almost all Bosnia. Various interviewed intelligence officials had doubts about this story.²⁸⁴

British and French national intelligence cells were created, which operated independently of each other and of the UN. London and Paris did not want to be dependent on the intelligence contribution from the UN, which was minimal. The director of the DIS, Air Marshal John Walker, had the following to say on this subject:

'Intelligence is a dirty word in the United Nations. The UN is not a thing in itself; it's an amalgam of 183 sovereign nations. If it does intelligence, it will be doing it against a sovereign UN member, so it's incompatible. But you need a military intelligence job to protect your troops. If you don't, you pay for it in body bags'.²⁸⁵

In brief, most Western intelligence services created new structures (usually ad hoc) in order to deal with the crisis in Bosnia.

The US intelligence community, because of the considerable political involvement of the Clinton administration in the conflict in Bosnia, had bundled its forces in the form of a 'Balkans Task Force' (BTF), in which the most important national services were represented. Its director was Gene Wickland. The BTF included representatives of the CIA and DIA, with intelligence supplied by the NRO and NSA. Military analysis was carried out mainly by the CIA. Each night a daily situation report was drawn up for the following morning, which was incorporated in the presidential morning briefing by the CIA. President Bush (Sr.) was always briefed personally, but President Clinton was apparently a speed reader: he read the material provided extremely rapidly and dispensed with the briefing. The material for the briefing also went to the special Balkans advisor of Vice-President Al Gore, Leon Fuerth, who was responsible for monitoring the sanctions against Serbia and did so 'very much in detail'.²⁸⁶

A separate Balkans Task Force was also created in the Intelligence & Research section of the State Department, which received its information from the American intelligence community. A special Bosnia group also existed at the National Security Agency since 1994. Despite the initial shortage of translators American intelligence officials felt at the time that this team carried out one of the best operations in the intelligence service's existence. There was a 'four hour turnaround time' for Sigint from Bosnia and Serbia. This meant that after the interception of a message it would be translated, processed, analysed and delivered to the desk of the consumer of the intelligence, such as the CIA or the State Department, within four hours.²⁸⁷ In addition, in Vicenza, Italy, a special NSA unit was created for the rapid processing of intercepted message traffic: the Special Handling and Evaluation Detachment (SHED).²⁸⁸

In the United Kingdom too, all manner of new structures were created in all haste within the intelligence community to deal with the conflict in Bosnia. SIS had a number of official sources in the old Yugoslavia, but produced little valuable intelligence. The service also had too few experts who could speak Serbo-Croat, and it had to build everything from the ground up on the outbreak of the war, much like GCHQ. The coordinating body for intelligence, the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), established the Current Intelligence Group for the Balkans. Within eighteen months, the Balkans department of SIS had recruited a number of sources among all warring factions and placed them effectively in Bosnia. Furthermore, SIS, reportedly carried out an operation in Macedonia in 1993, in which clandestine arms drops to the border were executed as part of an operation to set up a clandestine resistance network.²⁸⁹

Another secret operation in which SIS was said to have been involved was a detailed plan to eliminate President Milosevic. Former SIS worker Richard Tomlinson gained access to a secret two-page document, originating in SIS, with the title: 'The need to assassinate President Milosevic of Serbia'. It stated that Milosevic must be removed because he supported Karadzic. Meanwhile, American and French intelligence services made preparations to assassinate Karadzic; Milosevic apparently fell under the auspices of the United Kingdom. The plan was never executed, probably because the American government felt that Milosevic was a stabilizing factor.²⁹⁰ One American intelligence official rejected this notion. According to him, there was, and is, an absolute ban on any 'wet' work for US clandestine operations. Since 1974, each US clandestine operation is reviewed and approved by Congressional oversight, which flatly prohibits any such assassinations.²⁹¹

In 1994 Tomlinson worked under the cover of 'political advisor to General Rose' in Bosnia. He made trips to Belgrade, Skopje, Zagreb, Tuzla and Ljubljana, where he recruited new sources or spoke to senior Bosnian agents who already worked for the British service.²⁹² He successfully ran various high-level agents in Sarajevo.²⁹³ An official once asserted that these agents 'produced a very detailed intelligence picture which included not just the military plans and capabilities of the different factions but also early warning of political intentions'. Another source asserted, however, that important agents were recruited, but that these produced no 'substantial intelligence of quality'.²⁹⁴

A nationally oriented Bosnia Cell was created in the UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS). This special unit mainly had access to intelligence that was gathered by British and US services. This cell provided strategic, but not tactical intelligence to the Ministry of Defence. As regards the sources of the DIS: firstly this was GCHQ, after which came SIS, followed by Imint. In fourth place came the Foreign Office political reports. In addition, intelligence arrived via liaison and originally much was shared with the Americans (especially with the DIA).²⁹⁵ As the United Kingdom's political, military and humanitarian involvement in the events in Bosnia became more extensive, the British services started to become increasingly active in the Balkans. A national intelligence cell was established, as London no longer wanted to be dependent on the MIO in Zagreb. One such cell was set up in the Croatian port of Split and one in BHC in Kiseljak in central Bosnia, later in Sarajevo.

The sharing of intelligence with other UNPROFOR countries remained a problem throughout the UNPROFOR mission. The British also ran up against the difficulty that the UNPROFOR staff comprised many nationalities, including staff of former Russian and other Eastern European services. In Bosnia, the British Army Intelligence Corps originally worked closely with the French and Canadian military intelligence services.²⁹⁶ These operations were especially intended for gathering data for briefings for the commanders. Nonetheless, the same problems that frequently affect the world of intelligence soon appeared, characterized by the BBC journalist Urban as follows: 'Any channelling of Signals Intelligence or agent reports from the Government Communications Headquarters and MI6 to troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina was constrained by the intelligence community's strict rules about dissemination.' The result of this limitation on the dissemination of intelligence was that important information often did not reach the troops on the ground, as had happened during the Gulf War, where the command structure was almost ideal. Because troops from Russia and the Ukraine also took part in UNPROFOR in Bosnia, the probability that London would be allowed or able to supply valuable intelligence was small. If any intelligence was passed on, it was 'sanitized to the point of near-uselessness'. However, one should always remember, as mentioned in Chapter 1 of this study, that unclassified is not the same as worthless. Nonetheless, reports of intercepted message traffic from GCHQ were only passed on to a special British Sigint cell in Sarajevo, which was equipped with special communication equipment. This select group of specially appointed officers briefed the British General Rose and his successor General Smith personally.²⁹⁷ Furthermore, special Bosnia units were set up in the various headquarters of the Canadian, German and French (military) intelligence services. Until now, little has become known about the activities of these special units.

The information position of the Western intelligence services: the United States, France and the United Kingdom

The Western intelligence and security services appeared to be insufficiently prepared for the war in Bosnia. For instance, intelligence author Andrew Rathmell states that these services were still equipped for the situation as it had been before the fall of the Berlin Wall. 'Military forces embarking for remote trouble-spots overseas, for instance, find that they receive more timely and comprehensive background information from private sector information providers than through their own chain of command.'²⁹⁸ The question arises as to what the most important causes for this were, and whether there was a lack of information in the first place.

The former director of the CIA, James Woolsey, contested Rathmell's view. Discussing the information position of the CIA in 1993, he stated that his service had a firm grip on events and developments. According to him, this was because the interest in Yugoslavia within the CIA had always been great. For many years, much good intelligence had been gathered about that country. Yugoslavia had been an important player in the Cold War and had close ties with China. In this respect too, the country had been of interest to the CIA. There were therefore sufficient analysts and language specialists available when the conflict acquired a military dimension. The CIA knew fairly well who was talking to whom about what. That is also why the CIA held a balanced view (i.e. all groups committing atrocities but the Bosnian Serbs much more). They were also able to follow what weapons and other goods were being brought into the region. The CIA also knew that many 'visitors' from the Middle East were entering the region in an attempt to influence the conflict.²⁹⁹

The journalist Halberstam is of the same opinion. According to him there has been no lack of American political, military and intelligence talent in Yugoslavia for the last forty years. Belgrade was 'a good listening post' for developments in the Warsaw Pact. In the autumn of 1990, the CIA predicted in a thorough analysis that within one year Yugoslavia 'would no longer function and in two years it would begin to dissolve'. The CIA pointed to the dangers of armed conflicts between the various ethnic factions in Yugoslavia. Neither the United States nor the European countries would be able to stop this process, according to the service.³⁰⁰ It would nonetheless appear that the American information position in general was not actually that good. There were shortcomings, especially in the area of Humint, Imint and Sigint, as will be demonstrated in the following chapters.

Humint did play an important role for the Americans; not so much in the CIA, but in the DIA. One of the best sources of intelligence was formed by the flows of Displaced Persons that left Bosnia, Croatia, Serbia and the Republika Srpska to apply for asylum in European Union countries. Not only these refugees, but also deserters, were an extremely important Humint source. The US Army Intelligence and Security Command was running a sizeable programme in Germany and Italy that was aimed at debriefing refugees and deserters. They were interviewed in joint interrogation centres about their experiences in the former Yugoslavia. These special units were later incorporated into the Defense Humint Service. The CIA also had a separate unit in Croatia, the Refugee Debriefing Center, to interview and screen Displaced Persons from Bosnia.³⁰¹ The Austrian and Swiss intelligence services, incidentally, are also said to have gathered much intelligence thanks to the debriefing of refugees from the Balkans.³⁰²

The US community also acquired information from other similar projects. Via the 66th Intelligence Brigade in Munich, for example, which was also occupied with debriefing Displaced Persons. Furthermore, the American DIA had the 'Formica' project, in which all US military personnel that had been stationed with UNPROFOR or had travelled through the Balkans were comprehensively interrogated. Declassified American government documents reveal that in 1992 and 1993 this service already had a good insight into the atrocities committed in Bosnia in various camps where Muslims had been held prisoner, for example, Luka-Brcko and Omarska. It was also clear to the service that captured Muslims and Croats had been murdered on a large scale in Brcko. In order to mislead the International Red Cross, Bosnian Serbs were said to have inflicted minor wounds on themselves and pretended that they had been prisoners who had otherwise got off reasonably lightly.³⁰³ According to a senior US intelligence official US awareness on this issue was broad and well-defined. Nevertheless, the reporting priority given to the atrocities was nil. Many felt that the issue was very important, and reported extensively on it, but the direct application of the reportage was nil. Reporting on atrocities was seen as being aimed at three to five years down the road, for some ill-defined effort to hold parties accountable. It was an expression of faith in the system. All reporting on atrocities was done "out of hide", and in addition to the required reporting on tactical and operational requirements.³⁰⁴

Another US intelligence officer confirmed that the debriefings of refugees resulted in much useful intelligence. All raw intelligence from counterintelligence, Humint operations and Osint from the Balkans was entered into the so-called Blackbird Database. However, this officer also stated that the DIA had botched the recording of a great deal regarding evidence of atrocities. For instance, the service interviewed hundreds of Displaced Persons in Germany without noting in the debriefing reports who said what. Therefore these witnesses could not be used as witnesses by the Tribunal in The Hague.³⁰⁵

The following can be said about the United Kingdom with respect to the information position of the DIS. In the first place the information of GCHQ was important. They supplied mainly military-tactical Sigint on troop movements and, for example, to calls for meetings. This intelligence went by satellite directly to the service in Cheltenham; the information comprised approximately seven thousand reports a week. In the second place the British foreign intelligence service, SIS, played its part. SIS also supplied tactical intelligence, but only small chunks. According to a British intelligence official, incidentally, this intelligence was not of the highest quality; on a score of 1 to 5 this official would value the material at 2 or 3, or in other words: 'Not really good stuff'. In the third place Imint was of interest. Photos were supplied by (Nimrod-type) aircraft that carried out photo reconnaissance flights in the region. AWACS aircraft were also used for espionage. They supplied Elint and Comint. Flights of the American U-2 espionage aircraft often also supplied good photos. Unmanned espionage aircraft (for example UAVs) mainly supplied Imint regarding Gorazde. The satellite photos were supplied directly to the Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth. This is a wholly American organization, which forwarded the intelligence to the British. Only in fourth place was the political reporting of the Foreign Office of interest to the DIS. In addition, intelligence arrived at this service via the intelligence liaison with other countries (the main source originally was the liaison with the DIA).

British intelligence officers were often unimpressed with the UK Eyes Only intelligence supplied by the Special Air Services (SAS) and Special Boat Service (SBS) as part of the British collection operations. For example, the SAS reported one day that two Serbian tanks had been spotted at a given location. The DIS certainly found this interesting, but, according to the earlier mentioned official, the service also wanted to know where the tanks were going. In this way, the SAS did deliver much tactical intelligence, but the Humint that accompanied it was often difficult to assess and its value was difficult to ascertain. Later in 1995 the SAS carried out laser designation of Bosnian Serb targets and called down artillery fire on VRS positions.

From the United Kingdom there was also some intelligence liaison with the ABiH, but the information that was supplied was always taken with a grain of salt by DIS workers. Usually the Bosnian Muslims supplied all source intelligence (all types together), but the ABiH never supplied intercepted message traffic. Very often, the ABiH information came down to urging the UN to become involved in the conflict.³⁰⁶

Regarding the Sigint cover of Bosnia, an DIS employee said that Sigint resulted in 'no good picture'. The VRS and the VJ (the army of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) often used couriers or existing fixed land lines that could not be monitored, except in special operations where the lines were tapped directly. According to UK officials, this was in any case never done by the British services.³⁰⁷

An outline has now been given of how the intelligence and security services 'at home' acquired their information, and the question now remains as to what exactly the services themselves did in Bosnia in order to get the intelligence gathering off the ground. In addition to the outlined methods of Sigint³⁰⁸ and Imint³⁰⁹ there were also plenty of methods for gathering Humint, such as recruiting agents and informants or using existing structures, organizations and official bodies.

As far as Humint is concerned the impression is that the British information position was not so good. This was evident during the hostage crisis in the spring of 1995: regarding the hostages the British Chief of Defence Staff had to conclude in an internal intelligence memorandum that the greatest problem was that there was a lack of good intelligence. For this reason the British services simply did not know where the hostages were.³¹⁰ Until now very little has become known about the information position of other Western intelligence services, although all important services were active in Bosnia and they all had their 'own' official (diplomatic) and unofficial representatives in Bosnia.

The work of the intelligence services in Sarajevo, Belgrade and Zagreb

The most important Western intelligence services had a branch office in the region. This 'station' was usually connected with the embassies concerned; this was the case in Zagreb, Sarajevo and Belgrade. For instance, the German Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) had a representative in the German embassies in Belgrade and Zagreb. According to CIA officers, the BND also had Humint sources close to Mladic and Izetbegovic.³¹¹ In practice, the BND had a special interest in the violations of the embargo against Serbia and Montenegro by Romania and Greece.³¹² The service occasionally came up with reports the reliability of which turned out to be highly dubious. For instance, on 16 March 1995 the German embassy, probably on the authority of the Bundesnachrichtendienst, reported that a temporary bridge had been built over the Drina at Jagustica between Serbia and the Republika Srpska, and that this bridge was being used to transport equipment to the Bosnian Serbs. It appeared later that the local landscape resembled a Norwegian fjord: a steep wall of rock more than 200 metres high. The German intelligence was incorrect.³¹³

The American CIA was likewise represented by a station in Belgrade. The CIA and the monitoring service, the NSA, had already operated for some time from the embassy with a secret post that monitored the communication traffic in and around Belgrade. The CIA and NSA operated from a similar post in Zagreb to track the Croatian communication traffic.³¹⁴ Matters were arranged differently in Bosnia. The first CIA Chief of Station to arrive in Sarajevo, had formerly worked in Belgrade, Zagreb and Kosovo. Originally, the new Chief of Station was supposed to leave for Sarajevo with a small team in mid-1994. However, this was deemed to be too dangerous by CIA headquarters; eventually the team did not leave until June 1995, shortly before the fall of Srebrenica. During his stay in Sarajevo, the Chief of Station also reported on the fall of the enclaves Srebrenica and Zepa. Albright in particular was said to have asked the Chief of Station to provide the correct numbers of dead in Srebrenica. When he indicated that this number was between six thousand and eight thousand, Washington responded with great scepticism.

The work of the Chief of Station in Sarajevo proved to be not without risk. Later in 1995, the Bosnian security service revealed his identity to the Iranian secret service, so that he had to make a hasty retreat from Sarajevo.³¹⁵ Only in late 1995 was the American station in Sarajevo reopened, after obtaining some security guarantees from the Bosnian side. The new Chief of Station in Sarajevo had to work with a small staff of three, which meant in practice that he had an assistant, an administrative worker and a communications man at his disposal. Furthermore, there was a strict separation of tasks between the CIA stations in Zagreb and Sarajevo. The CIA station in Zagreb, where the Chief of Station had a larger staff at his disposal, was responsible for the Republika Srpska. The Chief of Station in Sarajevo would not dream of running sources or agents in the Republika Srpska or of carrying out clandestine operations there. The tasks were distributed as follows: the most important task of the CIA station in Zagreb was to follow the political, military and economic developments in Croatia and the Republika Srpska. The work was nonetheless focused on the gathering of intelligence regarding the Croatian armed forces.³¹⁶

The CIA station in Sarajevo was mainly concerned with an operation to expel Mujahedeen fighters from the country, and (partly overlapping) with fighting 'terrorism and the removal of foreigners'. This mainly concerned fundamentalists from Tunisia, Algeria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, and Revolutionary Guards from Iran and Yemen. As it happens, they were stateless Muslim soldiers, who had been recruited from the slums of cities like Cairo and Algiers. At the time considerable sums of money flowed from Iran to the ABiH to pay these fighters. The ABiH, however, wanted nothing to do with fundamentalists within Bosnia in the beginning. The ABiH may not have seen them as a danger and was not anxious to observe the wishes of the Chief of Station, who had been ordered from Washington to expel those particular fighters from the country. According to CIA workers, the Bosnian Muslims constantly tried to mislead the CIA and to downplay the problem of the Mujahedeen fighters. By the spring of 1996 CIA field officer Robert Baer worked with a half-dozen people in Bosnia on counterterrorism.³¹⁷

The CIA continued to actively pursue the order to expel these fighters from the country. For instance, they put pressure on Izetbegovic to force the Iranian Revolutionary Guards to leave. The president did not want to comply and in the first instance denied that such fighters were playing an important role. The CIA demonstrated that the Mujahedeen were closely involved with the Minister of the Interior of Bosnia, and also demonstrated that the Revolutionary Guards were occupied with training the ABiH to produce car bombs. However, a blind eye was turned to these Revolutionary Guards in the interest of what was considered to be the good cause of the struggle of the Bosnian Muslims. In these Iranian training centres in Bosnia, the CIA also encountered models of buildings that were evidence that the Iranians were planning to storm certain premises. In addition, the ABiH had engaged mercenaries from Albania and the Chechen Republic, which were needed because it had no other choice for training soldiers: most of its soldiers had no combat experience. Iran was permitted with American tacit agreement to supply weapons to the Bosnian Muslims,³¹⁸ but after the arrival of the first American troops the Revolutionary Guards had to leave Bosnia again. CIA workers, incidentally, admitted this 'tacit agreement' for arms trading; one of them remarked: 'That is politics.'³¹⁹

The CIA in Sarajevo soon discovered that the Bosnian Muslims had a 'white hot hatred' on all political and military levels towards the French. The CIA station, for example, received lists from the ABiH of French equipment, which had ostensibly been confiscated by the VRS. According to CIA officials, however, this concerned 'normal' French supplies to the VRS, for example two field kitchens, where each kitchen could feed approximately six hundred soldiers. These kitchens were transported in enormous trucks with low loaders and 'you do not just lose one of these accidentally along the way', according to a CIA official. In addition, the lists included summaries with serial numbers of radios, firearms, uniforms, rifles, military systems and communication equipment which were supposed to have been confiscated by the VRS. According to CIA officials, this was evidence that the ABiH had highly placed agents within the VRS or were able to intercept their communication traffic.³²⁰ The CIA itself also ran agents in Pale, who, according to a former official of the Dutch MIS, supplied excellent intelligence.³²¹

German, Turkish, Italian, Russian, Iranian and French intelligence services were also active in Belgrade, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Tuzla. CIA officials in Sarajevo and Zagreb had a golden rule: no contacts with the French foreign and/or military services; the CIA apparently did not trust the French services. There was no Chief of Station of the British foreign intelligence service SIS present in

Sarajevo, which was quite remarkable in view of the presence of the many British troops there, according to a CIA official.³²² And the BND also met with distrust. According to German intelligence sources the French themselves were also reluctant to share information with the BND. And later during the war in Kosovo the CIA was sometimes reluctant to share UAV Imagery with the BND.³²³

There was definitely a British representation of SIS, albeit not on the level of Chief of Station. This is apparent from the book written by Richard Tomlinson, who spent some time in Bosnia for SIS and carried out various clandestine operations in Sarajevo and Tuzla, under cover as a political advisor to General Rose.³²⁴ The problem with his book, however, is that it probably does not describe the personal adventures of Tomlinson. Instead he presumably presents the experiences of his predecessor as his own. However, it is true that he ran agents in Sarajevo and Tuzla.³²⁵ Interviews conducted for this report have revealed that the SIS recruited agents up to the highest regions of Izetbegovic's government and cabinet.³²⁶

The British SIS, like the German Bundesnachrichtendienst, also had excellent sources close to Mladic, according to the Canadian intelligence officers. The Canadians themselves recruited good sources within the Bosnian government. From the Canadian side it was emphasized that in Sarajevo too the French intelligence services had built up an excellent working intelligence system. According to Canadian intelligence officials, the French military intelligence service was the best organized in Sarajevo. The French had an excellent and centralized working system which operationally, tactically and strategically stood head and shoulders above everyone else's. It was an integrated all-source intelligence system.³²⁷ The Canadian view was, not surprisingly, shared by the former head of the French military intelligence service (Direction de Renseignement Militaire or DRM), General Jean Heinrich. According to him, up to 1995 this service had an information level that was actually above that of the CIA. The American services had an extraordinarily weak intelligence image 'at home'; their point of view on the war in Bosnia was to change only in the practice of the conflict. According to Heinrich, the CIA knew what was happening on the ground in Iraq, because there they were dealing with a desert. It corresponded well with the CIA's method. But, as Heinrich observed, flying over an area that was wooded and hilly, with people who moved in small groups in a misleading manner, was different from what the US services were accustomed to from Iraq.

Heinrich pointed out that the CIA had other resources, but that all resources were deployed for technical investigation, electronic monitoring and Imint. According to him, the CIA had almost no Humint whatsoever. According to Heinrich, an intelligence service, especially in a conflict involving problems of this type, must have a large number of 'censeurs humains' on the ground, as well as a very strong analytical capacity. Heinrich claimed that the director of the CIA, Woolsey, even visited him to discuss changes in his own intelligence system.³²⁸

This assertion was not based on French chauvinism, but was probably consistent with reality. Many interviews with (former) staff of the Dutch Military Intelligence service (MIS) and foreign services indicate that the American information position was indeed not highly regarded.³²⁹ A DIS official recalled Heinrich as 'a dreadful chap', who was extremely anti-American. Neither did he speak a word of English, which did not make bilateral contacts and liaison any easier.³³⁰ This did not detract from the fact that the Direction de Renseignement Militaire (DRM) under General Heinrich, in terms of the gathering of intelligence about Bosnia, was generally judged positively in Paris too.³³¹

The problem, however, was that the DRM absolutely refused to share its intelligence with NATO allies. The service was able to locate the positions of ABiH and VRS snipers and even employed Black Teams to take out snipers at night. The uncooperative attitude of the French caused great problems when a combined Danish-Swedish unit took over a part of the sector in Sarajevo that until then had been under French units. The DRM refused to disclose the positions of the ABiH snipers to this new unit, insofar as they were aware of these, which resulted in dead and wounded on the Scandinavian side. According to staff of the Canadian intelligence community, however, the DRM cooperated on special operations with the German BND.³³²

The need for intelligence steadily increased during the conflict. Therefore, in addition to the United Kingdom, other NATO member states also established their own national intelligence cells in order to safely provide the 'national' commanders within UNPROFOR with timely and accurate intelligence. The French intelligence services had their own intelligence cell, and turned out to be able to build up an excellent intelligence network in Sarajevo in a relatively short time.

The Canadians also had their own cell and a special unit in Pleso, near Zagreb, which was responsible for processing the daily flow of Comint from Ottawa. This was the Canadian Forces Information Operations Group (CFIOG), which was stationed in Pleso during the war in Bosnia. There was also a special Sigint unit there, which reported directly to the Deputy Force Commander (DFC), the Canadian General Ray Crabbe and later General Ashton. This unit arrived in Pleso in March 1995, where it worked with all source intelligence. The DFC therefore had an analysis unit with all capabilities and resources at his disposal. There was a direct line with the Department of Defence in Ottawa. Sometimes the American services would pass on intelligence to General Ashton, to which he remarked that he had already received it from 'his boys' in Pleso.³³³

Only some considerable time after the fall of Srebrenica, in January 1996, did a Netherlands National Intelligence Cell (abbreviated to NETHNIC) become attached to NATO headquarters in Zagreb. This was in principle a 'one-way gateway', intended to pass on Dutch intelligence to the intelligence officer in Zagreb.³³⁴ Other countries also had a national intelligence cell. For instance, the Swedish Vice-Admiral Magnus Haglund was head of the Swedish National Intelligence Cell (SWENIC) in Zagreb. Haglund collaborated closely with the German, British and Danish cells (GEMNIC, UKNIC and DANNIC) in particular to procure intelligence; he had fewer dealings with the Dutch cell. He did point out that the Dutch cell was usually avoided, because it was often affected by viruses in the computer systems.³³⁵

Besides technical resources, such as Imint and Sigint that were deployed for national intelligence gathering, various intelligence services often made use of Humint sources and the secondment of intelligence officers to a suitable location. The favourite secondment locations were in the various staffs and in Akashi's supporting unit in Zagreb. For instance, Akashi had a French advisor who worked for the French foreign intelligence service. The problem for this advisor, as he told another of Akashi's advisors, was that most other staff members knew what was going on, and at some meetings this Frenchman was consequently no longer welcome. This official's crowning glory was on his departure in August 1995, when he spent an entire afternoon loading a truck with boxes of documents. He later went to work for the European Commission Monitoring Mission (ECMM). According to this advisor to Akashi, this was also a favourite 'hangout' for intelligence personnel.³³⁶ Indeed, it will become clear below that Western intelligence services were already active in Bosnia in 1991, when the collapse of Yugoslavia started with the separation of Slovenia.

Western intelligence services in Yugoslavia from 1991

The ECMM mission operated in Slovenia from July 1991 and in Croatia from September. The mission originally comprised thirty to fifty observers with diplomatic status, whose safety was guaranteed by the parties involved. Thanks to the white suits that were intended to emphasize their civilian status, they were soon nicknamed the 'ice cream vendors'. The number of ECMM observers was to grow within two years to approximately four hundred. The ECMM later also operated in Bosnia and had a regional centre in Belgrade. From August 1991 the monitors also included observers from the CSCE member states: Canada, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Sweden. The mission received its instructions from the presidency of the European Community, to which it reported, as well as to the UN and the International Red Cross.

Immediately upon arrival in Zagreb, it was already clear that many observers had their own national agenda. A lack of consensus immediately came to light between the countries that contributed the observers. It had been agreed with the EC that the observers would not report independently to their own national capitals, but exclusively through the head of the mission to the presidency of the EC.³³⁷ There was no question of this. Immediately on arrival in Zagreb some observers installed their own satellite dishes on the balconies of their hotel rooms, while others kept themselves completely out of sight and worked, apparently under cover of the ECMM, on their own national agenda.³³⁸

Although the mission's attempts at mediation met with little success and the mission was hardly able to play a significant role in supervising ceasefire agreements, they would acquire a certain value as the eyes and ears of the European Community in the field. From the autumn of 1991, the ECMM teams also started investigating human rights violations. In addition, the mission started to play a role in the exchange of prisoners of war, the execution of confidence-building measures decided on by the EC, and monitoring aid convoys.³³⁹ It goes without saying that the mission was attractive to the intelligence services. The diplomatic status of the observers meant that they were exposed to little danger, and another major appeal was that the ECMM observers were able to travel through many areas and so, under cover of diplomacy, could gather intelligence at reasonably low risk.

Confirmation that the ECMM observers were a cherished cover of Western intelligence services was provided in various confidential interviews. Staff of the Dutch MIS were also active in the ECMM as observers. According to one MIS official, the organization was full of staff from European intelligence services. The French ECMM observers all had special aerials on their hotel room balconies or their rented accommodation in Zagreb. Their task was to monitor the communication traffic in and around Zagreb for their own military intelligence service. When this was no longer permitted by the heads of the ECMM, the French observers rapidly complied.³⁴⁰

Danish intelligence officers were also stationed as observers within ECMM by their military intelligence service.³⁴¹ The German current affairs programme Monitor revealed in September 1996 that Bundesnachrichtendienst staff were also active in the ECMM. An official of this service worked in the ECMM under the pseudonym 'Ebenberg'. He was allegedly involved in at least two cases of illegal arms supplies. Bonn admitted that an official was active within the ECMM, but he was said to be not involved in intelligence activities.³⁴² The ECMM, in other words, was used by a large number of intelligence services to station staff and so to gather intelligence in Yugoslavia.

Of course, Western intelligence services also placed staff within UNPROFOR and among the UNMOs, the UN military observers. Both these groups reported in the first instance mainly to the UN, but also to their own national governments. A former Chief of the UNMOs confirmed that his staff did hold various intelligence officials. These came mainly from France, Great Britain, Russia and the US. For example, his deputy came from the Russian Speznatz. A company in Texas 'delivered' the American UNMOs but this company was affiliated with the CIA. The British UNMOs came often from the SAS.³⁴³ During nearly all UN operations in other countries it happened that staff of intelligence and security services worked in UN organizations. For instance, the UNSCOM mission in Iraq had a large number of CIA workers.³⁴⁴ There was no great need for this during the war in Bosnia for the European intelligence services, because they happened to be 'in command' within UNPROFOR. Hence, it was mainly American services used UNPROFOR for intelligence gathering. After all, there were no American ground forces involved in the war, so their information position was therefore not always good.

The same was true for Eastern Bosnia. It was often suggested in publications and interviews that a certain Civil Affairs official of the UN in Tuzla worked for the CIA. For instance, a former ABiH general said about this official that the American services shared no intelligence with the ABiH, but that this person did occasionally pass on intelligence. According to this general, this official was a CIA representative. He sometimes went, according to the ABiH general, under the cover of Civil Affairs to Srebrenica and shared much information with the ABiH 2nd Corps headquarters in Tuzla.³⁴⁵ A Bosnian military intelligence service official confirmed that he knew various CIA workers and identified several of them. He received no intelligence from these persons, but did provide them with information, with the permission of the 2nd Corps.³⁴⁶ It was impossible to establish whether this official indeed worked for the CIA. Repeated requests for an interview were declined.

The position of Civil Affairs was often used as a cover for intelligence operations by American intelligence services (CIA or DIA). For example, an American captain in Lucavac worked for Sector North East, and he constantly interrogated Dutch UNPROFOR personnel about routes, convoys, and what they had encountered. If an incident had taken place, he asked about everything that had happened and how well the VRS was armed. This American captain frequently travelled throughout Bosnia. He suddenly disappeared after the attack of the 5th Corps in Bihac; he was picked up by an American colonel and never returned.³⁴⁷

Another UNPROFOR official in Tuzla was also said to have worked for the American intelligence community, in particular for the US Special Forces. He was first spotted in 1994 in Sarajevo at the headquarters of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command. He had an UNPROFOR identity card and told exciting stories about his ten-year stay in Vietnam. His credibility was soon brought into doubt, however, because he wore Airborne stripes on the wrong side of his uniform, and was therefore requested by General Rose's staff to leave the headquarters in Sarajevo.³⁴⁸

In 1995 the same official emerged in Tuzla, where he was working for UNPROFOR as head of the section for civil-military relations (in military terms: the G-5). In Tuzla, the US official made no secret of his Special Forces background.³⁴⁹ According to an UNPROFOR official, the American services always worked through this section.³⁵⁰ The same official was probably involved in secret arms supplies to the ABiH in Tuzla, and was also the one who maintained the contacts with the staff of a firm that had warm relations with the American intelligence world, Military Professional Resources Incorporated (MPRI), whose staff were sometimes spotted in Tuzla. The Norwegian commander of Sector North East (SNE) described him in an interview with the BBC as ‘a pain in the ass’. After a number of warnings about his behaviour, he was finally again requested to leave the organization; he had been caught on the spot trying to break into the SNE intelligence cell. In 1996 he was back in Sarajevo again, where, this time in plain clothes, he worked for MPRI.³⁵¹

General Rose himself also reported possible CIA staff. He had dealings with a ‘strange shadowy figure straight out of a Graham Greene novel’. This turned out to be an American marine, who ran a water project for Sarajevo for the International Rescue Committee. Rose assumed that he worked for the CIA.³⁵² The Chief of Staff under General Rose, the Dutch General A. van Baal, also suspected that in 1994 many American intelligence officers were operating in Sarajevo, where he stayed between 24 February and 1 September. He had seen many examples of this, because the American embassy was situated next to the residence of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command: ‘We suddenly saw a host of Americans appear, including the former SACEUR Galvin’. According to Van Baal, Galvin had apparently been hired in to provide military advice.³⁵³ The interpreter of General Rose and General Smith, Milos Stankovic, refuted this. According to him, Galvin was in Bosnia on a reconnaissance mission at Clinton’s behest.³⁵⁴ Also an US intelligence official vehemently disputed this claim by Van Baal: ‘This is paranoid to the point of being comical!’³⁵⁵

As for the other Americans, Van Baal’s British intelligence contacts said that they were CIA. Some were in plain clothes, others in uniform. Van Baal also had an American on his staff who officially worked as a liaison officer for humanitarian operations such as food drops, but who in fact only kept an eye on what UNPROFOR was doing and passed it on to his counterparts. There were also CIA employees who attempted to get onto Van Baal’s staff, but he managed to keep them out. Van Baal also found it highly significant that the Sarajevo airlift was almost exclusively maintained by American aircraft and was therefore largely under American control (also on the ground). Regarding espionage at Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo, Van Baal commented that on his arrival he found books in which all the positions of the warring parties, orders of battle, and so on were recorded: ‘The UN was transparent. I do not know who had seen this data.’³⁵⁶

The French military intelligence service also made use of French officers who were working undercover in UNPROFOR in Zagreb and Sarajevo, but who also reported directly to the DRM.³⁵⁷ According to a senior UNMO official, the infiltration of intelligence organizations was ‘normal’ in relief organizations such as UNHCR, UNICEF, the International Red Cross and NGOs. He gave as an example the American official who was the head of UNICEF in Sarajevo; he later discovered that he was a captain in the DIA. French NGOs were also said to have been used for arms smuggling.³⁵⁸

One UNMO official expressed his suspicion that UNHCR in particular was probably infiltrated by some services,³⁵⁹ which was not surprising, because this organization was responsible for the relief throughout Bosnia and took care of the supply by road of the eastern enclaves. American Special

Forces were said to have received permission to use UNHCR jeeps with special number plates for their operations.³⁶⁰ According to an internal investigation by UNHCR in May 1993, the Bosnian Muslims also repeatedly smuggled ammunition in aid convoys. For instance, 30,000 American camouflage uniforms were said to have been transported by the UNHCR to the ABiH 2nd Corps.³⁶¹ A load of weapons and ammunition was also discovered in an aid convoy of the Caritas organization on the way to Busovaca in March 1993. Whether this was a deliberate Bosnian-Serb attempt to discredit UNPROFOR, or a similar attempt by the Bosnian Croats, remained unclear.³⁶² The VRS was later to discover DM 30,000 in an NGO convoy bound for Gorazde.³⁶³

According to an UNMO official, from an intelligence point of view, 'the most interesting' organizations were the NGOs. Personnel of NGOs were therefore often recruited by intelligence services, because a variety of relief organizations were able to travel to provide humanitarian aid in areas that were closed to the outside world. Meanwhile, the ABiH also drove around in trucks marked with NGO stickers, and which proclaimed 'scottish European Aid', 'UNHCR', or 'European Aid'.³⁶⁴ An American intelligence service even recruited agents in one of the NGOs that worked in Srebrenica.³⁶⁵ It also became evident during the fall of Srebrenica that NGOs and a variety of other relief organizations supplied reliable intelligence. Officials from the American intelligence community declared at the time that 'their best information came from human rights groups, the United Nations and the press, not from spies, satellites or eavesdropping'.³⁶⁶

In other words, many intelligence services in particular were represented in UNPROFOR in various cities and areas in Bosnia. However, the above also reveals that the American services were not the only ones that were active. Other services likewise had sources and agents locally, and this was also true of intelligence services from countries like Russia, Turkey, Greece and Iran. The functions of these national elements were often unrelated to any support to an UN agenda. These nationalities worked to support their own agenda's, and some of those interests overlapped with on-going Western efforts. However, where it made good sense to do so, some cooperation with these services was permitted on a case-by-case basis. Whether this was also true of the Dutch intelligence community will be discussed in the next chapter. After all, it is relevant to know whether the Dutch intelligence and security services were also active in this grand intelligence 'theme park'. How well prepared was the Netherlands in the area of Humint, Sigint and Osint? Did it have sufficient technical, personnel and financial resources to 'tackle' the crisis in Bosnia and to provide Dutchbat with sufficient intelligence support?

5. Conclusions

The UN was extremely wary of active and focused gathering of intelligence, and UNPROFOR itself as an organization had no well-organized structure for gathering intelligence. This meant almost automatically that not only the United States, but also the countries that contributed troops to this peacekeeping operation, started to gather intelligence independently. This was carried out not only by the intelligence services from the different national capitals, but also in the region itself. By harnessing all possible resources and deploying more people, the services tried to gain a view of the political, economic and military developments in the region. As described above, there were initially a variety of teething troubles, which were psychological, political, structural and technical in nature.

For instance, the general mental attitude in the area of intelligence was still too much oriented towards the old East-West way of thinking. Many analysts found it hard to abandon this habitual pattern. There was still too much thinking, reasoning and analysis in the context of the Cold War and the transition took place only with difficulty. Furthermore, the intelligence services were now confronted with a different sort of conflict, a low intensity conflict, which was new to them. Many services found this difficult to cope with, because there was often no well-defined concept that made clear who exactly the enemy was.

The operations of different paramilitary organizations increased this confusion further. Alliances of warring factions could shift within 24 hours, and allies in a given region or town could suddenly turn out to be enemies in a different district or town. After all, a conflict with ethnic and religious backgrounds is quite a different matter to a few Soviet tank divisions on the North German plains.

The Western intelligence community had sufficient resources to gather timely warnings about preparations for war. But, as the British author Rathmell put it so aptly: 'These warning systems are not appropriate for warning of threats such as ethnic conflicts. Such threats require more holistic assessment but defence intelligence agencies do not yet appear to have adapted their approaches.'³⁶⁷

As far as political problems were concerned, this chapter has argued that intelligence services often had a different view of the conflict in Bosnia from policymakers. In some Western intelligence and security services the thinking was not in terms of 'good guys, bad guys', and usually a more balanced view could be detected than that adhered to by the politicians. Former CIA director James Woolsey confirmed that the CIA was balanced compared both with those who said there were no Muslims atrocities and those who said the Bosnian Muslims killed as many as the Serbs. Both views were wrong. The same issue was also raised in the many confidential interviews and in the comprehensive analysis of the Canadian intelligence community that has been quoted extensively above.

However, as the conflict progressed, and the press, public opinion and the politicians increasingly took the side of the Bosnians, some intelligence services 'turned'. This was especially true of the Americans. The phenomenon of the politicization of intelligence emphatically raised its head.³⁶⁸ Studies were sometimes written to please the most senior policymakers, as opposed to providing them with intelligence. This had already been the case during the Cold War, and it was sometimes no different in Bosnia. Unwelcome issues with respect to the activities of the Bosnian Muslims and Croats were only reported to a limited extent, if at all. Political correctness also crept into the analyses, which was evident from the fact that the deeds of the Bosnian Serbs came fully into the spotlight while the misdeeds of the Muslims and Croats were given hardly any attention.

As an example, there is the trouble that the spokesman of the State Department had in recognizing that the Bosnian Muslims had concentration camps. According to him, they were merely detention centres.³⁶⁹ Furthermore, the reporting of the armed conflict between the different factions was not always uniformly 'policy neutral'. Cause and effect, as well as action and response, were often presented out of sequence, either by policymakers, or the press. In this respect, the political policymakers were often supported by a press which expressed very little criticism and which, with respect to television reporting, was mainly dependent on the large television networks.

The views of some Western services increasingly diverged and no longer corresponded with each other. This had the consequence that transatlantic collaboration in the area of intelligence liaison also started to suffer. As outlined comprehensively above, intelligence liaison was already a delicate subject. The exchange of intelligence is not automatic, as is sometimes assumed. It usually happens on the basis of bilateral agreements and according to the quid pro quo principle. If a service has nothing to exchange, then generally speaking it cannot expect to be provided with much in return by a friendly service.

Neither was the international exchange encouraged by the turnaround within the American services, such as the DIA and CIA. Especially after Woolsey's departure as CIA director, intelligence started to serve as support to the policy of the Clinton administration, which was largely pro-Bosnian. This meant that parts of the American intelligence community were brought into conflict with friendly Western services. The British military intelligence service in particular suffered: the British did not share the American views, and the Americans slowly shut down the flow of intelligence. In particular the flow to General Rose in Sarajevo seems to have been cut off. This apparently did happen in Zagreb. This would only be restored again after some considerable time.

It seemed as if only the Bundesnachrichtendienst could count on a continuation of the cordial collaboration, but this was because officials there shared a very pro-Croat and pro-Bosnian attitude with many people at the CIA. The interests of the American and German intelligence services ran in parallel in this respect, which was obviously to the great benefit of the mutual collaboration and exchange of intelligence.³⁷⁰ This chapter has made clear that the extent to which services recognize a perceived shared risk (in this case Serbia), apparently influences intelligence liaison.

Different political views on the origin of and solution to the conflict had an impact on the international intelligence liaison about the war in Bosnia between the other Western services. This meant an additional impetus for European and Canadian intelligence services to become active themselves in the region. Although Ottawa was able to rely heavily on the American services, the specific acquisition of reliable intelligence within the framework of force protection of their own units remained central to Canadian thinking. After all, a reliable intelligence contribution was not to be expected from the UN.³⁷¹ This led to the undesirable situation that various services sought special intelligence that was primarily of potential interest to their own national units in Bosnia. For example, the British in 1995 concentrated heavily on Gorazde, the Canadians on Sarajevo and Visoko and the Scandinavians on Tuzla, with the serious consequence that the eastern enclaves were left to their own devices concerning the gathering of intelligence. In any case the areas did not enjoy the highest priority, as will be demonstrated later in this study.³⁷²

In various European capitals various special task forces were set up in great haste to regulate and coordinate the intake of the intelligence gathered, and to provide the policymakers with reliable intelligence. However, the gathering did not proceed smoothly and only after solving various teething troubles did the services get reasonably 'up-to-speed'. There were technical problems, ranging from a lack of good maps to not having enough Serbo-Croat interpreters and translators. The lack of translators was a particularly great problem on both sides of the Atlantic, which considerably limited the opportunities for an optimum use of Osint and Sigint at the start of the war. It was also impossible to arrange the recruitment of reliable sources and agents and to build up an extensive and reliable Humint network within 24 hours. It took intelligence services months if not years to obtain good Humint sources. Ultimately, most European services appear to have succeeded reasonably well in recruiting informants at the highest level of the political and military leadership in Bosnia and Croatia. They appear to have been less successful where the Bosnian Serbs and the Serbs were concerned, although it has been suggested in retrospect that American and British military and civil intelligence services eventually recruited informants and sources close to Mladic and Karadzic.³⁷³

It is also relevant that the overall Western intelligence climate in the years after the fall of the Berlin Wall had chilled somewhat, because Western services increasingly started to spy on each other. The conflict in Bosnia aggravated the animosity between Europe and the United States even further.³⁷⁴

Most of the CIA officials interviewed stated, for example, that in Sarajevo they were not allowed to share intelligence with the French. The same was true in reverse: the French services in Sarajevo often exchanged no information with their NATO allies, which could well appear extremely illogical to an outsider in the light of a joint peacekeeping operation. This observation would appear to be justified considering that Scandinavian peacekeepers died for the French had not told them where snipers were located, though they did have this information. Established and habitual patterns apparently do not change in leaps and bounds. The extent to which services recognize shared risks apparently influence liaison. On the other hand, intelligence officials remarked to the author that the allegations about the French were not true as a categorical statement. Information was exchanged with the French in Zagreb and other capitals, by many different parties. The French exchanged with their German and Canadian counterparts. Also US and other officials of different nationalities exchanged a great deal of information with the French at a variety of levels.³⁷⁵

The unwillingness to share intelligence was boosted further because UNPROFOR's political and military course during the entire war in Bosnia was a thorn in the side of the US political policymakers, while senior military circles and the intelligence community in the United States actually had a more balanced view of the conflict.³⁷⁶ These political differences resulted in American but also other Western services sending agents to try to infiltrate the most important staffs of UNPROFOR and the humanitarian relief organizations, a strategy, which in some cases proved successful. Furthermore, American services tried to monitor as much of the UNPROFOR communication traffic as possible.³⁷⁷ Sometimes a variety of operations were executed against UNPROFOR and against the policy that UNPROFOR favoured on behalf of the UN. This repeatedly led to great tensions and conflicts. The conflict in the area of intelligence was therefore sometimes no longer directed against the jointly perceived enemy (Bosnian Serbs and Serbs): there was sometimes also a 'conflict' between Western services themselves.

Now, the reader may get a bit confused here at the end because the stage the author of this study set is that on the one hand, the cold-war mentality has the western intelligence architecture crippled and unable to respond to the crisis in the Balkans, and on the other hand, a scenario of the Balkans 'swarming with spies'. The correct answer is probably that both were partly true. While capabilities were building, they were not what they would eventually come to be. It was in this sombre constellation of a lack of preparation for the conflict in Yugoslavia, mutual animosity between Western services, little willingness for international intelligence liaison, various different political points of view on the origin and progress of the military conflict, and a different perception of who were the good guys and who were the bad guys in the conflict, that Dutchbat departed for Bosnia at the beginning of 1994. At that time various intelligence officers were already present there playing all kinds of roles in different organizations.

Dutch intelligence and security services and the war in Bosnia

Question to General Couzy: What was your general view of the role that the Dutch intelligence community could play in the deployment and later stationing of Dutch troops in Bosnia?

Answer by General Couzy: *What I actually thought was: zero. Yes!*³⁷⁸

1. Introduction

Western intelligence and security services encountered many problems when the war in the Balkans broke out. There were many teething troubles of a psychological, structural, technical and political nature. All the services sought mainly independently for solutions in order to cope with these problems, and attempted to build up a system as quickly as possible that would be able to supply the various national capitals with rapid and reliable intelligence. Various considerations and circumstances were involved. For example, the American intelligence community had no need to take into account the interests of American troops on the ground in Bosnia: only those of the US Air Force and the US Navy. The main function of intelligence in Washington DC appeared to be a source of information for the political and military policymakers. The priorities at first sight appeared to be different in The Hague, London, Paris, Ottawa, Oslo, Stockholm and Copenhagen. However, this was not the case. The priorities for the US intelligence community were very similar, but involved no ground forces. Force protection from surface-to-air assets extended beyond the coastal area, and served to support airlift efforts and enforcement of the No-Fly Zone deep inside the country. The dimension of the problem was different, but the function was fundamentally the same, and completely natural for any nation: to protect the military assets inserted into harm's way. As well as the function described above, intelligence in those capitals served mainly for the protection of the countries' own ground forces, air force and navy. The question that is now in the spotlight is how the gathering and dissemination of intelligence was organized in the Netherlands.

This chapter examines the Netherlands intelligence and security services in greater detail. The political willingness to send troops to Bosnia, both in Parliament and in the government, was greater after pictures had been shown on television of the camps in northwest Bosnia. In the debates on the deployment there was nonetheless a lack of clear statements on intelligence support for the deployed troops. Neither could anything be read on the subject in the parliamentary motions that were adopted.³⁷⁹ It can be deduced from this that parliamentarians and the government had no interest in the relationship between peacekeeping and intelligence. The question arises as to whether this political interest in intelligence was indeed zero, especially on a ministerial and parliamentary level, and if so what the underlying reason was. One possibility is that the services failed to press their demands on the politicians sufficiently firmly; another is that they did not present themselves effectively enough.

Even if the interest had been stronger, the question remains as to whether the services were well enough prepared for Dutch participation in the Bosnia mission. The question arises as to what was the information position of the foreign intelligence service (Inlichtingendienst Buitenland, IDB), the national security service (Binnenlandse Veiligheidsdienst, BVD) and the military intelligence service (Militaire Inlichtingendienst, MID, hereafter MIS). The IDB hardly played any role in the conflict in Bosnia; this service was actually disbanded in January 1994. Section 2 discusses how the IDB was occupied with the Balkans nonetheless.

Section 3 covers the role and information position of the BVD, which was involved in the conflict because the stationing of soldiers in Bosnia could have consequences for the Netherlands national security and the democratic rule of law. From the Netherlands, the secret services of the warring factions might carry out operations, attempt to raise funds, or send weapons and ammunition to the region. Section 4 comprehensively considers the MIS, whose most important task was in distributing intelligence to the army leaders and the most senior politicians and officials of the Ministry of Defence on the dispatch and deployment of Dutchbat in Bosnia. The question arises as to what the MIS did in the way of Force Protection and whether any intelligence was supplied that was of benefit to Dutchbat.

A comment that immediately can be made on the role of the MIS is that small and medium-sized states that participated in peacekeeping operations, such as the Netherlands, often do not have the capacity to gather accurate and timely intelligence on each part of the world where troops are sent in a UN context. These countries are therefore completely dependent on what other intelligence services are prepared to exchange with them via liaison. But it should be said that this is not a natural fact, but often, as will be shown, the result of policy decisions hinged on funding, capability and political will.

Section 5 discusses the intelligence gathering in the enclave under Dutchbats I, II and III. Section 6 considers the collaboration between the MIS of the Central Organization (MIS/CO) and the Army's MIS (hereafter MIS/Army), which did not always appear to be particularly good in practice. Another MIS department that was responsible for gathering intelligence on Bosnia was the Royal Netherlands Air Force. Section 7 pays attention to the production of the Air Force section of the MIS (hereafter MIS/Air Force). Section 8 then considers the support the MIS received from UNPROFOR. The question remains as to what the MIS supplied in the way of intelligence to senior Ministry of Defence officials. This will be discussed in Section 9. Section 10 considers the role of the MIS in relationship to military security. Finally, Section 11 presents the conclusions.

The Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services

When the war in the Balkans broke out, the Netherlands had a clear intelligence structure, with the three services mentioned above. All three were engaged in following the war in Bosnia. The three services were controlled by the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV), which was formally responsible for the general policy on intelligence and security and the coordination of these services. This Ministerial Committee consisted of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Justice, the Interior, Defence, Finance, and Economic Affairs, as well as the chairman of the Committee on the United Intelligence Services in the Netherlands (CVIN), the heads of the three intelligence and security services and a senior official from each of the ministries mentioned. The Ministerial Committee is chaired by the prime minister and is convened when ministerial level decision-making is desirable on intelligence and security issues. The decisions of the Ministerial Committee are subsequently always discussed in the next session of the Ministerial Council.³⁸⁰

The Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV) met five times between 1991 and 1995. The meetings in 1992-1995 were concerned mainly with winding up the IDB. It was decided in 1991 to slim down the IDB, and the consequences of the developments in Central and Eastern Europe for the work of the services were discussed.

In 1992, the agenda included updating the BVD's tasks in Central and Western Europe. The take-over of the activities of the IDB by the BVD and MIS received particular attention, as did the ³⁸⁰ W.J. Kuijken, 'De coördinatie van de Nederlandse inlichtingen- en veiligheidsdiensten in verleden, heden en toekomst' ('The coordination of the Dutch intelligence and security services in the past, present and future'), in: Militaire Spectator, Vol. 170 (2001) 11, pp. 562-563.

reorganization of the MIS. In 1993, the most important item on the agenda was the change in the Intelligence and Security Services Act. Moreover, in handing over the IDB's tasks to the MIS and the BVD, the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services determined in 1993 that the MIS and the BVD could make use only of 'passive' human sources, such as Displaced Persons from the region who resided in the Netherlands. Only if necessitated by national interests could 'offensive' use be made of human sources.³⁸¹ In other words, restraints were hereby imposed on actively recruiting and working with agents in other countries. There was no session of the MICIV in 1994, but there were two sessions in 1995. The agenda included matters concerning cryptography, the stationing of BVD liaison officers in other countries, and a reinforcement of the controlling and monitoring function of the MICIV. It was therefore impossible to find anything in the agendas of the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services that was related to the former Yugoslavia.³⁸²

The Committee on the United Intelligence Services in the Netherlands (CVIN)

This committee (CVIN) is the official portal to the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV), and it coordinates the execution of the services' activities. The committee consists of the Coordinator of the Intelligence and Security Services (since 1991 the Secretary-General of the Ministry of General Affairs) and his adviser, the heads of the IDB (until 1994), the BVD and the MIS, and representatives from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Justice. Meetings are sometimes convened in a form known as 'CVIN-Plus', in which the constitution is extended to include the secretaries-general of the ministries that participate in the MICIV.

Until 1991, the coordinator was a full-time official who was drawn from defence circles. With effect from 31 December 1990, Major General F.H. Alkemade (ret'd.) resigned as Coordinator of the Intelligence and Security Services. It was then decided not to appoint another full-time coordinator, but to incorporate this function in the portfolio of the Secretary-General of the Ministry of General Affairs, who at the time was R.J. Hoekstra. Immediately after his appointment as coordinator, he announced that he wished to restrict the dispatch of the MIS reporting to the committee's monthly contribution, reports on the Antilles, and otherwise only those reports that were of interest to the prime minister, at the discretion of the head of the MIS. Hoekstra also requested that a stop be put to the dispatch of the so-called Green Edition, which comprised intercepted message traffic.³⁸³

The CVIN met fifteen times in 1991. The agenda included subjects such as the consequences for the security of the Netherlands arising from the Gulf Crisis, developments in Central and Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia, the threat of terrorism and Chinese intelligence activities. The committee met ten times in both 1992 and 1993. Then too, the impact of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia was on the agenda. The Committee met eight times in 1994 and twelve times in 1995. Yugoslavia was on the agenda on various occasions.³⁸⁴ For instance, the unanimous assessment in the committee meeting of 17 February 1994 was that, in view of the involvement in the conflict in Yugoslavia, sufficient national interest existed to require a more active deployment of human sources. This meant intensifying the interviewing in the Netherlands and abroad of Displaced Persons, soldiers and other Dutch citizens who were or had been present in the conflict region.³⁸⁵

The CVIN-Plus also met on several occasions between 1992 and 1995. We will return to the contributions the IDB, the BVD and the MIS made to this committee below. It must be concluded, however, that the top of the Netherlands intelligence pyramid hardly discussed the developments in Bosnia. This raises the question of the extent to which this was also true in the various services that supplied the information concerned.

2. The Netherlands Foreign Intelligence Service

In its initial form, the Netherlands foreign intelligence service was founded in 1946 as the Buitenlandse Inlichtingendienst (BID) and, by Royal Decree, was replaced by the Inlichtingendienst Buitenland (IDB) on 5 August 1972. Significant information on the history, terms of reference and working method of the IDB only became available in 1998.³⁸⁶ The most important task of the IDB was the gathering of information on foreign countries that was of potential interest to the government.

The IDB was disbanded in 1994 after an often turbulent existence. In this period, the service suffered from a number of recurring problems for which no solutions were found. For instance, it proved difficult to find a balance between gathering and processing intelligence. The distribution of 'raw' intelligence, without analysis, hindered the acceptance within the government departments of the intelligence gathered. The ministries were at a complete loss to know how to deal with unprocessed data from agents and informants. When the messages were processed, it often led to bureaucratic arguments and competence disputes, especially between the IDB and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which saw this information as a threat to its own diplomatic reporting.

The IDB was poorly informed of the needs of its users. Even when in 1982, after many years a National Intelligence Requirements Plan (Nationaal Inlichtingen Behoeften Plan) was finally formulated, the document was so comprehensive and demanding that even an intelligence service of a major power would have had trouble satisfying the wishes it expressed, let alone the IDB, which had always been kept small.

The budget that was available for the service, approximately 4.8 million Dutch guilders, indeed only permitted a limited ambition. For example, there were insufficient resources for establishing pseudo-companies or to 'build up' agents over many successive years, so that they could operate at ever higher levels. It was repeatedly decided not to incorporate the IDB within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, because the leaders of this department did not want to burn their fingers on any incidents that might have arisen from secret operations. Therefore, for reasons of principle, the service was 'suspended' within the prime minister's department, the Ministry of General Affairs.

Between 1970 and 1972, by way of experiment, the service was brought under the Ministry of Defence, but this was not a success. Although one may perhaps expect otherwise of an elite department such as that of the prime minister, the political and civil service control of the IDB by senior Ministry of General Affairs officials left much to be desired. The IDB did not know what the government actually expected from it. Direct exchanges of views between the prime minister, who had political responsibility for the service, and IDB leading officials were at best 'only sporadic'.³⁸⁷

Of course, it would be doing the IDB an injustice to refer only to its failures. It must be stated that to the extent that the service succeeded, this was largely determined by external factors, such as the Sigint (intercepted message traffic) that was supplied by the MIS. The IDB analysts were able to use this information to produce reports that were rated relatively highly by their users. For instance, in 1973 the IDB was able to give the government a timely warning of the planned oil embargo by the Arab world. The IDB's performance was moreover favourably influenced by the reports of a limited number of friendly foreign services. Although different ideas existed within the service about the material supplied and the assessments of reports by the American CIA, the British SIS and the German BND (Bundesnachrichtendienst) were sometimes far from favourable, the information - obtained on the basis of exchange and liaison - certainly had a positive effect on the service's performance.

³⁸⁶ De Graaff and Wiebes, Villa Maarheeze, passim.

³⁸⁷ Engelen, Inlichtingendienst Buitenland, p. 51.

A study of the history of the IDB between 1946 and 1994 shows that there were major internal problems within the service from the outset. There was an element of a sort of ‘crisis cycle’, with a commotion flaring up within the service every couple of ten years, which could lead to an explosion that often found its way into the press and - to a lesser extent - Parliament. Ultimately, the government of Prime Minister Lubbers decided in 1992 to disband the IDB, and a start was made on scaling it down. At the end of 1994 the curtain finally fell for the IDB, and the service no longer played a significant role in the conflict in Bosnia. The final reports on Yugoslavia date from the early 1990s.³⁸⁸ The disbanding of the IDB made the Dutch government completely dependent on the BVD and MIS for the provision of intelligence on developments in Yugoslavia and their possible impact on the Netherlands.

3. The National Security Service (BVD)

The National Security Service (Binnenlandse Veiligheidsdienst, BVD) was created in 1949 and falls under the responsibility of the Minister of the Interior. The BVD’s tasks are, briefly, as follows: gathering data, carrying out security investigations, and promoting security measures. At the time of the Yugoslav conflict, the BVD was not yet involved in tracking flows of money (from Yugoslavia to the Netherlands and vice versa); the financial-economic investigation unit of the BVD is only 3 years old.³⁸⁹

It was mainly the first task that was relevant to the situation in Yugoslavia. The BVD’s activities were geared towards limiting the risks for Dutch national security, democracy, economy and society. The service therefore followed the letter of the law by focusing on the gathering of data on organizations and persons that, because of their objectives or their activities, might give reason for serious suspicion that they formed a danger to the survival of the democratic rule of law, or to national security or other important interests of the state.³⁹⁰

The Staff Bureau Foreign Political Developments (SBP)

The gathering of data not only had a domestic component but also a foreign one. The analysis of foreign political developments actually took place not only at the IDB, but also at the Staff Bureau Foreign Political Developments (SBP) of the BVD. This department was founded on 3 October 1963, and its duty was to gather knowledge on political developments in the communist countries, and moreover on communist parties in non-communist countries at least to the extent that this was useful for the BVD’s performance. When it was founded, it was determined that the SBP could gather as much or as little data as it saw fit with respect to foreign countries and other parties abroad. At the time it already appeared that the ground had been prepared for a competence conflict with the IDB’s predecessor, but the authority of the SBP was mainly limited, as the official jargon put it, to warning of international phenomena and developments that could form a threat to the democratic rule of law, or the security or other important interests of the Kingdom of the Netherlands.³⁹¹ The IDB had a much wider remit, namely the gathering of intelligence in other countries for the Dutch government. The analyses of the SBP served operations that were aimed at giving BVD agents in communist organizations as much information as possible about developments or impending developments in the international communist movement, so that they could use this knowledge to penetrate the communist ranks in the Netherlands.

The existence of a department such as the SBP within a domestic security service was unique in the Western world. In the major powers, the foreign intelligence services managed to prevent the national security service from occupying this territory. In most small states, the security services were too small to fulfil such a role. In the Netherlands, however, the BVD was large enough to permit itself this luxury, and the foreign intelligence service was too weak to obstruct its creation. Due to the specific nature of the work, there was hardly any contact between the SBP and the IDB. Nevertheless, overlaps in their activities did occur. For instance, the SBP occupied itself extensively with investigating the disputes between the Soviet Union and China in the 1960s, a field in which the IDB also attempted to gather intelligence.

On 1 November 1990, it was decided to disband the SBP, although analysts continued to be involved in compiling analyses of foreign political developments that were regularly contributed to the CVIN. The disbanding took place within the framework of the complete reorganization of the BVD by the then head of the service, A. Docters van Leeuwen. Its objective was to cure the BVD of its Cold War syndrome, and to create a different working culture. Vertical departments were abandoned in favour of small teams working on finite projects, to bring an end to internal divisions and forms of specialization. The staff of the SBP were subsequently distributed as analysts around the various directorates, to be used on a project basis.

Changes to the new organization soon followed. Some projects turned out to have no real end, such as the fight against terrorism or Yugoslavian organized crime. This meant that analysts remained continuously engaged in studying overall political and economic developments in the Balkans. This was primarily carried out in Team Radar within the State Security Directorate. The leader of Team Radar rapidly came to the conclusion that a separate team would have to be created for Yugoslavia. This was to be Team Adriaan, which also incorporated the BVD's counterintelligence section on Yugoslavia, which here refers to the gathering of intelligence on the activities in the Netherlands by Yugoslav intelligence services.³⁹²

Team Adriaan

Team Adriaan started with 7 staff but expanded, especially after the arrival in The Hague of the Yugoslavia Tribunal, to approximately 20 staff. This was excluding the capacity of the Regional Intelligence Services, because in each large Regional Intelligence Service, in which the BVD and the police closely cooperated, one person was responsible for Yugoslavia. When the threat as a consequence of the arrival of the Tribunal proved to be less severe than expected, the number of staff dropped again to between 12 and 15.

Team Adriaan's responsibilities included giving security advice and gathering intelligence among Yugoslav Displaced Persons, as well as tracking the activities of Bosnian Muslims, Bosnian Serbs, Serbs and Croats in the Netherlands. The team independently debriefed refugees from these areas. The team employed several translators, who in addition to translation work were also responsible for monitoring tapped telephone traffic. The BVD had many Russian-speaking staff; because the major threat from Russia had ebbed meanwhile, they were retrained to become proficient in Serbo-Croat. In the first instance, the BVD approached the translators training school of the Military Intelligence Service, the SMID, but they were turned down because of a lack of capacity. A BVD official was even requested by the SMID to lobby the leaders of the MIS/Army for the training of more Serbo-Croat translators at the MIS. Because of the time and the trouble that this would have involved, the BVD then approached a reputable language institute, which retrained the BVD staff in 3 months. After that, there were no more language capacity problems. It was then possible to obtain much intelligence from the Yugoslav community that had long resided in the Netherlands. This source supplied the BVD with more than the intercepted message traffic of the MIS.³⁹³

³⁹² Confidential interviews (15), (16) and (17).

³⁹³ Confidential interview (15).

The collaboration of the BVD with its foreign counterparts was not excellent, but from 1993 it improved somewhat, thanks to the arrival of the Tribunal. One BVD official stated that this suddenly appeared to make the Yugoslavian conflict a concern of other countries. The associated conclusion is again that the extent to which services recognize shared risk apparently influences the sharing of intelligence.³⁹⁴ Until that time, the BVD's experience had been that its foreign counterparts had little or no intelligence on Bosnia. Only the French national security service had an effective counterintelligence system. The German security service was poorly informed, and the Americans (the CIA) asked many questions but supplied little intelligence themselves. Dutch intelligence officers state that liaison with the US services has always been difficult. Intelligence liaison was seen especially by Americans as a means of reinforcing or maintaining their position in every respect - including economically. In this respect, the Dutch services can be reproached for a degree of naivety, because the Americans had always adopted that attitude. It was simply a fact of life that the Americans seldom gave away intelligence, and when they did it was often almost exclusively to serve their own interests. They did not have a strongly developed awareness of other people's interests. The BVD subsequently complained to the CIA that matters could not continue as they were, after which the CIA became somewhat more obliging. The first American Chief of Station in Sarajevo subsequently paid a visit to the BVD. The BVD could not expect much from the British services either. The security service, MI-5, gave absolute priority to its own military apparatus and UK national security. The BVD was able to obtain most from the Eastern European services.

Team Adriaan also pursued closer collaboration with the larger regional police forces, for various networks of Yugoslav criminals were active in the Netherlands. At the time, the National Police Services (Korps Landelijke Politiediensten, KLPD) had no coordinated approach to Yugoslav organized crime. Each regional force muddled through, and departments within a regional force would often know nothing of each other's operations. A joint operation in Amsterdam, for example, did not go ahead because the leaders of the police did not recognize its usefulness.³⁹⁵

The work on Yugoslavia therefore had a domestic and a foreign component. The former was mainly concerned with monitoring the events in Yugoslavia from the Netherlands and assessing the probability of negative consequences on the Yugoslav community in the Netherlands. Particular attention was paid to possible conflicts between different factions and to the physical threat to the consultation between the various Yugoslav leaders in The Hague at the time of the Dutch EC presidency. In addition, the service paid attention to activities related to the civil war, such as press-ganging, arms purchases and the raising of funds in Yugoslav circles in the Netherlands. What is more, the fact that soldiers were located in Bosnia could also have consequences for state security and the democratic rule of law. For example, secret services of the warring factions could attempt to carry out operations or to raise funds in the Netherlands, or send arms and ammunition to the region.³⁹⁶

In 1992, the BVD concluded that the warring factions in Yugoslavia were receiving increasing support from 'larger powers in the background'. For instance, the Islamic world had positioned itself behind the persecuted Muslims in what had developed into a conflict against 'a strange association of East European conservative (ex-communist) forces'. The BVD expected terrorist activities mainly from the Serbian side. In mid 1992, the First Secretary for Consular Affairs at the Yugoslav embassy in The Hague, Radoslav Jankovic, was asked to leave. According to the BVD, he had been identified as an officer of an intelligence service of his own country. He was said to be carrying out activities that were incompatible with his diplomatic status (including manipulative relations with Dutch government officials). The BVD wanted to declare him persona non grata, but this was opposed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which was always extremely reserved in such matters. Jankovic had to leave anyway on 17 June 1992, because of the UN resolution that prescribed the freezing of diplomatic relations with

Serbia. The embassy counsellor Milorad Sredojevic suffered the same fate in September 1992 and also had to leave.³⁹⁷ The two positions remained vacant and no attempt was ever subsequently made from Belgrade to place new officials from the Yugoslav security service SDB in The Hague. After this, contacts with Serbs in the Netherlands took place only from SDB headquarters in Belgrade.³⁹⁸

In two confidential reports - Joegoslavië. Brandhaard in Europa (Yugoslavia. Hotbed in Europe) from November 1991 and Joegoslavië. Onverminderd brandhaard in Europa (Yugoslavia. Undiminished hotbed in Europe) from September 1992 - the BVD again presented in a comprehensive analyses all the problems that were connected with the war in the Balkans and the possible impact of Yugoslavia's civil war on the Yugoslav community. The first 'Hotbed' report was an exploratory action by Team Adriaan. According to an official closely involved, obtaining approval was a struggle because the report actually contained too many hypotheses and assumptions.

With respect to what was known as the horizontal threat (within the Yugoslav community), and the vertical threat (to Dutch subjects and institutions), the service's outlook in 1992 was more sombre than it had been one year earlier. Both in 1991 and 1992, attention was paid to the recruitment of Dutch mercenaries for the conflict in Croatia. Finally, in both years, the BVD devoted approximately 20 pages to the general political, military and economic situation in Yugoslavia, even though this was actually a task for the IDB, which was then still functioning.³⁹⁹

An example of such IDB-like BVD reporting was sent to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in July 1992. The political and military developments were analysed in an interim report on Yugoslavia. In military terms, the BVD analyst was sombre about the attempts to control the conflict; perhaps it would still be possible to achieve something with economic sanctions. From a political point of view, according to the analyst, it was necessary to settle the minorities issue, because otherwise a sustainable peace could not be achieved. Support from the Netherlands for the opposition leader Vuk Draskovic appeared to be advisable, but the disadvantage of this was that the BVD had reason to believe that a Yugoslav criminal organization in the Netherlands was providing Draskovic with financial support, a fact of which the politician himself might not necessarily be aware. However, it did give food for thought as regards the people in his entourage.⁴⁰⁰ In this period, the BVD also made overtures to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in order to arrive at joint analyses. Representatives of the Directorate-General of Political Affairs did once consult with the BVD management team, but after that nothing more was heard from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.⁴⁰¹

Yugoslavia continued to attract the BVD's attention in 1993. The more the conflict intensified, the more the service shifted its interest to the activities of the warring factions inside the Netherlands. On 21 April 1993, the service organized a 'separatism Conference' at ministerial level, at which there was a comprehensive discussion of the activities of the organizations from ex-Yugoslavia, and of Yugoslav political crime. The recommendations that emerged from this conference extended to a tighter control on the flow of Displaced Persons from the former Yugoslavia, and registration of Displaced Persons according to ethnic origin, so as to facilitate separate relief and accommodation. Furthermore, the Displaced Persons were to be informed as clearly as possible about their rights and obligations. Finally, the collaboration between government bodies had to be intensified.⁴⁰²

The BVD also investigated the extent to which politically related crime among ex-Yugoslavs was geared towards supporting the war effort of states and paramilitary groups in the Balkans, such as the Arkan Tigers and the White Eagles. For the first time, it was also published in an annual report that the Bosnian Muslims too were the subject of the BVD's attention. The SDA, President Izetbegovic's ruling party in Bosnia, was active in the Netherlands in the Merhamet foundation, which was part of an international Muslim humanitarian aid organization. However, items were repeatedly found among their relief goods for Bosnia that could be described as non-humanitarian, such as military uniforms hidden under a consignment of flour. Nonetheless, nothing could be done about this, because, according to the Militias Act, a green military camouflage suit was only a uniform if it bore military emblems, which was not the case.⁴⁰³

Merhamet in the Netherlands also maintained relations with the Turkish organization Milli Gorus, which sometimes collected money for the Bosnian Muslims. This relationship cooled, however, when the Turks discovered that much of the money collected was being skimmed off by the Bosnians. The activities of the Bosnian civil intelligence service (AID) were also monitored, mainly because representatives of different movements existed within the Bosnian delegation in The Hague. Finally, the BVD followed the activities of the Macedonians and Kosovo Albanians. Activities by the Yugoslav SDB were no longer observed in 1993.⁴⁰⁴

As well as the possible influence of the developments in Yugoslavia on the Netherlands, the political events in Yugoslavia itself were also the subject of investigation. In a contribution to the CVIN-Plus on 11 May 1993, the BVD produced an evaluation of the events. In a comprehensive survey, a summary was given of the ethnic distribution of the Yugoslavs in the Netherlands, the situation in Yugoslavia, geostrategic consequences, the threat of war and the position of Zeljko Raznjatovic, the leader of Arkan Tigers. At the time, there were approximately 80,000 Yugoslavs in the Netherlands, mostly Bosnian Muslims, followed by Bosnian Croats, Bosnian Serbs, Kosovars and a small number from other groups. The BVD established that until then there had been no question of the application of (interethnic) force on a large scale, but that it was becoming more probable.

The service expected that the active participation of the Netherlands in a UN intervention force would act as a catalyst. Serbia in particular had repeatedly announced that it would carry out reprisals if it was attacked. Terrorist attacks outside Yugoslavia were likewise to be expected. The BVD established that all parties were guilty of barbaric practices. The Bosnian Serbs and Serbs were especially guilty of systematic and large scale crimes. The BVD expected that if all parties were to agree to a peace plan, there was a possibility of a large scale military intervention in Yugoslavia, in which, according to the BVD, the lion's share of the troops would be contributed by the United States.⁴⁰⁵

Increasing attention was paid to the situation in the Balkans from 1993 on. This is also evident from the 1993 and 1994 BVD annual reports, in which an increasing number of pages were devoted to Yugoslavia. As mentioned earlier, an additional task was also introduced at that time: monitoring the internal and external security of the Yugoslavia Tribunal in The Hague, which was seen as a pre-eminent focal point for subversive and violent activities.

The BVD established that a Dutch citizen who had long been involved in Serbian networks, had been instructed by the Serbian secret service (SDB) to organize protest demonstrations at the Tribunal. This Dutch citizen rapidly departed to the United Kingdom, however. After this the BVD observed that, with the exception of a few incidents, there was hardly any question of a threat of violence against the Tribunal. Personal security was occasionally stepped up, such as during the Kosovo Crisis. The BVD otherwise took account not only of Serbian but also of Bosnian actions. For instance, in September 1996 in Sarajevo, Nedžad Ugljen, one of the deputy chiefs of the Bosnian civil intelligence service, was liquidated. He was the head of the department that was responsible for tracing war criminals and was one of the Tribunal's contacts in Sarajevo. Although various views existed on the background to this liquidation, it was assumed in the Western intelligence community that he was too unreliable in the opinion of some factions within Izetbegovic's government party and too inclined to cooperate with the Tribunal on tracing Bosnian war criminals.⁴⁰⁶

The service furthermore observed in 1994 that there were a number of war criminals from the former Yugoslavia among asylum seekers in the Netherlands. The investigation into this issue was started early in 1993 by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. At that time a start had yet to be made in the Netherlands on gathering information from ex-Yugoslav Displaced Persons, which could be used as evidence for a Tribunal. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs took the initiative of setting up a task force.⁴⁰⁷ The BVD collaborated closely with the Yugoslav war criminals investigation team of the National Criminal Intelligence Agency (CRI) and with the Public Prosecutor (OM) in Arnhem, who was responsible for investigating whether these alleged war criminals could be prosecuted. The Chief Public Prosecutor, A.P. Besier, constantly hesitated about resorting to prosecution, however. 'The Public Prosecutor saw little reason to do so, and that is putting it mildly', according to a BVD official. The performance of the war criminals investigation team was consequently limited.⁴⁰⁸

Secret services of the various Yugoslav republics were meanwhile becoming increasingly active on Dutch territory. The BVD had serious indications that a network of Serbian criminals had branches in Holland and it had connections with the Serbian secret service and Serbian government. There was a fear of violent actions on the part of these criminals. The BVD also observed that the Bosnian government obliged Bosnian refugees in other countries by law to pay income tax to finance the conflict. Refusal could have serious consequences for family members remaining in Bosnia. The service had not yet found any firm evidence of this, however.⁴⁰⁹

In 1995, the BVD had to admit that the developments in the former Yugoslavia had only limited consequences for the national security. The changed situation in the Balkans prompted only a muted response among ex-Yugoslavs in the Netherlands. It had not led to any form of organized political activity in the Netherlands. With respect to the horizontal threat (within the Yugoslav community) and the vertical threat (oriented against Dutch subjects and institutions) the fear had receded significantly in 1995, and with it the attention of the BVD.⁴¹⁰ The BVD continued to keep a watchful eye on monitoring and influencing activities by the Yugoslav embassy. The remarks made in 1994 regarding the criminal network with political connections were more or less retracted. While organized crime was indeed a phenomenon to be taken seriously, there were hardly any indications of continuous control from political power centres in the former Yugoslavia. The BVD was therefore not prepared to start investigations of its own into this area.

A remarkable affair that the BVD (and later also the MIS) was involved with, was that of the Serb defector Cedimir Mihailovic, who was said to have fled Serbia in October 1994 with the help of the Dutch embassy, which had given him a temporary passport on 6 October. Mihailovic had important documents on Milosevic's involvement in war crimes in Bosnia. Furthermore, he put himself forward as an intermediary for Karadzic, who - he claimed - was prepared to exchange the three eastern enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde for other Bosnian-Serb areas in Bosnia. The BVD suspected that Mihailovic was working for the Serbian secret service, SDB, and was attempting in this way to map out how the Western intelligence and security services operated, and who the discussion partners were.

The Mihailovic case gave rise to friction between the BVD and the MIS, because the MIS was not immediately given access to him when he had arrived in the Netherlands. Both services arrived at the conclusion, however, that he was probably not to be trusted. The Tribunal judge, Richard Goldstone, would later also arrive at the conclusion that the documents he had handed over were falsifications. After that, Mihailovic was said to have left the Netherlands;⁴¹¹ he sought publicity from abroad⁴¹² and ultimately received a United States visa. How reliable he was remained unclear.⁴¹³

The BVD collaborated closely on Yugoslavia with the Economic Intelligence Unit (Economische Controledienst, ECD) of the Ministry of Economic Affairs. The ECD supervised compliance with the embargo against the warring factions, and also discovered a number of irregularities. For instance, in 1994 the ECD investigated a consignment of canned baby food, in which 7.62 mm ammunition was found that was probably destined for the Bosnian Army. On another occasion, the ECD investigated part of a consignment of 200 kg of vacuum-packed tins of milk powder destined for Bosnia, where 13 of the 24 tins turned out to contain rifle ammunition. Each tin contained two boxes of 24 cartridges each. This consignment was destined for a hospital in the Muslim enclave of Bihac; the tins were from a Dutch company. The ECD investigation revealed that the ammunition was not put into the tins during the production process. Neither was it plausible that a stopover had been made somewhere in the Netherlands during the transport to Bosnia to fill the tins with ammunition. The most plausible explanation was that the tins of baby food were filled with ammunition during a stopover in Croatia. It is possible that a great deal of ammunition and explosives were smuggled to the warring factions in this simple way. The ECD did not rule out that this was part of a well-prepared operation that had already been in existence for some considerable time. Perhaps this smuggling system was an important supplier of ammunition to the Armija Bosna i Hercegovina (ABiH).⁴¹⁴ The German Bundesnachrichtendienst was probably also involved,⁴¹⁵ and in this way more than 17,000 cartridges were said to have been smuggled to the ABiH in Bihac.⁴¹⁶

The BVD collaborated with its foreign counterparts to acquire information on the role and activities of Yugoslav organized crime. In addition, the BVD had arrangements for sharing information with the Bosnian security service. This was used especially for sharing intelligence on war crimes. In the Netherlands, the BVD collaborated particularly closely with the MIS, the National Criminal Intelligence Agency (CRI), the Criminal Intelligence Service, the local police intelligence services, and the Ministry of Justice with respect to administering the Temporary Regulation for the Reception of Displaced Persons. There were also frequent contacts with the Immigration and Naturalization Service (IND), whose responsibilities included monitoring the legal residence of foreigners.

For the BVD, the IND kept an eye on which Displaced Persons could supply interesting information, which made this body the first point of contact for the BVD. The IND worked with what were known as 'profile' data concerning those whom the BVD found interesting, for example whether the Displaced Person had belonged to a certain paramilitary group or had worked for an intelligence or security service. Sometimes this approach would be productive, but in the majority of cases it failed to deliver results. In this regard, much more information came from the local police and the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, to which the refugees always reported first.⁴¹⁷

The MIS's countermove: Team Olivier

The tense situation in Yugoslavia and the increasing flow of Displaced Persons led, as mentioned, to the creation of Team Adriaan in the BVD. The MIS responded to this by setting up its own unit: Team Olivier, which included representatives of the MIS/Central Organization (part of the Counterintelligence and Military Security Bureau) and the MIS/Army (Operations Department).

Different ideas existed on the collaboration between Team Adriaan and Team Olivier. The collaboration between the BVD and the Counterintelligence Bureau of the MIS/CO proceeded satisfactorily, according to some. There was a regular meeting once a month, and once every 6 months there was a major meeting.⁴¹⁸

The complete picture surrounding the assessment of the MIS regarding this collaboration is hazy. Various MIS workers have completely different assessments of the collaboration between the BVD and the MIS. Team Adriaan (BVD) and Team Olivier (MIS) allegedly had fierce conflicts with each other on occasion, especially when it came to recruiting informants.⁴¹⁹ This recruitment took place on the basis of the screening of refugees by the IND for the BVD, which subsequently debriefed them. Team Olivier then received all the intelligence that the BVD distilled from this process. The most serious complaint of the MIS was that it was not itself allowed to interrogate Displaced Persons on specific military aspects and perceptions, so that much intelligence was lost. MIS employees asserted that the BVD put its own interests first. Refugees who might be of interest to the MIS because of their level of military knowledge were only referred by the BVD in dribs and drabs. BVD officials claim they saw little sign of this. According to them, all information of relevance to the MIS was sent to that service.⁴²⁰ The working method improved later, and in particular refugees with a military background were passed on to Team Olivier. The collaboration was complicated because of the anti-BVD attitude in some sections within the MIS, especially in the Navy and the Army sections of the MIS (MIS/Navy and MIS/Army). The MIS sections of the Air Force (MIS/Air Force) and Central Organization (MIS/CO) were said to have been on better terms with the BVD.⁴²¹

Another factor was that the BVD and the MIS did not always share the same views on the conflict in Bosnia. The BVD's political-military analyses sometimes led to differences of opinion between these services. This was not particularly remarkable, since political or military analyses from the IDB, the BVD and the MIS on certain subjects had in the past frequently given rise to mutual differences of opinion. For instance, the distribution of the BVD's interim report on the situation in the former Yugoslavia of July 1992 led to criticism from the MIS. The superficial formulations in the BVD report were a particular target. For instance, the BVD analyst stated that the conflict in Croatia regarding the Serb-occupied Croatian areas had definitely not abated. The MIS stated on the contrary that in Croatia there were hardly any Serb-occupied areas, just as there were virtually no Croat-occupied areas in Serbia. The Bosnian Serbs had been present for centuries in the areas of Croatia in which they were dominant, according to the MIS, and the BVD formulation overlooked the fact that the Croatian Serbs had good reason to fear for their safety. In other words, the BVD presentation of matters, that Serbia dominated these areas, was too simple. The comprehensive commentary concluded with the MIS's wish to arrange coordination or cooperation meetings on a more or less regular basis, which could lead to the exchange of data and improve the information position of both service's intelligence products.⁴²²

This appeal apparently did not have the intended effect. At the CVIN meeting of 19 November 1992, there was debate if there had been contact between the BVD and the MIS regarding the BVD report that had been discussed at the meeting in question. The coordinator of the committee, the Secretary-General of the Ministry of General Affairs, Hoekstra, expressed the concern that ministers would be confronted with reports that presented divergent views or that even contradicted each other. The BVD announced at this meeting through deputy head A. Kievits that the head of the MIS had correctly observed that the report was dated: it described the situation of the previous summer. Kievits also observed that this was indicated in the text. According to him, there had been good contact between the BVD and MIS analysts who were concerned with Yugoslavia since that time. Kievits emphasized that there could be no question of completely harmonized documents or coproductions given the differences between the two services as regards powers and tasks. This did not detract from the fact that collaboration and coordination were called for on the work floor but he did not have the impression that this was lacking at that time.⁴²³

The above showed yet again that the work of the BVD on Yugoslavia had both a domestic and a foreign component. Throughout the entire period, the activities of the BVD nonetheless provided no intelligence that could be of relevance to the position in which Dutchbat found itself in the enclave. Such intelligence would have to come from the MIS.

4. The Military Intelligence Service (MIS)

After 1945, the three branches of the Dutch Armed Forces each had their own separate intelligence and security services: the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army (MIS/Army), the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Air Force (MIS/Air Force) and the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Navy (MIS/Navy). They had duties in both the intelligence and security fields. The intelligence duties consisted of gathering the necessary data on the potential and the armed forces of other powers, with a view to achieving an appropriate structure and an effective deployment of the Dutch Armed Forces. Intelligence duties also involved gathering the information needed for the mobilization and concentration of the Armed Forces. The gathering of intelligence is a broad concept. It was taken to include the entire intelligence process from gathering (basic) data, evaluating, processing and documenting the data, to producing and distributing intelligence tailored to the users. Until approximately 1990, the activities of the military intelligence services focused on studying the capacities of the Warsaw Pact countries.⁴²⁴ Security duties comprised countering espionage, sabotage, terrorism and propaganda, securing data and performing investigations of a confidential nature. At the end of 1985, in discussing the Intelligence and Security Services Act, Parliament passed an amendment that urged the integration of the three military intelligence services mentioned above. When the Intelligence and Security Services Act came into force on 1 February 1988, Article 9.1 stipulated: ‘There is one Military Intelligence Service.’

Only one Military Intelligence Service?

The new law may have been couched in absolute terms but the actual situation proved stubbornly resistant to change. The integration of the MIS, which went into operation on 1 January 1987 pursuant to a promise made by the Minister of Defence to Parliament, only represented the coming together of personnel from the Intelligence and Security departments of the Defence Staff (part of the Central Organization) and from the individual Armed Forces. The ‘integrated’ MIS did not therefore amount to much more than ‘a sum of the parts’⁴²⁵ of the three former intelligence services and the Intelligence and Security Department of the Defence Staff.

For intelligence purposes, the heads of the Intelligence and Security Departments of the three Armed Forces remained hierarchically subordinate to their own Commanders-in-Chief. Each of these department heads was simultaneously Deputy Head of the MIS/CO, and were to be controlled by the new Head of the MIS. He alone was directly accountable to the Minister. In terms of organization, the Head of MIS was initially subordinate to the CDS and from the early 1990s to the Secretary-General. In rank, the Head of MIS (brigadier, commander or commodore) was always subordinate to the Commanders-in-Chief, so that, in the event of a conflict of interest, in all probability the heads of department would appeal to their respective Commanders. The command of the security activities, on the other hand, did fall completely under the Head of MIS, but the units responsible for executing security activities again continued to be organized per branch of the Armed Forces.

It was observed as late as March 1995 that the three Armed Forces had ‘not sufficiently’ subscribed to the political order of 1987 to arrive at one undivided and integrated MIS under a single commander, so that too little came of the execution. According to a final report by a reorganization commission led by the former Head of the Naval Intelligence Service, Rear Admiral S.W. van Idsinga (retd.), there was a ‘high resistance factor’ and ‘infighting (...) with all the mistrust which that entails’.⁴²⁶

For the Head of MIS, not much work appeared to remain in the first instance. His responsibilities included drawing up the Defence Intelligence and Security Requirements Report, but little would come of this in practice. It was still observed at the end of 1998 that this document was actually an extrapolation of work that was already being done. Moreover, the heads of the Air Force and Navy Intelligence and Security Departments backed out of participation in a central statement of requirements.⁴²⁷ Another duty of the Head of MIS was to produce intelligence for policy making, with special reference to crisis management. The Head of MIS was also Deputy CDS for Intelligence and Security. Together with the heads of the other intelligence and security services, he was a member of the CVIN. He took part in the twice-yearly NATO meetings of the NATO Intelligence Board and in the SHAPE Intelligence Conference.⁴²⁸

In 1987, an Intelligence Staff and a Security Staff were attached to the Head of MIS. The first was to be mainly concerned with the production of intelligence in the military-political, strategic and economic fields, while the three Armed Forces intelligence organizations would concentrate mainly in the operational, tactical and technical fields. The Security Staff was to concern itself with counterintelligence, industrial security and, in due course, security investigations. Only gradually would personnel and resources become available at the level of the Central Organization that was based on the Kalvermarkt in The Hague. An MIS Management Meeting took place almost every week chaired by the Head of MIS, and attended by the heads of MIS of the three armed forces (MIS/Army, MIS/Navy and MIS/Air Force) and the two MIS/CO staff departments: the Intelligence Staff and the Security Staff.

Discussions on the international political and military changes after the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Defence cutbacks, the takeover of the tasks of the disbanded Foreign Intelligence Service (IDB) and continuing discussion on the organization of Signals Intelligence, formed new reasons for the integration process. Ultimately it would be mid 1996 before the Intelligence and Security Services of the three Armed Forces would be brought under the single command of the Head of MIS. And only in 1997 were the various units of the Armed Forces that were active in Sigint incorporated in this one MIS. After the fall of the Berlin Wall, the disintegration of the Warsaw Pact and the collapse of the Soviet Union, the MIS’s intelligence interest shifted from the Warsaw Pact to crisis management and peace operations in which the Netherlands Armed Forces took part. This tendency had already started earlier in the Army’s Military Intelligence Service at the time of Dutch participation in the UNIFIL mission in Lebanon (1979-1985).⁴²⁹ The MIS still focused some attention on the Soviet Union’s successor, because of its large military potential combined with the political instability of the region. NATO commitments also played a role.

In addition to the defence task, the MIS also gathered intelligence with a view to the risks that soldiers could run in deployment in crisis management, peace and humanitarian operations. This was also true for assessing the risks of Dutch involvement in enforcing the flight restrictions over Bosnia. The MIS, in close consultation with the BVD, also assessed the risks to Defence personnel from criminal organizations of Serbian origin.⁴³⁰ The intelligence capacity of the part of the MIS based in The Hague, the MIS/CO, constantly lagged behind due to understaffing. In March 1995, in spite of cutbacks recommended by the Van Idsinga Commission, a strengthening of the MIS/CO analysis capacity from 28 to 42 staff was deemed necessary, whereas the same commission recommended that the number of Army intelligence positions could be reduced from 47 to 41. For the intelligence domain, the desirability of a decentralized approach was confirmed, however: in other words in the Armed Forces as opposed to the Central Organization.⁴³¹

In the 1990s, crisis management and peace operations also made their mark on the counterintelligence and security domain. This mainly involved promoting the security of Dutch soldiers. The debriefing of military personnel that had participated in peace operations was becoming increasingly important with a view to security aspects. All in all, the crisis management operations led to new intelligence requirements, which would seriously aggravate the pressure of work on the MIS, especially after the summer of 1995.⁴³²

The MIS/CO's sources

The Intelligence Staff of the MIS/CO was to make use of Open Source Intelligence (Osint), Human Intelligence (Humint) and Signals Intelligence (Sigint) for its intelligence production. The MIS has invested in the development of open sources, especially in recent years. This has meant more use of commercial data banks and Internet. It goes without saying that the service also had many national and international professional journals, weekly magazines and daily newspapers at its disposal. The MIS also exhibited the international tendency of making exhaustive use of open sources prior to resorting to more clandestine sources of information, such as human sources and Sigint. Another source of intelligence was the reports of the military attachés in other countries.⁴³³

With respect to information from human sources, there was an Operations Department within the MIS/CO that was responsible for recruiting and running informants and agents. This department was mainly created from the collaboration of the Counterintelligence (CI) departments of the 'old' military intelligence services of the Royal Netherlands Army and the Royal Netherlands Air Force. This department originally restricted itself to counterintelligence operations, but after the Foreign Intelligence Service (IDB) was disbanded on 1 January 1994, Operations started to make its own contribution to 'filling the hole' left by the IDB. A start was then made on building up Humint resources and closer collaboration with the BVD.⁴³⁴ Since mid 1996, this Operations Department has made an actual start on operations in the intelligence and counterintelligence area. The written accounts of the operational work can be found in what are known as the 'O Files' that contain data on the source, the operation files with information on the development of the operation, and finally the information files containing the intelligence provided by the source. The information reports were sent to users, such as the Intelligence Department, also at the MIS/CO.⁴³⁵

The MIS/CO also engaged in procuring Sigint. In 1995 there were three military units involved in this, one for each branch of the Armed Forces: the First Air Force Signals Group, the 898th Royal Netherlands Army Signals Battalion, and the Royal Netherlands Navy Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC). Until 1996, these three operated separately from each other, but in that year they were integrated to create one Sigint Department, which comprised two sections: the Operational Sigint Centre (OVIC) located at Eibergen (in the Dutch province of Gelderland) and the Strategic Sigint Centre (SVIC) in The Hague.

The Royal Netherlands Army's 898th Signals Battalion in Eibergen was engaged primarily in intercepting military tactical message traffic (in the HF band). The Royal Netherlands Navy's TIVC with its Granger antenna at Eemnes (Utrecht) then concentrated on international communication traffic (in the HF band), and via two satellite dishes in Zoutkamp (Groningen) on the message traffic sent via satellites. The military and political Sigint obtained in this way was primarily destined for the Intelligence Bureaus of the three branches of the Armed Forces.⁴³⁶

In addition, intelligence was obtained via (not from) NATO. The MIS had access to a few NATO databases containing intelligence summaries and specific studies contributed by the participating intelligence services of the member states. Furthermore, intelligence was supplied to the MIS by its foreign counterparts, since the MIS maintained bilateral contacts with the intelligence services, military and otherwise, of a large number (over 30) non-NATO countries.⁴³⁷ This outline of the MIS's sources, which was taken from the historian Engelen, assumes the most ideal and desirable situation. The everyday reality was often different and more complicated, however: the MIS had to make do with what the its foreign counterparts were prepared to supply.

What foreign services wanted the MIS to receive

It was firmly stressed in various interviews that a NATO member state does not automatically have access to the intelligence of the other member states. There is a persistent misunderstanding that NATO member states can automatically receive intelligence data from NATO. This misunderstanding also extends to 'politicians'.⁴³⁸ NATO has no capacity of its own for gathering intelligence. When NATO was founded in 1949, it was assumed that intelligence gathering always entailed a certain risk of being compromised. Therefore, the gathering of data had to be carried out by the member states exclusively. The member states did undertake to supply intelligence to NATO, but only those data that they wanted to make available: it was therefore a voluntary arrangement. The general picture is that in a qualitative and quantitative sense less intelligence could be obtained via NATO than via bilateral contacts. A revealing fact is that NATO's Intelligence Division appealed to the heads of the military intelligence services of the NATO member states in May 1994 to make more intelligence available to the Organization.⁴³⁹ NATO was completely dependent on intelligence made available by its member states.

In June 1995, the MIS determined that the intelligence that was obtained via NATO was inadequate for taking responsible decisions concerning crisis management operations. What is more, NATO intelligence was based on a consensus of allies, and was therefore politically coloured to some extent. With respect to countries and developments outside the treaty area, it was also the case that issuing intelligence to NATO member states could be made subordinate to national (economic) interests of the member states.⁴⁴⁰ According to a MIS memorandum from 1989, the international bilateral intelligence liaison between the Netherlands and other countries took place on the basis of agreements - reached formally or informally - for collaboration and liaison and based on common intelligence interest, according to subject and region. The extent to which, and the way in which, these bilateral collaborative contacts were maintained varied greatly, however. It depended, among other things, on the willingness of the partner to engage in de facto collaboration, the quality of the partner's information, the information that could be obtained from the partner in a quantitative and qualitative sense, the information that the partner wished to receive in exchange, and political considerations.

As far as NATO member states were concerned, bilateral exchange between the Netherlands and another NATO member state did not arise automatically out of NATO membership. It goes without saying that common interests are beneficial to the willingness to exchange. On NATO's foundation, the member states already emphasized that the Netherlands' lack of its own adequate intelligence gathering capacity would mean that the majority of the partners had no need of the Netherlands. In the other direction, this was most definitely the case, and as a result, when it came to engaging and maintaining contacts, the MIS could never determine in advance how cost-effective those contacts would be. It could only be determined over the course of a considerable period which partners were valuable and which were less valuable. In 1989, the MIS used three categories of countries, which were not restricted to NATO member states. Intelligence from countries in Category A 'cannot be missed'; information from countries in Category B was 'extremely useful' and intelligence from countries in Category C was 'desirable'. Category A included the Federal Republic of Germany, Denmark, France, the United Kingdom and the United States. Category B included Israel, Italy and Switzerland, and Category C contained Belgium, Canada, Austria and Spain. In addition, the MIS maintained contacts with foreign intelligence services from considerations of efficiency.⁴⁴¹

In theory, the situation appeared to be clear, but in practice liaison with these partners showed that the Netherlands had too little to offer. The strength of the MIS was in the analyses, but this generated a vicious circle. The MIS's foreign counterparts could only benefit from sound analyses on the basis of a good foreign intelligence source, and in view of the fact that none existed where the Netherlands were concerned, the MIS's analyses were therefore not interesting enough to the foreign intelligence services. The Netherlands had little intelligence to share with fellow services, which put the MIS in a weak intelligence position by definition. The result was that officials of another European service stated that they had occasionally seen foreign intelligence reports with the following inscription: 'Not for Dutch eyes'.⁴⁴² For a clear understanding of the significance of the MIS for the Dutch troops in Bosnia, it is important to examine how the Heads of the MIS in the period 1992-1995 view their service with hindsight, and what problems they encountered in this period.

The views of the heads of the MIS/Central Organization

Commodore P.J. Duijn was Head of the MISD from July 1990 to December 1993. Before that, from 1986 to 1990, he had been Head of the Air Force Intelligence Service. He was therefore a man with broad intelligence experience. From interviews transpired that a general problem for Duijn was that he was confronted with a CDS, General A.K. van der Vlis, who had some trouble letting go of the old Warsaw Pact mentality. On Duijn's appointment, the MIS/CO was oriented almost exclusively towards the East.

A fundamental problem that Duijn had to deal with was the question to whom he reported to as Head of MIS. At the time, he attended the generals' meeting of the Defence Staff each week, and was regularly confronted with the recurring discussion of whether the Head of MIS reported to the CDS or the Minister. His own opinion was and remained that he reported to the Minister, sometimes to the irritation of the Deputy CDS, Lieutenant General of the Marines H.G.B. van den Breemen, who considered that the Head of the MIS reported to the CDS. Duijn refused to adopt this position, and his refusal generated constant conflict.

As Head of MIS/CO, Duijn was also directly confronted with the stand-offish attitude of the senior officers of the Royal Netherlands Army to the MIS/CO's involvement in the events in Bosnia. There was no one from the MIS/CO among the first group of observers that departed for the Balkans. Senior Royal Netherlands Army officials would not allow it, because the general attitude in the Army at the time was that intelligence had no part to play in UN operations. Other European services made less of an issue of this, but in the area of intelligence, the Netherlands therefore did nothing towards the protection of its own troops.

In 1993, a senior British military officer had already publicly stated about Bosnia that 'intelligence is a vital element of any operation and the UN needs to develop a system for obtaining information without compromising its neutrality'.⁴⁴³ This recommendation was not followed up, however. One year later, a British brigadier came to the conclusion that UNPROFOR was still working with the traditional UN system of reporting events, without being actively engaged in intelligence gathering. Furthermore, rarely was anything done in the way of analysis.⁴⁴⁴ A fact which was certainly true of the Netherlands.

The more the conflict in the Balkans intensified, the more the verbal advice of the Head of the MIS to senior Defence officials was not to burn their fingers on the Balkans, to keep well away, not to intervene or send troops, and simply to allow the conflict to burn itself out. In early 1993, when the first Dutch signals troops were already in Bosnia, this recommendation was issued via the Deputy CDS and the Secretary-General to the Minister. The British and Danish military intelligence services also gave identical recommendations to their ministers. The MIS/CO persisted in this position, and the MIS/CO therefore never made an analysis of the situation in Bosnia to consider where Dutch combat troops could operate if they did actually have to go there. Duijn did express negative advice on the light arms with which Dutchbat was sent to Bosnia.

On his appointment, Duijn was confronted with a MIS/CO that had at its disposal only one Balkans analyst, who initially had to work mainly with open sources. In this phase, the Netherlands still had a military attaché in Belgrade, who proved to be an extremely useful source of information.⁴⁴⁵ However, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs wanted to freeze relations with Serbia, so that there was a threat that the attaché would have to leave, the consequence of which would be a further deterioration in the information position of the MIS/CO. At the time, the former Yugoslavia did not have a high priority in the MIS/CO. MIS staff were then also already heavily burdened with other tasks. Another factor was that MIS/CO staff themselves, like the CDS, continued to cling to the old East-West mentality, and had trouble making the shift to the new relationships in the Balkans.⁴⁴⁶

Relationships between the MIS/CO and the other three MISs

In the early 1990s, the MIS/CO was not able to get to grips with the intelligence units of the branches of the Armed Forces. The MIS of the Royal Netherlands Army (MIS/Army) was said to be relatively cooperative compared with the MIS of the Royal Netherlands Navy and the MIS of the Royal Netherlands Air Force. The last-mentioned was particularly reticent in sharing intelligence with the MISs of the other Armed Forces and the MIS/CO. This sometimes meant that intelligence would not be shared by the MIS/Army. In addition, the MISs of the Armed Forces sometimes wanted to win favour with their own Commander-in-Chief, and that led to situations in which intelligence was deliberately withheld.

The MISs of the Armed Forces were completely dependent on the Commanders-in-Chief. Another factor was that the CDS in that period did not yet wish to be a supreme commander, and as a consequence various crisis centres were created in the three branches of the Armed Forces. The Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC) supervised the whole, but that happened only when it was activated in a crisis situation. The MIS cell at the DCBC (Current Intelligence Centre, or CIC) was activated on 14 March 1994 in connection with Dutchbat's presence in Bosnia, but was poorly staffed at the time, with the exception of the one Balkans MIS/CO analyst mentioned above.

It can be considered remarkable that nothing was ever requested of the MIS/CO again by senior Ministry of Defence officials or at the instigation of the Ministerial Council within the framework of Yugoslavia. This was all the more remarkable because considerable doubts existed among senior Defence officials, on the part of CDS Van der Vlis and Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Lieutenant General H.A. Couzy, regarding sending troops to Bosnia. Negative advice on the subject from the MIS could possibly have strengthened their position, but they made no use of the services of the MIS/CO or the MIS/RLNA. In other words, the MIS was given no part to play. This was reinforced by the fact that the political decision to go to Bosnia had already been taken in the summer of 1993: the MIS had not been involved in that decision beforehand and afterwards the decision was irreversible.⁴⁴⁷

Another problem in this respect was that the Army's 898th Signals Battalion in Eibergen also assumed a Cold War mentality regarding the military communication traffic intercepted there. Furthermore, the Air Force and Army units operating there had capacity problems, and there was no Serbo-Croat language capacity in Eibergen whatsoever. One bright spot was that the Eibergen Air Force unit did have a good liaison with the German Bundesnachrichtendienst, and valuable military traffic was sometimes received via liaison. An issue in Eibergen at the time was whether the Sigint structure could continue to exist. The intelligence associated with it, Sigint, had an uncertain future in the Netherlands at the time because the Ministry of Defence was not then alert to Sigint. In Eibergen, there were three groups engaged in Sigint, one from each branch of the Armed Forces, without any coordination.

The capacity of the First Air Force Signals Group was cut back sharply, and Sigint in the Navy relied on the Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC), while the Navy's commanders were interested in more strategic political and maritime information. It was because of this situation that the political need arose in the mid 1990s to integrate the operational Sigint of the three Armed Forces units in Eibergen. Another factor was the economic cutbacks, which meant that in September 1994 the senior officers of the Royal Netherlands Army came close to closing down the unit that was engaged in Sigint in Eibergen, the 898th Signals Battalion. The Head of the Cabinet Office of the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army managed in a memo to persuade his boss, Couzy, not to go ahead with this proposal.⁴⁴⁸ It had already been indicated in Van Idsinga's report that the Navy wanted as rapidly as possible to hand over the TIVC in Amsterdam to the Strategic Sigint Centre in The Hague, because the upkeep of a separate centre for operational and strategic Sigint was a severe drain on the Navy's budget. However, at the time, the Army and the Air Force were opposed to any cofinancing of a new, yet to be established joint centre for strategic Sigint; the Commanders-in-Chief stated that they had no need for this type of intelligence.⁴⁴⁹

The Army and Air Force Sigint units were at the time still resources purely under the auspices of the Commanders-in-Chief. Almost no Sigint went to the MIS/CO, except for the Green Edition containing intercepted communications traffic. Neither was there any capacity for analysing Sigint, and there were problems with the MIS/Navy, which, in spite of all the financing problems surrounding the TIVC in Amsterdam, did not wish to hand over the raw Sigint to the MIS/CO.

In addition, the Head of MIS/Navy was not at all happy with the appointment of Duijn as the Head of the MIS, because this also made Duijn what was known as a Sigint Senior. This meant that Duijn would be the Netherlands' sole representative at the annual meeting of the nine most important Western Sigint countries instead of the Head of the TIVC, which was under the command of the Head of the MIS/Navy. The MIS/Navy would therefore find itself out of the loop, and for this reason it was fiercely opposed to transferring this task from MIS/Navy to MIS/CO.

However, because Duijn's appointment did go ahead, he went on to visit Norway, Denmark, Belgium and Hungary. As well as friction between MIS/CO and the Royal Netherlands Navy, problems also arose in relation to the Royal Netherlands Army. The senior Army officers did not want Duijn to discuss Sigint in Denmark. This was claimed by MIS/Army as an exclusive right. Duijn was, however, able to establish good contact with the Hungarian MIS regarding the sharing of Sigint.

Yugoslavia did not prove to be a subject that attracted the attention of the highest political policymakers and intelligence officers in the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV) or its portal, the Netherlands Committee on United Intelligence Services. According to the Head of MIS/CO, Duijn, the conflict in Yugoslavia was not a subject of discussion in the Committee; in his view the Committee's members were far too occupied with disbanding the IDB. There was constant discussion on which IDB tasks should be taken over by which service. The picture was the same in the Ministerial Committee: under Prime Minister Lubbers, the meetings took only approximately 20 minutes each, and there too, according to Duijn, there was no interest in Yugoslavia.⁴⁵⁰

After Duijn's departure, Commodore P. Kok was appointed Head of MIS/CO. He held this position from 1 January 1994 to 25 June 1995, in other words until shortly before the fall of Srebrenica. Prior to that, from mid 1991 to the end of 1993, he was Head of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Navy (in which position he was also Deputy Head of MIS/CO) and at the same time Head of the Intelligence and Security Department of the Navy Staff.

The new Head of MIS/CO was already confronted shortly after his appointment with a collaboration agreement that was intended to provide for 'a conflict reduction in the possible areas of tension' between MIS and BVD; Commodore Kok had not yet been involved in this process as Deputy Head of MIS. To this end, however, collaboration on the basis of equality would be necessary between the de facto still existing three MISs of the Armed Forces and, according to Kok, there was little evidence of such equanimity. According to this plan, the MIS as a whole would be dependent on the assent of the BVD as regards its actions in a number of areas. Kok proposed a new agreement as an alternative to this plan, which Docters van Leeuwen of the BVD agreed to, 'albeit grumpily'. Kok would later understand that not everyone in the BVD was happy with the new agreement as a replacement of the old plan.⁴⁵¹ Incidentally, this did not apply to various staff of his own MIS/CO, who considered the agreement to be excellent.⁴⁵²

The new Head of the MIS was left with a feeling of considerable frustration with regard to his period at MIS. He was obliged to occupy himself primarily with the task of reorganization, and had little time to focus on the military intelligence work. The parochialism, to which he himself had once actually diligently applied himself in his time at the Royal Netherlands Navy Military Intelligence Service, now turned against him at the MIS/CO. After a year in his position, he came to realize that things could not continue as they were, and he made serious attempts to integrate the three services in the MIS/CO. In his view, the MIS/CO was 'a jar of fleas all jumping in different directions'. Like his predecessor, he was also confronted with attempts to take the MIS away from the Minister and restore it to the CDS. Kok himself said that he attempted to obstruct this, but according to others he 'kept in with' the CDS, in contrast to Duijn who did business directly with the Minister.

The MIS at the time of the fall of Srebrenica

Kok confirmed that under him the MIS/CO was never consulted in decision-making on the deployment of Dutchbat to Srebrenica, as was also the case under his predecessor Duijn. Nor did the MIS/CO under Kok ever make a risk analysis of the enclave in East Bosnia. The MIS/CO, under Kok, and also under Duijn, did produce risk analyses on account of the Royal Netherlands Air Force's involvement in enforcing the no-fly zone over Bosnia. In this, the MIS/CO followed on from the MIS/Air Force in constantly examining the risks for defence personnel at Italian air bases, in connection with possible Serb terrorist and sabotage actions. The MIS/CO arrived at the proposal that the authorities should be extremely cautious in giving information on combat actions, and on the nationalities of the attacking aircraft.⁴⁵³

As the Head of the MIS/CO, Kok is also said to have urgently advised Defence Minister Voorhoeve, shortly after his appointment, to pull out of Srebrenica. Like his predecessor, the Head of the MIS was also confronted with CDS Van der Vlis, who must have been in despair about the position in which Dutchbat had ended up in Srebrenica. On his appointment, Kok therefore wanted a discussion with the Minister as soon as possible, but according to Kok the Minister was shielded by the Secretary-General, a state of affairs which Kok found extremely frustrating.⁴⁵⁴ Later, it did become possible for the Head of the MIS/CO to brief Voorhoeve on a regular basis. The Minister did have some interest in the work of the MIS, but this mainly involved the integration of the services and not the military information that the MIS had to offer. The problem for Kok was that he was given no political guidance by Voorhoeve, and had to write his own statement of requirements. Voorhoeve never informed the MIS or Kok what sort of information he actually required from the MIS.

For all these reasons, the MIS under Kok played hardly any role in the conflict in Bosnia. Neither was the MIS accepted as a serious discussion partner by the political policymakers, as was also confirmed by Voorhoeve.⁴⁵⁵ The MIS did arrange daily briefings in the Defence Crisis Management Centre on the political and military intentions of the warring factions, but when the briefing was over, the MIS had to leave and the doors were closed.

The information position of the MIS in the period of the fall of the enclave was also not terribly impressive. There were no contacts at a strategic level with the Scandinavian countries or the United Kingdom, which had troops in the vicinity. Furthermore, Eibergen was still geared towards a Cold War mentality and absolutely not towards Yugoslavia, so that no Sigint on Yugoslavia was gathered there. What is more, at the time of the fall of the enclave Eibergen still reported to the Commander-in-Chief of the RNLA, who demanded that the unit continue to operate according to the old East-West mentality. That was the order on the table, and it was not to be deviated from. In Eibergen and within the RNLA it was seen as a 'mortal sin' to glance in the direction of conflicts that did not fit into that mould.

Organizational problems exacerbated the situation still further. The fact that Eibergen was not allowed to do anything on 'Bosnia', coincided with resistance to a further integration of the three MISs of the Armed Forces, a process which only started to gain momentum in 1994. Senior RNLA officers blocked this integration, because they wanted to preserve the MIS/Army.⁴⁵⁶ Couzy confirmed that he had never ordered Eibergen to step up its activities regarding Bosnia. As Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army he did not have the impression that important information was being withheld from him in the sphere of Sigint.⁴⁵⁷

Otherwise, the image that the MIS/CO was entirely uninvolved in Bosnia deserves some correction. It was even clear to Kok as Head of the MIS that the enclave would disappear in due course. This was confirmed to him by a meeting in the first half of 1994 with his Hungarian counterpart in Budapest. He brought Kok into contact with the Head of the Serbian MIS, who confirmed the picture that the enclaves would disappear in the long term. Ideas were occasionally exchanged after that in the MIS management meetings, and consideration was given to using Dutch F-16s to take photos of Srebrenica. This did not happen because the Air Force thought that it was neither possible nor permissible. The MIS/Air Force was focused on protecting the security of Air Force personnel, and their assessment was that such an action could put them in danger.

In early 1995, it was more or less known that Kok had to leave. From that moment on, the MISs of the Armed Forces no longer wished to share any information with each other and with the MIS/CO. Intelligence sharing with the foreign sister services was also proceeding poorly. There were complaints from abroad in the direction of the MIS; they kept asking when the Netherlands was going to start producing intelligence on Bosnia. However, the MIS was able to provide extremely little, and therefore also received little intelligence from abroad in return. There was actually some Sigint available, but the Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC) of the Royal Netherlands Navy had a tendency to keep it to its chest.

The foreign services knew perfectly well that the MIS was strongly divided internally. Partly for this reason, the balance in the relationship between the MIS and its foreign counterparts constantly worked to the detriment of the Netherlands. The foreign intelligence services also took advantage of this under the motto 'divide and conquer': they 'went shopping' for information at the MISs of the Armed Forces and invariably obtained something in this way; the one service often did not know what the other had given away.⁴⁵⁸ Furthermore, the MISs of the Armed Forces were more concerned with getting credits from their respective Commanders-in-Chief than with informing the Minister. Former MIS/CO staff spoke of 'a sick atmosphere' within the service and its productivity at that time was completely undermined by mutual competence conflicts and the lack of actual operations. These were the circumstances under which Kok departed as Head of the MIS in June 1995.⁴⁵⁹

His successor was Brigadier General J.C.F. Knapp, who was appointed on 25 June 1995 as the new Head of MIS. It was apparent not long after his arrival that relations between the MISs of the Armed Forces in this period were still less than cordial, to put it mildly. Knapp too was confronted with the strong territorial boundaries that the three MISs had erected around their own areas. This was sometimes taken to extremes; the demarcation between the MISs was so emphatic that Knapp, as Head of the MIS, was not welcome at the TIVC complex in Amsterdam or the MIS/Air Force building.

Van Idsinga's report on the integration of the MISs into a single MIS was Knapp's starting point upon taking office. The report stated that the Royal Netherlands Army, Navy and Air Force were reluctant to contemplate an expansion of the MIS/CO,⁴⁶⁰ but Knapp had now been given a very clear political signal and instruction to realize the goal of one unified MIS.⁴⁶¹ Knapp's motto was always that the MIS was a support service, primarily to serve the Ministry of Defence and secondarily the interests of 'The Netherlands Incorporated'. In his 'will and testament' on his departure on 1 October 1997, he again indicated that an intelligence section and a section for military security would have to be formed.

As Head of the MIS, Knapp regularly visited the three MISs of the Armed Forces, and then reported directly to the Minister. To this end, Knapp did not first approach the CDS, and in so doing he reinstated Duijn's tradition. With strong backing from Voorhoeve, Knapp made a start on the onerous task of integrating the MISs. He initially received little cooperation from the individual MISs, but this later changed. On the one hand, this was because he appointed civilian personnel from the Ministry of Defence to various key posts in the MISs of the Armed Forces. From the point of view of integration, this was a smart move, because it diminished the pull that the Commanders-in-Chief of the various Armed Forces exerted on the Heads of their respective MISs. Financial aspects also lent a helping hand. The MIS/Navy in particular realized that collaboration was beneficial, because the MIS/CO was holding the purse strings. This attitude resulted in the MIS/CO taking over the TIVC from the MIS/Navy. Knapp's main reason for leaving the job was that he was given no formal appreciation expressed in the form of rank.⁴⁶²

It can be deduced from the above that, in the first half of the 1990s, the heads of department of the MIS/CO had little room for manoeuvre in their task of advising the Minister and providing him directly with intelligence. What is more, the MIS/CO only had one analyst available with respect to Yugoslavia. This made the information position of the MIS/CO less than strong. A more precise reconstruction of the MIS/CO's capacities, resources and staffing regarding Yugoslavia is given below.

The MIS/Central Organization and Bosnia

An analysis of the MIS reports in the period 1992-1995 reveals that intelligence on Bosnia was gathered on all sorts of levels. This happened firstly at the MIS/CO Intelligence Staff, where processing and reporting was carried out on the political, economic and strategic terrain. Strategic intelligence was primarily intended for the political, administrative and military leaders (Minister, Junior Minister, Secretary-General and CDS). The Head of Intelligence Staff was responsible for the coordination and fine-tuning of the reporting. The department was subdivided into a Military Analysis Bureau and a Political-Economic Analysis Bureau.⁴⁶³ It employed 12 staff in total, who mainly studied strategic developments in the fields of politics, economics and the military in the CIS, the Middle East, Surinam and the Balkans. The MIS/CO personnel capacity was insufficient to allow the Balkans to be handled properly. From 1996, after the final reorganization, this support department was expanded from 12 to 45 FTEs.⁴⁶⁴ Only one analyst worked almost full time on the Balkans, but he also had to cover developments in Surinam. This one-man outfit was also given little or no guidance: the analyst had to determine his own policy and occupied himself mainly with political-strategic developments. Yugoslavia was a target at the MIS/CO from 1988 onwards. This is when the first signals began to arrive that all was not well. According to insiders, the war in Yugoslavia (in spite of Dutchbat) was not given high priority. 'The Berlin Wall didn't fall at the MIS until years later', according to one analyst.⁴⁶⁵

Where sources were concerned, the MIS/CO Intelligence Staff had only rare access to Sigint. The relationship of the MIS/CO with special intelligence gathering bodies such as the TIVC in Amsterdam or the 898th Army Signals Battalion in Eibergen was in fact almost non-existent. The MIS/CO mainly had to make do with Open Source Intelligence (Osint) and sometimes with material supplied by UNPROFOR. Approximately 80% of all intelligence came from these sources. The MIS/CO also received information on Bosnia from Dutchbat, UNCivPol, UNMOs, ECMM (the European monitoring mission) observers and, initially, from the Military Attaché in Belgrade, who was later recalled. Further intelligence was obtained from the TIVC and NATO, and the political analyses that the BVD sent to the CVIN.

The MISs of the Armed Forces also supplied intelligence to the MIS/CO, but the MIS/Army only sent finished intelligence to the MIS/CO, and not the material on which it was based. It was therefore never possible for the MIS/CO's only available Balkan analyst to independently check the sources for reliability. A telling detail in this connection: the MIS/Army had English-Dutch translators at its disposal, but the MIS/CO did not. The Ministry of Defence made no additional effort to expand the capacity of the MIS/CO. One analyst continued to bear the complete responsibility for Yugoslavia, and received no support whatsoever. As a consequence, the MIS/CO was never actually able to make a thorough analyses of its own but had to rely completely on the finished intelligence product of the MIS/Army. The MIS/CO was never allowed to make direct contact with Dutch staff officers in Tuzla, Sarajevo or Zagreb. Everything ran via the MIS/Army. The three heads of the MIS at the time confirmed the picture outlined here regarding the information position of the MIS/CO.

Neither did the MIS/CO have imagery from satellites or U-2 spy planes at its disposal. It occasionally received material from the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND), the Italian MIS (the Servizio Informazioni e Sicurezza Militare or SISMI), the Danish MIS (DDIS), the CIA or DIA. There was a secure telex link with most services. The US intelligence on Yugoslavia tended to be in-depth in the military-tactical area, but it lacked breadth in the sense of offering a complete political and military picture.⁴⁶⁶ German, Italian and Danish intelligence was generally rated as good. The intelligence of the British and French military intelligence services, the DIS and the Service Generale de Reinseignement (SGR) and later DRM, was rated as reasonable. The MIS/CO had good access to the DIS. Furthermore, the Swiss and Austrian services provided excellent reports based on the debriefings of refugees from the Balkans. It was often observed in interviews that the quality of the partner information depended heavily on the personal contacts of the analyst. Contacts with Spain, for example, were pro forma while those with the BND were good. Contacts with the DIA were sporadic: usually once a year.⁴⁶⁷

Prior to 1994, the MIS/CO had no contact whatsoever with the CIA or with SIS: this was carried out by the IDB. After the IDB was disbanded in 1994, the MIS/CO did establish some contacts in the direction of the British and the Americans. MIS/CO Head Kok therefore had regular contact with the CIA Chief of Station. The Head of the MIS/CO Intelligence Staff was also responsible for all other foreign contacts. Initially, the Chief of Station visited Kok, but, after Knapp's arrival, he approached the Head of the Intelligence Staff, whom he visited once every two weeks. The overall feeling at the MIS/CO was that the Chief of Station generally came more to request intelligence than to supply it on behalf of the CIA. The US official occasionally gave briefings at the Defence Crisis Management Centre, where use was sometimes made of Imagery Intelligence from satellites and U-2 spy planes.⁴⁶⁸

In short, the information position of the MIS/CO on strategic developments in the political, economic and military sphere could certainly not be called strong, due to a lack of sufficient personnel, unique sources and intelligence gathering facilities of its own. The sole analyst had to 'make do' with information from the UN, the final analyses (not the sources) from the MISs of the Armed Forces, foreign counterparts and open sources.

The MISs of the branches of the Armed Forces and Bosnia

Alongside the MIS/CO, the Intelligence and Security departments of the three branches of the Armed Forces (MIS/Army, MIS/Air Force and MIS/Navy) were responsible for gathering intelligence on Yugoslavia. This section is mainly devoted to the activities of the MIS/Army, which bore the primary responsibility for gathering military intelligence destined for the leaders of the Royal Netherlands Army and the Dutch units in Bosnia. There will also be a brief description of the work of the MIS/Air Force, which gathered intelligence within the framework of the Force Protection of the Dutch F-16s that operated from Italy over Bosnia. Although the Royal Netherlands Navy participated in operations in the Adriatic Sea, there will be no separate section on the MIS/Navy, because it played no role in the situation surrounding the eastern enclaves.

It might have been expected that the MIS/Army would become more actively involved in gathering intelligence as part of the process of decision-making on the deployment of Dutchbat, certainly after Dutch troops left for Bosnia. An interview with the Head of the Intelligence and Security Department, who was also Deputy Head of the MIS/Army, Colonel H. Bosch, revealed that this only took place to a very limited extent.⁴⁶⁹ A related impetus could also have been the appointment of a new Head of the MIS/Army, Colonel H. Bokhoven, who held this position from 19 April 1994 to 15 December 1995.⁴⁷⁰ He had built up considerable experience in Bosnia. In 1993 and 1994, he was Plan Officer with the French Force Commander, Jean Cot.

The organization of the MIS/Army

The Intelligence and Security Department of the Military Intelligence Service of the Royal Netherlands Army (MIS/Army) occupied itself with the question of what equipment was situated where, and which equipment the warring factions had at their disposal. There was no formal intelligence requirements plan.⁴⁷¹ In 1994 and 1995, the Intelligence and Security Department operated with the following structure.

Section A: intelligence;

Section B: Security, including Counterintelligence;

Section C: liaison with military attachés and foreign partners;

Section D: military geography.

Section A, Intelligence,⁴⁷² was further subdivided into:

A-1: Bureau Current Intelligence, Situation Centre (SitCen) and Daily Intelligence Summaries;

A-2: Europe Bureau (Orders of Battle and Land Forces);

A-3: Scientific and Technical Intelligence Bureau;

A-4: Signals Intelligence Bureau;

A-5: Literature Research and Translations Bureau (no Serbo-Croat translators);

A-6: Administration, Documentation and Archive Bureau;

A-7: Non-Eastern-European States Bureau (Middle East, North-Africa and the rest of the world).

The most important Bureau for gathering intelligence were A-2 and A-4, and for the production of finished intelligence, A-1. Some analysts at the European Bureau had experience in Bosnia because they had worked in the intelligence staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Kiseljak. There they had access to the Linked Operational Intelligence Center Europe (LOCE) system. Intelligence in NATO was shared through this system, which was a heavily secured communication network, and the results of Imagery Intelligence, Electronic Intelligence and other intelligence were shared in this way.⁴⁷³

The Situation Centre of Bureau A-1 had three tasks: drafting the daily Intelligence Summary of 2 to 2 1/2 pages, which covered Yugoslavia in particular, but also the entire world; processing and disseminating daily intelligence; and supervising the streamlining operation that had been initiated in November 1994. The daily schedule was: from 8 am - 10 am processing and analysis; 10 am -12 noon writing; 12 noon - 1 pm reading and revising draft and 1 pm - 2 pm dissemination. The most important sources for the Situation Centre were the products of the Europe Bureau and the Signals Intelligence Bureau, the intelligence section of UNPROFOR and material from foreign intelligence services. It soon came to the notice of the SitCen staff that the sister services copied much of what the UNPROFOR intelligence section supplied, but they too had to accept that the MIS/Army had little good intelligence and certainly not a unique information position. The Intelligence Summary analysis and the European Bureau analyses sometimes contradicted one another.

473 Confidential interview (38).

Originally, the European Bureau's products relating to Yugoslavia resulted from barter with the foreign partners, which had been set up by one of the staff more than 20 years previously.⁴⁷⁴ An US official who had served in the US Army for 20 years, confirmed while he still worked at the DIA that the MIS/Army had been the most prolific producer of intelligence on the former Yugoslavia within NATO during the Cold War. In his opinion, the MIS had excellent intelligence, but the analysis was of inferior quality. Conversely, some US intelligence occasionally came the way of the MIS/Army via NATO in Mons, but there was no real will to share it on the part of the Americans.⁴⁷⁵

The European Bureau's sources were mainly Osint, UNPROFOR, sister intelligence services and the military attaché in Belgrade. The European Bureau did not originally have Sigint at its disposal. There was rigorous compartmentalization within the MIS/Army. Separate reports with Sigint went to the Deputy Head of the Intelligence Department, and European Bureau staff originally did not get to see them. This improved later; the European Bureau staff then did receive Sigint (once a week). The quantity also grew, because the head of the MIS/Army Intelligence Department at the time wanted a weekly briefing.

The European Bureau also had access to foreign material through organizations such as the ECMM and UNMO. With respect to the foreign partners: good and direct contacts with the Americans, the Germans and the Italians had been built up over the years. At the MIS/Army too, the quality rating of intelligence from foreign intelligence services was variable. 'Not so good' and 'nothing unique' were common characterizations. The liaison with the French services did not function well: French intelligence that did find its way to the MIS/Army was generally considered to be unsound. Contact with the DIS was limited. The European Bureau did receive DIS reports for perusal. More generally, the DIS was said to have come up-to-speed slowly, but the reports were later rated as good quality. In addition, material was occasionally obtained from the Danish MIS and the DIA.⁴⁷⁶ The products of the Bundesnachrichtendienst were rated as good; this service had good Humint sources, especially in the vicinity of Banja Luka and on the border with Serbia. The BND was also said to have access to Comint from communications traffic by the Vojaska Republika Srpska (VRS) and the ABiH.⁴⁷⁷

The MIS/Army made do with what it had

A significant problem with which not only the European Bureau, but also other Bureaus initially had to contend, was a lack of good and reliable maps. The maps of Yugoslavia dated from the 1960s or sometimes even earlier, and it was even the case that the words 'Führer Stab des Heeres, Ausgabe 1943' could be found printed at the bottom of some maps used by the MIS/Army.⁴⁷⁸ The most reliable maps used were the Royal Dutch Touring Club (ANWB) map of Yugoslavia and the street map of Sarajevo produced for the 1986 Winter Olympics. The maps that subsequently became available were repeatedly updated on the basis of Imagery Intelligence supplied by the French SPOT satellite.⁴⁷⁹ The MIS/Army made a three-dimensional sketch at the time of Dutchbat's deployment.

Dutchbat worked in the enclave with ten year old Yugoslavian maps, which was extremely inconvenient in discussions on establishing a demarcation line or in the event of incidents. After a visit to the enclave by the Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, the maps were translated to Dutch standards,⁴⁸⁰ but this revision also failed to improve communication between Dutchbat and the higher levels of command within UNPROFOR. The higher command levels worked with maps made by UNPROFOR in Zagreb, and there was a slight discrepancy between Dutchbat's maps and UNPROFOR's maps. This discrepancy led, for example, to Force Commander De Lapresle's helicopter only being able to land in the Srebrenica compound at its third attempt on his visit to Srebrenica on 2 February 1995.⁴⁸¹ Maps with coordinates became available later, but in general it can be stated that there was initially no overabundance of geographical intelligence.⁴⁸²

Once the dispatch of soldiers to Bosnia had got under way, it would be logical to expect that members of Dutchbat would be used as sources of intelligence. The information position of the MIS/Army could have been improved considerably by using the ears and eyes on the ground, but this did not happen. For instance, the European Bureau was not allowed to pass on questions to the intelligence officers of Dutchbat and its 'predecessors', the Signals Battalion and later the Transport Battalion. Although this was proposed by MIS/Army, the Deputy Commander-in-Chief of the Army refused permission. The Deputy Head of the MIS/Army was later rapped on the knuckles again for this by senior Army officers, whereupon the heads of the MIS/Army forbade MIS/Army analysts to re-establish direct contact with Dutchbat,⁴⁸³ because intelligence activities were not permissible in a UN context. Via a detour, the questions were subsequently presented through the MIS/Army Security Section, so that some information did then dribble in.

Where Sigint at the MIS/Army was concerned (Bureau A-4), the MIS/Army had instructed the 898th Army Signals Battalion in Eibergen to take a 'look' at Yugoslavia in 1994 or thereabouts. The operational order from the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army indicated that day-to-day operational command in this regard lay with the MIS/Army. From 1993 to 1995, Bureau A-4 only had the unit in Eibergen at its disposal as far as Sigint was concerned, and it had no say over the Technical Information Processing Centre (TIVC) in Amsterdam, which was the province of the MIS/Navy. The TIVC's only customers were the Navy, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the BVD. The MIS/Army and MIS/Air Force therefore had no direct access to the communications traffic that was mainly intercepted in Zoutkamp and Eemnes. At this time the first language course in Serbo-Croat was initiated at the MIS School by the Signals Intelligence Bureau of the MIS/Army. The problem was that the Eibergen antenna was oriented on the East-West axis, which made it difficult to intercept message traffic in the Balkans. The MIS/Army also had insufficient translation capacity and there were technical problems too. During the war in Bosnia, use was mainly made of walkie-talkies such as the Motorola. A separate analysis capacity is necessary for intercepting Motorola message traffic. This was not feasible in the Netherlands; it was only possible on the spot.

In 2001 some (former) employees of the MIS stated that, in 1995, their service was still mentally and technically oriented towards the East. There were two other reasons why the MIS had so much difficulty 'averting its gaze' from the East with regard to Sigint. In the first place, there was an investment freeze and departing from the East-West axis would have been an expensive business. A second reason had to do with the undertaking that had been made within NATO to this effect. If the MIS/Army were not to fulfil its existing obligation, then it would have nothing whatsoever to share with its partners.

Meanwhile, there were still no resources and military direction being given, not even from the leadership of the Ministry of Defence. Between 1993 and 1995, the Ministry simply took no interest in Sigint, the procurement of which was considered too expensive. The use of Sigint during the Dutchbat deployment was therefore tightly restricted by a dearth of resources, personnel and equipment. The Bureau A-4 (Signals Intelligence) was, as has already been stated, severely handicapped by the fact that no Sigint on Bosnia was being obtained from the Americans. According to some MIS workers, the Americans were also extremely frugal when it came to sharing such intelligence with the United Kingdom and Germany as well.⁴⁸⁴ MIS/Army staff stated that it was only after the fall of Srebrenica that an insight was obtained using Sigint into the VRS communication networks, which then succeeded through makeshift measures and personal contacts.⁴⁸⁵

The MIS/Army had no unique sources for Bosnia, and the political need in this respect did not appear to be great. In order to follow the war in Bosnia as well as possible, the analysts were dependent on fellow intelligence services, UNPROFOR, UNMOs, and the ECMM. At the request of the MIS/Army, the CDS, Van den Breemen made enquiries of General Shaliskashvili, the Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), for more intelligence, but this revealed that the American intelligence services also had no clearer picture concerning the eastern enclaves. Attempts were also made to gather additional intelligence from the German Bundesnachrichtendienst, but they had little effect.⁴⁸⁶

Should the MIS/Army or Dutchbat have done more themselves in the domain of intelligence?

According to MIS employees, foreign intelligence on Yugoslavia yielded little or nothing on Srebrenica that proved valuable after analysis. This prompts the question of whether Dutchbat itself could or should have resorted to intelligence gathering, to support the work of the MIS/Army for the subsequent benefit of the battalion. Many studies have shown that in complex peacekeeping operations, Human Intelligence (Humint) is often the most important source of intelligence. An American military officer therefore argued for keeping the methods of intelligence gathering 'simple'.⁴⁸⁷ In an area such as Bosnia, there was a shortage of all sorts of (especially American) advanced technical systems. Advanced espionage aircraft were not able to locate mines or snipers, or to determine the role of the local mafia.⁴⁸⁸

The author David Charters asserts that each peacekeeper is in fact a gatherer of intelligence. Each contact with the local population and authorities should provide added value. In his view, intelligence gathering and reporting should be second nature to each commander involved in a peacekeeping operation.⁴⁸⁹

Dutchbat's need for a good intelligence structure was already evident from the earlier experiences of the British Army in Bosnia. This was reported on in February 1994 by the military attaché in London. The experiences of the British battalion in Bosnia between May and November 1993 indicated that a successful task execution depended on the intelligence. For example, intelligence would provide more advance assurance of whether a convoy would reach the final destination. Without some assurance there was hardly any point in setting out. Dutchbat's intelligence information sources were local military commanders, the population, ex-soldiers from the region, UNMOs, International Red Cross workers, and their own officers.⁴⁹⁰

It became clear in June 1994 that the Dutchbat commander felt that he was not receiving enough intelligence. It is evident from the reports by the Dutch Deputy Commander of Sector North East in Tuzla, Colonel C.L. Brantz, of his visit to Srebrenica that since the deployment of Dutchbat I on 1 March 1994, the Dutchbat commander had repeatedly stressed that his 'world' was extremely limited by a lack of intelligence. Anticipating developments outside the enclave and verifying the information given by the warring factions was hardly possible, if at all, in the situation as it existed, argued Brantz. He pointed out that the intelligence picture was mainly based on irregular discussions with ABiH and VRS soldiers, UNMOs and observations from OPs. Support from the Netherlands could possibly alleviate part of this shortcoming. Whether this was feasible in practice remained to be seen, according to Brantz; the Royal Netherlands Army did not have much in the way of resources of its own in the mission area.

It is important to note that the British and the Danes each in their own way appeared to be able to partially alleviate these same shortcomings for their units. Brantz proposed the formulation of an action plan to minimize the perceived difficulties in the short term.⁴⁹¹ In a response, the Commander-in-Chief stated that all that needed to be established was why the promise of intelligence support to the Dutchbat commander made by the Head of the MIS could not be kept; this was information that the Dutchbat commander had to have. There was to be consultation on the action plan with the MIS/Army's Intelligence and Security Department.⁴⁹²

Dutchbat therefore provisionally received no optimum intelligence support from The Hague, but neither had it set up any intelligence-gathering structure of its own. The intelligence staff officer was not a key officer. In fact, Dutchbats I and II were not even allowed by its commander to take an intelligence staff officer with them. It is true that there was an intelligence officer with the transport battalion, but he was located in Simin Han with the Alpha Company, not in Srebrenica. In September 1994, no official intelligence officer was present in Simin Han either; only later was a soldier assigned to this specific work. At the Netherlands Support Command in Lukavac there was likewise no officer with the function of gathering intelligence.⁴⁹³ However, one officer there was given responsibility for Military Security.

The debriefing reports of this Military Security section in Lukavac showed that in the period July-November 1994 there was no good collaboration with Dutchbat ('useless' was the pronouncement made by the section itself). There were numerous problems. The information on the order of battle of the warring factions and other intelligence went in the first instance to Dutchbat in Srebrenica, who were supposed to provide feedback to Support Command in Lukavac. The officer responsible for Military Security did report to Dutchbat in Srebrenica, but discovered that his reports were not being incorporated in Dutchbat's daily Situation Reports (Sitreps) further along the UN line. Instead of the information received, the Dutchbat Sitreps simply stated 'Nothing To Report'. The reports were apparently of no interest to Dutchbat. At a certain point, Commander P. Everts of Dutchbat II even wanted to abolish this post in Lukavac, but The Hague nipped this plan in the bud. The last straw for the officer in Lukavac was when he phoned the compound in Potocari and a soldier in the Operationsroom (the command post) asked him who he was. Subsequently, this military security man started up his own network.

In contrast, Lukavac's collaboration with the Dutch company in Sapna and with the Transport Battalion worked well. Everything the convoy commanders encountered that might be of interest from an intelligence point of view was passed on to the intelligence officer in Lukavac, who forwarded it to his opposite number in Sector North East (SNE). Incidentally, this Scandinavian officer regularly warned him that the VRS listened in on UNPROFOR's communication traffic, and for this reason advised him not to include everything in situation reports.⁴⁹⁴ The warning was probably intended as a signal: not long afterwards the MIS/Army discovered that a Scandinavian intelligence service was monitoring the traffic between various units of the Dutch Signals battalion in Bosnia. Two Dutch soldiers were overheard making extremely denigrating remarks about their commander.⁴⁹⁵

5. Intelligence gathering in the enclave under Dutchbats I, II, III

In Dutchbat I, intelligence was gathered by the team for civil-military relations (in military terms: the S-5) under the leadership of Major A. Derksen. This team arranged the liaison with the ABiH and VRS, compiled a great deal of information, and made a 'mugshot album'. The team had no example to follow in terms of how it was supposed to operate and interpreted its task in its own commando-like way.

They made civil and military risk analyses. Risk analysis was carried out in a strictly military fashion: Derksen was a Major in the commandos with his own platoon, and acted accordingly.

This team also established the basic structures for consultations with the NGOs, UnCivPol and UNMOs. They operated 'with a blue cap on, using green methods'. Dutchbat II also boasted a good liaison team. Contacts were initiated, developed and maintained. The objectives were as follows: escorting convoys, monitoring relief goods, fighting corruption, and maintaining contact with the population. This team also functioned well and was given a pivotal role in the battalion. Collaboration with the battalion commander was also good.⁴⁹⁶

The problems in this regard started with Dutchbat III. According to various MIS staff, the fact that Dutchbat III provided little tactical military intelligence was a problem. As they saw it, Karremans took the position that he was in charge of a UN unit, not a national one. The intelligence officer was considered to be one of us. There was no structural reporting;⁴⁹⁷ in his period as Head of the UNMOs, General Gerard Bastiaans also turned against supplying intelligence. No intelligence was allowed to be supplied to the MIS/Army. Little or no response was made to specific or special questions from the MIS/Army.⁴⁹⁸ It is strange in this regard that Karremans and Franken even refused to go into specific logistics questions. In May 1995 the logistics section (in military terms: the G-4) of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff was even forbidden to gather logistics data.⁴⁹⁹

Dutchbat III did have its own intelligence officer, Captain E. Wieffer, but he reported exclusively to the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, and not directly to the MIS/Army. This explains why Karremans' alarming letter (of 5 June) to the Army Crisis Staff did not become known to the MIS/Army until much later.⁵⁰⁰ Wieffer sent daily Situation Reports to Sector North East (SNE) and Military Information Summaries to the Army Crisis Staff. He was only able to make extremely limited use of the experience of Dutchbat I and II during the additional training period in preparation for the deployment of Dutchbat III. Wieffer concluded that the Army was no good at passing on experiences. As he saw it, the Army carried out debriefings, identified problems and discussed opportunities for improvement, but often failed to carry things through. As a consequence, when evaluating a deployment, the same defects were observed as in the previous deployment, but no solutions were generated with a view to helping the following deployment.⁵⁰¹

Dutchbat III therefore took its own initiatives. Dutchbat II soldiers on leave were invited to Assen for a day to inform their successors of the activities and working conditions. The initiative for this was taken by the battalion staff and from one company. In this respect, there was a significant difference with Dutchbat I, which had been unable to fall back on a predecessor. Dutchbat I was ordered to optimise the intelligence gathering process on the situation in and around the enclave. With regard to the military aspect, all the objectives and intentions of the warring factions at all levels had to be identified. In terms of the humanitarian situation, the borders of the areas containing ethnic minorities, refugees and the homeless had to be defined, with a view to supervising and protecting the occupants. Dutchbat I was also ordered to seek out accurate information on local needs with respect to food, heating, shelter and medical assistance. This had to be passed on to UNHCR and BHC.⁵⁰²

An important part of the transfer of knowledge was formed by analysis of the situation in and around Srebrenica drawn up by Dutchbat I, and developed further by Dutchbat II. This document was also used in the training.⁵⁰³ This meant that Dutchbat III did have good basic information at its disposal. Their intelligence officer, Wieffer, had two daily Situation Reports as input: one from SNE and one from BHC. On the basis of these, the intelligence officer held a briefing for the battalion staff and the commanders every day. Within a company, the commanders kept their staff and ranks informed via a weekly briefing on developments in Srebrenica.⁵⁰⁴

The flow of information that Wieffer received from below once he was in Srebrenica came from patrols and OPs. They were reported on paper, via communications equipment, or both. This data was then translated into a flow of information that was sent to the higher echelon. In his case, this was SNE in Tuzla. The problem with this flow of information was that on a number of occasions Wieffer found that when he wanted to have more information on a specific subject, this information was not forthcoming. Dutchbat knew, for example, that a reconnaissance flight had been carried out by NATO, because they saw the aircraft overhead. They then issued an 'overflight report'. However, Imint from reconnaissance flights was not handed over to Dutchbat by UNPROFOR or NATO.

What were Dutchbat's intelligence needs?

The question then is what sort of information did Dutchbat want. There was a need for intelligence on overall developments in Bosnia in order to build up an accurate picture. If the fighting flared up elsewhere in Bosnia, this could have consequences for an intensification of the activities of the warring factions themselves. Of more direct interest was knowledge of the events in the immediate surroundings of the enclave, for example, within a radius of 5 to 10 kilometres.⁵⁰⁵ Sector North East (SNE) and Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (BHC) did not supply this information, and the sporadic reconnaissance platoon patrols outside the enclave during Dutchbat I and II could only provide fragments of the information requirement. The UNMOs were also barely able to fill this gap. Their freedom of movement was limited and they had no access to Bosnian-Serb areas.⁵⁰⁶ Dutchbat patrols sometimes supplied information on activities around the demarcation line, but it was not possible for them to patrol in secret. The departure of a patrol was often reported to the ABiH or VRS commanders by informants at the compound gate or in the vicinity of the OPs, so that measures could be taken to conceal military activities and weapons from the patrol.

Did Dutchbat receive no intelligence at all, then?

All of the problems listed above could lead to the conclusion that Dutchbat was completely intelligence-blind, but that was most certainly not the case. As a result of its frequent contacts with the warring factions and with the refugees in the enclave, Dutchbat I had a large amount of information at its disposal, which was also analysed. The battalion commander usually added a Commander's Assessment to the Sitreps, in which he gave an evaluation of developments in the enclave, their possible relationship with external events and a short-term outlook. This happened to a lesser extent with Dutchbat II, partly due to the deteriorating relationship with the ABiH. Under Dutchbat III, this trend continued.⁵⁰⁷ An important source of intelligence disappeared because of the sharp decline in contact with the ABiH and VRS.

All in all, the intelligence picture remained limited for Dutchbat III. Information on military developments in the area around the enclave was barely available, which fostered the feeling of isolation that visitors sometimes also noticed. General Smith spoke of a 'siege mentality' on the part of Dutchbat III, an assessment shared by the Operations Officer at SNE, the British Lieutenant Colonel Le Hardy.⁵⁰⁸

In other words, the flow of information from the higher echelons to Dutchbat III in Srebrenica was zero. For instance, Wieffer tried regularly for six months and three weeks to reach the Ukrainian battalion in Zepa by telephone. He had reams of different telephone numbers, yet he never managed to reach a single Ukrainian on the line. This meant that he remained in the dark as to what exactly was happening in Zepa, even though it was only 8 kilometres to the south as the crow flies. The flow of information from another UN unit, stationed right alongside Dutchbat III, was therefore non-existent.

The only thing left for Wieffer to do was to analyse the daily Situation Reports from BHC, extract some general information from them and use it in briefings within the battalion. Wieffer was an intelligence officer, but, certainly in the final months, he worked 18 to 20 hours a day in the Operations room (the command post) because of the shortage of staff. He had only been on six patrols and had therefore been outside the compound six times. Therefore, according to Wieffer, a complaint in a debriefing statement to the effect that the intelligence section personnel had little freedom of movement was correct.⁵⁰⁹ The importance of good contact with the local population from the point of view of intelligence gathering was also lost on Dutchbat III. Dutchbat I had frequent contact with the population but Dutchbat II adopted a more detached attitude. Dutchbat III copied this attitude and became even more detached. This was also caused by the fact that, for security reasons, Karremans banned contact between the locals and Dutchbat soldiers. This ban was not generally observed; at some OPs there was an element of regular contact with the local population.⁵¹⁰

Intelligence gathering via Humint was severely restricted in this way. In addition, no structure was set up for intelligence gathering. The Military Security man, Sergeant Major E.A. Rave, occupied himself in Dutchbat III mainly with counterintelligence and security, and not so much with the gathering of military intelligence. That was supposed to be Wieffer's task, but he did not get the chance to carry it out.⁵¹¹ The lack of diesel diminished contact even more. Reducing the number of patrols saved fuel, but it also meant even less contact with the local population and the ABiH, so that the supply of intelligence diminished. Because Dutchbat also operated no night-time patrols and the static OPs were fully illuminated at night, so that they were visible from a distance, 'our intelligence story was of course not really kosher. It just doesn't work like that. You have to be active at night, because that's when it's all happening in the enclave. Your OPs also have to have maximum observation. This means you have to switch the light off. But what can you do? Those were the rules and so that's what we did'.⁵¹² Neither did Wieffer receive any additional intelligence from the British JCO unit in the enclave.

Intelligence from the JCOs?

Since the end of 1994 there had been a JCO team in the enclave.⁵¹³ On 18 March 1995, a two-man JCO team arrived in Srebrenica. They relieved a team of four JCOs consisting of two British marines, another British soldier and a Swedish soldier. General Rose had sent the JCOs⁵¹⁴ to Srebrenica because he was receiving no intelligence whatsoever from the enclave. He wanted to have his 'own ears and eyes' in the eastern enclaves. According to a British UNPROFOR officer, there was a closed circle of Dutch officers who gave little away and also shared little information with UNPROFOR commander Rose (later Smith).⁵¹⁵

On 17 May, a third British soldier joined this new team. The patrol was detached to the commandos in Potocari. The JCOs were mainly involved in the regular reconnaissance patrols. Shortly after his arrival in the enclave, the JCO commander had a meeting with Karremans and offered him immediate support such as the use of secure satellite communication equipment. Karremans was not very forthcoming and insisted that the JCOs only cooperate with the commandos and not with the rest of the battalion. Karremans banned them from operating independently outside the enclave borders, a decision that did nothing to improve Dutchbat's intelligence picture. They were bound to the enclave for their operational action. Karremans stated that the JCOs would be forced to leave the enclave if his order was ignored.⁵¹⁶

The JCOs encouraged the commandos to explore 'hot spots' and to talk with the warring factions, which until then they had not done for fear of compromising their neutrality. Patrolling was important because it 'allows the commander to gain an intelligence advantage over the parties to the dispute at the tactical level'.⁵¹⁷ Shortly after their arrival in the enclave, the JCOs soon met representatives of the ABiH. Subsequent meetings were forbidden by Karremans. He had also prevented the JCOs from attending the regular meetings between Dutchbat liaison officers and the warring factions. It has to be concluded that Karremans mainly considered the JCOs to be Forward Air Controllers (in which position they were also used) and not so much as handy instruments for gathering intelligence. According to a British UNPROFOR officer, the JCOs were not adequately used, partly because it was an option Karremans was not inclined to consider: he refused to grant the commander of the JCOs permission to operate outside the enclave.⁵¹⁸ Furthermore, there were a number of differences of opinion between the JCOs and Karremans, and the latter restricted the scope of their operational action considerably.⁵¹⁹

Wieffer asserted that information was sometimes exchanged with the JCOs, but in spite of this he always had the feeling that the JCOs, notwithstanding the fact that they were physically based with Dutchbat in the enclave, were purely an intelligence organ for the British UNPROFOR commander. The JCOs were more likely to use Dutchbat as a source of information than the other way round. According to Wieffer, the JCOs sometimes set off separately, but not often. On these occasions they nipped across the enclave border to take a look somewhere, Wieffer heard later. But the JCOs did not leave the enclave often; they did not have the means to do so. Furthermore, there were mines here and there outside the enclave. Apart from these incidental forays, the JCOs only left the enclave together with the Dutchbat patrols.⁵²⁰

General Cees Nicolai (Chief of Staff BHC in Sarajevo) confirmed that the JCOs sometimes went outside the enclave. Smith did not keep it secret from him, although he did not state in detail where they had been or what order he had given them. It could be deduced from the nature of the intelligence that he occasionally received.⁵²¹ A British intelligence officer with access to the JCO reports confirmed that the JCOs occasionally operated outside the enclave.⁵²² The JCOs reported directly to BHC, as 'spies' of Rose and later Smith, and had access to the Dutchbat III reports. Wieffer assumed that there were no substantial differences between the two flows of reports.⁵²³ In other words, Dutchbat III was 'poor' with respect to intelligence so that the situation differed little from that of Dutchbats I and II.

What did the other units do?

Other UNPROFOR units had set up a better intelligence structure. For instance, Canbat II, the Canadian battalion stationed in the enclave before Dutchbat I, had a Military Information Cell with three tasks: looking for indications and warnings, following the tactical and strategic developments, and drawing up threat analyses. The greatest problem encountered by this military information cell was the lack of Order of Battle information and tactical information regarding the warring factions in the region. An additional problem was the limited opportunity for reconnaissance. With respect to their information sources, Humint proved to be the best (and almost exclusive) source of intelligence. Contacts with representatives of the warring factions, the population, their own liaison officers and a network of local informants delivered the best information, alongside humanitarian organizations and NGOs. In order to gather additional intelligence, Canbat (in Visoko) had a series of OPs on both sides of the confrontation line.⁵²⁴

The Scandinavian soldiers also engaged in intelligence gathering. Five people worked in the intelligence sector at the Nordic battalion (Nordbat) in Tuzla. Their performance is said to have been extremely professional. Moreover, the British also devoted much attention to intelligence work. They had six two-man teams that worked for the British sector commander of Sector South West. The Support Command intelligence officer stationed in Lukavac from July to November 1994, could therefore reach no other conclusion than that the Dutch operations, compared with those of other European countries, were relatively unprofessional and totally uncoordinated.⁵²⁵

To summarize the information position of the MIS and that of Dutchbat, it can be stated that the MIS/Army and the MIS/CO had no unique military-tactical intelligence as a result of a lack of their own sources and own intelligence gathering facilities. This position was not improved by the fact that Dutchbat hardly generated any intelligence. Sometimes Dutchbat intelligence got 'stuck' at the Netherlands Army Crisis Staff and did not even reach the MIS/Army. MIS/Army analysts had to 'make do' with intelligence from the UN line, from partners and from open sources.

Bringing about an improvement in this position through Sigint was not an option for the Netherlands because of a lack of language capacity, and technical and personnel problems. In this area, the MIS/Army was still completely caught up in Cold War thinking. It is also striking that, because of the uncooperative attitude of senior MIS/Army officials and senior Royal Netherlands Army officers, Dutchbat was not allowed to engage in improving its own information position.

It emerged from many interviews that there was a dominant attitude that UNPROFOR did not and ought not to gather intelligence. Given such a situation, it might be expected that, although the MIS/CO and MIS/Army each served a different master (Minister of Defence and Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army respectively), they would join forces in order to improve their own information position, but nothing was further from the truth.

6. The collaboration between MIS/CO and MIS/Army

The MIS/CO was quick to observe that, when it came to intelligence work, the Intelligence and Security Departments of the three Armed Forces remained hierarchically subordinate to their own Commanders-in-Chief. On the shop floor there was a healthy relationship between the staff of the MIS/CO and the staff of the MIS/Army and the MIS/Air Force, but it faltered at the higher levels. What collaboration there was (to put it mildly) was not very good. Senior officials of the MISs at the branches of the Armed Forces obstructed collaboration, and this was particularly true of the MIS/Army leadership. There was a predominantly parochial attitude among senior officials of the three MISs. As a result the MIS/CO always lagged behind the MIS/Army, where intelligence regularly 'stranded'. This sometimes led to totally different analyses of the same subject. The various opinions to be found in the MIS/Army camp can be broken down into three categories.⁵²⁶

526 Confidential interview (26).

A few MIS/Army workers admitted that there were great differences between the MIS/CO and parts of the MIS/Army. Sections of the MIS/Army leadership were actually in favour of more collaboration, but that was not true of everyone by a long way. Others continued to attend to the interests of the Army's Commander-in-Chief, and not the interest of a single MIS, as the law required. An example of the parochialism that prevailed: the European Bureau had no access of its own to LOCE, the system for intelligence liaison between the NATO countries. This was not permitted by the MIS/Army leadership. However, European Bureau staff were not allowed access to the MIS/CO via the LOCE system to check their own intelligence. There were constant competence disputes. The mutual divisions between the MISs meant that raw intelligence sometimes 'stranded'. These sources denied that this was also the case with Srebrenica. But in general there was a fierce level of competition between the individual MISs, with the MIS/CO, and even within the MIS/Army. For instance, the MIS/Air Force was not happy if the MIS/Army discussed helicopters in an analysis. The MIS/Air Force and the MIS/Navy also distanced themselves from each other.⁵²⁷

Other staff and former staff at the MIS/Army admitted frankly that in this period they attended first and foremost to the interests of their Commander-in-Chief, but at the same time they painted a milder picture of the poor relationships outlined above. While accepting that there were sometimes professional differences of opinion with the MIS/CO, these sources described the collaboration as otherwise going well. It was confirmed that raw intelligence was not always passed on and that the MIS/Army functioned as a filter, but, according to these MIS/Army employees, information never stranded if the impression existed that the MIS/CO did not have it. Partner information was always passed on.⁵²⁸

A third group challenged the idea that the collaboration around 1995 was not as good as it could have been. According to them, absolutely no intelligence was held back by MIS/Army; it was even the case that more had been reported than was strictly necessary.⁵²⁹ Officers from this last group were prepared to admit that Bureau A-1 (including the Situation Centre) was in a better information position, because there was more material available to the MIS/Army than the MIS/CO. However, according to them, intelligence was definitely made available in the form of analysis: the MIS/Army never 'sat' on it. The MIS/CO's lone analyst did not entirely agree with this: because the raw intelligence was not supplied, the MIS/CO analyst could not form his own balanced view, and he was forced to trust blindly in the MIS/Army analyses. This made the MIS/CO (and in particular their one Balkans analyst) dependent on what the MIS/Army supplied.

Relationships at the top

Collaboration at the very highest level between the heads of the MIS/CO and the three MISs of the individual branches of the Armed Forces did not proceed as well as it might have. The management meeting was held every two weeks. This was where the MIS/CO met the other MISs. The management meeting was actually a constant competence battle.⁵³⁰ Those involved stated that it boiled down to the fact that the MIS/CO served a different interest: that of the Minister. The MIS/Army looked to its Commander-in-Chief, rather than the Minister.⁵³¹ This was not all that strange, because the heads of the MISs had to return to their respective Armed Forces units. According to one person involved 'you didn't even entertain the idea' of going against your own Commander-in-Chief because it could damage your career. The absolute priority within the MIS/Army was to inform the Army to the best of your ability. Only once this duty had been fulfilled did the Minister become part of the equation.⁵³²

In reality the MIS/Army functioned as an intelligence organization for the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Tactical intelligence was gathered, geared towards the deployment of units. The MIS/Army constantly assessed the intelligence to see whether it was relevant for passing on to the MIS/CO. The CDS rather fell outside MIS lines: he may have been an adviser to the Minister, but so was each individual Commander-in-Chief and they saw themselves as occupying an independent position relative to the Minister. Every Commander-in-Chief wanted an autonomous and independent intelligence position, and felt no actual need for integration.⁵³³

Defence Minister Voorhoeve answered the question of whether he was aware of the conflicts and differences between the MIS/CO and the MIS/Army as follows: 'No. I did not know, and so it was covered up'. Voorhoeve went on to provide an explanation for this phenomenon: 'this is a normal response within an organization, I would say, because people never want to reveal to the upper echelons that differences of opinion exist. Generally speaking the information you are given is boringly uniform. People report what they have been able to agree on and leave out what they could not agree on.'⁵³⁴

Ultimately, a last-ditch attempt was made to improve the collaboration between the MIS/CO and the three MISs. This happened in early 1995 in the form of the Yugoslavia project organization.⁵³⁵ The Deputy Head of MIS/Army functioned as chairman; the coordinator was the Head of the MIS/Army's Production Section, and the MIS/Army, MIS/Navy, MIS/Air Force and MIS/CO could each supply a representative. The aim of this was to ensure the compilation or formulation of the complete intelligence and/or counterintelligence requirements for the area of the former Yugoslavia; the gathering and, where necessary, sharing of all relevant information with respect to the area; dissemination of overviews with key questions and/or ad hoc questions; the periodic distribution of a list of the existing forms of reporting, and coordination of efforts related to the recruitment or liaison process.⁵³⁶

The purpose of this project team's meetings was to improve the structure of the intelligence on Yugoslavia and to prevent duplication.⁵³⁷ This remained an aspiration, however, partly because of the attitude of various department heads. An example of this is the meeting of 30 June 1995, at which, according to the agenda and the minutes, the state of affairs in Srebrenica was not covered. The minutes did state that it had been agreed to carry out a survey within the Ministry of Defence into the Serbo-Croat capacity there. The next meeting would not take place until 4 August.⁵³⁸

Ultimately, in spite of the limited resources and all the mutual differences and conflicts, impressive quantities of reports were delivered by the MIS/CO and MIS/Army analysts; the contact on the shop floor was, as already mentioned, good. These reports mainly took the form of Intelligence Summaries, which could be divided into the categories daily and weekly. The daily messages attempted to provide an insight into the current developments and also presented forecasts. The weekly edition presented an outline of the events of the past week and the outlook for the coming week. Monthly summaries, annual summaries and Intelligence Reports (Intreps) were also produced, including the incidental sup(plementary) intreps.⁵³⁹

In addition, the MIS analysts produced threat analyses (assessments), order of battle basic documents, country studies, studies on tactics and the operations of the warring factions.⁵⁴⁰ For instance, a comprehensive threat analysis of the situation in Mostar and a counterintelligence assessment of the local security situation was drawn up in July 1994 for the CDS and the senior Ministry of Defence officials. This was in support of the Dutch presidency of the WEU.⁵⁴¹ Information files on Yugoslavia were also drafted to provide general information on the conflict. These documents were destined for observers who were dispatched by the UN or within the framework of the ECMM, and for staff officers of the Dutch units, of BHC and UNPROFOR staff.⁵⁴²

The question of the extent to which the MIS/CO or MIS/Army were in a position to provide a timely and accurate prediction of the attack on Srebrenica, or received relevant timely warnings, will be covered comprehensively in Chapter 8, 'Was Srebrenica an intelligence failure?'

7. The output of the MIS/Air Force

Another important producer of intelligence was the MIS/Air Force's Intelligence Department. After all, the involvement of the Royal Netherlands Air Force in the war, within the framework of the Deny Flight operation, meant that the MIS/Air Force took an active part. Every day, the Air Force Operation Centre published the Deny Flight Intelligence Summary (DFIS). One of the analysts at the MIS/Air Force had considerable experience of the war in Bosnia. In 1993, he was present in Italy as an intelligence officer in Villafranca. There he discovered that there were many 'holes' in the intelligence on Yugoslavia. For instance, AFSOUTH, the southern NATO command, maintained that a certain anti-aircraft missile installation (a SAM site) was operational in Serbia, while AFCENT (the NATO command in Central Europe) asserted that it was not operational.

This sort of intelligence was 'nice' for the pilots, because it raised the question of what was actually right. Analysts were of the opinion that the DFIS could be better. The intelligence provision to the unit in Italy was not deemed to be optimal. In this respect, the MIS/Air Force did engage in force protection, in contrast to the MIS/Army. It was for this reason that the MIS/Air Force Balkans analysts started to give more intelligence to Villafranca, the Commander-in-Chief of the Netherlands Air Force and the Air Force Board. The DFIS filled approximately 4 pages each day and always started with a political section, followed by a military section, and ended by detailing the violations of the flight ban. The DFIS was issued every evening at 18.00 hours, and always went to SHAPE, the NATO organization in Mons. The analysts worked about 60 hours a week and taking leave was out of the question.⁵⁴³

The Balkans section of the MIS/Air Force received intelligence support from Villafranca, where an MIS/Air Force analyst operated. He had a direct line to The Hague. At Villafranca he received American Imint, but it could never be established whether this came from a U-2 or a satellite. In addition, the photos were, according to a Dutch intelligence official, made a little 'fuzzier' to hide the actual resolution. The latter remark is probably incorrect. The photos were U-2 imagery, and were very often better than available satellite imagery due to high resolution from the film-based technology, as well as the much lower altitude. According to a senior US intelligence analyst 'no one had time to "fuzzy" pictures for specific consumers'. The U2 imagery was, according to this official, ideal for dissemination to other agencies, for it was completely releasable, coverage was so broad and revisit times in most areas were nearly weekly; sometimes twice weekly.⁵⁴⁴

The MIS/Air Force analyst supplied as much material as possible for the Deny Flight Intelligence Summary. Among the resources at his disposal was the NATO Linked Operational Intelligence Center Europe (LOCE) system. He also received the reports of the UNMOs and the Combined Air Operations Centre (CAOC) in Vicenza but also a daily NATO releasable air intelligence summary from the purely US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth, disseminated via LOCE for his benefit, and many others. It was initially released through the NATO Intelligence Center at AFSOUTH and later directly from JAC, Molesworth.

The staff in Villafranca was constantly aware of possible espionage by the Bosnian Serbs. Highly secure links were used. The staff had crypto telephones and the crypto code on LOCE was changed every day. This meant that little information leaked out. What did leak out, to Belgrade to be precise, were the daily Air Task Messages (ATMs).⁵⁴⁵ They were drawn up 12 hours in advance and they described the mission and the targets. Too many people within NATO knew of this. At the same time, the VRS is said to have had a good source in NATO circles.⁵⁴⁶ These efforts were not always appreciated by senior MIS/Air Force officials. In spite of the enormous pressure of work, the Balkans unit received no additional personnel, for example, but were sometimes reproached for their analyses. However, analysts admitted that this never led to a direct intervention by the heads of the MIS/Air Force, nor to a demand that the text be amended.

At shop floor level, the relationship between the MIS/Air Force and the MISs at the other two branches of the Armed Forces was excellent, but personnel were reminded from above that distance should be maintained. This led to bizarre situations, such as an MIS/Army analyst furtively delivering an envelope containing raw intelligence to the home of an MIS/Air Force analyst under cover of darkness, and depositing it in the letterbox. According to MIS/Air Force personnel, senior officials at the other two MISs blocked more intensive collaboration, which was actually a bitter necessity. The fact was that in principle all of the MISs had largely the same intelligence on the table, but what really mattered was the analysis. This could vary somewhat, because each MIS looked at the data through different eyes. The attack on the Krajina was given as an example. MIS/Air Force and MIS/Navy determined: 'es geht los'. The MIS/Army was of the opinion that nothing was going to happen. This was the position taken by their analyst at the daily briefing at the Defence Crisis Management Centre. Unfortunately for him, Operation Storm started the following day, in which the Croats attacked the Bosnian Serbs in the Krajina.⁵⁴⁷

Intelligence support for the air operations was deemed to be of eminent importance to the Netherlands Air Force detachment in Villafranca. The demands on this were that the information issued had to be of the highest possible quality, up-to-date and tailored to suit requirements. The intelligence section in Villafranca made use of NATO reports generated, for example, by the intelligence cell of the Fifth Allied Air Force in Vicenza and the US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) in Molesworth.

Secondly, consistent use was made of the messages from the Deny Flight Intelligence Summaries, compiled by the MIS/Air Force in The Hague. According to the detachment commander in Villafranca, Lieutenant Colonel J. Eikelboom the Deny Flight Intelligence Summary was of excellent quality. He spotted a problem with the intelligence generated by Vicenza and the Joint Analysis Center. They were completely dependent for their information on the American, British, German and French services, and what they were willing to release in the way of intelligence.

In the case of Deny Flight especially, political interests played a significant role. The idea existed that various intelligence services were only releasing those items that suited the political interests of their government. It often turned out to be the case that the intelligence passed on by them was incomplete or even incorrect. This was regularly demonstrated to the compilers of the DFIS. Through a better use of other sources, the Deny Flight Intelligence staff later arrived at a much better and realistic assessment, which resulted in an indispensable product. When the decision was taken to distribute the DFIS weekly instead of daily with effect from 15 September 1995 due to personnel problems, Eikelboom protested. This was because the intelligence from the Combined Air Operations Centre and JAC, Molesworth was of inferior quality.⁵⁴⁸

An US intelligence official rejected vehemently the idea that intelligence was doctored for political reasons. According to this source, it may well be that the information was sometimes incomplete or incorrect, and for that one must make accounts for human error. But to attribute the errors to some vast political conspiracy is 'absurd'. The same official also remarked somewhat offended that the intelligence staff of the US Joint Analysis Center (JAC) at Molesworth would have welcomed any constructive criticism from a Dutch analytical cell. The staff did frequently get analytical assistance from other nationalities, which led to better, more useful products for all involved. To the best of his knowledge, any improvements made by any Dutch analysts were kept to themselves. And if it was no good according to this Dutch source, the US official asked, what did they do about it? Where did they go to get what they needed? Did they explore bilateral avenues? Did they advise higher authority of the shortfall? Did they do anything about it, or did 'they go back to their cup of coffee, and show up sour grapes after the fact?'⁵⁴⁹

But Dutch intelligence officials persisted that thanks to thorough analysis, the Balkans Section of the MIS/Air Force discovered matters that had escaped the notice of others. For instance, the analysts determined that in early 1995, French Mirage aircraft had flown a secret mission from France and bombed Pale. UNPROFOR was not informed of this.⁵⁵⁰

8. Support for the MIS from UNPROFOR

At the MIS/CO, MIS/Army and MIS/Air Force it was completely clear that nothing could be expected of the UN in the area of intelligence gathering. This had already been made clear to the Dutch in the peacekeeping operation in Cambodia in 1992-1993. Even simple aerial photographs were frowned upon by the UN. It was established that the Dutch battalion had too few intelligence officers to gather information systematically itself.

At the time, the battalion commander in Cambodia had already established that he might have been able to obtain more knowledge from Sigint, but that Humint was what was really needed in a peacekeeping operation: 'If you have dealings with four factions who are unreliable or are unable to describe the situation in the field, then you have to have an intelligence service of your own'.⁵⁵¹ The Netherlands Ministry of Defence apparently drew no conclusions from this. In mid 1995, it was again observed in a Defence Intelligence Requirements memorandum that the lack of adequate security guarantees meant that the countries participating in UN operations were extremely reluctant to issue intelligence to the UN or the nations participating in UN operations.⁵⁵² Couzy was often described as having little or no interest in intelligence on this aspect. He never asked for special intelligence briefings. The assessment of the then head of his private office was that 'Couzy easily distances himself from matters he thinks others ought to take care of'. He stated that Couzy attached great importance to military security, but that he did not associate this with an additional intelligence effort.⁵⁵³

Nonetheless, Couzy too knew that the UN had no intelligence service of its own, because 'they were not there to fight. They were there for a humanitarian operation, for which you do not need an intelligence service'. The question is whether such an assessment is correct. According to many, good intelligence is also absolutely necessary for the satisfactory execution of humanitarian operations. It is essential to gather intelligence on such important issues as the manning of roadblocks, the condition of roads, the attitude of the warring parties, the situation on the ground, whether the local mafia is playing a role in the distribution of aid, the involvement of paramilitary units, and the extent to which a ceasefire is being upheld. In a nutshell, intelligence is of great importance to peacekeeping operations too. This had already been established by Dutch officers who had taken part in the UNTAC peacekeeping operation in Cambodia in 1992-1993. 'Even disregarding the fact that it is hardly possible to verify agreements without intelligence work, it is also quite simply risky for UN soldiers not to have intelligence available. Until the last moment, UNTAC had no clear picture of the troop strength of the Khmer Rouge, nor of where Khmer Rouge units were located', one Dutch battalion commander explained.⁵⁵⁴ The lack of military intelligence because of the UN's dismissive attitude was felt to be a great deficiency. This was an important lesson learned from Cambodia.

This raises the question of whether it ever made Couzy feel uncomfortable, knowing that the UN supplied no intelligence and that the Netherlands had too little intelligence. Some MIS officials stated that the Netherlands was more righteous than its masters on that point.⁵⁵⁵ Couzy was matter-of-fact about it all: 'Look, the UN had no intelligence service, which was logical because they were not at war. The UN was there to perform humanitarian operations, with that strange appendage of those Safe Areas, for which you don't need an intelligence service. That was always the case. What's the point of gathering intelligence, assuming you can get it, when you can't do anything with it? The fact is you have to go to the UN: it has to do something. We didn't need intelligence to let the UN know that we had drifted into a hopeless position.' According to Couzy, it would have made no difference to the fall of Srebrenica if the knowledge that emerged by 2001 had been available at the time.⁵⁵⁶

It remains a matter for speculation, but good intelligence could have sharpened The Hague's international negotiating position and could have been a significant supplement to the level of knowledge of the political, civil service and military policymakers, who, as things were, often had to take important decisions while completely in the dark. In any case, senior officers of the Royal Netherlands Army could have learned a lesson from the Dutch exercise 'Intell-Torch 1993' in which a large number of problem areas were brought to light in the intelligence field and related points for action identified regarding crisis management operations. The items examined during this exercise included the risks of deploying army units in operations ranging from crisis management to peacekeeping in a UN context.⁵⁵⁷

Couzy's position has not changed in the intervening years. The former Commander-in-Chief is still of the opinion that there was no role for the Dutch intelligence community in Bosnia. It was, after all, a UN operation. Couzy realized well that the UN had no intelligence architecture of its own, but saw that as no reason to encourage his own MIS/Army to gather additional intelligence: 'What were we supposed to do with that information? It's no help at all'. The Commander-in-Chief also had no need for additional intelligence within the framework of Force Protection because, according to him, it was no help either and Dutchbat was trapped like rats anyway. Couzy therefore never considered having the MIS/Army put in additional effort. Couzy said such an effort was never requested, not by Ministers Ter Beek and Voorhoeve, not by the Ministerial Council and not by Parliament.

The result of all this was that Couzy gave no guidance to the MIS/Army concerning the production of intelligence. Nor did any signals reach Couzy from senior MIS/Army officials. Was the MIS/Army or MIS/CO then a serious discussion partner for the policymakers and the Defence leaders? In an interview, Couzy said this service was 'not always a serious discussion partner'.⁵⁵⁸

Furthermore, it was possible to establish that the many Dutch officers in the UNPROFOR chain of command also supplied no intelligence for national use. In 1992, The Hague did occasionally make inquiries of Dutch UNPROFOR staff officers. The poor information position of the Intelligence and Security Department of the MIS/Army at that time was also evident from a fax sent to two Dutch

UN observers in Sarajevo,⁵⁵⁹ which stated frankly that the MIS/Army's information position was mediocre at best. There was no contact with UNPROFOR at that time.⁵⁶⁰

The Minister was said later to have issued an edict on reporting more often through the national line. Dutch representatives at UNPROFOR did not do so regularly, however. Data from a briefing for Voorhoeve in November 1994 revealed that 60 Dutch soldiers worked at UNPROFOR in Zagreb at the time and 51 at BHC in Sarajevo. The briefing covered the arguments 'for' and 'against' dispatching a third company to yet another enclave, Bihac.⁵⁶¹ The deployment of soldiers for a nation's own purposes was an established practice among other nationalities that were represented in UNPROFOR. The Dutch line, however, was that combat intelligence was important, but that other intelligence was 'dirty'.

The Dutch also did not engage in intelligence for UNPROFOR

A former head of the MIS/Army provided further confirmation of this. When he was still serving with UNPROFOR under General Cot, he occasionally reported via the national line to The Hague. This was discovered by Akashi, who immediately called him to account and warned that it must not happen again. Another factor was that everyone had a Blue Beret mentality; intelligence was not an acceptable activity at the UN.⁵⁶² The MIS/Army proposed supplying the representatives at UNPROFOR with their own secure crypto link with the minister and the CDS, but this idea was rejected.⁵⁶³

This meant that the MIS/CO and MIS/Army were already destined at the outset to lag further behind.⁵⁶⁴ Neither did the MIS/Army look specifically for intelligence in UNPROFOR through former UNPROFOR staff. For example, after his departure from the service, the deputy head of the MIS/Army's Intelligence Department was Deputy Head of Operations in Zagreb from August 1994 to August 1995. He had no direct line or contacts with the MIS/Army and the personnel of this section never called on him.⁵⁶⁵ In this way, important information sources were cut off, because the Netherlands was intent on being 'the best-behaved boy in the class'.⁵⁶⁶ As said earlier, the Netherlands became therefore completely dependent on what other intelligence services are prepared to supply to them. This was not a natural fact, but the result of policy decisions hinged on funding, capability, military and political will.

9. Intelligence and senior Ministry of Defence officials

The next question is what the political and military leaders thought of the usefulness of the MIS, and whether a view existed in those circles on the role that an intelligence service could play. Was the MIS involved in the decision-making surrounding the deployment of Dutchbat, and was a risk analysis or advice ever requested on the deployment of Dutchbat? MIS/CO personnel assert that they were not actively and directly involved in the preparation of the deployment of Dutchbat. This was really the task of the MIS/Army. The Minister and (the office of) the Secretary-General never requested a risk analysis of the situation. From other interviews it also appears that Defence Minister Ter Beek was never provided with a thorough risk analysis.⁵⁶⁷ Nonetheless, the MIS/CO independently produced a ⁵⁶⁷ In answer to questions in Parliament, Ter Beek claimed that troops were always dispatched on the basis of a careful analysis of the risks. negative assessment: not to go to Bosnia.⁵⁶⁸ Neither was there ever a request from senior Royal Netherlands Army officers or from the Commander-in-Chief for the MIS/Army to produce a threat analysis. The Commander-in-Chief at the time, General Couzy, confirmed this: 'I did not give such an order. Simply because I did not need it'.⁵⁶⁹ The Intelligence Department then issued an assessment on the planned light arming, which was negative, but the recommendation was not followed.

Otherwise, the information on order of battle and arming of the warring factions was sent to the Army Staff.⁵⁷⁰ Various interviews show that before the deployment, analysts also issued a negative opinion on the dispatch area;⁵⁷¹ Srebrenica was seen as a mousetrap. This recommendation was passed on to the head of the MIS/Army. Subsequently in the autumn of 1993, the MIS/Army sent a negative recommendation to the Ministry of Defence: do not deploy. This was before the final round of decision-making with regard to the deployment had taken place. These objections were said to have been raised in a verbal consultation with senior Royal Netherlands Army officers by the head of the MIS/Army. But the political decision-making was already at such an advanced stage that the objections were pushed to one side. The objections lodged against the light arming of the Dutch troops were also said to have been brushed aside.⁵⁷²

Netherlands Army officers had only two questions for the MIS/Army. The first concerned the extent of the risk. The answer was that the risk was limited but that something untoward could certainly happen. The second question was what could be done in Bosnia within the framework of a peacekeeping operation. Here the answer was that, from a military point of view, it would not be possible to ward off any attack, but it would be possible to 'show the flag'. Dutchbat could possibly play a stabilizing role, but not forever. Neither did any request come from senior Royal Netherlands Army officers for the MIS/Army to supply additional intelligence. The MIS/Army was not involved in the decision-making surrounding the deployment of Dutchbat and the road to Srebrenica, and it also took no part in the reconnaissance teams sent to the enclave. All that European Bureau personnel were allowed to do was to brief Dutchbats I and II, but this did not happen with the deployment of Dutchbat III.⁵⁷³ The fact that there was no Force Protection meant at the same time a reduction in the opportunities for acquiring foreign intelligence on a quid pro quo basis. If the Netherlands Army had arranged for Force Protection for Dutchbat, and for a better intelligence structure, then the information position of the MIS/Army would have been improved considerably, and the liaison possibilities would have been better.

The question is how Minister Ter Beek viewed the information he received from MIS/CO. With respect to the relationship between the decision to deploy Dutchbat and whether the MIS was engaged regarding the definite location, he stated: 'No explicit role. There was no question of a specific role for the MIS in relation to the Minister or suchlike. I did receive some analyses from time to time, a few reports, which were more extensive than the daily situation reports, but they came from the Defence Staff.'

On the question of whether there was then absolutely no role for the MIS, Ter Beek answered: 'An independent, risk analysis or risk appraisal carried out by the MIS to be sent to the Minister: no. There was no independent advice; never any independent advice from the MIS. Again, there were those reports'. By which the Minister was referring to intelligence summaries? 'Yes. In extremely small print. I always had trouble keeping my attention focused on them. They weren't all that exciting. In other words, no specific role for the MIS'. How did Ter Beek rate these reports in terms of the level of information, and did documents that he received from the MIS have any specific added value? 'Then the answer is a flat “no”. If you just followed The Herald Tribune, CNN and Le Monde a little, you could find out quite a lot. They were often compilations of open sources. That sums it up neatly’.⁵⁷⁴

Under Ter Beek, the MIS/CO was sometimes involved in confidential briefings on the security situation in Bosnia at the request of the Parliamentary Permanent Committee for Defence. For example, such a briefing was requested on 22 February 1994, shortly before the deployment to Srebrenica. The Head of the MIS was to take account of the objectives and resources of the warring factions, the threat to the Dutch troops and the living conditions in Srebrenica and Zepa.⁵⁷⁵

The next question is whether Ter Beek’s successor, Voorhoeve, had a different view of the role that the MIS could play. According to the Minister, the task of the MIS/CO was to continue to give a current, accurate analysis of the state of affairs on the basis of what they heard, saw and especially picked up from allies. He had the impression that the Netherlands had ‘only very limited intelligence resources. Therefore we were very heavily dependent on what the larger allies told us’. His assessment was that the best intelligence on Bosnia resided with the British, the French and the Americans. The Minister therefore admitted that there were only limited opportunities to actively gather intelligence in other countries. An official from the MIS/CO once said to Voorhoeve: ‘It is really a pity that we have disbanded the foreign intelligence service’.⁵⁷⁶

The Hague therefore had only extremely limited intelligence resources. The question then is whether the ministry or the government made any additional effort in the area of intelligence, and if the MIS ever remarked that, should Dutch soldiers be sent to Bosnia, they might need more resources and manpower. Voorhoeve was unable to recall any instance when this had been raised for discussion. Neither did Parliament ever insist that additional efforts be made in the area of intelligence. This also applied to Sigint: there was no additional effort put into this. He confirmed that the conflict in the Ministry of Defence had more to do with protecting Sigint against excessive cutbacks: intelligence capacity was also expected to make a contribution to the almost one billion guilders worth of cuts. There were also Defence officials who thought that Sigint generally yielded little. There was a familiar expression: ‘We’d rather have a frigate than ...’, which could be completed with a term like ‘signals Intelligence’. ‘You then know exactly where the resistance lay’, said Voorhoeve. In brief, there were no additional enhancements in the area of intelligence; neither Parliament nor the Ministry of Defence nor the Cabinet insisted on it. Voorhoeve: ‘I think that conclusion is correct’. Otherwise, up until the fall of the enclave he had not noticed that the Dutch intelligence position was nothing special. The Minister assumed that what he received in MIS reports was mainly based on the resources of far larger foreign services, which also operated under fewer legal restrictions.

Voorhoeve stated later that he was not impressed by the information position of the MIS/CO. The analyses that he received every two weeks did not rise above the average International Herald Tribune level.⁵⁷⁷ This was also clear from the report of a parliamentary hearing of Minister Voorhoeve. The Minister declared that for a number of reasons the possibility of gathering reliable intelligence did not exist. According to him, this was related to whether or not a country had a history as a great power. As an example, he referred to Britain, which had the possibility of dropping special forces behind enemy lines and thereby starting espionage activities. In a war situation, the Netherlands could do the same, but ‘within the framework of UNPROFOR we had no spies among the Serbs’, Voorhoeve said. ‘We therefore relied on the UN’s larger intelligence capacity. That makes you the requesting party, and then you simply have to take what you’re given. My assessment is that we did not receive any timely, adequate warnings from other intelligence services regarding what was about to happen. I say deliberately: no timely, adequate warnings. The Netherlands made maximum use of its own analysis capacity, and was therefore left with the “fog of war”’.⁵⁷⁸ Voorhoeve therefore relied on the intelligence capacity of the UN, but as described in Chapter 1 of this study, this was something that the UN did not possess. Voorhoeve had previously declared this to Parliament as well: the UN had no intelligence service of its own and was therefore unaware of the VRS strategy.⁵⁷⁹

This demonstrated that the Minister had not fully fathomed the process behind gathering intelligence. Dropping special units behind enemy lines is one method of gathering intelligence, but, of course, not the only one. Perhaps the Ministry of Defence and the Netherlands Army should have focused on utilizing the possibility of gathering Sigint from the enclave as effectively as possible. It would have been possible to operate an Electronic Warfare Unit from Tuzla in support of their own battalion. This unit could have concentrated on intercepting VHF communication traffic, and would have been effective within an area of over 50 kilometres around the deployment position. This option was even proposed by the MIS/Army, but Couzy rejected it. In a UN context, no intelligence tasks needed to be executed.⁵⁸⁰

Such an arrangement would have strongly improved the negotiating position of The Hague in the international intelligence community. Furthermore, the remark that within the framework of UNPROFOR the Netherlands had no spies among the Serbs was a strange starting point to adopt. For the sake of Force Protection, the Minister should perhaps have encouraged the MIS/CO or the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army through his MIS/Army to take such a step. Force Protection in particular implies that special attention be paid to counterintelligence (subversion, espionage and terrorism).⁵⁸¹ If this had succeeded, then The Hague would no longer have been a requesting party on the national and international stage, and would also have received more intelligence in return on a quid pro quo basis.

The question then remains as to how the ministers and the senior Ministry of Defence officials actually did receive their intelligence. The MIS/CO reported directly and through special briefings to the Ministers Ter Beek and Voorhoeve, the senior ministry officials and military officers. These briefings, by the MIS/CO's only Balkans analyst, took place in the meetings of the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC). They were carried out on behalf of the CDS responsible for policy guidance and evaluation of crisis management operations. The Centre was founded during the Gulf War. The branches of the Armed Forces contributed the necessary officers and NCOs, but until the autumn of 1994 they still did not have the requisite qualities.⁵⁸²

At the time there was an MIS cell at the Defence Crisis Management Centre, (DCBC) but the department's senior officials took hardly any interest in it. The Balkans analyst himself considered the information given in the briefings to be 'pearls cast before swine'. MIS/Air Force staff, who sometimes attended briefings at the Centre, confirmed this. The team at the MIS cell was not a strong one: only the MIS/CO analyst had sufficient calibre but he only carried out the political-strategic part. This influenced the Head of the MIS, Kok, in backing a proposal to disband the cell. It was later decided, under Knapp, to re-establish a similar MIS cell, but that was after the fall of Srebrenica. Better qualified people were then assigned.⁵⁸³

On weekdays, the MIS cell arranged briefings and intelligence summaries. According to some MIS officials, the briefings by the MIS/CO were occasionally too pro-Serbian in tone. However, they saw this mainly as an attempt to offer a counterweight to the pro-Bosnian attitude of the senior Ministry of Defence officials. According to many MIS personnel, there was a constant 'good guys, bad guys' mentality in the air, with no room for subtle distinctions. The MIS/CO analyst discovered this during briefings for the DCBC, where occasionally there was an element of a selective perception of the events in Bosnia. This analyst was to receive a 'reprimand' from Voorhoeve in June 1998. He was told by the Head of the MIS that the Minister's eye had been drawn to a number of wordings that in his view showed too much sympathy for Serbian military action in Kosovo.⁵⁸⁴

MIS/Air Force analysts confirmed that there was indeed sometimes an element of politicized intelligence in the direction of the senior military officers and ministry officials. MIS/Army officials likewise stated that intelligence was sometimes used in support of the 'good guys' versus 'bad guys' scenario.⁵⁸⁵ Certain politically sensitive issues were sometimes dropped from the weekly intelligence summaries. The overall climate dictated that the reporting to the leadership of the Ministry of Defence had to be 'politically correct'. Therefore what went to the senior officers and officials was 'polititized intelligence'. Examples included the mortar attack in Sarajevo or the secret flights to Tuzla. While there were no instructions that reports should be politically correct, the politicized aspects still crept in gradually and unconsciously.⁵⁸⁶

Almost all the MIS officials interviewed admitted that account was taken of pro-Bosnia attitudes at senior political and military level within the Ministry. The prevailing political preference definitely influenced perceptions. It was repeatedly pointed out that foreign intelligence sources, such as the NATO network LOCE, were also not entirely free of a political pro-Bosnia slant.⁵⁸⁷ On the subject of political intelligence a former head of the MIS/Army stated that 'as far as I am concerned it should not' have existed. But he too had to admit that the political mood was indeed taken into account. For instance, he was able to recall that once after Srebrenica he had given Voorhoeve a Serbian book on the ABiH hit and run operations from Srebrenica to the surrounding villages with Bosnian Serb residents. The Minister did not appear particularly pleased.⁵⁸⁸

Voorhoeve obtained no intelligence via a direct connection with the Head of the MIS. There was no structural contact; the Head almost never met Voorhoeve. Neither was there a particularly regular pattern of reporting. The Head reported to the Minister via the CDS and the Secretary-General. The Head always sent memos destined for the Minister via the Secretary-General, as in December 1994, when it was reported to Voorhoeve that the VRS and Croatian Serbs had approximately 140 American Stinger anti-aircraft missiles at their disposal. The presence of these arms could represent an additional risk to Dutch air operations over Yugoslavia.⁵⁸⁹

The limited frequency of the contacts was partly due to the CDS's conviction that the Head of the MIS was under his authority. Voorhoeve changed this situation by summoning the Head directly on a couple of occasions. He had the impression that the CDS and the Secretary-General did not think this was normal. Voorhoeve requested the new Head, Knapp, to provide him with intelligence more regularly, and to draw up a periodic summary of all relevant international intelligence. This happened from mid 1995. Voorhoeve then received an Intelligence Summary (IntSum) two or three times a week.⁵⁹⁰ To sum up briefly, the MIS/CO played no central role in the 'daily political life' of the Ministers Ter Beek and Voorhoeve.

10. The MIS and Military Security

In addition to an intelligence component, the MIS/CO also had a security component in the form of the Military Security Bureau. On the one hand, its task came down to carrying out security investigations as part of the defensive counterintelligence task. The aim was to ensure the integrity and reliability of defence personnel. On the other hand, this bureau concentrated on collecting data that were necessary to guarantee military security. This consisted of gathering data on people and organizations that could possibly inflict damage on the security or readiness of the Armed Forces. A military security officer was therefore also responsible for activities that were geared towards protecting his own units (personnel and equipment) against sabotage, subversion, terrorism and espionage.⁵⁹¹ This was a combination of defensive and offensive counterintelligence work. Osint, Humint and Sigint were available for the execution of all these tasks.⁵⁹²

In order to carry out this task, the MIS/CO included a Counterintelligence and Security Department, and together with the Security Bureaus of the MISs of the three Armed Forces this formed the Security component. As with the intelligence component, the nature of the security task has changed drastically since the fall of the Berlin Wall. Although Russian services are still monitored, and account is still taken of antimilitarist actions, the attention has shifted somewhat. Foreign intelligence services were also active in areas where Dutch soldiers were deployed in peacekeeping operations and as such could constitute a threat.

The Counterintelligence Bureau within the Counterintelligence and Security Department had two components: a Counterintelligence Section with 3 analysts (from the Army, Navy and Air Force) and an Operations Section. In September 1992, the Head of the MIS, Duijn, made a start on setting up an Operations Department, under the control of the Counterintelligence Bureau. The formal objective of the Operations Department was the acquisition of high grade, not freely accessible information via Humint and technical resources. The operational activities consisted of planning, tracing, approaching, training, securing, running and controlling human sources, and using them with Humint-related technical resources.⁵⁹³ This section started with 12 and gradually expanded to 50 people. Originally it was only concerned with counterintelligence, but later it also became involved in intelligence gathering operations at home and abroad.

From the outset, the collaboration between the Counterintelligence Bureau and the Operations Department was not as good as it could have been. There were different views on counterintelligence work. The Operations Department also did not want to share all its intelligence with the Bureau, and allowed no access to its sources; only finished intelligence was issued. In August 1993, the Operations Department started drawing up an outline for taking over the tasks of the Foreign Intelligence Service (IDB). The MIS/CO Operations Department had a close relationship with the National Security Service (BVD). Within the MIS/CO, various sections within the counterintelligence domain were then merged to form a department of 24 people.⁵⁹⁴ Initially the Operations Department had nothing to offer in the way of intelligence. In connection with the rapidly escalating situation in Yugoslavia, the Head of the MIS therefore asked the Minister whether the MIS/CO could be permitted to take a more 'offensive' approach in other countries.

As outlined above, the Ministerial Committee for the Intelligence and Security Services (MICIV) had determined in 1993 to hand over the tasks of the IDB to the MIS and BVD and that in principle the MIS and BVD would only be allowed to use 'passive' human sources in the Netherlands. Only if necessitated by the national interest could 'offensive' use be made of human sources. In brief, actively recruiting agents and operating with agents and sources in other countries was subject to restrictions. The Head of the MIS at the time, Kok, therefore advocated a more active use of Humint, partly because the information position of the MIS/CO was insufficient. He also referred to the meeting of the Committee on the United Intelligence Services in the Netherlands (CVIN) of 17 February 1994. There it was established unanimously that, in view of the involvement in the conflict in Yugoslavia, the national interest was then such that a more active use of human sources was required. This might involve stepping up the interrogation in Bosnia of Displaced Persons, soldiers and other Dutch citizens stationed in the conflict region.⁵⁹⁵ However, Kok was not given the go-ahead to operate on a large scale in Bosnia. The memorandum to the Minister proposing an increase in foreign operations was a step in this direction, but Kok could have known in advance that permission would not be forthcoming.⁵⁹⁶ He would have to make do with the resources available.

Kok, then attempted to more or less 'neutralize' the Operations Department. In March 1994 he sent a memorandum to the Deputy CDS and senior Ministry of Defence officials. He argued that the structure and organization of the MIS/CO needed to be changed. Kok proposed a reorganization that offered the prospect of a structural solution to major problems in the Intelligence domain. In the short term, a number of emergency measures needed to be taken to fulfil the most elementary requirements demanded by the MIS/CO. He wanted a reallocation of resources and personnel. It was possible for the Counterintelligence and Security and Operations Departments to be put on hold temporarily. This entailed undesirable risks, but Kok estimated that these were less hazardous than allowing the existing situation to continue. He especially wanted to strengthen the intelligence position of the MIS/CO, and was apparently content to leave aspects of Military Security entirely to the MIS/Army.⁵⁹⁷

Ultimately, the proposals were not implemented, but in 1994 the Operations Department was still not in a position to gather intelligence on Yugoslavia. There were no sources or trained people. Subsequently, the Operations Department made cautious attempts to set up operations in other countries, but everything needed to be built up from scratch. The Operations Department mainly gathered tactical military intelligence. Given this state of affairs, the CIA and the SIS, the British foreign intelligence service, were consulted as to whether they could train personnel for Yugoslavia, but that plan also faltered. The Operations Department also wanted to use Dutch troops or local interpreters for gathering intelligence, but this again was blocked by the MIS/CO leadership, for fear of conflict with the MIS/Army.⁵⁹⁸ The Operations Department only got 'up to steam' after 1995. In 1996, the Operations Department had a total of 5 operational bureaux and an administrative department: three regional bureaux (Eurasia, the Middle East and Africa/the Far East/Western Hemisphere), a Maritime Information Bureau and a Special Assignments Bureau.⁵⁹⁹

The MIS/Army's Military Security Bureau

The problems in the relationship with the MIS/Army were not confined to the Intelligence domain; the Military Security sector was also affected. The MIS/Army counterpart to the MIS/CO Counterintelligence Bureau was the Military Security Bureau (MV), which had three detachments at its disposal in the Netherlands. The Military Security Sector was extremely important to the Army, and was also a priority for the Air Force and Navy.⁶⁰⁰ In 1992, the Counterintelligence and Military Security components of the MIS/Army were separated from each other, in what was experienced as a 'painful' process. Good Counterintelligence personnel suddenly found themselves confronted with Military Security work, and that was a whole different craft. In addition there was confusion about the division of tasks: what constituted Counterintelligence and what came under Military Security?

The following serves as an example. Some considered that issues such as drugs, prostitution and morale were a matter for the commander. Military Security disagreed: it saw such issues as part of its remit. In the process, people tended to forget that Military Security often paved the way for Counterintelligence. The two processes could not be cleanly separated and attempts to do so proved unworkable. The Military Security Section claimed much at that time, and although the relationship on the shop floor between the personnel of the Counterintelligence Bureau and Military Security was good, there was (as usual) a conflict at management level. As was the case in the Intelligence

Department, the Counterintelligence Bureau and Military Security personnel communicated with each other through informal channels because nothing could be exchanged officially.⁶⁰¹

One Military Security official was responsible for deployments to peacekeeping operations, a task which made up approximately 90% of his work. The Military Security Section took particular notice of conduct. The same was incidentally true of the Counterintelligence Bureau, but its approach was considerably influenced by its 'old' background. The Counterintelligence Bureau wanted to concern itself with deployments, and pay special attention to issues like threats, risks and preservation of integrity. This was not allowed and as a result, a considerable amount of security information remained within the confines of the Military Security Bureau, according to an official⁶⁰² of the Counterintelligence Bureau. There was a built-in mechanism for drawing a discrete veil over many issues.

The impression at the MIS/CO was that the main concern of the Military Security Section was to protect the image of the Army. All the MIS/CO was allowed to do was brief and debrief UNMOs, Royal Netherlands Marechaussee personnel that had worked for UNCivPol, and personnel from the European monitoring mission. The problem here was again that these were often Army people, who therefore had no wish to cooperate. The Marechaussee also resisted the involvement of the Counterintelligence Bureau. Dutchbat was claimed completely by the Military Security Bureau. The MIS/CO Counterintelligence Bureau was not allowed access. Its head was explicitly told so on two occasions: not a single Dutchbat soldier may be approached. Involvement with the big debriefing in Assen after the fall of Srebrenica was also forbidden. The Counterintelligence Bureau was allowed to pass on questions to MIS/Army's Military Security Bureau, who then reported back on the intelligence gathered, but no direct access to Dutchbat was given.⁶⁰³

This restricted access probably influenced the investigation into extreme right-wing statements or behaviour. From early 1993, a specific request was made to the Armed Forces and the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee to report such matters to the Counterintelligence Bureau. In the case of deployments within the framework of peacekeeping operations steps had to be taken to prevent the personal conduct of the personnel having repercussions on the duties of the deployed unit. It was necessary to identify defence personnel who were members of extreme right-wing organizations and factions, and record any incidents, which had taken place. In March 1993, the Head of the MIS, Duijn, gave his approval to the 'Extreme Right Project', and from that moment the Counterintelligence Bureau would specifically map this area out within the framework of the project.⁶⁰⁴

The MIS/CO was in no way involved in the deployment of Dutchbat. This was done by the Military Security Bureau. The Counterintelligence Bureau did not consider secretly building up its own information network. There was some internal discussion, but the fear of being compromised was too great. The Counterintelligence Bureau did occasionally have access to Dutch officers that had worked at BHC. The Counterintelligence Bureau, like the Operations Department, was also interested in interpreters and translators. An attempt was made to monitor them within UNPROFOR. These interpreters often worked for Balkans intelligence services, and they turned up in various places in Bosnia.

Involvement in controversial incidents

The Counterintelligence Bureau was also involved in the tins of rice affair. The tins were used in an attempt by Bosnian Muslims living in Germany to smuggle money to Muslims in Srebrenica. This was discovered when a package was sent to a Dutchbat sergeant who had already left. The package was then opened, and it was decided to distribute the tins among the Displaced Persons. Several tins were very underweight, and once they were opened, it turned out that they contained documents and money.

There were several tins involved, and they had been sent from the Netherlands to the enclave. After the fall of Srebrenica, the deputy commander of Dutchbat brought and handed over that money to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee, which collected the German Marks. The money was subsequently returned to the original source in Germany. This consignment was probably the tip of the iceberg.⁶⁰⁵

Furthermore, the Counterintelligence Bureau always requested that attention be paid to indications of services or favours being carried out in the Netherlands. In March 1995, there were a number of known incidents where amounts of money were brought into Yugoslavia from the Netherlands. These involved soldiers of the Army who were approached by Bosnian Muslims while on leave in the Netherlands and who were asked to take parcels back with them. In these cases amounts were known to vary from approximately DM 500 to DM 25,000. The soldiers involved were usually not told of the contents of the mail. The Dutch soldiers' home addresses were apparently obtained in the conflict region. In this area the MIS/Army and the BVD did cooperate.⁶⁰⁶ Sometimes, the Bureau received reports of this sort through the Military Security Section from the Dutchbat security officer.

The Counterintelligence Bureau kept track of which services were attempting to recruit in Bosnia. An attempt was even made by the CIA to recruit a Dutch UNPROFOR soldier. This matter was discussed thoroughly by the Bureau with the CIA. The Bureau also observed that the ABiH and VRS recruited intelligence officers who had lived in the Netherlands. It collaborated closely on counterintelligence with its foreign counterparts, who, surprisingly enough, often appeared to have had equally little access to reliable intelligence. The US Army Intelligence and Security Command was always grateful to the Counterintelligence Bureau for supplying it with good intelligence on extremist factions that were active in Yugoslavia.

The US services had little data on this. In fact, the Americans appear to have been milking their partners dry. This meant that the US services had a hard time in the beginning; apparently they had trouble adjusting to the new international relationships in which there was no clear enemy anymore. The Counterintelligence Bureau's collaboration with the Bundesnachrichtendienst was solid, as it was with the British Security Services Organization (BSS), a British MI-5 security service unit in Germany. Generally, however, the MIS/CO did not have much use for British services. They attended mainly to British interests in Bosnia, such as Gorazde, and gathered no intelligence that might be useful to other countries. In contrast, this was something that the Netherlands often did.⁶⁰⁷

The Counterintelligence Bureau reported regularly on the activities of paramilitary groups in Yugoslavia.⁶⁰⁸ It also examined the behaviour and the activities of Dutch mercenaries in the Balkans. They were mainly active in Croatia and involved in war crimes. For instance, the Dutch mercenary Johan Tilder was followed intensively, partly as a result of a failed attempt to gather intelligence from UNPROFOR. Tilder later died in Croatia. MIS personnel said he was 'auf der flucht erschossen' by local soldiers. Incidentally, the Counterintelligence Bureau passed on the available intelligence on mercenaries to the Yugoslavia Tribunal.⁶⁰⁹

There was also a Military Security Section in the MIS/Air Force. Its head was at the same time the Deputy Head of MIS/Air Force. Security in Vicenza was especially important; compartmentalization was thoroughly implemented there because of possible penetration. Account was constantly taken of aeroplane spotters.⁶¹⁰ An excellent opportunity for the MIS/Air Force to greatly improve its information position with respect to Eastern Bosnia presented itself when the Deputy Head of the MIS/Air Force was appointed deputy commander of Tuzla Air Base, which would play an important role in clandestine arms supplies⁶¹¹ to the ABiH in February 1995. In March 1995, the MIS/Air Force officer went to Tuzla and would remain there until November 1995. He was responsible for the preparations for opening the airfield as a UN air base. Surprisingly enough, nothing in the way of an order to gather intelligence was forthcoming in the wake of this posting. Of course, the events around Tuzla were not of direct interest to the Netherlands Air Force, but they were to the MIS/Army. This officer was therefore dispatched to Tuzla by the Air Force without any national order. It soon became clear that other nationalities had a different approach to intelligence. A team of the British SAS had its own section in the control tower, which was responsible for monitoring the ABiH and VRS communications traffic, and probably that of UNPROFOR. This was a locked room full of special equipment. The British special forces maintained daily contact with their headquarters in Bosnia via secure signals equipment. The Dutch officer had to make do with an open satellite telephone link via the Netherlands Air Force Operations Centre. Other links were also open and were easy for the ABiH and VRS to monitor.⁶¹²

Although the Military Security Bureau took the Dutchbat deployments entirely for its own account, the task proved more difficult in practice than had been outlined. The debriefing of Dutchbat soldiers turned out to be a source of constant fighting between the Military Security Bureau and the Army. It was regarded as normal for a doctor and a psychologist to be involved with the returning Dutchbat soldier, but a representative from Military Security was not tolerated at first. This changed later, and the returning soldiers were given a schedule of people to visit that included an officer of the Military Security Section.⁶¹³ The debriefings usually took place on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. The report was drawn up on Friday, and it was sent to General Couzy the same day. There was sometimes feedback, after which the debriefing could be steered in a certain direction. The Security Section had particular interest in issues such as missing documents, equipment, arms, and ammunition. The Head of the Bureau made a selection of the intelligence to send to Couzy. He also decided which information would reach the Counterintelligence Bureau. There was no standard procedure for sharing intelligence. Under the new head of the MIS/Army, Colonel H. Bokhoven, who held this position from 19 April 1994 to 15 December 1995, progress was made in this area. The reports of the Military Security Bureau then went via Bokhoven directly to his predecessor, Colonel Hans Bosch, the head of Couzy's Private Office. A Military Security officer admitted that the underlying order was indeed to keep the Army out of the wind. The Commander-in-Chief was looked to first, and only in the second instance was the Minister attended to. The Military Security Bureau's primary responsibility was to its Commander-in-Chief. The Military Security Bureau was ordered to report in cases where the image of the 'Firm' could suffer any damage.⁶¹⁴

In the area of military security too, the Military Security Bureau was not directed by the Commander-in-Chief. The Bureau did not report directly to the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee or the Public Prosecutor. This gave a Commander-in-Chief - in this case Couzy - the chance to examine an issue internally first, and possibly resolve it informally before the Marechaussee or the Public Prosecutor became involved. A grey area therefore existed in which, for example, there might be strong indications or even proof of criminal offences, but in which a commander or the Commander-in-Chief would refrain from communicating this to the Marechaussee or the Public Prosecutor. There were no rules or regulations on reporting criminal offences to the Marechaussee or the Public Prosecutor. The personnel of the Military Security Bureau admitted that they operated on a moral and legal slippery slope.

There was comprehensive discussion within the MIS/Army about the possible risks for soldiers in Bosnia, and the chance that Dutchbat soldiers could be approached, even before Dutchbat's departure. It was assumed that the Bosnian community in the Netherlands would attempt to take such action. When the smuggling of funds was discovered, this information was passed up the chain of command. The incident involving the tins of rice did not result in a criminal prosecution; Couzy decided no action was necessary.⁶¹⁵

The Military Security Bureau and Dutchbat

The Bureau thought it important to have its own representative in the enclave. Someone was assigned to this task in the deployment of Dutchbat I. However, Commander Vermeulen did not want him to go to Srebrenica, so that Military Security ended up having no contact of its own. They had no direct lines of communication of their own either, and everything was arranged through soldiers on leave who brought with them reports from the deputy S-2. Someone from the Bureau was attached to Dutchbat II, but his commander sent him to Simin Han, after which the Military Security Bureau again had no one in the enclave. Accordingly, there was little reporting on internal problems in DutchBat I and DutchBat II, while in contrast, there were many reports concerning internal problems in DutchBat III.

In mid 1994, a first signal was sent to senior officers of the Army that ‘this situation could not go on’; it was not possible to keep the Commander-in-Chief properly informed in this way. The Deputy CDS for Operations then issued a written instruction to the commander telling him to cooperate, and to give the Military Security Bureau all the space they needed from that point on. The Bureau’s representative was only to be allowed to carry out only military security tasks and no other activities. This only worked well in the case of the individual charged with this task in Dutchbat III, E.A. Rave. An additional advantage was that Rave and the Military Security Bureau officer responsible were old friends. They had worked together previously in an observation team. This officer went to Karremans and explained to him what Rave had to do. Rave occupied himself mainly with counterintelligence and security, and not so much with gathering intelligence.⁶¹⁶

Rave’s predecessor in Dutchbat II had given him the tip of working in the liaison team, because this would give him the most freedom of movement. Rave was also advised: ‘make sure that you get into the enclave’. This was certainly necessary since the lack of a Military Security representative had meant that the rules with regard to security in the enclave were extremely disorganized. Nonetheless Rave was given a role in Dutchbat III. Another important reason for Rave’s arrival was that Karremans was the first commander to understand the importance of such an officer. His predecessors found it unnecessary. The problem was that Rave had no special secure link, which prevented him from performing his duties optimally. The Army or MIS/Army apparently did not deem it as essential, which was remarkable (to say the least). Rave therefore often had to make all sorts of cryptic remarks on the telephone.⁶¹⁷ This gave the Military Security Bureau an incomplete picture of the situation in Srebrenica. In spite of this, Rave was regularly able to issue intelligence.

Preparation for the deployment

During a meeting in Assen, the Military Security Bureau gave a briefing prior to the departure of DutchBat III. In the period of Dutchbats I, II and III, this bureau was responsible for the military security aspects during the deployments. The briefings generally lasted two hours. After the briefing, there was another one from the Intelligence Department. It was observed that Karremans and his deputy Franken adopted a ‘tough’ attitude; they expected that the VRS would not even consider confining Dutchbat III to the enclave. ‘If necessary Dutchbat III would fight its way out’, according to Franken. The latter was often to be reminded of this tough talk later.⁶¹⁸

During the briefing, attention was paid to issues such as taking good care of personal property, not leaving personal documents lying around, not admitting interpreters to the Operations room, not entering into close relationships with the local population, not putting envelopes in the wastepaper basket, and so on. A warning was also given that the UNMO interpreters had a direct line to the local political and military leaders, and that everything that was discussed with them was passed on immediately.⁶¹⁹

Karremans said he already recognized this danger and had ordered the commander of the Operations room to keep an eye on the interpreters. Main reason: the Dutch could not be certain that the four interpreters were reliable.⁶²⁰ These doubts proved justified: one of them was a cousin of ABiH commander Naser Oric. This was confirmed by intelligence officer Wieffer. Dutchbat was aware that they had to exercise extreme caution where their interpreters were concerned. Dutchbat therefore ensured that the interpreters had only a limited amount of knowledge; they never entered the Operations room. They had to remain outside, were not allowed to look at the maps and could not attend certain discussions. The same was true of the cleaning ladies who were hired in. They were allowed to do certain things and not others. This had to do with security. According to Wieffer, this system was mainly geared towards keeping the ABiH at a distance and it functioned reasonably well. The ABiH was not to know what Dutchbat knew about them or what was being said left and right about the VRS. Wieffer thinks that Dutchbat dealt with this problem fairly well.⁶²¹

The Military Security Bureau or Counterintelligence Bureau did not investigate the background of the dispatched soldiers, including the battalion leaders. Staff of both Bureau's stated that they were never asked to investigate the pasts of Dutchbat soldiers, and Couzy never indicated to the MIS/Army that an extra check should be carried out on the battalion leaders. However, the Royal Netherlands Army did receive an offer to investigate the battalion leaders from the MIS/CO. It was not accepted.⁶²²

The military security of Dutchbat in the enclave

The next question concerns the state of affairs of Dutchbat's military security once the battalion arrived in the enclave. Much came to light during debriefings after the fall of Srebrenica. It is true that not all the personnel were debriefed after deployments, but attention was focused on key staff and soldiers who had experienced something specific. The list of people to be debriefed was drawn up in agreement with the unit's security officer, and sometimes with the staff officer for personnel or intelligence.

On their return, every soldier had to complete a form containing a number of specific questions. Questions were asked on the following: the function, loss or theft of arms and other equipment, contact with the warring factions, incidents, etc. Based partly on prior knowledge of the individuals concerned, this checklist determined who should be debriefed. After Colonel Bosch was appointed Head of Couzy's Private Office, it became customary to send General Couzy a report on a single A4 sheet of the most important items of information the very next day after a debriefing. Shocking matters sometimes emerged from these debriefings relating to security.⁶²³

For instance, it emerged from a debriefing of one Dutchbat soldier that the Opstina (the municipal council) assigned cleaners who spoke reasonable English or German. However, in spite of all the recommendations made by the Military Security Bureau, they were still allowed to clean the C Company Operations room in Potocari at the time of Dutchbat II. The Dutchbat soldier concerned found this rather surprising from a military security point of view. Yet the Operations room was cleaned twice a day by 3 or 4 women, and it was simply impossible to watch their every move. Patrol schedules, leave rosters, duty and guard schedules, and a detailed map showing the division into sectors all hung in the Operations room. There was also the communication equipment, and the logbook of incoming messages was left open in front of the radio. There were no classified documents or telexes, but there were UNPROFOR Military Information Summaries. A bag containing all the outgoing post from C Company also hung in the Operations room. The local employees also entered the weapons room and kitchen and so also knew much about stocks and the food situation.

A Military Security official observed after the debriefing that this was particularly disturbing. In the light of this knowledge, it was not surprising that family members of dispatched soldiers were approached by Yugoslavs who knew everything about the soldier concerned. Another problem was that all envelopes were thrown away in the wastepaper basket, which the cleaners emptied. The addresses of the senders were written on the envelopes. This is how it came about that the home front was approached with requests to smuggle money. The cleaners were also in a position to make copies of leave lists, and in this way put together a picture of who was about to leave the enclave. No one was checked on leaving the compound, except for some hand baggage.⁶²⁴

Did the arrival in the enclave of a Military Security officer with Dutchbat III mean an improvement in military security? In any case, Rave soon noticed that the Bosnian Muslims were very well informed about the personal background of the battalion leaders. Rave knew, for example, that the deputy commander Franken was keen on horse riding, and shortly after Dutchbat III arrived in the enclave an invitation arrived from Oric for Franken to go riding. Rave wondered how Oric had found this out.⁶²⁵ It was also remarkable that the buildings and rooms that were in use by Dutchbat in Srebrenica and Potocari were never 'swept', so that it was unknown whether they contained hidden microphones. Only after the summer of 1995, during the periods of IFOR and SFOR, was this done. One such 'sweep' did indeed uncover a microphone at the later headquarters of Dutch soldiers in Bosnia. The battalion leaders operated from the office of the manager of an old flourmill. He called in occasionally to look through his old accounts, and while he did so he locked the room for approximately one hour.⁶²⁶

The Bosnian security service attempted to gather intelligence in the units. For instance, Dutch UNPROFOR soldiers were sometimes questioned during 'social patrols' by people who probably worked for this service. The Bosnian Muslims also attempted to gather information by other methods. One day, a local artist offering paintings appeared outside the Support Command compound fence in Lukavac. In order to buy one, the Dutch had to write their name, rank, registration number and home address on a list. This 'artist' was probably an ABiH intelligence man.⁶²⁷ Rave immediately intensified the military security in Srebrenica. Even before Dutchbat III arrived, there were reports that the interpreter for the transport battalion operations officer was typing out letters in his office. This was definitely against Rave's wishes, and indeed security risks of this nature did not occur in practice during Dutchbat III.⁶²⁸

The floppy disk affair

Nevertheless, a remarkable incident still took place, brought to the attention of the NIOD by a former officer of the MIS/Army Intelligence and Security Department.⁶²⁹ When Dutchbat departed for the Netherlands via Zagreb after the fall of Srebrenica, the equipment was left behind in the Croatian capital. During an inspection of the vehicles, a Dutch UNPROFOR officer encountered a chaotic scene: maps, documents and personal effects were all mixed up together. They were collected, put into a couple of large envelopes and taken away. Three members of the Military Security Bureau met the UNPROFOR officer concerned at Amsterdam Schiphol Airport, and the material from the Dutchbat APCs was handed over to them.

One envelope contained several floppy disks. The floppy disk in question (probably one of several floppy disks) contained part of the archive of Dutchbat's internal and external communication traffic. This was stored on floppy disks because the computer's hard disk was erased after the fall of Srebrenica, in order to prevent it falling into the hands of the VRS. On 12 July, Franken was ordered by the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff to ensure that as little as possible fell into VRS hands. The highest priority was the destruction of computers, laptops and satellite communication equipment.⁶³⁰ However, this instruction did not prevent material ultimately falling into the hands of the VRS. In total, equipment worth more than 31 million guilders, including 5 million guilders in communications equipment, was lost, destroyed or taken by the VRS.⁶³¹

One of Karremans' last messages was found on one floppy disk, translated into Serbo-Croat. It was message TK 95114 to Janvier, Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Sector North East, Voorhoeve and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, in which he reported on his meetings with Mladic on 11 and 12 July. In it, Karremans announced that he was not in a position to protect the Displaced Persons and his own battalion, that at that time he was unable to identify a suitable representative among the Displaced Persons, and also no ABiH representative, because the ABiH was in the process of attempting to open a corridor to Tuzla. How this translation had found its way onto the floppy disk was a mystery to interviewed MIS personnel.⁶³² If there was a question here of espionage or of a far-reaching breach of security in the compound, the translator would have had access to one or more stand-alone Dutchbat computers. This individual may have been working for an intelligence or security service of the ABiH or the VRS.

The head of the MIS/Army, Bokhoven, was on holiday in these days in July. He said his deputy never informed him of this incident. He acknowledged immediately that this should have happened because of the potentially compromising nature of this fact. The Chief of Staff of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, Colonel Dedden, was informed on 12 August 1995 by the MIS/Army about a document in Serbo-Croat found in a Dutchbat vehicle in Zagreb. However, Dedden was unfamiliar with the existence of such a floppy disk.⁶³³

The discovery of the floppy disk would appear to be astonishing. It raises the question of who translated the text and who ordered it. The interpreters were fluent in English, and were in a position to convey the substance of the discussions as well as the requirements of Mladic verbally or in writing to the highest authorities in Srebrenica. The incident also raises the question of whether this translator had long had access to Dutchbat's internal communication system or to Karremans' laptop. It has been established that many interpreters regularly worked for intelligence and security services and had a duty to report to the ABiH.⁶³⁴ Since the discovery of the floppy disk was never reported to the Head of MIS, he never ordered the matter to be investigated. Karremans stated that he himself knew of no diskette from Zagreb, nor of the translation of one of his own messages. Neither had he given instructions for anything to be translated: 'Why should I?'⁶³⁵

This answer from Karremans is remarkable, because one of the interpreters of the UNMOs stated before a Bosnian State Committee that on the morning of 12 July he was translating a letter that Karremans had sent to Janvier and the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff in The Hague. The interpreter did not make clear who had instructed him to do so.⁶³⁶ Deputy Battalion Commander Franken was equally unaware of this translation.⁶³⁷ Rave also had no explanation for the translated TK 95114; according to him, Karremans normally wrote this sort of message on his own laptop in his Ultimately, it was the Dutchbat officer, Major P. Boering, who was able to give a possible explanation. He immediately associated this incident with the preparation of the Displaced Persons’ delegation for the meeting with Mladic on the morning of 12 July. Information was given to the interpreter in connection with this meeting, and he had attempted to phone members of the Bosnian government. With this in mind, the interpreter was given a desk and a telephone.⁶³⁹ But still no answer has been given to the question of how the text came to be on the floppy disk. It may have been that the interpreter was also permitted to translate this letter on the laptop. In this case there was therefore probably no question of espionage or of a far-reaching breach of security in Dutchbat III.

11. Conclusions

The information position of the Dutch intelligence and security services at the start of the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia was neither strong nor unique. In this area, the Foreign Intelligence Service (IDB) no longer played any significant role, as the service was on the point of being disbanded. During the deployment of soldiers to Bosnia, the Netherlands therefore had no independent foreign intelligence service of its own, which meant that the government was deprived of a potentially important information source. According to various intelligence officers, this was regrettable during the war in the Balkans.⁶⁴⁰ They were of the opinion that each state that cherishes its sovereignty and independence must have not only a diplomatic service and armed forces, but also an intelligence organization of its own. The voice of a state that does not have such a facility counts for less in the choir of nations. As Peter Hennessy once said: ‘Intelligence is without question an influence-multiplier in the sense that it enables a state to apply its other instruments of influence more effectively’.⁶⁴¹ One could add to this that a nation also has a duty to protect its sons and daughters from the consequences of having no intelligence. It is not just about taking a place at the table of nations, it is about honouring those who sacrifice on their nation’s behalf. A well-functioning IDB could have played an important role in gathering intelligence on Bosnia. As things were, only scant intelligence was available.

The National Security Service (BVD) concentrated on domestic security. After all, the stationing of Dutch soldiers in Bosnia could have consequences for state security and the democratic rule of law. With hindsight, that threat was not as bad as might have been expected. Serb, Bosnian or Croat secret services were all but inactive in the Netherlands, and hardly carried out any operations. Attempts were made on a limited scale to raise funds or to send arms and ammunition to the region. The service did keep close track of whether mercenaries were recruited and who was responsible for this. The BVD was also very much occupied with mapping out politically related crime among ex-Yugoslavs, and investigating whether this was geared towards supporting the war effort of states and militias.

In 1995, the service established that the developments in the former Yugoslavia had only limited consequences for state security. The changed situation in the Balkans prompted only a muted response among the ex-Yugoslavs. This did not develop into organized political activity. The fear of a horizontal threat (within the Yugoslav community) and a vertical threat aimed against Dutch subjects and institutions receded sharply. After the expulsion of two Serb intelligence officers, the BVD continued to pay attention to monitoring and influencing activities on the part of the Serb embassy. The remarks made in 1994 about a criminal network with political connections were more or less withdrawn. Organized crime may have been a phenomenon to be taken seriously, but there were hardly any indications of continuous guidance from political power centres in the former Yugoslavia. For this reason, the BVD decided not to start its own investigation in this area. The only perceived danger was to the staff of the Yugoslavia Tribunal, but with only a few exceptions this threat was never serious in nature.

Intelligence had to come mainly from the MIS/CO and the Military Intelligence Services of two of the three branches of the Armed Forces: MIS/Army and the MIS/Air Force. It must be concluded that the information position was neither unique nor special. This did not change after the departure and stationing of Dutch soldiers in Bosnia. The MIS/CO had no special sources and the same was true of the MIS/Army. No Humint operations were executed, since such operations were not permitted by senior Ministry of Defence officials. Another tool for gathering intelligence from Dutch soil, Sigint, could not be used optimally because of technical obstacles. However, technical obstacles did not apply to DutchBat. Like nearly every other contingent they could have brought some tactical capability with them. Except for the Bangladeshis, Kenyans, Nepalese, and maybe the Indonesians, practically every other contingent had some sort of capability. As outlined above, this was not a technical problem, but a political problem, which prevented DutchBat from being able to protect themselves.

In this respect, the intelligence services of other countries were also unable to fill the void because they too had little intelligence available or had other priorities and areas for attention. Statements by the Ministers of Defence that the MIS analyses did not rise above the average level of the International Herald Tribune do no justice, however, to the quality of the many products that, in spite of all the internal and external problems, were actually supplied. What the Ministers were mainly given to read were the MIS/CO analyses, but this service was at a constant disadvantage relative to the MIS/Army. The MIS/Army, for example, ultimately had a clear insight into the order of battle of the warring factions and was definitely in a position to supply good political-strategic analyses. The same applied for work such as the Deny Flight Intelligence Summary supplied by the MIS/Air Force. However, the supply of information could have been much better, and this is a view shared by many MIS personnel.

Intelligence liaison was further obstructed because the Dutch intelligence and security services had little material to share. There was no intelligence input from Dutchbat, because no serious intelligence-gathering structure was set up with respect to the battalion. The local population was a potentially important source of information but contact with them was reduced to a minimum, particularly under Dutchbat III. Not only did this mean that Dutchbat itself remained deprived of potentially important intelligence, but neither could anything be passed on to Sector North East, Bosnia-Herzegovina Command or The Hague. This meant that on many levels political and military policymakers were groping in the dark. Another contributory factor was the awkward contact between Dutch staff officers and troops under UNPROFOR command. Other nationalities had less trouble with this and they did provide their respective capitals with information. Apparently, the instruction from New York that 'while serving the UN, officers must follow the UN Chain of Command and respond to orders from the UN, not from their national governments' was taken extremely literally.⁶⁴² Dutch UNPROFOR soldiers operated as prescribed: intelligence was not to be gathered within a UN context, although certain staff officers sometimes did issue intelligence directly to the Defence Crisis Management Centre. In this respect, the Netherlands was in fact more righteous than its UN masters.⁶⁴³

The information position of the military services was also weakened by the mutual infighting. This sometimes took place between the BVD and the intelligence services, but also within the MIS itself. There was also an element of competition between the various MISs. For many years, the MIS was an 'island kingdom; one service in name but in reality fragmented, difficult to manage, barely transparent and poorly understood', according to the former director of the MIS, Major General J.A.

⁶⁴² Everyone was reminded of this at the end of 1995: MoD, Archive, Operations file, BL-S, Biegmans to Foreign Affairs, No. 1205, 07/12/95.

van Reijn.⁶⁴⁴ It is likewise clear that the information position of the MIS/CO, which had to advise the Minister, the CDS and senior Ministry of Defence officials, constantly lagged behind that of the MIS/Army. Raw intelligence was often held back by senior MIS officers in the Armed Forces, who attended first to the interests of their own branch of the Armed Forces and their own Commander-in-Chief. In this sense, it reflected the relationship between the senior RNLA officers and the Central Organization as a whole. Here too, there was no question of a regular exchange of information, and the Minister complained about the paltry amount of intelligence that reached him from the Army.

This mutual infighting had a significant influence on the coordination and rapport between the MIS analysts. In the period up to 1996, there were serious problems at the MIS as a consequence of the 'independence' of the departments in the Armed Forces; management problems as a consequence of the lack of insight into these departments; a lack of insight into the effective use of personnel and material resources; lack of clarity among foreign intelligence services as a consequence of diffuse and fragmented deployment of the Dutch intelligence services. The tensions between the intelligence services worked to the considerable detriment of their information position. Only after Srebrenica did the realization dawn that the MIS could not continue in this way. It also needs to be said, however, that political, administrative or military guidance was also sadly lacking. An anti-intelligence attitude prevailed in The Hague as regards the use of intelligence and security services in peacekeeping operations in a UN context. There was no insistence from senior Army officers that additional intelligence be gathered, and no control was asserted. What is more: no role whatsoever was set aside for the MIS/Army. Senior Ministry of Defence officials also asserted no control or showed any special interest in the work of the MIS. No additional financial or other resources became available, and they had to make do with what they had. The Minister's interest in the work of his service did not increase significantly, and in any case no specific requests were made for threat or risk analyses prior to deployment. The MIS/CO and the MIS/Army were not consulted by the Minister and senior military officers regarding the deployment. Once the decision had been taken, the service was not given additional equipment to step up its efforts. The cutbacks in the Armed Forces appear to have been more important than obtaining additional intelligence that could have been important to the security of the Dutch soldiers in Bosnia. There was no sign of heightened awareness at the Ministry of Defence in terms of evaluating this situation.

The same was true of Parliament. Neither before the decision to deploy nor after the actual deployment did Parliament insist on an improvement in the Dutch information position in the field of intelligence. Intelligence and security services played no significant role in Parliament either. Parliament even thought it unnecessary to inquire cautiously about the information position. The same applied to the press: there too, intelligence and security services played no role. If they had done, it would possibly have been a reason for the Ministry of Defence to do something structural about it. In terms of structural consideration of the use and availability of intelligence, the Netherlands is a 'poor' country. No enthusiasm existed for carrying out serious intelligence gathering. This is regrettable, because former GCHQ employee Michael Herman rightly pointed out that good intelligence acquired by civilian and military intelligence services puts a country in a position 'to punch above its weight'.⁶⁴⁵ There was apparently no such need in the Netherlands.

When a senior foreign intelligence official did read a draft of this study chapter his comments were very harsh. 'Where Dutch policymakers, military leaders and lower ranking military personnel were derelict in their duty, and failed to take the least effort at remedial action, some heads should roll'. He added to this: 'Leaders knew the risk, sent those young boys in there with nothing but their spoons. Commanders knew it, and made it worse. General officers in UN positions of influence went out of their way to spit on those who may have been able to help. And they're spitting still'. He finished with this remark: 'They failed to act in anticipation of the known risk, they stood by idly as the facts became Secret arms supplies and other covert actions

1. Introduction

There is an element that, strictly speaking, has no connection with all the activities surrounding the gathering of intelligence, but is intertwined with it: covert action (special or clandestine operations). Covert action involves secret activities oriented to influencing foreign governments, persons and organizations, or political, economic and military developments for the benefit of a country’s own national security policy. A crucial point is that the country’s own involvement remains strictly secret.

There are various forms of covert action, ranging from propaganda, paramilitary or political activities oriented to overthrowing or supporting a given regime; secret support to individuals or organizations (trade unions, newspapers and political parties); secret arms supplies; economic destabilization operations, and lethal attacks.⁶⁴⁹ Covert action is therefore concerned with attempts to influence or to manipulate a country’s political policy. Strictly speaking, it is not an activity that falls within the definition of intelligence, although it can contribute to intelligence gathering.⁶⁵⁰ Covert operations took place throughout the world during the Cold War.⁶⁵¹

In this chapter, we will investigate which secret activities were carried out during the war in Bosnia. Attention will be paid to the resources that foreign services threw into the fray to support or to weaken one of the warring factions. In this, little or no attention will be paid to forms of covert action such as propaganda, coup attempts and assassination attempts. The reason is simple: so far nothing has been discovered on these activities. However, there will be a comprehensive discussion of one of the traditional resources in secret operations, the clandestine arms supplies to one of the warring factions. Such an operation, involving foreign services, was the secret arms supplies to the Bosnian army from Iran through what was known as the ‘Croatian pipeline’, which we will return to in Section 2. We will consider the role that the United States played in this.

Section 3 will go into further detail on the so-called Black Flights to Tuzla. In addition to Iran, other countries were actively involved in secret operations to supply the Armija Bosna i Hercegovina (ABiH) with weapons and ammunition. Section 4 will describe what has become known about the logistical military support to the other warring factions, Bosnian Serbs and Croats, and the associated role of Serbia and other countries. We will also pay attention to the ICFY Monitoring Mission that was

The same is true of counterintelligence (CI), which can best be defined as the identification and neutralization of the threat coming from foreign services and making attempts to manipulate these services and to use them for a country’s own benefit. CI is more a specific form of intelligence, and it also includes the gathering of information on foreign services, which may be either hostile or friendly services. CI also makes use of open and clandestine sources to gain information on the structure, working method and operations of these services. CI can also involve the penetration and destabilization of such services. See: Roy Godson, ‘Counterintelligence: An Introduction’, in: Godson, Intelligence, pp. 1-2. Further: Randall M. intended to monitor the border crossings on the Drina river. Section 5 will discuss the deployment of mercenaries. Much press attention has been devoted to the Mujahedin, who were said to have taken part in the conflict in substantial numbers on the side of the ABiH: numbers ranging from 1000 to 3000 Islamic fighters were mentioned.⁶⁵² Attention will also be paid to the deployment of mercenaries, including Dutch ones, by the other parties. Section 6 will deal with the deployment of Special Forces, such as the British SAS. The final section will present the conclusions.

2. Arms supplies to the ABiH: the Croatian pipeline

When the Security Council adopted resolution 713 on 25 September 1991, a document was on the table that requested every member state to stop supplying weapons and military goods to the warring factions from their own territory to the Balkans. It was the first Security Council resolution dealing with an embargo, three months after the outbreak of the conflict in Slovenia. By that time, various arms transactions had already been discovered. In early 1991, the Bosnian Minister of the Interior personally started purchasing Kalashnikovs and ammunition in Vienna.⁶⁵³ On 15 August 1991, Russian-manufactured Kalashnikovs, American M-16 rifles, anti-tank grenades and rocket launchers destined for Yugoslavia were intercepted. The same happened in November. Furthermore, weapons that had first been delivered to Lebanon were sold off by this country because of the 'relative quiet' there. Various lots were bought back by Yugoslavia.⁶⁵⁴ The German foreign intelligence service, the Bundesnachrichtendienst, was also said to be involved in arms supplies to Croatia via Hungary.⁶⁵⁵ At that time, the Bosnian Serbs had allegedly already received weapons.⁶⁵⁶

Resolution 713 did not imply that member states also had to stop the supplies from third party countries to the region. An enforcement mechanism for resolution 713 was adopted only in November 1992 via resolution 787. This called on the member states, individually or jointly via regional agreements, to stop the import by sea. The arms embargo was further tightened by the UN on 30 May 1992. On 9 October 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 781, which imposed a ban on military flights over Bosnia that had not been approved in advance. This was the well known No Fly Zone resolution. According to the mediator Lord Owen, his lobbying for the No Fly Zone resolution was partly inspired by his fear that Iranian aircraft would land at Tuzla Air Base, and the Bosnian Serbs would retaliate by stopping all humanitarian relief to them.⁶⁵⁷ In spite of all the resolutions, UNPROFOR was not given the mandate to monitor or enforce violations of the arms embargo on land,⁶⁵⁸ NATO and the WEU did do so at sea.

On 31 March 1993, the Security Council adopted resolution 816 to enforce the earlier resolution 781. It permitted military action by the UN against 'fixed wing and rotary aircraft', if permission was given by UNPROFOR. NATO Council imposed a No Fly Zone above the former Yugoslavia to monitor flight movements, and within the framework of Operation Sharp Guard, a fleet on the Adriatic Sea attempted to apprehend and inspect all suspicious vessels. Nonetheless, all the warring factions attempted to purchase weapons, ammunition and military equipment from abroad and to import them into the region.⁶⁵⁹ The question now is what military impact these secret weapons supplies had on the events in Yugoslavia.

The supplies were firstly a violation of the arms embargo imposed by the international community on the warring factions. The embargo was officially sanctioned by the Security Council. The supplies to, for example, the ABiH, could be interpreted by the other warring factions, such as the Vojska Republika Srpska (VRS, Bosnian-Serb Army) and the Hrvatsko Vijeće Odbrane (HVO, the Croatian Defence Council, the army of the Bosnian Croats) as a violation of the embargo, and thus could provoke a military response. In retaliation, the VRS could shell airfields with tanks, mortars or artillery so as to impede the supply.⁶⁶⁰

The supply of arms to the warring factions also affected the stability in the region, and in many cases inflamed the armed conflict. It is no coincidence that military equipment was often delivered a few weeks before the start of new large-scale offensives by the ABiH, VRS or Croats. This often went according to a fixed pattern: clandestine supplies; training, possibly supervised by instructors, for operating the new weapons; and subsequently the start of military offensives. Logically this could lead, or did lead, to situations in which UN troops were put in immediate mortal danger. After all, the UN troops' task was to control or monitor these airfields.

Finally, the secret operations are of interest because various statements pointed to the conclusion that the clandestine supplies usually led to rapid transit to the eastern enclaves, such as Srebrenica and Zepa. The VRS complained that the supply of new weapons usually facilitated new sorties from the enclaves into Bosnian-Serb villages and military positions, which in turn provoked a response from the VRS. This action-reaction cycle again put UNPROFOR troops in danger. In the enclaves, the ABiH actually all too often used the Observation Posts (Ops) as a cover in military actions against the VRS. It is important to reconstruct the secret arms supplies from Iran via the 'Croatian pipeline' and the Black Flights to Tuzla, because this will make clear that different NATO member states had different political and military views on the possible consequences for the UNPROFOR troops on the ground.

The background to the Croatian pipeline

On 4 September 1992, the CIA discovered an Iran Air Boeing 747 at Zagreb airport. Subsequent investigation revealed that the jumbo jet was loaded with weapons, ammunition, anti-tank rockets, communication equipment and other military equipment, such as uniforms and helmets, destined for the ABiH in Bosnia.⁶⁶¹ President Tudjman informed mediator Lord Owen accordingly. Apparently, he rejected Iranian involvement.⁶⁶² The Bush administration protested in Zagreb and the arms were confiscated, after which Croatia appeared to stop all further clandestine arms transport via Zagreb.

On 29-30 October 1992, Bosnian President Izetbegovic paid a visit to Teheran and entered into an agreement according to which Iran would again attempt to supply necessary goods via Zagreb. Turkey and Saudi Arabia also offered assistance but attached the condition that Izetbegovic should not request assistance from Iran. This did not dissuade the Bosnian from reaching an agreement with Teheran.⁶⁶³ According to officials of an European intelligence service, Izetbegovic was a president who was less tied to the apron strings of the United States than everyone thought.⁶⁶⁴ At least the former chairman of the British Joint Intelligence Committee, Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, was of this opinion.⁶⁶⁵ After Croatia had normalized its diplomatic relations with Iran in April 1992, it was represented in Teheran by the Croatian Muslim Osman Muftic, who elaborated the details of the agreement with the Bosnian ambassador in Teheran, Omer Behmen, and a confidant of Izetbegovic, Hasan Cengic.

On 1 November 1992, an Iranian Boeing 747 landed in Zagreb with sixty tons of 'humanitarian goods'. A few days later the Iranian religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei donated $ 3.3 million to Sarajevo. At the end of November, the Iranian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Ali Akbar Velayati, paid a visit to Zagreb to discuss the further logistical details.⁶⁶⁶ This was surprising, because in this period there was heavy fighting between Croatia and Bosnia.

Perhaps Bonn put pressure on Zagreb to cooperate. Close connections happened to exist between the German Bundesnachrichtendienst and the Iranian services. For example, this German service allegedly supplied computer hardware to Teheran, and it trained Iranian intelligence officers in Munich in 1992.⁶⁶⁷ In the same period, a variety of clandestine arms supplies were set up for Croatia and Bosnia by Croatian Catholic relief organizations. They ran via Ludwigshafen under the leadership of Father Johannes, and involved walkie-talkies, helmets, sleeping bags, field kitchens and uniforms, which mainly came from old stocks from the GDR.⁶⁶⁸

On 19 January 1993, the Dutch Permanent Representative to NATO, Jacobovits, reported that his British colleague had announced that the United Kingdom had made démarches in various capitals in connection with large-scale violations of the arms embargo. Certain Islamic countries were then said to be in the process of collecting hundreds of millions of dollars for providing the ABiH with a serious offensive military capacity. The arms had to be purchased before a resort was made to enforcing the No Fly Zone.⁶⁶⁹

Clinton on the stage: American initiatives to lift the arms embargo

Around the time of the inauguration of President Bill Clinton, on 20 January 1993, the ABiH was in a poor position militarily, partly because the fighting between Croatia and Bosnia had flared up again. However, Clinton had a much more positive attitude towards the Bosnian issue than his predecessor, Bush, and during his presidential election campaign he argued for lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian Muslims. The future Vice-President Al Gore especially was a supporter of tough politics in the Balkans and the arming of the Muslims.⁶⁷⁰ According to the later Secretary of State, Madeleine Albright, a sense of frustration was felt during the election campaign because of the Bush administration's Bosnia policy. Little attention was paid to Bosnia under President Bush. His priorities were the Gulf states and Somalia rather than holding Yugoslavia together. For ideological and political reasons, Bush explicitly opposed any further involvement with the developments in Yugoslavia. The Clinton campaign capitalized on this.

Differences of opinion existed in the American administration under Clinton about the extent to which they should become involved in the conflict in Bosnia. There were different ideas, because some (including Albright) had 1938 Munich as a frame of reference in their heads, while others had Vietnam. Everyone did realize that the Balkans would provide the United States with better access to the Middle East. They also looked at the united Europe and constantly asked why the United States always had to take care of everything. The Clinton administration therefore also looked more often to the UN, which had expressed its concern about the conflict. Albright remained opposed to lifting the arms embargo. According to her, this would serve no purpose whatsoever. The opposing pressure from Congress and the media to lift the embargo, should certainly not be underestimated.⁶⁷¹

The later National Security Adviser, Anthony Lake, was also already a supporter of a tougher Bosnia policy in the 1992 campaign. Lake had considerable experience with foreign policy. In 1969 he served on Henry Kissinger's staff and resigned in 1970 after differences of opinion with Kissinger on Vietnam, especially on the invasion of Cambodia. These experiences had formed Lake's ideas: there must be no involvement at all of American ground forces, because 'Bosnia is a much tougher neighbourhood'. For him, Vietnam was still the reference: 'Think ahead. Don't make commitments that you can't meet. And just don't wander into something.'

In his function, Lake constantly had to mediate in a wide variety of conflicts about Bosnia between and within ministries and intelligence services. The relationship between Lake and Christopher was also said to be under constant tension.⁶⁷² In the spring of 1993, Lake was closely involved in 'selling' the so-called lift and strike strategy, which advocated lifting the embargo and a more rapid and heavier deployment of air power. He discussed this proposal with Canadian officials, and said that his government envisaged only one option: 'lifting [the] arms embargo with arms going to Bosnian Croats and Muslims and air power to stop Serbian interference with these shipments.' According to Lake, lifting the arms embargo was the right path for the Americans. Training must be provided by a third party country, which must certainly not be the United States, but preferably a non-radical Arab or Muslim state. As far as Lake was concerned, any country except Iran could supply arms to the ABiH, preferably by lifting the arms embargo, but if necessary illegally.

Approximately 30,000 ABiH soldiers would be armed in the subsequent 3 to 5 months, starting with small arms. The force would slowly be built up from this basis. Germany would put pressure on the Croats to prevent them from claiming too large a share of the supplies that were to run through Croatia and were destined for Bosnia. Germany would also put pressure on Tudjman to prevent an attack by Croats on the Bosnian Muslims. Humanitarian relief should probably be stopped because of these supplies, but should be reinstated later once the ABiH had gained territory. According to Lake, the arms supplies would not prolong the conflict.⁶⁷³

Responses to the proposal to lift the arms embargo

This new approach was discussed with the United Kingdom and France. The response was somewhat predictable. London was fiercely opposed to supplying arms and ammunition, and Lake expected Paris to respond in an identical way. According to Lord Owen, the French view on the arms embargo on Bosnia was largely the same as that of the British. British diplomats were said to have reported from Paris that the American solution of lifting the arms embargo was the worst solution imaginable. Moving along this path would enable everyone to arm all other parties, which they said was sure to happen. Russian weapons would find their way to the Serbs, and the Islamic countries would respond in turn.⁶⁷⁴

A Canadian official asked Lake whether account had been taken of the safety of Canadian UNPROFOR and other troops on the ground, Lake's answer was a revealing and at the same time disconcerting: 'no'. According to Lake there were 'no easy answers. If he were back at college debating the issue he would take the no side.'⁶⁷⁵ In Ottawa, highly placed officials responded indignantly to Lake's statement.⁶⁷⁶ As a Canadian functionary in the same time remarked: 'We are back to a world of big power politics and that is not kind to nations like Canada. We are just another troop contributor now, and no one is asking our opinion'.⁶⁷⁷

Lake had evidently paid no attention whatever to the safety of the UN troops on the ground, and had accordingly also seriously underestimated the possible reactions of the Bosnian Serbs to lifting the arms embargo. According to the Canadians, most military analyses demonstrated that, even with sufficient arms, the ABiH would first require long-term training before any improvement in the command could occur. Ottawa, London and Paris, which all had ground forces in Bosnia, opposed this initiative. Although lift and strike was officially adhered to, it had now become clear to the American administration that it would not be feasible, partly as a consequence of criticism from Europe.⁶⁷⁸ The Chief Political Officer of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, Corwin, expressed it as follows:

'Any sign of lifting the embargo will encourage a wider war, and a wider war will mean more refugees. The main reason why the European powers are in the former Yugoslavia in the first place is to prevent refugee flows to their own countries'.⁶⁷⁹

As David Hannay, Britain's permanent representative at the UN from 1990-1995, acknowledged later, the failure to take decisive action at crucial moments in the conflict was more due to the tensions between those member states with troops on the ground and those like the United States without. Whilst anxious not to undermine publicly the impression of allied unity, many NATO allies with troops on the ground were markedly reluctant. According to Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, formerly chairing the JIC and later leader of the UK delegation at Dayton, Ohio, the allies for a long time frustrated each other and were unable either to convince others of their position, or to concede to a different viewpoint.⁶⁸⁰ And Boutros-Ghali cynically remarked: Washington devised a way to gain domestic political benefit from tough talk about air strikes, knowing that it was shielded from acting because its European allies would never agree to put their personnel serving with UNPROFOR in danger.⁶⁸¹

In the spring of 1993, there were various spheres of influence that affected the United States. After the Gulf War it was payback time for the United States: there was an expectation in the Arab world (especially Saudi Arabia) that Washington would support the Bosnian Muslims. Furthermore, there was great pressure on the American administration from the media and from Congress, which was dominated by Republicans. In June 1993, Clinton received the head of the Saudi Arabian intelligence service, Prince Turki al Faisal, who was a close adviser to his uncle, the King. The Prince urged Clinton to take the lead in the military assistance to Bosnia. The American administration did not dare to do so: the fear of a rift within NATO was too great. However, the United States did consider the Saudi Arabian signal to be important, and therefore a new strategy was elaborated. Its architect was to be Richard Holbrooke, who started to look for a way to arm the Bosnian Muslims. In the summer of 1993, the Pentagon - the American ministry of defence - was said to have drawn up a plan for arms assistance to the ABiH, which included supplies of AK-47s and other small arms. This operation was to demand almost three hundred C-130 Hercules transport aircraft flights. The weapons were going to have to come from former Warsaw Pact stocks. The plan was rejected, however, for fear that it would leak out and to prevent protest from the European allies.⁶⁸²

The Croatian pipeline in practice until the beginning of 1993

In the meantime, Iran, and by then also Turkey, supplied arms via Zagreb to Bosnia.⁶⁸³ In April 1993, there were again discussions on this subject in Teheran between Bosnian Muslims, Croats and Iranians, which were also attended by the Iranian President Rafsanjani and the Bosnian President Izetbegovic. Rafsanjani took this opportunity to offer to supply all old Russian weapons to Bosnia and Croatia, under the condition that the Bosnian Muslims arranged for the transport. There were still some rather sensitive issues between the two countries: during the visit Rafsanjani expressed indignation to the Croatian delegation about the bloodbath in Ahmici, a village in central Bosnia, where more than one hundred Muslims were killed by Croatian units on 16 April 1993.⁶⁸⁴

Arms and ammunition transport did not always proceed without a hitch. For instance, the Bosnian Prime Minister Silajdzic was able to recall an incident in February 1993 in which a delivery of Milan anti-tank missiles, destined for East Bosnia, was confiscated by Croatian militias. And the leader of the Bosnian Croats, Boban, told Vance and Owen frankly in March 1993 that he and Croatia had suspended the transit of arms because of the ABiH operations around Mostar.⁶⁸⁵ Boban had done so before, in July 1992.⁶⁸⁶

Sometimes the Croats sent a signal to Sarajevo referring to the dependence on the Croatian pipeline. For instance, a convoy of the relief organization Merhamet was intercepted in central Bosnia. It was transporting relief goods, but arms and ammunition were found under false floors. At the end of March, the two governments attempted to reconcile these problems: President Tudjman and President Izetbegovic reached an agreement in which Croatia would continue to transport arms in exchange for Bosnian electricity to Croatian Dalmatia. Tudjman visited Turkey in April 1993 in enhancement of this agreement. Furthermore, Croatia purchased Russian helicopters destined for Bosnia, which were properly delivered in Tuzla.⁶⁸⁷ As Sarajevo was very much aware of its dependence on Croatia, Izetbegovic visited Teheran again on 14 September 1993 to deepen the defence relationship.

Meanwhile Holbrooke⁶⁸⁸ was becoming increasingly frustrated that the Croatian pipeline was not progressing well. Lake once described Holbrooke as 'high-maintenance'⁶⁸⁹. Holbrooke therefore proposed to deliver arms and ammunition to the ABiH via third party countries. Lake, who had always welcomed such covert operations⁶⁹⁰, nonetheless found the plan 'too risky'. The Secretary of State, Christopher, shared this view. They did support 'lift and strike' but not 'lift, arm and strike'.⁶⁹¹ Holbrooke's proposals did lead to a debate within the administration. Clinton and State Department officials considered supplies via Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Pakistan. This was not new: in the 1980s, Saudi Arabia had already supplied arms worth $ 500 million via the CIA to the Mujahedin fighters in Afghanistan. There had also already been a close relationship with Turkey in the area of intelligence for some considerable time. For instance, there were various American monitoring stations in Turkey, and there was close collaboration of the Turkish domestic security service with the CIA and the FBI in opposing the terrorism of the PKK.⁶⁹² It was proposed at least three times between 1993 and 1995 to

Will the Americans support the Croatian pipeline?

The head of the Croatian intelligence service - the son of the Croatian president - Miroslav Tudjman, visited Washington DC in the autumn of 1993. He spoke there with James Woolsey, the director of the CIA, and others. The cynical Woolsey welcomed him with the words: 'I hear that you've discovered the best kept secret in Washington - that we have no policy towards the former Yugoslavia.' When Tudjman stated later to the director of the National Security Agency (NSA) that intelligence for a stable regional solution to the conflict should not be sought in Bosnia, but in Washington, the American stated: 'If something is a secret, we can discover it, but not if it's a mystery.' Whether Izetbegovic's earlier visit to Teheran was also on the agenda remains unclear, but in any case Tudjman opposed the involvement of Iran.⁶⁹³

Meanwhile, from mid 1993, the idea arose within the American administration of establishing a Muslim-Croat federation. Washington wanted to bring an end to the conflict between Bosnian Muslims and Croats. In early 1994, the frustrations in Washington increased, partly because of the VRS attacks on Sarajevo and Gorazde. On Saturday 5 February 1994, shortly after noon, a mortar shell exploded on Sarajevo's Markale market, close to the cathedral. As a consequence of the attack, approximately seventy people died and some two hundred were wounded. It was the heaviest attack on the city. Blood and severed limbs could be seen all around the market. Western television companies chose not to broadcast large parts of the available image material because it was too dreadful. Nevertheless, the pictures that were broadcast did have 'a transforming political impact'.⁶⁹⁴

The incident coincided with a reorientation of the policy of the major Western countries, and two new major players entering the Bosnian drama. In addition to the UN Secretary-General's special representative, Akashi, the new British Bosnia Hercegovina Commander (BHC) in Sarajevo, General M. Rose, had taken over the function on 21 January of the Belgian General F. Briquemont. It was already noticeable during the NATO summit of 9 and 10 January 1994 that the US administration was in the process of reconsidering its position on Bosnia. William Perry, who had succeeded Les Aspin as Secretary of Defense, and General John Shalikashvili, who as the new chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff had taken the place of Colin Powell, were more inclined to deploy air power than their two predecessors. During a visit by US Secretary of State, Christopher, to Paris on 24 January, the French government had also firmly insisted on a greater US involvement in the crisis in Yugoslavia. One week later, on 1 February, the British Foreign Secretary, Douglas Hurd, addressed Christopher in similar terms in Washington. What had happened on 5 February in Sarajevo market also eased the turnaround of the American administration to become more closely involved in Bosnia.⁶⁹⁵

The US diplomats Charles Redman and Peter Tarnoff were dispatched to Europe after the attack in Sarajevo. The message that they took with them was that the United States was prepared to cooperate towards peace in Bosnia, but at the same time wished tougher actions against the Bosnian Serbs; also, humanitarian convoys must also no longer be obstructed.⁶⁹⁶ A suspension of hostilities on 23 February and the formation on 13 March 1994 of the federation of Croatia and Bosnia, in which Redman played an important role, calmed the armed conflict.⁶⁹⁷

The role of the Croats

The Americans were aware that Iran had been supplying arms via Croatia since 1992, but that this had stopped or had been significantly reduced temporarily because of the conflict between Muslims and Croats in Bosnia. The establishment of the federation now offered an opportunity to reopen the Iranian pipeline. That, and the increasing American involvement, were important milestones in boosting the arms pipeline between Iran and Croatia. The Croatian Minister of Defence, Gojko Susak, also stated that in 1992 and 1993 the Americans still had no interest in the smuggling operations: 'The Americans never protested. When they asked, we would say that our original weapons were simply hatching babies.'⁶⁹⁸

The government in Zagreb was nonetheless divided on the transit issue, which was understandable, because Croatia and Bosnia had been involved in fierce fighting around Travnik and Zenica. This died down only after the establishment of the Federation in March 1994. On the other hand, Zagreb also needed arms and ammunition. At first, Croatia suffered the most under Security Council Resolution 713, in which every member state was requested to stop supplying arms and military goods from their own territory to the warring factions in the Balkans.⁶⁹⁹ However, Susak was a fervent supporter of Iranian supplies because, in spite of the conflict with the ABiH, by 'skimming' the consignments, many weapons could remain in Zagreb. Furthermore, with the new arms the ABiH could tie up Bosnian-Serb units and resources, so that they could no longer be deployed against the Croats.

Miroslav Tudjman and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mate Granic, were opposed to the resumption of the supplies, however. They feared an excessive Iranian influence and an intensification of the fighting between Bosnia and Croatia. President Tudjman nonetheless took Susak's side because the additional arms could ensure military successes. Tudjman need have no more worries that UNPROFOR would take action against the supplies: in spite of all the resolutions, there was no mandate to monitor violations or to enforce the embargo. Observers were not even allowed to inspect aircraft.⁷⁰⁰ Classified CIA documents to which the Los Angeles Times managed to gain access, proved that the American ambassador in Zagreb, Peter Galbraith, had already taken initiatives for supplies. In February or March 1994, he spoke with his CIA station chief about the option of secret arms supplies to Bosnia, to which the United States would turn a blind eye. The station chief reported this immediately to his headquarters.⁷⁰¹

On 16 April 1994, Galbraith spoke with the religious leader of the small Muslim community in Zagreb, Iman Sefko Omerbasic, who later informed the Iranian ambassador that American diplomats had urged him to purchase arms for the ABiH. The CIA managed to gain access to a report of this discussion, and they suspected that Galbraith was engaged in a secret operation.⁷⁰²

On 27 April 1994, the Croatian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Granic, visited the American ambassador, Galbraith. The Croatian government wished to reinstate the Iranian pipeline. Granic was still opposed to the supplies and urged Galbraith to say no. The following day, President Tudjman wished to discuss this with Galbraith. Tudjman wanted a formal answer to the question of how the Clinton administration would respond to a resumption of the supplies. Granic had expected Tudjman to accept a resumption of the supplies, as Zagreb wanted good relations with Washington. Galbraith, who was as frustrated as Holbrooke, thought that the supplies should be resumed. The next day, Galbraith had a brief discussion with Tudjman, who conveyed to him the Croatian request to consent to a resumption of the supplies.⁷⁰³

Later that day, Galbraith reported to the State Department: ‘This matter is time-urgent.’ He was referring to the fact that the Croatian prime minister, Mikica Valentic, was due to depart for Teheran on 29 April. Without an American ‘green light’ the trip was cancelled. Galbraith proposed using disguised Iranian Boeing 747s for the supplies. Half of the consignment of arms would be destined for Croatia and the other half for the Bosnian Muslims.⁷⁰⁴

The die is cast in Washington

Galbraith approached Alexander Vershbow, the Assistant Secretary of State for Bosnia, who passed the problem on to the Deputy Secretary of State, Strobe Talbott, and to Lake. Both understood the dilemma: the disadvantage was that Iran would be drawn into the region. This could have major consequences and could even cause the sudden collapse of the Muslim-Croat Federation. The advantage was that it would finally assure assistance to the Bosnian Muslims.

Meanwhile, State Department lawyers assessed the operation. They came to the conclusion that encouraging a foreign government to procure arms from Iran was not a secret action.⁷⁰⁵ Talbott and Lake decided to inform Galbraith that he had no instructions: ‘a deft way or saying that the United States would not actively object.’

On 27 April 1994, Lake and Talbott discussed this with Clinton on board Air Force One. It was then decided to give a green light to the arms supplies from Iran to Croatia. The opponents were thereby overruled: Christopher was confronted with a fait accompli, and CIA director Woolsey was not informed at all.⁷⁰⁶ According to Redman, Lake had ‘come around’ and he was the man behind the idea of supplying arms to the ABiH. The ‘No instructions’ instruction to Galbraith and Redman came from Lake.⁷⁰⁷ Doubts remained about Iran’s possible role, but the complete change in policy rapidly became clear.⁷⁰⁸

At first Galbraith did not understand the ‘no instructions’ message. He wondered whether it meant that he should give Tudjman the green light. He phoned the Europe chief of the National Security Council, Jenonne Walker, who then consulted Lake. Walker then phoned Galbraith back: ‘no instructions’ was what Lake had said to her but ‘Tony [Lake] was smiling when he said it.’⁷⁰⁹ On 28 April 1994, the architect of the Muslim-Croat federation, Charles Redman, accompanied by Galbraith, visited the Croatian president, Tudjman. Redman told him that Washington would have no objection to a clandestine channel through which arms would be transported to Bosnia. They told Tudjman specifically that they had ‘no instructions’ on this sensitive subject. Lake had again impressed upon the two American diplomats on 2 May that it was unnecessary to report on their ‘no instructions’ discussion with Tudjman to the State Department.⁷¹⁰

Tudjman did not understand this message at first, was confused and asked for clarification on the following day. Galbraith then said to him: ‘focus not only on what I had said yesterday but what I had not said.’ Redman was clearer: ‘We don’t want to be the ones who say no to this.’⁷¹¹ That was all Tudjman needed to hear and after talks with Izetbegovic he decided to take immediate action. From 29 April to 2 May 1994, the Croatian prime minister, Valentic, and the Bosnian deputy prime minister visited Teheran for consultations with President Ali Akbar Rafsanjani. A tripartite agreement was drawn up for arms supplies and humanitarian assistance to Bosnia.

Resumption of the arms supplies

The first consignment from Iran landed in Zagreb on 4 May, with sixty tons of explosives and military equipment on board. The arms were transported in Croatian army trucks along the Adriatic coast to Bosnia. The first consignment was probably an Iranian gift. Subsequently it appeared that Teheran wanted hard currency for the supplies. On 6 May, Ali Akbar Velayati visited Zagreb to discuss the further logistics arrangements. He travelled on to Sarajevo to present a cheque for $ 1 million to Izetbegovic. Because the supplies attracted too much attention at Pleso Airport in Zagreb, the flights subsequently went mainly to the Croatian island of Krk. Shortly after Iranian cargo aircraft had landed there, a number of Croatian helicopters arrived to continue transporting the load after dusk. Moreover, Albania was prepared to act as a transit port.⁷¹²

In the summer of 1994, the first reports started to arrive that the Croats and Bosnian Muslims had again travelled to Teheran to reach a new agreement. According to British diplomatic sources, a secret agreement was reached in Teheran between the Iranians and Croats in June 1994. The foundation for this was laid in May, during the Croatian prime minister's visit to Teheran. The following agreement was reached: Iran purchased five oil tankers and three cargo vessels from Croatia worth $ 150 million. Teheran was to pay this amount as follows: 25 percent in oil; 50 percent in cash and 25 percent in credit. In exchange, Iran would be provided unhindered access to Bosnia via Croatia. In this way, Teheran would initiate a flow of humanitarian relief and arms to Bosnia.⁷¹³ One consequence of the new US policy was that the British intelligence and security services stood alone in this phase because the American services no longer provided intelligence on violations of the embargo.⁷¹⁴

Not everything went smoothly with the supplies in practice, because a helicopter (an MR-8 MTV-I) exploded at Zagreb airport in the night of 4 December 1994. It was President Izetbegovic's personal helicopter, which was completely filled with ammunition and explosives. The official statement to UNPROFOR was that a tanker had exploded, and the European Monitoring mission, ECMM, was told that a pyromaniac had committed suicide.⁷¹⁵

The American assistant secretary Vershbow admitted to Dutch diplomats in July 1994 that he was aware of Islamic supplies and that part of the arms were handed over as 'bounty' to the Croats. He also expected that once the arms embargo had been lifted, a part of the American supplies would remain behind in Zagreb to ensure the cooperation of the Croats. He acknowledged that this could have negative consequences for UNPROFOR and the UN's refugee organization, UNHCR, but they would just have to be 'redeployed' somewhere else.⁷¹⁶ It was apparently that 'simple'.

The American division on the Croatian pipeline remains

After this secret agreement to resume arms supplies, the ball started to roll in the United States. The CIA gathered an increasing amount of evidence of Iranian arms supplies via Croatia to Bosnia, in the form of photos taken by spy satellites that revealed aircraft on Turkish airfields. Two days later, the CIA saw the same aircraft in Zagreb or other airports in Croatia. The aircraft flew via Turkey, where a stopover was sometimes made, before resuming the flight over the Black Sea via Bulgarian and Romanian air space to Zagreb, where the arms were unloaded. Part of the consignment was forwarded to Bosnia; Croatia was said to have received thirty per cent of the supplies. The CIA recorded approximately eight flights a month and also received reports from the Croatian intelligence services.

When the CIA got wind of the supplies, it produced a difference of opinion between the American ambassador Galbraith and the CIA station chief there. The station chief asked Galbraith to explain, and he answered that he was aware of the secret consignments from Iran; the station chief would just have to contact Miroslav Tudjman. The station chief would not be palmed off so easily. As a matter of fact, the State Department can covertly encourage anything the President tells them to. What would have been illegal was the involvement of the CIA without a 'written finding'. Covert diplomacy is not illegal. Covert action by the CIA is, however, illegal unless there is a finding. The station chief therefore asked Galbraith where the finding was, because without a finding he was not allowed to cooperate in the operations, which would then be illegal. If that was the case, it could have major policy consequences.

The chief of station raised the alarm with his headquarters in Langley, which subsequently wondered who knew about this at the State Department and in the National Security Council (NSC). A parallel was drawn with the Iran-Contra affair, which was also led from the NSC. The CIA wondered, although the ambassador can do what he wants, whether Ambassador Galbraith might have encouraged Tudjman to make requests for arms supplies. This fear would later be dismissed as unfounded by the Senate, but it did lead rapidly to speculations that the CIA had begun spying on State Department staff.⁷¹⁷ However, this fear proved to be correct. But the station chief in question had indeed decided to watch Galbraith's movements.⁷¹⁸ The station chief also became concerned because Iranian officials, who were apparently involved in the Croatian pipeline, visited the library of the United States Information Service, which was located immediately beneath Galbraith's office, daily. Out of fear of terrorist attacks, from then on only visitors with a membership card were allowed to enter the library, after which the Iranians disappeared.⁷¹⁹

According to Langley, a covert operation had indeed been started in which the CIA was not involved. In response, the CIA in Washington took action at the highest level. The director of the CIA, Woolsey, approached in succession Lake, Christopher, and Talbott. On 5 May 1994, Talbott told Woolsey 'the essence of what had been decided'.⁷²⁰ Galbraith had received no instructions. Incidentally, Woolsey later stated that he was not given the impression in this discussion that the policy on Iranian involvement changed with this instruction; although in practice this was definitely the case. According to a senior US intelligence official, Woolsey did not ultimately approach President Clinton. Once it was clear that the ambassador was acting on the authority of the White House and the Secretary of State and not off his own, the CIA interest stopped except to report the arms flows as intelligence.⁷²¹

Talbott told Woolsey that another reason for permitting the operations had been that the ABiH was at the end of its tether. The American intelligence community arrived at a different conclusion, however: it thought that the ABiH could retain the major part of Bosnia without needing military assistance. There were apparently divergent assessments of the power of the VRS versus the ABiH. According to Corwin, something else played a role in Sarajevo:

‘In fact, one of the great miscalculations of Serb military strength in the former Yugoslavia was made by Russian military intelligence (GRU). Out of a wish to strike a blow at NATO hegemony and out of revenge for having lost the Cold War, the GRU constantly overestimated the Serb’s ability after summer 1994, to withstand Croatian and/or Bosnian offensives’.

According to Corwin, the US administration also had a tendency ‘to overestimate the military strength of the Bosnian Serbs, at least publicly, albeit for different reasons’.⁷²²

In spite of the fact that the CIA had been bypassed in these operations, Woolsey offered to have the CIA set up the secret operation for smuggling arms to Bosnia, only if a finding was signed by President Clinton. But this was rejected: Lake still feared that it would leak out.⁷²³ Otherwise Lake appeared to have a pathological fear of leaks; he shared little information with others and was difficult to approach. He was nicknamed ‘the submarine’.⁷²⁴ Woolsey confirmed that he was not aware of a presidential finding, and that in May 1994 he went to the NSC, and later to the Secretary of State to obtain information on the supplies, but to no avail. Talbott told him that his station chief in Zagreb must do nothing and make no comment. According to the Assistant Secretary of State, it concerned a ‘policy decision of the US Government’; the president could after all ask an ambassador to do something.

Woolsey was surprised at this state of affairs; after all, the CIA had built up the necessary experience with covert operations. If policymakers were to have requested him to organize the secret arms supplies, then his service would have taken care of the execution, even if he was opposed to it: ultimately this was one of his duties. Woolsey:

‘We would rather have had control and could have done it better and without Iranian involvement (...) The CIA did not move weapons to Bosnia. We were perfectly willing to do that. We had enough experience in this field but the policy level did not want the CIA to do that’.⁷²⁵

The Senate concluded later in 1996 that Talbott should have explained the policy - not to block the transit of Iranian arms for Bosnia via Zagreb - more clearly to Woolsey. Meanwhile the Iranian arms supplies had indeed leaked out: on 24 June 1994, the Washington Times printed the story of the ‘wink’ towards Tadjman. The precise details remained rather vague for now.⁷²⁶

There were also suspicions regarding the Croatian pipeline within UNPROFOR. On 18 July 1994, Akashi reported that the Bosnian Muslims were receiving large quantities of new arms via Croatia, which was demanding financial compensation or a share of the goods. Akashi was unable to take any action against this because UNPROFOR was not even allowed to inspect the Iranian aircraft at Pleso Airport in Zagreb.⁷²⁷

Iran may well have been permitted to supply arms to Bosnia, but not to receive any arms itself. The fact that the CIA was not involved in the Croatian pipeline did not yet mean that Iran had a free hand: for instance, in August 1994 a shipment of advanced technology from Slovenia, destined for Iran, was intercepted in Vienna following a tip off from the CIA.⁷²⁸

In the summer and autumn of 1994, brainstorming continued at an informal level within the American government on the possibility of executing secret operations. Plans were elaborated for training the ABiH.⁷²⁹ An US ‘mercenary outfit’ was to arrange this training. This was carried out by Military Professional Resources Incorporated (MPRI), a company based in Virginia that employed various retired American generals and intelligence officials, such as the former director of the DIA, Lieutenant General Harry Soyster. With the consent of the State Department, MPRI trained the Hrvatska Vojska (HV, the Croatian Army) and later also the ABiH.⁷³⁰ MPRI’s role arose from the signing of the agreement between the United States and Croatia on military collaboration. By engaging MPRI, Washington also reduced the danger of ‘direct’ involvement.⁷³¹ Interestingly, DPKO was never officially informed about these activities of MPRI.⁷³²

Holbrooke, meanwhile appointed⁷³³ as Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs with the primary task of bringing an end to the war in Bosnia,⁷³⁴ was becoming increasingly actively involved with the option of secret arms supplies to Bosnia. In reality, he was against this, because of the danger for European ground forces in Bosnia. On 6 September, he met Akashi and stated ‘on a strictly confidential basis’ that he wanted to avoid the embargo being lifted, because of the far-reaching consequences for UNPROFOR on the ground. ‘He appeared to be genuinely looking for alternative policies’, according to Akashi.⁷³⁵

What these alternatives were would soon be apparent. When in October Holbrooke visited Zagreb, Galbraith told him about the ‘no instructions’ instruction and the Croatian pipeline. Holbrooke apparently knew nothing of the matter;⁷³⁶ which is remarkable because various articles had already been published on the subject. The political adviser to the British prime minister, Pauline Neville-Jones, was also convinced that Holbrooke was aware of the ‘no instructions’ instruction.⁷³⁷

On 2 November, the Dutch Permanent Representative to NATO also reported to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about cargo aircraft from Teheran, which were delivering arms to Croatia via the Ukraine. His Canadian counterpart had tipped him off, referring to the Globe and Mail, which stated that UNPROFOR was aware of the matter, but was turning a blind eye.⁷³⁸

Holbrooke also spoke on this trip (on which he was accompanied, among others, by Brigadier General M. Hayden⁷³⁹, the head of intelligence of US European Command)⁷⁴⁰ with the Bosnian prime minister, Haris Silajdzic, who urged him to do more for Bosnia. Holbrooke came up with a plan in which Sarajevo would accept that the arms embargo would not be lifted for the coming six months in exchange for American encouragements to third party countries to violate the UN embargo and to step up the supplies of military goods. Holbrooke had already instructed State Department lawyers to investigate the legal snags attached to such a separation of words and actions. Holbrooke said that their recommendation was ‘encouraging’:

‘... suggesting to a foreign country that it might consider a covert action appeared perfectly legal; going one step further and encouraging a foreign country appeared legal but potentially risky from a political standpoint. Actually supporting the foreign action through direct participation, the reports said, crosses the line into covert action’.

Lake and Christopher rejected Holbrooke’s plan, however; Christopher still feared leaks and angry reactions from London, Ottawa and Paris, which could lead to the departure of UNPROFOR. Lake thought that this was a sort of covert operation anyway, in which case the president and Congress must be let into the secret.⁷⁴¹

Reactions in the Netherlands and in UNPROFOR to the lifting of the arms embargo

Meanwhile, a debate was raging in the US Congress about lifting the arms embargo against Bosnia. This debate also did not go unnoticed in various capitals and in UNPROFOR. For instance, Netherlands Prime Minister Wim Kok told President Clinton by phone of his great concern about the possible lifting of the arms embargo. Clinton expressed understanding, but pointed to the domestic political pressure from Congress for lifting the arms embargo, which he himself called ‘hypocritical’, because in the event of a unilateral decision it would not be American but other troops who would run large security risks.⁷⁴²

In a gloomy and comprehensive scenario, Akashi outlined from Zagreb the possible consequences for the UN peacekeeping operations. The UNPROFOR commanders considered that lifting the arms embargo could be deemed by the Bosnian Serbs to be a de facto declaration of war by the international community. This had consequences for the humanitarian efforts and would lead to the VRS stepping up military actions against UNPROFOR. Furthermore, the VRS could feel forced to start large-scale military operations before the arms reached the ABiH, and UNPROFOR would lose any semblance of impartiality. The VRS would consider lifting the arms embargo to be new evidence of Western support to the Bosnian Muslims. Furthermore, the VRS would immediately withdraw its heavy weapons from the Weapon Collection Points in Sarajevo and other areas.⁷⁴³

In the autumn of 1994 there were in fact two tendencies that could be observed. The American government had to operate more cautiously, to prevent the ‘truth’ about the Iranian connection being revealed. At the end of 1994 a wide variety of rumours were circulating that Holbrooke had discussed a plan with foreign officials for Washington to make secret funds and/or arms available to the ABiH. A high American government official was said to have urged the Croatian government to continue certain military supplies to Bosnia.⁷⁴⁴

Investigation by the Intelligence Oversight Board

Holbrooke’s activities gave Woolsey renewed concerns; in October 1994 he approached Lake again, but again this had little effect. In the autumn of 1994, Woolsey then approached the Intelligence Oversight Board, a small unit in the White House that is responsible for internal investigation into possible false steps within the intelligence community. The reason for Woolsey’s move was that Congress was starting to have concerns about the Iran connection, and Woolsey wanted to prevent his service becoming the object of this concern.⁷⁴⁵

Some sections of the Clinton administration resented this move, because it ultimately led to an extremely thorough internal investigation by the Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) that lasted six months, and that concentrated on three questions: whether Galbraith and Redman had offered assistance to Tudjman; whether either one of the ambassadors had actively intervened with Croatian officials for the transit of arms; and whether Galbraith or Holbrooke had offered arms and funds to Bosnia or Croatia. At the same time, the Intelligence Oversight Board examined whether French accusations from March 1994, that the Americans had executed airdrops over Bosnia, were correct.

And the IOB also scrutinized the deployment of US Special Forces, who originally went to Bosnia to assist in humanitarian relief. However, some Canadian and Swedish UNMOs had seen these units unloading and handling cargo. The Canadian report came from Visoko; the Swedish report came from Tuzla, where a Civil Affairs official of Sector North East made no secret of his Special Forces background.⁷⁴⁶ Otherwise, American Special Forces were present throughout Bosnia: a British officer had personally witnessed an US Special Forces colonel scouting out the territory during a visit to the British headquarters in Gornji Vakuf in 1993. When asked what he was doing there, the American answered that he was looking for suitable helicopter landing places. In a night-time operation one day later, American C-130s dropped equipment, ammunition and arms, which were apparently transported in helicopters for the ABiH, and a few days later ABiH soldiers were walking around in brand new American uniforms carrying M-16 rifles. This was remarkable, because those were nowhere to be found in the Balkans.⁷⁴⁷

In May 1995, the IOB arrived at a better than expected conclusion for the supporters of the arms supplies resumption via the Croatian pipeline, namely that no definitive conclusions could be drawn on what had happened, but that no 'covert action was conducted in arms shipments and no U.S. laws were broken'; there had been no 'improper encouragement to President Tudjman', and the activities of Redman and Galbraith fell under 'traditional diplomatic activity', which required no permission from Congress. According to Redman, the Bosnian Muslims actually never discussed arms supplies with the Americans, because it was known in Sarajevo how legalistic American government thinking was.⁷⁴⁸ A subsequent conclusion of the IOB was that Holbrooke had made no offer. The Pentagon and the CIA had already investigated these French accusations and arrived at the conclusion that no such activities took place, and that furthermore no US Special Forces had been involved.⁷⁴⁹

The further American policy on the Croatian pipeline

In early 1995 James Woolsey resigned as Director Central Intelligence. A senior White House adviser stated that Woolsey's relationship with the White House and Congress was poor, and that this caused his departure. He described him as someone with 'an inherent tendency of always swimming against the stream'.⁷⁵⁰ Woolsey agreed with this observation but for other reasons. 'If you are a Director of Central Intelligence and you let the politicians tell you what intelligence should say, then you are a menace to the country's security'.⁷⁵¹ Woolsey's successor was John Deutch, and in 1997 Clinton appointed Lake as Deutch's successor. However, according to a prominent French military officer, the Senate, was to oppose Lake's appointment as CIA director, partly because of the Croatian pipeline.⁷⁵²

A second tendency in the autumn of 1994 was that Clinton came under increasing pressure from the prospective Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole to lift the arms embargo against Bosnia. Dole described the embargo as outrageous and indefensible.⁷⁵³ It must not be forgotten that Dole had a former Croatian as political adviser, and that the lifting of the arms embargo against Bosnia almost automatically also meant lifting the same embargo against Croatia. Croatia would after all have to forward the arms in transit to Bosnia. For the Croatian government it was therefore absolutely unacceptable to lift the arms embargo for Bosnia only.⁷⁵⁴ The American government had to do something to respond to this pressure, and on 28 October Albright submitted a draft resolution to the Security Council for lifting the arms embargo against Bosnia. This was more of a political gesture, because the implication of accepting this resolution would be that UNPROFOR would have to withdraw from Bosnia,⁷⁵⁵ which the Americans definitely did not want.

In November a law drafted by the Democratic senators Sam Nunn (Georgia) and George Mitchell (Maine) came into force banning the use of government funds for the support of, or assistance in enforcing the arms embargo against Bosnia. This law was incorporated in the Defense Budget Authorization Bill. The consequence was that American vessels that took part in Operation Sharp Guard no longer 'diverted or delayed vessels that contained arms or other cargo for the purpose of enforcing the arms embargo' against Bosnia. This would also mean that the exchange of intelligence on arms supplies would be stopped.⁷⁵⁶ This put the commander of the southern NATO command (CinCSouth), Admiral Leighton Smith, in a curious position relative to Force Commander Janvier and the new BHC Commander Rupert Smith,⁷⁵⁷ and the overall efficiency of the operation consequently suffered.⁷⁵⁸ Lake himself described this as an 'uneasy compromise with Congress'.⁷⁵⁹

Senator Dole also remained active on lifting the arms embargo against Bosnia; with this goal in mind he introduced Bill S.21 on 4 January 1995. According to Dole the bill also had an ulterior motive: '[A] decision to arm the Bosnians would reduce the potential influence and role of radical extremist states like Iran' in Bosnia. It was clear that Iran had meanwhile started to be an important political factor in Bosnia. On 7 June 1995 Dole stated:

'When those of us who advocate lifting the arms embargo point out that other countries would also participate in arming the Bosnians, we are told that this would allow Iran to arm the Bosnians. Well, the fact is that the arms embargo has guaranteed that Iran is a key supplier of arms to Bosnia and administration officials have actually used that fact to argue that there is no need to lift the arms embargo. From statements made by State Department officials to the press, one gets the impression that Iran is the Clinton Administration's preferred provider of weapons to the Bosnians. If the Administration has a problem with Iran arming Bosnia, it should be prepared to do something about it'.⁷⁶⁰

Dole therefore appears to have been aware of the Croatian pipeline, and of Iran's involvement in secretly providing Bosnia with arms. The fact that he was aware of the supply of arms was denied by the Republican party. On the other hand, Senator Lieberman (Connecticut) pointed out that Dole could not have failed to notice the article in the Washington Times of 24 June 1994 regarding the Iranian supplies; Dole said nothing then and he did not demand that Clinton do something.⁷⁶¹

Clinton remained set against lifting the arms embargo, but openly stated that he was no longer prepared 'to enforce the arms ban'. Washington itself would supply no arms, but neither would it intervene if other countries were to do so.⁷⁶² Dole was not the only important politician who supported lifting the arms embargo. For example, in August 1995 he quoted from a letter from the former British Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, who said the following to Dole:

'I am writing to express my very strong support for your attempt to have the arms embargo against Bosnia lifted (...) The safe havens were never safe; now they are falling to Serb assault. Murder, ethnic cleansing, mass rape and torture are the legacy of the policy of the last three years to the people of Bosnia. It has failed utterly'.

With this attitude she was (not for the first time) publicly turning against the British Conservative government's national security policy.⁷⁶³

The Croatian pipeline after 1994

Meanwhile, arms flowed liberally through the Croatian pipeline. In early 1995, Iranian cargo aircraft landed in Zagreb three times a week. The CIA and the White House and State Department continued to have different opinions, this time regarding the scale of the military support via the Croatian pipeline: the CIA settled on 14,000 tons between May 1994 and December 1996. According to the State Department from May 1994 to January 1996 Iran delivered a total of 5000 tons of arms and ammunition via the Croatian pipeline to Bosnia. The clandestine Iranian arms supplies were to stop only in January 1996, after American ground forces were stationed in the region.⁷⁶⁴

Sarajevo would nevertheless have felt uncomfortable at the time. The fact is that the ABiH was completely dependent on Zagreb's cooperation. Croatia could stop or reduce the transit at any moment. The Bosnian government will also have been disturbed by Croatia's 'skimming' of the supplies that were destined for it. According to Lord Owen, the percentage of arms that Croatia confiscated was fifty per cent or more.⁷⁶⁵ Turkey and Saudi Arabia possibly exerted pressure in the background to allow fewer arms to flow via the Iranian connection. These two countries had in the past already indicated that they were not happy with the situation. Izetbegovic appeared as a clever politician to be playing all parties off against each other, and so held the different movements (a Western oriented one and a more Islamic-fundamentalist one) within his political party in balance.⁷⁶⁶

For this reason, it was decided at the highest level to seek out opportunities for the ABiH to acquire arms and ammunition without the intervention of Zagreb. This meant direct supplies, but this was impossible via Sarajevo because the airfield was frequently under fire. Therefore Tuzla Air Base, in East Bosnia was decided upon.

3. Secret arms supplies to the ABiH: the Black Flights to Tuzla

At 17.45 on 10 February 1995, the Norwegian Captain Ivan Moldestad, a Norwegian helicopter detachment (NorAir) pilot, stood in the doorway of his temporary accommodation just outside Tuzla. It was dark, and suddenly he heard the sound of the propellers of an approaching transport aircraft; it was unmistakably a four engine Hercules C-130. Moldestad noticed that the Hercules was being escorted by two jet fighters, but could not tell their precise type in the darkness.

There were other sightings of this secretive night-time flight to Tuzla Air Base (TAB). A sentry who was on guard duty outside the Norwegian medical UN unit in Tuzla also heard and saw the lights of the Hercules and the accompanying jet fighters. Other UN observers, making use of night vision equipment, also saw the cargo aircraft and the fighter planes concerned. The reports were immediately forwarded to the NATO Combined Air Operations Center (CAOC) in Vicenza and the UNPF Deny Flight Cell in Naples. When Moldestad phoned Vicenza, he was told that there was nothing in the air that night, and that he must be mistaken. When Moldestad persisted, the connection was broken.

The secretive C-130 cargo aircraft flights and night-time arms drops on Tuzla caused great agitation within UNPROFOR and the international community in February and March 1995. When asked, a British general responded with great certainty to the question of the origin of the secret supplies via TAB: 'They were American arms deliveries. No doubt about that. And American private companies were involved in these deliveries.'⁷⁶⁷ This was no surprising answer, because this general had access to intelligence gathered by a unit of the British Special Air Services (SAS) in Tuzla. The aircraft had come within range of this unit's special night vision equipment, and the British saw them land.⁷⁶⁸ It was a confirmation that a clandestine American operation had taken place in which arms, ammunition and military communication equipment were supplied to the ABiH. These night-time operations led to much consternation within the UN and NATO, and were the subject of countless speculations. The question is whether the British general was right in his allegation that these were American consignments, and who was involved in these supplies on the Bosnian side.

The Bosnian connection: the Cengic family

It would seem likely that Bosnian intelligence services played a role in such supplies. They were closely connected with the Cengic family, who were described by Western intelligence services as 'Mafia'. The family was based in Visoko.⁷⁶⁹ It controlled this region entirely through its own militias. Before the war, the Cengic family already had connections in Europe and the Middle East, and owned countless companies in Turkey and Croatia. When the war broke out, the Cengic family proved capable of sidestepping the international embargo and of equipping the ABiH with arms and ammunition.

Because of the logistical usefulness of the family Cengic, it was logical that a family member, Hasan Cengic, was involved in the arms supplies.

Hasan Cengic's family was devoutly Islamic. His father Halid was appointed in 1990 as an SDA member of the Foca town council, and after the outbreak of the hostilities he organized the defence of Foca. When the town fell in 1992, the Cengic family moved to Visoko and later to Zenica. Halid Cengic was the most important person responsible for ABiH logistics from Visoko.⁷⁷⁰ All donations and the acquisition of arms and military technology ran via him. This made him one of the wealthiest Muslims. Halid Cengic also controlled the Bosnian intelligence service.

Of his two sons, the best known in intelligence circles was Hasan. The other son, Muhammed Cengic, had an important position within the SDA. As deputy prime minister he concluded a military collaboration agreement with Turkey in March 1992 under the pretence of assuring Bosnia of Turkish purchases from Bosnian arms manufacturers who were no longer able to supply to the Yugoslav army, the JNA.⁷⁷¹ It is reasonable to assume that the Turkish-Bosnian arms traffic in reality went in the opposite direction.

Hasan Cengic studied at the faculty of theology at Sarajevo university, and his studies meant that he spent some time in Teheran. Izetbegovic was his great example and mentor. After completing his studies, the friendship persisted. From 1977 the Yugoslav state security service kept an eye on him. In 1982, the Iranian consulate in Vienna organized an 'educational trip' to Teheran, in which Cengic participated. After his return from Iran he was convicted together with thirteen other Muslim intellectuals of 'activities directed against the state'; Izetbegovic was one of the other accused. From 1983 to 1986 he served his sentence in Zenica.

Cengic moved to Zagreb in 1989, where he worked as an Islamic cleric. He was also active outside the religious community and organized countless symposia and lectures. At the same time, he intensified the contacts with Izetbegovic. On the foundation of the SDA, Cengic fulfilled a main role in the area of organization, party rules and statutes. He also organized the party's financial affairs. In 1990, he became secretary of the SDA. After the outbreak of the hostilities that marked the start of the war, Cengic was instructed to organize Muslim combat units. He succeeded in collecting Muslim officers from the Yugoslav army, he organized a General Staff and was involved in founding the 'Patriotic League', which was later integrated into the territorial defence from which the ABiH was formed.

Cengic carried out his activities partly from Zagreb, where he collaborated with staff of the Croatian Ministry of Defence. From 1992, he worked for the Bosnian army, especially in the area of arms procurement. He was responsible for contacts with Iran and Islamic fundamentalist organizations, which contributed to the Bosnian war effort with arms, money and people. Because he worked from Zagreb, transactions could therefore only take place with the assent of the Croatian authorities.

Cengic was also closely involved in executing the agreement that Izetbegovic had concluded in October 1992 on a visit to Teheran, according to which Iran was to supply military goods via the Croatian pipeline.⁷⁷² In exchange for this, between twenty per cent and fifty per cent of the arms and equipment accrued to the Croats.

Slovenia was also involved in the arms trade; for instance, in the event of transport problems, goods could be stored temporarily at Maribor airport. This led on 21 March 1993 to the 'airport affair', when large quantities of arms and ammunition were discovered. After the outbreak of the hostilities between Bosnian Muslims and Croats, Cengic left Zagreb and sought refuge in Turkey, where he held the position of military attaché at the Bosnian embassy.⁷⁷³ He remained in Ankara until early 1996, when he was appointed Deputy Minister of Defence and acquired a large amount of influence over the ABiH and the military intelligence services. Cengic's appointment in January 1996 was intended to allow him (as one of the SDA confidants) to keep an eye on Vladimir Soljic (Croat and Minister of Defence). The Americans (and Croats) agitated against the lack of cooperation in the creation of a Federal Army and Cengic's contacts with Islamic countries. In protest, Washington refused to continue arms supplies and demanded his resignation.⁷⁷⁴ He was dismissed on 6 November 1996 and was given another post.

Cengic was a personal confidant of Izetbegovic and had fairly radical views. For instance, he stated that a Muslim may never receive blood from a non-Muslim and that a Muslim may also never give blood for a non-Muslim. He was also said to have insisted on striking a deal between the Bosnian Muslims on the one hand and the Serbs and Bosnian Serbs on the other, and fighting out the war with the Croats. This was consistent with the prevailing view of the rulers in Teheran. It was in the joint interest of Islam and the orthodox faith to fight the Catholics together.

In September 1997, it was reported that Cengic had been involved since 1993 in building an airfield in Visoko, which was intended for arms supplies. He was said to have invested a total of $ 5 million in this project. According to British sources, this airfield was built by the Americans. It was situated in a valley to the northwest of Sarajevo. The runway was long enough to handle C-130s or larger transport aircraft. However, Visoko was within VRS artillery range. The airfield was managed in 1995 by Hasan's father, Halid Cengic; many arms were said to have been brought via Visoko, and the flights would not be observed by NATO and UNPROFOR. This was because the arms flights would always arrive in Visoko when there were no NATO AWACS aircraft in the air, or only AWACS with a purely American crew.⁷⁷⁵

These assertions are incorrect, however. UNPROFOR certainly did report on flights to Visoko. For instance, in March 1995, Force Commander Janvier reported to Kofi Annan that Visoko was in use.⁷⁷⁶ Bosnian intelligence officers, incidentally, dispute that Visoko was important for arms supplies; according to them, arms arrived via convoys from Croatia, and not via Visoko. The airfield was allegedly never finished and the meteorological conditions were said to be too poor; the reason for its existence was simply that the SDA wanted to build an airfield no matter what.⁷⁷⁷

Hasan Cengic also dominated the Bosnian military intelligence services, which were closely involved in the arms supplies. In 1995 there were two military intelligence and security services, the VOS and Vojna KOS. The Vojna KOS was the counterespionage service of the Ministry of Defence, which collaborated closely with the military police. In December 1996, the former Chief of Staff of the ABiH, Safet Halilovic, was head of the Vojna KOS. The Vojna Obavjestajna Služba (VOS) was the intelligence service of the ABiH. This was led by Brigadier Mustafa Hajrulahovic, alias Talijan (the Italian). He had worked for a long time for the pre war Yugoslav secret service, the KOS, and had been stationed in Italy. The most important task of the VOS in other countries was to arrange logistics for the ABiH. The service occupied itself with arms deals and raising funds. This was carried out via umbrella firms and Islamic humanitarian organizations. The Cengic family was involved in many of these logistics activities: for instance, the arms imports from Iran ran mainly via the Cengic family's logistics network. Iran supported the ABiH not only with arms, but also with advisers, though there were never very many of them. In addition, the ABiH obtained its arms via the VOS from Austria, Germany, Turkey, Argentina and Czechoslovakia.⁷⁷⁸ British services also came into the possession of evidence that Iran supplied military equipment and arms directly to the ABiH. The supplies consisted of anti-tank weapons of the Red Arrow type (a Chinese variant of the Russian AT-3 Sagger) and detonators for artillery and mortar ammunition.⁷⁷⁹

An Islamic humanitarian organization that the Cengic family made much use of, was the Third World Relief Agency (TWRA). It was led by the Sudanese diplomat Elfatih Hassanein, and arms transactions were carried out, funds were collected, and intelligence gathered under its cover. It was said to have amounted to $ 350 million. TWRA had offices in Sarajevo, Budapest, Moscow and Istanbul. They had direct links with the Bosnian government: in October 1992, the Bosnian minister of foreign affairs, Haris Silajdzic, visited the First Austrian Bank in Vienna and issued a bank guarantee for Hassanein, and in 1993 Izetbegovic sent a letter to this bank to the effect that this Sudanese official had the complete confidence of his government.

Later, in 1994, incriminating material was found at the Third World Relief Agency office in Vienna during a police raid. Cengic was a member of the supervisory board of this organization, and was said to have used it in 1992 to smuggle arms from Sudan to Bosnia. The arms were collected in Khartoum and delivered to Maribor, Slovenia. Chartered helicopters from an American-Russian company continued the transport of the arms, with Croatian permission, to Tuzla and Zenica. The funds were also used to bribe Croatian officials after the conflict between Croatia and Bosnia had flared up again. Cengic also used the Slovenian company Smelt International to have 120 tons of arms and ammunition flown in from Libya using Slovenian cargo aircraft to Maribor in July 1993.⁷⁸⁰ TWRA was used by the military intelligence service, not by the Bosnian intelligence service, AID, which used the Cenex company for arms transactions. The then Bosnian Minister of the Interior, Deli Mustafic, was involved in 1991 in smuggling Kalashnikovs and ammunition from Vienna to Sarajevo.⁷⁸¹

Even UNPROFOR was covered by Cengic's network: his TWRA was also involved in smuggling light arms worth $ 15 million with the involvement of Turkish and Malaysian UNPROFOR troops.⁷⁸² Not only Turkish or Malaysian, but also other UNPROFOR detachments brought more arms than they needed for themselves. For example, soldiers from Bangladesh sold ammunition on a large scale to the ABiH, which was officially to have been used during exercises,⁷⁸³ and the battalion from Malta ordered four thousand mortar-shells while they only had four mortars.⁷⁸⁴ In other words: in spite of the international arms embargo, Bosnia was to receive arms through a variety of channels. The ABiH even bought arms and ammunition in Serbia. In November 1993, the Military Intelligence Service (MIS) already reported the possibility that Arab donations were being used to purchase arms in Serbia. These arms transactions ignored the political differences in the Balkans. The Bosnian minister Muratovic, frankly admitted to the European negotiator, the Swede Carl Bildt, that the ABiH had crossed the Drina in the vicinity of Zepa to buy arms in Serbia. Bildt apparently responded with surprise, to which Muratovic answered: 'This is the Balkans. Things sometimes work rather differently.'⁷⁸⁵ A former VRS officer confirmed that the ABiH in Zepa received many goods from Serbia for it was situated on the Drina. This took place both with convoys and by means of smuggling.⁷⁸⁶

The choice of Tuzla

Various European countries meanwhile became increasingly suspicious concerning the expanding arms supplies to Croatia and Bosnia. Little credence was attached to the assertions that Washington had nothing to do with them. There was a suspicion that one of the US intelligence services had received the green light to set up an operation for which assent was probably sought and obtained in from the Republicans.⁷⁸⁷ Tuzla was chosen for the supplies to East Bosnia. This was logical. Dubrava airport had been in use as a Yugoslav Army military airfield until 18 May 1992. The airfield had better facilities than Sarajevo, it was at a lower altitude (237 metres) and climatologically it was a better location, which assured the pilots of better visibility during takeoff and landing.

Tuzla Air Base (TAB) was one of the largest airfields and the most important airfield in East Bosnia. It was said to have been used by the ABiH for covert operations with helicopters around Srebrenica.⁷⁸⁸ Another reason for using Tuzla was probably that the transit of arms to the ABiH in East Bosnia, which were delivered via Croatia or to Visoko airfield, presented too many problems. TAB was leased by UNPROFOR from the Bosnian government on 7 March 1994. Akashi opened it on 22 March, but after 39 flights the airfield was closed again on 31 May 1994 because the VRS were unwilling to guarantee the safety of the aircraft.⁷⁸⁹

The UN controlled the largest runway (Tuzla Main) which was 2300 metres long and 8 km to the southeast of Tuzla, but exercised no control over the other three runways, which were not close to each other. The most important of them was without doubt the Tuzla Highway Strip, approximately 6 km to the south of Tuzla Main. This runway was approximately 1800 metres long. Tuzla East was approximately 1.5 km further to the east of the Highway Strip, and was a grass track approximately 1100 metres long. Finally, there was Tuzla West with a runway of approximately 2 km, but, to all appearances, this could not be used because there were large piles of earth on it. As it happens, an UNPROFOR worker stated that Tuzla West certainly could be used: according to him the piles of earth were removed after dark, so that small aircraft could land and the arms could be transported further.⁷⁹⁰ The advantage of using the three runways other than Tuzla Main was that they were out of sight of the VRS, and also outside VRS artillery range.⁷⁹¹

The equipment that was delivered in Tuzla consisted mainly of quick-firing weapons, ammunition, uniforms, helmets, new anti-tank weapons and Stingers. The archive of the 281st ABiH Brigade in Zepa reveals that much military equipment was delivered from Tuzla by helicopter for Zepa, largely to be forwarded in transit from there to Srebrenica. The ABiH commander of Zepa reported, for example, that on 14 February 1995, a few days after the first observations of the Black Flights, forty machine guns were transported by air, some of which were to be brought to Srebrenica. The VRS did fire on the helicopter, but without result. At the same time, the flight delivered DM 308,000. The commander of Zepa did not know what he was supposed to do with this money, but he assumed that it was destined for the 28th Division in Srebrenica.

Two days later, on 16 February, an ABiH helicopter was hit by VRS anti-aircraft fire.⁷⁹² The increasing number of helicopter flights with military equipment not only to Zepa, but also directly to Srebrenica, led to an order from the Drina Corps to various VRS units to shoot down these aircraft.⁷⁹³ In mid April, the ABiH commander of Zepa gave a summary of what he had received by air and what had been forwarded in transit to Srebrenica. Zepa had received the following items: 23,500 7.62 mm calibre cartridges, 15 mines (82 mm), 25 mines (60 mm), 4 TF-8 rockets, 34 B.R. M-93 machine guns

Evidence of flights to Tuzla Air Base

Nothing was done with Moldestad's report on 10 February 1995 that he had heard a Hercules C-130 on Tuzla Air Base. The Norwegian logistics battalion (known as NorLogBat), 4 kilometres from Tuzla West, also reported observing three unidentified aircraft: one cargo aircraft and two jet fighters. The cargo aircraft was described as a four-engine Hercules; the two fighters each flew close to either of the wing tips of the C-130 and left the area immediately after the Hercules has started the final approach. This was a familiar flying trick, because it created the impression on the radar screen that only one aircraft was in the air. Independently of this, Norwegian medical personnel (of NorMedCoy) reported seeing the same C-130. Shortly afterwards, observers heard how the jet fighters skimmed over Tuzla. At 18.45 hours a report arrived that all the aircraft had left again. These events were repeated on 12 February.⁷⁹⁵ After these observations, the Norwegian commander drafted an official report (Vakrapport), which summarized all the reports of NorLogBat and NorMedCoy, including the observations of 10 and 12 February. The NorMedCoy observer was extremely emphatic: he had seen the Hercules.⁷⁹⁶

Not only did the Norwegians draft a report, but the headquarters of Sector North East also immediately sent a report to Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo. The author was Lieutenant Colonel C.A. Le Hardy. It started with: 'this is a sensitive report.' The report set out the events: immediately after the first reports, a patrol was sent to investigate. It arrived on the spot one and a half hours later. This patrol was fired on near the Tuzla Highway Strip, and then surrounded by thirty ABiH soldiers. The patrol saw five trucks near a few old hangars,⁷⁹⁷ but were forced to leave without being able to observe an aircraft or inspect any possible military cargo. There was nothing strange about the fact that the patrol did not see a Hercules: the aircraft left again within barely one hour at 18.45 hours, while the patrol only arrived at 19.30 hours. The ABiH had sufficient time to hide, camouflage, or remove in trucks the delivered arms and military goods.

In fact, the Hercules would not actually have had to land: according to Le Hardy, it was possible that a 'para-extraction delivery method' was used, which is a way of performing 'low-altitude extraction of cargo airdrops'. In this method, 'kickers' at the ends of the cargo holds push the load out of the aircraft at extremely low altitude. Le Hardy was otherwise unable to confirm this. Tuzla Main was certainly not used in this operation.⁷⁹⁸ Le Hardy considered the risks attached to the operation to be relatively high, and therefore the value of the load was probably considerable. There was a suspicion that what was delivered was not so much heavy arms but rather communication equipment.⁷⁹⁹ Heavy arms may well have been urgently needed, but this risk, in view of the limited quantity that a Hercules was able to transport, would not have been justified. Furthermore Le Hardy pointed out that Moldestad's and the Norwegian sentry's statements were made in quick succession, so that there could be no question that they were both mistaken.

The Norwegian sentry, Lieutenant Saeterdal, was an observer with a great deal of experience, which he had gained with UNIFIL in Lebanon.⁸⁰⁰ The staff temporarily attached to the Fifth Allied

Tactical Air Force in Tuzla were unaware of any flight, and they were 'as mystified as the rest of us. There is apparently a high level of consternation at the Fifth Allied Tactical Air Force because of this incident', according to Le Hardy. According to him, it was still possible that an aircraft had landed on the Tuzla Highway Strip, without being noticed by nearby OPs, but it was deemed impossible for a Hercules to leave without the OPs noticing. The noise produced by the jet fighters could well have drowned out that of the C-130.⁸⁰¹

This assessment was adopted by the French Force Commander, General De Lapresle. He reported to Annan that on both 10 and 12 February, a Hercules, escorted by two fighter aircraft, had made a landing. De Lapresle had NATO aircraft sent to Tuzla, which were able to find nothing above Tuzla, however, but then they did arrive three hours later. According to De Lapresle, their departure was repeatedly postponed, but in principle the aircraft could have been flying above Tuzla within 10 to 30 minutes. De Lapresle's conclusion was very plain: according to him it involved 'two clandestine resupplies' probably with 'high value/high technology such as new generation anti-tank guided missiles or perhaps surface-to-air-missiles'. Because, however, two deliveries would have been insufficient, from a military point of view, substantially to strengthen the ABiH, the French general expected more supplies by secret flights to be on the cards.⁸⁰²

On 16 February, another C-130 was observed, and in the following days two more. A British daily newspaper even made a connection with a visit by Holbrooke to Turkey in mid February.⁸⁰³ This was not the end of the matter, because a further four flights were observed, where one aircraft was seen by a British UNMO using night vision binoculars.⁸⁰⁴ On 17 and 19 February, UN personnel made sixteen reports of helicopters that landed on Tuzla Air Base. Yet another cargo aircraft was said to have landed, or to have ejected its load at low altitude. Norwegian UNPROFOR patrols were consistently hindered by the ABiH. They did observe a few days later that the ABiH were wearing new American-manufactured uniforms.⁸⁰⁵ UNPROFOR soldiers established that a convoy of approximately 75 trucks left the airfield in the evening.

Furthermore UNPROFOR observers saw how on 17 February, late in the evening, the head of the Bosnian Air Force suddenly showed up at Tuzla Air Base. No explanation was forthcoming from the Bosnian side. NATO deployed aircraft on that day, but they lost radar contact.⁸⁰⁶ It was still remarkable that the Black Flights were able to enter Bosnian air space and not be detected by the NATO AWACS over the Adriatic Sea. Le Hardy paid no attention to this: according to his report, no AWACS aircraft of NATO member states other than the United States were flying on that night. According to him there were two possible explanations: 'Either the mission was carried out by powers capable of neutralizing the radar surveillance or it was made with the consent and support of the authorities commanding the assets in the area at the time.'⁸⁰⁷ The clandestine flights almost always seem to have taken place on nights either when no AWACS were in the air, or AWACS aircraft with US crews. On the night in question, there were only US aircraft (Grumman E-2c Hawkeye Radar and F/A-18C Hornets), which have a much smaller radar range. This allowed the Black Flights to fly to Tuzla unhindered. 'It is like Nelson putting the telescope to his blind eye and saying: "I see no ships"', according to a British researcher.⁸⁰⁸

On Friday 13 February, the daily overview report of UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo stated that there was 'continued evidence of [A]BiH arms re-supply activity'. Since early January 1995, the convoys from Croatia with arms and ammunition had increased considerably, and in other parts of Bosnia the same observations were made.⁸⁰⁹ In the spring, Dutchbat would also establish that the ABiH received new arms from Tuzla and that training was being stepped up.⁸¹⁰ This news spread rapidly, and in due course this could only have negative consequences for the clandestine arms supplies to the ABiH. The American pressure on Le Hardy was apparently increased, because he 'became involved in an acrimonious exchange with Americans on this subject'.⁸¹¹ Under apparent American pressure (see below in this chapter) he produced a second report on 18 February in which he stated that his earlier report was incorrect and he made recommendations for achieving more accurate reporting from then on. According to him, no one had seen the aircraft - which was not true - but only heard it. He also made a number of suggestions so that the Norwegians could report better.⁸¹² This second report is remarkable: on the one hand Le Hardy states that all alleged observations of the Hercules were wrong, but at the same time he makes a wide variety of recommendations, including stationing a Danish tank on Tuzla Air Base, to control the Highway Strip and to occupy more favourable positions, to improve the chance of actual 'hard' observations.

On the question regarding Black Flights, the commander of the Norwegian battalion, Colonel G. Arlefalk, stated that his soldiers sometimes reported six to eight aircraft to him, approaching from the direction of Brcko. The aircraft flew low and mostly without lights. One night, Arlefalk himself saw a Hercules approximately at 100 metres above his head at 03.00 hours. Arlefalk himself had flown in a C-130 on several occasions, and its sound and silhouette were unmistakable according to him. A temporary observation post was set up to gain a better view of these flights. In response to one of his reports, he was told that they had been AWACS, and moreover that they had been much further to the east: 'all the soldiers laughed themselves silly when that answer came', Arlefalk said.⁸¹³ It is clear, and Le Hardy's second report in no way detracts from this, that aircraft were observed above Tuzla in February that landed on the Highway Strip or ejected their load from a very low altitude. It was abundantly clear to all parties that something was going on.⁸¹⁴ There were even aerial photographs of crates on the Highway Strip.⁸¹⁵

Awareness of the Black Flights under the Bosnian Serbs

All in all, sufficient evidence exists that these flights took place. However, little protest was forthcoming from the Bosnian Serbs, and the question is why that was the case. No definite answer was obtained to this question.⁸¹⁶ The VRS was in any case well aware of these flights. On 13 and 24 February 1995, General Mladic sent letters to General De Lapresle in Zagreb and to General Smith in Sarajevo. According to Mladic, aircraft had landed in Tuzla on these days, escorted by two jet fighters, and they had delivered arms and ammunition. Mladic complained that this had happened in front of the eyes of UNPROFOR, but they had not intervened. He accused UNPROFOR of bias and stated that from now on he could no longer guarantee the safety of NATO aircraft in the air space.⁸¹⁷ On 5 March 1995, Mladic again complained to General Smith about the flights.⁸¹⁸

It was also possible to deduce that the VRS was well aware of the state of affairs from an interview with the former Minister of Information of the Republika Srpska, Miroslav Toholj. He was minister from 1993-1996 and asserted that the Bosnian Serb regime in Pale realized all too well that the military and other assistance from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Syria, Malaysia and other Islamic countries would eventually enable the ABiH to conduct a long war. Toholj asserted that Pale knew of the flights of the C-130s - according to him not American but Turkish Hercules aircraft, with an element of 'logistics patronage' from the United States. According to Toholj, the arms were transported from Tuzla to Srebrenica and Zepa.⁸¹⁹ The VRS would not have dared to fire on these aircraft for fear that this would be interpreted and presented by the media in the West as an attack on an aircraft with humanitarian relief goods. Attempts had been made, however, to take photos of the Turkish C-130s, but without success.⁸²⁰

A problem with Toholj's statements is that it is unclear whether the former minister already knew this in March 1995 or that he found out with the passing of the years through the many publications. However, the fact that Mladic already complained about the matter in writing at an early stage is a clear indication that Pale already knew about the Black Flights in March 1995. Another indication is that after the first flight the VRS immediately moved its anti-aircraft missiles (SAMs) from Han Pijesak to a position that was the closest to Tuzla Air Base.⁸²¹

There are indications that the Bosnian Serbs turned a blind eye to the Black Flights, for example in Bihac, where similar flights took place. This siege made the situation for ABiH General Dudakovic's 5th Corps in the Bihac enclave almost untenable. He told General Rupert Smith so via the Joint Commission Observers. One night, the Danish General Helsø - the UNPROFOR commander in the Bihac enclave - heard the sound of propellers on a gravel airstrip in the enclave. He recognized the specific sound of the four propellers of the Hercules C-130, because they kept turning. The Krajina Serbs fired a number of shells, but they all fell next to the runway, and this while the Krajina Serbs at other times fired very accurately with their artillery. This was, according to General Helsø, a warning along the lines of: 'we know what you are up to, but don't go too far'. This is an indication that the only reason for the VRS to permit the flights was that the VRS did not want the Americans against them. Helsø wanted, like his colleagues in Tuzla, to start an investigation, but he and his patrol were also obstructed by ABiH soldiers. In the following days it became clear that American-manufactured arms, uniforms and helmets had arrived.⁸²²

The Netherlands MIS also knew as early as 1992 of the existence of supplies transported by smaller aircraft from Cazin airfield to the north of Bihac.⁸²³ From 1992 onwards, daily helicopter flights were made into Bihac. East European pilots were paid $ 5000 per trip by the Bosnian Army's 5th Corps. In August 1994, a large Antonov An-26 transport aircraft, owned by a Ukrainian air charter, was shot down by the VRS and the crew killed while flying from Croatia to Bihac.⁸²⁴ There were also Black Flights to the besieged Muslims in the Maglaj. According to a former SAS officer the flights were executed by C-130s and the CIA was involved. These flights departed from a US Air Force base in Germany, like Ramstein or Rhein-Main.⁸²⁵ However, the reliability of some Russian and East European pilots was not always that great. In the spring of 1995 a helicopter pilot flying amongst others 150.000 Deutschmarks into the enclave Gorazde disappeared with his cargo.⁸²⁶ The many independent observations of UN observers who had night vision equipment were included in Le Hardy's very first report, which was sent by means of a Code Cable from De Lapresle to the UN headquarters in New York. It was time for damage control on the American side.

The attempt at a cover-up

As mentioned above, Le Hardy's report covered the Black Flights, and therefore had to be rendered 'harmless'. For this reason, the Americans were said to have exerted pressure on Force Commander De Lapresle to withdraw his earlier report to New York, in which he reported that, among other things, advanced military technology had been delivered, and that the origin of the military cargo and the cargo aircraft themselves was unknown.⁸²⁷ A British researcher stated that this could only mean that American military experts must also have flown to Bosnia to train the ABiH to handle this equipment. The Americans did not want this to be revealed, and they therefore wanted De Lapresle to issue a statement to the effect that 'no unauthorized air activity occurred at the Tuzla airfield' on 10 and 12 February.⁸²⁸

The morning briefing of South European NATO Command (AFSOUTH) on 16 February paid attention to the flights. According to these reports, there was no question of actual observation of Hercules aircraft (the Norwegian observations were therefore simply denied) and the escort aircraft mentioned were involved in Close Air Support training, according to the report. The Dutch liaison officer, Colonel J. Beks, considered this to be a strange moment for such training. He had 'picked up' a letter from Mladic to Smith and he found it remarkable that Mladic had already protested on 13 February. Beks interpreted the instructions and overreaction of American officers involved as an attempt to cover up the Special Operations activities, in the context of arms supplies to the ABiH. According to Beks, this was not to the benefit of NATO cohesion, and could even jeopardize the implementation of Deny Flight. Beks made the following comparison: 'A defensive player on the football team has no trouble with occasionally (...) letting a ball through.'⁸²⁹

The actual cover-up started with the 'official report' of Colonel Douglas J. Richardson of the US Air Force. He spoke to Moldestad, and made it clear to him that he had not used night vision binoculars, had not seen a cargo aircraft, and had only heard sounds that resembled the engines of a C-130. According to Richardson, Moldestad then started to have doubts. Richardson also made clear to him that on that night NATO jet fighters were in the process of a Close Air Support training mission over Tuzla, between 20.00 and 05.00 hours. According to Richardson, these had been under UNPROFOR control. Richardson came to the conclusion that Moldestad had made a mistake, and that he could have seen neither any NATO aircraft nor a C-130.⁸³⁰ Unfortunately for Richardson, Moldestad's observation was at 17.45 hours, well before 20.00 hours. The question now is what was really going on.

According to the American Colonel Timothy C. Jones, two Danish Forward Air Controllers were working with two A-6 E jet fighters, which were exercising at low altitude over Tuzla. According to him, two F-18 jet fighters were also flying to the south of Tuzla. Besides the two Danes, according to Jones, no one else knew that NATO aircraft were operating in this region, which is rather unlikely: Le Hardy's earlier report suggests that Norwegians in Tuzla also saw them. They had made subsequent enquiries in Sarajevo, but neither had Bosnia-Herzegovina Command been informed of Close Air Support training. Sarajevo had therefore not responded to the messages from Tuzla.⁸³¹

Jones denied furthermore that the UN observers used night vision binoculars. This was actually incorrect: a British SAS soldier had made an observation with such binoculars. In October 1994 the Force Commander had already been pointed out blind spots in the No Fly Zone that were apparently inevitable. It was decided then to issue night vision binoculars to observers in the areas around Tuzla.⁸³² The use of night vision binoculars was also confirmed in the Senior Staff Meeting with Akashi on 13

February 1995.⁸³³ According to Jones, neither were any visual observations made. This too conflicted with Le Hardy's report, which stated that various people had seen the wingtip lights.

Jones pointed out further that a Jordanian unit that was stationed to the east of the Tuzla West runway had observed nothing. This was not so strange, because the Hercules had landed or dropped its load on the Tuzla Highway Strip, which was approximately 10 km away from the Jordanian unit. And as Le Hardy had already indicated in his report, it was deemed possible that a large aircraft had landed on the Tuzla Highway Strip without nearby OPs noticing, let alone the Jordanian unit 10 kilometres away. According to Jones, the aircraft noises could be explained easily. This was 'serbian airline traffic.' The flight movements and lights that had been seen were 'consistent with the normal civilian airline traffic patterns in Serbian airspace', according to Jones. This statement is extremely implausible: there was actually a No Fly Zone above Bosnia, and Belgrade was far away from Tuzla. It is then illogical for regular Serbian commercial traffic to be flying so low, at a height of 300 metres over Tuzla. If that had been true, the ABiH could have fired at those aircraft. Jones did not explain this, however.

The sound of the cargo aircraft that different witnesses had heard could be explained, according to Jones, because they had been two A-6 E jet fighters. This too is peculiar, because the noise of an aircraft with four propellers is unmistakably different from that of a jet fighter. It was not even necessary to be a practised observer to notice this such as the people who had seen and heard the Hercules actually were.

Other evidence for the Black Flight was that an UNPROFOR patrol had been fired on by the ABiH when it wanted to inspect the Tuzla Highway Strip, but Jones apparently did not find this unusual. He concluded that 'there was no evidence that an aircraft landed or delivered any supplies by air at the Tuzla airfields'. This report was offered as a joint NATO/UNPROFOR investigation to the highest NATO authority in the region, Admiral Smith, to Force Commander De Lapresle and to Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander Rose. According to Jones, all the commanders agreed with the conclusion: there was no evidence that on 10 and 12 February 'unauthorized air activity' had taken place over Tuzla.⁸³⁴ An indication that the report left much to be desired was that a senior French military official even spoke of a forged NATO report.⁸³⁵ However, the document was sent to the UN in New York and the Americans could be satisfied.

The response from the UN in New York

Anyone who thought that the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations would easily accept the reassuring reports was in for a surprise. On 17 February, Akashi reported that there were discrepancies between the UNPROFOR and NATO reports.⁸³⁶ On 21 February, the political adviser to Boutros-Ghali, Ghinmaya Gharekhan, drafted a secret memo for Under-Secretary-General Annan, in which he indicated that the affair would come before the Security Council before too long: 'For us to tell the Security Council that there was no evidence to suggest any unauthorized air activity would be tantamount to saying that UNPROFOR should, in effect, stop reporting any air activity.' Force Commander De Lapresle had recently established helicopter flights from Zagreb to the Bihac, and Gharekhan wondered rhetorically whether this would also be retracted.

Gharekhan criticized the official NATO report and the explanations 'such as there were'. He wanted to know what that so-called regular commercial Serbian airline traffic had been.⁸³⁷ Two days later, Akashi told Annan that the investigation was deadlocked: he had discussed the affair with the Force Commander and with General Smith, and the conclusion was that the investigation would not yield any satisfactory answers. The NATO report had meanwhile been modified somewhat to bring it more in line with the UNPROFOR findings. It now stated that there was no 'conclusive evidence' of the flights.

It was difficult to maintain, however, that nothing at all had happened.⁸³⁸ The later Deputy Head of the MIS, Colonel Bokhoven, confirmed that during his time at UNPROFOR he had also heard of the Black Flights. According to him it was clear that they were American or Turkish aircraft.⁸³⁹ Another Dutch officer who had dealings with the Black Flights was Brigadier J.W. Brinkman, who was Chief of Staff at Bosnia-Herzegovina Command from September 1994 to March 1995. Brinkman never found any evidence for the clandestine American support to the ABiH, but neither had he ever looked for any. He did observe that within six months of the supplies in February and March, the ABiH's appearance improved considerably: they were wearing real uniforms and carrying better arms. Brinkman heard from local UN commanders that aircraft of unknown origin landed in Tuzla. They were C-130s, protected by fighter planes, the signatures of which bore a suspicious resemblance to those of NATO.⁸⁴⁰ Another Dutch staff officer at Bosnia Hercegovina Command, Lieutenant Colonel De Ruiter, had also heard that supply flights had taken place. Whether the Americans were behind them was unclear to him, because there were no identifying markings on the aircraft. The supplies also went via third party countries, 'but whatever, there were landings', according to De Ruiter.⁸⁴¹

On 23 February, Annan sent a 'most immediate code cable' to Akashi. He referred to De Lapresle's report and to the Moldestad's statement. The Norwegian stated in the 'joint' NATO/UNPROFOR report that he had not seen a C-130, but only heard one. De Lapresle's earlier report, however, stated that he definitely had seen a transport-type aircraft, and had also made an analysis of the flight pattern. Annan wanted to know whether Moldestad had really been interviewed by the researchers, and Annan also pointed out that the commercial airline traffic to Belgrade usually closed after 16.00 hours. He was prepared to agree to the joint report provided the outstanding questions and identified contradictions were resolved, and if it could be clearly indicated that the UNPROFOR report was drawn up professionally and in good faith in the first instance, but that new facts had emerged after a NATO investigation that were not available at the time of the earlier investigation.⁸⁴²

This was not the only message that reached Akashi from New York. On 24 February he was told through his adviser, Jesudas Bell, that UN headquarters through Shashi Tharoor was 'extremely upset' about the clandestine arms flights reports. Meanwhile, more reports had arrived from UNPROFOR soldiers, who had seen aircraft over Tuzla on 17, 22 and 23 February. Tharoor stated that New York was outraged at an investigation, described as a joint NATO/UNPROFOR investigation, that contained so many unanswered questions. If this had been a joint investigation to which UNPROFOR had linked its name, then the Norwegian report and the commercial airline traffic in Serbian airspace should also have been investigated. On this last matter, UNPROFOR should have contacted the Serbian authorities through its office in Belgrade and asked them to confirm the commercial airline traffic, according to Tharoor.

Tharoor added that UNPROFOR had put its name to an official investigation report that on the one hand contradicted the UNPROFOR reports and on the other hand provided no conclusive evidence why there were such divergent final conclusions. Tharoor felt that the document seriously undermined the credibility of UNPROFOR and the UN secretariat. Various delegations had already asked questions because the UNPROFOR reporting on the incidents was so contradictory and sometimes incorrect. Adding new building blocks would only further fuel this debate, Tharoor predicted. His preference was therefore for a separate investigation and a supplementary NATO report, to which UNPROFOR would only attach its name if it incorporated its earlier information: this would benefit UNPROFOR's credibility. Bell told Akashi that General Smith was aware of this view. Meanwhile, a variety of rumours was circulating in the press. If a request was made for comment, New York would state that the report had been received but that a more detailed explanation had been requested.⁸⁴³

Akashi responded several days later. According to him, the NATO investigation team had not heard all the witnesses, because a few of them were on leave. Moldestad was interviewed by telephone. Akashi was disappointed with 'the lack of rigorous documentation in the NATO team's report, and its failure to substantiate contradictions with original UNPROFOR observations'. He had decided not to put NATO under further pressure by producing a more reliable report, but he had agreed with the sentence 'We agree that the United Nations should not put its name to a report that falls short of achievable standards', which represented General Smith's conclusion.⁸⁴⁴ The new Force Commander, Janvier later referred back to the matter in a curious way: at the beginning of March he told Annan that the Hercules aircraft had actually been helicopters.⁸⁴⁵

The consequences of the reports about the Black Flights

The Black Flights led to tense relations between the United States, the UN and NATO. According to SACEUR, General George Joulwan, Islamic countries were involved in the supplies to the ABiH.⁸⁴⁶ The commander of the southern NATO command, Admiral Leighton Smith, promised Janvier and Akashi that he would resign if it should appear that American uniformed military personnel were involved in this operation, and wanted a thorough investigation. It had become known to him that on the day in question, 10 February, indeed no AWAC aircraft had flown above Bosnia. E-2 jet fighters from US aircraft carriers had taken over this task at the last moment. However, these fighters do not have the same capabilities as AWACS. So, it is no surprise that they spotted nothing. This then raises the question as to the nationality of the transport aircraft: Smith wanted to know if perhaps they were Turkish aircraft. Some British officials told him later that in Gorazde too the ABiH had been provided with new uniforms.⁸⁴⁷ The Bosnian Minister Toholj also claimed that the entire affair led to tense relations within the UN. Akashi's spokesman, Williams, had told him so. He hinted that NATO did not want UNPROFOR to reveal the secret supplies to Tuzla.⁸⁴⁸

It was not only in New York that this was a sensitive matter. The British Foreign Secretary, Hurd, also took the matter seriously. According to Lord Owen, he informed various embassies by telegram that the United Kingdom certainly was not involved in a cover-up of the Black Flights. Hurd stated that the flights were observed on 10, 12 and 23 February; meanwhile, according to Hurd, it was also known that there had been many more flights. Hurd reported further that one of the observers was a British officer who was at the head of the Operations Section in Sector North East, referring to Le Hardy. Hurd referred to Jones's report and then established that neither NATO, nor UNPROFOR had been able to produce a complete and definitive report. He therefore deemed it possible that these clandestine flights had taken place, although there was still no hard evidence.

According to Hurd, it had now been decided that both the UN and NATO should end this affair. NATO had decided not to investigate the affair further as long as no new facts appeared on the table. However, Hurd pointed out that Moscow did want further investigation, and Paris was also urging it, because they suspected that the United States was behind the clandestine operation, even if British diplomats in Washington were told repeatedly that this was not the case. The US ambassador in London made a special trip to the Foreign Office to forcefully deny this.⁸⁴⁹

The Black Flights were also raised for discussion at a summit between the US Secretary of Defense and the Ministers of Defence of the United Kingdom, France and Germany. They discussed the situation in Bosnia from 3 to 5 March 1995 in Key West (Florida). There was a comprehensive discussion of the options of direct support to the Bosnian government and a continuation of the UNPROFOR presence. At the end of the meeting, the American Secretary of Defense, Perry, made a statement. He had apparently been asked by the other ministers about the secret arms supplies to Bosnia. Perry stated for the record that 'if any aircraft were landing at Tuzla, they were neither US aircraft nor arranged by the US'.⁸⁵⁰ This in turn raised the question of whether Perry actually knew nothing, or that he was being rather economical with the truth.

In any case, earlier assertions in the NATO/UNPROFOR report to the effect that 'all those involved' had been heard, were incorrect. The British journalist Nik Gowing tracked down several Norwegian witnesses to the Black Flights, who stated that they had never spoken with Jones or his team. They declared in front of the camera that they had seen and heard an aircraft with propellers. Furthermore, a Norwegian relief worker had met two Americans in plain clothes in a warehouse in Tuzla, who were in the process of unpacking arms, apparently from the Black Flights. A Norwegian patrol that had gone to investigate on the night in question, had also clearly seen and heard a Hercules. Neither had the members of this patrol been questioned. The same was true for the Norwegian sentry who was one of the first to have heard and seen the Hercules.⁸⁵¹

Later, one of the most important Norwegian witnesses, Moldestad, would be taken aside by three American officers. They took him to a balcony on the fifth floor of a hotel in Zagreb, and made clear to him that if he stuck to his account and said any more on the subject, things could get messy for him. After reports on British television and articles in the press, journalists were also put under pressure by the American embassy in London. They heard all manner of threats. The embassy was said to have been acting on the instructions of the State Department.⁸⁵² Flights were reported into April, also by the Netherlands MIS.⁸⁵³ The question remains, of course, whether American aircraft were actually involved in the clandestine flights to Tuzla.

Who flew to Tuzla?

Former CIA director, Woolsey, was not aware of the Black Flights. Of course, these took place after his departure from the CIA. If the CIA had been involved with the flights to Tuzla, then, according to him, a written presidential finding would have had to have been issued for such a covert operation or for the ones that the CIA helps with.⁸⁵⁴ The affair was also examined by the US Senate. The flights had been investigated at an earlier stage by the Pentagon, as part of a NATO investigation and of an investigation for US policymakers. After studying the Pentagon investigation report, the Senate found in November 1996 that the investigation was scantily documented. It came to the conclusion that no activities had taken place that pointed to supplies of arms and there was no American involvement. The Senate was able to peruse documents of the Department of Defense and the CIA, to conduct interviews, but concluded nonetheless that there had been 'no U.S. role in any clandestine military airlifts'. No comment was made on who was involved, or what actually happened.⁸⁵⁵

Journalists and researchers have asked the question whether it was not American aircraft after all that carried out the Black Flights. The most common answer was that only one country actually qualified for these night-time operations: the United States. The fact is that it is unlikely that the Americans would 'blind' their AWAC aircraft for Iranian planes. The operation was said to have been paid for from a Pentagon Special Operations budget, with the complete assent of the White House. Probably the most important members of Congress were informed in the deepest of secrecy, and they were therefore 'in the loop' concerning the events.⁸⁵⁶

In Tuzla itself it was impossible to establish via interviews with Bosnian military and intelligence officials the identity of the C-130s. It was clear from observations that not all aircraft physically landed, but that some dropped their load from a low altitude. From a technical point of view, later explanations that no American aircraft had 'landed' were then correct, but the question remains as to whether absolutely no American aircraft were involved.

In Deliberate Force, Ripley describes how three Southern Air Transport C-130s from Rhein Main airfield in Germany carried out the flights. It is not so strange that Southern Air Transport (SAT) crops up in this account: it was, like Civil Air Transport, Air Asia and Air America, former CIA property. These companies were involved in many secret CIA operations. They carried out hundreds of Black Flights around the world. It was only in the mid 1970s that these companies were sold, but they continue to perform so-called contract work for the CIA, and the service still exercises considerable influence on the affairs of the airline company.⁸⁵⁷

However, the involvement of SAT is still not self-evident. After all, if the CIA was not involved in the secret operations in Bosnia, who then did use SAT? There is another reason why the involvement of Southern Air Transport was not self-evident: the company was far too notorious because of its past. On the discovery of these Black Flights, fingers would quickly be pointing at the CIA. Other sources assert, according to Ripley,⁸⁵⁸ that the Bosnian air force had a modest fleet of planes, consisting of a C-130 and CASA 212, Antonov AN-26 and AN-32 transport aircraft. These aircraft were allegedly stationed in Cyprus and Slovenia and were to have operated from Ljubljana and elsewhere.⁸⁵⁹

The question remains, however, whether this 'relatively young Bosnian air force' was capable of performing such operations. Ripley is of the opinion that the State Department and the National Security Council (NSC) were involved in the operation, and not the CIA or DIA.⁸⁶⁰ This is probably correct: it seems that after the scandals of recent years the CIA has become more cautious with foreign covert operations. They must be covered 'by the book' by the White House.⁸⁶¹ In addition, the director of the CIA, Woolsey, was of the opinion that clandestine operations probably could not remain secret for long.⁸⁶² Others concluded that private companies, such as Tepper Aviation, or Intermountain Aviation were involved in the Black Flights. Both companies have a CIA background.⁸⁶³ A British General and researcher, Brendan O'shea, also concluded that private companies were involved here; to be precise, reservists or retired American pilots (not in uniform and not in the active service of the American armed forces) were to have flown these C-130s.

The aircraft that took part in the various Black Flights were also seen by observers of the ECMM, the European monitoring mission. On 23 February they saw four C-130s on Split airfield. One of them was a Spanish cargo plane that was used for supplying the Spanish battalion in Mostar, but the other two aircraft were American C-130s. According to O'shea, they belonged to the 37th ALS Blue Tail Flies. The fourth plane had only a small American flag on its tail and no registration numbers, and was painted in different colours from the other two planes. The observers noticed that the crew were wearing green uniforms without rank or nationality markings. They were able to continue to work undisturbed and were not hindered by the Croatian police or UNPROFOR observers. Shortly before their departure from Split, the ECMM observers 'coincidentally' encountered the Croatian Colonel Kresimir Cosic, President Tudjman's personal adviser, in the departure lounge. Cosic was also the liaison with the State Department in the matter of the activities of the military company Military Professional Resources Incorporated.⁸⁶⁴ The ECMM launched its own investigation, but it yielded nothing.

The conclusion is that there are only suspicions but no hard evidence that American aircraft carried out the Black Flights. A British researcher put a question regarding American involvement to various sources, and most ('eyes were raised ceiling-wards') answered him as follows: 'Who else has the skill and expertise to carry out such a swift, delicate mission covertly? The Saudis? The Turks? The Iranians?' The specialized crews and the types of aircraft for these night-time operations indeed appeared to point in only one direction: that of the United States.⁸⁶⁵

Nonetheless, it is improbable that US aircraft were involved, but this does then raise the question of who had organized the operation. Woolsey was willing to have the CIA to carry out such a secret operation; his service had relevant experience. Woolsey stated, however, with great certainty: 'The CIA did not move weapons to Bosnia. We were perfectly willing to do that. We had enough experience in this field, but the policy level did not want the CIA to do that.'⁸⁶⁶ Woolsey's offer was therefore rejected, also because Lake (again) feared leaks⁸⁶⁷ and Christopher was afraid here too of angry reactions from London and Paris which could lead to UNPROFOR's departure. NATO Secretary-General Claes had warned Clinton of this.⁸⁶⁸ Lake also considered this a covert operation; another reason for it not to be allowed to go ahead was that Congress would have to be informed.⁸⁶⁹ The strategy via third party countries was then opted for. This indeed seems to be the course that was followed.

Turkey flies to Tuzla

There are other indications that the CIA was not involved in the Black Flights to Tuzla. Like the attitude of the CIA station chief in Zagreb, who gave a negative recommendation regarding Galbraith's plans for the Croatian pipeline and the later negative recommendations of the CIA on the clandestine supply of arms to the Croats and Muslims as Holbrooke had wanted.⁸⁷⁰ Much points in the direction that this was an operation by a third party country, with the assent of parts of the US government. Another indication that US services were not directly involved, was Holbrooke's evidence to Senate:

'US intelligence agencies were not involved.' This is correct if it refers to an operation that was sanctioned 'remotely'. Leighton Smith's promise to Janvier and Akashi that he would resign if it were to appear that uniformed military personnel were involved in the Black Flights, is also consistent with this picture. A prominent White House adviser confirmed that the United States did not wish to violate the arms embargo. It would undermine the authority of Security Council resolutions, however much the Americans were uncomfortable with this embargo. If the Americans themselves were to violate the embargo, then the imposition of an embargo elsewhere would be made impossible.⁸⁷¹

Washington definitely did play a role in the background, however. The attempts at a cover-up after the first observations of the flights to Tuzla point to this involvement. Why otherwise would the Norwegian key person be physically threatened, would several witnesses not be heard, the reported facts be distorted, journalists put under pressure, and attempts made to hold back De Lapresle's report? The fact that the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations and UNPROFOR ultimately agreed and let the matter rest, probably has more to do with the wish no longer to disturb the relations between Washington and the UN and NATO; after all, the 'lift and strike' debate had already caused a considerable deterioration in transatlantic relations.⁸⁷²

A number of countries are candidates for having supplied directly to Bosnia. Pakistan delivered equipment, as did the Sultan of Brunei, who paid for anti-tank missiles from Malaysia. In January 1993 already, a Pakistani vessel with ten containers of arms, which were destined for the ABiH, was intercepted in the Adriatic Sea.⁸⁷³ Pakistan definitely defied the United Nations ban on supply of arms to the Bosnian Muslims and sophisticated anti-tank guided missiles were air lifted by the Pakistani intelligence agency, ISI, to help Bosnians fight the Serbs, an ex-ISI Chief has officially admitted in a written petition submitted before a court in Lahore. The document was submitted by Lt. General (Retd) Javed Nasir, who was head of the ISI from March 1992 to May 1993, in a case he filed against the owner and editors of the largest newspaper and TV group of Pakistan, in an anti Terrorism Court.⁸⁷⁴ It remains unclear how the missiles were transported to Bosnia and who did it.

Furthermore, tons of diplomatic post regularly arrived by air in Sarajevo from Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Iran. Doubts were raised about the diplomatic immunity of the content of the load.⁸⁷⁵ A foundation that was affiliated to the Saudi royal family also provided millions of dollars in arms assistance.⁸⁷⁶ Moreover, Malaysia attempted to sidestep the embargo via merchant shipping and the Malaysian UNPROFOR soldiers that were stationed in Bosnia.⁸⁷⁷ All of these were direct supplies to Bosnia, because the Bosnian government was dissatisfied with the Croatian authorities' practice of skimming the arms supplies, or because the government did not want to become entirely dependent on Zagreb. This could be avoided by direct flights from certain countries.⁸⁷⁸

In addition to Iran (via Croatia), Turkey proved to be the most important supplier of arms to the ABiH. Turkey had been closely involved in the secret arms supplies to Bosnia for some time. As early as 1992 Iran had opened a smuggling route to Bosnia with the assistance of Turkey; this was two years before the Clinton administration gave 'permission' for creating the Croatian pipeline. Bosnian government officials acknowledged that in 1993 a Turkish pipeline also existed, through which the above-mentioned arms from Saudi Arabia, Malaysia, Brunei and Pakistan were smuggled. Other consignments came from Belgium, Hungary, Uganda and Argentina. In Argentina a scandal erupted because President Menem had issued a decree for the delivery of 8000 FN-Fals (automatic rifles), 155 mm guns, 2000 pistols, 211,000 hand grenades, 3000 rockets, 30,000 grenades, 3000 landmines and millions of rounds of ammunition to Bolivia. This country stated, however, that it had ordered nothing and the Argentine parliament discovered that the arms and ammunition were destined for Croatia and elsewhere.⁸⁷⁹

At the beginning of 1993, the name of Turkey was again dropped as direct supplier.⁸⁸⁰ The Bosnian Vice-President Ganic had an interview in mid February with the Turkish President Özal, but denied that he had promised him an aircraft full of arms. Ganic did admit to receiving arms in a different manner.⁸⁸¹ During a visit to Sarajevo of the later Prime Minister of Turkey, Tansu Ciller, and the Prime Minister of Pakistan, Benazir Bhutto, both ladies publicly called for a lifting of the arms embargo.⁸⁸² In the summer and autumn of 1994, the CIA reported that spy satellites had taken photos of Iranian aircraft on Turkish airfields. Two days later, satellite photos were taken of the same aircraft in Zagreb or at other airports in Croatia, where the arms were unloaded.

According to O'shea, Turkey's involvement was clear. Specially modified C-130s from American bases in the United Kingdom and Germany would pick up their cargo on remote runways in the Turkish part of Cyprus. The cargo, which consisted of arms and ammunition, would have been delivered there by Iranian and Turkish aircraft. The aircraft would fly to Croatia via the Adriatic, and then on to Bosnia. If the Hercules, with its modest range, could not achieve its objective in one hop, it could always make a stopover on the Croatian island of Brac, close to the coast near Split. The population there indeed often observed C-130 aircraft that operated from this airfield. From this island the CIA also operated its UAVs flying over Bosnia.⁸⁸³ The Croatian Minister of Defence, Susak, claimed that most of the aircraft that landed there came from Turkey and not Iran.⁸⁸⁴ Also quite some military goods were delivered to the Pula airport on the Istrian peninsula.⁸⁸⁵

The Turkish government therefore provided full cooperation to the Croatian pipeline. There was more: the Turks also flew directly to Tuzla with C-130s. This allegedly happened after the Chief of Staff of the ABiH 2nd Corps was sent to Ankara as an additional military attaché.⁸⁸⁶ UNPROFOR officers assumed that Turkish aircraft flew in from Cyprus, with American military authorities acting as intermediary.⁸⁸⁷ French military officials likewise asserted that Turkey was responsible for the flights. NATO officers stated in a British daily newspaper that if the American intelligence services used a cover, 'Turkey would be the obvious choice'. The Turkish air force had C-130s that could reach Tuzla. This was otherwise also true of the Iranian and Pakistani air forces, which were also mentioned as possible third-party countries for supplies via Turkey to Tuzla.⁸⁸⁸

The UK Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) was also aware of the American secret arms supplies to the ABiH. According to a British intelligence official, the DIS never made an issue of them, so as not to further damage the sensitive relationship with the US services. An internal DIS analysis concluded that the arms were delivered via 'a different network', and that the entire operation was probably led by the NSC. It was stressed that the CIA and DIA were not involved in the Black Flights to Tuzla. Incidentally, the DIS received a direct order from the British government not to investigate this affair. This was not permitted for the simple reason that the matter was too sensitive in the framework of American-British relations. The DIS also obtained intelligence on the secret supplies to the ABiH from the German military intelligence service and the Bundesnachrichtendienst, because some of the flights departed from Frankfurt. However, no American-German alliance existed in the matter of clandestine support to the ABiH.⁸⁸⁹

Cengic had set up the entire operation. The Cengic family owned numerous companies in Turkey, and during the war Cengic worked in Ankara as a military attaché, and would reach an agreement there with the Turkish government on secret arms supplies. They were to take place in Tuzla with the involvement of the Special Branch of the Turkish General Staff. This unit had also been responsible for covert operations in the past.⁸⁹⁰ The Pentagon had likewise identified Cengic as the main link between the supplies from Islamic countries, such as Iran, Turkey and Pakistan.⁸⁹¹ Even the Dutch national security service BVD observed that Turkish aircraft repeatedly dropped arms over areas that were under ABiH control. The service described the Turkish action as a 'solo performance'.⁸⁹² MIS/Navy reports also mention the involvement of Turkish aircraft; it was observed that Turkey was in a position to fly with C-130s to Tuzla directly or via third party countries.⁸⁹³ The conclusion must be that the United States 'turned a blind eye' to the Croatian pipeline, but in the case of the Black Flights to Tuzla Air Base, they deliberately closed their 'eyes' (of the AWAC aircraft) for the direct Turkish flights. US aircraft did not themselves fly to Tuzla, because their discovery would have seriously embarrassed the US government and put transatlantic relations under even greater pressure. Supplies via a third party country were a simpler solution for the United States.

4. Military assistance to the Bosnian Serbs

The clandestine arms supplies to the ABiH were not the only thing to stir up feelings: so too did the supplies to the Bosnian Serbs. According to some sources, Russian intelligence services even had a secret arms agreement with the Bosnian Serbs.⁸⁹⁴ Throughout the entire war, accusations were made that Serbia supplied arms and ammunition on a large scale to the VRS. For example, an article in the New York Times asserted that hundreds of Serbian helicopter flights had been recorded over northeast Bosnia. An anonymous UNPROFOR officer stated: 'We have not seen anything on this scale before and doubt that the Bosnian Serbs could organize this number of helicopter flights without the active involvement of the Yugoslav Army.'⁸⁹⁵ To Annan's irritation, this article, 'which runs counter to every element of analysis provided to us by yourselves', led directly to a request from the non-aligned countries for a debate in the Security Council. Annan requested Akashi to report all messages about helicopter flights directly. Akashi had already informed Annan that cross border flights were probably not involved, and that the number of flights observed from the ground was exaggerated.⁸⁹⁶

It was evident that the border between Serbia and Srpska was used regularly for the clandestine supply of arms and oil. A special organ was even created for its supervision: the ICFY Monitoring Mission, a product of the Yugoslavia Conference, which was established on 17 September 1994. The Finnish General Tauno Nieminen was the head of the mission from 13 January to 14 December 1995. He maintained regular contact with UNPROFOR, but worked mainly for the ICFY. There were divergent opinions on the Serbian supplies to the VRS. In a comprehensive report, the Bosnian government complained about the Serbian support to the VRS. From August 1994 to July 1995, Serbia and Montenegro are alleged to have supplied to the Bosnian Serbs a total of 512 tanks, 506 APCs, 120 howitzers, 130 other artillery pieces, 6 MIG 29s, SU-25 and SU-27 aircraft and more than 20 helicopters. These were formidable quantities, enough to equip an entire army. For this reason alone, these Bosnian quantities were implausible. According to Nieminen, these data were incorrect, and the checks at this border were watertight. He pointed out that the checking was not random, but that every car was inspected and completely investigated. Observers were even authorized to have cars or trucks dismantled.⁸⁹⁷

According to staff of a European intelligence service, the sanctions did not work on the Drina, however. For example, the observers had instructions to withdraw immediately in the event of danger. The Serbs usually fired a series of salvos in the air as darkness fell to frighten the observers, who then withdrew rapidly. On the basis of reliable intelligence data, this service came to the conclusion that military equipment was often transferred at night from Serbia to Srpska, usually consisting of 2 tanks (T-54), 2 APCs, 2 trucks with artillery, 2 buses with soldiers of the Yugoslav army and 2 trucks with fuel.

This was the normal pattern of Serbian support to the VRS; they also considered the sanction committee to be a political mission. It was confirmed from the side of the VRS that much fuel had been supplied from Bulgaria and Romania to Serbia, which was forwarded in transit to the VRS. Train wagons crossed the border, and fuel also arrived on the Danube. The observers were repeatedly put on the spot by a skipper who would say that he was going to sail on, or otherwise dump the oil in the Danube.⁸⁹⁸ However, General Nieminen persisted in claiming to the NIOD that reports of deliveries of tanks, APCs and trucks over the Drina had no basis in truth. If Milosevic supported the VRS on a large scale, then the question remains as to how this happened. Milosevic ran enormous political risks in doing so. What is clear is that support was provided from Serbia in the form of soldiers, technical recommendations, integrated air defence and financial assistance, but therefore not in the form of large-scale military equipment.⁸⁹⁹

A senior White House adviser confirmed this. He had never seen convincing evidence that arms had been delivered to the Bosnian Serbs via the Drina. The road via Croatia, however, was open for this purpose. He called the embargo 'fairly effective' but admitted that there were leaks. According to this source, intelligence on the violations was all Sigint, but it was not permitted to share this information with foreign intelligence services. What particularly stung the senior official was that Washington had failed in bringing about a financial embargo, because central banks in the EU, such as the Bank of England and the Bundesbank did not cooperate. The Security Council resolutions did not take this into account, and the banks hid behind national legislation. The particular culprit here was the Austrian central bank. According to this official, no progress was booked on this point against 'serbia Incorporated'. Milosevic was able to launder his money via Cyprus. Money was also laundered in Moscow, which was made easier by the state of the Russian banking system. Otherwise, according to this official, the war could have finished earlier, because then Milosevic would no longer have been able to pay the VRS officers.⁹⁰⁰

According to Sarajevo, in addition to arms and ammunition, other items were supplied to the Bosnian Serbs. The Bosnian government claimed that 8700 tons of fuel were supplied.⁹⁰¹ According to Nieminen, Serbia supplied the oil mainly via the Krajina, and there was a back door via Croatia because of the relationship between Tudjman and Milosevic. The problem was that the mandate of his mission did not extend to Croatia. What was supplied from this region via the Krajina to the VRS therefore fell outside his field of view.⁹⁰²

There were rumours about pipelines across the Drina that provided the Bosnian Serbs with oil, but Nieminen stated that he knew for certain that they had never existed. His mission had foot and vehicle patrols in operation 24 hours a day along the banks of the Drina: they would at least have seen their tracks or trucks. The same applied to all the claims about pontoon bridges. In an official report, the Bosnian government actually claimed that 25 secret military pontoon bridges were being used. Half of them were between Bijeljina and Zvornik.⁹⁰³ In one of the weekly overviews, Nieminen did report on such a Serbian pontoon bridge. According to the Yugoslav Army liaison officer, it was built in this sector to deal with refugees in case of a possible ABiH offensive.⁹⁰⁴ Sometimes oil would be taken across in small boats or with a number of barrels at once. Trucks also drove to and fro with full diesel tanks between Serbia and Srpska.

The question then remains as to how the Yugoslav Army, the Vojska Jugoslavija (VJ), supported the VRS. According to an European intelligence service, the VJ was active in East-Bosnia. This service gathered intelligence that proved that many parents in Serbia were complaining that their sons had to go to Bosnia. The obituaries in Serbian newspapers were scrutinized, only to reveal that soldiers had perished in Bosnia. Conscripts were sent over the border in groups by bus. They consisted mostly of approximately fifty soldiers without equipment, who had probably exercised in Serbia. Furthermore, Serbian staff officers worked in Pale, VRS officers were trained in Serbia and the VRS were paid their salaries via Belgrade. Much logistics support was also given to the VRS. Repairs and spare parts were provided by the VJ, and the VRS equipment was kept up-to-date by Serbia. The transportation of tanks and APCs was coordinated by the VJ.⁹⁰⁵

According to Nieminen, it must not be forgotten that before the arrival of the observers, Milosevic had had all the time he needed to supply as much as possible.⁹⁰⁶ His opposite number in Serbia, Kertis, was the greatest smuggler, according to sources within Western intelligence services.⁹⁰⁷ He was instructed by Milosevic to keep Nieminen's mission happy. Whatever Kertis said happened, the objective of which was 'to keep us happy so that nobody would blame Milosevic', according to Nieminen.⁹⁰⁸ Violating the embargo actually meant that the sanctions against Serbia would be intensified again.

The mission of Nieminen would run into trouble in late May 1995. There were air strikes on Pale on 25 May 1995 and hostages were taken in reprisal. On 29 May, the American embassy reported that information had been obtained about a direct threat to the American observers. This resulted in all US and ten Canadian observers immediately being withdrawn. The majority of the observers came from MPRI and the others were from the State Department. According to an intelligence officer, after much urging Nieminen, who in the first instance disagreed with the withdrawal, was finally shown reliable intelligence that proved that they actually were in danger. The CIA was said to have shown the Finnish General reports that made clear that the US service had a source or sources close to Mladic or Karadzic. They also showed him intercepted message traffic. In Pale the decision had already been made to take American observers hostage and to abduct them over the Serbian border to Srpska; after that the Finnish General agreed with the withdrawal of the observers.⁹⁰⁹

The original plan was that the mission would comprise 250 observers. This was never achieved, however, and the maximum staffing was 210, from September to October 1994. Nieminen's mission had total freedom of movement along the border with Serbia. The ICFY mission did not occupy all border crossings; many of them were not monitored or were monitored by hired-in Serbian personnel. The mission itself was said to have admitted that 71 potential border crossings on the Drina were not under their control. The Bosnian government then concluded that the mission was not in a position to exercise effective control. This would have required 1760 static observers, 310 mobile observers, 100 interpreters and 80 administrative staff. Furthermore, according to the Bosnian government, the mission would have to have 2 helicopters, 214 vehicles and a radar detection system for tracking low flying aircraft.

In May 1995 the number declined sharply; when the American and Canadian observers had been withdrawn, Nieminen had 151 observers left. Of the 18 Border Control Points, four were closed. There were then observers from 18 countries: mainly from the EU, Norway, Russia, and Czechoslovakia. They were professional customs personnel, who operated in every sector.⁹¹⁰ Other countries sent additional personnel, and in July 1995 the mission again had 185 observers who manned 19 border crossings 24 hours a day. It appears from their comprehensive reports that smuggling attempts were occasionally made over the border between Serbia and Srpska via the Drina,⁹¹¹ but no large smuggling operations were recorded. Three days before the attack on Srebrenica observers even noted that on two occasions buses with men of compulsory service age were held up at the border by Serbian militias, and were not allowed to enter the Republika Srpska.⁹¹²

Nieminen constantly complained about the lack of cooperation of the US intelligence community. They regularly took aerial photographs above the Republika Srpska, but when Nieminen asked for them, he was not given them. A White House adviser confirmed that this intelligence was not shared, and was kept for the Americans themselves.⁹¹³ Nieminen only received intelligence piecemeal, sometimes in the form of intercepts, but the question was whether it was always reliable. The Bosnian services also intercepted communication traffic, which showed evidence of Serbian involvement.⁹¹⁴ The intermediary concerned was Mirko Krajisnik, the brother of the chairman of the Bosnian-Serb parliament, Momcilo Krajisnik. The intercepts revealed that the Serbian Minister of the Interior and head of the Domestic Security service, Jovica Stanisic, were involved in clandestine supplies of arms and fuel.⁹¹⁵

The French and British intelligence services did give information to Nieminen 'to balance US intelligence reports', and the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) contributed observers only in the autumn of 1995, who had an anti-Serbian attitude, however. Nieminen also had to take disinformation into account; the German embassy in Belgrade occasionally produced reports of suspect reliability. For instance, the embassy reported on 16 March 1995, probably on the authority of the BND, that a temporary bridge had been built over the Drina between Serbia and Srpska at Jagostica, which was used to transport equipment to the VRS. Four border crossings were also mentioned across which goods were smuggled to the VRS. The messages immediately raised doubts; the bridge would actually have been in the Zepa pocket and the smuggling of military goods destined for the VRS via a Muslim area was unlikely. The British Army sent an SAS patrol to inspect the alleged bridge. The surroundings turned out to resemble a Norwegian fjord, with a steep rock wall more than 200 metres high. The German information was therefore incorrect, and the account of the smuggling via four border posts also proved to be incorrect because all posts were monitored 24 hours a day by UN observers.⁹¹⁶ The information of the Bosnian Muslims was likewise not always to be trusted. Sometimes Nieminen received intercepts, but account was always taken of the possibility of disinformation. In that period, as mentioned, many Bosnian reports were sent to the UN of large quantities of tanks and trucks that crossed the Drina.

The American observers in his team were often frustrated by the response from Washington, which only complained there that their reports were incorrect. Contradictory reports came from Washington, but they also often appeared to contain incorrect information. Although one of Nieminen's closest colleagues was a State Department official, the Americans remained reluctant to share their intelligence openly.⁹¹⁷ Therefore the mission was constantly confronted with disinformation about sundry tanks that crossed the Drina. A member of the mission gave as an example the attack on Zepa, in which American and German services claimed that tanks had been moved across the Drina. It turned out later that the two services used different aerial photographs, where the German photo was not of the Drina but of a completely different river.

The relationship with the US services improved later. The mission then received intelligence from the CIA on trucks that were moving to and fro between Serbia and Srpska. This service was able to say precisely which trucks were involved, the nature of the cargo, and the time and the place that they would cross. However, it was only in the autumn of 1995 that the mission received this intelligence rapidly and in good time;⁹¹⁸ by which time American ground forces had arrived.

A 'very hot potato' were the helicopter flights from Serbia to Srpska. The following mysterious episode may serve as an illustration. On 7 February 1995, Nieminen was phoned by UN negotiator Stoltenberg. Fifteen to twenty helicopter flights were said to have passed the border, and to have landed somewhere near Srebrenica. These helicopters came from Serbia.⁹¹⁹ The US intelligence community had probably informed Stoltenberg of this.⁹²⁰ Nieminen then drafted a special report for the Security Council. On 8 February came the Serbian denial that there had been any flights; on 22 February, Nieminen had a talk with Milosevic on the helicopter flights, which he also denied. On 2 March, UNPROFOR reported again that between 21 and 27 February nineteen helicopters had flown from Serbia to Bosnia. Nieminen demanded immediate clarification, but the VJ claimed that it knew nothing.⁹²¹ A new report was made on 27 March: this time it involved 27 helicopters, which flew at an extremely high altitude from Serbia to VRS territory. On the way back, the helicopters probably deliberately flew very low, so as to avoid the radar systems; Nieminen was told that the AWACS had problems tracking helicopters.

Nieminen had earlier ordered a large-scale investigation. On 28 March 1995, Lieutenant Colonel R. Gudmundsson presented his findings to Nieminen. Between October 1994 and March 1995, observers from the Belgrade airfield, Surcin, had recorded a total of 73 cross border helicopter flights. Radar tracks from various radar posts confirm this. All posts were linked with the two most important air traffic control centres: one in Zagreb and one in Belgrade. Four radars were available in Surcin, but they did not have a wide range. They were too far from the border between Bosnia and Serbia to be able to track low flying aircraft.

The radar tracks came exclusively from a radar post that was situated approximately 90 kilometres from the border with Bosnia. The 79 violations were distributed as follows: there were 6 violations of the No Fly Zone in Bosnia. This also included ABiH flights.⁹²² There were 13 violations involving flights from Serbia to Bosnia. The remaining 60 violations were helicopter flights from Bosnia to Serbia. In March 1995, in other words shortly after the Black Flights to Tuzla, a total of 30 violations were observed. These included 26 helicopter flights from Bosnia to Serbia and 4 violations of the No Fly Zone in Bosnia. The track headings were mainly in the direction of Belgrade.

Gudmundsson also had an opinion on what the helicopters were transporting from Bosnia to Belgrade as opposed to the other way around. According to him, the helicopters were transporting valuable goods on their return journey, and flying back unobserved from Serbia was no great problem, because look-out posts on the airfields and at the borders could be used to check if UNPROFOR or ICFY mission observers were in the vicinity. Gudmundsson observed further that these flights sometimes took place after one or two days of heavy fighting in Bosnia. They were apparently not medical flights, because they were permissible, and these flights were unannounced.

Gudmundsson determined that in two cases a NATO jet fighter had been close to a helicopter, but that no action was taken. Neither were the helicopters ever intercepted, but the question was whether an AWACS was able to detect these low and slow flying helicopters; according to Gudmundsson it was possible, but 'the findings are normally filtered out by the computer system'. He had noticed something else remarkable: not a single violation was seen simultaneously by both the Belgrade airfield Surcin and by UNPROFOR or ICFY. This could mean that only helicopter flights at high altitude were seen by Surcin, but if that was the case, the Serbian air defence alarm would have sounded after observation, which never happened. This could indicate that the air defence was aware of the origin of these helicopters; perhaps the helicopters were equipped with a transponder that operated on a certain military frequency, to simplify coordination with the Serbian anti-aircraft defence.⁹²³

Gudmundsson concluded that if a helicopter had been 'seen', it would also have to return, so that the total number of violations would have to be doubled. All in all, the air border between Serbia and Bosnia was not closed, and if the aircraft flew back from Serbia to Bosnia they would be able to transport important cargo. 'The amount of suspected helicopters turning back to Bosnia have capacity of carrying substantial operational, logistic and personnel support to local authorities or commanders.'⁹²⁴ On 30 March, Owen was briefed on Gudmundsson's findings. It remained unclear who carried out the flights, with what goal, and what the helicopters had transported. An attached map did indicate that there were many flights near Srebrenica.⁹²⁵ Serbia responded with irritation to the conclusions of this report.⁹²⁶

On 11 April, Nieminen had another talk with Milosevic, the basis for which was an UNPROFOR report with evidence that between 2 and 7 April 1995, 25 helicopters had flown from Serbia to Bosnia. He showed Milosevic all the reports and demanded that this stop. If not, then he and his mission would finally depart. After this, the flights from Serbia to Bosnia did not stop completely, but they did become less numerous.

Western intelligence services on the support of the VJ to the VRS

The reports of Serbian supplies continued. According to a Canadian UNPROFOR worker, many heavy trucks arrived in the area, which was controlled by the Bosnian Serbs, through border crossings with Serbia.⁹²⁷ At the same time, British intelligence services also investigated the supplies to the VRS. In March 1995, the British military intelligence service determined that this was taking place, and by the VJ using helicopters, according to various intelligence reports. British diplomats in Belgrade were not completely convinced, however; they disagreed with this analysis by Joint Headquarters in Salisbury of Quiggin pointed out that supporting supplies continued to flow from Croatia and Serbia to the Muslim rebel Fikret Abdic in Bihac.

8 March. It stated that ‘the VRS are clearly being resupplied across the Drina by helicopters’. According to British diplomats, this claim completely contradicted the ICFY report of one week earlier. They wondered why, if intelligence existed, it was not made available to the ICFY. British diplomats suspected that this was ‘repeddling of others’ unsupported intelligence reports’.⁹²⁸

The BND and Netherlands MIS likewise reported on violations of the embargo against Serbia and Montenegro by Romania and Greece. The Greek covert support to Serbia and the Bosnian Serbs during the war in Bosnia is extremely well documented by the Greek journalist, Takis Michas.⁹²⁹ Russian and Ukrainian oil supplies to Serbia took place across the Danube. Hungarian cargo vessels, officially in transit to Romania, were also said to have actually been unloaded in Serbia, and the oil forwarded to the Republika Srpska. These services also reported that Greece violated the embargo by drawing large quantities of electricity from Bosnia each day. Otherwise, this ran properly via Serbia to Greece, and the Greek state energy company paid $ 20,000 a month to Belgrade for using the electric power lines. Furthermore, according to these services, the arms embargo was evaded on a large scale via Macedonia.⁹³⁰ Greek banks on Cyprus were also used and via these banks more than 770 million Euros was spent by Serbia to buy arms from Russia and Israel. The Greek Central Bank would later refuse to cooperate with the Chief Prosecutor of the Yugoslavia Tribunal in The Hague, Carla Del Ponte.⁹³¹ The trial at the Tribunal in The Hague against Serbia’s retired President, Milan Milutinovic, might perhaps bring more evidence to light as regards the Greek involvement. He apparently played a pivotal role in the alliance between Greece and Serbia during the Balkan conflict.⁹³²

Much fuel was also brought in by train from Skopje. The British press accused Akashi of failure in this regard: ‘Akashi just wanted to push this into a black hole so we could forget about it’, according to an anonymous official. This reproach of Akashi is unjustified: UNPROFOR had no mandate to monitor violations of the arms embargo or to enforce the embargo.⁹³³ Finally, it is remarkable that no report was made of smuggling of nuclear fuels to Serbia, although this country did have a secret nuclear programme.⁹³⁴

Other ‘donors’ to the VRS

The VRS also received support from the Russian mafia, who supplied arms and oil abundantly. Much would reach Serbia in transit via the Danube; payments were made from Cyprus. In the summer of 1995, more than 480 Serbian companies were based on that island, a number of which had direct links with Milosevic. Oil, petrol, trucks, arms, ammunition, machine parts and consumer goods were purchased through these companies. Each week, the trade was estimated at £ 6 million. The Russian mafia was also said to be involved with the sale of tanks from Red Army stocks.⁹³⁵

Israel is also alleged to have supplied arms to the VRS. The intermediary in this was Jezdimir Vasiljevic, a banker and a confidant of Milosevic. In October 1991, he reached an agreement with Israel, and after that transactions went via the Croat Boris Krasni and the state companies Jugoeksport and Jugoslavija Publik. According to press publications, in 1992 Bosnian Serbs allowed large parts of the Jewish community in Sarajevo to leave the city in exchange for arms supplies from Israel. There were more indications of Israel's involvement: at the end of 1994, an investigation into the remains of a mortar grenade on Sarajevo airfield revealed that it bore Hebrew letters, and in August 1995, a news programme on Israeli television reported that private Israeli arms dealers were supplying the VRS. This must have taken place with the consent of the government.⁹³⁶

In summary: the VRS, like the ABiH, was supplied with arms, ammunition and oil on a large scale. Serbia, as well as other countries, was responsible. The supplies ran partly through the border crossings on the Drina, but also via Croatia. The ICFY mission did its best to monitor the embargo, but received hardly any intelligence, and was also not in a position to man all the checkpoints, so there was a great deal that they were unable to observe.

5. The deployment of mercenaries, advisers and volunteers

The fact that the war in Yugoslavia attracted mercenaries and volunteers was to be expected.⁹³⁷ This phenomenon manifests itself in almost every armed conflict; examples are volunteers of the International Brigade in the Spanish Civil War in 1936-1939, or the Belgian mercenaries in Katanga during the fighting in the Congo in the 1960s. The distinction between mercenaries and volunteers was also clear in Yugoslavia. The first group were paid for their activities; the second group were not, and they fought for 'a just cause'. A search in the press turns up many articles on the involvement of mercenaries, volunteers and advisers. They are said to have operated with all the warring factions, where it is noticeable that some nationalities - such as British and Germans - worked for the Bosnian Croats, the Bosnian Muslims and for the Bosnian Serbs.

The first reports of Russian volunteer units, which consisted mainly of Afghanistan veterans, appeared as early as the end of 1992. Russian mercenaries and advisers generally worked for the VRS.⁹³⁸ According to accusations made by the Bosnian government, Russian military advisers were sent from Serbia and more than 4000 mercenaries from Russia, the Ukraine, Romania and Greece supported various paramilitary organizations.⁹³⁹ Romanian mercenaries were supposedly fighting with the Bosnian Serbs near Sarajevo in 1992.⁹⁴⁰ Greek and Russian mercenaries were also involved in the attack on Srebrenica. A Greek Volunteer Guard, a unit based in Vlasenica, was formed in March 1995 and was fully incorporated in the Drina Corps.⁹⁴¹ Only about one hundred men fought with this unit and in September 1995 Karadzic decorated four members of the Guard with the medal of the 'White Eagle'.⁹⁴² The ABiH also intercepted a message from the VRS, which stated that the Serbian flag had been run up on the destroyed orthodox church.⁹⁴³ Another message suggested that the Greek mercenaries should also run up their flag, and that 'because of the marketing' this should be recorded on video.⁹⁴⁴

The number of mercenaries was never considerable, because the warring factions generally paid poorly.⁹⁴⁵ Therefore it was mainly volunteers that were active. Their military duties ranged from taking part in hostilities to gathering intelligence. For instance, a Danish volunteer travelled through Srpska in a car with Danish registration plates. His Danish passport gave him sufficient protection for intelligence gathering for Croatia. Many soldiers claimed that they had served with the French Foreign Legion or the SAS, but that seldom proved to be the case.⁹⁴⁶ Dutch mercenaries likewise fought on the side of the Croats 'at Zageb, Zabeg, Zagreb, or whatever it is called'.⁹⁴⁷ The mercenaries responded to an advertisement on 2 November 1991 in the newspaper De Telegraaf by the Dutch-Croat Foundations, which was set up by the right-wing extremist Douwe van de Bos. Their applications led to the deployment of the First Dutch Volunteer Unit in Croatia.⁹⁴⁸

Most Dutch mercenaries were, like their American, British, Canadian, German and French counterparts in Croatia, active in the 103rd infantry brigade, which was formed in the winter of 1992 as an International Brigade. There was also a special Italian unit, the Garibaldi battalion. In addition, there were reports of Dutch mercenaries in Bosnia. According to Serbian accusations, some mercenaries, including Dutch, were guilty of war crimes.⁹⁴⁹ One of them was the Dutch mercenary Johan Tilder, who was mentioned in the previous chapter.⁹⁵⁰

The Mujahedin in Bosnia

The greatest tension was caused by the participation of Muslims from Western Europe and the Middle East in the ABiH. 'Approximately 4000 Mujahedin, supported by Iranian special operations forces, have been continually intensifying their activities in central Bosnia for more than two years', according to the American Lieutenant Colonel John Sray, who was an intelligence officer in Sarajevo from April to August 1994.⁹⁵¹ There are no reliable figures on the number of mercenaries or volunteers in Bosnia, Srpska and Croatia. Neither is anything known about their effectiveness. According to Bosnian-Serb sources, in the Muslim-Croat Federation there were more than 1300 fighters, including those of Kurdish, Algerian and other Arab origin. This group was said to be centred around Zenica. The MIS considered the number mentioned to be exaggerated.⁹⁵² Like the author Ripley points out, there was no joint Muslim command and the rival Iranian, Saudi, Turkish and Malaysian-back groups all operated according to their own agendas.⁹⁵³

Mercenaries of non-Yugoslav origin were involved from the outbreak of the armed conflict. An active group was the Mujahedin. These were non-Bosnian, Islamic-fundamentalist fighters from Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Sudan, Afghanistan, Jordan, Lebanon, Algeria and Saudi Arabia. Furthermore, the names of Jihad, Fis, Hamas and Hezbollah were linked with the Mujahedin in Bosnia. Sray estimated the number of Mujahedin fighters at 4000; in April 1994, the CIA arrived at the conclusion that there were approximately 400 fighters.⁹⁵⁴ In 1994, the UN put the number⁹⁵⁵ at 450 to 500, and in 1995 at approximately 600. American estimates, however, spoke of 1200 to 1400. A BVD report from late 1995 likewise gave an estimate of only 200.

This group withdrew from the control of the Bosnian authorities, both politically and militarily. There were unconfirmed reports of control by authorities of the countries of origin, by Islamic-fundamentalist terrorist organizations and by criminal organizations.⁹⁵⁶ The Mujahedin formed part of the 4th, 7th and 8th Muslimski brigade, stationed around Zenica in central Bosnia, and took part in the activities of several paramilitary units, such as the Black Swans. They fell under the responsibility of the ABiH 3rd and 7th Corps. Furthermore, there were approximately 25 other Muslim factions and units active in Bosnia, which also included women.⁹⁵⁷

These groups were supplied by the ABiH, but operated decentrally as special units or shock troops. Many ABiH sources, according to an internal UNPROFOR report, considered their military value to be limited. Nonetheless, the UNPROFOR intelligence staff followed their movements closely. The UN estimated their number in the summer of 1995 to be no more than 1500 fighters.⁹⁵⁸ Military experts were, according to the BVD, of the opinion that because of their small number, the threat from these Mujahedin should not be overestimated.⁹⁵⁹

Furthermore, the population was not particularly enthusiastic about the fighters and appeared to be indifferent to their religious propaganda. The Bosnian government appeared to have less antipathy to the Mujahedin. President Izetbegovic especially appeared to see the fighters as 'a conduit for funds from the Gulf and Middle East'.⁹⁶⁰ Within the framework of the Dayton agreement, the Mujahedin fighters should have left Bosnia before 13 January 1996.⁹⁶¹ In October, UNPROFOR concluded that the numbers had declined to between 700 and 800. The presence of the Mujahedin was used by the Croats in particular to delay the process of reconciliation and normalization. The number of clashes with the local population around Tuzla increased, and the risk to the British UNPROFOR units was deemed to be significant. According to the ABiH, radical elements within the 7th Muslimski Brigade were responsible. The mood deteriorated after a British soldier killed a Mujahedin fighter. According to UNPROFOR, the US pressure on Izetbegovic was stepped up strongly to force the Mujahedin out of Bosnia.⁹⁶² Janvier also appealed to the UN in New York to step up pressure on the Bosnian and Croatian ambassadors.⁹⁶³ Iran did continue to support Izetbegovic, and in the autumn of

6. Special Forces in Bosnia

The signing of the Washington Agreement in March 1994 and the institution of a ceasefire in central Bosnia made an effective liaison between UNPROFOR and the warring factions necessary to supply accurate information to the UN commanders. The activities, expertise and competence of the UNMOs was deemed insufficient. Furthermore, the UNMOs did not fall under the authority of Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander Rose. London therefore decided to introduce special troops into Bosnia, which were known as Joint Commission Observers (JCOs).⁹⁶⁵ In reality these were units of the Special Air Services (SAS) and Special Boat Service (SBS).

The JCOs operated in small teams of a few soldiers. Attempts were made to create a multinational JCO organization, but because of the different levels of skill, poorly coordinated communication facilities and the lack of a joint intelligence infrastructure, the mixed patrols were no great success. There were various SAS operations in Bosnia. The Guardian reported a special SAS operation involving ambulances, which carried communication equipment instead of stretchers. These 'ambulances' were donated to Bosnia by the British Humberside health authority out of humanitarian considerations, but would often suddenly appear in the most surprising places, such as in the Bihac.⁹⁶⁶ According to a former UNPROFOR worker, the JCOs were already active in Bosnia from 1992 and gathered UK-eyes-only Humint. These JCOs reported within a UK-eyes-only chain. Part of what they gathered was shared with the UNPROFOR Military Information Office in Zagreb.⁹⁶⁷

An SAS unit was stationed in Gorazde⁹⁶⁸ and an SAS unit was also sent as JCOs to Srebrenica.⁹⁶⁹ The primary underlying objective of the JCOs in Srebrenica was to gather intelligence on Dutchbat and to discover whether anything illegal was happening between the ABiH and Dutchbat.⁹⁷⁰ On 18 March 1995, a new two-man JCO team arrived in Srebrenica. They relieved a team of four JCOs, consisting of three British soldiers and a Swedish soldier nicknamed 'schwarzenegger'.⁹⁷¹ On 17 May, a third British soldier joined this new team. The patrol was attached to the commandos in Potocari. The JCOs were mainly involved in the normal reconnaissance patrols. This SAS unit was easy to identify by their British uniforms.⁹⁷² Shortly after his arrival in the enclave, their commander had a meeting with Karremans, whom he immediately offered support, such as the use of secure satellite communication equipment. The SAS unit also worked with one time pads (codes for one-off use) and cryptography equipment. According to a British intelligence service official, the SAS communication traffic was unbreakable.⁹⁷³

Karremans insisted that the JCOs should work only with the commandos. The JCOs encouraged the commandos to explore 'hot spots', and to talk with the warring factions, which until then they had not done. However, Dutchbat soldiers were not allowed by the battalion leaders to have much contact with the population. The JCOs did rapidly meet ABiH representatives, a consequence of which was that Karremans banned such meetings in the future, and he also banned the JCOs from attending the regular meetings between Dutchbat and the warring factions. The JCOs continued with their patrols together with the commandos. In April, the fighting increased, and there were rumours that the VRS was going to attack the enclave. The local ABiH commander, Oric, seemed to have disappeared; another SAS patrol then arrived from Zepa on a 'visit' to Srebrenica. Dutchbat soldier Van Duijn recalled this incident; he later became acquainted with a British soldier on an SAS course in the UK who had been in the enclave in April 1995. Van Duijn did not recall seeing the soldier, which turned out to be correct, because the SAS soldier stated: 'I arrived with a patrol from the outside.' They were looking for Naser Oric, who had meanwhile left the enclave and was in Tuzla. The SAS soldiers wanted to know where he was. Van Duijn later asked how they ended up in Srebrenica; it seemed that the SAS unit had simply walked from Zepa to Srebrenica. One of them spoke fluent Serbo-Croat.⁹⁷⁴

On 25 May, Bosnia-Herzegovina Command informed the commander of the JCOs that an operation against the eastern enclaves was a realistic probability, and that Srebrenica would then be the first on the list. This was passed on to Karremans, but he did not believe it. On 27 May, the VRS announced to Dutchbat that it intended to capture OP-E. The VRS threatened to use force and Dutchbat reinforced the OP; an offer of help from the SAS was rejected by Karremans, because he said he had enough soldiers available. Subsequently, on 3 June, OP-E fell into VRS hands.⁹⁷⁵

On 8 June, the ABiH announced to Dutchbat that an attack on the entire enclave was expected soon; the JCOs too then reported that to Karremans. The JCO commander pointed out afterwards, however, that such rumours circulated constantly and were difficult to take seriously. The JCOs had furthermore no intelligence of their own that indicated an attack. Only on 9 July was it clear to the JCOs that the VRS wanted to capture the entire enclave.⁹⁷⁶ Karremans considered the JCOs mainly as potential Forward Air Controllers and not so much as useful 'instruments' for gathering additional intelligence. There were differences of opinion between the SAS and Karremans on several occasions, and the battalion commander restricted the opportunities for their operational action considerably.⁹⁷⁷ Had the SAS gone against the wishes of Karremans, they would have been asked to leave the enclave.

After the start of the attack, the JCOs contributed to guiding NATO aircraft to VRS targets (for this see comprehensively Chapter 6 of Part III of the main Srebrenica report). The JCOs were led by Major Jacko and had their own communication equipment. Their mission was also to serve as 'forward observers' during NATO air strikes. That this came too late, had, according to Muslim witnesses, to do with the fact that the JCO unit had refused to make a correct assessment of the severity of the VRS attack.⁹⁷⁸ Eventually, the SAS would leave the enclave at the same time as Dutchbat. In May 1996, the Daily Telegraph revealed the presence of the SAS in Srebrenica, which had been given the task of reporting to General Smith in Sarajevo.

The SAS also operated in the area of the Scandinavian battalion. This battalion was not authorized to give orders to them. The ten-man SAS unit did not report to the Scandinavian battalion nor was this unit responsible for the safety of the SAS soldiers. An agreement was reached later with the commander of Sector North East at least to know in which areas the SAS were located. According to commander Arlefalk of that battalion, the SAS soldiers moved 'hither and thither' and so occasionally got caught up in skirmishes.⁹⁷⁹

In addition to British, there were also French Special Forces active in Bosnia, especially in the Skenderija district of Sarajevo. A number of them came from the French Gendarmerie's special intervention team, where they were responsible for anti-sniper duties. These teams had been through a very special training, and they had the most up-to-date optical devices and equipment. The French determined that Bosnian-Serb snipers were not the only ones that were active and causing large numbers of victims among the population, but some sniper fire also came from ABiH soldiers, who deliberately fired on their own civilian population to be able to blame the Bosnian Serbs.⁹⁸⁰ The ABiH 'hated' the French special unit, because they sometimes used laser weapons to disable their opponents.⁹⁸¹ The French Special Forces also operated in the Maglaj. In early 1993 they are said to have been on standby in Split to free Morillon from Srebrenica in a secret rescue operation.⁹⁸²

How the Canadian battalion got out of the enclave

American special units were also often spotted in Bosnia. The most important operation in which Special Forces were involved took place in March 1993. Until then, neither the VRS nor the ABiH had permitted the Canadian battalion to be relieved by Dutchbat. On 12 February 1994, an agreement was reached between the Canadian prime minister, Jean Chrétien, and President Clinton: American Special Forces were to remove Canbat from Srebrenica in a night-time operation with helicopters and Suppression of Enemy Air Defence (SEAD) aircraft. It was more or less an execution of the agreements set down in an earlier secret American memorandum, destined for the Canadian Chief of Defence Staff, containing the promise that the American army would come to the aid of the Canadian peacekeepers if 'circumstances warranted and their safety was in peril'.

It was agreed that in addition to Canbat, a Dutch reconnaissance unit would also be removed from the enclave in this operation, which after many problems⁹⁸³ had meanwhile arrived in Srebrenica at the end of February. The Chief of Operations on the Canadian side was General Maisonneuve. There were two landing sites, Dorval and Mirabel, named after the Montreal airports. The Canadians and Dutch were to muster at Dorval, and all vehicles and heavy materiel was to be placed at Mirabel. This site was to be destroyed after removing the soldiers, so that the ABiH and VRS would not benefit from the equipment. NATO in Naples was informed of this plan.⁹⁸⁴ It is not known whether UNPROFOR command in Zagreb, or Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo, were aware of it.⁹⁸⁵ General M. Baril, Boutros-Ghali's Canadian military adviser, said otherwise that he was unaware of these plans to remove Canbat from the enclave by force.⁹⁸⁶ The same was true of Netherlands Defence Minister Relus Ter Beek.⁹⁸⁷

The tension in Ottawa increased: Canbat could not leave Srebrenica and Dutchbat had still not arrived. The question was whether Dutchbat would arrive before the rotation was forced by the deployment of air power and the Special Forces. On 20 February, a discussion took place between the Canadian commander in Srebrenica, Yvan Bouchard, and the overall Canbat commander, Moore, through coded messages. Moore spoke, for example, of visitors from Italy (being US Special Forces). The following day, the two talked to each other again about the execution of the operation.

On 22 and 23 February, a meeting took place in Naples between a Canbat representative and four members of the Canadian Joint Task Force Two (JTF2), which can be compared with the British SAS.⁹⁸⁸ In the nine-page operation plan that was discussed in this meeting, the operation for removing from the enclave a total of 140 Canadian UN soldiers, six members of the Dutch reconnaissance party, six UNCivPol workers, two UNMOs and four Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) workers with Sea Stallion helicopters was covered in great detail. The code name of the plan was Operation Royal Castor/Blue Jay. It described on a minute-by-minute basis how, from takeoff to landing in Brindisi, Italy, a total of 158 people would be removed from the enclave in a secret night-time operation in a matter of few hours. Different scenarios were considered, including one in which the operation would be carried out in a moderately to highly hostile environment. The Joint Task Force Two together with US Special Forces were to carry out the operation.⁹⁸⁹

On 24 February, the Special Forces arrived in Zagreb and were brought to a state of readiness. An air fleet of 2 C-130 Gunships and a few F-18s were to provide close air support and the operation was to start at 18.00 hours. The mission was flown from the aircraft carrier USS Saratoga and from the air force base Brindisi (Italy). Bouchard received instructions that the Dutch were not allowed to come to Dorval and Mirabel, but they would be taken along. In the meantime, Canbat had started with the expansion of the night-time APC patrols, so that neither the ABiH nor the VRS would be alarmed by Canadians driving around in the dark. In total, five people were informed of the entire operation, but otherwise it was a completely American-Canadian affair, in which UNPROFOR was entirely uninvolved. The expectation was that there would be approximately fifteen deaths.

The plan was sent to Visoko. A Canadian officer, whom Moore sent to Srebrenica with an aid convoy as a courier, carried the secret operation plan on his body. On 2 March, this officer returned from Srebrenica, after speaking extensively with Commander Bouchard about the operation. On 3 March, the official handover to Dutchbat took place; one day later, the Canadian compound in Srebrenica was blocked by five hundred ABiH soldiers. Canbat was accused in a hostile atmosphere of permitting the VRS lines to be advanced. The VRS also stepped up the pressure and refused to allow the convoy that had come to collect Canbat access to the enclave.⁹⁹⁰ On 5 March 1994, the ABiH surrounded the compound again, this time with more than 2000 people.⁹⁹¹

After this news, Ottawa decided to execute the plan. Apparently only Canbat was to be evacuated, and there were no plans to take along the Dutch reconnaissance unit. The evacuation of Canbat was to be carried out with helicopters, and furthermore the aircraft carrier Saratoga was standing by. Bouchard told the Dutch that he had developed a plan involving close air support and tear gas to clear a path out of the enclave.⁹⁹² He gave the impression of being under severe stress in those days.⁹⁹³

On 7 March, everyone was ready and the special operation should have taken place, but ultimately it was abandoned at the last moment, because the VRS lifted the blockade and Canbat could leave by road after all.⁹⁹⁴ Canbat was therefore able to leave the enclave without intervention, although it was a close shave.⁹⁹⁵

The evacuation of the Canadian battalion appeared to be problematic and raises the question of whether similar plans also existed for Dutchbat. According to the Chief of Staff of BHC, General Brinkman, the evacuation of Dutch units was never seriously discussed. The grip on the UN troops was actually extremely loose. The headquarters in Sarajevo was not a normal headquarters, and there was not even any formal transfer of authority over the troops. All the national governments maintained varying degrees of frequent contact with their own units in the field. They also took their own measures to support or evacuate their units. Nonetheless, the US Secretary of Defense, Perry, had indicated that the Dutch soldiers in Bosnia would be able to count on support if they were to find themselves in difficulty. The promised support was not specified in detail at the time, and neither did that appear to be necessary then, with this promise on the table.⁹⁹⁶ According to Brinkman, UN-plans for an evacuation continued to be no more than paper tigers. The serious plans had to come from NATO, such as the withdrawal plan Oplan 40104 as well as from the national governments: the British for Gorazde and the French for Sarajevo.⁹⁹⁷

US Special Forces also remained active in Bosnia later. They were said to have been given permission to use UNHCR jeeps fitted with special registration plates for their operations.⁹⁹⁸ The security services of the Bosnian Serbs had allegedly occasionally picked up CIA or SAS personnel, but an arrangement was worked out with UNHCR, that they would then issue a statement that it was one of their people.⁹⁹⁹ Dutch soldiers for example observed fifty US Special Forces soldiers in Mostar, who vanished again abruptly.¹⁰⁰⁰ After July 1995, US Special Forces and the SAS were even more active in the region; there were said to be serious plans to have them capture Karadzic.¹⁰⁰¹

7. Conclusions

The following quotation gives a clear indication of what the secret operations in the Balkans were all about.

‘All the conflicts concerned are fundamentally struggles for power, irrespective of whether the operations are initiated in order to provide humanitarian aid or to limit the scope of an armed confrontation. (...) Experience shows that the parties to the intervention inevitably become parties to the conflict, with their own distinct interests’.¹⁰⁰²

The secret arms supplies to the warring factions took place within the framework of a complex international political constellation.

The United States had to deal with a variety of fields of tension. After the Gulf War, it was payback time and in the Arab world (especially Saudi Arabia) it was expected that Washington would support the Bosnian Muslims. Furthermore, great pressure was brought to bear on the Clinton administration by the media and Congress, which was dominated by the Republicans. On the other hand, open military support would bring the United States into conflict with European countries that were contributing ground forces to UNPROFOR. The European countries expected that additional arms would encourage the conflict to flare up, resulting in a growing stream of Displaced Persons. The lift and strike strategy (lifting the embargo and resorting to air strikes against the Bosnian Serbs) that the Americans opted for, was partly motivated by a desire to meet domestic and foreign pressure: a ‘political gesture’, because the US government knew that the Security Council would not agree and that it would lead to a decision in London and Paris to withdraw from UNPROFOR. The US lobby in the Security Council for lifting the arms embargo was also connected to the desire not to have to deploy any American ground forces.¹⁰⁰³

The third party country strategy offered an even better way out of this dilemma: the so-called 'Croatian pipeline' (arms supplies from Iran to Croatia and from there to Bosnia) was an alternative to strengthening the Muslims and Croats in a military sense after the creation of the Muslim-Croat Federation. Furthermore, a stronger Bosnia and Croatia would ensure a reduction of the pressure on Washington to send ground forces.

The American government could do nothing towards supplies by third party countries, because Congress had removed that possibility. A law drafted by senators Nunn and Mitchell banned the use of government funds for the support of or assistance in enforcing the arms embargo. It is the firm conviction of Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, who in 1993-1994 was chairman of the British Joint Intelligence Committee, that American personnel themselves were not involved in the purchase and transport, but were responsible for the funding. According to her, these supplies definitely were a flagrant violation of international law: the actions of these bodies meant that the American government violated Security Council resolutions.¹⁰⁰⁴

As such, the UN itself in part also generated these secret operations. The fact is that Bosnia was officially admitted to the United Nations as the 177th member state. It is strange then that the Security Council did not draw the logical conclusion that a new state may take measures for defence against an armed attack. The embargo curbed the legal arms trade, but did nothing to reduce the demand for, and the supply of, arms, and only displaced it onto illegal circuits.¹⁰⁰⁵

Although the US government will have observed the increasing influence of Iran, they put up with it. Sarajevo would ultimately, it was thought, allow the political and military solidarity with the United States to take precedence over that with Teheran. In the course of time, US intelligence services will have established that the number of Mujahedin fighters was not considerable and moreover that they were not in great favour among the Bosnian population. The military leaders of the ABiH also had a low estimate of their fighting power. The Mujahedin seen especially as a 'political tool' for obtaining the support of some countries in the Arab world.

At the same time, the Islamic fighters played a role as a political lever: Izetbegovic was aware that Saudi Arabia and Turkey were unhappy with the Iranian influence.¹⁰⁰⁶ There is no doubt that the Bosnian government will have played this trump card to gain the support of these two countries. Izetbegovic clung as long as possible to the Iranian connection, but in 1996 Sarajevo had to let go of this under US pressure. The same was also true of bringing in the Mujahedin. They were tolerated in Bosnia, and were used by Izetbegovic as a political lever for attracting funds in the Middle East.

In view of the long history of Turkey in the Balkans, an active role in the region for this country was predictable. The traditional Greek links with Serbia and the political support of Athens to Belgrade will without doubt have played a role. Furthermore, Ankara will have wished to contain the Iranian influence. Turkey was a perfect candidate to serve as a direct supplier. The armed forces had the aircraft, arms and logistic infrastructure. Operations could take place undisturbed from the Turkish occupied part of Cyprus, and Croatia and Bosnia were easy to reach. The American 'logistics patronage' moreover ensured that the flights to Tuzla remained 'unseen'. It was likely that the Croatian pipeline would be discovered, but because UNPROFOR did not have the mandate and the resources to act against it, it did not matter. It was likewise to be expected that the direct flights to Tuzla, Visoko and Bihac would be seen, in spite of the fact that the AWACS had been rendered 'blind' or did not fly. The Americans managed through damage control to limit the damage, while taking a further step-up in the pressure on transatlantic relations into the bargain.¹⁰⁰⁷

The indirect American support of the ABiH by looking the other way in the presence of direct arms supplies and the Croatian pipeline were described as a sort of 'Vietnamization' of the war. In other words: a strong ABiH was created, which was able to compensate for the lack of American ground forces with a robust mandate.¹⁰⁰⁸ Something similar happened at the end of the war in Vietnam. It is not strange that different views existed within the Clinton administration on arms supplies to Bosnia and the influx of Mujahedin. There were also greatly divergent views within the CIA on a comparable operation during the Reagan administration, when Stinger missiles were supplied to the Mujahedin fighters in Afghanistan. The then Head of Operations for the Middle East at the CIA, T. Twetten, described the supporters of collaboration with the Mujahedin fighters within the Reagan administration as 'strange people developing strange ideas' at the time.¹⁰⁰⁹ Now too there were dangers attached to illegal arms supplies, which some certainly did recognize.

The direct results of the clandestine arms supplies to the warring factions are difficult to identify precisely. In general terms, the VRS will have consolidated and sometimes reinforced its military position. The problem with the Bosnian Serbs was not so much the availability of light and heavy arms, but rather shortages of trained soldiers. They were supplied amply from Serbia. The clandestine arms supplies were therefore of greater importance to the Croats and the Bosnian Muslims. The training and the supplying of arms, for example, simplified the Croatian operations in the Krajina in mid 1995.

Alongside secret arms supplies, the company MPRI provided training. An observer who was a witness to the operations in which Croatian commandos crossed the river Una during the offensive against the Bosnian Serbs, observed that this was a 'textbook US field manual river crossing'.¹⁰¹⁰ By engaging this company, Washington at the same time also reduced the danger of 'direct' involvement.¹⁰¹¹ The operation resulted in the killing of more than 500 civilians and the exodus of more than 150.000 ethnic Serbs from the Krajina. In view of the US covert support to the Croats it will be interesting to see if the International War Crimes Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague will seriously investigate this matter.¹⁰¹²

The ABiH had no lack of soldiers, but did lack arms. Heavy arms especially were necessary, but these did not flow through the Croatian pipeline. Only light arms and ammunition came through, because Zagreb was all too afraid that the Bosnian Muslims would terminate the Muslim-Croat Federation sooner or later, and would turn on Croatia with these 'Iranian arms'. The Croats had for instance not yet forgotten the fighting around Mostar in the autumn of 1993. The ABiH then paid the VRS to shell Croatian positions. In some areas, the Croatian authorities therefore also collaborated with the VRS, and there were supporters of containing the flow of arms to Bosnia.¹⁰¹³

The clandestine arms supplies through the Croatian pipeline and Black Flights were a violation of the arms embargo imposed by the international community against the warring factions in the former Yugoslavia. This embargo was officially sanctioned by the Security Council. The Black Flights were moreover a serious violation of the No Fly Zone over Bosnia.¹⁰¹⁴ This could have led to the total ruin of the peace process, and the negotiations on reopening Tuzla airfield for humanitarian flights were put directly at risk.¹⁰¹⁵ The special representative of the UN Secretary-General, Akashi, reported regularly in 1994 and 1995 on new arms and weapons systems. UNPROFOR, however, had no mandate to monitor or to oppose the violations of the arms embargo.¹⁰¹⁶ The sanctions and the No Fly Zone were violated systematically and could not be seriously enforced. This sent the wrong signals to the warring factions, namely that the international community was not prepared to put serious effort into this issue.¹⁰¹⁷

The influence of the supplies was also felt in East Bosnia when in April 1995 the ABiH Spring offensive started. The ABiH in Srebrenica also received new arms. It has been demonstrated that the clandestine supplies usually led to rapid transit by helicopter to the eastern enclaves such as Srebrenica and Zepa. New arms generally facilitated new sorties from the enclaves into Bosnian-Serb villages and military positions, which in turn provoked a response from the VRS. This sometimes put Dutch soldiers in danger, because in the enclaves the ABiH all too often used Dutchbat's OPs as cover in military actions against the VRS.¹⁰¹⁸ Therefore the enclave increasingly acquired the status of a 'protected area' for the ABiH, from which the ABiH could carry out hit and run operations against, often civilian, targets. These operations probably contributed to the fact that at the end of June the VRS was prepared to take no more, after which they decided to intervene: the VRS decided shortly after to capture the enclave.

In this respect, the Black Flights to Tuzla and the sustained arms supplies to the ABiH in the eastern enclaves did perhaps contribute to the ultimate decision to attack the enclave. In this connection it is not surprising that Mladic and other Bosnian Serbs constantly complained about this, but usually received no response to their complaints.¹⁰¹⁹ In the eyes of the VRS, the complaints were perhaps justified, but it must not be forgotten that UNPROFOR did not have the mandate to oppose the supplies. In fact the sanctions and the arms embargo had little substance. At most, the flow of arms, ammunition, resources, oil and other goods was reduced somewhat. The smuggling trade flourished, and otherwise organized international criminals, including Russians, ensured sufficient supply.¹⁰²⁰ The border between Serbia and Srpska over the Drina may well have been monitored by the ICFY mission, but this check was far from watertight.

Smuggling operations from Serbia to Srpska took place daily. There were perhaps too few observers to man all the crossings, but neither did any major supplies of tanks, APCs and artillery take place, as the Bosnian Muslims claimed. There was cooperation from the Yugoslav authorities, because Belgrade had much to lose in the event of excessively visible violations of the embargo. The UN headquarters in Zagreb did hear constant rumours of support of the VJ, but hard evidence of it was never received.¹⁰²¹ Secret UN documents, to which the media referred and that indicated that the VRS was receiving 'high-level military support' from the VJ and that personnel and equipment was being supplied across the Drina¹⁰²², were not found by the NIOD in the UN archives. The conclusion was therefore that there was Serbian involvement in the war in Bosnia in 1995, but not in a direct way. The military infrastructure of the old Yugoslavia was still largely intact; the Serbian assistance related to logistics support, components, payment of officers' salaries and communications.¹⁰²³

From the American side it was confirmed that no evidence was ever supplied that arms went to the Bosnian Serbs across the Drina. The road via Croatia was open, however. The conclusion therefore was that the embargo along the Drina was 'fairly effective', albeit not watertight.¹⁰²⁴ There was another Western intelligence service that never had hard evidence in the period before the fall of Srebrenica of the VRS receiving arms from the VJ, but it still cannot be ruled out completely.¹⁰²⁵ In addition, the ICFY mission had to contend with a formidable opponent in the form of Kertis, who is described by Western intelligence services as the best organized smuggler in the Balkans. Large deliveries probably took place completely outside the view of ICFY, and much was supplied with low-flying helicopters or through the Krajina; this then happened with the knowledge of Croatia, which had an interest in a sustained conflict between the ABiH and the VRS because it tied up Bosnian-Serb troops, who could then not be deployed against the Croats. It also assured that the ABiH was not nurturing any particularly large-scale offensive plans against Croatia. Zagreb will moreover, as with Iran, have skimmed the Serbian supplies.

The arms supplies to the warring factions increased the instability in the region and allowed the armed conflict to flare up. It is no coincidence that offensives by the ABiH, VRS or Croats took place a few weeks after the military material was delivered. A common pattern was as follows: clandestine supplies, training - whether or not supervised by instructors - and after that the start of offensives. New arms mostly facilitated, the VRS complained, renewed sorties from the enclaves into Serbian villages and military positions, which in turn provoked a response from the VRS. Finally, the reconstruction of the secret arms supplies shows that divergent views existed in the various NATO member states on the possible consequences for the UNPROFOR troops in the former Yugoslavia. Washington had different ideas on this from most European capitals, but then Washington had no ground forces in Bosnia.

Chapter 5

The Signals Intelligence war of the Western intelligence services in and around Bosnia

‘In God we trust, all others we monitor’

(motto of an intercept operator)

1. Introduction

Intercepted conversations played an important role during the war in Bosnia and intercepted communications traffic had become an area of interest just a few months after the fall of Srebrenica. ‘Intercepts’ and prior knowledge of the attack on Srebrenica have been inextricably linked in various publications. The article by the journalist Andreas Zumach published in October 1995, also printed in various newspapers in the Netherlands, can serve as an example here.¹⁰²⁶ According to Zumach various sources claimed that from 17 June 1995 onwards, more than three weeks before the attack started, American intelligence services had monitored the daily conversations between General Momcilo Perisic, Chief of Staff of the Yugoslav Army, the Vojska Jugoslavija (VJ), and General Ratko Mladic.

Zumach is not specific which US intelligence service was supposedly reading this traffic and is more or less lumping all 17 US intelligence services into one group. Nevertheless, in these conversations the two generals are said to have planned the operation against Srebrenica. Excerpts from these conversations were reportedly published. The conversations proved that the initiative for the attack on Srebrenica came from Belgrade. Perisic is said to have had command of the actual attack on the enclave. This intelligence about the planned attack was not passed on to UNPROFOR in order not to disrupt the peace efforts of President Clinton.¹⁰²⁷ When asked about this, Defence Minister Voorhoeve said he was aware of these reports; he addressed an inquiry about their correctness to his American colleague William Perry.¹⁰²⁸

Until the present day, knowledge about the role and importance of Sigint in the years after the end of the Second World War can actually best be described as ‘an inventory of ignorance’. The British historian Christopher Andrew wrote:

‘The biggest gap in our knowledge of United States intelligence collection during the Cold War concerns the role of Sigint. No history of the Second World War nowadays fails to mention the role of the Anglo-American code breakers in hastening victory over Germany and Japan. By contrast, most histories of the Cold War make no reference to Sigint at all’.¹⁰²⁹

To date little is known about the role of Sigint and the interception of communications traffic during the war in the Balkans and in Bosnia in particular. This is chiefly because Sigint is one of the most secret methods of gathering intelligence.

To begin with we need a good definition of Sigint. A US Marine Corps manual describes it as 'intelligence gained by exploiting an adversary's use of the electromagnetic spectrum with the aim of gaining undetected firsthand intelligence on the adversary's intentions, dispositions, capabilities, and limitations'.¹⁰³⁰ Sigint involves the acquisition of information from electromagnetic transmissions (of any type whatsoever) aiming to intercept electronic message and data traffic and is always conducted under the greatest secrecy by technical means. This is usually conducted from ground stations, special ships, aircraft or satellites. Sigint consists of three separate, mutually interconnected gathering techniques: Communications Intelligence (Comint), Electronic Intelligence (Elint) and Foreign Instrumentation Signals Intelligence (Fisint).¹⁰³¹

Communications Intelligence (Comint) concentrates on intercepting and processing domestic and foreign communications by means of voice and data traffic through telephone, radio, Morse, code, fax, video and telegraph links, and by means of other electronic media. Comint does not relate to the interception of postal traffic or the monitoring of foreign radio and TV broadcasts.¹⁰³² A typical target of Comint during the Cold War was formed by the routine activities of Soviet airfields in the GDR, Poland and elsewhere: the radio links, the traffic between the ground personnel and the control towers, the conversations of the pilots and the weather reports for the pilots.

Electronic Intelligence (Elint) concentrates on all the other information and data traffic transmitted by domestic and foreign electronic equipment. The most common Elint targets are transmissions by radar stations and navigation systems. By means of Elint these radars can be identified by function, type, range and capabilities and their location can be precisely determined. This intelligence is chiefly of importance to the Military Intelligence Services.¹⁰³³ Foreign Instrumentation Signals Intelligence (Fisint) involves the gathering and processing of emissions related to the testing of certain aircraft, missiles and (un)manned space vehicles. Fisint is also involved in the interception of electronic traffic transmitting video images to ground stations, and of transmissions intended to test all sorts of weapons systems.¹⁰³⁴

Over the last ten years Sigint has increasingly been used to intercept a new electronic communication medium: digital data traffic. Its main purpose is to transmit enormous quantities of digital data between computer systems and networks. One example is a special program for the monitoring of electronic banking traffic. This program was used, for instance, to closely monitor Milosevic's cash flows abroad (especially to and from Cyprus).¹⁰³⁵ During the Balkan war too the intelligence services devoted attention to Comint, with particular attention given to the gathering, intercepting and decoding of military and diplomatic messages. This traffic can be conducted over an 'open' line, but it may also be coded or encrypted. In cryptography (the art of secret writing) information is converted in a way that third parties are not thought capable of deciphering.

In addition Comint can be important even if the code is not broken, because an analysis of the traffic in combination with Elint can enable intelligence services to establish the location, movements and even the strength of the Armed Forces.¹⁰³⁶ Increasing transmission activity from a military headquarters can, for instance, be an indication of an imminent military operation. Before this chapter moves on to a closer examination of the claims made in publications regarding intercepted communications traffic and the possible successes and failures in this Sigint war between the warring parties, Section 2 will first outline the advantages and disadvantages of Sigint. This is important because these are also reflected in the war in Bosnia during the period 1992 to 1995.

Subsequently, section 3 devotes brief attention to the history of the most important Sigint Services that focused on the war in Bosnia. A description is given of the largest (in budget and staff) service in the world, the American National Security Agency (NSA). Attention is also devoted to several other western bodies, such as the Canadian Communications Security Establishment (CSE), the British Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), the German Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) and the French Direction du Renseignement Militaire (DRM). This section also describes the resources that these services employed in Bosnia.

Section 4 then turns to the difficult issue of exchanging Comint (especially of a strategic nature) between friendly Western Services. The results of Comint are generally subject to strict secrecy and are not automatically shared by Western services with sister services. Even within NATO Sigint is not exchanged with full freedom; this is partly because the Intelligence-gathering Service does not wish to reveal its own capacities. A variety of accounts have been published regarding the results achieved in the field of Comint.

In Section 5 these are compared and supplemented by the author's own research. On the basis of the goals of Comint and Elint a distinction is made between the following categories: firstly the diplomatic and military communications traffic of the warring factions (the military targets), such as the VJ in Serbia; secondly the VRS in the Republika Srpska and the ABiH in Bosnia; thirdly the Elint targets in and around Bosnia; and finally UNPROFOR as a target. What can be said about the successes and the reliability of the published accounts? This section also considers the capacities and activities of the Afdeling Verbindingsinlichtingen (Sigint Department) of the Netherlands Military Intelligence Service (MIS). Finally, the conclusion in Section 6 looks back at the Sigint war between 1992 and 1995 and examines the role and the importance of Comint during the war in Bosnia.

2. The advantages and disadvantages of Signals Intelligence

Little is known about Sigint during the Cold War and following the fall of the Berlin Wall.¹⁰³⁷ A blanket of secrecy has always lain over this subject. Sigint is rather technical in nature and it is thus often difficult to explain its importance. This is one reason why scientists and journalists have generally avoided the subject. The little attention that has been devoted to Sigint in print mostly relates to World War II.¹⁰³⁸ Nonetheless, thanks to the specific information that it provided Sigint has been of enormous importance in military conflicts during and after the Cold War. Since time immemorial, governments have always wanted to know what their enemies (but also their friends) are up to. The easiest way to find this out is simply to listen to their communications traffic. By way of illustration, the former head of the US Navy Comint organization wrote: 'The ambition of every nation has been to develop unbreakable ciphers for its own use and to solve every cipher in use by its actual or potential enemies.'¹⁰³⁹

Advantages of Sigint

Due to the specific nature of the information obtained, Sigint has a number of special qualities making it a highly effective method for gathering intelligence. Indeed, Sigint proved to be one, if not the, most important source of intelligence during and after the Cold War. In October 1998 John Millis, the late Staff Director of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said that Sigint ‘has been and continues to be the intelligence of choice of the policymaker and the military commander’. He added: ‘the fact of the matter is, it’s there quickly when needed. It’s always there. Or it has always been there.’¹⁰⁴⁰ Nine advantages are listed below. One major advantage of this form of intelligence is that it is a passive method, generally conducted without the target knowing about it. Moreover, Sigint can be used against a target that is sometimes hundreds or even thousands of kilometres away. It is often not necessary to position the intercepting equipment close to the target. Sigint thus has few political or physical risks; an exception is formed by the gathering of this information by aircraft flying along the coasts of various states.

Secondly, Sigint is objective; it has a high reliability and that can sometimes even result in a perfect intelligence product. Sigint will, in contrast to intelligence gained from Humint, always be free of political prejudice and will not be influenced by the political perception of the agent’s sources. Humint can sometimes be politically coloured because it is supplied by traitors, or for reasons of blackmail, corruption, or political or financial gain. But Sigint provides, in a raw state, exactly what has been recorded in an unembellished, uninfluenced and undistorted form. Sigint has thus acquired an important status with the recipients of intelligence. As a former CIA agent put it: ‘You know the origin and you know that this is genuine. It’s not like a clandestine (Human Intelligence) report where you don’t know if this is a good agent or a weak agent or a bad agent or a double agent.’ Another CIA officer immediately pointed out the down-side too: ‘Electronic intercepts are great, but you don’t know if you’ve got two idiots talking on the phone.’¹⁰⁴¹

A third advantage is that some – certainly not all – intercepts can be an autonomous intelligence product, without the information needing to be verified through other sources. The former director of the CIA, Stansfield Turner, wrote in 1991:

‘Electronic intercepts may be even more useful [than agents] in discerning intentions. For instance, if a foreign official writes about plans in a message and the United States intercepts it, or if he discusses it and we record it with a listening device, those verbatim intercepts are likely to be more reliable than second-hand reports from an agent’.¹⁰⁴²

An intercept can thus supply unique intelligence. This is why every morning the American president is presented with not only a Top Secret Intelligence Summary but also a ‘Black Book’ with the most important intercepts of the past 24 hours. In The Hague the highest government policymakers are provided with a similar publication focussing on the Netherlands, known as the Groene Editie (Green Edition).¹⁰⁴³

Fourthly, Sigint is usually the form of intelligence most rapidly available to the intelligence recipient. The NSA in particular can, thanks to its global eavesdropping network, supply Sigint faster than any other form of intelligence. During the 1962 Cuba Crisis, for instance, on average more than a week was needed before a Humint report reached the CIA. Intercepts were directly available to the policymakers, however. As a result Sigint and Imagery Intelligence (Imint) started to play an ever more important role in warning about an enemy attack.

Fifthly, Sigint provides much more intelligence on a broad range of subjects than any other form of intelligence. At the end of the 1960s the NSA was already producing more than 400,000 intelligence reports a year, i.e. more than a thousand reports every day.¹⁰⁴⁴ Sixthly, Sigint ‘never sleeps’. After all, agents and their sources need to rest from time to time and Imint is sometimes unavailable due to darkness, sandstorms or meteorological conditions. Sigint, however, can be used day and night: 24 hours a day and 365 days a year.

Seventhly, Sigint is more flexible and more focussed on the recipient than most other forms of intelligence. This is why a report by the American Congress in 1998 stated: ‘much of the NSA’s past strength has come from its localised creativity and quick-reaction capability’.¹⁰⁴⁵ In particular the larger Sigint organizations are able to eavesdrop on new targets quickly. After all, intelligence services are not able to establish a whole new network of agents and spies within 24 hours. Imint is not flexible enough either, because bringing an espionage satellite into a new orbit involves huge costs. Eighthly, the potential of Sigint is much greater than any other form of intelligence. A successful breakthrough in cracking a foreign code can provide more valuable information than all other intelligence sources together. Breaking a code is sometimes ‘equivalent not of one but of a thousand spies, all ideally placed, all secure, and all reporting instantaneously’.¹⁰⁴⁶ Even the most fervent advocate of Humint, the legendary CIA director from 1953 to 1961 Allen W. Dulles, had to admit that Sigint provided ‘the best and “hottest” intelligence that one government can gather about another’.¹⁰⁴⁷

Finally, Sigint is said to be the most effective manner (compared to other methods) of gathering intelligence: despite its high costs, Sigint generally provides ‘more value for money’.¹⁰⁴⁸ Sigint is admittedly expensive. During the Cold War the American government spent four to five times more money on Sigint than on Humint. Since 1945 the NSA has probably spent more than $100 billion, 75 percent of which was on Sigint and the remainder on Communications Security (making communications links secure).¹⁰⁴⁹ In short, Sigint was and is probably one of the most productive ways of gathering intelligence. Since the fall of the Berlin Wall the relative importance of Sigint has increased even further. This goes not only for the United States, but also for its European allies. The latter, due to the lack of a major Imint capability are probably even more dependent on Sigint.

By way of illustration one can cite the corresponding links between the United States and the United Kingdom: even during the 1980s the majority (80 to 90 percent) of the intelligence supplied to the UK Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) every day was derived from Sigint. In May 1999 the British Foreign Secretary, Robin Cook, stated that ‘the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) work is vital in supporting our foreign and defence policies’.¹⁰⁵⁰ The 2000 annual report by the Intelligence and Security Committee to the British Parliament also indicated the importance of Sigint: ‘The quality of the (Government Communications Headquarters) intelligence gathered clearly reflects the value of the close co-ordination under the UKUSA agreement.’¹⁰⁵¹ This refers to a treaty signed by London and Washington in June 1948, known as the UKUSA Comint Agreement. This set out the division of the Comint efforts that at that time were directed against Moscow and its allies. At a later stage Canada, Australia and New Zealand also joined this agreement.¹⁰⁵²

Sigint was of great importance to other countries too, such as Canada, a major supplier of troops to UNPROFOR. The national Sigint agency, the Communications Security Establishment (CSE), was the most important supplier of intelligence in Ottawa.¹⁰⁵³ And in the Netherlands too Comint has played an important role in the past, for instance during the oil crisis. In later years too the Afdeling Verbindingsinlichtingen (Signals Intelligence Department/AVI) of the MIS supplied important intelligence.¹⁰⁵⁴

Disadvantages of Sigint

Despite its advantages, Sigint also has a number of disadvantages. These weak aspects and limitations are however sometimes also applicable to other intelligence disciplines. Twelve disadvantages are listed below. Firstly, intercepts are always a matter of the greatest secrecy. The distribution of the Sigint product is thus always very limited. Only a very small circle of the highest political and military policymakers have access to Sigint. This secrecy is also important in the context of intelligence-sharing between the United States and its allies. Sigint is often incorporated into intelligence reports, but Sigint is often available to just a few people and then mostly only on a need-to-know basis. The main reason for this is that leaked Sigint can cause considerable damage. If the person or organization being monitored, the ‘target’ in intelligence jargon, discovers this, then he or it can quickly change codes or ciphers, thus at a stroke rendering useless all the previous effort expended in breaking this code or cipher.

The disadvantage of this extreme secrecy is that Sigint often fails to reach the right people at the lower levels. Sometimes Sigint does not reach the commander on the ground, because it has been decided that this Sigint has a need-to-know classification and hence the intelligence is not distributed any further. This was the case, for instance, during the war in Korea. The Comint not only failed to reach the US troops on the ground, but also failed to reach the US Navy and Air Force. As a result highly valuable tactical and strategic intelligence remained unused. Little was learned from the Korean War, because virtually the same thing happened in the Vietnam War. Important Sigint about the locations of North Vietnamese defence systems and MIG fighter aircraft remained ‘hung up’ at the NSA and never reached the US Air Force and Navy. The consequences were far-reaching: more US aircraft were shot down and more pilots were killed needlessly.

In the mid-1980s, under the Reagan administration, the NSA initially even refused to pass on to the CIA intercepts about support provided by Cuba and Nicaragua for the armed resistance in El Salvador. Such limitations also apply to other countries than the United States. In Moscow the KGB and the Military Intelligence Service (GRU) supplied their Sigint only to a small group within the Politburo. Sharing Sigint with members of the Warsaw Pact was even officially forbidden. In European countries too, such as the United Kingdom, Germany, France and the Netherlands, access to Sigint is confined to a select group of policymakers and military commanders.¹⁰⁵⁵

A second disadvantage of Sigint, besides the extreme secrecy and limited distribution, is the inhibition regarding its use. During the 1950s and 60s each American Comint report started with the following standard sentence: 'No action is to be taken on information herein reported, regardless of temporary advantage, if such action might have the effect of revealing the existence and nature of the source.' This initial sentence is probably still used today. This limitation has led to extremely bizarre situations. To give one example, it is claimed that in October 1995 the Australian Sigint agency, the Defence Signals Directorate (DSD), intercepted Indonesian military messages which indicated that there were plans to execute five Australian journalists who had been arrested in East Timor. The service decided not to pass on this information to the Australian Prime Minister, because it was feared that he would then act on the basis of these intercepted messages, or would even publicize them. This, it was reasoned, could reveal the ability of the Defence Signals Directorate to eavesdrop on Indonesian military traffic. Following this decision, all five journalists were murdered by Indonesian Special Forces.¹⁰⁵⁶

A third disadvantage was that Sigint was often not valued properly or sometimes not even believed. During the Cold War, for instance, Sigint was not regarded as a sufficiently reliable source. As early as the Korean War, the top commanders of the US Armed Forces attached no value to Comint regarding the true strength of Mao's Red Army. During the war in Indochina, French commanders refused to heed intercepts of enemy communications traffic because these did not fit into their own analysis of the military situation.¹⁰⁵⁷ A further disadvantage was to be found in the converse possibility, namely that during the Cold War many countries were too dependent on Sigint. In 1978 the US intelligence community had become so dependent on it that President Jimmy Carter issued a clear warning: 'Recently (...) I have been concerned that the trend that was established about 15 years ago to get intelligence from electronic means might have been overemphasized.'¹⁰⁵⁸ Equally, the Soviet military leadership became fully dependent on Sigint when it came to early warning of a nuclear or conventional attack. This had very unpleasant consequences, as became apparent in the autumn of 1983. A serious nuclear crisis threatened then, as a result of misunderstandings: Soviet and Warsaw Pact ground stations interpreted a NATO exercise totally wrongly. On the basis of Sigint they thought that a surprise attack by US Pershing missiles was imminent.¹⁰⁵⁹ And in May 1998 a false interpretation of intercepts by the Sigint service of the Indian Army almost led to a nuclear confrontation between India and Pakistan.¹⁰⁶⁰

This relates to the fifth disadvantage: blind faith in Sigint can lead to a sort of 'sigint snobbery'. During and after the Cold War ever greater importance was attached to Sigint. In particular the introduction of spy satellites and the U-2 spy plane led to a neglect of Humint. A sort of intelligence elitism arose, also known as the 'Green Door syndrome': the notion that only Sigint (and to a certain extent Imint) could still be trusted. Humint was then frequently dismissed as unreliable. The 'BrixMis' espionage missions in the GDR suffered from this, for example, because their mission reports sometimes diverged from the Sigint reports on the same subject. Then it was usually the Sigint that was believed, simply because reports from GCHQ were classified much higher ('secret' or 'Top Secret'), while the same intelligence in the BrixMis report was only classified as 'UK Confidential'.¹⁰⁶¹

Excessive faith in Sigint can also bring another risk, listed here as the sixth disadvantage: this intelligence product must often be viewed together with Humint and Imint. If Sigint is the sole intelligence product then it provides a sure foundation only in special cases. Sigint often provides only part of the puzzle and not the entire puzzle, as such intelligence is often fragmentary and indirect. This also means that the intelligence of the NSA does not form a strong basis because it consists only of raw Sigint (a single source product) and not of 'finished intelligence' (an all source product). The responsibility for creating a finished intelligence product lies with the consumers of the raw material supplied by the NSA. Consequently, analysts within the US intelligence community must analyse hundreds or even thousands of Sigint items if they want to get a clear picture. A member of an American intelligence service stated with regard to this: 'You rarely get a Sigint smoking gun. It's usually very fragmentary (...) Very often you don't even know who you're listening to.'¹⁰⁶² This confirms that neither Sigint provides all the answers; used alone, it is certainly not enough to expose the political plans or internal political machinations of a foreign government. For that matter, Imint and Humint are seldom able to do this either.

A seventh disadvantage is that although Sigint is fast, it can still sometimes arrive too late. During the Suez Crisis in 1956 and the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 there was enough Sigint available in the NSA for instance, but its processing, analysis and reporting proved to be too time-consuming. The Sigint first became available days after these two invasions. This relates to the eighth disadvantage, which is probably the most important one: the flow of information is enormous but the analysis capability is not sufficient. Powerful computers can carry out a rapid preselection and separate the wheat from the chaff, but it is the analyst who must ultimately decide if a message is valuable. In a time of crisis Sigint organizations are flooded with masses of intercepts. CIA analysts were not able to predict the war in the Middle East in 1973 because they had hundreds of Comint reports from the NSA on their desks and thus, to put it simply, were unable to see the wood for the trees.

Admiral McConnell, the director of the NSA in 1995, stated for instance that 'NSA's capability to intercept far exceeds its capability to decode, analyse and report. The good news is the agency can decode and analyse a million messages a day; the bad news is the agency must decide which million, of the billions of messages sent globally, to decode.'¹⁰⁶³ Around 1995 the NSA did indeed process about just one percent of the intercepts that reached its headquarters in Fort Meade: in the 1980s this figure had been twenty percent. It was typical for the relationship between incoming intercepts and outgoing intelligence that the current director of the NSA, General Hayden, had to admit that the NSA now produces less intelligence than it did ten years ago. The intelligence production of the NSA was also not helped by the fact – revealed by an internal study in early 1995 – that there was constant bureaucratic infighting between the military and civilian sections of the Operations Division of this organization. This brought a considerable delay in the flow of intelligence to other departments: in mid-1995 many consumers of the intelligence products of the NSA complained that the NSA was not meeting their needs.¹⁰⁶⁴

A ninth disadvantage is formed by the inherent vulnerability of Comint. Signals are rendered secure, codes can suddenly be changed, the transmitters can frequency-hop (whereby the transmitter jumps between different frequencies in a pattern known only to the legitimate recipient). Burst transmissions can be conducted as well, in which enormous amounts of information are sent in a few seconds. A spread spectrum can be used, whereby the information for transmission is distributed over simultaneously transmitted frequencies. Another way for the 'eavesdropped' party to disrupt Comint is to intentionally disseminate false messages in the hope that these will be intercepted. Cryptography is another excellent method of protecting communications traffic. Millis described this as one of the major threats to the efforts of the NSA: according to him Sigint was in a crisis due to these factors and the world of communications traffic could no longer be called Sigint-friendly.¹⁰⁶⁵

All efforts can of course also be negated by espionage or betrayal. Soviet spies such as William Weisband, William H. Martin and Bernon F. Mitchell caused enormous damage to American attempts to acquire Comint. Mistakes by the American president can have the same effect. In 1969, for instance, President Richard M. Nixon revealed during a press conference that the NSA was able to read the communications traffic of the Soviet Union and North Korea. Following this statement Moscow and Pyongyang changed their cryptographic systems and the NSA was immediately rendered 'deaf'. The NSA needed months to repair the damage caused by Nixon's slip-up.

A tenth disadvantage is that Sigint, due to its limited distribution, can also be used for personal political ends. Henry Kissinger did this when he was national security advisor to Nixon: certain sensitive intercepts were not shared with the State Department and Pentagon.¹⁰⁶⁶ And in 1986 the NSA even refused to share Sigint about the Iran-Contra affair with the Minister of Defence, Casper Weinberger: the reasoning used was that the Pentagon did not have a 'need-to-know'.¹⁰⁶⁷ An eleventh advantage often cited is the lack of coordinated intelligence gathering activities. During the Cold War the various Sigint units of the three branches of the US Armed Forces and of the various intelligence services were often engaged in the same tasks. This led to an enormous multiplication of Comint. This even occurred after the Cold War, for instance during the hunt for the drugs king Pablo Escobar in 1992-1993. The NSA and Sigint units of the CIA and the Armed Forces all operated totally independently of each other, in an attempt to show that their staff and equipment were 'better' than those of the other organizations. In the Soviet Union too the KGB and GRU often worked separately, and this phenomenon was not confined to the superpowers. In Germany the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) and Military Intelligence Service spent more than 20 years in a mutual struggle for authority over Sigint.¹⁰⁶⁸ In Chapter 3 it has already been noted that in the Netherlands too there were three separate military organizations for Sigint, and there was virtually no cooperation or serious effort to achieve integration. It was only in 1996 that these three services were merged to form one Signals Intelligence Department (AVI).

As twelfth factor, technical obstacles can also hinder Sigint. Such factors as atmospheric disturbance, static, poor reception and the occasional 'drop-out' of signals can prevent a good intercept. Built-up areas, or mountains and valleys too, can often make good long-distance interception impossible. Finally, serious disruptions can also be caused by industrial activities.¹⁰⁶⁹

To summarize, Sigint is an important, safe, fast, permanently deployable, valuable, productive and highly reliable method of gathering intelligence in the form of Comint. It also has a number of disadvantages, however, the most important of which are the avalanche of intercepted information, the lack of sufficient analysis capacity, the limited possibilities for interception due to cryptographically protected signals via landlines, the nature of the topography and human habitation, and atmospheric conditions. Before considering which of these factors were important during the war in Bosnia, the focus first turns to the history of the most important Sigint organizations.

3. The most important western Signals Intelligence organizations

Sigint organizations do not need to be physically close to the land or region being monitored: this is possible from considerable distances, although the interception of specific types of communications traffic does require that monitoring posts be in the vicinity. If the region is very mountainous, then communications traffic via walkie-talkies, radio telephones or VHF traffic, for instance, is hard to pick up. Turning to the Bosnian conflict, the question is which organizations monitored, or 'targeted', the various warring factions (especially the VRS and the ABiH). First of all we will look at the American National Security Agency (NSA).

The National Security Agency

Since its creation in November 1952, the NSA has been responsible for the management and control of all activities relating to the gathering and processing of Sigint for the American federal government. With regard to the history of the NSA, an expert states: 'It is extremely difficult for an outsider to accurately evaluate the current importance of this agency to the US foreign intelligence effort. No agency of the US intelligence community has been able to better insulate itself from public scrutiny.'¹⁰⁷⁰

In the year 2002 the NSA is the biggest intelligence service in the world. It is the primary gatherer and processor of Comint and Foreign Instrumentation Sigint (Fisint), and since 1958 has been the central coordinator for all Elint. The NSA produces only Sigint, and not finished intelligence reports based on analysis. This responsibility lies with the consumers of the NSA product within the American intelligence community. Furthermore the NSA is responsible for monitoring the security of the signals, the communications traffic and the data traffic of the American federal government. Within the NSA this is known as Information Security (Infosec). Since the mid-1980s the NSA has also been responsible for the Operations Security (Opsec) programme of the American government.

The most important customers of the NSA are the White House, the Pentagon, the Departments of State, Energy, Trade, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the CIA, DIA, the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), the leadership of the US Armed Forces, the three Military Intelligence Services and several foreign intelligence services with which the NSA cooperates. At the end of the 1960s more than 100,000 people worked for the NSA. At the time of the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, some 75,000 American military personnel, civilians and temporary staff were engaged in Sigint operations in the United States and at bases overseas. Of these 75,000, more than 25,000 people worked at the headquarters in Fort Meade (Maryland).¹⁰⁷¹

The NSA is not the only agency engaged in Sigint, but it is at the top of a pyramid formed by three other Military intelligence services: the US Army Intelligence and Security Command, the Naval Security Group and the Air Intelligence Agency. The NSA also closely collaborates with the Sigint division of the CIA, the Office of Technical Collection,¹⁰⁷² and the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), which manages the US spy satellites.¹⁰⁷³ Since 1962 the United States has had special Sigint satellites such as Magnum, Orion and Jumpseat operating in space, as well as special Comint satellites such as Vortex and Intruder which have the job of 'hoovering up' Comint.¹⁰⁷⁴

Right from the start the NSA took a strong interest in the conflict in Bosnia. The activities were increased further after Clinton had been sworn in as president in January 1993. In the same year the lack of translators and analysts who spoke Serbo-Croat proved to be a problem. The NSA thought it would encounter problems if Clinton decided to make a military contribution to UNPROFOR, and the NSA decided to place an advertisement in daily newspapers in order to recruit translators. On April 1993 this ad appeared in the Commerce Business Daily, announcing the need for 'a group of approximately

From 1991 to 1995 NSA was interested in virtually all aspects of the conflict in Bosnia: diplomatic, military and economic. Much emphasis was placed on diplomatic Sigint, i.e. intercepting the communications of the Croatian, Bosnian Muslim, Bosnian Serb and Yugoslav governments about the conflict and related political issues, as well as the role of various outside governments in the conflict, such as the involvement of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards. This was generally referred to as 'strategic Sigint', much of which was very sensitive in nature. The organization is said, for instance, to have monitored telephone conversations that the German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, conducted with the Croatian president Franjo Tudjman. At the same time, NSA (not the military) also collected massive amounts of Sigint about military developments in the region, much of it tactical in nature (such as Croatian Army battalion xx moving from place A to place B), using listening posts and mobile reconnaissance platforms. In addition to diplomatic and economic, NSA also monitored a wide range of other subjects, such as wire transfers coming in and out of the various former Yugoslav republics, illicit arms shipments, petroleum smuggling into the former Yugoslavia, terrorist activities, narcotics trafficking, etc. It is probably fair to say that by 1995, the former Yugoslavia was probably the single most important Sigint target for NSA, despite the fact that there were no American troops yet on the ground.¹⁰⁷⁶

Due to the involvement of the US Air Force and Navy, the NSA also focused on the Serb air defence in Bosnia. The agency was interested in the military developments on the ground despite the fact that US Ground Forces were not stationed in Bosnia. The NSA supplied intelligence for Operation Deny Flight, in the form of Sigint from the military communications traffic and Elint from Serb air defence operations. This was fed into the Linked Operational Intelligence Center Europe (LOCE) system. The Americans were interested in the air defence systems of the (Bosnian) Serbs. US intelligence officials indicated, however, that it was not impossible that information on this subject that was passed on by the NSA to the Pentagon for further processing then became 'hung up' at the Pentagon.¹⁰⁷⁷

The deployed American aircraft and satellites

Sigint satellites and aircraft formed the chief resource for 'hoovering up' the telephone, radio, digital and analogue computer data, fax and modem transmissions between computers and GSM traffic. A new generation was in use at this time: the Mercury (Advance Vortex) satellite which is supposedly able to intercept from space even very low-power radio transmissions, such as those from walkie-talkies.¹⁰⁷⁸ Moreover, between 1994 and 1997 three new Sigint satellites (Trumpet) were launched, intended for amongst others monitoring military targets. Because Trumpet used a special orbit, it could not hover over designated points on the Earth's surface as geosynchronous Sigint satellites do. These satellites copy primarily civilian traffic. Because of the unique dynamics of these special orbits, the system has no utility for monitoring civilian telecom nets because it passes too quickly over designated points over the Earth; but the system does have great utility against mobile military-type communications and Elint emitters in the northern hemisphere.¹⁰⁷⁹

In fact the existence of Sigint satellites remained secret until 1996 until officially confirmed by the Director of the CIA of the day, John Deutch. This confirmation was long discussed within the US government. The State Department was mainly afraid of the impact this would have in certain countries. Despite the blacked-out sections in a State Department document¹⁰⁸⁰ it is clear that the main concern was countries hosting US ground stations responsible for receiving and processing Comint from Sigint satellites. The countries in question are the United Kingdom (Menwith Hill), Germany (Bad Aibling), Japan (Misawa Air Base) and Australia (Pine Gap). These stations are linked to the stations of the UKUSA partners: Morwenstow in the United Kingdom, Leitrim in Canada, Kojerena in Australia and Waihopai in New Zealand.¹⁰⁸¹

Nonetheless, many doubt whether there is still much point in equipping satellites for Sigint tasks. The late John Millis, former Staff Director for the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, believed that the possibilities provided by ground stations for Sigint were sufficient. In his opinion the next generation of satellites no longer needed to include Sigint in their package, with the possible exception of Elint.¹⁰⁸² In addition to satellites, special manned and unmanned aircraft were also used to monitor the warring parties in Bosnia: RC-135 Rivet Joint Sigint aircraft from the 922nd Reconnaissance Squadron flew from RAF Mildenhall, and U-2R Senior Span reconnaissance aircraft from Fairford in Great Britain and in 1996 from Istres Le Tube in France. US Navy EP-3 Aries aircraft, stationed at Souda Bay Air Base on the Greek island of Crete, operated over the Adriatic Sea and were used to monitor the military activities of the Bosnian Serbs, Muslims and Croats. The gathered Sigint (chiefly Elint) was passed on to the NATO Combined Air Operations Centre (CAOC) in Vicenza in Italy, which coordinated air operations over Bosnia. The Special Handling and Evaluation Detachment (SHED), in which the NSA participated, received this intelligence in Vicenza.¹⁰⁸³ In Mildenhall were also linguists, analysts and other specialists stationed the 488th Intelligence Squadron of the US Air Intelligence Agency.¹⁰⁸⁴

The first RC-135 Rivet Joint Sigint mission was flown over the Adriatic on 10 July 1992. As part of Operation Provide Promise, the UN's humanitarian air bridge to Sarajevo, the RC-135s flew more than 600 missions, monitoring Serb and Bosnian Serb air defence systems, military radio traffic and radar pulses. These aircraft also tracked the cargo planes that transported the aid to Sarajevo. These missions were continued during Operation Deny Flight, which once again monitored the air defence systems of the Yugoslavian Army and the Army of the Bosnian Serbs in the No Fly Zone. The RC-135s were also active in the air strikes on VRS positions during Operation Deliberate Force in 1995.

The RC-135 was not the only Sigint weapon. U-2R Senior Span reconnaissance aircraft also regularly flew over Bosnia. The aircraft are based at Beale Air Force Base in California, but these Beale Bandits later flew from Aviano Air Force Base in Italy and Istres in France.¹⁰⁸⁵ The intercepts from these U-2s were immediately passed on by satellite to a specially created unit, known as the Consolidated Remote Operating Facility, Airborne (CROFA) at the headquarters of the NSA. If an intercept is immediately passed on to a unit, this is known in the jargon as 'real-time intelligence'. The near-real-time intercepts involved here were processed and translated and then distributed as raw intelligence.1086

Aircraft of the US Navy were also involved in Sigint missions over Bosnia. By around the end of May 1997, the EP-3 Aries Sigint aircraft stationed at Souda Bay had flown more than 1100 Sigint missions against VJ and VRS targets since 4 July 1992, clocking up over 10,000 flying hours in the process. Smaller ES-3A Shadow aircraft, stationed on US aircraft carriers in the Adriatic, also flew thousands of hours over Bosnia. The first ES-3A missions were carried out over Bosnia from February 1994 onwards, from the aircraft carrier USS Saratoga in support of Operations Provide Promise and Deny Flight.1087 A unit of ES-3A aircraft on the carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt also supplied Sigint support for the air strikes on Bosnian Serb targets.1088 American submarines were also involved in Sigint operations. Teams of navy cryptologists, including Serbo-Croat translators, were on board the USS Archerfish and USS City of Corpus Christi, which operated in the Adriatic during 1991 and 1992. These American submarines chiefly monitored the military activities of the VRS during Operations Provide Promise and Sharp Guard.1089

The Canadian Signals intelligence service

The Communications Security Establishment (CSE) is a part of the Department of National Defence. In April 1946 Prime Minister MacKenzie King agreed to the creation of a Sigint agency; in the same year all Sigint units of the three branches of the Armed Forces were merged into the Communications Branch of the National Research Council¹⁰⁹⁰ Canada became a member of the UKUSA intelligence alliance between the US, UK and Canada. In 1957 the Communications Branch stopped its cryptanalysis activities, meaning that Canada was 'demoted' to a simple supplier to the NSA and GCHQ. This step made the Communications Branch dependent on the NSA with regard to decoding, translation and processing of the Canadian Comint. In 1975 the Communications Branch of the National Research Council was given a new name: the Communications Security Establishment (CSE). Due to Canada's unique special relationship with the United States, the CSE had (and has) unlimited access to all Comint generated within the aforementioned UKUSA alliance. This special position exists because Canadian territory is absolutely essential for American defence against nuclear missile attacks by hostile powers: Sigint sites in the far north would be the first to pick up corresponding signals. This gave CSE unique access to the innermost secrets of the US intelligence community.

The CSE reports to the intelligence coordinator in the Privy Council Office and the intelligence cells at the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, and the Department of National Defence. At the operational level Canada's Sigint monitoring stations are not manned by CSE personnel, but by specialist military personnel on detachment from the Canadian Forces Information Operations Group (CFIOG), who do however work under the command of the CSE. The CFIOG has about a thousand employees, mostly military Communications Research Operators, known internally as '291-ers'. They work at the Leitrim monitoring station, but also at highly isolated stations such as Alert, Gander and Masset. Until recently it was not known that a special CFIOG unit was stationed at Pleso (near Zagreb) during the war in Bosnia. This unit arrived at Pleso in March 1995, where a special Sigint unit was stationed; this unit, among other tasks, supplied information directly to the deputy Force

Commanders, the Canadian Generals Ray Crabbe and later Barry Ashton.¹⁰⁹¹ There was a considerable overlap between the activities of the NSA and the Canadian unit in Pleso. Both services ensured a constant flow of Comint for the Canadian troops participating in UNPROFOR, who were stationed in Visoko and at other locations. This CFIOG also had a special, secure link to the intelligence staff at the Canadian Department of National Defence, thus giving them access in near-real-time to UKUSA Sigint.¹⁰⁹²

The British Signals intelligence service

The United Kingdom was also active in Bosnia in this field, through the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ). Compared with the two other British intelligence services, MI5 and MI6, much less has been published and much less is known about the GCHQ. A bibliography of the British intelligence and security services refers to hundreds of publications, of which only six relate to the GCHQ in the time following 1945. Nevertheless, this service, measured by the volume of produced intelligence, by the size of the annual budget and by the size of its staff, is the biggest service. In 1966 the GCHQ, and the organizations that gathered intelligence for the service, employed some 11,000 people: more than the combined strengths of MI6 and MI5. The service was also larger than the entire British diplomatic service, including the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London and the overseas embassies and consulates.¹⁰⁹³

Thanks to the participation in the UKUSA alliance, the GCHQ is said to have acquired a strong position in the United Kingdom. However, the GCHQ was rather overshadowed by the NSA. At the start of the 1950s, due to budgetary reasons and the 'shrinkage' of the British Empire, London was forced to reduce its activities in the field of Comint and cryptanalysis. GCHQ had to close monitoring stations and make staff redundant. As a result it became increasingly dependent on the NSA for financial support and technical equipment, such as receivers and fast computers.¹⁰⁹⁴ Two British authors issue a tough verdict on this period: from a 'post-Second World War partnership of equals' the relationship between the NSA and the GCHQ became a 'master-servant arrangement of convenience'.¹⁰⁹⁵

GCHQ became used to this situation and was even able to gain an advantage from it. The attraction of US dollars and sophisticated technology was irresistible. Former GCHQ official Michael Herman wrote, for instance: 'For Britain and others, access to the United States' weight of resources, technology and expertise is an overwhelming attraction'.¹⁰⁹⁶ The relative decay of the strength and capacity of the GCHQ meant that over the years London gained more advantages from the relationship with the NSA than it contributed. This did however mean that the GCHQ seemed even more strongly 'married' to the NSA.¹⁰⁹⁷ The annual report of the British Parliamentary Intelligence and Security Committee thus stated, with regard to the intelligence of GCHQ, that 'the quality of the intelligence gathered clearly reflects the value of the close coordination under the UKUSA agreement'.¹⁰⁹⁸

The fear of being marginalized in the UKUSA alliance, due to the shrinking significance, budgets and technical resources of the GCHQ, became a serious concern in London in the 1970s and 1980s. An internal memorandum of the GCHQ, the Strategic Direction Summary, came to the
