

Srebrenica

Reconstruction, background, consequences and analyses of the fall of a 'safe' area

Table of contents

Prologue The history preceding the conflict: Yugoslavia up till 1991	7
Chapter 1 The era up till 1945	9
Chapter 2 Tito's Yugoslavia	34
Chapter 3 The era after Tito	54
Chapter 4 Yugoslavia during the Serbian presidency of Slobodan Milosevic.....	61
Chapter 5 The West and Yugoslavia before the crisis.....	95
Part I The Yugoslavian problem and the role of the West 1991–1994.....	117
Introduction to Part I.....	119
Chapter 1 Europe confronted with war in Slovenia: June-July 1991	128
Chapter 2 The war in Croatia and the western reaction	181
Chapter 3 Recognition of Croatia and Slovenia and the significance of that for Bosnia.....	298
Chapter 4 UNPROFOR and the Dutch contribution	371
Chapter 5 The start of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina: March 1992 – May 1992.....	391
Chapter 6 Emotionalization of the debate following reports about the camps ('Omarska'): June 1992 – August 1992.....	443
Chapter 7 The Autumn after 'London': September 1992 – October 1992.....	566
Chapter 8 Safe Areas as spin-offs from humanitarian action, November – December 1992.....	592
Chapter 9 The rapes in Bosnia and the Vance-Owen peace plan, January-February 1993	631
Chapter 10 Srebrenica under siege	682
Chapter 11 Bankruptcy of the international community – the Netherlands as a catalyser: May to July 1993.....	752
Chapter 12 The Owen-Stoltenberg plan: June 1993 - September 1993	796
Chapter 13 Offering the Airmobile Brigade: August 1993 – November 1993.....	822
Chapter 14 Interim balance	856
Chapter 15 Problems with implementation	870
Part II Dutchbat in the enclave.....	918
Chapter 1 The organizational structure of UNPROFOR	920
Chapter 2 The history preceding the conflict in Eastern Bosnia up until the establishment of the Safe Area.....	936
Chapter 3 Srebrenica under UN protection: demilitarized and Safe Area (March - June 1993).....	952
Chapter 4 Srebrenica in the time of CanBat - the humanitarian situation and the arrival of the NGOs.....	975
Chapter 5 The preparation and dispatch of Dutchbat	997
Chapter 6 Operational performance of Dutchbat I, II and III in the Safe Area Srebrenica.....	1047
Chapter 7 Dutchbat in the enclave – the local perspective	1115
Chapter 8 Peacekeeping and humanitarian action	1132
Chapter 9 How Dutchbat functioned internally until the VRS attack.....	1228
Chapter 10 Srebrenica from the national and international point of view.....	1268
Part III The fall of Srebrenica	1322
Chapter 1 The military and political situation in spring 1995	1324
Chapter 2 Air power: Close Air Support and air strikes	1418
Chapter 3 No air actions on release of the hostages: a deal between Janvier and Mladic?.....	1450
Chapter 4 The mood in the enclave: May - July 1995	1471
Chapter 5 The period from 25 May 1995 to 6 July 1995	1529
Chapter 6 The Fall of Srebrenica: 6 to 11 July 1995.....	1600

Chapter 7 6 - 11 July 1995 – retrospective accounts	1756
Chapter 8 Plans to re-take Srebrenica.....	1863
Chapter 9 The departure of Dutchbat from Srebrenica	1879
Part IV The repercussion and the aftermath until the end of 1995.....	1902
Chapter 1 The journey from Srebrenica to Tuzla.....	1904
Chapter 2 The executions.....	1952
Chapter 3 The news of the executions and the mass graves.....	1991
Chapter 4 Potocari – Dutchbat and the fate of the local population.....	2006
Chapter 5 The debriefings in Zagreb.....	2152
Chapter 6 ‘Circus Pleso’.....	2245
Chapter 7 The big debriefing in Assen, 4 September 1995–4 October 1995.....	2278
Chapter 8 The ‘srebrenica affair’ in the public domain.....	2335
Chapter 9 The fate of the other eastern enclaves.....	2399
Appendix I Dutchbat III and the population: medical issues	2436
Introduction.....	2438
Chapter 1 The medical organization of Dutchbat.....	2440
Chapter 2 Medical aid for the local population.....	2442
Chapter 3 The conflict between Médecins Sans Frontières and the Opstina.....	2449
Chapter 4 The ‘emergency stock’	2452
Chapter 5 Humanitarian aid in the period from 6 to 13 July 1995.....	2462
Chapter 6 6–12 July 1995.....	2463
Chapter 7 Return to Srebrenica	2485
Chapter 8 13 July 1995.....	2487
Chapter 9 14 July.....	2493
Chapter 10 15 July	2495
Chapter 11 Afterthoughts about provision of medical aid by Dutchbat for the refugees.....	2496
Chapter 12 The evacuation of the hospital on 11 July.....	2500
Chapter 13 Convoy of wounded destined for Kladanj fails to make it (12–13 July).....	2508
Chapter 14 Involvement of the International Red Cross	2523
Chapter 15 Dutchbat’s internal problems	2544
Chapter 16 Criticism of Dutchbat’s medical actions.....	2560
Chapter 17 Investigation conducted by the Military Health Care Inspectorate.....	2576
Chapter 18 Investigation conducted by the Public Health Care Inspectorate.....	2582
Chapter 19 Conclusions and consequences of the investigations	2588
Chapter 20 Subsequent opinions about the medical and ethical issues of ‘essential stock’.....	2596
Chapter 21 Conclusions relating to Dutchbat III and medical matters.....	2603
Appendix II Intelligence and the war in Bosnia 1992–1995: The role of the intelligence and security services	2608
Document Information	2610
Chapter 1 The United Nations and Intelligence	2617
Chapter 2 The Western intelligence community and the war in Bosnia	2652
Chapter 3 Dutch intelligence and security services and the war in Bosnia	2686
Chapter 4 Secret arms supplies and other covert actions	2744
Chapter 5 The Signals Intelligence war of the Western intelligence services in and around Bosnia	2799
Chapter 6 The Signals Intelligence War of the Warring Factions	2854
Chapter 7 Imagery Intelligence in Bosnia	2883

Chapter 8 Was ‘Srebrenica’ an intelligence failure?.....	2919
Chapter 9 Survey of archival records.....	2979
Appendix III Chemical weapons used?	3010
1. Reports about the use of chemical weapons during the war.....	3012
2. Chemical weapons used against the column on the way to Tuzla?.....	3016
3. Conclusion.....	3019
Appendix IV History and Reminders in East Bosnia.....	3020
Introduction.....	3022
Chapter 1 Serbs and ‘Turks’ – The Ottoman Heritage.....	3026
Chapter 2 The Austro-Hungarian Period And World War One.....	3039
Chapter 3 World War Two, 1941–1945.....	3048
Chapter 4 Under Communist Rule.....	3066
Chapter 5 The Nationalist Take-Over.....	3089
Chapter 6 War In Eastern Bosnia.....	3116
Chapter 7 The Rise of the Muslim Enclave of Srebrenica.....	3137
Final Remarks.....	3155
Appendix V Western Perceptions and Balkan Realities.....	3160
Foreword.....	3161
Chapter 1 Introduction.....	3162
Chapter 2 Western image-forming.....	3170
Chapter 3 Dutch policy on the Balkans and Yugoslavia.....	3191
Chapter 4 Image and reality.....	3208
Notes.....	3224
References.....	3237
Appendix VI The Background of the Yugoslav crisis: A review of the literature.....	3248
Introduction.....	3250
Chapter 1 The history of the Yugoslav state.....	3255
Chapter 2 Theories concerning the disintegration of Yugoslavia.....	3274
Appendix VII.....	3316
Resupply by air.....	3318
Appendix VIII Background and influence of media reporting of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia during the period 1991–1995: A study of views and methods of Dutch journalists	3352
Introduction.....	3354
Chapter 1 Media: process and effects.....	3357
Chapter 2 Yugoslavia and Dutch journalism.....	3369
Epilogue.....	3414
Bibliography and References.....	3417
Appendix IX List of people interviewed.....	3426
Appendix X Archive Overview.....	3448
Introduction.....	3450
Chapter 1 Ministry of Foreign Affairs archives.....	3451
Chapter 2 The Ministry of Defence archives.....	3461
Chapter 3 Other archives and collections.....	3472

Chapter 4 Additional private collections	3478
Chapter 5 List of audio-visual material consulted.....	3479
Appendix XI	3484
The organization and coordination of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.....	3486
Appendix XII.....	3512
Defence in a changing world.....	3514
Appendix XIII Chronology of the Bosnian conflict 1990–1995	3552
Introduction.....	3554
Chronology 1991.....	3560
Chronology 1992.....	3587
Chronology 1993.....	3645
Chronology 1994.....	3704
Chronology 1995.....	3781

Prologue

The history preceding the conflict: Yugoslavia up till 1991

Chapter 1

The era up till 1945

1. Introduction

In January 1991 J. Fietelaars, the Dutch ambassador to Yugoslavia, sent a message from Belgrade to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague that Slovenia was virtually certain to leave the Federation of Yugoslavia.¹ The Dutch diplomat felt this would lead to a political momentum where Croatia would rapidly follow Slovenia's example and the remaining republics of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro would no longer wish to belong to the remnants of a Yugoslav state that would be dominated by Serbia.

An answer to the question of what would happen if Yugoslavia were to disintegrate came on 16 January from none other than President Milosevic of Serbia during a four-hour lunch in Belgrade with the European Community ambassadors to Yugoslavia. Here, Milosevic indicated 'the ultimate compromise' that Serbia was prepared to make if Yugoslavia were to collapse: 'If this cannot be achieved peacefully, Serbia will have to opt for the power resources that we have at our disposal but they (the remaining republics) do not possess.' According to the coded message that Ambassador Fietelaars sent to The Hague, the Serbian president continued by saying:

'... [B]ut let there be no misunderstanding about this: if a federal Yugoslavia is no longer supported then the Serbian willingness to make sacrifices is rendered superfluous and is robbed of its value. We will then return to our starting point, to our Serbia. But this is not the present administrative department but the Serbs' fatherland, and the Serbs in Yugoslavia who declare themselves in favour of a return to the Serb fatherland have the right to do this and the Serbian people will enforce that right.'²

Milosevic told his diplomatic audience that Serbia had no objection to Slovenia leaving the Yugoslav state structure because hardly any Serbs lived there. In Croatia, where 650,000 Serbs lived, 'the borders will be adjusted and the Serbian enclaves will be secured. This is inevitable and is non-negotiable. Otherwise leaving the federation cannot be accepted and will be opposed by every available means.' As yet the Serbian leader had reached no conclusions about Macedonia's position. But Montenegro and Bosnia-Hercegovina would have to remain a part of Yugoslavia. 'There's no place for concession.'³

Five months later Slovenia and Croatia declared independence on 25 June 1991. During the days that followed, images appeared throughout the world of terrified Yugoslav People's Army conscripts who had found themselves caught up in a real war in Europe. For 45 years Europe had been synonymous with the absence of war. This almost idyllic situation came to an abrupt end in June 1991. For the Europeans, war was no longer something distant.

At first it still seemed like a 'drôle de guerre': an operetta-like war in Slovenia. It was a war that would last for ten days and would claim no more than a few dozen dead and wounded.⁴ By contrast in Croatia, which had also proclaimed its independence, the conflict between Belgrade and the renegade republics rapidly took a sinister turn. Serbs and Croats were fighting a war where the Geneva Convention was repeatedly violated.

¹ Hazewinkel, 'Beleid', pp. 10 and 13.

² ABZ, DDI-DEU/ARA/00408, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Servië, Fietelaars 14, 21/01/91.

³ ABZ, DDI-DEU/ARA/00408, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Servië, Fietelaars 14, 21/01/91.

⁴ Zametica, Conflict, p. 15 mentions the Slovenian armed forces sustaining 19 fatalities with the federal army incurring 45.

The conflict spread to Bosnia-Herzegovina in April 1992. This occurred shortly after the United Nations had decided to station troops in Croatia that were known as the United Nations Protection Force, or UNPROFOR for short. It was under this UNPROFOR flag that the Netherlands soon became involved in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia as ultimately it was also to be in the fall of Srebrenica. This was because UNPROFOR's mandate was rapidly extended to include Bosnia.

The Netherlands contributed to the UNPROFOR peacekeeping force from the very start. At first its contribution included a signals battalion and a transport battalion but this was later extended to the formation of a fighting unit in East Bosnia in March 1994. This meant that the Netherlands had sent 2339 armed soldiers to the former Yugoslavia so that the Dutch were the fourth largest supplier of troops to UNPROFOR (after France, Great Britain and Jordan) and were the eighth worldwide in terms of the 17 United Nations' peace operations that were currently underway.⁵ In addition, approximately 400 men of the Dutch Royal Navy and an additional 400 members of the Dutch Royal Air Force were deployed for the operations in and around the former Yugoslavia. Moreover, with its contingent of 50 unarmed UN observers, the Netherlands also supplied the largest proportion of the 600 United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) in the former Yugoslavia. Most of the unit, or 'Dutchbat' as it was known in UN jargon, was stationed at Srebrenica, a Muslim enclave in East Bosnia. Its role was security, a task for which other countries had shown little enthusiasm.

In July 1995, sixteen months after the deployment of the first Dutch fighting battalion, Bosnian Serb troops overran the United Nation's Safe Area of Srebrenica. The Dutch UN troops who were present were forced to abandon their task and over the following days several thousand Muslims were killed in the forests and at execution sites in this 'safe area's' immediate vicinity.

Many felt that this was proof of the moral bankruptcy of an international community that had worked for three years without finding a political solution to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. This was a bitter blow, certainly when bearing in mind the radical changes to the world stage that had recently occurred. The world order had changed radically since the reformer Mikhail Gorbachev had taken office in Moscow in 1985: Soviet control over Eastern Europe had been dismantled, the Berlin Wall had fallen and, finally, Communism had ceased to be the Soviet Union's governing movement in the summer of 1991. This led around 1990 to a general sense of euphoria about the new world order that had been created by the end of the Cold War which had dominated international relations for more than 40 years. This euphoria became still more intense at the beginning of 1991 when an international force under the leadership of the United States rapidly ended the occupation of Kuwait. American President George Bush declared that his country had entered the war against Iraq because of 'more than one small country; it is a big idea, a new world order'.⁶ This new world order would include new forms of co-operation between countries, a peaceful settling of differences, international solidarity against aggression, arms reduction, arms control and the fair treatment of all peoples. It was received with general acclaim.

However, there was also cause for concern. Now that a suicidal war between East and West was no longer an issue, there was an increasing awareness that there were also fewer restraints on outbursts of violence, particularly in the Balkans.⁷ Indeed, rather than suddenly improving, the international context had simply changed. This does not alter the fact that the violent outbursts in the Balkans in the early 1990s were difficult to understand within this international context.

The violence in the Balkans was also in stark contrast to the solemn tributes at the 1980 funeral of Josip 'Tito' Broz. This event in a still-united Yugoslavia was attended by the largest imaginable collection of heads of state from both East and West along with the Non-Aligned Movement countries.

⁵ Apart from the three countries already mentioned, it came after Pakistan, India, Bangladesh and Malaysia. M.A.W. Scheffelaar, 'De blauwe onmacht', Carré 1995, no. 11, p. 11; the Information Service of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 'Nederlandse militairen in en rond voormalig Joegoslavië. Stand van zaken 1 maart 1994'.

⁶ Quoted in Dore, Japan, p.116.

⁷ K. Koch, 'Het nieuwe dreigingsbeeld, Nederlandse defensie tegen een nieuwe achtergrond', p. 11.

All of them paid their last respects to the man who, for 35 years, had enabled Yugoslavia to gain a unique position and respect in the world.

What happened in the 11 years between 1980 and 1991 when the country that Tito had forged together was finally to disintegrate? Where are the causes of the dramatic end of the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia? Do these causes exclusively exist in Yugoslavia itself or were there also external ones? Have other nations or the international community either intentionally or unintentionally contributed to the collapse of Yugoslavia's political structure? Would it have been possible to try to prevent this deterioration externally? And what were the outside world's options to end or to limit the conflict once it had started? Which routes were open here and what resources were available? These questions are mainly discussed at the beginning of the preceding history because they are necessary for a good understanding of the events that occurred in and around the former Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1995. What follows reveals an all-too-frequent collision between the reality of international decision-makers and the reality of the developments within the region itself. The consequences were to be fateful.

As was previously stated, a good understanding of the events in Srebrenica can only be achieved by exploring the history of Yugoslavia. This chapter has already referred to President Tito who managed to maintain his country's unity for dozens of years. We must now focus on the period of his regime and on the preceding era so as to be able to understand that the conflict in the early 1990s had an extensive and contiguous history.

2. The death of Tito

On 10 May 1980 the Dutch publisher Uitgeverij Het Spectrum had no scruples about literally capitalizing on the death six days earlier of the Yugoslav president and die-hard Communist Josip Broz, or Tito as he was better known. Amongst newspaper advertisements was the headline 'Yugoslavia After Tito'. The advertisement read: 'Which course will Yugoslavia take? East, West or will it once again become Serbia, Montenegro and Croatia, just as before the First World War? Will national interests override the international ones?' If you wanted to discover more 'about this country's wealth of history, art, workers' self-rule, politics and music' the thing to do was to invest in the 25-volume Grote Spectrum Encyclopedie.

This commercially astute publisher had played on the interest shown throughout the world over the previous week in the late statesman who was also the oldest major leader since World War Two. Governments from both East and West along with the Non-Aligned Movement, which was partly founded by Tito, sang the praises of this political tight-rope walker who not only managed to control regional differences in his own country but also maintained an independent foreign course between the Communist and the Capitalist powers.

Tito's recognition and importance was demonstrated at his funeral. Apart from half a million Yugoslavs, dignitaries from as many as 129 countries came to pay their last respects to the statesman in Belgrade. They included four kings, six princes, three presidents, ten vice presidents, eleven parliamentary leaders, dozens of premiers, 47 foreign ministers and many Communist Party leaders. The official Dutch delegation was also considerable and consisted of Prince Bernhard, Prince Claus, Premier van Agt and Minister Van der Klaauw of Foreign Affairs.

Many people felt that Yugoslavia would probably never be the same again after the death of its first president and this was illustrated by the Dutch newspapers of the day. To quote the Algemeen Dagblad reporter B. van Oosterhout, Tito had taken Yugoslavia from being 'a backwards Balkan province, a ball on the field of influence of international politics' and had turned it into 'a self-aware, independent Socialist country'.⁸ Apart from the hundreds of thousands of mourners, Yugoslavia appeared outwardly unchanged in the days following the death and funeral of the ‘old man’ - ‘Stari’ or ‘old man’ being one of Josip Broz’ nicknames. Four months of illness had prepared the country for the death of the last major leader of the Second World War.

⁸ B. van Oosterhout, 'Belgrado loopt uit', Algemeen Dagblad, 07/05/80. Also F. Schaling, 'Tito: de successtory van een meedogenloze partizanenleider' & 'Door breuk met Stalin kon Joegoslavië geschiedenis maken', NRC Handelsblad, 05/05/80.

The Dutch newspapers focused considerable attention on the main points of Tito’s political course during the 35 years after the war: his independent foreign politics, workers’ self-rule and his policy concerning Yugoslavia’s separate regions. The daily newspapers described him as ‘the greatest statesman (...) to come out of the Balkans’,⁹ the man who was called the ‘only Yugoslav’,¹⁰ and – to quote Nehru – the man who had forged Yugoslavia out of ‘six republics, two autonomous provinces, five different peoples, four languages, three religions, two alphabets and one political party’.¹¹

The question was whether Tito’s legacy would be preserved.¹² According to F. Schaling of the NRC Handelsblad, Tito ‘had lived too long because his all-but-eternal presence had blocked the solutions to many of the problems of Yugoslavia’s future and this had resulted in a general stagnation in the country’s leadership.’ This stagnation was, for instance, evident in the carefully-formulated rules concerning the collective leadership that was to govern Yugoslavia after Tito’s death and which, Schaling argued, ‘would automatically have a brief existence.’ Stagnation was also demonstrated by the fact that the set of leaders under Tito was generally frighteningly mediocre because Tito distrusted all forms of ambition and quality was not rewarded.¹³

Clearly disturbance within the Yugoslav state system could not be excluded. A crisis could be caused by the leadership of the Soviet Union which had recently invaded Afghanistan: ‘The Afghan scenario – an internal power struggle, tensions between national minorities and finally a cry for help to sympathetic Communists in the Kremlin – ultimately was and is the nightmare of many Yugoslavs.’¹⁴ However, Moscow publicly stated that it would leave Tito’s country alone. President Carter warned that the United States would tolerate no form of ‘terrorism’ against Yugoslavia. In diplomatic circles it was understood that here the American president was referring to the causing of internal disorder ‘which is regarded as being a much greater danger to Yugoslav independence than any “normal” military invasion.’¹⁵

According to a leader article in the Volkskrant, ‘one of Tito’s greatest virtues is the fact that the formation of the Yugoslav nation seems to be sufficiently rooted so as to be able to survive his passing.’¹⁶ By contrast other Dutch commentators argued that, although the Yugoslavs’ sense of national identity had increased under Tito, the Serbs, Croats, Bosnians, Montenegrins and Macedonians ‘and all those other tribes’ were still contaminated by ‘the passionate tribal chauvinism that the mixed population of Yugoslavia has suffered from since time immemorial.’¹⁷ ‘The strength of the forces that threaten the country’s unity both at home and abroad will be revealed now that the old leader is no longer around’¹⁸

⁹ M. Broekmeyer, ‘Tito was uitzonderlijk’, Het Parool, 06/05/80

¹⁰ B. van Oosterhout, ‘Belgrado een tranendal’, Algemeen Dagblad, 09/05/80. Also ‘Tito was zijn eigen Marx’, de Volkskrant, 05/05/80.

¹¹ Nehru quoted in T. Kuijt, ‘Tito’s leven in het teken van strijd’, Het Parool, 05/05/80.

¹² ‘Joegoslavië zonder Tito’, Algemeen Dagblad, 05/05/80; B. van Oosterhout, ‘Belgrado loopt uit’, Algemeen Dagblad, 07/05/80.

¹³ F. Schaling, ‘Door breuk met Stalin kon Joegoslavië geschiedenis maken’, NRC Handelsblad, 05/05/80.

¹⁴ T. Kuijt, ‘Tito’s leven in het teken van strijd’, Het Parool, 05/05/80. J. den Boef, ‘Kan Joegoslavië zonder Tito?’, Trouw, 05/05/80, ‘Tito’, NRC Handelsblad, 05/05/80; F. Schaling, ‘Leiders Joegoslavië hebben eerste vuurproef doorstaan’, NRC Handelsblad, 06/05/80.

¹⁵ A. de la Kromme, ‘Supermachten laten Joegoslavië met rust’, de Telegraaf, 08/05/80. ‘De politieke dood van een staatsman’, Het Parool, 05/05/80; ‘Commentaar - Tito’s dood’, Trouw, 05/05/80; ‘Russen blijven uit Joegoslavië’, ibidem, 06/05/80.

¹⁶ ‘Ten geleide – Tito’, de Volkskrant, 05/05/80.

¹⁷ ‘Tito was zijn eigen Marx’, de Volkskrant, 05/05/80. Also J. den Boef, ‘Kan Joegoslavië zonder Tito?’, Trouw, 05/05/80.

¹⁸ ‘Joegoslavië zonder Tito’, Algemeen Dagblad, 05/05/80. ‘Tito’s naaste adviseurs krijgen de macht’, de Volkskrant, 07/05/80; ‘Tito’, NRC Handelsblad, 05/05/80; F. Schaling, ‘Leiders Joegoslavië hebben eerste vuurproef doorstaan’, NRC Handelsblad, 06/05/80; ‘De politieke dood van een staatsman’, Het Parool, 05/05/80.

Tito's obituaries were illustrations of the developments that had occurred in his country during the 20th century. He was born in 1892 to a Croat father and a Slovenian mother. Before assuming leadership of the Communist Party at the end of the 1930s, Tito had climbed the ranks of the Imperial Army to become a sergeant major during the First World War - Croatia still being a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. At first he fought against the Serbs along the Drina, a fact that he later preferred to omit from his biography.¹⁹ After being captured by the Russians, he converted to Communism and initially remained in Russia. When Josip Broz returned to the land of his birth in 1920, Croatia was no longer a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire but of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes that was later to be called Yugoslavia. This first Yugoslavia took him by chance just as its end took him by surprise in 1941. The second Yugoslavia, which was formed after the Second World War, was largely his creation and survived him by only eleven years.

The events that led to Slovenia and Croatia's proclamations of independence in the summer of 1991 raised the question as to the feasibility of a Yugoslavia that had been created and destroyed on two occasions during the 20th century. Of course, the question was not simply of academic importance but was also relevant for the initial positioning of other countries vis-à-vis the conflict that arose in 1991. Linked to this is the question of whether the collapse of Yugoslavia can be attributed first and foremost to causes within Yugoslavia itself (endogenous explanations) or to external developments and events (exogenous explanations). Some authors place great emphasis on internal factors in terms of the collapse of both Yugoslavias. One of them, Dusan Necak, has written: 'The nations of Yugoslavia have faced a decision on their common destiny on several occasions in history, but the forces of division and disintegration have always been stronger than those of unity and consolidation.'²⁰ Ivo Banac, an authoritative historian who specializes in Yugoslavia and works at the University of Yale, goes one step further. He attributes no credit whatsoever to the Yugoslavs for the creation of their state of Yugoslavia (which literally means South Slavia): 'Every examination of the Yugoslavia project will show that the idea of South Slavic unity and reciprocity was promoted, often unwittingly, by the non-Slavs and was undermined by the southern Slavs themselves.'²¹ We will explore in depth the question of whether this is correct. The answers are important so as to show which centrifugal tendencies were present in both the First and the Second Yugoslavia, which were the mechanisms that had to counter these developments and why these ultimately failed. The reader must be patient here because Bosnia only enters the picture at a late stage. In fact, Bosnia-Herzegovina was not the source of major political problems in Yugoslavia. On the contrary, probably there would have never been a war in Bosnia in the 1990s if Yugoslavia had not already collapsed.²²

3. The events preceding the first Yugoslavia

'Yugoslavia's death had been a long one with the first seeds of its destruction sown before its birth...'²³

Yugoslavia was located on the Balkan Peninsula that throughout history was the victim of alternately too much or too little interference from the major civilizations and great powers. Hence, in many ways, the country was situated on a fault line: it was simultaneously a no man's land, an area of confrontation and a melting pot.

¹⁹ Glenny, Balkans, pp. 571-572.

²⁰ Dusan Necak, 'Historical Elements for Understanding the "Yugoslav Question"', Akhavan/Howse (eds.), Yugoslavia, p.

14. See also Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 7

²¹ Ivo Banac, 'The Origins and Development of the Concept of Yugoslavia', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.) Disintegration, p. 1.

²² Susan L. Woodward, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina: How Not to End Civil War', in: Walter/Snyder (eds.), Wars, p. 75.

²³ Owen, 'Breakup', p. 39.

For centuries the line dividing the Western from the Eastern Roman Empire ran through what was later to become Yugoslavia. After the schism between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches in 1054, representatives of both branches of the Christian faith continued for many years to fight together against Islam that appeared to be spreading to the West.

The Serbs had their own kingdom from the beginning of the 13th century; it was supported by its own church that was founded by Saint Sava. He had seized upon a momentary weakness in the Byzantine Orthodox Church so as to set up an independent Serb Orthodox Church with its own liturgy. The Serb Empire achieved its ultimate expansion in the middle of the 14th century under King Stefan Dusan (1331-1355). At that point it covered Serbia, Macedonia, Albania, a large part of Greece and Bulgaria. But it was all downhill from then on: the troops of the Serbian King Lazar were beaten by the Turks at the 'Blackbird Field': the Battle of Kosovo or Kosovska Bitka. This event was kept alive with epic songs for centuries to come. The Serbian Empire continued until the middle of the 15th century when it was forced to admit defeat against the Ottomans, the Sultans who ruled the Turkish Empire between approximately 1300 and 1922.

The Slovenes and the Croats came under the domain of the Roman Catholic Church once Byzantium fell to the Turks in 1453. Hence, the Slovenes were subject to Venetian rule and the Croats to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Like the Serbian Empire, the Bosnian Empire, which had existed since the 12th century, was conquered by the Ottomans in the 15th century.

Most Serbs remained loyal to the Orthodox faith under Turkish rule but some of the Serbs in Bosnia and the Albanians in Kosovo converted to Islam. The Ottoman government had a high degree of religious tolerance that was maintained by the millet system. This system included a form of sectarianism: religious organizations also governed a part of the people's lives within society. This resulted in a development where faith and ethnicity converged. Through faith, the administration of justice and cultural tradition, the Orthodox priests greatly contributed to the preservation of an individual identity and the development of the Serbs' sense of nation.

Towards the Treaty of Berlin

This development of a Serbian national awareness was not insignificant. Turkish domination resulted in the Serbs emigrating to the north and away from Kosovo that was associated with such important memories. They moved to more peripheral areas such as what was later to become Vojvodina along with the area around Banja Luka in the north-west of Bosnia, Slavonia and the Krajina which bordered on the territory under Turkish rule. In Slavonia and the Krajina, the Serbs were able to live as free peasants under the Austro-Hungarian regime with the right to practise their own religion in exchange for military service in the fight against the Turks.

The Vojna Krajina (literally: military border area) extended like a sickle from Novi Sad and Belgrade to close to Zadar on the coast. This area, which encompassed both Krajina near Knin and East Slavonia, maintained a separate legal status until 1881 when it was no longer of military importance and became a part of Croatia.

From the end of the 18th century, there was an overt national awareness in the area that was to become Yugoslavia. This awareness was initially based on religion. Serbs, Croats and Muslims could only be distinguished from one another on the basis of their religion, no matter how weak their belief. Croats were Catholic, Serbs were Orthodox and Muslims were Islamic. A Catholic Serb and an Orthodox Croat would be just as absurd as a Jewish Muslim.²⁴ A Serb who changed religion would also change ethnicity. For instance, a Serb who converted to Islam would therefore also become a 'Turk' or 'Muslim'; a Serb who embraced Catholicism would become a Croat.²⁵

The second distinguishing element was the memory of the past where the Serbs, Croats and Bosnians had all had their own empires replete with myths that were communicated and touched up through an oral tradition that passed from generation to generation. These epic poems created a sense of intimacy with eras long past and virtually erased the intervening centuries from human consciousness. Some Serbian ideologists even went so far as to argue that if a Serb converted to Islam, he not only became a 'Turk' but was also tainted with the blood of the Serbs who had been killed four or five hundred years previously during the Ottoman conquests.²⁶

There were only limited linguistic differences between the three Slavic groups that could be compared to the differences between English and American. The Slovenes had a different language during the later Yugoslavia, as did the Albanians in Kosovo and the Macedonians.

In 1815 the Sultan of the now-fading Turkish Empire granted limited self-rule to Serbia and in 1830 he recognized Obrenovic's sovereignty over Serbia, Obrenovic being the forefather of one of the two dynasties that would rule Serbia during the 19th century. Serbia now had the status of a vassal state that encompassed a limited area to the south of the Sava and the Danube, and with Belgrade to the far north.

Between 1815 and 1833 many Serbs moved to Serbia from the surrounding areas while the Turkish citizens and Muslims left the Serbian territory. This was the beginning of a series of expulsions and massacres that left Serbia virtual 'Muslim-free' at the beginning of the 20th century and showed how Serbian nationalism tended to exclude non-Serbs rather than integrate them.

Yet many Serbs still lived outside of the Serbian heartland: in Montenegro, Vojvodina, Krajina, etc. It was not long before pioneering Serbs began to dream of a Greater Serbian Empire that reflected the memory of the medieval Kingdom of Serbia. Once the Turks had abandoned their final bulwark in Serbia in 1867, the Serbs began to work towards a union with the areas outside of Serbia where their ethnic kinsfolk lived.

The Serbs fought the Turks with the help of Russia, and Serbian sovereignty was fully recognized at the Treaty of San Stefano and the Treaty of Berlin (1878). The Treaty of Berlin also recognized the independence of Montenegro, an area where the mountain dwellers and their religious and secular rulers had always managed to maintain a certain autonomy vis-à-vis the major powers.

Towards the First World War

Nonetheless the Serbs were dissatisfied with the results of the Treaty of Berlin because they had failed to achieve a foothold in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This Ottoman area was assigned to the Austro-Hungarian Empire in the form of a protectorate. In 1908 the Austro-Hungarian Empire formally annexed this region, much to Serbia's fury.

Along with the ideal of a Greater Serbia, there was an increasing desire following the Treaty of Berlin for the unification of all the southern Slavs (i.e. the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes) who were ²⁴ Detrez, Balkan, p. 12.

²⁵ Also Raju G.C. Thomas, 'History, Religion and National Identity', Thomas/Friman (eds.), Conflict, pp. 26-27.

²⁶ Michael Sells, 'Christoslavism 2. The Five Major Components', located within the borders of the Double Monarchy of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. This movement was nourished by the fact that there were no major linguistic differences between the various southern Slavs. However, at that time Serbia's political and military ambitions were directed southwards.

<http://www.haverford.edu/relg/sells/postings/christoslavism2.html> consulted 26/12/00.

During the First Balkan War (1912-1913), Serbia and Montenegro along with Bulgaria and Greece attacked a weakened Turkey that was virtually driven out of Europe. However, Serbia and Montenegro once again felt that they had missed out on the territorial spoils that had been divided up by the major powers.

This dissension led a month later to fresh hostilities, this time between Bulgaria on the one side and Serbia, Greece, Roumania and Turkey on the other: the Second Balkan War had just broken out. Serbia acquired a large part of Macedonia once the peace treaty was signed. The rest of Macedonia was handed over to Greece and Bulgaria.

During the two Balkan Wars, the Serbian territory grew from 48,000 to 87,000 square kilometres. Serbia gained control of areas including Kosovo and Macedonia, both having many Albanian residents. Many Serbs felt that this was historically justified. After returning from the Second Balkan War, Crown Prince Aleksandar was greeted by crowds as the 'avenger of Kosovo'.²⁷

However, Serbia hardly had time to integrate the new areas into the Kingdom. The Austro-Hungarian Empire regarded Serbia's power expansion with displeasure. Vienna felt that there were calls from the elite of Croatia and Slovenia for Serbia to play the same role in achieving a southern Slavic amalgamation as the Prussians had for German unification or Piedmont had for Italy. The Serbian regime was aware of the fact that some circles in Vienna were just waiting for a reason to declare war on Serbia.

On 28 June 1914 the Bosnian Serb Gavrilo Princip murdered the Austrian Archduke and heir to the throne Franz Ferdinand and his wife in Sarajevo. Princip belonged to a group of Bosnian-Serb nationalists who were supported in semi-official Serbian circles. These circles had refused to accept the annexation of Bosnia by the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1908.²⁸ This attack was to trigger the First World War.

Austria, encouraged by Germany, stipulated humiliating conditions for Serbia who, according to Austria, was behind the attack. Serbia, supported by Russia, did not want to give in. After Russian mobilization, which was rapidly followed by the mobilization of other countries, the First World War had become a fact.

4. The first Yugoslavia

'You cannot understand Yugoslavia without having a detailed knowledge of its history even before its official birth in 1918. This is because the reasons for its birth were the same as for its death.'²⁹

The first Yugoslavia consisted of Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia- Hercegovina, Montenegro and Vojvodina; it came into being on 1 December 1918.³⁰ The direct reason for the creation of this first Yugoslavia is to be found in the course of the First World War in this area.

During the First World War, the Croats and Slovenes fought in the Habsburg Army (the army of the Austro-Hungarian Empire) against the Serbs. Amongst these fighters was Josip Broz who was ²⁷ Branislav Gligorijevic, 'King Aleksandar I Karadordevic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 143.

²⁸ For more about the complicated relations between Princip, the Unification or Death group (Ujedinjenje ili Smrt) (which is better known under its popular name of The Black Hand (Crna Ruka) and was responsible for secret operations outside of Serbia) and the official organizations in Belgrade, see David MacKenzie, 'Dragutin Dimitrijevic-Apis', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, and in particular pp. 69-82.

²⁹ Dobrica Cosic, quoted in Cohen, Bonds, p. 1.

³⁰ For a survey of the history of the first Yugoslavia see, for instance, Almond, War, pp. 112-132; Glenny, Balkans, pp. 402-412, 428-436, 473-477; Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 99-196; Mønnesland, Land, pp. 211-238.

later to become known as Tito. The Croats set up seven concentration camps for Serbs and Bosnians, the most notorious being at Doboï. Ten thousand prisoners were to die here, mostly from illness and neglect.³¹

In the autumn of 1915, with the help of the Bulgarians, the Austrian and German troops managed to drive the Serbian enemy into Albania. The Serbian troops reached Greece through Albania and Montenegro where a Franco-British fleet evacuated the 155,000 men who had survived the appalling journey to Corfu.

In 1915 political exiles from Croatia and Slovenia agreed in London on the formation of a federal Yugoslav state. At first it was impossible to reach conciliation with the supporters of the idea of a centrally-governed Greater Serbia. However, the February Revolution in Russia in 1917 brought both sides closer together: the Serbs no longer had the support of the Russian tsar and feared that the other members of the Entente – France and Great Britain – would recognize an independent Croatia that would still include many Serbs within its borders. On the other hand the Slovenes and Croats, who wanted to separate themselves from the Habsburg Dual Monarchy, now also had their interests in a Greater Serbia. They had read in diplomatic documents exposed by Russian revolutionaries, that two years earlier the allies had promised Italy territory – South Tyrol, Trieste, Istria and parts of the Dalmatian coast – in exchange for it entering the war on their side. These promises of territory would have been at the cost of Slovenia and Croatia who hoped to free themselves of the Double Monarchy.

Due to these foreign threats, in 1917 the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes agreed upon a joint kingdom that would be ruled by the Serbian Karadjordjevic dynasty. During the final year of war, the Serb forces were based in Albania and managed to reconquer the territory that they had had to give up at the end of 1915. At the same time there was a growing sympathy for a southern Slavic state amongst the starving and war-weary peoples of Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia because it would mean an end to the rule of the Austro-Hungarian Empire that had plunged the Balkans into catastrophe.³²

Following the defeat of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the international climate favoured the implementation of the southern Slavs' federal plans. This enabled King Petar to proclaim the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes on 1 December 1918. Macedonia and Montenegro, who were considered to be a part of Serbia, were excluded from this title as were the Muslims in areas such as Bosnia-Herzegovina. Petar abdicated six months later in favour of his son Aleksandar.

Unlike the nation states of Western Europe, Yugoslavia was not therefore a nation in the sense of a political entity that had been grafted onto an ethnic community. It was the result of the fragmentation process of two multi-ethnic states; it occurred at the end of the suffering of Europe's 'sick' Habsburg Austro-Hungarian and Ottoman empires. And it was also the result of the temporary decline of the great states of Germany and Russia during the First World War: the two political entities that had constantly influenced the Balkans during the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century.

Hence, Yugoslavia was created from areas that had extremely diverse political backgrounds. It encompassed the former Kingdoms of Serbia and Montenegro (which had managed to escape the Ottoman domination), Croatia (which following two centuries of independence from the beginning of the 12th century had, with the maintenance of a certain level of autonomy, become a part of first Hungary and then the Habsburg Empire), Bosnia and Herzegovina, (which were a part of the Ottoman Empire for many centuries but were added to the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1878) and Slovenia (which had never existed as an independent state, had spent many centuries under German influence but finally became a part of the Habsburg Empire).

Unlike some Western European states, the Yugoslav State had not begun as the dream of a people who had fought together for their freedom. In the 19th century Serbs, Croats, Slovenes and Montenegrins had either argued for Pan-Slavism (which went way beyond Yugoslavia) or had fought for a separate Serbian, Croatian, Slovenian or Montenegrin state. Each of these aspirations paled alongside Yugoslavia as a construction.

³¹ Johnsen, Enigma, p. 39.

³² Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 106.

If there was mention of a southern Slavic state in the nationalist programs of the Slovenes and the Croats, it was mostly for tactical reasons. This was because they would need the Serbs' support so as to be able to free themselves from the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy or alternatively so as to achieve autonomy as a third state that would be the equal of both Austria and Hungary. And when the Serbs spoke of southern Slavic unification, as based on a common language, it was mainly because they were seeking a solution so as to create a new national home for the Serbs who lived outside of Serbia.³³ The lack of synchronization between the various nationalist aspirations made the ideal of a southern Slavic state virtually impossible until the First World War: Croatia and Slovenia were not independent and Serbia was already an autonomous state which would later achieve independence and would not voluntarily allow itself to be confined within the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

The national awareness in this area, which entered the world community in 1918 under its initial name of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, had long been the dream of an elite. This elite consisted of a modest-sized intelligentsia that included a clergy that advised its political leaders against a background of romantic nationalism.³⁴ These elite circles lived in Belgrade, Zagreb, Ljubljana and Sarajevo, cities that had become greatly modernized during the 19th century. Rural areas remained excluded from innovative trends or they actively opposed them.

These elite circles played a role in the region's nationalist sentiments in two separate ways. Firstly representatives of these circles traced the borders on Balkan maps and coloured them in a way that subsequently was to be realized by political and military leaders. The people counted only as foot soldiers and had no voice in these nationalist aspirations. A second way in which the intelligentsia propagated nationalism during the 19th century was to create the ethnic-national myths whose influence was still to be felt at the end of the 20th century. While ignoring the long period of Austrian, Hungarian, Turkish and Venetian domination, the nationalists longed for the eras when the historical empire was at its zenith – either in reality or in the imagination. This meant, for instance, that the historical claims for a Greater Croatia or a Greater Serbia had to overlap. It also meant that the needs of Macedonia, Bosnia and Albania to have their own states were in conflict with each other.

Serb mythology focused on the Battle of Kosovo at the Blackbird Field where King Lazar was given the choice between a place in the Kingdom of Heaven or conquest on Earth: he accepted the first choice. His troops then suffered a defeat that would lead to centuries of Turkish domination. Their Orthodox faith generated the idea amongst the Serbs that they formed a front against Catholicism on the one hand and Islam on the other. This gave them both a sense of pride and a feeling of victimization and xenophobia.

Croatian nationalists regarded their people as being a stronghold of Catholic Rome, the Antemurale Christianitatis, against both the Orthodox Church and Islam.³⁵ The nationalist movements of the 19th century generally added extra emphasis to the exclusive elements of their own parties although it was impossible to exclude paradox in an area where so many different groups lived together. For instance, Ante Starcevic, who set up the ultra-nationalist Party of Croatian Rights in 1861 and who is regarded by many Croats as being the founder of anti-Serbian, Croatian nationalism, was also the son of a Serbian Orthodox mother and a Catholic Croatian father. Sometimes other population groups were usurped in an attempt to justify claims to particular areas. Hence, Serbs became 'Orthodox Croats' and Muslims became 'Serbs who have converted to Islam'.

These forms of 19th century nationalism finally led to a compromise that was only made possible by the First World War. However, it in no way solved the tensions between the amalgamated ethnic elements of the first Yugoslavia. On the contrary, these tensions dominated the country's politics for virtually its entire existence. For that matter, the Serbs and Croats had decided on the formation of a southern Slavic state for entirely different reasons. The Serbs saw it as being the only possibility to realize their dream of combining all the Serbs into a single nation. They effectively regarded the presence of other ethnic groups as being a part of the bargain. The Croats needed Serbia's help to acquire the necessary clout so as to achieve independence from the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

³³ Batakovic, 'Integration?'

³⁴ Also Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 229-230.

³⁵ Some 19th century nationalists contended that the Croats had also protected Western Europe against the Avars and the Mongols, Deschner/Petrovic, Krieg, p. 101.

Once the new state had become a reality, the vast majority of its inhabitants were Serbs who numbered five million amongst a total population of twelve million. The Serbs tended to dominate the other ethnic groups. The Croats no longer appreciated the Serbs' dominance now that Austro-Hungarian dominance had been thrown aside and the state had been set up. In fact the Croats, who had enjoyed a certain degree of autonomy under Austro-Hungarian rule, even felt that their position in the new Kingdom had deteriorated. The Serbs, on the other hand, had emerged from the war on the winning side and argued that they had made sacrifices during the war for the freedom of the Slovenes and the Croats whom, as they pointed out, had fought against them for the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Serbian domination was also the plan of the peace negotiators at Versailles, and this was especially true of the French who felt that the southern Slavic state had to be a bulwark against the restoration of the Austro-Hungarian Empire or the possibility of new German interests in the Balkans.³⁶

Further consideration of the politics of the first Yugoslavia

The explanation for the creation of the first Yugoslavia can be sought through causes that existed both within Yugoslavia (endogenous factors) and abroad (exogenous factors).

The supporters of the endogenous explanation for the creation of the first Yugoslavia emphasize the fact that the idea for a southern Slavic state was already present in the programs of the 19th century nationalists in the various areas that were later to become the amalgamated parts of Yugoslavia. They argue that this idea had gained considerable support in the ten years preceding the First World War.³⁷

In addition, they refer to the linguistic homogeneity of the southern Slavic area, with the exception that the Serbs generally use the Cyrillic alphabet and the other ethnic groups the Latin version.

The endogenous explanations continue by arguing that, at the end of the First World War, elite circles from Croatia, Slovenia and Serbia regarded a unified southern Slavic area as being the best guarantee against the power of neighbouring countries such as Germany, Hungary, Italy, Rumania and Turkey. Of course, this could also be regarded as an external factor. These authors contend that a condition for southern Slavic unification was the power of the Serbian army.

The supporters of the exogenous explanation consider the significance of the First World War as being all important: 'Yugoslavia is a product of the First World War.'³⁸ The Austro-Hungarian and the Ottoman Empires were in decline and had emerged from the war in defeat. Croatia and Slovenia could expect nothing more of these empires after the war. And without the Italian threat at the end of the war, the elite of Ljubljana and Zagreb would have never fled into the arms of their Belgrade counterparts.³⁹ Finally, at the peace conference in Versailles, the major powers forced the Serbs, their wartime ally, to accept the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia.⁴⁰ Hence, they also determined that large Slovenian minorities would remain in Austria while at the same time Italy had been allocated Istria,

³⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 108-109, 151, 161; Van den Heuvel, Land, pp. 10 and 34; Tiersky, Mitterrand, p. 204; Naarden, Western Perceptions and Balkan realities, p. 31.

³⁷ For the arguments mentioned here, see for instance: Dusan Necak, 'Historical Elements for Understanding the 'Yugoslav Question'', Akhavan/Howse (eds.), Yugoslavia, p. 16; Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 99.

³⁸ Stallaerts, Afscheid, p. 74. Also Rogel, Breakup, p. 7: 'World War I determined what happened to the Southern Slavs; Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 70: 'Only the course of the First World War ... made it possible to form the first Yugoslav state ...'.

³⁹ Weithmann, Brandbaard, p. 64.

⁴⁰ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 4.

Zadar and a number of Dalmatian islands. Hungary was forced to surrender Vojvodina and a part of the Banat to the new Kingdom.

The southern Slavic State was founded in 1918 with the international situation playing a vital role. Yet it did not have an easy start. The country was poor. Eighty per cent of the population lived in rural areas where, in both Croatia and Serbia, Habsburg soldiers had requisitioned a great many cattle and goods. Two-thirds of all peasant families lived below subsistence level.⁴¹ Industry was not sufficiently developed to alleviate the widespread hidden unemployment in rural areas in any significant way. Moreover, there was considerable inequality between the various regions. Serbia had suffered terribly in the war. More than a quarter of a Serb population of four-and-a-half million had been killed in the two Balkan Wars and the First World War. As many as 62% of men aged between 15 and 55 had died.⁴² By contrast, the cost in human life was less than ten per cent in the regions of Yugoslavia that had been a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

What applied to people also applied to industry. The slight industrial lead that Slovenia and Croatia originally had over Serbia was subsequently increased by the war itself and by Serbia's reconstruction problems after the war. The retreating Austro-Hungarian troops had focused their scorched earth tactics on Serbia. After the war Croatia benefited from investments from Austria and Hungary whereas Serbia failed to attract foreign investment for several years. The new Kingdom still had virtually no integrated national transport system. Train connections, roads and bank systems were still the same as in the days of the great empires. There had been virtually no trade between the various areas of the Kingdom before the First World War, a situation that was slow to change afterwards. The advantages of a large internal market were rarely exploited.

The political system was particularly unstable. Croat and Slovene political leaders resisted the Belgrade-based centralist state government that had been imposed by the Serbs and was included in the Constitution of 1921. This meant that the imbalance between centralism and federalism was inherent to the first Yugoslavia right from the start and was ultimately to destroy the second Yugoslavia. Even the day on which the constitution was proclaimed revealed Serbian domination: 28 June, Saint Vitus' Day, the day of the battle on the Blackbird Field and also of Gavrilo Princip's attack.

By virtue of its constitution, Yugoslavia had become a parliamentary democracy with the King fulfilling an exceptionally important role. This constitution was passed with only a small majority of the voting delegates. A large number of representatives, including the Croat Peasant Party and the Communists, had abstained.

Non-Serbian groups discovered that the practice of government was no better than the principle. Almost all the prime ministers of the 24 cabinets between 1921 and 1929 were of Serbian origin; only once, for almost six months in 1928, was there a non-Serbian premier: Bishop Anton Korosec of Slovenia. Almost all the army chiefs were Serbian, an ethnic group which otherwise accounted for 40% of the population. There were virtually no Croats in top positions although they formed a quarter of the population. Let alone the eight per cent who were Slovenes along with the Bosnian Muslims (six per cent), the Macedonians (five per cent), the Germans (four per cent) and roughly 15 other smaller ethnic groups who could not recognize themselves in the new Kingdom's title.

In addition, the Serbs were grossly overrepresented in the political world: of the 656 ministers who served between 1921 and 1939, 452 were Serbs, 26 were Croats with party affiliations and 111 were Croats without party affiliations.⁴³ On the eve of the German invasion of Yugoslavia, 161 out of a total of 165 generals were either Serb or Montenegrin; only two were Croats. This situation represented a deterioration for the Croats who, during the Habsburg era, had accounted for 15% of the generals and admirals of the Austro-Hungarian forces.⁴⁴ In 1934, out of a total number of 145 top diplomats,

⁴¹ Almond, War, p.119.

⁴² Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p. 25.

⁴³ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 183.

⁴⁴ Cohen, War, pp. 8-9.

123 were Serbs and 21 were of Croatian origin.⁴⁵ In addition, the vast majority of provincial prefects were Serbs in every area except Slovenia.

60% of the Yugoslav army were Serbs who also accounted for more than half of all civil servants.⁴⁶ It was only in the justice system that the relation remained in proportion, at least so far as the Serbs and the Croats were concerned. More than half of all judges were Serb and a quarter Croat.

The Slovenes fared the best of all the non-Serb groups in the Kingdom. Their language ensured that they maintained a certain level of government autonomy vis-à-vis Belgrade. And educational opportunities, which had been limited under the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, now were greatly increased. But it was a very different story for the inhabitants of Macedonia which was now known as South Serbia and had been subjected to a 'Serbification' program that had demolished their own educational system and religious organizations. Even their Macedonian names had been changed into their Serbian equivalents.⁴⁷

The instability of the first Yugoslavia was demonstrated by the high level of political violence. 24 political death sentences were carried out during the Kingdom's first ten years and approximately 600 political murders were committed. In addition, there were around 30,000 political arrests and 3000 citizens fled the country for political reasons.⁴⁸ The victims were primarily Croats, Macedonians and Albanians.

Following an overly heavy-handed attempt by the Serbs to introduce educational materials that were based on a joint Yugoslav nationality, texts remained in use that took each individual ethnicity and region as their point of departure.

The development of political parties, along with general trade union activity, seemed only to occur along ethnic lines. The Social Democratic, the Communist and the tiny Republican Parties were the exception to this rule. At the 1920 council elections, the Communists gained a majority in 36 towns and villages that included Belgrade and Nis. They also won 12% of the votes at elections held for the constitutional assembly; this made them the third biggest party in the country. However, measures taken against the party's revolutionary nature soon drove it underground.

Despite centralism and their numerical superiority, the Serbs were unable to control the parliament effectively. This was due to the fact that the Serbian parties were rarely able to work together in unity. Consequently virtually no legislation was passed and the various judicial systems of the Kingdom's amalgamated areas continued to exist alongside each other.

The Kingdom's most popular opposition party was the Croatian Peasant Party that was led by Stjepan Radic, a populist lawyer from Zagreb. He ensured that nationalism, which up till then had been an elitist issue, was to reach every Croatian hamlet. Radic resisted the domination of the Orthodox Serbs and Montenegrins right from the start. He fought for an independent republican Croatia that at most would be a part of a Yugoslav confederation, a political construction that would allow for a high degree of independence amongst its member states. By focusing Croatia on Europe, he tried to maintain its distance from the rest of Yugoslavia 'so as not to become dependent upon the Balkans which, whatever one may say, are simply an Asian protuberance. Our duty is to make the Balkans more European rather than to make the Croats and the Slovenes more Balkan...'⁴⁹

Radic's party repeatedly boycotted both the parliament and the elections that were always prone to fraud and were regularly the signal for the Serb-dominated police force to inflict violence on non-Serbs. The Croatian Peasant Party was more of a national movement than a political party. Therefore, in the 1920s and 1930s, its contribution was for promoting ethnic nationalism rather than for creating a sense of 'Yugoslavism'.⁵⁰

⁴⁵ Almond, War, p. 128.

⁴⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 130.

⁴⁷ Cohen, War, p. 11.

⁴⁸ Cohen, War, p. 10.

⁴⁹ Radic quoted in Cohen, Bonds, p. 15.

⁵⁰ Cohen, Bonds, p. 16.

One of the low points of the troubled history of the first Yugoslavia came in 1928 with a Montenegrin delegate's assassination in parliament of Radic and two other members of the Croatian Peasant Party. Two of the victims were killed instantly. Radic died some time later from the wounds that he had sustained in the attack.

At the same time, the Empire of King Aleksandar was confronted with territorial claims and other threats from surrounding countries. The danger from abroad and the internal state of deadlock resulted in the King abolishing democracy and introducing a monarchic dictatorship. He also began to suppress every expression of ethnic nationalism. Hence, he replaced his Kingdom's extensive title with a shorter name: from 1920 onwards the country was officially known as South Slavia or Yugoslavia.

Consequently, ten years after the creation of the new Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, the country's name was officially changed to 'Yugoslavia'. This Yugoslavia was divided into nine government units. These were arranged in such a way that six of them had a Serbian majority while two had a Croatian majority and one was dominated by the Slovenes. It was a blatant attempt to sweep the ethnic issue under the carpet. At the time, this step was greeted with the remark that children, let alone states, cannot be brought into the world by decree.⁵¹ Political parties were forbidden, press censorship was introduced and judicial independence was swept aside. Croatia and Macedonia were terrorized by a police force that functioned both secretly and openly, officially and unofficially, and which almost always consisted of Serbs.

The 1931 Constitution paved the way for the political parties' return. However, these parties were to play a subordinate role and only 'Yugoslav' parties were permitted. In fact, this new electoral system strongly favoured the Serbs. Extremist parties on both the left and the right had long since been driven underground. These included the VMRO, the Macedonian nationalist organization. Croatian nationalism reached its extreme in 1929 in the form of the Ustashe Croatian Revolutionary Organization or the 'uprisers' movement. It was known as the Ustashe for short and was led by Ante Pavelic. This fascist movement opposed Serbian domination and found support in Italy, Germany and Hungary.

King Aleksandar of Yugoslavia was murdered during a visit to Marseille in 1934. The Ustashe was responsible for the murder and had deployed a VMRO terrorist. It was supported by the Italy of Mussolini who wanted the return of the former Italian areas along the Adriatic coast. Naturally King Aleksandar had opposed this.

Political relations remained difficult but the economy improved from 1934 onwards. This was due to focusing on Germany and on an industrialization program that particularly benefited Serbia and the mining and metallurgic industries of Central Bosnia. Nonetheless, at that time the Yugoslav economy was one of the slowest to develop in the Balkan region.⁵²

The shift in industrial centre was viewed by Croatian politicians as being new evidence that Croatia would not benefit from what they regarded as being Serbian centralism.⁵³ Dr. Vlatko Macek, Radic's successor as the leader of the Croatian Peasant Party, argued that Croatia should acquire a higher level of autonomy. He felt that Croatia and Serbia should only be joined by a personal union. Meanwhile Pavle, Yugoslavia's Prince Regent, was confronted by the increasing threat of war in Central and Eastern Europe. An additional danger was the possibility that either Germany or Italy would take over Croatia or would try to turn this area into a puppet state. The Prince Regent took action to deal with this pressure: at his instigation the Serbian Prime Minister Cvetkovic strengthened Yugoslavia's stability in 1939 by compromising with the Croats. In August of that year, Cvetkovic reached an agreement with Macek whereby Croatia acquired an autonomous status with the addition of the area in Bosnia-Herzegovina where the most Croats lived. This expanded Croatia was to have its own parliament and government. Only foreign policy, defence, transport and communication would be dealt with on a national level. Neither the parliament nor the people were consulted about this plan. In fact, this attempt to create more autonomy for Croatia had come too late. The agreement's implementation had virtually no effect because of the approaching war.

⁵¹ Gojko Boric, 'Kroatien und Jugoslawien – Ein Abriss historischer Erfahrungen', Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, p. 62.

⁵² Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 57.

⁵³ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 185

Towards the Second World War

On 25 March 1941 Pavle, the Prince Regent, and his government responded to tremendous German pressure by agreeing that Yugoslavia would enter the Axis pact of Germany and Italy. Two days later this step was countered by a successful military putsch. The coup was supported by demonstrations where people chanted slogans such as 'Better dead than a slave' or 'War is better than the pact', slogans that 50 years later would once again emerge from the junk room of history.

However, the true position of the coup's leaders was less principled than the sentiments of these slogans. They were soldiers who had seized the moment to express the army's indignation at the politics of the past few years. Although they talked about resisting the Axis pact, the coup's leaders soon secretly let Germany know that they would adhere to its agreement.

The leaders of the coup then set about reorganizing the government: they replaced a number of ministers from the previous cabinet, they included several fascists in the government and they replaced the Prince Regent with the underage Crown Prince who was proclaimed King Petar II. However, this did not placate Hitler. The Germans bombed Belgrade on 6 April 1941. This signalled the beginning of a campaign that would only last for 12 days.

This was followed by a wave of invasions by different countries – Germany, Italy, Bulgaria and Hungary – each of whom wanted to be bequeathed a part of the territorial assets. These invasions also make it difficult to judge the debate between the supporters of the endogenous and the exogenous explanations for the collapse of the first Yugoslavia. For instance, it can be argued that the actions of the German forces, which were rapidly followed by those of other countries, prevented a possible solution to the Yugoslav question as based on the Cvetkovic-Macek agreement.⁵⁴ One can defend this to the extent that this agreement largely erased all the years of Croatian resentment against Serbian domination; in its place came the Croats' long-time dream of achieving the status of a federation. However, this reasoning does have its flaws. The agreement met with objections from both the Serbs and the Croats because they respectively felt that either too many or too few concessions had been made to Croatia. Weithmann argues that the agreement in no way eased the tension within the country and that it actually increased it still further.⁵⁵

Additionally, there were three other problems. Firstly the definitive border in Bosnia that would separate Croatia from Serbia still had to be established. This was bound to cause problems. Secondly Belgrade was only prepared to consider the Croats' political wishes when faced with the threat of Fascist Italy and National-Socialist Germany. Thirdly other ethnic or regional groups, such as the Albanians, Macedonians, Montenegrins and Slovenes, were not included in this solution or, as in the case of the Bosnian Muslims, they were actually its victims. The agreement also ignored the Serbs in Croatia. In other words: the issue of nationality in the first Yugoslavia was initially reduced to just three groups – the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes – and finally to a matter to be solved by an arrangement between the Serbs and the Croats. There was little or no consideration of the other groups. For instance, in Kosovo, the relations between the Albanians – the most oppressed group in the Kingdom – and the Serbs were so bad that in 1937 political circles in Belgrade argued that the solution would be the Albanians' forced emigration, a policy which followed the example of the treatment of the Jews in Nazi Germany.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ Also Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 8, 190, 192-194; V.P. Gagnon, 'Historical Roots of the Yugoslav Conflict', Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 182; Judah, 'Serbs', p. 34.

⁵⁵ Weithmann, Brandhaard, pp. 70-71.

⁵⁶ Cohen, War, pp. 4-6; Dusan Necak, 'Historical Elements for Understanding the 'Yugoslav Question'', Akhavan/Howse (eds.), Yugoslavia, pp. 23-24.

In conclusion, it would seem here that, even if it had not been invaded, the first Yugoslavia would have found it extremely difficult to survive in its existing form. To quote Necak:

‘The Kingdom of Slovenes, Croats and Serbs was supposedly established exclusively to protect the national interests of the constituent nations. Once this fundamental expectation was not fulfilled, the existence of the state defied its raison d’être. Social injustices only deepened national antagonism, and became a substantial part of the explosive mix of national and class differences that destroyed the first Yugoslavia.’⁵⁷

5. Yugoslavia in the Second World War

Lampe argues that the Second World War defined the creation of the second Yugoslavia to an even greater extent than the First World War defined the first one. This was because the dismantling of Yugoslavia had destroyed virtually all the existing institutions. Without that influence, says Lampe, the 8000 Communists at the beginning of the war would have never been able to dream about seizing power in 1945 and defying the Soviet Union several years later.⁵⁸

However, before this occurred, various nationalist movements in Yugoslavia would be driven to extremes. Those who sought to escape this ended up in the Partisan movement that was dominated by the Communists and was the only important organization that included a multi-ethnic perspective. By the end of the war, the rest of the population had virtually no alternative to Tito’s Communism. Nationalism had been discredited and the pre-war system that revolved around nationalism was bankrupt.

The Yugoslav army collapsed like a house of cards during the German campaign. Many Slovenian and Croatian officers and soldiers either deserted or simply did not show up for mobilization. The Serbian sections of the army did little better. The Germans captured 100,000 Yugoslav soldiers, most of whom Serbs, while they lost only 166 of their own men. King Petar fled to London with most of his government of eight Serbs, two Croats and a Slovene.

Although the government-in-exile could still maintain a degree of multi-ethnicity, the political structure of the first Yugoslavia had become completely fragmented. Following Yugoslavia’s capitulation, the Yugoslav monarchy was split between the National-Socialist and Fascist powers. Germany took over Central Serbia. The Italians let the Ustashe leader Ante Pavelic form ‘the first Croatian government’ in Croatia and allowed him to incorporate Bosnia-Herzegovina. At first Germany and Italy assumed joint responsibility for Croatia. The country then became an Italian protectorate but, following the Italian capitulation in 1943, the area was completely incorporated into Germany's field of interest.

⁵⁷ Dusan Necak, ‘Historical Elements for Understanding the ‘Yugoslav Question’’, Akhavan/Howse (eds.), Yugoslavia, p. 24. Also Glenny, Balkans, p. 405; Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 10.

⁵⁸ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 197.

The Ustashe State during the war

With his Croatia sve do Drine (right to the Drina), Pavelic was able to achieve some of the nationalist dreams of the medieval Croatian Kingdom. However, he still found it painful that Italy, who also wanted to restore its lost empire, now occupied almost the entire Dalmatian coast and its islands along with Montenegro whose coast Italy also had its eye on. Slovenia was divided between Italy, Germany, Hungary and Croatia. Hungary took over Vojvodina. Bulgaria occupied Macedonia and southern Serbia. Kosovo was incorporated into Albania.

At first the occupation of Yugoslavia created a reversal in the power relations between the Serbs and the Croats. The Serbs, who had dominated Yugoslavia during its 22-year existence, now found themselves oppressed and even threatened physically. After several months the Germans installed a puppet-government in Belgrade that was led by General Nedic, a Serb and a former Minister of War. Nedic was known for his anti-Communist views and before the war he had argued that the country should join the Axis. The Germans allowed this cross between Pétain and Quisling to raise a small army of 17,000 men that was to help to combat the Partisans' growing resistance. The Germans themselves did not have enough troops for the job. In the course of time, Nedic was also supported by volunteer units who were from Greater Serbia and/or of a Fascist persuasion, an example being the Zbor, the Serbian Fascist party. Nedic was a supporter of a Greater Serbian state that would be based on Serbian peasants who formed 'the perfect Serbian race' because their 'blood [was] not yet mixed with that of other peoples'.⁵⁹

The physical threat to the Serbs came from both the German occupiers and their local enforcers and, more particularly, from Croatian extremists who, before the collapse of the Yugoslav state, had been forced into an existence of illegality or even self-imposed exile.

Before the war, the Ustashe movement had only a few thousand members and an estimated following of not much more than five per cent of the population in Croatia.⁶⁰ However, in what was typical of pre-war relations, the inhabitants of the Croatian capital of Zagreb were greeting the invading German troops as liberators while Belgrade was still burying 2300 of its citizens who had been killed as a result of German bombing.

A triumphant Pavelic entered in the wake of the German troops, a pattern that was repeated when Bulgarian troops marched into Macedonia several days later. Pavelic received the immediate support of the Catholic Church. Archbishop Stepinac of Zagreb sent a charge to his priests with the text: 'Today's events have fulfilled a long-cherished dream of our people.'⁶¹

Once in power, Pavelic's government began to attract more Croats. The Ustashe movement had approximately 28,500 members by 1943. The Domobrani, a Ustashe people's militia, consisted of 90,000 men. At its height, in September 1944, it was to consist of as many as 312,000 members. However, their battle readiness and morale were low. There was also another smaller Ustashe militia group that was more dogmatic. It consisted of 70,000 members including Pavelic's Personal Guard. It was mainly this group that applied its own, particularly cruel version of the Final Solution to the Serbs, Jews and Gypsies, and was supported by a section of the Bosnian Muslim community. On 2 May 1941, just a few weeks after Pavelic's government had come to power, the Ustashe Minister Zanic declared:

'This country can only be a Croatian country and there is nothing that we would not resort to so as to make it truly Croatian and to cleanse it of Serbs

⁵⁹ Cohen, War, p. 53.

⁶⁰ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 193.

⁶¹ Anstadt, Servië, p. 97. See also Mønnesland, Land, p. 269.

who have threatened us for centuries and would do it once again if they get the chance.’⁶²

Pavelic reverted to the nationalist ideas of the 19th century. He spoke of the ‘Resurrection’ of the ‘Independent State of Croatia’, ‘by God’s grace, the wish of our allies and the long, sorrowful and ancient struggle of the Croatian people’. This state would ‘be pure Croatian, a bulwark of Western civilization against the Serbs.’⁶³ Pavelic declared that all the Serbs within his state were to be stripped of their civil rights and protection. Just like the Jews and the Gypsies, they were banned from government jobs. Marriage between people of different ethnicities was forbidden. The Ustashe tried to create an ethnically-homogenous state through forced Christianization and large-scale massacres. Pavelic ordered that a third of the almost two million Serbs in the Ustashe state, as he now regarded Croatia, were to be murdered, a third were to be driven out and a third were to be converted. As one of the leading Ustashe figures was to comment after the war: ‘anti-Serbianism was the essence of the Ustashe doctrine, its raison d’être and ceterum censeo [constantly recurring fundamental attitude, author]’⁶⁴

The Jasenovac camp was the symbol of the regime’s atrocities, and it was here that probably between 60,000 and 80,000 prisoners were killed.⁶⁵ The commandant was Filipovic, a Franciscan priest. Apart from in Jasenovac, the Stara Gradiska death camp and a number of other concentration camps, tens of thousands of Serbs were killed in Pavelic’s state in local massacres and particularly in Serb-dominated cities such as Knin, Glina and Bijeljina.

About a quarter of all Croatian Jews survived the war, a figure that was higher than the less than ten per cent who survived in Serbia. One of the Ustashe government’s alleged reasons for their destruction was that Jewish doctors had committed ‘several hundreds of thousands of abortions’ between the wars so as to keep the Croatian birth rate down.⁶⁶

Franciscans and Catholic priests directed a program of forced conversions in wartime Croatia. When this failed to produce results, Pavelic’s government set up a ‘Croatian Orthodox Church’. Between two and three hundred thousand Serbs were forcibly converted or joined the new church. Hundreds of Orthodox churches, convents and monasteries were destroyed, as were synagogues. It is estimated that more than 200,000 Serbs were forced to migrate to Serbia from Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁶⁷

Here, the question was how ‘the first Croatian national government’ of Pavelic and his associates would manage to govern not only Croatia but also a large area of Bosnia-Herzegovina. It was for this reason that the Ustashe maintained an ambivalent attitude towards the Muslims. Sometimes they committed atrocities against them and sometimes the Muslims were called ‘the flower of the Croatian nation’ and encouraged to attack the Serbs.

Ustashe, Cetniks and Partisans

Archbishop Stepinac was later to adopt a more reserved attitude towards Pavelic’s government,⁶⁸ but Pavelic could still rely on the support of a considerable section of the clergy.

A large percentage of the population, who cheered at the end of the first Yugoslavia, now felt disillusioned with Pavelic’s government that was responsible for anarchic forms of violence that were also directed against Croats with divergent viewpoints. Many deeds that conflicted with ‘the honour

⁶² Quoted in Johnsen, Enigma, p. 122.

⁶³ Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 46.

⁶⁴ Eugen Dido Kvaternik, quoted in I. Banac, ‘The Fearful Asymmetry’, p. 155.

⁶⁵ Higher estimates, which are sometimes as much as ten times as high, are often (incorrectly) quoted, I. Banac, ‘The Fearful Asymmetry’, pp. 154 and 172, n. 30.

⁶⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 207.

⁶⁷ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 206-207.

⁶⁸ Monnesland, Land, pp. 269-270; Geert van Dartel, ‘Nationalities and Religion in Yugoslavia’, in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 33.

and the vital interests' of the Ustashe state were considered to be high treason and were punishable by death, an example being a discussion about Croatian borders.

Resistance in Yugoslavia initially came from sections of the defeated Serb army under the leadership of the monarchist Colonel (and later General) Dragoljub (Draza) Mihailovic. Mihailovic was known before the war for his anti-German views and his criticism of the Serbian army's lack of preparation.⁶⁹ He also felt bitter about the Croat officers and men who deserted while he was stationed at Djakovo in April 1941 during the Hungarian invasion.

On 11 April, the day after the proclamation of the 'independent' Ustashe State, Mihailovic and his men fought the Ustashe troops at Brcko in Bosnia. This resulted in Mihailovic being cut off from his headquarters and he subsequently operated on his own initiative. After Belgrade had capitulated on 17 April, he decided to wage a guerrilla war with a group that initially consisted of just a few dozen men. Mihailovic and his officers based themselves on the tradition of the Cetniks: Serbian guerrillas who had fought against the Turks in the 19th century. He set up his headquarters in Ravna Gora, a mountain village in the area of Serbia where Serbian resistance to the Ottoman rulers had started at the beginning of the 19th century.

In the summer of 1941 Mihailovic's troops claimed their first big success against the Germans when they liberated the city of Loznica. The leaders of the Cetnik movement declared their support for a 'homogenous Serbia' that would encompass two-thirds of Yugoslavia. To realize these plans, they estimated that it would be necessary to deport a million Croats and more than one-and-a-half million others. The remaining country would consist of Slovenia, with the addition of Istria, and a mini-Croatia. The Muslims were described as being 'a serious problem'.⁷⁰ The Cetniks were soon attacking the Croats and Muslims in an attempt to create an ethnically-pure Serbia.

Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, a second resistance movement was launched when Tito's Communists engaged in a partisan campaign. The Communist Party had been banned in 1921 because of a series of attacks but had continued to exist illegally. It had less than 500 members in 1932.⁷¹ Although the Party expanded from 1935 during the People's Front period when the Communists sought contact with other parties and the broader masses, by October 1940 it still only consisted of 6600 members and 17,800 young sympathizers.⁷² However, the first two months of Yugoslavia's occupation resulted in the Communist Party expanding by 50%. Its membership subsequently reached a total of 12,000 adults and 30,000 young people after the German invasion of the Soviet Union.

Josip 'Tito' Broz became the leader of the illegal party in 1937. Although the Party had decided in 1935 to retain the state of Yugoslavia, most of its support at the beginning of the war came from the Serbs and particularly from those who were threatened by the Ustashe regime in Croatia. This was soon to change. Unlike the Cetniks Tito, who was of Croatian-Slovenian origin, was not working towards a Greater Serbia. In addition, he had led a party meeting in Zagreb in October 1940 that had opposed the Cvetkovic-Macek agreement and had promised self-rule to Montenegro, Macedonia and a restored Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The preparations for Communist resistance were completed before Operation Barbarossa. Once the Operation was underway, the Yugoslav Communists engaged in a campaign of large-scale sabotage at the instigation of the Comintern, the Communist Party International. Like the Cetniks, the Partisan movement benefited from the fact that the Italian troops were weak and Hitler had sent all his best troops to the Russian front. In fact, there were only three German divisions in Serbia, each of which consisted of two regiments rather than the usual figure of three. Moreover, the units were mainly

⁶⁹ Kosta Nikolic, 'Dragoljub-Draza Mihailovic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, pp. 207-208.

⁷⁰ Cohen, War, p. 44; Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 202.

⁷¹ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 171.

⁷² Ivo Banac, 'The origins and development of the concept of Yugoslavia (to 1945', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.) Disintegration, p. 20.

made up of older conscripts with little combat experience. They were almost exclusively stationed in towns and had poor transport facilities.

In September 1941 Tito established his headquarters in Uzice on the Serbian side of the Drina where the Uzice Republic had existed for three months. At the end of the year Tito's Partisans were driven from there by the first in a series of seven German offensives. Tito then moved his headquarters to Foca in East Bosnia. Once the Partisans had left, there was little resistance in Serbia and it remained relatively peaceful until 1944. There were only 1700 Partisans there by the end of 1943.⁷³

By contrast, tens of thousands of people joined both the Partisan resistance and the Cetniks in Croatia and Bosnia–Hercegovina. Local Serb-dominated militia in these areas had been fighting the Ustashe terror since 1941. Moreover, the resistance had flourished in Bosnia as Pavelic did not have enough troops to govern the area effectively.

Mihailovic's Cetniks and Tito's Partisans operated jointly for some of the autumn of 1941. They had forced a large number of German soldiers to surrender and had set up a prisoner-of-war camp. However, the two organizations soon disagreed over issues such as command, tactics, the division of weapons and the countries' political future. The Cetniks were organized on a loose basis. In fact, many of the Cetnik groups were unclear about whether they accepted Mihailovic's authority or were led by purely local and regional motives. Naturally Mihailovic and the Yugoslav government-in-exile presented a different picture to the Allies. Tito's Partisans had a clear structure and hierarchy that was determined by the Leninist doctrine of democratic centralism. When a group of supporters appeared to have divergent views, as was the case with the leadership of the Croatian section in 1944, they were either replaced or eliminated in some other way.

But there were other differences between the Cetniks and Tito's Partisans. The Cetniks aimed at restoring the monarchy. Tito's Communists regarded the war as being an excellent opportunity to implement political and social revolution. They limited themselves to hit-and-run actions but also tried to occupy and govern the areas they conquered. The usual way in which the Cetniks operated was through warlords who led groups of peasants. By contrast, Tito's resistance movement provided both peasants and others with the potential for social mobility and a feeling of self-worth.

The events in Kragujevac in October 1941 proved to be a turning point in the relations between the Cetniks and the Partisans. Ten Germans had been killed and 26 wounded in an ambush; the penises of the dead men had been severed and placed in their mouths. The German reaction was that this mutilation was typical of the Cetniks' conduct⁷⁴. In reprisal, the Germans and their Serbian accomplices executed more than 2300 Serbian citizens on the spot. The Germans announced that, just as elsewhere in occupied Europe, 100 Serbs would be executed for every German who was killed and fifty would be executed for every German casualty. The Cetniks felt that the price was too high. As many Serbs as possible had to survive the war so to be able to create a homogenous Serbia. Therefore, the Cetniks subsequently tried to avoid German reprisals against the civilian population. They wanted to postpone major actions until the military front moved closer.

From then on Mihailovic sought the collaboration of the Italians, the Germans and their Serbian associates whose ideology frequently resembled the Cetniks' own beliefs. Their common enemy was the Partisan movement.⁷⁵ By contrast, the Partisans did not avoid civilian sacrifices and actually regarded them as presenting an opportunity to radicalize the population who would subsequently join their movement.

Fighting also broke out between the Cetniks and the Partisans in the autumn of 1941. The Partisans now regarded the Cetniks as being 'internal traitors, the occupier's servants and Greater Serbian reactionaries'. The Cetniks in turn described the Partisans as being the 'betrayers of the Serbian nation, Ustashe criminals and Communist lunatics'.⁷⁶ At the beginning of 1943, Pavelic remarked to a ⁷³ Cohen, War, p. 98.

⁷⁴ Cohen, War, p.41

⁷⁵ For striking examples of collaboration and attempted collaboration, see Cohen, War, pp. 39-43; 46, 57.

⁷⁶ Kosta Nikolic, 'Dragoljub-Draza Mihailovic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 213.

British colonel that, in order of importance, the Cetniks' enemies were Tito, the Ustase, the Muslims, the Croats and finally the Germans and the Italians.⁷⁷ Meanwhile, the Partisans waged a war of terror against villages that were suspected of having Cetnik sympathies. Yugoslav Communist historians later glossed over this episode as being a 'left-wing aberration'. This particularly occurred in Montenegro where those who did not support the Communists were convicted by people's tribunals or were simply shot.⁷⁸

At the end of 1941, the Yugoslav government in London and the British government recognized Mihailovic as being the leader of the Yugoslav resistance. Mihailovic was also able to rely on the support of three-quarters of the Orthodox clergy.⁷⁹ Although the Germans were hot on his heels during 1942 and 1943, Mihailovic managed to form separate commando units for the various parts of Yugoslavia. Hence, 68 units with tens of thousands armed men were set up during the course of 1942 and 1943.⁸⁰ These fighters concentrated on attacking German communications and on anticipating an allied landing on the Adriatic coast. At the same time Mihailovic also exhorted the population to civil disobedience. According to German intelligence at the beginning of 1943, Mihailovic had won the sympathy of 80% of the Serbian population.⁸¹

Tito's troops had managed to take over a large part of Bosnia in 1942. At the end of that year, the Partisan army consisted of 150,000 men who were divided into eight divisions. The Partisans came under heavy fire at the beginning of 1943 when they were surrounded in Montenegro by a German offensive that was supported by the Bulgarians, the Ustashe and the Cetniks. However, the Partisans broke through the siege and reached Bosnia although they left at least ten thousand men behind.

The three indigenous groups, the Cetniks, the Ustase and the Partisans, were fighting more amongst themselves than they were with the occupying forces. The Partisans also made agreements with the Germans although less frequently than the Cetniks did.⁸² The mutual warfare between the various Yugoslavs regularly resulted in degrading crimes that shocked even the German and Italian occupiers. They were particularly disgusted by the Ustashe who, for instance, felt no scruples about shutting the Serbs up in their churches and setting fire to them or pushing women and children off mountain tops.

But there was also a calculating attitude along with the genuine abhorrence: the occupiers feared that the Ustashe's extreme actions would strengthen the resistance by driving more and more people into the arms of the Cetniks and the Partisans.⁸³

At first the Cetniks had been able to rely on material support from England because that country hoped that this would hamper the German troops. However, the British government reviewed its policy once the Allies had landed in Italy in 1943. It was now in London's interests that the Germans should be successfully resisted in Yugoslavia. Intercepted German messages had already convinced London that the Partisans were more effective than the Cetniks at countering the Germans. A British mission to the region also came to the same conclusion. Consequently, the British government decided to support the Communists. Moreover, London was offended by the Cetniks' constant reprisals against the Croatian population that were intended to avenge the Ustashe's crimes against the Serbs. In addition, it became clear that the Cetniks' were virtually unable to recruit non-Serbs because they were associated with a pre-war situation that the non-Serbs did not support.

⁷⁷ Cohen, War, p. 48.

⁷⁸ For a documented survey of this 'aberration' as seen from the Serbian side, see Vukceвич, Tito, passim.

⁷⁹ Cohen, War, p. 45.

⁸⁰ For the development of the numerical strength of Tito's partisans, see Gow, Legitimacy, pp. 35-37.

⁸¹ Kosta Nikolic, 'Dragoljub-Draza Mihailovic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 216.

⁸² See, for instance, Almond, 'War', pp. 141-142; Peter Radan, 'The Serbs and their History in the Twentieth Century', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, pp. 11-12; Cohen, War, p. 90; Neeven, 'Koning', p. 34; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 183; Vukceвич, Tito, p. 267.

⁸³ Almond, War, pp. 134 and 136-137; Anstadt, Servië, p. 56; Constandse, Joegoslavië, p. 70; Deschner/Petrovic, Krieg, p. 268; Glenny, Balkans, p. 487; Pavlowitch, 'Who is 'Balkanizing' Whom?', p. 215; Van den Heuvel, Land, pp. 49-50; Peter Radan, 'The Serbs and their History in the Twentieth Century', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 11; Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 77.

The People's Congress or Saint Sava Congress typified the Cetniks' position and was held at the Serbian village of Ba in January 1944. Here, the Cetniks declared their support for the restoration of the pre-war Yugoslav State and they rejected the Cvetkovic-Macek agreement. Yugoslavia was to be a federation consisting of Serbian, Croatian and Slovenian member states. The future border between Serbia and Croatia was not yet defined but in principle Serbia would encompass all the land 'where Serbian blood was shed and Serbian heads had fallen'.⁸⁴ The Serbs would play a leading role in federal affairs.

The Communists were able to generate support amongst non-Serbs through their bratstvo i jedinstvo (brotherhood and unity) ideology and the promise that after the war a federal Yugoslavia would be based on the right to self-rule. In November 1943 Tito held a second meeting of the Anti-Fascist Council for National Liberation in Jajce (Bosnia) that resulted in the creation of a provisional government. This meeting emphasized the equal rights of Serbia, Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia, Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina. The rights of ethnic minorities were also guaranteed. This represented a fundamental break with the pre-war situation where it was primarily Serbian rights that mattered; these were followed at some distance by those of Slovenia and Croatia.

From the end of 1943 London opted to send arms to the Partisans instead of the Cetniks. The allied leaders also recognized Tito as their ally at the Teheran conference in November 1943. The change in British policy on Yugoslav resistance has been attributed to the activities of Communist agents within the British secret service Special Operations Executive in Cairo.⁸⁵ But even without this situation, it would be difficult to see how the British could have acted in any other way. The Partisans were clearly more effective than the Cetniks and it seems that the British government felt that this was the most important consideration.⁸⁶

An additional consideration, which on a long-term basis was scarcely less important, was the fact that in the long term it was difficult to see how the realization of the Cetniks' future plans as based on their opinions could result in stable relations in South Slavia. Here, the Partisans' outlook was clearly more promising. Tito's supporters had managed to create a stable society in the areas they had conquered. Banac goes so far as to say that, without Communism, there would have been no post-war Yugoslavia.⁸⁷

Moreover, the Partisans succeeded in taking advantage of the Italian troops' withdrawal following Italy's capitulation in the summer of 1943. Tito's troops occupied large areas of the land that was thereby released and took possession of the arms that the Italians had left behind.

The decisive battle for Serbia began on 28 July 1944 when it was invaded by three Partisan divisions. Within a few weeks there was heavy fighting between the Cetniks and the Partisans. The British government put pressure on King Petar II that he should recognize the Partisan movement's position of power. This succeeded and on 12 September the King appealed to all the Serbs, including Mihailovic's Cetniks, to place themselves under the command of Tito and his provisional government. A month earlier Tito had promised an amnesty to all those who chose to support him. 10,000 Cetniks took advantage of this offer including some who had clearly collaborated with the Germans. Tito repeated his offer on a number of occasions up till 15 January 1945.

In addition, Tito flew to Moscow to draw up an agreement with Stalin about the liberation of Yugoslavia. He received an undertaking from the Soviet leader that the Red Army would liberate the country with the Partisans but would subsequently leave. Russian troops entered the Yugoslav territory in October 1944 in support of the Partisans. The Red Army and the Partisans jointly liberated Belgrade on 20 October 1944. Fighting in north-west Yugoslavia was to continue until May 1945. The German ⁸⁴ Kosta Nikolic, 'Dragoljub-Draza Mihailovic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 220.

⁸⁵ For a reference to these statements, see Kosta Nikolic, 'Dragoljub-Draza Mihailovic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, pp. 218-219.

⁸⁶ Almond, War, pp. 139-140.

⁸⁷ Ivo Banac, 'The origins and development of the concept of Yugoslavia (to 1945)', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 20.

occupiers finally surrendered to the Partisans on 7 May 1945 with Tito's troops taking Zagreb some two days later.

Yugoslavia at the end of the war

After the liberation of Belgrade, Mihailovic and the troops that had remained loyal to him left for Bosnia-Herzegovina in the hope that there would be a confrontation between the Western Allies and the Soviet troops. In doing this, he had also handed Serbia over to the Partisans. Mihailovic had counted on there being a Serbian uprising against the Communist government but the only support he received was from General Nedic who had led the Germans' puppet government in Serbia. Nedic's troops placed themselves under Mihailovic's command in the autumn of 1944. However, the remaining 25,000 Cetniks had become demoralized as they were without a supply of arms and munitions, and there was too little food. Many soldiers and a number of commanding officers deserted. Even Mihailovic's son and daughter joined the Communists while another son was killed fighting the Partisans.

On 13 May 1945 the Cetniks suffered their final defeat at the Zelengora Mountain in south-east Bosnia. 4000 of them were either killed, wounded or captured. Mihailovic went into hiding. He turned down numerous offers from the American authorities to go to the United States. Deserted by an increasing number of officers, he was finally captured in the night of 12 and 13 March 1946 and brought to Belgrade. The trial against him for treason had already begun. Mihailovic was found guilty on 15 July 1946 and was executed two days later. Many tens of thousands of others had already suffered the same fate: Ustashe, Cetniks, ethnic Germans, Serb Fascists, collaborators and other 'traitors'.⁸⁸ The Tito regime kept the exact number of executions a closely guarded secret.

For a long time the precise number of war victims remained subject to mystification. After the war, the authorities initially put the figure at 1,700,000. This number was primarily intended to 'benefit' Yugoslavia in terms of post-war reparations but it then began to lead a life of its own.⁸⁹ At the beginning of the 1960s, when talks with Germany led to a demand for an exact figure, Belgrade reduced the number to almost a third (600,000), but this figure was then classified as a state secret. Since then serious research has proved on several occasions that the number of dead must have been slightly more than a million out of a total population of sixteen million in 1941.⁹⁰ However, there is a greater variation in the death toll's ethnic division. The number of Serbs varies between 460,000 and 590,000, the Croats between 190,000 and 270,000, the Muslims between 70,000 and 95,000, and the Jews between 60,000 and 70,000.⁹¹ Approximately 80% of the total number of Jews were killed, seven or eight per cent of the Muslims, seven per cent of the Serbs and five per cent of the Croats.

⁸⁸ Almond, War, pp. 144-146; Arday, 'Hintergrund', p. 258; Bell-Fialkoff, 'History', p. 117; Glenny, Balkans, p. 530; Van den Heuvel, Land, pp. 62-63; Johnsen, Enigma, p. 43; Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 223-224; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 193; Mønnesland, Land, p. 254; Chuck Sudetic, "Srebrenica – The endurance of depravity", IWPR's Tribunal Update no. 228, Part 1, June 2-7, 2001, pp. 4-7; Raju G.C. Thomas, 'History, Religion and National Identity', Thomas/Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 23; Vukceovich, Tito, pp. 273-277; Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 78.

⁸⁹ Cohen, War, p. 108.

⁹⁰ This refers to research by the U.S. Bureau of Census (1954), the Serbian academic Bogoljub Kocovic (1985), the Croatian academic Vladimir Zerjavic (1991) and a 1995 estimate by Srdan Bogosavljevic, the former director of the Federal Institute for Statistics in Belgrade, who had had access to the most statistical of the sources for estimates, Cohen, War, pp. 109-111; Srdan Bogosavljevic, 'Drugi Svetski Rat – Zrtve u Jugoslaviji', Republika, 01-05/06/95, quoted in Hayden, 'Fate', pp. 746 and 748.

⁹¹ For the number of Jewish dead, see in particular Cohen, War, pp. 93 and 107; Raju G.C. Thomas, 'History, Religion and National Identity', Thomas/Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 24.

Bosnia-Herzegovina was the hardest hit in terms of the number of victims per republic. It lost 10.3 % of its population. Croatia had the next highest figure of 7.3% and was followed by Serbia with 4.2%.⁹²

There have been repeated attempts by the Serbs to suggest they were the ones who resisted Fascism and National Socialism and that, after the Jews, they were the main victims of the Second World War. Terms such as ‘the Serb Holocaust’⁹³ equate the fate of the Serbs with that of the Jews. Conversely, from the Serbian point of view, it was the Croats who were responsible for the crimes. Tito’s government was accused of brushing these ‘facts’ under the carpet. It was an image that was widely accepted abroad and has even appeared in recent academic publications.⁹⁴

The figures mentioned above indicate that this version of events cannot be justified either numerically or in terms of Yugoslavia as a whole. However, it is true that, apart from the Jews, the Serbs in both Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia were the hardest hit of all the groups with, respectively, 12% and 17% of their total population killed. This is equal to one in eight Serbs in Bosnia and one in six Serbs in Croatia.⁹⁵

Apart from the concrete number of victims, the following should be borne in mind: the deeds of the Ustashe government should not be blamed on the Croatian people as a whole. Pavelic and his associates were only able to assume power with the support of Italy and Germany; they never would have succeeded on their own. During the Second World War, there were no more than 30,000 Ustashe who only controlled a section of the Croatian territory. Italy occupied the coastal area. Despite a brief, initial period of enthusiasm, a large part of the Croatian population distanced itself from the Pavelic government.

The number of Partisans in Croatia outstripped the number in Serbia until the liberation of Belgrade. Only a part of Tito’s troops consisted of Serbs in Croatia. His troops also included many Croats, for instance the young Franjo Tudjman.⁹⁶

The Serbians who entered the Partisan movement as liberation already dawned ‘September Knights’ included those who collaborated but who also benefited from Tito’s amnesty. This amnesty was partly responsible for the fact that a large number of collaborators were able to acquire or retain prominent positions in Serbia after the war.⁹⁷ Moreover, various Serbian groups and organizations participated during the Second World War in the persecution of the Jews both in Serbia and elsewhere. They included Nedic’s Nazi-supported regime and various state security services, the Zbor Serbian Fascist movement and the Cetniks. The leading collaborators in Serbia had mostly been involved with the main pre-war movements.

By contrast, the Ustashe were a marginal movement in Croatia before the war. The leadership of the major political movement, the Croatian Peasants’ Party, refused to collaborate, despite repeated pressure from the Germans. Macek was even imprisoned for five months in Jasenovac and spent the rest of the war under house arrest because he refused to co-operate politically. Finally, it should not be forgotten that the Cetnik resistance, which appealed to so many nationalist Serbs, was deeply involved with collaborating with the German National Socialists, the Italian Fascists and even the Ustashe.

Hence, it can be concluded that the occupation of Yugoslavia was also a period of civil war where the wounds would be slow to heal.⁹⁸

⁹² Ivo Banac, ‘The origins and development of the concept of Yugoslavia (to 1945)’, Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 18; Ludwig Steindorff, ‘Die Vorgeschichte – Von der Zeit vor der Staatsbildung Jugoslawiens bis zur Krise der achtziger Jahre’, Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)Erben, p. 26.

⁹³ Deschner/Petrovic, Krieg, pp. 264 and 269

⁹⁴ See, for instance, Raju G.C. Thomas, ‘History, Religion and National Identity’, Thomas/Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 25

⁹⁵ Ludwig Steindorff, ‘Die Vorgeschichte – Von der Zeit vor der Staatsbildung Jugoslawiens bis zur Krise der achtziger Jahre’, Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)Erben, p. 26.

⁹⁶ Almond, War, pp. 135-136; Cohen, War, p. 96; Also Vinko Prizmic, ‘Het volgzame Nederland. Kanttekeningen bij de lessen van “voormalig Joegoslavië”’, Idee, September 1996, p. 32.

⁹⁷ Cohen, War, passim, and particularly pp. 102-106 and 137-152.

⁹⁸ For part of this reasoning, see also Michel, Nations, p. 220.

Subsequently, the second Yugoslavia was set up in 1945 and would exist for 46 years. On an external level, the second Yugoslavia was made possible by the Fascist and National-Socialist occupation that eliminated many of the pre-war structures and discredited the nationalist ideologies. On an internal level, Tito and his associates contributed by the fact that Yugoslavia could largely be restored after the war on its own conditions. Up till that time, the debate about Yugoslavia had mainly been a pointless discussion between nationalist ideologies. Tito and his government succeeded in transforming this discussion into a political struggle about how the state was to be organized and where the succession of post-war constitutions were to play an important role.

Chapter 2

Tito's Yugoslavia

1. Introduction

The Partisans' role in liberating Yugoslavia meant that the Communist Party had gained greater prestige there than in other Eastern European countries. A similar status had been achieved by the Yugoslav People's Army, the Jugoslavenska Narodna Armija (or JNA), which was set up after the liberation on the basis of the Partisan movement. Moreover, the Communist Party assumed power more rapidly in Yugoslavia than in the rest of Eastern Europe where considerable support from the Soviet Union was needed before it was able to make a definitive break-through several years later.

Hence, the second Yugoslavia involved the population as a whole in a way that the first Yugoslavia had not since it was a state created by an elite. Although Communism in Yugoslavia had a higher level of grass roots support than elsewhere in Eastern Europe and had not been imposed upon the country from abroad, it was nonetheless only able to establish itself through terror. The first years of Tito's government can quite simply be described as Stalinist.

A government was formed in March 1945 where 23 of its 28 members were either Partisans or former Partisans. Tito became both its Premier and the Minister of Defence. He managed to counter the opposition with the help of his friend A. Rankovic who was the director of the secret police. The secret police was initially known as the Odsek za zastitu naroda, or OZNA for short, which literally meant the 'Department for the People's Security'. This was later changed to Uprava državne bezbednosti, or UDBa for short, which in turn meant the 'Office for State Security'.

The secret police had far-reaching powers. Just like its Russian example, the KGB, it was allowed to make arrests and to execute people without trial. In fact, the executions and revenge actions against collaborators at the end of the war were to continue and those who opposed the new regime were either executed or persecuted. Under Rankovic's leadership, tens of thousands of people who opposed the regime were to be executed during the first years after the war. It has been estimated that 200,000 people were killed between 1945 and 1953 as a result of the regime's barbarism.⁹⁹ Hundreds of thousands of others were interned.¹⁰⁰

The Communists won 90% of the votes of the first post-war elections in November 1945. However, this was partly due to the disenfranchisement of countless opponents of the Communists, which resulted in Yugoslavia becoming a one-party state where changes to the constitution could now be made.

2. The founding of the second Yugoslavia

As based on the constitution that was introduced on 31 January 1946, the new Yugoslavia was both a republic and a federation of six equal republics: Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia-Hercogovina, Macedonia and Montenegro. This was closely modelled on the example of the Soviet Union's 1936 constitution. The Slovenian ideologist E. Kardelj, who was a close friend of Tito, was mainly responsible for all the constitutions of the second Yugoslavia. Kardelj's reason for copying the Russians was that the Soviet Federation [was] 'the most positive example of the solution to the issue of the relations between peoples in the history of mankind.'¹⁰¹

Just like its Soviet predecessor, the new Yugoslav constitution included the republics' formal right to secede. However, for the next few years the government's interpretation was that the republics had forfeited the right to secede by joining the federation in the first place.¹⁰² This right was subsequently dropped from the 1953 Constitution.

⁹⁹ Van den Heuvel, Mythen, p. 373.

¹⁰⁰ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 234.

¹⁰¹ Quoted in Hondius, Community, p. 137.

In practice, the republics' power was still limited. Instead a strict centralism had been chosen that would operate from Belgrade which was once again to become the capital. In terms of the country's territorial divisions, Tito tried to alleviate the ethnic tensions that had existed both before and during the Second World War. He was also aware of the problem that the Serbs could potentially dominate the other ethnic groups as they accounted for one third of the total population. Tito and his advisors partly tried to solve this through defining the borders between the various republics and provinces. A small committee of Communist Party leaders had already established these borders although it had not devoted much time to this task because the Yugoslav leadership expected that the borders would lose their significance with the advance of Socialism. For that reason, the committee opted primarily for the pre-1914 borders as its point of departure but its decisions were also based on ethnic and economic considerations.¹⁰³

The significance of the new constitution for the Serbs

The decision to return to the pre-1914 situation, which had already been taken during the war, meant that the Macedonians and Montenegrins now had separate nationalities. During the first Yugoslavia, the Serbs still regarded them as being Serbian. Moreover, Serbia was confronted with the fact that its territory would now include two autonomous districts: the 'Autonomous Province of Vojvodina' and the 'Autonomous District of Kosovo and Metohija'. (See map of 'The Yugoslav Republics').

The problem for Serbia was not the ethnically-mixed Vojvodina that had become a part of Serbia while also retaining its autonomy. In fact, the area had not previously belonged to Serbia and had suffered relatively heavy losses during the war with a total of 80,000 dead.¹⁰⁴ The Hungarian Arrow Cross Fascists had caused widespread destruction and after the liberation the Serbs had killed approximately 40,000 Hungarians in revenge.¹⁰⁵ Moreover, the number of ethnic Germans, many of whom had lived in Vojvodina, had been diminished by several hundred thousand at the end of the war through flight, deportation and extermination. These demographic changes meant that most of the Vojvodina population was Serbian so that Serbia could rely on the region's support and co-operation.

However, the real problem for Serbia was the 'loss' of Kosovo where the roots of Serbian national awareness were based. 11,000 Serbian colonists had settled there during the first Yugoslavia. Most of Kosovo along with Albania had been governed by Italy during the war, and Albanians had moved to Kosovo while 100,000 Serbs had left the area. Tito had encountered strong anti-Communist resistance there from the end of 1944, which he was only able to quell in the summer of 1945. He therefore created a special regime for Kosovo so as to reconcile the Albanians with Yugoslavia and where – unlike the example of Vojvodina – the Serbs were not allowed to settle even if they had fled from there during the war and wanted to return to their homes. A particularly repressive regime of Serbian and Albanian Communists was set up to govern the area.

An additional disappointment for Serbia was the fact that these losses were not to be compensated by the addition to Serbia of the Serbian areas in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. The borders now meant that approximately 30% of Serbs were living outside of their 'own' republic of Serbia, as was also the case for 20% of Croats. This created the situation that constitutionally Serbia consisted of one people: the Serbs. By contrast, Croatia consisted of two peoples: the Croats and the Serbs. And Bosnia-Herzegovina consisted of three peoples: the Muslims, the Serbs and the Croats.

¹⁰² Hondius, Community, pp. 140-144.

¹⁰³ Cohen, Bonds, p. 24; Mønnesland, Land, p. 260; Pavkovic, Fragmentation, pp. 48-51; Ludwig Steindorff, 'Die Vorgeschichte – Von der Zeit vor der Staatsbildung Jugoslawiens bis zur Krise der achtziger Jahre', in: Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, pp. 27-28.

¹⁰⁴ Cohen, War, p.111.

¹⁰⁵ Van den Heuvel, Hongaren, pp. 66-67.

Only in Slovenia was the population virtually ethnically homogenous. There was a dominant group in all the other republics with the exception of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

In Tito's Yugoslavia, various legal – and often sensitive – concepts would continue to exist alongside each other: the citizenship of the state of Yugoslavia; the inhabitants of a republic; and the membership of an ethnic group.

An ethnic group could take three legal forms: a nation with the right to its own republic (narod), a nationality (narodnost) or a national minority (nacionalna manjina). The nations consisted of the people who were mentioned in the constitution: the Slovenes, Croats, Serbs, Macedonians, Montenegrins and - from 1974 - the Muslims. An ethnic group did not qualify as a nation if its fatherland was located outside of Yugoslavia. In this case, it was considered to be a nationality. Here, examples include the Hungarians, Italians and Romanians. The Albanians were another example who did not have the status of a nation although they constituted the fourth largest ethnic group in the country after the Serbs, Croats and Muslims.

Finally, various groups constituted either a national or an ethnic minority such as the Ruthenians, Vlachs and Gypsies. Tito's government was initially optimistic about the problem of ethnic nationalities. Kardelj had already written in a 1938 statement that a Yugoslav consciousness would originate and surpass that of the various ethnic groups, when economic relations and society were exposed to the beneficial affects of Communism.¹⁰⁶ The Communist leadership remained convinced of this, even when the party was in power.

The party leaders were just as optimistic about the painful memories of the Second World War: they would be forgotten. After the war and the settling of accounts that followed, the government imposed a taboo on discussing ethnic differences in general and the confrontations that occurred during the years 1941 to 1945 in particular. During Tito's regime, many of the victims of the civil conflict during the Second World War were described as being the victims of Fascism. The existence of other victims was simply hushed up. The leadership in Belgrade hoped that time would heal the wounds. Meanwhile, the ideology of 'brotherhood and unity' (bratstvo i jedinstvo) was used to try to foster a Yugoslav consciousness.

It was partly through these measures that Tito gained a reputation on an international level of being the great organizer of stability in the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia. However, this suggests too much of a stable situation : the equilibrium that Tito created was actually very fragile. Here, Cohen writes: 'Throughout the existence of the Yugoslav state from 1918 to 1991, survival against the odds was its quintessential feature.'¹⁰⁷ Tito was a tightrope walker who functioned through constant tactical swerves as the exclusive and most important arbiter between the ethnic groups. However, he was unable to create a lasting solution so that his legacy was ultimately troublesome.

The significance of the new constitution for the Croats

At first Croatia had as little reason as Serbia to be satisfied with Tito's political solutions. In 1944 he had already replaced the Croat Communist Party leaders because they demanded more autonomy for Croatia and a certain accommodating of the traditional powers there. Pavelic and Macek managed to escape the vengeance of the Communists by fleeing abroad.

By contrast, the Catholic Church and its servants were to remain there, and in the years following the war there were to be many clashes between the Communist authorities and the Roman Catholic organizations in Croatia. Several hundred priests were killed because they had supposedly collaborated. Cardinal Stepinac was condemned to a prison sentence of 16 years in a show trial in 1946. In fact, he was released in 1951 but would remain under a form of house arrest until his death in 1960.

¹⁰⁶ Cohen, Bonds, p. 22. The prominent Communist M. Djilas, who became a dissident in the 1950s, also shared these ideas, ibidem, p. 24.

¹⁰⁷ Cohen, Bonds, p. 1.

The fact that Serbs accounted for half of the Partisan movement in Croatia meant that there was a relatively high number of Serbian Communist officials there after the war. This in turn meant that the party was less readily accepted.¹⁰⁸

The Croats also felt that they had been harmed by a number of territorial regulations. For instance, the Croats had lost the part of Bosnia-Herzegovina that had been gained through the Cvetkovic - Macek agreement of 1939. They had also been deprived of the area around Kotor in the south, which was given to Montenegro, and Srem, which had been added to Vojvodina. On the other hand, the Croats were pleased that Tito had managed to augment Yugoslavia with Zadar and a large part of Istria. Only Trieste would remain a part of Italy despite Yugoslavia's demands and years of bickering.

The causes of ethnic tension in the second Yugoslavia

There had never been many Communists in Slovenia. Many Slovenes did not support the Communist state but they became reconciled to it when Tito succeeded in augmenting the country with a large part of the Slovenian areas of Italy and Austria.

Macedonia was known as South Serbia before the war. Here, the Macedonian Communist Party had only opted to become a part of Yugoslavia rather than Bulgaria at a late stage of the war. After 1945, Tito's Communist rule was resisted for many years in this republic. As a concession, Belgrade recognized Macedonian as being a separate language.

By recognizing a number of republics and minorities, Tito would appear to have made Yugoslavia considerably more difficult to rule than it was between the two world wars when there were only three official groups: Serbs, Slovenes and Croats. On the other hand, the principle of equality between the republics and the many minorities made the all-encompassing Yugoslav state more palatable to both the elite and the general population. And the increased number of pawns on the political chessboard provided Tito with more room for manoeuvre than had existed during the Serb-Croat differences between the two world wars. Moreover, he created a one-party state so that he had none of the problems of the political instability that had plagued the parliament of the 1920s.

Just like the first Yugoslavia, where the Serbs had been victors in the First World War and thought that they could rule the roost, Tito's state was also burdened with the Greater Serbian issue. Serbia had survived the Second World War relatively unscathed when compared to the other parts of Yugoslavia. In addition, it was liberated six months earlier than the rest of the country: at the end of 1944. This created a flaw in the construction of the Communist Party that was never repaired. Up till then, the Party only had several tens of thousands of members but from the autumn of 1944 to May 1945, its ranks were swelled with a few hundred thousand Serbs. Moreover, as previously mentioned, many of these newcomers were Cetnik defectors. Hence, the Serbs had entered the Party with their superior numbers and Greater Serbian philosophy, and this was to remain the source of constant turmoil.¹⁰⁹ Even in 1981, when the Serbs constituted 36.3% of the population, they still accounted for 47.1% of the party membership.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁸ Cohen, Bonds, p. 49.

Moreover, Serbia again had the advantage that the Yugoslav capital of Belgrade was located in its territory. Apart from at the very top, Serbs occupied a relatively high number of positions both in the army and in the civil service.¹¹¹ By approximately 1990, it was estimated that 90% of the civil servants who were working for federal organizations were Serbian.¹¹² Roughly 60% of both the commissioned and the non-commissioned officers of the Yugoslav National Army (the JNA) was either Serbian or Montenegrin. However, the Croat and Slovenian numbers remained in proportion. By contrast, all the other ethnic groups were under-represented amongst the JNA officer class.¹¹³ Rankovic's secret service was also dominated by Serbs.¹¹⁴ What's more, the fact that Belgrade was the capital of both Yugoslavia and Serbia could easily create the impression that an unwelcome measure from the federal capital was actually a ukase from the federal capital of Serbia.

A new source of ethnic tension in Yugoslavia was the over-representation of Serbs in leading social positions; this occurred despite the egalitarian and multi-ethnic promises of Tito's regime. Apart from the historical accidents of the war years, this over-representation was based on a conscious political choice. On the one hand, Tito appointed many Serbs because he aimed at eliminating the Serbian dissatisfaction with Yugoslavia's territorial division. On the other hand, by appointing them to posts in other republics, he wanted to counter any individual developments in these areas. Tito hoped in vain that his compatriots would eventually regard these Serbian officials as Communists and Yugoslavs and not primarily as Serbs.

3. Yugoslavia's foreign relations after the Second World War

The Cold War, which was at its height at the end of the 1940s, was mainly 'a war by proxies', a war that was waged not by the major powers themselves but through the agency of allied states. By being the 'proxy' of neither the Soviet Union nor the United States, Yugoslavia remained an attractive 'bride' for both parties in the global conflict. Yugoslavia was to be seduced, not taken.

Relations with the Soviet Union

Tito had had arguments with Stalin on several occasions during the war. For instance, for opportunist reasons the Soviet leader had opposed the fact that Tito's Partisans had emphatically presented themselves as Communists. Moreover, Tito had formed a provisional government without first consulting Moscow. After the war, the Yugoslav leader clearly had no objection to Stalinism but he did not want to let himself be ordered about by his great example. He resisted both direct instructions from Moscow and the interference of Russian agents and advisors in Yugoslavia. Moreover, Tito did not want to subject the Yugoslav economy to the interests of the Soviet Union. Conversely, Moscow was seriously concerned about Tito's headstrong actions concerning the Greek Civil War and his ambitions for a Balkan federation that would include Albania, Bulgaria and possibly northern Greece.

Stalin could not accept that there was an alternative Communist power. This resulted in Yugoslavia's expulsion from the Cominform, the Moscow-led command centre of the Communist Party. It was no coincidence that this occurred on 28 June 1948: Saint Vitus Day, a day full of significance in the history of Yugoslavia. The Cominform passed a resolution on that day that accused ¹⁰⁹ See also Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 93.

¹¹⁰ Mønnesland, Land, p. 300.

¹¹¹ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 258.

¹¹² Tromp-Vrkic, 'Burgeroorlog', note 5.

¹¹³ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 250.

¹¹⁴ Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from The former Yugoslavia', Baehr/Baudet/Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, p. 62.

the Yugoslav party leadership of Trotskyism, nationalism and deviating from Communist principles. Stalin hoped that this denunciation would cause the Moscow-oriented Communists in Yugoslavia to join battle with Tito. He supported this plan with an economic embargo against Yugoslavia and the threat of its military invasion by the troops of the Soviet Union and its Eastern European satellites. This invasion never occurred despite the massing of troops on Yugoslavia's borders.

It is unclear to what extent Stalin had felt constrained by a wartime agreement with the British Prime-Minister Winston Churchill where the division of Yugoslavia would result in one half being under Anglo-American control and the other half being under Soviet control. Stalin must have realized that a Soviet invasion of Yugoslavia, which borders on Italy, would have been unacceptable to the West as it would have allowed for the Russian domination of the Adriatic Sea.

The Soviet threat from the summer of 1948 onwards did not spell the end of Tito's regime but it did curtail his foreign adventures in the Balkans such as the dream of a Balkan federation and his interference with the civil war in Greece. From then on, to quote a Yugoslav pun, the country was encircled by brigama. This was not only an acronym made up of the first letters of the seven countries that surrounded Yugoslavia¹¹⁵, but also the Serbo-Croat word for 'worries' as expressed in the instrumental plural case.

Yugoslavia's expansionist tendencies vanished in 1948, with the initial exception of Trieste. Henceforth, the emphasis was to be on the established nature of Yugoslavia's external borders.

Relations between Moscow and Belgrade were to thaw to some extent for two reasons in the second half of the 1950s and the early 1960s. The first reason was that Stalin's successor, Krushchev, was less vehemently opposed to Yugoslavia's alternative Communism. Relations were also improved by the moral support that Tito gave to the Soviet Union at the time of the Hungarian Uprising in 1956 and during the conflict between the Soviet Union and China from the end of the 1950s onwards.

Relations with the West

Its Stalinist attitude and the widespread nationalization of banks and businesses in the early post-war years did not suggest that Yugoslavia was ultimately to be the country out of all the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe that was to have the best relations with the West. At that time, the West was irritated by the Belgrade government's support of the Communists in the Greek Civil War and it instigated considerable conflict about the possession of Trieste. However, all that was soon to change.

Once the Soviet Union had stopped its credit loan to Yugoslavia and trade with Eastern Europe had come to a virtual standstill, Belgrade launched an urgent appeal in 1950 to the United States and Western Europe for food-aid because otherwise the country would be threatened with famine. Because of Yugoslavia's strategic position on the Adriatic Sea, the United States offered the country six hundred million dollars of economic help between 1950 and 1955, of which only fifty-five million dollars were in form of a loan.¹¹⁶ This money was not quite enough to cover the deficit in Yugoslavia's balance of payments. In economic terms, Yugoslavia had become an artificial state where its chances of survival depended on the Western infusion.¹¹⁷ Along with its economic help, the United States provided another six hundred million dollars in military aid during the first half of the 1950s¹¹⁸. In exchange, the West received an assurance that Yugoslavia would resist if the Soviet troops decided to invade northern Italy from Hungary.¹¹⁹ Although there was relatively less American aid after the mid-1950s, the United States still took care of 60% of the deficit of Yugoslavia's balance of payments during the years 1950 to ¹¹⁵ Here, the letter M stands for Madjarska, the Serbo-Croat word for Hungary.

¹¹⁶ Pasvkovic, Fragmentation, pp. 54-55; Anstadt, Servië, p. 107; Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 254-255.

¹¹⁷ Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 110; Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 255-256; Woodward, Tragedy, p. 25.

¹¹⁸ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p.55.

¹¹⁹ Gervasi, 'Germany', p. 43; Pedrag Simic, 'Civil war in Yugoslavia. The roots of disintegration', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), p. 77.

1964. Moreover, the American Export-Import Bank and the World Bank provided loans from 1960 until 1990 that would amount to a total of, respectively, one and four billion dollars.¹²⁰

4. Internal consequences of Yugoslavia's foreign policy

The fact that both the East and the West knew that Yugoslavia was to be seduced rather than taken, was also to have consequences for the country itself. Hence, Western markets were opened up to Yugoslav products, particularly in Germany and Italy. However, Yugoslavia's extensive foreign aid meant that there was little impetus to focus on exports.

Moreover, the country's need to stand on its own two feet between the two major powers caused it to concentrate on the production of investment goods so as to meet its internal demand. Of all the Eastern European Communist countries, only Romania and Albania achieved a lower level of foreign trade per capita during the years 1950 to 1965.¹²¹

Trade relations between Yugoslavia and the Eastern bloc improved again after 1955. However, the threat of the Soviet invasion of Yugoslavia never completely vanished, despite the restored economic and diplomatic relations. There were periodic moments of fear such as in 1959 when tensions led to the inclusion of 126 Partisan brigades as territorial militia in the Yugoslav National Army (the JNA). And when the Warsaw Pact troops invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968, a system of territorial defence was introduced that in principle allowed for the involvement of all Yugoslavs in a Partisan war.

Even after the 1950s, Tito's Western connections regarded him as being a considerable irritant so far as the Communists were concerned. Just as he had ultimately been their best ally in the struggle against Hitler's Germany during the Second World War, Tito was now the Communist darling of the West because his attitude deviated from the Soviet point of view. The West's economic aid to Yugoslavia was partly intended to show other Eastern European countries that taking a more independent stance vis-à-vis Moscow would have its rewards. Thanks to this support, Yugoslavia lived above its means both economically and in terms of international politics, and this helped Tito to control the tensions between the different population groups.

The West had every interest in maintaining the stability of Tito's multi-ethnic state. Therefore, the United States did not try to destabilize the regime despite its attempts to undermine the other Eastern European countries (with the exception of Albania).¹²²

In ideological terms, Yugoslavia's central position in the Cold War was based on its participation in the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries that came out of a 1955 gathering of former Asian and African colonies in Bandung, Indonesia. The Movement's first meeting took place in Belgrade in 1961 where it was immediately apparent that Yugoslavia had assumed a central position as a European power. Tito had many contacts with foreign heads of state on behalf of the Movement and, conversely, this greatly increased his authority at home.

The break with the Cominform in 1948 was to affect Yugoslavia both in the short term and the long term. The regime hardened in the short term. Stalin had hoped that his rejection of Tito's policy would result in serious opposition to Tito within his own party. However, the Yugoslav helmsman managed to retain the support of the vast majority of Communists. This was partly due to his heavy-handed suppression of any opposition within the party: Communists who were not on Tito's side were prosecuted as 'Stalinists'. Approximately 50,000 of them were arrested, of whom between 10 and 20,000 were imprisoned on Goli Otok Island, the Naked Island, a reef to the south of Rijeka where the summers were too hot and the winters were too cold. Although this Yugoslav equivalent of the Gulag

¹²⁰ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 270-271.

¹²¹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 74.

¹²² Gervasi, 'Germany', p. 43; interview Boris Stanojevic, 26/10/00. Also Kadrijevic, Viem, pp. 13-14. In addition, there were no Radio Free Europe or Radio Liberty broadcasts to either Yugoslavia or Albania.

Archipelago was to be closed down several years later, its existence had to be hushed up until after Tito's death.

Another short-term effect of the break with the Cominform involved agriculture. The widespread collectivization of agriculture had begun in 1949 and was applied particularly strictly partly because the Communist Party leadership wanted to prove its doctrinal correctness after the break with Moscow. However, this policy of collectivization was also to be dropped several years later.

The long-term effects of the Cominform's rejection were that Tito and his associates realized that they had to organize a higher level of internal support. The country would not be able to survive the constant Soviet threat if heavy-handed repression resulted in too much internal resistance. Therefore, there were no more political death sentences after the beginning of the 1950s. Political opposition was punished with lengthy prison sentences or dismissal. The political system was transformed into what the Serbian writer Cosic described as a pragmatic tyranny.¹²³

The transformation into a pragmatic tyranny

The measures taken by Tito's regime to organize internal support included a higher level of openness than in other Eastern bloc countries. After the first few years, Yugoslav Communism became less rigid in a number of respects than the Communism of other Eastern European countries. When Yugoslavia was hit by an economic crisis at the beginning of the 1960s, its reaction was to open its borders. Many thousands of Yugoslavs seized the opportunity to become migrant workers in Northern and Western Europe. From the late 1950s onwards, hoards of tourists visited the country each year and they provided a major source of foreign currency.

However, Yugoslavia's academic and artistic freedom was still limited. Books and films could be banned. Nonetheless, from the beginning of the 1950s, there was a higher level of cultural freedom than elsewhere in Eastern Europe.¹²⁴ 'Western' consumer goods became common in large areas of Yugoslavia at the end of the 1960s. Hence, Tito's Yugoslavia was relatively open and liberal which also created a good impression of the country abroad.

Moreover, the country's economy appeared to be in good shape. The Communists' economic policy was helped by the fact that the consequences of the Second World War had been less disastrous for Yugoslavia's economy than the First.¹²⁵ For instance, the Germans had managed to increase the productivity of both mining and the metal industry through capital investment. Hence, Yugoslavia recovered rapidly after this war and was partly helped by more than four hundred million dollars of United Nations aid for reconstruction and rehabilitation. This was the program's largest donation to any single country.¹²⁶ The aid consisted not only of food and coal but also, to an important extent, of investment goods. Expropriation of the possessions of ethnic Germans and collaborators facilitated the Communists' nationalization and redivision programs.

From having been a mainly agrarian nation before the Second World War, Tito's Yugoslavia was transformed into a more industrialized state that also managed to develop tourism along its coastal areas. Between 1945 and 1971, the percentage of the population that lived from agriculture decreased from more than 73% to more than 38% of the total work force.¹²⁷ Yugoslavia was one of the fastest growing economies in the world with an average annual growth in national income of 5.3% between the years 1953 and 1989.¹²⁸

¹²³ Silber/Little, Death, p. 32.

¹²⁴ Also Ugresic, Cultuur, pp. 46-51.

¹²⁵ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 63.

¹²⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 235.

¹²⁷ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 126 and 136.

¹²⁸ V. Bojicic, 'The Disintegration of Yugoslavia: Causes and Consequences of Dynamic Inefficiency in Semi-Command Economies', Dyker/Vejvoda, Yugoslavia, p. 29. Also Cohen, Bonds, p. 31.

But the peasants were less successful despite the fact that they had played such a strong role in the Partisan movement.¹²⁹ The agricultural sector clearly failed to develop as much as the economy as a whole. The collectivization program had been reversed because it had led to a dramatic decrease in agricultural produce and to a number of local revolts. However, depending on the region, land ownership remained limited to a maximum of ten or twenty hectares per farmer. Moreover, a radical price policy for agricultural produce remained in force that meant that the rural areas had to finance the development of industry and the cities.

The Communist leadership regarded small-scale private farming as a money spinner. Nonetheless, despite the abandoning of collectivization, farmers were also viewed for many years as being modest capitalists who had no place in the Communist system. Because they operated outside of the public sector, they had no right to either welfare provisions or representation at the higher levels of workers' self-rule. When companies had to lay off workers, those with a rural background were often the first to go. The idea behind this was that they would still be looked after by their families in the countryside. This contributed to a serious aggravation of the economic relations between the cities and the rural areas that were increasingly marginalized.¹³⁰

Worker' self-rule and its consequences

The attempt to legitimize Yugoslavia's individual interpretation Socialism led to the introduction of workers' self-rule in 1950. According to this system, the employees of each company elected a workers' council. The company's management consisted of the director and a daily committee that the council provided. In practice, these workers' councils were to be dominated by the Communist Party. Ultimately, this variation on the centralist Communist planned economy was 'one great utopia, which was really needed as an alibi for the absence of political democracy'.¹³¹

The reason behind the fiasco of workers' self-rule was that under this system, employees tended to give priority to employment and wages rather than to other economic factors, a situation that was helped by the fact that companies could not go bankrupt. Well-established foreign observers assessed this experiment as being 'uneconomical, socially unproductive and to a great extent unsuccessful'.¹³² Tito was never particularly interested in economic issues but other Yugoslav party leaders began to endorse this criticism from the 1970s onwards.¹³³ However, by contrast, workers' self-rule contributed for many years to the idea abroad that Yugoslav Communism was a milder version of Moscow Communism.

The system of workers' self-rule also went hand in hand with the fact that the economy's decision-making process was decentralized to the level of the opština (councils) and the control over virtually every federal company was transferred to the republics. This resulted in the mixing of politics with economics at a regional level, and the regulation of labour relations became largely the councils' responsibility. This not only countered the development of a real market economy, it also resulted in the councils becoming inward looking. The development was by Western standards anti-modern and is one of the examples of how, between 1945 and 1991, Yugoslavia embodied 'a deep contradiction between the imperatives of modernization and the fundamentally anti-modern features of the "Yugoslav road to socialism"'.¹³⁴

Along with an economic dimension in 1952, political decentralisation was also reflected in the Communist Party's transformation into the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (Savez Komunista

¹²⁹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 183; Deschner/Petrovic, Krieg, pp. 299-300.

¹³⁰ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 126 and 135.

¹³¹ Josip Zupanov, quoted in Cohen, Bonds, p. 36.

¹³² FBIS commentary dating from 16/10/89 and quoted in Cohen, Bonds, p. 43. See also Russell, Prejudice, p. 138.

¹³³ Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 87.

¹³⁴ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 7-8. See also Ludwig Steindorff, 'Die Vorgeschichte – Von der Zeit vor der Staatsbildung Jugoslawiens bis zur Krise der achtziger Jahre', Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)Erben, pp. 31-32.

Jugoslavije or SKJ). This change made it clear that there was no single Communist Party, but that the League consisted of parties that were primarily organized by each republic or autonomous area and were only connected at a national level. These forms of decentralization were typical of the Tito government at the beginning of the 1950s. Each political crisis was followed by a 'solution' that led to the decentralizing of both politics and the economy.

There were two reasons for this decentralization. First and foremost, Tito refused to consider a multi-party system. Therefore, in his view, decentralization was the only acceptable alternative. Secondly, there was such a taboo on nationalism that it could only be debated in the coded form of discussions about economic centralization or economic decentralization. New political crises were partly caused by the adverse effects of economic measures that had followed previous political crises. This situation could be described as a vicious circle had it not involved a downward spiral that would ultimately land Yugoslavia in the depths of misery in approximately 1990.

Milovan Djilas, who was one of Tito's closest confidants along with Kardelj and Rankovic, was to discover the extent to which the discussion of the Communist Party's monopoly was forbidden. As an extension of economic self-rule, he suggested that there should be a greater decentralization of political authority so as to counter the Party's bureaucratization. He supported a multi-party state and argued that the UDBa (the secret police) should be held responsible for its deeds. Djilas was expelled from the Party after a special meeting of the Central Party Committee in January 1954. In 1956 he was sent to prison for his constant criticism where he was ultimately to remain for nine years.

5. The promotion of 'the' Yugoslav culture

Djilas had actually made an important effort to create a Yugoslav national awareness. From 1952 onwards, the Yugoslav regime addressed its citizens as the 'working people' (radni narod) of Yugoslavia so as to communicate the idea that the individual was first and foremost a producer. Nonetheless, Tito's government failed to create a sense of socio-economic awareness amongst large sections of the people that went beyond the usual ethnic boundaries. During the first half of the 1950s, the Communist Party abandoned the idea that an enforced industrialization and a tightly-planned economy would create a new person who would no longer be susceptible to ethnic nationalism. Subsequently, it mainly tried to foster Yugoslav patriotism through a process of political socialization and education. Here, the central elements were the Partisans' struggle during the Second World War and the break with Stalin in 1948.

Tito was the nation's binding force and a virtual cult began to develop around his personality. Cities and streets were named after him. Portraits of the bronzed statesman in his marshall's uniform hung not only in public buildings but also in homes and shops. On Tito's official birthday, youth relay races were held throughout the country that ended in a Belgrade stadium. Religious education, which had been tolerated till then, was banned in 1952. It was replaced by lessons that were intended to educate children as Socialist citizens, and Yugoslav culture was also promoted. The Seventh Party Congress in 1958 was completely dominated by this Socialist Yugoslavism.

However, it was never completely clear whether the Yugoslav culture that the government tried to promote was a reservoir of separate national cultures or an all-encompassing culture. 'Brotherhood and unity' meant that a Yugoslav patriot could regard himself as being a Croat, a Serb or a Macedonian (etc.) but that at the same time he was a Yugoslav who was prepared to sacrifice his life for Yugoslavia.

The media – newspapers, radio and later television – were mainly organized per republic. The exceptions were the Borba daily newspaper, the Tanjug press agency, which reflected the federal leadership's opinions, and the Danas, NIN, Politika and Vjesnik magazines. In addition, the second Yugoslavia never used national school books.

The ideology of Yugoslavism had an obvious attraction but one that certainly did not affect everyone. It particularly flourished amongst intellectuals and sections of young people who were neither Catholic nor Muslim and who mainly lived in the cities.¹³⁵ Yugoslavism also appealed to the Serbs more than to other ethnic groups who regarded it as being a veiled attempt to create a Serbian hegemony.¹³⁶

Census results revealed that only a limited percentage of the population had registered as Yugoslav. The highest percentage in Yugoslavia as a whole was reached in 1991 with 6.6%, a modest achievement when one considers that 13% of the population was the result of ethnic intermarriage¹³⁷ and that the regime had had 45 years to propagate a Yugoslav ideology with the help of a party monopoly. The Yugoslav optants primarily consisted of professional servicemen and civil servants.

Religious organizations were now the sole competition in terms of the promoting of values but they only had a limited influence. There was a certain relaxation of legislation and regulations during the 1960s and '70s, but the Communist regime kept a tight rein on the various religious denominations because it regarded them as being the bulwarks of ethnic nationalism. Whether that was sensible, considering the Communists' aims, remains to be seen. By suppressing religious expression, the government of brotherhood and unity was in fact thwarting an ecumenical movement that in turn established religion as a sign of ethnicity.¹³⁸

The Communists also failed to eliminate the differences in economic development between the areas in the north of the country and those in the south, a situation that had already existed before the Second World War. A federal investment fund was set up in 1956 to bridge that gap. This fund was replaced in 1965 by a development fund for the disadvantaged south that was financed by a tax of 1.85% on all government services. In spite of this policy, this state of inequality continued to grow dramatically. In 1947 the Slovenes earned 175% of the average income per capita of the Yugoslav population while the residents of Kosovo earned just 53%. In 1979 these figures were, respectively, 195% and 29%. In other words: on average, the Slovenes earned at least three times as much as the Kosovans in 1947 and a good 30 years later they earned more than six times as much.¹³⁹

Education and literacy levels also varied greatly from region to region. Although the illiteracy rate for those above the age of ten was 20% for the whole of Yugoslavia in 1961, this consisted of just 2% in Slovenia, 12% in Croatia, 33% in Bosnia-Herzegovina and 41% in Kosovo.¹⁴⁰ These figures had fallen 20 years later but the regional differences remained the same: the illiteracy rate for the whole of Yugoslavia was 9.5%; for Slovenia it was less than 1%, for Bosnia-Herzegovina it was 14.5% and for Kosovo it was 17.6%.¹⁴¹

There were different reasons for the republics' varying levels of development. The north had been more industrialized while agriculture and cattle breeding continued to play a greater role in the south. So far as industry existed in the south, it was mainly the result of the industrialization program that the government had set up shortly after World War Two. This primarily involved mining that was capital intensive and provided relatively little employment. Partly because of the economic differences, the birth rates in the south were considerably higher than those in the north so that any growth had to be divided amongst a higher number of people.

The fiasco of the government policy to divide economic affluence equally became a source of irritation. There was a feeling in the south that the government was not doing enough and that, for ¹³⁵ Cohen, Bonds, pp. 32 and 49; Mønnesland, Land, p. 285; Vesna Petic, 'The War for Ethnic States', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 20; Naarden, Western Perceptions and Balkan realities [Annex to NIOD Srebrenica Report].

¹³⁶ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p. 62; Peter Radan, 'The Serbs and their History in the Twentieth Century', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 14; Williams, Legitimacy, p. 62. Even the Serbian writer Dobrica Cosic warned about this in 1961, Cohen, Bonds, p. 29; Hondius, Community, pp. 242 and 315-316.

¹³⁷ Nikolai Botev, "Seeing Past the Barricades. Ethnic Intermarriage in The former Yugoslavia, 1962-1989", Halpern/Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 225.

¹³⁸ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 299; Geert van Dartel, 'Nationalities and Religion in Yugoslavia', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 25-28.

¹³⁹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 196. For more figures see, for instance, ibidem, pp. 83-84; Cohen, Bonds, p. 35.

¹⁴⁰ Hondius, Community, p. 25.

¹⁴¹ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 333.

instance, Croatia with its coastal tourism could afford to spare more. However, the north felt that the money that it gave was not being used effectively and would therefore be better invested in its own region.

Economic recession – ethnic consequences

Ethnic nationalism began to stir again at the end of the 1950s and it indeed included issues of division. For that reason the Serbian writer Dobrica Cosic branded it as ‘dinar nationalism’.¹⁴² There was also industrial unrest at that time because the working population was demanding a greater share in the country’s economic success. This was soon followed by a recession. Up till 1960, the economy had grown faster than almost any other in the world. In the 1950s, the average annual increase in the gross national product was 6.7%,¹⁴³ and this was mainly due to an expanding industry that was growing by more than 11% per year.¹⁴⁴ However, around 1960, this growth seemed to have reached a limit. The central investment fund was partly responsible for this and had levelled this growth by siphoning capital off to the disadvantaged areas. The party leaders failed in their attempts to reform the economy and to increase the market orientation and cost awareness of the largely politically-appointed management teams of the major factories.

Industrial production dropped in 1961 and 1962. Unemployment figures reached a level of, respectively, 6% and 7.3%.¹⁴⁵ The dinar was devalued to 40% of its old value. The cost of living rose by 30% between 1959 and 1962 although wages remained frozen. The Communist Party was confronted with the question of whether to opt for more decentralization or simply to return to centralization so as to get the economy back on course.

6. The 1960s: centralization versus decentralization

Rankovic, who was the head of the UDBa secret police until 1964, was the strongest opponent of the decentralization of political and economic power. His intelligence agency was also partly decentralized in 1964 which led to the UDBa’s name being changed into the State Security Service, the Služba Državne Bezbednosti (or SDB). Yet Rankovic’s power seemed to remain unaffected. He was even appointed Vice-President of the Federation as a result of the 1963 Constitution; this made him the second most important man in Yugoslavia after Tito.

However, an enquiry was launched in 1966 into the heavy-handed actions of the secret police in Kosovo. Rankovic’s mainly Serbian security force had tried to crush every attempt at decentralization, particularly in Kosovo. Tito also failed to solve the tensions there between the Serbs and the Albanians, and this repeatedly led to violence. The activities of the secret police in Kosovo had resulted in a series of deaths and serious injuries.

The enquiry revealed that Rankovic had bugged the phones of countless leading politicians who included, according to unconfirmed rumours, Tito himself. To make things worse, Tito had assigned this enquiry to the KOS (Kontraobavestajna Služba), the military counter-intelligence service that mainly consisted of Croats. Rankovic was sacked and expelled from the Party along with many of his police. This blow to the regime was regarded by many Serbs as an attack on their position within the state. It was greeted in the other republics with relief.¹⁴⁶

Even in the 1950s, there was a struggle within the League of Communists of Yugoslavia between the supporters of the original centralism and those who favoured decentralization. The supporters of centralism could rely on the help of Rankovic while the other side was backed by Kardelj, ¹⁴² Hondius, Community, pp. 241-242.

¹⁴³ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 275.

¹⁴⁴ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 272.

¹⁴⁵ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 273, 277.

¹⁴⁶ I. Banac, ‘Asymmetry’, pp. 147-148; Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 94.

the Slovenian Communist Party ideologist whose friendship with Tito gave him plenty of influence. The supporters of decentralization argued that the existing emphasis on Yugoslav unity was simply a masquerade for Serbian domination.

This political issue confronted Tito with a difficult decision. He had strongly encouraged Yugoslavism in around 1960 and the population census of 1961 had for the first time included the possibility of registering as a Yugoslav. However, only 317,000 people opted for that choice. All the others selected an ethnic nationality. The precise role that this signal played is unknown but Tito increasingly distanced himself from Yugoslavism from 1962 onwards. In March of that year he confronted a secret meeting of the party leadership with the following question: 'Is our country really in a state to continue to survive or will it collapse? Is this society viable or not?'¹⁴⁷ Six months later Tito declared that 'Socialist social relations' were to be the binding factor between Yugoslavs. He felt that an all-encompassing Yugoslav culture was unnecessary. There was no need for a Yugoslav layer to come between the republics' culture and global culture.¹⁴⁸ Apparently Tito felt that his two main political objectives - the State of Yugoslavia and the rule of its Communist Party - would benefit the most by abandoning Yugoslavism and allowing for a tendency towards decentralization. Kardelj declared: '[O]ur Federation is not a framework for creating some new Yugoslav nation or an outline for the kind of national integration that the supporters of hegemonism or denationalizing terror have been daydreaming about.'¹⁴⁹

Tito's decision in 1962 to abandon Yugoslavism was described by the future Minister of Defence General Kadijevic as being 'beyond any doubt the worst and the most fateful in the entire existence of the second Yugoslavia'.¹⁵⁰ A new constitution was introduced in 1963 that had been drawn up by Kardelj. It was a triumph for the decentralists. Numerous powers were transferred to the republics. The new Constitution transformed the Federation into being primarily the guardian of both the country's unity and integrity, and the unity of its financial and economic policy. The Federation's main responsibilities were to be foreign policy, defence and trade. However, the republics also had a need to assert their influence in these areas. This was mainly accommodated by striving towards a proportional representation of civil servants from the republics in federal posts. As based on this Constitution, over the next few years a growing number of federal posts were rotated between representatives of both the republics and the autonomous provinces. All posts could be held for a maximum of two terms with the exception of the presidency. The right to secession was once again included in the Constitution and was now granted to the different peoples: the ethnic groups.

During the Eighth Congress of the Communist League of Yugoslavia in 1964, Yugoslavism, which had been the positive theme of the previous congress six years earlier, was to suffer a defeat from which it would never recover.¹⁵¹ Tito condemned Yugoslavism at this conference as being a form of 'assimilation and bureaucratic centralism, unitarianism and [Greater Serbian] hegemony'.¹⁵² Kardelj readily followed in his footsteps by describing the Yugoslav nation as a creation made from 'the remnants of Greater Serbian nationalism'. There was also no mention of Yugoslavism or a common Yugoslav culture in the 1964 party program.¹⁵³ At the end of 1965, Kardelj declared at a meeting of 80 leaders from both the Federation and the republics that the idea that ethnic distinctions would automatically diminish had proved to be incorrect. He argued that they had actually become stronger.

¹⁴⁷ Quoted in Stallaerts, Afscheid, p. 94. Also Dusan Bilandzic, 'Termination and Aftermath of the War in Croatia', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 86; Vukcevic, Tito, p. 277.

¹⁴⁸ Hondius, Community, p. 243.

¹⁴⁹ Quoted in Hondius, Community, p. 242.

¹⁵⁰ Kadijevic, View, p. 64.

¹⁵¹ Vesna Pesic, 'The War for Ethnic States', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 20.

¹⁵² Tito quoted in Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from The former Yugoslavia', Baehr/Baudet/Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, p. 63.

¹⁵³ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p. 63.

In his opinion, the only way to avoid Yugoslavia's collapse was to set up a confederation that allowed the republics a high level of autonomy.¹⁵⁴

The order had been reversed between the regional congresses and the Central Party Congress before the Eighth Congress in 1964. Binding decisions were previously taken by the Central Congress that were subsequently implemented by the regional congresses. But there was a radical break with this tradition in 1963: the congresses in the republics and autonomous areas were subsequently to precede the Central Congress. Thereafter, the Central Congress was to become more and more of a market place for horse trading between the representatives of the regional congresses.

The 1963 Constitution and the 1964 Party Congress were followed by major economic reform in 1965. This change of policy led to a reorganization of banking which up till then had mainly been organized on the level of the opstina or councils. Here, the idea was that the new trade and investment banks would be responsible for transactions throughout Yugoslavia. However, in practise, they mainly functioned on the level of the republics and were strongly over-represented in Belgrade. These banks, rather than the central government, were mostly responsible for the investment policy. The government no longer had control over the production of money so that there was an inherent risk of inflation. The banks began to grant favoured companies loans that had extremely favourable and effectively negative interest rates. This problem was increased even more by the fact that companies that encountered problems because of the limitations of the available banking transactions between the republics would simply circumvent the banks altogether by borrowing money from other companies in their own republics. This led to an increase in the amount of money in circulation. In 1970, the sum of the companies' outstanding bills amounted to a quarter of the gross national product.¹⁵⁵ Inflation would remain at an annual average of 18% between 1970 and 1979; this was almost twice as high as the global average.¹⁵⁶

The Ninth Party Congress in 1969 decided that key posts in all the important party committees were to be divided along ethnic lines. Moreover, there was to be a greater emphasis on the Party's organization per republic. Therefore, a Yugoslav identity was clearly a handicap for Party officials. Each federal post would only be held on a temporary basis. Politicians' grass roots support was undeniably to be found in their republics.

'Yugoslavia as a goal in itself' is put to rest

Other parts of Yugoslav society were also permeated by the formula of ethnic division. Yugoslavia was the common manger from which everyone was to receive his share. Here, it seems that for large sections of the population, Yugoslavia was increasingly becoming a means rather than a goal in itself.¹⁵⁷

Jobs in companies in ethnically-mixed areas were also given out according to the formula of ethnic division, a policy that even extended, for instance, to company holiday homes. Although it was intended as a way of eliminating tension between ethnic groups, the ethnic division formula actually contributed to a fixation on mutual relations. Everyone was constantly on guard that his group was not being disadvantaged.¹⁵⁸ And when this did occur, the other group would have to suffer the same fate. This was also demonstrated by the consequences of Rankovic's dismissal from his post as the head of the secret police.

The 1963 Constitution and the attack on Rankovic resulted in an important reversal in the relationship between the secret service and the Communist Party as organized per republic. Unlike its ¹⁵⁴ Dusan Bilandzic, 'Termination and Aftermath of the War in Croatia', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 87.

¹⁵⁵ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 309.

¹⁵⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 309

¹⁵⁷ Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: a reassessment', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 62.

¹⁵⁸ Also Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: a reassessment', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 61-62; Slapsak, Joegoslavië, p. 69; interview R. Dukic, 14/06/00.

predecessor the UDBa, the SDB did not have control over party appointments in the republics. In fact, the political leaders of each republic had now acquired control over their republic's secret service. The secret service's permission was no longer needed for a passport which greatly contributed to the mass exodus of hundreds of thousands of migrant workers to Western Europe. In the late 1960s, this in turn appeared to have solved Yugoslavia's unemployment problem in one fell swoop.

In many ways, Rankovic's fall had a liberating effect on Yugoslav society. Voices of dissent now found an outlet in the newspapers and magazines. Tito had expected that Rankovic's dismissal would cause unrest in Serbia but it remained calm, and liberals even took over the Serbian Party. They were in fact prepared to undertake measures such as far-reaching decentralization so as to eliminate non-Serb fears of Serbian domination.¹⁵⁹ Yugoslavia experienced a spring that resembled the Prague Spring of Dubcek's Czechoslovakia and which occurred at virtually the same time. Moreover, the economy recovered in 1968. Yugoslavia developed into a consumer society and compared favourably with other Eastern European countries with their famous queues for bread and meat.

Just as elsewhere in Europe, there were student demonstrations in Belgrade in 1968 that focused on issues such as the affluence of party officials. The students were also demanding reforms and a higher level of Socialist idealism instead of a slide towards a market economy. Tito parried the students' demands with a mixture of flattery and violence. He announced that his economic reforms would benefit those on the lowest incomes. At the same time, his response to the student demonstrators was heavy-handed. It became clear that the individual freedom to have a divergent opinion was permitted to a certain extent. Students could subject themselves to the 'sex and drugs and rock 'n' roll' of their Western counterparts and could also write critical articles, but any form of organized opposition remained absolutely forbidden.¹⁶⁰ Hence, the Communist government prevented the development of all forms of organization that would have existed between the agencies of the Communist State and the individual. When opposition was allowed, it could only occur within the party and the state agencies.

7. Ethnic problems: Kosovo, Slovenia, Croatia versus Serbia in around 1970

Ethnic problems became apparent during the emergence of nationality issues and especially when economic problems rapidly recurred and the question of the division of wealth was once again on the agenda. Signs of nationalism were most evident in Kosovo and Croatia.

But the economy was not the only problem in Kosovo. A major grievance of the Albanians concerned the fact that the Kosovan Serbs and Montenegrins occupied more than half of the province's government posts including jobs at the police and the SDB. In the autumn of 1968, Albanians demonstrated in Kosovo for a higher level of autonomy under the rallying-cry of 'Kosovo Republic'. This caused great irritation amongst the Serbs and Montenegrins in Kosovo. They felt threatened by the province's Albanians and by the shifts in demographic relations. These were caused by the increasing number of Serbs who were leaving the province and also by the Albanian birth rate that had an annual increase of 3.2% in the 1970s and was the highest in Europe.¹⁶¹

The introduction of the 1963 Constitution meant that conferring the status of a republic also entailed the possibility of secession. Non-Albanians felt that behind the call for the status of a republic was a secret desire for independence or assimilation with Albania.

Just like the student demonstrations, Belgrade responded to the problem with a mixture of violence and promises. Demonstrations were ruthlessly broken up and their organizers were sentenced to years of prison. On the other hand, Albanians were made eligible for a wide range of government posts and for the first time they acquired a real place in the representing structures of both the

¹⁵⁹ Vesna Pesic, "The War for Ethnic States", Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 24-25.

¹⁶⁰ Also Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 274-275.

¹⁶¹ Detrez, Balkan, p. 98.

Federation and Serbia. School books from Albania were introduced on a massive scale and the capital of Pristina acquired its own university. The Serbs soon began to leave Kosovo in far greater numbers than ever before. It was difficult for them to find work and they no longer felt at home there. This exodus was a bone of contention for the Serbs and particularly for those who chose not to leave. Hence, Kosovo was rapidly becoming the powder keg of Yugoslavia.

Following Kosovo, there was also tension between Slovenia and Belgrade in 1969. This was caused by the fact that Slovenia had missed out on its share of the money that was provided by the World Bank for modernizing the roads. The heated emotions about economic handicaps were demonstrated by the fact that there were calls in Ljubljana for Slovenia's cession. The Slovenes were kept in check by a combination of heavy pressure from Tito and the promise that Slovenia would be given priority in future projects, but they did not forget this experience. Moreover, this conflict had caused differences between Slovenia on the one side and Croatia and Macedonia on the other so that these three republics no longer operated at a national level as a closely-knit liberal bloc.

The greatest outburst of nationalism took place in Croatia and was ignited by a 1967 conflict about language. There had been an agreement in 1954 to design a joint Serbo-Croat dictionary. However, when the first two volumes were published in 1967, it appeared that many Croat words had been left out or had been included with the words 'local dialect'. In each case where there were two possible spellings, the Serbian version had been selected as the correct one. Indignant Croat intellectuals published a statement where they demanded that Croatian should henceforth be recognized as a separate language alongside Serbian, Slovenian and Macedonian. This cultural movement was becoming increasingly political.

Moreover, there were numerous complaints in Croatia that, although this republic earned a great deal of money through exports, migrant workers and tourism, its profits were largely appropriated by the state and companies in Belgrade to support objectives such as developing the southern regions. The northern republics' complaints about the failed attempts to divide affluence equally across the country at their expense would frequently be heard over the next two decades. A further annoyance was the fact that the Croats only had to threaten to step out of line for them to be immediately associated with the Ustashe terror.¹⁶² The Croatian Communist Party's sympathetic attitude towards this criticism led to remarks of a 'Croatian Spring' as based on the analogy of the Prague Spring of 1968. Just as in Czechoslovakia, the Croatian Communist leadership tried to relax the political and economic command structure. The people's support for this new approach overwhelmed even the party leaders in Zagreb who nonetheless did not feel that it was necessary to reverse their policy despite the problems that they could expect from the national party organization in Belgrade.

There were massive demonstrations. 30,000 students and school children went on strike to add weight to the demands for a higher level of autonomy and even independence. This movement, which was initially liberal, began to become more overtly nationalist. The party leadership in Croatia was surpassed by the Matica Hrvatska. This Croatian cultural movement had supported Croatian self-awareness since the middle of the 19th century but had virtually led a clandestine existence during the first decades of the Communist government. Tens of thousands of new members signed up. Difficult questions were asked such as why almost 60% of the Zagreb police were Serbian although they only accounted for 15% of the city's residents.¹⁶³ There were also calls to exercise the right to an army, an individual currency and membership of the United Nations, and territorial claims were made on parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina. In August 1971, the Croatian Student Union unveiled a commemorative plaque in honour of Radic who had been described by Tito as a kulak or big peasant. It was located on the front of the house where he had lived in Zagreb. A statue of him was even erected in Metkovic.

Eventually the Serbs also began to rebel in Croatia. Their mildest demand was that the rights of the Serbian minority should be included in the Croatian Constitution. But some Serbs went further and began to arm themselves. They demanded the right to secede their area so that it could be linked to Serbia. Once this point had been reached, there was a very real risk of Croatia's secession or even a civil war. Therefore, conservative Communists, including those from Croatia, tried to persuade Tito to deploy the army in Croatia. However, the 80-year-old leader realized that he could opt for a less violent response because at that moment Croatia's position in Yugoslavia was somewhat isolated.

¹⁶² For Croatia's depiction as the 'genocide nation' see, for instance, Mønnesland, Land, p. 281.

¹⁶³ Glenny, Balkans, p. 591.

Hence, at the end of 1971 and the beginning of 1972, Tito decided to purge the Croatian League of Communists of its 'Fascist totalitarian tendencies'. Tens of thousands of people were forced to leave the Party. The Matica Hrvatska was banned. Universities and the media were also subjected to the same 'spring cleaning'. Several thousand people, particularly intellectuals, were imprisoned for some months without trial. After the 1972 purge, the new leaders of the Communist League of Croatia remained tainted by the crushing of the Croatian Spring and by the impression that, when it came down to it, they would always be at Belgrade's beck and call. The brief Croatian Spring was followed by 17 years of the Croatian Silence (1972-1989). Those arrested included Franjo Tujman, the Director of the Zagreb Institute for the History of the Labour Movement, along with Stipe Mesic and various others whose names would emerge at the centre of Croatian politics in 1990.

Both this intervention and the equating of the Croatian desire for reform with the Ustashe past resulted in bad blood in Croatia, particularly against the Serbs. The fact that Tito allowed Croatia to keep half of its income from the tourist industry and a quarter of the republic's foreign exchange was a pleasant but insufficient form of compensation. In a sense, this concession actually aggravated Yugoslavia's economic and political problems because it was the cause of increasing complaints from the south about the unequal division of the nation's wealth. And in the north it strengthened the idea that economic progress had to be fought for through ethnic nationalism at the expense of Communism. The Croatian Serbs were also left with a bitter experience. As a Serb in Kordun told the American-Serbian journalist Dusko Doder in 1974: '[We] will never let ourselves be surprised again. At least now there's an axe behind every door.'¹⁶⁴

The nationalist powers suppressed

It was obvious that Tito had completely failed to defuse the issue of nationality. This particularly applied to the most serious aspect of this issue that had already dominated the first Yugoslavia and where the Serbs' goal was centralism while the Croats' most basic desire was for autonomy. Rather than cultivating a system of mutual tolerance between the various ethnic groups, Tito had acted like a new Habsburg sovereign with his divide and rule politics of playing the groups off against each other. The status of a particular group was increased or decreased according to what Tito felt was necessary for the country's internal stability. Often a government action against one group would be followed by another against a different group. This created a pattern of expectation amongst the population whereby a blow to one section of the people had to be followed by the adverse treatment of another group.

The 1970s also started in this way. In an attempt to restore the ethnic balance, most of the other republican and provincial Communist leagues were purged in the months that followed the suppression of the Croatian Spring. Those affected included the Reformist Serbian leaders and 6,000 of their supporters.

These purges dealt a fatal blow to the possibility of reforms coming from within the Communist Party itself and it is difficult to overestimate the consequences that this would have for the further history of Yugoslavia. The Communist League had been stripped of its reforming powers. The liberal opposition that had embraced nationalism now largely abandoned its liberalism in favour of pure nationalism. However, this development would only become overt at the end of the 1980s. As yet, the only sign was the fact that the Communist Party was becoming increasingly rigid and unsound. The Party had been stripped of its ideals forever and it attracted fewer young people.¹⁶⁵

¹⁶⁴ Doder, Yugoslavia, p. 13.

As a substitute for liberal reform, Tito and Kardelj decided to further their policy of shifting power towards the regions. They wanted to create a strong basis for regionalism in a new constitution. Tito had already established in April 1970 that:

‘today there is not only an increasing desire for greater autonomy, the republics want actual independence, they want to separate themselves politically from the Federation... If someone were to ask me about it right now, I would find it difficult to say that we have a real federation. It already seems to be a confederation ...’¹⁶⁶

Tito stressed the need for a new constitution in a letter to the federal parliament that was dated 9 December 1970. It stated that greater autonomy at the level of the republics would deal with the tensions that had been created by the differing economic developments. The next day the parliament decided to set up a committee that would be responsible for drawing up a new constitution. Kardelj would be its chairman and its members would be the speakers of the parliaments of the various republics and autonomous areas. It was not difficult to guess the direction that the new constitution would take.

The 1974 Constitution: Kosovo and Vojvodina are autonomous and not independent

The new constitution had been completed in 1974. With 406 articles and more 350 pages, it was the largest in the world and included complicated stipulations about the relations between the federation and the republics that would repeatedly lead to quibbles.

The essence of this constitution was that government authority had been decentralized to such an extent that it had become difficult to rule the country on a federal level. Along with the six republics of Slovenia, Croatia, Serbia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Montenegro and Macedonia, the constitution also included the autonomous provinces of Kosovo and Vojvodina that were located within Serbia. These two provinces had now acquired the same status as the other republics although they also remained a part of Serbia, an incongruity that was to have major consequences.

There was one important exception to this process of equalization. Each of the republics was supposedly based on the people’s sovereignty that in turn implied a right to secession. However, this right was withheld from the two autonomous provinces as a concession to Serbia.

To prevent the country’s disintegration, the new constitution stipulated that any alterations to it would need the approval of all six republics and the two autonomous provinces of Kosovo and Vojvodina. This decision would have to be made by the collective state presidium that was set up by the constitution. This body would ultimately consist of eight members: one for each republic and autonomous province. The chairmanship would change each year according to an order that had been established in advance. The same principle was applied to the Central Committee of the Communist Party. Finally, there was the Committee for the Protection of the Constitutional Order that was set up in 1975 and included the Ministers of Home Affairs and Defence. Using a system of checks and balances, these three bodies had to safeguard the continuity of the Yugoslav State and Communist society after Tito’s death.

Only foreign policy, defence and foreign trade policy continued to operate on a mainly national level. Decisions concerning economic affairs required unanimity within the presidium. A majority was enough for most other matters but the representatives of each republic or autonomous province could also opt to veto federal decisions. Kosovo and Vojvodina could therefore block the decisions of Serbia of which they themselves were also a part. Even making a treaty required the approval of all the republics. From then on, the republics were able to maintain foreign contacts through the co-ordination committees for foreign relations that began to develop from the republics' Chambers of Commerce from 1970 onwards.

¹⁶⁵ Cohen, Bonds, pp. 48-49.

¹⁶⁶ Tito quoted in Dusan T. Batakovic, ‘Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from The former Yugoslavia’, Baehr/Baudet/Werdmöller (eds.), Rights, p. 65.

Economic problems were increased by the fact that the new constitution included the Croatian demand that the banking system, that was still concentrated in Belgrade, would now be completely decentralized. The immediate consequence of this was that the financial flow between the separate republics diminished to a level of between one and two percent of Yugoslavia's entire capital.¹⁶⁷

Although the 1974 Constitution was intended as a step forwards after the Croatian Spring, it was actually a step into the dark. It provided a recipe for difficult decisions and compromises at the lowest possible level, and would ultimately arrive at a complete impasse. The situation was saved for the time being by the charismatic Tito who had been appointed president for life by the constitution. After his death, the collective state presidium would operate on the basis of a constitution that had in principle transformed Yugoslavia into being a 'semi-confederation of semi-sovereign republics'.¹⁶⁸

Was there another possible arbiter between the republics apart from Tito and the state presidium? There were two other important centres of power: the Communist Party and the army. It was no coincidence that the Party's leading role was once again emphasized after the acceptance of the 1974 Constitution. The Party had to be the binding factor in a state where the republics and the autonomous provinces dealt with each other on a basis of virtual equality and were not constrained by the federal bodies. The principle of democratic centralism was once again introduced so that the Yugoslav expert Allcock had no qualms about describing the apparent liberalization that followed the 1974 Constitution as being effectively a Stalinist reform.¹⁶⁹ Others use the term 'polycentric étatism' to define the post-1974 situation.¹⁷⁰ Moreover, the Party had acquired the power to elect candidates for government posts. This completely changed the composition of Yugoslavia's elite in the years following 1974. The technocrats, whose presence was based on workers' self-rule, were now supplanted by professional politicians. These politicians mainly fulfilled the role of exegetes of the extremely complicated paper regulations that were the result of the world's largest constitution. The party's new and weighty role, which left little space for other organizations, again prevented liberal alternatives from developing in Yugoslav society that would have been able to oppose the rise of nationalism in the 1980s.¹⁷¹

However, it would have been difficult for the Communist Party to fulfil a binding role because, for instance, of its over-representation of Serbs and Montenegrins. At the same time, decentralization even affected the Communist League of Yugoslavia. For instance, the members of the Central Committee were elected at the regional congresses. The combination of position appointments and regionalism resulted in the creation of government empires in every republic and province that refused to obey the national authorities. Regional governors no longer had to feel responsible for the level above them. They were supported in their quest for self-sufficiency by the heads of local and regional businesses who sought protection against competition from other parts of the country. Incestuous relations developed between political governors and the directors of state companies. The consequence of all this was an end to political decency and the rise of a mass desire for personal gain amongst party officials who effectively operated as feudal lords. The Communist Party became less of a political body and more of a career channel that also helped the unscrupulous. From the 1970s onwards, all this

¹⁶⁷ Ilija Ika Todorovic, 'Regional Economic Nationalism in the Former Yugoslavia', in: Thomas/Friman (eds.), Conflict, pp. 174-175.

¹⁶⁸ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p. 70. See also interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

¹⁶⁹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 92. Also Djilas, Profile, p. 85.

¹⁷⁰ Pedrag Simic 'Civil war in Yugoslavia. The roots of disintegration', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 83 and 85.

¹⁷¹ Also Woodward, Tragedy, p. 77.

meant that corruption flourished in Yugoslavia, as was occasionally revealed in much talked-about scandals.¹⁷²

Apart from Tito and the state presidium, there was just one other institution that could be described as existing on a national level: the Yugoslav Peoples' Army or JNA. The question now was how it would react once Tito was dead and there was no other arbiter.

¹⁷² Also Meier, Jugoslaviën, pp. 77-78; Michielsen, 'Joegoslavië', p. 224.

Chapter 3

The era after Tito

'In the wake of the disintegration of the Yugoslav federation (...) the attempt to provide an explanation has dwelt quite disproportionately upon the factor of ethnic diversity. Nevertheless, I contend that no explanation which does not place at its heart economic factors deserves to be taken seriously.'¹⁷³

1. Introduction

Tito died at the respectable age of nearly 88. This is a considerable achievement for a person but for the country that he led, it is difficult to decide whether his death came too early or too late. On the one hand, in terms of merits and charisma, Tito was the only politician in Yugoslavia to go beyond the ethnic and republican level. On the other hand, his leadership had blocked fundamental political and economic solutions for far too long. The slogan "Posle Tita – Tito!" (After Tito – Tito!) bore witness to the sense of destitution that followed his death. Like almost every dictator, Tito had failed to leave a crown prince.

Shortly before his death in 1980, Tito spoke to W. Averell Harriman, the former American Undersecretary of State: 'When I came to power as the leader of the Partisans, I had the whole country behind me. That will never happen again. I was able to exert this level of power because of the war. It is completely impossible for me to select a single successor. Ultimately there is no way to protect this country against its own disunity.'¹⁷⁴

After Tito, there was only the collective presidium of the Yugoslav Federation with its rotating chairmanship, but it had none of Tito's charisma. The members of the presidium were just anonymous figures in Tito's shadow. They became the laughing-stock of cinema newsreels where their appearance was greeted by a noisy audience trying to guess which shadowy figure was now stalking across the screen. Moreover, establishing the Yugoslav leadership, as demonstrated by the cult around Tito, had been strongly based on the experiences of the 1940s: the Partisans' struggle and the break with Stalin. These experiences were becoming less relevant to the younger generations. The fact that the Communist regime in Yugoslavia was initially stronger than elsewhere in Central and Eastern Europe and that it was so strongly based on Tito's charismatic leadership had now become a major stumbling block for the central authority's continued existence.¹⁷⁵

Tito's successors were similarly unsuccessful at creating structural solutions to the issues that arose during the final years of his life such as economic problems and the difficulties created by the 1974 Constitution. The future Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic described the situation as follows: 'The system wasn't working even before he died – it was Tito who functioned. After his death, nothing worked and no one even seemed capable of agreeing about anything.'¹⁷⁶

Perhaps that was also too much to expect of a party where the Reformist leaders had been removed and any form of creativity had vanished after the re-introduction of democratic centralism and the appointment systems. The party was losing its attraction for young people and was increasingly the symbol for impasse, stagnation and eventually deterioration. Only the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan had led to an increase in student members so that the Party reached its zenith in 1982 with a ¹⁷³ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 89.

¹⁷⁴ Tito's words as remembered by Mrs. Pamela Harriman and quoted in Cohen, Hearts, p. 108.

¹⁷⁵ Also Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 421.

¹⁷⁶ Cohen, Bonds, p. 53.

membership of 2200,000. This figure had fallen to 1500,000 by 1989. Half of all young people in the mid-1980s did not want to join. In Croatia that figure was 70% and in Slovenia it was as high as 88%.¹⁷⁷

Even abroad Tito's government had already lost its allure before his death. Yugoslavia's international position in the Non-Aligned Movement had been seriously eroded during the 1970s because the organization had inclined towards the Communist camp under Cuba's leadership. China had already initiated a détente with the West at the beginning of the 1970s and even Republican President Ronald Reagan's blustering rhetoric about the Evil Empire could not hide the major improvement in relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. This improvement was of major significance for Yugoslavia's internal relations. Just as the first Yugoslavia had been partly created and maintained by the fear of the territorial claims of countries such as Italy (in particular) and subsequently Germany, so the threat of a Soviet invasion had helped to suppress the internal tensions of the second Yugoslavia. An important reason for Tito's intervention in the Croatian Spring was that the Russian leader Leonid Brezhnev had offered the Soviet Union's (not entirely disinterested) assistance in solving this issue. In a speech after the crisis, Tito warned workers in Zagreb that if the Yugoslavs were unable to keep their own house in order, then 'someone else' would do it for them.¹⁷⁸ There was no need for Tito to explain to the Zagreb workers who he meant by this.

There were two reasons why the country did not immediately disintegrate after Tito's death, as many had predicted. Firstly the threat of a Soviet invasion had not entirely subsided.¹⁷⁹ Shortly before Tito died, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan had demonstrated that Moscow still did not hesitate at teaching Communist regimes a lesson by force of arms. But Afghanistan was also to be the Soviet Union's Vietnam: it revealed the Soviet forces' short-comings in a guerrilla war. The experience of Afghanistan forced the leaders in Moscow to re-consider the system in their own country. However, the outcome of the war in Afghanistan would also affect Yugoslavia because the risk of action being taken against Yugoslavia was becoming progressively more unlikely. The second reason why Yugoslavia did not immediately disintegrate was that the country was still kept afloat by capital from the West. However, this economic help strongly depended on the first factor: the degree to which the Soviet Union was seen to be a threat.

There was no immediate opposition in Yugoslavia after Tito's death. As has been previously demonstrated, the Yugoslav Communist system had allowed very little space for the development of organizations that could lead to opposition. Even if there were more organizations in the 1980s, these were mostly regional and not national although this may not have been the original intention. For instance, it was typical that at the beginning of the 1980s, the Belgrade Committee for the Freedom of Ideas and Speech was unable to attract members outside of Serbia.¹⁸⁰

Moreover, the Communist government's instruments of power were still intact: the Party, which maintained a strict discipline, the SDB secret service and the JNA federal army. These factors kept Yugoslavia going at the beginning of the 1980s, but the question now was for how long?

2. New ethnic tensions in Kosovo

The consequences of the 1974 Constitution virtually destroyed the possibility of federal government by the collective state presidium. This particularly applied after May 1980 when the presidium had to continue without Tito as an arbiter. Each republic was now looking for the maximum of room for manoeuvre.

Serbia found it difficult to accept that it had almost no power in its autonomous provinces. This was especially true of Kosovo where Albanians accounted for 78% of its population in 1981 and 90%

¹⁷⁷ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 336-337.

¹⁷⁸ Magas, Destruction, p. 81.

¹⁷⁹ Also Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: a reassessment', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 55-56.

¹⁸⁰ Magas, Destruction, p. 70.

some ten years later. The rest of its people mainly comprised of Serbs. The Albanians in Kosovo regarded the 1974 Constitution as the first step towards an ethnically-pure state.¹⁸¹

In 1981 the Serbian authorities in Kosovo with the support of the Albanian Communists had already deployed a 30,000-strong special police force against the Albanians who were initially protesting against the dire economic situation. There were approximately ten deaths according to official sources (which did not always agree with each other). The Albanians put these figures at hundreds or even more than a thousand victims. The party leaders in Kosovo were purged; teachers and students from the university in the capital Pristina were removed. Over the next few years, this confrontation would lead to increasing turmoil in Kosovo where the Albanians found it difficult to forget this repression. This was also because a total of 6400 of the demonstrations' instigators and participants were convicted on the basis of false allegations, a process that was to continue for five years. Almost 600,000 Albanians were either arrested or interrogated between 1981 and 1989 so that as many as half of the adult population was directly involved.¹⁸² Despite the Albanians' harsh treatment, the Serbs continued to leave Kosovo: 100,000 left between 1980 and 1987. Their departure was mainly for economic reasons and was also to avoid Albanian harassment that included puncturing tyres and setting property on fire.

Serbs, both in Kosovo and beyond, were angered by the Albanians' arrogance so that the heated emotions of the Kosovan Serbs were to spread to other republics. There, non-Serbs regarded the Serbian repression in Kosovo as the writing on the wall. And indeed an increasing number of Serbian politicians, intellectuals and journalists watched the advancing decentralization of the State of Yugoslavia with regret because it was made at the expense of approximately three million Serbs who lived outside of the Republic of Serbia. Rankovic, the former head of the secret police, had advocated a powerful Yugoslav unity and a tough approach to the Kosovan Albanians. His death in 1983 prompted opposition to decentralization and an estimated 100,000 Serbs attended his funeral.

3. It's the economy, stupid

Meanwhile a decline in the Yugoslav economy was undermining political relations. As shown in the previous chapter, an important part of Yugoslavia's post-war economic affluence depended on financial support from the West that wanted Yugoslavia to maintain its position as a relatively independent state vis-à-vis the Communist bloc.

Tourism to the hospitable and relatively open Yugoslavia ensured an influx of currency. The number of foreign tourists who visited Yugoslavia between 1959 and 1967 had risen from 500,000 to 3600,000 with the resulting foreign currency growing from four-and-a-half million dollars to 133 million dollars.¹⁸³ Yugoslav migrant workers in Western Europe were subsequently responsible for an additional flow of money from abroad. There were as many as 800,000 of them in around 1970, a number that accounted for more than 10% of the home work force.¹⁸⁴ In 1971, these migrant workers sent 852 million dollars back home, a sum that was equal to 59% of the balance of trade's deficit of 1438 million dollars.¹⁸⁵

However, after the 1973 international oil crisis, there were wide-spread lay-offs of Yugoslav migrant workers, some of whom returned to Yugoslavia. The liquidity problem that this caused in Yugoslavia forced companies to repeatedly send employees home for long periods of time while the cost of living continued to rise. In addition, Yugoslavia was hit by the 1973 oil crisis in other ways. Although the country produced much of its energy through hydropower, 40% of its intensive deployment of energy still depended on foreign sources that mainly involved oil. The reaction to this

¹⁸¹ Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from Former Yugoslavia', Baehr/Baudet/Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, pp. 67 and 69.

¹⁸² Thompson, House, p. 128.

¹⁸³ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 82.

¹⁸⁴ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 165; Glenny, Balkans, p. 589; Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 329.

¹⁸⁵ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 94.

first energy crisis consisted of taking out more foreign loans. This financial support from abroad camouflaged a number of fundamental defects in the Yugoslav economy. These comprised of a lack of efficiency and the inability to adapt, a lack of technological innovation, low productivity, large-scale unemployment and major foreign debts. Unemployment had already reached 13.6% in 1978.¹⁸⁶ Although the gross national product increased by an average of 5.1% between 1970 and 1979, this growth was mainly due to foreign capital. During the same period, the country's debts were increasing by 20% each year.¹⁸⁷ The Yugoslav national debt amounted to 15 billion dollars in 1980, and a quarter of all foreign income was used to pay the interest on that debt.

The second oil crisis in 1979 threw the Yugoslav economy completely off balance. Although migrant workers sent some 1902 million dollars to their country, which was more than twice as much as ten years earlier, that sum was now equal to just 31% of the balance of trade deficit that had grown to 6086 million dollars.¹⁸⁸ The national debt would rapidly increase to 20 billion dollars and the value of the dinar would be decimated between 1979 and 1985. Food subsidies were cancelled in 1982 and a year later the prices of fuel, food and transport were to rise by a third. The import of all goods that were not necessary for home production was halted.

The republics were becoming increasingly self-sufficient within Yugoslavia through the 1974 Constitution's decentralization of political and economic power. The republics' leaders were able to take a great many independent fiscal and monetary measures. The fact that the republics' Communist leadership depended on the population's support meant that companies that were not economically viable were often bailed out even when more efficient equivalents existed elsewhere in Yugoslavia. Hence, employment opportunities were kept artificially high.

The separate republics, which were able to create and borrow money, had contributed to the country's growing debt because they did not feel responsible for national development. This debt was aggravated by Yugoslav society's low internal savings quota. This was the price that the country paid for its high level of consumption in comparison with other Eastern European countries. The republics' independent stance in terms of acquiring foreign loans had reached such an extreme in 1981 that the federal government found it necessary to ask foreign organizations to establish the extent of Yugoslavia's total foreign debt.

Yugoslavia encountered major difficulties when capital interest rates rose rapidly at the end of the 1970s. By 1982, the country was no longer able to fulfil its foreign financial obligations and the International Monetary Fund (the IMF), the World Bank and the Bank for International Settlements had to come to its aid. This restored the equilibrium in the balance of payments. However, the IMF had only agreed to help after the American Deputy Secretary of State, Lawrence Eagleburger, had found a consortium of private banks called 'the Friends of Yugoslavia' that was prepared to lend the country two billion dollars. At that point, Yugoslavia was still able to count on special treatment from the United States.

Economic growth continued to decline despite the IMF's rescue plan. Although Yugoslavia was once one of the most rapidly-developing countries in the world, in the 1980s the average growth of its national income was just 0.5%, the lowest percentage in the whole of Europe.¹⁸⁹ The standard of living fell drastically. The average income in 1988 was just 70% of what it had been in 1978.¹⁹⁰ Unemployment rose dramatically. It stood at 8% in relatively prosperous Slovenia in 1990, yet it was double that figure in Serbia in 1991 and had reached almost 40% in Kosovo. Social security provisions

¹⁸⁶ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 311.

¹⁸⁷ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 315.

¹⁸⁸ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 94.

¹⁸⁹ V. Bojicic, 'The Disintegration of Yugoslavia: Causes and Consequences of Dynamic Inefficiency in Semi-command Economics', Dyker/Vejvoda, Yugoslavia, p. 34.

¹⁹⁰ D.A. Dyker, 'The Degeneration of the Yugoslav Communist Party as a Managing Elite - a Familiar East European Story?', Dyker/Vejvoda, Yugoslavia, p. 57. Also Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 317.

had never been good and they now suffered from the high level of inflation.¹⁹¹ The number of people living below the poverty line grew between 1978 and 1989 from 3.4 million to 5.4 million, in other words: from 17.2% to 23.6% of the population.¹⁹² There was also spiralling inflation that had reached an annual level of as much as 2500% by December 1989.

Meanwhile there was a widening economic gap between the northern and the southern republics, and the cities and countryside. Economic reform was desperately needed but there was no effective mechanism at the federal level. Not only the constitutional stipulations but also the difference between the disadvantaged and the more affluent regions made it difficult to develop a common economic policy. The more advanced economies, such as Slovenia's, supported decentralization and the free market; the disadvantaged economies of Macedonia, Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina wanted centralization and a redistribution of incomes. The unwillingness to continue sending income to the less developed regions of Yugoslavia would ultimately be one of the reasons for the secession of Slovenia and Croatia at the beginning of the 1990s.

Moreover, right or wrongly, all the republics with the exception of Serbia would have immediately regarded any increase of federal power as involving the danger of Greater Serbian claims. Yugoslavism had failed for this very reason at the beginning of the 1960s and the developments of the 1980s in no way prompted a change of mind.

4. Consequences of the end of the Cold War

The shaky balance that arose in Yugoslavia in the 1980s was placed under extra pressure by the end of the Cold War during the decade's final years.

Back in the spring of 1984, American President Ronald Reagan had sent out a National Security Decision Directive stating that it was vital to the West that Yugoslavia should be independent, strong and stable in both economic and military terms. This directive also described Yugoslavia as being an important obstacle to the Soviet Union's expansion and hegemony, and that it could be held up as an example to other Eastern European countries in terms of the advantages that could be gained by having a more independent stance towards Moscow and closer links with the West.¹⁹³ However, after 1985 and the advent of Mikhail Gorbachov, the West lost much of its previous interest in Yugoslavia because of the improved relations between East and West. This meant that the supply of money to Yugoslavia was decreased. The West shifted its interests – and its money – to Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia, countries that seemed to be more successful at making the transition to a free market economy and a democratic system.

Yugoslavia, which had always been more open than the other Eastern European Communist countries, now began to experience the dialectics of progress. There was a certain smugness amongst much of Yugoslavia's elite and its general population concerning the regime's relative humanness, the degree to which the economy had diverged from the standard Communist solutions and the scale of relations with the West.¹⁹⁴ In addition, the opposition was disadvantaged when compared with its equivalents in other Communist countries that increasingly came to the forefront and ultimately took over power.

Despite his tolerance, Tito had made it impossible for the opposition to organize itself.¹⁹⁵ This meant that the social alternative that existed at a level between the state and its citizens was far less developed than elsewhere in Europe. The exception here was Kosovo, which had also been subjected to the most extreme repression. The relatively high degree of national acceptance of Communism ¹⁹¹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 192 and 194.

¹⁹² S. Radosevic, 'The Collapse of Yugoslavia - Between Chance and Necessity', Dyker/Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 72.

¹⁹³ National Security Decision Directive 133, 14/03/84, <http://www.fas.org/irp/offdocs/nsdd/23-2222t.gif> consulted 08/01/2001.

¹⁹⁴ Also Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 227.

¹⁹⁵ Also Levinsohn, Belgrade, pp. 42, 101.

would prevent Yugoslavia from changing. Moreover, in the second half of the 1980s, Yugoslavia had the additional handicap that the necessary economic reforms would have to be carried out by the existing Communist regime. Elsewhere in Eastern Europe, these changes were implemented by the governments that succeeded the Communists and where their people's initial trust enabled them to introduce unpopular economic measures.

The changing international constellation once again affected the West's readiness to support Yugoslavia both financially and economically. Up till the mid-1980s, Yugoslavia's non-aligned position meant that the West had been sparing with its criticism of the country's human rights violations.¹⁹⁶ The fear now was that too much criticism would drive Yugoslavia into Moscow's arms. Moreover, Tito had kept the ethnic groups under control and, in order to prevent Yugoslavia from seeking support from Moscow, the West did not want to be too judgmental about the methods that had been used. But Yugoslavia's human rights record was to play a considerable role after the mid-1980s, and the United States was to be particularly critical of the Serbs' harsh treatment of the Kosovan Albanians.

5. The rise of the 'ethnic entrepreneurs'

In an attempt to deflect attention away from their own problems or to justify claims in terms of other republics, the party elite in the various republics began to appeal increasingly to the ethnic awareness of their republic's majority. The more the security of Tito's welfare state disintegrated, the more ethnic nationalism seemed to be the solution for the many individuals who were not used to contributing independently to democratic decisions. Not only did it provide a form of safety, it could also act as a model of explanation so that adversity could be blamed on other ethnic groups or republics. The ratios between the ethnic groups in companies completely obsessed leaders at all levels in the different republics¹⁹⁷. This created a 'culture of paranoia'.¹⁹⁸

Data from sociological research indicates that the rural population had begun to define social issues in terms of ethnic antitheses even before the major economic problems of the 1970s and '80s. Whereas in the 1970s an overtly liberal pattern of values can be detected in the cities particularly amongst the intelligentsia, it is clear that traditional norms and values were still strongly represented amongst the peasants, agricultural workers and uneducated workers.¹⁹⁹ Here, there seems to have been a revival of traditional norms and values amongst sections of the Serbian population and this included a rediscovery of their own culture and history. This affected not only the rural population but also the city dwellers of rural origins. Rapid urbanization meant that a large proportion of the people living in the cities were just one generation away from their rural roots. These new city dwellers often lived in groups on the edges of the city where they maintained their rural way of living which is therefore defined as 'rurbanization'. They often encountered discrimination on the jobs market in terms of their background because their rural mentality had accompanied them to the city: 'Instead of the provinces becoming citified, the cities became countrified'.²⁰⁰ From the 1960s onwards, the rural population and the underlying city groups were involved in a reorientation towards traditional values and the history of their own ethnic group. This in turn created a breeding ground for nationalist ideologies that particular politicians and the Serbian intelligentsia only began to propagate in the 1980s.²⁰¹ Ethnic nationalism from the bottom upwards, which Tito had long kept under control, then encountered a nationalism

¹⁹⁶ Also Russell, Prejudice, p. 143; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 104.

¹⁹⁷ See, for instance, Carol J. Williams, 'Croatia's "Raving Nationalist" Now Seeks to Contain the Flames', Los Angeles Times, 30/10/90.

¹⁹⁸ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 97.

¹⁹⁹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp.204-205; Cohen, Serpent, p. 84.

²⁰⁰ Job, 'Furies', p. 67. See also Dimitrios Kyriakou, 'Civil Society and Civil War in Bosnia', in: Danopoulos/Zirker (eds.), Relations, pp. 243-245.

²⁰¹ Also supplement Naarden 2001, p. 80.

from the top downwards: ‘nomenclature nationalism’.²⁰² Research, which was carried out at the beginning of 1983 on behalf of Radio Free Europe, appears to confirm this and shows how some Communists warned the Party’s Central Committee about nationalist trends, particularly in Serbia where the Party was doing too little to counter them. The author added his own conclusion:

‘... [I]t is certainly true that large segments of the Serbian population are now undergoing a kind of nationalist feeling. It is also true that this new wave of nationalism is mainly concentrated on and emanates from the Serbian cultural scene: theaters, books, papers, periodicals and the provincial press. It should also be noted that the Serbian Orthodox Church, with its historically deep ties with the national idea, is playing an ever greater role in the latest development. Very recently, however, sparks of Serbian nationalism have begun to inflame broader strata of the population, youth in particular. Religious services and celebrations of religious events are being held more frequently and are better attended, books on national themes or about Serbian history are best sellers, young people are demonstrating en masse their Serbian national feelings in songs and national symbols.’²⁰³

It was illustrative that, according to the same research, rumours suggested that the author Dobrica Cosic, who was the cultural leader of Serbian nationalism, was the protégé of a number of Serbian Communist leaders who tried to revive Serbian nationalism for politically- opportune reasons.²⁰⁴ The embrace between ethnic nationalism from below and nomenclature nationalism was made all the stronger because politicians, thanks to their access to government money and their company links, could just keep on dividing the pie no matter how meagre the portions. Moreover, if they wanted, they could opt to favour their own ethnic group. In other words: they became ‘ethnic entrepreneurs’.²⁰⁵

²⁰² D.A. Dyker, ‘Introduction’, Dyker/Vejvoda, Yugoslavia, p. 3.

²⁰³ Antic, Danger, p. 3.

²⁰⁴ Ibidem, p. 5

²⁰⁵ The term is used in connection with Yugoslavia by Jill A. Irvine, ‘Introduction: State-Society Relations in Yugoslavia, 1945-1992’, in: Bokovoy/Irvine/Lilly (eds.), Relations, p. 13. There is a further description of the role played by the ethnic entrepreneurs in ethnic conflicts in Milton J. Esman/Shibley Telhami, ‘Introduction’, in: Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 10: ‘Perceived slights or threats from outsiders can generate powerful collective reactions, which can be mobilized and politicized by ethnic entrepreneurs who are motivated partly by genuine concern for their people and partly by a desire to build a constituency in pursuit of personal political ambitions. Ethnic entrepreneurs precipitate conflict by politicizing collective identity, that is, by dramatizing grievances or threats to common interests or by pointing out opportunities to promote and further such interests by organized action. These competitive interests may run the gamut from control of territory to eligibility for citizenship and the exercise of political rights, from official recognition of language to the status of religion, from access to education to opportunities for employment, landownership, business enterprise, and the distribution of government investments and public services.’

Chapter 4

Yugoslavia during the Serbian presidency of Slobodan Milosevic

‘If there was a single cause of the war, it was the expansionist nationalism Milosevic employed to propel himself up the greasy pole of Serbian politics.’²⁰⁶

‘I have no doubt that if Milosevic’s parents had committed suicide before his birth rather than after, I would not be writing a cable about the death of Yugoslavia.’²⁰⁷

Much to their frustration, the Serbs in Kosovo realized that the level of autonomy granted to their province by the 1974 Constitution made it virtually impossible to protect their rights. The Republic of Serbia, of which Kosovo was a part, could not ensure these rights and the federal authority was unable to intervene. The constant ‘emigration’ of Serbs from Kosovo caused great concern amongst the Serbian party leadership in Belgrade. From 1981 onwards, there was so much press coverage of the fate of the Kosovan Serbs that even such a well-informed author as Paul Shoup was surprised that the Serbian leadership had only adopted a truly nationalist course with the advent of Slobodan Milosevic.

Yugoslavia was the only state where all the Serbs were able to live together. As the disintegration of Yugoslavia took hold and the Serbian nation wished to remain united, there were just three options from their perspective: a radical about-turn from the path of disintegration through democratic reform and the guaranteed protection of minority rights; an about-turn from the path of disintegration by means of violence; or the creation of a Greater Serbia to which parts of other republics with a Serbian majority would be added.

In terms of the first option, it is never easy to make concessions that adversely affect your position of power and, as we have already seen, there was clearly no tradition of this in Communist Yugoslavia. Moreover, at that time all the leaders of the Eastern European Communist Parties realized that democratic reform, as implemented by Gorbachev in the Soviet Union, not only greatly damaged the Communist Party’s power but also set off centrifugal forces. That meant that there were only two alternatives left.

1. Intellectuals play the nationalist card

Serbian intellectuals assumed their responsibility in this situation.²⁰⁸ They were no longer asking for democratic freedom but appeared to opt for a combination of the second and third alternatives, in other words: they cherished Greater Serbian aspirations and these would have to be achieved through violence. More punitive actions needed to be taken against groups that they felt formed an obstacle to Serbian ambitions. A stream of publications was brought out about the threat that the Kosovar Albanians constituted for the Serbs, whose rights were the most ancient because Kosovo, with its monasteries and the Battle of Kosovo, was the cradle of Serbian civilization. Writers did not baulk at ²⁰⁶ Major, Autobiography, p. 534. Italics as in the original text.

²⁰⁷ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 251.

²⁰⁸ For a justification of the Serbian intellectuals’ lifesaver attitude, see: Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 19-20. For a discussion of what he feels to be the Serbian intellectuals’ traditional pattern of expectation, i.e. the justifying of historical, territorial claims, see: Willem Vermeer, ‘Albanians and Serbs in Yugoslavia’, Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 103-105. For the veneration of intellectuals by less developed sections of the Serbian population, see: Job, Furies, pp. 67-68 the task at hand. Serbian literature had a long tradition that combined the heroism and the victimization of both the people and its leaders. In this nationalist genre, the individual was subsumed into his ethnic-national identity: the individual was primarily, for instance, a Serb or Croat, or a ‘Turk’ as nationalist Serbs used to refer to Muslims.

On 21 January 1986, 212 prominent Serbian intellectuals, orthodox priests and former army officers set the tone of the political debate of the following years with the publication of a petition called ‘Against the Persecution of the Serbs in Kosovo’.²⁰⁹ The signatories demanded an end to the ‘genocide’ of Serbs which referred to the Albanian harassment and the exodus of Serbs from Kosovo. Old women and nuns had allegedly been raped and children had been beaten up in the name of an ‘ethnically-pure Kosovo’. The extent of the Albanians’ crimes against the Serbs would be proved by the Djordje Martinovic Case. On 1 May 1985, Martinovic, a Serbian peasant, was found more dead than alive in his field in Kosovo with a beer bottle in his hand. Some people swore that it was the work of the Kosovan Albanians. Research would later prove that the man had most probably fallen on the bottle on purpose. Nonetheless, the Martinovic Case would obsess the Serbian press and public for months and even years. Some people argued that the man had a sexual aberration but the case was mostly presented as ‘proof’ of the perversities that the Albanians inflicted on the Serbs. The successful publicity of this case spawned the feeling amongst the Serbian press that, after years of Communist manipulation, it could now ply the people with nationalism. The petition’s signatories were outraged by this case. They argued that it was difficult to imagine a more heinous crime. They felt that the fact that the Communist regime appeared not to take the case seriously should have confused international public opinion that appeared to be more concerned about the genocide of the persecutors (the Albanians) than about the fate of the persecuted (the Serbs). The drift of the nationalist reporting was that the autonomy of Kosovo and also Vojvodina should be immediately abolished and that even more radical changes would be subsequently needed throughout Yugoslavia.

These statements about the genocide and rape of Serbs were widely circulated over the next few years and were used by the Serbian elite to launch a psychological war so as to create the idea amongst the Serbian population that their continued existence was at stake and that repressive actions against the Albanians were justified.²¹⁰ No one took any notice of the information that there was no question of Albanians committing ethnically-motivated murders and rapes against Serbs, and that the percentage of rapes in Serbia, excluding the autonomous areas of Kosovo and Vojvodina, was in fact higher than in Kosovo.²¹¹ A few months after the petition’s publication, the Serbian government stipulated that ordinary crimes would henceforth be treated as crimes against the state whenever the perpetrator came from a different ethnic background than the victim. This legislation was particularly aimed at Kosovo.²¹²

Back in 1985, the Serbian Academy of Sciences and Arts had set up a committee that was to prepare a memorandum about both the political, social, economic and moral crisis in Yugoslavia and Serbia’s political status. The Memorandum was published on 24 and 25 September 1986 in the Belgrade daily newspaper Vecernje Novosti. Up till that point it had been an unofficial and incomplete document that had only been distributed within limited circles.²¹³ The manifesto combined what in some ways was a correct analysis of the problems with a solution that would only increase them. The Memorandum blamed the economic stagnation on the economic policy’s subordination to the disintegrating regional power monopolies of the republican and provincial leaders instead of blaming it either on the central ²⁰⁹ Magas, Destruction, pp. 49-52.

²¹⁰ Also Ugresic, Cultura, pp. 101-102.

²¹¹ Magas, Destruction, pp. 61-62.

²¹² Magas, Destruction, pp. 55 and 62.

²¹³ On 1 February 1989, the memorandum was published in Nase teme, no. 33, pp. 182-263; in June 1989, it appeared as a special publication of the Belgrade magazine Duga in Belgrade. Finally it was formally published on 23 April 1993. For an official English-language version, see: Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum.

plan or on market forces or on workers' self-rule.²¹⁴ The Memorandum also argued that the trend towards a confederation no longer suited the present circumstances. This trend was the consequence of the much-criticized 1974 Constitution that had created a constant political impasse due to the requirement of a consensus decision-making process. This same demand made it impossible to alter the constitution.

The Memorandum emphasized that, following the Comintern, Tito and Kardelj had attached too much value to the national issue of non-Serbs.²¹⁵ It argued that it was no coincidence that these two pivotal figures were of Croatian and Slovenian origins. After the Second World War, they had constantly treated Serbia and the Serbs in an adverse way in accordance with the motto that a weak Serbia meant a strong Yugoslavia. Serbia was the victim of an anti-Serbian coalition of the other republics that even allowed a 'physical, political, legal and cultural genocide'²¹⁶ to be committed against the Serbs by the Albanians whose goal was an 'ethnically-pure' Kosovo.²¹⁷ The Serbs had never been so threatened in Croatia, apart from during Pavelic's Fascist state.²¹⁸ Moreover, the Serbs' cultural heritage was kicked around more than that of any other ethnic group in Yugoslavia.²¹⁹

The Memorandum argued for the following measures: Yugoslavia's recentralization; political transparency and participation at all levels of the decision-making process; an open, democratic decision-making process and freedom of speech.²²⁰ The principles that the Memorandum presented sounded lofty: 'Any form of political repression or discrimination on ethnic grounds in modern, civilized society is unacceptable.'²²¹ However, these principles mainly involved the Serbs as victims. According to the Memorandum's authors, they were disadvantaged when compared with Yugoslavia's other ethnic groups because less money was being invested in Serbia, the Serbs did not have their own state ('it is impossible to imagine a worse defeat in peace time')²²² and they were being seriously oppressed outside of Serbia.²²³ By contrast, Slovenia and Croatia had benefited from Tito's economic policy.

Therefore, the Memorandum stated that Serbia would be justified in no longer contributing to the federal funds for underdeveloped areas of Yugoslavia, and it condemned the Serbian leaders who had agreed to these payments by not even exercising their right to veto: 'the Serbian leaders were not ready for the historical task that was facing them as a consequence of the extremely adverse internal relations within the state of Yugoslavia'. The time to say 'no' to Serbia's humiliation had come.²²⁴

The Memorandum argued that Kosovo and Vojvodina had to be integrated once again into the Republic of Serbia. Here too, the Serbian leaders had been overly defensive and timid.²²⁵ The issue of the Serbs in Croatia also had to be solved because otherwise 'the consequences will be disastrous not only for Croatia but for the whole of Yugoslavia.'²²⁶

The Memorandum remained vague about the political future apart from the two provinces' reintegration into the Republic of Serbia. Its point of departure was that: 'the establishing of the complete national and cultural integrity of the Serbian people is their historical and democratic right, no matter which republic or province they may live in.'²²⁷ It appeared that the Memorandum did not ²¹⁴ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 102-103.

²¹⁵ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 106-107.

²¹⁶ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 128.

²¹⁷ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 129 and 130.

²¹⁸ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 133.

²¹⁹ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 134-135.

²²⁰ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 106-110, 117.

²²¹ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 117.

²²² Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 127.

²²³ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, pp. 118-119.

²²⁴ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 125.

²²⁵ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 128.

²²⁶ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 133.

²²⁷ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 138.

exclude a federal solution. But Serbia would clearly have to emphasize its national interests in the preparations for a revision to the 1974 Constitution. It should not hold back this time. The Republic of Yugoslavia would be endangered if Serbia and the Serbs did not achieve their goal of a status that was equal to that of the other republics and ethnic groups.²²⁸ Hence, this document meant that the Belgrade intelligentsia had rejected a federal Yugoslavia as being the best solution for the Serbs; the other republics would just have to guess at what this would mean for them. In no uncertain terms, the manifesto confronted the official ideology of Yugoslavia as being in all respects superior to the rest of the world with its wretched reality.²²⁹

The Serbian Communist Party reacted by trying to push the nationalist genie back into the bottle. It let it be known that there was no need for forces other than itself to indicate the social situation and, moreover, to teach its leaders a lesson. Hence, the Memorandum was endangering the Party's ideological hegemony while the leaders of the other republics could accuse the Serbian leaders of 'not having their own house in order' by having failed to thwart such expressions of nationalism. Probably the other republics would have reacted to the Memorandum by opposing the call for constitutional reform that threatened their autonomy. For that reason, the Serbian Communist Party immediately condemned the Memorandum but it was clearly an omen that the manifesto was extremely popular amongst other Serbs.

The Memorandum and similar writings meant that the Serbian intelligentsia had assumed a heavy responsibility. 'The original call to upgrade Serbian power within the Yugoslav federation, which would irrevocably lead to war, came not from the leaders, not from the people but from the thinkers', writes Frank Westerman.²³⁰ 'As the vanguard and the conscience of the people, illustrious writers and scholars had cried *'en garde!'*²³¹ Even if, as we have already seen, the intelligentsia was in fact the interpreter of feelings that existed amongst wider levels of the population rather than their inventor, the Memorandum succeeded in creating a platform and a legitimization of Serbian nationalist ideas.

2. The rise of Slobodan Milosevic

In fact, the Memorandum constituted the ideological starting point for Slobodan Milosevic, who shortly before its publication had become the chairman of the Central Committee of the Serbian Communist Party. Up till then, Milosevic had been an intelligent if colourless party bureaucrat who did not seem destined for a major political future. He was born on 29 August 1941 in Pozarevac, a Serbian provincial city some 100 kilometres to the south-east of Belgrade. His mother Stanislava was a teacher and a dedicated member of the Communist Party. His father Svetozar, an Orthodox priest from Montenegro, taught Russian and Serbo-Croat literature and language at the local secondary school. Slobodan's parents divorced in 1950 after which he and his elder brother were brought up by their mother. What the parents had in common was depression. His father finally committed suicide when Milosevic was 21; his mother followed suit some 12 years later. Slobodan was an exemplary pupil at school but did not become involved in, for instance, sports. Milosevic's youth must have been an unhappy one and many have looked there for the roots of his subsequent chilly political conduct and ²²⁸ Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 140.

²²⁹ See, in particular: Mihailovic/Krestic, Memorandum, p. 116.

²³⁰ Westerman, Brug, p. 118.

²³¹ Westerman, Brug, p. 129. Also Karahasan, Sarajevo, p. 76: '... the leaders of the Serbian nationalist parties who have destroyed Yugoslavia and plunged the country into war, are almost without exception writers and professors of literature.' Compare 'Intellektuelle Väter der serbischen Expansion', FAZ, 13/09/92; Blagojevic/Demirovic, Bloedverwanten, pp. 11, 23 and 65; Slapsak, Joegoslavië, pp. 69 and 73.

his lack of empathy.²³² His fellow students nicknamed him Little Lenin because of his emotionless behaviour.²³³

Milosevic seems never to have had friends apart from his self-assured wife Mirjana (Mira) Markovic, with whom the introverted Slobodan began a close friendship during the fourth year of the Pozarevac secondary school.²³⁴ Their relationship was both inward looking and deeply involved. Both were members of the Communist Party. Mirjana, who was the child of Communist Party aristocracy and had a reputation as an ideological quibbler, constantly pushed her Slobodan up the social ladder and into the Party.

Mirjana Markovic was helped in designing her husband's career by Ivan Stambolic, who was five years older and had met Slobodan Milosevic as a student. Ivan Stambolic, who was the nephew of one of Yugoslavia's most important Communists, Petar Stambolic, acted as Milosevic's older brother and political mentor. He continued to fulfil this role after Slobodan had graduated in law from the University of Belgrade in 1964. Each time Stambolic left a particular post, he would bequeath the vacancy to Milosevic. Hence, after several lowly jobs at Belgrade City Council, Milosevic worked at the Tehnogas power company between 1970 and 1978, first as an assistant director and later as the director. When Stambolic became the chairman of the Belgrade Chamber of Commerce in 1978, he ensured that Milosevic become the director of Udružena Beogradska Banka. Stambolic's pupil then learned English and frequently visited the United States with which he developed a love-hate relationship.²³⁵ At that time Milosevic was known as an economic liberal.²³⁶ In 1982, Stambolic arranged for Milosevic to be included in the Serbian Communist Party presidium.

When Stambolic became the head of the Communist Party in Serbia in 1984, Milosevic followed him as the chief of the Communist Party in Belgrade. In this capacity, Milosevic distinguished himself with his fierce attacks on dissident intellectuals along with his opposition to any form of liberalization and his tough actions against expressions of Serbian nationalism. Two years later, in 1986, Milosevic again followed Stambolic and now became the chairman of the Serbian Communist Party after Stambolic had recommended him as a man who 'can organize and take action but can't make long speeches'.²³⁷ Stambolic had now become President of Serbia.

In June 1987, Milosevic still condemned the Serbian Academy's Memorandum as being 'the purest kind of nationalism. It means the liquidation of the Socialist system, in other words: our country's complete collapse.'²³⁸ However, there was a noticeable difference between the hard criticism of the Memorandum that Milosevic expressed behind closed doors, and the wishy-washy way in which he rejected it in public.²³⁹ Shortly afterwards, the Memorandum was to become the ideological basis, if not the grand design of Milosevic's politics.

Milosevic's conversion to Serbian nationalism: 'no one may beat this people'

Milosevic's political about-turn had already begun in the spring of 1987 during a visit to Kosovo Polje, where the illustrious Battle of Kosovo had taken place. He had been sent there by Stambolic who had warned him of the extreme nationalism that he would confront there. Indeed, Stambolic was aware of a growing Serbian nationalism, particularly in relation to Kosovo. However, he continued to argue for a ²³² See, for instance: Westerman, Brug, p. 105; Yael Vinckx, 'Emotieloze "Kleine Lenin"', NRC Handelsblad, 06/10/00; Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 5; idem, Origins, p. 24.

²³³ Yael Vinckx, 'Emotieloze "Kleine Lenin"', NRC Handelsblad, 06/10/00. According to Cohen, Serpent, p. 56 Milosevic acquired this nickname when he was the party chief of Belgrade.

²³⁴ For information about Mirjana Markovic see, for instance: Bart Rijs, 'De vrouw achter president Milosevic', HP/De Tijd, 30/04/93, pp. 14-15.

²³⁵ See, for instance: the interview by Carl Bildt, 13/12/00; Cohen, Serpent, p. 50.

²³⁶ Westerman, Brug, p. 106; Cohen, Serpent, p. 50.

²³⁷ Meier, Jugoslawien, pp. 72-73.

²³⁸ Westerman, Brug, p. 108.

²³⁹ Lenard J. Cohen, 'Slobodan Milosevic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, pp. 237-238.

‘constantly militant position towards the nationalist poisoning of youth’.²⁴⁰ During a visit to Kosovo Polje in April 1986, he himself had taken a powerful stand against the Serbian ‘paranoia’ and ‘disinformation’ vis-à-vis the Albanians.²⁴¹ Hence, Milosevic seemed to be following the line that his master had set out for him.

When Milosevic arrived by train at Kosovo Polje on 24 April 1987, there was a demonstration of 15,000 Serbs who were protesting against the behaviour of the ethnic Albanians. While Milosevic consulted the Communist leaders in the local house of culture, the Serbs threatened to storm the building. The police, who mainly consisted of Albanians, dealt with the crowd harshly. When Milosevic went outside to try to calm the crowd, a number of demonstrators complained to him about the actions of the police. Then Milosevic uttered the sentence of which he was soon to understand the enchantment: ‘Ovaj narod niko ne sme da bije – No one may beat this people.’ He then invited a delegation of demonstrators for discussions at the house of culture that were to last for 12 hours and produced a list of complaints about the Serbs’ position in Kosovo.

It seemed to be a spontaneous event but appearances can be deceptive. Few people realized that Milosevic had already been in Kosovo Polje four days earlier when there was a much smaller demonstration of 2000 Serbs. Here, Milosevic was told that the Serbs were no longer interested in the Communist leaders’ monologues which they were all too familiar with. Milosevic allowed himself to be persuaded to return several days later for talks. The major demonstration for 24 April was orchestrated in the days between the two visits.²⁴² This initial experience of the organization of a demonstration to support his politics was much to Milosevic’s liking. His political comrades at the state television station ensured that, through constant repetition, his words were soon known throughout Serbia.²⁴³ Other Serbian media also reacted enthusiastically.

With this one small sentence, Milosevic had broken the taboo that had existed since 1945 against any public expression of nationalism and ethnic antitheses. Ethnic nationalism had replaced the ideology of brotherhood and unity. Milosevic ‘went to Kosovo Polje as a Communist and came back as a Serb’ was how his biographer Slavoljub Djukic described these events which he witnessed in person.²⁴⁴ At the beginning of the Communist government shortly after the Second World War, it was believed that nationalism would automatically disappear, yet one of its top men was to embrace nationalism in its most extreme form at what was to be the end of both Yugoslavia and its government.

Yet the transition from Communism to nationalism was not such a big one for Milosevic who was a power-hungry tactician with no ideals apart from his own interests. Like so many others, he had not embraced Communism primarily as an ideology but as a means of obtaining and retaining power. It was true of both Milosevic and his followers within the Communist Party that: ‘the opportunism that made them Communists in the Tito era led them to embrace ethnic nationalism thereafter.’²⁴⁵ This about-turn was not only an act of opportunism but also of ‘political cannibalism’ where the opponent, Serbian nationalism, was devoured, but its spirit was later to take possession of the eater.²⁴⁶

Moreover, since the 1974 Constitution, all the leaders of the Yugoslav republics had become nationalist to some degree even if initially it was primarily in an economic sense. Once it had become obvious that Communism had lost both its vitality and its capacity to solve the problems of Yugoslavia’s political organization and economy, those searching for an answer for the present would have to look either to the future or to the past. The past was the only way open to the Communists

²⁴⁰ Quoted in Lenard J. Cohen, ‘Slobodan Milosevic’, in: Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 235. For his powerful position against nationalism, see also: Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 339.

²⁴¹ Lenard J. Cohen, ‘Slobodan Milosevic’, in: Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 236; idem, Serpent, p. 57.

²⁴² For this version of events, see: Silber/Little, Death, p. 39; Cohen, Serpent, p. 62; Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 23-26 and pp. 33-34.

²⁴³ Silber/Little, Death, p. 39.

²⁴⁴ Djukic, quoted in Westerman, Brug, p. 110.

²⁴⁵ Newland, Conflict, p. 95.

²⁴⁶ Djilas, Profile, p. 87.

who refused to implement the reforms that the West would have liked to have seen. Up till then, Communism's legitimacy was based on the past of the Second World War. If one broke with this, it would be necessary to look further back in time. Those who were familiar with Yugoslavia's history knew that the nationalism of the previous two centuries was the only ideological force apart from Communism that had succeeded in mobilizing the masses.

As a top Serbian politician, Milosevic set the tone with his blatant transition to nationalism. The Communist system with its power over the media and the police had created a situation where just one man could make such a difference. The system, which was so strongly based on collectivism, actually provided a great deal of space for the individual's will and objectives. Tito knew it and Milosevic had begun to understand it. Milosevic, the man who was never known to have friends or advisors, who never discussed strategy or tactics (except with his own wife²⁴⁷), who had always been a loner right since his youth and was a poor speaker, had suddenly discovered the electrifying effect of the contact between him, the leader, and the Serbian people.²⁴⁸

3. The end of the 1980s: precursors of a new ethnic conflict in Yugoslavia

In essence, ethnic conflict is based on the following four conditions:

- a serious economic crisis combined with mutual changes for the various ethnic groups in the access to the sources of wealth;
- a disintegration of the state combined with an altered and unequal access to power;
- a collapse of the common culture;
- the exploitation of mutual fear.²⁴⁹

The meaning of the words 'no one may beat this people' partly implied that Milosevic had placed the Serbs in Yugoslavia above the law. Hence, Milosevic had added the third ingredient for ethnic conflict, a collapse of the common culture that had been based on a fragile balance of ethnic pluralism. The first two conditions had already been fulfilled in Yugoslavia.

All that was left was the fourth condition: the conscious and large-scale exploitation of mutual ethnic tensions. As demonstrated, the nationalists included in their number both the authors of the Memorandum and a section of the intelligentsia along with those living in the countryside and city migrants. Milosevic had to travel from Belgrade to Kosovo Polje to discover the extent of the nationalist breeding ground. Now he had to make sure that the nationalist vision of both the past and the present would be able to press ahead against other possible views.

The fact that there were people who could be used, who were not allies or partners but instruments that could be thrown away at will, appealed to Milosevic's cynicism because he was a man without qualities, vision and policy apart from a hunger for power. He was in fact 'the amoeba in power'.²⁵⁰ A section of the people that was not schooled in the subtleties of democracy but was brought up with a Communism that was constantly searching for front positions found it easy to make the transition to nationalism. One collectivist ideology was simply exchanged for another.

Milosevic was happy to exploit the fact that Yugoslav Communism had always had enemies not only abroad but also at home. His political language was drenched with such terms as 'counter-revolutionary', 'Stalinists', 'Cominform supporters', 'koelaks', 'bourgeois liberals', 'Greater Serbian hegemonists', 'anarcho-liberalists', 'anti-Communist reactionaries' and 'techno-managers'. As late as

²⁴⁷ Also Westerman, Brug, p. 130.

²⁴⁸ Also Ramet, Milosevic, p. 95.

²⁴⁹ Maarten Kuitenbrouwer, 'Ethnic Conflicts and Human Rights: Multidisciplinary and Interdisciplinary Perspectives', Baehr/Baudet/Werdmöller (eds.), Rights, pp. 15 and 17; Joost Herman, 'Intergovernmental Organisations and Ethnic Conflicts', ibidem, pp. 27-29.

²⁵⁰ Westerman, Brug, p. 117. See also: Djukic quoted in Gutman, Witness, p. 18; Olaf Tempelman, 'Milosevic' succes wordt nu zijn ondergang', De Volkskrant 27/09/00; Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 24-25.

1984, party chairman Stipe Suvar had drawn up a white list of enemies that was so long that any self-respecting intellectual felt insulted if he was left out.²⁵¹ This old image of enemies was easy to replace with the new one.²⁵² The new enemy was called Albanian, Croat or Muslim and could be the man or the woman next door. Milosevic now set his sights on again subjecting the autonomous republics of Kosovo and Vojvodina to direct Serbian government. But the constitution stipulated that this required the other republics' unanimous agreement.

But before Milosevic could press ahead on a national level, he first had to strengthen his power position within his own party. At that point there were two groups within the Serbian Communist Party: a reform movement under Stambolic's leadership that was prepared to resign if elections changed the regime, and the group led by Milosevic that had no qualms about diverting attention away from the political debate about reform by exaggerating anti-Serbian ethnic nationalist threats and by provoking ethnic conflict. In this way, Milosevic's group hoped to counter the loss of power that would be the consequence of free elections.

Hence, as an ethnic nationalist, Milosevic was now opposing his master Stambolic who had allowed space for reformers. Stambolic tried in vain to control his sorcerer's apprentice. He realized that his pupil, who had followed him for so many years, now wanted to stab him the back.²⁵³ Nonetheless he seemed to be virtually paralysed by these events and incapable of defending himself against the crude methods that Milosevic used to commit political patricide. In the past, Stambolic had consistently refused to listen to warnings about Milosevic's ambitious nature. He was not unaware of Milosevic's unpleasant side and shortcomings, but he felt that his positive qualities were the decisive factor.²⁵⁴ It was from a paternalist magnanimity that he provided Milosevic with the space to develop.²⁵⁵ He had quarrelled with him in the past about Milosevic's appointment of people whom he found disagreeable, but for a long time he had believed that these decisions were the result of political inexperience.²⁵⁶ It was already too late when Stambolic finally realized that Milosevic was after his position. For a quarter of a century, Stambolic had praised Milosevic to everyone who would listen. To admit that Milosevic was the wrong man would be at the cost of Stambolic's own credibility. Having promoted Milosevic for many years, he now realized that he had become the victim of his own patronage.²⁵⁷ During the eighth session of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia in September 1987, Milosevic and his supporters with their nationalist program defeated Stambolic's more liberal faction which they blamed for not fighting hard enough for Serbia's interests within the Yugoslav federation. Some months later, in December 1987, Milosevic replaced Stambolic as the chairman of the presidium of the Serbian Communist Party.

The leaders of the other republics immediately drew their own conclusions about this political patricide. 'It was an obvious sign to us that this could happen to anyone who worked with Milosevic in the future ...', remarked Milan Kucan, who led the Slovenian Communist Party from 1986 and often encountered Milosevic in that capacity.²⁵⁸ For that matter, working with Milosevic was already an unappealing prospect for leaders from other areas.

With Stambolic out of the running, Milosevic undertook the next phase of his program. He attempted to oust the current Communist leadership in several areas by means of an 'anti-bureaucratic revolution'. To achieve this, he set up a number of mass organizations such as the Committee for the Protection of the Serbs and Montenegrins in Kosovo. Large-scale 'solidarity gatherings' and 'truth ²⁵¹ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 77.

²⁵² Also Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: A reassessment', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 61.

²⁵³ Silber/Little, Death, p. 45.

²⁵⁴ Stambolic, Put, p. 101, 135 and 139.

²⁵⁵ Stambolic, Put, p. 140 and 159.

²⁵⁶ Stambolic, Put, p. 158 and 160.

²⁵⁷ Stambolic, Put, p. 160-162.

²⁵⁸ Stephen Engelberg, 'Carving Out a Greater Serbia', The New York Times, 01/09/91.

meetings' of Serbs attempted to pressurize the party executives of Kosovo, Vojvodina and Montenegro into resigning. The aim of this was to subordinate these areas to Serbian interests and to shore up Milosevic's long-term power position. These gatherings mobilized hundreds of thousands of Serbs who, through Milosevic's organization of politics by means of the street, felt that finally here was a Communist who, in their eyes, did not represent the arrogant, urban elite that had refused to listen to them for so many years. For them, his populist nationalism was a new and welcome form of political participation at a time full of economic uncertainties. In 1988, an estimated four million demonstrators took to the streets in a country where not so long ago expressions of protest resulted in the certain intervention of the feared secret police.²⁵⁹

At the same time, Milosevic responded to the Memorandum's call for recentralization through his actions against the regional bureaucracies. On 6 October 1988, Milosevic succeeded in getting 100,000 people out onto the streets of Novi Sad, the capital of Vojvodina, so that the province's party leadership was forced to resign. He subsequently installed his own people. In January 1989, he achieved the same result through a mass meeting in Titograd which was the current name of the Montenegrin capital of Podgorica. This was a signal to the other republics that Milosevic was not content simply with the restoration of Serbia's power over its autonomous republics and that his desire would continue to expand.²⁶⁰

The federal leadership wanted Milosevic to withdraw his actions but did not have the power to force him. The Yugoslav People's Army, the JNA, also did not intervene. An action in March 1989 resulted in an official death toll of 22 Albanians and two police; this followed months of Serbian pressure to place the Kosovan government under Milosevic's control and was supported by both the police and the army. Threatened with the deployment of military government, the Kosovan Parliament no longer resisted the constitutional changes that would abolish the province's autonomy. Shortly afterwards, on 28 March 1989, the Serbian parliament accepted a new Serbian constitution that largely reversed the high level of autonomy that had been granted to both Vojvodina and Kosovo in 1974. The two areas did retain a separate seat in the collective state presidium. However, from then on it was clear that they could only voice the same opinions as the representative of Serbia.

This take-over meant that the Serbian party leader Slobodan Milosevic now had control over four of the eight votes in the federal presidium: those of Serbia, Kosovo, Vojvodina and Montenegro. Hence, the fragile balance that Tito had tried to maintain by granting equal status to the six republics and two provinces had been destroyed forever. Votes of four against four were now inevitable. Moreover, the four other republics of Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia were also threatened by mass demonstrations of Serbs within their own territory that were not only protests against bureaucracy but were also displays of Serbian nationalism.

Resistance against Serbian nationalism in Slovenia

Milosevic also wanted to organize a 'truth meeting' where Serbs would denounce what had happened to their brothers in Kosovo.

Slovenia had occupied a special place in Yugoslavia for quite some time. Only a very small number of Serbs lived there. It was also the most economically successful area in Eastern Europe but it did not escape the general Yugoslav malaise of the 1980s. In 1978, the average purchasing power of wages in Slovenia still amounted to 80% of those in Austria; ten years later, in 1988, this had fallen to just 45%.²⁶¹ Consequently, Slovenia became progressively less willing to let itself be dragged along by Yugoslavia. Opinion polls at the beginning of the 1970s revealed that nationalism was a stronger force in Slovenia than in the other republics. Polls in the 1980s also showed that there was a more developed belief in democracy amongst Slovenes than elsewhere in Yugoslavia.²⁶² Nonetheless, after many years, Slovenia still retained a dogmatic party leadership. It was only in April 1986 that the Communist Party was taken over by the liberal wing under the command of Milan Kucan so that the conservatives were finally pushed into the background. This take-over was influenced by the increasing irritation concerning the Serbian actions in Kosovo, although elements of snobbery and gloating over the Serbs certainly played a role in the Slovenian attitude to Kosovo.²⁶³ There are even indications that Slovenian nationalists were using the Kosovo issue for their own ends.²⁶⁴

²⁵⁹ Cohen, Bonds, pp. 45-46.

²⁶⁰ Also Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 155.

²⁶¹ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 130.

A liberal climate developed under the leadership of party chairman Milan Kucan. This resulted in an increasing number of political taboos being broken by the independent station Radio Student and the Communist youth organization's publication Mladina. In February 1987, the Slovenian magazine Nova revija published a special issue that was devoted to the 'Slovenian national program' and included complaints about the neglect of the Slovenian language and demands for still more autonomy. The existence of Yugoslavia was not discussed as such. However, more space had to be created for the development of democratic relations and the extending of Slovenia's 'European' sides. This program was regarded as being the Slovenian answer to the Serbian Memorandum. Significantly, whereas at that point the Serbian leadership still distanced itself from the Memorandum, the same was not true of Kucan's relation with the nationalist program in Slovenia.²⁶⁵ Indeed, it was a sign that a nationalist trend was accepted earlier amongst the Slovenian elite than in Serbia. There was an increasing number of articles in Mladina that found fault with the JNA although the constitution forbade any criticism of the army.²⁶⁶ There was also a growing number of rumours that the JNA wanted to resort to violence in order to counter the liberal climate in Slovenia.²⁶⁷

At the beginning of 1988, Mladina published an article that was based on a number of secret documents that included the names of prominent Slovenians who were to be arrested in the event of a state of emergency. Consequently, the federal army detained the editor-in-chief, two journalists and the person who had provided the documents. The Slovenian public was outraged, particularly when the military court decided that, although the sessions took place in Slovenia, they would be held in Serbo-Croat. The JNA's attempt to force Slovenia back into the old framework had the effect of a boomerang. This case greatly influenced the continuing development of nationalist awareness in Slovenia. A demonstration of 40,000 people took place in Ljubljana on 22 June 1988; it was the biggest in Slovenia since World War Two. The hastily-established Committee for the Protection of Human Rights (Odbor) soon collected a petition of 100,000 signatures on behalf of the four detainees. The Slovenes then opted en masse for the path of democracy. Suddenly, new political parties were set up in the wake of Odbor that were soon demanding a Western-style constitution. According to an opinion poll in July 1988, 63% of the Slovenian population supported a form of independence.²⁶⁸ Meanwhile, the four accused were condemned to relatively mild prison sentences that varied between five months and four years. From then on, the JNA was jeeringly referred to in Slovenia as the 'occupying army'.

The role of the JNA in Slovenia

The JNA deeply regretted Yugoslavia's disintegration, a situation that was the most advanced in Slovenia. It was not easy for the federal army to define its position in this increasing political chaos.

²⁶² Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: a reassessment', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 63-64.

²⁶³ Paul Shoup, 'Titoism and the national question in Yugoslavia: a reassessment', Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 62 and 64-65.

²⁶⁴ Dimtrij Rupel, who became the Minister of Foreign Affairs in April 1990, admitted at a conference in Berlin in March 1992 that the Slovenian nationalists had indeed done this, Woodward, Tragedy, p. 440, n. 32.

²⁶⁵ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 112.

²⁶⁶ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 117.

²⁶⁷ Meier, Jugoslawien, pp. 118-123.

²⁶⁸ Meier, Jugoslawien, pp. 128-129.

Moreover, through its structure, the JNA was automatically involved in the looming ethnic conflict and would also play an active part in it.

The JNA had come out of Tito's Partisan army during World War Two and was extremely prestigious for many years. In an ideological sense, it was shaped by Tito's Communism and was based on 'brotherhood and unity'. The armed forces were the guardians not only of Yugoslavia's unity but also of its Socialist social order and were therefore a conservative power in Yugoslavia. In addition, the histories of the JNA and the Communist Parties were closely interwoven. Until January 1996, 96% of all officers were members of the League of Communists.²⁶⁹ Along with the six republics and two autonomous provinces, the JNA had an official seat in the Central Committee of the League of Yugoslav Communists. For that reason, the armed forces were known as being Yugoslavia's ninth Communist Party.

The JNA was one of Europe's larger armies. In around 1990, it consisted of 150,000 men and 510,000 reservists. Moreover, a system of territorial defence had been introduced after the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact countries that meant that virtually every Yugoslav could be called up. Apart from the fact that the territorial defence system clearly reflected the Partisan tradition, Kardelj also regarded it as being a part of the prominent ideology of self-rule. The territorial defence system consisted of reservists who had been trained by the JNA. This meant that one-and-a-half million people could be mobilized in the event of war. They were under the command of both the JNA and the local authorities: the republics, districts and city councils. It was, to quote General Veljko Kadijevic who later became Minister of Defence: 'an excellent basis for paralysing the command structure or for something even worse'.²⁷⁰ The JNA had already neutralized the territorial defence system in Kosovo in the 1980s so as to counter the sabotaging of this organization, which could appeal to the local authorities' commands.

The JNA's position was further complicated by the fact that it was the keeper of social and constitutional order yet it remained under the supreme command of the state presidium that was ruled by the republics and autonomous areas. The weak, federal leadership created the impression amongst military leaders that the JNA was in fact an army without a state.²⁷¹ In terms of finance, the JNA depended on the federal agencies whereas the funding of the territorial defence system was a matter for the republics, districts, city councils and state companies. Yugoslavia's further disintegration threatened the JNA with financial cutbacks while the territorial defence system, which could always count on a higher level of sympathy at a local level, remained relatively unscathed.

The army had already suffered cutbacks in the 1980s as a result of the poor economic situation so that its share of the national income was officially reduced from 6.1% to 3.9%. However, the real reduction was even more drastic.²⁷² So as to maintain the republics' support at budget discussions, the JNA increasingly had to allow officers to serve in their own republics although it had always been the JNA's policy that officers should serve outside of their republics as much as possible.

The ethnic imbalance in the officer class also played a role in some republics' unco-operative attitude towards the financing of the JNA. At the end of the 1980s, 60% of all officers were Serbian although the Serbs only accounted for 36% of the population. Some of the other ethnic groups were represented as followed: Montenegrins 6.2% of all officers (2.6% of the population); Macedonians 6.3% (6.0%), Croats 12.6% (19.8%); Slovenes 2.8% (7.8%); Muslims 2.4% (8.9%) and Albanians 0.6% (7.7%).²⁷³ Just as in the civil service, a code of proportional ethnic representation was applied to the top military posts. Here too, the Serbs were dissatisfied with the ethnic relations within the army because relatively few Serbian officers were able to occupy the highest posts.

²⁶⁹ Sanz, Army.

²⁷⁰ Kadijevic, Vien, p. 75.

²⁷¹ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 3, 78.

²⁷² Kadijevic, Vien, p. 76. Also Meier, Jugoslavien, p. 131.

²⁷³ Gow, 'Deconstruction', p. 302; Djilas, 'Profile', p. 91. Comparable figures in Mønnesland, Land, p. 305; Zametica, Conflict, p. 41. See also: Gow, Legitimacy, pp. 54-55 and 142.

The JNA became even more involved with the ethnic conflict when Admiral Branko Mamula became Minister of Defence in 1982. This job was always given to one of the JNA's top men and was combined with the post of Chief of Staff of the Supreme Command at the state presidium. Mamula took a number of measures that made the federal armed forces look more like a Serbian army. For instance, he abandoned the system of proportionally dividing the top military jobs along ethnic lines. In addition, he tried to subordinate the territorial defence system to the JNA. Slovenia particularly criticized these measures.

Slovenia was also critical of the fact that, since 1982, the JNA increasingly regarded the West as its greatest enemy because of the weakness that it had detected in the Warsaw Pact. This development intensified after 1985 when there was détente between East and West. At that point, NATO was seeking contact with the Warsaw Pact countries. Yugoslavia's chosen isolation vis-à-vis the two military blocs now began to be regarded in JNA circles as an imposed isolation with an implied threat that was mainly due to the more powerful West.²⁷⁴

This Slovenian criticism pushed the federal army leadership towards Milosevic. At first, the relationship between the JNA and the Serbian president seemed to be an uncomfortable one. Milosevic had little affinity with the armed forces and conversely the JNA officers felt that Milosevic had a poor understanding of military affairs.²⁷⁵ During the first years of his government, Milosevic was uncertain as to whether the Yugoslav army would attempt a coup d'état, if necessary by pushing the Serbian leadership aside. For that reason, he created an alternative power resource through the police that developed into a kind of Praetorian Guard of 60,000 men who were both well equipped and well paid. However, the JNA officers appreciated Milosevic's military turn of phrase that he used when speaking in measured tones of mobilization, combat and war.²⁷⁶ Perhaps the most important element at that moment was the fact that the Milosevic-controlled media protected the JNA against the attacks of the Slovenian and Croatian media. Moreover, the officers approved of Milosevic because he resisted the abolition of the Communist organizations for far longer than the other Communist leaders in Eastern Europe.

However, the Slovenian Communists were noticeably less pleased with Milosevic's resistance to the Communist organizations' abolition. This led to clashes, particularly during the February 1989 session of the Central Committee of the League of Yugoslav Communists. Here, the Slovenian party leader Milan Kucan made it clear that Slovenia would only accept a democratic, pluralist, Europe-oriented Yugoslavia. Without democracy Yugoslavia would simply cease to exist.²⁷⁷ This position led to a sharp exchange with Milosevic, who wanted to have nothing to do with pluralism. Milosevic's reactions strengthened the impression in Slovenia that Yugoslavia was heading in exactly the wrong direction so far as the Slovenes were concerned and that this was partly due to the Serbian action in Kosovo.²⁷⁸

Mounting tensions between Slovenia and Serbia

On 27 February 1989, when army and police actions had aimed at deposing the government leadership in Kosovo, an event occurred in Ljubljana that would inflame Slovenian-Serbian relations. The Slovenian Communist Party leadership demonstratively attended a meeting for the protection of human rights in Kosovo that also supported the Albanian miners who had locked themselves in the Trepca mines as a protest against Serbia's constant pressure. Here, Kucan commented, 'the situation in Kosovo shows that people are no longer living together and are increasingly in conflict. Politics must be kept off the streets and away from anywhere where lives are at stake.'

²⁷⁴ Also Meier, Jugoslawien, pp. 129-130; Woodward, Tragedy, pp. 150-151.

²⁷⁵ Interview Carl Bildt, 13/12/00.

²⁷⁶ Djilas, 'Profile', pp. 81 and 91.

²⁷⁷ Mønnesland, Land, p. 326.

²⁷⁸ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 31.

The Slovenian party chairman argued that Yugoslavia was being subjected to an insidious coup. It was not hard to guess who Kucan was referring to.²⁷⁹ Shortly beforehand, Kucan had sent Slovenian television teams to Kosovo because he felt that the Serbian reporting there was no longer reliable. Serbian television understood the historical importance of the meeting in Ljubljana and aired it in its entirety. These images resulted in outrage in Serbia. Hundreds of thousands headed to the federal parliament building in protest and to demand that action should be taken against the Albanian leaders of Kosovo.

In September 1989, the Slovenian parliament adopted a constitution that emphasized Slovenian sovereignty and determined that only the representatives of the Slovenian people could declare a state of siege in Slovenia or could allow JNA troops to enter Slovenian territory. In contrast to the 1974 Constitution, the new Slovenian constitution stipulated that the area could separate itself without the other republics' permission. This constitution was accepted despite extreme pressure from both Serbia and the JNA. It was then rejected by the Constitutional Court and the federal parliament but Slovenia held its ground partly because it received support from within the Central Committee of the Yugoslav party.²⁸⁰ For the first time in this exploding conflict, the Croatian party had emphatically rallied on the side of its Ljubljana comrades.

When Serbian politicians announced that a truth demonstration would be held in Ljubljana on 29 November, the Slovenian authorities posted police along its borders to hold back the Serbian demonstrators. Once again they were supported by Croatia which the Serbian demonstrators would first have to cross but found themselves obstructed by the Croatian authorities. Milosevic experienced the failure of this march on Ljubljana as a slap in the face. He hit back by calling on Serbian companies to break all business ties with Slovenia and to boycott Slovenian products. Slovenian property in Serbia was confiscated and import duty was imposed on products from Slovenia. A month later, economic transactions between Serbia and Slovenia had come to a virtual standstill.

The Serbian boycott also meant that Slovenian papers were no longer available in Belgrade. It was becoming increasingly difficult for the Serbian capital to follow Ljubljana's train of thought.²⁸¹ The authorities in Ljubljana reacted by taking things into their own hands and reducing the federal budget by 15% and replacing their contribution to the fund for underdeveloped areas with a direct donation to Kosovo. The Slovenian people took their own measures. From then on, anyone with a car with Serbian number plates could expect to be refused service at Slovenian petrol stations.²⁸² Because of these events, the American ambassador to Belgrade, Warren Zimmermann, reported to Washington that the unimaginable in Yugoslavia had now become imaginable, that the country would split up.²⁸³ Ever sensitive to the rapid democratic developments in Eastern Europe in 1989, the Slovenian parliament introduced changes on 27 December 1989 that allowed for political parties other than the Communist Party and proposed the prospect of free elections.

The 14th Party Congress of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia took place in January 1990. This occurred at the instigation of the JNA and others who felt that the federal party had to call a halt to the process of disintegration that was affecting Yugoslavia. The Slovenian party chairman Milan Kucan warned the Congress that the country was on the brink of civil war. The Slovenian party leadership proposed the introduction of a multi-party system, freedom of the press and other civil rights. It wanted a political solution that would make it possible to join the West and would also include an acceptable regulating of the situation in Kosovo.²⁸⁴ One by one, the Slovenian proposals were voted down. When it became clear that the Serbian party would continue to focus on the problem of the Serbs in Kosovo and that the Slovenian suggestions were considered unacceptable, the Slovenian

²⁷⁹ Silber/Little, Death, p. 66.

²⁸⁰ See also Part I.

²⁸¹ Slapsak, Joegoslavië, p. 101; also ibidem, p. 65.

²⁸² Zimmermann, Origins, p. 34.

²⁸³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 53.

²⁸⁴ See also: Hans Smits, 'De Joegoslavische waarheid kent vele staten', Vrij Nederland, 18/01/92.

deputation left the hall and was followed by the Croatian delegation. Both parties left the Communist League shortly afterwards. Milosevic tried to carry on with the meeting but was confronted with objections from the other parties. This signalled the end of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia, the country's connective tissue as Tito had once called it.²⁸⁵ The only remaining mainstay of Yugoslav unity was the army: the JNA.

Several days after the Congress, the state presidium assigned the army to intervene in Kosovo where there had been demonstrations in various cities that, according to the presidium, threatened to turn into civil war. The army's actions on 1 and 2 February resulted in 28 deaths and 79 injuries. On 4 February 1990, Slovenia decided to withdraw its units from the federal police troops that were stationed in Kosovo. Croatia once again followed Slovenia's example.

The Slovenian and Croatian parties' resignation from the League had seriously upset Milosevic's plans. After Slovenia had first halted his attempt to trigger a revolution in Slovenia through his call to take to the streets, he had now been robbed of the chance to impose Serbia's will on the rest of the country by creating a majority within the Communist Party and through the diktat of democratic centralism. Moreover, Milosevic was shocked by the fact that Croatia had followed the Slovenian example.²⁸⁶ From that moment onwards, Milosevic felt that a Greater Serbia would be the best solution for the Serbian people.²⁸⁷ Conversely, the thoughts of Slovenia and Croatia were increasingly of a confederation or even independence.

4. The strengthening of Milosevic's position as Serbian leader

Because of these developments, Milosevic was increasingly supported by a large section of the Serbian intelligentsia. Some of them viewed him as being the first Communist since Rankovic who was prepared to stand up for Serbian interests. Others regarded him as someone who had placed himself in the tradition of the 19th century Serbian leaders.²⁸⁸ Not so long ago Milosevic had condemned this intelligentsia for its nationalism, but it had now become extremely important to him for airing his policy views to the media.

Meanwhile, Milosevic realized that Serbia could not be the only area in Eastern Europe to evade elections. Hence, he began to transform the Serbian Communist Party into the Serbian Socialist Party that was finally set up on 12 July 1990. His less-than-fastidious methods earned him the nicknames 'Tito the Second' and the 'Baby Face Killer'. His wife, Mirjana Markovic, remained loyal to Communism. Ultimately, she was also to set up her own party but before that, as a Communist Party member and a Belgrade University sociology professor, she created a bridge on her husband's behalf with both the neo-Marxist intellectuals and the Communist-oriented officers of the JNA. As journalists at the Belgrade-based publication Vreme remarked: Milosevic 'managed to trick both the Communists and the nationalists; the Communists thought that he was only pretending to be nationalist, and the nationalists thought that he was pretending to be Communist'.²⁸⁹

Milosevic also created the opportunity for a major development of the Orthodox Church.²⁹⁰ This religious revival, which had already begun immediately after Tito's death,²⁹¹ was also significant in terms of his objectives. Xenophobia was an important element in the dominant Serbian Orthodox theology of the 20th century that had constantly referred to the danger that the Albanians in Kosovo constituted for the Serbian heartland. This theology was also extremely defensive vis-à-vis Islam and Catholicism, both of which were regarded as being a threat not only to the Orthodox Church but also ²⁸⁵ Thompson, House, p. 226.

²⁸⁶ Obrad Kesic, 'Defeating 'Greater Serbia'', Building Greater Milosevic', Danopoulos/Messas (eds.), Crises, p. 55.

²⁸⁷ Also Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 82 and 87.

²⁸⁸ Lenard J. Cohen, 'Slobodan Milosevic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, pp. 248-249.

²⁸⁹ Quoted in Lenard J. Cohen, 'Slobodan Milosevic', Radan/Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 252.

²⁹⁰ Tomanic, Crkva, pp. 21-29 and 33.

²⁹¹ Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 247-249; Tomanic, Crkva, pp. 10-15.

to Serbian ethnicity. From the end of the 1980s, it stirred up the Serbian aversion to the Croats and Muslims with its services and reburials for the victims of the World War Two genocide.²⁹² Serbian Orthodox priests and theologians greatly contributed to the defining of discrimination against Serbs by non-Serbs as genocide, and the equating of the Serbs' suffering with Golgotha, the suffering of Christ, or with that of the Jews during the Third Reich.²⁹³

In 1989, the Orthodox Church and the Serbian state under Milosevic's leadership jointly celebrated the 600th anniversary of the battle at Kosovo Polje with great pomp. On 28 June, Milosevic and his followers managed to gather one million Serbs for this Golgotha where the Serbian people were supposedly crucified in order to protect the West from the advance of the Muslim 'Turks'. At this event, Milosevic admitted for the first time that 'armed combat' could not be excluded.²⁹⁴ In any case, it was obvious that the return of Kosovo to the Serbian bosom had failed to satisfy Milosevic's political ambitions.

The call to protect the Serbs both in Kosovo and elsewhere spread fear amongst the non-Serbs. This strengthened the other republics' resolve to keep their Serbian minorities on a short rein. Little else could be expected here. The description by even the Serbian intellectuals of the Albanian harassment of Serbs in Kosovo as constituting genocide, the aggression of the Serbian demonstrators calling for protection, the memories of the pre-war Serbian hegemony and the post-war actions of Rankovic and his kind combined to create the impression amongst non-Serbs that the Serbs saw little difference between defence and attack. There was the threat on the Serbian side of what the Serbian writer Svetlana Slapsak called 'preventative revenge'.²⁹⁵

The role of the media in the strengthening of Milosevic's position

The media were chosen to play a vital role in the campaigns to strengthen Milosevic's power and to promote ethnic nationalist views.²⁹⁶ Milosevic had purged the most important media immediately after he had come to power. Thereafter, the media provided the public with the enemy. Here, the residents of other republics and provinces, and the members of other ethnic groups were maligned whereas the Serbian side was portrayed as the victim. It was now possible to fall back on ethnic and national values that had been suppressed during Tito's government.

The population, that was subject to great existential uncertainty once the old collective values of Communism were gone and had been suffering the effects of a serious economic crisis since the beginning of the 1980s, became convinced within a relatively short time of this new gamut of ethnic values. Family memories of World War Two atrocities, which were committed for ethnic reasons, encouraged this conviction. Large sections of the population were no longer interested in 'factual' reporting about others, but in confirming the 'opponent's' demonic image as created by ultra-nationalist leaders, power-hungry manipulators and the media.

'Old' nationalists, who were from the opposition, and new nationalists, whose origins were the Communist nomenclature, looked for the differences between the ethnic groups and exaggerated them.²⁹⁷ They generated and orchestrated fear by exposing the long-suppressed memories of mass murder during the Second World War that were committed by 'them' against 'us': by Cetniks against ²⁹² Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 257-260; Tomanic, Crkva, pp. 42-43.

²⁹³ Geert van Dartel, 'Nationalities and Religion in Yugoslavia', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 37-40 and 45-46; idem, Kerk, p. 42; Van den Heuvel, Land, pp. 92 and 100; idem, Mythen, p. 374; Westerman, Brug, p. 167. For the growth of nationalism in the 1980s amongst the younger clergy of the Orthodox Church, see: Cohen, Serpent, pp. 151-152.

²⁹⁴ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 173; Silber/Little, Death, p. 72.

²⁹⁵ Svetlana Slapsak, 'Serbische Alternativen', Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, p. 174.

²⁹⁶ See, for instance: Pejic, 'Medien'.

²⁹⁷ For a description of this mechanism see, for instance: Ugresic, Cultuur, pp. 51-53.

(allegedly) Ustashe, by Ustashe against (allegedly) Cetniks et cetera.²⁹⁸ But the previous centuries of Turkish domination and medieval glory were also added for good measure.

It has been said that at that time Yugoslavia was a country with ‘too much history’,²⁹⁹ but it would be equally valid to say that Yugoslavia had no sense of history at all. The historical vision that was imposed on the people was a cut-out history, a caricature, where sometimes whole centuries were ignored so as to concentrate overly on periods of greatness and periods of struggle and victimization. The terror of remembering was the counterpart of the terror of forgetting.³⁰⁰ It was as if the equally one-sided historical landscape of the Communist era had been turned upside down. Highpoints became low points and vice versa. Where brotherhood and unity had once been emphasized, the focus was now on moments of mutual strife. The media were increasingly using the term ‘ethnically pure’. Here, cards were published with coloured areas that denoted either actual ethnic division or ethnic ambitions. They contributed to a climate where the fear of the ‘ethnically impure’ prevailed. Fear was followed by hate. This turned neighbours and acquaintances into ‘imagined adversaries’.³⁰¹

Television and radio played the main role in the spreading of ethnic fear and hate because the influence of the written press in Yugoslavia was mainly limited to the better-educated middle class.³⁰² Private television and radio stations did not exist until B92, an independent radio station, was set up in Belgrade in May 1989. The state stations were primarily organized per republic and appointments had always been controlled by the party. In the 1980s, the Republican parties switched to the policy that their own stations should limit broadcasts from other republics as much as possible. The stations in Zagreb and Ljubljana began to apply strict language norms so that programs from elsewhere were refused. Following the purging of staff at Belgrade Television in 1987, the station’s most important subject was Kosovo followed by broadcasts about the Ustashe crimes and Slovenia’s alleged ingratitude and German sympathies.

The media also played a similar role in Slovenia and Croatia, and the Slovenian and Croatian stations began to emphasize the Serbs’ Christian-Orthodox and Communist aspects as compared with their own regions’ supposed European and democratic traditions. What the Slovenian and Croatian stations had in common was the much-emphasized idea that the various ethnic groups could no longer co-exist in Yugoslavia: Yugoslavia was ‘Serboslavia’. They attacked what remained of the federal organizations, with the JNA as their main target which they viewed as being the most important obstacle to independence.

Conspiracies supposedly planned by other republics were a favourite subject of both radio and TV. Hence, the Serbian stations believed that plots engineered by Germany and the Vatican were behind Slovenian and Croatian nationalism; they also felt that ‘Muslim fundamentalists’ were preparing a holy war against the Serbs in Bosnia and Kosovo with the help of their fellow believers abroad. Negative stereotypes of other groups were frequently emphasized: the Serbian media argued that the Croats had a genocidal predisposition and, according to the Ljubljana press, non-Slovenes were lazy. Real media events were created when all sides began to dig up the remains of the opponent’s victims from previous conflicts so as to rebury them in consecrated ground.

Media and journalists who refused to be involved with this nationalist rhetoric found that their work was obstructed in every possible way, for instance: by refusing them access to state printers or distribution channels, or by cutting off their phone or telex lines.

Meanwhile, a sense of powerlessness prevailed amongst those who had grown up with Tito’s saying that one ‘must protect unity and brotherhood as the apple of my eye’ or reader sentences such as ‘no mountain is too high when brotherly hearts unite’.³⁰³ They had believed in a Yugoslavism that was ²⁹⁸ Also Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 103.

²⁹⁹ Also Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 19.

³⁰⁰ Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 113. Also Ugresic, Nationaliteit, pp. 56-57.

³⁰¹ The term ‘imagined adversaries’ can be found in Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 2.

³⁰² Simic, Yugoslavia, p. 41.

³⁰³ Ugresic, Cultuur, pp. 9, 21, 98.

based on ‘a false or a real brotherhood and unity that resulted in a joint Yugoslav cultural area’.³⁰⁴ And they were both right and wrong. Yugoslavia was a joint cultural area that primarily embraced the urban, upper echelons rather than the countryside. But they were wrong because they believed that their reality and future could no longer be overtaken by the memories and exploitation of the past because it would incite nationalist sentiments. However, behind Yugoslavism’s veneer of propaganda and idealism, ethnic-national antitheses had continued to play a role in the decades following the Second World War. But they remained invisible to the public at large, the subject of veiled allusions by the Communist elite. Unaware of the subtleties of the nationalist problems and the chosen solutions, the people were susceptible to the nationalist manipulators who could easily suggest that their population group’s interests had been constantly blocked.³⁰⁵ In other words: ‘the future occurred because – in a very particular way – the past reoccurred.’³⁰⁶

The first real declaration of independence: Kosovo

In the second half of 1990, there was to be a dramatic sequel to the chain of actions and reactions in Kosovo, which had previously contributed so much to the escalation of relations between Serbia and Slovenia. Although Kosovo had been incorporated into Serbia a year previously, on 2 July 1990 a majority of more than two-thirds of the Albanian people’s representatives voted in the Kosovan capital of Pristina that Kosovo would be a part of either a Yugoslav federation or confederation, but only as a republic.

Milosevic’s answer was to dissolve both the parliament and the government of Kosovo and to order the representatives’ arrest. The Serbian parliament then accepted the ‘program for the realization of peace, equality, democracy and prosperity in the Kosovo region’. This meant that public life in that area was to be purged of everything Albanian. Political parties and trade unions were forbidden, broadcasting networks and newspapers were closed, education was to follow a Serbian program and tens of thousands of Albanians were sacked from government service. The Albanian members of parliament who had been sent home declared Kosovo’s independence on 13 September 1990. Shortly afterwards, the federal government annulled Kosovo’s autonomy. On 28 September, the Serbian government adopted a new constitution that abolished Kosovo’s autonomy. The preamble mentioned ‘the Serbian people’s centuries of struggle’ and their resolve ‘to create a democratic state of the Serbian people’.³⁰⁷ The constitution’s 136 articles no longer mentioned the agencies of the Yugoslav federation. Article 135 briefly mentions that Serbia was a part of Yugoslavia but only in a negative sense: ‘when laws of the federal government or other republics are contrary to the federal constitution and damage Serbia’s interests, then the Serbian government must protect those interests’. This reference to the federation could hardly be taken seriously and did not disguise the fact that Serbia was actually the first republic to withdraw from the Yugoslav federation even though the West was barely aware of this. Milosevic had already discussed this legislation in an interview with the magazine Politika at the end of June 1990. Because of the strong trend towards disintegration, he remarked that it would be irresponsible if he and his party were to provide only one solution for the Yugoslav crisis. He felt that this was why the drafted constitution offered the possibility of ‘Serbia as an independent state’.³⁰⁸ Therefore, this constitution revealed the first clear evidence that Milosevic had altered his course from the preservation of Yugoslavia to the realization of a Greater Serbia.³⁰⁹ Back in March, Milosevic and ³⁰⁴ Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 10.

³⁰⁵ Paul Shoup, ‘Titoism and the national question: a reassessment’, in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 60.

³⁰⁶ Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 14.

³⁰⁷ Hayden, ‘Nationalism’, p. 660.

³⁰⁸ Almond, War, p. 185.

³⁰⁹ Detrez, Balkan, p. 129, Ramet, ‘Road’, p. 873. On 19 August, the day on which the Serbs in Krajina voted on autonomy, the Montenegrin newspaper Dnevnik published a letter from Milosevic to the state presidium where the Serbian president wrote that the federal presidium must rapidly adopt legislation that would enable a peaceful separation from Yugoslavia for those peoples who wanted it, Milosevic, p. 98.

his confidant Borisav Jovic had concluded behind closed doors that their power-retaining politics would be easier to achieve without the presence of Slovenia and Croatia. However, they felt that it was not yet advisable to admit this publicly.³¹⁰ Nonetheless, Serbian party officials were already roused to support a course whereby the Serbian Communist Party would fight for Yugoslavia's preservation while also preparing for a Greater Serbia that would consist of Serbia, Montenegro, a part of Bosnia-Herzegovina and possibly Macedonia.³¹¹

At the end of June 1990, Milosevic and Jovic, who had now become president of the state presidium, wanted to speed up the departure of Croatia and Slovenia because they regarded these republics as holding back the advance of their party domination regarding the elections that were soon to be held throughout Yugoslavia. However, there were two problems for which they had no suitable solution: the position of the Serbs in Croatia and the attitude of the JNA. They would have liked the JNA to have ensured a fait accompli in the areas with many Serbian residents. Nonetheless, Kadijevic had grave doubts about whether the JNA should separate from Yugoslavia and also about whether he was prepared to deploy the JNA without the presidium's permission.³¹²

Borisav Jovic was becoming increasingly agitated about Kadijevic's indecisiveness. On 3 October, Jovic wrote in his diary: 'The generals remain constantly obsessed by Yugoslavia's unity but it has already disintegrated and has no future.' He also wrote: 'Slobodan Milosevic maintains that he must simply let Slovenia go and will only have to intercede in Croatia in those areas where the Serbs live.'³¹³ Another of Milosevic's confidants, Mihalj Kertes, who was a member of the Serbian presidium, wrote at a slightly later date about this constitution that: 'the federal constitution only exists on paper. What the Slovenes can do, we can do as well.'³¹⁴

5. The economic consequences of Yugoslavia's disintegration

The progressive rejection of Yugoslavia by the federation's republics had major consequences for the program of economic reforms that were supposed to save Yugoslavia from its downwards political and economic spiral. At the 13th Congress of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia in June 1986, it was decided that all questions concerning the policy's 'Socialist contents' would be shelved until the economic crisis had been solved. It was no wonder that the attempts to get the economy back on course were doomed to failure. The combination of mass unemployment, pay cuts and price rises led to major industrial unrest in the mid-1980s.³¹⁵

In May 1986, Branko Mikulic became chairman of the Federal Executive Council, which the National Assembly had elected to serve as the cabinet for the next four years. His task as Yugoslavia's premier was to reform the country economically after it had been saved from financial ruin by foreign loans in the first half of the 1980s. Significantly, the appointment of Mikulic, who was a Bosnian Croat, was partly due to the fact that the National Assembly refused to accept a Serb as premier. When he took office, Mikulic was confronted with 90% inflation and 16.6% unemployment (with 60% of the unemployed being under the age of 25). In addition, a quarter of all Yugoslavs lived in poverty. Mikulic did not succeed in reducing inflation. Inflation for the whole of 1987 stood at 419% and it had reached 1232% by 1988.³¹⁶ The British economist Harold Lydall remarked in 1989 that the fall in the standard of living had been so great that that it was difficult not to imagine any other country reacting to this without either radical political change or even revolution.³¹⁷

³¹⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 125-128.

³¹¹ Jovic, Dani, p. 131.

³¹² Jovic, Dani, pp. 160-163.

³¹³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 103.

³¹⁴ Quoted in Hayden, Blueprints, p. 48.

³¹⁵ Magas, Destruction, p. 53.

³¹⁶ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 96.

³¹⁷ Quoted in Cohen, Hearts, p. 105.

Only 10% of the population still trusted the Federal Executive Council by the middle of 1987. 79% felt that it was no longer possible to escape these economic difficulties.³¹⁸ For the first time since the Second World War, there were articles in the press that called for the resignation of both the premier and his cabinet. There was a general awareness by the end of 1987 that the entire Yugoslav political system was not in favour of any real economic reforms.³¹⁹ Meanwhile, Mikulic found that the republics had forced him to make the implementation of his economic reforms depend upon the acceptance of amendments to the constitution. Moreover, accepting these amendments proved to be a time-consuming business. Similarly, the Western financiers threatened to make future credit loans depend upon the centralization of monetary policy but Mikulic did not succeed in breaking the republics' opposition to this. In fact, the federal government was no longer positioned above the republics' governments; they were now on a par. Mikulic and his federal cabinet were forced to resign in December 1988, a unique event in Communist Yugoslavia.

Mikulic was succeeded in March 1989 by the economist Ante Markovic (who was not related to Milosevic's wife). This former electro-engineer launched a program that was supposed to result in a free market economy, drastic cutbacks in government expenditure, an end to inflation and the potential to convert the dinar. Markovic was a Bosnian Croat but he regarded himself as being a Yugoslav and was also a reformist Communist.³²⁰ Yet he was also an incorrigible optimist who, despite his better judgement, kept hoping that he would be able to push his program through.

His optimism seemed justified at first. For instance, Markovic managed to curb inflation in December 1989 by linking the dinar with the Deutschmark so that inflation was reduced to less than 20%. He also managed to increase the amount of foreign currency and to break particular monopolies. He announced in the middle of 1989 that Yugoslavia now hoped to become both a member of the European Free Trade Association and an associate member of the EC.

Markovic introduced economic shock therapy in January 1990. This entailed measures such as the reduction of government subsidies on essential goods and the creation of the option of bankruptcy. However, this approach was thwarted by its social consequences and by the collapse of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. The industrial production of the first few months of 1990 dipped by 10% in comparison to the previous year, the retail trade turnover decreased by 23.8% and the standard of living fell by 28.1%. After an initial decrease, inflation began to rise once again. Payment difficulties were encountered by more than 8600 companies employing in excess of three million workers, i.e. more than half of the working population.³²¹ When Slovenia and Croatia stopped paying taxes and import duty to Belgrade in 1990, these republics experienced a run on foreign currency that resulted in the federal government imposing a ban on its supply so that the dinar became de facto unconvertible. Moreover, savers lost all confidence in the banking system that had apparently more or less confiscated their deposits.

The different opinions concerning the republics' future economic policy had become irreconcilable. Slovenia and Croatia wanted to introduce market mechanisms, Serbia and Montenegro preferred the deployment of state control and Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia supported an economic middle way. Moreover, Slovenia and Croatia found that Markovic had become an obstacle to their increasing desire for independence.³²² Yet the Serbs felt that he was too liberal and Western. Borisav Jovic, the Serbian chairman of the state presidium, even called him an American spy.³²³

At first Markovic tried to concentrate as much as possible on the required economic reforms and to steer clear of the current political situation that involved increasing human rights abuses in ³¹⁸ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 322 and 326.

³¹⁹ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 80.

³²⁰ For a personal description see, for instance: Theo Engelen, 'Ante Markovic. Alleen nog vertrouwd in het Westen', NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Ante Markovic. Een schietschijf voor iedereen', Trouw, 14/12/91.

³²¹ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 129.

³²² Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 112-113.

³²³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 112.

Serbia and Kosovo. But this was an untenable position. The federation needed to function again for the economy's sake, and this could not occur without extensive political reforms. Serbia's aggressive actions stopped the other republics from working towards recentralization just as they also dissuaded the United States from providing economic support.³²⁴

Yet Markovic was extremely popular. According to an opinion poll, 79% of the population endorsed his policy in the spring of 1990.³²⁵ This probably encouraged Markovic who had also jettisoned the idea that political reforms could be separated from economic reforms. In the middle of 1990, he set up his own party: the Alliance of Yugoslav Reformist Powers.

6. Elections in Slovenia and Croatia

Meanwhile two of the six republics, Slovenia and Croatia, had already held elections. But instead of this leading to more stable and democratic relations, the election results in the republics generally created an increase in ethnic tensions.³²⁶

These were the first free elections since the 1930s. There had been little experience between the two World Wars of representative democracy. Parties had largely been organized on an ethnic basis. Political leaders had mainly pursued populism, and were elected for their charisma and their ethnic leadership rather than for the contents of their policies. So the 1990 elections could hardly be regarded as a renewed experience of a Western-style democracy following Communism's interruption. Instead, they resulted in a restoration of populist and collectivist traditions.³²⁷

The first free, post-war elections in Yugoslavia were held in Slovenia and Croatia in April and May 1990. The non-Communist parties won both elections. The Slovenian elections were won by the Democratic United Opposition of Slovenia (DEMOS), a party that was a somewhat broadly-based coalition of Social Democrats, Christian Democrats, liberals, democrats, Greens and the Peasants Alliance. Their only common interest was a desire for greater independence.

In Croatia, the Croatian Spring, which was suppressed in 1972, was followed by 17 years of silence that was imposed by the secret police and by other forms of repression. There had been virtually no dissident voices in Croatia. But in 1989, the Communist leadership in Zagreb had failed to evade the increasing pressure for pluralism. In this, they followed the example of a series of Communist governments throughout Eastern Europe that had given way to this pressure. The conservative Communist government of Croatia was replaced by a more liberal regime in December 1989. The new leadership promptly proclaimed the other political parties' right to exist. A month before the free elections, the JNA leadership warned the Croatian leaders that the 'Ustashe' would gain power but the politicians in Croatia took little notice of this.³²⁸

The elections in Croatia were won by Franjo Tudjman's conservative and nationalist Croatian Democratic Party (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica or HDZ) that supported Croatia's future independence and closer ties with Western Europe. Tudjman's campaign was largely financed by donations from Croatian exiles; he had also benefited from an electoral system that had been designed by the Communists and where a minority of the votes could still achieve a parliamentary majority. Hence, with 40% of the votes, the HDZ was able to gain 205 of the 365 seats. Tudjman became president.

In Slovenia, although DEMOS triumphed in the parliamentary elections, the presidential elections were won by the current Slovenian leader Milan Kucan, who was the candidate for the Democratic Renewal Party that had grown out of the old Communist Party. Kucan's election was due to his credibility as a reformer.

³²⁴ Also Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 47, 51 and 59.

³²⁵ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 129; Hayden, Blueprints, p. 28.

³²⁶ Also Pejic, Medien, p. 57.

³²⁷ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 275.

³²⁸ Kadijevic, Viem, p. 96 n. 4.

Slovenia's new parliament approved a draft constitution on 2 July that established its right to self-determination. The country also retained the right to block federal decisions. The Slovenian leaders described a request by the federal government to negotiate this constitution as being 'totally baseless and absurd'.³²⁹ In its government policy statement, the Slovenian cabinet under the leadership of the Christian-Democrat premier Lozje Peterle declared that Yugoslavia would become a confederation in the future. If negotiations about this did not lead to a satisfactory result, Slovenia would then opt to become an independent state. It would acquire its own army along with an intelligence service and a secret service. Ljubljana would also cease making payments to the federal fund for underdeveloped regions. Shortly afterwards, the Slovenian government took over the responsibility for its area's territorial defence from the federal authorities. These developments were unmistakably gaining momentum. On 5 July, the Slovenian Minister of Foreign Affairs Dimitrij Rupel told the Italian press that Yugoslavia no longer existed.³³⁰ Slovenia was now determining the steps to independence and Croatia followed.

Non-Communist parties had also come to power in both Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia by the end of 1990. The only exceptions now were Serbia and Montenegro. Free elections were held there in December. Following the power upheaval in Eastern Europe, Serbia was slower at organizing free elections than any other country apart from Albania. Along with the Serbian Socialist Party (the SDS), which Milosevic had created out of the Communist Party, Vuk Draskovic's Serbian Renewal Party and Vojislav Seselj's Serbian Radical Party were the most important. Moreover, these leaders were just as nationalist as Milosevic. The SDS won 48% of the votes. The 'winner-takes-all' district system meant that the party had acquired 194 of the 250 parliamentary seats. Milosevic won 65% of the votes in the first round of the Serbian presidential election. While Communists were losing power throughout the rest of Europe, they still ruled Serbia, albeit under the cloak of nationalism.

The Yugoslav premier Ante Markovic participated in the elections of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Macedonia, Montenegro and Serbia. However, this resulted in the worst of both worlds: he lost his reputation for impartiality while his party's weak campaign was partly responsible for the fact that he won virtually no votes and failed to achieve the power base that he had apparently hoped for. During the election campaign in Serbia, he was opposed with unprecedented ferocity by the SDS and Milosevic who viewed him as a potential rival. Moreover, it proved impossible to organize federal elections. This was mainly because of the resistance of Slovenia that feared being voted away in the national elections through a system of 'one man, one vote'. The fact that elections were held in the republics but not at a federal level meant that Markovic lost still more legitimacy. He also experienced the embarrassment that no television station was prepared to broadcast his 'speech from the throne'. A subsequent attempt to deploy YUTEL, his own television station, ultimately failed. Hence, he ended up being caught between the desired economic policy for recentralization on the one hand, and the continuing process of decentralization on the other.

Markovic's program was seriously torpedoed when Serbia introduced a boycott of Slovenian goods in November 1989 after the failure of the march on Ljubljana.³³¹ On 24 October 1990, Serbia decided to take over the federal government's role concerning economic and financial areas. This meant that Serbia now dealt with the taxes that had been previously collected by the federal government. Here, the Serbian government's argument concerned the federal government's backlog. But this measure was really intended to punish Slovenia and Croatia for their desire for increasing autonomy by imposing taxes on products from these areas. It also undermined Markovic's economic reform program. Moreover, the Slovenian and Croatian governments now realized beyond a shadow of a doubt that the collective presidency was merely 'a branch of the Serbian government'.³³² This measure was to have few practical advantages for Serbia.

³²⁹ ABZ, IDB-rapport 5125/RC/90, 'Centrifugale tendenzen in Joegoslavië versterken zich', 30/07/90.

³³⁰ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 120.

³³¹ Also Woodward, Tragedy, p. 115.

³³² ABZ, Joegoslavië, 911.31, deel IV. IDB-rapport 8099/RC/90, 'Joegoslavië drijft verder uiteen', 12/11/90.

A consequence of this Serbian fiscal measure was that Ljubljana now refused to hand over import duties. This resulted in the central government announcing an import ban on all Slovenian goods on 13 June 1991. Slovenia was to declare independence less than two weeks later. The final blow to Markovic's program came in December 1990 when Milosevic, who had an eye on the up-coming elections, withdrew 18.3 billion new dinars from the National Bank of Yugoslavia so as to be able to pay off salary and pension arrears. This was the equivalent of more than 1.7 billion dollars or more than half of the total issue of money in 1991 for all six republics put together. Kucan concluded that if Serbia could get away with dipping into the federal purse, the federation had clearly lost its right to exist.

7. The rise of Franjo Tudjman

Franjo Tudjman, who had come to power in Croatia after an election campaign where he had promised to end the republic's domination by Belgrade, also felt that the federation of Yugoslavia had lost its right to exist.

Tudjman, who was born in 1922, had been a part of the Partisan movement during World War Two. He had become the JNA's youngest general at the age of 39. During the 1960s, he became increasingly converted to Croatian nationalism, and he also advocated autonomy and the Croatian language. As an historian, he wrote books where he played down the seriousness of the Ustashe actions. Tudjman was expelled from the Communist Party in 1967 because of his nationalist views. The former JNA general was one of the leaders of the Croatian Spring and was imprisoned from 1972 to 1974 for his 'propaganda against the state'. Once he was released, he was banned from publishing in Yugoslavia. When he circumvented this by providing a German journalist with figures about the Serbian over-representation in both the Croatian Communist Party and the police, he was condemned to three years imprisonment in 1981.³³³ On 30 May 1990, the vast majority of the newly-elected Croatian parliament voted for Tudjman as their president. His fellow party member Stipe Mesic became premier.

Whereas Milosevic's nationalism was based on opportunism, Tudjman's was a matter of conviction. On the morning after his party's election triumph, the next Croatian president repeated to US Ambassador Warren Zimmermann what he had stated throughout his campaign, that Bosnia-Herzegovina traditionally belonged to Croatia. If the Serbs applied 'pressure', then Croatia would deem it necessary to claim its 'historic rights'.³³⁴

The Croatian Serbs, who numbered almost 600,000 and constituted 12% of the population, reacted to Tudjman's 1990 election triumph in an extreme way. Emotions were running high even before he was elected. The HDZ had been set up at the beginning of 1989 before any other non-Communist parties were permitted in Serbia. Party extremists had already carried out a series of attacks on Serbs in Dalmatia in the summer of 1989. Just a few weeks before the collapse of the Communist League and a fortnight before the first congress of Tudjman's HDZ, a Serb from the Knin region was quoted in the Serbian weekly Nin as saying: 'We sleep here with guns in our hands. Go to any village you like and try to find a house where the gun is not already loaded.'³³⁵ The axes of 1974 had apparently been replaced some 15 years later with guns.

Two months before the elections in March 1990, Jovan Opacic, a prominent Serb from the Knin region, had already stated that the republics' borders would have to be discussed if Yugoslavia became a confederation because 'the creation of small, separate states would result in the politics of genocide'.³³⁶ Tudjman was portrayed as a future mass murderer. For several years, there had been a ³³³ In 1980, the Serbs accounted for 14% of the population as a whole, 24% of party members and more than half of the police, Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 107.

³³⁴ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 74.

³³⁵ Quoted in Vermeer, Joegoslavië, p. 68.

³³⁶ Slobodna Dalmacija, 26/03/90, quoted in Vermeer, Joegoslavië, p. 69.

movement in Serbia that attempted to label the Ustashe's genocidal tendencies as being a genetic defect of the Croatian people.³³⁷ Verbal attacks on the Catholic Church, which was strongly identified with Croatia, were nothing unusual in Belgrade at the end of the 1980s.

Conversely, Tudjman, the author of a book that considers genocide to be a normal part of human history and where multi-ethnic states are described as an anomaly,³³⁸ did little to remove the fear of Croatian domination that affected the Serbian minority who constituted 12% of Croatia's population. Following his election, Tudjman set up a Ministry of Emigration with aims that included raising funds amongst Croats abroad, a source that the Serbs viewed with suspicion. Extreme forms of Croatian nationalism were active within the extensive diaspora of Croats in, for instance, the United States and Australia that had been created through two waves of emigration after the Second World War and the Croatian Spring. Moreover, the Serbs particularly regretted the fact that Tudjman had acquired the support of the Catholic Church by abolishing the limitations imposed on religious expression.

In the flurry of triumphalism, little importance was attached to minority rights. Croatia's new constitution no longer mentioned a co-ordination of Croats and Serbs, rather the regional republic of Croatia was now described as a state of the Croatian people and of other nationalities such as Serbs, Italians and Hungarians. Although in theory the constitution provided the same rights to non-Croatian nationalities, the Serbs still felt that they had been relegated to the position of second-class citizens.³³⁹ Tudjman did not appoint a single non-Croat to the republic's political leadership. In fact, Serbs were fired from top positions because it was alleged that they were over-represented. This particularly affected the police and journalists. Serbs, who wanted to keep their jobs or to be able to vote, were forced to sign declarations of loyalty. Tudjman had rubbed extra salt into the wounds by publicly stating during his election campaign that he was fortunate that his wife was neither Jewish nor Serbian.³⁴⁰ The red-and-white checkerboard flag flew in many places in Croatia after the HDZ's triumph. This coat of arms had existed in Croatia since the Middle Ages and was also in use in the Communist era. It was, for instance, included in the 1974 Constitution. Nonetheless, many could easily be offended by the omnipresent flags with their coat of arms that had also adorned the government of Ante Pavelic, the Croatian Ustashe leader both before and during the Second World War. Serbs complained that the Jews never had to live with swastika flags whereas they had to put up with the flag in whose name genocide had been committed against them some 50 years previously.³⁴¹

Tudjman's statement during the election campaign that Croatia was claiming Bosnia-Herzegovina also evoked memories of the 'independent' Ustashe state during the Second World War. The slogan 'a Croatia exclusively for Croatians' had a similar effect. Croats wore badges bearing Pavelic's portrait. Tudjman also made an unfortunate attempt to eradicate the religious distinction between Croats and Serbs by once more setting up a Croatian Orthodox Church that brought back bitter memories for the Serbs of the Ustashe government's program of forced conversion to Catholicism. A section of the Croatian population began to crow increasingly loudly about their sense of superiority over the Serbs. These Croats regarded themselves as being a part of the developed Occident whereas the Serbs belonged to the turbulent, dark and inferior Balkans. This provoked a reaction amongst the Serbs to emphasize their military and political past along with their military superiority, an attitude that had once enticed the Croat writer Miroslav Krleža to remark: 'May God

³³⁷ I. Banac, 'The Fearful Asymmetry', pp. 155-157; idem, 'Historiography', p. 1101.

³³⁸ F. Tudjman, Bespuca Povijesne Zbiljnosti: Rasprava o povijesti i filozofiji zločinja, Zagreb 1990. See also the quotation from this book in: Hayden, Nationalism, p. 671.

³³⁹ Also Hayden, Nationalism, pp. 657-658.

³⁴⁰ Hayden, 'Fate', p. 745; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 73.

³⁴¹ Helen A. Pavelich, 'Foreword', in: Vukcevic, Tito, unnumbered page.

protect us from Croatian culture and Serbian heroics.³⁴² Hence, there was reason enough for a sense of turmoil amongst the almost 600,000 Serbs in Croatia, of which approximately one third lived in Slavonia and Krajina, the two extremities of the republic that encircled Bosnia-Herzegovina like a boomerang. Unlike Slovenia, Croatia was a breeding ground for mutual fear and hate that harked back to the time of the Cetniks and the Ustashe.

8. Serbian reactions to Tudjman's election as president

Meanwhile Milosevic was sharpening the knives. On 13 February, he told his confidant Jovic that there would be war with the Croats.³⁴³

Several days later, Milosevic's agents helped to organize a Serbian political party in Krajina. In June 1990, the Belgrade secret services began to supply arms and to infiltrate agents into the Serbian communities in Croatia. They set up the basis for political control and paramilitary formations. Belgrade's agents and members of the Serbian Democratic Party (the SDS) launched a campaign of intimidation in those places in Krajina where Serbian political leaders were still prepared to negotiate with Zagreb. The SDS wanted Krajina, where Serbs accounted for 70% of the population, to become a part of Serbia.

On 25 June 1990, Milosevic declared in the Serbian parliament that the republics' borders would need to be discussed if Yugoslavia were to become a confederation. He pointed out that the constitution stipulated that it was the ethnic peoples rather than the republics who had the right to self-determination. In other words: so far as he was concerned, a Greater Serbia was the only alternative to a federal Yugoslavia.³⁴⁴

There were skirmishes in Croatia between Croats and Serbs in August 1990. Serbs in Krajina stole guns from police stations, set up barricades on the roads, blocked the railway between Zagreb and Split and closed off the area. Then Serbian paramilitary units began to patrol 'their' areas of Croatia. A Serbian referendum on autonomy was held in Krajina on 19 August. According to the official result, it was opposed by just 172 people.³⁴⁵ However, the Croatian and official authorities were not prepared to recognize the referendum. Nonetheless, the government in Zagreb was powerless although this was not true of the Yugoslav Army, the JNA. This federal army officially occupied the area and divided the parties, but in fact it consolidated the situation in favour of the Serbs. When Zagreb wanted to send a number of police helicopters to the area, the JNA obstructed their arrival. Hence, Zagreb was well aware of the side that the JNA supported in this conflict.

The Serbs in Krajina issued a declaration of the Autonomous District of Krajina at the beginning of October. At the same time, Milosevic brought the crowds out onto the streets of Belgrade with slogans such as 'We want guns' and 'Off to Croatia'. The National Serbian Council, which consisted of mayors from places with a Serbian majority and the representatives of Serbian parties in Croatia, declared itself to be 'the highest authority' for Serbs in Croatia. This council immediately called on the Croatian Serbs 'to resist Croatian state terror with every available means'. They also appealed to the federal government to protect the Serbs in Croatia. A National Serbian Council was also set up in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

On 15 May 1988, the Croatian Serb Veljko Kadijevic succeeded Admiral Mamula as the Minister of Defence of the Yugoslav federation and the Chief-Of-Staff of the Supreme Command of the JNA. Kadijevic represented the increasing mistrust of foreign countries amongst Belgrade officials who repeatedly blocked communication with the West. It seemed as if the country's political and ³⁴² Quoted in Gojko Boric, 'Kroatien und Jugoslawien – Ein Abriss historischer Erfahrungen', Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, p. 58. Compare the views of the Croatian politician and sociologist Stipe Suvar in 1972, almost 20 years before Tudjman's election as president, about the nature and aims of Serbian and Croatian nationalism, quoted in Oschlies, Ursachen, p. 6.

³⁴³ Noted by Jovic, quoted in Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 75.

³⁴⁴ Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 109.

³⁴⁵ Ramet, Milosevic, p. 102.

military leadership was unable to free itself of the siege mentality that had dominated the ideas of the Yugoslav elite during the Cold War. It had become effectively impossible to make the mental switch from large-scale conflict, where the JNA fought one or two foreign enemies, to a situation of internal conflict. Sections of the elite were behaving as if they were actors in the film Underground that was made by the Yugoslav director Emil Kusturica. The characters in this film spend many years underground in a state of war because someone above ground has assured them that the Second World War had not yet ended.

It is striking that Kadijevic pays far more attention to foreign enemies than to internal factors in his later explanation for the collapse of Yugoslavia. This completely reflects the evaluation of the General Staff of the Supreme Command at the end of 1989, who stated that foreign countries were the most important factor for the developments in Yugoslavia.³⁴⁶ Kadijevic was completely convinced that the American and German governments were determined to destroy Yugoslavia's unity and viewed civil war as being the most suitable means of achieving this. He argued that these governments' ultimate goal was to gain supremacy in the Balkans³⁴⁷ and that official American agencies were actively involved. Secret agents and straw men from Germany were active at the highest political levels in Croatia and Slovenia.³⁴⁸

According to Warren Zimmermann, America's ambassador to Belgrade, Kadijevic felt that there was no difference between Helmut Kohl's Germany and the Third Reich.³⁴⁹ In his view, Austria and Italy acted as the accomplices of, respectively, Germany and the United States.³⁵⁰ He also argued that the Vatican was providing the financial backing for all anti-Yugoslav activities by, for instance, having made it possible for Croatia to buy arms.³⁵¹ Finally, there was a fifth column in Yugoslavia that was ready to undermine the country.³⁵² The power with which these ideas took hold of Kadijevic and others was partly determined by the tendency to think exclusively in mechanistic and functionalistic terms. Unpleasant developments – such as the collapse of Yugoslavia – were explained as reflecting the West's bad intentions. Kadijevic rejected every suggestion of mistakes and errors: there were only masterplans.³⁵³

Against this background, it comes as no surprise that Kadijevic and the JNA leadership vehemently opposed every form of international mediation or interference with Yugoslavia.³⁵⁴ This attitude was the result of a lack of allied contacts over the preceding decades and the West's tendency to avoid meddling with the country's internal state of affairs during the Cold War.

Kadijevic was unimpressed with Croatia's new leadership. He viewed the former JNA General Franjo Tudjman as being a disaffected Communist, and it was also a bitter pill that Janez Jansa, who had been condemned for the publication of the JNA document in Mladina, had now become the Slovenian Minister of Defence. The JNA was unequivocal in its views about the Croatian leadership and constantly referred Tudjman as the 'so-called president'.³⁵⁵ Kadijevic might have been able to endorse the advancement of a pluralist, democratic society but only if it had been implemented from above.³⁵⁶ It had apparently slipped his notice that everything that was implemented in Yugoslavia from above was per se suspect for the republics of Slovenia and Croatia. Kadijevic personally contributed to that suspicion because he increasingly adopted a Serbian point of view.³⁵⁷

³⁴⁶ Kadijevic, View, p. 36.

³⁴⁷ Kadijevic, View, pp. 5, 14-15, 18, 25-26, 87. See also: Silber/Little, Death, p. 90

³⁴⁸ Kadijevic, View, pp. 25, 88, 111, 117 and 123-124.

³⁴⁹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 89.

³⁵⁰ Kadijevic, View, pp. 34-35.

³⁵¹ Kadijevic, View, p. 34.

³⁵² Kadijevic, View, p. 29.

³⁵³ See, for instance: Kadijevic, View, pp. 5, 28.

³⁵⁴ Kadijevic, View, pp. 37 and 115.

³⁵⁵ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 96.

³⁵⁶ Kadijevic, View, pp. 18, 53-54.

³⁵⁷ See, for instance: Kadijevic, View, p. 38.

Kadijevic's remarks that the 1974 Constitution had turned the JNA into an army without a state, were lacking in candour because he also rejected the federal authority whenever it suited him. For instance, he had little sympathy for Markovic whom he regarded as being too much of an implementer of the American-backed policy of economic liberalization. He also expected that Markovic would reduce the JNA budget.³⁵⁸ According to Kadijevic, in the summer of 1991 the JNA had made it 'drastically' clear to Mesic, the Croatian chairman of the state presidium, that he could in no way influence the JNA: 'there were orders that he gave to the army via the media, that we ignored at the General Staff of the Supreme Command, as if they simply didn't exist.'³⁵⁹

The army under Kadijevic initially supported the federation but only as a 'real' one that actually worked. In 1988, the JNA proposed a number of amendments to the constitution so as to re-establish a functioning federation. This gained the army little sympathy. Many felt that it was only concerned with solutions that would restore a powerful Yugoslav unity.³⁶⁰ It had become unclear which constitutional and social order the JNA was still supposed to defend now that the army was confronted with what it judged to be a failing constitution along with republics that had little or no respect for the federal laws and a political system where the party monopoly had been replaced by pluriformity. The JNA leadership increasingly spoke of a constitutional order that would contravene the 1974 Constitution. This led to statements such as: 'the armed forces were manoeuvred into a situation where they had to act in an unconstitutional way if they were to protect the constitutional order (...). Which constitutional order was supposed to be protected: the one that led to the country's disintegration or another one? In this case, which one was it?'³⁶¹ 'Were the armed forces supposed to carry out their duties within the existing judicial system that would inevitably lead to the countries disintegration? Or should they oppose that system?'³⁶²

There were frequent rumours of a JNA coup, but that would have been harder to achieve than many people realized. Seizing power would have been particularly difficult because of the existence of the republics' territorial defence system.³⁶³ This system would have enabled large sections of the population to turn against the JNA. Moreover, the army would have been unable to control the situation after a coup for any length of time because it would have had to deal with the desertion of non-Serbian soldiers. It would have also been difficult to motivate some of the Serbs to fight outside of Serbia after a coup. This would have provoked foreign sanctions and the army leadership even felt that the possibility of foreign military interventions could not be excluded.³⁶⁴

Kadijevic wanted to prevent circumstances where, by intervening, the JNA would be lumbered with all of Yugoslavia's failings. He preferred a situation where the JNA could be portrayed as a victim of the 1974 Constitution and a Little Yugoslavia would ultimately be created.³⁶⁵ Moreover, Kadijevic attached considerable importance to the constitutionally-required legitimization of the JNA's actions by the federal presidium. This repeatedly led to conflict between him and Blagoje Adzic, the JNA Chief-of-Staff. Adzic was prepared, if necessary without the state presidium's agreement, to declare a state of national emergency so as to oppose the consequences of Yugoslavia's disintegration.³⁶⁶ Adzic, a Bosnian Serb, belonged to the generation that came to power in around 1990 but still had grim memories of World War Two. The Ustashe had killed most of his family when he was ten years old. He ³⁵⁸ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 15 and 116-117; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 90.

³⁵⁹ Kadijevic, Vien, p. 38.

³⁶⁰ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 66-67.

³⁶¹ Kadijevic, Vien, p. 87.

³⁶² Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 90-91.

³⁶³ Gow, Deconstructing, p. 299.

³⁶⁴ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 122-123.

³⁶⁵ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 91 and 123.

³⁶⁶ Gow, Deconstruction, p. 301.

rarely missed an opportunity to talk about these events.³⁶⁷ Some of what he said was extreme and was greeted with little sympathy abroad: ‘And what does it matter if a few thousand heads roll? The world will make a fuss for about a week or so and then will forget all about it.’³⁶⁸

Under Kadijevic and the extremely anti-Croatian Adzic, the JNA leadership became increasingly convinced that what was good for the Serbs, was also good for Yugoslavia.³⁶⁹ This meant that here the difference with Milosevic’s Greater Serbian views was only a matter of degree. Moreover, Kadijevic respected Milosevic. He had tried in vain to urge the Serbian president to succeed Mikulic as the federal premier so as to apply ‘his political authority and proven competence, and particularly his ability to find simple solutions to the complex problems that the Yugoslavian system constantly produced.’³⁷⁰ In addition, a new Communist Party was set up in November 1990, the League of Communists – Movement for Yugoslavia, which was supported by Kadijevic and many prominent generals. Milosevic’s wife, Mirjana Markovic, was its vice-chairman.

Kadijevic was much less enthusiastic about the federal authorities. He thought that the federal agencies contained three categories of politicians: the real Yugoslavs, those who supported separation and opportunists. The JNA leadership felt that it could no longer present its evaluations and plans to the state presidium and the Federal Executive Council because this would entail turning this information over to ‘the enemy’.³⁷¹

Since the end of 1990, ‘the enemy’, according to the JNA leadership, was first and foremost Slovenia, which was continuing its preparations for separation. It was closely followed by Croatia. On 4 October 1990, a joint working party of the presidia of Croatia and Slovenia drew up a proposal for a Yugoslav confederation. The member states would remain sovereign. They would each acquire their own currency, army and Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The military and foreign policy would be coordinated at the level of the confederation. In short, Yugoslavia would have to be organized ‘in the style of the European Community’.³⁷²

Slovenia had repeatedly urged that the Slovenes’ military service should be limited to their own territory and that their Slovenian officers should exclusively command JNA units. The JNA leadership opposed this vehemently because it would effectively lead to a Slovenian army.³⁷³ So as to prevent this, in October 1990 the JNA began to confiscate weapons that were intended for the territorial defence systems of Slovenia and Croatia. In December 1990, Kadijevic announced that the idea of the peoples’ defence system was finished. The JNA subsequently confiscated the arms of the territorial defence systems in all the republics except Serbia. In Slovenia, the JNA only managed to acquire 40% of the territorial defence system’s materials although this included almost the entire stock of heavy artillery. However, it managed to confiscate virtually all the Croatian weapons. These differing results were to affect the development of combat forces in both republics. Slovenia created an army out of the remains of its territorial defence system that resulted in a corps of 10,000 professional soldiers and 50,000 conscripts. Slovenian conscripts ceased entering the JNA in March 1991. Instead, the Slovenian parliament introduced a scheme where the seven months of military service would be spent with its own forces. All Slovenian citizens were withdrawn from the JNA in June 1991.

Robbed of its military defence system, Croatia began to transform its police force into an army at the end of 1990. This was no easy task because in mid-1990 the police in Croatia mainly consisted of Serbs.³⁷⁴ However, they were largely sacked in the aftermath of the HDZ election victory.

³⁶⁷ Caroline de Gruyter, ‘Onze Kacin is beter dan Goebbels’, Elsevier, 13/07/91, p. 36; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 100. For descriptions of Adzic see, for instance: ‘Blagoje Adzic. Eenheid tot elke prijs’, NRC Handelsblad, 04/07/91; Ian Traynor, ‘Spook uit jaren veertig achtervolgt stafchef’, De Volkskrant, 05/07/91.

³⁶⁸ Sanz, Army.

³⁶⁹ Also Kadijevic, View, p. 109.

³⁷⁰ Kadijevic, View, p. 112.

³⁷¹ Kadijevic, View, p. 95.

³⁷² The model of a confederation in Yugoslavia, quoted in Zametica, Conflict, p. 14.

³⁷³ Kadijevic, View, pp. 105-106.

³⁷⁴ Lendvia, Yugoslavia, p. 255 n. 6.

Approximately 50,000 reservists were called up so that the republic's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which included the police, now grew from 25,000 to 75,000 men. The police troops were lightly armed and had no real armoured cars.

The conduct of the JNA and the development of armies in both Slovenia and Croatia led to a war of nerves between both parties from the end of 1990 onwards. Once the Serbs in Krajina had made the district virtually autonomous with the help of the JNA, the federal army began to grow in other 'Serbian' areas in Croatia and in cities such as Dubrovnik.

9. The Slovenian and Croatian preparations for separation

Over the next few years, in many respects General Tudjman was to prove to be a better strategist than his opposite numbers in Belgrade. He had a clearer understanding than Milosevic of the opinions abroad.³⁷⁵ In October 1990, he warned a nationalist crowd in the Croatian capital of Zagreb against impulsiveness. He declared that public opinion elsewhere in the world would turn against the side that fired the first shot in an ethnic war.³⁷⁶ In December 1990, he opposed a plan drawn up by his own Minister of Defence Martin Spigelj that consisted of immediately encircling the JNA barracks and of disarming the federal troops. Tudjman later commented: 'Had we accepted that plan we would have been condemned by the world as outlaw secessionists who wanted to overthrow the constitutional system. If we had carried out that plan, the world would have condemned us as an illegal movement for separation that wanted to overthrow the constitutional system.'³⁷⁷

Military preparations

Meanwhile, the JNA was also confronted with the issue of timing. If the army were to intervene too quickly against the nationalist developments in Slovenia and Croatia, it would be blamed as a Greater Serbian military power that had pursued aggression against the republics' democratically-elected governments. If the army were to wait too long, these governments would have enough time to organize their armed defence.³⁷⁸ And Slovenia and Croatia had indeed started to purchase arms abroad in reaction to the disarming of their territorial defence systems.³⁷⁹ In December 1990, Slovenian television showed footage of the republic's troops destroying a tank with Amhurst rockets that had been bought abroad and could be fired from the shoulder.

However, Croatia made the most famous purchase by buying several tens of thousands of Kalashnikovs in Hungary.³⁸⁰ Under great pressure from the JNA³⁸¹, the presidium and the federal government attempted to oppose the formation of Croatian paramilitary units in January 1991 by warning of the JNA's intervention. The Bosnian Serb Bogic Bogicevic resisted the Serbian pressure in the state presidium to authorize the JNA for this kind of intervention.³⁸² But this did not mean that Croatia was no longer under threat. The JNA still argued that action should be taken against the Croatian authorities.³⁸³ Despite Belgrade's threats, Croatia continued to arm its police and Zagreb ensured that the armed forces were in a state of readiness. On 25 January, a film was shown on various Yugoslav television stations. It was made by the KOS, the JNA's secret service, and showed deliveries of arms from Hungary to Croatia. It also showed how the Croatian Minister of Defence Martin Spigelj ³⁷⁵ Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 8; idem, Origins, p. 77.

³⁷⁶ Carol J. Williams, 'Croatia's "Raving Nationalist" Now Seeks to Contain the Flames', Los Angeles Times, 30/10/90.

³⁷⁷ Silber/Little, Death, p. 109.

³⁷⁸ Kadijevec, View, pp. 89-90.

³⁷⁹ Silber/Little, Death, pp. 106-109.

³⁸⁰ See, for instance: Woodward, Tragedy, p. 149.

³⁸¹ Kadijevec, View, pp. 118-119; Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 10; idem, Origins, p. 98.

³⁸² Zimmermann, Origins, p. 99.

³⁸³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 100. For a description of the atmosphere in Zagreb at that time, see: Drakulic, Communism, pp. 169-178.

tried to persuade a Croatian JNA officer to leave the federal army with the words: 'We are at war with the JNA.' A few days later, the Yugoslav army demanded that Spegelj should be arrested on the suspicion of preparing a civil war. The Croatian authorities refused to co-operate. Instead they declared that they would welcome foreign help in the event of a federal attack. In a sense, that help had already been offered by the American ambassador Warren Zimmermann who informed the authorities in Belgrade on 17 January that the West would not accept an armed intervention by the JNA in Croatia.³⁸⁴ The British government followed suit.³⁸⁵

But the most extraordinary offer of help to Croatia came from Milosevic himself. He had been aware of the existence of the KOS film since the middle of October but had apparently not acted on that knowledge.³⁸⁶ Shortly before the broadcasting of the incriminating footage on 25 January, he had already mentioned to his loyal follower Borisav Jovic that Serbia would not resist a Croatian secession. The JNA would have to withdraw from a large part of Croatia and to move to those areas where the Serbs formed a majority. At almost the same time, on the evening of 24 January, Milosevic informed the Slovenian President Kucan that Slovenia could separate from Yugoslavia so far as he was concerned.³⁸⁷ Some two months earlier, Jovic, the Serbian member of the federal presidium, had told his Slovenian colleague Janez Drnovsek that the Serbian leadership would not oppose Slovenian secession.³⁸⁸ This information tallied with a speech that Milosevic gave to the European Community ambassadors on 16 January (see the introduction to this preview) and with the announcements that Milosevic had made to the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs Gianni de Michelis at the beginning of 1991.³⁸⁹

However, the JNA had not yet gone as far as Milosevic. The army still had the official duty of defending Yugoslavia's unity.³⁹⁰ The army leadership continued to hesitate between occupying Krajina, as supported by Milosevic and Jovic, and preserving Yugoslavia.³⁹¹ Meanwhile, the political problems were mounting and had now begun to affect the federal republic of Macedonia. On 25 January, the day of the broadcasting of the KOS footage, the Macedonian parliament had accepted a declaration of independence and a plan to discuss its secession from Yugoslavia.

Politics in Slovenia and Croatia head towards secession; turmoil in Serbia

On 23 December 1990, 88.5% of all Slovenes who were eligible to vote had supported a referendum for independence. Two months later, on 20 February 1991, the Slovenian parliament accepted an amendment that declared that the Federal Yugoslav government was no longer authorized to govern the republic. Slovenia became a 'autonomous, sovereign and independent country', that would only continue to remain a part of the Yugoslav federation for six months at the very most. This was followed by far-reaching preparations for separation: the country stopped payments to Belgrade, it set up a form of diplomatic representation abroad and introduced its own currency. The day after the Slovenian parliament's actions, the Croatian house of representatives also decided that the laws of its own republic should prevail over federal legislation. Moreover, the Croatian government received the go-ahead to start preparing for separation.

In March 1991, Serbia seemed to be experiencing a transformation that had been unleashed by the masses and had already occurred in Czechoslovakia, East Germany and Roumania. For several days from 9 March onwards, hundreds of thousands of people, under the command of student leaders and ³⁸⁴ Kadijevic, View, p. 119; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 99; Silber/Little, Death, p. 112.

³⁸⁵ Eyal, Europe, p. 2.

³⁸⁶ Silber/Little, Death, p. 117.

³⁸⁷ Silber/Little, p. 113. Also Zimmermann, Origins, p. 145; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 111.

³⁸⁸ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 110.

³⁸⁹ Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 77.

³⁹⁰ Silber/Little, Death, pp. 114-115.

³⁹¹ Silber/Little, Death, pp. 114-115; Jovic, Dani, pp. 255-257 and 259.

the opposition leaders Vuk Draskovic and Zoran Djindjic, took to the streets of Belgrade to challenge the results of the December election and Milosevic's grip on the media. Expressions of support to the demonstrators occurred in a number of major Serbian cities. Milosevic's government appeared to be undermined. However, he managed to remove the movement's sting by consenting to some of the students' demands and by using the media to point out the dangers of Serbian disunity at a time of sharp ethnic contrasts. For the rest, the JNA's tanks and armoured cars did the work that the police appeared – either intentionally or unintentionally – incapable of doing: dispersing the demonstrators. Tanks rolled through the streets of Belgrade for the first time since 1944. A student was shot after a policeman had been stoned to death by demonstrators. Apparently this people could be beaten. Later the media received a tape where Adzic could be heard urging the police to beat the demonstrators until their officers were exhausted.³⁹²

Moreover, the JNA had acted at the request of Jovic, Milosevic's paladin in the state presidium.³⁹³ The writing was on the wall. The demonstrations meant that the fates of both Milosevic and the army were now bound together. At the same time, the JNA had suffered a sensitive defeat in the presidium. Jovic had called a meeting of the federal state presidium for 12 March. Rather than tackling the subject of the demonstrations, this meeting was to discuss the January proposal concerning the disarming of the paramilitary units in Croatia. Once it had gathered, the entire presidium was transported by military bus to Topcider, the presidium's emergency seat in times of war. The highlights of this meeting were later broadcast on television. Jovic gave a sombre picture of the country's situation. All the enemies from World War Two had returned to the Yugoslav stage and included the Ustashe, the Cetniks and the Albanians. On behalf of the Supreme Command, Kadijevic proposed declaring a state of national emergency so as to allow for general mobilization. All the republics' paramilitary units had to be abolished; military service must once again be served in the normal way. However, the state presidium rejected these proposals.

On 13 March 1991, Kadijevic, the federal Minister of Defence, flew to Moscow to ask the Russian Minister of Defence Dmitrii Yazov for support if a JNA coup were to be followed by a Western intervention. His actions were undertaken with the permission of Jovic, the chairman of the federal presidium, but without the rest of the presidium's knowledge. Several months earlier the JNA had also gauged international reactions to the possibility of a coup by sending Mamula to London, Adzic to Paris and Admiral Stane Brovet to Moscow. They were given to understand that London and Paris would not oppose the coup and Moscow would even support it although the Russian government would not admit this publicly. There was no point in Kadijevic asking for Washington's views on this subject.³⁹⁴ While Kadijevic was visiting Moscow on 13 March, Warren Zimmermann made it clear in Belgrade that the American government would halt all economic aid to Yugoslavia if the JNA were to resort to violence.³⁹⁵

The Russians informed Kadijevic that the West had no plans for military intervention in Yugoslavia. However, his hosts avoided the question of support. But Kadijevic had seen enough; the Russians had offered him not so much as a drink, not even mineral water. On the way back, he commented to his assistant Colonel Vuk Obradovic that the Russians were 'in a dreadful state'. But his subsequent conclusions completely reflected the situation in Yugoslavia. He thought that Gorbachev's days were numbered, that it would not be long before the 'real' Communists would attempt to seize power in Russia. And that is exactly what happened later that year. When Kadijevic returned to Belgrade, he told Jovic: 'We're going for the coup.'³⁹⁶

On 14 and 15 March, the presidium continued its meeting with the JNA leadership. Jovic was still unable to convince a majority of the state presidium to support the declaration of a state of ³⁹² Zimmermann, Origins, p. 108.

³⁹³ Zametica, Conflict, p. 42.

³⁹⁴ Silber/Little Death, p. 126. Also Zametica, Conflict, p.42.

³⁹⁵ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 458, n. 27.

³⁹⁶ Svarm, 'Kill', Based on Jovic's published diary notes; Silber/Little, Death, p. 127.

national emergency. At Milosevic's command, Jovic resigned as chairman of the state presidium on 15 March. Milosevic also ordered the resignation of the members representing Kosovo, Vojvodina and Montenegro who were under his control. His aim was to do away with the state presidium. In a television speech on 16 March, Milosevic said that Yugoslavia was finished and that Serbia could no longer respect the federal authority.³⁹⁷ He declared that he had ordered the mobilization of special reservists and the immediate creation of extra Serbian paramilitary units.³⁹⁸ Milosevic appeared to be creating the maximum of space for the JNA to act on its own authority.

On the next day, 16 March, Milosevic called the 200 mayors of Serbia to a closed strategy meeting in Belgrade. Speaking to them, he set the tone for the violent xenophobia of the next few years with the following slogans: Serbia was in great danger; the West hated the Serbs; a united Germany would attempt to extend its control over the Balkans; Slovenia and Croatia were Germany's puppets; if the Serbs were unable to work, they could still fight. Serbia would no longer accept the federal government's decisions. Milosevic argued that Yugoslavia was in 'the terminal phase of its death throes'.³⁹⁹

Milosevic also made it clear that the Slovenes and Croats could leave Yugoslavia, but not the Muslims. All the Serbs had to be united in a single state. A few days later he repeated his resolutions almost literally at a meeting with two hundred students.⁴⁰⁰

However, Milosevic was mistaken if he thought that he could kill off the state presidium by withdrawing four members. With Markovic's support, the four remaining members met and declared that they would continue to function as the state presidium. This completely upset the plans of the JNA's coup leaders. Moreover, there was probably still a level of mutual mistrust between Milosevic and the JNA. Milosevic feared that a JNA coup would undermine his political position in favour of the armed forces. Conversely, the JNA was afraid that Milosevic would push the army aside as soon as he had achieved his goal of uniting all the Serbs in a single state. The coup did not take place.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Command of the JNA had taken it upon itself to change its task concerning Greater Serbia. It would no longer try to preserve Yugoslavia's unity; rather it would protect the rights of the ethnic groups that wanted to remain a part of Yugoslavia. These were primarily Serbs and Montenegrins. What Kadijevic later described as a 'peaceful separation' would be sought for the other groups that no longer wished to remain a part of Yugoslavia.⁴⁰¹ In other words: in terms of its tasks, the JNA was in the process of becoming a Serbian army. The objectives of Milosevic and the 'federal' army were increasingly one and the same but the federal army leadership still found it extremely difficult to abandon Yugoslavia. The army leadership had informed the Serbian leaders on 25 February that from then on they would work with the SDS in Croatia so as to keep Tudjman's HDZ under control.⁴⁰² On 19 March, the JNA publicly announced its new task: the army would fight ethnic unrest, protect the borders and prevent republics from leaving the federation against the other republics' wishes.⁴⁰³

The next day, the Serbian National Assembly corrected Milosevic's mistake by refusing to accept Jovic's dismissal as the state presidium's chairman. Jovic returned to the presidium along with the representatives of the three other areas who had resigned their seats a few days previously.

³⁹⁷ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 102-103.

³⁹⁸ Silber/Little, Death, p. 128.

³⁹⁹ Rick Kuethé, 'Grimmige logica in Belgrado', Elsevier, 23/03/91, p. 40; Stephen Engelberg, 'Carving Out a Greater Serbia', The New York Times, 01/09/91.

⁴⁰⁰ Silber/Little, Death, pp. 129 and 131.

⁴⁰¹ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 117 and 121.

⁴⁰² Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 116.

⁴⁰³ See also: Libal, Limits, p. 25.

10. How should Yugoslavia proceed?

The republics' presidents met several times over the following months so as to discuss a new political structure for Yugoslavia.

Slovenia and Croatia proposed a confederation. By contrast, Serbia and Montenegro suggested a stronger concentration of power at a federal level. The presidents of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, Alija Izetbegovic and Kiro Gligorov, tried to mediate with a proposal for an asymmetrical confederation. This was to be constructed around Serbia and Macedonia, with a slightly more loosely-associated Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, and with Croatia and Slovenia retaining as much sovereignty as possible. Izetbegovic had his reasons for attempting to mediate: he believed that Bosnia would not survive the death of Yugoslavia.⁴⁰⁴ He had no positive expectations of either Milosevic or Tudjman. As he said himself, choosing between them was like choosing between leukaemia and a brain tumour.⁴⁰⁵

He had every reason to say this. On 25 March, a meeting had taken place between Milosevic and Tudjman at Tito's former hunting lodge in Karadjordjevo. Despite their different opinions, both presidents had a symbiotic relationship⁴⁰⁶ because of their strongly-nationalist politics, a relationship that was rarely more clearly defined than on that day. During a four-hour discussion, they agreed to work together for two more months so as to prevent Yugoslavia's disintegration. Moreover, they spoke of a possible exchange of territory where Tudjman would agree to give up the Serbian areas of Croatia (which were mainly in Krajina) in return for the Croatian parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina. It went without saying that Serbia could do what it liked with the rest of Bosnia. This proposal also allowed for the possibility that the Muslims would retain a small area.⁴⁰⁷

Tudjman had already suggested this division of Bosnia-Herzegovina to Milosevic in 1990. Here, he was harking back to the 1939 agreement between Cvetkovic and Macek. The Croats who were involved felt that Milosevic reacted to the proposal in a positive way. According to the Croatian presidium member Stipe Mesic, Milosevic said that personally he was not particularly concerned about Croatia and the Croatian Serbs; his objective was to incorporate two-thirds of Bosnia into Serbia.⁴⁰⁸ On 12 June 1991, this proposal for a Greater Serbia and a Greater Croatia would also be presented to the Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic (for further information, see Part I). However, the Karadjordjevo Agreement had no real influence on events in Krajina.

After the Serbian National Council of the Serbian Autonomous Region of Krajina had proclaimed a declaration of independence on 28 February, skirmishes between the Serbian militias and the Croatian police were to continue there throughout the month of March. At the end of the month, members of the Serbian Krajina militia tried to occupy the Plitvice National Park, a tourist attraction in the overwhelmingly Serbian region of Lika. The attempts by the Croatian police to prevent this resulted in the first two deaths in Croatia's ethnic tensions: a Croatian police officer and a Serbian militiaman. The 29 Serbs who were arrested included eight members of special units from Serbia. On 1 April, the Serbian activists in Krajina, Slavonia, Baranja and Western Srem (see the map on page #) took the unilateral decision to announce that they, as the Serbian Autonomous Region, had been annexed by Serbia. Krajina's Serbian National Council decided that henceforth its territory would only be governed by the laws of Serbia and Yugoslavia.

⁴⁰⁴ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 115.

⁴⁰⁵ Thompson, House, p. 95.

⁴⁰⁶ Also Hirs/Hellinga, Zeit, p. 174.

⁴⁰⁷ Also Zimmermann, Origins, p. 117; Patrick Moore, 'A Bizarre Media Campaign in Croatia', RFE/RL Newline vol. 1 no. 34 (20/05/97), part II; Bodansky, Offensive, pp. 48-49; Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 127-131; Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia: The Secret War. Croats Who Supped with the Devil', The Guardian, 18/03/96.

⁴⁰⁸ Davor Butkovic, 'Mesic. I drugi su Hrvatski politicarai svjedocili pred istraziteljima Suda u Haagu!', Globus, 16/05/97, pp. 14-15; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 126.

Serbian paramilitary units began to form not only around Knin but also in Western and Eastern Slavonia, where the population was more ethnically mixed than in Krajina. They were regularly provoked by extremists from Tudjman's party, the HDZ. On 2 May 1991, Croatian police were ambushed by Serbian paramilitaries in the village of Borovo Selo near Vukovar. Twelve of them were killed along with three citizens. The Serbian ultra-nationalist Vojislav Seselj proudly declared on TV Belgrade that his Cetniks had been involved in this incident. Radmilo Bogdanovic, who had been Serbia's Minister of Internal Affairs from 1987 to March 1991 and was subsequently a shadowy figure in the Serbian secret service, later said that the Serbian authorities had provided the weapons for Borovo Selo.⁴⁰⁹ The JNA encircled the village after this incident.

It was not just the Croats and the Serbs who were killing each other. In the first six months of 1991, there were many victims amongst the Croatian Serbs who still tried to reach a settlement between both parties and were killed by their militant fellow residents.⁴¹⁰ Moderate Serbs were frequently threatened, abused or even murdered – usually by paramilitary agents – if they did not seem prepared to take a stand or at least to keep their mouths shut.⁴¹¹ 'What's most important for a people is to know who its enemies are', said the Serbian paramilitary leader Arkan who was soon to make a name for himself.⁴¹² The Serbian areas of Croatia demonstrated what so often precedes a radical conflict: that the moderate forces in the middle became the first victims.

In reaction to the events in Borovo Selo, demonstrations of Croats were held the next day in the Croatian towns of Zadar and Sibenik, during which the household goods of Serbs were smashed. On 6 May, Croats attacked Yugoslav troops who were guarding the navy base in Split. Kadijevic, the federal Minister of Defence, subsequently declared the country to be entering a civil war and proclaimed a state of national emergency. The JNA received the presidium's approval, which had been previously withheld, so as to disarm the paramilitary units in the insurgent republics. Jovic gave the army permission to intervene in situations of ethnic unrest, and the presidium decided that the army should be used to protect the Serbs in Krajina.⁴¹³ In addition, the JNA began to arm the Serbs there.⁴¹⁴ JNA Chief-of Staff Blagoje Adzic took advantage of Kadijevic's absence in hospital to deploy JNA units not only in one-third of Croatia's territory but also in the 'Serbian' parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The JNA's actions had immediate consequences for the troops' ethnic make-up. Soldiers from Slovenia, Croatia and Kosovo failed to show up for mobilization. Macedonia would only permit its conscripts to serve in its own territory and therefore made no direct contribution to the JNA's new combat plan. So the federal army increasingly depended on Serbian reservists. The result of this was that the JNA abandoned the final remnants of Yugoslavism and began to create ethnically-homogenous units.

Jovic's permission for the JNA's new course of action came several days before the annual rotation of the presidium's chairmanship. He was to be succeeded by the Croat Stipe Mesic on 15 May 1991. Although Mesic was a HDZ member, he was a moderate one. He was married to a Serb and the Ustashe had wiped out virtually his entire family during the Second World War. Nonetheless, Milosevic and the army found his appointment unacceptable. If Mesic were to take office, he would probably distance himself from his predecessor's decision to allow the JNA to act de facto as the protector of the Serbs in Krajina. Therefore, Mesic's appointment was obstructed by the Serbian bloc in the state presidium. Consequently, the Federation of Yugoslavia no longer had a president and the federal agencies were paralysed. The exception was the JNA that felt that it now had carte blanche.

Events followed each other in rapid succession. Four days after Mesic should have been appointed, a referendum about independence was held in Croatia just as it had been some five months

⁴⁰⁹ Silber/Little, Death, p. 142.

⁴¹⁰ Caroline de Gruyter, 'Wie niet meedoet legt het loodje', Elsevier 19/10/91, pp. 44-49.

⁴¹¹ See, for instance: Williams/Cigar, War Crimes, n. 171.

⁴¹² Haviv, Blood, p. 70.

⁴¹³ Silber/Little, Death, p. 145.

⁴¹⁴ Silber/Little, Death, p. 145.

earlier in Slovenia. With a turn-out of 84%, 93% supported independence. This meant that an important section of the urban Serbs must have voted for independence.

For a moment it seemed as if the impending catastrophe might still be averted. During a series of discussions between the presidents of the separate republics, an agreement was reached in principle on 6 June about a confederation of sovereign republics that was proposed by Izetbegovic and Gligorov on behalf of Bosnia and Macedonia. However, after the meeting, the Serbian authorities denied ever having agreed with the agreement in principle.

On 11 June 1991 the Slovenian government declared that the country would proclaim its independence on 26 June. Slovenia would then take over the federal authority's responsibility for the checkpoints on the borders with Italy, Austria and Hungary. In addition, all Slovenes would be withdrawn from the federal agencies. The Yugoslav army would also have to withdraw from Slovenian territory. Slovenia would eventually introduce its own currency.

Croatia's government, which had previously announced that 30 June would be its independence date, now decided to opt for Slovenia's choice because it did not want to remain in the federation without its Slovenian ally, not even for just four days.⁴¹⁵

In fact, both Slovenia and Croatia declared independence on 25 June 1991.

⁴¹⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042. DEU/berichtgeving d.m.v. coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Fietelaars 151 aan het Luxemburgse EG-voorzitterschap, 31/05/91.

Chapter 5

The West and Yugoslavia before the crisis

‘It is a tragic paradox that though no one in Europe wishes to see Yugoslavia collapse, no one knows how to control the destructive forces that are at work within it.’⁴¹⁶

In a sense, Yugoslavia was fiction so far as the West was concerned until the beginning of the 1990s. It had been misunderstood; the country’s independent status during the Cold War had been exaggerated; the decentralization of power had been mistaken for a form of democracy; and workers’ self-rule was wrongly viewed as a liberalization of the economy. When, from 1989 onwards, the realities of this country became increasingly obvious to those both at home and abroad, they were simply too complicated to be easily understood. Moreover, the Western media and policy-makers were involved with other issues such as the virtually-silent revolutions that ended the Communist regimes elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union’s simultaneous liberalization and dismantling, and the Gulf War.⁴¹⁷ Here, the question is whether the ultimate outcome would have been different if the West had paid greater attention to Yugoslavia’s internal developments.

1. The Dutch relation with Yugoslavia until 1990

Just like the other Western countries, Yugoslavia’s special status during the Cold War was a constant factor in Dutch foreign politics that was to have far-reaching consequences.⁴¹⁸ The Netherlands did not have an articulate Eastern European policy until the end of the 1980s.⁴¹⁹ The government did not have this kind of policy and the parliament did not request it. The Netherlands had kept its distance during the Cold War and, when required, had simply followed the policy of NATO or the EC.⁴²⁰ At the Dutch parliament’s request, the Minister of Foreign Affairs Hans van den Broek, finally produced a memorandum in 1988 called Dutch Policy Concerning Eastern Europe, Yugoslavia and Albania. However, it contained virtually no policy proposals. Little attention was paid to Yugoslavia and that also applied to the subsequent written and verbal consultations between the government and the parliament.⁴²¹ The memorandum stated that the Netherlands had ‘always greatly appreciated the way in which Yugoslavia had given shape and content to its independent position in a positive way.’ The memorandum emphasized the country’s economic problems. Minister Van den Broek felt that Yugoslavia was ‘well aware’ that only its continued orientation towards the West would provide the necessary solace.⁴²²

In October 1970, Tito was the first president of a Communist country to pay an official state visit to the Netherlands. He was warmly received. The relations between the Netherlands and Yugoslavia remained cordial after his death in 1980, and there were regular meetings between the various ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence. When the Yugoslav presidium member Lazar Kolisevski visited the Netherlands in mid-December 1981, he described the relations between the two countries as being friendly and without problems. In April 1984, Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers visited President Mika Spiljak who informed him of the Yugoslav authorities’ concern about their country’s ⁴¹⁶ Lendvai, Yugoslavia, p. 261.

⁴¹⁷ Also Callahan, Wars, pp. 75 and 97.

⁴¹⁸ The following description for the period 1975-1989 is primarily based on Baudet, Aandacht, pp. 213-251.

⁴¹⁹ Unlike the usual views, Baudet concludes that the Dutch governments during the period 1972-1989 did in fact have an Eastern European policy where human rights in the form of roll-back strategy played an important role; Aandacht, pp. 253 and 257

⁴²⁰ Van den Heuvel, Leven, pp. 8, 158 and 166; Boussard/Van Ham, Continuïteit, passim.

⁴²¹ TK 1987-1988, 20564, nos. 3 - 7.

⁴²² TK 1987-1988, 20564, nos. 1-2.

growing nationalism. This did not prevent Van den Broek from announcing during the same visit that Dutch arms supplies would be subsequently permitted because the Dutch government believed that Yugoslavia was adopting an increasingly-independent stance regarding the Eastern bloc.⁴²³

There was also close contact between delegations of Dutch MPs and members of the federal Yugoslav house of representatives. Moreover, the Netherlands had a special relation with Yugoslavia in terms of foreign aid. Here, Yugoslavia was the only Western country with which the Netherlands maintained permanent co-operation. The ministers responsible held talks about this virtually every year.⁴²⁴ For instance, the Netherlands financed agricultural courses for Third World students that were held in Yugoslavia. In addition, the Netherlands was part of the same electoral group in the International Monetary Fund so that the finance ministers of both countries maintained frequent contact. Here, the Netherlands helped to arrange loans for Yugoslavia in the second half of the 1980s.⁴²⁵

The Hague was aware of human rights violations in Yugoslavia,⁴²⁶ but for a long time these were less serious than in other Eastern European countries and – more importantly – criticism could have alienated the Belgrade government. The Dutch parliament was also less critical of Yugoslavia than it was of other Eastern European countries. During the period 1975-1989, only one question about Yugoslav human rights violations was asked in parliament; it was posed by the pacifist-socialist (PSP) MP Fred van der Spek in 1984.

In the 1980s, the Kosovan Albanians' efforts to achieve a higher level of autonomy met with as little sympathy from the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs as they did in other countries. At first, this reticence remained unchanged until the mid-1980s when Yugoslavia's edge over other Eastern European countries concerning human rights issues, was reversed. An Amnesty International campaign in the spring of 1985 focused attention on the 2200 people in Yugoslavia who had been condemned on political grounds over the previous three years. However, this did not lead to the Dutch government taking the measures in Belgrade that Amnesty had hoped for. Apart from the Dutch Helsinki Committee, Amnesty International was the only non-official group in the Netherlands to focus on the human rights situation in Yugoslavia. In 1988, when Minister Van den Broek was asked about his views concerning Serbian nationalism and its consequences for Yugoslavia as a whole, he argued that the success of the planned constitutional and economic reforms would determine the extent to which Yugoslavia would be able to overcome its 'national problems'.⁴²⁷

From the mid-1980s onwards, the combination of Yugoslavia's declining importance in international relations and the country's internal tensions led to increased criticism in the West. The first sign of a change in the Dutch position could be detected when Van den Broek visited Belgrade on 10 November 1987, some months after the eighth session of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia when Milosevic had seized power from Stambolic.

During lunch, various representatives of Yugoslav human rights organizations pointed out to the Dutch minister that it would be impossible to achieve the country's required economic changes without first implementing political reforms. These political reforms would not occur while the Communist Party was in power. They argued that the republics' growing alienation would only be increased by the Communist divide-and-rule policy that stirred up nationalist sentiments, and that the republics could not secede because of Yugoslavia's position in the international power constellation. An ⁴²³ G. van de Kreeke, 'Nieuwe benadering betekent doorbraak. Nederland mag wapens leveren aan Joegoslavië' [New Approach Means Breakthrough. The Netherlands Can Supply Weapons to Yugoslavia], de Telegraaf, 26/04/84. See also: 'Planinc Holds Talks with Netherlands' Lubbers', Tanjug, 24/04/84, 1753 and 'Spiljak Receives Netherlands Premier Lubbers', Tanjug, 25/04/84, 1336.

⁴²⁴ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁴²⁵ TK 1987-1988, 20564, nos. 1-2, p. 17; interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁴²⁶ See also: TK 1987-1988, 20564, nos. 1-2, p. 17.

⁴²⁷ TK 1988-1989, 20564, nos. 3 and 4, question 41 plus answer.

answer was not forthcoming when Minister van den Broek asked about what was still keeping the country together.

Van den Broek told Premier Mikulic that it was partly due to Dutch pressure that a recent European Investment Bank loan to Yugoslavia had been increased from 380 to 550 million ecu. However, he wondered whether the money would vanish into a bottomless pit if there was no political reform.

The European Community had signed a preferential co-operation agreement with Yugoslavia in 1980.⁴²⁸ Nonetheless, by the end of the 1980s, it began to be confronted with a dilemma where a higher level of financial aid to the republics would simply strengthen their resolve for increased autonomy. This would not benefit the Yugoslav economy as a whole. It was doubtful whether donations of money to Belgrade would actually end up in the right hands, particularly as the Belgrade government had an increasingly bad reputation for human rights.

The EC policy concerning Eastern Europe was strongly influenced by economic considerations such as the presence of market-oriented ideas, a structure of tax legislation that protected private property relations, infrastructure, modernizing production machinery and the issue of foreign debt. Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia were granted a form of association with the EC because they had made the most rapid and far-reaching advances concerning these points; Yugoslavia fell by the wayside.

Like other Western diplomats in Belgrade and, for instance, Minister of Defence Kadijevic⁴²⁹, the Dutch ambassador to Yugoslavia A.J.A.M. Nooij initially felt that the energetic Milosevic was the man who could possibly reverse Yugoslavia's process of disintegration. An additional factor here was that Milosevic passed as being liberal in economic terms. However, Nooij soon had to abandon all hope when it became obvious to him that Milosevic was definitely not the 'consensus figure' who could preserve the country from further misfortune. In April 1989 following the authorities' heavy-handed actions against the Albanians in Kosovo, Van den Broek informed Kovic, the Yugoslav ambassador to The Hague, that the West would increasingly take the side of the Kosovan Albanians if Belgrade were to pursue this course. Nonetheless, the governments of both the Netherlands and other Western countries did everything they could to avoid the impression that they sympathized with the people in Yugoslavia who were put on trial for criticizing Belgrade's dominant position.

However the Belgrade government made it increasingly difficult for the West to hide its criticism. On 28 March 1989, the Dutch ambassador did not attend the festivities in the Serbian parliament to mark the ending of an autonomous Kosovo where 22 people had just been killed. The Dutch diplomat stated that this was 'an objectionable spectacle'. On 28 June 1989, he and most of his colleagues also failed to appear at the commemoration of the 600th anniversary of the Battle of Kosovo.⁴³⁰ Nonetheless, at the same time, Yugoslavia along with Hungary, Poland and the Soviet Union were granted guest status at the Council of Europe.⁴³¹ However, in the same year Yugoslavia was informed that there was no question of entry to the European Community or the Council of Europe while European diplomats were still denied access to the country's political processes.

From the summer of 1989 onwards, Ambassador Nooij repeatedly hinted at Yugoslavia's disintegration. On 23 June 1989, five days before the commemoration of the Battle of Kosovo, he wrote to The Hague: 'Rien mais vraiment rien ne va plus entre Serbie et la Slovénie' ('Nothing but nothing still works between Serbia and Slovenia'). 'The alienation of these two republics has now assumed such forms at every level and area of society that a return of a consensus policy no longer seems possible.' He observed separatist trends in both Slovenia and Serbia.⁴³² On the same day, he stated that relations between the republics and provinces had 'degenerated to such a point that one must fear for the ⁴²⁸ A non-preferential trade agreement had been previously signed in 1970.

⁴²⁹ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 77.

⁴³⁰ Also Zimmermann, Origins, p. 19.

⁴³¹ R. Sieckman, Sovjet-Unie in Raad van Europa? ('Soviet Union in Council of Europe?'), Trouw, 24/06/89.

⁴³² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00408, Nooij 76, 23/06/89.

federation's continued existence'.⁴³³ The sense of alienation between Serbia and Slovenia (and later Croatia) as caused by the Kosovo issue, and disagreement about the economic policy were frequently mentioned in the dispatches that he and Fietelaars, who succeeded him at the end of 1990, were sending to the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs.⁴³⁴

2. Prophets on the sideline

At the beginning of the 1990s, the entire Western world was waiting for Croatia and Slovenia's declarations of independence. However, in Western Europe this was often based on the unjustified hope that it would not necessarily lead to a catastrophe and that the predicted crisis might just blow over.⁴³⁵ By contrast, there were numerous articles in, for instance, The New York Times about the Yugoslav federation's potential disintegration.⁴³⁶ In May, the former German chancellor Willy Brandt argued in vain for the formation of a European intervention force so as to secure peace in Yugoslavia.⁴³⁷

Prophesying the conflict: Dutch politics

The outbreak of conflict in Yugoslavia had also been predicted by a wide political spectrum in the Netherlands.⁴³⁸ 'You hardly needed to be a prophet to be able to prophecy a civil war in Yugoslavia', remarked Eimert van Middelkoop, a MP representing a Protestant party called the Gereformeerde Politiek Verbond (GPV). His comments came at a meeting on 11 July 1991 of the Parliamentary Commission for Foreign Affairs that was to discuss the events that followed Croatia and Slovenia's declarations of independence.⁴³⁹ At the beginning of the 1980s, when he was working as A.J. Verburg's parliamentary assistant, Van Middelkoop had been detained for an hour at Skopje railway station after trying to make photographs of Kosovo from a train.⁴⁴⁰

Theo Kralt, the foreign secretary of the CDA Christian Democrat party, had spoken with the Slovenian Christian Democrat premier Lozje Peterle when he had visited as a member of a CDA delegation of foreign specialists in February 1991. Kralt warned in the March 1991 edition of CD/Actueel that Yugoslavia would have to abandon its present political form. The country had to become a confederation or else it would disintegrate. He felt that the minorities' position in the republics that were gaining independence was such that the Council of Europe would need to supervise the implementation of human rights. The EC would also have to contribute so that the process of political reform would occur peacefully.⁴⁴¹ 'If there ever was an armed conflict and crisis that could have been predicted after the Second World War, then it's the one in present-day Yugoslavia', wrote Olaf van Boetzelaer in the CD/Actueel party publication of the autumn of 1991. Van Boetzelaer was a member of the CDA Central and Eastern Europe working party and was also the head of the Analysis

⁴³³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00408, Nooij 75, 23/06/89.

⁴³⁴ See, for instance: ABZ, DDI-DEU/ARA/00408, Nooij 143, 13/12/89; Nooij 38, 28/02/90; Nooij 109, 20/07/90; Fietelaars 198, 19/12/90.

⁴³⁵ See, for instance: Maarten Lak, 'The Involvement of the European Community in the Yugoslav Crisis During 1991', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 176; Libal, Limits, p. 11; 'Yugoslavia Is On the Brink of a Ruinous Internal Ethnic Struggle', Nieuwweek, 15/01/90; Maren Köster-Hetzendorf, 'Auf Tito schießen, um Jugoslawien zu töten', Die Presse, 21/06/89.

⁴³⁶ See, for instance: 'A Single Yugoslavia, Pluralized', The New York Times, 29/12/89; One Yugoslavia or Six?, ibidem, 31/01/90; Chuck Sudetic, As Croatia Goes, Will All Yugoslavia?, ibidem, 05/05/90; ibidem, Ethnic Revolutions Push Yugoslavia to Edge, ibidem, 14/10/90; Why Keep Yugoslavia One Country? ibidem, 10/11/90.

⁴³⁷ Eyal, Europe, p. 10.

⁴³⁸ Westerman, Brug, p. 100.

⁴³⁹ TK 1990-1991, 22181, no. 2, p. 8.

⁴⁴⁰ Interview E. van Middelkoop, 08/10/99.

⁴⁴¹ Theo Kralt, 'Joegoslavië. Voortzetting federatie niet haalbaar, maar ook confederatie problematisch' [Yugoslavia. Continuation Federation not Feasible, but Confederation also Problematic], CD/Actueel, 30/03/91, pp. 8-9.

Department of the Dutch Foreign Intelligence Service. He continued, ‘however, it has to be admitted that the majority of political authorities in the West – and the Dutch political authorities are no exception here – have created the impression of being insufficiently prepared for the outbreak of this crisis.’⁴⁴²

‘Rarely has conflict been so repeatedly predicted and in such detail as the war in the former Yugoslavia’, was how the liberal democrat D66 MP Bob van den Bos later described this situation in 1997.⁴⁴³

The Socialist PvdA MP Gerrit Valk published an article in his party’s magazine Voorwaarts following a visit to the PvdA’s sister organization in Slovenia in April 1990. This article was called ‘Yugoslavia Does Not Exist’ and it had been drastically cut by the editors because of its gloomy tone.⁴⁴⁴ But the gloominess still pervades even the abbreviated version:

‘The adjective ‘Yugoslav’ resounds like a curse in the ears of all true Slovenians. Chairman Pucnik of our sister organization Socialdemokratska Zveza Slovenije even declared recently that Yugoslavia no longer exists. While borders are disappearing in Western Europe, there is an increasing call for Slovenia to opt for secession. Hence, Yugoslavia seems to be returning to the state structure that preceded the two World Wars. During discussions in the corridors at the SDZS’s founding congress, it seemed to me that the Social Democrats regard a confederation as simply being a tactical move towards an independent Republic of Slovenia (...). Yet the foundation of a new, independent state that is half the size of the Netherlands and has a population of two million is less alluring for the rest of Europe. And that’s not to mention the creation of the independent republics of Croatia, Bosnia-Hercegovina, Serbia, Montenegro and Macedonia along with the additional possibility of Kosovo and Vojvodina. So what will the future hold for the Balkans?’⁴⁴⁵

Valk’s colleagues also found his article too morbid and asked if he had eaten something that had disagreed with him.⁴⁴⁶ Shortly afterwards, in mid-May 1990, he attended the London conference for young parliamentarians. Here, he discussed his fears concerning Yugoslavia’s disintegration with President Vasil Tupurkovski of Macedonia who also dismissed his concerns out of hand.⁴⁴⁷

However, Valk was not alone. For instance, a month earlier, Sir Michael Howard, the chairman of the distinguished International Institute for Strategic Studies, had asked in a lecture about how much longer the amalgam of the former Habsburg and Christian-Orthodox areas of Yugoslavia would be able to survive.⁴⁴⁸ The Amsterdam historian M.C. Brands wrote in the autumn of 1990 that Yugoslavia was already in a state of ‘semi-permanent civil war’.⁴⁴⁹ Valk was also not the only one to be disbelieved. When the journalist Misha Glenny wrote in a February 1991 report for the BBC that the leaders of Yugoslavia ‘were stirring a cauldron of blood that would soon boil over’, he was reprimanded by his superiors because his piece was too ‘alarmist’. Unlike at the beginning of the 20th century, they felt that there were to be no more Balkan wars at its end.⁴⁵⁰

⁴⁴² Olaf van Boetzelaer, ‘EG-politiek in Joegoslavië baseerde zich op onvoldragen analyse’ [EC Politics in Yugoslavia Based on Premature Analysis], CD/Actueel, 23/11/91, p. 20. Similar descriptions in: Olaf van Boetzelaer, ‘Bosnië’ [Bosnia], CD/Actueel, 14/11/92, p. 14.

⁴⁴³ Bob van den Bos, ‘Aanval op de oorlog’ [Attack on the War], Idee, June 1997, p. 29.

⁴⁴⁴ G. Valk to the NIOD, 31/05/00.

⁴⁴⁵ G. Valk, ‘Joegoslavië bestaat niet’ [Yugoslavia does not exist], Voorwaarts, 15/04/90, p. 25.

⁴⁴⁶ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

⁴⁴⁷ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99; G. Valk to the NIOD, 31/05/00.

⁴⁴⁸ Howard, Remaking, p. 102.

⁴⁴⁹ M.C. Brands, Een conservatieve beschouwing over Europese veiligheid, Nederlandse defensie tegen een nieuwe achtergrond, pp. 17-18.

⁴⁵⁰ Glenny, Balkans, p. 634.

Finally, the Protestant SGP party magazine De Banier warned shortly afterwards that Yugoslavia was on the point of disintegration and that the time for discussion was over. Civil war would automatically follow if Serbia's Communist leadership did not adopt a more constructive approach. The same also applied if the Serbian opposition failed to tone down its nationalism and if the Croatian government resorted to violence against the Serbian minority in Croatia.⁴⁵¹

Prophesying the conflict: the Foreign Intelligence Service

In the Netherlands, the Foreign Intelligence Service (IDB) wrote in July 1990 that Tito's Yugoslavia 'was finished' after the elections in Slovenia and Croatia, and the Albanian MPs' declaration of independence. The Dutch Intelligence Service argued that Slovenia and Croatia's desire for at least a confederation and possibly even independence was incompatible with the Serbian demand for a more efficient federation. With considerable foresight, the secret service did not exclude the chance that Serbia would also leave the state but that it would then impose demands concerning the Serbian areas outside of Serbia. Both political 'solutions' involved the prospect of war: either a civil war or a war of separation. The IDB felt that Bosnia-Herzegovina risked being divided up between Croatia and Serbia. However, Yugoslavia's internal conflict would entail little danger at an international level now that the Cold War was over.⁴⁵²

Three-and-a-half months later, the service observed that the federal perspective was farther away than ever. Greater Serbian objectives now had to be taken into account that could lead to the borders being altered. Bearing in mind Yugoslavia's history, this development could result in bloodshed. The IDB considered the election in Bosnia-Herzegovina on 18 November 1990 to be of great importance. If this 'Little Yugoslavia' remained harmonious after this election, then there was still hope for Yugoslavia as a whole.⁴⁵³

More than a week before Croatia and Slovenia's declarations of independence, the IDB stated that there was a 'real' risk of armed combat between Slovenian and Yugoslav forces following the conflict around the import of Slovenian goods into Serbia. If Slovenia and Croatia were to proclaim independence, then there was a likelihood of 'large-scale violence', and Italy and Austria would probably have to deal with an extensive stream of refugees. Moreover, irregularities could follow in Kosovo and Macedonia that – in the case of Macedonia – could also affect Bulgaria and Greece. Finally, the service detected a 'growing pressure for independence' amongst the Muslim population of Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴⁵⁴

In fact, the Dutch authorities and politicians were not the only ones who were aware of the coming conflict. Before Croatia and Slovenia's declarations of independence, the number of reservations for holidays in Yugoslavia for the summer of 1991 had already fallen by 80 to 85% in comparison with the previous year.⁴⁵⁵

3. The summer of 1990 to the summer of 1991: a wretched idleness

‘The war is here. I recognize it now. It tricked me – it tricked all of us.
It's in our waiting for it to begin.’⁴⁵⁶

⁴⁵¹ H. Lenselink, Buiten onze grenzen ('Beyond Our Borders'), De Banier, 30/05/91, pp. 12-13.

⁴⁵² ABZ, 911.31 Yugoslavia, Part IV, IDB-rapport 5125/RC/90, Centrifugale tendenzen in Joegoslavië versterken zich, 30/07/90.

⁴⁵³ ABZ, 911.31, Yugoslavia Part IV, IDB-rapport 8099/RC/90, Joegoslavië drijft verder uiteen, 12/11/90.

⁴⁵⁴ ABZ, 911.31, Yugoslavia, Part IV, IDB-rapport 4610/RC/91, Slovenië en Croatië aan de vooravond van de afscheiding, 17/06/91.

⁴⁵⁵ 'Toeristen krijgen advies Joegoslavië te mijden' [Tourists Advised to Avoid Yugoslavia], de Volkskrant, 29/06/91. See also: Nicles Lucas, 'De zon schijnt hier tevergeefs' [The Sun Shines here in vain], Trouw, 03/07/91.

⁴⁵⁶ Drakulic, Communism, p. 178.

During the previous months, the Dutch government and parliament had repeatedly discussed the new structures of a European security policy and the nature of the possible risks to security. Here, the nationalist aspirations in Yugoslavia were constantly mentioned as prototypes of possible conflicts in Central and Eastern Europe. The Western governments, including the Dutch government, could not be blamed for failing to spot the dramatic developments in Yugoslavia that would lead to conflict between Serbia and the republics that were working towards separation.⁴⁵⁷

In the summer of 1990, Ambassador Nooij wrote to the Dutch Foreign Affairs department as he was leaving Belgrade that the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia was on the point of disintegrating.⁴⁵⁸ There was open discussion of the possibility of a confederation of Slovenia, Croatia and potentially a part of Bosnia-Herzegovina, along with a Greater Serbia that would also encompass Montenegro, Kosovo and Vojvodina. The Dutch diplomat argued that the possibility that this revolution would involve violence could not be excluded because the Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic had already announced that the borders would have to be revised so that every Serb would be able to live in Serbia without having to give up his current abode in Croatia or Bosnia-Herzegovina. Similarly, on the basis of mutatis mutandis, Tudjman would also accept nothing less on behalf of the Croats.⁴⁵⁹ The Eastern Europe department of the Europe Directorate of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs agreed with this assessment. Violence would be the result of the federation's disintegration but, conversely, it seemed that violence was all that could keep the federation together.⁴⁶⁰

A meeting of NATO's Political Committee on 31 July 1990 revealed that this observation was shared by most other Western countries.⁴⁶¹ There was no question of there being any real choice here so it was also impossible to draw up a policy. Only the United States supported greater activism.

The American view of Yugoslavia from 1990 to 1991: unity and democracy

The USA was the country that had been confronted with Yugoslavia's economic problems for the longest period of time. In the 'National Security Decision Directive 133' of 14 March 1984, President Reagan observed that Yugoslavia's financial situation endangered the country's stability so that that it had been weakened in terms of the Warsaw Pact. He therefore announced that the United States along with other Western countries would strengthen economic relations with Yugoslavia and would help to stimulate a free market economy within the country.⁴⁶² But this was to no avail. When the President of Slovenia, Janez Stanovnik, visited the United States in October 1988, he stated at a Washington press conference that his country was on the brink of civil war.⁴⁶³

Less than half a year later, in March 1989, the US State Department decided to fundamentally alter its policy concerning Yugoslavia. So far as America was concerned, Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger had established that Yugoslavia had by now lost its geo-political importance of the Cold War period. The Polish and Hungarian economies were more open than Yugoslavia's. Moreover, Yugoslavia had a poor record in terms of human rights. The new American ambassador to Belgrade, Warren Zimmermann, who had been previously made responsible for human rights issues at the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), was asked to convey that message when presenting his credentials to President Raif Dizdarevic of Yugoslavia and his Minister of Foreign ⁴⁵⁷ Also Both, Indifference, p. 71.

⁴⁵⁸ Unless otherwise stated, the following information about the official Western reactions to the developments in Yugoslavia between the summers of 1990 and 1991 is based on the internal Foreign Affairs memorandum by H. Hazewinkel, 'Het beleid t.a.v. Joegoslavië, 1990-1993', 11/03/93, which the author has placed at the disposal of this report, and Both, Indifference, pp. 72-98, which is based on the same piece.

⁴⁵⁹ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 1.

⁴⁶⁰ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 1.

⁴⁶¹ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 3.

⁴⁶² National Security Decision Directive 133, 14/03/84, <http://www.fas.org/irp/offdocs/nsdd/23-2222t.gif>, consulted 08/01/2001; Gervasi, Germany, p. 42.

⁴⁶³ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 443, n. 51.

Affairs, Budimir Loncar. He was able to add that Washington still greatly appreciated Yugoslavia's unity, independence and territorial integrity, but that its unity could only be supported on the basis of democracy.⁴⁶⁴ At almost the same time, Eagleburger told the American senate that Milosevic had created a dangerous situation in Yugoslavia: 'I don't yet say it's come to the point of a real likelihood of shooting. But it is far the worst situation with regard to the nationality question that we've seen since the close of the war.'⁴⁶⁵ Zimmermann's diplomatic intervention met with little success. Loncar informed him that neither the federal government nor the army could restrain Milosevic's Kosovo politics. And, according to Loncar, Milosevic was not remotely interested in the West's opinion about this.⁴⁶⁶ Indeed, the Serbian president, who already suspected what Zimmermann would want to tell him, waited for ten months before receiving the American ambassador. In addition, Zimmermann soon discovered once he arrived in Belgrade that Milosevic's Kosovo policy was immensely popular with the Serbs.⁴⁶⁷

In October 1989, President George Bush received Premier Markovic who was respected in the West for his attempts to implement economic reforms that would promote a free market economy.⁴⁶⁸ Markovic was expecting aid from the West. He was hoping that the American government would provide a billion dollars so as to bail out the Yugoslav banking system and that the World Bank would lend an additional three billion dollars. However, he could offer no guarantee of Yugoslavia's successful future. In fact, he warned that it would be difficult for him to continue his political reforms against the Communist hard-liners. Moreover, his reform policy could create a drastic increase in unemployment that in turn could lead to serious ethnic tensions within the six republics and the two autonomous provinces.⁴⁶⁹ Washington rejected Markovic's request for aid on the basis of the human rights violations in Kosovo and because the American Treasury, which determined the financial and economic aid policy, was only willing to help those countries in Eastern Europe that were prepared to leave all traces of Communism behind them.⁴⁷⁰

Shortly after this visit, the American diplomats in Belgrade outlined a worst case scenario where aggressive nationalism would result in Yugoslavia's disintegration. Such a development would be accompanied by extreme violence and probably war. However, Zimmermann's frightening message met with little response at a meeting in Brussels of the American ambassadors to Europe, which was also attended by Secretary of State James Baker.⁴⁷¹

Meanwhile, Washington's policy towards Yugoslavia maintained a combination of unity and democracy. The State Department felt that these two concepts were intrinsically linked. Slovenia's secession, which would possibly be followed by Croatia, could result in intervention from Serbia and the JNA. This would mean the end of democracy. On the other hand, unity without democracy was not feasible because the longing for democracy was also the driving force behind Slovenia and Croatia's desire for separation.⁴⁷²

The State Department maintained a largely non-active approach to Yugoslavia for almost a year after its policy was changed. The reason for this was that the ultra-conservative Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina was criticizing Lawrence Eagleburger for the financial interests that he had had in Serbian and Slovenian companies at a time when he was out of office.⁴⁷³ In addition, as he stated during ⁴⁶⁴ Zimmermann, Ambassador, pp. 2-3; idem, Origins, pp. 7-8.

⁴⁶⁵ Quoted in Zimmermann, Origins, p. 8.

⁴⁶⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 16.

⁴⁶⁷ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 17.

⁴⁶⁸ See, for instance: Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 173; Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 28 and 42.

⁴⁶⁹ Gervasi, Germany, p. 44; Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 46-47.

⁴⁷⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 51.

⁴⁷¹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 41.

⁴⁷² Zimmermann, Origins, p. 41.

⁴⁷³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 58. In the 1980s, Eagleburger had helped to set up two Yugoslav companies in the United States: the LSB Bank, a branch of the Ljubljanska Banka, and Global Motors/Yugo of America, a branch of the Yugoslav a speech in Berlin in 1989, Baker felt that the promoting of political and economic reforms in Eastern Europe was first and foremost a task for the European Community.⁴⁷⁴

At the beginning of 1990, Eagleburger ceased avoiding the subject of Yugoslavia and visited Belgrade on 25 February 1990. President Stanovnik of Slovenia impressed upon him that his republic was moving towards secession and that Yugoslavia was on the point of following the unfortunate example of the Lebanon, a country that had been ruined by civil war. Peter Jambreč of the Slovenian DEMOS party showed how relentlessly the Slovenians were striving for independence. Slovenia would not be dissuaded from achieving its objective by the threat that this could be accompanied by bloodshed. This was something that could happen in the rest of Yugoslavia but not in Slovenia. It was for this reason that politicians in Ljubljana felt that they did not need to take this into account. The Croat Vladimir Seks, who was a member of Tudić's HDZ party, informed Eagleburger that his party would adopt a Greater Croatian stance if Yugoslavia's internal borders were tinkered with.⁴⁷⁵

At this time, David Gompert was Senior Director for Europe and Eurasia and Senior Deputy to the National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft. After Eagleburger's visit, Gompert sent instructions to all American embassies in Europe to communicate to their respective governments America's concerns regarding Yugoslavia and to ask them to support the American policy of unity and democracy. Washington also referred to the elections that were soon to be held in the republics and that could result in forces coming to power that advocated Yugoslavia's dissolution. This was met with little reaction on the European governments' part.⁴⁷⁶

Meanwhile, Washington remained somewhat powerless. During his discussions in Belgrade, Eagleburger had made it clear that there was no question of the United States resorting to any form of violence to oppose secession, a message that was later reiterated by Zimmermann.⁴⁷⁷ On the other hand, Washington turned down a Croatian request for 'technical help to improve the police' in December 1990.⁴⁷⁸

From the spring of 1990 onwards, the American government ensured that its opinion concerning the developments in Yugoslavia would not be misunderstood. In June 1990, when the Serbian parliament declared a state of emergency in Kosovo and the Kosovan members of the house of representatives were sent home, the American government induced the European Community to join it in implementing the first phase of the CSCE's 'human dimension' mechanism against Yugoslavia. This concerned the country in question providing information about its human rights situation and its willingness to discuss this within the context of the CSCE.⁴⁷⁹ The US also informed Belgrade that any future aid from America would depend on Yugoslavia's political developments.⁴⁸⁰ Washington cancelled Secretary of State Dick Cheney's visit to Belgrade, which had been planned for the first week of July 1990.

Both the European Community and NATO's Political Committee were frankly disappointed by the Belgrade federal authorities' answer to the CSCE procedure. It showed that the federal Yugoslav authorities were unable to distance themselves from Serbia's position of intolerance.⁴⁸¹ Like Washington, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague had established in October and November 1990 that Yugoslavia was only being kept together for negative reasons.⁴⁸² Nonetheless, the extra European Council of government leaders from the European Community member states met in Rome arms manufacturer Zavodi Crvena Zastava and an importer of 'Yugo' cars, 'Lawrence of Serbia', The New Republic, 24/02/92; David Binder, 'Eagleburger Anguishes Over Yugoslav Upheaval', The New York Times, 19/06/92.

⁴⁷⁴ Quoted in: Centro Studi di Politica Internazionale, Lessons.

⁴⁷⁵ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 58-59.

⁴⁷⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 64-65.

⁴⁷⁷ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 62 and 73.

⁴⁷⁸ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 95; Laura Silber, 'The Terrifying Logic of War', Financial Times, 02/09/95.

⁴⁷⁹ Callahan, Wars, p. 116. Austria also participated in this diplomatic action, Mock (hg.), Balkan-Dossier, pp. 68-69.

⁴⁸⁰ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 4.

⁴⁸¹ Hazewinkel, Beleid, pp. 5-6.

⁴⁸² Hazewinkel, Beleid, pp. 6-7.

on 27 and 28 October. Apparently without discussion, it expressed the wish ‘that the current process of democratic evolution in Yugoslavia will succeed in developing respect for human rights and maintaining the country’s unity and territorial integrity’.⁴⁸³ Here, Washington and Europe were on the same wavelength: unity and democracy. At that point, there was a strong desire both in the EC and the United States not to support the ‘centrifugal’ forces in Yugoslavia.

The European view of Yugoslavia 1990-1991: democracy before unity?

Once a particular policy had been established by the European Community, there was not much willingness to change it. This position was partly determined by the fact that the French and German governments had reached agreement after the fall of the Berlin Wall concerning the idea that German reunification had to be embedded in the process of European integration that also needed to be developed in greater detail. The provisional result of this would have to be the acceptance of a monetary and political union in 1991. During this stage, the consensus within the European Community (EC) needed to be maintained as much as possible. The Dutch Minister Hans van den Broek also supported this approach.⁴⁸⁴ A similar desire to avoid cracks in the fortress prevailed at NATO that had been strongly involved in discussions after the end of the Cold War about the legitimacy of its continued existence. This organization came into being in 1949 with the aim of defending member states’ territory. ‘Out of area’ operations were not in principle a part of its objective although they were not completely excluded by the Washington treaty that had set up NATO.

This did not mean that there were no divergent opinions within the Western community. On 6 November, NATO’s German political advisor underlined his country’s somewhat extraordinary position with the remark: ‘if a choice has to be made between Yugoslavia’s stability and unity on the one hand, and democracy and human rights on the other, then priority must be given to the latter concern’.⁴⁸⁵ The German political director repeated this comment more than a week later at the European Community’s Comité Politique (CoPo), whose meetings were attended by the political directors of the EC member states’ Ministries of Foreign Affairs.⁴⁸⁶

The Europe Directorate of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs then added the following: ‘According to the current situation, the greatest supporters of Yugoslavia’s unity are not the greatest supporters of its democracy.’⁴⁸⁷ Although the dilemma was obvious, the policy remained unclear. Federal Premier Markovic, who supported economic reform but had no power base, was the only person who could enable the West to ignore the problem for the time being.

Yugoslavia was not particularly high on the priority list of the American foreign policy for 1990 and the first half of 1991. Much of the White House’s attention was taken up with Iraq’s occupation of Kuwait, the creation of an international coalition and armed forces along with the short-lived Gulf War. In addition, Washington’s foreign policy establishment was preoccupied with events in the Soviet Union. Yugoslavia’s possible division could not be detached from the potential dissolution of the Soviet empire or of other Eastern European nations. Opinions concerning the relevant policy differed between the State Department and the Pentagon. The State Department opposed any form of dissolution in Yugoslavia because it did not want the Soviet Union to follow this example.⁴⁸⁸ By contrast, the Pentagon hoped that a peaceful separation of Yugoslavia’s component parts could serve as a positive example to the Soviet Union. However, the State Department won the argument in Washington and its position met with much approval in the European capitals including The Hague.⁴⁸⁹

⁴⁸³ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 7; Both, Indifference, p. 90.

⁴⁸⁴ Both, Indifference, pp. 81 and 85.

⁴⁸⁵ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 8.

⁴⁸⁶ Both, Indifference, p. 90.

⁴⁸⁷ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 8. Also Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 70.

⁴⁸⁸ Gutman, Witness, p. 2.

⁴⁸⁹ Both, Indifference, pp. 79-80 and 84-85.

In April 1991, the American intelligence service, the CIA, warned that the Balkans would be particularly susceptible to ethnic differences after the end of Communism. The agency felt that this situation was the most dangerous in Roumania and Yugoslavia. Civil wars and even widespread wars could break out there.⁴⁹⁰ In November 1990, the CIA presented the National Intelligence Estimate, an evaluation of Yugoslavia, to President Bush. It detailed the Serbian striving for hegemony within Yugoslavia alongside the other republics' desire for a higher level of autonomy or even secession. It felt that there was a high chance of bloodshed as a result of these conflicting developments and predicted revolts amongst the Albanians in Kosovo and the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia. A civil war was clearly on the cards but would probably not happen within the next two years. The US and Europe would be unable to preserve the country's unity. The CIA proposed that the American government's policy should focus on maintaining Yugoslavia's external borders.⁴⁹¹

Curtis Kamman, the State Department's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Eastern European, Yugoslav and Soviet Affairs, admitted to J.H. Meesman, the Dutch ambassador to the United States, that the West could do little or nothing to prevent the outbreak of violence in Yugoslavia.⁴⁹²

The American Congress paid less attention to the developments in Croatia and Slovenia than it did to the abominable human rights situation in Kosovo that had been strongly criticized in 1990 by the State Department's annual report on Yugoslavia's human rights.⁴⁹³ Senator Bob Dole of Kansas and Representative Tom Lantos of California argued for an improvement here especially after Dole and two other senators had visited Kosovo in the summer of 1990 and had witnessed the Serbian police using tear gas and clubs against the 10,000 Albanians who had waited for the Americans' arrival.⁴⁹⁴ This visit also had consequences in terms of the support that Yugoslavia could henceforth expect from the United States.

No unity means Yugoslavia's excommunication

The US Congress accepted the 1991 Foreign Operations Appropriations Law 101-513 on 5 November 1990. This act presented the prospect of financial aid to Eastern European countries that demonstrated their willingness to introduce a free market economy. It also included a number of economic measures that were directed at regimes that were hostile to Washington: Angola, Cambodia, Cuba, Iraq, Iran, Libya, Syria, North Korea and Vietnam.

The Republican Senator Don Nickles of Oklahoma, who had visited Kosovo with Dole in the summer of 1990, managed to add an amendment to this law so that Yugoslavia was added to this list of 'pariah' countries, an inclusion that was against the Bush administration's wishes.⁴⁹⁵ This meant that the law stipulated that within six months the United States would cut off all forms of financial aid, loans and credit loans to Yugoslavia and would freeze trade relations with the country if the human rights situation in Kosovo was not improved. Financial and economic relations would also be severed with the six republics until free elections were held there. In addition, the law stated that in the future oppositional 'democratic forces' would be supported financially. Americans working at international ⁴⁹⁰ Director of Central Intelligence, Future, pp. 181-183.

⁴⁹¹ Michael Putzel, 'Intelligence Report Predicts Collapse of Yugoslav Federation', The Associated Press, 28/11/90; David Binder, 'Yugoslavia Seen Breaking Up Soon', The New York Times, 28/11/90; Stephen S. Rosenfeld, 'A Timely Warning: The CIA Predicts a Blowup in Yugoslavia', The Washington Post, 30/11/90; K. Royce and P.J. Sloyan, 'The U.S. Waited. Back in June, CIA Told Bush of Atrocities', Newsday, 14/08/92; Gutman, Witness, p. xxiv; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 84.

⁴⁹² Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 9.

⁴⁹³ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 126-127; Callahan, Wars, pp. 72 and 116; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, pp. 21-25. For the human rights report on Yugoslavia, see: the United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, pp. 3-15. Kosovo features prominently in the rest of this hearing's report. See also the limited attention that was generally paid to Yugoslavia in: United States House of Representatives, Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Policy.

⁴⁹⁴ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 127-130.

⁴⁹⁵ For the history of Nickles' amendment, see: Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, pp. 30-33.

organizations such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund were expected to implement this policy within these agencies. The amendment affected a sum that was less than five million dollars. The measures became effective on 6 May 1991 but were suspended by Baker some two weeks later because he did not support the idea that the whole of Yugoslavia would be made to suffer for Serbia's behaviour.

Meanwhile, the amendment had an extremely adverse effect on American-Yugoslav relations, and especially on those with Serbia.⁴⁹⁶ The Nickles amendment was later copied to some extent in Europe. A Council of Europe delegation stated on 6 February 1991 that Yugoslavia would not be admitted to the Council of Europe until federal elections had been held there. There was even the threat of economic measures if these failed to occur over a longer period of time.

On 21 February 1991, the Sub-Committee on European Affairs of the American Senate's Committee on Foreign Relations held a special hearing about Yugoslavia, an event that had not occurred in a long time. The reasons behind this meeting were the awareness that Yugoslavia had become dramatically less important in geo-political terms and the fact that the country now appeared to be on the brink of civil war.⁴⁹⁷ Senator Joseph R. Biden, who chaired the hearing, stated that Yugoslavia's altered strategic importance meant that criticism of its government could no longer be withheld.

He also criticized the government's position that was based on the twin points of unity and democracy. For him, it was not a given that these points should continue to exist alongside each other in contemporary Yugoslavia, and he was supported in this opinion by Bob Dole.⁴⁹⁸ Nonetheless, Serbia was still championed on Capitol Hill by the Democratic Senator Jim Moody of Wisconsin and his Republican colleague Helen Delich Bentley of Maryland.

It was particularly Bentley, whose ancestors had emigrated from Serbia to the United States 'long before it was part of Yugoslavia' who had, as she admitted herself, 'strong feelings on the subject'.⁴⁹⁹ She objected to the hearing's title ('Civil War in Yugoslavia: The United States Response') and pointed out that Yugoslavia had not yet reached that situation. As an alternative, she suggested 'Preventing Yugoslavia's Internal Strife: An Accommodation Must be Found'. The sub-committee wanted to go no further than replacing the word 'war' in the title with 'strife'.⁵⁰⁰

The EC European Council, which had no solution to Yugoslavia's seemingly inevitable bloody separation process other than that of the USA, could do little else than advise against the use of violence and 'express the hope that the dialogue between the republics and the Federal authorities would lead to a new Yugoslavia that would be based on freedom and democracy'.⁵⁰¹ It was along these lines that the ambassadors representing the troika of the EC's past, present and future chairmen took direct steps at the federation and wrote to the republics' authorities in Yugoslavia.⁵⁰²

Following the deliberations of the political directors of the member states' Ministries of Foreign Affairs on 6 and 7 February 1991, it was decided that the Yugoslav republics' representatives should not be received by members of the Twelve so as to emphasize the preference for Yugoslavia's unity.⁵⁰³

However, Prime Minister Lubbers circumvented this agreement several days later by receiving Premier Lozje Peterle of Slovenia who was also chairman of his country's Christian Democrats. Peterle was visiting the Netherlands and their meeting was held under the pretext that it concerned contact ⁴⁹⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 131.

⁴⁹⁷ United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, p. 1.

⁴⁹⁸ Ibidem, pp. 2 and 37.

⁴⁹⁹ United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, p. 48.

⁵⁰⁰ Ibidem.

⁵⁰¹ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 15.

⁵⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Van den Broek to the Belgrade embassy, 04/02/91, celer 5; ibidem, Coreu message from the Luxembourg EC chairmanship, 08/02/91, cpe/pres/lux 150.

⁵⁰³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Schoen 14 to Van den Broek, 07/02/91.

between two politicians from the Christian Democrat European People's Party.⁵⁰⁴ Peterle assured Lubbers that Slovenia's separation could be implemented without violence. However, Croatia's separation would involve violence, but this would not deter Slovenia from declaring independence.⁵⁰⁵

In fact, Lubbers was not alone in breaking the EC agreement. For instance, on 20 March the German Minister of Foreign Affairs Hans-Dietrich Genscher received the Slovenian President Milan Kucan and Minister Rupelj of Foreign Affairs. Genscher urged them not to take any hasty or biased steps.⁵⁰⁶

However, Van den Broek wanted to keep the EC agreement during Peterle's visit so he was replaced by Peter van Walsum, his Director General of Political Affairs. The Slovenian president convinced Van Walsum, a senior civil servant, that a Western policy that still focused on the maintenance of Yugoslavia's territorial integrity was unlikely to influence the governments of either Slovenia or (most probably) Croatia.⁵⁰⁷ Nonetheless, in terms of both Europe and discussions with American government representatives, Van Walsum realized that there was no possibility of altering the Western point of view so as to provide a higher level of support to the republics from which, he felt, more democratic awareness could be expected than from the Belgrade leadership.⁵⁰⁸

In February 1991, Washington informed the EC countries that it had already undertaken so many initiatives in Belgrade that it now expected a higher level of action on the part of Europe.⁵⁰⁹ Moreover, despite the fact that the Americans strongly supported Yugoslavia's unity, both the Serbian and JNA leaderships constantly suspected that they were actually undermining it.⁵¹⁰ The participants of the CoPo discussions agreed on 4 March that:

‘ultimately respect for territorial integrity must carry the greatest weight in those cases where the arguments both for and against the conservation of a country threatened with disintegration are more-or-less keeping each other in check. Agreement was reached that a life-threatening situation would be created in Central and Eastern Europe if those politicians who are confronted with ethnic problems begin to view the founding of a new state as an ‘easy way out’. This situation would be effectively a recipe for violence that would result in human rights abuses which would be considerably worse than those that are currently occurring in Kosovo.’⁵¹¹

The next day, the European Council repeated its statement of 4 February and confirmed its support for Yugoslavia's unity and territorial integrity.

However, it remained unclear just how actively the EC should implement its point of view. Fietelaars had succeeded Nooij as ambassador in Belgrade on 3 October 1990. Following his initial optimism, he soon changed his mind about the developments in Yugoslavia⁵¹² and strongly opposed the dispatching of European mediators to Belgrade: ‘There is no way that an outsider would return ⁵⁰⁴ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 16.

⁵⁰⁵ Hazewinkel, Beleid, pp. 16-17.

⁵⁰⁶ Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 931.

⁵⁰⁷ Both, Indifference, pp. 82-83; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Van den Broek circ. 152 to the Washington and Belgrade embassies, 28/02/91.

⁵⁰⁸ Both, Indifference, pp. 83-84.

⁵⁰⁹ See, for instance: ABZ, DEUARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Van den Broek circ. 152 to the Washington and Belgrade embassies, 28/02/91; ibidem, Van den Broek to the Luxembourg embassy, 05/03/91, celer 21.

⁵¹⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 101 and 123.

⁵¹¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Van den Broek 152 to the Luxembourg embassy, 05/03/91, celer 21; Both, Indifference, p. 91.

⁵¹² Both, Indifference, pp. 73-74.

from the hornets' nest of Yugoslavia in one piece.'⁵¹³ America's proposals also met with luke-warm reactions elsewhere in the EC.

Following the demonstrations on 9 March in Belgrade, J.D. Blaauw, a member of parliament for the Conservative Liberalist VVD party, presented questions that discussed the situation in Yugoslavia. He urged that the European Community troika should be sent to inform the Yugoslav government that any future aid would depend on compliance with human rights and respect for a pluriform democracy. In addition, Blaauw remarked that he feared for 'an extremely explosive situation' if the democratization process was not completed in Yugoslavia. Action by the EC that would involve both the federal government and the republics would have to be taken so as to prevent military conflict.

Prime Minister Lubbers commented that this proposed mission was already the subject of discussion amongst the 12 member states. When asked about the Dutch contribution here, he replied that the government in The Hague was investigating how the 'Twelve could turn this step 'into concrete action'.⁵¹⁴

Looking back in 1998, Fietelaars wrote about how, as the Dutch ambassador, he had observed the Luxembourg chairmanship in Belgrade. He also stated that the catastrophic forces that were operating between the Croats and Serbs in Krajina had become obvious by the Easter weekend of 24 and 25 March 1991. The dramatic events of mid-March were apparently realized in Belgrade by that time. From then on, it also became clear that only Bosnia-Herzegovina was still prepared to support the federal structure.⁵¹⁵ Therefore, on 28 March the troika of EC ambassadors presented a statement to Loncar, the Yugoslav Minister of Foreign Affairs, that once again emphasized the need for a peaceful solution to the problems along with respect for human rights. A united and democratic Yugoslavia would have the best chance of being integrated into the new Europe⁵¹⁶. This was also primarily intended as a signal to Slovenia and Croatia that if they separated, they could not automatically count on rapid economic and political help from the EC.

On the same day, Ambassador Zimmermann of the United States presented Premier Markovic with a similar message from President Bush that placed an even greater emphasis on Yugoslavia's continued unity.⁵¹⁷ President Bush also phoned the Yugoslav premier in person.⁵¹⁸ Moreover, on 11 April Zimmermann urged Kadijevic that the JNA should not resort to the use of violence.⁵¹⁹ The NATO's North Atlantic Council of 27 March considered the situation in Yugoslavia to be extremely serious although tensions seemed to have decreased to some extent since the middle of March 1991. Despite its concern, the North Atlantic Council did not want to issue any public statements for fear that the Serbs in particular would conclude that dark forces from the West would facilitate separation. The Council left it up to the EC and the separate member states to voice their concern and to urge mutual dialogue instead violence along with democracy, respect for human rights and minorities, and the maintenance of Yugoslavia's unity and territorial integrity. Only the representative of a small member state expressed a somewhat divergent opinion by stating that Yugoslavia's unity could result in greater instability than would be created by the separation of Croatia and Slovenia.⁵²⁰ Austria received no support from the other countries when it proposed the implementation of the second phase of the CSCE mechanism on 28 March following the Serbian actions in Kosovo. Yet Serbia's reaction to ⁵¹³ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 18.

⁵¹⁴ TK 1990-1991, Handelingen, p. 3375, 12/03/91.

⁵¹⁵ ABZ, 109, 1998. Fietelaars 18 to Van Mierlo, 28/01/98.

⁵¹⁶ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 24; Confidential Information (187).

⁵¹⁷ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 24. See also: ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042. DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Van den Broek 084 to the Washington embassy, 25/03/91; Confidential Information (188).

⁵¹⁸ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 122.

⁵¹⁹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 123.

⁵²⁰ Confidential information (175)

Austria's 13-point complaint was clearly alarming. The Serbian government stated that its human rights violations were understandable in the light of the 'separatist tendencies' in Kosovo.⁵²¹

The EC troika of Gianni de Michelis, Jacques Poos and Hans van den Broek then visited the Yugoslav leaders President Jovic, Premier Markovic and Minister Loncar of Foreign Affairs.⁵²² The aim of this visit was to emphasize to the country's leadership that Yugoslavia's disintegration would hamper closer co-operation with the EC because of its destabilizing effects on the Balkans. Moreover, the troika stressed that violence was not the solution and that federal elections also needed to be organized.

In the report of his visit which he presented during the Council of Ministers on 5 April 1991, Van den Broek made it clear that there was a very real chance that civil war would break out in Yugoslavia if Slovenia and Croatia decided to separate from the federation because this in turn would provoke an extreme reaction from the Serbs. During his discussions, Van den Broek became aware of the fact that nationalist sentiment in Yugoslavia was so powerful that the EC would be virtually unable to exert any form of influence.

These impressions were backed up by President Kucan of Slovenia who told EC government leaders at the beginning of April that Slovenia was now virtually certain to separate.⁵²³ Bearing in mind the Netherlands' upcoming EC chairmanship, Ambassador Fietelaars notified the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 19 April 1991 that Greece was already treating Milosevic as a head of state and that Italy and Germany also seemed to be reconsidering their positions in terms of Belgrade. This message was partly prompted by a conversation between J.L. Werner, the embassy's Undersecretary, and Drago Bekic who was a Croatian and Tadjman's personal advisor. Bekic was extremely critical of the discussions between the Troika and Premier Markovic of Yugoslavia. He argued that the federal agencies were being increasingly excluded and that the republics' presidents now constituted the only real power, a claim that Fietelaars described as a 'premise that is becoming difficult to dismiss'.

Although Bekic believed that it would still be difficult to discuss a confederation, he nonetheless felt that foreign mediation was needed because otherwise Serbia, with the JNA in the background, would exert a disproportionate influence on these discussions. Bekic blamed Western Europe for following America's example and emphasizing multi-party democracy and a market economy. He argued that it was insufficiently aware of the nationalities issue and the problems' historical roots. The West had to understand that the conflict between Croatia and Serbia was dominated by the fundamental antithesis between the 'European West' and the 'Eastern South' where Serbia stood for despotism, orthodoxy and nationalism. Bekic told the Dutch diplomat that Croatian troops would take action 'in the near future'.⁵²⁴ Werner was also informed that 26 June would be crucial for the area's independence. This date came six months after the referendum where the Slovenes had supported separation from the Yugoslav political structure.⁵²⁵

These developments again prompted the Eastern Europe department of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs to enquire about the feasibility of the EC position of maintaining Yugoslavia's territorial integrity and unity. The moment was 'probably nigh (...) that the only possibility is to guide Yugoslavia's disintegration in such a way that bloodshed can be avoided and that a part of the federal structure may still be retained'.⁵²⁶ The German government seemed to have reached the same conclusion but the EC as a whole had not yet progressed this far.⁵²⁷

⁵²¹ Mock (Hg.), Balkan-Dossier, pp. 69-71.

⁵²² Reports in: ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Coreu message from the Luxembourg EC chairmanship, 06/04/91, cpe/pres/lux 316; ibidem, Van den Broek 23 to Belgrade, 07/04/91.

⁵²³ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 29.

⁵²⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405, Memorandum, CdP/Belgrade to DEU/OE, no. 1455, 19/04/91.

⁵²⁵ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 29.

⁵²⁶ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 31.

⁵²⁷ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 32; Both, Indifference, pp. 91-92.

It's not good but you can no longer be sure that it's really bad'

The Netherlands maintained an attitude of 'wait and see' in terms of the position of both the EC and NATO. Yet it remained unclear about what could be done to protect Yugoslavia from disintegration and civil war. There was also a lack of consensus at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Ministry's civil servants felt that both Fietelaars and the Europe Directorate were being overly alarmist.⁵²⁸ There was even the suggestion of 'crying wolf' because since Tito's death the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had been constantly informed that Yugoslavia was on the brink of disintegration. The usual NATO scenario was that Yugoslavia would collapse and then be invaded by the Soviet Union.⁵²⁹ The American diplomat Ron Neitzke later remarked, 'During the Cold War, for forty-five years, we were obsessed about Yugoslavia. It was one of the top three potential tinderboxes for World War III. The resources focused on that country were enormous.'⁵³⁰

The Dutch attitude in general was illustrated by the book Joegoslavië in crisis ('Yugoslavia In Crisis') which Marius Broekmeier wrote for the Clingendael Institute in 1985 and where he demonstrated that Yugoslavia's collapse had already passed the point of no return. Only three hundred copies of this book were sold.⁵³¹ Warnings from Belgrade and the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs' regional policy department were virtually ignored by the rest of the Ministry.⁵³² There, the attitude towards Yugoslavia was one of 'it's not good but you can no longer be sure that it's really bad.'⁵³³ Elsewhere, the fact that Yugoslavia still existed ten years after Tito's death was viewed as an indication that there was still hope for the country.⁵³⁴

However, the Dutch Ministry of Defence and the armed forces closely followed the developments in Yugoslavia during the spring of 1991. On 27 February, the Defence Chief-of-Staff General P. Graaff commented at the Defence Council that the situation was giving cause for concern. Now that Croatia and Slovenia were heading towards independence, he felt that it was no longer possible to create a compromise between the federal government and the republics. Similarly, he argued that there was an increasing likelihood of a JNA intervention so as to retain Communism and the federal political structure.⁵³⁵ After the Dutch defence authorities had initially thought that there would be a return to stabilization,⁵³⁶ the Defence Chief-of-Staff confirmed at the Defence Council of 22 May that, along with the problems concerning the federal agencies, 'the conditions for further unrest are clearly present'. At this point, B.J. van Eenennaam was the head of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Atlantic Co-operation and Security Directorate. Although he tended to be less pessimistic, Van Eenennaam warned at the same meeting that the West had few resources at its disposal that were capable of influencing the situation in Yugoslavia. He felt that the only means of providing some respite would be an association agreement with the EC to maintain the country's integrity.⁵³⁷

At the beginning of May, the Military Intelligence Service detected an escalation of relations in Krajina. This was partly because of the events in Borovo Selo where the Croatian police had been ambushed by the Serbian paramilitary (see: Chapter four). The Service did not exclude a JNA coup ⁵²⁸ Both, Indifference, p. 77; interview A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

⁵²⁹ Interviews H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00, H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00 and P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99; Both, Indifference, p. 80. Also Sanz, Army and Woodward, Tragedy, p. 72. In his book The Third World War: a Future History Sir John Hackett had described in 1978 how a build-up of tension between East and West would lead to conflict between NATO and Warsaw pact troops in Slovenia.

⁵³⁰ Quoted in Cohen, Hearts, p. 173.

⁵³¹ J.G. Siccamo, 'Nogmaals: ex-Joegoslavië' [Once again Ex-Yugoslavia], Armex, July/August 1993, p. 5.

⁵³² Both, Indifference, p. 80.

⁵³³ Interview H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00.

⁵³⁴ Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 69; interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

⁵³⁵ KAB, report of a Defence Council meeting, 27/02/91.

⁵³⁶ Ibidem, report of a Defence Council meeting, 27/03/91.

⁵³⁷ Ibidem, report of a Defence Council meeting, 22/05/91.

d'état. The consequence of all this would be the disintegration of Yugoslavia's armed forces along ethnic lines, which in turn increased the prospect of civil war.⁵³⁸

The Hague cancelled a spring visit by State Secretary Van Rooy of the Ministry of Economic Affairs. It was announced that she would be pleased to travel to Yugoslavia in the autumn once the situation had become clearer.⁵³⁹ Nonetheless, Vice-Premier Kok visited Belgrade on 27 May where he spoke with a number of people including Premier Markovic of Yugoslavia.

In an interview on 4 May, A. Mock, the Minister of Foreign Affairs for Austria (which was yet an EC member) argued that the European Community should provide a mission of peace-keeping troops. He felt that it was too late for calls to reject violence and that rapid action was needed; otherwise a civil war would break out that would have consequences for the whole of Europe.⁵⁴⁰ Two days later, he replaced this proposal with a suggestion for a commission of three or four wise men who would stimulate Yugoslavia's internal dialogue. This idea was acclaimed by the leaders of Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. However, Budimir Loncar, Yugoslavia's Minister of Foreign Affairs, rejected it because it involved meddling with the country's internal matters.⁵⁴¹

On 29 May, Premier Jacques Santer of Luxembourg visited Belgrade as the chairman of the EC along with Jacques Delors who was the chairman of the European Commission.⁵⁴² The previous day, Chancellor Helmut Kohl and President François Mitterrand had sent a joint letter to the Yugoslav state presidium and the presidents of all the republics in which they pushed for a peaceful solution and for dialogue concerning Yugoslavia's future political structure.⁵⁴³ Santer and Delors emphasized the importance of maintaining territorial integrity, the undesirability of altering the country's internal borders, the implementation of a market economy, respect for human rights and complete democracy.⁵⁴⁴ If Yugoslavia was able to find a peaceful and democratic answer to its political problems, the EC would then be prepared to put in a good word at the IMF and other agencies that could subsequently benefit from the stabilization of the Yugoslav economy. Moreover, although it was mostly on his own authority, Delors promised that the EC was willing to begin immediate discussions concerning Yugoslavia's associate membership and it would be able to count on the EC's considerable financial support (of up to five billion ecu).⁵⁴⁵ Yet even this financial carrot could not deter the leading figures in Belgrade, Ljubljana and Zagreb from a course that would inevitably lead to confrontation.⁵⁴⁶

On the advice of an extremely-concerned Jacques Delors, the CoPo (the political directors of the member states' Ministries of Foreign Affairs) were asked to prepare a worst case scenario.⁵⁴⁷ However, the Eastern Europe working party of the EC's European Political Co-operation section decided to abandon this once it became known that it could create the impression of accepting the republics' declarations of independence.

⁵³⁸ ABZ, Chief-of-Staff Intelligence Department, S.W. Schouten, Colonel of the Cavalry, to head of IDB, head of BVC and Foreign Affairs for the attention of AMAD, 03/05/92, DIS/91/095/2253, with the supplement of the memorandum 'Joegoslavië: verscherping militair/politieke situatie'.

⁵³⁹ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 38.

⁵⁴⁰ Mock (Hg.), Balkan-Dossier, p. 72.

⁵⁴¹ Ibidem, pp. 72-73.

⁵⁴² Reports in: ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042. DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, 1990-1991, Fietelaars 150 & 151 to the Luxembourg EC chairmanship, 31/05/91; ibidem Coreu message from the Luxembourg EC chairmanship, 31/05/91, cpe/pres/lux 496.

⁵⁴³ Libal, Limits, p. 6.

⁵⁴⁴ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 40.

⁵⁴⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU/berichtgeving dmv COREUS inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, June-September 1991, celer circ 339 from Van den Broek to the Athens embassy, etc., 04/06/91. See also: Isakovic, Democratisation, p. 4.

⁵⁴⁶ Hazewinkel, Beleid, pp. 40-42.

⁵⁴⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. DEU/berichtgeving dmv COREUS inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, June-September 1991, Lux. COREU message, 04/06/91, cpe/pres/lux 507; celer circ 339 from Van den Broek to the Athens embassy, etc., 04/06/91.

The only possibility was to wait and see.⁵⁴⁸ Ultimately, it was not easy to anticipate the form that the independence declarations would take: they would either be rhetorical or definitive. The European capitals tended to view the militant rhetoric of Ljubljana and Zagreb as simply the means of acquiring a good starting position for negotiating Yugoslavia's political future.⁵⁴⁹ Moreover, the Eastern Europe department of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs hoped that the compromise that the presidents of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia had proposed to their colleagues on 6 June would be successful. The department felt that 'it would be sensible to allow the Yugoslavs the time to develop the agreement that has been reached so that consequently they can find a solution to their problems'.⁵⁵⁰

Nonetheless, at the same time State Secretary Van Voorst tot Voorst of Defence had asked D.J. Barth, the director of the department's General Policy Matters, to draw up a memorandum about the security consequences for the Netherlands if the tensions in Yugoslavia were to escalate. In his memorandum, Barth stated that the Netherlands had no direct interests that would be affected by a conflict in Yugoslavia but that it did have general interests in terms of Europe's stability. The EC, which was to adopt a Dutch chairman in the second half of 1991, would provide the proper framework for action. This was because political and economic tools would be initially deployed so as to influence the crisis. The CSCE involved many limitations including the unanimity rule. Nevertheless, it seemed sensible to use it as much as possible so as to test Europe's new security arrangement (which had been championed by the Dutch government) and, if necessary, to expand it still further. Potentially, the UN Security Council would also have to be involved. Barth argued that the use of military resources should be regarded as the final option because they would probably lead to a further escalation. Apparently, to some extent Barth was still thinking in Cold War terms because he particularly recommended that attention should be paid to the positions of the two super-powers and he did not exclude the possibility that both parties would be supported in the conflict.⁵⁵¹

On 19 June, the CSCE Council of Ministers in Berlin appealed for a peaceful solution to Yugoslavia's differences. It declared its support for the country's territorial integrity and simultaneously endorsed the republics' democratic developments whereby it also explicitly requested that attention should be paid to human rights including minority rights.⁵⁵²

James Baker, who had also attended the conference, flew to Belgrade on 21 June 1991 to explain the American policy on Yugoslavia to Markovic, Loncar, the presidents of the six republics and the Albanian leaders of Kosovo. The American Secretary of State indicated that Washington wanted the country's unity to be maintained. He warned Slovenia and Croatia against one-sided initiatives and that America would not recognize their independence. He lectured Milosevic in no uncertain terms. Baker argued that the Serbian leader was the main cause of turmoil and was responsible for the civil war that the country was heading for. In his opinion, Milosevic had scuppered Markovic's program and blocked the appointment of the Croat Stipe Mesic. 'We reject any claims by Serbia to territory beyond its borders. If you persist, Serbia will be made an outcast, a pariah.'⁵⁵³

But Baker was unable to threaten Milosevic with anything more than Serbia's isolation from the international community; America would not resort to violence. To quote Zimmermann, with his emphasis on maintaining Yugoslavia's unity Baker did not, as has often been suggested, give the go-ahead to the JNA's use of violence yet he also failed to call a halt through the threat of American measures if violence were to be deployed.⁵⁵⁴ He urged Markovic not to resort to violence because in ⁵⁴⁸ Hazewinkel, Beleid, p. 44.

⁵⁴⁹ Libal, Limits, p. 4.

⁵⁵⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/0 0081, DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, June-September 1991, memorandum DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië, for the ministerial EPS, Luxembourg, 17/06/91, 13/06/91.

⁵⁵¹ CRST, 245, D.J. Barth to Politiek Beraad, 12/06/91, D91/284 with the supplement 'Notitie over de veiligheidsconsequenties voor Nederland van een eventuele escalatie van de spanningen in Joegoslavië'.

⁵⁵² See also: 'CVSE roept Joegoslavië op tot eenheid' [CSCE Calls For Yugoslav Unity] NRC Handelsblad, 20/06/91; Joegoslavië ('Yugoslavia'), ibidem, 21/06/91.

⁵⁵³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 134.

⁵⁵⁴ Zimmermann, Ambassador, pp. 11-12.

that case the United States would have to choose for the side of ‘democracy’.⁵⁵⁵ Tudjman was completely unconvinced by Baker’s argument that the JNA would be deployed against Croatia if it declared independence.⁵⁵⁶ He was also impervious to pressure that he should adopt a conciliatory attitude towards the Serbs in Croatia. Baker was able to confirm that the various parts of Yugoslavia were on a collision course.⁵⁵⁷ Hence, it was too late for persuasion but too early for military intervention.

On 24 June, both the EC and the CSCE declared their support for Yugoslavia’s territorial integrity. However, they would not support Croatia and Slovenia’s independence. On the same day, Bonn used the EC’s Coreu communication system to send a message to all the member states’ capitals that urged the maintenance of a minimum of unity within Yugoslavia but also proposed caution in condemning Slovenia and Croatia’s expected declarations of independence.

According to Bonn, the desire for a Greater Serbia had caused the Slovenian and Croatian pursuit of independence. In fact, Ljubljana and Zagreb would probably have taken little notice of any condemnation because they were hoping that sections of Western European public opinion would take their side. Moreover, such condemnation would simply play into the hands of the Serbian forces that wanted to counter separatism with violence. The best approach was simply to ignore the declarations of independence as much as possible and to emphasize Yugoslavia’s internal dialogue that had to lead to new political relations. This would preferably occur on the basis of the Bosnian-Macedonian compromise proposal of 6 June.⁵⁵⁸ The Netherlands supported this German position.⁵⁵⁹ The next day, both Croatia and Slovenia declared independence.

4. Conclusion: is there a link between the end of Yugoslavia and the Western position?

Here, a basic question involves locating the main causes of Yugoslavia’s disintegration. The relevant literature contains two interpretations. Many authors consider Yugoslavia’s increasing ethnic tensions to be the main cause of its disintegration.⁵⁶⁰ Other authors feel that Yugoslavia could have continued to exist if Milosevic and his associates had not disturbed the fragile balance between the ethnic groups.⁵⁶¹ It is certain that both internal and external causes played a role in the historical process that led to this disintegration. The relation between these causes requires some discussion.

Causes from the inside

A problem that was fundamental to the Yugoslav state was the Serbs’ numerical domination. So long as Yugoslavia’s population continued to think primarily in ethnic terms, this domination would consistently create losers, both Serbs and non-Serbs, in every political and economic issue of division.

⁵⁵⁵ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 137.

⁵⁵⁶ He also refused to believe the news brought to him a day later by his followers concerning intelligence from Belgrade about a JNA attack. At that point, he said that this did not correspond with the agreements that he had made with Kadijevic and Milosevic, Silber/Little, Death, p. 152. See also: Glenny, Fall, p. 38.

⁵⁵⁷ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 133. For a report of Baker’s discussions, see also: ABZ, 911.31 Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Message to Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek from Secretary of State Baker, supplement concerning C.H. Wilkins Jr. to Van den Broek, 22/06/91; ‘US Secretary of State in Yugoslavia’, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 27/06/91.

⁵⁵⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. Berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, June-September 1991, Bonn COREU message, 24/06/91, cpe’bon 294.

⁵⁵⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. DEU/berichtgeving dmv coreus inzake de standpunten van de EPS over Joegoslavië, June-September 1991, Foreign Affairs to cpe/pres/lux, 25/06/91.

⁵⁶⁰ ‘Andreas Zumach Responds to Phillips’, Covert Action Quarterly, no. 55, Winter 1995-1996, p. 55.

⁵⁶¹ See, for instance: Ludwig Steindorff, ‘Die Vorgeschichte – Von der Zeit vor der Staatsbildung Jugoslawiens bis zur Krise der achtziger Jahre’, Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)Erben, pp. 35-36.

Tito and his Communist Party failed to solve this problem, a fact that is most clearly illustrated by their decision in the first half of the 1960s to abandon Yugoslavism.

Serbia's ruthless attitude to Kosovo played a particularly important role in the dramatic developments that preceded the conflict between the nationalities. This was because its attitude was viewed in the other republics as a sign of what could be in store for them as well. The leadership of the Serbian Communist Party was partly responsible for this and had opted for this front line. They did this because many of their people were not willing to hand over power without putting up a fight; they would not allow a velvet revolution to take place as it had in other former Communist states at around this time.

The position of Tudjman cum suis can also be added to these endogenous factors. His extremely thoughtless attitude towards the Croatian Serbs and his claims on Bosnia-Herzegovina certainly contributed to igniting the conflict. In addition, the Yugoslav media were similarly responsible by helping to dredge up memories of a violent past and by spreading ethnic hate. The JNA also played a negative role in the conflict. Its social and political conservatism meant that it could not maintain a neutral position in terms of developments such as decentralization and the creation of a pluriform society. Ultimately, the army opted for a Greater Serbian program and therefore became allied with Milosevic. As subsequent events reveal, its role in forming and arming paramilitary groups that had begun before the conflict had even broken out, also contributed to its occurrence.

Causes from the outside

However, there are also authors who felt that the causes of Yugoslavia's disintegration were located in the West. They were critical of the West's attitude of 'wait and see' in terms of the developments in Yugoslavia that preceded the declarations of independence. Could the West have prevented Yugoslavia's disintegration? The supporters of the exogenous explanations have pointed to Yugoslavia's loss of international status at the end of the Cold War,⁵⁶² and the destabilizing consequences of the Western requirement of economic reform.⁵⁶³

It has, however, been suggested that Yugoslavia could have been saved by a larger number of credit loans from the West.⁵⁶⁴ The question is whether this is true. Yugoslavia's political elite had shown for far too long that credit loans simply meant that they postponed essential reform rather than implementing it.⁵⁶⁵ A form of recentralization was needed for achieving real economic reform; no republic was prepared to do this apart from Serbia and then only on its own terms. From the 1950s onwards, the Communist system had relied far too heavily on deploying decentralization as a safety valve. The 1974 Constitution had made that process irreversible.

In addition, there is criticism of the IMF's strict requirements because they resulted in social upheaval.⁵⁶⁶ But it should not be forgotten that during the 1980s the IMF was prepared to compromise on a number of occasions. However, the IMF did insist on its main requirement of recentralizing economic policy.

It has also been suggested that the EC could have saved Yugoslavia in 1989 if it had wanted to 'help to improve mutual relations so as to enable a united Yugoslavia to become a member of the EC'.⁵⁶⁷ The European Union has always opted to export stability rather than to import instability, and it would have certainly imported instability if it had admitted the Yugoslavia of 1989. If requirements

⁵⁶² Jason McQuinn, The West Destroyed Yugoslavia, Covert Action Quarterly, pp. 60-61.

⁵⁶³ Gervasi, Germany, passim; Jason McQuinn, 'The West Destroyed Yugoslavia', Covert Action Quarterly, pp. 60-61; S.L. Woodward, 'Redrawing Borders in a Period of Systemic Transition', Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, pp. 198-234.

⁵⁶⁴ Milo Anstadt, 'We moeten de mythe van de Servische schuld doorprikken' [We Have to Puncture the Myth of Serbian Guilt], NRC Handelsblad, 20/12/94.

⁵⁶⁵ See also: Michielsen, Joegoslavië, p. 225; Tromp, Conflict, pp. 33-34.

⁵⁶⁶ See, for instance. Woodward, Tragedy, p. 383; ibidem, 'Redrawing Borders in a Period of Systemic Transition', Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, pp. 198-234.

⁵⁶⁷ Anstadt, Servië, p. 123.

concerning political and economic stability and human rights had been omitted in Yugoslavia's case, the floodgates would have then been opened to other countries that the Community was still excluding, such as Turkey. Moreover, this position would have deprived Brussels of the possibility of imposing entry requirements that probably would have been difficult to implement at a later point in time. The issue of whether the European Community should be prepared to import a certain degree of instability so as to prevent a more serious situation will remain a question that is certain to be frequently discussed in the future. At that point, it involved the antithesis between European Community stability and European security; it had become an issue following the fall of the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe.

There is also Norbert Both's criticism that the West had supported the concept of territorial integrity 'ad absurdum'.⁵⁶⁸ The question is whether there was any other possibility. Just as the West could not physically intervene in a sovereign nation so as to prevent civil war, it was also unable to promote the secession of republics within what was still a sovereign nation. For instance, at the beginning of June 1991 Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar had rejected the idea of sending UN observers to Slovenia with the argument that this area was not an independent member of the United Nations.⁵⁶⁹ The West's recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina under dramatically-altered circumstances certainly did not prevent the Serbs and Croats' use of violence.

This argument can be opposed by the rationale of David Gompert who was at that time closely involved with policy as the second highest official of the American National Security Council. He wrote: "Those who criticize the Bush administration for contributing to the conflict by favoring unity have yet to explain how favoring disunity would have prevented the conflict."⁵⁷⁰ Conversely, nothing was achieved by the Western insistence on emphasizing Yugoslavia's unity and striving for a confederal solution. Here, the question is whether more diplomacy would have helped the republics' leaders to reach agreement. '[C]ompromise wasn't in their lexicon', wrote the American ambassador Warren Zimmermann. The fact that Milosevic kept him waiting for ten months before receiving him was indicative of the prevailing attitude. In the summer of 1990, the Serbian president also refused to receive a delegation of seven American senators under the leadership of the Republican Bob Dole. The federal authorities admitted that they could no longer control Milosevic and his Kosovo policy. The fact that Milosevic was not susceptible to money and reason is demonstrated by a speech that he gave in November 1988:

"This is not a time for sorrow, it is a time for fighting. Serbia has become convinced of this over the last summer. This awareness has increased and has become a force that will stop the terror in Kosovo and will unite Serbia. No opposing force can halt this process; it is a process where all fear is weakness. The people are even prepared to live in poverty (...). We will win the battle for Kosovo no matter what obstacles we encounter either at home or abroad..."⁵⁷¹

The view that money could have succeeded here would be under-estimating the power of nationalism from the end of the 1980s. Nationalism's supporters prefer their own hell to someone else's heaven. Many Serbian leaders considered foreign governments and agencies to be their enemies. These included both the German government and the International Monetary Fund. The question here is whether they would have still knuckled under for loans, credit loans and donations to be given under certain conditions.⁵⁷²

⁵⁶⁸ Both, Indifference, p. 86.

⁵⁶⁹ Jakobsen, Multilateralism, p. 371.

⁵⁷⁰ Gompert, Serbia, p. 34.

⁵⁷¹ Ramet, Milosevic, p. 96. Quoted in Van den Heuvel, Land, pp. 100-101.

⁵⁷² Also Patricia Clough, 'Europe the Key To Yugoslavian Future', The Independent, 22/03/91.

The greatest problem in Yugoslavia was the sense of fear that accompanied the growing ethnic tension that was the result of economic decline. Many people felt unsafe. The Slovenes could still believe that they would be unaffected by the violence. But there was fear between the Croats and the Serbs, and the Bosnian Muslims were afraid of both groups.

Only a large-scale preventative deployment of troops could have probably ensured the desired security but that was still too much to ask of the world community in 1990 and 1991. It had more on its mind than Yugoslavia and also had strong views about national sovereignty.

Bearing all the arguments in mind, it is nonetheless possible to regret that in 1990 the international community did not have more resources at its disposal so as to remove the sting from the Yugoslav conflict. However, credit loans to guide the economic reform program did not help and there were no peace-keeping troops to prevent the outbreak of predictable crises.

But even if the international community's failings are accepted as a factor, the Yugoslav leadership must still bear a heavy responsibility. It starts with Tito's government that sacrificed so much for party monopoly and went on to such irresponsible projects as the 1974 Constitution along with uneconomic solutions that included the extensive decentralization of monetary policy and social politics. It continues with the leaders who failed to come up with more creative solutions to the economic and political problems in the years that followed Tito's death. And it concludes with the nationalist leaders, headed by Milosevic and Tudjman, who increased and exploited the ethnic tensions in an irresponsible way. Their number also includes the Slovenian leadership that found it all too easy to think: 'Après nous le déluge.'

Therefore, the West simply waited for Slovenia and Croatia to declare independence. The outside world would then have to come up with an ad hoc solution for the almost irreconcilable values of respecting territorial integrity on the one hand and sympathizing with the more democratic republics' right to self-rule on the other.

Part I

The Yugoslavian problem and the role of the West 1991–1994

Introduction to Part I

The main question dealt with in this first part of the report is how it can be explained that the Netherlands made such a relatively large contribution to the peace-keeping forces in the former Yugoslavia. How did a Dutch military unit come to end up precisely in Srebrenica, the enclave for which other troop-contributing nations to the region showed such little enthusiasm? This special position of the Netherlands cannot be explained solely on the basis of political factors in the Netherlands, but must also be considered against the background of the international diplomatic and military decision-making.

This part of the report will deal with the relationship between the Netherlands and the former Yugoslavia; it should be realized, however, that the contact between the two was only partially direct. In nearly all cases, international organizations acted as intermediary between the Netherlands and the former Yugoslavia. It will be shown that precisely this indirect nature of the official dealings of the Netherlands with Yugoslavia, despite all the good intentions which may have existed, led to mutual distortion of the facts and incorrect calculations on the part of the policy-makers.

The war in Slovenia was to be the first of a series of violent conflicts on Yugoslav soil during the last decade of the twentieth century. As each conflict ended, the hotbed of violence shifted towards the south-east and the course of each of these wars was an important factor in determining the nature of the next confrontation. The short war in Slovenia and the reaction of the international community to it will therefore be dealt with first, followed by the conflict in Croatia and finally the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. First of all, however, the theoretical starting points on which this part of the report is based will be presented and insights will be offered into the issues to be dealt with.

*Doors of perception and windows of opportunity*¹

‘Intervention is both a problem of knowing what to do and when to do it. The issue of timing haunts all retrospective looks at the Yugoslav catastrophe.’²

Two days after Croatia and Slovenia made their declarations of independence on 25 June 1991, the Yugoslav Federal Army (JNA) initiated actions on Slovenian soil. The Slovenian government wasted hardly any time in calling on the European Community (EC) and the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) to mediate in the situation that had arisen.³

How did the West, which had mainly watched passively as events developed in Yugoslavia up to 25 June, react when Croatia and Slovenia did actually declare their independence? And how did it react to the involvement of the JNA? The starting points determining the stance of the major nations, such as Germany, France, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States, to the conflict will be reviewed. Since the European Community had the main involvement with the conflict in the first instance, particular attention will be paid to the activities of the EC in the coming chapters, alongside the ambitions, resources and scope for action of the United Nations, NATO, CSCE and Western European Union.

¹ The concept ‘doors of perception’ is taken from the title of a book by Aldous Huxley, in which he described his experience in the use of mind-expanding substances.

² Michael Ignatieff, ‘Introduction: Virtue by Proxy’, in Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. xvi.

³ The European Community was succeeded by the European Union on 1 November 1993. The CSCE became the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, the OSCE, with effect from 1 January 1995. To ensure uniform terminology, the terms European Community (abbreviated EC) and Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) will be used throughout this part of the report.

It is important to consider in the first place whether the West had a proper perception of the Yugoslav crisis. Did the West identify the actors in Yugoslavia and their objectives correctly, as well as the geographical regions involved in the problems? And did it have a clear insight into the nature of the conflict? The extent to which the media, in particular the Dutch media, offered insights to and/or forced opinions on the policy-makers (in particular the Parliament and the Government) will also be considered.

When policy concerns people – which is often the case – the perception of the people affected by the policy is also of importance: how do they understand the policy-makers' objectives, and how do they try to influence them? For this reason, this report also considers the insights, views and intentions of the various parties in (the former) Yugoslavia themselves.

However, good observation and correct insights are not enough to guarantee a policy based on reason and the appropriate policy requirements. The realization of policy objectives requires resources that are both sufficient and adequate to the purpose, as will appear time and time again in the course of this report. This applies not only to personnel and finances but also to the scope of the terms of reference and mandate of national and international bodies charged with tackling problems and bringing them to a good conclusion.

Another question which will be considered throughout this part of the report is whether, apart from the availability of sufficient resources, the political will to realize certain policy objectives was also present. Western action with respect to the wars in Yugoslavia has been described as the "Triumph of the Lack of Will".⁴ The truth or otherwise of this claim will be considered.

Attention will further be paid to the question of whether the rationale of the policy-formers corresponded to the categories involved and to the object of the policy. The answer given to this question will be largely based on consideration of the possible contradictions between the realities in (the former) Yugoslavia and western reality as perceived in Brussels, The Hague, Washington, New York etc.

To sum up, the topics reviewed here will cover:

perceptions: western perceptions of Yugoslavia and vice versa, and Dutch views of international politics;
 clarity of policy objectives; policy resources, including institutional assets;
 political will;
 the interaction of policy circuits.

The timing factor

Yet another relevant factor in this context is timing. Good timing is of vital importance, especially if several policy circuits are involved. A decision in one policy circuit can have an adverse effect in another: in such cases, policies can thus be counterproductive. Policy circuits can be visualized as a set of cylinders, rotating around one another. Each cylinder may have one or more openings in it. Some cylinders rotate in one direction, others in the opposite direction. There are only a limited number of moments when the openings of all cylinders are aligned with one another. When policy-makers realize that such a moment has arrived, they can make use of this window of opportunity. If they fail to do so in time, the cylinders rotate further and the opportunity is lost – sometimes forever. This idea of a window of opportunity is particularly relevant in the case of interventions in wars – especially civil wars.

Intervention in intrastate conflicts is not easy. It is in principle only likely to succeed if applied at an early stage, before the conflict has escalated, or at a late stage when the conflict has lost (almost) all its momentum.⁵ This is true of military intervention, but even more so of diplomatic intervention not backed up by military resources.⁶

⁴ Gow, Triumph.

Seen from the perspective of the conflict region itself, early intervention would be ideal.⁷ Society has not yet been eroded so far that warlords have a free hand. Food supplies have not yet become a weapon in the hands of the combatants. Intervention is practically impossible when the battle is in full swing.⁸ The conflict has escalated; practically every inhabitant has lost friends or relatives. Especially in civil wars, the conflict itself creates new hate in this way, playing into the hands of extremists at the expense of more moderate elements. Even a powerful country like the United States will find it practically impossible to influence the course of a conflict at this stage.⁹

Many authors point out, however, that the national and international decision-making required for military intervention by an external force takes so much time that the spirit of conflict has already escaped from the bottle before an intervention force can be made operational.¹⁰ The problem is often not that the decision-makers are unaware of the impending crisis, but that new crises threatened in the (near) future generally lose the battle for their attention from existing crises.¹¹ For example, as already mentioned in the part of this report entitled 'The prehistory of the conflict', the conflict in the Persian Gulf and the disintegration of the Soviet Union caused policy-makers to lose sight completely of the developments in Yugoslavia between mid-1990 and 1991.

The relative lateness of military intervention also follows from the requirement that such an intervention must be seen as the ultimate remedy;¹² this norm is based on the ius ad bellum, the idea of the just war in international law. According to international law, only the Security Council of the United Nations can legitimize intervention in the affairs of another state. Two conditions must be satisfied before this can be done: there must be a threat to international peace and security, and the issues involved must not be purely domestic ones. Considerations of international law are not the only ones that can prevent the Security Council from considering a crisis. Serious problems are in general only passed on to the UN for consideration when the big powers or other international organizations are unable or unwilling to find a solution themselves.

If the UN finally approves external involvement in a conflict, there are various possible ways of deploying troops. The choice may be for a UN operation, but since the United Nations does not have a standing army it will have to ask member states to make troops available; this process involves a great deal of consultation. Moreover, it is by no means certain that such a round of consultations will yield

⁵ See e.g. O'Hanlon, Lives, p. 8; Hoffmann, Politics, p. 39; De Nevers, Democratization, p. 33; Max van der Stoep, 'Zwijgen is soms halve medeplichtigheid' (Keeping silent is sometimes halfway to complicity), NRCHandelsblad, 27/11/99; J.G. Siccama, 'De NAVO-top' (The NATO summit), Armex, 77(1993)11, p. 5; idem, 'Vredesmacht' (Peacekeeping forces), Armex, 77(1993)12, p. 5; idem, 'Luchtmobiele brigade' (Airmobile brigade), Armex, 78(1994)2, p. 5; idem, 'Lessen leren versus lering trekken' (Learning by rote as compared with learning from experience), Armex, 80(1996)2, p. 5; Terrett, Dissolution, p. 363; General A.K. van der Vlis in: A.K. van der Vlis & W.F. van Eekelen with C. Homan, 'Lessen uit vredesoperaties' (Lessons from peacekeeping operations), Weerdenburg (ed.), Lessen (Lessons), p. 55; De Wijk, Interventie (Intervention).

⁶ Bertram, Diplomacy, p. 66.

⁷ Cf. Andrew S. Natsios, 'Whither Intervention?', The Washington Quarterly, Vol. 17(1994)1.

⁸ Eric Balemans, 'Een nieuwe militair-politieke orde 'doos van Pandora?' (Is new military and political order a Pandora's box?), Liberaal Reveil, 34(1993)4, p. 120; 'Gewatteerde interventie. In gesprek met Jan Geert Siccama' (Kid-glove intervention. Conversations with Jan Geert Siccama), Idee, 16(1995)(December) p. 14; Rob de Wijk, 'Absentie is preventie' (Absence is prevention), in: Interventie, p. 12.

⁹ Callahan, Wars, p. 85.

¹⁰ Bob van den Bos, 'Aanval op de oorlog' (Attack on war), Idee, 18(1997)(June), p. 29; Mient Jan Faber, 'Presentie is preventie' (Presence is prevention), in: Interventie, p. 16; Wim Bossema, 'Vredessoldaten komen nooit op tijd' (Peacekeeping forces never arrive on time), de Volkskrant, 16/12/00.

¹¹ Cf. Frans Timmermans, 'Conflictpreventie. De noodzaak van diplomatieke vernieuwing' (Conflict prevention. The need for diplomatic innovation), in: Melissen (ed.), Diplomatie, p. 113.

¹² Cf. Dijkink, Rijk, p. 492.

the desired number of troops. Another possibility is for a regional organization or a coalition of the willing to be given the task of implementing the mandate of the Security Council.

However, governments are often only prepared to engage their troops in a humanitarian conflict, after marked escalation of breaches of human rights has been observed.¹³ ‘Ordinary’ violations of human rights are not seen as a sufficient basis for the decision to risk the lives of one’s own troops. It is only when the violations assume the character of mass extermination and wide-scale expulsion, or become a threat to surrounding countries, that western governments are prepared to intervene.¹⁴ Politicians in democratic countries will consider carefully how much grass-roots support they have before deciding on any military action. However, while society at the end of the twentieth century has more information about the world – and about violations of human rights – than ever before, according to some authors it is slow to react with the appropriate emotions.¹⁵ As a result, while the military costs of early intervention are low, the political costs are high. Conversely, the political costs of late intervention are lowest even though the military costs are high.¹⁶ Additionally, the decision-making process depends further on the contributions of two specific groups of professionals: the diplomats and the soldiers. Both groups demand due time for their decision-making. Diplomats are often imbued with a ‘culture of caution’.¹⁷ While this is frequently a useful characteristic in the exercise of their day-to-day diplomatic tasks, it is less welcome when quick decisions have to be taken. Military commanders, in their turn, do not wish to plunge themselves and their troops into a conflict without thorough preparation. Proper analysis of the causes of the conflict and the characteristics of the warring factions is required, as is a clear view of the desired form of intervention and an exit strategy.

In all cases, setting up a peacekeeping operation demands a long preparation time. By definition, such an operation will not take place on the doorstep of the troop-contributing nations. In general, the UN does not ask neighbouring states to contribute troops, in order to ensure that they do not become involved in the conflict. The military commanders of the participating countries and the UN are thus often faced with logistic problems. The transport to the area in question is often not without difficulties. Many countries have inadequate means of transport, especially for air travel. As a result, military transport often takes place by sea, which can be very time-consuming. Other countries, especially those in the Third World, often lack the necessary equipment and are dependent on supplies from the richer countries.

Troops from these countries have to be trained in the use of the new equipment, while even soldiers from western countries will have to receive special training in the use of weapons adapted to the nature of the conflict. All troops will have to receive instruction about peacekeeping operations and the procedures typically involved in them, the nature of the conflict and the culture(s) in the region affected by the conflict. In the early nineties, three to four months usually elapsed between the authorization of a mission by the Security Council and the presence of operational peace-keeping troops on the ground in the region in question.

Theoretically, the consequence of the lack of synchronicity between the escalation of intra-state conflicts on the one hand and the decision-making about military interventions for humanitarian purposes on the other is that external intervention seldom occurs in the initial stages of the conflict. The willingness to intervene, boosted by the publicity given to large-scale violations of human rights, will not be great until the conflict has escalated to such proportions that it is hardly controllable, if at ¹³ Cf. N. Stuijver, colonel of the Royal Netherlands Air Force (ret.), chairman of the NOV (Dutch Officers’ Association), ‘De Nederlandse krijgsmacht op weg waar naar toe? Jaarrede 1992’ (Where are the Dutch armed forces going? Annual lecture 1992), Carré, 15(1992)12, p. 8.

¹⁴ Cf. Bruce Nelan, ‘Justifying Just Wars’, Time, 29/05/00.

¹⁵ Stjepan G. Mestrovic, ‘Introduction’, idem (ed.), Genocide, p. 12. This also applies in the case of preventive involvement, see Saadia Touval, ‘Lessons of Preventive Diplomacy in Yugoslavia’, Crocker & Hampson with Aall (eds.), Chaos, p. 415.

¹⁶ E.A. Hammel, ‘Lessons from the Yugoslav Labyrinth’, Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 35.

¹⁷ Callahan, Wars, p. 230.

all. If external forces do intervene at this moment, they will tend to become directly involved in the conflict instead of remaining impartial arbitrators or mediators, as they are supposed to be.¹⁸

In his article 'Why the West Failed', the professor of war studies Lawrence Freedman argued that this was precisely the mechanism that operated in the case of Yugoslavia. 'The growth of concern [in the West] was always outpaced by the deterioration in the local situation and the consequent growth in the requirements for a successful intervention.' The result was 'a collection of half measures that left unbridgeable gaps between the ends proclaimed and the means adopted'.¹⁹ The applicability of the general ideas about the lack of synchronicity between the course of the conflict and the reaction to it by the outside world to the case of (the former) Yugoslavia will be considered in greater depth below.

Since this part of the report ultimately attempts to answer the question as to how it came about that Dutch troops ended up precisely in Srebrenica, particular attention will be paid not only to the developments in Yugoslavia and at international level, but also to Dutch policy. This is particularly relevant as far as the second half of 1991 is concerned because this period, in which the Yugoslav conflict first manifested itself to the world in all its violence, happened to be one during which the Netherlands had the presidency of the European Community (EC). It will be considered whether the Dutch government was aware of the intentions of the governments of the other EC Member States, and whether it took these into account when forming its policy.

Various officials from the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs have claimed after the event that this chance involvement of the Netherlands with the conflict committed the government in The Hague to the Yugoslav question to such an extent that they were subsequently unable to distance themselves from it.²⁰ The involvement of The Hague from the European President's chair had raised the target for Dutch performance so high that the Netherlands felt obliged to contribute more than it would have if it had not had the presidency. It will be considered below whether this view is backed up by the facts. To this end, the organization and ambition levels of the Dutch authorities (insofar as relevant to the issue discussed here) will be reviewed. In concrete terms, this means that attention will be paid to the role of the government in The Hague, the Dutch Parliament and the ministries of General Affairs (roughly equivalent to the Cabinet Office in the UK), Foreign Affairs and Defence.

Intermezzo: the morality of Dutch foreign policy

Before answering the above-mentioned questions, it is appropriate to make a comment about the morality of Dutch foreign policy. Dutch foreign policy is often described as motivated by ethical considerations, among others. According to this view, the voice of the minister of religion alongside that of the merchant is a constant element in the utterances directed by the Dutch government to other countries. It is claimed that this foreign policy is often (maybe even too often) characterized by a belief in the moral superiority of the Netherlands compared with other countries and a disinclination to get down to the nitty-gritty of power politics.

'The Dutch are so imbued with the need to bear witness (to the Gospel) that they always tend to be more interested in the moral content of the motives than in the results', wrote Ben Knapen,²¹ while as long ago as 1864 W.J. Hofdijk ended his six-volume cultural history of the Netherlands with ¹⁸ Cf. Rob de Wijk in: Marijnissen & Glastra van Loon, Oorlog, p. 92.

¹⁹ Freedman, West, pp. 53-54. See also S.L. Woodward, 'Redrawing Borders in a Period of Systemic Transition', in Esman & Telhami (eds.), Ethnic Conflict p. 230.

²⁰ Interviews B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00; H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00; J.L. Sandee, 12/06/00; H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00; A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

²¹ Ben Knapen, 'Het vaderland in Europa' (The fatherland in Europe), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91. See e.g. Baehr, Role, p. 151; Castermans-Holleman, Mensenrechtenbeleid, pp. 87-88, 148, 261-262; Metzemaekers, Grenzen, p. 13; Malcontent, Kruistocht, pp. 23 and 46; Scheffer, Natie, pp. 44-45; M. van der Stoel, 'Koopman en dominee' (Merchant and minister of religion), in: Heldring (ed.), Moraal, pp. 78-82; M. van der Stoel, cited in C.J. Visser & S. Rozemond, 'Nederland en het opkomen voor de mensenrechten' (The Netherlands and the obligation to urge compliance with human rights), Rozemond (ed.), Woord, pp. 204-205; Voorhoeve, Peace, pp. 49-50; Wels, Aloofness, pp. 60-61.

the statement ‘It is better to be the most virtuous nation on earth than to be the most powerful’.²² The idealistic Dutch expert on international law Van Vollenhoven even believed at the start of the twentieth century that a combination of disinterestedness and moral superiority made the Netherlands ideally suited as the supplier of a world army.²³

Both the Dutch decision-makers concerned and observers have made similar comments about the policy concerning Yugoslavia in the period from 1991 to 1995. The above-mentioned moralistic tendency led in the Netherlands to a call ‘to do something’, on the basis of the idea that doing something is better than doing nothing.²⁴ Or as Van Vollenhoven put it in 1933, ‘The trick is not to avoid mistakes – everyone who (...) dares to act must make some mistakes’.²⁵ But is such a principled stand sufficient justification for a foreign policy?

In theoretical discussions of foreign policy, this attitude is often characterized as the idealistic, as opposed to the realistic approach. The latter assumes that the world consists of an anarchy of states that are out to maintain or increase their power. According to this view, a sheep – a country that wishes to play the innocent on the international stage – would be well advised to keep far away from such a pack of wolves. It is often – incorrectly – assumed that idealists are on a higher moral plane than realists. Such an attitude may be sensed e.g. in a statement like: ‘having done something (...) may be a pleasant feeling for a private person, from a moral point of view. However, as important as moral views are, they are not the only considerations that should guide foreign policy.’²⁶

In this part of the report, the positions assumed by various countries and organizations with respect to the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia will be described having due regard to these differences in morality. The possible policy alternatives seen against this background, in particular for the Dutch government, will also be reviewed. In order to remove the risk over-simplifying the contrast between Dutch idealism and the realism or immoralism of other countries in advance, it should be noted that there is another sort of morality than that which is often seen as the basis of Dutch foreign policy, viz. morality founded on conviction.

The planner of actions, in the present case actions in the field of foreign policy, is also under a moral obligation to think through the foreseeable consequences of his actions and of the possible alternatives.²⁷ In other words, apart from a morality in terms of conviction and desirability there also exists a morality in terms of feasibility and consequences.

The sociologist Max Weber stated in his lecture Politik als Beruf (Politics as a profession) in 1919 that as well as feeling passionately about the cause he espouses, a man cannot call himself a real politician until, he:

‘also takes the responsibility for this cause as the main guideline for his action. And to this end, one needs discernment, the most important mental property of the politician. This is the ability to absorb the impress of reality calmly and deliberately, i.e. to distance oneself from things and people. The inability to do this is in itself already a deadly sin for any politician (...) For in the final resort there are only two kinds of deadly sins in the field of politics: an unbusinesslike approach and – often but not always identical with this – irresponsibility.’²⁸

²² W.J. Hofdijk, Ons voorgeslacht in zijn dagelijksch leven geschilderd VI, Leiden 1875, 2nd impression pp. 323-324.

²³ C. van Vollenhoven, De eendracht van het land, The Hague 1913, p. 28.

²⁴ Repeated by G. Valk in his review of Klep & Van Gils, Korea, in BMGN part 115, No. 4, p. 657: ‘Het alternatief zou zijn geweest dan maar helemaal niets te doen.’ (The alternative would have been to do nothing at all.)

²⁵ Cited in H.T. de Beaufort, Cornelis van Vollenhoven 1874-1933, Haarlem 1954, pp. 209-210.

²⁶ Baehr, Role, pp. 23-24.

²⁷ Fisher, Ethics, pp. 57-58; M.F. Fresco, ‘Zedelijke normen en buitenlandse politiek’ (Ethical standards and foreign policy), in: Heldring (ed.), Moraal, pp. 61-62; Van der List, Mensenrechten, pp. 56, 95-96 and 143; Voorhoeve, Rol, pp. 75-76.

²⁸ Weber, Politiek, pp. 90-91; italics in the original.

On this basis, Weber distinguishes between the ethics of conviction or intention and the ethics of responsibility. One who acts on the basis of the ethics of conviction does not consider the consequences of his deeds: 'If the consequences of his actions, arising from a pure conviction, are bad he does not consider himself to be responsible for this, but rather the world, the stupidity of other people – or the will of God who created them so.' One who acts on the basis of the ethics of responsibility, on the other hand, takes 'the shortcomings of the average person' into account. He believes 'that you have to take responsibility for the (foreseeable) consequences of your actions'.²⁹ Weber points out that those basing themselves on the ethics of conviction have a particular tendency to preach violence, 'the final violence, that must lead to the destruction of the rule of violence everywhere'.³⁰ He did not, however, make a choice between these two types of ethics, though he did realize that they were practically incompatible within one and the same person:³¹ 'For the problem is precisely how fiery passion and discrimination can be forced to cohabit within a single soul.'³²

'Truly: politics are made with reason, but certainly not with reason alone. Those who base themselves on the ethics of conviction are right when they claim this. But no one can prescribe whether one should act on the basis of the ethics of conviction or on the basis of the ethics of responsibility, and when one should do the one or the other.'³³

Others believe that one can make a choice between the two. According to them, politicians are obliged to have regard to the ethics of responsibility. Joris Voorhoeve, later to become the Dutch minister of Defence, introduced the term 'functional idealism' in this connection, in response to the question of how concrete contributions could be made to an improvement in 'world politics'.³⁴ And Todorov wrote e.g. in his book on the French civil war of 1944:

'Political life is a matter not of the ethics of conviction but of the ethics of responsibility. Its manifestations are judged not in function of what precedes them but of what ensues, of their effects rather than their motivations. The criterion that allows each of these acts to be legitimated must be as follows: in full knowledge of the facts, can I be sure that the good that should ensue from this will be greater than the bad that could come from it?'³⁵

What is true of foreign policies is also true of war. For example, Arnout Brouwers, one of the editorial staff of the Dutch newspaper De Volkskrant, wrote: 'In war, good intentions are not enough. They have to be grafted on to a realistic estimate of the relationship between end and means.'³⁶ Marijnissen and Glastra van Loon made a similar statement in their book about the war in Kosovo: 'Those who do not bother about effectiveness but merely base themselves on their moral motives may sometimes discover at the end of the ride that they have actually been acting immorally.'³⁷

²⁹ Weber, Politiek, p. 99.

³⁰ Weber, Politiek, p. 101.

³¹ Weber, Politiek, p. 98.

³² Weber, Politiek, p. 90.

³³ Weber, Politiek, p. 111.

³⁴ Voorhoeve, Rol, p. 76.

³⁵ T. Todorov, A French Tragedy: Scenes of Civil War, Summer 1944, Hanover 1966, p. 127. Cf. Martin Sommer, 'Niet mees – petitie volgt' (We disagree – petition follows), de Volkskrant, 26/01/01.

³⁶ Arnout Brouwers, 'Europa wil wel de oorlog maar niet de gruwelen' (Europe wants war without the associated horrors), de Volkskrant, 18/01/01.

³⁷ Marijnissen & Glastra van Loon, Oorlog, p. 193. Cf. M. Bos, 'Verheven moraal leidt niet tot betere rechtsorde' (A high moral tone does not lead to a better legal order), NRC Handelsblad, 15/12/99: '... human rights may be universal, but they do not have an 'absolute' effect. ... You always have to ask yourself what the role and the scope of a human right that has been repealed are, and what is or can be regarded as 'just' under the given circumstances. In a historical perspective, justice

Some critics of Dutch foreign policy also make a stand against the dominance of the ethics of conviction over the ethics of responsibility which they perceive in it. According to the historian Maarten Kuitenbrouwer from Utrecht, Dutch human rights policy after the Second World War aimed at mobilizing domestic support for promotion or protection of human rights elsewhere in the world often called on ‘specifically Dutch feelings of humanity and civilization (...) which led to ineffective or even counter results when embodied in the foreign policy.’³⁸ And as early as 1974, C.L. Patijn wrote that ‘a deep misunderstanding about the way desired effects could be realized in the international field’ lay behind ‘the continued pressure for permanent intervention’ by Dutch diplomacy in connection with human rights violations in other countries.³⁹

The emeritus professor of Human Rights Peter Baehr, on the other hand, believes that it can actually harm the credibility of the Netherlands, which regards its human rights policy as an essential part of its foreign policy:

‘if it has to adapt its policy too much to that of other countries in the interests of a supposed increase in effectiveness. The alternative, of being ‘one crying in the wilderness’, may not seem very attractive but can actually be preferable in terms of credibility in the long term. Finally, the credibility with respect to one’s own grass roots must not be lost sight of either.’⁴⁰

The relationship between the Dutch will to action⁴¹ and the (predictable) effectiveness of the policy followed will therefore be scrutinized in this part of the report. It is interesting in this connection that Dutch foreign policy, which is often described as reactive,⁴² had the intention of acting as a catalyst on international decision-making in the case of Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1995. Attention will therefore also be paid to the question as to whether the organization of Dutch foreign policy was adapted to this end and how this was given form.

In answering these questions, it is not the intention to pass easy judgements in the light of hindsight on the decisions taken. As engineer B.J. van der Vlies, member of Parliament for the SGP (one of the Christian parties) wrote as early as the summer of 1992 about military actions in support of humanitarian activities in the former Yugoslavia, ‘Participation creates heavy responsibilities, but so does non-participation’.⁴³ Or as the Americans put it in the discussions on intervention, you’re ‘damned if you do, damned if you don’t’.⁴⁴ It is however the intention, on the basis of knowledge which was already available at the time, to map how much room there was for manoeuvre and what alternatives has never been anything else than ‘what works’; Jonathan Moore, ‘Introduction’, in Moore (ed.), Choices, p. 7: ‘To be moral is to be operational ...’; Both, Indifference, version 99, p. 8: ‘Moral entrapment’ refers to instances where a government publicly commits itself to a policy in the name of certain moral values and principles at stake, only to discover that it cannot translate its moral concerns into effective policy.’; M. van der Stoel, ‘Koopman en dominee’, in Heldring (ed.), Moraal, p. 81: ‘The word of witness must always have a well considered function. It cannot be simply the expression of deeply rooted feelings and convictions, but must also be aimed at achieving an objective. ... Effect and repercussion must therefore always be given careful consideration, especially in situations of acute tension and conflict.’ See also Willem de Bruin, ‘De diepe stilte rond Tsjetsjenië’ (The deep silence round Chechnya), de Volkskrant, 10/12/99; Voorhoeve, Peace, p. 248; F. Westerman & J.W. Honig, ‘Dezelfde gebeurtenis, verschillende interpretaties: Twee boeken over Srebrenica’ (Different interpretations of the same event: two books about Srebrenica), in Weerdenburg (ed.), Lessen, p. 19.

³⁸ Kuitenbrouwer, Nederland, p. 201.

³⁹ C.L. Patijn, ‘Grenzen en mogelijkheden van de morele factor in de buitenlandse politiek’ (Boundaries of and scope for the moral factor in foreign policy), in Heldring (ed.), Moraal, p. 32.

⁴⁰ P.R. Baehr, ‘Een hoeksteen van het buitenlands beleid? Nederland en de rechten van de mens’ (A cornerstone of foreign policy? The Netherlands and the rights of man), in Van den Berg, Boerfijn & Weerdenburg, Wijs, p. 32.

⁴¹ ‘Dutch foreign policy regarding Yugoslavia was very activist, certainly by small power, and even by great power standards’, Jan Willem Honig, ‘Dutch Foreign Policy Towards Ethnic Conflict’, in Baehr/Baedet/Werdmöller(eds.), Rights, p. 92.

⁴² See e.g. Castermans-Holleman, Mensenrechtenbeleid, p. 76.

⁴³ B.J. van der Vlies, ‘Kort en bondig’ (Short and sweet), De Banier, 20/08/92, p. 5.

⁴⁴ Richard C. Leone, ‘Foreword’, in: Callahan, Wars, p. xi.

there were for other policies, in order to explain why the policy was followed as it was and to judge the policy for internal consistency.

It goes without saying that this part, like any work of history, can only offer a limited cross-section through the reality of the time. The limitations on space in this report made it even more imperative to make choices. Without wishing to offer a story that is too strongly overshadowed by the ending which is already known in the meantime, it will be clear that this part of the report is strongly marked by the ultimate outcome, the sending of Dutchbat to Srebrenica. This means that certain aspects of the case that played an important role for decision-makers and opinion formers at the time will receive relatively little attention here. This is true e.g. of the great fear of the outbreak of conflicts in other parts of (the former) Yugoslavia such as Kosovo and Macedonia,⁴⁵ the problems connected with the recognition of Macedonia,⁴⁶ the operation of sanctions against (the former) Yugoslavia and the actions of Dutch naval units, the financial aspects of the operations⁴⁷ and the reception of refugees from the former Yugoslavia.

⁴⁵ With respect to Kosovo see e.g. Detrez, Balkan, pp. 95-113; B. Rijs, 'Meneer de president' (Mr. President), HP/De Tijd, 05/02/93, pp. 14-20; BVD (Dutch internal security service), 'Probleemgebied Kosovo' (The Kosovo problem area), January 1994.

⁴⁶ As regards the question of Macedonia, see e.g. Detrez, Balkan, pp. 141-162.

⁴⁷ See e.g. TK, 1995-1996, 24 605, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4; TK, 1996-1997, 25 250 Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

Chapter 1

Europe confronted with war in Slovenia: June-July 1991

1. War in Slovenia: ‘not worth the life of a single Serbian soldier’

‘When we started breaking up Yugoslavia and changing the social system in 1990, did we have any idea what the results of these changes would be? I don’t think so. If we had, things would be different now ... Now the region and the system of the former Yugoslavia are a mess. Even if the best minds of the former Yugoslavia were to work together, they would find it difficult to deal with the situation; divided as they are at present, it is almost impossible to find a solution.’⁴⁸

Slovenia declared its independence on 25 June 1991. With the exception of Bulgaria, not a single country recognized it; the authorities in Ljubljana were thus quickly forced to give up their idea of introducing their own passport, and Slovenes abroad continued for the moment to make their way through the world as Yugoslavs. At the same time as the declaration of independence, a contingent of three thousand Slovene policemen occupied the frontier with Croatia. Along the borders with Italy, Austria and Hungary, the frontier signs, flags and other Yugoslav symbols were replaced by emblems of Slovenia. The federal police and customs officials were ordered to leave their posts. The Slovenian authorities commandeered the control towers at airports. The Slovenian territorial defence forces quickly gained control of all Slovenian territory, and declared themselves lord and master of the air space above its soil.

The estimated more than thirty thousand Slovenian soldiers of the territorial defence forces had in principle to be prepared to confront the powerful forces of the JNA. The federal army had started calling up Serb reserves in May 1991, raising the number of troops in Slovenia from twenty thousand to 55,000 and those in Croatia from forty thousand to a hundred thousand.⁴⁹ The JNA did not dare to rely on multi-ethnic troops in any action against Slovenian independence, and therefore mainly made use of purely Serbian units in support of its plans. The above-mentioned expansion of the forces would however prove to be ineffective and, as it turned out, even counterproductive.

On the day before the declaration of independence, the Serb president Milosevic and his confidant Jovic on the one hand and the Minister of Defence General Kadijevic and JNA chief of staff Adzic on the other had still not reached agreement about the course to be followed. The political leaders of Serbia considered that the JNA should confine itself to protecting the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia. The JNA was not yet fully prepared to give up the idea of Yugoslavia. Moreover, the military leaders were annoyed that Milosevic and Jovic had prevented the Croat Mesic from assuming the chairmanship of the presidium on 15 May, as a result of which the Yugoslav presidium was without a chairman. This topic overshadowed the talks to such an extent that the course to be followed in dealing with the country’s problems was forced into the background.⁵⁰

On 25 June, the Yugoslav Federal Executive Council (the cabinet) approved the deployment of no more than 1900 JNA troops, intended for the protection of the frontier. In fact, the cabinet was not authorized to take this decision since the state presidium had the supreme command of the army. The presidium was paralysed, however, because Mesic had not been appointed chairman.

⁴⁸ Mira Markovic, Milošević’s wife, Night, p. 127 (12/10/93).

⁴⁹ Isby, Yugoslavia.

⁵⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 340.

The motives that led the Yugoslav premier Markovic to agree with the decision to deploy JNA troops have never been made completely clear.⁵¹ There are various possible explanations. On the one hand, Markovic probably acted under pressure from the JNA. On the other, he was furious about the sudden seizure of the customs posts by the Slovenian leadership, despite their assurance a few days before that things were not that bad; indeed, they had signed an agreement at that time stating that the customs duty on goods passing the Slovenian border would be handed over to Belgrade.⁵² The Slovenian seizure of the border and customs posts removed the basis for the federal programme of economic reforms. Markovic may also have been overpowered by his deep personal attachment to the Yugoslav idea.⁵³

Three thousand JNA troops were finally deployed – still a very modest operation in view of the potential the federal army had at its disposition in Slovenia. The force was in any case much too small to stand up to the many tens of thousands the Slovenian authorities managed to mobilize under the motto of territorial defence. The federal troops were not authorized to shoot, and indeed some of them had not been issued with live ammunition. The JNA high command in Belgrade expected the Slovenian government and people to climb down after a limited display of force, a kind of police action.

In any case, the JNA units passing through Croatia on their way to Slovenia encountered no problems. The authorities there did nothing to impede the advance of the federal army, despite a mutual assistance pact signed between Slovenia and Croatia in January which stated that if one of the two republics was to be attacked, the other would not allow troop movements on its soil.⁵⁴ It was partly thanks to this Croatian compliance that the JNA experienced few problems in occupying 133 of the 137 Slovenian border posts in the space of 48 hours on 27 and 28 June. Federal units also attacked Ljubljana airport on 27 June, but the federal army did not manage to occupy the airport.

Neither did it succeed in putting an end to Slovenian radio and TV broadcasts by destroying the transmitters. After this, events took a disastrous turn for the JNA. On the very same day, units of the Slovenian territorial defence forces surrounded federal army barracks on Slovenian soil, where extra large numbers of troops had recently been quartered. Their water and electricity supplies were cut off, and telephone links were interrupted. The JNA was completely surprised by the resistance offered.⁵⁵ Markovic, who must have felt that the ground was slipping away under his feet, proposed a ceasefire and a three-month suspension of the declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia on the evening of 27 June – the first day of the war. None of the warring factions paid any attention to this proposal, however.

In slightly more than a week's time, the JNA lost 7900 troops by desertion or capture by the Slovenian forces. Thirty-one tanks, 230 armoured vehicles and four helicopters were put out of action, while the Slovenian forces captured no fewer than 124 tanks.⁵⁶ The Slovenian defence activities were backed up by good military organization and a wealth of information. Slovenes working for the federal ministry of Defence passed on the JNA's plans straight to Ljubljana. Moreover, the morale of the Slovene defence forces was high, unlike that of the JNA. Some JNA soldiers were told that they were being deployed to counter an attack by German and Austrian forces, others that the threat was an Italian invasion.⁵⁷ Picture their amazement and shock when they found that they were supposed to fight fellow Yugoslavs. The limited nature of the operation and the lack of clarity about its objectives helped ⁵¹ See e.g. Silber & Little, Death, pp. 154-155 and 161.

⁵² Zimmerman, Origins, pp. 142-143; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Servië zal desnoods met geweld Servische minderheden helpen' (Serbia intends to support Serb minorities – with force, if necessary), de Volkskrant, 21/06/91; Robin Alison Remington, The Yugoslav Army: Trauma and Transition, in Danopoulos & Zirker (eds.), Relations, p. 172 n. 36.

⁵³ Pointers in this direction may be found in 'Markovic: Belgrado zal het leger inzetten' (Markovic says Belgrade will deploy army), NRC Handelsblad, 22/06/91; Detrez, Balkan, p. 131.

⁵⁴ Ramet, War, IV, claims that Milošević got Croatia to adopt this stance as part of the Karadjordjevo agreement.

⁵⁵ See e.g. the reaction of the JNA generals Andrija Raseta and Milan Aksentijević in Silber, Little, Death, p. 158.

⁵⁶ UN, S/1994/674/Appendix II, Bassiouni report, appendix III, p. 21.

⁵⁷ See e.g. Theo Engelen, 'Slovenië laat gevangenen vrij, wijst ultimatum van de hand' (Slovenia releases prisoners but rejects ultimatum), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

to demoralize the JNA even further. Furthermore, the Slovene territorial defence forces experienced relatively little trouble in blocking the advance of the JNA armour. This took place along main roads, allowing the Slovenian troops to cut off these roads with barricades and set the tanks and armoured vehicles under fire when they had come to a halt. Once the Slovene defence forces had managed to set a few JNA tanks on fire and to shoot down a few helicopters, the morale of the Slovene population seemed unshakeable.

The divided views in Belgrade about the point of the war raised as many problems for the JNA as the resistance in Slovenia. It was clear to everyone that the real struggle would centre on Croatia. Some of the leaders in Belgrade regarded the attack on Slovenia as a regression to Yugoslavism, serving no useful purpose at all in the struggle to promote the interests of (Greater) Serbia.⁵⁸ Others were convinced, on the other hand, that if the JNA did not fight to preserve Slovenia, the subsequent battles in Croatia would be seen as a war between Serbs and Croats. If Slovenia was given up, then the JNA and the Serbian leadership would lose, both at home and abroad, the benefit of the argument that they were fighting for the unity of Yugoslavia.⁵⁹

However, Slovenia as such was not worth a war to Milosevic. According to the diaries of his great confidant Jovic, he had said on the eve of Croatia's and Slovenia's declarations of independence, 'We oppose any policy aimed at keeping the Croats and Slovenes (in the federation) by force and we repeat our demands that the army should establish itself along the new Serbian borders of Yugoslavia. If it fails to do so, we will organize our own defence and drop the Yugoslav army.'⁶⁰

Milosevic repeated this message clearly to Minister of Defence Kadijevic on 27 June.⁶¹ The JNA, under the leadership of Kadijevic, wanted to strike a firm blow in Slovenia after their humiliating initial experiences. This was not intended so much to keep Slovenia permanently within the federation as to show the rest of Yugoslavia – in particular Croatia – the kind of reaction any attempt at secession was likely to encounter. In other words, the JNA should defeat the Slovenian troops before withdrawing. The army high command calculated that this would require an extra three brigades and that more use should be made of air power than had been done so far.⁶² The state presidium did not agree with this analysis, however. Jovic stated in the presidium as early as 30 June that there was no point in continuing to wage war in Slovenia.⁶³ On the same day, Milosevic decided to end his opposition to the nomination of Mesic as chairman of the state presidium. He needed the Croat to create a constitutional basis for an order to the JNA to withdraw from Slovenia.

According to his diary, Jovic together with Milosevic made it clear to Kadijevic on 5 July that the JNA had to concentrate its troops along the line joining Karlovac and Plitvice in the west, Baranja, Osijek and Vinkovci in the east and the river Neretva in the south (see map in Section 2 of Chapter 2).⁶⁴ Kadijevic obeyed, and then blamed premier Markovic for the Slovenian debacle, claiming that the premier had forced their army into a military adventure for which it was not prepared.⁶⁵ This was to Milosevic's advantage: his position could only be strengthened if premier Markovic and Minister of Defence Kadijevic (also Chief of Staff of the Supreme Command) started squabbling.⁶⁶ On 12 July, Milosevic gloated to the British and American ambassadors in Belgrade, Peter Hall and Warren Zimmermann, that Markovic had blundered with his half-hearted measures in Slovenia: according to the Serbian leader, he should either have sent a hundred thousand soldiers immediately to Slovenia, or ⁵⁸ Libal, Limits, pp. 20-21.

⁵⁹ Glenny, Fall, p. 97.

⁶⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 340; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 159.

⁶¹ Jovic, Dani, pp. 343-345; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 160.

⁶² Kadijevic, View, p. 132.

⁶³ Silber & Little, Death, p. 161.

⁶⁴ Jovic, Dani, p. 349; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 164.

⁶⁵ Theo Engelen, 'Van solidariteit Kroaten en Slovenen is niet veel over' (Not much left of solidarity with Croats and Slovenes), NRC Handelsblad, 22/07/91.

⁶⁶ Cf. Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 94.

none at all. If it had been up to Milosevic, he would not have sent any troops: as he put it, Slovenia was not worth the life of a single Serbian soldier.⁶⁷ Hard lines on the 37 JNA soldiers who did fall.

The struggle was over in ten days. While outsiders might have characterized it as a Mickey Mouse war, it had a lasting effect on the Slovenes. They called it their war of independence. Their state had received a baptism of blood, for the Slovenes had their own – eighteen – victims too: twelve members of the territorial defence and police forces, and six civilians. While the declaration of independence spoke of disassociation from the Yugoslav federation, an opinion poll held after the bloodshed showed that three-quarters of the Slovenes were no longer prepared to have any link with Yugoslavia, no matter how tenuous.⁶⁸

2. David and Goliath: A public relations coup

The politicians in Ljubljana made simultaneous use of the confrontation with the JNA as the basis for a well-thought-out public relations campaign, aimed at a number of different target groups: the new state's own population, in the hope of getting it to close its ranks more firmly behind the government; the officers and men of the JNA, in order to sow the seeds of doubt in their loyalty to the federal army; and, probably most importantly, the European governments and their electorate which had to be fed with television images.⁶⁹

While the action of the federal army was limited in nature, involving only three thousand troops, and the number of victims on the JNA side was three times that among the Slovenes, the Slovenian authorities presented the world with a picture of the JNA operation as a repetition of the Soviet invasions of Hungary in 1956 and Czechoslovakia in 1968, and as a copy of the action of the Chinese authorities in Tiananmen Square in 1989. Film images were intended to raise the impression in the West that this was an operation involving armoured military units in Soviet-made tanks against an innocent population – a battle between democracy and panzer Communism, between civilization and barbarity. The political leaders spoke continually of the threat of mass murders of the civilian populations, which never eventualized.⁷⁰ The Slovenian president Kucan told western journalists that they were the only mouthpiece of oppressed Slovenia.⁷¹ He asked for understanding from world opinion for his republic's wish to secede from a country governed by 'antiquated ideological formulas' and 'hegemonistic ambitions'.⁷²

The Dutch journalist Caroline de Gruyter, writing for Elsevier, stated that the Slovenian propaganda machine had beaten 'the experienced PR men of Belgrade' hands down by forcing the Serbs into the role of merciless Bolshevik murderers.⁷³ The American ambassador Zimmermann spoke of 'the most brilliant public relations coup in the history of Yugoslavia'.⁷⁴ Henk Hirs, reporting for the Dutch daily Trouw from Ljubljana, saw the whole series of activities as 'intended to persuade the outside

⁶⁷ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 149.

⁶⁸ Opinion poll cited in a Round Table discussion on Yugoslavia on Soviet television, 14/07/91, 12:30, included in the BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 16/07/91. According to Zimmermann, Origins, p. 144, all Slovenes held this opinion after the short-lived war. See also the remarks in this connection by Kucan in Ray Moseley, 'Fighting pushes Yugoslav peace plan toward collapse', Chicago Tribune, 30/06/91; Rajko Mursic, 'The Yugoslav Dark Side of Humanity. A View from a Slovene Blind Spot', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, pp. 66-67.

⁶⁹ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, p. 136.

⁷⁰ Pavkovic, Fragmentation, pp. 137-138; Henk Hirs, 'Slovenen lijden aan oorlogshysterie' (Slovenes suffering from war hysteria), Trouw, 03/07/91. See also Simic, Yugoslavia, p. 44; 'Slovenia appeals to EC as deadline passes', Agence France Presse, 30/06/91; James Morgan, 'As they say in Europe. A war of words without ceasefires', Financial Times, 06/07/91.

⁷¹ Peter Sartorius, 'Slovenien: "Wir erwarten das Allerschlimmste"' (Slovenia says 'We expect the worst'), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 01/07/91.

⁷² Blaine Harden, 'Yugoslav Regions Assert Independence', The Washington Post, 26/06/91.

⁷³ Caroline de Gruyter, "Onze Kacin is beter dan Goebbels" (Our Kacin is better than Goebbels), Elsevier, 13/07/91, p. 34.

⁷⁴ Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 13; idem, Origins, p. 145.

world that this was a struggle of David against Goliath'.⁷⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard, correspondent of the NRC Handelsblad, came to the same conclusion: according to him the real facts of the Slovenian war generally pointed in exactly the opposite direction. Slovenian troops laid siege to barracks or had 'fun and games' with the charred bodies of JNA soldiers. He talked to Yugoslavs conscripts from Macedonia who a short while later would be 'blown to smithereens'.⁷⁶ One Dutch journalist who did echo the Slovenian point of view to a certain extent was Peter Michielsen of NRC Handelsblad, who expressed complete sympathy for Slovenia, the 'plucky little nipper' who had subjected the 'ugly Goliath' in the form of 'an army of reckless orthodox-communist generals' to a couple of humiliating defeats.⁷⁷ Most messages in this direction were to be found, however, on German television, which showed pictures of JNA planes and tanks in action. These made a deep impression on viewers.⁷⁸

Despite the Slovenian PR offensive, there was a certain amount of more or less amused astonishment in the press about this war – the first in Europe in nearly half a century. Journalists had largely missed the run-up to the Yugoslav crisis, because media attention had been strongly concentrated on the Gulf War during the preceding year.⁷⁹ There were few established press correspondents in Eastern Europe. Since Eastern Europe, and in particular the Balkans, did nevertheless arouse a fair degree of interest in the late 'eighties, this region tended up to the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia to be the field of free-lance journalists writing in particular couleur-locale stories.⁸⁰

The Cold War had presented the Foreign desks of the media with a relatively simple framework for international reporting: the world was divided into capitalists or democrats and Communists or dictators. They now had to get used to the change in post-war relationships, re-learn their history and geography and find new frameworks for the interpretation of their observations.⁸¹ At the same time, they had to present complicated matters in a relatively compact format to a western public with a grasshopper mind, that had become accustomed to zapping faster and faster from one item to another. In this respect the first part of the Yugoslav conflict, the war in Slovenia, was still fairly easy to grasp – even though it was over before the media had had the chance to explore its background in depth.

The struggle in Slovenia offered a war that could be reached from Vienna in a couple of hours along the Autobahn. A total of some two thousand journalists found their way to Ljubljana. Many of them knew little about Yugoslavia. They were in a certain sense disappointed that there was not much to see. During this 'ten-day war', there were only six days of real fighting. Sometimes there was little more to report than an 'eerie silence', in which a bell could be heard ringing 'unnaturally loudly'.⁸² A truce was announced as early as 3 July. The unreal nature of the 'war' in Slovenia reinforced the historic ⁷⁵ Henk Hirs, 'Slovenen lijden aan oorlogshysterie', Trouw, 03/07/91. The description of the struggle as one between David and Goliath came from Kučan, Peter Sartorius, 'Slowenien: 'Wir erwarten das Allerschlimmste'', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 01/07/91.

⁷⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan' (Lessons from the war in the Balkans), in Van Es & Sampimon & Starink (ed.), Redacturen, p. 214.

⁷⁷ Peter Michielsen, 'Breuk Joegoslavische federatie maakt van Balkan weer kruitvat' (Split in Yugoslav federation turns Balkans into a powder keg once more), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

⁷⁸ On this last-mentioned topic, see e.g. 'CSCE members increasingly divided over Yugoslav crisis', Agence France Presse, 03/07/91. See also Martin Kettle, 'Europe. The west sees the light', The Guardian, 05/07/91; Eisermann, Weg, p. 45.

⁷⁹ Mira Beham, 'Mythen und Lügen. Zum historischen Serbien-Feindbild' (Myths and lies. On the fine detail in the historical picture of Serbia), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 02/03/94; Herman Hoeneveld, 'Litouwse pers in opmars' (Lithuanian press on the march), De Journalist, 42(1991)4, p. 16.

⁸⁰ Peter Olsthoorn, 'Heen en weer in de roerige Balkan' (To and fro in the troubled Balkans), De Journalist, 42(1991)4, pp. 19-20.

⁸¹ Grunwald, 'Press'.

⁸² Peter Sartorius, 'Slowenien: 'Wir erwarten das Allerschlimmste'', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 01/07/91.

image of the Balkans as ‘a silly little place with silly wars’.⁸³ This remarkable overture to the wars in Yugoslavia strengthened the impression that this was ‘a provincial entertainment’,⁸⁴ an ‘operetta war’.⁸⁵

Peter Millonig - who had been recognised as a foreign agent of the Slovenian republic in March of that year - wrote in the New York Times that the Slovenian declaration of independence could not be called particularly dramatic from the perspective of world history.⁸⁶ The following passage from an article by the Dutch journalist André Roelofs in De Volkskrant may be seen as typical of this type of reporting, in which the dramatic element was strongly played down: ‘Fortunately, the Slovenes are an orderly people: nice little red and white warning signs were placed in front of the iron dragons’ teeth of the anti-tank barricades. You wouldn’t want an accident to happen.’⁸⁷

This relaxed tone, suitable for summer editions of the media, was reinforced by the fact that the western press, while reporting the reactions of the Slovenes, also played considerable attention to the problems of stranded tourists.⁸⁸

3. ‘Europe’s hour’

As soon as the Yugoslav crisis broke out in late June 1991, the EC leaders, glowing with enthusiasm, announced that here was a chance for the European Community to prove itself. The EC sent its troika (the ministers of Foreign Affairs of the previous, the present and the next Member of State to take up the presidency of the EC in turn) to the crisis-stricken region without delay. At that time they were the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs De Michelis, his colleague from Luxembourg Jacques Poos and the Dutch Minister Van den Broek respectively. Off they went to lend a helping hand. Luxembourg had almost finished on its term of presidency at the time, and Poos rejoiced on his way to Yugoslavia: ‘It is the hour of Europe. If anyone can achieve it, it is the European Community.’ And: ‘If there is one problem which the Europeans can solve, it is the Yugoslav problem... It is not up to the Americans’.⁸⁹

Other European leaders also stressed that the EC could and should solve this problem without support from the United States: ‘Yugoslavia is a European country’, said the German Federal Chancellor Kohl. ‘That means that we have the primary responsibility, and not the Americans or the Russians.’⁹⁰ The chairman of the European Commission, Delors, was of the same opinion: ‘We do not interfere in American affairs. We hope they will have enough respect not to interfere in ours.’⁹¹ The chairman of the Christian Democrat fraction in the European Parliament, Otto von Habsburg, never one to be shy of forceful statements, put it even more clearly. According to him, Yugoslavia was in no sense any business of the Americans. ‘They don’t understand the slightest thing about the matter, and they shouldn’t meddle with it.’⁹² The Italian De Michelis stated in more diplomatic terms that ⁸³ Russell, Prejudice, p. 168.

⁸⁴ Peter Michielsen, ‘Fluwelen en andere revoluties’ (Velvet and other revolutions), in: Van Es & Sampiemon & Starink (ed.), Redacteuren, p. 175.

⁸⁵ Peter Sartorius, ‘Slowenien: ‘Wir erwarten das Allerschlimmste’’, Süddeutsche Zeitung, 01/07/91.

⁸⁶ Peter Millonig, ‘After 7 Centuries, Slovenia Is Free’, The New York Times, 26/06/91.

⁸⁷ André Roelofs, ‘Slovenië hoopt, maar is op ergste voorbereid’ (Slovenia is hopeful, but prepares for the worst), de Volkskrant, 08/07/91.

⁸⁸ See e.g. ‘Twee lijken in een straat met broden’ (Two dead bodies in a street with loaves of bread), NRC Handelsblad, 28/06/91.

⁸⁹ Poos, speaking on BBC Radio 4 News, 27/06/91 and Channel 4 News, 27/06/91, respectively, cited in Almond, Wars, p. 392 n. 3. Cf. Alan Riding, ‘Conflict in Yugoslavia: Europeans send high-level team’, New York Times, 29/06/91. See also Gutman, Witness, p. xxv; Gijs de Vries, ‘Een kwestie van leiderschap’ (A question of leadership), in: De Vries et al., Continent, p. 18.

⁹⁰ ‘Bemiddeling EG’ (EC mediates), de Volkskrant, 29/06/91. See also Oscar Garschagen, ‘Kwestie-Joegoslavië brengt EG-leiders in alle staten’ (Yugoslav question agitates EC leaders), de Volkskrant, 01/07/91.

⁹¹ Cited in Bert, Superpower, p. 139.

⁹² Cited in Henri Beunders, ‘Aloude Duitse gevoelens tegen de Serviërs’ (Age-old German feelings against the Serbs), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

Washington was being kept informed, but was not being consulted.⁹³ And the Dutch premier Lubbers considered that the United States were 'not essential' for the solution of this crisis.⁹⁴

Someone from the inner circle of the Dutch Government stated that the European Community had got 'a kick' out of the Yugoslav question on 28 June. After the subsidiary role they had played during the Gulf War, EC leaders sensed that this new crisis might offer them new chances. With his typical habit of thinking up the questions that should be put to him, Lubbers stated, 'If you ask me whether the will to action we are displaying is partly due to the knowledge that the European reaction to the Gulf crisis was so markedly divided, I must answer yes.'⁹⁵

A certain optimism about the conflict in Yugoslavia could initially also be noted in the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV) of the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs. A memo from this directorate issued a few weeks after the outbreak of the crisis stated among other things, 'The next Ministerial (meeting of the CSCE) will take place in Prague on 30 and 31 January 1992, that of the CHA (Dutch abbreviation for Committee of Senior Civil Servants) on 22-24 October 1991. These meetings are thus only relevant to the Yugoslav crisis if that crisis is still in existence then.'⁹⁶ Like every Greek tragedy, the Yugoslav crisis began with hubris, the sin of pride.

The American government did not seem to be visibly hurt by the noises from Europe indicating that it should not interfere in the Yugoslav crisis. On the contrary. After Secretary of State James Baker had made a statement of American policy in Belgrade on 21 June 1991, less than a week before the outbreak of war in Yugoslavia, official American policy concerning the conflict was initially marked by extreme restraint. This attitude was due to American isolationist tendencies after the end of the Cold War, and a wish to let other countries share the costs of action in the interests of international stability. The weakening of the Soviet Union meant that the United States no longer had to intervene worldwide in order to counter possible Soviet influences.⁹⁷

The lack of clear aims in American foreign policy after the Cold War was probably an even more important factor than the growing isolationism.⁹⁸ The new world order proclaimed by George Bush Sr. was apparently mainly a slogan introduced to support the Gulf War rhetoric. Soon after that tour de force, American policy became cautious, ad hoc and reactive. Yugoslavia was no longer considered to be among the United States' vital interests after the Cold War. The attitude of the government in Washington was 'We don't have a dog in that fight.'⁹⁹ Washington seemed convinced that Europe, which had leaned heavily on the Americans for support since the Second World War, should deal with this crisis itself. Even Douglas Hurd, the Foreign Secretary of the UK, who always stressed his country's special relationship with the USA, was convinced that the American government could not be relied on for help in the case of Yugoslavia. 'The United States has no desire or ambition to police the world', he told the congress of the Conservative Party on 8 October 1991. 'For me it is clear and the case of Yugoslavia proves that the United States increasingly expects regional organizations to take care of regional conflicts.'¹⁰⁰

If Europe managed to get the sting out of the problem, Washington would be pleased. If it failed, the European government leaders would have to tone down their behaviour in dealings with the US compared with what they had shown shortly after the outbreak of war in Slovenia.¹⁰¹ The US State Department had concluded shortly after the event that there would be no quick solution to the ⁹³ Alan Riding, 'Conflict in Yugoslavia: A Toothless Europe?', New York Times, 04/07/91.

⁹⁴ Dutch Radio 1, VARA, Vrijdageditie, 05/07/91, 6.10 pm.

⁹⁵ 'Conflict Joegoslavië beheerst EG-top' (Yugoslav conflict dominates EC summit), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

⁹⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from RZ/rz, 'Joegoslavië/CVSE', 17/07/91.

⁹⁷ Cf. Bert, Superpower, pp. 3-10; Callahan, Wars, p. 19; Gergen, Opportunities; Talbott, Blues.

⁹⁸ See also e.g. Martin Walker, 'VS moeten nieuwe rol in wereld zoeken' (US forced to look for new world role), de Volkskrant, 29/08/91.

⁹⁹ Baker, cited in Silber & Little, Death, p. 30; Shawcross, Evil, p. 61. See also Jakobsen, Multilateralism, pp. 370-371.

¹⁰⁰ Cited in Roper, Yugoslavia, p. 2.

¹⁰¹ Cf. Newhouse, Round, p. 61.

Yugoslav problem, so direct involvement would not yield them any kudos.¹⁰² Time would prove them right.

Although the Yugoslav crisis had been foreseen, it could not have come at a more unfortunate moment. While it is true that President Bush had announced a new world order, nearly half a century after the Second World War and so shortly after the end of the Cold War the European architects of security had not yet managed to set up a usable edifice. This gap made it possible for the Yugoslav question to lead to what Richard Holbrooke, the subsequent American mediator in the conflict, called ‘the greatest collective security failure of the West since 1938’.¹⁰³ The end of the Cold War had caused the security situation in Europe to change drastically in the space of a few years. The European security architecture still was not furnished for intervention in intrastate conflicts. The international lawyer Steve Terrett has correctly stated that the rhetoric of the new world order was well in advance of the capacity for intervention in such conflicts.¹⁰⁴ But some comments went even further.

In many publications about (the former) Yugoslavia in the ‘nineties, the discussion concerning a new security architecture for Europe was regarded as the decor against which the developments there were enacted. A report like the present one, in which the developments in Yugoslavia also occupy a central place, could easily give rise to the same impression. This impression would be false, however, and would exaggerate the importance assigned to Yugoslavia – especially in the first few years of the conflict. Things were precisely the other way round, in fact: the crisis in Yugoslavia would form the decor against which the discussions about Europe’s new security architecture were held.¹⁰⁵ Yugoslavia was certainly not without significance in this context, and may have speeded up certain decisions which might only have been taken later under other circumstances, but the main question under discussion was the significance of NATO, the WEU, the security policy of the EC, CSCE and the role of the UN in the event of a European conflict. The events in Yugoslavia were secondary to all this. And, though it may seem regrettable from the viewpoint of Yugoslavia and the remnants resulting from its dissolution, what governments and ministries in the western capitals considered to be good for European security would not always offer a solution to Yugoslavia’s problems. In addition, one aspect of Yugoslavia that had been an advantage for many years, its non-aligned status, was starting to turn into a disadvantage after the collapse of the Soviet empire. With the exception of the CSCE, European security organizations were mainly interested in their own traditional member states and in the former members of the now defunct Warsaw Pact and Comecon. Yugoslavia had been caught in the offside trap: it was part of Europe, but was not a member state of any of these organizations.

There was a strong need for consensus within the EC at this time, on the way to the Maastricht treaty. This was perceived as more important than any detailed considerations of content. As more international organizations became involved in the solution of the conflict – the initial involvement of the EC was followed by that of the WEU, NATO, CSCE and UN – the problem of getting the western reaction to follow a single line increased. And even if all these organizations managed to reach a common decision, this would not necessarily mean that the policy chosen was the most effective one in the Yugoslav context.¹⁰⁶

Despite all the fine words about a new world order, it was thus completely unclear at this time (mid-1991) what order the international community, and the western countries in particular, were aiming at. Apart from lacking a clear, unanimous vision of the international order after the Cold War, the United States and the Western European countries also had no view of the objectives of their own foreign policy.¹⁰⁷ NATO, the only organization with the resources for military intervention, was going

¹⁰² ABZ, Kabinetsarchief Stg. Geheime Codes. Bentinck 815 to Van den Broek, 16/08/91, Confi.

¹⁰³ United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, United Nations, p. 6.

¹⁰⁴ Terrett, Dissolution, p. vi.

¹⁰⁵ Cf. Eisermann, Weg, p. 54.

¹⁰⁶ Cf. Freedman, West, p. 54.

¹⁰⁷ Cf. Callahan, Wars, p. 14; Erich Rathfelder, ‘Der Historiker Jasper Ridley über britische Balkanpolitik’ (The historian Jasper Ridley on British policy in the Balkans), Taz, Die Tageszeitung, 24/01/95.

through an identity crisis¹⁰⁸ and other organizations that could have played a role in a European security structure, such as the Western European Union (WEU), the CSCE and the European Community, were not (yet) ready to do so. The main reasons for the failure of these organizations to make any meaningful contribution were the vacuum created after the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact and Comecon in 1991; the fact that the multilateral security organizations were designed to deal with interstate, not intrastate, conflicts; and a lack of suitable problem-solving tools.

No role for NATO...

NATO had several big advantages compared with other international bodies that could have played a role in decision-making about the Yugoslav question: political consultation and military planning were already well integrated within its structure, and military cooperation between member states was already institutionalized. It was a big organization, its component units were used to working together and it had a clear command structure.

On the other hand, NATO was an intergovernmental organization within which decisions were taken on the basis of consensus. This had not given rise to problems during the Cold War, when everyone knew who the enemy was; but the end of this era heralded a certain degree of mental renationalization also within the ranks of NATO.¹⁰⁹ The disagreements about Yugoslavia which manifested themselves between e.g. Germany, France and Great Britain in the European Community or the WEU could also be felt in NATO – quite apart from the fact that the most important member state of the Atlantic alliance, the United States, felt little for intervention in the former Yugoslavia. Due to this lack of commitment, the Americans in NATO could not exert the same tempering effect on differences between the Western European partners that they could generally provide.

Moreover, each NATO member state had individually cashed in its own 'peace dividend' quite soon after the end of the Cold War. As a result, NATO had fewer troops at its disposal while the lack of coordination when the cuts were made had led to an imbalance in resource structure. In addition, NATO was hampered by a conflict of interests (which may or may not have been imaginary) between the United States and Europe. Precisely because trans-Atlantic relationships were less governed by military considerations after the Cold War than before, differences between Europe and America made themselves felt not only in the military but also e.g. in the economic field. At the same time, these somewhat strained relationships naturally also had an effect on matters in the field of defence.

The American reserve with respect to the Yugoslav conflict means that NATO, within which the United States were such a dominant factor, would also be unable to play a role of significance – at least in the beginning. It would in any case have been difficult for NATO to do so at that time, since in 1991 the alliance was only supposed to deal with conflicts in which one of the signatories to the treaty was attacked. Initially, therefore, NATO did little more in connection with the Yugoslav crisis than monitor the situation and express support for the initiatives of the EC and the CSCE.

During the NATO summit conference in Rome in November 1991, member states were supposed to embrace the new Strategic Concept according to which, among other things, NATO was to become one of the pillars of security in Europe. By so doing, the alliance took an important step in its development from a confederation for collective self-defence towards an organization for collective security. Nevertheless, NATO's new Strategic Concept did not as yet say anything about peacekeeping operations.

There were in principle three European organizations capable of playing a role in connection with the Yugoslav conflict: the WEU, the CSCE and the EC. Two of these three, the CSCE and the ¹⁰⁸ See e.g. Herman Amelink and Frits Schaling, 'Dilemma: vernieuwing of vergetelheid' (Dilemma: innovation or oblivion), NRC Handelsblad, 05/10/91.

¹⁰⁹ See e.g. the relevant passage in the talk given at the AGM of the NOV (Dutch Officers' Association) on 24 November 1993 by the chairman of NATO's Military Committee, Field Marshall Sir Richard Vincent: 'NATO – Where next?', Carré 17(1994)1, p. 8.

WEU, were chaired at this time by Germany, a country that had proved during the Gulf War to have great constitutional problems about deploying troops outside its national borders. Moreover, an active role on the part of Germany was made more difficult by the fact that Serbia had started up a violent press campaign against German 'revanchism' several months before the outbreak of the conflict. None of the three European organizations had an adequate political crisis-management mechanism.

...or for the WEU...

The WEU, set up in 1954 by a number of Western European countries with the objective of offering mutual support in the case of an attack on one of the member states' territory, comprised all EC states with the exception of Ireland, Denmark and Greece in 1991. It had led an almost dormant existence in the shadow of NATO for decades. The union first assumed operational tasks in 1987, when it coordinated the sending of naval units to the Gulf in order to protect shipping in the region during the Iraq-Iran war, mainly by means of mine-sweeping duties. The operation lasted one and a half years. Thereafter, the WEU also supplied ships for an economic blockade of Iraq after troops from that country had invaded Kuwait in 1990.

The union had one clear advantage over the much more powerful NATO when it came to dealing with the conflict in Yugoslavia. While the North Atlantic Treaty Organization restricted itself to the territory of member states (the 'treaty region'), the WEU was not subject to any such geographical limitation.

The drawback of the WEU was the lack of American participation. This lack would be felt most strongly in the case of a possible WEU intervention in the fields of transport facilities and intelligence. The French President Mitterrand and the German Chancellor Kohl had suggested in December 1990 that a WEU force might be set up as the defence arm of the EC. The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek had opposed this idea forcibly because he feared that it would undermine NATO, in which the Americans played the leading role.¹¹⁰ Shortly after, on 20 February 1991, the American State Department informed WEU capitals via the 'Bartholomew telegram' that while a role for the WEU outside Europe was acceptable, Washington was against WEU involvement in Eastern Europe. The American government did not wish the impression to be created that the Americans cared less about Eastern Europe than the Europeans. This telegram caused the WEU ministers to decide to freeze further decision-making on this point.¹¹¹

It appeared during a regular meeting of the WEU on 27 June in Vianden (Luxembourg) that the Netherlands and the United Kingdom were still opposed to a European security and defence identity in which the WEU would play a greater role, as in particular France wanted.¹¹²

On that occasion, the WEU also issued a statement expressing concern about the situation in Yugoslavia and the wish that the parties to the conflict would soon get down to negotiations. The Union called on CSCE member states to promote such a process.¹¹³ Shortly after, the WEU Institute for Security Studies prepared a memo on a possible role for military observers to counter escalation of the conflict in Yugoslavia. Germany – occupying the chairmanship of the WEU at the time – refused to circulate this paper, however.¹¹⁴ The organization did not meet again for a considerable time.

¹¹⁰ P.G.S. van Schie, 'Vrede en veiligheid in het nieuwe Europa' (Peace and security in the new Europe), Liberaal Reveil, 32(1991)4, p. 122; P. Rusman, 'De laatste Koude Oorlogstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)' (The last Cold War warrior, Hans Van den Broek (1982-1993), in Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, pp. 275-276.

¹¹¹ W.F. van Eekelen, 'Nieuwe dimensies van Europese veiligheid' (New dimensions of European security), LEF, (1992)33 (June), pp. 19-20. The text of the telegram is reproduced in Van Eekelen, Security, pp. 340-344

¹¹² Oscar Garschagen, 'WEU blijft verdeeld over veiligheidsbeleid Europa' (WEU remains divided on security policy for Europe), de Volkskrant, 28/06/91.

¹¹³ Statement by WEU Council of Ministers, Vianden, Luxembourg, 27/01/91, <http://www.weu.int/eng/comm/91-vianden-a.htm>.

¹¹⁴ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 143.

In fact, the union was poorly equipped for an active role. The WEU, headed by the former Dutch Minister of Defence W.F. (Willem) van Eekelen since the spring of 1989, had a ‘remarkably small’ staff;¹¹⁵ insiders in the Dutch political scene often jokingly said that WEU stood for ‘Willems Eigen Unie’ (Willem’s own union). As the Member of Parliament for the VVD (Liberal) fraction Weisglas said, ‘To be honest, it’s nothing more than Mr. Van Eekelen in his London office.’¹¹⁶ It was not until the second half of 1992 that a planning unit with a staff of about forty was set up within the WEU to deal with crisis management operations.

Two of the WEU’s member states, Germany and Italy, were completely unacceptable to Serbia as to deal with the crisis in Yugoslavia. Great Britain was completely opposed to involvement of the WEU. The only remaining supporters of the idea were Belgium, France, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain.

... or for the CSCE...

The CSCE, which comprised all European countries (with the exception of Albania), the United States, Canada and observers from Japan and South Korea – therefore called ‘the Euro-Atlantic community from Vancouver to Vladivostok’ by Secretary of State Baker¹¹⁷ – was set up in 1975 by the Act of Helsinki to deal with matters concerning security, economic cooperation and human rights. The founding agreement enshrined the importance of the principles of territorial integrity and the right to self-determination, without assigning priorities. The second Conference devoted to the Human Dimension was held in Copenhagen in June 1990. In the final communiqué of the Conference, the CSCE member states made far-reaching commitments concerning human rights, national minorities, free elections and the promotion of democratic institutions. Further guidelines to this effect, drawn up at the initiative of the Netherlands among other countries, were laid down in the Paris Charter for a New Europe that was adopted during the CSCE summit conference held in the French capital in November 1990. The Charter also contained agreements on improvement of security in Europe by further arms controls, political consultation and conflict-prevention mechanisms. It instituted a permanent CSCE Council of Ministers, together with a Commission of Senior Civil Servants to prepare the ministerial meetings. A permanent secretariat, a conflict-prevention centre and a bureau for the observation of free elections were also formed.

While these changes reflected the high level of ambitions in the CSCE at the time, the organization was still weakly developed when the conflict in Yugoslavia broke out. It had no military resources, and the large number of member states (initially 34, i.e. the original 35 signatories minus the GDR, subsequently 52, with Bosnia-Herzegovina as the 52nd member) made decision-making difficult. Consensus was initially required for all decision-making, but with effect from January 1992 this requirement was weakened to ‘consensus minus one’.

The CSCE’s main activity was consultation, and this remained the case for some considerable time. As a diplomat put it at the end of June 1991, the CSCE was still in its milk-teeth stage.¹¹⁸ It was not much more than a ‘fair-weather’ debating society.¹¹⁹

In November 1990, the United States and the Soviet Union had vetoed CSCE involvement in the incipient Yugoslav crisis. The Soviet Union was particularly worried that the CSCE might get involved in the internal affairs of a country, since it might then go on to meddle with the issue of the ¹¹⁵ Van Eekelen, Sporen, p. 231.

¹¹⁶ VARA, Vrijdageditie, 10/07/92, 5.05 pm

¹¹⁷ See e.g. Joris Cammelbeeck, ‘CVSE heeft haar plaats gevonden’ (CSCE has found its place), de Volkskrant, 21/06/91.

¹¹⁸ Alan Philips, ‘Crisis in Yugoslavia; Europe’s fire brigade fails in Balkan crisis’, Daily Telegraph, 29/06/91. See also ‘CVSE: weinig concreets, veel fraaie woorden’ (CSCE: Plenty of fine words but few concrete conclusions), Trouw, 20/06/91.

¹¹⁹ Van Eekelen in: Ko Colijn & Paul Rusman, ‘Wim van Eekelen over zijn Joegoslavië-plannen: divisie, vlootje, luchtmachtje’ (Wim van Eekelen on his plans for Yugoslavia: a cosy little army division, a cosy little fleet, a cosy little air force), Vrij Nederland, 30/05/92.

Baltic states, which were pressing for independence from the Soviet Union. This decision was not repealed until July 1991.

On 27 June, Austria asked for CSCE measures to boost confidence and promote security, in view of the unusual military activities in neighbouring Yugoslavia. Austria had been following the developments with great interest for some considerable time. The Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs Alois Mock visited a series of European capitals starting in the Spring of 1990 to point out the serious nature of the crisis in Yugoslavia, but his own government was divided on the question of what Austria could do about these developments.¹²⁰ In May 1991, he made a plea for the formation of a group of wise statesmen to mediate in the impending conflict. His Yugoslav counterpart Loncar rejected that proposal, however. Austrian troops were placed on a state of alert as early as the second week of May, in response to movements of JNA troops along the Slovenian border.¹²¹ In view of its application for membership of the EC, Austria did not want to make a direct plea for recognition of the independence of Slovenia and Croatia which would go against the European Community's initial stress on Yugoslav unity. However, the Austrian Consul-General in Ljubljana and the governors of a number of Austrian provinces did attend the Slovenian independence celebrations on 26 June. The CSCE charter offered Austria a mechanism for placing the Yugoslav question after the declarations of independence before an international forum for debate.

Austria's example was soon followed by another neighbour of the two republics that were striving for independence, viz. Italy. So far, that country had not been steering a perfectly straight course with respect to the constitutional future of Yugoslavia. On the one hand, it had no wish to see European borders – in particular those of Yugoslavia – undergoing change, this might revive discussion of the status of the borders around Trieste, only agreed after complex and difficult negotiations after the Second World War. On the other hand, two weeks before the declarations of independence the Italian government violated the EC agreement not to receive representatives of the breakaway republics at high level, when Premier Giulio Andreotti and President Francesco Cossiga met the Slovenian President Kucan, the Slovenian Premier Peterle and the Croatian President Tudjman. The Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs De Michelis pointed out on that occasion that Italy was bound by the EC viewpoint stressing the unity of Yugoslavia, but Cossiga countered that Croatia and Slovenia should not be sacrificed on the altar of Yugoslavia's constitutional unity.¹²²

The recently instituted CSCE crisis mechanism stipulated that Yugoslavia should provide answers to Austria and Italy within 48 hours about the military activities of the JNA, after which the latter countries could ask for a meeting to be convened. On 30 June, Luxembourg made use of another CSCE instrument by asking Germany as the current chair of the CSCE to call an emergency meeting of the Committee of Senior Civil Servants in accordance with the crisis mechanism procedures. After Yugoslavia had provided the information requested about the unusual military manoeuvres, representatives of the 34 CSCE member states met in Vienna on 1 July. The final communiqué, based on consensus and thus also agreed on by Yugoslavia itself, called for immediate cessation of hostilities and immediate return of the troops to their barracks.

The Dutch government, which took over the chairmanship of the European Community from Luxembourg on that date, did its best to coordinate the activities undertaken within the framework of the CSCE as closely as possible with those of the EC,¹²³ since the CSCE offered a platform for continued involvement of the Soviet Union and the United States in the handling of the Yugoslav crisis. Thanks among other things to an active contribution from the Netherlands as chair of the EC, the CSCE's Committee of Senior Civil Servants reached agreement on 4 July on a call for a ceasefire, a communiqué about a CSCE goodwill mission and one about the sending of a team of observers to ¹²⁰ Woodward, Tragedy, pp. 148-149.

¹²¹ Gow, Yugoslavia, pp. 304 and 308.

¹²² Gow, Yugoslavia, pp. 304-305.

¹²³ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 1.

Yugoslavia.¹²⁴ The mission in question would only be sent, however, in response to a formal invitation from Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia had played a constructive role within the CSCE in the past. During the Cold War Belgrade regarded this organization, in which member states participated on an equal footing, as the ideal platform for neutral and non-aligned countries to voice their opinions in a European context.¹²⁵ The organization even remained attractive to the regime in Belgrade after the end of the Cold War, because it was the only security organization of which Yugoslavia was a member. However, the 34 countries of the CSCE felt more nervous than the twelve EC countries about active involvement in a matter that could be described as an internal affair.¹²⁶ In addition, the Yugoslav delegation could block all decisions it did not like on the basis of the consensus rule. After Slovenia and Croatia had made their declarations of independence, however, Belgrade preferred the matter to be handled by the EC since the current chair of the CSCE, Germany, had expressed its preference for independence of the two republics too clearly. As a result, Belgrade never sent an invitation for the goodwill mission. Milosevic and his men were against it.

...not to mention the UN...

The stance adopted by the UN was initially if possible even more reserved than that of the WEU and CSCE. Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar stated shortly after the declarations of independence that he regarded the matter as a Yugoslav internal affair.¹²⁷ This view was also shared in particular by Russia and China. The permanent members of the Security Council decided during an informal discussion held on 3 July 1991 that the situation in Yugoslavia did not call for a formal meeting, since there was as yet no question of a threat to international peace and security.¹²⁸

In mid-July, the G-7 (the seven richest industrialized countries) called for a UN peacekeeping force to be sent to Croatia; this initiative met with Russian opposition, however.¹²⁹ Even if the Security Council had been more willing to deal with the Yugoslav conflict, it is doubtful whether such a peacekeeping initiative would have been possible. In the early 'nineties, the UN was confronted with a combination of growing ambitions and a shrinking budget, partly because of the tardiness of certain member states in paying their dues.¹³⁰ As a result, the UN's secretariat was not particularly keen to get involved in a conflict in Europe, which was rich enough to deal with it itself. It would be better to leave the problem to a regional organization.¹³¹ As the months went by, Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar was more and more inclined to regard the Yugoslav question as 'a failed undertaking', with which his organization would be well advised to have as little to do as possible.¹³²

...so maybe the EC could do something after all?

As a result on the one hand of the reserved stance adopted by the United States and the unwillingness or inability of other international organizations to deal with the matter, and on the other of the ¹²⁴ Libal, Limits, p. 18.

¹²⁵ Baudet, Aandacht, p. 215.

¹²⁶ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 14.

¹²⁷ Herman Amelink, 'Joegoslavische crisis eerste test voor CVSE-mechanisme' (Yugoslav crisis first test for CSCE mechanism), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

¹²⁸ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 14; ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283, EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië/scenario's en beleidsmogelijkheden' (Yugoslavia: scenarios and policy options) for Extra CoPo, The Hague 19/07/91, 18/07/91.

¹²⁹ Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', in Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 242. See also Eisermann, Weg, p. 37.

¹³⁰ Cf. 'Vredesmissies VN schieten tekort door geldgebrek' (UN peace missions underperform due to cash shortage), de Volkskrant, 24/08/00.

¹³¹ Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, pp. 478 and 486.

¹³² Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 486.

euphoria felt by some European leaders at the prospect of the EC getting a chance to prove itself on the international stage, the European Community became the main foreign actor in the Yugoslav conflict in the summer of 1991.

However, this conflict came both too early and too late for the EC. Too early, because the Community was still busy developing a common foreign and security policy. Starting in 1958 with six member states wishing to set up an economic union, it now comprised twelve countries and its activities had expanded to cover non-economic fields as well. The member states had decided in 1970 to embark on European Political Cooperation (EPC), involving inter-governmental consultation aimed at coordination of the foreign policy of the individual member states. The terms of this form of cooperation were laid down in the Single European Act, adopted in 1986, which also stipulated that the member states undertook 'to avoid any action or attitude which reduces their effectiveness as a cohesive force in international relations or within international organizations'.¹³³

EPC was not an integral part of the European Community, but an independent body with its own secretariat in Brussels. In the meantime, however, the Twelve were on the way to realizing a common foreign and security policy. After the collapse of the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, some European leaders were afraid of the possibility of renationalization of European foreign and defence policy. The wish to avoid this was one of the motives leading European leaders to agree during the Dublin summit in June 1990 to open negotiations concerning the formation of a European Union. The Dutch government was a particularly fervent opponent of renationalization. The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek wrote e.g. in this connection, 'History forbids a return to unbridled freedom for national states, to the bilateralism of the European great powers and the Kleinstaterei of the others', and he went on to say 'Europe will cooperate or it will cease to exist'.¹³⁴

Despite the difficulty associated with some steps along the path of European unification, the EC had made great progress towards integration. In this respect, the Yugoslav crisis came too late. While some tendencies towards renationalization may have become apparent after the end of the Cold War, the leaders of the EC were no longer mentally equipped to deal with expressions of extreme nationalism. Thinking in terms of transfer of authority from national states to intergovernmental, Community or confederative bodies was so far advanced in Western Europe since the Second World War that there was little room for understanding of what was regarded as old-fashioned nationalism.¹³⁵ 'Separatism and European unity cannot co-exist in principle', noted W.H. Weenink in NRC Handelsblad.¹³⁶

While Europe seemed to be on the way to the future, it was brutally confronted in the Summer of 1991 with the resurrection of an aspect of history which many people had thought was dead and gone after Fukuyama. While it is true that the examples of Fidel Castro in Cuba, Kim Il Song in North Korea and, nearer home, Ceausescu in Romania had proved, long before Milosevic, that nationalism was still a real option for Communist leaders struggling to hold on to power, this tendency was apparently too alien to current Western European political value patterns to be clearly noticed.

The nature of the tools the EC had at its disposal to try to control the crisis in Yugoslavia clearly reflected the organization's mainly economic origins. As Delors was to comment in September 1991, the EG had only three weapons it could use: public opinion, recognition and economic sanctions.¹³⁷ It had no military weapons at all. Negotiating to reach a settlement on such matters as agriculture or mutual trade was quite a different matter from trying to achieve diplomatic aims without a real threat to fall back on.

¹³³ Single European Act, title III, art. 30.

¹³⁴ H. van den Broek, 'Continuïteit en vernieuwing in Europa' (Continuity and innovation in Europe), Christen Democratische Verkenningen (1990)5, p. 208.

¹³⁵ Cf. Callahan, Wars, pp. 11-12; Bertrand de Largentaye, 'The Role of the European Community', in: Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, p. 32; Russell, Prejudice, p. 221; Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 69; interview H.A. Schaper, 12/04/00.

¹³⁶ W.H. Weenink, 'Pax Europeana', NRC Handelsblad, 01/07/91.

¹³⁷ Cited in Maull, Germany, p. 127 n. 5.

It was characteristic of the second half of 1991 that a strong feeling existed within the EC that the Community should reflect a spirit of consensus on the way to the Maastricht Treaty.¹³⁸ In view of the existing developments and balance of power, however, that meant that big countries with clear objectives could make use of this desire for consensus among the other partners to force acceptance of their own wishes.

Moreover, each one of the major EC countries had its own policy as regards Yugoslavia right from the start of the conflict.

4. National positions within the European Community

A meeting of the Council of Ministers was planned on 28 and 29 June in Luxembourg, to mark the end of that country's chairmanship of the EC.

The only measure taken during this meeting, at the instigation of Germany, was the threat to freeze EC financial assistance to Yugoslavia if it did not meet EC wishes with respect to the crisis. After the weekly government meeting in The Hague, Vice-Premier Kok, who replaced Lubbers who was at the EC summit, stated his view that the EC had been right to take up 'firm positions' so early on in the process.¹³⁹ He went on to say that as a result the Netherlands, which was due to take over the chairmanship of the EC 'had also got right to the heart of the attempts to contribute to finding peaceful solutions'. He added on the same occasion that the Netherlands would fulfil 'an important function' not only in the EC but also in the CSCE.¹⁴⁰ Premier Lubbers was less optimistic about the results of the threat to stop financial assistance. According to him, experience has taught that such threats to cut off the flow of money did not help 'when people have finally come to the end of their tether'.¹⁴¹

Two days before the meeting of the Council of Ministers, the Eastern Europe department of the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs briefed Minister Van den Broek, suggesting that the points to be raised at the meeting were that the conflict in Yugoslavia should be localized as far as possible, attempts should be made to reach a ceasefire and dialogue should be resumed. Formal recognition of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia would 'probably be inevitable in the long term, but should be postponed as long as possible'.¹⁴²

In the meantime, the urgency of the developments in Yugoslavia did not seem to have penetrated to the department. EC chair Luxembourg had proposed sending a legal commission to Belgrade to advise the parties. Germany, supported by England and France, regarded the problem not as a legal but as a political one, so that a political mission would be more appropriate. The civil servants of the Eastern Europe department of the Dutch ministry agreed that some kind of mission to Belgrade was desirable, but thought it advisable to decide on the nature of the mission before sending anybody. According to the Eastern Europe department, the Eastern Europe working group of the EC could work out a recommendation during its next meeting in mid-July.¹⁴³ The European Community thus had little to offer at the moment when Croatia and Slovenia made their declarations of independence. Although the impending crisis in Yugoslavia was also discussed within the framework of the EPC, not a single plan of action was ready for use when it finally came.¹⁴⁴

¹³⁸ Both, Indifference, pp. 89 and 102; Dumas, Fil, p. 354.

¹³⁹ 'Kabinet denkt aan opschorten hulp voor Joegoslavië' (Government considers stopping aid to Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

¹⁴⁰ AVRO, News, 28/06/91, 6.04 pm

¹⁴¹ 'Bemiddeling EG', de Volkskrant, 29/06/91.

¹⁴² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, memo DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië – Spreekpunten' (Yugoslavia: topics for discussion) for the Council of Ministers, 28/06/91 and 29/06/91, 26/06/91.

¹⁴³ Council of Ministers, Ibid.

¹⁴⁴ Cf. Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 70.

Energetic approach from Italy

During the meeting of the Council of Ministers, however, it soon became clear that the Italian delegation was determined to make use of practically the last opportunity for it to set a stamp on events as a member of the troika (its membership ended two days after the summit, on 1 July).¹⁴⁵

The Italian delegation arrived in Luxembourg in a DC-9 of the Italian Air Force, which was much too big for it. Right after the opening of the conference, Premier Andreotti proposed that the troika should go to Yugoslavia to quieten down the conflict there. That was why the Italians had arrived in such a big aircraft, which would have room not only for the three ministers of the troika together with their staff, but also for journalists (only Italian ones, of course).¹⁴⁶

The troika did indeed leave Luxembourg for Yugoslavia in the late afternoon of 28 June. The delegation was armed with little more than persuasive words. ‘Come to your senses, man’, the Italian Minister De Michelis, who played a dominant role during the troika’s visit to Belgrade, appears to have called out to the Yugoslav premier Markovic.¹⁴⁷ The troika threatened Markovic and the Serb president Milosevic with termination of the financial assistance to Yugoslavia valued at 1.9 billion guilders (some 850 million euros, at current rates of exchange). Pressure was exerted on the Slovenian and Croatian presidents, Kucan and Tudjman, to agree to a three-month moratorium on their independence.

Since the truce that the troika thought they had brokered on Friday 28 June did not hold, while Kucan and Tudjman denied having made any promises about a moratorium, the troika set off again two days later. During this second visit, on 30 June 1991, the troika managed to bring about a delay in the implementation of the two declarations of independence. A ceasefire was also announced, and it was further agreed that the JNA troops would withdraw to their barracks and that the Croat Mesic, whose appointment as chairman of the collective state presidium in May had been blocked by Serbia, would be confirmed in this function after all.

Kucan and Tudjman demanded, however, that the EC should send observers to monitor compliance with the agreements. Markovic objected to this proposal. Van den Broek, who had taken over the chairmanship of the EC from Poos at midnight in Belgrade, commented modestly after his return from Belgrade on 1 July that ‘the EC has neither the pretension nor the illusion to claim to have achieved lasting solutions for Yugoslavia with these proposals’. The solution would ultimately have to come from Belgrade and the constituent republics themselves. But ‘if you don’t try to advance, you will soon very quickly slide further and further back. Particularly in the Yugoslav situation, this possibility is far from imaginary.’¹⁴⁸ According to De Volkskrant, everything that the Dutch minister of Foreign Affairs said came down to ‘I’ll believe it when I see it’. It was concluded that Minister Van den Broek was going to face difficult times. This was not just due to the problems in Yugoslavia but also to the lack of European unity and consensus.¹⁴⁹

British scepticism

At the end of June, when Poos and other EC leaders had expressed such euphoria, the British Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd had sounded a more cautious note. He had stated on that occasion that no solution could be imposed from outside. He had further pointed out that Yugoslavia had been formed after the First World War as a solution to the problems of a multi-ethnic population in the Balkans ‘with a long history of peoples fighting each other’. According to him, the independence of Slovenia ¹⁴⁵ Cf. interview H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00.

¹⁴⁶ Oscar Garschagen, ‘Kwestie-Joegoslavië brengt EG in alle staten’, de Volkskrant, 01/07/91; ‘Conflict Joegoslavië beheerst EG-top’, NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91; ‘EG lijkt te schrikken van daadkracht’ (EC seems scared of idea of using force), ibid.

¹⁴⁷ Oscar Garschagen, ‘Kwestie-Joegoslavië brengt EG in alle staten’, de Volkskrant, 01/07/91; according to André Roelofs, ‘Een voorproefje van Duitse Alleingang’ (A foretaste of German Alleingang (‘going it alone’)), de Volkskrant, 03/07/91, De Michelis had said, ‘Come on man, come to your senses’.

¹⁴⁸ NCRV, Hier en Nu (Here and now), 01/07/91, 12.05 pm

¹⁴⁹ Oscar Garschagen, ‘Kwestie-Joegoslavië brengt EG-leiders in alle staten’, de Volkskrant, 01/07/91.

and Croatia meant the displacement of many thousands of people, ‘and that doesn’t happen peacefully and easily. The prospect is a frightening one.’¹⁵⁰

He considered further that all the European Community was capable of was tightening the economic thumbscrews on a country, but in conflicts like the one in Yugoslavia such an approach achieved nothing. Politics were trumps there. In Hurd’s opinion, all the West could do was to try to negotiate, but in fact he had little hope of good results from such an approach.¹⁵¹ The British government had experience of a civil conflict in Northern Ireland. Because London knew how little effect regular troops could have in such a conflict, it adopted a very reserved attitude in the present case.¹⁵² An additional factor was that officials in London were far from happy about the lack of results in Cyprus, where a multinational UN peacekeeping force had been stationed since 1974. As a British civil servant put it, ‘We are the WEU member with the greatest experience of peace-keeping and all that experience suggests is that it is far easier to send the troops in than to take them out afterwards.’¹⁵³ Moreover, London considered that military involvement required a solid political foundation. It was not felt in the British capital that the EC – or later the UN – offered such a foundation.¹⁵⁴

Great Britain’s reserve was reinforced by the tradition of avoiding involvement in matters affecting the European continent.¹⁵⁵ The British secret service MI6 also had the motto ‘Stay out as long as possible.’¹⁵⁶ There was a great tendency for splendid isolation and arrogance to go hand in hand. The first time the British premier John Major discussed the situation in Yugoslavia with his Dutch counterpart Lubbers, he told the Dutch premier, ‘This is Africa.’¹⁵⁷

Finally, the UK had made drastic cuts in its armed forces in the summer of 1991 while at the same time increasing the number of troops stationed in Northern Ireland. The army was worst hit, its numbers being reduced from 147,000 to 116,000. The British Army on the Rhine was more than halved, from 55,000 to 23,000.¹⁵⁸ As a result, the country had few troops available to meet new commitments abroad. This led Great Britain to keep a foot continually on the brake during the first year of the conflict in (the former) Yugoslavia, and to block initiatives proposed within the framework of the European Community and the WEU.¹⁵⁹

Moreover, Great Britain was not without sympathy for the Serb cause. This was true of the British diplomatic service,¹⁶⁰ but also in particular of politicians and the media.¹⁶¹ Friends of Serbia were to be found both in Labour and in Conservative circles. Besides, Great Britain had had a well-developed Serb community of its own since 1945. Despite such pro-Serb feelings, which had been reinforced by Serb action during the First World War, reservations about the Serbs also existed in the United Kingdom because they were seen as potential allies of Russia. In fact, the British had objections to all parties with regard to the Yugoslav conflict, which provided a fertile soil for a policy of isolationism. The Croats were Catholics, which elicited an instinctive aversion in many Britons. They ¹⁵⁰ Cited in Almond, War, p. 234.

¹⁵¹ Interview Hurd by Jonathan Dimbleby, ‘On the Record’, BBC1, 30/06/91, cited in Almond, War, pp. 234-235.

¹⁵² For references to the conflict in Northern Ireland see e.g. Caroline de Gruyter, ‘Wachten op een Churchill’ (Waiting for a Churchill), Elsevier, 15/08/92, pp. 31-32; Rick Kuethe, ‘De oorlog als moeras’ (The war as a swamp), Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 34; the British Major-General Thompson, cited in Joke van Kampen, ‘Op de plaats rust!’ (At ease, men!), De Groene Amsterdammer, 19/08/92, p. 7; Hans van den Broek in: Leonard Ornstein, ‘Minister Van den Broek: ‘Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg’’ (Foreign Minister Van den Broek says, ‘I would suggest we start by firing a shot across their bows’), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10; interviews A. Erdős, 11/05/00 and H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00.

¹⁵³ Menon & Forster & Wallace, Defence, p. 118 n. 11.

¹⁵⁴ Interview P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00.

¹⁵⁵ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

¹⁵⁶ Interview M. Urban, 26/03/99.

¹⁵⁷ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

¹⁵⁸ ‘Londen beperkt kosten defensie met een vijfde’ (London slashes defence costs by a fifth), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

¹⁵⁹ Interview H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00.

¹⁶⁰ For examples, see Russell, Prejudice, pp. 283-285.

¹⁶¹ For examples, see Tanner, Croatia, pp. 272-273.

were also unduly influenced by Germany. And in a later phase of the conflict, the Muslim presence in Great Britain led to a fear of fundamentalism in Europe.¹⁶²

Great Britain tried to coordinate the policy regarding recognition of the republics produced by the crumbling of Yugoslavia with that followed by the western world with respect to the Soviet Union. Certain problems were similar in both cases, such as the question of boundaries, the minority problems and the burden of debt.¹⁶³

Germany prepared to go it alone?

It became immediately clear during the meeting of the Council of Ministers in Luxembourg at the end of June that the two main principles involved in the conflict – maintenance of territorial integrity in the case of Yugoslavia and recognition of the right to self-determination in the cases of Slovenia and Croatia – led to serious divisions within the EC, and in particular between the two countries regarded as the driving forces behind European integration, France and Germany. The French President François Mitterrand was a firm advocate of the first principle, while the German Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl stated his strong support for the right to self-determination. It was decided during the meeting by way of compromise that the European Community should take steps to promote a process of controlled constitutional change in Yugoslavia.¹⁶⁴

The main country to articulate a national standpoint of its own during this phase was Germany, which was in the process of re-orienting its international stance since the re-unification of Eastern and Western Germany on 3 October 1990. Weighed down by the burden of the past, (Western) Germany had not acted like a great power for decades after the Second World War. While the country had developed into an economic giant, it had not dared to follow a foreign policy that matched its national status. It had made great efforts to embed its foreign policy in multilateral treaties and international organizations and had followed a highly normative policy embodying a positive valuation of international law and an aversion to violence as a means of resolving conflicts.¹⁶⁵

In 1989, the American President Bush had called on the government in Bonn to play a greater role in international politics. He did this by stating that the United States and Germany were partners in leadership. In fact, the American government clearly had less trouble accepting Germany's new position than European governments had. Now that the Soviet Union no longer counted as a great power, the nuclear threat was reduced and the Federal Republic had been re-united with the DDR, Bonn had less need of American guarantees of its security than in the past and Germany could start steering a more independent course.

It took Germany some time to adapt to its new role, however. Since the German government considered that its constitution prohibited an international military role for the Bundeswehr other than the defence of its own territory and that of its allies, it refused to respond positively to an American request for it to play a substantial military role during the Gulf War. Bonn made a contribution of 17 billion mark in lieu of this obligation.¹⁶⁶ Even after that, in particular with reference to the Yugoslav conflict, most German politicians would continue to insist that the German armed forces should only be used to defend its own territory and that of its allies. Others were more responsive to the argument that German relations with South-east Europe were so burdened by the events of the Second World War that the deployment of German troops in this region, even for peacekeeping purposes, would not

¹⁶² Erich Rathfelder, 'Der Historiker Jasper Ridley über britische Balkanpolitik', Taz, Die Tageszeitung, 24/01/95.

¹⁶³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Speaking note from the British Embassy, 'Consequences of recognizing Croatian independence', 02/12/91.

¹⁶⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 93; Alan Riding, 'Conflict in Yugoslavia', The New York Times, 29/06/91.

¹⁶⁵ Maull, Germany, p. 114.

¹⁶⁶ Shaw, Germany, p. 13.

be opportune.¹⁶⁷ It was not until 12 July 1994 that the Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe ruled that German armed forces could be used for purposes other than pure self-defence.

Despite this caution in the military field, Germany was re-adjusting both nationally and internationally to the idea of boxing in the heavyweight division again. It became clear that the re-united Germany felt less need to tread carefully in order to avoid disturbing sensitivities arising from the country's recent past. For example, a few days after the outbreak of the Yugoslav conflict it was decided to move the government and the parliament back to Berlin in the near future.

The new attitude of the government in Bonn would be reflected particularly clearly by the stance adopted by Germany concerning the Yugoslav question in the second half of 1991.

German interest in the development of the conflicts in Croatia and Slovenia was of recent date. A delegation from the Bundestag had travelled to Yugoslavia in November 1990, but it had been mainly concerned with Kosovo. After that, the topic of Yugoslavia practically disappeared from the political agenda in Bonn for half a year. As in other countries, the Gulf War dominated the reporting in the media, and apart from that German politicians were mainly busy dealing with questions arising from the re-unification of Western and Eastern Germany.¹⁶⁸

While the German government continued up to the end of June to support the EC standpoint that the unity of Yugoslavia should be preserved, voices in the media and those of various prominent politicians were raised well before that in favour of the right of Croatia and Slovenia to self-determination. For example, the Frankefurter Allgemeine Zeitung set up a campaign supporting the right to self-determination of both these Yugoslav republics as early as March 1991.¹⁶⁹ After a visit to Yugoslavia, the deputy chairman of the SPD Norbert Gansel argued at the end of May that the independence of Slovenia – and possibly also that of Croatia – should be recognized as soon as they were proclaimed.¹⁷⁰ On 19 June, the CDU, SPD, FDP and the Green party in the Bundestag passed a resolution endorsing this right to self-determination. The resolution did not speak of recognizing the independence of constituent republics, however, and it offered Yugoslavia as a whole associate membership of the EC on condition that it adopted a new constitutional form.¹⁷¹

The day after the declarations of independence, 26 June, the German government adopted a standpoint that was practically identical with that of this resolution recognizing the right to self-determination. They made a strong plea for talks in Yugoslavia itself about the future of the country, in which more room was left for the right to self-determination for the peoples of Yugoslavia; the use of violence was most strongly to be deprecated.¹⁷²

Bonn hoped that the proposal made on 6 June by the presidents of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, Izetbegovic and Gligorov, could form the basis for further talks,¹⁷³ even though the Serbs had had consigned it to the waste-paper basket shortly after it had been made and Tudjman had categorically rejected it on the occasion of the Croatian declaration of independence.¹⁷⁴ The German government still hoped to sail the same course they had plotted at the time of re-unification, viz. not to raise the impression in other countries that Germany was a threat to their security; not to awaken memories of Germany's questionable past; and to speed up the process of European integration. Croatia and Slovenia were subsidiary to these aims. The Bonn government wanted to avoid any form of Alleingang in the EC.

¹⁶⁷ Koslowski, Bosnien, p. 361; Maull, Germany, p. 120.

¹⁶⁸ Eisermann, Weg, p. 41.

¹⁶⁹ Jakobsen, Multilateralism, p. 392 n. 7; Mira Beham, 'Mythen und Lügen. Zum historischen Serbien-Feindbild', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 02/03/94.

¹⁷⁰ Eisermann, Weg, p. 41; Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 932; Libal, Limits, pp. 6-7.

¹⁷¹ Libal, Limits, p. 7.

¹⁷² Libal, Limits, p. 12.

¹⁷³ Libal, Limits, p. 13.

¹⁷⁴ 'President Tudjman's speech proclaiming the independence of Croatia', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 27/06/91.

German grass-roots opinion was quite different.¹⁷⁵ Public discussion of this topic erupted in the weekend of 29 and 30 June. Many Germans were highly indignant about what they saw as the much too weak stance of the EC. Prominent members of the SPD and the CSU, together with large numbers of Croatian migrant workers, raised their voices in the press. The German Green Party demanded immediate recognition of Croatia and Slovenia. Björn Engholm, chairman of the SPD, endorsed this standpoint on 2 July,¹⁷⁶ immediately followed by the Secretary-General of the CDU, Volker Rühle, and the former leader of the SPD, Hans-Jochen Vogel.¹⁷⁷

The question arises how this sudden, wide German support for recognition can be explained. It was in any case not based on material interests: the economic ties Germany had with Croatia and Slovenia were of only slight significance, and at any rate in the short term not very promising.¹⁷⁸ The disintegration of Yugoslavia would have adverse consequences for the German treasury, since Yugoslavia had a heavy burden of debts to the former GDR.

The international political set-up offers more explanations. The idea of a Mittleuropa (Central Europe) under German leadership had long had many adherents in Germany, especially in the Bavarian CSU, one of Chancellor Kohl's key supporters. The result of two world wars in the twentieth century had prevented the realization of this dream, but now that Eastern and Western Germany were re-united and after the collapse of Communism, the Central Europe idea began to look more attractive to Germans compared to that of Western Europe. This does not mean that Germany was thinking of expansion or of gaining a position of hegemony at this moment. On the contrary: Germany had its hands full with the costs of German re-unification, which were turning out to be many times higher than initially expected. However, Germany did feel a special responsibility for the stability of Eastern Europe, in particular because it would be the first to feel the consequences of wide-scale unrest, e.g. in the form of floods of refugees. It had already received many refugees from Kosovo during the preceding years who had been victims of Serb policies, so the government in Bonn did not find it hard to imagine what consequences repression in other republics could have for it.¹⁷⁹ The German government had the feeling that it could not 'escape from the new turbulence that might break out anywhere between Saint Petersburg and Constantinople', as a spokesman of the German ministry of Foreign Affairs put it.¹⁸⁰ Bonn hoped that the other EC countries would be prepared to take this special German responsibility into account, as Bonn had taken account of France's special position within the EC for decades and was now prepared to give up the Deutschmark, the emotionally charged symbol of post-war Germany's monetary and political stability, for the euro.

Traditional sympathy for Croatia and Slovenia played a certain, albeit modest, role in Germany. This was partly based on the fact that the upper classes in both regions had spoken and written German in the nineteenth century, and because of the strength of Catholicism there.¹⁸¹

The favourable German attitude towards Croatia is often represented, especially in Great Britain, as a result of the links between Nazi Germany and the Ustashe, the fascist Croatian nationalist movement that has been dealt with at length in the part of this report about the run-up to the Yugoslav conflict. This is a particularly ungenerous representation of the facts. It would probably be truer to say that the ethnic cleansing that occurred somewhat later in the conflict evoked reactions precisely in Germany because that country had, in an attempt at Vergangenheitsbewältigung (overcoming the past), ¹⁷⁵ Jakobsen, Multilateralism, pp. 375-376.

¹⁷⁶ Willem Besusekamp, 'Regering in Bonn onder druk om Kroatië en Slovenië te erkennen' (Government in Bonn under pressure to recognize Croatia and Slovenia), de Volkskrant, 03/07/91.

¹⁷⁷ Libal, Limits, p. 19.

¹⁷⁸ For a more extensive survey of the motives for German support for recognition, see in particular Axt, Jugoslawien, pp. 353-354.

¹⁷⁹ Libal, Limits, pp. 104-105.

¹⁸⁰ Joseph Fitchett, 'East Europe: Bonn's Growing Preoccupation', International Herald Tribune, 13/01/92.

¹⁸¹ See also Mira Beham, 'Mythen und Lügen. Zum historischen Serbien-Feindbild', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 02/03/94.

been flooded with pictures of the Second World War, of which the events in Yugoslavia forty years later seemed to be a re-run.¹⁸²

It is true that one factor of importance in German public opinion was the aversion to Communism, with which the country had been so much more closely confronted than the rest of Western Europe as a result of the decades of partition it had suffered. Germany's positive attitude towards the throwing off of the Communist yoke in Eastern Germany led to an a priori favourable stance towards the longing for self-determination in the Yugoslav republics. Croatia and Slovenia should not be deprived of the advantages that Germany had managed to acquire.¹⁸³ Just as Eastern and Western Germany had been allowed to re-unite within the framework of self-determination, so should the Yugoslav republics be granted the right to secession.

Finally, Slovenia and Croatia were favourite tourist destinations, especially for Germans. Besides, more than half a million migrant workers from the two republics lived in Germany itself, making up the majority of the roughly seven hundred thousand Germans of Yugoslav origin.

Hans Dietrich Genscher, Germany's Foreign Minister, was not only subject to the pressure of public opinion but also – from the very first day of the Yugoslav conflict – felt the full weight of Chancellor Kohl bearing down on him.¹⁸⁴ Genscher, who had been the most popular minister in Germany during practically the whole of his eighteen years in office, was known to be sensitive to his popularity rating.¹⁸⁵ This was not just a personal matter. He had to take account of the position of his party, the FDP, which was often on the verge of falling below the percentage of the national votes which, under Germany's system of proportional representation, it needed to get any seats at all in the Bundestag. Neither he nor his party could afford to let the CDU and the opposition party SPD join forces over the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia, leaving him offside.¹⁸⁶

During a meeting of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs committee called by the opposition and held on 1 July 1991, Genscher ran the risk of getting the full blast from the committee on account of the reserved stance adopted by the EC. Kohl made a statement during the meeting 'jointly with the Foreign Minister', the essence of which was that Germany would not support the unity of Yugoslavia under all conditions and at any price.¹⁸⁷ This intervention by Kohl showed that the political grandmaster foresaw dangers ahead not only on Yugoslavia but also for Germany. The developments in Yugoslavia and the public commotion in Germany in response to them were indeed putting his government in a difficult position. There was probably no other government that had, without external prompting, invested as much political capital in the realization of European political union as the German. The Kohl government wished, therefore, to avoid all possible obstacles along the road leading to the Maastricht Treaty. Kohl gave a public warning early in July that the Yugoslav problem should be solved by a joint European approach because German solo diplomacy could have disastrous consequences for European integration.¹⁸⁸ However, domestic political pressure forced Kohl and Genscher to make concessions to the call for recognition of Croatia and Slovenia.

The responsible members of the German government found a route they could steer between this Scylla and Charybdis from early July. While they demanded recognition, they made this conditional. In this way, they took up a standpoint that agreed in principle with the desires of their German grass roots, while not departing too much from the main current of European opinion. An additional advantage of this stance was that the government in Bonn could use it as a threat both to the Serb

¹⁸² Cf. Maull, Germany, p. 111.

¹⁸³ See e.g. the remarks in this connection by Volker Rühle in: William Drozdiak, 'Germany Criticizes European Community Policy on Yugoslavia', Washington Post, 02/07/91 and Maull, Germany, p. 117 and further William Drozdiak, 'Conflicts Over Yugoslav Crisis Surface in Europe', Washington Post, 05/07/91; Eisermann, Weg, p. 44.

¹⁸⁴ Kalaitzidis, Relations, pp. 18-19; Horsley, Sins, p. 240. See also Almond, War, pp. 237-238

¹⁸⁵ Horsley, Sins, p. 229.

¹⁸⁶ Cf. Axt, Jugoslawien, p. 354; Eisermann, Weg, p. 44; Maull, Germany, p. 122.

¹⁸⁷ Libal, Limits, pp. 15-16; Axt, Jugoslawien, p. 351; J.M. Bik, 'Bonn weet niet goed raad met Joegoslavië' (Yugoslav question poses a quandary for Bonn), NRC Handelsblad, 03/07/91; Eisermann, Weg, p. 44.

¹⁸⁸ Maull, Germany, p. 102.

leadership and to European partners who in the opinion of the German government were too soft towards Serbia.

On the very same 1 July on which Genscher was confronted by a closed front in the Bundestag, Germany opposed a statement made at a CSCE meeting in Vienna that referred to previous EC pronouncements supporting maintenance of the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia.¹⁸⁹

Genscher experienced a kind of personal conversion on that 1 July, and wasted no time in telling the world about it. He went on to Belgrade the same day, where he had talks with the Yugoslav premier Markovic, the Yugoslav Minister of Foreign Affairs Loncar, the Croatian chairman of the Yugoslav presidium and thus in fact President of Yugoslavia Mesic, the Serbian President Milosevic, the Macedonian President Gligorov, the Bosnian President Izetbegovic and the Montenegrin President Bulatovic. On the following day he had talks with the Slovenian President Kucan and Minister of Foreign Affairs Rupelj in Klagenfurt (Austria). He told all parties that violence must be excluded as a solution to the problem. At the same time, he sounded the opinions of the various parties about a CSCE goodwill commission and an EC mission to monitor the situation.¹⁹⁰ Genscher formally made this trip in his capacity as chairman of the CSCE, but there can have been no misunderstanding of the fact, as the head of the South-eastern Europe department of his ministry subsequently wrote, that Genscher, who was not a member of the EC troika, wanted to give visible form to German diplomacy in this field.

The talk with Genscher was an enormous boost for the Slovenes in their struggle for independence. After the tone had been set on 1 July for Germany's exceptional efforts in favour of recognition, the next months saw a constant coming and going of the presidents and foreign ministers of the various Yugoslav republics in Bonn.¹⁹¹ The most prominent guest was Tudjman, who was received by Kohl and Genscher on 18 July to make up for Genscher's failure to meet Tudjman on 2 July. It may be noted, however, that Genscher toed the EC line during this talk. He did not mention the subject of recognition on this occasion.¹⁹² Tudjman did make a plea for recognition in his talk with Kohl, but the Chancellor rejected his proposal.¹⁹³

Genscher held the Yugoslav Federal Army responsible for his inability to travel to Ljubljana and Zagreb because of the risk of war, which meant that he had to meet the Slovenian leaders in Klagenfurt instead and had been unable to meet Tudjman at all. Genscher used the fact that the JNA had apparently put itself beyond any form of civil control, as the argument par excellence that there was no longer any need to insist on maintenance of the unity of Yugoslavia.¹⁹⁴ It did not take long for the rest of the West to share the idea that the JNA was an aggressor in what was still its own country. That was the result of a number of factors, of which the high-handed action of the army, that would not listen to Markovic and Mesic, was indeed one. Others were the successful propaganda of the Slovenian authorities, who had pictured the fairly limited JNA actions as a form of 'panzer Communism'; and – starting in August 1991 – the disproportionate violence of the federal army in Croatia.

Two countries within the EC would experience particular difficulties with the new German assertiveness: France and the Netherlands.

¹⁸⁹ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief; Coll. Van den Broek, box 7 (1991). Joego-voorzitter (Chair of Yugoslavia committee), memorandum from DAV for M, 01/07/91, No. 206/91. For further details of the German position, see also Hans Nijenhuis, Het Westen schrikt weer van de werkelijkheid (Reality scares the West again), NRC Handelsblad, 02/07/91.

¹⁹⁰ Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 939; Libal, Limits, p. 17.

¹⁹¹ For a summary of the visits made, see Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 932-933; Zeitler, Rolle, pp. 186-187.

¹⁹² Libal, Limits, pp. 24-25.

¹⁹³ 'Bonn wimpelt pleidooi van Tudjman af' (Bonn brushes aside plea for Tudjman), NRC Handelsblad, 19/07/91.

¹⁹⁴ Libal, Limits, p. 17.

France's opposition to Kleinstaaterei

A special sympathy for Serbia had traditionally existed in France. The elite of Belgrade had looked towards France and spoken French in the nineteenth century, while German was the dominant language among the upper classes in Zagreb and Ljubljana. France and Great Britain had applauded 'poor Serbia', so viciously attacked by Austro-Hungary and Germany, as their ally during the First World War, and in particular France had offered help after the march of Serb troops through Albania. The Serb troops had later fought their way back from Thessalonica to Serbia under French command. Memorials like the monument set up near Kalamegdan Castle in Belgrade or the sunken marble plaque bearing the text 'France-Serbie 1914-1918' in the Gračanica Orthodox monastery in Kosovo preserve the memory of this historic episode of solidarity between the two nations.

During the interbellum period, France tried to make Serb-dominated Yugoslavia a cornerstone of the Eastern European ententes aimed at countering German expansion. It was during the visit of King Aleksandar to France in 1934 in support of this policy that the king and the French Foreign Minister Louis Barthou were assassinated. The event itself was partly a consequence of the emotional links between the two countries. The king had been warned that Croatian extremists planned an attack on his life when he arrived in Marseilles, and he was advised to dock elsewhere. Aleksandar insisted on landing in Marseilles, however, as a gesture in honour of the French troops who had lost their lives alongside the Serbs on the Thessalonica front.¹⁹⁵

The idea that Serbia had fought on the Allied side in two world wars, while the Croats were regarded as the heirs of the Ustashe, resurfaced repeatedly in discussions in France during the 1990s, and initially gave rise to pro-Serb sentiments.¹⁹⁶ Mitterrand's image of the situation in Yugoslavia was also strongly coloured by ideas about the Second World War. The French Head of State received the Yugoslav Premier Markovic in May 1991 with the words that there had been strong links between France and Serbia since Napoleonic times, which were reinforced by two world wars.¹⁹⁷ Mitterrand told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung at the end of November 1991 that he did not want to talk of assailants and victims in the conflicts between Serbs and Croats. He went on to say, 'What I know is that the history of Serbs and Croats has been full of such dramas for ages. Especially during the last World War, many Serbs were killed in Croatian camps. As you know, the Croats belonged to the Nazi Block, while the Serbs did not.'¹⁹⁸ This statement not only witnessed to a lack of historical knowledge; it was also particularly shocking because it was made ten days after the fall of the Croatian Vukovar and after a visit by the French Secretary of State for Humanitarian Aid Bernard Kouchner to the Croatian Dubrovnik. The interview was noted in Croatia, and soured Franco-Croatian relations for many years;¹⁹⁹ it also caused Mitterrand to be accused in the French press of being a 'Serb-lover'.²⁰⁰ It was not until June 1992 that Mitterrand named the Serbs as the aggressor in the conflict.²⁰¹ Even as late as the beginning of 1994, however, Mitterrand could still say, 'Yes, I love the Serbs – and what of it? How could one forget their courage during two world wars? It is the Croats who have suppressed seven hundred thousand Serbs.'²⁰²

During the French government meeting of 7 August 1991, Mitterrand sketched French policy with regard to Yugoslavia as follows:

¹⁹⁵ Branislav Gligorijevic, 'King Aleksandar I Karadjordjevic', in Radan & Pavkovic (eds.), Serbs, p. 156.

¹⁹⁶ Chenu, France, pp. 376 and 379-380.

¹⁹⁷ Olivier Lepick, 'French Perspectives', in Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 78.

¹⁹⁸ 'Mitterrand: Frankreich will in Maastricht den Erfolg' (Mitterrand says France wants Maastricht to succeed), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 29/11/91.

¹⁹⁹ Chenu, France, p. 379.

²⁰⁰ See also Tardy, France, p. 119.

²⁰¹ Chenu, France, p. 376.

²⁰² Adler, Année, p. 84.

‘All the ingredients of this century are combined at a dangerous spot. The Twelve have no armed forces or peacekeeping troops. The Soviet Union, which has troubles of its own with national groups, will not intervene. We cannot avoid taking traditional friendships into account. For us, just as for Russia, Serbia is a friend. Slovenia and Croatia are more oriented towards the Germans. In short, the situation is very grave: it is not righting itself, and it is not going to right itself.’²⁰³

It is thus clear that Mitterrand did not think much of the Croats, whom he regarded as the ‘buddies’ of Germany and the Vatican.²⁰⁴ Moreover, Mitterrand – just like the French Foreign Minister Roland Dumas – did not like the idea of Kleinstaaterei (the continued breaking up of large states into small ones) : steps had to be taken to stop secessions spreading through Europe like a forest fire.²⁰⁵ The thought of the struggle for independence in Corsica will doubtless not have been far from his mind. In his 1992 New Year’s speech, Mitterrand was still saying that the right to independence must not be confused with the ‘anarchy of tribes from a distant age’.²⁰⁶ This standpoint also initially led Mitterrand to a pro-Serb stance.

In line with this, Dumas commented shortly after the outbreak of the conflict that the tasks of the EC did not include promoting the independence of peoples.²⁰⁷ This standpoint was in direct contrast to that of the German government.

Unlike the government in Bonn, that in Paris was prepared for military intervention, though the French government did all it could to avoid such intervention turning into all-out war.²⁰⁸ France has traditionally had fewer inhibitions about peacekeeping operations than other great powers. In a certain sense, the government in Paris regarded peacekeeping operations as a possible means of global politics which France could no longer realize at a national level. Moreover, since the end of the ‘eighties there had been a strong moral awareness in France of a duty, if not a right, to carry out humanitarian interventions, which was nourished by people like Bernard Kouchner, the founder of the international organization Médecins Sans Frontières.²⁰⁹ It should be remembered that France was not only the state with its cynical raison d’état for which it is often so well-known in the Netherlands. It was also the country that was to celebrate the bicentennial of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen a few years later. Like the Netherlands, it had made human rights an important element of its foreign policy.²¹⁰

This attitude was clearly visible at the time of the Yugoslav conflict. France was the biggest contributor to UN peacekeeping operations worldwide in mid-1993.²¹¹ It started deploying troops in the former Yugoslavia in April 1992, ultimately reaching a level of six thousand soldiers, making it the

²⁰³ Dumas, Fil, p. 354. The original text here is as follows: ‘Toutes les données du siècle se trouvent réunies sur un terrain dangereux. Les Douze n’ont pas de forces de combat ou d’intervention. L’URSS, qui a ses problèmes de nationalités, n’interviendra. Nous ne devons pas négliger de tenir compte des amitiés traditionnelles. Pour nous, comme pour la Russie, c’est la Serbie. La Slovénie et la Croatie sont plutôt tournées vers les Germains. En conclusion, l’affaire est très grave, elle ne s’arrange pas et ne s’arrangera pas.’

²⁰⁴ Chenu, France, p. 373 n. 10 and n. 11.

²⁰⁵ See e.g. Chenu, France, p. 367; Eisermann, Weg, p. 47; Koslowski, Bosnien, p. 363; Dumas, Fil, p. 353; ‘UPI News Analysis. Yugoslav crisis reveals split within European Community’, UPI, 06/07/91.

²⁰⁶ Eisermann, Weg, p. 47.

²⁰⁷ In an interview in ‘The World at One’, BBC Radio 4, 05/07/91, cited in Almond, War, p. 237.

²⁰⁸ Confidential interview (1).

²⁰⁹ See e.g. Marie-Claude Smouts, ‘Political aspects of peace-keeping operations’, in: Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, pp. 19-20, 33 and 36-37; Yves Daudet, Legal aspects, ibid, p. 54; idem, ‘Budgetary and financial aspects’, ibid, p. 78.

²¹⁰ Baehr, Role, p. 127; Martin Sommer, ‘Fransen waren niet simpelweg pro-Servisch’ (The French were not simply pro-Serb), de Volkskrant, 17/11/2000.

²¹¹ Cf. Marie-Claude Smouts, ‘Political aspects of peace-keeping operations’, in Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 19.

biggest contributor of troops to the region. It would ultimately also pay the highest price of all troop suppliers for this intervention, with a total of 56 dead and nearly six hundred wounded.²¹²

French Foreign Minister Dumas had already suggested in July 1991 that a peacekeeping force should be sent to the region, after the head of the directorate for Europe at the Quai d'Orsay (the home of the French Foreign Ministry) had stated, on the basis of a fact-finding mission to Yugoslavia from 9 to 12 July, that separation of the hostile troops and creation of a buffer zone could not be excluded.²¹³ France would play a leading role in all important initiatives taken in 1991 – the mobilization of the EC, the peace conference, the Arbitration Commission and the involvement of the Security Council. And this would continue to be the case in the succeeding years. Mitterrand commented in September 1994 that France had done more for Bosnia than any other country.²¹⁴

French policy with regard to Yugoslavia was further largely determined by the attempt to prevent the conflict from spreading to other countries²¹⁵ and the wish to deal with the matters involved without NATO intervention. This was related to the dominant role played by the Americans in the latter organization and the fact that France had only played a partial role in it since 1967, when it had withdrawn from the organization's military activities while still playing a role in its political set-up.

Since the American government initially had no wish to get involved in the conflict, there seemed to be a good chance of realizing this latter wish. As mentioned above, attempts to take action within a WEU framework stranded on British intransigence. German support for recognition of the independence of the breakaway Yugoslav republics was initially a barrier to effective EC involvement.²¹⁶ In the autumn of 1991, however, the German and French governments reinstated the Paris-Bonn axis, which had been damaged by the differences of opinion about how to deal with the Yugoslav crisis. The differences between Germany and the Netherlands were to prove longer lasting.

5. The Netherlands as EC chairman despite itself

It was unfortunate that the EC troika in the second half of 1991 consisted of relatively small countries, viz. Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Portugal. While it is true that the three Ministers of Foreign Affairs Poos, Van den Broek and De Deus Pinheiro were the official representatives of the European Community, they did not have the same political clout as their counterparts from the more powerful nations such as Dumas, Genscher, Hurd and De Michelis. Even though a senior Dutch civil servant claimed that the Netherlands was 'a kind of superpower' compared with Luxembourg and Portugal,²¹⁷ the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek would find that it is no sinecure for a chairman from a small country to keep his colleagues from the big member states on board in such an enterprise.

The small countries did have some advantages, however: they could hardly be accused of pursuing material interests in their handling of the Yugoslav conflict,²¹⁸ or of being burdened by historical sentiments and reflexes.²¹⁹

There was certainly no traditionally strong negative image of the Serbs in the Netherlands.²²⁰ In fact, up to the Second World War there could have been said to have been 'a certain pro-Serb tendency'.²²¹ The Dutch author and journalist A. den Doollaard did more than anyone else to 'maintain ²¹² Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', in: Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 21.

²¹³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283, EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië/scenario's en beleidsmogelijkheden' for Extra CoPo, The Hague 19/07/91, 18/07/91.

²¹⁴ Cited in: Centro Studi di Politica Internazionale, Lessons.

²¹⁵ Confidential interview 1.

²¹⁶ Confidential interview (1) and H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00.

²¹⁷ 'Conflict Joegoslavië beheerst EG-top', NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

²¹⁸ This advantage was also evident to Paris, 'EG wijzigt beleid voor Joegoslavië' (EC changes Yugoslavia policy), NRC Handelsblad, 04/07/91.

²¹⁹ Interview H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00.

²²⁰ Cf. the comments of the head of DEU in ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Engels 76 to Kooijmans, 20/03/93.

²²¹ Appendix Naarden, Beeld en Balkan.

a positive image of the Balkans and Yugoslavia in the Netherlands' in the years round the Second World War.²²² He did this mainly with the aid of his novels, which were filled with noble but violent characters. Den Doolaard, who travelled widely through the Balkans in the 'thirties and 'fifties, was acclaimed by many other post-war Dutch authors who credited him with 'a view of Yugoslavia that was very optimistic while not being entirely free from criticism'.²²³

In a country like the Netherlands, where there was a strong feeling (especially in the 'sixties and thereafter) that the population as a whole had not really given the Resistance movement sufficient support during the Second World War, it is understandable that there could be great, if not blind, admiration of the struggle of the Communist partisans in Yugoslavia.²²⁴ When Tito died in 1980, there was only one commentator in the Dutch broadsheets who raised a finger in criticism of the Serbs. According to J. den Boef in Trouw, they would 'inevitably try to regain their dominant position'.²²⁵

Some left-wing politicians and shapers of opinion in the Netherlands, such as the Minister of Defence Relus ter Beek, the columnist and lecturer in international relations and comparative politics at the University of Leiden Koen Koch, the author Lisette Lewin and the journalists Herman Vuijsje, John Jansen van Galen and Igor Cornelissen, had in their time flirted with the idea of workers' control or worked on the construction of the big Brotherhood and Unity motorway between Belgrade and Zagreb.²²⁶ Left-wing intellectuals saw Yugoslavia as the country behind the Iron Curtain where the Marxist sun still shone, 'a country where the foundation for the realization of Marx's theories has been laid and where – somewhat in contrast to most of the other countries of Eastern Europe – there is still room for further development'.²²⁷ Wim Kok, leader of the PvdA (Labour), had also been 'keenly interested' in the system of workers' control in Yugoslavia during the time when he had been closely involved in the work of the Dutch union movement in the 'seventies'.²²⁸ The positive image of Yugoslavia and the Serbs in the Netherlands would not change until 1991, when undue emphasis was put on the violent aspects of their history and their 'nature'.

The differences between Germany and the Netherlands concerning the Yugoslav question, which put a heavy burden on the Dutch chairmanship of the EC, were due not so much to Yugoslavia itself as to the position which these two countries considered they had to take up in the world – and in particular to the change in Germany's stance, already alluded to above, which took place round about the time of the Yugoslav crisis. For many years after the end of the Second World War, German foreign policy had strongly resembled that of the Netherlands, both being characterized by a stress on multilateral alliances, moral considerations and a strong aversion to the use of military force.

Dutch Premier Lubbers and Foreign Minister Van den Broek were thus struck by a form of cognitive dissonance when Germany, strengthened by re-unification and with a new feeling of responsibility for stability in Central and Eastern Europe, started to adopt a foreign policy marked by a greater stress on Germany's own role in the affairs in question. The impact of this change in course was even harder because Van den Broek and Lubbers were doing all they could at that time to carry through the Dutch chairmanship of the EC on the basis of consensus. Dutch civil servants in the ministry of Foreign Affairs also noted 'a rather surprising self-awareness on the part of the Germans. Self-awareness of this kind was not exactly the most convenient development at this juncture!'²²⁹

The situation was made even more difficult by the fact that the two actors with primary responsibility for Dutch foreign policy – Van den Broek and Lubbers – had already manoeuvred ²²² Appendix Naarden, Beeld en Balkan.

²²³ Ibid.

²²⁴ Cf. Constandse, Joegoslavië, passim; Bart van Steenbergen, 'Ten geleide' (Introduction), in: Markovic, Weg, p. 9.

²²⁵ J. den Boef, 'Kan Joegoslavië zonder Tito?' (Can Yugoslavia go on without Tito?), Trouw, 05/05/80.

²²⁶ See in this connection Appendix Naarden, Beeld en Balkan; Arendo Joustra, 'Hollandse stootarbeiders voor Tito' (Dutch 'storm troopers' work for Tito), Elsevier, 05/09/92, pp. 16-20; Van den Heuvel, Leven, pp. 143-144.

²²⁷ Bart van Steenbergen, 'Ten geleide', in Markovic, Weg, p. 8.

²²⁸ Interview Wim Kok, 08/05/00.

²²⁹ Interview A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

themselves into a problematic position with respect to Germany by trying to make Western acceptance of German re-unification subject to certain conditions. Van den Broek was afraid that the re-unification of Germany could lead once again to German Alleingang (going it alone) and to the country's following a Sonderweg (separate path) between East and West. Like Lubbers, he wanted public guarantees from the re-united Germany that the Oder-Neisse would remain Poland's western frontier.²³⁰ In particular Chancellor Kohl, but also Foreign Minister Genscher, would not lightly forget the attitude taken by the Dutch ministerial duo.²³¹ Moreover, Genscher suspected the pro-NATO Van den Broek of wishing to play down the Paris-Bonn axis in the run-up to European political union.²³² Conversely, Genscher had been incredibly rude to Van den Broek in February 1990 during the Open Skies Conference in Ottawa when the latter had claimed a place for the Netherlands alongside the four former occupying powers in the discussions on German re-unification. 'You are not part of the game,' Van den Broek was told by his German counterpart.²³³

The Netherlands has an existential problem, as the diplomat N.H. Biegan put it: it's too big to be counted among the small countries, and too small to be counted among the big ones.²³⁴ This leads to a constant ambition to belong with the big countries, and constant rejection by the latter. In addition, Lubbers and Van den Broek had been 'spoiled' in the 'eighties by the international position accorded to the Netherlands at the time of the debate on cruise missiles and by the growing appraisal of Dutch economic policy. The central position the Netherlands had assumed during the debate on the siting of cruise missiles had been a boost to the ego of the ministerial spokesmen. In a world that still seemed fairly simple, the idea could grow that the Dutch Foreign Minister had 'a little, a very little say in the way the world went'.²³⁵ Hence, according to Lubbers, the Netherlands was not using the Yugoslavia dossier to build up a position for itself as chairman of the EC: 'the Netherlands already had a position.'²³⁶ And in the view of the Dutch government, this position implied a noblesse oblige attitude on its part. This means that the Netherlands had to adopt a more active stance than countries like Ireland or Austria. And the 'assertive Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek' had to do something significant, as a 'consequence of the fact that he already was someone'.²³⁷

This 'plucky-little-country syndrome'²³⁸ had not however turned Van den Broek into a power thinker. He still argued primarily in political and moral terms where the future of Europe was involved.²³⁹ Nevertheless, Van den Broek was convinced that interest-based politics and idealism could go hand in hand. He found it quite logical, for example, that when dealing with the Yugoslav conflict the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs should aim at realization of one of the main objectives of Dutch foreign policy, viz. making a contribution to the maintenance and promotion of peace.²⁴⁰ Execution of this task would at the same time enhance Dutch prestige on the international scene and create a positive image.²⁴¹

²³⁰ See e.g. H. van den Broek, 'Continuïteit en vernieuwing in Europa', Christen Democratische Verkenningen, (1990)5, pp. 207 and 211-212; J.M. Bik, 'Er valt nog veel te verbeteren aan omgang met Duitsland' (There is lots of room for improvement in relations with Germany), NRC Handelsblad, 30/09/91; Wielenga, Vijand, pp. 186-187, 211.

²³¹ Interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99; Metze, Stranding, p. 259; P. Rusman, 'De laatste Koude-Oorlogsstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)', Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, pp. 275-276; Wielenga, Vijand, p. 187; Both, Indifference, p. 118. See also Van Eekelen, Sporen, p. 234.

²³² Both, Indifference, p. 118; Dankert in Rehwinkel en Nekkers, Regerenderwijs, pp. 151-152.

²³³ Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 729.

²³⁴ TCBU. Vertrekpunt (Starting point), III, deposition by N.H. Biegan, 29/05/00, p. 185.

²³⁵ Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: "Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg"', Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 9.

²³⁶ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

²³⁷ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

²³⁸ The term was coined by Ben Knapen, 'Het vaderland in Europa', NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

²³⁹ See e.g. H. van den Broek, 'Continuïteit en vernieuwing in Europa', Christen Democratische Verkenningen, (1990)5, p. 208.

²⁴⁰ TCBU. Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by H. van den Broek, 22/05/00, p. 19.

²⁴¹ TCBU. Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by H. van den Broek, 22/05/00, p. 21.

In the meantime, considerable confusion existed in the Netherlands round about 1990 (as in many other countries at that time) about the form foreign policy and in particular security policy should take after the Cold War.²⁴²

It was ironic that the Netherlands should be the very country to occupy the chairmanship of the European Community at this time, and thus in fact to give form to the common foreign and security policy avant la lettre via a process of intergovernmental consultation. After all, the traditional Dutch supranational orientation led to a preference for a strong European Commission and a disinclination to give much power either to the Council of Ministers or to the chairmanship of the EC. When the Netherlands had been chairman of the EC in the past, therefore, it had restricted itself mainly to 'looking after the shop'.²⁴³ Van den Broek objected to the Council of Ministers, because he was of the opinion that it often degenerated into a cosy get-together of the big countries. Besides, he was not entirely happy that not he but the Prime Minister took part in such meetings.²⁴⁴

The Netherlands was such a strong advocate of a Community approach – a view in which it differed appreciably from the big countries – that it was even doubted in June 1991 whether it would make a good chairman of the EC at this juncture.²⁴⁵ The Hague had the reputation of not consulting the other European capitals much. As Rob Meines put it in NRC Handelsblad shortly before the Netherlands was to assume the chairmanship of the EC, the country 'often had an almost high-priestly fidelity to the true doctrine'. Formally, the Council of Ministers was only empowered to take decisions on matters prepared by the European Commission. In general, the Netherlands waited patiently to see what the Commission had hatched out and then discussed it with the other members of the Council of Ministers, so that it often did not have much of a finger in the pie. In other words, the Netherlands was not skilled in European 'lobbying techniques, which tended to be equated with hanky-panky in our country'.²⁴⁶ The Director-General of the department of Political Affairs in the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs, A.P. van Walsum, wrote later that Van den Broek 'did not really do his best to create the impression of being vitally interested in European integration'.²⁴⁷ Piet Dankert, Junior Minister for Foreign Affairs during the Lubbers-Kok coalition, said that he had never thought that Van den Broek had been keenly interested in Germany and France. 'His mind was much more on England and America'.²⁴⁸ Van den Broek had the reputation of always wanting to participate when the Americans went to war.²⁴⁹

Not only was the Netherlands traditionally rather ill at ease when it came to chairing the EC, but also like Great Britain it was (to put it mildly) not a strong advocate of quick realization of a common European security policy. Both London and The Hague feared that if Europe were to have its own policy line in this field, this could lead to collisions with the United States, with which both countries had special relationships of long standing.²⁵⁰ Moreover, the Netherlands was not particularly keen to cooperate in the setting up of a common policy that would, it suspected, be dictated by the big

²⁴² 'Buitenland, hoezo?' (What do you mean, abroad?), NRC Handelsblad, 11/04/92; J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 'Nederland is niet te klein voor rol in de wereld' (The Netherlands is not too small for world role), ibid., 14/04/92.

²⁴³ Victor, Presidency, 6.1 en 6.2.2.2.

²⁴⁴ Co Welgraven, 'Zes zware mannen in een Europa vol obstakels' (Six big men in a Europe full of obstacles), Trouw, 29/06/91.

²⁴⁵ Rob Meines, 'Een voorzitter met een sterk afwijkende mening' (A chairman with a strong view of his own), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

²⁴⁶ Rob Meines, 'Nederland is 'Europees' genoeg' (The Netherlands is 'European' enough), NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/91.

²⁴⁷ Van Walsum, Nederland, pp. 59-60.

²⁴⁸ Dankert in: Rehwinkel & Nekkers, p. 143.

²⁴⁹ Stemerding, Dromen, pp. 191-192; P. Rusman, 'De laatste Koude-Oorlogssrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)', Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 274

²⁵⁰ Menon & Forster & Wallace, 'Defence', pp. 104-105; Frits Schaling, 'Europees Parlement gelooft Haagse voornemens niet zo' (European Parliament has little faith in Dutch intentions), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91; Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, 'Internationaal kan Henz Vendenbroek niet meer stuk' (The international position of 'Henz Vendenbroek' (Anglicized pronunciation of Hans Van den Broek) is secure), Trouw, 13/07/91; André Roelofs, 'Keuze lokatie vredesmacht is het probleem?' (Choice of location of peacekeeping force is the problem), de Volkskrant, 03/08/91.

three (France, Germany and the United Kingdom) while the smaller countries like the Netherlands would have little or no say but would still share the responsibility for the decisions taken.²⁵¹ It has even been suggested that the zeal Van den Broek displayed concerning the Yugoslav conflict was mainly motivated by his need to remove the impression on the part of his German counterpart Genscher that he was not really prepared to put effort into the realization of such a policy.²⁵² In line with this, the Netherlands would remain a firm advocate of actions within a NATO framework to deal with the Yugoslav question, but had little enthusiasm for the WEU actions repeatedly proposed by the Dutch head of the WEU Van Eekelen.²⁵³

Since the Dutch embassy in Belgrade also acted for Luxembourg during the first six months of 1991 when the latter was chairman of the EC, all the additional information on conditions in Yugoslavia that Luxembourg received via this channel for the purposes of the EC chairmanship also landed on the desks of the appropriate civil servants at the ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague. This would have provided ideal material for a preparatory study of the problems that were on the way in Yugoslavia. It was however only in the last few months before the Netherlands was due to take over the chairmanship that Van den Broek started considering Yugoslav issues seriously; before that time, it had long been a matter left to the Eastern Europe department of his ministry. In a letter to Parliament describing the programme for the Dutch chairmanship of the EC, Van den Broek summed up a large number of priorities. Yugoslavia occupied a very modest place here. The list of priorities did include 'a number of very disturbing developments in Eastern Europe', on which the Twelve would have to formulate a standpoint. This referred primarily to the breakdown of the Soviet Union and in particular to the position of the Baltic states. The letter to Parliament went on to state that 'due attention must also be paid to the impending disintegration of Yugoslavia' However, Van den Broek looked for solutions mainly in expansion of the CSCE and maintenance of the good trans-Atlantic relationships, not in the EC.²⁵⁴

6. The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs

The ministry that was to back up Van den Broek during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC did not in fact have a large number of civil servants who were really engaged in policy production.²⁵⁵ The ministry, with its dual leadership – apart from the minister of Foreign Affairs, his colleague the minister for International Development also headed the department – had three Directorates-General in the early 1990s: those of Political Affairs, European Cooperation and International Cooperation.

The task of the Director-General for Political Affairs (Dutch abbreviation DGPZ) was to deal with all aspects of foreign policy involving a definite policy line. He was thus responsible for coordinating the work not only of the directorates that fell directly under his authority, but also that of the units which formally fell within the field of the other two Directorates-General. This made the Director-General for Political Affairs not only the primus inter pares of the three directors-general but also the minister's highest political advisor.

Four regional directorates fell directly under the authority of the the Director-General for Political Affairs, those of Asia and Oceania, Africa and the Middle East, the Western Hemisphere and Europe. He was also responsible for the directorates for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs and ²⁵¹ See e.g. ABZ, Bosnia discussion, Fietelaars 18 to Van Mierlo, 28/01/98.

²⁵² J.G. Siccama, 'Tegengaan van anarchie in Oost-Europa; een pleidooi voor een idealistische integrationistische visie' (Countering anarchy in Eastern Europe; a plea for an idealistic integrationist vision), in Gijs de Vries et al., Continent, p. 108; idem, 'Nogmaals: ex-Joegoslavië' (The former Yugoslavia again), Armed, 77(1993)7/8, p. 5. See also A. van Staden, 'NAVO: Opties voor de toekomst' (NATO: options for the future), ibid., p. 175.

²⁵³ See e.g. the standpoint regarding enforcement of the flight restriction, ABZ, kabinetsarchief, Joegoslavië, resolution 781, 786 (1992), ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Jacobovits 2005 to Van den Broek, 18/12/92.

²⁵⁴ TK, 1990-1991, 22 052, No. 1, p. 10.

²⁵⁵ For a more detailed description of the organization of the ministry of Foreign Affairs, see the appendix 'The Organization and Coordination of the ministry of Foreign Affairs.'

for Political UN Issues. These two last-mentioned directorates, together with the directorate for Europe (DEU), played the main role within the ministry in relation to the Yugoslav question.

Van den Broek was an ‘Atlanticus pur sang’.²⁵⁶ Thanks to his many years as minister, since 1982, the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs had developed into a key part of the ministry during the eighties. The formal terms of reference of this directorate covered the protection of Dutch security interests in an international framework, which meant that it had to deal with NATO, the WEU, the CSCE, arms control, verification and arms export policy as well as Atlantic cooperation. In practice, the department also dealt with relations with the United States and Canada, though this was formally the responsibility of the regional directorate for the Western Hemisphere.²⁵⁷

Van den Broek considered it to be of great importance that competent civil servants were employed in this department.²⁵⁸ The head of the directorate since August 1990 was B.J. (Boudewijn) van Eenennaam, like Van den Broek a whole-hearted Atlanticus with a great affinity for the American mentality. The minister gave him a free hand as director.²⁵⁹ Van Eenennaam was an advocate of power politics, but suffered the disadvantage in this connection of having been born a Dutchman. His perception of international politics was strongly coloured by the Cold War. His conviction that Serbia was the aggressor in all conflicts in the former Yugoslavia led Van Eenennaam to believe that Serbia should be dealt with firmly and forced into isolation.²⁶⁰ He had also concluded on the basis of his experience during the Cold War that policy should be based not on the views held in the region which was the object of the policy, but on the convictions of the policy-maker. He also believed firmly that if the Netherlands wanted to be an international leader in the field of overseas aid and to contribute to the solution of humanitarian crises, it must also be prepared to curb the violence which can arise in such situations.²⁶¹

The influence of the regional directorates, which embodied the institutional memory and the analytical capacity to handle issues relating to particular regions, was reduced under Van den Broek in favour of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs.²⁶² Nevertheless, the regional directorate for Europe (DEU), which was responsible for bilateral contacts in Europe, was formally the first port of call when it came to issues of Yugoslav politics. DEU consisted of one Western Europe office and one for Eastern Europe, the latter being responsible for matters concerning Dutch involvement in the former Yugoslavia. Each of these two offices had a staff of three in 1991; it should be noted that the Eastern Europe office also had to deal with matters concerning the Soviet Union. The Western Europe office was not so interested in bilateral relations; the main emphasis in this unit was multilateral diplomacy. During the Cold War, the ministry of Foreign Affairs had the impression that there was little for it to do in Eastern Europe. The head of the Eastern Europe office (and Deputy Director of DEU) was H.J. Hazewinkel. He had been mainly responsible for Yugoslavia before the outbreak of the conflict. When Yugoslav matters began to demand more and more of his department’s attention, from mid-1991, the young diplomat AM van der Togt was added to the department’s staff. He was given the special task of dealing with issues concerning Yugoslavia.

The Directorate for Political UN Issues was charged with the contacts with the United Nations. It was headed by J.T. (Jan) Hoekema from 1 July 1990 to 1994, when he became a member of Parliament. This directorate included a Political office, the main task of which was to maintain contacts with the permanent delegation of the Netherlands to the United Nations in New York. This directorate

²⁵⁶ Stemerding, Dromen, p. 157; cf. Dankert in Rehwinkel & Nekkers, p. 147; P. Rusman, ‘De laatste Koude-Oorlogsstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)’, Hellema et al. (ed.), Ministers, pp. 269, 272, 275, 276; Van Walsum, Nederland, pp. 52 and 60.

²⁵⁷ Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 49.

²⁵⁸ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

²⁵⁹ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99; Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het stratego van de experts’ (Stratego for experts), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/93, p. 11.

²⁶⁰ Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

²⁶¹ Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00; TCBU. Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by B.J. van Eenennaam, 05/06/00, p. 280.

²⁶² Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

had little involvement with the Yugoslav question in 1991, since the UN initially kept its distance from this matter.

It goes without saying that the activities of these different directorates operating alongside one another required coordination. In the ministry of Foreign Affairs, this coordination occurred both at top level and at operational level. The top civil servant at the ministry was formally the Secretary-General. Since 1989, this post had been filled by Dr. Bernard Rudolf Bot who had the reputation of being one of the leading Dutch diplomats in this period. It should be noted, however, that the Secretary-General played a less prominent role at Foreign Affairs than in various other Dutch ministries. The primary responsibility for policy coordination lay not with him but with the Director-General for Political Affairs (DGPZ). In addition, the function of personal secretary to the minister had been created a number of years before; his task was to regulate the flow of documents and to control access to the minister. The Secretary-General at Foreign Affairs was thus little more than formal head of the organization of civil servants working at the ministry.

All these facts made the Director-General for Political Affairs the minister's main political advisor. He acted as gatekeeper to the minister together with the latter's personal secretary and was further responsible for the general policy line and the unity of Dutch foreign policy. In addition, together with his counterparts from other EC member states he was a member of the EC's Comité Politique, which prepared matters for discussion by the Council of Ministers. Peter van Walsum, a respected diplomat with a well balanced approach, had been Director-General for Political Affairs since July 1989. His diplomatic career had been an excellent preparation for the task he had to perform during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC in the second half of 1991. He had more than twenty years of diplomatic experience in South-Eastern Europe. He was posted to Bucharest in 1967, and travelled to Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Greece and the European part of Turkey from the Romanian capital. He was moved to the Dutch permanent delegation to the United Nations in 1970 – a position to which he would return between 1998 and 2001 at the end of his diplomatic career. At the UN, he was the Dutch representative in the Third Commission of the General Assembly, which dealt with human rights. In 1979, he was posted to the Dutch permanent delegation to the EC in Brussels. He had a reflective nature, and while a keen analyst he had a tendency to secondary reaction. Thus, he stood in sharp contrast to Van den Broek. The minister, who often reacted in a primary manner, thought that his Director-General for Political Affairs often reacted too slowly.²⁶³

When the Yugoslav conflict broke out, the ministry was thus headed by five persons: the Foreign Minister Van den Broek; Director-General for Political Affairs Van Walsum; to a certain extent his deputy, ambassador at large C.M.J. Kröner; the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs Van Eenennaam; and Henri Wijnaendts, the Dutch ambassador in Paris and special confidant of the minister. Of this select company, the Director-General for Political Affairs was the appropriate figure to take care of policy coordination. However, Van Walsum did not play the coordinating role that might be expected of him in dealing with the matters contained in the Yugoslavia dossier. Consequently, the policy concerning (the former) Yugoslavia was divided over the three directorates: Atlantic Cooperation and Security, Europe and Political UN Issues, the chief actors being forced to arrive at policy proposals by a process of mutual consultation.²⁶⁴ It was not always clear to the staff in the three directorates who was supposed to be dealing with which aspect of the policy concerning Yugoslavia, since a given issue may have several sides each of which belongs in principle under one or other of the three directorates.²⁶⁵ And if guidance was not being given from the top, at the level of the Director-General for Political Affairs, could one expect it from the heads of the individual directorates? As K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, a member of staff of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, put it, 'But who was in fact responsible for this problem? That was not clear'. He went on to say,

²⁶³ Interview P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99.

²⁶⁴ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

²⁶⁵ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

'There was never any task setting. Any clearly defined head. Who was supposed to be that head?... it was characteristic of the style of government. Let everyone struggle on with the job as well as he could and then we pick out the best result and talk it over with the minister. That is not a transparent way to work. You don't know what's happening to your products. You don't even know what's demanded of you. You don't know who has the initiative.'²⁶⁶

Not only was there a lack of control, but the staff of the various directorates often lacked clear information about what was going on at top level. A great deal of information and policy-in-the-making flowed through the hierarchy from bottom to top, but there were very seldom signals passing in the opposite direction.²⁶⁷ This situation was reinforced by the fact that the ministers, in particular Van den Broek during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC, discussed many matters by phone with their foreign counterparts while the Director-General for Political Affairs had many similar discussions with the ambassadors. In addition, Van den Broek had the habit of not making decisions on the basis of official documents, but of calling together a number of heads of departments and their immediate staff for a talk early in the evening. The feedback from these various sorts of verbal exchanges of ideas was often fragmentary. Written notes of conversations were seldom taken, though they often are in the ministries of Foreign Affairs in other countries.²⁶⁸

The same complaint was heard about feedback from the Ministerial Council to the staff in the directorates. As one of the officials in question commented:

'Preparing a paper for the Ministerial Council was an ordeal. You never heard what decisions were taken in the Ministerial Council about it. We were sometimes passed over completely, or documents were even presented to the Ministerial Council that we had not seen in the final form ... We were greatly handicapped and this was also connected with the internal organization of Foreign Affairs. We never got feedback from the Ministerial Council on the Monday morning because we have two ministers (for International Development as well as for Foreign Affairs) and each one had his own following. That was a really weak point in the organization of Foreign Affairs. The distribution of classified documents, the conclusions of the Ministerial Council and minutes was always a very sticky business too. It could take days to lay eyes on them. That could be a bit of a drawback. We often had to ask Defence what decision had been taken.'²⁶⁹

If something was laid down on paper, no structure existed for its distribution. The same was also true of the distribution of information of this sort to the Dutch diplomatic missions abroad. Dutch ambassadors repeatedly found in their dealings with the ministry of Foreign Affairs in the country where they were accredited that they were confronted with the contents of talks that the Dutch ²⁶⁶ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00. Cf. Michiel van Hulten, 'Zwarte Maandag. Kroniek van en gemiste kans' (Black Monday. Chronicle of a lost chance), in Labohm (ed.), Waterdragers, p. 196, where Ronald van Beuge, Director-General of European Cooperation at the time, stated that Van den Broek 'had become accustomed to getting a set of contradictory recommendations all the time, between which he could then arbitrate himself.

²⁶⁷ Interviews P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00; K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00; J.L. Sandee, 12/06/00; R. Swartbol, 08/07/00; and A. M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

²⁶⁸ Interviews R. in den Bosch, 19/04/00; J.T. Hoekema, 05/03/98; K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00; R. Swartbol, 08/07/00; and AM van der Togt, 04/05/00.

²⁶⁹ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

minister of Foreign Affairs or the Director-General for Political Affairs had had with a foreign counterpart on the (incorrect) assumption that this information had already been passed on by The Hague to the embassy in question. If notes were taken of talks, the Dutch contribution was often left out so that the Dutch diplomats reading them abroad were unable to distil the Dutch policy from them.²⁷⁰

This gave rise to the remarkable situation that the minister often had a good knowledge of the position of other EC member states via his telephone contacts, while his civil servants had to gather scraps of information about it from embassy reports, articles in the press, press reports and CNN.²⁷¹ The situation was somewhat mitigated in the second half of 1991 by the very high frequency of ministerial meetings or meetings of the EC Comité Politique. These meetings required preparation, which led to preliminary discussions in Van Walsum's room. As a result, there was temporarily less need for structural coordination between the directorates. A coordinator for the policy concerning Yugoslavia at operational level would not be appointed until the summer of 1992.

Another question is how the ministry had organized its knowledge about Yugoslavia. According to Van Walsum, after looking round a bit there proved to be sufficient expertise about the Balkans already present in the ministry, including his own.²⁷² Many other top civil servants in Foreign Affairs considered, however, that there was a severe lack of knowledge about the Balkans in general and Yugoslavia in particular. According to H.A. Schaper, deputy head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, this soon led to a knowledge bottleneck.²⁷³ The person in the department who knew most about the region was H.J. Hazewinkel, head of the Eastern Europe office. His directorate occupied a marginal position, and he and his director were much less visible than the self-confident staff of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, who had established good access routes to the minister and the Director-General for Political Affairs during the preceding years. When the conflict broke out, therefore, various officials from Foreign Affairs hurried off to the library and the bookshop to get hold of literature on Yugoslavia.²⁷⁴ Van Eenennaam had to admit, as did Schaper and Hoekema, that Foreign Affairs had approached the Yugoslav conflict very largely from the viewpoint of Western European logic, and had severely underestimated its difficulty.²⁷⁵

Many civil servants had however brushed aside the lack of knowledge, on the basis of the argument that knowledge of the region was not relevant for policy development - if indeed one could speak of policy development at this early stage:

‘We were very much carried along by the current of events ... You reacted, and from the very first moment you just had to keep on reacting. I kept on writing notes for Parliament until I was dizzy. I had no time at all to really think about policy and policy options. No one asked me to do that anyway. I have the feeling that this was going on at the level of the Director-General for Political Affairs, the minister and maybe one or two directors ... Look, doing nothing was not an option. Suppose that that is your conclusion, on the basis of your deeper knowledge of the Balkans. Well, you put that very nicely, but there are a couple of things that the pressure of public opinion will not let us do. You can't say: It's a terrible situation, but as I see things we only have one realistic option and that is to do nothing and wait, see how things turn out. No, ... things that ²⁷⁰ Interview A.P.R. Jacobovits de Szeged, 21/09/00.

²⁷¹ Interview AM van der Togt, 04/05/00.

²⁷² TCBU. Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, p. 9.

²⁷³ Herman Schaper in: Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het stratego van de experts’, Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 12. See also interview N. Biegman, 03/07/00.

²⁷⁴ Interviews with B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00 and A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00; Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het stratego van de experts’, Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 11; Willem Wansink, ‘Scheepstoeter-diplomatie’ (Ship's hooter diplomacy), Elsevier, 22/07/95.

²⁷⁵ Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het stratego van de experts’, Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 11.

pointed in that direction were simply not an option. We had to do something.²⁷⁶

Van den Broek would say, nearly a year after the Netherlands' chairmanship of the EC, 'I keep on hearing Balkans experts say, you have underestimated the nationalist forces. That may well be the case, but what would we have done differently if we had estimated them correctly?'²⁷⁷ And somewhat later, 'What could we have used if we had all been highly qualified professors of the history of the Balkans?' '...Even if you had read everything there was to read about the history of the Balkan wars at the start of this [twentieth] century, what would you have learnt that would be of use today?' Van den Broek doubted the relevance of detailed knowledge of local circumstances and history to policy decisions in particular because the main stress in Dutch policy lay on keeping the standpoints of the EC member states on the same line. One's own insights were of little value in this connection.²⁷⁸ It was precisely this stance of Van den Broek which would so annoy the Serbs with whom he was engaged in discussion. As the Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs Vladislav Jovanovic would say, 'Van den Broek epitomized that arrogance of the EU (European Union, still called the European Community at that time) towards international law. I witnessed his superficiality. He was not willing to invest in learning more about Yugoslavia. They had the political might. They were ignorant.'²⁷⁹

The chairmanship of the EC was a mixed blessing as far as the level of knowledge in the ministry was concerned. It is true that the department received much more information about developments in Yugoslavia thanks to the chairmanship than would have been the case otherwise.²⁸⁰ At the same time, the chairmanship meant that the Netherlands had much less freedom in the formulation of its own policy, as it continually had to take into account what would be an acceptable policy for the Twelve. Another problem was that 'if you put two Balkans experts next to one another, the chance that they would reach agreement is very slight'.²⁸¹

7. Hans van den Broek: pros and cons of a long period in office

The lack of adequate coordination at civil-servant level meant that a very heavy burden fell on the shoulders of the minister, who in general had too little time to draw in the policy lines.²⁸² In fact, this was the least of Van den Broek's problems during the Yugoslav conflict: he was generally regarded as a 'Samson'²⁸³ with years of experience. He also had a reputation for 'doing his homework very thoroughly' and as a fast reader.²⁸⁴

The politician Hans van den Broek, born in Paris where his father was a correspondent of the Dutch daily de Telegraaf at the time, was discovered by Norbert Schmelzer, a powerful figure within the CDA (Dutch Christian Democrat party). Schmelzer, who had been minister of Foreign Affairs himself in the past, brought Van den Broek to The Hague as a Member of Parliament. After a year as junior minister for Foreign Affairs, Van den Broek became minister of that department in November 1982. He was on the right wing of his party, as appeared during his time as a backbencher from his standpoint on such issues as abortion and euthanasia. As minister, he supported the idea of siting cruise

²⁷⁶ Interview AM van der Togt, 04/05/00.

²⁷⁷ Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: "Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg"', Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10.

²⁷⁸ Interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99.

²⁷⁹ Interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

²⁸⁰ Both, Indifference, p. 232.

²⁸¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, p. 9.

²⁸² This problem in the ministry of Foreign Affairs had been pointed out earlier and in more general terms by Everts (ed.), Controversies, pp. 74 and 330.

²⁸³ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

²⁸⁴ Interviews B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00; P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99 and H.A. Schaper, 12/04/00; P. Rusman, 'De laatste Koude-Oorlogstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)', Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 269.

missiles in the Netherlands and opposed a unilateral oil embargo against South Africa. During the formation of the Lubbers-Kok coalition in 1989, he had difficulty dealing with the differences between the political programme of his own party and that of the left-wing PvdA.²⁸⁵ He had the reputation of being a ‘cold fish’, but according to political colleagues he could be emotional within his own four walls.²⁸⁶

Van den Broek combined all the pros and cons of a long period in office. During more than eight years as minister of Foreign Affairs, he had collected a small group of advisers whose opinion he valued. The central figure in this group was Van Eenennaam, the head of DAV.²⁸⁷ Van den Broek was a minister with a pronounced opinion of his own,²⁸⁸ who became more and more convinced of the rightness of his ideas the longer he remained in office.²⁸⁹ This gave him the image of ‘a dominant man who would rather convince others than be convinced’, as his fellow CDA member Aarts put it.²⁹⁰ Both friend and enemy regarded him as ‘arrogant’.²⁹¹ The Yugoslavs would never see him in any other role.²⁹² Van den Broek had in addition a very legalistic line of reasoning. He was not very flexible, and believed that a politician should stick to his course once he had chosen it: ‘We do not mess around.’²⁹³

Van den Broek’s stance was at the same time the strength and the weakness of his ministry: ‘Of course, he made a control structure, a coordination structure, unnecessary because he had all the lines in his own hand. He was the boss, and he did it himself. With just a few close advisers.’²⁹⁴ After nearly ten years in office, the press increasingly lost interest in him.²⁹⁵

The final years of Van den Broek’s tenure of the ministry were moreover adversely affected by the troubled relationship with Prime Minister Lubbers. Lubbers had had a great deal of respect for Van den Broek for many years. In 1989, however, the relationship began to cool. At that time, Van den Broek was one of the three members of the CDA tipped as possible candidates to succeed Lubbers as Prime Minister, the other two being the Minister of Finance Onno Ruding and the leader of the CDA fraction in Parliament, Elco Brinkman. In order to test their suitability for the job, the leaders of the CDA thought it necessary to try out Van den Broek and Ruding in a new position. They recommended that Ruding should be made minister of Foreign Affairs and Van den Broek minister of Justice. The plan failed, however, because Van den Broek refused to leave his accustomed hunting ground.²⁹⁶ In Lubbers’ view, this decision put Van den Broek out of the running.²⁹⁷

The personal relationship between Van den Broek and Lubbers was even more seriously damaged in the autumn of 1990, as the result of disagreement about competences in the field of foreign ²⁸⁵ Metze, Stranding, p. 178.

²⁸⁶ Metze, Stranding, pp. 85 and 188.

²⁸⁷ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

²⁸⁸ Gualthérie van Weezel, Rechts, p. 71.

²⁸⁹ Interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99; cf. P. Rusman, ‘De laatste Koude-Oorlogstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)’, Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 269, 270.

²⁹⁰ Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, ‘Internationaal kan Henz Vendenbroek niet meer stuk’, Trouw, 13/07/91. See also Dankert in: Rehwinkel & Nekkens, Regerendewijs, pp. 144, 151; Metze, Stranding, p. 188.

²⁹¹ Leonard Ornstein & Max van Weezel, ‘Van den Broek kan de wereld weer aan, dertel als een veulen’ (Van den Broek can handle the world again, as frolicsome as a foal), Vrij Nederland, 11/04/92; Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, ‘Nederland is bijna te klein voor Hans van den Broek’ (The Netherlands is almost too small for Hans Van den Broek), Trouw, 13/07/91; ‘Van den Broek mikpunt spot’ (Van den Broek is target for satire), de Telegraaf, 24/03/93; Jan Bron Dik, ‘De Hollanditis ligt gelukkig achter ons, er is weer internationaal respect’, CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 6; P. Rusman, ‘De laatste Koude-Oorlogstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)’, Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 281.

²⁹² See e.g. Kadjevic, View, p. 46; interview A. Buha, 17/12/99; interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

²⁹³ Leonard Ornstein, ‘Minister Van den Broek: “Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg”’, Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10.

²⁹⁴ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

²⁹⁵ Interview B. Hiensch, 13/07/00; ‘Steile calvinist alleen populair op aperots’ (Stiff Calvinist only popular on monkeys’ climbing rock), de Volkskrant, 18/09/91; Jan Tromp, ‘Van den Broek had geen minister meer moeten willen wezen’ (Van den Broek should not have wanted to continue in power), De Volkskrant, 08/10/91.

²⁹⁶ Metze, Stranding, p. 39.

²⁹⁷ Metze, Stranding, pp. 40, 188-189.

policy.²⁹⁸ When the European Council of heads of government was set up in 1976, it was discovered that the Dutch prime minister had much less authority in the field of foreign policy than many other members of the Council. This Council, which generally met at six-monthly intervals, was formally composed of the heads of government, the (French) head of state and the chairman of the European Commission. The heads of government were accompanied at these meetings by their ministers of Foreign Affairs. There were however moments during such a summit, e.g. during the final ceremonial dinner, when the prime ministers were not accompanied by their ministers of Foreign Affairs when they exchanged views with their foreign counterparts. Now the mandate of the Dutch premier was determined by the government, and largely by Foreign Affairs; it had been found, however, that once the premier was in the Council such a mandate could show some serious loopholes.²⁹⁹ For this reason among others, Dries Van Agt, the Dutch prime minister at the time, had written at the end of 1978 that it had 'long' been true that the minister of Foreign Affairs no longer had the prime responsibility for the European dimension of Dutch foreign affairs.³⁰⁰

The Dutch Home Secretary, Ien Dales, proposed at the end of 1990 in a memo to the Government that the Prime Minister, like the German Federal Chancellor, should be given powers of assignment so that he could assume an independent position on behalf of the Government during European summit meetings. Lubbers, who had not only experienced problems with respect to his constitutional position at the six-monthly European summits but also wished to maintain contacts, in particular by phone, with his counterparts abroad in between these summits to realize a kind of informal 'European consultative body',³⁰¹ agreed with this proposal. He explained in a letter to Van den Broek that he wanted to enjoy the same scope as his foreign counterparts, without hindrance as regards 'information, contacts, presence, status' and the like.

Van den Broek was not at all pleased at Lubbers' attempt, as he saw it, to go too far towards 'European harmonization' of his office, and threatened to resign.³⁰² Though the acute conflict was calmed down, the affair had done lasting damage to the relationship between Lubbers and Van den Broek.³⁰³ The two ministers kept up a constant low-level squabbling, and the daily Trouw sketched Van den Broek as giving the impression of a 'child that keeps on whining because it doesn't get what it wants'.³⁰⁴ The conflict was compounded by background rumours that Lubbers could succeed Jacques Delors as chairman of the European Commission, which could reduce the chances of Van den Broek continuing his career abroad in view of the scarcity of top international positions.³⁰⁵

It was thought on the eve of the Netherlands' taking up the chairmanship of the EC that the draft of the Maastricht Treaty, embodying a design for European political union, that was due to be signed at the end of 1991 would be the main item on the agenda. However, the complications ²⁹⁸ For a further discussion of this problem, see also Rozemond, Regeringsleider.

²⁹⁹ Schmelzer, Minister-president, p. 193.

³⁰⁰ Cited in: Schmelzer, Minister-president, pp. 190-191.

³⁰¹ TK, 1990-1991, Proceedings 08/11/90, p. 1129.

³⁰² Metze, Stranding, pp. 40 and 189; A.E. Kersten, 'Een woud van verandering. Ontwikkeling van taak en organisatie van het ministerie' (A forest of change. Development of tasks and organization within the ministry), in Van Ditzhuyzen et al. (eds.), Jaar, p. 74; TK, 1990-1991, 21 865, No. 1; ibid., pp. 1115-1133.

³⁰³ Dankert in: Rehwinkel & Nekkers, Regerendernijfs, p. 153; P. Rusman, 'De laatste Koude-Oorlogstrijder. Hans van den Broek (1982-1993)', Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 269, 270, 272, 276-277, 281; 'Duitsland verwacht veel van Nederland als voorzitter van de EG' (Germany expects a lot from the Netherlands as EC chairman), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91; Victor, Presidency, 6.2.1.

³⁰⁴ Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, 'Nederland is bijna te klein voor Hans van den Broek', Trouw, 13/07/91.

³⁰⁵ 'Had Lubbers Van den Broek maar op cake getrakteerd' (If only Lubbers had treated Van den Broek to some cake), Trouw, 18/06/91; Jan Tromp, 'Delors draait Lubbers in moeilijke positie. Premier vindt speculaties over EG-carrière vervelend en vervuilend' (Delors puts Lubbers in difficult position. Dutch Prime Minister finds speculation about EC career annoying and denigrating), de Volkskrant, 26/06/91; Oscar Garschagen & Wio Joustra, 'Premier Lubbers over het Nederlands EG-voorzitterschap: 'Ik hoor nergens een vals geluid'' (Prime Minister Lubbers on Dutch chairmanship of EC: 'I don't hear a false note anywhere'), de Volkskrant, 27/06/91; Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, 'Internationaal kan Henz Vendenbroek niet meer stuk', Trouw, 13/07/91.

surrounding the Yugoslav crisis very soon took up so much of Foreign Minister Van den Broek's time that he had hardly any left to devote to other issues.³⁰⁶

8. Brioni: success or make-believe?

While European leaders were in a jubilant mood, convinced that the EC was going to play a heroic role in the handling of the conflict in Yugoslavia, Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Broek wanted to start off his country's chairmanship of the EC by getting to know the American standpoint on this issue.

To this end, he paid a lightning visit to his American counterpart James Baker and National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft in Washington. Van den Broek heard that the American government was considering a block on economic aid to Yugoslavia and the imposition of an arms embargo on that country. Baker stated further that the American government would in principle support EC actions in this field, and the solution to the problems involved devised by the EC.³⁰⁷ He emphasized that the EC would have to take the lead, while the United States would remain in the background.³⁰⁸ A Dutch diplomat told the Dutch daily NRC Handelsblad that it was 'interesting to observe' during Van den Broek's visit 'how the Americans calmly leave everything to us. They have the highest praise for all EC initiatives in Yugoslavia, and seem to be adopting the attitude, "it's your problem, so you decide how to handle it."'³⁰⁹

Baker and Van den Broek did however issue a joint statement after their talks to the effect that they would respect the independence of the Yugoslav republics, if this was brought about by peaceful means. This represented an abrupt departure from the standpoint taken by the European Community in the autumn of 1990 (that the unity of Yugoslavia should be preserved), within a week of the outbreak of the conflict.³¹⁰ The independence of Croatia and Slovenia was changed from an option that was not on the cards at all to a question of modality and opportunity.³¹¹ Since a great deal of water would doubtless have to flow through the Danube before the questions on this issue would receive an answer, Washington could confidently expect that the question of recognition would not be an acute one; this was reassuring, since the whole matter of the independence of constituent republics was a tricky one for Gorbachev in the Kremlin - with whom the Americans were currently on good terms - to handle in view of his wish to preserve the unity of the Soviet Union.

The visit to Washington had shown Van den Broek quite clearly that he could not expect any real support from the USA in dealing with the Yugoslav crisis.³¹² Since the Second World War, the unity of Europe had nearly always been forged on an American anvil.³¹³ Would the Atlanticus Van den Broek, who had always plotted his course with the aid of Washington's compass in times of major international conflicts, manage to bring the Twelve of the EC in line without backup from the USA? The signs were not favourable.

³⁰⁶ Interview P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99; Elsbeth Tiedemann, 'Terug naar Zwarte Maandag' (Return to Black Monday), Elsevier, 22/06/96, p. 14; Michiel van Hulten, 'Zwarte Maandag. Kroniek van en gemiste kans', in Labohm (ed.), Waterdragers, p. 194; Hans Nijenhuis, 'Nederland heeft niet het laatste woord' (The Netherlands does not have the last word), NRC Handelsblad, 25/09/91.

³⁰⁷ R. Gutman, Q and A. 'Why are Yugoslavia's people fighting each other?', Newsday, 12/07/92; M.C. Brands & Ronald Havenaar, 'De Verenigde Staten en het probleemkind Europa', in: Gijs de Vries et al., Continent, pp.69-70.

³⁰⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, COREU, 04/07/91, cpe/sec 579.

³⁰⁹ Rob Meines, 'EG afhankelijk van diplomatieke bluff en een overjarige typemachine' (EC dependent on diplomatic bluff and an antiquated typewriter), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

³¹⁰ 'VS: toch steun voor onafhankelijkheid' (US ready to support independence after all), NRC Handelsblad, 03/07/91. The Dutch MPs Blaauw and De Hoop Scheffer stated on Dutch Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 03/07/91, 5.05 pm, that they shared the American viewpoint on the need to support the independence of the Yugoslav republics.

³¹¹ Cf. Peter Michielsen, 'Breuk Joegoslavische federatie maakt van Balkan weer kruitvat' (Split in Yugoslav federation turns Balkans into a powder keg once more), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

³¹² Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 71.

³¹³ This image is from Hodding Carter, Serbia, p. 51.

On 3 July, the Croatian chairman of the Yugoslav presidium (and hence de facto President of Yugoslavia) Mesic phoned German Foreign Minister Genscher; Bonn sent a report of their telephone conversation to the other EC capitals on the same day. According to this report, Mesic said that the JNA (Yugoslav Federal Army) was acting entirely without authorization, and had in fact staged a coup. The Yugoslav premier Markovic had phoned Mesic to say that he believed his life was in danger, and that this might be the last telephone call he ever made. Genscher concluded from this that both their lives could be in danger. Mesic asked Genscher to get the international community to do everything in its power to force the JNA to moderate its actions, and to recognize Slovenia and Croatia as independent states that might form a confederation with the other Yugoslav republics in the future. Genscher told Mesic, completely in line with the German policy of ‘recognition, if’ that he would be prepared to take this latter step if the JNA did not return to its barracks.³¹⁴

Now that the JNA ‘had gone mad’, Genscher did not exclude the possibility that Germany might recognize Croatia and Slovenia independently, if the situation called for it.³¹⁵ He phoned Van den Broek in the latter’s hotel in Washington to tell him this, waking him up at 4.30 am for the purpose. Van den Broek did not let the grass grow under his feet, and phoned his counterparts Dumas, Hurd and Baker, and Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs Alois Mock twice. Finally, he phoned Mesic. The latter repeated to Van den Broek that only recognition of Croatia and Slovenia could halt the JNA’s military advance on these two regions. Van den Broek replied that he expected that such recognition could lead precisely to escalation of the violence.³¹⁶

Dumas suggested that Van den Broek should call an emergency meeting of the EC ministers for two days later in The Hague. Van den Broek decided to cancel a large part of his appointments in Washington and to fly back to the Netherlands without delay.³¹⁷ The talks with Dumas and Baker had confirmed Van den Broek in his opinion that a threat to recognize the two breakaway republics would be too dangerous, as it might lead either to JNA actions to protect Serb minorities³¹⁸ or to Slovenian provocation of the Federal army.³¹⁹

Before he left Washington, Van den Broek urged EC member states not to make unilateral statements or take unilateral steps concerning the independence of Croatia and Slovenia.³²⁰ In the meantime, however, De Michelis made a statement in the Italian Parliament to the effect that Italy would recognize Croatia and Slovenia if the JNA continued to use violence.³²¹

The German position on this issue clearly irritated Van den Broek and the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs. When it was suggested to Van den Broek during a radio interview that Germany was after all a force to be reckoned with, he replied that the chairman of the EC was by no means negligible either.³²² It was clear to the leadership of the Dutch department of Foreign Affairs that Yugoslavia could be a banana peel on the path towards further European unification, and a blemish on the Dutch

³¹⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, COREU bonn, 03/07/91, cpe’bon 322; Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 940.

³¹⁵ Richard Ingham, ‘World consensus shatters as Germany threatens to recognise breakaways’, Agence France Presse, 03/07/91.

³¹⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, 03/07/91.

³¹⁷ Rob Meines, ‘EG afhankelijk van diplomatieke bluf en een overjarige typmachine’, NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

³¹⁸ Nederland 2, NOS, Journal (News), 04/07/91, 8 pm; ‘Erkennen Slovenië wordt netelig punt voor EG-ministers’ (Recognition of Slovenia ticklish point for EC ministers), de Volkskrant, 05/07/91; Rob Meines ‘Joegoslavië wordt nooit meer wat het was’ (Yugoslavia will never again be what it was), NRC Handelsblad, 06/07/91. See also Both, Indifference, p. 105.

³¹⁹ Rob Meines, ‘EG afhankelijk van diplomatieke bluf en een overjarige typmachine’, NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

³²⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, Meesman 682 to Foreign Affairs for COREU, 03/07/91.

³²¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, Jacobovits 1036 to Van den Broek, 04/07/93.

³²² VARA, Vrijdageditie, 05/07/95, 4.05 pm.

chairmanship of the EC.³²³ The prestige not only of Van den Broek personally but also of the Netherlands was at stake.

Emergency summit on Yugoslavia in The Hague

It became clear during the ministerial EPC meeting in The Hague on 5 July 1991 that Germany, Italy, Denmark, Belgium and Luxembourg were in favour of speedy recognition of Slovenia and Croatia. France, Spain and Great Britain, which were unlikely to be flooded with refugees from the region thanks to their geographical situation and which had their own problems with separatists, took the opposite view and stressed the need to preserve the unity of Yugoslavia.³²⁴ Genscher found himself in particular opposed by Dumas.³²⁵ France perceived the German position, that was supported by Austria, as embodying the threat of a German Drang nach Osten (push to the East),³²⁶ and also, as anonymous French sources put it, evidence of a 'Teutonic will to power'.³²⁷

While the Dutch position as regards Yugoslavia before the Netherlands had taken over the chairmanship of the EC had not differed all that much from the German standpoint, Van den Broek now felt that his new role forced him to follow the view of the majority of EC member states, which still aimed at preservation of the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia. It was the start of a policy where preservation of a uniform line within the Twelve was seen as more important than working out well based concrete plans about how to deal with Yugoslavia.³²⁸ This was one time when Genscher could not force through acceptance of his standpoint (in this case, in favour of recognition of the breakaway republics).³²⁹

One consequence of the EPC meeting of 5 July was that, following the lead given by Washington, an immediate embargo on the supply of weapons to Yugoslavia was proclaimed. Other countries were urged to do the same, and countries bordering Yugoslavia were urged to block the transport of weapons through their territories to Yugoslavia.

The troika in action again

The ministerial troika paid a third visit to Yugoslavia on 6 and 7 July, in response to a call for help from Loncar, the Federal Yugoslav Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the Dutch ambassador in Belgrade Fietelaars ('we badly need help, we badly need help'),³³⁰. The venue this time was Brioni, an island to the south of Istria that had been Tito's favourite spot for conferences and where he had offered hospitality to countless foreign guests. Genscher repeated his warnings to Serbia in Welt am Sonntag on 7 July, where he stated that renewed military action on the part of the JNA would remove any basis for negotiations. In that case, recognition of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia would be among the possibilities.³³¹

³²³ Both, Indifference, p. 102.

³²⁴ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00; 'Geen erkenning door EG' (No recognition by EC), de Volkskrant, 06/07/91.

³²⁵ Chenu, France, p. 373; Dumas, Fil, p. 353; Axt, Jugoslavië, p. 352.

³²⁶ See e.g. Eduardo Cue, 'UPI News Analysis. Yugoslav crisis reveals split within European Community', UPI, 06/07/91; Jonathan Kaufman, 'Yugoslav strife spoils Europe's unity party', The Boston Globe, 07/07/91; R.C. Longworth, 'As Yugoslav crisis unfolds, Europe is struggling to police itself', Chicago Tribune, 07/07/91; Rob Meines 'Joegoslavië wordt nooit meer wat het was', NRC Handelsblad, 06/07/91.

³²⁷ 'Europese bemiddeling' (European mediation), NRC Handelsblad, 09/07/91.

³²⁸ Leonard Ornstein, 'Het stratego van de experts' (Stratego for experts), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 12.

³²⁹ Rob Meines, 'Joegoslavië wordt nooit meer wat het was', NRC Handelsblad, 06/07/91.

³³⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië (preparation for and reports on visits of troika to Yugoslavia), July/August 1991, Fietelaars 187 to Van den Broek, 05/07/91.

³³¹ Libal, Limits, p. 22.

The troika found the various Yugoslav parties so divided as to be hardly able to provide any contribution of substance to the discussion.³³² In particular the Serbian member of the Yugoslav presidium, Jovic, behaved in a manner that was far from diplomatic. He claimed that the JNA could wipe Slovenia off the map in a day if they wanted. He thought it unlikely that peaceful solutions could be achieved in Croatia, because according to him the destruction of the Serb minority in that republic was being prepared. If other republics considered that they had the right to self-determination, then so had the Serbs according to him. The Serbian republic guaranteed Serbs the right to exercise this option, he went on to say, in a clear reference to the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia.

After sixteen hours of discussion, Van den Broek stated that the text of the declaration worked out by the troika in the course of the day was non-negotiable. If it was not accepted, the EC had no further role to play in the process. This ultimatum produced a joint declaration by all parties concerned with two appendices, which came to be known as the Brioni Agreement.³³³ This stipulated that negotiations between all parties concerned would start no later than 1 August, without any preliminary conditions. At that conference, the peoples of Yugoslavia would themselves decide about their future. The EC would only assist in the search for a solution and in the provision of the necessary facilities. A ceasefire would be observed in Slovenia, and the Federal army would return to its barracks. In the meantime, there would be a three-month moratorium on the implementation of the declarations of independence.

The European monitoring mission

One of the provisions of the Brioni Agreement was that a group of observers from the European Community under the name European Commission Monitoring Mission (ECMM) would be admitted to Slovenia and Croatia in order to monitor compliance with the ceasefire, the withdrawal of the JNA, the exchange of prisoners and the implementation of the moratorium. The mission would consist of thirty to fifty observers who would be given diplomatic status, and whose safety would be guaranteed by the parties concerned. These monitors were soon given the nickname 'ice-cream men' because of the snow-white clothing they wore to underline their unarmed civilian status. A Memorandum of Understanding between the EC representatives, the Yugoslav authorities and representatives of Croatia and Slovenia, specifying the mandate and status of the observers, was signed on 13 July.

The number of members of the ECMM increased gradually to about four hundred over the next two years. The mission subsequently also became active in Bosnia-Herzegovina and had a small office known by the rather grand name of 'regional centre' in Belgrade. It had other regional centres in Szeged (Hungary), Sofia (Bulgaria) and Tirana and Kukes (Albania), that were intended to help prevent the conflict from spreading beyond the boundaries of (the former) Yugoslavia. From August 1991, monitors from the CSCE member states Canada, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Sweden joined the ECMM. The mission received its instructions from the chairman of the EC and reported to him and to the United Nations and the International Red Cross. The chairman of the EC passed the reports of the ECMM on to the Community's Ad Hoc Group on Yugoslavia.

Although the mission's attempts to mediate between the parties to the conflict had little success, and the mission was in fact hardly able to play a significant role in monitoring the ceasefire agreements, it did achieve a certain value as the eyes and ears of the European Community in the field. It also started investigating violations of human rights from the autumn of 1991, with the encouragement of the chairman of the EC. As time went by, it further played a role in the exchange of ³³² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 195 and 196 to Van den Broek, 08/07/91.

³³³ The text of this agreement is given in Review of International Affairs, Vol. 42, Nos. 995-7, pp. 20-23 and in ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië, July/August 1991, COREU Nederlands EG-voorzitterschap (COREU message Dutch chair of EC), 08/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 320. For a report of the meeting where the agreement was reached, see ibid., Fietelaars 195 to Van Den Broek, 08/07/91.

prisoners, the execution of confidence-increasing measures and the monitoring of aid convoys.³³⁴ Thus, the ECMM gradually developed from a body charged with monitoring the withdrawal of the JNA from Slovenia and compliance with the terms of truce agreements to an in situ monitor of not only the military but also the political, economic and humanitarian situation.³³⁵ It was therefore true to a certain extent to say of it, 'It was improvised and disordered, and it should not have worked, but it did.'³³⁶

After the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) was set up early in 1992, however, the ECMM came to be overshadowed by this UN organization. The ECMM was largely trapped in the role of an observer with the supplementary task of solving acute, often humanitarian problems at a local level in regions where the situation was tense. ECMM reports were mainly restricted to factual information about a shooting incident at such and such a location, at such and such a time. Since the recipients of such reports in Western capitals did not in general appreciate it when the monitors gave their own assessment of the situation, these reports were not highly respected either by the EC and UN mediators or by the authorities in the various European capitals. The ECMM had thus very little involvement in the political negotiation process.³³⁷

Things had however not yet reached this stage when, shortly after the signing of the Brioni Agreement, 62-year-old Jo van der Valk, former head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs at the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs and before that (in the late 'seventies) Dutch ambassador in Belgrade, was appointed head of the ECMM with Brigadier General J.C. Kusters as his deputy. They arrived in Zagreb, the capital of Croatia, on 15 July with a few dozen ECMM observers (diplomats and a few officials from EC countries). This site had been chosen because of its location between Belgrade and Slovenia. The ECMM set up its headquarters there, and would make missions to Slovenia by jeep or helicopter.

Soon after the signing of the Brioni Agreement, a German diplomat had stated that the real war – by which he meant one between Serbs and Croats – was bound to start soon: 'Observers will have to be sent there without delay, or they will be bashing one another's' heads in again.'³³⁸ The question was whether the ECMM was actually authorized to perform tasks in Croatia as well as Slovenia. The Memorandum of Understanding signed by the EC and the six republics of Yugoslavia, which governed the mandate of the ECMM, stated that the field of operation of the mission comprised 'Slovenia and, as appropriate, Croatia, unless the Participating Parties agree that the implementation of the Mandate also requires activities beyond these areas'.³³⁹

While Van der Valk was on the way to Zagreb to take up his mission, representatives of the countries who had sent observers to take part in the mission were meeting in The Hague. The Dutch ambassador-at-large Christiaan Kröner, who had led the group preparing the way for the ECMM,³⁴⁰ explained during this meeting that the JNA and the Federal authorities were afraid that there were spies among the monitors. The organizers of the mission had managed by the skin of their teeth to persuade the authorities in Belgrade to admit monitors from certain countries – doubtless including Germany and probably Italy too. Activities in Croatia were particularly sensitive in this connection. This could ³³⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05267. COREU van het EG-voorzitterschap (COREU message from chair of EC), 22/09/93, CPE/Pres/Bru/928.

³³⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05267. COREU van het EG-voorzitterschap, 17/12/93, CPE/Pres/Bru/1596. For summaries of the activities of the ECMM see J.W. Beekman, 'EG-waarnemers in het voormalige Joegoslavië; de juridische aspecten' (EC observers in the former Yugoslavia: the legal aspects), Carré, 15 (1993)10, pp. 6-9; Bohr, Experiment, ABZ DEU/ARA/00085. COREU message from British chairman of EC, 08/10/92, cpe/pres/lon 1490.

³³⁶ Nuttall, EC, p. 22. Cf. Libal, Limits, p. 49.

³³⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05267. dossieraantekening CoPo, 'ECMM en CVSE in voormalig Joegoslavië' ('ECMM and CSCE in the former Yugoslavia', with marginal notes by CoPo), from JW./DAV/MS and HZ/DAV/PH, 07/09/93, 17/12/93, CPE/Pres/Bru/1596.

³³⁸ Rob Meines, 'EG afhankelijk van diplomatieke bluf en een overjarige typemachine', NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91.

³³⁹ Article III.1 of the memorandum, as reproduced in Review of International Affairs, Vol. 42 (1992) Nos. 995-7, p. 22; DCBC, 244. Appendix to memo from De Winter to Ter Beek, 11/07/91, D91/352.

³⁴⁰ 'EG-kwartiermakers' in Belgrado' (EC quartermasters in Belgrade), Trouw, 10/07/91.

easily give rise to problems, since the headquarters of the mission were sited precisely in Croatia. Kröner stressed that it was essential to ensure that the monitors did not get involved in the struggle between the Serbs and Croats: 'Although, as agreed in the Memorandum of Understanding, Croatia was not to be excluded from the mission area, it would not be the main focus of the mission.'³⁴¹ Other Western diplomats reported that the leadership of the JNA had told the presidium that they had strong reservations against the simple fact of the stationing of the observers in Zagreb.³⁴²

On arrival in Zagreb, Van der Valk created the impression during his first press conference that the mission had no mandate at all to monitor hostilities in Croatia. His remarks were greeted with incomprehension by the reporters present and by the Croatian authorities.³⁴³ The Dutch ambassador in Belgrade, Fietelaars, reported without delay to Foreign Affairs that according to him Van der Valk was a 'very agreeable old gentleman', but 'no longer competent to deal with this very complicated task and not tough enough to deal with the snake pit of present-day politics here. His knowledge of the Brioni Agreement and the Memorandum of Understanding is inadequate, and his reaction to questions from the press was clumsy.'³⁴⁴

The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs responded to Fietelaars that a policy group at the ministry led by the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, Van Eenennaam, was responsible for the policy aspect of the ECMM, while the practical work was delegated to a coordinator of the Yugoslavia mission, K.J.G. van Oosterom, who had been appointed head of a new liaison office to be set up within the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs which would be known under the initials DAV/LSO. This office formulated the tasks of ECMM and was responsible for the logistics, setting up the mission's regional offices and the distribution of ECMM reports to the capitals of EC member states via 'COREUS', special telegrams designed for European correspondence. The office consisted of two members of staff in charge of policy issues and a clerk from Foreign Affairs and a military advisor who was responsible for the liaison between the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs and the Defence staff. After some initial troubles in the filling in of this function of liaison with Defence, T.P.J. (Tom) Karremans, subsequently the commander of Dutchbat III, was appointed to this position on 14 August.

In the meantime, sources within the American National Security Council (NSC) stressed to the Dutch ambassador in Washington, Meesman, on 16 July that the ECMM should pay attention to the situation in Croatia. According to these NSC sources, there would 'no longer be much point' in looking for structural solutions to the problems in Yugoslavia once violence had broken out in Croatia. The State Department was also a keen supporter of ECMM activity in Croatia.³⁴⁵ Washington also urged other EC member states to extend the mandate of the ECMM to include Croatia.³⁴⁶

Somewhat embarrassed by the situation that had arisen as a result of Van der Valk's restrictive interpretation of the ECMM's mandate, the Dutch permanent representative at NATO, A.P.R. Jacobovits de Szeged, had to state in the North Atlantic Council that the mission to Yugoslavia was intended to monitor a ceasefire, not a conflict.³⁴⁷

Ten days after the signing of the Brioni Agreement, on 18 July, the Federal Presidium of Yugoslavia decided that the JNA troops should be gradually withdrawn from Slovenia within the space

³⁴¹ ABZ, DAV. ISN 4824115, COREU message from chair of EC, 16/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 381.

³⁴² David Hearst, 'Conflict erupts over EC observers', The Guardian, 13/07/91.

³⁴³ Zeidler, Rolle, pp. 129-130; Theo Engelen, 'Ook Kroatië wil EG-waarnemers. 'Teleurstelling in Zagreb over uitlating Van der Valk' (Croatia wants EC observers too. Disappointment in Zagreb about statement by Van der Valk), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/91; 'EG-waarnemers zullen niet actief worden in Kroatië' (EC observers will not be active in Croatia), de Volkskrant, 16/07/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Politici spelen met vuur' (Politicians are playing with fire), Trouw, 18/07/91.

³⁴⁴ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief, Stg geheime codes. Fietelaars 213 to Van den Broek, 16/07/91, Stg geheim.

³⁴⁵ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief, Stg geheime codes. Meesman 711 to Van den Broek, 16/07/91, Stg Geheim.

³⁴⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, Jacobovits 1115 to Van den Broek, 19/07/91.

³⁴⁷ ABZ, NAR: CR (91)51. NATO, Summary record of a meeting of the North Atlantic Council held at NATO Headquarters, Brussels 17/07/91, 19/09/91.

of three months. This goal was indeed reached in October. This would seem to indicate that the EC had scored a quick success with the Brioni Agreement.

A number of critical comments may be made in this connection, however. Firstly, the negotiation process stipulated as part of the Brioni Agreement was supposed to be one in which the EC left it up to the various parties in Yugoslavia to work out their future. It may be asked whether this was a good idea, in view of the differences that had existed between the various Yugoslav republics since 1987, the inability to reconcile the conflicting wishes for recentralization on the one hand and confederation – not to speak of independence – on the other, the irreconcilable claims of the Serbs and Croats on Krajina and Slavonia and finally the complete impotence of the Federal authorities. Milosevic stated once more in Brioni that those who wanted to leave Yugoslavia should be able to do so, but that Serbs living outside Serbia had an equal right to continue to be part of the common state of Yugoslavia, and that the Yugoslav army would protect that right.³⁴⁸ Even if it was not already clear to the EC at that moment that the parties to the conflict would not be able to resolve matters unaided, the continual breakdown of the ceasefires should in any case soon have acted as a warning signal.

Secondly, the EC stipulated an end to the hostilities as a condition for political talks. The continual violations of the ceasefires thus caused much precious time to be lost. In the absence of solutions, the unity of Yugoslavia had to be maintained and the EC was prepared to reinforce the Federal authorities.³⁴⁹ Their efforts in this direction were however pointless, as the Federal cabinet had in fact ceased to function. The Federal premier Markovic and his Foreign Minister Loncar no longer played a meaningful role, as noted as early as the spring of 1991 by the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Dutch Military Intelligence Service (Dutch abbreviation MID).³⁵⁰ The American ambassador in Belgrade, Zimmermann, commented in a similar vein that at the time when Croatia and Slovenia made their declarations of independence, Markovic was increasingly seen as ‘a figurehead or, even worse, a fig leaf’.³⁵¹

The EC insistence on the nomination of Mesic as chairman of the Federal Yugoslav presidium was fairly pointless too; this move was only of symbolic value. It did not give Mesic any real influence over the JNA. Serbia could always reckon on four of the eight votes, thanks to its usurpation of the seats of Kosovo and Vojvodina and the support of Montenegro, as Izetbegovic told the European troika in early August 1991. He hoped that the EC would now only do business with the heads of the six republics: ‘They hold the real power.’³⁵²

The presidium was practically paralysed in the spring of 1991 by the even split of votes (Serbia and Montenegro against the rest). The EC, which continued to support the unity of Yugoslavia, tried to counter this de facto situation. This helped Serbia, which was trying to block the trend towards independence. These facts help to explain why the Federal Minister of Defence Kadijevic, who normally did not have a good word to say about the actions of the EC, thanked the troika in early August 1991 for the fact that the Community had enabled the presidium to function again.³⁵³

³⁴⁸ Steven L. Burg, ‘Negotiating a Settlement: Lessons of the Diplomatic Process’, Blank (ed.), Wars, p. 38.

³⁴⁹ See e.g. ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DEU/OE, ‘Joegoslavië/scenario’s en beleidsmogelijkheden’ (Yugoslavia: scenarios and policy options) for Extra CoPo, The Hague 19/07/91, 18/07/91.

³⁵⁰ ‘The Federal government under premier Markovic has lost nearly all its authority, and the question is how long it will remain in the saddle.’, ABZ, DEU/ARA/00042. DEU/COREU message re EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, 1990-1991, points for Van den Broek’s speech at the Gymnich meeting, Monorf-les-Bains, 27-28/04/91, 23/04/91; ‘In the meantime, the divisions between the constituent republics have led among other things to a situation where the central organs of administration, in particular the Federal government, are actually powerless’, Archives of Dutch ministry of Defence, (Head of Information Staff department), S.W. Schouten, Colonel of Cavalry, to head of IDB, head of BVD and Foreign Affairs re AMAD, 03/05/92, DIS/91/095/2253, with the memo ‘Joegoslavië: verscherping militair/politieke situatie’ (Yugoslavia: exacerbation of military and political situation) as appendix.

³⁵¹ Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 11.

³⁵² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië, July/August 1991, Hasselman 250 to Van den Broek, 03/08/91.

³⁵³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 253 to Van den Broek, 05/08/91.

Thirdly, the moratorium on the independence of Croatia and Slovenia agreed in Brioni created the impression that this independence would be a fact when the waiting period came to an end – an impression that could only be reinforced by the general recognition of the importance Germany attached to this independence. And that at a moment when the EC was still formally a firm supporter of the need to maintain the unity and territorial integrity of Yugoslavia. This stance thus quickly lost most of its credibility, and the situation supported the JNA in its conviction that there was every reason to win territory as quickly as possible. The troops that withdrew from Slovenia (a move monitored by the ECMM) were deployed in Croatia and Bosnia, in preparation for the offensives the JNA would be mounting there in the near future.³⁵⁴ It was the predictability of this threat that made the Croat Mesic the only member of the presidium to vote against the motion for withdrawal from Slovenia, while Bogic Bogicevic, the representative of Bosnia-Hercegovina, abstained.³⁵⁵ While Croatia fell victim to the new offensive shortly after, Slovenia could lie back calmly in the expectation that all it had to do was ‘wait till the EC moratorium was over’.

By agreeing with a monitoring mission aimed solely at Slovenia, the EC had set foot on the path of limited, local solutions instead of making a contribution to an approach to the future of the Yugoslav state as a whole.

After the withdrawal of the JNA from Slovenia had been confirmed, the deputy head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, Schaper, asked Van der Valk once again what he thought about extending the field of operation of the ECMM to Croatia and possibly to Bosnia-Hercegovina, now that JNA actions in Croatia were to be expected in the near future.³⁵⁶ However, Van der Valk continued to turn down the idea of operation of the mission in Croatia.³⁵⁷ ‘We are an unarmed civilian mission, and are thus not equipped for operations in Eastern Croatia’, said Van der Valk.³⁵⁸ The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs finally supported him in this position. An official from the ministry thought that since the tense situation in Slovenia had not yet completely cleared up, there was no reason for the observers to leave.³⁵⁹ Tudjman, however, perceived a difference between Van der Valk’s position and that of ‘his chief, Van den Broek’. Tudjman wanted the latter to explain what sense it made for him, as head of state of Croatia, to have voted for the Brioni Agreement and the deployment of the observers if they were not allowed to operate in Croatia itself.³⁶⁰

The restrictive interpretation of the mandate by Van der Valk and Milosevic’s decision to give up Slovenia thus put the international community on the back foot. Two weeks after the mission had been brought into being its aims were, according to the Dutch daily NRC Handelsblad, ‘generally regarded as overtaken by events and more or less pointless’.³⁶¹ It was not even allowed to monitor the withdrawal of the JNA from Slovenia to barracks in Bosnia-Hercegovina. The initiative shifted to Belgrade, and the international community would find itself forced, time after time, to react to new crises for which it was hardly prepared. Slovenia would be followed by Croatia, Bosnia-Hercegovina, Kosovo and Macedonia in succession.

³⁵⁴ Cf. Kadijevic, View, p. 130.

³⁵⁵ See also Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Kroatië reageert met scepsis en achterdocht’ (Croatia reacts with scepticism and suspicion), NRC Handelsblad, 19/07/91; ‘Slovenië viert feest; Kroatië ziet bui hangen’ (Slovenia celebrates while Croatia sees stormy weather ahead), Trouw, 20/07/91.

³⁵⁶ ABZ, DAV archives, ISN 4824115, memo from deputy. DAV to HOM, 19/07/91, No. 22-91.

³⁵⁷ ABZ, DAV archives, ISN 4824115, COREU of EC presidency, 17/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 385.

³⁵⁸ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Kroatië reageert met scepsis en achterdocht’, NRC Handelsblad, 19/07/91. See also ‘Soldaten weg waar ze als bezetters worden gezien’ (Soldiers removed where they are seen as occupying forces), Trouw, 19/07/91.

³⁵⁹ ‘Slovenië viert feest; Kroatië ziet bui hangen’, Trouw, 20/07/91.

³⁶⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Kroatië eist terugtrekking federale leger’ (Croatia demands withdrawal of Federal army), NRC Handelsblad, 20/07/91; idem, ‘Opracht waarnemers goeddeels achterhaald’ (Remit of observers has already lost most of its validity), NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/91.

³⁶¹ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Opracht waarnemers goeddeels achterhaald’, NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/91.

9. Dutch assessment of the future of Yugoslavia

Of the main Dutch dailies, the Liberal NRC Handelsblad generally adopted a cynical stance as regards the ability of the EC to deal effectively with the crisis in Yugoslavia. On the other hand, it did recognize that the EC had to do something. The risk of a complete breakdown of society in Yugoslavia was great, in the opinion of the paper's editor in chief W.H. Weenink. 'Doing nothing, or welcoming the secessions, are however even less attractive options for the EC. The former would make the efforts towards political union lose credibility, while the latter would probably lead to prolonged instability and a breakdown of proper relations in Europe. The Yugoslav crisis shows that only European integration can save the old continent from relapsing into an era of tribal wars, which had for so long been kept nicely under control by the Cold War and Western-European unification.'³⁶²

The foreign affairs commentator of the NRC Handelsblad, J.L. Heldring, did however have a few good words to say about the efforts of the troika under the leadership of Van den Broek, though he did warn that what the EC had been aiming at so far was crisis management rather than policy.³⁶³ A leader in that broadsheet asked 'whether an approach the Dutch elements of which would be clear to the insider will prove to be functional in the Balkans'. Temporizing tactics which might seem useful in the Dutch situation could lead to a fatal loss of tempo in the Balkans.³⁶⁴

In general, however, Dutch opinion approved of what the EC and in particular Van den Broek were doing. Leonie Sipkes, Green Left Member of Parliament who had expressed fierce criticism of Van den Broek during the Gulf crisis, admitted, 'it hurts me to say so, but Van den Broek has been doing well in this conflict.'³⁶⁵ This statement reflects not only the all-party support Van den Broek could count on in Parliament but also the U-turn in security policy manifested by Green Left. In the winter of 1990/91, Green Left had been the only party that did not support military intervention in response to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. However, a split developed in the party at that time about the deployment of Dutch Patriot rockets to intercept the Scud missiles Iraq was firing at Israel. Paul Rosenmöller and Ina Brouwer supported the deployment, while Peter Lankhorst, Ria Beckers and Leonie Sipkes opposed the sending of these defensive weapons. This led the CDA (Christian Democrat) MP Thijs Van Vlijmen to call Green Left 'Brown Left' – a reference to the treasonable activities of the brown-shirted NSB, Dutch fascist party during the Second World War, for which CDA fraction leader Brinkman later apologized.

The U-turn in Green Left thinking was brought about by the situation of the Kurdish refugees in Northern Iraq. After this crisis, peacekeeping and peace enforcement in response to serious violations of human rights were no longer taboo in Green Left.³⁶⁶

In the Protestant daily Trouw, Dr. R.C.R. Sieckmann, who was attached to the T.M.C. Asser Institute for international law, praised the navigational skills of Van den Broek as he tacked between the Scylla of Yugoslav unity and the Charybdis of the Croatian and Slovenian claims for independence to reach the relatively safe haven of the Brioni Agreement. He was sorry, however, that only observers had been sent, and that that the CSCE lacked the resources and the political will to send a peacekeeping force to act as a buffer and maintain peace and quiet.³⁶⁷

³⁶² W.H. Weenink, 'Pax Europeae', NRC Handelsblad, 01/07/91.

³⁶³ J.L. Heldring, 'Democratie als gevaar voor vrede' (Democracy as a threat to peace), NRC Handelsblad, 09/07/91.

³⁶⁴ 'Europese bemiddeling', NRC Handelsblad, 09/07/91.

³⁶⁵ Leonoor Meijer & Co Welgraven, 'Nederland is bijna te klein voor Hans van den Broek' (The Netherlands is almost too small for Hans Van den Broek), Trouw, 13/07/91.

³⁶⁶ Tweede-Kamerfractie Groen Links, Blauwdruk (Green Left fraction in Parliament, Blueprint), pp. 2 and 14; Ab Gietelink, 'De Verenigde Naties als schietende politieagent' (United Nation as an armed policeman), de Helling, 4(1991)2, pp. 11-14; Leon Wecke, 'Het glibberige pad naar de nieuwe wereldorde' (The slippery path to the new world order), de Helling, 4(1991)3, pp.19-20.

³⁶⁷ R.C.R. Sieckmann, 'Gevraagd: vredesmacht van de CVSE' (Situation vacant: peacekeeping force for CSCE), Trouw, 11/07/91.

A variety of comments were seen in the left-wing De Volkskrant. A leader commenting on the second visit of the troika to Yugoslavia on 30 June gave the opinion that the Netherlands had started its chairmanship of the EC well.³⁶⁸ Columnist Koen Koch, writing in the same paper the next day, thought however that the visit had set a seal on the failure of EC policy which shared responsibility for the bloodshed by supporting the unity of Yugoslavia.³⁶⁹

André Roelofs, reporting for De Volkskrant from Ljubljana, said that it was not clear what would happen if the three-month moratorium on independence for Croatia and Slovenia were to expire without an agreement having been reached. In his report, Roelofs cited Slovenian premier Peterle, who seemed to be suggesting that Slovenia simply had to be patient for the stipulated three-month period and the independence would drop into its hands: 'We have waited a century for independence, and it won't do any harm to wait another three months.'³⁷⁰

Oscar Garschagen praised the provisional success achieved at Brioni, stating that the EC's shuttle diplomacy had shown it 'in an unusually dynamic light' – largely thanks to the initiatives of Van den Broek. He went on to say that while Genscher had so far not dared to venture on a course of German Alleingang (going it alone), the Yugoslav crisis would remain a test case of the ability of the Twelve to maintain a united front.³⁷¹

Some commentators sympathized with Van den Broek in connection with the headaches Genscher was giving him. For example, writing in Trouw about the personal visit Genscher made to Yugoslavia in the first few days of July, Theo Koelé commented that there was no obligation on the chairman of the CSCE to pay such a personal visit to a region hit by crisis.³⁷²

Approval of Van den Broek's actions so far was also expressed in the Dutch Government meeting of 11 July 1991. A number of ministers went so far as to suggest that the Yugoslav crisis might provide an opportunity for setting the tone for European security policy for the coming years. One minister noted the positive side-effect of the united front shown by the Twelve, though he added that it would be unwise to cheer too soon.³⁷³

At the request of two Members of Parliament, Gualthérie van Weezel of the CDA and Weisglas of the Liberal VVD, the permanent Parliamentary Committee of Parliament was called back from the summer recess to discuss the situation in Yugoslavia.³⁷⁴ On the evening of 11 July 1991, the Committee debated a letter of 10 July from the minister of Foreign Affairs.³⁷⁵ This was a rather false start to a dossier in which practically all actions were taken jointly by the ministries of Foreign Affairs and Defence. In fact, the department of Defence made an official protest to their colleagues at Foreign Affairs because it was not informed of the letter until it had been sent to the Government. After all, the monitoring mission discussed in the letter was a joint responsibility of the ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence. Even though the operational leadership was in the hands of Foreign Affairs, the Defence Staff and the Directorate for General Affairs of the ministry of Defence were involved in the policy formation and Army staff took care of the execution of Defence's share of the mission.³⁷⁶

³⁶⁸ 'Ten geleide – Joegoslavië' (Introduction to Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 02/07/91.

³⁶⁹ Koen Koch, 'Repeterende mislukking' (String of failures), de Volkskrant, 03/07/91.

³⁷⁰ André Roelofs, 'Parlement Slovenië stemt in meerderheid voor akkoord Brioni' (Brioni Agreement ratified by majority vote in Slovenian Parliament), de Volkskrant, 11/07/91.

³⁷¹ Oscar Garschagen, 'CVSE moet eer aan EG laten in crisispreventie' (CSCE has to give way to EC when it comes to crisis prevention), de Volkskrant, 13/07/91.

³⁷² Theo Koelé, 'Bonn beschuldigt Belgrado van boosaardigheid' (Bonn accuses Belgrade of ill will), Trouw, 11/07/91.

³⁷³ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 11/07/91, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷⁴ 'Spoedoverleg Kamerleden over Joegoslavië' (Emergency debate on Yugoslavia in Dutch Parliament), NRC Handelsblad, 08/07/91; ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek. Memo's PS 1991, memorandum PS to DGPZ, 04/07/91, No. 115/91.

³⁷⁵ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 1.

³⁷⁶ DCBC, 247. Memo De Winter to Ter Beek, 11/07/91, D91/352.

Having to combine the tasks of minister of Foreign Affairs and chairman of the European Community was a mixed blessing for Van den Broek in the Dutch Parliament. On the one hand, MPs tended to be less critical of the minister during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC since they recognized that he had to mediate between the views of the various EC member states and was thus unable to keep strictly to the line that the Netherlands would have chosen on its own. For example, a report in NRC Handelsblad stated that an MP (not mentioned by name) asked during the first discussion of the Yugoslav question with Van den Broek what was left of Dutch foreign policy now that Van den Broek was acting as chairman of the EC during the crisis.³⁷⁷ On the other hand, the minister was under pressure from Parliament to make something good out of the chairmanship, since the Netherlands was in the international spotlight as well as Van den Broek. This in itself was sufficient reason for the Netherlands not to adopt a passive stance in the conflict. The Parliament stimulated Van den Broek to take an active approach.

The minister and the EC troika received all-party support during the debate.³⁷⁸ Eimert van Middelkoop from the Protestant GPV party (Gereformeerd Politiek Verbond) praised Van den Broek for ‘his active stance and above all for his political caution’, and added, ‘Messrs Genscher and Kohl could learn a lot from his example.’³⁷⁹ In general, the political parties wanted to support neither Serb dominance nor regional strivings for independence. They agreed with Van den Broek that the Helsinki Accords and the Charter of Paris should serve as their starting points. ‘That means’, the minister pointed out, ‘recognition of both the right of peoples to self-determination and the great benefits attached to the integrity of states. It is thus clear that some kind of appropriate compromise must be found between these two aims, in the sense that a unilateral choice for one of the options is unacceptable.’ The parties to a conflict involving these matters would have to reach an agreement that would be capable of recognition at international level.³⁸⁰ The European Community would have to try to reconcile the differing viewpoints of the various parties via a process of negotiation. It could attempt to stimulate the parties to reach agreement, or could offer support in the form of expertise e.g. with respect to constitutional, economic or financial questions. If however the parties did not wish to negotiate, there was not really a role for the EC to play in the process.³⁸¹ The perspectives in this latter case were extremely dark. Van den Broek went on to say, ‘Once again, I must stress that any result which is not the product of a negotiation process and real agreement can be nothing but a scenario for disaster! All such outcomes are prescriptions for civil war, without exception!’³⁸²

The spokesmen of the various fractions in Parliament agreed with the minister that the parties in Yugoslavia had to reach agreement about the future structure of their country. Ton de Kok of the Christian Democrat CDA said, ‘Any support for a unilateral declaration of independence will give rise to further escalation of the crisis. This does not only apply to Yugoslavia – in fact, we are afraid that it applies to the whole of Central and Eastern Europe.’³⁸³ Van Middelkoop (GPV) objected to ‘a premium on state-destroying nationalism. That is a cancerous growth on the countries in that part of the world, nationalism of a kind which we in the Netherlands can hardly imagine. If we want to maintain peace and stability in the world, we will have to oppose that sort of nationalism as much as ³⁷⁷ Rob Meines, ‘Minister v.d. Broek overlegt met Kamer over toestand Joegoslavië’ (Foreign Minister Van den Broek consults Parliament on situation in Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 12/07/91.

³⁷⁸ See also ‘Kamer: bij nieuw geweld troepen naar Joegoslavië’ (Parliament supports sending troops to Yugoslavia if new violence erupts) and Rob Meines, ‘Minister v.d. Broek overlegt met Kamer over toestand Joegoslavië’, NRC Handelsblad, 12/07/91; ‘VVD en Groenen: overweeg inzet leger in Joegoslavië’ (VVD (liberals) and Greens urge that consideration should be given to deployment of army in Yugoslavia), Trouw, 12/07/91; ‘Lof Tweede Kamer voor Van den Broek’ (Parliament praises Van den Broek), De Telegraaf, 12/07/91.

³⁷⁹ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 8.

³⁸⁰ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 15.

³⁸¹ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 17.

³⁸² TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 17.

³⁸³ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 3.

possible'.³⁸⁴ He went on to say, 'I can agree with the EC standpoint that we will have to start for the moment from the idea of territorial integrity for Yugoslavia. In this connection, I would like to underline the word "start" heavily. It is clear that Yugoslavia will never be what it once was – and that is a good thing. In any case, it means that everyone will have to learn to deal with one another in a different way.'³⁸⁵

Jan-Dirk Blaauw of the Liberal VVD was the only one during this debate to mention the problems in Bosnia-Herzegovina 'between the Serb minorities on the one hand and the Croat minorities on the other': 'According to the reports I have received, the Serb civilians in Bosnia-Herzegovina are however currently being transformed half-way into combatants by being called up as reservists and transported in military vehicles from Bosnia-Herzegovina to the Croatian border. Or is this all just propaganda?'

Blaauw wondered whether the Western nations were perhaps not doing enough. He suggested the possibility of putting the whole of Yugoslavia under the supervision of observers, and pointed out that in the past hostile groups had been separated by UN observers and peacekeeping forces. Maybe a similar construction might be possible in the present case, under the CSCE umbrella, though he did not think the CSCE was really 'ripe' for this. He went on to say:

'The use of other military organizations might perhaps create an undesirable impression. In this connection, I would like to offer what might be a rather wild suggestion. Might it not be a good idea, even now, to start to create a construction which would make it possible, if a request to that effect were ever made, for the Benelux countries, possibly in combination with the Scandinavian countries and Switzerland, to offer a little bit more than civilian good services? To supply, if necessary and if requested, military units to separate hostile groups so as to make combat impossible, and thus to prevent bloodshed rather than allowing it to spread, so that a more stable starting situation could be created for a Yugoslavia of the future in which the component parts could once again be allowed to go their own ways.'³⁸⁶

Wilbert Willems of Green Left also asked Van den Broek 'to consider, both internally and in an EC context, the possibility of further deployment of peacekeeping forces', even though he was not prepared to go as far in this direction as Blaauw.³⁸⁷

Maarten van Traa (PvdA) and Ton de Kok (CDA) made it perfectly clear, however, that they didn't think much of Blaauw's 'wild suggestion', which clearly could not be realized at that moment under a CSCE or UN umbrella. Nevertheless, Blaauw was not the only Member of Parliament to play with the idea that the Netherlands as a small power might be able to play a special role in relation to the conflict. Van Middelkoop (GPV) characterized it as 'quite a fortunate circumstance' that the Dutch were chairing the EC precisely at this time: 'If you want Europe to have a good foreign policy, you have to start by creating a sort of internal European balance of policies. Well, creating a balance of that kind is a role that the Netherlands is quite accustomed to play.'³⁸⁸ Van Middelkoop hoped that Van den Broek would not give in to Realpolitik: 'That makes justice subsidiary to all kinds of ambitions, which is not a good thing.'

³⁸⁴ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 8.

³⁸⁵ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 9.

³⁸⁶ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, pp. 6-7.

³⁸⁷ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 11.

³⁸⁸ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, No. 2, p. 8.

10. Division along ethnic boundaries?

After the signing of the Brioni Agreement, Van den Broek, Poos and De Michelis proposed to their EC colleagues on 10 July that the Community should go one step further by developing ideas about the material aspects of the negotiations that had been stipulated as part of the Brioni Agreement. De Michelis, who had left the troika in the meantime, was a strong supporter of the idea that the internal boundaries of Yugoslavia should not be changed. (He was doubtless influenced in taking up this stance by the situation in the Southern Tyrol, where voices had been raised in favour of secession from Italy in favour of some form of union with Austria.) He received warm support for this idea from Genscher.³⁸⁹ Director-General for Political Affairs Van Walsum, who was doing his homework at that moment in preparation for the formulation of the second phase of the EC intervention, does not appear to have been aware of these noises. The development of his ideas had by this time become strongly influenced by the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Peter Michielsen had already commented in the NRC Handelsblad of 5 July that acceptance of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia would have major consequences for Bosnia-Herzegovina. He had pointed out the unstable nature of the ethnic equilibrium in that republic and the hungry glances Croatia was casting at it from just across the border.³⁹⁰ The Financial Times reported on 10 July that Milosevic and Tudjman had been having talks about dividing up Bosnia-Herzegovina; this report was taken over in the Dutch press. The publication of this item was stimulated by the remark Tudjman had made on the television: 'If the Serb demand that all Serbs should live in a single state is realized, no one can deny the same right to the Croats.' Tudjman's advisor Mario Nobile explained later the same week that the Bosnian Muslims could be left with a mini-state of their own the size of Slovenia. This would be brought about by massive ethnic migrations leading to the creation of pure Croat and Serb areas in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which could then link up with their 'mother countries'.³⁹¹

The report in the Financial Times set Van Walsum thinking. The Netherlands would have to act fast as chair of the EC, and not just in reaction to the ambitions Croatia and Serbia apparently had with respect to Bosnia-Herzegovina. Van Walsum was also afraid that if the EC chairman did not come up with a solution soon, 'some other party' would. He therefore wrote a memo to Van den Broek on 11 July, in which he wrote that three things were in any case unthinkable. Firstly, that the constitutional structure of Yugoslavia would remain unchanged. Secondly, that Yugoslavia would split up peacefully into six republics with the same borders as the existing ones. And thirdly, that the borders of the republics could be changed by negotiation. In brief, there was no peaceful way out of the Yugoslav crisis: 'What we would like to do here is to square the circle.'³⁹² He submitted this memo on Friday 12 July to Van den Broek, who was attending a Government meeting at the time, with a request for comment.

Van Walsum did not offer a real solution to the problems he posed in his memo. In line with this, Van den Broek told Van Walsum in the course of the same afternoon that his memo was of limited use because it did not offer a policy choice. Van Walsum had in the meantime come to the conclusion that the ethnic question in Yugoslavia could not be solved exclusively by guarantees of the protection of minorities.³⁹³ He took the view that it was better to redraw the borders of the Yugoslav republics so as to give maximum ethnic homogeneity within each republic. When Van den Broek pointed out to his Director-General for Political Affairs the lack of a policy choice in his memo, Van ³⁸⁹ Libal, Limits, p. 22.

³⁹⁰ Peter Michielsen, 'Breuk Joegoslavische federatie maakt van Balkan weer kruitvat', NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

³⁹¹ Tim Judah, 'Creation of Islamic buffer state discussed in secret', The Times, 12/07/91; 'Serviërs en Kroaten in geheim grens-overleg' (Serbs and Croats in secret border negotiations), Trouw, 11/07/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Bosnië vreest ten onder te gaan aan kempende bureu' (Bosnia fears that conflict between neighbours will lead to its own downfall), Trouw, 15/07/91; André Roelofs, 'Kroatië bevestigt plan voor opdelen republiek Bosnië' (Croatia confirms plans for division of Bosnian republic), De Volkskrant, 13/07/91.

³⁹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03309. DGPZ to Van den Broek via Secretary-General, 11/07/91, No. 161/91.

³⁹³ Both, Indifference, p. 81.

Walsum replied (according to claims he made later) that his preference was for a redrawing of Yugoslavia's internal borders so as to give maximum ethnic homogeneity in each constituent part. The minister responded (again according to Van Walsum) that if the Director-General for Political Affairs modified the memo along these lines, he (the minister) would have no objection to the Director-General for Political Affairs sending it to capitals of the various EC member states as a COREU message.³⁹⁴

Good reasons could be given to back up Van Walsum's preference for modifying Yugoslavia's internal borders in such a way that each ethnic group could live in a state of its own. It is true that Jacques Delors, President of the European Commission from 1985 to 1994, and Jacques Santer, Prime Minister of Luxembourg, had told the Yugoslav leaders that they would have to find a solution to their constitutional problems 'within the existing internal and external borders'.³⁹⁵ And James Baker, the American Secretary of State, had during his dramatic visit to Belgrade on the eve of the declaration of independence by Croatia and Slovenia also called on the various parties involved to preserve the integrity of Yugoslavia, 'including the borders of the constituent republics'.³⁹⁶ The subsequent signing of the Brioni Agreement showed however that the EC had in principle accepted the independence of Croatia and Slovenia, and hence also the loss of Yugoslavia's external borders which had been guaranteed in the 1975 Helsinki Accords. Why then should the country's internal borders be sacrosanct? There was in a certain sense a historical argument to support this line of thought as regards the border between Croatia and Serbia. While this border was substantially the same as that between the Habsburg and Ottoman Empires, which had existed since the seventeenth century, the region of Vojna Krajina had been transferred to Croatia as late as 1881 after having had a special status in the preceding centuries.

The COREU message sent by Van Walsum on 13 July for comment to the capitals of all EC member states put into words the basic idea that according to the Netherlands as chair of the EC, 'the principle of self-determination (...) cannot exclusively apply to the existing republics while being deemed inapplicable to national minorities within those republics'. In other words, Yugoslavia could not be split up into six republics within their existing borders. The Netherlands therefore proposed that these borders should be redefined on a voluntary basis. The EC would never approve an agreement like that of Karadjordjevo, where Tadjman and Milosevic decided the fate of Bosnia-Herzegovina without the knowledge of the Federal government and without consulting the republic itself.³⁹⁷

If Van Walsum's idea were to be accepted, that would have consequences not only for e.g. Krajina, the Croatian region where many Serbs lived, but also in particular for Bosnia-Herzegovina, where none of the three main ethnic groups (the Bosnian Muslims, the Serbs and the Croats) formed a majority of the population. Van Walsum seems to have been aware of this. In any case, he said in an interview with Both on 20 August 1995, 'If Yugoslavia died of its ethnic divisions, it does not seem to be a very good idea to choose the option that would lead precisely to the creation of a new independent state (Bosnia-Herzegovina) that would be plagued by exactly the same ethnic divisions'.³⁹⁸ Another indication in the same direction is a note written by Van Walsum in late August 1991, where he stated that the time was not yet ripe for a discussion between Milosevic and Tadjman concerning the division of Bosnia-Herzegovina.³⁹⁹ In brief, while Van Walsum did not want a division of Bosnia imposed by

³⁹⁴ Van Walsum, Ontbinding, p. 80; idem, Nederland, p. 73; interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00; TCBU, Vertrekpunt (Starting point), III, deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, p. 10.

³⁹⁵ Cited in Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 239.

³⁹⁶ Ibid.

³⁹⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Joegoslavië: EU/EPS. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparation of Dutch contribution. Reports of meetings July-December 1991, COREU message Dutch chair of EC, 13/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 367.

³⁹⁸ Both, Indifference, p. 108; the original Dutch text of this quotation is from Both, 1999 edition, p. 193, note 21. See also Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 73; interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

³⁹⁹ Both, Indifference, p. 114.

Milosevic and Tudjman, he hoped that something along these lines might be possible in consultation with the Muslims.

Van den Broek had only seen the memo with the remark about squaring the circle – i.e. not the additional far-reaching suggestions about changing the borders. When questioned about this later, the minister could not remember ever having seen the draft COREU message⁴⁰⁰ or, if he had, he must have underestimated the scope of Van Walsum's suggestion.⁴⁰¹ In any case, the COREU message was sent on Saturday 13 July, signed by Van Walsum.

It led to almost unanimous rejection within the EC. France feared that the proposal, if carried out, would lead to massive displacement of people.⁴⁰² Spain did not want the EC to endanger its scope for mediation by adopting such a sharply defined stance.⁴⁰³ Only Copenhagen showed some sympathy for the idea.⁴⁰⁴ While Lord Owen would later praise Van Walsum for his idea, which the British mediator thought might have led to less bloodshed on Yugoslav soil if put into practice,⁴⁰⁵ it is understandable that the idea reigned in other European capitals that if the European Community were to give a signal to the world that they were in favour of creating state boundaries along ethnic lines, this would have the effect of opening a Pandora's box.⁴⁰⁶ And for some countries, such a box was not far away: 'The Italians thought of Southern Tyrol, the English of Northern Ireland, Scotland and perhaps even Wales; the French thought of Corsica and the Spanish of the Basque regions or Catalonia. The fear of creating the precedent of one successful secession far outweighed the feeling of common European responsibility.'⁴⁰⁷ In addition, various EC member states expected that changes in the existing borders would lead not only to massive displacement of people but also to violence. A 'free for all' situation would be created.⁴⁰⁸ And if the internal boundaries were up for discussion, the external ones might well follow. As soon as the Albanians of Kosovo and Macedonia had united, they would doubtless be wanting to join up with Albania. And would the Hungarians of Vojvodina not then opt for union with Hungary?⁴⁰⁹

Van Walsum's behaviour reflected a lack of coordination within the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs. Not only is it doubtful whether Van den Broek ever actually saw the text of the telegram suggesting the border changes, but in addition Van Walsum sent it without consulting the rest of the ministry.⁴¹⁰ This led to direct criticism of Van Walsum's COREU message, e.g. from his deputy Kröner.⁴¹¹ According to Van Walsum's own report, his close colleagues 'tore the telegram to shreds' when they finally became aware of its contents.⁴¹² Van Eenennaam thought that his own criticism was perhaps the fiercest. In his opinion, the pursuit of mono-ethnicity was morally reprehensible. He did not believe that the existence of a Greater Serbia alongside a radicalized Muslim state would contribute ⁴⁰⁰ Both, Indifference, pp. 107-108; interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99.

⁴⁰¹ Interview H. van Den Broek, 15/11/99.

⁴⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPS. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparation of Dutch contribution. Reports of meetings July-December 1991, COREU message to Paris, 17/07/91, cpe/par 335.

⁴⁰³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288 Yugoslavia: EU/EPS. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparation of Dutch contribution. Reports of meetings July-December 1991, COREU message to Madrid, 18/07/91, cpe/mad 306.

⁴⁰⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 108; see also ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. London to BZ, 05/11/92, 07:32, Hoekman 601.

⁴⁰⁵ Owen, Breakup, p. 38.

⁴⁰⁶ Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 73.

⁴⁰⁷ Translated from the German of J. Stein, cited in Heinz-Günther Stobbe, "Realpolitik" und dritter Balkankrieg. Thesen zum Versagen der europäischen Politik auf dem Balkan' (Realpolitik and the Third Balkan war. Theses concerning the failure of European policies in the Balkans), in: Bremmer (ed.), (Sch)erben, pp. 123.

⁴⁰⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. DEU; COREU messages concerning EPC standpoints on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, Van den Broek 74 to Dutch embassy Belgrade, 18/07/91.

⁴⁰⁹ Cf. ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Joegoslavië: EU/EPS. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparation of Dutch contribution. Reports of meetings July-December 1991, non-paper from the Dutch chair of the EC for the EC ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia, 30/07/91.

⁴¹⁰ See e.g. interview A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

⁴¹¹ Van Walsum, Ontbinding, p. 80; Both, Indifference, p. 108; interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

⁴¹² Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 73.

to the stability of the region. And finally, he was convinced that Van Walsum's proposal had no chance at all of acceptance by the Netherlands' EC partners.⁴¹³

The rest of the ministry staff seem thus to have been opposed to Van Walsum's telegram not only because they were against the idea of discussing the borders at all, but also because they took a positive stand in favour of multi-ethnicity.⁴¹⁴ The West chose multi-ethnic society as the model for the new republics which they hoped would rise out of the old Yugoslavia. This was a choice that, in Van Walsum's words, was 'forced' on Yugoslavia.⁴¹⁵

The discussion on this topic would flare up again in late 1997 and early 1998 in the coded messages passing between a number of staff members in Foreign Affairs, such as Vos, Biegan, Van Eenennaam, Van Walsum and Fietelaars, who had been closely associated with the course of events in July 1991. At the time, Van Walsum had rejected the criticism of his colleagues that the proposal he had made in his COREU message of 13 July 1991 was 'indefensible, irresponsible, unwise and impracticable'. He pointed out that the decision not to discuss the internal boundaries of Yugoslavia had led to the creation of the sovereign state of Bosnia-Herzegovina - a development that he regarded as highly questionable. He was hurt by the allegation from inside the ministry that the drawing of boundaries around ethnically homogeneous regions was 'morally indefensible':

'It goes without saying that it is better to maintain multi-ethnic structures under all circumstances – but then that would have applied to Yugoslavia too. It is curious that everyone realized that Europe did not have the power to save Yugoslavia, while it was assumed unhesitatingly that we could keep Bosnia-Herzegovina together or that the problem would not arise at that level.'⁴¹⁶

Van Walsum was prepared to admit in 1998 that dividing up Yugoslavia along ethnic lines was not an ideal solution, 'but I find it difficult to see why it should be morally more indefensible than the course actually chosen by the Twelve, which cost the lives of at least 150,000 people.'⁴¹⁷ Even later than that, Van Walsum would stick to his opinion that the EC had been too quick to assume that multi-ethnicity was the best solution for the new states arising out of the old Yugoslavia.⁴¹⁸

It is questionable whether Van Walsum's standpoint would have met with any warmer welcome in the Netherlands than it did in the rest of the EC, in view of the marked antipathy to any form of ethnic division manifested in Dutch politics. As Wim Kok, who was vice-premier at the time, put it later:

'(...) at the moment when lines of ethnic division start to determine the way majority and minority groups deal with one another and to influence the balance of power, that is when you rebel. As I mentioned, we are talking about the early 'nineties, during the Dutch chairmanship of the Union (the European Community), and this issue did raise its head in quite a marked form then. My feeling at the time was that as a human being, as a citizen, you rebel as it were ⁴¹³ Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

⁴¹⁴ In a later telegram of 6 July 1995, Engels compared the "Realpolitik" approach of "ethnic compactness" with the more 'principled' approach of the 'pluri-ethnic society' as possible ways of handling the question of the former Yugoslavia; see DCBC, 630. Engels 78 to Foreign Affairs, 06/07/95.

⁴¹⁵ Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 76.

⁴¹⁶ ABZ, BZ 109. Van Walsum 33 to Van Mierlo, 26/01/98. See also TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, p. 10.

⁴¹⁷ Ibid. Cf. Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 78 and idem, Ontbinding, p. 82.

⁴¹⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, pp. 9-10.

against something that according to your standards is impermissible, impossible, just can't be allowed to happen .⁴¹⁹

The clear rejection, both in the Netherlands and abroad, of Van Walsum's proposal to modify Yugoslavia's internal boundaries had two consequences. Firstly, any solution to the problems of Yugoslavia would now have to contain a clear guarantee of minority rights. And secondly, the West would have to consider how it was going to respond to movement of Serb and Federal Yugoslav forces across internal boundaries and to attempts to change these boundaries.

One of the reasons why the German government had not been able to agree with Van Walsum's idea was that the German rejection of the behaviour of the JNA was based precisely on the violation of the existing boundaries of the republics.⁴²⁰ After these boundaries had more or less been declared 'sacrosanct' by the EC responses to Van Walsum's COREU message, the question of whether the JNA's military aggression (which had by definition already taken place) should be halted by military means became much more pressing. Just a few weeks after the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia, the top officials in the Dutch department of Foreign Affairs concluded that political and diplomatic initiatives concerning Yugoslavia should receive military backing.⁴²¹

This shift of stress towards military intervention led automatically to an increase in the importance of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs within Foreign Affairs at the expense of the regional expertise to be found within the Eastern Europe office of DEU.⁴²² Although the idea of military action repeatedly resurfaced among Dutch politicians and civil servants during the subsequent period, it remained no more than an idea because The Hague realized that going further along this road would damage the consensus within the EC. Moreover, The Hague was not in favour of involving the WEU in this matter, and while it would have been in favour of NATO involvement it knew that no support for this idea could be expected from Washington.⁴²³

On the morning of 17 July, Foreign Affairs heard from Washington that the American government would be prepared to support a change in Yugoslavia's internal boundaries, if the parties concerned in Yugoslavia agreed with this proposal. The Dutch ambassador Meesman reported that he had heard from sources within the US National Security Council that this body was even of the opinion that a 'Serboslovenia' with an independent Slovenia and an independent Croatia that had given up part of its territory to the Serbs 'might ultimately be the best achievable solution under the circumstances.'⁴²⁴

It is doubtful however whether Van Walsum's COREU message would have met with more understanding if it had been discussed with Washington beforehand. Officials at the State Department were exceedingly unhappy with his assumption that the outside world would simply have to accept the disintegration of Yugoslavia. Van Walsum would hear repeatedly in the future from the Americans, in particular from Gewecke, the second-in-command at the American embassy in The Hague, how unhappy they had been with his suggestion.⁴²⁵

⁴¹⁹ Interview Wim Kok, 08/05/00.

⁴²⁰ Both, Indifference, p. 108.

⁴²¹ Both, Indifference, p. 109.

⁴²² Both, Indifference, p. 109.

⁴²³ Both, Indifference, pp. 110-111.

⁴²⁴ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief, Stg. Geheime Codes. Meesman 711 to Van den Broek, 16/07/91.

⁴²⁵ Interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

Chapter 2

The war in Croatia and the western reaction

1. Consequences of the war in Slovenia for the subsequent course of the Yugoslavian conflict

Although brief, the war in Slovenia had a number of major consequences and, by opting for independence, the Slovenians also bore a significant responsibility.⁴²⁶

In the first place, the war marked the start of a far more serious conflict that was to last for years between the JNA and (at a later stage) Serbian forces on the one hand, and republics attempting to assert their independence on the other. After the actual departure of Slovenia from the Yugoslavian federation it was even less attractive for the other republics to remain as members together with Serbia and Montenegro. The ease with which Milosevic said goodbye to Slovenia can be attributed not only to the limited number of Serbs in the area, but also to his expectation that it would make it all the easier for him to settle the score with the remaining republics. After the JNA's departure, Slovenia indeed lost nearly all interest in the further negotiations about Yugoslavia.⁴²⁷ There was also no longer much point in the three-month moratorium on the declaration of independence that was agreed in Brioni. The EC could even have recognized the separate independence of Slovenia except that this would have meant abandoning a continuation of Yugoslavia, even as relatively loosely linked nations, as early as July 1991. And the EC was not ready for this at that time. It was a position that was to generate negative publicity in Slovenia, especially for the Dutch presidency of the EC. The word there was that they had already freed themselves of the Serbs and all that remained was to get rid of the Dutch.⁴²⁸

Secondly, Slovenian and Croatian officers left the JNA, voluntarily or otherwise, so that the Yugoslavian people's army steadily became more purely Serbian.⁴²⁹ It became increasingly common for soldiers to have an emblem with the four Cyrillic S-es, which stand for Samo Sloga Srbina Spasava (only unity will save Serbia) sown onto their uniforms rather than a red star.⁴³⁰ Finally, on 23 October 1991 the Yugoslavian people's army, the JNA, would be renamed the Yugoslavian Armed Forces, the Vojska Jugoslavije (VJ). The JNA top helped the Serbification of the armed forces because, as the Yugoslavian Minister of Defence Kadijevic was later to write, they communicated with the presidium (in other words the high command) on two levels. Some of the plans were submitted to the complete presidium, and some to 'those members who worked for Yugoslavia'.⁴³¹

Thirdly, the JNA was totally surprised by 'the scope, forms and scale of the hatred' displayed by the Slovenians towards them during the short war.⁴³²

And a final consequence of the war in Slovenia was that other republics aspiring to independence were able to learn from the international PR success of the authorities in Ljubljana. The trick was to shed light on the brutality of the Serbs with the intention of provoking an international reaction. For instance, an instruction was issued by Croatian Radio and Television management that military defeats were not to be hushed up in war reports, but that the overwhelmingly superior strength of the Serbian enemy and its 'unscrupulous brutality' were to be stressed in such cases.⁴³³ Croatian authorities resorted to a deliberate Verelendung of its own population by provoking enemy fire and ⁴²⁶ Cf. Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 7; idem, Origins, p. 146.

⁴²⁷ Libal, Limits, p. 24.

⁴²⁸ Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 402.

⁴²⁹ Cf. Owen, Breakup, p. 37.

⁴³⁰ Van Cleef, World, p. 42.

⁴³¹ Kadijevic, Vien, p. 128, n. 7.

⁴³² Kadijevic, Vien, p. 133.

⁴³³ Reported in: Simic, 'Yugoslavia', p. 45.

exaggerating the damage caused.⁴³⁴ Furthermore, the party that was to engage in combat with the Serbs in each subsequent conflict found it easier to portray them as aggressors. The Croatian government was able to take advantage of the fact that the Serbs had drawn the joker from the pack in the short Slovenian war. In turn, the government in Sarajevo then again made use of the effect achieved by the Croatian media campaigns. If the governments in the West did not immediately react as they were supposed to, it might still be possible to cause them to do so through public opinion. An 'advantage' for Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, which were to follow in Slovenia's footsteps, was that the Serbian forces and their helpers hardly made it difficult for them. The Serbian side consistently responded with overwhelming fire power to suspected or real aggression from the Croatian side, which was a phenomenon that was to be seen again later in Bosnia: 'Small arms would be answered by mortars, and machine guns by shellfire.'⁴³⁵

2. The action of the JNA in Croatia

For a clear understanding of the conflict that developed in July and August 1991 in Croatia, it is necessary to refer to the problems that the JNA had in manning its units.

The greatest surprise for the federal army command during the JNA's 'ten-day campaign' in Slovenia was the exodus of soldiers and the poor level of enlistment.⁴³⁶ At the time of the declaration of independence, the federal army already had a reputation among the Croats for being completely partisan. While the JNA had disarmed Croatian territorial defence units, Kadijevic took it for granted that the territorial defence in the Serbian areas in Croatia and Bosnia collaborated with the JNA.⁴³⁷ Soldiers from Croatia and Slovenia had also deserted en masse. A significant number of the deserters had found their way to the Croatian National Guard, which had developed from the territorial defence prior to the foundation of the Croatian state. Although the Guard was to engage in combat with the JNA and the Serbian irregular units, it was not originally an army in the true sense of the word. Initially, the nature of the Guard was that of a robust domestic police force, whose purpose was to deal with the Serbian 'rebels' in Krajina and Slavonia. As the conflict progressed it developed into a true Croatian Army, Hrvatska Vojska (HV).

In each case the objective of the JNA's deployment in Croatia was to protect the areas there that were labelled as Serbian, which roughly speaking constituted the area to the east of the line Karlobag-Karlovac-Virovitica (see map in this section). However, these areas were not ethnically homogeneous. Out of a total of approximately six-hundred thousand Serbs in Croatia, approximately 200,000 lived in Zagreb. The overwhelming majority of the rest lived in Krajina and Slavonia: 316,000. As mentioned above, the Serbs had declared the autonomy of Krajina as early as August 1990 following a referendum. On 25 June, the day Croatia proclaimed its independence, Serbian representatives took the decision also to create an autonomous region of Slavonia, Baranja and West Srem. The Serbs constituted three quarters of the population in Krajina around Knin; in Banija, Kordun and East Lika approximately seventy per cent; in West Slavonia 50 per cent, but in East Slavonia only 35 per cent (see map in this section). In East Slavonia the Serbs were in the majority only in the town of Pakrac. The formation of a 'pure' Serbian area therefore required the non-Serbian part of the population to 'disappear' from Krajina and Slavonia. At the same time, the Croatian Volunteer Guard and the Croatian police also attempted to assert their authority on this part of Croatian territory. In July and August 1991 the skirmishes that had already been taking place in the region for a year degenerated into outright war.

⁴³⁴ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan' ('Lessons from the Balkan War'), Van Es & Samiemon & Starink (eds.), Redacteuren, p. 213.

⁴³⁵ Bell, Way, p. 108.

⁴³⁶ Kadijevic, Viem, pp. 133-134.

⁴³⁷ Kadijevic, Viem, p. 99.

The JNA's ambitions, however, went beyond the 'Serbian' areas in Croatia alone. Kadijevic may well have solemnly declared to Milosevic and Jovic on 30 July that the JNA was now transforming itself into a Serbian army,⁴³⁸ but this arch waverer at the top of the JNA almost never failed to backtrack on a decision.⁴³⁹ For all his embrace of Milosevic's Greater-Serbian ideas, the general was unable to put all thought of Yugoslavia out of his mind. The federal army therefore developed a second plan that would enter into force as soon as Croatian troops directly attacked the JNA. If the situation allowed it, the Croatian armed forces were to be completely defeated in that case.⁴⁴⁰ It was therefore necessary to develop the JNA within Croatia in Krajina and Slavonia as well as in the (as yet) undisputed parts of the republic.⁴⁴¹ In the meantime, the JNA had to maintain the appearance of impartiality that was appropriate to the ideology of the guardian of Yugoslavian unity. The federal army must not be open to being branded as a Greater-Serbian conquering force, but must appear to be a neutral arbitrator between the Croats and Serbs. In name the army had to remain Yugoslavian.⁴⁴² Milosevic and compatriots were aware that the moment it could be labelled a Serbian-Montenegrin army they would lose significant benefits.⁴⁴³ Whereas, behind the scenes, Milosevic gave orders to draw up lists of names of generals and colonels who clung too much to Yugoslavia, he constantly resisted great pressure, for example, from the Serbian Ministry of Defence, from the side of Kadijevic, from Serbian volunteers, or from the Serbian opposition, to create an openly Serbian or Serbian-Montenegrin army.⁴⁴⁴

During the war in Croatia, Milosevic therefore also adopted the position that Serbia was not involved. Only in February 1992, after the hostilities had ceased, did he admit that his regime had helped the Serbs in Croatia, 'at first economically and politically, (...) but eventually, when this proved inadequate, with arms'.⁴⁴⁵ The JNA therefore initially had to limit itself to supporting the Serbian militias in Croatia and to tactically important counterattacks on the Croatian armed forces. As soon as the Croatian army attacked across a broad front, the JNA would begin a wholesale counterattack, according to the plan known as Bedem II.⁴⁴⁶ In that second phase the JNA was to double its deployment

⁴³⁸ Jovic, Dani, p. 366.

⁴³⁹ Jovic, Dani, passim; Mamula, Slučaj, p. 154.

⁴⁴⁰ Kadijevic, View, p. 145; Norma Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 201-202.

⁴⁴¹ Kadijevic, View, pp. 136-137.

⁴⁴² Cf. Krizan, Nationalism, p. 77; Kadijevic, View, p. 136; Libal, Limits, p. 25.

⁴⁴³ Statements by Mihailo Markovic in late August and by Jovic in late September, cited in Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 176-177.

⁴⁴⁴ Jovic, Dani, pp. 349 and 389; Gajic Glisic, Vojska, pp. 28, 41, 80, 84, 85, 90 and 92.

⁴⁴⁵ Cited in Norma Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War', 1991, in: Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 65.

⁴⁴⁶ Bedem means Stronghold. As early as 7 August, the Slovenian Minister of Defence Janez Jansa made public the plan, which had shortly before fallen into Slovenian hands, 'Slovene Defence and Interior Ministers on Alleged JNA Plots', press conference in Ljubljana, 07/08/91, 13:30, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 09/08/91. Bedem I was concerned with the withdrawal of the JNA from Slovenia after the defeat, see 'Kucan and Jansa on advantages and problems of JNA withdrawal from Slovenia', press conference in Ljubljana, 19/07/91, 13:30, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 22/07/91. That plan was with fifteen to eighteen army brigades.⁴⁴⁷ So what they were waiting for was Croatian manoeuvres that could be construed as large-scale aggression against the JNA.

This took some considerable time. Slovenia had thoroughly prepared for its independence and the military response that may follow. But the Croatian president continued for a long time to hope that Kadijevic would not attack his republic, possibly from an outdated idea that a JNA general would not do such a thing⁴⁴⁸ as long as Zagreb indicated that it was still aiming for a form of accommodation. Tudjman also believed he could derive security from his agreements with Milosevic on a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Tudjman furthermore continued to express the view that for international support the other party had to deal the first major blow. He was fairly optimistic that the West would intervene on Croatia's behalf when it came under attack. When the American ambassador Zimmermann advised Tudjman in August 1991 not to rely on American intervention, Tudjman answered unperturbed that he perhaps knew more about the United States than the American diplomat.⁴⁴⁹ He therefore brushed aside proposals from his military advisers for many preparations and a more offensive strategy.⁴⁵⁰ There was another reason for Tudjman not to rush into a defensive war as the Slovenians had done. He had a great interest in the area in Bosnia that was largely inhabited by Croats and therefore had nothing to gain from an immediate complete withdrawal from Yugoslavia.

The reserve of the Croatian armed forces initially gave the JNA no excuse for large-scale action and it could do little more than 'protect' the 'Serbian areas' in Croatia. In those early days it was particularly the local militias, about twelve thousand men in total under the leadership of the Minister of the Interior of Krajina, the former policeman Milan Martić, who took action and so enlarged the Serbian area in Croatia. The JNA were always on hand to help if they got into difficulties. Then the federal army would separate 'the combatants'. It led to limited skirmishes. This is how on 27 June the federal army came to use thirty tanks to seal the town of Glina (sixty kilometres south of Zagreb) from the outside world, which coincided with the JNA actions in Slovenia, following a lengthy exchange of fire around the police station between Serbian citizens and a special Croatian army unit. In the weekend of 6 and 7 July, while the EC were meeting with the Yugoslavian leaders on Brioni, at least fifteen people died in a skirmish in the village of Tenja near Osijek, including ten Croatian Guards and policemen.⁴⁵¹

The occasional engagements intensified the war rhetoric. On Monday 8 July, Milosevic attended a Serbian territorial troop manoeuvre in the border area of Serbia and Croatia. He took the opportunity to urge the Serbian population to prepare themselves morally for war. In a television broadcast that same evening, Tudjman said that the Croatian government could no longer stand by and watch while 'Greater-Serbian terrorists' walked around with impunity on Croatian soil. He repeated that Croatia would yield not one centimetre of territory and demanded the complete withdrawal of the JNA.

Starting on 12 July, the JNA mobilized reservists and dispatched units to Croatia. On 17 July, on the eve of the announcement of the withdrawal of the JNA from Slovenia, Tudjman announced the formation of a nine-member crisis staff, a sort of war cabinet, that was to lead Croatia 'now that the safety of the republic is in danger'. Josip Manolić resigned as prime minister of Croatia to lead the crisis staff. The decision was taken after the Croatian authorities had received information that the JNA was to transfer to Croatia one armoured division from Vojvodina and two from Bosnia. According to the again preceded by Bedem-91, the plan for the attack on Slovenia, Christopher Bellamy, 'Yugoslavia in Crisis: Federal troops have "secret plan"', The Independent, 04/07/91.

⁴⁴⁷ Kadijevic, View, p. 145.

⁴⁴⁸ Libal, Limits, pp. 38 and 50; Zimmerman, Origins, p. 153.

⁴⁴⁹ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 154.

⁴⁵⁰ Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', in: Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 64; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Kroaten ontspannen maar alert' ('Croats relaxed but alert'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/07/91; Silber & Little, Death, pp. 169-170; Tanner, Croatia, pp. 249-251; Zimmerman, Origins, p. 151.

⁴⁵¹ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Spanning tussen Kroatië en Servië loopt op' ('Tensions mount between Croatia and Serbia'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/07/91.

authorities in Zagreb that would lead to 'total war'.⁴⁵² At that time, six thousand Croats mainly from Serb inhabited areas in Croatia, and thirteen thousand Serbs from predominantly Croatian areas, had already fled.⁴⁵³

On 19 July, Vinkovci in East Slavonia became the first Croatian town to be attacked by Serbian regular units, who went in with rocket launchers. In the days that followed, the conflict between Croats and Serbs erupted in all ferocity.⁴⁵⁴ On 22 July rail traffic between Belgrade and Zagreb, which ran close to the scene of battle, was suspended, and twenty people were killed in engagements in East Slavonia. On that day Tudjman made a television address to all Croats to call them to prepare for a general war.⁴⁵⁵ The fierce fighting in and around Vinkovci caused the Croatian president to return with all haste from a meeting with the other presidents in Ohrid, where they were to discuss the political future of Yugoslavia and, according to the Macedonian president Tupurkovski, were only a quarter of an hour away from an agreement at that time.⁴⁵⁶ Furthermore Milosevic was not willing to agree to Tudjman's condition that the JNA should withdraw to their barracks. If Serbia were to do so, 'we would now have total civil war', according to the Serbian member of the presidium Borisav Jovic, 'and we would be up to our knees in blood'.⁴⁵⁷ Later that same day the Croatian National Guard went over to offensive actions in the Lika region, in which, according to their own account, they 'liquidated at least sixty terrorists'.⁴⁵⁸

At the end of July, Croats started to erect barricades in such places as Virovitica, Krizevci and Bjelovar (see map in this section), in response to which Kadijevic announced the second plan.⁴⁵⁹ Some of the most important elements of this second plan were as follows: a total air and sea blockade of Croatia and effective coordination between the Serbian armed forces in the Croatian-Serb areas and the JNA garrisons in the rest of Croatia. Croatia was to be transected by four JNA axes: Gradiska-Virovitica; Bihac-Karlovac-Zagreb; Knin-Zadar; and Mostar-Split. The strongest wave of attack was to free East Slavonia and then pull west, aiming to link up with armed forces in West Slavonia and subsequently to advance on Zagreb and Varazdin, in other words to the border between Croatia and Slovenia. At the same time, an attack was to be launched from Herceg Novi and Trebinje in Bosnia, which was to lead to a blockade of Dubrovnik, and link up with the troops that were active on the Mostar-Split axis.

Until early September the JNA operation went largely according to plan. At the end of July fighting broke out on a large scale between Croats and Serbs, and the death toll rose from a few casualties to dozens each day.⁴⁶⁰ There had been fighting on 28 July around Vukovar. Three days later, Osijek, the largest town in East Slavonia, was attacked with mortars. Both Serbs and Croats started to flee the combat zones. The bloodiest battle so far took place on 1 August in Dalj, a small town with 7500 Croatian residents, which was harassed for hours with tanks, mortars, bazookas, shells and machine guns. Serbian tanks and paramilitaries were said to be responsible for the deaths of seven Serbs and 84 Croats. Afterwards nearly all the houses showed signs of impact. Journalists encountered

⁴⁵² Theo Engelen, 'Toezegging army: geen aanvalsplan tegen Kroatië' ('Army pledge: no attack plan against Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 18/07/91.

⁴⁵³ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 49.

⁴⁵⁴ 'Bij strijd in Kroatië minstens 12 doden' ('At least 12 die in fighting in Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 22/07/91.

⁴⁵⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Kroatië bereidt zich voor op oorlog' ('Croatia prepares for war') and 'Oorlog lijkt onvermijdelijk en wordt 'totaal', zegt Tudjman' ('War seems inevitable and will be "total", says Tudjman'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/91; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Tudjman roept Kroaten op zich voor te bereiden op oorlog' ('Tudjman calls on Croats to prepare for war'), de Volkskrant, 23/07/91.

⁴⁵⁶ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 153.

⁴⁵⁷ 'Verwijten over en weer; opnieuw onlusten in Kroatië' ('Mutual reproaches; more unrest in Croatia'), Trouw, 24/07/91.

⁴⁵⁸ 'Kroatië zegt zestig "Servische terroristen" te hebben "geliquideerd"' ('Croatia claims "liquidation" of 60 "Serbian terrorists"'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/07/91.

⁴⁵⁹ Kadijevic, View, pp. 139 and 146; Mamula, Shucaj, p. 220.

⁴⁶⁰ See e.g. Blaine Harden, '30 Reported Dead in Croatia After Night of Battles', The Washington Post, 28/07/91.

a veritable bloodbath in the local school gym.⁴⁶¹ The Yugoslavian Red Cross claimed that on 27 July alone 54,000 people fled the centres of combat in Croatia.⁴⁶²

The JNA offensive intensified in mid August. In the second half of August, the JNA began a siege of the strategically situated town of Vukovar. Vukovar was a town on the Danube with 45,000 residents, where Serbs made up 37.4 per cent of the population. It was Croatia's advance stronghold. Built on the bed of the dried-up Pannonian Sea, the town was an easy target for JNA artillery and air bombardments. The town was to be defended for three months, mainly by a local militia consisting of a couple of thousand men, against the superior strength of the JNA and paramilitaries, who at one point had 35 to 40,000 men. The longer the resistance persisted, the more the town became the focus of a battle of prestige between Serbs and Croats. The JNA bombarded the town with five thousand shells daily. In early October the chief of the local military police of the mechanized guard, Major Veselin Slijivancanin, was already making no secret of the fact that the town would be razed to the ground if the Croats were to continue to defend it.⁴⁶³ This promise was fulfilled at the end of a three-month-long siege.

According to a general who was involved, the order for the heavy shelling of Vukovar came 'from Dedinje itself', in reference to the Belgrade residential area where Milosevic lived.⁴⁶⁴ In September 1991, the Serbian weekly Vreme also printed a transcript of a telephone conversation between Milosevic and the Bosnian-Serb leader Radovan Karadzic, which had been passed to them by the Bosnian police. In it, Milosevic said that Vukovar had not been bombarded on that day because a meeting of the EC was taking place.⁴⁶⁵ Vukovar was also where the activities of the paramilitary groups, especially the troops of Arkan and Vojislav Seselj, first became apparent to the outside world on a large scale.

The fighting spread to West Slavonia on 16 August. Three days later the centre of Osijek was heavily shelled. In the weekend of 24 and 25 August the JNA occupied Baranja, the fertile region to the north of Osijek. The Serbs there constituted only 25 per cent of the population, as opposed to 44% Croats.⁴⁶⁶ The army drove the Croatian and Hungarian population out and handed the region over to the Serbian Autonomous Province of Slavonia, Baranja and West Srem.

The collaboration between the JNA and paramilitaries again became abundantly clear on the following day, 26 August, when, first of all, the artillery of the recently appointed JNA Chief of Staff in Knin, general Ratko Mladic, attacked the village of Kijevo. The shelling of this completely Croatian community of approximately one thousand villagers in an otherwise predominantly Serbian area lasted for twelve hours, after which almost no stone was left standing. After this, Milan Martić's paramilitaries entered the village. Any survivors fled.

After the fall of Kijevo, Tudjman was no longer able to deter his government from war. On the day that Kijevo was cleansed, the cabinet in Zagreb announced a general mobilization and called for a 'war of liberation'. The government in Zagreb delivered an ultimatum that the federal army must be out of Croatian territory before 31 August.

Until then, there was little sign in the capital city Zagreb itself of the war on Croatian territory. The war appeared to be far away, merely a media spectacle. Early September, however, saw the start of a real war psychosis caused by reports of possible attacks on the capital city. All important buildings were protected with barriers of sandbags, and roadblocks with armoured vehicles were put in place by bridges. A night-time blackout was ordered, and the air-raid sirens regularly went off, after which the population had to go to the air-raid shelters.

⁴⁶¹ 'Serviërs en Kroaten richten bloedbad aan in school Dalj' ('Serbs and Croats cause bloodbath at Dalj school'), de Volkskrant, 05/08/91.

⁴⁶² Theo Engelen, 'Bestand in Kroatië geëist' ('Ceasefire demand in Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/07/91.

⁴⁶³ Milan Dragovic, 'Serbian-controlled presidency decrees "partial mobilization"', Agence France Presse, 04/10/91. See also Nicole Lucas, 'Om half twee klinkt het eerste schot' ('At 1.30 the first shot rings out'), Trouw, 10/10/91.

⁴⁶⁴ Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, IV.A.

⁴⁶⁵ Tanner, Croatia, pp. 241, 256 and 317 n. 1; Almond, War, p. 221.

⁴⁶⁶ Tanner, Croatia, p. 255.

On 7 September the authorities in Zagreb decided to blockade the oil pipeline that ran through their territory on its way to Serbia. On 13 September JNA barracks were put under siege throughout Croatia, which until then had received water, food and energy from the Croatian authorities. From this moment, the war, which until then had been restricted mainly to East Croatia, expanded as far as the Adriatic coast. Milan Martić had already announced in August 1991 that the Croatian Serbs wanted Zadar, because they needed a port.⁴⁶⁷ The attack on Zadar was to have a great impact on relations in a European context between Germany and the Netherlands, as will be explained below.

Morale problems in the JNA

First, consideration will be given to the consequences of the firmer attitude of the Croatian authorities to the JNA offensive. This harder line made the JNA command aware of the difficulty of simultaneously protecting the 'Serbian areas' in Croatia and their own units in the rest of Croatia.⁴⁶⁸ The problem was not so much the resistance from the Croats, which was modest, as the limited success of the mobilization and the large-scale desertion of reservists.⁴⁶⁹

The JNA soldiers, in cooperation with the population, had been in preparation for military action for many years. Now that the JNA had come into action, it was being deployed against the population. It had already become clear in Slovenia that fighting against those who (until recently) had been considered fellow countrymen had a serious impact on morale, including among conscript JNA soldiers from other republics.⁴⁷⁰ In Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croat and Muslim enthusiasm for the JNA declined rapidly. On 26 July the Bosnian government ceased to dispatch new recruits to the JNA. Shortly afterwards, the Macedonian leaders also stated that it was no longer prepared to allow conscripts to operate outside its own territory. When, nevertheless, two thousand Macedonian soldiers were deployed in Croatia, the authorities in Skopje allowed the conscription lists to go missing.

In September the JNA had already shrunk from 160,000 to 70,000 soldiers.⁴⁷¹ Not only did soldiers from other republics desert or fail to present themselves, but the conscripts' enthusiasm for the army also proved particularly subdued in Serbia itself.⁴⁷² A problem that the Yugoslavian army had in calling up conscripts was that throughout the period described here Milošević persisted in the pretence that Serbia was not in a state of war, because he knew that the Serbian population had no enthusiasm for the war. Furthermore, the kit necessary for a complete mobilization was not available. Above all, important military production centres were still in the republics that had declared themselves independent.⁴⁷³

Therefore there was no declaration of war by Serbia and neither was there a mobilization. There was considerable desertion even among conscripted Serbs in the Serbian regions of Croatia. It is estimated that between thirty and sixty thousand of them fled to Serbia to avoid serving at the front, which prompted the then Serbian Minister of Defence, General Marko Negovanović, to remark bitterly that he could not protect the Croatian Serbs against genocide if they did not want to defend themselves.⁴⁷⁴ The fleeing of Croatian Serbs to avoid their military service also led to irritation among ⁴⁶⁷ Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 114.

⁴⁶⁸ Kadijević, Vieć, p. 140.

⁴⁶⁹ Kadijević, Vieć, pp. 140 and 179; Jović, Dani, p. 385.

⁴⁷⁰ See also David Binder, 'Ethnic Conflict in Yugoslavia Tearing Apart Its Army, Too', The New York Times, 01/10/91.

⁴⁷¹ Libal, Limits, p. 50; Wijnandts, Kroniek, p. 88.

⁴⁷² See e.g. Blaine Harden, 'Thousands of Serbs Evade Call-Ups; Young Men Hide From Military Service in Yugoslav Crisis', The Washington Post, 25/07/91. For a comprehensive overview of the problems surrounding the mobilization, desertion and mutiny of Serbian soldiers see Ofelija Backović/Milos Vasić/Aleksandar Vasić, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 329-345.

⁴⁷³ Cf. David Binder, 'Ethnic Conflict in Yugoslavia Tearing Apart Its Army, Too', The New York Times, 01/10/91; Gajić Glisic, Vojška, pp. 16, 21, 23, 65, 72-73 and 86; Jović, Dani, p. 401.

⁴⁷⁴ Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 71.

Serbs who had served at the front, some of whom saw their jobs in Serbia being taken by Serbs from Croatia.⁴⁷⁵

According to Kadijevec, the JNA could count only on units made up largely of reservists.⁴⁷⁶ Under Yugoslavian law, however, reservists could be kept in the army only for a limited period in peacetime. When nevertheless the reservists of Serbia and Montenegro were mobilized in the autumn of 1991, across Serbia only thirty per cent of the recipients responded to the call-up order, and in Belgrade and Vojvodina as few as ten per cent or less did so. Forty per cent reported from Montenegro.⁴⁷⁷ Between one hundred and two hundred thousand young people failed to respond to the call-up; approximately forty thousand Serbian soldiers left the front. The reservists who did report frequently complained about their kit, the quality of the food and the capability of their superiors.⁴⁷⁸ A large number of soldiers died at the start of the war in Croatia because, for example, there were not enough helmets.⁴⁷⁹ The competence of the officers continued to deteriorate as a result of the ethnic exodus, which turned the JNA increasingly into an army of only Serbs and Montenegrins. Unrest about the command contributed to new desertion.⁴⁸⁰ A considerable problem for morale was that many reservists that were called up did not know what objective they were fighting for. If Greater Serbia was mentioned as an objective, there appeared to be scant enthusiasm to risk their lives for it.⁴⁸¹ If the preservation of Yugoslavia was mentioned as an objective, it would not sound credible in view of the widespread criticism expressed by Serbian nationalists about Yugoslavia.⁴⁸² However, some of the deserters, who considered that the volunteers were better off than the regular JNA, crossed over complete with arms to the paramilitary units, where, furthermore, objective and status were clearer than those of the JNA.⁴⁸³

It was repeatedly necessary to goad the troops into action by having their own troops fire on them from behind.⁴⁸⁴ A case in point regarding the morale problem is the account of General Slavko Lisica, commander of the Dalmatian front, who admitted ordering his artillery to fire on his own people for this reason. He recounted how he had once tried to deal with the situation more subtly. He tried to appeal to his men's sense of honour and shame by giving them a pep talk. He ordered everyone who did not wish to defend 'the glory of the Serbian nation' to put down their arms and to remove their uniform. When everyone did just that, Lisica demanded that the soldiers also remove their underpants. Everyone did that too, after which the soldiers marched away naked. Lisica hoped that the unit would change their minds, but the following day the men appeared to have found not only clothes, but also a gun, which they used to shell Lisica's headquarters.⁴⁸⁵ Officers in Slavonia complained that they had to sleep with their pistols in their hands out of fear of mutinous men.⁴⁸⁶

In another incident, at the Vukovar front, a commander asked a group of recruits who was prepared to fight and who wanted to return home. The group then divided up, but one recruit grabbed ⁴⁷⁵ David Binder, 'Ethnic Conflict in Yugoslavia Tearing Apart Its Army, Too', The New York Times, 01/10/91.

⁴⁷⁶ Kadijevec, Viem, p. 127.

⁴⁷⁷ Reuter, Bürgerkrieg, pp. 704 and 705; Mirjana Prosic-Dvorniv, 'Serbia. The Inside Story', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 330 n. 24. See also Ray Moseley, 'Army in tatters. Many Yugoslavs refuse to fight', Chicago Tribune, 30/09/91.

⁴⁷⁸ See e.g. the letter from Vuk Draskovic to Simovic in: Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, p. 78.

⁴⁷⁹ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, pp. 72-74.

⁴⁸⁰ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, p. 89; Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 142.

⁴⁸¹ Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 70; David Binder, 'Ethnic Conflict in Yugoslavia Tearing Apart Its Army, Too', The New York Times, 01/10/91; Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 329. See also Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, p. 90.

⁴⁸² Ofelija Backovic/Milos Vasic/Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 330.

⁴⁸³ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, pp. 61 and 95.

⁴⁸⁴ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 97.

⁴⁸⁵ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 97-98.

⁴⁸⁶ Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 334.

his gun and shot himself through the head.⁴⁸⁷ The number of victims of ‘friendly’ fire was very large, not only through deliberate shooting from behind, but more particularly through the extremely poor performance of their own air force.

As a consequence, many reservists also deserted. In the autumn of 1991 there were repeated demonstrations by reservists, with the authorities daring to take little action against them. Entire units deserted as soon as they reached the front.⁴⁸⁸ For instance, a group of one thousand soldiers from Kragujevac deserted the front with impunity to return home, approximately one thousand reservists from Kraljevo refused to return to the front after leave, and seven hundred reservists from Velika Plana surrendered their uniforms and arms.⁴⁸⁹ Others failed to appear. The army had to resort to raids on companies to round up conscripts. More than one hundred thousand young Serbian people left for abroad to avoid service at the front.⁴⁹⁰ For reasons of political opportunism, and so as not to overload the courts, only a very small number of deserters were prosecuted.⁴⁹¹ To reduce the growing reluctance to the war in Serbia the JNA introduced a rotation system in which no one had to serve more than 45 consecutive days at the front. This, of course, only exacerbated the manpower problem and led to inefficiency.

A consequence of the manpower problem was that the JNA had to resort to dividing the full-scale attack on Croatia, the Bedem II plan, into phases.⁴⁹² Knin-Krajina fell almost without problem into the JNA's hands. There had been almost no recruiting problems here. On the other hand, the shortage of soldiers for the attack through the Gradiska-Virovitica axis in West Slavonia was most acute, according to Kadijevec. The JNA managed to mobilize only one and a half of the planned five brigades. A large proportion of the men who reported dropped out later as they approached the front. However, it was fortunate for the JNA that it had armed the militias in West Slavonia well and prepared them for combat. Furthermore, the tactical coordination of the militias with the JNA proceeded with few problems there. This allowed West Slavonia to be occupied.⁴⁹³ Only the equivalent of one of the intended four brigades turned up for the operations in Banija, Kordun and Lika, so that the operation had to be scaled down.

The strongest wave of JNA attack had indeed managed to liberate East Slavonia, but not to push through to Zagreb and Varadin, mainly owing to a lack of motorized infantry to accompany the tanks. The offensive was also held up by the engagements around Vukovar, where the Croatian armed forces put up heavy resistance.

In Mostar, which was to have been the start of an offensive on Split, only one third of the necessary number of soldiers showed up, and accordingly the operational objectives had to be adjusted drastically. This group was left only with the task of occupying the Mostar airfield and attempting to set up a base in East Hercegovina for a possible later strike towards Split.

It was possible to recruit enough men in East Hercegovina and Montenegro for the land blockade against Dubrovnik. The navy succeeded in the meantime in effecting a sea blockade against Croatia. The JNA and paramilitary units had already carried out limited attacks on the ancient Croatian port of Dubrovnik in June and August 1991. On 1 October the JNA started a siege by land and sea around the largely defenceless city. The shelling that started on that day was to last until December.

⁴⁸⁷ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 98; Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Vredesbeweging Belgrado zoekt een alternatief voor de oorlog’ (‘Belgrade peace movement seeks alternative to war’), de Volkskrant, 30/11/91.

⁴⁸⁸ Kadijevec, Viem, p. 147. See also Norman Cigar, ‘The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991’, Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, pp. 67, 70 and 72.

⁴⁸⁹ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 98; ‘Duitsland legt als eerste verkeer met Joegoslavië stil’ (‘Germany first to break ties with Yugoslavia’), de Volkskrant, 10/12/91.

⁴⁹⁰ Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, ‘Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports’, Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 331, 340 and 342-343.

⁴⁹¹ Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 141; Gajic Glisic, Vojska, p. 16; Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, ‘Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis – an analytical overview of media reports’, Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 330.

⁴⁹² Kadijevec, Viem, p. 148.

⁴⁹³ Kadijevec, Viem, p. 149.

During the worst bombardment there were six hundred shell bursts a day. The primary objective appeared to be to hit historical buildings in the old city. In 1991 and 1992, 563 of the 824 buildings in the old city were hit,⁴⁹⁴ but in many cases the material damage was limited. More than eighty Dubrovnik citizens died as a result of the JNA action between September 1991 and December 1992, 43 of them between 1 October and 6 December 1991. Thirteen citizens died on 6 December 1991 alone as a consequence of that day's extremely heavy shelling.⁴⁹⁵

The reasons for attacking Dubrovnik can only be guessed at. According to some, Serbia could make a historical claim on the city, while according to others the Serbian command begrudged Croatia the income from tourism.⁴⁹⁶ The military explanation was that Serbia wanted co-determination over a city so close to the Bay of Kotor, which was traditionally a large naval base.⁴⁹⁷ Finally there was a suggestion that Milosevic, who was often on the lookout for accomplices, felt that Montenegrins, through their efforts at Dubrovnik, 'would also have to be sprinkled with blood'.⁴⁹⁸

All things considered, the JNA had accomplished everything from the limited plan for the protection of the Serbian areas, except for the occupation of part of West Slavonia. The more extensive plan to operate throughout Croatia was wrecked, mainly owing to a serious lack of manpower. In the execution of the more limited plan, the federal army was also forced to relinquish theoretically more favourable positions in the rest of Croatia, such as its garrisons and military depots, which were surrounded by the Croatian National Guard.

3. The JNA in relation to the Serbian military and security organizations

'The conflagration didn't break out through spontaneous combustion. Pyromaniacs were required.'⁴⁹⁹

The war in Croatia was only partly a JNA conflict. The fact is that the Serbs' fight against the Croats was not only a criminal war. It was also a war of criminals.⁵⁰⁰ There were two main reasons why they were given a chance. The first was the Serbs' need to camouflage the federal army as a military force that sought only to preserve Yugoslavian unity as much as possible. The JNA should present itself, when possible, as a neutral buffer that was attempting to restrain the ethnic factions from fighting with each other. Therefore the military dirty work had to be carried out as far as possible by the local militias and volunteer corps from Serbia. Only if these units were unable to hold their own was the JNA to intervene. The second reason that the JNA was to leave the field clear for paramilitary factions was the shortage of its own manpower.

This shortage prompted the JNA General Staff in July 1991 to order that volunteers were to be admitted into the army as fully-fledged members. While, on the one hand, military service was widely evaded, the JNA now had an influx of extreme nationalists, criminals and paramilitaries who had worked or still worked for the secret services. This decision meant the entry into the war of those with a bent for dangerous living or who, after a week of hard work, wanted to enjoy themselves at the weekend at the front: the 'weekend cetniks' or 'weekend snipers'.⁵⁰¹ It was people of this sort who were later to make the weekends in Sarajevo the most dangerous days of the week.⁵⁰² During the war in Bosnia there was even said to be a paramilitary unit operating in the north around Brcko that went by ⁴⁹⁴ ICTY, charge against Pavle Strugar, Miodrag Jokic, Milan Zec and Vladimir Kovacevic, 22/02/01.

⁴⁹⁵ United Nations, S/1994/674, Appendix, par. 287-294 and 298-301.

⁴⁹⁶ Mønnesland, Land, p. 362.

⁴⁹⁷ Mamula, Slucuj, p. 232.

⁴⁹⁸ Mamula, Slucuj, p. 233. See also ibid., p. 294.

⁴⁹⁹ Zimmerman, Origins, pp. 204 and 210.

⁵⁰⁰ Cf. Bell, Way, p. 57; E.A. Hammel, 'Lessons from the Yugoslav Labyrinth', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 34.

⁵⁰¹ See e.g. Voet, Hotel, p. 36; Westerman, Brug, pp. 180 and 184.

⁵⁰² Maass, Neighbor, p. 110.

the name Vikendasi: the weekenders. On the other hand, weekend snipers were also to be found on the Croatian side.⁵⁰³ Moreover, on 3 October the JNA command was ordered by Milosevic to grant entire paramilitary units the status of members of the regular armed forces.⁵⁰⁴ Otherwise, the action of paramilitaries at the front did not in all respects represent a solution to the problem of manning the regular units. Their activities had a demoralizing effect on the regular army. Officers were frequently told by their men that they were not prepared to fight, let alone to die, for the misdeeds of the paramilitaries.⁵⁰⁵

While the JNA formed its own units from paramilitaries, the Ministry of the Interior had already been training its own paramilitaries for some time. In August 1990, which was when Milosevic made the transition from preservation of Yugoslavia to Greater Serbia, the Serbian parliament had already passed a law allowing paramilitary units to be placed under the authority either of the territorial defence or of the JNA.⁵⁰⁶ On 16 March 1991 Milosevic made his infamous television broadcast, in which he said that Yugoslavia was at its end, and announced that one day earlier he had ordered the formation of 'new groups that were able to protect the interests of Serbia and the Serbian people outside Serbia'.⁵⁰⁷

In this connection, Milosevic appealed to a group of men who, together with his propaganda chief, Dusan Mitevic, formed the circle of his intimate confidants. Their names were: Radmilo Bogdanovic, Mihalj Kertes, Radovan Stojcic and Jovica Stanisic.⁵⁰⁸ They had helped Milosevic establish his authority and widen his power after his victory over his mentor Stambolic.⁵⁰⁹ This group formed what was known as the military faction ('vojna linija') within the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministarstvo Unutrasnjih Poslova (MUP), which included the Serbian state security service, the Sluzba Drzavne Bezbednosti (SDB).

Bogdanovic had been the Serbian Minister of the Interior since 1987, and Milosevic ordered him to organize the antibureaucratic revolution and the truth meetings.⁵¹⁰ Shortly after the 19 August 1990 referendum on autonomy for the Serbs of Krajina, Milosevic decided to send arms and ammunition to the Serbian rebels in Krajina.⁵¹¹ Bogdanovic then created a special cell within his

⁵⁰³ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Kanonnen al in Zagreb te horen' ('Cannon already heard in Zagreb'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/10/91.

⁵⁰⁴ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 199.

⁵⁰⁵ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 97; Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 74.

⁵⁰⁶ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 201.

⁵⁰⁷ Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 199-200; Tomanic, Crkva, p. 37.

⁵⁰⁸ Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 142; Cohen, Serpent, p. 165; Thomas, Serbia, p. 93.

⁵⁰⁹ For more information on the persons named below and the role they played, see e.g. Jonathan S. Landay, 'Belgrade Regime Tied to Alleged War Crimes', The Christian Science Monitor, 26/11/93; George Rodrigue, 'To Divide and Conquer', The Dallas Morning News, 03/07/94; Michael Dobbs, 'Crash of Yugoslavia's Money Man', The Washington Post, 29/11/00; Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', IV.B.3.b, V.A.2 and V.A.4; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.2 and II.D.6(a)(ii); Cohen, Serpent, p. 165; Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 199-207.

⁵¹⁰ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 57.

⁵¹¹ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 98.

Ministry of the Interior for arming the Serbian rebels, who were to come under the leadership of a clique from Vojvodina.

Its direct command was entrusted to Mihalj Kertes, who had served in the Germany and Russia sections of the SDB. He himself was an ethnic Hungarian, but at the same time a fierce Serbian nationalist. In 1988 he led the antibureaucratic demonstration in Novi Sad that was attended by 150,000 people, which was to bring an end to the autonomy of Vojvodina. In the spring of 1989, Kertes and Stanistic, help by other Serbian nationalist Milosevic supporters within the state security service, won the struggle against the old communists who still clung to the federal ideal.

The supervision of the cell led by Kertes was put in the hands of Jovica Stanistic.⁵¹² Stanistic was born in 1950 in Backa Palanka into a Montenegrin family. Immediately after completing his studies in 1974 he started work at the SDB. After working for some time in the counterintelligence service, he became the right hand man of the Serbian SDB head. At the time Stanistic was one of the people charged with organizing the six-hundredth anniversary celebrations of the Battle of Kosovo (the "Field of Blackbirds"). He is said to have greatly indebted Milosevic there by foiling an attempt on his life.⁵¹³ On 16 March 1991, Milosevic appointed Stanistic head of the SDB.

Radovan Stojicic, who was from Sremska Kamenica in Vojvodina, started his career as a uniformed policeman in the Belgrade police, but climbed to become head of the special units within the MUP. His nickname was Badza, which means: Bluto, after the violent character in the Popeye cartoon. Stojicic 'won his spurs' in 1989 with the tough action of his units in Kosovo, for example, by devising a plan to drive the Albanian mineworkers out of the Stari Trg mine in Kosovo, where they had locked themselves in as a protest against Milosevic's politics. In 1990 he helped organize the Serbian uprising in Croatia. As commander of the territorial defence of Slavonia, Baranja and the West Srem, he had units comprising selected troops of the JNA, reservists and volunteers at his disposal. When in the spring of 1991 Serbian prison doors were opened for criminals who were prepared to serve at the front, Stojicic was an important consumer of this new potential. He provided them with weapons and arranged for military training.

On 16 March 1991, the day Milosevic appointed Stanistic as head of the SDB, he appointed Stojicic as Deputy Minister of the Interior and ordered both of them to secretly create a paramilitary unit able to realize the Greater-Serbian plans and at the same time to break residual opposition to them in the JNA. Stojicic and Stanistic involved Franko ('Frenki') Simatovic in their activities.⁵¹⁴ Simatovic was a Croatian, also from Vojvodina. He was Stanistic's deputy and at the same time commanded the police special and antiterrorist units.⁵¹⁵

As a concession to the March 1991 student demonstrations, Milosevic had to dismiss Bogdanovic as Minister of the Interior, but Bogdanovic continued behind the scenes to lead the group that organized and controlled the paramilitary units. This sphinx sometimes managed to be covered by official functions as chairman of the Council of Serbs outside Serbia.

License to kill: the paramilitary units of Arkan, Seselj and the Beli Orlovi

'Profiteers have come back from every war, and this war is no exception, with large quantities of bounty, usually in the form of money, gold or arms. It is no secret that people from this war returned ⁵¹² Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 98.

⁵¹³ Translated article by Dobrila Nenadic, 'Last Second-in-Command', Reporter, Banja Luka, 24/05/00.

⁵¹⁴ There is also information on Stanistic's links with Simatovic and leaders of paramilitary units in interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

⁵¹⁵ Daniel Sunter, 'Serbia: War crimes arrests spark Serbian mutiny', IWPR's Tribunal Update no. 243, Part I, 05-10/11/01, pp. 5-6. Simatovic is sometimes also known as Stamatovic.

with more sophisticated bounty: fridges, televisions or video recorders. Lesser plunderers robbed larders and made off with pots of jam.⁵¹⁶

The action of paramilitary units was to become one of the decisive features of the conflict in ex-Yugoslavia. The Bassiouni committee that reported to the United Nations on the human rights violations in this area announced in 1994 that it had established the existence of 83 such groups: 56 Serbian groups, 13 Croatian and 14 with a Bosnian Muslim background.⁵¹⁷ The great majority of these groups operated within a limited region. A feature of the start of the conflict was that on the Serbian side there were a couple of larger groups that were deployed in several locations, such as Arkan's volunteers, Seselj's Cetniks and the Beli Orlovi.

Arkan had links with Yugoslavia's secret services long before 1990. In the early seventies, during and shortly after the Croatian Spring, the military counterintelligence service Kontraobavestajna Sluzba (KOS) was confronted with increasing political agitation against the Tito regime, which the service thought stemmed from Croatian and Serbian nationalists in other countries. In an attempt to combat this, the KOS had nationalist emigrants in other countries murdered by Yugoslavian underworld figures. The service provided them with false documents and safe houses. The State security service, the SDB, also hired criminals for matters it was unwilling to be associated with itself, such as murder and kidnapping.⁵¹⁸ This is how in 1972 or 1973 Arkan was engaged by the Yugoslavian Federal Secretariat for Domestic Affairs (SSUP), mainly to liquidate Yugoslavs in Western Europe who were not well-disposed to the regime in Belgrade.⁵¹⁹ According to police records, 'Arkan', whose real name was Zeljko Raznjatovic, was born in 1952 in Brezice, Slovenia, as a son of a retired Yugoslavian air-force Colonel. He was always in trouble, and he ran away from home at the age of fourteen, to be detained one year later in a hostel for juvenile delinquents. After his release he went abroad, where he continued along the wrong path together with his partner-in-crime Carlo Fabiani, who became known later as Giovanni di Stefano, the British businessman-lawyer whose Yugoslavian passport bore Milosevic's residence as address.⁵²⁰

In that period Arkan accepted the offer of the SSUP to carry out liquidations in exchange for a degree of impunity. In the years that followed he alternated committing attacks ordered by the secret powers in Belgrade with crimes such as bank robbery, theft and extortion in Sweden, the Netherlands, Belgium and Italy.⁵²¹ In the course of time Arkan turned into one of the most wanted criminals on the Interpol list. He was sentenced in various Western European countries, including the Netherlands, where he nonetheless managed to escape from the Amsterdam Bijlmer prison.⁵²² Arkan returned to Yugoslavia in the early 1980s. There too he occupied himself with criminal practices, but usually avoided prosecution by using his relations with the SSUP. His star rose rapidly in the Belgrade underworld. At the same time he was head of the Red Star Belgrade football team fan club, and he quickly gained a senior position in the club management.

Under Milosevic the practice of hiring criminals for political purposes reached unprecedented levels through the organization of paramilitary units by the vojna linija. Milosevic was fully aware that he had to leave as little evidence as possible of his own involvement in the work of the paramilitary units. He habitually kept no record of discussions, and guests were liable to be searched for bugging ⁵¹⁶ Mira Markovic, Milosevic's wife Night, p. 141 (12/11/93).

⁵¹⁷ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, I.C.

⁵¹⁸ Spasic, Lasica, p. 60.

⁵¹⁹ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.6.(b)(i); Chuck Sudetic, 'A Shady Militia Chief Arouses Serbs', The New York Times, 20/12/92; Zoran Kusovac, 'Crime and culpability in Milosevic's Serbia', Jane's Intelligence Review, 01/02/00; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 101.

⁵²⁰ Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, n. 213.

⁵²¹ Also the MID report, MID 438-0042, box 251. 'The conflict between Milosevic and Seselj', January 1994 mentions that Arkan was 'a trained intelligence officer'.

⁵²² Mark van Driel, "'Kon of wilde hij me niet doden?'" ('"Couldn't he kill me or didn't he want to?"), de Volkskrant, 20/12/00; Westerman, Brug, p. 163; Voet, Hotel, pp. 167-169; [Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 210-211.

devices⁵²³ and his circle of confidants was extremely small. Nevertheless, since then various people who were involved have indicated that Milosevic was very well-informed of the activities of the paramilitary units and the assistance given to them, both from the Serbian Ministry of the Interior and by the JNA.⁵²⁴ According to Dobrila Gajic Glisic, the secretary of the Serbian Minister of Defence, General Tomislav Simovic, her boss spoke to Milosevic almost every day on a special telephone line, and Milosevic concerned himself in detail with the paramilitary activities in Croatia.⁵²⁵ When a Croatian diplomat once asked Milosevic in 1993 about Arkan, the Serbian president is said to have answered: 'I also need someone to do jobs of a certain kind for me.'⁵²⁶

The fact was that under Milosevic, Arkan continued to cooperate with the authorities. Bogdanovic originally used Arkan to reshape the hard core of the Red Star supporters crowd into a movement for Milosevic. Until that time the notorious north side of the Red Star supporters did adhere to the Greater-Serbian idea, but not to Milosevic. Arkan did his job well. He made sure that the nationalist opposition leaders, Vuk Draskovic and Vojislav Seselj, and their supporters, would no longer dare to show themselves at Red Star, and he disciplined the hooligans.⁵²⁷ The activities of Arkan and the supporters then started to extend beyond the stadium. For instance, in June 1990 Arkan offered his hooligans to Bogdanovic to disrupt an anti-Milosevic demonstration. The offer was gratefully accepted.⁵²⁸

Tudjman won the elections in Croatia in May 1990, and in the summer of that year Serbs in Knin started a 'popular uprising', in which they set up roadblocks. However, to the disappointment of their secret sympathizers in Belgrade, by no means all the Serbs in Croatia supported the uprising. They responded by sending Arkan to agitate them with references to the Croats' Ustashe past. Arkan also distributed World War II vintage machine guns among the Serbs. On 11 October 1990 Arkan set up the Serbian Volunteer Guard the Srpska Dobrovoljacka Garda (SDG) for his activities in Croatia, the core of which consisted of the Red Star Belgrade hooligans and Belgrade underworld figures. These Arkan volunteers considered themselves to be totally loyal to Milosevic and his party.

However, the Croatian secret service, the Ured za Nacionalnu Sigurnost (UNS), disrupted the activities of Arkan and his Guard by luring Arkan and three companions into a trap at Dvor na Uni on 29 November 1990. On their apprehension they were found to be in possession of explosives, automatic rifles and pistols. Arkan was sentenced on 14 June 1991 to twenty months imprisonment less the period spent in pre-trial detention. Arkan and his three associates were released pending appeal, whereupon they set off for Belgrade. It appears that one million German marks had been paid from Belgrade for their release.⁵²⁹

Immediately after his return to Belgrade, Arkan dedicated himself to expanding the Serbian Volunteer Guard, who were than also known as the Tigers, because a tiger was the Arkanovci's traditional mascot. Arkan's Guard received its weapons, uniforms, communication equipment, maps ⁵²³ 'His Master's Voice: the adventures of Hrvoje Sarinic in the land of the Serb aggressor', Bosnia Report, new series no. 8, January-March 1999.

⁵²⁴ Jonathan S. Landay, 'Belgrade Regime Tied to Alleged War Crimes', The Christian Science Monitor, 26/11/93; George Rodrigue, 'To divide and conquer. Serbian leader saved self by ruining nation', The Dallas Morning News, 03/07/94; 'Sarajevo could become "the Beirut of Europe", Karadzic warns', Deutsche Presse-Agentur, 27/11/95, 10:40; Jonathan McGeary, 'Face to face with evil', Time Magazine, 13/05/96; Julian Borger, 'Milosevic Case Hardens' and 'Inside Story: The President's Secret Henchmen', The Guardian (London), 03/02/97; Philip Smucker, 'International criminals find a home in Serbia', Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, 16/02/97; Dusan Stojanovic, 'International News', AP Worldstream, 01/11/00; Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', I.5.c, IV.A, V.A.2, nVI.A.2. 21 and n. 173; Cohen, Hearts, p. 410; Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 101.

⁵²⁵ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 102.

⁵²⁶ Hrvoje Sarinic, quoted in 'His Master's Voice: the adventures of Hrvoje Sarinic in the land of the Serb aggressor', Bosnia Report, new series no. 8, January-March 1999; Cohen, Serpent, p. 135.

⁵²⁷ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 212; Thomas, Serbia, p. 94; Ivan Colovic, 'Football, Hooligans and War', Popov (ed.), pp. 385-388.

⁵²⁸ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.6.(b)(i).

⁵²⁹ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 419 n. 39.

and training from Serbian official bodies.⁵³⁰ The training took place in Bubanj Potok camp, just outside Belgrade, and in Erdut and Tenja, near Osijek and Vukovar, in East Slavonia. From the summer of 1991, Arkan's troops were deployed on completion of their training in Croatia, and later also in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Arkan's fighters, who were estimated to be five hundred to one thousand in strength, were by far the best armed of all the paramilitary groups. They even had tanks, mortars and various types of automatic rifles at their disposal.⁵³¹ Their small number did not stand in the way of great notoriety. The news that Arkan and his Tigers were on the way was enough to make entire villages take flight. The Arkan Tigers headquarters were in Vasa Pelagic street in Belgrade, not far from Milosevic's house in the Dedinje residential neighbourhood.

As a consequence of his detention in Croatia, when Arkan started to expand his Milosevic loyal guard he had to catch up with a number of other militias, which had some degree of affiliation with opposition political parties. One of the militias was aligned with the extreme nationalist politician Seselj. Vojislav Seselj was born in 1950 in East Herzegovina/Sarajevo.⁵³² At 26 he became Yugoslavia's youngest PhD after submitting a thesis on Marxist justifications for war. Following a year teaching in Michigan, he went on to teach political science at the University of Sarajevo. In 1984 he was sentenced to six years' imprisonment for anticommunist activities: the police had found at his home an unpublished article he had written, which argued for a Greater Serbia.⁵³³ Amnesty International acted on his behalf at the time.

When he was released after 21 months, he had transformed from a rebel against communism into a monarchist nationalist.⁵³⁴ At the same time he was said to have suffered serious psychological damage as a result of the torture that he underwent in prison. This trauma could explain his later violent behaviour.⁵³⁵ Others ascribe his vengeful behaviour to his anger at not having been given any important institutional position in Belgrade, where he settled after his release.⁵³⁶ He joined the leading Serbian nationalists there and started to publish nationalist documents.

He was the fiercest supporter of a Greater Serbia, which he believed should stretch 'from Zagreb to Thessaloniki'.⁵³⁷ That Seselj, who was once supported by Amnesty International, had little interest in human rights himself, became apparent when this man, who since 1990 constantly carried an automatic pistol in his bag, advocated almost three weeks before the Croatian declaration of independence, gouging Croats' eyes out with a rusty spoon so that they would die of blood poisoning. He apparently changed his mind later and thought that Serbs should not cut their opponents' throats, but rather hang them, because it was more hygienic.⁵³⁸ Another pronouncement from his rabid repertoire was that Zagreb should be attacked with napalm.

In March 1990 Seselj, together with Vuk Draskovic and Mirko Jovic, set up the Serbian Renewal Movement, the Srpski Pokret Obnove (SPO). After only a few weeks the three started to have disagreements and Seselj left the movement. After a number of other brief political adventures he created the Serbian Cetnik Movement, Srpski Cetniki Pokret (SCP), with which he claimed the Cetnik tradition for himself and his followers. He felt this to be his right after the notorious World War II

⁵³⁰ Blaine Harden, 'Serbia's Treacherous Gang of Three', The Washington Post, 07/02/93; Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, V.A.4; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.2; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 102.

⁵³¹ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.1 and 2, D.6.(b)(iv).

⁵³² For information on Seselj see e.g. Hans Steketee, 'Trouw aan de doodshoofd-vlag' ('Allegiance to the skull and crossbones') and "Mijn soldaten zijn vechters" ("My soldiers are fighters"), NRC Handelsblad, 13/07/91.

⁵³³ See also Magas, Destruction, pp. 89-93.

⁵³⁴ This is according to the sociologist Slobodan Inic from Belgrade in: Laura Silber, 'Serbia's Ultranationalist Leader Emerges as Formidable Political Force', 03/08/93.

⁵³⁵ Peter Michielsen, 'Seselj: kampioen van de haat' ('Seselj: champion of hatred'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/10/97.

⁵³⁶ Svetlana Slapsak, 'Serbische Alternativen', Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, p. 174.

⁵³⁷ Gerbert van Genderen Stort, 'Gerecht zonder aangeklaagden' ('Trial without defendants'), HP/De Tijd, 04/06/93, p. 28. See also Yoeri Albrecht, 'De oorlog van Joegoslavië is er een van oude mannen' ('The war in Yugoslavia is one of old men'), Vrij Nederland, 07/08/93, p. 23; Cohen, War, p. 128.

⁵³⁸ Markovic, Night, p. 122.

Cetnik warlord, pope or (Christian-Orthodox) priest Momcilo Djujic, who had collaborated on a large scale with the Italians and Germans and was almost universally considered to be a war criminal, had bestowed on him the Cetnik title vojvoda (duke), which was the highest military rank in the Serbian army during World War I and under the Cetniks during World War II, on 28 June (St Vitus day) 1989. With this rank he received the instruction 'to cleanse the holy Serbian land' of the last remaining Jew, Albanian, Croat and any other 'foreign elements'.⁵³⁹ Seselj's Cetniks made a start on executing this task in 1989 in Vojvodina, where they terrorized non-Serbs in an attempt to make them leave the province.⁵⁴⁰

Seselj and his Cetnik movement came fourth in the 1990 presidential elections. After the elections he was imprisoned for two months in Belgrade, because he had smuggled weapons on his own account to Serbs in Knin. On his release, at the end of February 1991, he set up the Serbian Radical Party (SRS). He entered the Serbian parliament in the spring of 1991 after a mid-term election.

This is when Milosevic discovered him as the ideal opposition politician, a man who was far more radical in his pronouncements than himself and did not shrink from getting his hands dirty, especially through his organization's paramilitary arm, the Serbian Cetnik Movement. This was led by Branislav Vacic, a former boxer, who, like Seselj, had briefly been a member of the SPO, but was expelled because of 'extremism' and 'criminality'.⁵⁴¹ According to Seselj himself, the collaboration of his paramilitary troops with the secret services started on 1 April 1991, shortly before the massacre at the village of Borovo Selo, where his troops had been sent to 'protect' local Serbs.⁵⁴² The arrival of Seselj's paramilitaries in Borovo Selo was applauded in the Belgrade media as a rescue of endangered Serbs.⁵⁴³ In truth, Seselj, like Arkan, contributed to a reluctance on the part of moderate elements to speak out, or as he himself put it: 'Twenty or thirty Cetniks in every village is enough to hearten the local population.'⁵⁴⁴ Seselj claimed that his Cetniks were responsible for the death of the twelve Croatian policemen in Borovo Selo in early May 1991. When asked about the legality of the his people's action he answered: 'What we do is not illegal; the fact is that we do not recognize the law.'⁵⁴⁵

In the meantime, the royalist Serbian Renewal Movement, the Srpski Pokret Obnove (SPO), which Seselj had once been a member of and which was now led by Draskovic, founded its own paramilitary organization in June 1990: the White Eagles (Beli Orlovi). Its commander was Dragoslav Bokan. Bokan considered that the collaboration of his unit with the SDB, like Seselj with his Cetniks, started in the early days of April 1991. The Eagles were then supposed to be subordinate to the Territorial Defence in East Slavonia, which was a creature of the Serbian security forces.⁵⁴⁶

When the Beli Orlovi gained more independence, Draskovic set up a new paramilitary unit, the Srpska Garda, in the summer of 1991. Its creation was announced on 24 July 1991 at a press conference given by the vice-chairman van the SPO, Zoran Kojic, and the guard commander, Djordje Bozovic ('Giska'), who took the opportunity to announce that forty thousand Serbs had already reported for duty, and that activists of the SPO and 'fatherland-loving Serbs' had already contributed 15,500 bullets, 265 kilos of explosives, pistols and other military equipment to Croatia in the last few days.⁵⁴⁷ Outsiders estimated the size of the Guard in 1991 at approximately seven thousand men.⁵⁴⁸

⁵³⁹ Cohen, War, pp. 45-47 and 128-129.

⁵⁴⁰ Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, V.1.

⁵⁴¹ Thomas, Serbia, p. 97.

⁵⁴² Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, IV.B.3.b; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.1.

⁵⁴³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 137.

⁵⁴⁴ Cited in Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 208.

⁵⁴⁵ Hans Steketee, "Mijn soldaten zijn vechters", NRC Handelsblad, 13/07/91.

⁵⁴⁶ Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, IV.B.3.b. For information on Bokan see also Juan O. Tamayo, 'Leader of feared Serbian band likes label of war criminal', The Dallas Morning News, 04/10/92; 'Milosevic Has Created Monsters He Cannot Stop', All Things Considered, National Public Radio, 19/05/93.

⁵⁴⁷ Theo Engelen, 'Servië formeert leger voor strijd tegen Kroaten' ('Serbia forms army for fight against Croats'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/91.

Bozovic had a string of convictions to his name, especially in Italy. Like Arkan, he was reputed to have committed attacks in Western Europe on dissidents, but in the course of time he would become anti-Communist and attracted to the Cetnik tradition.⁵⁴⁹ Because of Draskovic's opposition role, especially at the time of the March 1991 demonstrations, the Serbian Guard was repeatedly obstructed by the authorities.⁵⁵⁰ At the front in Croatia there was full-blown combat between the JNA and members of the Serbian Guard.⁵⁵¹ Bozovic was to die on 14 September 1991 at Gospic in Lika. Under his successor Branko Lainovic, the Guard became estranged from Draskovic, when he embarked on a course towards peace. This growing distance made the Guard acceptable to the authorities. They were to play an active role in the early months of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁵⁵²

Finally, it is necessary to mention Captain Dragan, a Serb from Belgrade, who emigrated to Australia but returned to Yugoslavia a few years before the outbreak of war. He was spotted by western journalists in Krajina soon after the start of the war in Croatia.⁵⁵³ He did not avoid journalists and his favourite pose for photographers was holding a black club to a Croatian skull. His men walked around in the same type of camouflage suits used by the special troops of the federal army, had brand new sniper guns and used JNA topographic maps. Dragan himself told journalists that it was perfectly normal for him to receive help from federal army commanders.⁵⁵⁴

He was unclear about his background, which contributed to his mysterious hero status among Serbs. Some said that Dragan, in his mid-thirties, had been a member of the French Foreign Legion or the Australian SAS or that he had worked for the CIA or the IRA. Others said that his real name was Daniel Pavic and that he maintained links with the Israeli secret service, the Mossad. In reality he was Dragan Vasiljkovic alias Daniel Sned(d)en, who was known to the police in Australia for trading in drugs and running prostitution. There was a suspicion that he had been part of a private Serbian army in Victoria that returned to Yugoslavia at the end of the 1980s with several hundred men.⁵⁵⁵

Captain Dragan was nicknamed the 'Rambo of Knin' and his fighters were called the Knindjas, after the popular cartoon series 'Ninja Turtles'. He himself called his militia the regular army of the Serbian autonomous region Krajina.⁵⁵⁶ At the outset of the war in Croatia, Captain Dragan set up fifteen military camps, where he is said to have had between one thousand and 1200 paramilitaries at his disposal.⁵⁵⁷ There were also women among them.⁵⁵⁸

According to his own account, his involvement in the region started in 1990, when 'a very good friend', who held a position in the region, requested him to train for irregular warfare. Tight discipline meant that he succeeded in setting up armed units, which he said had failed until then because of internal disputes between the Croatian Serbs. In addition to the area around Knin, the Draganovci caused particular havoc around Vukovar, where they executed dozens of Croats. Later they were active in such places as Brcko and around Zvornik.⁵⁵⁹

⁵⁴⁸ Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', n. 13.

⁵⁴⁹ Thomas, Serbia, p. 100.

⁵⁵⁰ Thomas, Serbia, pp. 102-103; Judah, Serbs, p. 256.

⁵⁵¹ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, p. 83.

⁵⁵² Thomas, Serbia, p. 104.

⁵⁵³ See e.g. Dusko Doder, 'Mysterious commander', The San Francisco Chronicle, 08/08/91; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Legendarische Servische kapitein weer op oorlogspad' ('Legendary Serbian captain back on the warpath'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/11/91.

⁵⁵⁴ Mary Battiata, 'Serbian Guerrilla Camps Operate Inside Croatia', The Washington Post, 22/07/91.

⁵⁵⁵ Dragan Vasijevic. De zwervende zwijgende kapitein van de Kninja's' ('Dragan Vasijevic. The roaming silent captain of the Kninjas'), Trouw, 07/08/91; Geoffrey Lee Martin, 'Serb rebel has record in Australia', The Daily Telegraph, 13/08/91.

⁵⁵⁶ 'Other reports on Croatia', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 11/07/91.

⁵⁵⁷ Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', n. 13; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, III.C, Captain Dragan units.

⁵⁵⁸ Russell, Prejudice, p. 187.

⁵⁵⁹ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, III.C, Captain Dragan units.

All these special units played a central role in the conflict in Croatia and later in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which, however, had little to do with their reputedly modest military value.⁵⁶⁰ In Croatia they sometimes engaged with Croatian fighters. If they were in danger of coming off worse, the JNA would come to the rescue. Their primary task actually consisted of ethnic cleansing: actions against a defenceless population, which the irregular units could carry out only with the support of the JNA, who, for example, would close off one of the paramilitaries' operational areas from the outside world or would provide artillery support. Their hardly dangerous actions resulted in correspondingly few casualties among the paramilitaries. They 'cleansed' places of Croats or Muslims. Their reward was whatever they could plunder.⁵⁶¹ The Serbian authorities provided Arkan's troops with means of transport and permits to remove plundered goods from Croatia and later Bosnia and import them into Serbia, which earned them the epithet 'truck division' among the Serbian soldiers.⁵⁶² A symbiotic relationship developed between the JNA and the irregular units, in which the paramilitaries needed the regular army's artillery and logistics, and the JNA relied on the paramilitaries, who put the Croatian or Muslim population to flight with their ethnic cleansing and so made conquered territory safe. But Mladic had few words of praise for the paramilitaries:

'Most of them consisted of "great patriots" who never forgot to appear on television and "liberators" who "would fix everything". But their units and militias generally hung around jeweller's shops, banks and well-stocked self-service stores, and there is not a single hill that they defended or liberated. All they did was extensive plundering.'⁵⁶³

The above units were associated with the vojna linija of the Serbian Ministry of the Interior. In addition, the JNA had its own paramilitary units from early October 1991. It was inevitable that these two lines would come into contact before long. The person at the point of intersection of the lines was Captain Dragan and the person confronted with this was the Serbian Minister of Defence, General Tomislav Simovic.

This history also shows how unbelievably unclear the organizational relationships at various levels in the disintegrating Yugoslavia were. There were tensions between federal and republican bodies, between official and unofficial bodies, and between the Serbian Ministry of Defence and the Ministry of the Interior, all of them wanting a say in a future Serbian army. The Serbian Minister of Defence, Simovic, had no say in the JNA. In fact, the supreme command of the JNA resided with the federal state presidium. He did have a say in the Serbian territorial defence. From this position he worked with paramilitary groups that he hoped would eventually become the core of a future, purely Serbian, army, such as Arkan and his men.⁵⁶⁴ In the course of October and November, however, the JNA increasingly became a Serbian army, while the presidium barely continued to function. Against this background, Simovic ordered Captain Dragan to train the paramilitaries in Belgrade for what, according to Simovic, would become the pure Serbian army. This appeared to take place with the SDB's consent, who thought that Captain Dragan had put himself too much in the limelight through his contacts with foreign journalists. The SDB feared that this could mean that their financial and other support of Captain Dragan might be revealed at any moment.⁵⁶⁵

Furthermore, Captain Dragan had come into conflict with the Bosnian-Serb leaders Milan Babic and Milan Martić, who were protégés of the JNA.⁵⁶⁶ Dragan was to arrange the training of Red

⁵⁶⁰ See e.g. Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, pp. 68-69.

⁵⁶¹ Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', III.C and IV.A.5.

⁵⁶² Pejic, 'Medien', p. 60.

⁵⁶³ Cited in Norma Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination or the War', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 212.

⁵⁶⁴ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, pp. 16, 50-58 and 62.

⁵⁶⁵ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, pp. 101-102.

⁵⁶⁶ Gajic Glisic, Vojaska, p. 109.

Berets and the Munja, in other words Lightning Flash troops, in Bubanj Potok. In his new position, Dragan came to support the view that the position of the irregular troops should be formalized.⁵⁶⁷ At the same time he had personal difficulty in being forced into the role of regular officer and in giving up his legendary existence.⁵⁶⁸ He apparently had the feeling that he was being sidelined, which would have been reinforced because hardly any recruits turned up for his training.⁵⁶⁹ Captain Dragan subsequently explained to journalists that Simovic had told him face-to-face that his objective was to set the JNA officers an example with the Dragan training programme. The JNA was later bent on revenge on Simovic and stated that the Serbian Minister of Defence had given Captain Dragan an improper order at the Bubanj Potok camp, because it did not fall under the authority of the Serbian territorial defence and neither, therefore, under Simovic.⁵⁷⁰

When in late December Simovic ordered Dragan's transfer, Dragan appealed to his commitments to the SDB and let it be known that any involvement on his part required the approval of that service. Of course, the existence of irregular units run by civil authorities was no secret for Simovic. In November 1991, in response to media questions on Milosevic's support of Arkan, he had somewhat cryptically remarked that:

‘As far as I know the said “Arkan” is active with the blessing of the Serbian government in the areas Slavonia, West Srijem and Baranja. It is also known that they are not the only volunteers there. I would not tend to draw a distinction between criminals and patriots, but sooner between those who do contribute to the interests of the nation and those who do not, and we know which category the criminals are in.’⁵⁷¹

What Simovic did find unacceptable was that special units of paramilitaries that he believed to be under his command were also controlled by Stojicic and Bogdanovic. The Minister of Defence was furious about this and demanded an immediate interview with Milosevic. What he got was not an interview, but the sack.⁵⁷² Simovic was told that the creation of a Serbian army was impossible as long as Milosevic preferred to uphold the pretence of a federal army.⁵⁷³ This member of government had also come up against a phenomenon that would be repeated often in the years to come: despite their incorporation into the JNA, the irregular troops repeatedly received direct ‘requests’ for specific actions from the Serbian government.⁵⁷⁴

The criminalization of a society

A destructive influence from the paramilitary leaders started to affect society, not only in Croatia and later Bosnia, but also in Serbia. The leaders of the irregular troops often were or became members of parliament. They were state television celebrities and a role model for some young people.⁵⁷⁵ The top people had interesting prospects. Seselj's party won 33 seats in the May 1992 federal elections, giving him the largest opposition party. However, Seselj did not exactly behave like an opposition politician.

⁵⁶⁷ Gajic Glisic, Vojska, p. 102.

⁵⁶⁸ Gajic Glisic, Vojska, pp. 103-104.

⁵⁶⁹ Gajic Glisic, Vojska, p. 106.

⁵⁷⁰ Gajic-Glisic, Vojska, p. 106.

⁵⁷¹ Gajic Glisic, Vojska, p. 86; Williams & Cigar, ‘War Crimes’, IV.A.

⁵⁷² James Gow, ‘Army of Yugoslavia or Serbian Army?’, Jane's Intelligence Review, 01/08/92; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 102-103.

⁵⁷³ Gajic-Glisic, Vojska, p. 107.

⁵⁷⁴ Williams & Cigar, ‘War Crimes’, IV.B.3.b.

⁵⁷⁵ See e.g. United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.D.6(a)(ii); Andrew Bilski, ‘Wild in the streets’, Maclean's, 14/12/92; Chuck Sudetic, ‘A Shady Military Chief Arouses Serbs’, The New York Times, 20/12/92.

He more than once threatened to shoot people who sought to overthrow Milosevic.⁵⁷⁶ With 73 seats, Seselj's party, the SRS, became Yugoslavia's second party after the December 1992 elections, and this time they formed a coalition with Milosevic's SPS party.

Arkan was elected the representative of Kosovo in December 1992. Shortly afterwards he formed his Party of Serbian Unity (Stranka Srpskog Jedinstva), which had the specific purpose of reining Seselj in after he started in that year to turn ever further against Milosevic, and submitted a motion of no-confidence against the Serbian government in September 1993. In that period there was a small breach in the pact of silence. Milosevic accused Seselj of crimes in Croatia and Bosnia with his paramilitaries, the existence of which Milosevic had always denied. And Seselj made known that Milosevic had been aware of these practices for years and that he not only tolerated them, but had also personally facilitated them.⁵⁷⁷ Because Arkan did not manage to mobilize the extreme right-wing element of the electorate in the same way as Seselj, Milosevic felt it necessary to retain Seselj as his favourite opposition leader, but Seselj was never again given the chance to shine.

And then there was Kertes, the head of the cell for arming the Serbian rebels. Under Milosevic, Kertes became first deputy Minister of the Interior of the federation, and head of the domestic security forces. He later became Minister for the Serbs in the Diaspora, under which title he was able to move freely through Croatia and Bosnia. As a member of the Serbian state presidium he advocated in 1990 the forced emigration of Albanians from Kosovo and the colonization of the area by Serbs.⁵⁷⁸ At the end of 1993 he was to be rewarded for his support to Milosevic with the lucrative post of Head of Customs, according to many the centre of smuggling in Serbia. At the time Kertes decided who did and who did not have to pay import duty and who was granted the monopoly of certain trade.⁵⁷⁹

In honour of his services to the Milosevic regime, Stojicic was appointed Head of Public Safety in January 1992, in other words: head of all uniformed police, and deputy Minister of the Interior. All this contributed to the idea that people could get away with crime in Serbia, and that it was even possible to become a hero in the process. Pursuant to a Ministry of the Interior bye-law, from the summer of 1991 paramilitaries were allowed to carry weapons openly in Belgrade. It was also nothing special to see them walking through the capital city or outside bars in camouflage suits with pistols and hand grenades. The condition was that the paramilitaries had to have the requisite arms permit.⁵⁸⁰ A lively arms trade developed in Belgrade. Explosives, ammunition and even rocket launchers were available on the black market, where the price of a hand grenade dropped from one hundred to five marks between early September and mid November 1991.⁵⁸¹

If the action of such groups was objectionable enough on moral grounds, so was it from a purely political point of view. The groups that the vojna linija had created or helped to create not infrequently set up their own deals, which ran right across and over the front lines. For instance, they sold weapons to Croats. Serbs were also murdered, either for their money and their property, or because they opposed the violence that had appeared to have become routine through the action of such groups, within Serbian society too. When Stojicic needed money for 'our lads' in Croatia and Bosnia, he approached Serbian businessmen, who were afraid to say no.

The methods of combat the irregulars used externally were also reflected internally. Once back in Belgrade after their 'excursions' in Croatia and later in Bosnia, the leaders of the paramilitary groups were unable to relinquish their lifestyle, which was based on large-scale robbery, plundering and extortion. A symbiotic relationship developed between the police and organized crime. The police in ⁵⁷⁶ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, n. 196.

⁵⁷⁷ See e.g. Jonathan S. Landay, 'Belgrade Regime Tied to Alleged War Crimes', The Christian Science Monitor, 26/11/93; Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 217-218.

⁵⁷⁸ Michael Montgomery, 'Serbian threat to expel Albanians after unrest', The Daily Telegraph, 12/03/91.

⁵⁷⁹ John Pomfret, 'Government Officials Linked to Criminalization of Yugoslav Society', International Herald Tribune, 22/11/96.

⁵⁸⁰ Reuter, 'Bürgerkrieg', p. 704.

⁵⁸¹ These prices were for type M-75 hand grenades, Reuter, 'Bürgerkrieg', p. 704.

Serbia was being thoroughly corrupted. Competing factions rose up within the 'law enforcers', who traded in drugs, arms, fuel, cigarettes and other contraband, and who extorted businessmen.⁵⁸² Such smuggling practices were particularly profitable after the imposition of the UN embargo of Serbia in May 1992. The combinations of police and criminals worked in turn together with politicians in bank fraud, for example, where not only the leaders of paramilitary groups but also prominent members of government and other politicians profited at the cost of small savers.⁵⁸³ Politicians who followed Milosevic faithfully were rewarded with lucrative jobs on the side in state bodies and nationalized companies. The principle that had been applied on a small scale before 1990, in which criminals who had rendered services for the secret services could enjoy a certain indemnity from prosecution for criminal activities, was now applied almost without restriction.⁵⁸⁴ Because laws no longer applied to anyone who was on Milosevic's side, except the law of the jungle. But even the names of opposition leaders were regularly linked with corruption and fraud.⁵⁸⁵

However, a number of members of the paramilitary network were to find out that a lawless life can be a short one. After a number of years, various key figures of Stojicic's network, himself included, were murdered. The perpetrators were seldom arrested, and it remained unclear whether the murders were the result of internal rivalry in the criminal circuit or eliminations for fear that the victims might open their mouths about Milosevic's complicity and his allegiance to their activities. The list of confidants who had perished was to become a long one.⁵⁸⁶

Radovan Stojicic was shot dead on the night of 10 to 11 April 1997 in the Mamma Mia restaurant in Belgrade, close to the headquarters of the MUP, by a masked man. A number of months earlier he had indicated that he was less eager about committing violence against demonstrators than Milosevic, and especially his wife Mirjana Markovic. In addition there were rumours that Stojicic had had contact with the International War Crimes Tribunal in the former Yugoslavia to testify against Milosevic.⁵⁸⁷

Arkan was murdered by four men at the start of 2000 while he sat in the lobby of the Intercontinental Hotel in Belgrade. Shortly before there had been rumours that he had turned away from Milosevic to the opposition and was in the process of doing a deal with the Yugoslavia Tribunal, which the Tribunal itself happens to deny.⁵⁸⁸ He had also just had a quarrel with Milosevic's son Marko about the fuel import monopoly.⁵⁸⁹

The uprising against Milosevic in October 2000 brought Captain Dragan and Kertes together again in a special way. After several years of paramilitary activities, Dragan settled in Belgrade, where he set up the Internet company NetCentar and created a foundation, the Captain Dragan Fund, to provide assistance to veterans and families of Serbs who had been killed. During the coup against Milosevic in October 2000, Dragan honoured a request from Zoran Djindic, who was later to become prime minister, to lead the occupation of the Studio B television station and the Belgrade customs office, where Kertes resided. Kertes, who was personally engaged in shredding documents at the time of the ⁵⁸² See e.g. Dan Fesperman, 'In Yugoslavia, crime has become the norm', The Baltimore Sun, 02/08/94.

⁵⁸³ Andrew Bilski, 'Wild in the streets', Macleans, 14/12/92; Dan Fesperman, 'In Yugoslavia, crime has become the norm', The Baltimore Sun, 02/08/94.

⁵⁸⁴ See e.g. Andrew Bilski, 'Wild in the streets', Macleans, 14/12/92.

⁵⁸⁵ See e.g. Dan Fesperman, 'In Yugoslavia, crime has become the norm', The Baltimore Sun, 02/08/94.

⁵⁸⁶ For a summary of a number of these murders, see 'Dangerous acquaintance: Petrovic is latest Milosevic associate to die', Agence France Presse, 26/04/00; Steve Crawshaw, 'Anarchy, assassinations, gangland rule – another day in Belgrade', The Independent, 30/04/00; 'Depuis 1991, une longue série d'attentats', Agence France Presse, 16/06/00. See also Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 220-221.

⁵⁸⁷ Edin Subasic, 'Dokaze protiv Milosevica Britanci su dobili od Badze!', Ljiljan, 04/06/97, p. 22; 'Drzava i mafija. Atentat na Radovana Stojica Badzu', Vreme, 19/04/97, pp. 6-13.

⁵⁸⁸ 'Tribunaal praat niet met Arkan' ('Tribunal not in talking to Arkan'), Spits, 15/07/99; Michel Maas, 'Diepe angst alleen al voor de naam Arkan' ('Arkan's name alone strikes terror'), de Volkskrant, 17/01/00; 'Aanklacht tegen Arkan blijft geheim' ('Charge against Arkan remains secret'), Spits, 18/01/00.

⁵⁸⁹ Peter Beaumont & Norma Jelacic, 'Did Milosevic's son kill Arkan?', The Observer, 23/01/00.

raid by Dragan's men, surrendered without resistance.⁵⁹⁰ Kertes was fired, and on 15 December 2000 he was arrested for misusing his position. A few days later he was released after appealing to his parliamentary immunity.

Paramilitary units were not a uniquely Serbian phenomenon during the conflicts in (former) Yugoslavia. There was no shortage of extremists on the Croatian side, though there were fewer of them.⁵⁹¹ This mainly involved the Croatian Defence Force, the Hrvatske Odbrane Snage (HOS), the paramilitary arm of the Croatian Rights Party, the Hrvatska Stranka Prava (HSP), led by the thirty year old former theology student Dobroslav Paraga.⁵⁹² The HSP was an extreme right-wing party that availed itself of the Ustashe symbols and demanded all Bosnia-Herzegovina as Croatian territory. Paraga was convicted in 1980, at the age of twenty, to four years imprisonment for his contacts with Ustashe supporters in other countries. He was convicted for a second time in 1987 for criticising the Yugoslavian regime's maltreatment of political prisoners. Paraga's HVO sent volunteers to places at the front where breakthroughs were likely. Paraga and his supporters tried to capitalize on this action for publicity. Because of pressure from the JNA, the regular army HVO tolerated the presence of the HOS paramilitaries at the front. Paraga's men made a name at Vukovar in particular. They collaborated closely there with the local Croatian army commander Mile Dedakovic, who, like Paraga, repeatedly accused Tudjman of doing nothing for the defence of the city.⁵⁹³ According to HOS commander Ante Dapic, approximately three thousand HOS men were active in and around Vukovar in October 1991.⁵⁹⁴

The HOS consistently criticized Tudjman's policy as too moderate. There was talk of an impending coup by Paraga and his compatriots on several occasions. Tudjman was the brunt of some considerable criticism from abroad because he would allow Paraga and his men to pursue neo-fascist activities. He was arrested in early November 1991 and detained for almost a month on suspicion of conspiring against the constitutional order of Croatia and its government. The action of the HSP and HOS was a thorn in the side of the West, which saw it as an obstacle to complete support for Croatia. Ultimately the HOS was integrated into the regular Croatian army. However, the HOS would continue to carry out independent actions in Bosnia-Herzegovina, on the justification that agreements with the authorities in Zagreb referred only to Croatian territory itself.

If Paraga was the Croatian counterpart of Seselj, then the Croatian opposite number of Arkan was: Branimir Glavas, a specialist in ethnic cleansing, who came from West-Herzegovina. He was the one who actually held sway in Osijek and surroundings and was later also formally appointed commander. Tudjman tried in vain to curb his influence. Among the Croats of East Slavonia, Glavas was well liked precisely because of his ruthless methods. Dirty jobs were otherwise carried out by the Black Legion, which officially formed the antiterrorist brigade of the Croatian police in Sisak and which also had foreign volunteers among its ranks.⁵⁹⁵ Another example of a notorious Croatian unit was the Zebras, led by Drovski, a Croat from Austria known in the field as Commander Sinisja. This unit consisted of skinheads who carried out dirty work. There was also no shortage of football hooligans among the Croatian troops. For example, a unit of the National Guard stationed at Vinkovci comprised largely of the 'Bad Blue Boys', hooligans from Zagreb.

The situation in which irregular groups and militias played an extremely important role in the conflict continued until the autumn of 1993. Military organizations were then formed almost ⁵⁹⁰ Paul Watson, 'Dot-camaraderie helped in Milosevic's ouster', Los Angeles Times, 18/10/00; Julius Strauss, 'Henchman betrayed Milosevic in revolt', The Daily Telegraph (London), 20/10/00; Michael Dobbs, 'Crash of Yugoslavia's Money Man', The Washington Post, 29/11/00.

⁵⁹¹ See e.g. Ewoud Nysingh, 'Kroatische Rambo's veroveren slechts één spookstadje' ('Croatian Rambos conquer a single ghost town'), de Volkskrant, 10/08/91.

⁵⁹² For information on the HOS see e.g. Raymond van den Boogaard, "'Tudjman een verrader; wij vechten door'" ('"Tudjman's a traitor: we fight on"'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/09/91.

⁵⁹³ Tanner, Croatia, p. 266.

⁵⁹⁴ Peter Sartorius, 'Zagreb: Die Erben der Ustascha melden sich zu Wort', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 28/10/91.

⁵⁹⁵ See Ed Vulliamy, 'Kroaten negeren bestand in jacht op Cetniks' ('Croats ignore truce in their hunt for Chetniks'), de Volkskrant, 21/09/91.

simultaneously by all parties in the conflict. This gave the armies more control over the paramilitaries and special troops, for example by integrating or disarming them. Among the reasons for this simultaneous normalization were international diplomatic pressure, the desire for professionalization of the national armed forces and the need of politicians to increase their grasp on the military system and to settle scores with opposition factions within the paramilitaries.⁵⁹⁶ Clearer command structures and more discipline were then introduced in the armies themselves. These changes also manifested themselves externally in the form of an increasing number of soldiers dressed in regular uniforms with familiar emblems. This was not previously the case and it contributed to the ease with which individuals crossed the boundary between the regular army and irregular units.

4. Intermezzo: the nature and form of the conflict

For a clear understanding of the matter it is necessary to interrupt the chronology and answer the following question: what precisely was the nature of the conflicts here? Fighting as it broke out in Croatia in the summer of 1991 cannot formally be considered a war of aggression, in view of the fact that as yet there was no element of international relations between Yugoslavia and Serbia on the one hand and Croatia on the other. Originally there was also no element of civil war. The Serbs in Croatia were guided too much from outside for that and the Croats, at Tudjman's urging, were too passive. We have seen a number of instances where, in the eyes of the leaders in Belgrade, a significant proportion of Serbs in Croatia responded too passively and were unwilling to go along with the official line that the Serbs in Croatia were about to face a genocide equal to the one during the Ustashe regime in World War II.

The breeding ground of the conflict was that right from the start of Yugoslavia there had been two mutually exclusive state projects within the country. The first was the Serbian view that all Serbs had to be kept together, if possible within Yugoslavia, and, failing that, within a Greater Serbia. This was the view that anywhere Serbs lived, or – in a more extreme variant – were buried, was Serbian territory. The second was the Croatian view that if a harmonious existence within Yugoslavia was not possible, far-reaching autonomy, if not independence, was the alternative. In addition it had to be considered whether the Croats from Bosnia-Herzegovina should not also have the opportunity to join the independent Croatia. These claims on regions originally made the conflicts in Croatia and Bosnia territorial conflicts, with the Serbs in particular demanding their share as the most powerful party: the 'Serbian regions' in Croatia, access to the coast, two thirds of the land of Bosnia-Herzegovina, etc. After that, a start could be made within the framework of ethnic homogenization, distribution of economic prosperity, strategic interests and suchlike, on shuffling the maps, possibly at the negotiating table, but, if there was more to be gained, by a continuation or resumption of the conflict.

The actual reason for the conflict was the unwillingness of Milosevic and other Communists to relinquish power at a time when the rest of Europe was taking its leave of Communism. For him, engaging in war was a way to preserve his position of power and to divert attention from the poor economic situation. In other words, Milosevic was engaged in what is known as social imperialism: aggression as a lightning conductor. Serbian nationalists were behind him in this.

As stated above, the large-scale involvement of irregulars in the conflict made it also a war of criminals. Local warlords and outside gang leaders used the war for self enrichment and they gave the combat a dynamic of their own. It was precisely this irregular nature of the conflict that contributed to a lack of restraint of the violence.⁵⁹⁷ This created even more room for the volunteers, such as the weekend Cetniks, who took part in the war for their 'pleasure'. Some of them were unadulterated nationalists. A significant number of them were the scum of society, 'the philosophy of football hooliganism magnified a hundredfold'.⁵⁹⁸

⁵⁹⁶ Bougarel, Bosnie, pp. 114-115.

⁵⁹⁷ See for this view of the conflict e.g. A. de Swaan, 'De staat van wandaad' ('The state of outrage'), Carré, 17(1994)3, pp. 19-23, especially p. 22; Piet de Moor, 'Aleksandar Tisma', De Groene Amsterdammer, 13/10/93.

The important role played by these irregulars in the war made it easier for others to fight a multitude of personal and local conflicts, arising from quarrels with neighbours, professional envy, and suchlike. This was what was referred to in Yugoslavia as the mali rat, or small war, within the larger conflict.⁵⁹⁹ This created an interplay between violence from outside and locally determined conflicts, with local elites and leaders competing for power, and old village feuds flaring up again. This explains why the arrival of special units in certain areas could so easily produce a chain reaction from village to village of threats and attacks between groups who previously apparently lived peacefully side by side. The paramilitary units, who operated on a larger scale, often received support from members of the local militias, police and radical political parties. Sometimes representatives of the groups referred to, united in the local crisis committee, would call in the assistance of paramilitary units from outside their own region.

Their propaganda of fear and hatred, and terrorist actions allowed the instigators of the war to fulfil their prophecy that ethnic groups would be at each other's throats. For instance, they succeeded in involving ordinary people in their slaughter. In so doing they caused a complete blurring of moral standards so that violence was given free rein. Fear was also an important motivation of the war among all sections of the population.⁶⁰⁰

When the fear that the other ethnic group will strike with murder and rape became large enough, people were prepared to make a pre-emptive strike, which would not be difficult to justify later: if we hadn't done it, then they would have...⁶⁰¹ Radovan Karadzic, the Bosnian-Serb political leader, understood this mechanism all too well: 'Everyone is suspicious of what the other sides are intending to do. So, to prevent anything horrible being done to them, they do it to the others first.'⁶⁰² Time and again, alleged provocation from the other party was discovered, which did not have to be investigated, but created a mechanism of revenge and counter-revenge. The less secure the population became, the easier it became to appeal to fears and feelings of insulted honour, which demanded redress.

The residents of the rural areas, the 'peasants', the 'folk from the hills', came down to the cities to take revenge on the signs of civilization, modernization and cosmopolitanism that were threatening their traditional existence.⁶⁰³

Because the ethnic differences had been preserved more clearly in the countryside than in the cities, and the state television was the pre-eminent source of information, nationalist leaders found it easier to recruit foot-soldiers there to counter the inter-ethnic links that had been created in the cities - mixed marriages, multi-ethnic parties and suchlike. Shades of meaning and voices of reason, whether from their own surroundings or from the international community, no longer had any effect. The black and white thinking - 'us' against 'them'; the countryside against the city; the mythical experience against reason - had gained the upper hand. There was something of a Pol Pot-like intimidation of cities and intellectuals. The population could be mobilized for wars that originally had a predominantly territorial character by appealing to such feelings of dissatisfaction and ethnic sentiments. However, in the course ⁵⁹⁸ Russell, Prejudice, p. 280. See e.g. also Gert van Wijland, 'Autoraces aan de Donau' ('Car races by the Danube'), Elsevier, 10/09/92, p. 71.

⁵⁹⁹ For information on this see e.g. Tromp, 'Moeder'.

⁶⁰⁰ Ivica Ceresnjes, chairman of the Jewish community in Sarajevo: '... the feeling I have is that they are afraid of each other rather than that they hate each other.', in: Max Arian, 'La Benovolencija', De Groene Amsterdammer, 09/06/93, p. 10.

⁶⁰¹ Cf. Maas, Neighbor, pp. 112-113.

⁶⁰² 'We will never again be history's fools', Los Angeles Times, 30/08/92.

⁶⁰³ Hirs & Hellinga, Geit, p. 178; Voet, Hotel, p. 123; Sreten Vujovic, 'An Uneasy View of the City', in: Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 123-145.

of the conflict, ethnic differences grew to such a level as a consequence of the spiralling violence that the ethnic nature of the conflict became dominant.⁶⁰⁴

It was not only fear that drove individual citizens into war, however. The war also offered unprecedented opportunities for enrichment or rising up the social ladder. Individuals were able to take possession of their neighbours' houses, cars and refrigerators, and their wives' and daughters' bodies. Bar owners became local gang leaders, ordinary soldiers became generals, teachers became mayors and professors became ministers.

As the war progressed, the religious undertones of the conflict became stronger.⁶⁰⁵ It was mentioned above that the distinction between Croats, Muslims and Serbs could in principle be traced back to religious differences. However, a strong process of secularization had unfolded in Communist Yugoslavia after World War II. In the late 1980s in Bosnia, only 53 per cent of the Croats, 37 per cent of the Muslims, and 34 per cent of the Serbs, were religious.⁶⁰⁶

In 'Catholic' Croatia in the early 1990s, only one third of all parents sent their children to catechism, and church attendance, in the forty to sixty age group especially, declined sharply. However, there was something of a religious revival among young people and sections of the intelligentsia, which was accompanied by a growing national awareness and a need for support in difficult economic times. There was an increase in the numbers entering the priesthood.⁶⁰⁷

A joke was circulating in Bosnia in the early 1990s that the difference between a Serbian, a Croat and a Muslim was that the first never kissed icons in the Orthodox Church, the second never attended a Catholic Mass and the third never prayed facing Mecca.⁶⁰⁸ Apparently no more than 28 per cent of Bosnian Muslims were actively religious even in the autumn of 1992.⁶⁰⁹ Another joke from the time is the following: 'What is the definition of a Bosnian Muslim? Answer: A Bosnian Muslim is someone who drinks alcohol, eats pork and doesn't pray to Mecca five times a day.'⁶¹⁰ There were even Muslims who had fled from Sarajevo, whose first encounter with Muslim girls wearing headscarves was in the Netherlands.⁶¹¹

The outbreak of conflicts between ethnic groups emphasized religious differences once more, however.⁶¹² For instance, at the start of the war in Bosnia, Muslims who had never done so before started to fast during Ramadan.⁶¹³

In May and August 1991, the Roman Catholic Cardinal Kuharic of Zagreb met the Orthodox patriarch Pavle in an attempt at reconciliation, but it appeared to be more of a ritual than a genuine attempt to cooperate⁶¹⁴ and Pavle especially was increasingly drawn into the political developments. At the start of August 1991, the Conference of European Churches in Geneva produced a report on the deteriorating relations between the churches in Yugoslavia. The report said that not only were politicians exploiting the religious differences, but members of both the Roman Catholic and Christian Orthodox Churches were also intensifying the ethnic conflict with religious polemics. At the same time ⁶⁰⁴ For information on this view of the conflict, see for example S. Radosevic, 'The Collapse of Yugoslavia - Between Chance and Necessity', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, pp. 66 and 78.

⁶⁰⁵ See e.g. Michael Sells, 'Christoslavism 1/The religious component', 27/06/96, <http://www.haverford.edu/relg/sells/postings/christoslavism1.html> accessed on 19/12/00; Russell, Prejudice, p. 194.

⁶⁰⁶ Calic, Krieg, pp. 28 and 30.

⁶⁰⁷ Ton Crijnen, 'Kroaten zien katholieke kerk als dam tegen Servisch gevaar' ('Croats see Catholic Church as dam against Serb danger'), Trouw, 04/07/91.

⁶⁰⁸ Westerman, Brug, p. 74.

⁶⁰⁹ Caroline de Gruyter, 'In de tang van de halve maan' ('In the grip of the half moon'), Elsevier, 14/11/92, pp. 68-69.

⁶¹⁰ Maas, Neighbor, p. 66.

⁶¹¹ Ineke Bijngte, 'Korak. Een eskimo uit Sarajevo' ('Korak. An eskimo from Sarajevo'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 17/11/93, p. 9.

⁶¹² Duijzings, Conflict, p. 5.

⁶¹³ Van Cleef, Wereld, p. 52.

⁶¹⁴ Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the 'Serbian Question'', in: Popov (ed.), Road, p. 261.

as Pavle called for reconciliation, the report quotes him as saying that extremist Croats were committing the same 'brutal atrocities' against the Serbs as the Ustashe in 1941.⁶¹⁵ In the autumn of 1991 Pavle would write to Carrington that the Serbs were being exposed to genocide for the second time in the twentieth century in what he called a new Ustashe state. He said that it was impossible for Croats and Serbs to live together in one state, and he advocated linking parts of Croatia with Serbia.⁶¹⁶ When Milosevic decided at the end of 1991 to call a halt to the war in Croatia, this even met with the objection of the Orthodox Church.⁶¹⁷

At the start of the conflict Serbian-Orthodox clerics were already expressing on television their support for militant Serbs in Borovo Selo and Knin.⁶¹⁸ During the war in Bosnia, Orthodox clerics repeatedly blessed soldiers and paramilitaries and incited them to murder and plunder.⁶¹⁹ Arkan had his recruits baptized in Dahl Cathedral during the war in Croatia in 1991.⁶²⁰ During the war in Croatia almost five hundred churches were totally destroyed or seriously damaged.⁶²¹ Croatian prisoners of war were sometimes forced by Serbs to swallow the crosses they wore around their necks.⁶²²

Later in Bosnia too, close links developed between the Orthodox Church and Radovan Karadzic's political party, the SDS.⁶²³ However, when the consequences of Serbian aggression became visible there in the first months of the war, the leaders of the Orthodox Church started to criticize Milosevic and his supporters for closing their eyes to the crimes being committed there by the paramilitaries. The lower clerics, who were frequently militantly nationalist, maintained close ties with Karadzic and his supporters, however. The leaders in Pale also had a positive attitude to the church and traditional Serbian national values. 'Our spiritual leaders are present at all our discussions and are involved in the decision making process; the voice of the church is respected as the voice of the highest authority', Karadzic said in 1994.⁶²⁴ The nationalist section of the clergy therefore felt more affinity with the Bosnian-Serb leaders than with Milosevic, who they continued to see as more of a Communist, and who had made an arrangement with the church out of pure opportunism.⁶²⁵ Serbs carved crosses with knives in the bodies of Muslims.⁶²⁶ A Muslim was nailed alive to the door of the mosque, with his arms spread like Christ on the cross.⁶²⁷ Mosques were desecrated, and Korans were urinated on.⁶²⁸ Mosques and minarets in Bosnia were among the favourite targets of Serbian soldiers and volunteers.⁶²⁹

However caution is called for in attributing the attacks on Catholic churches and on mosques only to anti-Catholic or anti-Islamic motives. They were also an attack on a culture, a civilization, comparable with the shelling of the National Library in Sarajevo. The wrecking of churches and ⁶¹⁵ "Katholieke Kroaten dreigen orthodoxe Serviërs uit te roeien" ("Catholic Croats threaten to wipe out Orthodox Serbs"), Trouw, 03/08/91. See also Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', in: Popov (ed.), Road, p. 262.

⁶¹⁶ Geert van Dartel, 'Nationalities and Religion in Yugoslavia', in: Van den Heuvel & Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 45; Tomanic, Crkva, pp. 65-73. For Pavle's ambivalent attitude towards ethnic tensions and conflicts in 1991 see also Cohen, Serpent, pp. 152-153.

⁶¹⁷ Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', in: Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 76.

⁶¹⁸ Geert van Dartel, 'Nationalities and Religion in Yugoslavia', in: Van den Heuvel & Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 41. Cf. Blagojevic & Demirovic, Bloedverwanten, p. 31.

⁶¹⁹ For examples see Sells, Bridge, pp. 80-83.

⁶²⁰ Martin Bell, 'I know he's a war criminal but I can't help liking him', Mail on Sunday, 06/06/99.

⁶²¹ Tanner, Croatia, p. 278.

⁶²² Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 77.

⁶²³ Cohen, Serpent, pp. 153-154; Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', in: Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 265-268.

⁶²⁴ Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', in: Popov (ed.), Road, p. 268.

⁶²⁵ Cohen, Serpent, p. 155; Radmila Radic, 'The Church and the "Serbian Question"', in: Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 265-266.

⁶²⁶ Bart Rijs, 'Sporen van een massamoord' ('Traces of a massacre'), HP/De Tijd, 28/08/92, p. 10; Cohen, Hearts, p. 204;

United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, IV.A.42.

⁶²⁷ Maas, Neighbor, p. 7.

⁶²⁸ Maas, Neighbor, p. 8.

⁶²⁹ Moore, 'Aspects', p. 38. See e.g. first the list of 55 Muslim holy places shelled in Sarajevo in: United Nations, S/1994/674/Add. 2 (Vol. II), Appendix 5.

mosques was also an attempt to erase the visible and tangible evidence of Croatian and Muslim presence from the landscape, which was the cultural aspect of ethnic cleansing.⁶³⁰

The form of the conflict was partly determined by the serious shortage of men on the Serbian side. This was compensated by superior artillery strength. This gave the combat in the former Yugoslavia a strong flavour of a war of siege, in which Serbian troops surrounded Croatian or Bosnian cities with terror bombardment, while those under siege were in no position to break out because of a lack of fire power, despite having a numerical majority. For instance, there would often be local standoffs in which the most powerful weapon appeared to be starvation. The Bosnian-Serb Colonel Milovan Milutinovic explained this strategy in the following words: 'We Serbs are like a snake. When we want to eat a frog, we first hypnotize it.'⁶³¹ Because the population of the cities was cut off from food, water, medicines, fuel and the most elementary resources for keeping the city clean, they were at the mercy of the mafia, who were able to make unprecedented profits from all parties in the conflict by cashing in on the needs of a destitute population. Some cities, such as Vukovar and Jajce, were captured only after months of siege. Other cities, such as Dubrovnik or Sarajevo, were able to withstand the siege.

With the exception of the early phases, there was relatively little fighting along clear front lines with the purpose of conquering territory. Where troops opposed each other, they became accustomed to the idea that they had nothing to fear from each other other than mortar attacks. Often they would not even put a guard on sentry duty at night.⁶³²

A much more common objective was the ethnic cleansing of an area, in which members of an ethnic group were caused to leave a city or village. Again, the agent for achieving this was fear, which was employed by the paramilitary units in particular. They put the population into a state of anxiety psychosis by means of a broad spectrum of ill-treatment and threats, oriented towards driving out the population of another ethnic group, in order that their own territory would become ethnically homogeneous: murder, summary executions, torture, rape and other forms of sexual violence, arbitrary arrests and detention, shelling and wrecking possessions. The paramilitaries would often set fire to or blow up houses, after looting them, to make it almost impossible for the population to return. They often sought out members of the elite as their victims. This choice, together with the fact that many of the crimes, including rape, were carried out openly, was intended to enhance the effect of terror on the population. The population that remained often also fled. Otherwise, sooner or later, if they were not killed first, they would be deported or exchanged for prisoners of the other party.

The wars in the former Yugoslavia were therefore a combination of various conflicts on different levels. And just as the conflict had different characteristics and forms, the fighters also differed. As was observed in early 1996 in a final UNPROFOR report: 'This war gave employment to every type of fighter: the mercenary, the regular, the fanatic, the pressed man, the brutal sadist and the villager defending his home.'⁶³³ However, it was a long time before the international community came round to this way of thinking. The fact is that one of the deciding factors in the request for intervention in ex-Yugoslavia was always the lack of clarity on the nature of the conflict among the opinion and policy makers in the West.⁶³⁴

5. Intermezzo continued: the unknown Balkans

'The problem, I fear, is the Yugoslavs themselves. They are a perverse group of folks, near tribal in their behaviour, suspicious of each other (with usually sound reasons), friendly on the outside but very cynical ⁶³⁰ Cf. Tanner, Croatia, p. 278; Maas, Neighbor, p. 85.

⁶³¹ Cited in Westerman, Brug, p. 16.

⁶³² Loyd, War, p. 47. Cf. Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 158-159.

⁶³³ Headquarters UNPF, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, 31/01/96, p. 7.

⁶³⁴ Cf. Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 9.

within, ever ready for a war or a battle, proud of their warrior history, and completely incapable of coming to grips with the modern world
...⁶³⁵

In many respects the West thought of the Balkans as 'foreign' and 'different' within Europe, where assumptions that worked elsewhere did not apply. There were plenty of ideas about the Balkans, but understanding was another matter entirely. And many in South-east Europe itself agreed that this was also too much to expect. Westerners were not infrequently told: 'You are incapable of understanding our fight'.⁶³⁶

The - relatively - limited scope of this report, which focuses on the deployment of the Dutch Airmobile Brigade in Srebrenica, means that it is neither possible nor necessary to go into detail on the image of Yugoslavia that was created in the West.⁶³⁷ This report will, however, cover those elements of the image created that were decisive for the question of whether it was possible and sensible for the West to intervene militarily in (the former) Yugoslavia. It will be evident that a large part of the argumentation surrounding the intervention issue was based on an overestimate of possible Yugoslavian resistance and on an overdose of unsatisfactory historical parallels. There was certainly no shortage of historical analogies in the intervention debates in the West. 'The less they understood the historical context, the more historical analogies they found', a Balkan expert sighed.⁶³⁸ 'Anytime one attempts to grasp the meaning of this Balkan War, a historical phenomenon is invoked by journalists and agents of various governments,' wrote the sociologist Stjepan Mestrovic in an introduction to a compilation in which the representation of the conflict had an important place.⁶³⁹ How true that was is instantly clear from the first contribution in the same collection:

'Former Yugoslavia is not Vietnam, not Lebanon, not Northern Ireland. The more appropriate analogy is Adolf Hitler and, more recently, Saddam Hussein (...) The crisis in the former Yugoslavia has epitomized the choice between the paths of Neville Chamberlain and Winston Churchill.'⁶⁴⁰

It is often unclear whether argumentation is based on insufficient knowledge of facts or that rationalizations were used pour besoin de la cause, dragged in to back up a policy that had already been determined. A further comment is that many contributions in, for example, correspondence columns, appeared to be intended less to contribute to a greater understanding of the actual situation in Yugoslavia than to inject a moral undertone into a domestic political debate.

We will suffice here with a brief mention of the reasoning used and the arguments against them. The reader will encounter similar arguments now and again in the description of the decision-making surrounding the dispatch of Dutch troops. Otherwise we will devote attention here mainly to generally held views in the West. More nationally-determined conceptualizations were mentioned in the description of the attitudes of individual countries in the conflict. Particular attention will be paid here to discussions in the Dutch press, because one of our objectives is to illuminate the relationship between the media and policy.

Knowledge of the Balkans in general and Yugoslavia in particular was scarce in the West. This may seem strange at first sight, in view of the pet status of the country during the Cold War, but it is not. During the two-sided battle from the end of World War II to the end of the 1980s, the intellectual energy of the West was oriented more to potential adversaries, specifically the Soviet Union and the ⁶³⁵ David Anderson in The Wall Street Journal, 21/02/91, cited in Mestrovic, Habits, p. 48.

⁶³⁶ Hirs & Hellinga, Geit, p. 8; Westerman, Brug, p. 143.

⁶³⁷ For a more extensive description of this, see the Naarden and Tromp appendices.

⁶³⁸ Stevan K. Pavlowitch, 'Who is 'Balkanizing' Whom', p. 215.

⁶³⁹ Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), Genocide, p. 13.

⁶⁴⁰ Philip J. Cohen, 'Ending the war and securing peace in former Yugoslavia', in: Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 43.

Warsaw Pact, than to non-aligned Yugoslavia. Stevan K. Pavlowitch, affiliated with the University of Southampton for the history of the Balkans, wrote that western knowledge of Yugoslavia was at a lamentable level: 'The West did not understand Yugoslavia better than it understood Armenia or Georgia, Afghanistan or Cambodia, Somalia or Angola, but Yugoslavia was nearer.'⁶⁴¹ In the eyes of many in the West, it had always seemed that the study of the 'foreign' country Yugoslavia was the realm of eccentrics.⁶⁴² Knowledge of Yugoslavia was also impeded by the lack of freedom of expression in Yugoslavia itself and the fact that for many years research data had to be forced into either a Marxist or a nationalist frame of interpretation.⁶⁴³ This was actually a general problem of Eastern Europe experts.

In the entire western world, the study of Eastern Europe at the end of the 1980s went into crisis because of the end of the Cold War, and it did not emerge for years afterwards.⁶⁴⁴ This lack of knowledge served only to create more room for poorly founded views.

Whereas academic knowledge of Eastern Europe in the Netherlands was not particularly great, knowledge of Yugoslavia was nearly non-existent.⁶⁴⁵ Among the few experts that could be consulted in the Netherlands when the conflicts in Yugoslavia exploded in the summer of 1991 was Z. Dittich, a professor emeritus, who had held the chair of Eastern European history at the University of Utrecht for twenty years. He characterized the Serbs as 'a people who take offence very easily', who had liberated themselves unaided from Turks and Germans, which had made them 'not easy to negotiate or make treaties with'.⁶⁴⁶

The Dutch press and the Yugoslavian conflict

Anyone interested in finding out about and interpreting the developments in Yugoslavia therefore had to resort to the media. It is necessary to make a distinction in the media reporting on Yugoslavia between the audiovisual and the written press. The television depended mainly on pictures. A further problem with television was that TV crews were generally restricted in how long they could operate in the region because of considerations of cost and conflicting priorities, whereas some newspaper correspondents worked there for years on end. In addition, for example, the Dutch public service (NOS) news sent different reporters each time. This form of parachute journalism damaged the continuity of the reporting, and the level of knowledge on which it was based even more.

The Dutch reporting was therefore performed mainly by journalists of the printed media.⁶⁴⁷ In the printed media in the Netherlands, but to a certain extent also on radio and television, there were separate information flows, and they often all went their own way: the reports from the correspondents on the ground, the parliamentary journalism in The Hague, the editorial teams and the contributions in the correspondence columns.

The larger newspapers in the Netherlands had their own correspondents on the ground. For instance, Othon Zimmermann, whose background was in Slavonic studies, had been reporting intensively on the region in the Algemeen Dagblad prior to the outbreak of the conflict. Raymond van den Boogaard reported on the war from Zagreb and elsewhere in Croatia for the NRC Handelsblad. He was previously stationed in Moscow. He regularly submitted reports on hostilities. For the same newspaper, Theo Engelen was closely involved in the reporting as correspondent in Ljubljana and Peter Michielsen provided many opinion-forming articles. De Volkskrant had a contract with Ulrike Rudberg, who provided contributions from Belgrade. Marianne Boissevain and André Roelofs reported for this ⁶⁴¹ Stevan K. Pavlowitch, 'Who is 'Balkanizing' Whom', p. 215; cf. Ivan Banac, 'The Fearful Asymmetry', p. 143.

⁶⁴² Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 5.

⁶⁴³ Cf. Willem Vermeer, 'Albanians and Serbs in Yugoslavia', in: Van den Heuvel & Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, pp. 101-102.

⁶⁴⁴ D.P. K. wrote in 1996 that this crisis 'has now continued for so long that it might more properly be termed a malaise than a crisis', 'From the editor', Slavic Review, 55(1996)4, p. 725.

⁶⁴⁵ Cf. Van den Heuvel, Leven, pp. 8 and 144.

⁶⁴⁶ Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld' ('Afraid of the outside world'), HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p.17.

⁶⁴⁷ Cf. Karskens, Pleisters, p. 259. See also Scholten and Wieten appendices.

newspaper from Ljubljana from the start of the conflict, while Ewoud Nysingh also reported from Belgrade for a time. For Trouw, Nicole Lucas took charge of reporting on Yugoslavia from Belgrade. For the same newspaper, Henk Hirs departed in the autumn for the former Yugoslavia, where he provided reports from various cities. These correspondents generally offered a balanced picture of the local situation and the complex relationships between the parties in the conflict. However, it was difficult to convey this picture effectively, not only to the readership, but also among their peers in the Netherlands.⁶⁴⁸ The rule that applied here was that whoever was closest to the printing press had the greatest influence on what appeared in the newspaper.⁶⁴⁹ For Raymond van den Boogaard, who reported in turn on the wars in Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia for NRC Handelsblad this was the most bitter lesson that he learned from the conflicts: 'The historical picture of that war will not be painted by reporters like me, but by remote observers, who will take a simplified version of the facts and mix it with moral views to construct what the structure of the conflict was and possibly even who was right or wrong.'⁶⁵⁰ He noted 'with disgust' that 'even at my own newspaper' editors urged adopting a position and gave credence to the horror stories that emerged from the combatants' propaganda machines, suggesting that by not adopting a position he was 'on the wrong side' in this war.⁶⁵¹

The conflict in Yugoslavia was not entirely unexpected, neither for the Dutch press nor for Dutch politicians. There were reports in the first half of 1991 on Slovenia's and Croatia's plans to secede, and on Krajina's pursuit of autonomy. The outbreak of war between Serbia and Croatia was anticipated.⁶⁵² As in politics, the dominant note in the press was 'Hopefully, this turns out all right.' On the day before the Croatian declaration of independence, Raymond van den Boogaard reported from Zagreb that, in anticipation of events that he felt would have unpredictable consequences, there was an 'almost uncanny calm'.⁶⁵³

Between the outbreak of the conflicts in Yugoslavia in the summer of 1991 and their (provisional) cessation in late 1995, more than one hundred Dutch journalists, photographers and camera crew would visit the fronts, which made the Yugoslavian conflict 'the best attended war ever' by Dutch journalism.⁶⁵⁴ However, it proved difficult for the Dutch correspondents to break through established news patterns. Interesting items were often not used by their masters in the Netherlands because they usually wanted to hear the news from CNN, the BBC or major foreign press agencies first.⁶⁵⁵ On the other hand, journalists of other nationalities also experienced this phenomenon. BBC correspondent Martin Bell wrote that he likewise ran up against reactions from the BBC newsroom such as: 'Are you sure about this ambush? It's not on the wires yet.'⁶⁵⁶

Furthermore, the Dutch reporting on the conflict was faced with considerable budgetary constraints. Editorial teams did not have the money for long-term war-risk insurance or security arrangements such as armour-plated vehicles and bulletproof vests.⁶⁵⁷ In Germany too, newspapers not always insured their journalists, and there was no money for expensive armour-plated cars.⁶⁵⁸

⁶⁴⁸ See e.g. interviews W. Breedveld, 11/10/00; G. Eickhof, 18/01/00; M. Kranenburg, 13/09/00; W. Lust, 19/07/00.

⁶⁴⁹ Interview M. Kranenburg, 13/09/00. Investigation has shown that in Britain there was also a wide gulf between the reports from Croatia and Bosnia and editorial policy, with the latter having the upper hand, Simms, Hour, p. 301.

⁶⁵⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan', Van Es & Sampiemon & Starink (eds.), Redacturen, p. 217.

⁶⁵¹ Ibid.

⁶⁵² See e.g. Rik Kuethe, 'Van oude partizanen, de dingen die voorbijgaan' ('From old partisans, the things that pass'), Elsevier, 22/03/91, pp. 38-39; Igor Znidarsic, 'Passeport Slovenija' ('Passport Slovenija'), HP/De Tijd, 29/03/91, pp. 38-42; Harry Lensink, 'De geschiedenis als verdeelmes' ('History as carving knife'), HP/De Tijd, 12/04/91, pp. 18-19; Hugo Camps, 'Joegoslavië is science-fiction, meneer' ("Yugoslavia is science-fiction, my good man"), Elsevier, 08/06/91, pp. 38-41.

⁶⁵³ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Stilte voor de storm in Joegoslavië' ('Calm before the storm in Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/91.

⁶⁵⁴ Karskens, Pleisters, p. 255. Cf. ibid., p. 271.

⁶⁵⁵ Cf. the remarks made by Harald Doornbos, reporter for Zuid Oost Pers and Radio 1 in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 260.

⁶⁵⁶ Bell, Way, p. 29.

⁶⁵⁷ See e.g. Karskens, Pleisters, pp. 257, 265, 269 and 283.

⁶⁵⁸ Richter, Journalisten, pp. 133 and 149.

Freelancers were certainly unable to pay the high insurance premiums.⁶⁵⁹ Editorial staff often used these independents to 'spare' their own people.⁶⁶⁰ And freelancers especially were under greater pressure to produce sensational reports than correspondents in regular employment.⁶⁶¹

It was certainly dangerous for journalists in the war areas. Of the 65 journalists around the world who were to die while performing their work in 1991, eighteen died in Slovenia and Croatia. Serbs in Croatia were often unpredictable at best, at worst, the word 'press' on a car windscreen, which afforded a degree of protection to the occupants in many wars, was sufficient reason for them to start shooting.⁶⁶² German and Austrian journalists were the favourite target.⁶⁶³ In May 1992, the Dutch Association of Journalists (NVJ) advised its members not to travel to Bosnia, and those who were already there were advised to seek shelter for the time being, because, according to the NVJ, the parties in the conflict shot at 'everything that moved'. The danger was enhanced even more because combatants would pose as journalists. By that time, 24 journalists had already lost their lives in the war in Yugoslavia in the course of their work.⁶⁶⁴ In August 1993, the Dutch Association of Journalists (NVJ) withdrew their travel and war-risk insurance for Yugoslavia. After that it was only possible to arrange insurance with the same company for ten thousand guilders a week.⁶⁶⁵ At the end of 1993 there were no Dutch photographers working in Bosnia because of the dangers.⁶⁶⁶ In due course, it became possible for NVJ members to hire one of the two bulletproof vests that the association had at its disposal, or to borrow a vest from the Army Information Officer of Dutch Transport Company in Central Bosnia, whose stock was also limited, however.⁶⁶⁷ When, on top of that, Dutch journalists discovered that real news from the front was used only after editorial staff had confirmed it from other sources, the enthusiasm for exposing themselves to risky situations declined rapidly.

The view on the conflict also added to this lack of enthusiasm. Dick Verkijk, not the most easily scared of Dutch journalists, called the Yugoslavian war 'the most pointless in history. Started over nothing and leading to nothing.' First, according to him, there were invented incidents that were blazed about by the Yugoslavian media especially; the invented incidents provoked real incidents; and the real incidents led to escalation. According to him, it was 'not a civil war at all'. Serbian and Croatian citizens fled the disputed area, not out of fear of each other, but of the war-like actions of 'fanatics'.⁶⁶⁸ He considered the risks for journalists to be (too) great. In the Croatian war there was literally no boundary to be drawn: 'Before you know it you are in the "other" area; there are countless enclaves of one party or the other. No party takes risks: they shoot at everything that seems slightly out of the ordinary.' Fronts were seldom cordoned off, so that a journalist could easily wander into the line of fire. 'I have always been prepared to give something for a good cause', said Verkijk. 'But here? In Yugoslavia? This war is a poor cause, not worth dying for.'⁶⁶⁹

The majority of the reports from correspondents therefore consisted of news coming from public relations officials in the capital cities of the various (former) republics, and descriptions of the atmosphere. The approximately seven hundred foreign correspondents who were accredited in Zagreb

⁶⁵⁹ Richter, Journalisten, p. 134.

⁶⁶⁰ Richter, Journalisten, p. 144.

⁶⁶¹ Richter, Journalisten, p. 146.

⁶⁶² Richter, Journalisten, pp. 128, 149, 150.

⁶⁶³ Richter, Journalisten, p. 129.

⁶⁶⁴ 'Bosnië-Herzegovina', De Journalist, 22/05/92, p. 7. For an overview of the incidents in which, by that time 27 journalists had died in ex-Yugoslavia, see: 'Pers onder vuur' ('Press under fire'), De Journalist, 28/08/92, p. 18. In 1991, eighteen journalists died in Slovenia and Croatia; in 1992, eleven in Bosnia; in 1993, eight in former Yugoslavia; in 1994, eight in the Balkans; and, in 1995, four in Bosnia and Croatia, Richter, Journalisten, p. 131.

⁶⁶⁵ 'Sarajevo niet langer automatisch verzekerd' ('Sarajevo no longer automatically assured'), De Journalist, 20/08/93, p. 9.

⁶⁶⁶ For a non-exhaustive list of the photographers who visited the area previously, see Frits Baarda, 'Foto's uit Bosnia veroorzaken niets' ('Photos from Bosnia have no effect'), De Journalist, 19/11/93, p. 19.

⁶⁶⁷ See the advertisement for bulletproof vests that appeared regularly in De Journalist in 1993.

⁶⁶⁸ Dick Verkijk, 'Joegoslavië. De officiële tv wakkert haat aan' ('Yugoslavia. State television fuels hatred.'). De Journalist, 22/11/91, p. 19.

⁶⁶⁹ Dick Verkijk, 'Joegoslavië. De officiële tv wakkert haat aan', De Journalist, 22/11/91, p. 18.

during the war in Croatia based their reporting largely on Croatian sources.⁶⁷⁰ Furthermore, the Yugoslavian Centre for Eurovision was based in Zagreb, so that for a long time reports from Serbia were able to reach the rest of Europe only indirectly. A British colleague criticized the risk-avoiding work ethic of many journalists. In his view, they all too easily assumed that a visit to the front would not yield any new points of view, whereas discussions with authorities would.⁶⁷¹ In his opinion, this attitude was further encouraged by the editorial offices at home, who preferred to read reports containing the familiar names of the most important leaders from well-known places, rather than items that they could mockingly dismiss as local colour stories: better to have an item from Sarajevo than one about Gornji Vakuf, for example.⁶⁷²

Image forming: peoples with a penchant for war

The war in Yugoslavia was represented within the context of the Balkans. The Balkans was an elastic concept. During the Cold War, when Yugoslavia's singular position in the international field of influence was valued by the West, the country was not counted as part of the Balkans, and the term itself had fallen somewhat into disuse, but came back into use immediately after disturbances broke out in the early 1990s.⁶⁷³ War and violence apparently have to be understood within a Balkan context: 'Along with the themes of fragmentation and confusion, violence has become a component of the definition of the term "Balkan".'⁶⁷⁴

For many, the Balkans was seen as a peripheral and underdeveloped area.⁶⁷⁵ 'The Balkans is like a poorhouse, Europe's back yard, that has only marginal significance in international politics.'⁶⁷⁶ Even Maria Todorova, who carried out an extensive study into the negative representation of the Balkan areas, described Yugoslavia as 'a corner of Europe'.⁶⁷⁷

But this image had a reverse side. Especially those who advocated a more active position on the part of the West argued that Yugoslavia, and particularly Croatia and Bosnia, were in 'the heart of Europe',⁶⁷⁸ 'in the middle of Europe, in a country where two years ago millions of Western Europeans still lazed around half naked next to the sea'.⁶⁷⁹ From the point of view of a country such as Austria, ex-Yugoslavia was, of course, 'close to home': 'Bosnia is (...) not "somewhere over there". It is "here".'⁶⁸⁰ Journalists and others repeatedly emphasized that a mere thousand or so kilometres from the Netherlands, France, etc., or two hours by plane, wholesale slaughter of people was taking place.⁶⁸¹

As is the case with so many regions, both a positive and a negative image existed of the Balkans, inside and outside the region. The two images would alternate in time depending on the current ⁶⁷⁰ Simic, 'Yugoslavia', p. 45.

⁶⁷¹ Loyd, War, p. 110.

⁶⁷² Karskens, Pleisters, p. 260; Loyd, War, p. 111.

⁶⁷³ Todorova, Balkans, p. 136.

⁶⁷⁴ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 381. Cf. Bakic-Hayden, 'Orientalisms'; in: Bakic-Hayden & Hayden 'Variations', p. 3; Todorova, Balkans, p. 3; idem, 'Balkans', pp. 453 and 474-475; Caroline de Gruyter, "De Turken komen" ("The Turks are coming"), Elsevier, 01/02/92, p. 32; Papoulia, 'Balkan', p. 206; Laura Silber, 'The terrifying logic of war', Financial Times, 02/09/95.

⁶⁷⁵ Bernard & Schlafer, Bed, p. 9; J.H. Sampiemon, 'Europa in verdacht gezelschap', ('Europe in conspicuous company'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/07/91.

⁶⁷⁶ Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 9. The Balkans or Yugoslavia as back yard also in Anet Bleich, 'Tegen het Wilde Oosten' ('Against the wild East'), de Volkskrant, 29/06/91; Ian Traynor, 'Brussels grapples with biggest blot on new European landscape', The Guardian, 02/08/91; Kalaitzidis, Relations, p. 7.

⁶⁷⁷ Todorova, Balkans, p. 186.

⁶⁷⁸ See e.g. Mestrovic, 'Foreword', Cigar, Genocide, p. xiii; Thatcher cited in Maass, Neighbor, p. 269; Van Cleef, Wereld, p. 134. See how Mestrovic refers to the war in Yugoslavia on the one hand as taking place in the heart of Europe, and on the other hand as a war in a corner of Europe, Mestrovic, Balkanization, pp. vii and ix.

⁶⁷⁹ Tromp, Verraad, p. 30 (20/05/92).

⁶⁸⁰ Bernard & Schlafer, Bed, p. 32.

⁶⁸¹ See e.g. Daan Dijkman, 'Een héél rare oorlog' ('A very strange war'), HP/De Tijd, 07/02/92, p. 7; Daan Dijkman, 'Waanzin' ('Madness'), HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 7; Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', in: Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 37.

circumstances. Milo Anstadt, who in 1993 wrote one of the few Dutch language books on (the start of) the Yugoslavian conflict, summed up the two images as follows 'that the majority of Yugoslavs can be amiable, hospitable, sociable and forthcoming, but also extremely intolerant, bigoted, stubborn and malicious'.⁶⁸²

For instance, in times of hope and expectation it was written that the Balkans were 'the ideal place for bringing about an integration of races and cultures from Europe, Asia and Africa'.⁶⁸³ Some would say that this observation was particularly applicable to Bosnia-Herzegovina, 'a special place, known for the tolerant, civilized interaction of its many ethnic groups. It was a miniature of the multinational Yugoslav state, except that its melting pot really worked'.⁶⁸⁴

Many Europeans also knew Yugoslavia as a pleasant holiday destination.⁶⁸⁵ This applied especially to Germans, who, with three million a year, accounted for one third of the flow of foreign tourists to Yugoslavia.⁶⁸⁶ It applied likewise to the Netherlands, which saw approximately half a million tourists a year depart for Yugoslavia in the second half of the 1980s.⁶⁸⁷ Before 1991, for example, sixty per cent of foreign tourists to the Macedonian Lake Ohrid were from the Netherlands.⁶⁸⁸

It was an experience that could also be of importance for policy makers. The Netherlands Junior Minister of Justice, Aad Kosto, accepted on behalf of the Netherlands three thousand Displaced Persons from Yugoslavia in August 1992 after seeing a news picture of a Bosnian orphan who was wounded when the bus she was travelling on was fired on by a sniper, with the words: 'When I saw that child in that bus, I thought: this is unacceptable. It shocked me. Yugoslavia is so close, you have been there on holiday, you have touched the people there, then this happens there. I therefore think that some of those people should be offered shelter here'.⁶⁸⁹

Unlike the Western Europeans, there was no holiday-experience for most of the American public. They saw Yugoslavia as far away, not only geographically but also mentally. For them, Yugoslavia meant only a basketball or water polo team that could beat the superpowers Russia or America in the Olympic Games once every four years.⁶⁹⁰ But a mixture of respect and fear for the Balkans was not absent among the elite there, as can be seen in the words from 1950 of the American journalist C.L. Sulzberger. He said that the area was:

'a gay peninsula filled with sprightly people who ate peppered foods, drank strong liquors, wore flamboyant clothes, loved and murdered easily and had a splendid talent for starting wars. Less imaginative westerners looked down on ⁶⁸² Anstadt, Servië, p. 128; Milo Anstadt, 'We moeten de mythe van de Servische schuld doorprikken' ('We have to puncture the Serbian blame myth'), NRC Handelsblad, 20/12/94.

⁶⁸³ The Slovenian anthropologist Niko Zupanec in 1920, cited in Blagojevic & Demirovic, Bloedverwanten, p. 6.

⁶⁸⁴R. Gutman, 'Q and A. Why are Yugoslavia's people fighting each other?', Newsday, 12/07/92. See also Gutman, Witness, pp. xviii-xix. Elsewhere, Gutman calls Bosnia-Herzegovina an 'ethnic tinderbox', ibid., p. 4, and a 'powder keg republic', ibid., p. 7.

⁶⁸⁵ For the lack of understanding and the shock of the civil war for Yugoslavia's former holidaymakers, see e.g. Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91; Daan Dijkman, 'Waaizin', HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 7. Vluchtelingenwerk Nederland also attributed the willingness of people to receive Displaced Persons from Yugoslavia in their own family to holiday sentiments, Marianne Fennema, 'Opvang vluchtelingen' ('Accommodating Refugees') CD/Actueel, 12(1992)(5 September) p. 12.

⁶⁸⁶ Oschlies, 'Ursachen', p. 10.

⁶⁸⁷ TK, 1987-1988, 20 564, nos. 1-2, p. 17.

⁶⁸⁸ Van den Heuvel, Leven, p. 166.

⁶⁸⁹ Max van Weezel, 'De verfijnde Balkan-oorlog tussen WVC en Justitie' ('The sophisticated Balkan war between the Welfare and Justice Ministries'), Vrij Nederland, 03/10/92, p. 7. On the other hand, others in the article disputed that this was a correct description of what happened. According to them Kok prevailed upon Kosto to accept the Displaced Persons.

⁶⁹⁰ Cf. Maas, Neighbor, p. 106.

them with secret envy, sniffing at their royalty, scoffing at their pretensions, and fearing their savage terrorists.⁶⁹¹

It should be clear that, in a time of crisis and violence, the positive image of the Balkans, which was characterized by romantic ideas of the passion, the hospitality and the authenticity of the population and the rustic life in the region, hardly rang true. In so far as the positive image still left memories, it was in the form of the pain and lack of understanding felt by former holidaymakers, volunteers in the construction of infrastructure works and admirers of the system of worker self-government in Yugoslavia, because black storm clouds had gathered above the sunny places they loved so much. From 1990, the black side of the Balkans dominated the representation of Yugoslavia. The images that arose from this were hardly contradicted by knowledge of discordant facts.

A counterpart of the romantic image was the idea of the Balkans as an area where irrationality was dominant,⁶⁹² which was a notion that gained in acceptance during the conflict when many Yugoslavs and immigrants from Yugoslavia themselves declared to Westerners that their fellow countrymen had gone collectively mad.⁶⁹³ Irrationality was also raised as an argument by policy makers who felt little inclined to intervene. For instance, the American Acting Secretary of State Eagleburger said the following in September 1992 on the war in Bosnia:

'It is difficult to explain, but this war is not rational. There is no rationality at all about ethnic conflict. It is gut; it is hatred; it's not for any common set of values or purposes; it just goes on. And that kind of warfare is most difficult to halt.'⁶⁹⁴

The author, Wayne Bert, who described American policy on the war in Bosnia, pointed to the paradox that those who used irrationality as an argument not to resort to military intervention, still spent many years attempting to solve the conflict through diplomacy: 'Isn't force the preferred method of influence when confronting forces that will not listen to reason ...?'⁶⁹⁵

Other authors felt they knew exactly where the border between rationality and emotion, civilization and barbarism, lay. Long before Samuel Huntington's ideas on a clash of civilizations became popular in some quarters in the 1990s, there was a view in the West that a boundary existed between what was called the civilized West Roman, Catholic, former Hapsburg northwestern part of Yugoslavia on the one hand, and what was called the less civilized Byzantine, Christian Orthodox or Islamic and former Ottoman southeast of Yugoslavia on the other.⁶⁹⁶ It was an idea that was gladly reinforced by Slovenians and Croats because they found themselves on the 'European-civilized' side of the border as opposed to the darker Balkan side.⁶⁹⁷ There is a certain irony in the two republics that around 1990

⁶⁹¹ Cited in Kaplan, Ghosts, p. xviii.

⁶⁹² See e.g. Lendvai, 'Hass', p. 4; Bart Rijs, 'Vrijheid of de dood' ('Freedom or death'), HP/De Tijd, 16/08/91, p. 24. For a powerful example from a later period, see Olaf Tempelman, 'Servisch irrationalisme. Spookrijders op de westerse snelweg' ('Serbian irrationalism. ghost-drivers on the Western freeway'), de Volkskrant, 02/04/99.

⁶⁹³ See e.g. Levinsohn, Belgrade, pp. 26-27, 89; Bart Rijs, 'Vrijheid of de dood', HP/De Tijd, 16/08/91, p. 25; Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p. 17; Bart Rijs, 'Adagio voor de dood' ('Adagio for death'), HP/De Tijd, 26/06/92, p. 43; P. de Moor, 'Aleksandar Tisma', De Groene Amsterdammer, 13/10/93.

⁶⁹⁴ Cited in Bert, Superpower, p. 102.

⁶⁹⁵ Bert, Superpower, p. 102.

⁶⁹⁶ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 13. See e.g. R.C. Longworth, 'Ancient hatreds heat Yugoslav cauldron', Chicago Tribune, 27/06/91; Willem Wansink, 'Dood aan de Donau' ('Death by the Danube'), Elsevier, 10/08/91, p. 28; Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p. 16. In Germany this notion figured particularly strongly in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, see Mira Beham, 'Die Medien als Brandstifter', in: Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp. 123-124; Henri Beunders, 'Aloude Duitse gevoelens tegen de Serviërs' ('Centuries-old German feelings against the Serbs'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91. A later expression of this border-through-Europe approach is contained in: Peter Michielsen, 'Rome versus Byzantium', NRC Handelsblad, 30/10/99.

⁶⁹⁷ See e.g. Tadjman in: Blaine Harden, 'Yugoslav Regions Assert Independence', The Washington Post, 26/06/91. See also Bakic-Hayden & Hayden, 'Variations', pp. 6-12; Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 24; Kaplan, Ghosts, pp. 25-26; Hugo Camps, appealed most powerfully for the right to self-determination being so willing to subordinate themselves to the larger entity of Europe. The political top and church leaders of Croatia again presented their country to the West, as the Croatian nationalists had done in the nineteenth century, as the bastion against the Islam and Orthodoxy.⁶⁹⁸

Image forming: centuries of violence

'O smallest among peoples! rough rock-throne
 Of Freedom! Warriors beating back the swarm
 Of Turkish Islam for five hundred years,
 Great Tzernagora! never since thine own
 Black ridges drew the cloud and brake the storm
 Has breathed a race of mightier mountaineers.'⁶⁹⁹

Multi-ethnic and multinational empires have been collapsing in the Balkans and its direct surroundings since the nineteenth century. Ethnic cleansing had taken place repeatedly then and during the processes of nation forming that were to follow. The nineteenth century British statesman Benjamin Disraeli had already described the nationalist uprisings in the Balkans as a 'throwback to barbarism'.⁷⁰⁰ The Serbs wreaked havoc in Kosovo during the Balkan wars. During World War I, Turkey violently disposed of one and a half million Armenians. Turks and Greeks drove each other from their own territory. During World War II, Pavelic and his followers attempted to cleanse Croatia. At the end of the World War II, the ethnic Germans were driven out en masse from Sudetenland, Silesia and Vojvodina. On Cyprus, a division was made between Greeks and Turks, which was still in place at the end of the twentieth century. If the twentieth century was indeed 'the century of expulsions' (Günther Grass), then it was certainly true for Central and Eastern Europe.

It was incorrectly concluded from over a century of ethnic tensions in the Balkans that an age-long hatred existed there between groups of the population. 'The war we are now witnessing did not start this summer', commented Peter Michielsen at the end of September 1991 in NRC Handelsblad:

'the war has actually been going on for hundreds of years. The postwar peace - which was imposed by Tito - was an intermezzo: an exception rather than the rule. A Serbian saying has it that a gram of power weighs more than a kilo of brains, and this is the philosophy that, by and large, has always determined the actions of the leaders in Belgrade (and Zagreb). That Western politicians consider that they can settle the account presented by seven hundred years of history by stationing the odd peacekeeping force here and there and sitting

'Joegoslavië is science-fiction, meneer', Elsevier, 08/06/91, p. 39; André Roelofs, 'In Joegoslavië gaat het ook om de grenzen van 'Europa'. Conflict in Balkanstaat is een conflict tussen westerse en oosterse denkwereld' ('In Yugoslavia it's also about the borders of "Europe". Conflict in a Balkan State is a conflict between Western and Eastern mentalities'), de Volkskrant, 10/07/91; Hayden, 'Use', pp. 215-216; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 54, 61-63 and 67; Russell, Prejudice, pp. 156-157; Voet, Hotel, p. 138; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 72.

⁶⁹⁸ Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from Former Yugoslavia', in: Baehr & Baudet & Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, p. 72; Smith, Story, p. 18; Cardinal Kuharic to Fietelaars, see ABZ, DEU/ARA/00408, Fietelaars 410 to Van den Broek, 07/11/91.

⁶⁹⁹ Lord Tennyson, Montenegro.

⁷⁰⁰ appendix Naarden, Beeld en Balkan.

around the table under the flag of decent principles, is, certainly in the longer term, an illusion.'⁷⁰¹

Some even considered that the feuds underlying the conflict were thousands of years old.⁷⁰²

This view of history played an important role in the Yugoslavian conflict, both in the region itself and in the views of outsiders. During his press conference in Belgrade on 4 August 1991, the Dutch Minister Van den Broek already remarked that the European troika was finding it extremely difficult to accept that it appeared impossible to focus attention on the future in discussions with Yugoslavia's leaders; discussions always seemed to have to go back to the past.⁷⁰³ We are like cat and dog, we can never live together, according to the Bosnian-Serb nationalist Karadzic.⁷⁰⁴ The West proved to be very susceptible to this idea that was disseminated so vigorously by the nationalists in Yugoslavia themselves.⁷⁰⁵ Some therefore considered war in this region to be 'a regularly recurring natural phenomenon'.⁷⁰⁶

This view was a powerful argument for not having to intervene.⁷⁰⁷ The American president Bush avoided deploying American soldiers with the comment that Bosnia was about 'a blood feud' and 'a complex, convoluted conflict that grows out of age-old animosities'.⁷⁰⁸ His Secretary of State, Lawrence Eagleburger, did the same in August 1992 at the Conference of London when he referred to the conflict as having 'ancient and complicated roots'.⁷⁰⁹ America's Chief of Staff Colin Powell stated that 'a thousand-year-old hornet's nest' existed in the former Yugoslavia, and 'an ethnic tangle with roots reaching back a thousand years', where it would be better not to sacrifice the lives of American soldiers.⁷¹⁰

Clinton, who at the time of his inauguration as president had said that the war in Bosnia was the consequence of Serbian aggression, was to say a number of weeks later: 'The hatred between all these three groups [Croats, Muslims and Serbs] (...) is almost unbelievable. It's almost terrifying, and it's centuries old. That really is a problem from hell.'⁷¹¹ In a television broadcast in early 1995, Clinton and his vice-president even seemed to be trying to outdo each other in the historical nature of the conflict ⁷⁰¹ Peter Michielsen, 'Joegoslavië vecht tot boedel is verdeeld' ('Yugoslavia fights on until the estate is divided'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/09/91. For other expressions of the conviction of age-long ethnic tensions, see for example Richard Schifter, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, in United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strijde, p. 83; Blaine Harden, 'Yugoslav Regions Assert Independence', The Washington Post, 26/06/91; R.C. Longworth, 'Ancient hatreds heat Yugoslav cauldron', Chicago Tribune, 27/06/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Joegoslavië is niet meer' ('Yugoslavia is no more'), Trouw, 26/06/91; idem, 'Serviërs en Kroaten koesteren oud zeer' ('Serbs and Croats nurse old wounds'), Trouw, 11/07/91; idem, 'Een onmogelijke missie' ('An impossible mission'), Trouw, 03/08/91. See also the remark made by Hylke Tromp: 'We are dealing in the Balkans with conflicts that are hundreds of years old, which have never been solved and never will be unless a world policeman takes action.' in: Max Arian & Joke van Kampen, 'Te wapen' ('Call to arms'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 05/08/92, p. 4.

⁷⁰² See e.g. Snow, Peacekeeping, p. 8.

⁷⁰³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, voorbereiding en verslaglegging bezoeken Trojka aan Joegoslavië, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 253 to Van den Broek, 05/08/91.

⁷⁰⁴ Russell, Prejudice, p. 266; Garrison Walters, 'The Future of History in the Balkans', Thomas & Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 43; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 73.

⁷⁰⁵ See e.g. Magas, Destruction, p. 58; Susan L. Woodward, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina: How Not to End Civil War', in: Walter & Snyder (eds.), Wars, p. 110 n. 7. See also Garrison Walters, 'The Future of History in the Balkans', Thomas & Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 43.

⁷⁰⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan', Van Es & Sampiemon & Starink (eds.), Redacteuren, p. 215.

⁷⁰⁷ Russell, Prejudice, p. 266.

⁷⁰⁸ Cited in Gutman, Witness, p. xxxi.

⁷⁰⁹ Gutman, Witness, p. xxxii.

⁷¹⁰ Powell & Persico, Journey, pp. 281 and 544.

⁷¹¹ Cited in Bert, Superpower, p. 105.

in Bosnia. After Vice-President Al Gore had said that the people there had already been fighting each other for five hundred years, Clinton said that it was probably more like a thousand years.⁷¹²

The most recent crises, from the 1990s, were seen as an 'anachronistic tribal war',⁷¹³ one link in a long chain of tribal conflicts.⁷¹⁴ According to Mestrovic, 'tribalism' was probably the term most commonly used by Western journalists, diplomats and politicians to refer to the conflicts in (the former) Yugoslavia in the 1990s.⁷¹⁵ The reference to tribal relations carried an implied connotation of a reference by the civilized world to the world of savages.⁷¹⁶

The view that the Balkans had been the scene of an age-long bitter ethnic conflict, however, was not correct.⁷¹⁷ Bart Tromp rightly commented that the ethnic differences were only a century old.⁷¹⁸ Until the first Yugoslavia there was little conflict. The medieval empires of Croats, Serbs and Bosnians did not fall because they fought each other, but because of internal differences and because the Hapsburg and Ottoman empires swallowed them up. Croats and Serbs then lived largely separately: the first group in the Hapsburg empire; the second in the Ottoman empire. In so far as Serbs were living in Croatian areas, it was mainly in Slavonia and Krajina, where they took upon themselves the defence of Hapsburg empire, and consequently also of the Croats, against the Turks. Only at the end of the nineteenth century would Serbs and Croats in Croatia be set against each other by a Hungarian divide-and-rule policy. Finally, many Slovenians and Croats, including Josip Broz 'Tito', fought in the Austrian-Hungarian army against Serbian forces in World War I. But many Serbian units also fought on the Hapsburg side against Serbs in that war.

There had been conflict for some time between Serbs and Muslims. Serbian peasants in the Ottoman empire were dominated by Muslim landowners, but the domination did not yet have a bloody aspect. In the early nineteenth century the frictions became more clearly visible. Around 1830 and shortly after 1860, the Serbs drove Muslims out of their central area, which they had managed to wrest from the Ottomans, and in so doing boosted an outflow that had already started in 1804.⁷¹⁹ Between 1875 and 1878 Serbian peasants rose up against the Ottoman regime and at the same time against the Islamic upper class in Bosnian society. However, during the first Yugoslavia the Muslims generally chose the Serb side again.

Croats and Serbs first came up against each other in real life-and-death combat in World War II, but it has to be borne in mind that the conditions for this outburst of violence were created mainly by the foreign powers - Germany, Italy, Hungary and Bulgaria, which had pushed aside Yugoslavian state authority in April 1941. And during the Pavelic regime the Muslims were reputed to be the cream of his Ustashe state. All things considered, the differences between the peoples of Yugoslavia were not age-old and the region that was later to become Yugoslavia was actually fairly peaceful in comparison with Western Europe.

Some commentators felt that, in terms of long-term or violent conflicts, the West had little right to speak. '[W]hat about the English and French, who fought more or less continuously from 1066 to 1815?', remarked Warren Zimmermann, American ambassador in Belgrade at the time of the outbreak ⁷¹² Tromp, Verraad, p. 209.

⁷¹³ Rudolf Gruber, Marjolein Sebregts & Gert van Wijland, 'Acht schorpioenen' ('Eight scorpions'), Elsevier, 10/08/91, p. 26.

⁷¹⁴ Russell, Prejudice, p. xviii. Cf. the opinions cited in Th. Cushman and S.G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), This Time, pp. 21, 28 and 38.

⁷¹⁵ Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), Genocide, p. 15.

⁷¹⁶ Cf. Dunja Melcic, 'Aufstieg und Fall Jugoslawiens: Stationen einer europäischen Tragödie', in: Bremer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, pp. 151-153.

⁷¹⁷ For the criticism of this view see e.g. Fraser, Yugoslavia, p. 1; V.P. Gagnon, 'Historical Roots of the Yugoslav Conflict', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 179; H. Richard Friman, 'Introduction', in: Tomas & Friman (eds.), Conflict, p. 4; Naarden, pp. 2-3; Zimmermann, Origins, p. vii.

⁷¹⁸ Ko Colijn & Paul Rusman, 'Wat moet Nederland met 'Joegoslavië'? ('What should the Netherlands do with 'Yugoslavia?')', Vrij Nederland, 31/07/93, p. 12.

⁷¹⁹ See appendix Duyzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnie (History, Memory and Politics in Eastern Bosnia) of the Yugoslavian conflict.⁷²⁰ 'Not to mention France during the French Revolution or Germany since 1870'.⁷²¹ 'Considering the record for violence of the members of the European community in this century and the fact that one of them developed the art of ethnic cleansing to its perhaps ultimate degree of technical efficiency, the association of the Balkans with extreme violence is ironical at best', the Balkan expert Robert Hayden remarked.⁷²² Minister Van den Broek probably got closest to the truth at the opening of the Yugoslavia Conference on 7 September 1991 under the auspices of the European Community, when he said with diplomatic courtesy: 'The Yugoslav lands are an age-old battleground for imperial ambitions, religious beliefs, political allegiances and ethnic identities. From this angle, Yugoslav history resembles a microcosm of European history.'⁷²³

There were opinion and policy makers in the West who placed the emphasis not so much on (non-existent) age-long ethnic conflicts, but on the frequency and scale of violence in general, on the 'horror' and the 'barbarity' of the Balkans: 'Dreadful things have always happened in the Balkans, simply because the Balkans are the Balkans.'⁷²⁴ The idea of a long tradition of violence in the Balkans had its supporters in Yugoslavia itself. For instance, the Croatian writer Dubravka Ugresic wrote of the 'culture of sticks, clubs and knives'.⁷²⁵ In his younger years, the nationalist Serbian writer Dobrica Cosic devoted much attention to the cult of the slaughter knife among Serbs.⁷²⁶ And the British Yugoslavia expert John B. Allcock observed that it was not insignificant that the novel in which Vuk Draskovic proclaimed himself leader of Serbian nationalism bore the title Nož, which means: 'The knife'.⁷²⁷

Allcock considers the issue of violence in Yugoslavia to be one of the greatest obstacles to understanding the region, and anyone wishing to discuss the subject enters a territory 'where angels fear to tread'.⁷²⁸ Pervasive violence in the Balkans was a central theme of the book Balkan Ghosts by the American Robert D. Kaplan, the text of which was completed shortly before the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia, and which was intended as a travel guide.⁷²⁹ However, the book gained an extra dimension because it is said to have made President Clinton cautious about a military intervention in favour of the Bosnian Muslims in 1993. The question remains as to whether this actually was the case. As will become clear later, Clinton would not have needed such a book. Kaplan himself was later also to question this assertion. He writes correctly that there is little in the book about Bosnia. Only a quarter of the book or thereabouts, approximately 75 pages, is about Yugoslavia. Romania is given far more attention. If policy makers were to base their decisions on such a flimsy basis, it would be cause for great concern, Kaplan thought. He is probably right when he writes that Clinton was only looking for an excuse and may have found it in his book, which would actually disappoint Kaplan, who happened to be in favour of military intervention.⁷³⁰

In January 2001, Clinton sent a letter to Kaplan in which he wrote that he had read more into the book than it actually contained.⁷³¹ Nevertheless the book was indeed characterized by the black sides of Yugoslavian history. There is a constant undercurrent of killing and acts of revenge. The blood drips from the pages. The diversity of murders in Yugoslavia appears to be unlimited: with hammers, with nails, with clubs, with axes; by throwing a child in the air and catching it on a knife; by tying

⁷²⁰ Zimmermann, US, p. 1.

⁷²¹ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 120-121.

⁷²² Hayden, Use, p. 216. Cf. Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 141-142

⁷²³ 'Gebruik geweld om problemen op te lossen niet acceptabel' ('using force as a means to solve problems is unacceptable'), Staatscourant, 10/09/91.

⁷²⁴ Benard & Schlafer, Bed, p. 9.

⁷²⁵ Ugresic, Nationaliteit, p. 37; see also pp. 129-130 on the culture of knives and blood.

⁷²⁶ Job, 'Furies', p. 64.

⁷²⁷ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 398 n. 16. See also Naarden appendix, Beeld en Balkan.

⁷²⁸ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 381.

⁷²⁹ Kaplan, Ghosts, p. ix.

⁷³⁰ Kaplan, Ghosts, pp. x-xi.

⁷³¹ Elsbeth Tiedemann, 'Angst als beleidsmaker' ('Fear as policy-maker'), de Volkskrant, 24/03/01.

someone to a burning tree trunk;⁷³² with sulphuric acid; and through vampirism.⁷³³ Rapes were also committed in abundance in Yugoslavian history.⁷³⁴ In brief, the book appears to foreshadow the war porn that was soon to follow. Everything that was bad, appeared to have its origins in the Balkans: terrorism, the fanaticism of Iranian Fundamentalists and National Socialism.⁷³⁵ Serbs, Croats and others in the Balkans had a closed, tribal character.⁷³⁶ They were prisoners of their own bloodthirsty history, which they repeated endlessly.⁷³⁷ Yugoslavia awaited only the lighting of a new fuse.⁷³⁸

In an attempt to explain the violent nature of the Balkans, reference is made to the repressive character of the Ottoman empire and the cruel punishments imposed by the Ottoman rulers, such as beheading and what was known as impaling - running people through with stakes. A notorious example is the tower of skulls in Nis, which the Turks built after beheading the defeated Serbs there in 1809. There is also a reference to the glamorization of violence through the acceptance of the social banditry practiced by the Serbian Hajduks, which was new life breathed into by the Cetniks and partisans of World War II.

Montenegro and Krajina kept their traditions of violence alive through social and cultural circumstances. In Montenegro, where the hostility between the clans was even greater than that shown to the Turks, it became customary in the nineteenth century to cut off the noses of defeated enemies. 'A constant undercurrent of war was as much a part of the Krajina as a low pressure area was to the Azores', Volkskrant correspondent Frank Westerman wrote.⁷³⁹ Even before the outbreak of the conflict in Croatia, Raymond van den Boogaard wrote about the belligerent attitude of the Serbs there, which was supposed to be linked to their history of resistance against the Turks.⁷⁴⁰ Anstadt, who generally cannot be accused of Serbia-bashing, considers that the Serbs' 'blackguardly past' in the Krajina still rears its ugly head in times of crisis. At the same time, in view of the warlike traditions of the Montenegrins, he says it is 'almost a miracle' that they urged the Bosnian Serbs to cease hostilities during the war in Bosnia.⁷⁴¹

Anyone looking at the history of Yugoslavia and its national predecessors could find an abundance of traditions and incidents that would confirm the violent nature of the societies there. For instance, there were the traditions of vendetta and political attacks, such as the regicide in Serbia in 1903,⁷⁴² of course, Gavrilo Princip's attack on Franz Ferdinand, the attack on Radic, and many others during the First Yugoslavia.⁷⁴³

Various books, with a more or less literary slant, contributed to the image of the Balkans in the West as a traditionally violent society. For Bosnia in particular, the author and winner of the Nobel Prize for literature, Ivo Andric, recorded the culture of violence in his novels and stories, and his books were often referred to as 'a literary blueprint of the passions that plunge the Balkans, and the rest of the world, into madness every few generations, sometimes more often than that'.⁷⁴⁴ Another source of inspiration was Black Lamb and Grey Falcon, the weighty tome about Yugoslavia written in 1941 by the British Rebecca West, who wrote the following about World War I, for example: 'Millions of people ⁷³² Kaplan, Ghosts, p. xxi.

⁷³³ Kaplan, Ghosts, p. xxii.

⁷³⁴ Kaplan, Ghosts, pp. 55, 61

⁷³⁵ Kaplan, Ghosts, pp. xxvii and 56-57.

⁷³⁶ Kaplan, Ghosts, p. 16.

⁷³⁷ Kaplan, Ghosts, pp. xxv and 58.

⁷³⁸ Kaplan, Ghosts, p. 7.

⁷³⁹ Westerman, Brug, p. 41.

⁷⁴⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Angst voor provocaties Servië' (Fear of Serbian provocations), NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/91.

⁷⁴¹ Anstadt, Servië, p. 116.

⁷⁴² Todorova, Balkans, p. 118 attributes great significance to this event in forming an image in the West.

⁷⁴³ See e.g. Johnsen, Enigma, pp. 16-18, Michel, Nations, p. 204.

⁷⁴⁴ Maas, Neighbor, p. 10. See e.g. also Almond, War, pp. 138-139; Beale, Bombs, p. 9; Briquemont, Something, pp. 18, 33, 175; Cohen, War, p. 106; Fraser, Yugoslavia, p. 3; Morillon, Croire, p. 32; interview F. Briquemont, 22/06/00.

were delivered to the powers of darkness, and nowhere were those powers more cruel than in Serbia.⁷⁴⁵ And there were also the youthful memories of the former communist and dissident Milovan Djilas of the Montenegrin village where he was born, which the English edition's cover blurb says 'was nourished by blood'.⁷⁴⁶ Djilas wrote about what he says was an age-old and perhaps even inborn hatred felt by Montenegrins towards the 'Turks' (read: Muslims), partly because of their alleged wrongful possession of sacred Serbian land since the Battle of Kosovo (the "Field of Blackbirds") in 1389.⁷⁴⁷ He provides a bloody account of a slaughter of unarmed Muslims in Montenegro after a murder that took place shortly after World War I, which was erroneously blamed on Muslims. There was a clear pattern in this slaughter that was to prove prone to repetition seventy years later: 'Faithful to the traditions of their forefathers, the mob murdered only men older than ten - or fifteen or eighteen, according to the killers' mercy. Approximately three-hundred and fifty people were slaughtered, all in a dreadful way. In the midst of looting and arson there were also incidences of rape, until then unheard of among the Montenegrins.'⁷⁴⁸

'One of our villagers, Sekula, went from body to body and severed the Achilles tendons. That is what was done to bullocks in the village after they had been felled with an axe, to prevent them standing up if they came to life again. Some of the people who searched the pockets of the dead found blood-soaked lumps of sugar, which they ate. Babies were taken from the arms of mothers and sisters and slaughtered before their eyes. The murderers later justified their behaviour by saying that they would not have cut their throats but only shot them had their mothers and sisters not been there. The beards of the Muslim clerics were ripped off and crosses were carved in their foreheads (...) A group attacked an isolated Muslim farm. They came across the farmer while he was skinning a lamb. They wanted to shoot him and set fire to the house, but the skinning of the lamb gave them the idea of hanging the farmer by his heels from the same plum tree. A practiced butcher split open the farmer's head with an axe, but very carefully, so that he did not touch the torso. He then cut open the chest. The heart was still beating. The butcher removed it with his hand and threw it to a dog. It was later said that the dog did not touch the heart because even a dog would not eat Turkish flesh.'⁷⁴⁹

Beyond a number of minor reprimands, the government left the perpetrators alone.

The step from an age-old culture of violence to a nature of violence was not so large for some authors. The use of violence seemed to be genetically determined, and so 'Balkan Man' appeared on the scene, cursed with a barbaric disposition. It was an idea that was given credence not only outside the Balkans, but also inside. The moderate Bosnian Muslim Zulfikarpasic, for example, based his prediction of a bloody conflict in Bosnia in the early 1990s on the notion that some nationalities faint at the sight of blood, 'but we in the Balkans become delirious, we become intoxicated'.⁷⁵⁰

The idea that the population of the Balkans was predisposed to violence was first given a pseudo-scientific explanation within Yugoslavia itself by the founder of modern Serbian geography, Jovan Cvijic (1865-1927). Cvijic drew a distinction between various ethnic types in Yugoslavia, one of which was the violent Dinaric people, who were mountain peasants that he held responsible for an ancient tradition of violence in Serbian and Montenegrin history.

⁷⁴⁵ Cited in Maass, Neighbor, p. 90.

⁷⁴⁶ Djilas, Land.

⁷⁴⁷ Djilas, Land, pp. 205 and 212.

⁷⁴⁸ Djilas, Land, p. 207.

⁷⁴⁹ Djilas, Land, pp. 208-209. Cf. Cekic, Aggression, p. 18.

⁷⁵⁰ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 151.

Dinko Tomasic, a Croatian sociologist and United States émigré, propagated this view in a somewhat modified form in the late 1940s and early 1950s. He considered Dinaric behaviour to be a social characteristic of the peoples from the Balkans and around the Urals, which originated in the personality traits of power-crazed and rapacious cattlemen-cum-fighters and had not changed through the centuries since the arrival of Genghis Khan.

At the start of the 1990s, another sociologist of Croatian origin in the United States, Stjepan G. Mestrovic, resurrected Tomasic's ideas from their obscurity. He was supported in this by Slaven Letica, a sociologist from Zagreb, who was also an adviser to the Croatian president Tudjman.⁷⁵¹ They described Dinaric behaviour as barbaric, violent, power hungry, emotionally unbalanced, intolerant, suspicious, deceitful, patriarchal, authoritarian and prepared for self-sacrifice. Because the Dinaric type was identified, albeit not exclusively, but still predominantly, with Serbs and Montenegrins, as opposed to Croats and Slovenians,⁷⁵² their book appeared to be a veiled attempt to create a distinction between more civilized Croats and Slovenians on the one hand and emotionally unbalanced Serbs and Montenegrins on the other. In any case, they felt that Tomasic's publications explained why the Serbs attempted to conquer territory from the Croats, violated human rights in Kosovo, and continued to cling to Communism while the rest of Eastern Europe had abandoned it.⁷⁵³ That they did not base their case on empiricism, they hardly considered to be a shortcoming.⁷⁵⁴ As long as there was some 'insinuating evidence'.⁷⁵⁵

In popularized form, similar ideas are also encountered from other late twentieth century writers on Yugoslavia. Blagojevic and Demirovic, for example, write that it cannot be denied that the southern Slavic war habits were still typified by extreme cruelty.⁷⁵⁶ They blamed this on the constant presence of foreign armies and brigandry that led to a patriarchal-heroic culture, which became almost second nature to the southern Slavs.⁷⁵⁷

However, there is no real evidence for the existence of Balkan Man, born for violence, any more than for the corresponding existence of Lebanon Man because a civil war was raging in that country, or for Tutsi Man because the Tutsis carried out the mass extermination of Hutus. Internal conflicts lead to unexpected outbursts of violence. Between 1861 and 1865, the Americans also surprised themselves with the degree of violence they appeared capable of in a civil war.⁷⁵⁸ More Americans lost their lives in that war than in any foreign war that they fought.⁷⁵⁹ After a long quest for Balkan Man, the Dutch journalist Frank Westerman possibly came closest to his essence:

'Perhaps it is like this: Balkan Man lives inside the heads of the people in the Balkans. He is not in their blood or genes. If he is to live on he must be recreated from generation to generation, and, because this has always happened, it seems that he has crept into the nature of the Balkan peoples.'⁷⁶⁰

The epic tales that glorify the heroic acts, the self-sacrifice and the bloody violence have probably been the most important vehicle from generation to generation for this Balkan mutation.

Just as with assertions of age-long conflicts in the Balkans, assertions of endemic violence in the Balkans beg the question of how much the situation there differed from that in the West. After two world wars, with tens of millions of dead and the extermination of six million Jews, a series of colonial ⁷⁵¹ Mestrovic, Habits.

⁷⁵² Mestrovic, Habits, pp. 26, 29-30, 36, 38, 42 and 90.

⁷⁵³ Mestrovic, Habits, p. 51.

⁷⁵⁴ Mestrovic, Habits, pp. viii en 64.

⁷⁵⁵ Mestrovic, Habits, p. 56.

⁷⁵⁶ Blagojevic & Demirovic, Bloedverwanten, p. 48.

⁷⁵⁷ Idem, p. 61.

⁷⁵⁸ Hayden, Blueprints, p. 11.

⁷⁵⁹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 209.

⁷⁶⁰ Westerman, Brug, pp. 196-197.

wars, after the Vietnam War with three million dead, and after the 'clean' Gulf War, it is difficult to raise the 'different-ness' of the Balkans with respect to the use of violence.⁷⁶¹ As the British journalist Anthony Loyd confronted his readers: 'Is dropping fire from aircraft on to civilians in Dresden more acceptable than cutting their throats with a knife in Bosnia? Apparently so.'⁷⁶² The American reporter Peter Maass even expressed a preference for the Bosnian low-tech war. It had:

'the cruel virtue of limiting the carnage each soldier could accomplish. Is a soldier who slits another person's throat more barbaric than a soldier who pushes a button that launches a missile that kills one thousand people? I suspect not. In the pecking order of barbarism, Bosnia's war could be topped.'⁷⁶³

The historian Mark Mazower has pointed out that the discussion of the violence in the Balkans relates not so much to a difference in the scale of violence between the West and the Balkans, as to disgust in the West about what it views as the cruel forms assumed by the violence in Southeastern Europe. That would also explain why the Nazis distanced themselves from certain violent acts in the Balkans during World War II.⁷⁶⁴ And it is why the Italian writer Curzio Malaparte was shocked when Ante Pavelic showed him a basket full of human eyes.⁷⁶⁵ And it is also why Irwin Shaw was appalled in 1964 on seeing a war memorial just over the border between Italy and Slovenia that realistically depicted a partisan running through a German, who is lying at his feet, with a bayonet. There were war memorials throughout Europe, he wrote, 'quietly elegiac or absurdly triumphant, but this one (...) is savagely unique, and perhaps tells us more of the character of the people than they would really wish us to know'.⁷⁶⁶

The humanitarian indignation of the West about cruelty in the Balkans dates back to the middle of the nineteenth century, when such punishments as beheading were being abolished, public executions discouraged and collective punishment declared taboo in Western Europe, while there was an uninterrupted view from the King of Montenegro's palace of Turkish heads drying on poles in the sun.⁷⁶⁷ This divergence of opinions was further reinforced at the end of the twentieth century when the West, at least in the PR sphere, aspired to clean wars, which it had to be possible to see at any hour of the day, even if children were present, on television in people's living rooms. The wars in Yugoslavia transgressed the parental guidance rating of television viewers in the West. This shock was all the more severe because never before had there been a war, not even the 'CNN war' in the Gulf, that had played itself out before the eye of the camera as much as the war in Bosnia.⁷⁶⁸ Originally, the parties under attack both in the Croatian and Bosnian wars imposed hardly any restrictions on journalists. Camera crews stood with their lenses right on top of acts of war.⁷⁶⁹ The Western television viewer was treated to 'prime time horror'.⁷⁷⁰

Allcock also suggests that the cause of the difference between the West and the Balkans is probably mainly that the West has discouraged the 'display' of violence and that violence is applied more professionally and has passed into official hands. The official monopoly on violence has been put into practice less in the Balkans than in the West.⁷⁷¹ The delay in this process of modernization resulted from the fact that parts of this area - Krajina, the fringes of the Ottoman empire, Montenegro with its ⁷⁶¹ Cf. Hayden, Blueprints, p. 3.

⁷⁶² Loyd, War, p. 141.

⁷⁶³ Maass, Neighbor, p. 150.

⁷⁶⁴ Mazower, Balkans, pp. 148-149.

⁷⁶⁵ Bell-Fialkoff, 'History', pp. 116-117.

⁷⁶⁶ Cited in: Job, 'Furies', p. 54.

⁷⁶⁷ Djilas, Land, p. 10.

⁷⁶⁸ Bell, Way, p. 137; Richter, Journalisten, p. 126.

⁷⁶⁹ Richter, Journalisten, pp. 126-127.

⁷⁷⁰ Wall Street Journal, 28/05/92, p. A10, cited in Th. Cushman & S.G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), This Time, p. 9.

⁷⁷¹ Allcock, Yugoslavia, pp. 383-384. See also Tromp, Verraad, p. 210 constantly threatened autonomy - remained border regions for a long time. Society remained, as it were, militarized. This was so during World War II to an extreme extent and remained so after 1945 through the development of the doctrines of the popular and territorial defence. The obvious presence of the military in the communist hierarchy showed that the social differentiation between the section of society that may legitimately make use of violence and the section that may not was not well developed in Yugoslavia. Military values and military expertise were therefore widespread in Yugoslavian society. They were highly regarded and there was no clear distinction between the military and political elites. Allcock's vision is also supported by the view that, in Yugoslavia at the end of the twentieth century, the civic culture of the large cities had not yet gained the upper hand over the culture of the countryside, where a combination of peasant and military values and traditions were held in high esteem.⁷⁷²

Vendetta, which is often put forward as an example of revenge, wilfulness and lack of personal emotional control, is likewise a consequence of the imperfectly developed state system. It would disappear the more the state took over the monopoly on violence; it would reappear in times of declining state authority. In the meantime, vendetta had become a structured social process. It worked to a fixed code; there was no question of wilfulness, it was more of a social obligation.⁷⁷³

Allcock also points out that the question often asked in the West about the conflicts in Yugoslavia in the 1990s, 'How can they do such a thing to their neighbours?' can therefore be answered in part by saying 'Their neighbours would be precisely who they would do it to'. There was a tradition in the Balkans, where people lived on boundary lines and where vendetta was an established custom, to single out the next-door neighbours for action. It has been estimated that in 1989 it was not safe for 17,000 Albanians in Kosovo to set foot outside the door, because of the risk of being involved in a vendetta.⁷⁷⁴

Finally, there was also the revenge against foreign oppressors, which was particularly highly regarded through the esteem in which the social banditry of, for example, the Hajduks was held, and which lived on in folklore and provided role models for the use of violence. The glamorization of partisan heroes was an extension of this tradition: 'In this respect, Communism enshrined violence, rather than ending it.'⁷⁷⁵ There was good reason for various paramilitary leaders to hark back to the older role models by referring to themselves as Vojvoda or Cetnik. In the early 1990s, once the enemy images in which Serbs and Croats saw each other as Cetniks and Ustashi had become established, the frozen images from the civil strife during World War II served both as role models and a justification for extreme violence.⁷⁷⁶

However, there is evidence that not everyone in Serbia and Montenegro in the early 1990s was affected by the glamorization of the military tradition in Serbian literature, in that in the summer of 1991 many thousands of Serbian and Montenegrin young people and reservists dodged military service and even fled the country, and mothers organized protest meetings to demand their sons' release from the JNA.⁷⁷⁷

Like the myth of age-old ethnic conflicts, the reputation of endemic violence in the region worked to the advantage of the nationalists in Yugoslavia who were trying to prevent intervention by the West. From the top to the bottom, the cry of war appeared to fulfil this function for the Bosnian-Serb politicians and soldiers. For instance, the Belgian journalist Dirk Draulans recorded the following from the mouth of a Bosnian-Serb commander: 'No one can defeat us (...) because of all the peoples in ⁷⁷² Dimitrios Kyriakou, 'Civil Society and Civil War in Bosnia', in: Danopoulos & Zirker (eds.), Relations, p. 248.

⁷⁷³ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 389.

⁷⁷⁴ Westerman, Brug, p. 175.

⁷⁷⁵ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 393.

⁷⁷⁶ Hayden, 'Use', p. 214.

⁷⁷⁷ Cf. Blaine Harden, 'Thousands of Serbs Evade Call-Ups; Young Men Hide From Military Service in Yugoslav Crisis', The Washington Post, 25/07/91.

the world we love war the most.'⁷⁷⁸ A Bosnian-Serb official said to the American journalist David Rieff: 'Wait until the coffins start coming back from Bosnia'. 'You are not a strong nation any more. You cannot stand the idea of your children dying. But we Serbs can look at death. We are not afraid. That is why we will beat you even if you come to help these Turks you love so much.'⁷⁷⁹

The Western media accepted too easily the assertions of the nationalists in Yugoslavia that the bloody history of the past explained everything. Because no violence had broken out in Europe for decades, it did appear that the roots of the extreme violence that were starting to sprout in Yugoslavia must lie in the distant past, in memories and historical analogies.⁷⁸⁰ The adjective therefore used to describe the cruelty that took place in the former Yugoslavia was often 'medieval'.⁷⁸¹ With this inflated view of history, the media helped accentuate the ethnic nature of the conflicts and they had no regard for the fact that the background to the disputes was so much more varied and could be interpreted in so many other ways.⁷⁸²

Not only did the media help legitimize the conflict in this way, they also offered a justification for not intervening.⁷⁸³ According to the senior American diplomat Richard Holbrooke, this fallacy of age-long tribal conflict between Serbs, Croats and Muslims largely determined the Washington government's policy on the conflict until the mid 1990s.⁷⁸⁴ The same applied to the notion that cruelty was part of the natural state of the Balkan people.⁷⁸⁵ The idea that the governments and population in the Balkans were more primitive and more violent than those in the West discouraged many a government from involving its 'boys and girls' in an attempt to bring the conflict in the former Yugoslavia under control.⁷⁸⁶ If the violence had already persisted for centuries, one also had to wonder how long the conflict would last this time. The American military expert and political scientist Edward Luttwak was of the opinion that the international community would be well advised to abandon the former Yugoslavian areas to their fate, in view of the fact that the level of civilization of the population groups fighting in Bosnia was so low that they could well continue massacring each other for a century.⁷⁸⁷

However, Holbrooke himself demonstrated that such a representation does not necessarily have to infer remaining aloof, when he wrote the following about a quarrel between Tudjman and Izetbegovic: 'An aspect of the Balkan character was revealed anew: once enraged, these leaders needed outside supervision to stop them from self-destruction.'⁷⁸⁸ For some commanders of the UN forces on the ground, the tradition of violence actually offered the argument that force could be used because that was precisely the language that people understood in the Balkans.⁷⁸⁹

Views on multi-ethnicity

The assumed inevitability of ethnic conflict was also not accepted by everyone in the West. We have already seen that this applied to a large proportion of senior civil servants in the Netherlands Ministry ⁷⁷⁸ Draulans, Mirjana, p. 95.

⁷⁷⁹ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 160.

⁷⁸⁰ Cf. Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 2.

⁷⁸¹ See e.g. Fisher, 'Ethics', p. 58. Criticism on this e.g. in Pfaff, 'Invitation', p. 97

⁷⁸² For a bitter indictment of this 'help' from the international media to the 'savages' who caused the war in Yugoslavia, see Nenad Fiser, 'Dance macabre van Western media', de Helling 6(1993)3, pp.19-21; Garrison Walters, 'The Future of History in the Balkans', in: Thomas & Friman (eds.), Conflict, pp. 43-44; cf. Chuck Sudetic, 'The Crime and the Witness', in: Haviv, Blood, p. 11.

⁷⁸³ Zimmermann, US, p. 1.

⁷⁸⁴ Holbrooke, War, p. 23.

⁷⁸⁵ Cf. Pfaff, 'Invitation', p. 99.

⁷⁸⁶ Todorova, Imagining, p. 185; Holbrooke, War, p. 23; Th. Cushman and S.G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), This Time, p. 23.

⁷⁸⁷ Cited in Mock (Hg.), Balkan-Dossier, pp. 84-85.

⁷⁸⁸ Holbrooke, To End, p. 165.

⁷⁸⁹ See e.g. Major, Autobiography, p. 542.

of Foreign Affairs after Van Walsum unleashed the discussion on Yugoslavia's internal borders. Perhaps the Dutch who lived in the era of 'pillarization' of their own society could have understood something of the situation where Muslims and Serbs lived both alongside and in opposition to each other. And perhaps the Dutch from the colonial East Indies, where society was divided into Europeans, Indonesians, and Chinese, with Indo-Europeans as a sort of in-between category, could have understood something about strict separation. But not the Dutch from the post-pillarization Netherlands, where the multicultural society had been raised to the highest political importance, and where the white culture was still sufficiently dominant to create the expectation that it would eventually overrun or overwhelm all other cultures on Dutch soil.⁷⁹⁰

As the Dutch Minister Van den Broek said in the Dutch Lower House on 21 November 1991, a political solution was being sought for Yugoslavia that also introduced in the Balkans the notion that, as such, multinational states are an idea of the current time. In other words, different ethnic factions living together within one national unit (...) should be considered part of the normal, civilized practice of the current time.⁷⁹¹ What applied to Yugoslavia as a whole, and at that time to Croatia in particular, also applied later specifically to Bosnia-Herzegovina. On 21 October 1994, the European Affairs Department of the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs was able to proudly note: 'The Bosnian government's endeavour to maintain Bosnia-Herzegovina as a single multicultural national unit has always enjoyed the warm support of the Netherlands.'⁷⁹²

There was great intransigence regarding ethnic separation, especially among American opinion and policy makers. There were a number of reasons for this. If the process of ethnic homogenization was not halted, it would be imitated in the rest of Eastern Europe or the Soviet Union.⁷⁹³ Many also thought that a compromise would seriously erode the standards and values that the West attempted to uphold. In this sense, the process could even represent a moral undermining of Western Europe.⁷⁹⁴ Americans could say this all the easier because they could all too easily equate the multi-ethnicity of their own society, 'the most successful multiethnic country in the world',⁷⁹⁵ which had been created through immigration, with the multi-ethnicity that either existed or must be preserved or created in Yugoslavia, and in particular in Bosnia.⁷⁹⁶ As Senator Joseph R. Biden of Delaware presented to his audience early in 1991: 'They [the United States] have more people with greater ethnic diversity than you have in the country of Yugoslavia, and they live very, very well. There is some magic about America that seems to be missing in other parts of the world...'⁷⁹⁷ 'Lord of Mercy', sighed Clinton to journalists, 'there's 150 different racial and ethnic groups in Los Angeles County...'⁷⁹⁸ If this attitude was not enough to lead to military intervention, then at least it would lead to sympathy for the Bosnian government, which was assumed to be a supporter of a multi-ethnic society.⁷⁹⁹ Warren Zimmermann, American ambassador in Belgrade at the outbreak of the Yugoslavian conflict, considered that, with the exception of Japan, all states in the world were multi-ethnic. 'History does not favour the nation-state concept (...) If stability cannot be constructed on a multinational principle, (...) then the twenty-first century will be an unstable time for us all.'⁸⁰⁰

What was at least as fatal as the overaccentuation of ethnic differences to the West's assessment of the conflict in Yugoslavia was the lack of attention to internal differences within the ethnic groups.

⁷⁹⁰ Cf. Karahasan, Sarajevo, p. 54; Westerman, Brug, p. 25.

⁷⁹¹ TK, 1991-1992, Proceedings, p. 1647.

⁷⁹² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00797. Memorandum DEU to Van Mierlo, 21/10/94 no. 837.

⁷⁹³ See e.g. Pfaff, 'Invitation', pp. 97-99 and 105-106.

⁷⁹⁴ Pfaff, 'Invitation', p. 107.

⁷⁹⁵ Zimmermann, 'US', p. 4. Similar in Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 218 and 244. See also Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 10: 'the most successful multicultural society in history'.

⁷⁹⁶ Cf. Kumar, Divide, p. 144 n. 19.

⁷⁹⁷ United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, p. 131.

⁷⁹⁸ The editors, 'The Abdication', in: Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 172.

⁷⁹⁹ See e.g. Pfaff, 'Invitation', p. 104.

⁸⁰⁰ Zimmermann, 'US', p. 4.

For instance, the Serbs were a far less homogeneous group than the leaders in Belgrade liked to pretend. History has shown that one quarter of the Hapsburg army that invaded Serbia in 1914 consisted of Serbs from Krajina.⁸⁰¹ The enormous problems that arose in 1991 with the turnout of conscripts in Serbia for the 'brotherly assistance' to their fellow-sufferers in Croatia were typical. This was precisely the reason that the political effect of the West's weak and poorly monitored sanctions on Serbia on account of the Bosnian Serbs' behaviour could be so significant, because Milosevic realized that the willingness in Serbia to suffer for the brothers on the other side of the Drina was not great.

Image forming and intervention: the Balkans as the powder keg of Europe

In addition to the fear of the violence that was considered possible within Yugoslavia, there was fear in the West of an international escalation resulting from conflicts there. The idea that the Balkans was the powder keg or the hotbed of Europe goes back as far as the nineteenth century.⁸⁰² A simplistic historical account has it that World War I was ushered in by the shot fired in Sarajevo by Gavrilo Princip on 28 June 1914, which killed Archduke Franz Ferdinand, the crown prince of Austria-Hungary, and which according to the historical image was heard throughout the world. As the American journalist John Gunther, who was popular at the time, wrote in his Inside America: 'It is an intolerable affront to human and political nature that these wretched and unhappy little countries in the Balkan peninsula can, and do, have quarrels that cause world wars.'⁸⁰³ Some people considered that almost eighty years later Sarajevo could again play its nation-destroying role.⁸⁰⁴ 'Everything came back to the surface and personally I saw the ghost of August 1914 rise again', wrote Minister of Foreign Affairs Roland Dumas with a sense of drama.⁸⁰⁵

The comparison between Sarajevo in 1914 and Sarajevo in 1991/1992 was rather meaningless, however. Europe was not 'a tinderbox awaiting a light' as it was in 1914.⁸⁰⁶ In 1914 it was not so much that the Balkans was the powder keg, but that a fuse was placed there by two powerful alliances, on the one hand France, Great Britain and Russia, and on the other Germany, Austria-Hungary and, in theory, Italy. The powder keg itself existed primarily in Western Europe. Alliances that would facilitate an escalation and chain reactions, such as in 1914, did not exist in 1991. In 1914 war was not excluded as a means by the great powers; in the early 1990s they actually went to great lengths to avoid being drawn in.⁸⁰⁷

The powder keg argument could be used for various political objectives: non-intervention to avoid giving the powder keg a chance to explode, containment, or, conversely, intervention, to avoid a ⁸⁰¹ Russell, Prejudice, p. 185.

⁸⁰² 'Afsplitsing' ('Separation'), de Volkskrant, 27/06/91; Larrabee (ed.), Powder Keg, p. xi; Peter Michielsen, 'Breuk Joegoslavische federatie maakt van Balkan weer kruitvat' ('Breach in Yugoslav Federation makes Balkans powder keg once more'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91; James Baker, cited in: 'VS en Europa achten situatie zeer bedreigend' ('US and Europe regard situation as highly threatening'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Buren van Joegoslavië houden het kruit droog' ('Yugoslavia's neighbours keep their powder dry'), Trouw, 23/07/91; Weithmann, Brandbaard, p. 10; Crnobrnja, Drama, p. xii; Naarden, Beeld en Balkan; Papoulia, 'Balkan', p. 197; Peternel, Joegoslavië, p. 49; Simic, 'Europe', p. 4; Todorova, 'Balkans', p. 475. See e.g. also the six articles on the Balkans in Elsevier, 27/06/92, that were illustrated with a cartoon of a bomb with a burning fuse. and the words 'The Balkans Hotbed'; H. Lenselink, 'Buiten onze grenzen' ('Beyond our borders'), De Banier, 22/08/91, p. 12; Marcel van Lingen, 'Bonden lakoniek over actie Joegoslavië' ('Alliances laconic about action on Yugoslavia'), Het Parool, 06/06/00.

⁸⁰³ John Gunther, Inside Europe, New York 1940, p. 437.

⁸⁰⁴ See e.g. Strausz-Hupé, 'Rendez-vous'; Willem Wansink, 'Kruitvat Sarajevo' ('Powder keg Sarajevo'), Elsevier, 27/06/92, p. 37.

⁸⁰⁵ Original: 'Tout revenait au jour et, personnellement je voyais ressurgir le spectre d'août 1914', Dumas, Fil, p. 352.

⁸⁰⁶ Pfaff, 'Invitation', p. 107.

⁸⁰⁷ Cf. Niall Ferguson, 'Europe Nervosa', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, pp. 131-132; Pierre Hassner, 'From War and Peace to Violence and Intervention. Permanent Moral Dilemmas under Changing Political and Technological Conditions', in: Moore (ed.), Choices, p. 14; Larrabee, 'Memories', pp. 71-72; Papoulia, 'Balkan', pp. 198-199; H.J.A. Hofland, 'Een zwerm spoken' ('A swarm of ghosts'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91; H.L. Wesseling, 'Sarajevo 1914-1994', NRC Handelsblad, 21/07/94; Frans Altling von Geusau, 'Joegoslavië kan niet uiteenvallen' ('Yugoslavia cannot fall apart'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/08/91; Jacques Rupnik, 'Les enjeux internationaux', Rupnik (ed.), Sarajevo, p. 115.

world conflagration.⁸⁰⁸ It was, for example, the argument that Van Eekelen used for dispatching a WEU peacekeeping force.⁸⁰⁹

Many mentioned the fear that the war in the former Yugoslavia would spread from Croatia and Bosnia to, for example, Kosovo and Macedonia, and then move on by involving, for example, Albania and Greece, and then would spread throughout the Balkans.⁸¹⁰ This argument weighed heavily with Van den Broek: "Those who have read the history of the Balkans know how unpredictable the area is. How it can escalate."⁸¹¹

There were also fears that the balkanization of Yugoslavia would be imitated elsewhere, for example in the (former) Soviet Union. Van den Broek, for example, was an adherent of this view: "This conflict has within it the danger of a risky escalation. My thoughts turn to such places as the Moldovas, the Nagorno-Karabakhs, the Ossetias and the Abkhazias. Coming events cast their shadows if we accept what is happening in Yugoslavia. And we will just have to wait how the situation develops between Russia and the Ukraine regarding Crimea."⁸¹²

The late twentieth-century counterpart of the powder keg was the 'hornets' nest', a much used metaphor in the media for the conflict-torn (former) Yugoslavia, which implied that the West would be better to stay outside, unless they wanted to be stung.⁸¹³ The hornets' nest metaphor was also used among policy makers. For instance, back in July 1991, the Eastern Europe Department of the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs asked whether the countries of the European Community would 'venture deeper into this hornets' nest', should the conflict in Yugoslavia escalate further.⁸¹⁴

⁸⁰⁸ Cf. Caroline de Gruyter, 'Wachten op een Churchill' ('Waiting for a Churchill'), Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 32.

⁸⁰⁹ TV, Nederland 3, NOS Laat, 16/09/91, 10.30 p.m.

⁸¹⁰ See for example Van Eekelen, Security, pp. 141-142; Major, Autobiography, p. 535; Moore, 'Aspects', pp. 38-42; Voorhoeve in: Huib Goudriaan, 'Toekijken werkt als boemerang' ('Looking on will rebound like a boomerang'), Trouw, 17/11/92; Manfred Wörner in: Herbert Kremp, 'Wir müssen den grossen Balkankrieg verhindern', Die Welt, 25/01/93; R. Gutman, 'Q and A. Why are Yugoslavia's people fighting each other?', Newsday, 12/07/99; Warren Christopher, cited in: Gutman, Witness, p. xxxviii; Caroline de Gruyter, 'De Turken komen', Elsevier, 01/02/92, p. 32-33; Hans Van den Broek in: Leonoor Meijer, 'Joegoslavië gruwelijke voorbode' ('Yugoslavia a terrible omen'), Trouw, 12/06/92 en in: Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: 'Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg'' ('Minister Van den Broek: "I'd say start with a shot across the bow"'), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10; Caroline de Gruyter, 'Smeulend vuur in Kosovo' ('Smouldering fire in Kosovo'), Elsevier, 18/07/92, p. 31; Auke Kok & Bart Rijs, 'Oorlog of vrede' ('War or peace'), HP/De Tijd, 11/09/92, pp. 22 and 24; Frans van Deijl and Auke Kok, 'Mission impossible', HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p. 16; B. Rijs, 'Meneer de president' ('Mister President'), HP/De Tijd, 05/02/93, pp. 14-20; W.F. van Eekelen in: 'Europese veiligheid in een veranderende wereld. Speech given at the general meeting on 28 October 1992 in Soesterberg', Carré, 16(1993)1, p. 11; M. van den Doel in: Michiel Zonneveld, 'Actie in Joegoslavië kan jaren duren' ('Action in Yugoslavia could take years'), Het Parool, 10/06/92; Bart Tromp, 'Derde Balkanoorlog is in voorbereiding' ('Third Balkan War in the making'), Het Parool, 01/08/92.

⁸¹¹ Interview Van den Broek, 15/11/99.

⁸¹² Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: "Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg"', Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10.

⁸¹³ Anstadt, Scheuren, p. 136; Nicole Lucas, 'Joegoslavië is niet meer', ('Yugoslavia is no more') Trouw, 26/06/91; idem, 'Serviërs en Kroaten koesteren oud zeer', Trouw, 11/07/91; Z.R. Dittrich in: Steven de Vogel, 'Zeven argumenten om Joegoslavië heel te houden' ('Seven arguments for keeping Yugoslavia together'), Vrij Nederland, 13/07/91, p. 7; Peter Michilesen, 'Bosnië meegesleurd in kolkend conflict' ('Bosnia dragged into fermenting conflict'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/91; Meijers, 'Joegoslavië', pp. 157, 158 and 160; Bob van den Bos, 'Strategische keuzen in ons buitenlands beleid' ('Strategic choices in our foreign policy'), Idee, 14(1993)(September) p. 11; Frans van Deijl & Auke Kok, 'Mission impossible', HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p. 18; Willem Wansink, 'Kruitvat Sarajevo' ('Powderkeg Sarajevo'), Elsevier, 27/06/92, p. 37; retired serviceman J. Scholten in EV, 'Militair ingrijpen. Was het de moeite waard?' ('Military intervention: Was it worth it?'), Vrij Nederland, 15/08/92, p. 10; Colonel A.W. van Koeveringe (ret.) in: Remco Meijer, 'Een harde job' ('A tough job'), Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 32. Weisglas in: Jan van der Ven, 'Ingrijpen in Servië voor CDA al reëel' ('Intervention in Serbia a realistic prospect for CDA'), Het Parool, 15/06/92; the Chairman of the General Federation of Military Personnel B. Snoep in: Marcel van Lingen, 'Bonden lakoniek over actie Joegoslavië', Het Parool, 06/06/92; Bart Tromp, 'Derde Balkanoorlog is in voorbereiding' ('Third Balkan war on the way'), Het Parool, 01/08/92. Moreover, the 'hornets' nest' metaphor for Serbia was also used shortly after World War I, Todorova, Balkans, p. 120. A less common label for Yugoslavia was 'snake pit', see e.g. Voorhoeve in: Bayer, 'Noodzaak', p. 5.

⁸¹⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië/scenario's en beleidsmogelijkheden' for Extra CoPo, The Hague 19/07/91, 18/07/91.

Non-intervention, however, could lead to recriminations framed in other historical analogies. In discussions on whether or not to intervene in Yugoslavia, comparisons were repeatedly drawn with the aloofness of the West at the time of Nazi Germany's expansionism: with the appeasement of Munich in 1938, the unwillingness to die for Gdansk⁸¹⁵ and the Western non-intervention policy during the Spanish civil war.⁸¹⁶

Image forming and intervention: the misconceptions surrounding the partisan conflict

Likewise, the quagmire was a regularly recurring metaphor for the situation in Bosnia.⁸¹⁷ It was most commonly used by those who feared that by supplying troops the West would sink into a guerrilla war.

One of the historical analogies that cropped up frequently in the intervention debate at the end of the twentieth century was concerned with assertions about the difficulties that German troops were said to have had in Yugoslavia half a century earlier during World War II because of the strength of the partisan resistance. It was not only an argument pour besoin de la cause. Genuine supporters of intervention also felt shaken by the argument that Tito's partisans in the hilly and wooded territory had succeeded in restraining twenty German divisions.⁸¹⁸

Some even went further than the number of twenty divisions. The Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs W. Claes said on Dutch television in December 1992: 'If you consider that during World War II more than forty German divisions, armed to the teeth, were powerless to control the area, then one has to think twice [before resorting to military intervention].'⁸¹⁹ And Lieutenant Colonel M. van den Doel, who was affiliated with the Clingendael institute for international relations for security and defence issues, even thought that the Germans had lost six divisions in trying to overrun Serbia from Croatia.⁸²⁰

The comparison did not hold true. It led both to underestimating the West's own strength and overestimating the danger to be feared from the Serbian side. To start with, the historical 'facts' are flawed. In the first place, as stated in the 'Previous history' section of this report, the Germans had easily crushed the Yugoslavian army in 1941. Secondly, the German military force in Yugoslavia during World War II was not as large as some assumed. If all units had been at full strength, at some point they would have had 36,000 men in Serbia and Croatia together, 16,000 men plus a few Bulgarian and Croatian divisions in Bosnia, and 12,000 in Albania. Including Croatian and other units, the number of troops did not exceed one hundred thousand.⁸²¹ Until the summer of 1943 there were only four, low quality, German divisions in Yugoslavia. Two reserve divisions were added in August of that year. When, one month later, the Italians withdrew from the war, the Germans doubled their military force ⁸¹⁵ See for example Cohen, War, p. 136; Weithmann, Brandhaard, p. 7; 'Bosnië een tweede "München"' ('Bosnia a second Munich'), CD/Actueel, 13(1993) (15 May) p. 11; Van den Broek in: Theo Brinkel, 'Europa mag nooit op geweten hebben dat moslims van kaart worden geveegd' ('Europe must never have the decimation of the Muslims on its conscience'), CD/Actueel, 29/01/94, p. 13; American senator Pat Moynihan, cited in G.F. Will, 'How Can We Help End Bosnia's War?', Newsday, 11/08/92; Sharp, Balkans, p. 19.

⁸¹⁶ See e.g. J.G. Delfgaauw, 'Bosnia', HP/De Tijd, pp. 6-7.

⁸¹⁷ E.g. Rick Kuethé, 'De oorlog als moeras' ('The war as quagmire'), Elsevier, 22/08/92, pp. 34-35; Hans Righart, 'Het Bosnische moeras' ('The Bosnian quagmire'), HP/De Tijd, 16/04/93, p. 15; J.H. Sampiemon, 'In Bihac klinkt echo van 1914' ('The echo of 1914 sounds in Bihac'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/11/94; Tromp, Verraad, pp. 39 (12/08/92) and 63 and 65 (31/03/93).

⁸¹⁸ See for example R. Gutman, 'Q and A. Why are Yugoslavia's people fighting each other?', Newsday, 12/07/92; De Kok: 'Hitler had many divisions there, he could never really keep control of the situation.', Radio 1, IKON, De andere wereld van zondagmorgen, 10/05/92, 9.30 a.m.; Dr Paul Hoekink: 'Demokratie kun je niet afdwingen met militair ingrijpen' ('You can't enforce democracy with military intervention.'), Tribune 29(1993)2 p. 14; General C. de Jager (ret.) in: Remco Meijer, 'Een harde job', Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 33; the Chairman of the General Federation of Military Personnel B. Snoep in: Marcel van Lingen, 'Bonden lakoniek over actie Joegoslavië', Het Parool, 06/06/00.

⁸¹⁹ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Het Capitoel, 06/12/92, 12.00 noon. Flounders, Tragedy, p. 6 refers to 43 divisions. See also Simms, Hour, pp. 285-286.

⁸²⁰ Michiel Zonneveld, 'Actie in Joegoslavië kan jaren duren', Het Parool, 10/06/92.

⁸²¹ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 145.

in Yugoslavia to thirteen divisions.⁸²² They were either second-rate divisions or divisions that used Yugoslavia as a recuperation area after engagements on the Eastern front.⁸²³ Only the 1. Gebirgs Division rose above the low level. Nevertheless, the German second-rate troops managed to make things very hard for the partisans.⁸²⁴

Furthermore, the comparison as such was inaccurate. In the early 1990s a military force would have had to control a much smaller area than the Germans in World War II in Yugoslavia. Furthermore, if it had been deployed against the Serbs, such an intervention force could have relied on the sympathy of the Croats and Muslims. As a troop separation force, an international unit in the early 1990s would also have had a moral advantage over the German occupying force in World War II. It is remarkable how little the moral advantage of the peacekeeping force in the early 1990s was weighed against the national-socialist and fascist military presence half a century earlier.⁸²⁵ As if the United Nations is equivalent to Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy. Almost half a century after World War II, the Western troops, albeit with all their limitations, could also have made more use of the airspace than the Germans could have done.⁸²⁶ Bosnia-Herzegovina in the 1990s was also much more accessible than half a century earlier, so that the area had become less suitable for guerrilla-type operations. This was even more so for the areas in Croatia. Something else that many overlooked was that what was referred to as the success of the partisan fighting was a myth that had been nourished by Western politicians from the early 1950s to justify extending large credits to the communist Tito.⁸²⁷

Finally, the morale of the Serbian troops was generally low and could certainly not stand comparison with that of Tito's partisans. They had few internal difficulties as long as they were able to shell cities such as Vukovar, Dubrovnik and Sarajevo, but as soon as they were confronted with a resolute and mobile opponent, their resistance easily caved in, both in Croatia and Bosnia.⁸²⁸ Because the Bosnian-Serb army was dependent on its fire power, guerrilla-operations were less appropriate than for the Cetniks and partisans in World War II.

A large error of judgment in the West was that many saw the paramilitaries as (potential) guerrillas.⁸²⁹ Their effectiveness was limited, however. They behaved faint-heartedly by usually only operating under the cover of the regular troops and they were often undisciplined and drunk.⁸³⁰ There was no truth in the idea that a guerrilla war was in progress in Yugoslavia similar to the World War II partisan conflict. The Bosnian Serbs mainly made use of artillery, either to prepare for ethnic cleansing, or shelling for the purpose of creating terror. The paramilitary factions were not conducting a guerrilla conflict, but they mishandled, murdered and plundered in areas that were shot to a pulp or surrounded, against an often defenceless population, with consequently extremely modest losses among the paramilitaries. A UN military observer pointed out to journalist David Rieff that the paramilitaries' extensive weaponry, including entire sets of knives, may have appeared impressive at first sight, but was ineffective in a military sense: '(...) such gear was for killing civilians, not enemy soldiers. If (...) the Serbs had believed that they were going to face people who could effectively shoot back, they would have carried more ammunition and fewer weapons(...)'.⁸³¹ This is consistent with a report written in ⁸²²Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 216; Tromp, Verraad, p. 208.

⁸²³Almond, War, p. 140.

⁸²⁴ See also Tromp, Verraad, p. 208.

⁸²⁵ An exception is Strobe Talbott, 'America Abroad. Why Bosnia Is Not Vietnam', Time, 24/08/92, p. 49.

⁸²⁶ Anthony Farrar-Hockley, 'Niet ingrijpen is ook partij kiezen' ('Non-intervention is also taking sides'), Het Parool, 05/01/93.

⁸²⁷ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 154-155.

⁸²⁸ Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 408; Russell, Prejudice, p. 284. Cf. Tromp, 'Conflict', p. 38.

⁸²⁹ See e.g. the reference to the Serbian paramilitaries in Croatia as guerrillas in 'Van den Broek paste nog snel toespraak aan' ('Van den Broek amended speech at last minute'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/09/91; 'Lord Carrington krijgt leiding van vredesconferentie' ('Lord Carrington to chair peace conference'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/09/91.

⁸³⁰ Cf. Philip J. Cohen, 'Ending the war and securing peace in former Yugoslavia', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 33; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 214.

⁸³¹ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 157.

August 1992 to the American Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in which the Bosnian-Serb soldiers were described as 'a force of essentially cowardly attackers'.⁸³² The paramilitaries may well have operated with the help of local radical Serbs and their militias, but they did not operate for long periods in a territory where they would depend on the support of the population like fish in water - according to the Maoist guerrilla doctrine. On the contrary, the so-called guerrillas in the former Yugoslavia at the end of the twentieth century actually drove the population out of the territory through ethnic cleansing.

The often-made remark that all Yugoslavs were trained in territorial and civil defence and were therefore formidable opponents, capable of engaging in a heavy guerrilla conflict, calls for a number of comments. The territorial and civil defences were myths created by Yugoslavia after 1968 in the hope of deterring a Soviet invasion like the one in Czechoslovakia. In reality, the territorial and civil defence were makeshift solutions that were necessary because Yugoslavia's economic weakness prevented it building up conventional armed forces to the required level.⁸³³

And the regular army behaved in just as 'cowardly' a way as the paramilitaries. It did little more than operate artillery at a safe distance while leaving the dirty work to the irregulars. One of the few reports from the ECMM (the European monitoring mission) to contain policy advice referred in so many words to the cowardly nature of the JNA. A report leaked to the press proved that the ECMM considered that the federal army must be made to understand that ships could not shell cities with impunity and that gunners ran the risk of being hit themselves if they fired on hospitals. In the Netherlands, Bart Tromp, who fully supported this analysis, repeatedly stated that the martial reputation of the Serbs was incompatible with the known facts about the shelling. He also stated that the Serbian aggression of the 1990s shrivelled to 'the ranting of a drunk', as soon as the Serbs were confronted with trained and well-armed soldiers.⁸³⁴

Tromp correctly remarks that those who referred to the strength of the partisan resistance in World War II overlooked the current power relationships. Tromp challenged people such as Kissinger, who spoke of 35 German divisions in Yugoslavia during World War II, to explain to him how it could be, half a year after the start of the war, that the shabby government troops in Bosnia had still not been overpowered by opponents who were far better armed 'and were reputed to be the heirs of the partisans'.⁸³⁵

In the United States, any reference to possible guerrilla warfare evoked alarming visions of the lost war in Vietnam. The general conviction in the United States was that American ground forces would never again be put in such a hopeless situation as in the 1960s and 1970s in Vietnam.⁸³⁶ President Bush Sr. and his immediate advisers were said to be 'traumatized' by the thought of a new Vietnam.⁸³⁷ Bush's successor, Clinton, his Secretary of State Warren Christopher and the American army top were equally unwilling to become embroiled in a 'second Vietnam' through American participation in military intervention.⁸³⁸ 'That the Balkans had the look and feel of a Vietnam-like quagmire did not help to stiffen spines in our government', Christopher said.⁸³⁹ The Washington government's fear was also felt by a large part of the American population. When asked in January 1993

⁸³² United States Senate, Cleansing, p. 29.

⁸³³ Suilen, 'Interventie', p. 170.

⁸³⁴ Tromp, Verraad, p. 38. See also ibid., pp. 25-26, 33 and 39. For a similar position see Sharp, Balkans, p. 7.

⁸³⁵ Tromp, Verraad, p. 47 (30/09/92).

⁸³⁶ See e.g. Bert, Superpower, p. xxiii; Callahan, Wars, p. 192; R. Howell, 'Outrage. At UN Pressure For Armed Reply', Newsday, 07/08/92; Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), Genocide, p. 13; Thompson, House, p. 325.

⁸³⁷ Zimmermann, 'US', p. 3; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 215. For the influence of the Vietnam trauma on the Bush policy on Bosnia, see also Bert, Superpower, pp. 107-123. See further the quote from Bush in Warren P. Strobel, 'The Media and U.S. Policies Toward Intervention. A Closer Look at the 'CNN Effect'', Crocker/Hampson with Aall (eds.), Chaos, p. 367: 'I do not want to see the United States bogged down in any way into some guerrilla warfare. We lived through that once.' For the influence of Vietnam on Eagleburger's Bosnia policy, see Zimmermann, Origins, p. 214.

⁸³⁸ 'Vance en Owen stuiten op verzet regering-Clinton' ('Vance and Owen encounter resistance from Clinton administration'), de Volkskrant, 03/02/93.

⁸³⁹ Christopher, Chances, p. 252.

whether sending American troops to Bosnia would lead to a war more like the one in Vietnam or more like the Gulf War, 41 per cent said that Bosnia would turn into a Vietnam-like situation; 47 per cent opted for the analogy with the Gulf War and four per cent expected that a war in Bosnia would be unlike either of the earlier conflicts.⁸⁴⁰ But the parallel with the Vietnam war was drawn outside America too.⁸⁴¹ This was a fear that was consciously exploited by the leaders in Belgrade and Karadzic.⁸⁴²

Here too, the comparison would not stand up. Unlike the Hanoi regime in the Vietnam war during the Cold War, Serbia could not count on the wholesale support of Russia or China. Milosevic's regime was virtually isolated internationally. Nationalism had strongly motivated the Vietcong, but the enthusiasm to fight for a Greater Serbia was, as we have seen, considerably less strong.⁸⁴³

Finally there was concern among Americans for a situation resembling the one that followed the attack on American soldiers in Beirut in 1983, in which 241 marines died, after which domestic public opinion forced the American government to withdraw its troops.

The Yugoslavian army was often described at the start of the war as the second or third largest in Europe. This was also a myth. A comparison with the armed forces in a number of European countries in 1990 proves that the JNA was closer to the tenth than the third or fourth place. The regular army (without the territorial defence) comprised 180,000 men. This was less than the armies in the Soviet Union, Turkey, East Germany, France, Italy, Poland, Great Britain, Spain or Czechoslovakia. In numbers of tanks it trailed the Soviet Union, West Germany, Czechoslovakia, Turkey, Poland, East Germany, Bulgaria, Romania and Greece. And as far as artillery is concerned, as many as thirteen countries were ahead of Yugoslavia. Much of the equipment was also long out-of-date.⁸⁴⁴

The Serbs as villains

The media, which ever more often had to compete for the volatile attention of zapping viewers, listeners and readers, could often not afford to report subtle shades of meaning. According to them, their target group usually had a need for a clear division of roles between villains and heroes. It was indeed the question whether the West, that had just recovered from the well-defined split of the Cold War, was able to think in shades of meaning. If such a clear division of roles was actually necessary, the Serbs were the ones who appeared most to deserve the position of bête noire.

To the United States especially, the Serbs regularly appealed to the fact that their country had fought on the same side as the Americans in both twentieth century World Wars, while the Croats had twice been on the 'wrong side' in the same conflicts.⁸⁴⁵ It was often raised both by Americans and by Serbs that Woodrow Wilson, more than anyone else in the world, had contributed to the creation of the first Yugoslavia.⁸⁴⁶ It would do the Serbs no good.

Many American politicians and officials who dealt with Yugoslavia judged the country by only one standard: was it still Communist or not? The Serbs were governed by former Communists of the old school, who had also once embraced Nationalism. In a world that, in 1991, still looked forward ⁸⁴⁰ Bert, Superpower, p. 88.

⁸⁴¹ Hans Leber, "Laat ze de oorlog uitvechten" ('Let them fight out their war amongst themselves'), Tweentsche Courant, 05/08/92; Laurent Heere, "Militaire actie in Bosnië onvermijdelijk" ('Military action in Bosnia unavoidable'), Rotterdams Dagblad, 06/08/92.

⁸⁴² Judah, Serbs, pp. 212-213 Ramet, Babel, p. 244; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 160; Koen Koch, 'Joegoslavië, Oost-Europa en de strategie van neo-containment' ('Yugoslavia, Eastern Europe and the strategy of neo-containment'), Gijs de Vries e.a., Continent, p. 124.

⁸⁴³ See e.g. also Strobe Talbott, 'America Abroad. Why Bosnia Is Not Vietnam', Time, 24/08/92, p. 49.

⁸⁴⁴ Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 110-113.

⁸⁴⁵ See e.g. Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 4; idem, Origins, pp. 13 and 22.

⁸⁴⁶ E.g. Representative Moody and James F. Dobbins, Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of European and Canadian Affairs, in United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, pp. 69 and 77.

positively to a future without history, the Serb leaders appeared hopelessly outdated.⁸⁴⁷ In the absence of a final break with Communism, for American policy makers the rulers in Belgrade remained the Communist 'them' as opposed to the anti-Communist and democratic 'us'.⁸⁴⁸ But someone such as Genscher also had the same view on the subject.⁸⁴⁹

The black-and-white picture of Communism versus democracy was the reason that recognition of the problem of ethnic differences took so long to come about in the United States.⁸⁵⁰ Those Americans who had more of an eye for the mix of Communism and Nationalism practiced by Milosevic, did not judge his regime any the milder, however. For them, Milosevic combined the worst of two worlds: 'He is a Stalinist Bolshevik and he is an ardent nationalist'.⁸⁵¹

As was evident in the description of Slovenia's and Croatia's PR campaigns, the Serbs with their superior artillery strength quickly bombarded their opponents into the role of underdogs. From the somewhat mystical and xenophobic view of being the 'eternal' victim of the Western lack of understanding, or, worse, Western conspiracies - involving the Vatican, Germany, 'the Fourth Empire', the United States - Serbs devoted relatively little energy to public relations beyond their own borders.⁸⁵² The Serbs were so convinced of their own moral rectitude that they seldom found it necessary to tell the world of their 'truth'.⁸⁵³ A notable example is the pride with which the Chief of Staff of the JNA, Kadijevic, repeatedly mentions in his recollection of the collapse of Yugoslavia that he did not speak to foreign statesmen who wished to meet him.⁸⁵⁴ In 1989, Milosevic even kept the American ambassador Warren Zimmermann waiting for an interview for almost a year, because the message he brought from Washington was not agreeable to the Serbian statesman.⁸⁵⁵

Furthermore, as will become clear in the description of the war in Bosnia, the analogy of World War II was to contribute strongly to the demonizing of the Serbs on the one hand and the portrayal of Muslims as pure victims on the other. In the international press, however, comparisons were being drawn between Milosevic and Mussolini as early as the autumn of 1988, especially because of the way in which Milosevic pushed opponents aside and took over power in his antibureaucracy revolutions.⁸⁵⁶ The Dutch professor F.A.M. Alting von Geusau considered that Goebbels could have learned something from Milosevic with respect to 'the propaganda and provocation that dripped hatred' which he carried out from the time he took office.⁸⁵⁷ As will be shown elsewhere in this report, at the time of ⁸⁴⁷ Cf. Julian Borger, 'The Observer profile: Europe's last dinosaur', The Observer, 29/12/96.

⁸⁴⁸ See e.g. Bob Dole and Joseph DioGuardi in United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, pp. 37-40 and 91. Cf. Woodward, Tragedy, p. 13. Cf. the objection to this Cold War inspired black-and-white thinking by Michael Bernhard in: United States House of Representatives, Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Policy, p. 2.

⁸⁴⁹ Libal, Limits, p. 14.

⁸⁵⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 130.

⁸⁵¹ Joseph DioGuardi in United States Senate, Subcommittee on European Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Strife, p. 92.

⁸⁵² Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Series Editor's Statement', in: Cohen, War, pp. xiv-xiv; Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 3. See for example also the surprise of the journalist Bert Bukman about what he took to be the xenophobic views of the Serbian author and professor of cultural history Milorad Pavic in 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, pp. 16-18, or the powerlessness of Bart Rijs as opposed to the conspiracy theories of the Serbian philosophy professor Mihailo Markovic, who was the hero of the Belgrade students in 1968, and a Milosevic ideologue and vice-chairman of his party in the early 1990s, in 'Adagio voor de dood' ('Adagio for death'), HP/De Tijd, 26/06/93, p. 43. For an earlier positive reception of Markovic in the Netherlands when he was one of the Marxist philosophers who congregated around the magazine Praxis see Bart van Steenbergen, 'Ten geleide', Markovic, Weg, pp. 7-11. For the disappointment about Markovic's progress see Magas, Destruction, pp. 4, 52, 55-73, 122-124. See also interview A. Buha, 17/12/99.

⁸⁵³ Cf. Sherman, Zerschlagung, p. 5.

⁸⁵⁴ Kadijevic, View, pp. 26, 33, 44.

⁸⁵⁵ Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 3.

⁸⁵⁶ Cf. Ramet, 'Milosevic', p. 96.

⁸⁵⁷ Olaf van Boetzelaer, 'Naleving Verenigde Naties-resoluties' ('Compliance with United Nations resolutions'), CD/Actueel, 13(1993)(6 February) p. 15.

the conflict in (former) Yugoslavia, World War II often functioned as a frame of reference and benchmark, not only within Yugoslavia itself, but also in the West.⁸⁵⁸

What most defined the image in the West at the time, however, was the action of Serb soldiers, both of the JNA and irregulars. Unlike in opinion and policy making circles, accounts of the Serb dominated army and the Serbian paramilitaries by journalists on the spot made a disorganized, even chaotic, impression.⁸⁵⁹ They wore 'a hotch-potch of uniforms: chubby grandfathers, smooth-faced teenagers, a handful of irregulars in Chetnik badges and shaggy hats, a real-life unit of Dad's Army'.⁸⁶⁰ Dutch journalists also spoke of 'Serbs in all manner of fancy uniforms',⁸⁶¹ in casually worn attire under which navels, chest hair and bellies were visible,⁸⁶² about 'wild tattooed men with Kalashnikovs over their shoulders'.⁸⁶³ Journalists repeatedly endured mortal fear when drunken Bosnian-Serb soldiers played with their rifles and hand grenades in their presence.⁸⁶⁴ The home-made armoured vehicles and artillery vehicles also aroused the disbelief of journalists who knew only the regular weaponry and the vehicle fleet of the Royal Netherlands Army in the Veluwe.⁸⁶⁵

The first graphic accounts of Serbian atrocities appeared in Dutch newspapers towards the end of July 1991, concerning a Serbian attack on 26 July near Struga, a village in Banija with a population of four hundred, in which the region was almost entirely 'cleansed' of Croats. This was also the first time that the pattern of ethnic cleansing was clearly reported for Dutch newspaper readers: one and a half hours of shelling with 120 mm shells, after which Serbian paramilitaries marched into the village using Croats from neighbouring Zamaca as a shield. Three policemen who for this reason refused to fire on the Serbs were murdered by them, after two of them had their eyes poked out and they were undressed and beaten. After that a few more Croats were killed or abducted.⁸⁶⁶

De Volkskrant on 2 August also made a first attempt at portraying the emptiness after an ethnic cleansing: with a photo of two dogs running through the deserted streets of the village Kostanjica after the local population had fled before Serbian paramilitaries.⁸⁶⁷ One day later Trouw made the first mention of the word 'rape' in connection with the war in Yugoslavia. At that time they were said to be the order of the day, without explicitly mentioning who the perpetrators were.⁸⁶⁸ For their part, Bosnian-Serbs claimed that concentration camps for Serbs had been set up at four sites in Croatia. Other than in De Volkskrant, no noticeable attention was paid to this issue.⁸⁶⁹

⁸⁵⁸ Cf. Tromp, Verraad, pp. 15, 38.

⁸⁵⁹ See e.g. Raymond van den Boogaard, "De schoften schieten van ons geld" ('The bastards are shooting thanks to our money'), NRC Handelsblad, 03/07/91; Hirs & Hellinga, Geit, p. 176.

⁸⁶⁰ Russell, Prejudice, p. 244.

⁸⁶¹ Bart Rijs, 'Reis naar het einde van Bosnië' ('Journey to the end of Bosnia'), HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 22. See also Kees Schaepman, 'Kogels fluiten en de waanzin wint' ('Bullets hum and madness wins'), Vrij Nederland, 25/07/92, p. 7.

⁸⁶² Bart Rijs, 'Vrijheid of de dood' ('Freedom or death'), HP/De Tijd, 16/08/91, p. 24. See also N. Lucas, 'Serviërs in Bosnië: kogels voor bier' ('Serbs in Bosnia: bullets for beer'), Trouw, 28/09/91 on Serbian and Montenegrin reservists: 'With their unkempt appearance - unshaved, vests half out of their trousers - and their clumsy behaviour';

⁸⁶³ Bart Rijs, 'De aanval' ('The attack'), HP/De Tijd 23/08/91, p. 14.

⁸⁶⁴ E.g. Bart Rijs, 'Reis naar het einde van Bosnië', HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 24. Cf. Gert van Wijland, 'Autoraces aan de Donau', Elsevier, 10/09/92, p. 71; Cohen, Hearts, p. 136.

⁸⁶⁵ Bart Rijs, 'Reis naar het einde van Bosnië', HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 24.

⁸⁶⁶ Ulrike Rudberg, 'EG presenteert vredesplan voor strijd in Kroatië' ('EC presents peace plan for conflict in Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 29/07/91; "Onze Servische burens zijn achtergebleven, ze huilden" ('Our Serbian neighbours stayed behind', they cried'), de Volkskrant, 31/07/91; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Bloedbad in dorp Kroatië: wellicht bijna 200 doden' ('Bloodbath in Croatian village: up to 200 feared dead') and 'Serviërs gebruikten mede-dorpelingen als schild' ('Serbs used fellow-villagers as shield'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/91.

⁸⁶⁷ 'Half Kroaat half Serviër en nu alleen' ('Half-Croat, half-Serb and now alone'), de Volkskrant, 02/08/91.

⁸⁶⁸ Nicole Lucas, 'Een onmogelijke missie' ('An impossible mission'), Trouw, 03/08/91.

⁸⁶⁹ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Bittere beschuldigingen in Kroatië. Leaders verwijten elkaar 'oorlogsmisdaden en genocide' ('Bitter accusations in Croatia. Leaders blame each other for "war crimes and genocide"'), de Volkskrant, 30/07/91; idem, 'Strijd tussen Ustaša en Cetniks leeft weer op in Kroatië' ('Struggle between Ustaša and Cetniks revived in Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 03/08/91.

The associations with World War II would certainly not leave Western newspaper readers and television viewers unmoved. The war in Croatia disrupted the 'never again' attitude towards war in Europe that had been cherished for almost half a century.⁸⁷⁰ The war in Bosnia would make clear that the notion of 'never again genocide' had become 'a sick joke'.⁸⁷¹ Unlike the response to the genocide of the Jews in World War II, this time the West would not be able to say, as many commentators stressed, that they 'didn't know'.⁸⁷²

Croats: no angels themselves

There was a general air of sympathy in the Dutch media for Slovenia's pursuit of independence, which was felt to be a response to Serbia's pursuit of hegemony, especially under Milosevic's leadership. Anet Bleich in De Volkskrant, however, questioned the declarations of independence of Slovenia and Croatia. She said that the governments of these areas would have been better advised to forge links with the Serbian opposition to Milosevic rather than using their energy 'in rehearsing their old national anthem and changing the flag'. In her opinion, if the two republics wanted so badly to belong to the civilized Europe, they should not resort to 'Wild East games of cowboys and Indians in the Balkans'. She foresaw that Bosnia would then shortly be hacked into three: 'One piece for Greater Croatia, one piece for Greater Serbia, and a corridor to Turkey for the Muslims'.⁸⁷³ Bleich's article was one of a pair, in which Jan Luijten adopted the position that the peoples of Yugoslavia had the right, belatedly, to realize their nation states.⁸⁷⁴

Likewise, the correspondence columns of NRC Handelsblad two weeks later contained two contributions on the expediency of Croatia and Slovenia exercising their right of self-determination. P.J. van Krieken, deputy regional representative of the High Commissioner for Refugees in Stockholm, argued that attempts must be made to prevent the disintegration of Yugoslavia. If Europe were not to do so, it would forfeit its moral authority and would carry less weight in international law, and so be unable to pass judgement on wars of secession elsewhere in the world, such as in India or Africa.⁸⁷⁵ In the other article, the emeritus professor of administrative law, S.W. Couwenberg, argued for a Yugoslavian confederation, as Croatia and Slovenia had proposed shortly beforehand. His argument was that Europe should not leave two republics that were on the road to becoming a liberal democracy and a market economy out in the cold in favour of a still Communist Serbia.⁸⁷⁶ According to an editorial in Trouw, in the conflict between 'the arrogant nationalism of the Serbs' and Croatia's and Slovenia's pursuit of independence, which the newspaper felt did not fit in with the general development of Europe, 'there was no clear line between good and evil'.⁸⁷⁷

⁸⁷⁰ Gompert, 'Serbia', p. 30.

⁸⁷¹ Carter, 'Serbia', p. 54. Cf Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 27.

⁸⁷² Magas, Destruction, p. xii; Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Series Editor's Statement', in: Cohen, War, pp. xiii and xvi; Thomas Cushman & Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (eds.), Time, p. 7; Samary, Déchirure, p. 9; Mestrovic, 'Balkanization', p. vii; Tromp, Verraad, p. 56 (13/01/93); Weithmann, Brandbaard, p. 7; Member of the American House of Representatives for Virginia, Frank R. Wolf in: United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, United Nations, p. 17; Ton de Kok in: "Westerse politici mede schuldig aan drama Bosnië" ("Western politicians share blame for drama in Bosnia"), Utrechts Nieuwsblad, 19/11/92; P.R. Baehr in: Ko Colijn and Paul Rusman, 'Wat moet Nederland met 'Joegoslavië'? ('What is the Netherlands to do with Yugoslavia'), Vrij Nederland, 31/07/93, p. 12.

⁸⁷³ Anet Bleich, 'Tegen het Wilde Oosten', de Volkskrant, 29/06/91. See also idem, 'Het slopen van Joegoslavië lost niets op' ('Demolishing Yugoslavia won't solve anything'), de Volkskrant, 16/08/91 and idem, 'Een nieuw volks denken bedreigt Oost-europa' ('A new popular thinking threatens Eastern Europe'), de Volkskrant, 18/09/91.

⁸⁷⁴ Jan Luijten, 'Het recht op een eigen lot' ('The right to their own fate'), de Volkskrant, 29/06/91.

⁸⁷⁵ P.J. van Krieken, 'Alle pogingen Joegoslavië te redden zijn nastreven waard' ('All efforts to save Yugoslavia are worthwhile'), NRC Handelsblad 11/07/91.

⁸⁷⁶ S.W. Couwenberg, 'Confederatie lijkt voor Joegoslavië een reële optie' ('A confederation seems to be a realistic option for Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/07/91.

⁸⁷⁷ 'Een conservatief oordeel (2)' ('A conservative assessment'), Trouw, 03/07/91.

On the other hand, the emeritus professor of Eastern European history, Dittrich, already detected a good guys, bad guys pattern in the first weeks of the conflict. It irritated him. In his opinion, Slovenians and Croats made as much demagogic use of Nationalism as Milosevic. Dittrich understood the Serbs' fear of a repetition of the Croatian genocide of World War II. He was in favour of retaining the Yugoslavian unitary state. Slovenia might perhaps be able to leave. But: 'In the case of Croatia there are already squabbles about the border with Serbia, and I cannot even begin to imagine how in the name of God Bosnia is supposed to secede.'⁸⁷⁸ He hoped that the EC and the United States would bring gentle pressure to bear to prevent a collapse of Yugoslavia. If such a thing were to happen, surrounding countries could become involved, and Dittrich thought that the only possibility left would be military intervention.

If these articles, which appeared shortly after the declarations of independence, showed a degree of caution with respect to Croatia, this was not set to change in the following months. In the first year of the conflict especially, much of the Western media, including in the Netherlands, associated Croats with Ante Pavelic's extreme nationalist Ustashe movement. Between 1941 and 1945 it was at the head of the Croatian puppet state that was tolerated by the Fascist powers, and in which many thousands of Serbs were put to the sword.⁸⁷⁹ It was a typical expression of the late twentieth century historical awareness, where today's deeds were judged within the framework of the moral indignation about events half a century earlier. Sometimes the two eras were linked together very simply, as in the 1993 summer edition of Foreign Affairs: 'Today's victimized Croats were yesterday's Fascist oppressors of the Serbs...'⁸⁸⁰

It was also observed in De Groene Amsterdammer that World War II was always being refought: 'The distinction between "good guys" and "bad guys" is becoming ever more difficult to make in the former Yugoslavia. All things considered, there are only 'mad guys' left ...'⁸⁸¹ The Zagreb regime did not make it very difficult for its critics to make the connection with the Ustashe state by virtue of a number of hamfisted incidents, as described above.

This association in particular stopped the Croats from being the perfect victims for the Western media.⁸⁸² The British Financial Times of 17 July 1991 portrayed the Croatian 'problem', for example, as a question of insufficient denazification.⁸⁸³ Mestrovic is largely right, however, in saying that blaming the fifty year old Ustashe past on an entire people, while the Ustashe in Croatia were a small minority, and the same region contributed significantly to Tito's partisan movement, was at least as absurd as holding the French population at the end of the twentieth century responsible for collaborating with the World War II Vichy regime, or the Italians for the Fascism in their country half a century earlier.⁸⁸⁴ It is interesting to contrast the Western media's attacks on the President of Croatia, Franjo Tudjman, with its relatively mild treatment of Mitterrand's Nazi collaboration. Tudjman was a partisan general who fought the Nazis, while Mitterrand collaborated with them.⁸⁸⁵

⁸⁷⁸ Steven de Vogel, 'Zeven argumenten om Joegoslavië heel te houden', Vrij Nederland, 13/07/91, p. 6.

⁸⁷⁹ Cf. Mestrovic, Balkanization, pp. 28 and 39-42. See e.g. Simms, Hour, p. 284; Edward Pearce, 'Kroaten zijn bepaald geen engelen' ('Croats are certainly no angels'), de Volkskrant, 06/07/91; Piet de Moor, 'Milosevic en Tudjman moeten ophoepelen, alletwee. Het democratische gehalte van de regering in Kroatië' ('Milosevic and Tudjman should clear off, the pair of them. The democratic content of the government in Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 27/07/91, illustrated with a photo of Pavelic performing the Fascist salute; Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91; Fred Stroobants, 'Rauwe wortel' ('Raw carrot'), Trouw, 25/11/91.

⁸⁸⁰ Grunwald, 'Press'.

⁸⁸¹ Arthur van Amerongen, 'Zwart Kroatië' ('Black Croatia'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 26/08/92, p. 4.

⁸⁸² Cf. Mestrovic, Balkanization, p. 51. The Dutch NOS television news of 8 August 1991 showed pictures of the remnants of the Croatian World War II concentration camp Jasenovac in connection with Serbian accusations that Tudjman's Croatia was the heir to Pavelic's state. Extreme examples of this association can be found in Anstadt, Serbia, passim. Cf. Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 109.

⁸⁸³ Cited in Eyal, Europe, p. 31.

⁸⁸⁴ Stjepan G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', idem (ed.), Genocide, pp. 18-19.

⁸⁸⁵ Ibid., p. 19.

In the Netherlands, Willem Vermeer, a Slavist from Leiden, wrote that he saw little reason why Tudjman and his democratically elected government 'should be made to pay for genocide that was carried out half a century earlier by an irregular rabble that was kept in the saddle by two suspect occupation regimes'.⁸⁸⁶

New life was breathed into the association of Croatia with the Ustashe by the sympathies of right-wing extremists for Croatia's pursuit of independence.⁸⁸⁷ This was the case in France with the Front Nationale. In Brussels, members of the Vlaams Blok took part in a demonstration of Croats on 29 July 1991 to coincide with a meeting of EC ministers.⁸⁸⁸ In Great Britain, Branimir Glavas was portrayed in the press as 'a neo-Nazi killer'.⁸⁸⁹ And in the Netherlands the Ustashe past was raised through the interest displayed by a few dozen Dutch people for providing military support to the Croats. They responded to an advertisement on 2 November 1991 in De Telegraaf placed by the Nederlands Kroatische Werkgemeenschap movement, which was set up by the extreme right-winger, Douwe van de Bos. Their applications led to the deployment of the First Dutch Volunteer Unit in Croatia.⁸⁹⁰

An attempt was made from Belgrade to exploit the association of Croatia with the Ustashe regime of half a century earlier, for example by distributing English and French translations of passages from one of Tudjman's earlier publications on genocide and Jews in the West.⁸⁹¹ For the same reason, members of the Yugoslavian air force intelligence service planted bombs in August 1991 at the Jewish cemetery and the Jewish community centre in Zagreb within the framework of the secret operation 'Opera Orientalis', which had the purpose of opposing the secession of Croatia.⁸⁹² In addition to the two agents concerned, the then head of KOS (the JNA's military intelligence and security arm), Aleksandar Vasiljevic, the former air force commanding officer General Zvonko Jurjevic, and the ex-

⁸⁸⁶ Willem Vermeer, 'De genocide van hoofdman Ante Pavelic en zijn Ustase op Serviërs' ('The genocide of Serbs by leader Ante Pavelic and his Ustase'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/09/91.

⁸⁸⁷ See also Dzamic, Psi, pp. 75-166.

⁸⁸⁸ Oscar Garschagen, 'EG: bij vrede geld naar Joegoslavië' ('EC: when there is peace there will be money for Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 30/07/91.

⁸⁸⁹ Russell, Prejudice, p. 213.

⁸⁹⁰ See e.g. Sluik & Kurpershoek (ed.), Duiveljager; Dzamic, Psi, pp. 97-109; 'Oud-strijders mobiliseren Nederlands steunkorps voor onderdrukt Kroatië' ('Veterans mobilize Dutch support company for repressed Croatia'), Trouw, 06/11/91; 'Extreem-rechts schiet leger Kroatië te hulp' ('Right-wing extremists jump to Croatia's help'), Trouw, 07/11/91; 'Garanties ontbreken: vrijwilligers gaan niet naar Kroatië' ('No guarantees. Volunteers will not go to Croatia'), Trouw, 08/11/91; 'Vrijwilligers alsnog 'op verkenning' bij militairen Kroatië' ('Volunteers will go 'on reconnaissance' with soldiers in Croatia' after all), Trouw, 25/11/91; 'Ultra-rechts in Europa op de bres voor Kroatië' ('Far right in Europe in the breach for Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/11/91; Karin de Mik, 'Aan avonturiers hebben ze niks in Kroatië' ('We don't need adventurers in Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/11/91; Boris Peters, 'Van kreten dat het niet mag, trekken de Serviërs zich niets aan' ('Serbs take no notice of being told to stop'), de Volkskrant 06/11/91; 'Werving Kroatië-strijders gestopt na kritiek op comité' ('Recruitment of Croatia fighters stops following criticism of committee'), de Volkskrant, 08/11/91; 'Het moet daar gewoon afgelopen zijn' ('It simply has to stop there'), de Volkskrant, 02/12/91; Jos Slats, 'De huurling gaat omdat de hele wereld Kroatië laat stikken' ('The mercenary goes because the whole world is leaving Croatia in the lurch'), de Volkskrant, 11/12/91; idem, 'Nederlandse huurlingen vuren op Serviërs' ('Dutch mercenaries fire on Serbs'), de Volkskrant, 23/12/91; idem, 'Vrijwillige strijders vereerd door Kroaten' ('Voluntary fighters honoured by Croats'), de Volkskrant, 14/01/92; Clifford C. Cremer, 'Een héél rare oorlog', HP/De Tijd, 07/02/92; Clifford C. Cremer, 'Een steeds raarder oorlog' ('An ever stranger war'), HP/De Tijd, 27/03/92, pp. 14-17; 'Nederlandse huurlingen gevangen in Hercegovina' ('Dutch mercenaries imprisoned in Hercegovina'), De Telegraaf, 25/07/92; Angelo Vergeer, 'Blanke boeren min of meer onze volksgenoten' ('White farmers more or less our fellow countrymen'), De Telegraaf, 30/06/93; Clifford C. Cremer, 'Van Kroatië naar Transvaal' ('From Croatia to Transvaal'), HP/De Tijd, 13/08/93; Griezels, De maten van Janmaat ('Horrors. Janmaat's friends'), Tribune 29(1993)2 p. 20; Bert Huisjes, 'Opgejaagd op de Balkan' ('Hounded in the Balkans'), Algemeen dagblad, 19/09/01; TK 1991-1992, Appendix, nos. 364 (Questions in the House, Frinking) and 448 (Questions, Valk and Stoffelen).

⁸⁹¹ Richard West, 'An Apologist for Hitler', The Guardian, 18/10/91.

⁸⁹² 'Political report in brief. Former head of army intelligence service under investigation', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 21/07/92; 'Further reports on election preparations. Trial of ex-chief of military counter-intelligence postponed 'indefinitely'', ibid., 09/12/92; 'Seventy generals reportedly punished after war in Slovenia and Croatia', ibid., 26/01/93; Batsheva Tsur, 'Anatomy of a Balkan frame-up', The Jerusalem Post, 03/02/93; Cohen, War, p. 127.

head of the air force intelligence service, Colonel Slobodan Rakocevic, were put on trial for these incidents. As well as the attack in Zagreb, they were accused of plotting against the Serbian government and of fraud. The trial was mainly seen as an attempt by the JNA to rid itself of officers who were still strongly Communist and too weakly Serbian in their thinking. In spite of this stain on his reputation, Vasiljevic managed to make a comeback as an adviser to Geza Farkas, the head of KOS under Milosevic. President Vojislav Kostunica would finally dismiss him as a Milosevic confidant.⁸⁹³

The Serbian smear campaign against Croatia was not without success.⁸⁹⁴ Ton Crijnen wrote in Trouw that anti-Semitism, nationalism and Catholicism in Croatia 'had gone hand in hand for centuries'.⁸⁹⁵ The London newspaper The Guardian saw in Tudjman's earlier anti-Semitic statements reason to caution against recognition of Croatia.⁸⁹⁶ Conversely, the chairman of the Jewish community in Zagreb, Nenad Porges, stated that although there were anti-Semitic feelings under the surface of Croatian society, the official authorities were not guilty of it. He also cautioned against the often heard misconception that Serbs stood up for the Jews in World War II. Serbia, he said, was Judenfrei sooner than Croatia.⁸⁹⁷

Much Western reporting mentioned Tudjman's hardly democratic character.⁸⁹⁸ The Dutch media, for example, devoted ample attention to the nationalism of Tudjman and his followers, which had unnecessarily rubbed the Serbs in Croatia up the wrong way and roused their suspicions, and criticized the authoritarian nature of Tudjman's administration and his personality cult.⁸⁹⁹ They were therefore not very susceptible to the explanation of the differences between Croatia and Serbia expounded elsewhere as a conflict between democracy and Communist dictatorship.⁹⁰⁰ Furthermore, much of the Western media referred to the stifling nationalist climate and the link between nationalism and Catholicism in Croatia.⁹⁰¹

The conflict between Serbs and Croats could not therefore be portrayed by the Western media simply as a conflict between good and evil.⁹⁰² National variations on this theme were possible, however. The British press, for example, remained extremely neutral in the conflict between Serbs and Croats. On the one hand this was because they adopted much Serb propaganda, but on the other hand also because correspondents in the region were as little inclined to create the impression of being pro

⁸⁹³ Vensa Peric Zimonjic, 'Kostunica purges Yugoslav army of Milosevic loyalists', The Independent, 01/01/01.

⁸⁹⁴ See e.g. Robert D. Kaplan, 'Croatianism; the latest Balkan ugliness; Holocaust denial and revisionism', The New Republic, 25/11/91; Teddy Preuss, 'Goebbels lives - in Zagreb', The Jerusalem Post, 06/12/91.

⁸⁹⁵ Ton Crijnen, 'Kroaten zien katholieke kerk als dam tegen Servisch gevaar', Trouw, 04/07/91.

⁸⁹⁶ Richard West, 'An Apologist for Hitler', The Guardian, 18/10/91.

⁸⁹⁷ John Daniszewski, 'Today's Turbulence and Nitter Memories Disquiet Jews', The Associated Press, 27/07/91.

⁸⁹⁸ See e.g. Russell, Prejudice, p. 181; Tromp-Vrkic, 'Kroatië, in het bijzonder' pp. 8-10 and 14.

⁸⁹⁹ See e.g. Theo Engelen, 'President van Kroatië houdt nauwelijks grondgebied over' ('President of Croatia left with hardly any territory'), NRC Handelsblad, 22/06/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Joegoslavië is niet meer', ('Yugoslavia is no more') Trouw, 26/06/91; idem, 'Spelers in drama van Joegoslavië (Players in Yugoslavia drama)', Trouw, 03/07/91; idem, 'Franjo Tudjman. Nationalist ten koste van zijn volk' ('Nationalist at the expense of his people'), Trouw, 12/10/91; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Echte feestvreugde wil niet uitbreken in Zagreb' ('Real party spirit won't take hold in Zagreb'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/06/91; idem, 'In Kroatië neemt verzet tegen Tudjman toe' ('Resistance to Tudjman within Croatia on the rise'), ibid., 05/12/91; Peter Michielsen, 'De wrok zoekt een uitweg' ('The resentment is looking for a way out'), ibid., 06/07/91; Anet Bleich, 'Franjo Tudjman is symbool van onafhankelijk Kroatië' ('Franjo Tudjman is symbol of independent Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 27/06/91; Piet de Moor, 'Milosevic en Tudjman moeten ophoepelen, alletwee. Het democratische gehalte van de regering in Kroatië', de Volkskrant, 27/07/91; Bert Lanting, 'Kroatische leider Tudjman neemt alle beslissingen zelf' ('Croat leader Tudjman takes all the decisions himself'), Het Parool, 17/07/91; Lydia Luttenberger, 'The democratic forum, Rijeka', Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, pp. 59 and 61; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 58-59.

⁹⁰⁰ Cf. Nicole Lucas, 'Een onmogelijke missie', Trouw, 03/08/91.

⁹⁰¹ Arthur van Amerongen, 'Zwart Kroatië' ('Black Croatia'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 26/08/92, pp. 4-5; Dubravka Ugresic, 'Het onverdraaglijk overleven in Yugoslavia' ('The unbearable survival in Yugoslavia'), Vrij Nederland, 12/09/92, pp. 22-24; idem, 'Goedenacht, Kroatische schrijvers, waar u zich ook bevindt!' ('Goodnight Croatian writers wherever you are!'), Vrij Nederland, 20/02/93, pp. 26-28.

⁹⁰² Russell, Prejudice, p. 181.

Tudjman as pro Milosevic.⁹⁰³ In the German media, on the other hand, reports on the lack of democracy in Croatia were suppressed for some time because it was 'politically inconvenient'.⁹⁰⁴

In the reporting of the conflict between Serbs and Croats, the Dutch media were generally relatively impartial. As early as July, the NRC Handelsblad quoted a Croatian woman in Slavonia who was married to a Serb. 'There are two truths', she said. 'The Serbs provoke violence from the Croats or vice versa. Who should you believe?'⁹⁰⁵ The journalists also appeared to be unsure. A number of weeks later Van den Boogaard wrote in NRC Handelsblad that, as the intensity of the engagements between Croats and Serbs increased, the full facts of the events became more difficult to ascertain.⁹⁰⁶ However, inequalities in power were observed: Croatian shotguns as against Serbian mortars.⁹⁰⁷

The reports in the Dutch press revealed that not only did the JNA support the local Serbian militias, but also sent paramilitaries into the area and assisted with weapons. Attention was also paid to ethnic cleansing, which was practiced by the Cetniks especially, with mention of atrocities such as the use of citizens as a shield, the poking out of eyes, the mutilation of bodies and acts of destruction. Van den Boogaard, for example, wrote background accounts, mainly from the mouths of Croatian Displaced Persons.⁹⁰⁸ It also became clear how this furtherance of violence drove Croats and Serbs completely apart in Krajina and Slovenia, how old friendships were broken from one day to the next and changed into hatred and murder, while emphasizing their own ethnic symbols, such as Cetnik caps.⁹⁰⁹ Possessions of Croat-Serb couples especially were singled out.⁹¹⁰

There was also a considerable degree of objectivity to be seen in the photographic material. For instance, NRC Handelsblad showed a photo of a passing car in the Croatian independence celebration, where not only is the Croatian flag to be seen waving out of the window, but also the driver's left hand holding a revolver.⁹¹¹

It could be stated in general that the criticism of Croatia was concerned with the political system and the associations with the Ustashe past in particular. Reporting on current Croatian war crimes committed against Serbs was given little attention in the Western media for a long time.⁹¹² This was only to change during the war in Bosnia. After returning to the Netherlands in the summer of 1992, Squadron Leader J. Brinkhof, who had served for six months as a UN observer in Bosnia and Croatia, complained that the reporting in the Dutch media 'had been taken for a ride by the Croatian propaganda machine'. According to him, the Croats and Muslims were 'just as bad' as the Serbs.⁹¹³ It would take until the spring of 1993 before Croatian acts of war also became the subject of serious criticism. For instance, the following could be read in May 1993 in HP/DeTijd: 'The more or less intact image of barbaric Serbs and obliging Croats is long out-of-date (...) Like the Serbs, Croats now cut off food-aid transport to Muslim areas with the following objective: starving out and evicting the population.'⁹¹⁴

⁹⁰³ Russell, Prejudice, pp. 214-215.

⁹⁰⁴ N. Lucas, 'De waarheid over 'Joegoslavië'' ('The truth about Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 09/03/93.

⁹⁰⁵ Hans Steketee, 'Serviërs vluchten voor 'terreur'' ('Serbs flee 'terror)'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

⁹⁰⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Hagelwit op missie' ('Snow white on mission'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/91.

⁹⁰⁷ See e.g. Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Jachtgeweer helpt niet meer tegen mortiervuur' ('A hunting rifle is no use against mortar fire'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91. See also idem, 'Kroatië zonder wapens en zonder hoop', ('Croatia without arms and without hope') NRC Handelsblad, 03/08/91.

⁹⁰⁸ See e.g. Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Serviërs gebruikten mededorpelingen als schild', NRC Handelsblad, 30/07/91; idem, 'Kroatië zonder wapens en zonder hoop', NRC Handelsblad, 03/08/91.

⁹⁰⁹ See e.g. Hans Steketee, 'Serviërs vluchten voor 'terreur'', NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Jachtgeweer helpt niet meer tegen mortiervuur' ('A hunting rifle is no use against mortar fire'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/91; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Serviërs gebruikten mededorpelingen als schild', NRC Handelsblad, 30/07/91.

⁹¹⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Serviërs gebruikten mededorpelingen als schild', NRC Handelsblad, 30/07/91.

⁹¹¹ Placed alongside 'Twee lijken in een straat met broden' ('Two bodies in a street with loaves'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/06/91.

⁹¹² Caroline de Gruyter, 'In Kroatië is iedereen goed' ('Everyone is good in Croatia'), Elsevier, 08/08/92, p. 32.

⁹¹³ Eric Vrijnsen, 'Een massale invasie is onbegonnen werk' ('A massive invasion is a hopeless task'), Elsevier, 09/01/93.

⁹¹⁴ Henk Steenhuis, 'Philippe Morillon', HP/De Tijd, 21/05/93, p. 24.

General half-heartedness and the difficulty of identification

The Western press's lack of a very clear position regarding the war in Croatia, which formed such a remarkable contrast to the later engagement in the war in Bosnia, also had to do with the initial lack of public interest and the time journalists needed to put the conflict into an understandable context. After three months among snipers and artillery duels in Croatia, the journalist Raymond van den Boogaard, for example, remarked that the topic of the war was not 'alive' in the Netherlands: 'Strange Balkan business, people would think, a squabble between neighbours that had got out of hand.'⁹¹⁵ 'Ignorance is the bane of journalists arriving in any crisis. It was to prove particularly acute in Yugoslavia, which drew hundreds of Balkan first-timers.' According to Alec Russell, Balkan correspondent of the British Daily Telegraph.⁹¹⁶ However, the first months of the war in Croatia were covered mainly by correspondents who were old hands in the Balkans.⁹¹⁷ Many journalists who dropped in on the war in Slovenia turned out to be just passing through. After the Slovenian war, for example, it took almost a year before the large American television networks returned to the region.⁹¹⁸ In the second half of 1991 the serious American television programmes devoted hardly any air time to the war in Croatia.⁹¹⁹ American newspapers with an orientation to international news, such as The New York Times and the Washington Post, still had a little more than one article a day on average on the conflict in Yugoslavia in this period.⁹²⁰ Throughout 1991, on the other hand, the major American weekly papers Time, Newsweek and U.S. News and World Report, had a total of only 31 articles on the country.⁹²¹ In the words of an American media analyst, the reporting in the American media on Yugoslavia in 1991 and 1992 was 'misinformed and superficial, when not biased and racist. It has tended to focus on the sensational rather than the substantive; it has concentrated on personalities rather than issues; and it has tended to recast what is essentially a Balkan affair in terms of American policy or the role of such international organizations as the EC, the UN and NATO.'⁹²²

In France too, the interest for the war in Croatia appeared to have been limited. In July 1991, Le Monde considered that Yugoslavia was only worth an opening article on two occasions, and after 10 July, Le Figaro made no further comment on the crisis in Yugoslavia for weeks.⁹²³

The lack of interest in the West for the war in Croatia was generally attributed to the confusing nature of the conflict. There was no question of a real declaration of war. While fighting was going on elsewhere in Croatia, people in Zagreb were sitting in pavement cafes in the summer of 1991.

'Like a leaky tap, the fighting was now on, now off and by August it had settled into a cyclical pattern. The Serbs attacked a position; the EC issued a condemnation; the federal authorities called a ceasefire. After a few days of posturing at peace, the sequence started again with the next Serb assault. No one seemed sure if this routine counted as war or not and so journalists, politicians and the public continued to talk about the "Yugoslav crisis" just as we talk about currency crises or job crises...'⁹²⁴

⁹¹⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Een oorlog zonder sympathie' ('A war without sympathy'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/10/91.

⁹¹⁶ Russell, Prejudice, p. 158.

⁹¹⁷ Russell, Prejudice, p. 173.

⁹¹⁸ Russell, Prejudice, p. 165.

⁹¹⁹ James J. Sadkovic, 'The response of the American media to Balkan neo-nationalisms', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, pp. 116-119.

⁹²⁰ James J. Sadkovic, 'The response of the American media to Balkan neo-nationalisms', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 121.

⁹²¹ James J. Sadkovic, 'The response of the American media to Balkan neo-nationalisms', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 123.

⁹²² James J. Sadkovic, 'The response of the American media to Balkan neo-nationalisms', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 123.

⁹²³ Godfrey Hodgson, 'Discord in the European concert', The Independent, 03/08/91.

⁹²⁴ Russell, Prejudice, p. 198.

For many Westerners in major cities, for months after the start of the Croatian war, Balkan meant no more than the name of the restaurant on the corner. The beaches and islands of the Adriatic coast in Yugoslavia had been heard of, as had cevapcici and slivovitz and the Red Star Belgrade football club. It was a pleasant holiday country, but little was known of the ethnic distinctions and the history of the former Yugoslavia. Sarajevo as the event that sparked World War I, the partisan conflict in World War II, and Tito's independent position in the Cold War were the best kept collective memories.⁹²⁵

It was difficult to explain to the public what had happened in Croatia, especially after the Gulf War that had been so pleasingly easy to understand:

"The fighting had five main theatres, in each of which the JNA had different war aims. On one front the fighting was about ethnic rivalry. On another it was about territorial aggression, a.k.a. Greater Serbia. On a third it was about tribal vendettas. On a fourth the fighting was spawned by the culture of violence. With commentators struggling to explain this maze, interpretations differed, and the big picture, that the JNA was running amok, was obscured."⁹²⁶

Lack of understanding and despair led to resignation. Furthermore the complexity of the conflict took away the possibility of identifying with what was going on. 'It would appear that you have to be a German or an Austrian to believe in the conflict, as the Croatian propaganda tried to hammer home: democracy versus reactionary Communism', wrote Van den Boogaard after three months experience in Croatia.

"The French, the British and the Dutch tend to distance themselves more. Rather too many lies were told about the course of the conflict and who started shooting, a little too much primitive propaganda intended to stir up hatred against Serbs, a few too many bodybuilders with extreme right-wing ideas arriving on the Croatian side from all over Europe to make their childhood dreams come true. No, the first war in Europe in decades had to make do without having meaning given to it, and without broad sympathy for one of the combatants."⁹²⁷

The commentator Koen Koch in De Volkskrant also felt that the Yugoslavia fatigue that he had observed in December 1991 had to do with a lack of opportunity for identification. After all, who in the Netherlands felt attracted to the nationalism of Milosevic or Tudjman? He thought that a fundraising campaign run by the Red Cross and a few other aid organizations for humanitarian assistance to the victims of the conflict in Yugoslavia was late in getting under way and perfunctory.⁹²⁸ The proceeds were disappointing. Part of the reason, according to the Red Cross, was that the television companies were unwilling to give it sufficient attention. The NOS thought that it was also due to the public response to Yugoslavia.⁹²⁹

In late 1991, Elsbeth Etty and Peter Michielsen expressed their frustration in NRC Handelsblad about the lack of interest in the conflict in Yugoslavia, with the phrase 'War is being waged in the heart of Europe and we couldn't care less':

⁹²⁵ Cf. Mock (Hg.), Balkan-Dossier, p. 8.

⁹²⁶ Russell, Prejudice, p. 221.

⁹²⁷ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Een oorlog onder sympathie', NRC Handelsblad, 26/10/91.

⁹²⁸ Koen Koch, 'Yugoslavia-moeheid' ('Yugoslavia fatigue'), de Volkskrant, 06/12/91. He was referring to the Yugoslavia campaign of Memisa, Mensen in Nood, the Netherlands Red Cross, the ecumenical aid foundation, the foundation for Displaced Persons and UNICEF in the Netherlands.

⁹²⁹ 'Ruzie over hulpactie' ('Quarrel about aid operation'), Trouw, 30/11/91; 'Ruzie omroepen en Rode Kruis fataal voor hulpactie Joegoslavië' ('Quarrel between broadcasters and Red Cross disastrous for aid to Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 06/12/91.

"The war in Yugoslavia has never been the topic of the day here: from the outset it was a war of which only a few could see the logic and the deeper historical motives, and where there is a lack of understanding and knowledge, indifference quickly follows. The war in Yugoslavia has no appeal. A war is being fought in Yugoslavia about land and influence, a nationalist war. We think this is outdated, backward, an anachronism (...) And so there never was a demonstration for peace in Yugoslavia in this country. For that matter, neither was there in any other country. If there was any kind of demonstration it was by Croats."⁹³⁰

A demonstration of sympathy with the independence of Croatia was held in the Netherlands on 30 June, but there were few participants, which according to the organizers was a consequence of the conflict in Slovenia that followed the declaration of independence.⁹³¹

On Saturday 13 July 1991 one hundred and fifty demonstrators in The Hague declared their support for a united and peaceful Yugoslavia. The meeting was organized by the confederation of Yugoslavian associations in the Netherlands. The turnout was disappointing and it was not all about Yugoslavian unity, as evidenced by the criticism directed at a reporter of De Volkskrant by one of the demonstrators: 'Serbs are portrayed as oppressors and Milosevic as a Bolshevik. Communism has given all the leaders, also those of Slovenia and Croatia, dirty hands. But the press heaps the blame on us.'⁹³²

According to Raymond van den Boogaard, the 'civil war' that developed in early July in Croatia had little resemblance to the 'more or less orderly conflict' in Slovenia:

"This is the conflict of the pistolleros led by minor Serbian politicians, of one village against the other, one half of the village against the other, of the assassins, the lumberjacks and the users of grandad's hunting rifle. And around that, the Yugoslavian army gathered along the border between Serbia and Croatia, the Croatian police units, the Croatian National Guard estimated at 30,000 men, and the countless police reservists in all republics."⁹³³

In his article, Van den Boogaard also mentioned Serbian 'terrorists', who the Croatian government said were supported by the JNA. And HP/De Tijd wrote at the beginning of September 1991:

"What gradually came to be known as the Yugoslavian crises occupied a lot of newspaper space, but otherwise resulted in little more than the shrugging of shoulders. A shame about the beaches, though. There is a shortage in Yugoslavia of clear heroes and villains which we can identify with. (...) On television each evening you see men in camouflage firing at men in approximately the same clothing in battles over unheard-of pieces of the country (East Slavonia! West Srenj!)."⁹³⁴

This was reason for the HP/De Tijd editors not to include too much Yugoslavia in its pages, for fear that the reader would quickly skip over it because they found nothing to identify with.⁹³⁵ The weekly mainly restricted itself to balanced atmosphere reports by Bart Rijs and, later, a number of more military-oriented articles by the freelance journalist Clifford C. Cremer.

⁹³⁰ Elsbeth Etty & Peter Michielsen, 'Europese vredesactie is wat Joegoslavië nodig heeft' ('A European peace operation is what Yugoslavia needs'), NRC Handelsblad, 31/12/91.

⁹³¹ Voor vrij Croatia' ('for free Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 01/07/91.

⁹³² 'De demonstranten zijn allen Joegoslavaaf' ('The demonstrators are all Yugoslavs'), de Volkskrant, 15/07/91.

⁹³³ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Burgeroorlog nadert Zagreb' ('Civil war approaches Zagreb'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/07/91.

⁹³⁴ Arno Kantelberg & Bart Rijs, 'Zonder helden of schurken' ('Neither heroes nor villains'), HP/De Tijd, 13/09/93, p. 8.

⁹³⁵ Daan Dijkman, 'Een héél rare oorlog', HP/De Tijd 07/02/92, p. 7.

There was no lack of contributions on the conflict in Yugoslavia in the correspondence columns, even though they were not yet thick on the ground at the time of the war in Croatia, but the matter was seldom mentioned in the letters to the editor.⁹³⁶ No one knows whether this was the consequence of a conscious editorial policy or that there really were relatively few readers who felt the urge to write letters on Yugoslavia.

A case in point was also that a book on the conflict in Yugoslavia did not yet prove to be commercially attractive for publishers in the Netherlands at the start of the war.⁹³⁷ Arendo Joustra, writing in Elsevier recorded the following in September 1991:

"Do you still read everything about Yugoslavia?."

"Not for a long time. I turn the page if it is full of stories about Croatia, Slovenia and Macedonia."

'A bit of chat concealed in the convolutions of a discussion in a bar. Bar talk, in other words. But the interest was hardly greater in the offices of the professional observers.'

Joustra also attributed the lack of interest or engagement to the difficulty in identifying with the nationalist conviction of Croats, for example. 'The demonstrators at the embassy in The Hague are Croats, Serbs and the odd Yugoslavian. They are not Dutch sympathizers.' Others' nationalism was unable to arouse any ideological enthusiasm elsewhere, as the Spanish Civil War or the Cuban revolution had done earlier.⁹³⁸

Alongside the difficulty in identifying as a cause of the modest interest, Elsevier also cited the constant lurching between peace talks, ceasefire agreements and violations of these agreements. Seemingly futile details, 'news on the square millimetre', had to provide evidence for peace optimism, but the reader of that news quickly discovered that 'the typical Balkans choreography' consisted of one step forward, two steps back.

"All that fuss, I have stopped following it", the majority of people in the West eventually said. "They are choking on it, there in Yugoslavia." So much intrigue, so much deceit on a high level does not fit in with our view of the world.⁹³⁹

Therefore, according to NRC Handelsblad correspondent Raymond van den Boogaard, the war in Yugoslavia was not a popular subject in the Netherlands until 1993. As early as 1991 he encountered acquaintances in the Netherlands who would say they had 'stopped reading about it' because it was complicated, insoluble and was always the same thing.⁹⁴⁰

The war in Croatia was also difficult to illustrate. Toon Schmeink, deputy editor-in-chief of Het Parool, explained that for months the editorial team had been driven 'crazy' by the photo material: 'From the start of the war in Yugoslavia, the same sort of picture was offered almost every day: an older ⁹³⁶ For some notable exceptions see M. Wiegman, 'Joegoslavië' ('Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 21/09/91; H. Neudecker, 'Yugoslavia', NRC Handelsblad, 12-12-91; 'Volkenrechtelijk is ingrijpen in Kroatië uitgesloten', ('International law rules out intervening in Croatia') de Volkskrant, 10/08/91; I. van Wijngaarden, 'Vukovar', de Volkskrant, 24/10/91; Igor Znidarsic, 'Nieuw taalgebruik nodig voor oorlog in Kroatië' ('New language needed for war in Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 23/11/91; Nikola Rasic, 'Kroatië' ('Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 09/12/91.

⁹³⁷ Ugresic, Nationaliteit, p. 18.

⁹³⁸ Arendo Joustra, 'De betrokkenheid ontbreekt' ('The commitment is missing'), Elsevier, 21/09/91, p. 41.

⁹³⁹ 'Jojo' ('Yo-yo'), Elsevier, 19/10/91, p. 49.

⁹⁴⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan', Van Es & Sampiemon & Starink (eds.), Redacteuren, p. 215.

woman in tears. You had to be happy if now and again you saw a young mother with a child in the shot.⁹⁴¹

6. The early intervention debate in the Netherlands

Despite the resignation of a large part of the population, a split began to appear among the major Dutch quality newspapers at the end of June 1991 between NRC Handelsblad on the one hand and De Volkskrant on the other regarding the advisability of European involvement in the events in Yugoslavia. Trouw adopted a middle position in this matter.

From the outset, NRC Handelsblad took a critical course with respect to the European Community's possibilities for doing something about Yugoslavia. An editorial four days before the declarations of independence stated that the Community lacked effective instruments 'and the CSCE had none whatsoever'. The EC budget had no room for support and the organization did not have a political-military arm. If the Slovenians were to separate cleanly, the EC would be seen to be wearing the emperor's clothes: its credibility as the centre for European crisis management would be seriously undermined.⁹⁴² Shortly after the declarations of independence it was considered to be an outdated idea to deny Slovenia and Croatia the chance to leave Yugoslavia and to be admitted to Europe. Even without Serbian hegemonism, the 1918 solution was no longer adequate for Croatia and Slovenia.⁹⁴³ Through the eagerness with which it threw itself into the matter, the EC was in danger of 'digging a hole for itself'. The community would be given the blame if no solution was found.⁹⁴⁴ In the defence of the unity of Yugoslavia, the Community found itself in 'the questionable company of senior officers and populist zealots who were mainly obsessed with the continuity of their own power'.⁹⁴⁵

According to Peter Michielsen, the breakup of Yugoslavia would lead to bloodshed in Yugoslavia against which the confrontation in Slovenia would be as nothing. The question, however was 'whether something can still be done to change that scenario'.⁹⁴⁶ According to NRC Handelsblad columnist Paul Scheffer, the 'in more than one respect Orthodox Serbia' actually took little notice of outside pressure. And areas such as Croatia and Slovenia should not remain in a reactionary Yugoslavia as a result of Western European interference: 'where persuasion fails, we have to reconcile ourselves to a separation'. In that case, recognition was better than clinging to the unity of Yugoslavia, which Belgrade took as encouragement for the use of force. And if it came to violence, 'the brave EC troika would efficiently take to its heels'.⁹⁴⁷ According to the NRC Handelsblad editorial too, 'Persuasiveness, with the suspension of aid as an incentive' was 'the only means' at the EC's disposal. Furthermore, the contribution of the EC, namely the combination of unity and democracy, was equivalent to squaring the circle. And the Community's foreign policy was rendered 'lame' by the prevalence of national interests, as the actions of Genscher and Hurd demonstrated. As long as the EC encompassed many disparate views the troika would never be able to replace the large countries.⁹⁴⁸

Following Belgrade's decision to withdraw the JNA from Slovenia NRC Handelsblad hoped that the EC had learned that it could exert little influence on developments outside the community borders. According to the editorial in this newspaper, the combined effect of arguments of international law and financial-economic means of pressure failed to outbalance the 'historically accepted hatred and deeply-⁹⁴¹ " Een krant positioneert zich via de foto's" ('A newspaper positions itself through the photos'), De Journalist, 22/05/92, p. 17.

⁹⁴² 'Joegoslavië' ('Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 21/06/91.

⁹⁴³ 'Afgewezen' ('Rejected'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/91.

⁹⁴⁴ 'Machtsvertoon' ('Show of strength'), editorial, NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/91.

⁹⁴⁵ J.H. Sampiemon, 'Europa in verdacht gezelschap', NRC Handelsblad, 04/07/91.

⁹⁴⁶ Peter Michielsen, 'Breuk Joegoslavische federatie maakt van Balkan weer kruivat' ('Rift in Yugoslav Federation turns the Balkans back into a powder keg'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/07/91.

⁹⁴⁷ Paul Scheffer, 'De vraag van Tomas G. Masaryk' ('The question of Tomas G. Masaryk'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/07/91.

⁹⁴⁸ 'Trojka en Twaalf' ('Troika and twelve'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/07/91.

rooted urge for emancipation' that existed in Yugoslavia.⁹⁴⁹ At the beginning of August, after the war in Croatia had become visible to the West in all its horror, NRC Handelsblad observed that 'four weeks after the first lightning action (...) the EC's widely publicized mediation attempts appeared to have delivered precious little'.⁹⁵⁰

Dick Verkijk in the professional journal of Dutch journalism used similar terms. He wrote that the conflict in Croatia had been caused by 'a collection of irresponsible politicians' who until recently had belonged to the Communist party and were only interested in maintaining their positions. He said that they had always learned that to compromise was equivalent to capitulation and that nothing was worse than losing power. That was 'too much for ten ECs to compete with'.⁹⁵¹

The criticism directed from the outset at foreign involvement in the Yugoslavian crisis, in particular from the EC, by NRC Handelsblad, had no place on the editor's desks at De Volkskrant. While Ulrike Rudberg from Belgrade was sending her balanced contributions, totally different ideas were apparently floating around the Wibautstraat office in Amsterdam. As early as 29 May 1991 they printed an article by Flora Lewis with the title 'CSCE must prevent civil war'. She observed that the Yugoslavs were heading for civil war as if hypnotized. She dismissed a Western response by saying 'let them fight it out among themselves: we only have to take care that the violence does not get out of hand'. Conflict in Yugoslavia would inevitably inflame old border disputes in neighbouring countries, would result in hundreds of thousands of Displaced Persons and break up international economic networks. She felt that the parties in Yugoslavia were not open to mediation at that time, although, under the aegis of the CSCE, a group of generally respected people could map out the differences and at the same time make clear that none of the parties could rely on the support of the rest of Europe. Furthermore, the CSCE should make it very clear that both the external and internal borders of Yugoslavia were inviolable.⁹⁵²

The powerlessness of the CSCE was observed three weeks later in De Volkskrant when the CSCE ministers in Berlin stressed that the Yugoslavs would have to solve their problems themselves.⁹⁵³ Another week later an editorial nominated the European Community as a body to help the Yugoslavian republics conduct a dialogue that they did not appear to be able to do themselves. The instrument of economic and financial help could be used as a lever in this.⁹⁵⁴ On 3 July the newspaper observed that until then the international involvement had failed, but that was no reason not to continue to try to silence the weapons. The highest priority was to persuade the JNA to return to their barracks.⁹⁵⁵

At the end of July, when the fighting in Croatia exploded in all its intensity, André Roelofs criticized the failure to grant the Croatian authorities' repeated request to station ECMM people in Croatia too. The Brioni agreement opened the way for this. If the EC waited too long, only a rump of Croatia would remain and Europe could expect a conflict between Serbia and Croatia 'that could last for generations'. He admitted that it was possibly a little dangerous for civil observers. Then the moment would quickly arrive when the EC member states would have to be prepared 'at the request of the involved parties' to send a 'European "peacekeeping force"' to Yugoslavia.⁹⁵⁶ After the conflict in Croatia had flared up further in the following days, De Volkskrant expressed the opinion that the EC could not avoid discussing the question of whether a peacekeeping force for Yugoslavia would have to be formed.⁹⁵⁷

⁹⁴⁹ 'Slovenië vrij' ('Slovenia free'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/07/91.

⁹⁵⁰ Hans Nijenhuis, 'EG verstrikt geraakt in eigen bemiddelingplan' (EC tangled in own mediation plan), NRC Handelsblad, 02/08/91.

⁹⁵¹ Dick Verkijk, 'Joegoslavië. De officiële tv wakkert haat aan', De Journalist, 42(1991)21 p. 19.

⁹⁵² Flora Lewis, 'CVSE moet burgeroorlog voorkomen' ('CSCE must prevent civil war'), de Volkskrant, 29/05/91.

⁹⁵³ 'CVSE-top' ('CSCE summit'), de Volkskrant, 20/06/91.

⁹⁵⁴ 'Afsplitsing', de Volkskrant, 27/06/91.

⁹⁵⁵ 'Ten geleide - Joegoslavië' ('An introduction - Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 03/07/91.

⁹⁵⁶ André Roelofs, 'EC heeft A gezegd, EC moet B zeggen' ('EC said A, EC should say B'), de Volkskrant, 25/07/91.

⁹⁵⁷ 'Ten geleide - EG-troepen' ('An introduction - EC troops'), de Volkskrant, 31/07/91.

Another striking fact about the Dutch press was that while the Netherlands held the presidency of the European Community at the time, little interest was shown in the press for noises from over the borders.

Among the Yugoslavian voices that were heard in the Netherlands was that of the Croatian writer Dubravka Ugresic, who visited the Netherlands in late September 1991 and went on to the United States, returning to Zagreb via the Netherlands in the summer of 1992. For some time she wrote as a United States based correspondent for NRC Handelsblad and would later also contribute to Dutch media.⁹⁵⁸ She wrote the following Dutch language publications during the Yugoslavian conflict: Nationaliteit: geen, (Nationality: none) part of which she wrote in Amsterdam in 1993 and De cultuur van leugens (The culture of lies) in 1995. In her publications she expressed her feeling of being rootless both inside and outside her native country through the sharpness of Croatian Catholic-nationalism and the Western lack of understanding for Yugoslavia, full as she was of nostalgia for 'Titoland', her 'poor Atlantis'⁹⁵⁹ or 'Yugo-Atlantis'.⁹⁶⁰

The Czech writer Milan Kundera had the opportunity at the end of July 1991 to argue in De Groene Amsterdammer for preserving Slovenia. The West must not make the mistake made by Chamberlain, who rejected the idea of intervention for an unknown and far away country at the time of the Munich Conference.⁹⁶¹

Prof.dr.ir. J.J.C. Voorhoeve, at the time director of Clingendael, was one of the first among Dutch opinion makers to advocate intervention. As early as 29 June 1991, while the fighting in Slovenia had just started, he urged the deployment of peacekeeping forces, which, if necessary, would have to press ahead against the will of the JNA. He regretted that international law still offered too few opportunities for intervention in humanitarian crises; possibly, however, the genocide treaty would provide a way out!⁹⁶² In October, Voorhoeve expressed the opinion that Yugoslavia came close to 'a situation (...) that no longer has an ethical justification'. In such a case, he felt that humanitarian intervention should be possible in principle. The problem nonetheless was that not a single international organization appeared to be properly equipped for the purpose. He therefore advocated either strengthening the UN, in particular the secretariat, or enhancing the CSCE into an effective crisis management body.⁹⁶³

The director of the Clingendael Institute for International Relations and the former chairman of the VVD parliamentary party would repeatedly urge far-reaching military intervention.⁹⁶⁴ Unlike many interventionists, his argument was not simply emotional in nature. Neither was his starting point the possibility of a relatively small country such as the Netherlands becoming great in the field of human rights. His main point was an awareness of international responsibility for the course of events in the world.⁹⁶⁵ It was the moralism of the Netherlands elevated to a worldwide level: from model country to model world. And because Voorhoeve did not entirely ignore the power relations: moralism with a dash of realism.

⁹⁵⁸ Ugresic, Nationaliteit, pp. 9-10. See e.g. Dubravka Ugresic, 'Het onverdraaglijk overleven in Joegoslavië', Vrij Nederland, 12/09/92, pp. 22-24; idem, "Goedenacht, Kroatische schrijvers, waar u zich ook bevindt!", Vrij Nederland, 20/02/93, pp. 26-28.

⁹⁵⁹ Ugresic, Nationaliteit, pp. 18 and 20.

⁹⁶⁰ Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 58. See also Ugresic, 'Confiscatie', p. 149.

⁹⁶¹ Milan Kundera, 'Redt Slovenië!' ('Save Slovenia!'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 31/07/91, p. 5.

⁹⁶² Wim Jansen/Johan ten Hove, 'De wereld kan wat doen' ('The world can do something'), Trouw, 29/06/91.

⁹⁶³ Bayer, 'Noodzaak', p. 6.

⁹⁶⁴ See also Paul Scheffer, 'Weg naar de hel' ('The road to hell'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/09/95.

⁹⁶⁵ See also the remarks of the then Clingendael worker Theo van den Doel in: Eric Vrijzen, 'Recept voor een ramp' ('Recipe for disaster'), Elsevier, 21/10/95, p. 36.

Voorhoeve's argument was preceded by an appeal by S. Rozemond, who wrote that even without the presence of a collective security system, 'it is impossible on the one hand to pursue pan-European cultural and economic linkage and on the other to remain indifferent to acts of war'.⁹⁶⁶

Others were more cautious. Koen Koch, political scientist and columnist for De Volkskrant, thought it best to limit the physical area of the conflict and to deprive it of oxygen.⁹⁶⁷ Brigadier General (ret.) J.C.A.C. (Koos) de Vogel, UNIFIL Head of Operations in Lebanon in 1980 and defence attaché in Belgrade between 1982 and 1986, warned in August 1991 that the dispatch of a peacekeeping force, which Van den Broek and Van Eekelen were discussing at the time, could not be realized from one day to the next, and certainly not in the absence of American command.⁹⁶⁸ 'If not all parties and militias consent to your arrival, you will be hacked to pieces.' According to him the West should have no illusions about what it would mean to make peace in the border area between Croatia and Bosnia, 'with so many combatants and interests'. Within the framework of the territorial defence, the weapons were mostly 'in a shed behind the town hall', and the territory was inhospitable⁹⁶⁹ and the Serbs in Krajina had been expert in the execution of military exercises since the sixteenth century.⁹⁷⁰ He thought that negotiations were vastly preferable to any form of military intervention whatsoever.⁹⁷¹

The Groningen based polemologist Hylke Tromp, who was married to the Croatian Nena Vrkic, was also one of the pessimists as far as Western involvement was concerned. In August 1991 he still thought that if EC mediation did not yield results, a military intervention by a Rapid Deployment Force would be 'virtually inevitable'.⁹⁷² For the time being he deemed mediation still possible, however, for example by a committee of wise men.⁹⁷³ Tromp's wife Vrkic also wanted to give such a committee another chance in early September, even though she started to fear that 'the deployment of military power is ultimately the only language that will still be understood in Yugoslavia'.⁹⁷⁴ Her husband also became increasingly convinced of this. The only way of still avoiding intervention with force was to threaten it, he wrote a few weeks later. And if that threat did not work, Europe would have to intervene with force without the permission of Milosevic and Tudjman.⁹⁷⁵ An action of this sort would have to be large scale: 'You don't put out a fire with a cup of water.'⁹⁷⁶

In October 1991, Hylke Tromp saw no solution to the conflict emerging from the region itself. He pointed to the Yugoslavs' xenophobic attitude, which he said was largely attributable to a general human pattern of radicalization during a conflict. The authoritarian structure in Eastern Europe was a further guarantee of people passively following their leaders.⁹⁷⁷ He thought that economic sanctions no longer made the slightest impression now that the conflict in Yugoslavia had escalated so far. However, he had doubts about military intervention:

⁹⁶⁶ S. Rozemond, 'Het dreigingsbeeld', Nederlandse defensie tegen een nieuwe achtergrond, p. 7, wrote this even before the outbreak of the war in Yugoslavia.

⁹⁶⁷ K. Koch, 'Het nieuwe dreigingsbeeld', Nederlandse defensie tegen een nieuwe achtergrond, p. 12, prior to the conflict in Yugoslavia ⁹⁶⁸ J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Zo'n Europese vredesmacht staat niet zo gauw in het gelid' ('Such a European peace force is not inclined to fall in line'), Vrij Nederland, 31/08/91, pp. 26-27.

⁹⁶⁹ 'Instemming van alle partijen nodig' ('Assent of all parties needed'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/08/91.

⁹⁷⁰ "Pacificatie duurt al maanden" ('Pacification has already taken months'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/08/91.

⁹⁷¹ Wio Joustra, "Praatcultuur kan Joegoslavië redden, interventie niet" ('The culture of talking can save Yugoslavia, intervention cannot'), de Volkskrant, 09/08/91.

⁹⁷² Hylke Tromp, 'Crisis Joegoslavië is vooral een machtsstrijd' ('The Yugoslavia crisis is mainly a power struggle'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/08/91.

⁹⁷³ Hylke Tromp, 'EG-trojka had te weinig gezag. Alleen team van ervaren chirurgen kan Joegoslavië redden' ('EC troika had too little authority. Only a team of experienced surgeons can rescue Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/91.

⁹⁷⁴ Nevenka Tromp-Vrkic, 'Steeds verder escaleert de Joegoslavische crisis' ('The Yugoslavia crisis escalates ever further'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/09/91.

⁹⁷⁵ Hylke Tromp, 'EG moet vrede in Joegoslavië durven afdwingen' ('EC must have the courage to enforce peace in Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 19/09/91.

⁹⁷⁶ Haro Hielkema/Alder Schipper, 'De oorlog in huize Tromp' ('The war in the Tromp household'), Trouw, 28/09/91.

⁹⁷⁷ Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p.17.

'The only thing that still makes an impression, is threatening intervention. And then not with thirty thousand lightly armed people, something I refer to in private as the rifle club - no, you have to be able to present yourself with two hundred thousand men, with precision weapons; you must be able to use the Sixth Fleet as a threat. Only then will you be credible. But I am afraid that even that will no longer help. The problem is that we in Europe lack the structure for situations of this sort. We are empty-handed.'⁹⁷⁸

What did Europe actually do in the meantime?

7. Further problems of the Dutch EC presidency surrounding the monitoring mission

Prior to an additional meeting of the Political Committee of the Twelve on 19 July, there was great foreign pressure on the Dutch presidency of the EC to resort to expanding the ECMM mandate to Croatian territory. Nonetheless, when on the eve of this meeting the Eastern Europe Department of the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs drew up an assessment of opportunities available to the EC for influencing the situation in Yugoslavia, the officials concerned did not put such an expansion at the top of the list. The department wondered how the Serbian irregular groups could be monitored, how the observers might operate in an area such as Slavonia where there was no suspension of hostilities and how expansion of the mandate could be realized while Belgrade opposed it. According to the department, other opportunities for the EC to contain the conflict were as follows: the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia; the suspension of financial aid; sanctions; and suspending the EC effort, such as withdrawing from the monitoring mission. The EC could also raise the subject of measures in a CSCE context or in the UN.

The department felt little for the first option, the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia. The Serbs in Croatia would then rise up, after which the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina would possibly join in. Civil war could subsequently break out in Bosnia, which - apparently through the involvement of Muslims - would be given a religious twist, according to the department. The Eastern Europe Department rejected military intervention: 'Yugoslavia is a great hornets' nest. Military supervision in mountainous and therefore difficult to monitor territory does not seem realistic. The inflamed passions of the local population and the extent to which they are armed justify the fear that military intervention could involve many victims.'⁹⁷⁹

During the 19 July EC Comité Politique meeting (which discussed matters in advance of the Council of Ministers) it was decided to change the name of the ad hoc group for the monitoring mission to the 'ad hoc group on Yugoslavia'. From now on this group would be able to discuss all aspects of the relations between the EC or its member states and Yugoslavia. At its next meeting it would also have to consider the expansion of the activities of the ECMM to Croatia and possibly Bosnia-Herzegovina, where likewise difficulties were expected by the Comité Politique, which was itself unable to decide on extending the terms of reference of the monitoring mission.⁹⁸⁰ In response to this outcome the Dutch embassy in Belgrade advised The Hague against the dispatch of monitors to Bosnia. The ethnic problem was even greater there and the ECMM should not get involved in this 'mess'.⁹⁸¹

⁹⁷⁸ Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p.18.

⁹⁷⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DEU/OE, 'Joegoslavië/scenario's en beleidsmogelijkheden' for Extra CoPo, The Hague 19/07/91, 18/07/91.

⁹⁸⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 22/07/91, celer 080; ibid., DDI-DEU, 03288, Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for the Dutch contribution. Minutes of sessions July-December 1991, COREU of the Dutch EC presidency, 19/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 405.

⁹⁸¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03309. Hasselman 232 to Van den Broek, 23/07/91.

Another outcome of the deliberation of the Comité Politique of 19 July was that four days later, on 23 July 1991, the Dutch ambassador in Paris, Henry Wijnaendts, left for Yugoslavia with the mandate from the Comité Politique of the Twelve to ask the federal authorities and the republics how they viewed the negotiations on the future of the country and to suggest what he thought the role of the EC could be.⁹⁸² Wijnaendts was Van den Broek's star player. He had already acted in awkward situations as the minister's diplomatic troubleshooter.⁹⁸³ He rapidly came to the conviction that the greatest danger in Yugoslavia came from the conflict between the Serbs and the Croats and that the assistance of the Europeans was indispensable in bringing about a solution.⁹⁸⁴

Also after the meeting of the Comité Politique of 19 July, the German government continued to urge the Dutch presidency of the EC to expand the ECMM task to Croatia. This lured Van Walsum to respond in like kind. The Dutch Director-General of Political Affairs asked his German colleague Chrobog by telephone on 23 July if Germany could arrange for the WEU or the CSCE to take the lead in a peacekeeping operation, in view of the fact that it was chairman of both. In so doing Van Walsum overlooked a memo of a few days earlier from the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV) of his own ministry, which stated that NATO and WEU troops were little suited to peacekeeping duties. Anyway, such a deployment would possibly lead to objections from the Soviet Union, the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs thought. The memo said that these troops were suited to peace-enforcing. According to the directorate, however, a scenario in which there would be (an element of) peace-enforcement in Yugoslavia was not likely.⁹⁸⁵

Chrobog told Van Walsum that a WEU action was undesirable in view of the fact that the CSCE even found the EC too exclusive a gathering, not to mention the even smaller WEU. Chrobog considered action by the CSCE unfeasible. Van Walsum then gave Chrobog notice that from now on Bonn should give more careful consideration before pressing for monitoring tasks in Croatia, where, according to Van Walsum, the observers could accomplish little without military support.⁹⁸⁶ It would not be the last time that the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs would play such a 'prank' on their counterparts in Bonn.

However, the Dutch Director-General's intervention by telephone made little impression on the German Ministry of Foreign Affairs. One day later Genscher repeated the German request for expanding the ECMM to Croatia in a letter to Van den Broek.⁹⁸⁷ On the same day, 24 July, Genscher took the initiative for a meeting with his counterparts from France and Luxemburg, Dumas and Poos, during the Bayreuther Festspiele, to prepare for the meeting of the EC Ministers of Foreign Affairs that was to take place in Brussels in five days time. Under Genscher's leadership they agreed on a request to Van den Broek as EC president to invite not only the Yugoslavian premier Markovic and his Minister of Foreign Affairs Loncar to this EPC meeting on 29 July as planned, but also representatives of all the republics. The purpose was to reach agreement at the meeting on the expansion of the ECMM mandate to Croatia.

Minister Genscher would increasingly irritate his Dutch counterpart Van den Broek with tête-à-têtes of this sort.⁹⁸⁸ The following day the Netherlands lodged an objection in the Comité Politique to Bonn's proposal. As a compromise it was therefore decided to invite the entire Yugoslavian presidium.

⁹⁸² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 22/07/91, celer 080.

⁹⁸³ See e.g. Philip Freriks, 'Henry Wijnaendts is diplomaat voor moeilijke klussen' ('Henry Wijnaendts is a diplomat for difficult assignments'), de Volkskrant, 13/09/91.

⁹⁸⁴ Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 67.

⁹⁸⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, memo from DAV/PN/CG, 'Een mogelijke rol voor de WEU m.b.t. peace-keeping in Joegoslavië', undated, probably 17 or 18/07/91.

⁹⁸⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03309. Memorandum from DGPZ to DAV, 23/07/91, no. 173/91.

⁹⁸⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03308. Genscher to Van den Broek, undated, appendix to K.J. Citron to Van den Broek, 24/07/91; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 130; 'EG wil nu ook waarnemers in Kroatië' ('EC now wants observers in Croatia too'), de Volkskrant, 25/07/91; 'Mandaat waarnemers in Joegoslavië wordt mogelijk uitgebreid' ('Mandate for observers in Yugoslavia may be extended'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/91.

⁹⁸⁸ Interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99.

This compromise fell through, however, because the Netherlands addressed the invitation to the presidium and not to the individual members. Furthermore, Ambassador Fietelaars in Belgrade implemented his instruction rather flexibly by handing the invitation to the Macedonian presidium member Tupurkovski, who he happened to meet on his way to a meeting of the presidium. As a consequence, only Tupurkovski himself and the Bosnian member of the presidium turned up at the EPC meeting. The representatives of Croatia, Montenegro, Serbia, and Slovenia stayed at home. Genscher was furious at Van den Broek, because his attempt to act as Croatia's protector had been thwarted by the way in which the Dutch authorities had implemented the Comité Politique decision.⁹⁸⁹

On 24 July Dumas also made a proposal for deployment of a WEU military force for peacekeeping in Croatia. However, on the same day in the French Ministerial Council, French president Mitterrand declared opposition to a peacekeeping force of this kind. Only a continuation of the dialogue between the Yugoslavian republics was acceptable to him.⁹⁹⁰ Nevertheless, Dumas persisted in developing the idea and presented the proposal to send soldiers along with a group of three to four hundred observers at the EPC meeting of 29 July in Brussels.

It is not clear how sincere Dumas's proposal was. After all, it was not only the French head of state who had objections to a WEU peacekeeping force. It must have been known in Paris that it was a virtual certainty that the United Kingdom would not participate in such a peacekeeping force, firstly because the British government felt little for engaging the WEU for fear that they would harm the Atlantic cooperation, secondly because the British Minister Hurd made no secret of the fact that he expected little good to come of involvement in an internal conflict. Dumas must also have been aware that if Serbia already objected to the deployment of monitors on Croatian territory, it would certainly resist the stationing of a WEU peacekeeping force that above all had Germany, which Belgrade so mistrusted, in its chair.⁹⁹¹ Not unexpectedly, the proposal stranded on 29 July. Dumas's colleagues called an intervention force premature, and Genscher pointed out that assent could not be expected from all parties in the conflict.⁹⁹²

At the EPC meeting of 29 July, the EC ministers declared that the internal borders of Yugoslavia were just as important as the international borders, which was the final shunning of Van Walsum's COREU of 13 July. Otherwise the other EC ministers were prepared to extend the ECMM to Croatia on the condition of an effective ceasefire. On two important points, the matter of the internal borders and the expansion of the ECMM mandate to Croatia, EC President the Netherlands therefore was isolated. The request from the government of Bosnia-Herzegovina to station monitors there also was kept in the portfolio. For the time being the EC wanted to concentrate on the problems in Croatia, although the German government warned that it was Bosnia where it expected the greatest problems.⁹⁹³

When later, at the meeting of the ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia, the German representative proposed that EC diplomats in Belgrade repeatedly visit Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia to demonstrate their concern for these two moderate republics specifically, it met with objections from Greece.

Greece adopted an individual position within the EC with respect to Yugoslavia.⁹⁹⁴ The Greek government took pride on its historically good relations with Serbia. Both countries had freed ⁹⁸⁹ Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 942-944; Libal, Limits, pp. 27-28; Zeitler, Rolle, pp. 296-297; J.L. Heldring, 'De kop van Jut' (The scapegoat), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/91.

⁹⁹⁰ Favier & Martin-Rolland, Décennie, p. 189.

⁹⁹¹ Cf. Jakobsen, 'Multilateralism', p. 374.

⁹⁹² Favier/Martin-Rolland, Décennie, p. 190.

⁹⁹³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03309. COREU of the EC presidency, 22/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 414; idem, no. 00405, Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia 1990-1991, COREU of the Secretariat, 29/07/91, cpe/sec 636; Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 70; Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

⁹⁹⁴ For a summary of the Greek position with respect to the wars in ex-Yugoslavia, see Prodromos Yannas, 'Greece's Policies in the Post-Cold War Balkans', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, pp. 153-168. And further: Frans van Hasselt, 'Grieken van EG meest pro-Servië' ('Within the EC the Greeks are the most pro-Serbia'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/11/91; Jan van themselves from the same oppressor, the Ottoman empire, and their populations adhered predominantly to the Orthodox faith. Milosevic's regime hoped in the 1990s to make use of these links to avoid international isolation. Conversely, the government in Athens took pride in their relationship with Milosevic and in the following years they were eager to play the role of mediator with the Serbian leadership in Belgrade.⁹⁹⁵ Greece therefore had less of a tendency than other EC countries to denounce the Milosevic regime and Serbian misdeeds. Furthermore, the country itself would suffer more than other EC member states under sanctions imposed on the former Yugoslavia. Athens therefore preferred a diplomatic solution to the conflicts at times when other countries were advocating military action. It would not participate in such action itself and later it would look on with sorrow that Turkish F-16s and ground forces were deployed in connection with the war in Bosnia.

With a view to its own Macedonian area in the north of the country the government in Athens had more to fear than other EC and NATO states for an escalation of the war in Macedonia. Furthermore, the Greek government feared territorial claims from an independent Macedonia on the north of Greece. Therefore Greece was to raise many objections, especially against the name 'Macedonia', which appeared to underscore the territorial claims.

In this early phase of the conflict, the Greek government feared that visits by EC diplomats to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, as proposed by Bonn, would actually provide an impetus for the pursuit of independence in those republics. It was decided to allow each country the freedom to determine what to do on this point, as long as they informed the other EC partners on the visits and findings of their own diplomats.⁹⁹⁶

Partly to provide better guarantees of the safety of the observers, at the European Political Cooperation (EPC) meeting of 29 July Van den Broek raised for discussion the possibility of mixed patrols of the JNA and Croats, with possible ECMM participation, following the example of Angola. The minister failed to see why that would not be possible if both parties were actually aiming for negotiations on the future of Yugoslavia.

At the same time it was a makeshift solution. The EC had no means for sending soldiers, and Germany, that as chairman still had not convened the WEU on the Yugoslavian issue, did not appear to be prepared to deploy the union for protecting the monitors. Furthermore, Van den Broek expected, deployment of the WEU would provoke much discussion on the acceptability of risks and the nature of the weaponry, so that it would take too long before the monitors could actually be protected.⁹⁹⁷ Nothing came of this idea from Van den Broek. Germany and Belgium objected to the role that Van den Broek had in mind for the JNA in the mixed patrols.⁹⁹⁸ der Putten, 'Athene steunt Serviërs uit vrees voor aanspraken Macedonië' ('Athens supports Serbs for fear of claims from Macedonia'), de Volkskrant, 05/12/91; ABZ, 999,241, Vijverberg 58 to Kooijmans, 05/04/93.

⁹⁹⁵ See also interview T. Miller, 18/06/00.

⁹⁹⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for the Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 27/08/91, celer 107.

⁹⁹⁷ Radio 2, AVRO, Radio news, 28/07/91, 13.02 hours; Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 01/08/91, 23.05 hours; 'Nieuw EG-plan voor Joegoslavië' ('New EC plan for Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 29/07/91; Ulrike Rudberg, 'EG presenteert vredesplan voor strijd in Kroatië' ('EC presents peace plan for struggle in Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 29/07/91; 'Van den Broek doet nieuw vredesvoorstel' ('Van den Broek presents new peace proposal'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/91. The idea of such mixed patrols was proposed by Van der Togt (Eastern Europe department) in departmental consultation. According to Hazewinkel, Van der Togt was only joking, but the joke was to be taken seriously by the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV), interview H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00. This recollection of Hazewinkel also found its way into Both, Indifference, p. 111. According to Van der Togt himself, however, it really was a serious idea, which had come up in a discussion involving Herman Schaper, Sigrid Kaag and himself: 'This also happened in other operations. It happened in Angola too. That was another example of a tentative proposal: could we apply it there as well? These were brief moments when you thought: maybe this is something that could be useful? Then we actually would have made a contribution...!', Interview, 04/05/00. See further ABZ, DEU/ARA/03309. Memorandum from deputy DAV, Schaper, to Van den Broek via DGPA and secretary-general, 26/07/91, no. DAV-RP/233/91.

⁹⁹⁸ Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 943.

The failure of the fourth troika mission and Van den Broek's disillusionment

On 2 August, four days after the EPC meeting, the EC troika departed for Yugoslavia for the fourth time since the declarations of independence, at the request of the federal government. It became clear during the visit that the request had come from Markovic and Loncar in particular. Minister of Defence Kadijevic proved to have completely different views, namely ones identical to those of Milosevic. They both had little regard for the EC's involvement with Yugoslavia.

The main goal of the troika's visit, in accordance with the decision of 29 July, was to discuss the possibility of expanding the duties of the EC observers to Croatia, which required the assent of all parties, and therefore of Kadijevic and Milosevic especially. The fact is that the EC ministers set an effective ceasefire as a condition for expansion of the mandate to Croatia. Van den Broek still also wanted to discuss the possibility of mixed patrols of Croatia, the JNA and representatives of Croatian Serbs.⁹⁹⁹ Before the event, Van den Broek deemed the chance of effecting a ceasefire and of getting the parties back around the negotiating table small. On 1 August he said on the radio: 'I fear that the history of Yugoslavia also teaches us that these [solutions] will not be easily found, whatever the circumstances. (...) Ultimately we are dealing with something that has deep historical roots and that is not likely to change permanently in response to a single salutary word from Brussels or from The Hague.' Van den Broek understood from contacts with Wijnaendts that the Serbian leadership 'would fend off, if not obstruct, any form of interference from the European side.'¹⁰⁰⁰ By putting his own influence into perspective in this way, Van den Broek apparently sought to temper excessive expectations.

Similar evidence of diplomatic modesty could be heard when Van den Broek rejected a suggestion for military intervention in Yugoslavia put forward by the Luxemburger Poos on the same 1 August. The television pictures of the areas in Croatia mainly inhabited by Serbs left an impression on Van den Broek of 'a state of desperation (...), such that it is also difficult to see how it can be alleviated in the short term.'¹⁰⁰¹

One day later, Van den Broek stated that he was taking account of the fact that a WEU peacekeeping force could be necessary at any moment, which would emphatically not be intended to enforce or impose peace, but at the same time he called the idea of such a peacekeeping force premature:¹⁰⁰² 'I am not ready for that yet,' the Dutch minister said,¹⁰⁰³ in which he enjoyed the support of the the government parties PvdA (Labour) and CDA (Christian Democrats), which did not wish to see troops dispatched in the absence of a sustainable truce.¹⁰⁰⁴

The Secretary-General of the WEU, Van Eekelen, who thought that it would be possible to assemble a WEU buffer force of several thousand within one or two weeks, was also not 'straining at the leash to jump into that (Yugoslavian) hornets' nest', as long as the EC did not request it,¹⁰⁰⁵ and the political will was also absent elsewhere: 'The level of violence is still too low and public opinion is insufficiently mobilized for that.'¹⁰⁰⁶

Van den Broek's aspirations prior to the fourth troika mission may have been modest, but he was nevertheless badly affected by its failure. According to Van den Broek, Serbia was mainly to blame, having thrown up a blockade against the EC proposals although they were acceptable to the other five ⁹⁹⁹ For reports see ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Troika, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, COREUS of the Secretariat, 05/08/91, cpe/sec 643 and cpe/sec 644; ibid., Fietelaars 253 to Van den Broek, 05/08/91.

¹⁰⁰⁰ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 01/08/91, 23.05 hours.

¹⁰⁰¹ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 01/08/91, 23.05 hours.

¹⁰⁰² Radio 1, VARA, Vrijdageditie, 02/08/91, 17.05 hours.

¹⁰⁰³ 'WEU-macht 'laatste middel' in Joegoslavië' ('WEU force 'last resort' in Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/08/91.

¹⁰⁰⁴ De Kok and Van Traa in Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 02/08/91, 13.10 hours; De Kok and Van Traa in Radio 2, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 18/09/91, 17.04 hours; De Hoop Scheffer in Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 23/09/91, 12.05 hours.

¹⁰⁰⁵ 'WEU-macht 'laatste middel' in Joegoslavië', NRC Handelsblad, 02/08/91.

¹⁰⁰⁶ 'Van Eekelen: WEU kan zeer snel paraat zijn' ('WEU can quickly achieve a state of readiness'), Trouw, 03/08/91.

republics and the federal presidium. On Saturday evening 3 August, while the troika discussions were still in progress, Milosevic, in a statement that was 'bursting with insults',¹⁰⁰⁷ announced that he rejected all the troika's suggestions. According to the Serbian head of state, representatives of the EC were welcome as politicians, diplomats, businessmen or tourists, but not in the form of a peacekeeping force or observers.¹⁰⁰⁸

The following day the Serbian discussion partners, with the exception of Kadijevic, failed to appear. For Van den Broek, the possibility of a peacekeeping force was provisionally off the agenda now that Serbia even objected to unarmed civilian observers. It was clear to the troika that little could be accomplished as long as the Serbian territorial aspirations in Croatia remained unsatisfied.¹⁰⁰⁹ While EC politics appeared to be in a deadlock, Van den Broek considered the step to the Security Council still too great at that time: 'For that, I think, you have to consider an unhoped-for much more serious situation of large scale violence, civil war, and the threat of violence.'¹⁰¹⁰ There first have to be 'circumstances like those in Irak with the Kurds'.¹⁰¹¹

At the end of the troika's visit, Van den Broek made no secret of his disappointment to the members of the presidium and the presidents of the republics present. Under the circumstances, he said, further efforts by outsiders would be useless. He announced that he would make it abundantly clear in his contacts with the press which party the troika thought had obstructed an agreement.¹⁰¹²

At the concluding press conference in the early afternoon of 4 August at the federal palace in Belgrade, Van den Broek appeared to the representatives of the press who were present to be weary and shaken. 'The mission has failed. Europe can do little more for Yugoslavia', was his message to the media.¹⁰¹³ He blamed the failure of the troika mission on one of the parties, but did not want to say which party he meant. On his return that evening to Schiphol, where he still gave an exhausted and disheartened impression,¹⁰¹⁴ he blamed the Serbs explicitly. 'The outside world should know where the obstruction is.'¹⁰¹⁵ He said he sympathized with a people who had leaders like Milosevic. Van den Broek was 'undiplomatically bitter', according to The New York Times.¹⁰¹⁶ The way in which Van den Broek aired his disappointment was deemed to be unprofessional. 'The frustration was all too understandable - a minister is only human - but the way it was expressed at Schiphol was unwise.'¹⁰¹⁷ The Volkscrant even used the term 'defeatism'.¹⁰¹⁸

¹⁰⁰⁷ 'Van den Broek verbitterd en somber na mislukking EG-trojka. 'Servië saboteert vredesmissie' ('Van den Broek bitter and gloomy after EC troika failure. Serbia sabotages peace mission'), Trouw 05/08/91.

¹⁰⁰⁸ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Trojka staakt bemiddeling in Joegoslavië' ('Troika abandons mediation in Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 05/08/91; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 131.

¹⁰⁰⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, COREU of the Secretariat, 05/08/91, cpe/sec 643.

¹⁰¹⁰ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Journaal, 04/08/91, 20.00 hours.

¹⁰¹¹ 'Spoedoverleg EG na mislukte trojka-reis' ('Emergency EC meeting after failed troika mission'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/91.

¹⁰¹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Trojka, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 253 to Van den Broek, 05/08/91.

¹⁰¹³ Rudolf Gruber, Marjolein Sebregts and Gert van Wijland, 'Acht schorpioenen', Elsevier, 10/08/91, p. 26. See also 'Kroatië wil hulp Verenigde Naties' ('Croatia wants UN help'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/91; Leonoor Meijer, 'EG peinst over laatste redmiddel voor (delen van) Joegoslavië' ('EC contemplates last resort for (parts of) Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 06/08/91; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Trojka staakt bemiddeling in Joegoslavië', de Volkskrant, 05/08/91.

¹⁰¹⁴ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, 'Van den Broek vermoeid en ontmoedigd' ('Van den Broek weary and discouraged'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/91; Pieter Nijdam, 'EG-missie mislukt in Joegoslavië' ('EC mission fails in Yugoslavia'), Telegraaf, 05/08/91; 'Van den Broek verbitterd en somber na mislukking EG-trojka. 'Servië saboteert vredesmissie' ('Van den Broek bitter and gloomy after EC troika failure. Serbia sabotages peace mission'), Trouw 05/08/91.

¹⁰¹⁵ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, 'Van den Broek vermoeid en ontmoedigd' ('Van den Broek weary and discouraged'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/91.

¹⁰¹⁶ Stephen Engelberg, 'Carving Out a Greater Serbia', The New York Times, 01/09/91.

¹⁰¹⁷ 'Bijbaantje' ('Job on the side'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/08/91. See also 'Joegoslavië', de Volkskrant, 06/08/91.

¹⁰¹⁸ Wio Joustra, 'Waar niet wordt gepraat, vallen doden' ('Where talking stops, people die'), de Volkskrant, 07/08/91.

Van den Broek admitted for the first time after the mission that the federal authorities no longer had much relevance, and in any case had no control over the JNA.¹⁰¹⁹ It was the Croatian and Slovenian discussion partners especially who had contributed to these convictions. Tudjman commented to the troika that every decision taken by Markovic that was not to the liking of the Serbian leadership would not be carried out.¹⁰²⁰ Half a day later, the Slovenian Prime Minister, Peterle, said that Markovic 'had no credibility or support for his action nor real power'.¹⁰²¹ Markovic also had absolutely no influence on the Minister of Defence Kadijevec, who described Loncar to the troika as 'only 25 per cent of the problem'; the other 75 per cent was formed by the leaders of Serbia.¹⁰²²

According to the Dutch ambassador, Fietelaars, an evaluation of the Yugoslav relations as the troika encountered them, led to the conclusion:

'that the actual power relations were much less complicated than the complex institutional structure of this country might lead you to believe. This has to do with a life-and-death power struggle between the (actually single-headed) communist leadership of the expansive-nationalist republic Serbia (which has absorbed Montenegro in all but name) and the neodemocratic leaders, not to be confused with democrats, of two equally nationalist, but less expansionist republics, Croatia and Slovenia.'¹⁰²³

According to Fietelaars, the JNA had decided to carry out 'the hard work' for the Greater-Serbian aspirations. As long as not as many Serbs as possible in areas outside Serbia were brought together under the protection of the JNA, it would not consent to the arrival of foreign busybodies.

Under these circumstances, it was even more inconvenient that the EC was still unable to decide between maintaining the unity of Yugoslavia on the one hand, and assuring the right to self-determination on the other. According to Markovic this, as he called it, European fickleness, was the main cause of the failure of the troika mission.¹⁰²⁴

On the Serbian side, there was a completely different explanation for the troika fiasco: Dutch pigheadedness. This was an easy reproach to make, of course, and it was often levelled at the Dutch in international consultation, but this made the reproach no less justified. Van den Broek, who was more or less taken by surprise by the outbreak of the major crisis in Yugoslavia a few days before the start of the Dutch EC presidency, had immediately set to work fervently to bring about solutions, as various other members of government and his officials observed at the time.¹⁰²⁵ The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs, more than most of his colleagues, was fearful that if the West failed to take action, the conflict would have repercussions outside Yugoslavia. He therefore thought that 'there was no time to lose'.¹⁰²⁶ However, Van den Broek quickly noticed that the Yugoslavia problem was less susceptible to a rapid solution than in all optimism had originally been thought.¹⁰²⁷

The confrontation with the Balkans certainly did not leave Van den Broek unaffected. As early as July 1991 he had formed an extremely negative image of Yugoslavia and its citizens in general, and of ¹⁰¹⁹ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 131.

¹⁰²⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Troika, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, COREU of the Secretariat, 05/08/91, cpe/sec 643 and cpe/sec 643.

¹⁰²¹ Ibid.

¹⁰²² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Troika, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 253 to Van den Broek, 05/08/91. Cf. ibid., COREU of the Secretariat, 05/08/91, cpe/sec 644.

¹⁰²³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Troika, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 260 to Van den Broek, 07/08/91.

¹⁰²⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287. EU/GBVB/Troika, preparation and reporting of Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, Fietelaars 256 to Van den Broek, 06/08/91; ibid., Fietelaars 260 to Van den Broek, 07/08/91.

¹⁰²⁵ Interviews R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00; P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00; A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

¹⁰²⁶ Jan Bron Dik, 'Nederlands EG-voorzitterschap', CD/Actueel, 21/12/91, p. 5.

¹⁰²⁷ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

Milosevic in particular. At one point during the negotiations on the Brioni agreement, the Slovenian president, Kucan, said that the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs had stormed out of the room muttering the words 'What a people! What a country!'¹⁰²⁸ According to Van den Broek, Milosevic was the major villain.¹⁰²⁹

It quickly became apparent that Van den Broek's fervour was not linked to a deep understanding of the issue. The risk of blind activism was not far away. 'Hectic, haphazard, confused and inconsistent' is how the liberal Süddeutsche Zeitung described the activity of the EC after one week.¹⁰³⁰

Neither could everyone at his own ministry understand Van den Broek's fervour. At the Eastern Europe Directorate there was a view that Tudjman was scarcely more respectable than Milosevic. Officials therefore wondered what the point was of EC involvement in the conflict: 'What on earth are we to do with this? Do we need to get involved in it? To be drawn in? This activist nonsense? I do understand that the minister is on that track, but I had major reservations. Is it possible for us to grasp the situation anyway? Should we want to?'¹⁰³¹

After a few weeks of involvement, Van den Broek had already perceived that agreements with the leaders in the former Yugoslavia had little value, and that, in his own words, 'in that regard the Balkans are a law unto themselves'.¹⁰³² More than a year later he would remark: 'With respect to Yugoslavia, agreements no longer give me any pleasure. I am only pleased about agreements that are complied with. (...) I have learned to live with the great lie. Saying yes and then doing no. I have always had difficulty with that.'¹⁰³³

The Dutch Minister Van den Broek was certainly not the only Western statesman to feel frustrated in the 1990s by a series of broken promises from leaders in the former Yugoslavia. Lubbers also referred to an initial underestimate on the side of the Dutch of 'the capacity of politicians and peoples there to manipulate (...) a climate in which you reach agreement and that is that - yes, life just isn't that simple there (...) And then you get that muddle.'¹⁰³⁴

The mediator Lord Carrington once let slip that he had never met such two-faced and unreliable people as in the former Yugoslavia.¹⁰³⁵ His successor Owen did not fare any better: 'The most striking thing - which everyone who has ever taken part in the negotiations on the modern Yugoslavia will notice - is the astonishing capacity that all people on all levels appear to have: the capacity to lie. It almost defies belief. How many truces have been violated. They just keep signing treaties without the slightest intention of respecting them. In the former Yugoslavia our views on honour are unheard of, it is part of their culture.'¹⁰³⁶

The British Prime Minister, John Major, also quickly perceived that 'an "agreement" with states of the former Yugoslavia is one of history's less useful pieces of paper'.¹⁰³⁷

Although there was a tendency to consider this form of insincerity as a sort of Balkan characteristic, too little attention was given to the fact that parts of Yugoslavia were in a state of war and that truces served as an 'opportunity to stock up on additional ammunition'.¹⁰³⁸ Contrary to what would have been the case if an inborn Balkan attitude had existed, the repeatedly broken promises were ¹⁰²⁸ Silber/Little, Death, p. 164.

¹⁰²⁹ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

¹⁰³⁰ Quoted in: "Struisvogel is het symbool van de EG" ('Ostrich is the symbol of the EC'), de Volkskrant, 04/07/91.

¹⁰³¹ A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00. See also interview H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00.

¹⁰³² Interview H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99.

¹⁰³³ Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: 'Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg'', Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10.

¹⁰³⁴ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

¹⁰³⁵ BVD, inspection of dossiers Yugoslavia reports, no. 98272. BVD, 'Vredeskansen in ex-Joegoslavië en de gevolgen voor Nederland', 22/04/94. Cf. Almond, War, p. 243; Barbara Crossette, 'Europe's Envoy in Yugoslav Crisis Quits', The New York Times, 26/08/92; Tromp, Verraad, pp. 16-17.

¹⁰³⁶ Cited in Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 97. See also Terrett, Dissolution, p. 76.

¹⁰³⁷ Major, Autobiography, p. 538.

¹⁰³⁸ Frans van Deijl and Auke Kok, 'Mission impossible', HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p. 18.

also seen in Yugoslavia as a phenomenon that had to do with the war. For example, according to the Yugoslav newspaper Borba, the parties in the region followed the principle 'agree today, and wriggle out of it tomorrow!'¹⁰³⁹

The Dutch weekly Elsevier quoted an official of the Ministry of the Interior in Zagreb regarding a ceasefire agreement: 'No one believes it. This agreement is for the benefit of the Europeans, because we are keen to have their support. Not for ourselves.'¹⁰⁴⁰

The Dutch polemicist Hylke Tromp, on the other hand, considered that failing to honour agreements was part of the local culture.¹⁰⁴¹ His opinion was supported by the nationalist Serbian writer Dobrica Cosic, who was soon to be president of Yugoslavia: 'The lie is a part of our patriotism and a confirmation of our innate intelligence.'¹⁰⁴²

If that was true, there was only one possibility for doing something about it, and that is to attach sanctions to the breaking of agreements. Van den Broek's personal experiences quickly convinced him that the only way of making sure that agreements made would also be complied with was to threaten with the use of force. Otherwise, in his opinion, with people like Milosevic the international community could 'fairly quickly forget' it.¹⁰⁴³

Van den Broek was therefore at the end of his diplomatic tether on 4 August: promises were worth little and if he could not threaten with force, he knew he would be treated with contempt by Milosevic. On the one hand it was impossible to make binding agreements with the Yugoslav parties. On the other hand, Van den Broek wanted to bring the European presidency to a successful conclusion, backed up by consensus. These two desires were hardly compatible, and that led to Van den Broek's personal frustration with the Yugoslavia dossier.¹⁰⁴⁴ He is said even to have briefly considered resigning.¹⁰⁴⁵

In his speech to the conference with the Dutch ambassadors on 27 August 1991, Van den Broek sighed that in recent months he had often wondered 'how Jan Fietelaars had gathered all his contacts, because I have often had the feeling of being surrounded by nothing other than horse thieves and brigands'.¹⁰⁴⁶

Van den Broek had got his teeth stuck into the Yugoslavia issue and it would not let him go. Even after the end of the Netherlands presidency of the EC, the Yugoslavia issue continued to have 'a top priority' for the minister. 'He had sunk his teeth into the Yugoslavia file.'¹⁰⁴⁷ David Owen, who was later to become EC mediator in the Yugoslav conflict, sensed in Van den Broek 'signs of trauma' as a consequence of his failed approach to the issue during the EC presidency. After that, Owen said, he behaved like a 'hawk', which fell on deaf ears among his opposite numbers in other countries.¹⁰⁴⁸ For his part, Van den Broek was to criticize Owen for his 'strategy of capitulation'.¹⁰⁴⁹

Shortly after his resignation as Minister of Foreign Affairs in late 1992, Van den Broek called the inability to bring an end to the conflict in (former) Yugoslavia the low point of his period of office.¹⁰⁵⁰ In his next position as European Commissioner for External Relations, he also continued to ¹⁰³⁹ Quoted in 'Jojo', Elsevier, 19/10/91, p. 49.

¹⁰⁴⁰ Ibid.

¹⁰⁴¹ Bert Bukman, 'Bang voor de buitenwereld', HP/De Tijd, 18/10/91, p.17.

¹⁰⁴² Cited in Ugresic, Cultuur, p. 97. See also p. 104.

¹⁰⁴³ Interview H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99.

¹⁰⁴⁴ Interviews H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99; B.J. van Eennaam, 22/08/00; H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00; and H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00; Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: 'Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg'', Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10. Cf Major, Autobiography, p. 532

¹⁰⁴⁵ Rob Meines, 'Rol EG bij de Balkancrisis begon zo mooi' ('The EC's role in the Balkans crisis got off to such a good start'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/09/91.

¹⁰⁴⁶ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek. File: Ambassadors' conference 1991. Speech Van den Broek, 27/08/91.

¹⁰⁴⁷ Interview A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

¹⁰⁴⁸ Cited in Van der Roer, Frontdiplomaten, p. 61. Similar sentiments in interview D. Owen, 21/10/99.

¹⁰⁴⁹ Ibid. Cf. interview W. Claes, 21/03/01

¹⁰⁵⁰ Jan Bron Dik, 'De Hollanditis ligt gelukkig achter ons, er is weer internationaal respect', CD/Actueel, 13(1993)(16/01/93), p. 4.

present the case for intervention.¹⁰⁵¹ As his successor P.H. Kooijmans put it: 'In comparison, I was rather tame.'¹⁰⁵²

It was a little ironic, in view of the frequent friction Van den Broek experienced during the Dutch EC presidency with the political leaders in Bonn, that the Serbs saw Van den Broek only as second-fiddle to Kohl and Genscher, who were pursuing the speedy recognition of Croatia.¹⁰⁵³ When a Dutch reporter left Serbia in the autumn of 1991, someone said to him: 'Genscher grosses Schwein, Van den Broek kleines Schwein.' When some time later he drove into Croatia, he was to hear: 'Genscher Freund, Van den Broek grosses Schwein.'¹⁰⁵⁴ Dutch citizens in Yugoslavia were no longer patted on the back to enthusiastic shouts of 'Kroif', referring to the ex-football player Johan Crujff, but were given a hostile greeting with references to Van den Broek.¹⁰⁵⁵ His name was pronounced by Serbs as Bruka: which means disgrace.

Otherwise, Minister Van den Broek's frustration with the difficulty of moving others in the European Community to a more active position was shared by the rest of the government: 'From the outset there was an element of irritation and a degree of impatience regarding the lack of deftness on the part of the international community, including the European Union, in turning the words that had been spoken into proud deeds.' In this respect, there was no difference of opinion the government between the coalition partners CDA and PvdA.¹⁰⁵⁶

What now?

On 6 August, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Twelve attended a special meeting of the EPC in The Hague at the request of the German Minister Genscher, to discuss the results, or rather the lack of them, of the troika mission. After Van den Broek had given his account of the visit, various ministers emphasized that, in their eyes, the troika had not failed and could still play a role.¹⁰⁵⁷ This was comfort that Van den Broek sorely needed at that time. It was added, however, that other international organizations should be involved in the solution of the conflict to step up the pressure on Yugoslavia. The Security Council would be requested to prepare for involvement. At the proposal of Dumas, the Permanent WEU Council was to be convened for an initial exchange of views on a peacekeeping force, although the British Minister Hurd immediately urged restraint.¹⁰⁵⁸

Both initiatives were torpedoed almost immediately by the United States and the Soviet Union. Later the same day, the Soviet government warned the EC not to intervene militarily in Yugoslavia, because this would mean that the community would not only come into conflict with powers within Yugoslavia, but also outside, which could lead to a European war.¹⁰⁵⁹ Washington stated its opposition to engaging the Security Council, because it did not want the Soviet Union to concern itself with the matter.¹⁰⁶⁰ The very next day in London the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the WEU rejected any notion of a peacekeeping force.¹⁰⁶¹

¹⁰⁵¹ See e.g. Van der Roer, Frontdiplomaten, pp. 61-71; interview W. Claes, 21/03/01.

¹⁰⁵² Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

¹⁰⁵³ See e.g. Kadjevic, View, p. 46; Theo Engelen, "Servië heeft EG-overleg niet laten mislukken" ('Serbia did not cause EC consultation to fail'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/91.

¹⁰⁵⁴ Peter Michielsen, 'Na duizend doden gaat Van den Broek eindelijk ultimatum stellen' ('After one thousand deaths Van den Broek finally issues ultimatum'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/10/91.

¹⁰⁵⁵ Dick Verkijk, 'Joegoslavië. De officiële tv wakkert haat aan', De Journalist, 22/11/91, p. 18.

¹⁰⁵⁶ interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

¹⁰⁵⁷ See e.g. Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 944.

¹⁰⁵⁸ On the dismissive British response see also ABZ, DEU/ARA/03305. Roberts (London) 271 to Van den Broek, 06/08/91.

¹⁰⁵⁹ Hella Rottenberg, 'Moskou verwerpt Europese bemoeienis met Joegoslavië' ('Moscow rejects European involvement in Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 08/08/91; Jakobsen, 'Multilateralism', p. 371; Kaufman, 'Force', p. 313; Weller, 'Response', p. 575; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 161.

¹⁰⁶⁰ Védrine, Mondes, p. 609

¹⁰⁶¹ Eiserman, Weg, p. 53.

On 6 August, the EC ministers also demanded a study into the possibilities for economic and financial sanctions against those parties in Yugoslavia that resisted the establishment of a ceasefire. This was a clear reference to Serbia. It had therefore taken little more than a month before the EC appeared to be prepared to exchange its neutral attitude towards the conflict for selective policy. However, such an attitude could lead to problems as long as the EC still hoped to mediate.

At the previous EPC meeting on 29 July, the EC ministers had stated that they would stand by to provide substantial support to the federal presidium and the leaders of the constituent republics in negotiations on the political future of Yugoslavia, with recommendations on legal, economic and financial matters. However, the point of departure then was still that the Yugoslavs themselves should find a concrete solution to their problems. The EC was prepared to formulate the principles with which such a solution should comply, but not to draw up a blueprint.¹⁰⁶² After the troika's visit had created the impression that the parties could achieve little with their own resources, the EC ministers stated, on a British proposal,¹⁰⁶³ on 6 August that they were prepared to organize a round table conference on Yugoslavia.

The EC ministers were aware that a mediating role at a conference and simultaneous application of sanctions against one or more of the parties at the negotiating table were mutually incompatible. However, the German government thought that pressure would have to be brought to bear on Serbia in order to get negotiations moving at all. If it did not happen, the Serbian authorities would continue to present the world with faits accomplis, as evidenced by the intensification of the conflict in Croatia at the end of July. Furthermore, it would become increasingly difficult to interest Slovenia in a comprehensive arrangement for Yugoslavia, after the announcement on 18 July that the JNA would withdraw from that area.¹⁰⁶⁴

As a compromise, the Twelve decided to have the European Commission carry out a study into the possibility of selective sanctions. The Commission ultimately did not produce a report, because it considered that there were no opportunities for such sanctions. Van den Broek did not regret this. He saw (as yet) 'little point' in drawing a distinction between 'good guys' and 'bad guys'.¹⁰⁶⁵ In this, Van den Broek adopted a different position from that of Van Eenennaam, who from the outset was in favour of the international isolation of the 'bad guy' in Yugoslavia.¹⁰⁶⁶

Furthermore, Genscher asked again on 6 August for 'understanding' for Germany's desire for speedy recognition of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia, albeit stressing that Germany wished to negotiate on this point only in line with the rest of the EC.¹⁰⁶⁷ Hurd immediately stated his opposition. He thought that such recognition would accelerate the disintegration of Yugoslavia and encourage similar processes elsewhere in Europe. Van den Broek supported his British opposite number and stressed that the EC must speak with a single voice on the subject. He refused to reopen the discussion on this subject.¹⁰⁶⁸ Genscher had only raised this subject, however, for the purpose of forcing Serbia to cooperate.¹⁰⁶⁹

¹⁰⁶² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade, 02/08/91, celer 93.

¹⁰⁶³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of sessions July-December 1991, UK paper, 'Scheme for a possible round table conference', distributed at the meeting of the ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia of the EC, 01/08/91; ibid., Van den Broek to Belgrade, 02/08/91, celer 93.

¹⁰⁶⁴ Libal, Limits, p. 32.

¹⁰⁶⁵ ABZ, Cabinet archives: Coll. Van den Broek, box 7 (1991), Yugo chairman, memorandum PV EC to M, 07/08/91; ibid., ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232. EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, minutes of interdepartmental consultation dated 08/10/91. See also ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade, 27/08/91, celer 107.

¹⁰⁶⁶ Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

¹⁰⁶⁷ Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 945.

¹⁰⁶⁸ Both, Indifference, p. 110.

¹⁰⁶⁹ Libal, Limits, p. 34.

Van den Broek and the other troika members could derive some comfort from the remarks of the other ministers that they had not failed in their mission, but there was no denying that at the meeting of 6 August, the major countries, Germany, France and the United Kingdom, started to concern themselves more emphatically with the direction.¹⁰⁷⁰

The Russian factor

The United States also appeared in the wings for a while. After the troika had failed to move Milosevic and Kadijevic to consent to the expansion of the ECMM mandate to Croatia, the American government decided to make an indirect attempt by requesting Moscow to exert pressure on Belgrade to agree.¹⁰⁷¹ It was a first sign that Washington had realized that it needed the Russian government in a solution to the Yugoslav crisis, after the American government a short time previously had opposed engaging the Security Council in view of the Soviet Union's representation on it.

Russia was traditionally considered to be an ally of the Serbs. One of the first foundations of the political sympathy was laid in the war between Russia and Turkey (1828-1829), when Russia managed to achieve greater autonomy for Serbia. After that, prominent Russians supported the idea of Pan-Slavism, in which the shared creed of Orthodox Christianity could serve as cement. On the eve of World War I, Russia threw in its lot with that of Serbia. When the government of Austria-Hungary, encouraged by Berlin, made presumptuous demands on Serbia, Russian troops mobilized, setting off a chain reaction that resulted in World War I.

Nevertheless, the past Russian and Serbian links were less strong than was believed at the end of the twentieth century.¹⁰⁷² There was more affection in Serbia for Russia than vice versa.¹⁰⁷³ For instance, in 1878, Russia adopted more of a pro-Bulgarian than a pro-Serbian position at the Congress of Berlin and the earlier discussions in San Stefano.¹⁰⁷⁴ In 1908, much against Belgrade's will, Russia consented to the annexation of Bosnia by Austria-Hungary, in the expectation of gaining Austrian support for opening the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles for Russian warships.¹⁰⁷⁵ During both Balkan wars, too, Serbia enjoyed no support from Russia.¹⁰⁷⁶ During the interbellum period, Yugoslavia maintained no official relations with the Communist rulers in Moscow. There was still even a Tsarist embassy in Belgrade until 1939.

At the end of World War II there was something of a renewal of the 'special relations'. In 1944 the Serbian Orthodox Church welcomed the Red Army at the liberation of Belgrade as 'our brothers and sisters from the distant Slavic country of Russia'. This 'profound brotherhood' indicated 'that nothing was more beautiful than mother Russia'.¹⁰⁷⁷ Patriarch Gavriilo repeated this tribute more than two years later at the International Pan-Slavic World Congress in Belgrade.¹⁰⁷⁸

In 1948 relations between Russia and Serbia deteriorated again because of the split between Stalin and Tito. After the invasion by Warsaw Pact troops in Czechoslovakia in 1968, relations between Moscow and Belgrade escalated. This was relaxed again only in 1988 thanks to Gorbachov's visit to Yugoslavia, when he solemnly swore that the Soviet Union would never intervene militarily in the country. The Soviet leader otherwise took the opportunity to express his great admiration for the developments in Slovenia, which illustrated the remaining gulf between the reform-minded regime of Gorbachov and the regime of Milosevic.

¹⁰⁷⁰ Cf. 'Parijs en Bonn geven niet op' ('Paris and Bonn are not giving up'), Trouw, 06/08/91.

¹⁰⁷¹ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief Stg Geheime Codes. Bentinck 803 to Van den Broek, 14/08/91, Stg Confi., Van den Broek circ 448 to Moscow and Washington embassies, 13/08/91, Stg Confi.

¹⁰⁷² Naarden appendix, 2001, pp. 39-40.

¹⁰⁷³ Blagojevic & Demirovic, Bloedverwanten, pp. 50-51; Interview Carl Bildt, 13/12/00; Sremac, War, pp. 54 and 70.

¹⁰⁷⁴ Libal, Serben, p. 115.

¹⁰⁷⁵ Libal, Serben, p. 116.

¹⁰⁷⁶ Libal, Serben, p. 116-117.

¹⁰⁷⁷ Monnesland, Land, p. 273.

¹⁰⁷⁸ Monnesland, Land, p. 273.

The Soviet Union originally had as little idea as the West about what to do with the Yugoslavia issue, even though the collapse of Yugoslavia had been the most rehearsed scenario of the Warsaw Pact for years, as was also the case with NATO.¹⁰⁷⁹ An anonymous government official in Moscow said the following a few days after the declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia: 'Ironically enough this is a crisis - the collapse of Yugoslavia with a few republics turning capitalist and separating - about which we have been deliberating and making plans for three or four decades.' At the time of the Cold War the thinking was in terms of intervention, both in the Soviet Union and the West. But now it was difficult even for Moscow to put together a statement on the crisis. It could do little other than to stand behind the CSCE declarations.¹⁰⁸⁰

By early July 1991, Gorbachov had come to the conclusion that the eventual disintegration of Yugoslavia was inevitable in view of the German support for the independence of Croatia and Slovenia.¹⁰⁸¹ In the following weeks, Gorbachov found an ally in the American president Bush senior, who was no less anxious about the collapse of the Soviet Union than the Soviet leader himself. Both agreed that in the short term Yugoslavia should remain as a unit to prevent Soviet republics grasping the development in the southern Slavic federation as a precedent.¹⁰⁸²

When the coup against Gorbachov took place in Moscow in mid August, it came as no surprise to the JNA command. They had maintained contact with the perpetrators of the coup for months, and in the spring there was even talk of the possibility of simultaneous coups in the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia.¹⁰⁸³ As soon as news of the coup in Moscow broke, the regime in Belgrade expressed its sympathy for the perpetrators. This yielded Milosevic the abiding disfavour of Russian President Boris Jeltsin's circle, who, to Gorbachov's cost, had emerged from the attempted coup as the great saviour of reform-minded Russia.¹⁰⁸⁴ Neither did Milosevic improve matters later by occasionally treating the Russian leaders with contempt.¹⁰⁸⁵ In the meantime, the failure of the coup in Moscow spelled the end of the JNA's expectation that the Yugoslav army could carry out a coup, directed towards restoration of a federal state, by analogy with and with the support of their comrades in Moscow.¹⁰⁸⁶

After the coup in Moscow, the leaders there managed not to develop a clear policy on Yugoslavia for half a year. Because they were dependent on Western support, they mainly echoed the sentiments of Washington and the Western Europe capitals.¹⁰⁸⁷ However, from the spring of 1992, increasing criticism was to be directed by the Russian opposition to their own government's accommodating policy on the former Yugoslavia. The pro-Serb position of the nationalist opposition to Jeltsin was, however, mainly motivated by feelings of frustration with Russian powerlessness in carrying out aspirations outside their own borders now that the gross national product had gone into free-fall. Furthermore, the Russian opposition was able to play the domestic political card that, if Jeltsin should go too far in making overtures to the Western position, he could be accused of being a traitor to the Serbian brothers.¹⁰⁸⁸ Meanwhile there were various contacts between nationalist Russians and Serbs, including on arms supplies and Russian mercenaries and volunteers. In exchange for this, Serbs were to send money to the Russian nationalists, for example via Cyprus. It is unknown to what extent official Russian bodies were aware of these arms supplies, but it is unlikely that they did not know.¹⁰⁸⁹

¹⁰⁷⁹ Richard H. Ullman, 'The Wars in Yugoslavia and the International System after the Cold War', idem (ed.), World, p. 12.

¹⁰⁸⁰ Michael Parks, 'News analysis. Moscow caught flat-footed by crisis', Los Angeles Times, 29/06/91.

¹⁰⁸¹ Andrei Edemskii, 'Russian Perspectives', Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 30.

¹⁰⁸² Thomas Halverson, 'American Perspectives', Danchev/Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 5; Andrei Edemskii, 'Russian Perspectives', ibid., p. 31.

¹⁰⁸³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 119-120.

¹⁰⁸⁴ Doder/Brandson, Milosevic, p. 71; Glenny, Balkans, p. 637; Hoppe, 'Moskan', p. 269; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 176.

¹⁰⁸⁵ Interview Carl Bildt, 13/12/00.

¹⁰⁸⁶ See e.g. M. Vasic, 'The Yugoslav Army and the Post-Yugoslav Armies', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, pp. 126-127.

¹⁰⁸⁷ Paul A. Goble, 'Dangerous Liaisons: Moscow, the Former Yugoslavia, and the West', Ullman (ed.), World, p. 190.

¹⁰⁸⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Vos 245 to Kooijmans, 21/04/93.

¹⁰⁸⁹ See e.g. Bata, Auslandskontakte, pp. 378-380; Ramet, Babel, pp. 254-255; confidential interview (5).

From the summer of 1992, the Russian government would discover that a position that diverged somewhat from the West would both take the wind out of the sails of the domestic opposition and offer a chance to gain a place of its own in international politics.¹⁰⁹⁰ The United States' engagement of Russia in the Yugoslav conflict in the years to follow was therefore also mainly motivated by the need to support Jeltsin, more than by the hope that Moscow could exercise any real influence on the Serbs' authority.¹⁰⁹¹

Reproaches for foot-dragging in The Hague, Croatian escalation

The criticism directed by other countries towards Van den Broek after the last unsuccessful troika mission was not echoed in the Netherlands itself. Dutch politicians still had the tendency to protect their Minister against Genscher, whom the VVD member Blaauw accused of following the 'Greater-German line'.¹⁰⁹²

In the first one and a half months after the declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia, the Dutch Ministerial Council was not strongly involved in the development of the conflict and the formulation of the European response. This did not mean that the government did not support Minister Van den Broek. There was understanding for the fact that he, and, to a somewhat lesser extent, Prime Minister Lubbers ('I am somewhat of a doer')¹⁰⁹³, adopted a strong position because of the European presidency. There was a feeling in the Ministerial Council from an early stage that the international community should not allow events in the disintegrating Yugoslavia to run their own course.¹⁰⁹⁴

In the Ministerial Council of 15 August, satisfaction was expressed that, in spite of the obstruction suffered by the Netherlands as EC president from the pro-Croatian and Slovenian action of the German government, it had succeeded in preventing 'premature' recognition, among other things by pointing out that this would cause a chain reaction - for example, with respect to the Baltic states.¹⁰⁹⁵ Despite the difficulties encountered, a preference remained for a prominent EC role now that the supremacy of the United States and the Soviet Union was under discussion. Although the deployment of a peacekeeping force appeared to have little chance in view of the attitude of the Serbian and German authorities and the fact that a proposal to that effect in the Security Council would probably meet with a Russian veto, it was deemed desirable for the three Western European countries in the Security Council - Belgium, France and Great Britain - to urge the Council to prepare for possible UN intervention.

The following day it became clear in The Hague how slight the chance of deploying a peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia was. On 16 August the Dutch ambassador in Washington, Bentinck, reported that the American government was not prepared to supply troops for peacekeeping or peacemaking that would be necessary at the end of the hostilities in Yugoslavia. The American authorities held out the prospect only of logistics support. Bentinck's informant in the State Department even suggested that the EC would be well advised to delay the negotiations on the Yugoslav issue, which he felt were no less complicated than those of Cyprus or Northern Ireland, until economic problems forced Milosevic to make way for more moderate leaders. The senior official of the ¹⁰⁹⁰ Paul A. Goble, 'Dangerous Liaisons: Moscow, the Former Yugoslavia, and the West', Ullman (ed.), World, pp. 190-191.

¹⁰⁹¹ See also Thomas Halverson, 'American Perspectives', Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 2; Bert Lanting, 'Ook Rusland mist greep op Serviërs' ('Russia also has no hold on the Serbs'), de Volkskrant, 19/07/95. See also interview Th. Stoltenberg, 22/09/00.

¹⁰⁹² Wio Joustra. Verdeelde EG laat Yugoslavia aan lot over. Kritiek op Van den Broek wordt in eigen land niet gedeeld ('Divided EC abandons Yugoslavia to its fate. Criticism of Van den Broek not shared in his own country'), de Volkskrant, 08/08/91.

¹⁰⁹³ Willem Breedveld, 'Ik ben nu eenmaal een doenerig type' ('I am something of a doer myself'), Trouw, 26/10/91.

¹⁰⁹⁴ See e.g. interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

¹⁰⁹⁵ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 15/08/91, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

State Department advised against stationing monitors in Bosnia-Herzegovina without Serbia's permission, because he thought that Milosevic would not hesitate to eliminate a few observers in order to influence public opinion in Western Europe.¹⁰⁹⁶ One week earlier, an anonymous State Department informant made a statement to the press that the American restraint was partly determined by pessimism about the state of affairs in Yugoslavia: "There is a feeling that the Yugoslavs are determined to cut each other down in droves, whatever we do or say."¹⁰⁹⁷ At the end of August, the aloofness of the American government, despite the increasing pressure of public opinion and Congress, was repeated both publicly and in a discussion with Bentinck. The opportunity was taken to scrap plans of the Principal Assistant to the Secretary of State Ralph Johnson, who was responsible for policy on Yugoslavia at the State Department, and National Security Council official Hutchings, to come to the Netherlands to discuss Yugoslavia.¹⁰⁹⁸

On 20 August 1991, Van den Broek informed Parliament by letter of the state of affairs with respect to Yugoslavia.¹⁰⁹⁹ The minister stated that provisionally only the EC could play a mediating role through a conference, although he said that he was now convinced of the great degree of difficulty of the terms of reference. The CSCE was hindered by consensus decision making and therefore the necessity for the assent of Yugoslavia. There was (as yet) no role for the UN because it was an internal conflict. The minister acknowledged the danger that 'premature' recognition of the independence of Slovenia and Croatia could entail for the other republics, which would not be pleased with the resulting Serbian domination. Van den Broek continued that he was taking account of the possible precedent of the solution to the conflict in Yugoslavia for other Central and Eastern European states.

After the failure of the troika mission, the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs appeared to have lost some of its momentum. The Hague emphasized that there must be an effective ceasefire before the start of the envisaged Yugoslavia Conference. Meanwhile, Minister Van den Broek left for a delayed, short holiday in his own country. Van den Broek and the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV), Van Eenennaam, were pressed from the German, French, Irish and Spanish capitals not to lay too much emphasis on this condition and to make haste with getting the conference under way.¹¹⁰⁰

Not only foreign ministers and diplomats, but also the press started to question the Netherlands' conduct of the presidency. "This has been the summer which the Dutch, in whose lap the international management of the Yugoslav crisis has fallen, will prefer to forget", wrote David Hearst in The Guardian on 16 August.¹¹⁰¹ Around this time, the message got through to Van Walsum. Doing something was better than doing nothing, he thought at the time, even if waiting and seeing (as recommended by the Eastern Europe Department) was objectively the better option.¹¹⁰²

Meanwhile, the intensity of the war in Croatia only increased. On 22 August Tudjman announced that Croatia would take all necessary measures to protect its territory. He threatened all-out war if the JNA, which the Croatian government now referred to as an occupation army, had not withdrawn from Croatia by 1 September.¹¹⁰³ A number of days later, Croatian armed forces started to ¹⁰⁹⁶ Bentinck 815 to Van den Broek, 16/08/91, Stg Conf.

¹⁰⁹⁷ 'VS kunnen in Joegoslavië geen eer behalen' ('No credit for US in Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 08/08/91.

¹⁰⁹⁸ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Bentinck 868 to Van den Broek, 30/08/91.

¹⁰⁹⁹ TK, 1990-191, 22 181 no. 3.

¹¹⁰⁰ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, box 7 (1991). Yugo-chairman, message from Dumas to Van den Broek, 12/08/91; ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of sessions July-December 1991, memorandum of DAV head to Van den Broek, 13/08/91, DAV-160.91; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. DEU; reporting via COREUS regarding the points of view of the EPC on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, appendix to J.A. López Jorriñ to Van den Broek, 14/08/91; 'Spanje wil initiatieven' (Spain wants initiatives), NRC Handelsblad, 15/08/91.

¹¹⁰¹ David Hearst, 'Europe: A Weak Way to War', The Guardian, 16/08/91.

¹¹⁰² Both, Indifference, p. 113.

¹¹⁰³ See also Raymond van den Boogaard, "Onze operaties zullen radicaler worden" ('Our operations will become more radical'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/08/91.

besiege the JNA barracks on Croatian territory and to cut off the oil transport through a pipeline from Rijeka to Serbian territory.

It appeared difficult to convince the Croatian authorities of the idea that they could not bring about an outside intervention with an escalation of the conflict. Washington went to great pains to implore the leaders in Zagreb to continue to occupy the 'moral high ground' and requested the Netherlands to dissuade Tadjman and his followers that a Western intervention was imminent.¹¹⁰⁴ At the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs there was little sympathy for Tadjman, whose Greater-Croatian aspirations appeared to the Dutch officials to differ little from Milosevic's Greater-Serbian ambitions.¹¹⁰⁵ Van den Broek himself talked of Tadjman in terms of 'that awkward customer'¹¹⁰⁶ and felt that 'some of the so-called repressed, and the Croats in particular, also made things very difficult for us from time to time'.¹¹⁰⁷

The German government, on the other hand, continued to consider Tadjman, right or wrong, as their protégé.¹¹⁰⁸ Bonn also had more regard for the escalation of the JNA's violence in the second half of August. On 24 August Genscher told the Yugoslav ambassador in Bonn, Boris Frlec, that if the federal armed forces persisted with their actions, the German government would seriously 'review' the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia within their existing borders, and would urge a similar review by the EC. At the end of the interview, this German government position was also made public.¹¹⁰⁹ It was an unmistakable signal from the government in Bonn, which in the preceding weeks had still expressed the EC position to both the Slovenian government and the Bosnian vice-president Ejup Ganic, and had urged cooperation in the creation of a confederate Yugoslavia.¹¹¹⁰ But it remained a signal mainly intended for domestic consumption, that Genscher felt was necessary in view of the public indignation in Germany about the JNA's action.¹¹¹¹

8. Dutch energy against the background of the Bonn-Paris axis

For Bonn, the escalation of the violence in Croatia was also a reason to request a meeting of the EPC Ministerial Council on 27 August in Brussels. Meanwhile, the EC had already decided to provide a chairman to lead the meetings of the Yugoslavia conference. A ceasefire was indeed no longer a condition for calling a conference. The principles underlying such a conference were as follows: eschewing the use of force, only peaceful changes of borders, firm guarantees for the rights of national minorities, respect for human rights and the law in general, political pluralism and a market economy.¹¹¹²

In the car on the way to the meeting in Brussels, Van den Broek asked Van Walsum what the presidency could still propose to the ministers of the other member states after the repeated ceasefire violations. The tête-à-tête in the car led to a draft for a 'hard anti-Serbian statement' from the Council, in which Serbia was warned that it was making a serious mistake if it thought it could present the EC

¹¹⁰⁴ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283. EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, Van Nouhuys 1233 to Van den Broek, 30/08/91; ibid., ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia 1990-1991, Hasselman 287 to Van den Broek, 27/08/91; ibid., Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 30/08/91.

¹¹⁰⁵ Interviews H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00 and A.M. van der Togt, 04/05/00.

¹¹⁰⁶ Interview H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99.

¹¹⁰⁷ Interview H. Van den Broek, 02/12/99.

¹¹⁰⁸ Maull, 'Germany', p. 112.

¹¹⁰⁹ Libal, Limits, p. 39; Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 400.

¹¹¹⁰ Libal, Limits, p. 39.

¹¹¹¹ Libal, Limits, p. 40.

¹¹¹²ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of sessions July-December 1991, COREU of the Dutch EC presidency, 23/08/91, cpe/hag 660.

with military faits accomplis in Croatia.¹¹¹³ This statement offered the possibility of a conference on the future of Yugoslavia, from which Serbia and Montenegro would be excluded if Belgrade did not agree to the conference and with a ceasefire to be verified by monitors, before 1 September.

However, Van den Broek was overtaken in this initiative by Genscher and Dumas. Genscher, who was seriously concerned about the crack that the Yugoslavia issue threatened to cause in the traditional EC Bonn-Paris axis, had prior consultation with his French opposite number. The two ministers had come up with a formula for bridging the French-German differences. All Yugoslav parties, without exception, would have to take part in the conference: both the federal government, which Paris wanted, and the presidents of all six republics, which Bonn wanted.

Furthermore, Dumas had Genscher's ear for the idea of attaching an arbitration committee to the conference under the chairmanship of the president of the French Constitutional Court, Robert Badinter, who was a confidant of the French president, Mitterrand.¹¹¹⁴ At Genscher's proposal, the committee was to be made up of members of constitutional courts of the EC countries that had such a body: Belgium, Germany, Italy and Spain. In view of the fact that the Netherlands had no such court, the presidency of the EC was again put at a disadvantage. Furthermore, it was decided later that the committee would not meet in The Hague, where the Yugoslavia Conference was being held, but in Paris. A satisfied Genscher would later write: 'Deutschland und Frankreich hatten wiederum der Politik der Europäischen Gemeinschaft einen wichtigen Impuls gegeben.'¹¹¹⁵

Van den Broek was highly irritated by what he perceived to be a German snub.¹¹¹⁶ This blow was felt all the more acutely because Van den Broek could consider that he had shifted to Bonn's position of giving the Serbs a serious warning. The German-French tête-à-tête meant that Van den Broek saw himself as EC president forced to return to a policy of even-handedness in the form of the Yugoslavia Conference, while Germany meanwhile headed further towards recognition of the independence of Slovenia and Croatia.

On the other hand, Great Britain, Greece, Spain, Ireland and Luxemburg also felt the tone of the statement to the Serbs formulated by Van den Broek and Van Walsum to be too sharp. This resulted in a milder statement. Serbia was mentioned, but only by reference to the action of the Serbian irregulars and to 'elements' of the JNA who provided support to Serbia. The JNA as such remained out of harm's way.¹¹¹⁷

On a more practical level, the statement stressed the necessity of an internationally monitored suspension of hostilities. To this end, the ECMM monitors would also have to act with respect to Croatia. The German government did not succeed in persuading the other EC countries to station monitors in Bosnia and Macedonia too, mainly because of resistance from Greece.¹¹¹⁸

According to Fietelaars in 1998, the Dutch presidency was prepared to go much further at this meeting. It was said to have made a proposal for EC action, in collaboration with the Security Council and the United States under the auspices of NATO, to stop the JNA actions. The JNA was to be bombarded from the air, there was to be a total ban on flying on penalty of strikes on airfields, and the JNA fleet was to be confined to the Bay of Kotor. No ground troops would have been necessary for these actions. France, the United Kingdom and Germany were opposed the proposal. In so far as any specific blame was attached to the Netherlands for the wars in Yugoslavia, Fietelaars thought that it was mainly to do with the fact that the Netherlands was unable to persuade these important EC

¹¹¹³ Interview H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. reporting from the posts on the domestic politics of Yugoslavia regarding Croatia, March 1990 - September 1991, Declaration on Yugoslavia; Both, Indifference, p. 115; the Dutch language quotation is taken from Both, version 1999, p. 194 n. 43.

¹¹¹⁴ Genscher, 'Erinnerungen', pp. 946-947; Libal, Limits, p. 40.

¹¹¹⁵ Genscher, 'Erinnerungen', p. 947. Luxemburg and Portugal also had no constitutional court, so that not only the presidency, but also the troika was excluded from the committee.

¹¹¹⁶ Both, Indifference, p. 119; Genscher, 'Erinnerungen', p. 948. See also Rob Meines, 'Genscher en Dumas prijzen Den Haag, maar niet te veel' ('Genscher and Dumas praise The Hague, but not too much'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/09/91.

¹¹¹⁷ Libal, Limits, p. 41.

¹¹¹⁸ Libal, Limits, p. 41.

member states in late August 1991 of the 'moral imperative' of a joint military action at that time.¹¹¹⁹ Evidence of such a course of events could not be found, however.

The preliminary discussions between Dumas and Genscher were not the only indication that Van den Broek, as president of the EC, was told little of the activities of his colleagues in Bonn and Paris. For instance, it appeared that Genscher received the Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Jovanovic, on 27 August without informing Van den Broek, whom he met the same day.¹¹²⁰

On 28 and 29 August, the French president, Mitterrand, held discussions in Paris with Milosevic and Tudjman to prevail upon them to take part in the conference. For Van den Broek in the meantime it was the umpteenth slap in the face as EC president. He had hoped that the anti-Serbian statement of 27 August was the start of a new development, but the French government, which had likewise failed to announce these forthcoming discussions in Brussels, actually extended Serbia a helping hand.¹¹²¹

It was time that the EC president made his voice heard again. Van den Broek, encouraged by Wijnaendts,¹¹²² decided on Sunday 1 September 1991 to travel to Belgrade himself to obtain the signatures of Milosevic and Tudjman to a Memorandum of Understanding concerning the monitoring activities within the framework of a suspension of hostilities in Croatia. This time Van den Broek had more success than at the beginning of August. After intensive discussions, shortly after midnight the agreement for deploying observers was signed. According to Van den Broek and Wijnaendts, Milosevic finally gave in under the threat made by the Dutch minister that the conference would begin without the Serbs if necessary.¹¹²³ It is not improbable that Milosevic would give in for this reason. It was probably known in Belgrade that Tudjman would have welcomed a refusal by Milosevic. In that case the Croatian president could count on concerted European action against Serbia.¹¹²⁴

In other words, the Dutch minister was belatedly able to play the card that he was unable to get rid of at the EC meeting: to threaten Serbia with exclusion from the conference. The notion that Minister Van den Broek appeared to be going it alone was reinforced, as was observed in the Dutch parliament, in that this time he was not travelling to Belgrade as part of a troika. In his defence, Van den Broek stated that speed was called for, and that the two other troika members had expressed their assent for his unilateral action after the event.¹¹²⁵ That irritation about the recent German manoeuvres might not have been unrelated to his solo action can be inferred from Van den Broek's statement in the Dutch parliament that the German position in the Yugoslav conflict was apparently determined by the notion that 'charity begins at home', with the nation rather than the community.¹¹²⁶ It may not have been an action according to the diplomatic rule book, but no one could say that Van den Broek returned from Belgrade with empty hands this time. At last observers could leave for Croatia and the Yugoslavia Conference could begin.

After all the Yugoslav parties had signed the ceasefire agreement and the Memorandum of Understanding on the monitor activities, the EC dispatched between 250 and 300 additional observers to Croatia. A ministerial meeting took place on 3 September within the framework of the European Political Cooperation, where the conference agenda could be established. In the run-up to the ¹¹¹⁹ ABZ, Fietelaars 18 to Van Mierlo, 28/01/98.

¹¹²⁰ ABZ, Cabinet archives: Coll. Van den Broek, box January-May 1991. Memorandum from M to S, DGPZ, DEU, DAV, DVL, 28/08/91 no. 18/91.

¹¹²¹ Interview H. Van den Broek, 15/11/99; Rob Meines & Hans Nijenhuis, 'Niemand consulteert EG-voorzitter' ('No one consults the EC president'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/91; interview Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

¹¹²² Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 83.

¹¹²³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286. ministerial EPC, 03/09/91, Van den Broek 126 to Belgrade embassy, 09/09/91; Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 86; Leonard Ornstein, 'Mr. Henry Wijnaendts - voor het eerst - over zijn zeven vredesmissies in Joegoslavië' ('Henry Wijnaendts - for the first time - on his seven peace missions in Yugoslavia'), Vrij Nederland, 21/11/92, p. 14. Cf. Jovic, Dani, pp. 381-382

¹¹²⁴ Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 86.

¹¹²⁵ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, no. 9, p. 6.

¹¹²⁶ TK, 1990-1991, 22 181, no. 9, p. 7.

ministerial meeting, the Dutch Foreign Affairs official Lak proposed to the department leaders that, in view of the objections to German, Italian and French candidates, a British chairman - Lord Carrington 'or possibly' Sir Geoffrey Howe - would be the most eligible. Furthermore, he stuck to the condition that the ceasefire would have to be observed, and proposed that the head of ECMM produce a daily report. The situation would be reviewed after ten days. He felt that the opening of the conference could take place between 12 and 16 September.¹¹²⁷

The governments of other member states felt little for the ceasefire condition, however, because it would offer Milosevic the opportunity to continue with his policy of faits accomplis.¹¹²⁸ It was decided to bring forward the opening of the conference to 7 September. This therefore meant that the fighting in Croatia would continue during the negotiations. Although suspensions of hostilities were agreed with some regularity, such agreements were always violated within a couple of days, and sometimes within a few hours. In the end, there would be fourteen ceasefires agreed and violated between 27 June and the end of 1991.

Van den Broek had more success with his proposal to appoint Carrington as chairman, which met with general approval.¹¹²⁹ This put a representative of one of the large countries at the head of the EC mediation.

During the telephone call in which Van den Broek requested Carrington to mediate, he immediately offered him Wijnaendts' assistance. Van den Broek asked Carrington to steer towards a comprehensive peace arrangement within two months. Carrington later called this period 'absolutely ridiculous', and evidence of a general lack of understanding in Western Europe of the difficulties still to be expected in Yugoslavia.¹¹³⁰

Carrington, who in 1980 had helped to steer the transition of the former colony of Rhodesia to the independent Zimbabwe clear of disaster, without the then feared outbreak of civil war,¹¹³¹ actually demonstrated cheerful naivety himself by continuing to mediate in the Yugoslavia issue alongside his position as Chairman of Christie's International auction house in London.

On the other hand, the period of two months that Van den Broek mentioned to Carrington would go well beyond the end of the three month moratorium for the independence of Croatia and Slovenia, almost two months of which had elapsed by then. This fact would cause a few headaches for Van den Broek. Apart from that, he himself was also partly to blame for this deadlock because, after the failed troika visit in early August, he did not succeed in keeping up the momentum of the EC involvement with Yugoslavia.

The criticism of Van den Broek's performance that could be heard here and there in other countries was not yet echoed in the Netherlands, however, as was evidenced in a verbal meeting between the Permanent Parliamentary Committee for Foreign Affairs and the minister on 4 September 1991.¹¹³²

For example, there was no trace of criticism in a memo written one day earlier by PvdA parliamentarian G. Valk for the members of his party's parliamentary committee for Foreign Affairs. On the contrary, there was even understanding for Van den Broek, who found himself confronted with a host of difficulties and worrying developments.¹¹³³ Valk wrote that it was apparently still too early for a joint EC foreign policy, which was further handicapped by not having military weapons at its disposal. Sanctions appeared to have no effect on Serbia. The PvdA party member thought that ¹¹²⁸ See e.g. Libal, Limits, p. 48.

¹¹²⁷ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286. Ministerial EPC, 03/09/91, Lak to DGPZ, 02/09/91.

¹¹²⁹ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286. Ministerial EPC, 03/09/91, Van den Broek 126 to Belgrade embassy, 09/09/91.

¹¹³⁰ Silber/Little, Death, pp. 190.

¹¹³¹ For brief biographical outlines see Oscar Garschagen, 'Lord Carrington gaat liefst in stilte te werk' ('Lord Carrington prefers to work in silence'), de Volkskrant, 04/09/91; W. Woltz, 'Lord Carrington. Een heer op de Balkan' ('a gentleman in the Balkans'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/09/91.

¹¹³² TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 9.

¹¹³³ NIOD, Coll. Valk. PvdA parliamentary party, memo Valk for the members of the parliamentary party committee for Foreign Affairs before the debate on 4 September 1991, 03/09/91, FC/BUZA/005.91.

recognition of the independence of Slovenia and Croatia would only serve to increase the problems. He wondered what the EC could do if Serbia were to occupy Slavonia, Banija and Krajina in Croatia. And what if it were to do the same with certain areas in Bosnia-Herzegovina, where Serbs also lived? An 'all-out civil war' in Yugoslavia would have dramatic consequences for the country, could lead to internationalization of the conflict and start a large flow of Displaced Persons.

The most critical questions to the minister in the debate were whether the CSCE or the Security Council should not be involved in the peace process. Van den Broek answered that, as president of the EC, the Netherlands was already making efforts to keep the CSCE command informed of all actions of the Twelve, so the CSCE structures were 'currently utilized as effectively as possible'.¹¹³⁴ France, Great Britain and Belgium kept the Security Council informed of the EC activities. So Van den Broek was certainly not short of domestic support at the start of September, which would soon see the opening of the Yugoslavia Conference as well as a major confrontation between Van den Broek and Genscher.

9. The Yugoslavia conference in The Hague

It proved not to have been a good idea to give the opening of the Yugoslavia Conference on 7 September a public character. The protagonists in the conflict wanted to put their own points of view firmly back in the spotlight in front of the assembled press. The atmosphere was 'icy'.¹¹³⁵ Various European ministers were given their first opportunity to experience first hand how the fighting cocks Milosevic and Tudjman positioned themselves against each other in public. Tudjman accused the Serbs of conducting a dirty war and committing war crimes and held out to Belgrade the prospect of reparations. He demanded from the international community unconditional recognition of Croatia. In turn, Milosevic said the military actions in Croatia were necessary to prevent genocide on the Serbs living there. It was like a continuation of World War II, the bewildered Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mark Eyskens, observed.¹¹³⁶

Meanwhile, Carrington was given a completely different impression in his first behind-the-scenes contact with the two 'fighting cocks'. It was immediately clear to him that the actual problem did not lie in Croatia or Slovenia, but in Bosnia, because the two presidents - who the American ambassador Zimmermann described as the 'Tweedledum and Tweedledee of destructive nationalism' -¹¹³⁷ had jointly devised a solution for dividing up the republic. This led Carrington to the conclusion for his further activities that Yugoslavia no longer existed. He therefore hardly made room in his discussions for the federal Prime Minister, Markovic, who had previously been the white sheep of the EC and the American government.¹¹³⁸ Carrington also believed that a solution for the former Yugoslav territory would have to be comprehensive. Recognition of the independence of republics must occur solely within the framework of an all-embracing regulation.¹¹³⁹

In his opening speech to the conference, Lubbers fired a warning shot that was mainly intended for Serbia. He recalled the recent events in Moscow and stated that they contained a clear lesson for the ¹¹³⁴ TK, session, 1991-1992, 22 181 no. 9, p. 8; Cf. ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288. Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade, 25/07/91, celer 084.

¹¹³⁵ Stallaerts, 'Afscheid', p. 102; Oscar Garschagen, 'Presidenten sluiten wijziging grenzen uit. Haagse conferentie over Joegoslavië begint in gespannen sfeer' ('Presidents rule out border changes. Conference in The Hague on Yugoslavia starts in a tense atmosphere') and idem, 'Joegoslavisch slagveld verplaatst zich naar Den Haag' ('Yugoslavian battlefield moves to The Hague'), de Volkskrant, 09/09/91.

¹¹³⁶ Willam Drozdiak, 'Yugoslavs Trade Accusations As Peace Conference Opens', The Washington Post, 08/09/91. See also Libal, Limits, pp. 45-46; Rob Meines, 'Even schrikken in Den Haag' ('A bit of a fright in The Hague'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/91.

¹¹³⁷ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 153.

¹¹³⁸ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 162.

¹¹³⁹ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 190-191.

conference participants: 'those in power cannot escape answering to their electorate if they intend to turn back the clock and maintain by force of arms structures and practices that have had their time'.¹¹⁴⁰

Van den Broek said in his opening speech that time had been lost since Brioni in seeking a solution because of the use of force. He hoped that the press, who were present in abundance, would present the population of Yugoslavia with an objective picture of the conference and in doing so would contribute 'to the atonement of heated and even blind emotions'.¹¹⁴¹

It was important to the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs that the conference, which was taking place in The Hague, was brought to a successful conclusion. He must have realized, after all his earlier frustrating experiences, how little it could take to make the meeting fail, and he painstakingly tried everything in his power not to allow that to happen. After a series of growing irritations, this caused a hard confrontation with his German counterpart Genscher.

Even before the start of the meeting, Genscher appeared to throw sand in the conference machine. He said in a debate in the German Bundestag on 4 September that if the peoples of Yugoslavia who wanted their independence were unable to obtain it through negotiation, Germany would resort to unilateral recognition.¹¹⁴² In the conference corridors he also remarked to Kucan and Tudjman that, if the conference were to fail, Germany would resort to recognition, in which case the rest of the EC would follow Bonn.¹¹⁴³ This message could hardly have contributed to a favourable attitude on the part of the two presidents, who were aiming for the recognition of their countries; after all, it would seem that this recognition would come anyway. In the Dutch parliament one day after Genscher's performance in the Bundestag, Van den Broek expressed his hope that after the start of the Yugoslavia Conference the 'national oracles (...) keep their mouths shut'.¹¹⁴⁴

Both the repeated collisions of Van den Broek with Genscher and Kohl¹¹⁴⁵ and the lack of contact between the governments in Bonn and The Hague had not been kept secret from the German press. 'The relationship between Hans Van den Broek and myself improves from conference to conference', Genscher joked at the beginning of September to the assembled press in Van den Broek's own ministry.¹¹⁴⁶ The German media took the side of their own minister and Chancellor.¹¹⁴⁷ The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung accused Van den Broek of 'überdurchschnittliche Inkompetenz in Balkanfragen'.¹¹⁴⁸ There were accusations of Dutch pro-Serbian bias and naivety, which aggravated the EC's failure.¹¹⁴⁹ The Dutch minister felt 'goaded' by this 'character assassination' and 'mud slinging', as he described it.¹¹⁵⁰

The collision between Van den Broek and Genscher

The explosion occurred around the weekend of 14 and 15 September. In the previous week, which was the first week of the conference, Van den Broek was disturbed by Zagreb's escalating position. Prior to this, Van den Broek as EC president was bombarded with complaints by the Croatian authorities ¹¹⁴⁰ 'EG kan niet voorbij aan hulp aan Joegoslavië', Staatscourant, 10/09/91.

¹¹⁴¹ 'Gebruik geweld om problemen op te lossen niet acceptabel', Staatscourant, 10/09/91.

¹¹⁴² Zeitler, Rolle, p. 303.

¹¹⁴³ Libal, Limits, p. 46-47; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 304.

¹¹⁴⁴ Leonoor Meijer, 'Van den Broek trekt boetkleedje aan' ('Van den Broek dons hair shirt'), Trouw, 06/09/91.

¹¹⁴⁵ See e.g. also ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: coll. Van den Broek. Van den Broek to Lubbers 01/08/91 with appendices.

¹¹⁴⁶ Rob Meines, 'Genscher en Dumas prijzen Den Haag, maar niet te veel', NRC Handelsblad, 04/09/91.

¹¹⁴⁷ J.M. Bik, 'Voor Duitse media is Van den Broek kop van Jut' ('Van den Broek is scapegoat for German media') and 'Europees huis aan verwarring ten prooi' ('European house the victim of confusion'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91.

¹¹⁴⁸ Cited in: Leonard Ornstein & Max van Weezel, 'Van den Broek kan de wereld weer aan, dartel als een veulen' ('Van den Broek can face the world again, as frisky as a foal'), Vrij Nederland, 11/04/92.

¹¹⁴⁹ Cf. Meier, Jugoslavië, p. 402.

¹¹⁵⁰ Leonard Ornstein/Max van Weezel, 'Van den Broek kan de wereld weer aan, dartel als een veulen' ('Van den Broek can face the world again, as frisky as a foal'), Vrij Nederland, 11/04/92.

regarding Serbian behaviour, threats to escalate and requests for the recognition of Croatian independence.¹¹⁵¹

Following an instruction from Van den Broek, Fietelaars took diplomatic steps as early as 8 September with the Croatian chairman of the federal presidium, Mesic, who had said that if the JNA ignored an order given by him, it was tantamount to a coup. In accordance with his instruction, Fietelaars said that such statements were 'very unhelpful' in the delicate initial phase of the conference.¹¹⁵²

In a short discussion in the afternoon of 13 September, Carrington said to Van den Broek that, in his opinion, in the event of a deteriorating military situation in Yugoslavia and the conference appearing to be heading for failure, the Croatian and Slovenian delegations seemed to expect the EC to be prepared to resort to military intervention. Carrington impressed upon them: 'you're living on another planet', but he apparently doubted whether his words had the desired effect. The British negotiator therefore asked Van den Broek to put similar pressure on Croatia, because he feared otherwise that Croatia would aim for a failure of the conference in the hope of bringing the EC's recognition and material assistance closer.¹¹⁵³

On 13 September Van den Broek lectured his Croatian opposite number Separovic, because, more than those of the other parties, Croatian ceasefire violations were endangering the conference in The Hague. Perhaps Van den Broek recalled how he had booked success in Belgrade less than two weeks earlier with the threat of exclusion, because he mentioned that the conference could also continue without Croatia. According to his own account, in that case Van den Broek would make it abundantly clear how matters had got to that stage: 'We will expose you.'¹¹⁵⁴ The Dutch minister recorded his invective in a COREU, which was sent the following day, Saturday 14 September, to the other capitals of the EC.¹¹⁵⁵ Van den Broek's attitude led to anger and bitterness in Croatia.¹¹⁵⁶ A short time later, the Croatian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Zvonimir Separovic, would describe his Dutch opposite number on Croatian television as an 'arrogant tulip'.¹¹⁵⁷ But amazement with the EC president's attitude was not confined to Croatia.

Although the EC ministers agreed on 6 September to speak with one voice on Yugoslavia in order to make the conference a success,¹¹⁵⁸ after a bilateral meeting in Venice, Genscher and De Michelis announced to the assembled press on Sunday 15 September that Germany and Italy were prepared, if necessary, to recognize the independence of Croatia and Slovenia separately from the other EC countries, should the negotiations under Carrington not lead to a result.¹¹⁵⁹ There was a certain emotionality in Italy at the time because of the strike on Zadar, which had once been a Venetian and later an Italian city.

¹¹⁵¹ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia 1990-1991, Franjo Greguric to Lubbers, 22/08/91; Zvonimir Separovic to Van den Broek, 26/08/91; ibid., Tudjman to Van den Broek, 22/08/91, 27/08/91, 03/09/91; ibid., Marijan Kostrencic to Foreign Ministries of the EC states.

¹¹⁵²ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia 1990-1991, Fietelaars 304 to Van den Broek, 08/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 859.

¹¹⁵³ ABZ, Cabinet archives: Coll. Van den Broek, memos PS, 1991, memorandum from PS to DGPZ, 13/09/91, no. 178/91.

¹¹⁵⁴ ABZ, Cabinet archives: Coll. Van den Broek, memos PS, 1991, memorandum from PS to DGPZ, 16/09/91, no. 179/91. See also 'Kroatië is schuldig aan escalatie geweld'. Uitspraak Van den Broek brengt geschil in EG over kwestie-Joegoslavië aan het licht' ('Croatia is to blame for escalation of violence'. Statement by Van den Broek throws light on EC dispute on Yugoslavia issue'), de Volkskrant, 16/09/91.

¹¹⁵⁵ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia 1990-1991, COREU of the Dutch EC presidency, 14/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 857.

¹¹⁵⁶Zeitler, Rolle, p. 148.

¹¹⁵⁷ 'Hollands optimisme in hoofdstad Kroatië' ('Dutch optimism in Croatian capital'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/10/91.

¹¹⁵⁸ See also Oscar Garschagen, 'Genscher berispt aan vooravond Joegoslavië-top' ('Genscher reprimanded on the eve of Yugoslavia summit'), de Volkskrant, 07/09/91.

¹¹⁵⁹Both, Indifference, p. 120; Libal, Limits, p. 52-53.

Genscher's tendency of consulting other EC member states and subsequently confronting the presidency with faits accomplis was a source of irritation for Van den Broek. A highly critical COREU was sent from The Hague at 1 o'clock in the morning of 16 September. As president of the EC, Van den Broek was sending:

'an urgent appeal to all partners strictly to abide by established EC positions, declarations and statements in order not to undermine the chances of success of both the Yugoslavia Conference and EC monitoring. It continues to be essential for the Twelve to be even-handed and to avoid raising vain hopes regarding EC recognition or intervention'.

The statement of 'two partners after their meeting in Venice' carried the risk that Croatia would withdraw from the Yugoslavia Conference and would take no notice of the suspension of hostilities.¹¹⁶⁰

The COREU provoked an angry reaction from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Bonn. They were convinced that Van den Broek's views on the behaviour of the authorities in Zagreb constituted a somewhat remarkable assessment of the actual situation in Croatia in the light of Serbian aggression. There were fears in Bonn that each time the threat of recognition of Croatia and Slovenia was prohibited, it would only incite the Serbs to unbridled aggression.¹¹⁶¹

Later the same day, 16 September at 5 o'clock in the evening, the Dutch ambassador in Bonn, Van der Tas, was summoned to the German Director of Political Affairs, Chrobog. The German diplomat stated on Genscher's behalf that, 'in spite of excellent personal relations on an official level' between the Ministries of Foreign Affairs in Bonn and The Hague, the previous weekend's attribution of blame by the EC presidency on the Croats, and the critical remarks made by a Dutch official that the Germans were conducting their own aggressive foreign policy after regaining their unity, was causing 'a strain on German-Dutch relations' and was deemed to be a direct attack on Genscher.

Van der Tas parried - at least according to his own account - forcefully. He considered that it could never be possible for a position adopted by the presidency to be a burden on bilateral relations. Furthermore, the German position within the EC was certainly not 'mehrheitsfähig'. He ascribed the remark made by an official in The Hague to a personal view, which was also often to be heard in Bonn. He expressed his 'concern' about the extent to which 'German actions, often under the influence of fairly emotional and vague opinion forming in the media or among political supporters, often came down to a position that was difficult to align with points of view recently agreed in an EC connection'. The German leaders could follow the example of the political courage with which Van den Broek stood up to public opinion.

Chrobog said that Kohl and Genscher were in no way intending to abandon the threat of recognizing Croatia and Slovenia, and they would also do so if the Yugoslavia Conference failed. Van der Tas said that such a position could lead to a fiasco. Furthermore, after recognition the EC would have no weapon left. The UN would then have to come into action with a peacekeeping force, to which Germany would not contribute, of course. At the end of the discussion, Van der Tas said that, if he had not been instructed, he would have sought Chrobog out himself with the question whether 'in view of the incredible mud-slinging campaign' against the Dutch presidency in the German press, 'might [Genscher] not find a way of occasionally uttering a word of appreciation for and solidarity with the presidency'. It is difficult to believe, but, according to Van der Tas, the discussion was conducted 'in a sympathetic atmosphere'.¹¹⁶²

¹¹⁶⁰ABZ, DEU/ARA/00405. Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Croatia1990-1991, COREU of the Dutch EC presidency, 15/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 859.

¹¹⁶¹Libal, Limits, p. 53.

¹¹⁶²ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232. EC/Yugoslavia September-October1991, Van der Tas 394 to Van den Broek, 17/09/91; Both, Indifference, p. 120.

In the meantime, the German-Dutch irritations with respect to Yugoslavia were given a focus in the ECMM. On 13 September, Van der Valk was succeeded as head of mission by D.J. van Houten, who had worked as counsellor under Van der Valk in Belgrade at the end of the 1970s. On the following day Van Houten visited the Croatian president, Tudjman. According to Van Houten, the tension in Croatia was increasing rapidly, especially through the agency of the Croats. He felt that the media in Zagreb were stirring up a war euphoria. Van Houten did not succeed, however, in at least persuading Tudjman to restore the electricity and water supplies to the headquarters of the fifth military district of the JNA in Zagreb. In rather unfortunately chosen words, Van Houten warned in his report, which was read in all capitals of the EC, that: 'JNA, which seems to have been rather reticent in places like Vukovar, does not seem prepared to accept further provocation.'¹¹⁶³ In Bonn, such expressions were viewed as curious, to put it mildly. For Michael Libal, head of the Southeast Europe Department of the German Ministry of Foreign Affairs, for example, they were 'strangely out of touch with what was really happening'. What the Croats were doing was on a different scale from the war of capture, destruction and expulsion being conducted by Serbia.¹¹⁶⁴

On 15 September Van Houten together with his deputy, General Kusters, again paid his respects to Tudjman in response to a violation of the ceasefire ordered by the authorities in Zagreb. Van Houten made himself Van den Broek's mouthpiece by pointing out to the Croatian president that he should not count on a military intervention by European forces. Recognition of Croatia was possible only as the outcome of negotiations. It was said that Tudjman's recent actions were little appreciated in Europe. Tudjman said that Croatia could do little else. It had to protect itself and the president pointed in particular to an attack on Zadar. It was also known in Zagreb that the JNA was suffering from low morale at the time, in other words it was the ideal moment to attack.¹¹⁶⁵

On 16 September, two German ECMM monitors refused to carry out a mission to Zadar because they considered it to be too dangerous. Also in the ECMM, which was deployed to monitor compliance with the Brioni agreement, a lack of consensus among the representatives of the various European countries became apparent immediately after the arrival of the mission in Zagreb. It was agreed that the monitors would not report independently to their own capitals, but exclusively through the head of mission to the EC presidency.¹¹⁶⁶ To the irritation of the Dutch leadership, several members of the mission set up their own satellite dishes on their balconies immediately on arrival in Zagreb, while other observers kept themselves completely out of sight and operated apparently according to their own agenda.¹¹⁶⁷

Also on 16 September, Van Oosterom pointed out to Minister Van den Broek at the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which was charged with the day-to-day coordination of the ECMM, that it was now the second time that German monitors had refused an order. Furthermore, the German Junior Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Kastrop, had given this refusal personally and immediately to those concerned. The head of mission, Van Houten, was greatly enraged by this refusal. The Memorandum of Understanding allowed no room for misunderstanding that only he decided where and by whom missions were to be executed. Participation in the ECMM according to an à la carte formula was fundamentally wrong.¹¹⁶⁸

Van den Broek now saw an opportunity 'to put the problem firmly on our neighbours' plate'.¹¹⁶⁹ Or as it was expressed rather more strongly in Germany: 'die Verantwortung für weitere Fehlschläge ¹¹⁶³ABZ, DEU/ARA/03306. COREU of the EC presidency, 16/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 863.

¹¹⁶⁴Libal, Limits, p. 51.

¹¹⁶⁵ABZ, DEU/ARA/03306. COREU of the EC presidency, 17/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 873.

¹¹⁶⁶ ABZ, DAV archive, ISN 4824115, COREU of the EC presidency, 16/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 381.

¹¹⁶⁷ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

¹¹⁶⁸ ABZ, DAV archive, 921.353.22, Memo DAV (Van Oosterom) via DGPZ and secretary-general to Van den Broek, 16/09/91, DAV/PC 268.91, with memo HOM to DAV, 16/09/91.

¹¹⁶⁹ Voorhoeve cited in Bayer, 'Noodzaak', p. 5.

von der niederländischen EG-Präsidentschaft auf den deutschen WEU-Vorsitz zu verlagern'.¹¹⁷⁰ Van den Broek did that on 16 September in a shift from his earlier resistance to a Western European Union action - Trouw referred to a 'dramatic turnaround' - by¹¹⁷¹ asking Genscher as chairman of the WEU whether the Union could not form a peace force for peacekeeping. The fact was that situations repeatedly arose in which it was too dangerous for the civilian EC monitors.¹¹⁷² It was something of a repeat dose of his own medicine that Van Walsum had served Chrobog on 23 July, but now on a ministerial level. If the German government knew it all so much better than the government in The Hague, then they should take the lead themselves for once, while it was known in advance that Bonn itself felt it could not supply any troops.

Van den Broek was able to rely on support in his action. The French government had urged Van den Broek to have the possibility of an intervention force from the WEU looked into.¹¹⁷³ And in the Netherlands he had been promised support for his action by Minister of Defence Relus Ter Beek¹¹⁷⁴ and Prime Minister Lubbers, who was opposed to the idea that the European Community had no business and nothing to offer in Yugoslavia:

'I (...) would find it a dreadful idea, anno 1991, to say: well, if people are beating each other's brains out again somewhere, that is their business, we should not interfere.(...) I think it is only right (...) that we now also say: look, just put those weapons down, and if you can no longer sort it out yourselves and instead go back to fighting each time, then we are available to send soldiers, not to wage war, but to keep the peace. But then, of course, there must first be a suspension of hostilities.'¹¹⁷⁵

Van den Broek had also set a ceasefire as 'an absolute condition' for dispatching a peacekeeping force.¹¹⁷⁶ That last point was the crux of the matter. It was completely clear in the European relationships that no WEU force would be deployed without the assent of the parties involved. The deployment of WEU units would be possible, also according to Minister Van den Broek himself, 'only with the assent of all involved parties, of course', as he and Ter Beek wrote to Parliament on 20 September.¹¹⁷⁷ It could hardly have been a secret for Van den Broek that the proposal would founder in Yugoslavia on resistance from Serbia. What sort of response could be expected from Milosevic, who in early August still opposed expansion of the mandate of the ECMM to Croatia with the announcement that Yugoslavia was prepared to receive only diplomats, businessmen and tourists from the West?¹¹⁷⁸ As expected the Serbian government announced as early as 17 September that it would not accept an 'invasion'.¹¹⁷⁹ In Croatia, a peacekeeping force would probably still have been welcome. After all, a

¹¹⁷⁰Zeitler, Rolle, p. 162. See also ibid., p. 305

¹¹⁷¹ Co Welgraven, 'WEU-leger naar Joegoslavië. Dramatische ommezwaai minister Van den Broek' ('WEU to go to Yugoslavia: dramatic U-turn by Minister Van den Broek'), Trouw, 17/09/91.

¹¹⁷² Cf. Van Eekelen, Security, p. 145; idem, Sporen, p. 243.

¹¹⁷³ Favier/Martin-Rolland, Décennie, p. 197.

¹¹⁷⁴ TV, RTL4, News, 16/09/91, 18.00 hours.

¹¹⁷⁵ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 20/09/91, 23.06 hours.

¹¹⁷⁶ Rob Meines, 'Van den Broek: vredsmacht van WEU naar Joegoslavië' ('Van den Broek: WEU peacekeeping force to go to Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91. See also 'Voorlopig geen vredesleger' ('No peace army for the time being'), Trouw, 20/09/91

¹¹⁷⁷ TK, session 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 6, p. 2.

¹¹⁷⁸ Cf. Van den Broek's own words at the beginning of August: 'The Serbs already object to unarmed soldiers in plain clothes who form part of the EC observers team in Yugoslavia. Let alone that they would agree with stationing armed soldiers in the crisis zones in Yugoslavia', Leonoor Meijer, 'EG peinst over laatste redmiddel voor (delen van) Joegoslavië', Trouw, 06/08/91.

¹¹⁷⁹ Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 244; Rob Meines, 'Van den Broek: vredsmacht van WEU naar Joegoslavië' ('Van den Broek: WEU peacekeeping force to Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91.

banner had been hanging over the centrally located Jelacic Square in Zagreb for months with a text inviting the UN to come to Croatia.¹¹⁸⁰ But even in Croatia, the interest in a European peacekeeping force faded as it became clearer that Western Europe was prepared not so much to defend the borders of Croatia as to find a solution around the negotiating table that the Serbs would also have to find acceptable.¹¹⁸¹ The reactions from the Western European countries to Van den Broek's proposal were therefore also sceptical.¹¹⁸² Even if the parties involved had agreed and the WEU had consented to the dispatch of units, the question remained as to whether NATO would have consented. The fact is that the WEU would have had to rely on units that were promised to NATO. Apart from the fact that the American government would have felt little for facilitating a WEU initiative, Washington would have objected to the deployment in Yugoslavia of troops intended for NATO.¹¹⁸³

It is therefore also right to ask why Van den Broek made his proposal. Van den Broek said later that he could only 'conclude that the Netherlands was a little ahead of its partners in the EC'.¹¹⁸⁴ If that was so, this episode could be added to a whole list of cases, starting with Van Walsum's proposal for border changes, where the Dutch government launched thoughts and proposals whose acceptability in other countries would have been limited from the start.

Another possibility is that Van den Broek was affected by at least a hint of 'get Genscher back'. In any case, the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs took into account that the Dutch initiative could be viewed in this light. The Dutch diplomats in other countries were given clear instructions on this point from department spokesman Dig Ishta. If they were to be asked 'Is it true that this step was taken only to cross Germany?', they were to answer: 'That is completely untrue. It is not how we treat each other in the EC. The fact that Germany was requested to organize the WEU meeting is a coincidence, because Germany holds the WEU presidency.'¹¹⁸⁵ Apparently the instruction for statements to the press were not well known at the department in The Hague, because the German press agency DPA quoted an official of the ministry with the words: 'Jetzt soll Aussenminister Genscher Verantwortung als Vorsitzender der WEU übernehmen.'¹¹⁸⁶ In NRC Handelsblad too it was observed that Foreign Affairs people were sniggering that Van den Broek had forced Genscher to convene a WEU Ministerial Council on a peacekeeping force that Germany itself could not participate in.¹¹⁸⁷

Van den Broek's proposal again provoked heated reactions in Germany. Genscher had serious objections to deploying a peacekeeping force to Croatia because it could obstruct the central German objective - recognition of Croatia.¹¹⁸⁸ CSU spokesman Christian Schmidt felt that Van den Broek was moving 'ever further from reality', and as mediator in the Yugoslav conflict had 'failed across the board'. Second parliamentary party chairman and security expert of the SPD, Norbert Gansel said: 'It looks very much as if Van den Broek is trying to obscure his lack of success by shifting the responsibility onto the WEU, of which Germany and therefore Minister Genscher is chairman.'

¹¹⁸⁰ Tanner, Croatia, pp. 281.

¹¹⁸¹ Cf. Raymond van den Boogaard, 'In Joegoslavië opereren veel groepen autonoom' ('Many groups operate autonomously in Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/09/91.

¹¹⁸² 'Europa nogal sceptisch over sturen vredesmacht' ('Europe fairly sceptical about sending peacekeeping force') and Frits Schaling, 'Belgen wachten wat andere EG-landen zullen zeggen' ('Belgians wait to see what other EC countries say'), NRC Handelsblad, 18/09/91; 'Bonn en Parijs eens over Joegoslavië' ('Bonn and Paris agree on Yugoslavia') and 'Major tegen snelle inzet van troepen' ('Major opposes rapid deployment of troops'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/09/91.

¹¹⁸³ Cf. Van Walsum, cited in TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 89.

¹¹⁸⁴ Van den Broek, cited in TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 89.

¹¹⁸⁵ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, memos PS, 1991, spokesman to CSCE posts, 17/09/91, reference 1049/91. See for the irritations of AMAD and DAV on sending this instruction without their knowledge: ibid., memorandum from PS to M, 01/10/91, no 191/91.

¹¹⁸⁶ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 162.

¹¹⁸⁷ Rob Meines, 'Om troepen te kunnen sturen moet er eerst vrede in Joegoslavië zijn' ('There has to be peace in Yugoslavia before troops can be sent'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91. See also Theo Koelé, 'Quarrel Genscher-Van den Broek', Trouw, 17/09/91

¹¹⁸⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 88.

According to him, 'Van the Broek with his manoeuvring was in the process of ... throwing away the moral responsibility that the Netherlands had gained for itself in international politics'.¹¹⁸⁹ The relationship between Genscher and Van den Broek was meanwhile becoming 'ever more painful' and Kohl complained to Lubbers about Van den Broek's 'pigheadedness'.¹¹⁹⁰

So, on 19 September at Dutch initiative, a meeting took place of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence of the West European Union, which was also attended by observers from Denmark, Greece, Ireland, Norway and Turkey.¹¹⁹¹ The objective was to investigate the desirability and feasibility of a possible deployment of a limited military peacekeeping force to Yugoslavia, which would become operational as soon there was a sufficient prospect of the ceasefire being upheld, and with the assent of all involved parties. The Dutch ministers declared at the meeting that in the event of the creation of a WEU peace mission, the Netherlands was prepared to contribute personnel and equipment. After the meeting, Ter Beek firmed up the offer in the form of a battalion of marines.¹¹⁹²

However, the WEU conference concluded that a military intervention was not among the possibilities through lack of assent of the parties in the conflict.¹¹⁹³ Genscher managed to manoeuvre himself out of the corner that Van den Broek had pushed him into by proposing an investigation into four options for military intervention. The ministers present consented to setting up an ad hoc working group to study these possibilities.

However, the United Kingdom did not support such an investigation. London had learned from civil wars such as the ones in Northern Ireland and Lebanon that it was simpler to send in troops than to withdraw them. Furthermore, the military force usually has to be expanded considerably in the course of a mission.¹¹⁹⁴ The British Minister of Foreign Affairs, Hurd, stated therefore, after a British cabinet meeting held that morning, that he considered there could be no strict compliance with the condition of assent of all parties. The British Minister of State, Archie Hamilton, said at the WEU meeting that the fact that the observers were unable to perform their work did not mean that a peacekeeping force had to be dispatched.¹¹⁹⁵ In his opinion, an open-ended deployment would entail the EC being sucked into 'the Yugoslav quagmire'.¹¹⁹⁶ Hurd did not give way to the strong pressure of other countries to shift his position. Therefore the EPC meeting eventually agreed with only a WEU study into reinforcing the effectiveness of the monitors.

After that, the Foreign Affairs spokesman, Dig Ishta, deemed it advisable to give Van den Broek clear advice: 'Your position on returning from Yugoslavia on 5 August (...) was poorly received in the media and is (not only in the German press) still quoted as an example of what is referred to as "lack of professionalism"! Now that no immediate decision had been forthcoming on a WEU peacekeeping force, steps had to be taken to prevent headlines appearing in the media, 'which is always eager to report a failure', such as 'Van den Broek Plan rejected' or 'No enthusiasm for Dutch WEU plans'. Ishta therefore advised Van den Broek in communicating with the press to lay the 'blame' on the lack of a ceasefire and the lack of assent of all parties, which were conditions for a peacekeeping force, 'and to avoid any suggestion that the idea for a WEU peacekeeping force was rejected by the allies ¹¹⁸⁹ 'Vredesmacht alleen weg als alle partijen instemmen' ('Peacekeeping force only to leave when all parties agree'), de Volkskrant, 18/09/91. See also Wio Joustra, 'Joegoslavië inzet van burenruzie tussen Nederland en Duitsland' ('Yugoslavia is nub of quarrel between neighbours Netherlands and Germany'), de Volkskrant, 20/09/91.

¹¹⁹⁰ Lubbers, 'Keer', p. 369.

¹¹⁹¹ For reports of this see ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286, extra ministerial EPC, 19/09/91, Van den Broek to Belgrade, 21/09/91, celer 136; TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 6; Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 20/09/91, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

¹¹⁹² Van Eekelen, Security, p. 146; DAB, 248. Memo De Winter for Ter Beek, 03/10/91, D91/503, with as appendix: 'Elements for the Minister of Defence's reply in the debate on the situation in Yugoslavia on 03/10/91.

¹¹⁹³ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 306.

¹¹⁹⁴ Thompson, House, p. 325.

¹¹⁹⁵ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 146.

¹¹⁹⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286, extra ministerial EPC, 19/09/91, Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 21/09/91, celer 136.

because they thought it was a poor plan'.¹¹⁹⁷ However, Van den Broek could not resist one more chance to get even in the press. It is very easy for someone to recognize Croatia and Slovenia from behind his desk and to leave the rest of the work to others, the Dutch minister said to the press.¹¹⁹⁸

In the meantime, Van den Broek had inflicted considerable damage with his proposal for the WEU conference. His suggestion would provide open evidence of the incapacity of the Western European countries to intervene militarily. This unnecessarily damaged the position of the international community towards Serbia.¹¹⁹⁹ Thanks to Van den Broek's initiative, it had become perfectly clear that Europe itself was unable to guarantee the peace. Was it actually the EC president's intention to demonstrate that European organizations were not in a position to bring about peace on the ground and to show that only the UN was still eligible for this? Van den Broek was able to book a victory only in the personal dispute with Genscher. The German minister would have to admit that the German government would not resort to the deployment of troops, which was detrimental to the standing of the country that constantly took the lead with its call for recognition.¹²⁰⁰

The follow-up to the WEU initiative

In late September, the WEU ad hoc working group had developed the four options, which was a laborious task. The first option consisted of deploying from two to three thousand lightly-armed soldiers for logistics support of the observers. In the second option, these soldiers would have to fulfil a protective role towards the observers (troop requirements: five to six thousand men). The third option involved an armed peacekeeping force that would supervise the ceasefire itself and would require approximately ten thousand men. The fourth option included the deployment of larger units (twenty to thirty thousand men in total) which would be required to form a buffer and, under the heading of 'expanded peacekeeping' would in fact be engaged in peace enforcing. Otherwise, the number of soldiers that were considered necessary for the four options varied in the course of time. As might be expected, after the meeting on 19 September the enthusiasm for a WEU force was little. The Italians, French and Dutch had actively cooperated in developing the options, but the other delegations had cried off. There was 'no substantial contribution from the Germans, heavy opposition from the British, and silence from Spain, Portugal, Belgium and Luxemburg'.¹²⁰¹

The British 'opposition' consisted of a totally different view on the action required of an intervention force. The Netherlands considered that a deployment of troops in separate areas that were the subject of dispute between Croats and Serbs was sufficient. According to the British, this was a far too optimistic view of a guerrilla war such as the one to be conducted in Yugoslavia, for which entire areas would have to be pacified. Above all, the British still feared that the conflict would escalate further so that the troop deployment would have to continue for a long time, as in Cyprus or Northern Ireland.¹²⁰² Hurd saw absolutely no necessity to send troops into a situation where the future development was unclear. The British minister agreed with a further study of the first option, but he indicated clearly that he was not yet ready for a decision on the matter.¹²⁰³

¹¹⁹⁷ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, doss. January-May 1991, memorandum of spokesman to M, 19/09/91 no. 1054.

¹¹⁹⁸ David Gow & John Palmer, 'Mitterrand and Kohl urge UN intervention in Yugoslavia', The Guardian, 19/09/91.

¹¹⁹⁹ Cf. Zeitler, Rolle, p. 306.

¹²⁰⁰ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 306.

¹²⁰¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286, ministerial EPC/Brussels, 30/09/91, Ministry of Foreign Affairs to PV New York for the attention of the minister via DGPZ, 27/09/91, celer 238; Cf. ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288, Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van der Tas 405 to Van den Broek, 26/09/91

¹²⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288, Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to London embassy, 23/09/91, celer 151; DSG.Yugoslavia, memo De Winter for Ter Beek, 25/09/91, D91/484.

¹²⁰³ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 147; ABZ, central NATO records, Van den Broek to London embassy, 02/10/91, celer 153.

France supported the fourth option, for which it was prepared to supply one quarter of the troops. The Netherlands objected to the fourth option, not only because there was a question of whether such a considerable military force could be mobilized in the short term, but also because such a unit could easily create the impression of an intervention or an occupation army.¹²⁰⁴ The Netherlands was in favour of the third option, but considered that only five thousand troops would be necessary, divided into companies of 120 men for the thirty to forty individual trouble spots that the Netherlands estimated to exist.¹²⁰⁵

According to Van Eekelen, Van den Broek and Ter Beek were the most enthusiastic for deployment among all the attendees at the WEU ministerial meeting of 30 September, where the options were discussed, as they had been one and a half weeks earlier.¹²⁰⁶ Apart from the Netherlands and France, which were in favour, and Great Britain, which was against further decision-making on a WEU force, the member states had a lukewarm reaction to the proposals. Finally, Genscher managed to bring the WEU ministers into line with the proposal to defer a possible decision until after the chairman of the Yugoslavia Conference, Carrington, had indicated to Genscher that a suspension of hostilities demanded the support of the WEU. In order to reassure Hurd, Genscher also stated that such a decision could also turn out to be negative. This statement could hardly have inspired the development of any of the four options. Carrington himself adopted the position that Yugoslavia was not even worth the life of a single British soldier.¹²⁰⁷ In further discussion of the options, the United Kingdom finally appeared willing in principle to deploy one hundred men for duties that were without danger, such as the multinational staff, medical support and mapping support.

As disappointed as the Netherlands Ministry of Defence was with the British attitude, which made the WEU peacekeeping force 'an almost academic exercise',¹²⁰⁸ it was equally concerned about the eagerness with which France threw itself at the study. The Chief of Defence Staff and the ministry's Directorate of General Policy Matters feared that France might be trying to make political capital out of the matter and was attempting to weaken NATO. The fact is that France had managed to achieve a transformation of the original idea for a WEU peacekeeping force into a WEU Reaction Force, also for other situations in Europe. The most important French operational staff, of the First Army in Metz, led by the Chief of Staff, General P. Morillon, embarked on drawing up an operational plan for the WEU and a two star general was designated as a possible commander of the WEU force.¹²⁰⁹ The Netherlands could not skirt around these developments. With his tactical manoeuvre against Genscher, Van den Broek, who had always opposed a development in the direction of the WEU at the expense of NATO, had therefore not only achieved nothing for Yugoslavia but also done the general Dutch security policy a disservice.

This time Van den Broek was also given a black eye in the Dutch Parliament with his proposals for a WEU peacekeeping force. During verbal consultation with the two responsible ministers in the permanent parliamentary committees for Foreign Affairs and Defence on 3 October 1991, the VVD member of parliament Blaauw said that he shared the ministers' preference for the third WEU option. He wondered, however, whether the Netherlands was ready for participation in it.¹²¹⁰ Van Traa also ¹²⁰⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286, ministerial EPC/Brussels, 30/09/91, Ministry of Foreign Affairs to PV New York for the attention of the minister via DGPZ, celer 238.

¹²⁰⁵ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 27/09/91, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study; ABZ, DEU/ARA/03288, Yugoslavia: EU/EPC. Ad hoc working group on Yugoslavia. Preparations for Dutch contribution. Minutes of meetings July-December 1991, Van den Broek to London embassy, 23/09/91, celer 151; ibid., secretariat WEU to WEU member states, 24/09/91, weusec 192; DSG. Memo Barth to Ter Beek, 27/09/91, D91/494.

¹²⁰⁶ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 147.

¹²⁰⁷ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 149; idem, Sporen, p. 244.

¹²⁰⁸ DAB, 248. Memo De Winter for Ter Beek, 03/10/91, D91/503, with as appendix: 'Elements for the Minister of Defence's reply in the debate on the situation in Yugoslavia on 03/10/91.

¹²⁰⁹ KAB. Minutes of Defence Council meeting, 09/10/91; Morillon, Credo, pp. 134-136.

¹²¹⁰ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 10, p. 2.

liked the idea of the third option, but considered deployment impossible for the time being.¹²¹¹ The CDA member Kok saw 'absolutely no need for even more speculations on deploying troops in Yugoslavia'.¹²¹² Sipkes of the Greens called discussions on the subject 'totally premature': 'Military intervention has an escalating effect and it would also mean that ultimately only a limited number of Western European countries would bring "matters to order"'.¹²¹³ She favoured a peacekeeping force of soldiers from the East and West, only if the Yugoslavia Conference was successful. The Minister of Defence, Ter Beek, finally stated that it was not yet necessary to warn the Defence personnel of a possible deployment, because the conditions of a ceasefire and the assent of the involved parties were not yet complied with.¹²¹⁴

The first Security Council resolution regarding the Yugoslav issue

The Dutch government had been toying with the idea of involving the Security Council since the failure of the troika mission in early August. On 13 September, Van den Broek raised with Carrington the matter of whether France and the United Kingdom could bring up the Yugoslavia issue in the Security Council. Carrington replied that it would be worthwhile trying. On this occasion Loncar did not dwell on whether Yugoslavia might oppose discussion in the Security Council.¹²¹⁵

Confronted with the question of whether they favoured discussion of the Yugoslav issue in the Security Council, the French government had to deliberate on how much this would bear pressure on the special relationship with Germany within the EC. After all, discussion in the Security Council would give France, as a permanent member, a considerable say, but Germany, which put itself forward so prominently within the EC, would be sidelined. The reason for raising the matter in the Security Council regardless could be the persistent German urging for the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia.¹²¹⁶

The German government was spurred on in this position by the Vatican, which from the start of the conflict in Yugoslavia had argued for respect of the right of self-determination and against the violence of the JNA. Cardinal Soldano, who was responsible for Vatican foreign policy, urged Genscher on 18 September to move to recognition and said that such action by Germany would be followed immediately by Austria, Poland and the Vatican.¹²¹⁷ After an official visit by Tudjman, the Vatican pressed the EC ambassadors to collectively proceed to recognition, because it expected that this would result in a reduction of the violence.¹²¹⁸ When Genscher again sounded out Paris on the subject of recognition in response to the Vatican's representation, he came up against Dumas, who felt that a rapid recognition would tempt the Serbs into even more offensive actions.¹²¹⁹

In the course of September, however, the French position began to shift in the German direction. Paris also saw the need to repair the Bonn-Paris axis, since the press on Yugoslavia was even mentioning the possibility of a German-Italian axis.¹²²⁰ At a press conference on 12 September, Mitterrand stated that, after the events of recent months, a future independence of Croatia and Slovenia ¹²¹¹ Ibid., p. 4.

¹²¹² Ibid., p. 3

¹²¹³ Ibid., p. 3

¹²¹⁴ Ibid., p. 9

¹²¹⁵ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, memos PS, 1991, memorandum from PS to DGPZ, 13/09/91, no. 178/91.

¹²¹⁶ Cf. Centro Studi di Political Internazionale, 'Lessons'; ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Van den Broek to Belgrade embassy, 21/09/91, celer 136.

¹²¹⁷ Chenu, 'France', p. 374; Dumas, Fil, p. 254.

¹²¹⁸ Chenu, 'France', p. 374.

¹²¹⁹ Dumas, Fil, p. 354.

¹²²⁰ Josef Riedmiller, 'Wird eine neue 'Achse' geschmiedet? Deutschland und Italien lassen sich im Jugoslawien-Konflikt auf eine Sonderrolle ein', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 17/09/91; J.M. Bik, 'Europees huis aan verwarring ten prooi' ('European house the victim of confusion'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91.

was possible.¹²²¹ Four days later, on 16 September, Dumas said on French television that the problem was no longer whether Croatia and Slovenia could become independent, but how.¹²²² It was also not at all in the German government's interest for Bonn and Paris to have divergent points of view on committing the WEU, or for Paris to play political games behind the back of the Dutch EC presidency. The time was ripe for a bilateral statement on the joint French-German points of departure regarding Yugoslavia.¹²²³

Kohl and Mitterrand therefore reached a compromise on 19 September, which would have to bring an end to the open rifts in the Bonn-Paris axis, which both statesmen found undesirable in the run-up to Maastricht. This formula was intended to guarantee that, in the Yugoslav issue, Germany 'weder allein steht noch geht'.¹²²⁴ Kohl promised that Germany would not take any unilateral action in the matter of Yugoslavia and acknowledged the rights of the minorities there, while Mitterrand accepted in principle the right to self-determination of Croatia and Slovenia.¹²²⁵ One day later in the German Bundsdag, Genscher committed all thought of a German virtuoso performance on Yugoslavia to the wastepaper basket: 'Wir halten den Schulterschluss mit Frankreich für entscheidend.'¹²²⁶

Kohl and Mitterrand also agreed that at the opening of the General Assembly of the United Nations, both countries would press for the deployment of a UN peacekeeping force.¹²²⁷ The German government actually seemed not to have such a great objection to involving the Security Council. Firstly, it was a way of involving Russia in the approach to the Yugoslav issue, which the German government had long wanted. Furthermore, involving the Security Council would mean possible military deployment, which the European Community was not in a position to provide.¹²²⁸

On 20 September, only one day after the agreement between Kohl and Mitterrand, Germany and France, together with Canada and Austria, requested the Security Council to convene on the Yugoslavia issue. Because it was feared that several members of the Council (China, India, Cuba, Ecuador) would object to discussing the Yugoslav issue because they considered it to be an internal affair, Yugoslavia itself was also persuaded to request discussion of the matter.¹²²⁹ The Security Council met on 25 September. The Council took the opportunity unanimously to call an arms embargo against all parties in Yugoslavia in Resolution 713. It was the first Resolution of the Security Council, three months after the outbreak of the conflict in Slovenia.

It was furthermore a measure that Yugoslavia itself had requested.¹²³⁰ This was not so strange, because the authorities in Belgrade themselves at that time only stood to gain from an embargo. They had considerable military stocks of what until recently had been one of the largest armies in Europe. An embargo would take the wind out of independence-seeking Croatia's sails. And more than half a year later, Bosnia-Herzegovina, which by then would be declared independent, would be put at a disadvantage by the embargo. This would open the international community to severe criticism when they neither appeared prepared to lift the embargo to put the country in a position to defend itself, nor were inclined to provide military support to the Bosnian government. At the time of imposing the embargo, the Western world did not yet have Bosnia clearly in its sights, however.¹²³¹ The reason that in both cases this embargo caused few problems was that there was plenty of supply on the international ¹²²¹Zeitler, Rolle, p. 97.

¹²²²Zeitler, Rolle, p. 305.

¹²²³Libal, Limits, p. 53.

¹²²⁴'Initiative bei Mitterrands Besuch in Deutschland', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 20/09/91.

¹²²⁵Jakobsen, 'Multilateralism', pp. 371, 375-376 and 378-379; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 97.

¹²²⁶Genscher, 'Erinnerungen', pp. 950-951. See also Libal, Limits, p. 55.

¹²²⁷David Gow & John Palmer, 'Mitterrand and Kohl urge UN intervention in Yugoslavia', The Guardian, 19/09/91.

¹²²⁸See also Rob Meines, 'Frans-Duits pragmatisme bij VN' ('Frenco-German pragmatism at UN'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/09/91.

¹²²⁹Weller, 'Response', p. 578. See also archive PV New York, Yugoslavia/general, September 1991 - December 1995, PV New York to Van den Broek, 25/09/91, nyv/6490; minute-message Bas Backer (PV New York) to DPV, 04/10/91.

¹²³⁰Eisermann, Weg, p. 57; Weller, 'Response', p. 578.

¹²³¹Zimmerman, Origins, p. 155.

arms market at the time as a consequence of - oh, irony - arms reduction agreements between the East and West, the dismantling of the military apparatus of the former Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union and the stabilization of Lebanon after many years of civil war.¹²³² In the short term, the arms embargo led to an intensification of the 'barracks war' in Croatia. Provisionally this was the most convenient way for the Croatian armed forces to avail themselves of heavy weapons.

Yugoslavia's call to the Security Council indicated that the authorities in Belgrade expected more from them than from the EC. The Security Council indeed offered more guarantees for Serbian interests. The Council had taken a more reserved position on intervention in the internal Yugoslav situation than the EC, which appeared to be taking a much firmer line, especially after convening the conference. Of the Western European countries, France and the United Kingdom, whose position in the conflict until then had not been unfavourable for Serbia, had a seat in the Security Council, and Germany, which was hated in Belgrade, did not.¹²³³ In addition, the Soviet Union, which Serbia considered to be a traditional ally, and the People's Republic of China, with which the Milosevic regime felt ideological kinship, had a right of veto in the Council. Furthermore, both countries had a reputation for feeling more strongly than the Western countries about the international community intervening in the internal affairs of a state. Involving the UN also meant that the non-aligned countries would be given a voice in the conflict. There was hope in Belgrade that it would be able to count on sympathy from this group of countries, with which Tito had maintained such friendly relations in the past. What is more, UN involvement, which until then had kept its distance, meant that a second international player would appear on the scene alongside the EC, which could not always be expected to adopt the same position as the Twelve of Europe. This could create room for manoeuvre for the Milosevic regime.¹²³⁴

Resolution 713 also supported the efforts made by the EC until then. The Security Council further decided 'to remain seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved'.¹²³⁵ This guaranteed permanent UN involvement.

To what extent this would produce a real improvement relative to what the EC had done until then, remained to be seen. In any case, France and Great Britain had permanent seats in the Council. Differences between them on European level could equally well arise in the Security Council. The involvement of two other permanent members, the United States and Russia, could complicate matters. Furthermore, from now on France and the United Kingdom would be able to play chess on two boards at the same time. What they did not like in the EC they could attempt to correct behind the - often closed - doors of the Security Council.

In pursuit of the involvement with Yugoslavia imposed on him by the Security Council, the UN Secretary-General, Javier Pérez de Cuellar, appointed the former American Secretary of State Cyrus Vance as his personal envoy for Yugoslavia on 8 October. His task would include maintaining contact with the European Community's Yugoslavia Conference. Vance, who appeared a little diffident towards the media, had a long reputation as a fighter of world fires. In 1968 he was the second negotiator on the American side in the peace talks with North Vietnam in Paris. This New York lawyer had been involved in the past at the American government's request in such matters as the Cyprus conflict, relations between the two Koreas, discussions between the South African government and the anti-apartheid organization ANC, and with the race issue in the United States. As Secretary of State in the Carter administration, he gained a reputation as the architect of the Camp David treaty between Israel ¹²³² See e.g. Cekić, Aggression, pp. 47 and 162.

¹²³³ Cf. Thompson, House, p. 318.

¹²³⁴ Petković, 'Role', p. 6.

¹²³⁵ For the text of resolutions and explanations of the Security Council chairman, see United Nations Department of Public Information, Nations.

and Egypt.¹²³⁶ Vance was one of the few foreigners involved in the Yugoslavia conflict to enjoy a good reputation with the Serbs.¹²³⁷

Observers to Bosnia-Herzegovina

At an additional ministerial meeting in The Hague on 19 September in connection with the European Political Cooperation, after a visit to Yugoslavia Lord Carrington called the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina 'explosive'. The leaders there and in Macedonia had therefore requested the stationing of monitors in their republics as a preventive measure. The Dutch presidency had responded cautiously and expressed the opinion that there must first be a study of 'to what extent it would be advisable and possible'.¹²³⁸ Also in those days, requests reached the Dutch presidency of the EC from the Bosnian Muslim leaders for stationing ECMM personnel in Bosnia in connection with the deteriorating situation there, partly as a result of the behaviour of Serbian and Montenegrin JNA soldiers there.¹²³⁹

On 26 September Van den Broek therefore sent Wijnaendts to Sarajevo to establish whether sending observers to Bosnia-Herzegovina was possible as a form of preventive diplomacy. The Dutch government considered it 'not out of the question' that the hostilities in Croatia could spread to Bosnia-Herzegovina, 'in view of the internal tensions within this republic, in particular as a consequence of troop movements of federal army units, which had led to negative reactions among sections of the population and the authorities'.¹²⁴⁰

The political leaders of the three large ethnic communities in Bosnia and Milosevic appeared to agree with observers who would be ordered 'to contribute to maintaining peace and stability and to help prevent possible conflicts'. In agreeing, it will not have escaped the notice of the Serbian leaders that the Serbs in Croatia were starting to rate the monitors more highly, and the Croats conversely less highly, because they were effectively helping to consolidate the Serbian positions deep into Croatia.¹²⁴¹ At an EPC lunch in Brussels on 30 September, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Twelve agreed on expanding the number of monitors to two hundred. Eight of them would be deployed in Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹²⁴²

The Greater-Serbian coup

Anyone who thought they could derive hope from the fact that the Serbian leaders appeared to see an advantage again in cooperating with the EC at the end of September, was soon to be disappointed. On 3 October 1991 the representatives of Serbia, Montenegro, Vojvodina and Kosovo decided in the collective state presidium that from now on they were entitled to exercise the highest state authority ¹²³⁶ On Vance see e.g. Caroline de Gruyter, 'De man zonder bijnaam' ('The man with no alias'), Elsevier, 18/01/92, p. 37; 'Cyrus Vance. Geboren diplomaat' ('Cyrus Vance. Born diplomat'), NRC Handelsblad, 14/10/91; Stanley Meisler & Carol J. Williams, 'Globe-trotting envoy douses the hot spots', Los Angeles Times, 07/04/92.

¹²³⁷ Kadjevic, View, p. 47; interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01; Stanley Meisler & Carol J. Williams, 'Globe-trotting envoy douses the hot spots', Los Angeles Times, 07/04/92.

¹²³⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03306, Izetbegovic to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the EC, 16/09/91; ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286, extra ministerial EPC, 19/09/91, Van den Broek to Belgrade, 21/09/91, celer 136. Genscher, Erinnerung, p. 950 as well as the Netherlands, refers to Greece as an opponent of stationing monitors in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia.

¹²³⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03306, Fietelaars 330 to Van den Broek, 24/09/91; Van den Broek to HOM ECMM, 24/09/91, celer unnumbered.

¹²⁴⁰ TK, session 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 7, p. 2.

¹²⁴¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Yugoslavia/Domestic Politics/Bosnia-Herzegovina, Fietelaars 337, 26/09/91.

¹²⁴² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03306, Fietelaars 340 to Van den Broek, 27/09/91; Fietelaars 343 to Van den Broek, 29/09/91; COREU of the EC presidency, 29/09/91, cpe/pres/hag 1018; DAB, 248. Memo De Winter for Ter Beek, 03/10/91, D91/503, with as appendices: 'Elements for the Minister of Defence's reply in the debate on the situation in Yugoslavia on 03/10/91 and KvO/DAV, Discussion points for the Ministerial EPC 30 September 1991 and activities for Monitor Mission for UCV Yugoslavia, 03/10/91.

with or without the other members. They therefore conferred upon themselves the highest state authority and furthermore took over the authority of the federal parliament, because of 'a situation of impending danger of war'.¹²⁴³ In fact, after that, the federal Yugoslavia consisted only of Serbia and Montenegro. A clearly asymmetrical relationship existed between the two areas, one of which, Serbia, had ten million residents, and the other, Montenegro, only six-hundred thousand. It was clear that only one person was in charge in the new federation: the Serbian president Slobodan Milosevic.¹²⁴⁴ The representatives of Croatia and Slovenia left the presidium a few days later; the three month moratorium on the execution of their declarations of independence had passed and it was clear that they had little reason to remain in Belgrade.

Belgrade upheld the fiction of a federation, however, in the hope of using legal arguments to make a claim on continuity of the former Yugoslavia. This would allow Belgrade to make a claim on the assets of the ex-state and its seats in international organs. An example of the extent to which Serbia dominated the federation was the fact that the Serbian police had forty thousand men as against two thousand federal police, who were finally taken over by the Serbian police in October 1993.

On 8 October, the ambassadors of the EC met in the Dutch diplomatic mission's building in Belgrade and took stock of the European Community's efforts so far. The outcome was discouraging. According to the assembled diplomats, all the good intentions of the EC had come to nothing because the nationalists of Serbia and Croatia were not seeking a compromise, but appeared to be aiming for the other party's capitulation. This fundamental fact had not been discounted in EC policy. This meant that the EC had been transformed from an impartial arbiter into one of the parties in the Yugoslav conflict: 'This has reduced the community to the Yugoslavs' own level of give and take, without any commitment to durability of the agreements reached, a climate that they know very well and that they can better exploit than anybody else.' The opportunities remaining for the EC to do something were slight. They consisted mainly of economic and financial sanctions. In addition, the EC diplomats made a futile attempt to limit the effects of the 'coup' of 3 October by upgrading Markovic and Loncar in the negotiations relative to the 'Serbian' federal presidium.¹²⁴⁵

Apparently by way of upgrading Markovic, the EC ambassadors invited him one week later as a guest to their monthly lunch meeting. Markovic told the EC that it was wrong to see the conflict between Serbia and Croatia as one 'between the rearguard of totalitarianism and the leading edge of democracy'. In reality, Milosevic and Tudjman had the same motives, namely a craving for power, in which they would go to any lengths. He also reproached the EC that they had accomplished little until then. This was especially because the community promised and threatened, but seldom kept promises and carried out threats. That was seen in Yugoslavia as a sign of weakness 'and weakness is always exploited'.¹²⁴⁶

Meanwhile, one month after his appointment, Carrington had come to some conclusions. He presented a plan for Yugoslavia at a conference on 4 October in The Hague, in which the republics that wished to be independent would be allowed to do so and could use their own discretion in the extent to which they maintained links with a Yugoslav confederation. Carrington's proposal came down to a sort of Yugoslavia à la carte, and resembled the plan of Gligorov and Izetbegovic of 6 June. As he did with that plan, Milosevic appeared to accept it in the first instance.¹²⁴⁷

At an informal meeting at Haarzuilens Castle on 5 and 6 October, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Twelve were informed of the state of affairs. Van den Broek announced that Serbia now ¹²⁴³ Public Statement SFRY Presidency, 03/10/91, in: Review of International Affairs, vol. 42(1991) nos. 995-7.

¹²⁴⁴ Cf. Williams/Cigar, 'War Crimes', IV.B. 1.c and n. 149.

¹²⁴⁵ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Fietelaars 364 to Van den Broek, 08/10/91.

¹²⁴⁶ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Fietelaars 382 to Van den Broek, 17/10/91.

¹²⁴⁷ Cf. Wijnaendts, Kroniek, pp. 129-130; 'Akkoord over toekomst van Joegoslavië' ('Agreement on the future of Yugoslavia') and Rob Meines, 'Haags akkoord biedt Joegoslavië weer hoop' ('Hague agreement offers Yugoslavia renewed hope'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/10/91.

appeared resigned to the recognition of the republics that were pursuing independence.¹²⁴⁸ Besides this good news, the ministers expressed dismay at the violence displayed by the JNA in Croatia.¹²⁴⁹ Genscher demanded the immediate withdrawal of the JNA from Croatia and stated that, if necessary, Germany would proceed to the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia alone. The twelve EC ministers sharply condemned the Serbian 'coup' and announced that from now on they would recognize no further decisions of the presidium. They decided, if no ceasefire was in effect after 7 October, to resort to sanctions against reluctant parties and termination of the cooperation agreement between the EC and Yugoslavia. On the other hand, a cooperation agreement would be entered into with the cooperative parties. This not only marked the EC's turn to a biased course, which it been reluctant to take until then in connection with the mediation that it wished to offer the Yugoslavia Conference, but it could also create the impression that it was anticipating the recognition of Croatia, Slovenia and possibly other republics. On 8 October, after intensive telephone consultation, Van den Broek belatedly reached agreement with the Deputy Minister of Defence of Yugoslavia, Admiral Brovet, and the head of the ECMM mission, Van Houten, on a suspension of hostilities. This meant that the sanctions would not go ahead.¹²⁵⁰ Van den Broek, who until then had avoided contact with the Yugoslav military as much as possible, had now apparently sought direct contact with Brovet to avoid contact with the 'Serbian' presidium under the leadership of Kostic.

Van den Broek's promise of recognition of Croatia and Slovenia

Van den Broek badly needed a success. On Monday 30 September 1991, 'black Monday', the Dutch draft treaty for a political union was torpedoed by all other member states of the European Community except Belgium. Its failure was not directly attributable to Van den Broek himself, who was hardly in a position to concern himself with the draft treaty because of his involvement with Yugoslavia, but to Junior Minister Piet Dankert, who, according to an anonymous diplomat in the Dutch ministry, entertained 'bizarre ideas' on the acceptability of the draft among other member states.¹²⁵¹ 'It seemed as if Dankert had not been entirely part of this world for months', according to a well-informed diplomatic source in London.¹²⁵² As a European ambassador in The Hague put it: 'In the Netherlands they are so convinced of the moral superiority of what they have in mind for Europe (...) that they have tended to lose sight of the power relations.'¹²⁵³ It was serious food for thought that senior officials in the ministry - Dankert was supported by the Director-General of European Cooperation, Van Beuge, and the European Integration Directorate - apparently took such little account of the how the cards were stacked in the other European capitals.¹²⁵⁴ The Dutch permanent representative to the EC, P. Nieman had tried in vain to give a warning that the Dutch draft would not be acceptable to the EC partners.¹²⁵⁵ 'While in Yugoslavia, Minister Van den Broek was being confronted in a hard way with the limits of European foreign policy, Mr Dankert dreamed on 'undisturbed', VVD opposition leader F. Bolkestein would rightly observe.¹²⁵⁶ Furthermore, diplomatic circles in The Hague had once again

¹²⁴⁸Both, Indifference, p. 125.

¹²⁴⁹Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 953.

¹²⁵⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03283, EU/GBVB/extra CoPo 1991, Van den Broek circ 594 to embassy Belgrade and PV EC, 10/10/91.

¹²⁵¹ Frits Schaling, 'Nederland oogst storm met voorstel voor politieke unie' ('Netherlands brings storm on its head with proposal for political union'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/09/91.

¹²⁵² Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord' ('The suicide of The Hague'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁵³ Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord' ('The suicide of The Hague'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁵⁴ See e.g. Oscar Garschagen, 'Stay in touch with the Dutch', de Volkskrant, 05/10/91.

¹²⁵⁵ 'Premier erkent fouten bij presentatie unievoorstel EG' ('Prime minister admits errors in presentation of union proposal'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/10/91; Elsbeth Tiedemann, 'Terug naar Zwarte Maandag' ('Back to black Monday'), Elsevier, 22/06/96, p. 16; M. Sie Dhian Ho, 'Federatiekampioen of trouwe bondgenoot. Het Nederlandse beleid ten aanzien van de Europese en Atlantische Samenwerking', Van Ditzhuyzen et al (ed.), Jaar, p. 303; Michiel van Hulten, 'Zwarte Maandag. Kroniek van een gemiste kans', Labohm (ed.), Waterdragers, pp. 196-197.

¹²⁵⁶ Rob Meines, 'Lichte Europa-moeheid in Kamer' ('Slight Europe fatigue in parliament'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/10/91.

underestimated the power of the Bonn-Paris axis by believing that the German government would support the Dutch draft despite objections from Paris.¹²⁵⁷ According to the professor of constitutional law of the University of Nijmegen, Kortmann, this should not come as a surprise to those interested in history: "They know or are in a position to know that the Netherlands, or more specifically Holland, has a tradition of wrongly estimating the wishes of (the) other (European) states."¹²⁵⁸ Paul Scheffer, commentator in NRC Handelsblad, likewise thought that there was an element of a long [Dutch] tradition of self-deception: 'We feel so sure of what we want that the idea that others might want something else has trouble breaking through.'¹²⁵⁹ Also, the Dutch attitude of 'we'll just do that more properly', which had resulted in the Luxemburg draft from before the Dutch presidency being pushed aside, had raised hackles in other European cities.¹²⁶⁰

It was, again, a blot on the Dutch EC president's copybook. According to NRC Handelsblad, the defeat of the Dutch ambitions for Europe was 'total'.¹²⁶¹ Diplomats who had witnessed the meeting of EC representatives in which the Dutch draft was slated, spoke of 'carnage'¹²⁶² or a 'bloodbath'.¹²⁶³ 'We looked like complete idiots', concluded Van den Broek himself.¹²⁶⁴ EC president the Netherlands, in NRC Handelsblad's analysis, would 'no longer be able to blow its own trumpet so much'.¹²⁶⁵ And its foreign affairs correspondent thought he observed in the following weeks a demoralization among Dutch diplomats, because they were no longer taken completely seriously by their foreign discussion partners.¹²⁶⁶

The Netherlands had to come up with a new proposal as quickly as possible, in order to avoid 'Maastricht' being a complete washout. The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs then found himself in the position of 'a schoolboy who has to repeat an exam', according to PvdA's foreign affairs specialist Maarten van Traa.¹²⁶⁷ Apparently the masters had little confidence in that, because at a press conference in Utrecht after the EC Ministerial Conference in Haarzuilens Castle in the weekend of 5 and 6 October, Dumas and Genscher stated that they would take the initiative for a German-French variant.¹²⁶⁸ By any measure the press conference was a low point in the relationship between Genscher and Van den Broek. Dumas and Genscher acted in breach of the custom after an EC meeting that the EC president and the chairman of the European Commission are the first to speak the press. What is more, the German minister, who arrived by helicopter, hijacked his Dutch opposite number's official car after the meeting to travel to the press conference in a hotel in Maarssen. "This time the Germans didn't just take a bike, but a Dutch government limousine", is how J.H. Sampiemon summed up the old and new Dutch sores caused by German rudeness, in NRC Handelsblad.¹²⁶⁹

¹²⁵⁷ See e.g. 'Delors troost vernederd Nederland' ('Delors comforts humiliated Netherlands'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/10/91; Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord', NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁵⁸ 'C.A.J.M. Kortmann, 'Nederlandse EG-politiek is irreal' ('Netherlands EC policy is unrealistic'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/10/91.

¹²⁵⁹ Paul Scheffer, 'Veroordeeld tot Europa' ('Sentenced to Europe'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/10/91.

¹²⁶⁰ Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord', NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁶¹ 'Delors troost vernederd Nederland', NRC Handelsblad, 01/10/91.

¹²⁶² Frits Schaling, 'Nederland oogst storm met voorstel voor politieke unie' ('Netherlands brings storm on its head with proposal for political union'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/09/91.

¹²⁶³ Theo Koelé, 'Nederland op de pijnbank' ('The Netherlands on the rack'), Trouw, 05/10/91

¹²⁶⁴ Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord' ('The suicide of The Hague'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁶⁵ 'Delors troost vernederd Nederland' ('Delors comforts humiliated Netherlands'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/10/91.

¹²⁶⁶ J.L. Heldring, 'Het rendement van onze diplomatie' ('The outcome of our diplomacy'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/10/91.

¹²⁶⁷ Maarten van Traa, 'Verlies niet je zelfrespect bij ontbrekend applaus' ('Do not lose your self respect with a lack of applause'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/10/91.

¹²⁶⁸ 'Niet meer dan Luxemburg' ('No more than Luxembourg'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/10/91; Theo Koelé, 'Frankrijk en Duitsland kapen voorzitterschap EG', ('France and Germany hijack EC presidency') Trouw, 07/10/91; Oscar Garschagen, 'Dumas en Genscher gaan verder zonder Van den Broek' ('Dumas and Genscher continue without Van den Broek'), de Volkskrant, 07/10/91; idem, 'Dumas en Genscher plegen overval op EG-voorzitterschap' ('Dumas and Genscher raid EC presidency'), de Volkskrant, 08/10/91.

¹²⁶⁹ J.H. Sampiemon, 'De Europese arsenalen sterven niet vanzelf uit' ('The European arsenals will die out of their own accord'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/10/91.

Domestically, Van den Broek had to watch how, as a result of the defeat, his ministry eventually had to allow the prime minister to take the lead with respect to European integration.¹²⁷⁰ The CDA member of parliament J.P. van Iersel proposed that, for the rest of the Dutch presidency, Prime Minister Lubbers should spend six hours a day on European policy, 'not only to save the political and monetary union, but equally Dutch political prestige in the Community'.¹²⁷¹ After almost ten years, the press had grown tired of Van den Broek as minister, and now took it out on him, playing 'the Requiem of a middleweight'.¹²⁷²

On 8 October, the three month moratorium set down in the Brioni agreement on the implementation of the proclamations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia expired. Both republics reaffirmed their independence and made a start on its implementation, including in the area of currency. One week later, on 15 October, Bosnia-Herzegovina also declared its sovereignty. This republic did state that it was prepared to continue to cooperate with the other republics in a newly to be formed association.

The expiry of the Brioni moratorium posed a problem for Van den Broek. On the one hand he did not wish to give the impression of delaying the recognition indefinitely. On the other hand such a recognition could derail the Yugoslavia Conference. Furthermore, as EC president, Van den Broek had to take account of the differences between Germany, which wanted rapid recognition, and France and Great Britain, which were not in favour.

An illustrative example of the tensions that this could cause within the EC was that Minister Hurd of Great Britain, who under different circumstances was a none too warm supporter of European integration, on seeing the opportunity to curb German brashness, suddenly discovered the usefulness of the EC. In his address to the British Conservative Party Congress on 8 October, he said that:

'the luxury and danger of the West European powers pursuing national policy on their own in Eastern Europe belong in the first and not the last decade of this century. Even if the European Community had not been invented in 1956, we should have to invent it now for this reason. Had we not become a member in 1973, we should have to do so now.'¹²⁷³

Van den Broek found a compromise for himself between the extremes, and on 8 and 9 October he informed the European capitals and Washington by telephone that, if the Yugoslavia Conference had not yielded results within two months, recognition would follow automatically on 10 December.¹²⁷⁴ The same information was given to Milosevic and Kadijevic.¹²⁷⁵ It was a rash assertion for Van den Broek to make. Maybe he had allowed himself to be swayed by optimism from the willingness with which Milosevic had responded to the Carrington's proposal of 4 October and was pleased with the personal success that he had achieved with Brovet on 8 October. An internal memorandum from the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs formulated the matter somewhat more cautiously than the minister had done in his telephone calls: the recognition of those republics in Yugoslavia that desired it ¹²⁷⁰ Willem Breedveld, 'Lubbers uitroepen tot staatshoofd?' ('Should Lubbers be declared head of state?'), Trouw, 19/10/91; Leonoor Meijer, 'Debacle rond Europese Politieke Unie was geen incident' ('Debacle surrounding European Political Union was not an isolated incident'), Trouw, 24/10/91; idem, 'Lubbers tempert EG-hoop' ('Lubbers dampens EC hope'), Trouw, 30/10/91.

¹²⁷¹ Rob Meines, 'De Haagse zelfmoord' ('The suicide of The Hague'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/10/91.

¹²⁷² Jan Tromp, 'Van den Broek had geen minister meer moeten willen wezen' ('Van den Broek should not have wanted to carry on as minister'), de Volkskrant, 08/10/91.

¹²⁷³ Cited in: Roper, 'Yugoslavia', p. 2.

¹²⁷⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 123; Rob Meines, 'EC: leger verlaat Kroatië; leger weet van niets' ('EC: army leaves Croatia; army aware of nothing'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/10/91.

¹²⁷⁵ Helmut Hetzel, 'In zwei Monaten entscheiden wir über die Anerkennung', Die Presse, 18/10/91. See also Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 954-955 could take place before the end of the year at a concluding meeting of the Yugoslavia Conference, on condition that a general settlement had been arrived at.¹²⁷⁶

Even with this condition, the authorities in Croatia and Slovenia could now have the impression that they would not have to wait much longer for recognition of the independence of their republics. Would it be possible for the recognition to be refused after two months, if the blame for the failure of the conference could be laid at the door of the Serbs? And that would not take much. The situation that had arisen after Van den Broek's pronouncements was clear on 10 October at a press conference following a five hour discussion between Milosevic and Tudjman in The Hague within the framework of the Yugoslavia Conference. Van den Broek then stated that the JNA would hopefully withdraw from Croatia within a month in the framework of a political solution. Milosevic, sitting on Van den Broek's left, said that Van den Broek's proposal was realistic, as long as the notion of a centralized Yugoslav state was the focus of the negotiations. Tudjman, sitting on Van den Broek's right, said that it was no longer relevant whether Yugoslavia was a centralized state or a loose confederation: Croatia became independent with effect from 9 October.¹²⁷⁷ No wonder that Lord Carrington was unpleasantly surprised by Van den Broek's telephone calls.¹²⁷⁸

The government in Paris had less difficulty with this development. On 9 October Dumas stated in the Assemblée Nationale that Yugoslavia no longer existed and that the EC would have to draw logical conclusions from the fact.¹²⁷⁹ Bonn was obviously pleasantly surprised by the sudden change of course of the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs.¹²⁸⁰

It remained hidden from the general public that by mentioning a period of two months for the recognition of independence, Van den Broek had bowed towards Bonn. The barrage of abuse against him from German politicians and journalists continued. The CSU representative in the European parliament and son of the former Emperor of Austria-Hungary, Otto von Hapsburg, called Van den Broek, because of his supposed adherence to Yugoslav unity, 'the Serb among the Europeans'.¹²⁸¹

The failure of the Yugoslavia Conference

More than one week later, on 18 October, the crucial sixth plenary meeting of the Yugoslavia Conference took place in The Hague. Its importance was underscored by the presence of UN envoy Vance and a joint statement from the EC, the United States and the Soviet Union that was issued on the same day, which rejected the use of force in the Yugoslav conflict, both for changing external and internal borders.¹²⁸² At this meeting, Carrington explained to the leaders of the Yugoslav republics the draft agreement for a general settlement of the Yugoslav crisis, which he had presented two weeks earlier in The Hague, and to which Milosevic then appeared to agree.

In the plan, as he presented it on 18 October, Carrington had gone a long way to meeting a number of Serbian desires. Because he did not wish to discuss the borders of the republics, Carrington made extensive concessions with respect to the protection of minorities. One of the clauses of his plan mentioned a special statute for 'areas where persons belonging to a national or ethnic group form a ¹²⁷⁶ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, box October 1991 - January 1992, memorandum from spokesman to Van den Broek, 10/10/91, no. 1169/91, plus draft of article by Rob Meines; Rob Meines, 'Tijdslimiet aan inzet EG in Joegoslavië' ('Time limit on EC deployment in Yugoslavia') and idem, 'Succes voor shuttle diplomatie Den Haag' ('Success for The Hague's shuttle diplomacy'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/10/91.

¹²⁷⁷ Paul L. Montgomery, 'Croat and Serb Chiefs Meet but Fail to Bridge Gap', The New York Times, 11/10/91.

¹²⁷⁸ Both, Indifference, p. 125-126.

¹²⁷⁹ Jakobsen, 'Multilateralism', p. 379; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 97.

¹²⁸⁰ Genscher, 'Erinnerungen', p. 955.

¹²⁸¹ Peter Sartorius, 'Zagreb: Otto von Habsburgs zäher Kampf um ein unabhängiges Kroatien', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 19/10/91, in which the emperor's son also pilloried Van den Broek as a hater of Germans and Catholics, who furthermore had not got over World Wars I and II.

¹²⁸² Terrett, Dissolution, p. 79; TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 11, p. 4.

majority'.¹²⁸³ It had still to be negotiated which areas were eligible, but it was beyond dispute that it would have to apply to the areas in Croatia, and probably also those in Bosnia-Herzegovina, with a Serbian majority. The Serbs would be allowed to use their own national symbols there, as well as the flag of their choice. The Serbs in these areas were permitted their own parliament, own administration, own police and own law. They were granted the right to a second, Serbian, nationality. Education in these areas would take account of 'the values and needs' of the Serbs. There would be international supervision on effecting the rights of the minorities.

Five of the six republics agreed with Carrington's plan on 18 October. Milosevic now objected, however. As formal obstacle he said that Carrington's proposal would establish that Yugoslavia no longer existed. Milosevic and his Minister of Foreign Affairs, Vladislav Jovanovic, used as a legal argument that if other republics were given the right to separate, Serbia, Montenegro and possibly Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia must be given the right to remain in the federal Yugoslav republic. Carrington, on the other hand, could not deny Serbia and Montenegro the right to call themselves jointly Yugoslavia again, but according to him that would have to be a new state and not the legal successor of the existing federation. This position was later, on 29 November, supported by the Badinter Committee, which stated that Yugoslavia was in a state in dissolution.¹²⁸⁴ Furthermore, according to Milosevic, the plan incorrectly assumed that the republics were the constituent elements of Yugoslavia, rather than the peoples. Neither of these objections was realistic. Milosevic and his supporters themselves gave the lie to the idea that they were still greatly attached to Yugoslavia four days later, on 22 October, when the 'Serbian bloc' in the federal presidium - Serbia, Montenegro, Vojvodina and Kosovo - made proposals for the 'continuation' of Yugoslavia in the form of a Greater Serbia: Serbia, Montenegro and the Serbian regions in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Otherwise, Milosevic was not only concerned with the notion of Greater Serbia. He also wanted the recognition of his new Yugoslavia as the legal successor to the second Yugoslavia (1945-1991), in order for the assets of that state to benefit his regime.¹²⁸⁵

Although they did not openly raise the matter, the Slovenian government was also not favourably disposed to Carrington's plan. They felt no need whatever to reopen the discussion on complete sovereignty, which appeared to be in prospect, by participating in a Yugoslavia à la carte.¹²⁸⁶ Being well tuned to the West, however, the government in Ljubljana understood that it would be given little credit there by being obstructive. It would be much better for the blame to be placed on one or other of the other republics. The most eligible for that were Serbia and Montenegro, which had always meekly followed the Serbian lead since the antibureaucratic revolution. Montenegro dropped out, however, because the president of the republic, Momir Bulatovic, allowed himself to be bribed by De Michelis shortly before the opening of the meeting on 18 October in The Hague, with an Italian promise of substantial financial support.¹²⁸⁷ Milosevic was greatly enraged by the Bulatovic's 'treachery', partly because, by dropping out, Montenegro had considerably weakened the claim that 'his' Yugoslavia was the legal successor of the second Yugoslavia.¹²⁸⁸

After Bulatovic's 'treachery', Milosevic showed himself to be a willing victim of a Slovenian scheme. The Slovenian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Rupel, remarked at one of the conference working party meetings attended by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the republics, that the rights for minorities, as granted by Carrington's proposal to the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia, according to the same plan were equally applicable to all minorities throughout Yugoslavia with a local majority. And therefore also to the Albanians in Kosovo. Not only would Serbia have to grant broad minority rights to the Albanians, they would also have to accept international supervision of their observance. Rupel ¹²⁸³ Ramcharan (ed.), Conference, I, p. 16.

¹²⁸⁴ Jovanovic, 'Status', p. 1725; interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

¹²⁸⁵ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 192; Zimmerman, Origins, p. 162.

¹²⁸⁶ Cf. Meier, Jugoslawien, p. 404.

¹²⁸⁷ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 195.

¹²⁸⁸ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 194.

had hit the raw Serbian nerve: Quod licet Jovi non licet bovi. In other words: what would be granted to the Serbs outside Serbia, would not apply to the Kosovo Albanians. As Rupel later recalled, following his remark the Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Jovanovic, became 'really (...) mad, that was really something I shouldn't have said. It was the end of our friendship.'¹²⁸⁹ Apparently Tudjman understood the game. At the plenary meeting of 25 October he argued for application of the special statute for minorities to be applied to all of Yugoslavia, while Milosevic wanted it to be considered as a solution sui generis for the Serbs in Croatia.¹²⁹⁰

This attitude meant not only the end of the friendship between Jovanovic and Rupel, it was also the end of the Carrington proposal and actually of the peace conference he had chaired. Three days later the 'federal' presidium in Belgrade stated that it no longer had confidence in the impartiality of the EC.¹²⁹¹ All that followed was by way of an epilogue. On 8 November Carrington would adjourn the conference, because its continuation served no purpose now that Serbia was unable to accept his plan, while in the meantime the fighting was continuing in all its intensity. The Twelve agreed and left it to Carrington to decide when the conference could be reconvened. The British chairman had rightly concluded at the start of his activities that only a comprehensive solution to the Yugoslav issue would offer a way out. At the same time this was also the problem. What was granted to one ethnic group, whether it was a form of minority protection or the right to separate, would immediately be demanded by the other groups. As long as Milosevic would not accept this consistency and the West refused to enforce it, every 'solution' would carry the seed of a following conflict. So somehow or other, the law of conservation of problems would apply in Yugoslavia at the end of the twentieth century.

After returning to Belgrade from the conference, Bulatovic was given a thorough dressing down, so that he would never again dare to let his 'ally' down. He was forced to organize a referendum in Montenegro on the question of whether this republic should remain in Yugoslavia. The answer was an overwhelming 'yes'.¹²⁹²

Selective sanctions

It was not only the coup of 3 October and Milosevic's pull-out from the Yugoslavia Conference that stirred up bad blood among the EC ministers. The heightened activities of the JNA and Serbian irregulars in Croatia did so too. The shelling of Dubrovnik and Vukovar especially made a great impression on Western public opinion, not in the least in the Netherlands.¹²⁹³ The shelling of Vukovar, ¹²⁸⁹ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 193. See also Paul L. Montgomery, 'Serb rejects plan posed by Europe', The New York Times, 26/10/91; Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 246; Libal, Limits, p. 68-69; Meier, Jugoslawien, pp. 410-411.

¹²⁹⁰ Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 140.

¹²⁹¹ Eisermann, Weg, p. 61.

¹²⁹² Silber & Little, Death, pp. 195-196.

¹²⁹³ Monnesland, Land, pp. 360-368; Both, Indifference, p. 101 and 112-113. The number of publications in the Dutch press devoted to just these two cities is overwhelming. See e.g. 'Kroatische havenstad zwaar onder vuur' ('Croatian port town under fire'), de Volkskrant, 02/10/91; "Beslissend' offensief tegen Kroatië. Joegoslavische leger bombardeert en omsingelt Dubrovnik" ('Decisive' offensive against Croatia. Yugoslav army shells and surrounds Dubrovnik'), de Volkskrant, 03/10/91; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Servië uit op toerisme-inkomsten Dubrovnik' ('Serbia out to get tourism income from Dubrovnik'), de Volkskrant, 04/10/91; 'Historisch Dubrovnik zwaar bestookt' ('Historic Dubrovnik heavily shelled'), de Volkskrant, 24/10/91; 'Leger bestookt Dubrovnik van alle kanten' ('Army shells Dubrovnik from all sides'), de Volkskrant, 11/11/91; 'EG wil waarnemers weghalen uit zwaar belegerd Dubrovnik' ('EC wants to pull observers out of beleaguered Dubrovnik'), de Volkskrant, 12/11/91; 'Evacuatie waarnemers in Dubrovnik vertraagd' ('Evacuation of observers in Dubrovnik delayed'), de Volkskrant, 13/11/91; Norman Stone, 'Serviërs zijn rijp voor nieuw 'Neurenberg'', 'Federale leger geeft veerboot toegang tot haven Dubrovnik' ('Serbs ready for new 'Neurenberg') and 'In oude Dubrovnik bloeide het humanisme' ('Humanism blossoms in old Dubrovnik'), de Volkskrant, 14/11/91; 'Geduw om plaatsje op veerboot in haven Dubrovnik' ('Jostling for a place on the ferry Dubrovnik harbour'), de Volkskrant, 15/11/91; 'Val Kroatische stad Vukovar lijkt op handen' ('Fall of Croat city of Vukovar seems imminent') and Ewoud Nysingh, 'Spookstad Vukovar symbool van heftig Kroatisch verzet' ('Ghost town Vukovar symbol of Croatian resistance'), de Volkskrant, 18/11/91; 'Aanblik oorlogsleed in Vukovar schokt VN-afgezant Vance' ('Glimpse of war suffering in Vukovar shocks envoy Vance'), de which was given the epithet of 'the Stalingrad of Croatia'¹²⁹⁴ or the 'Hiroshima of Europe',¹²⁹⁵ led again to comparisons with the conflict between David and Goliath, which Slovenia had earlier used so profitably in its PR campaign in the West.¹²⁹⁶

Even more than the attacks on Vukovar¹²⁹⁷ those starting in October on Dubrovnik, the Pearl of the Adriatic and the best preserved walled medieval city in Europe, provoked great international indignation.¹²⁹⁸ The destruction in a city that in 1979 had been given a place on the UNESCO list of monuments and was familiar to many foreign holidaymakers, led to more protest in other countries than the many human victims until then.¹²⁹⁹ The Serbian nationalists took little notice of the international criticism. If necessary they would build a more beautiful and older Dubrovnik, except that it would be renamed Niksic on Sea, according to cynical comments on the Western indignation.¹³⁰⁰

The attacks on Vukovar and Dubrovnik prompted the EC ministers to decide to abandon their neutral position on the conflict.¹³⁰¹ Carrington observed that mainly because of the attacks on Dubrovnik, the EC ministers 'were getting very short tempered'.¹³⁰² He also spoke himself of 'the distastefulness of the fuss being made about historical buildings while ignoring the usually considerable human suffering'.¹³⁰³ In a statement made on 27 October, the EC ministers said that the repeated attacks on Dubrovnik had given the lie to the assertion that the JNA only went into action to liberate

Volkskrant, 20/11/91; 'Vukovar is veranderd in een hoop stenen en stof' (Vukovar transformed into a pile of stones and dust), de Volkskrant, 21/11/91 (with photos), 'Vukovar', de Volkskrant, 30/11/91 (photos); 'Federale legertop gaf geen order tot aanval Dubrovnik' (Federal army commanders order attack on Dubrovnik), de Volkskrant, 09/12/91; Nevenka Tromp-Vrkic, 'Alle partijen zijn schuldig aan verwoesting van Dubrovnik' (All the parties to blame for destruction of Dubrovnik), de Volkskrant, 14/12/91; 'Honderden doden bij slag om Dubrovnik' (Hundreds die in battle for Dubrovnik), Trouw, 03/10/91; 'Vukovars patiënten verbleven in kelders' (Vukovar's patients have to stay in cellars), de Volkskrant, 18/12/91; "Beneden ons brandt Dubrovnik" (Below us Dubrovnik is burning), Trouw, 05/10/91; 'Honderden monumenten in puin' (Hundreds of historic buildings in ruins), Trouw, 09/10/91; 'Dubrovnik van alle kanten onder vuur; bewoners vluchten' (Dubrovnik under fire from all sides: residents flee), Trouw, 18/10/91; 'Felle strijd bij Dubrovnik' (Fierce fighting at Dubrovnik), Trouw, 21/10/91; 'Strijd op alle fronten' (Fighting on all fronts), Trouw, 24/10/91; 'EG stelt Servië nieuw ultimatum' (EC delivers Serbia new ultimatum), Trouw, 29/10/91; 'EG-waarnemers weg uit Dubrovnik' (EC observers leave Dubrovnik), Trouw, 12/11/91; 'Kroatische regering vreest wraakzucht Serviërs in Vukovar' (Croatian government fears Serbs' lust for revenge in Vukovar), Trouw, 18/11/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Na Vukovar is de haat alleen maar groter' (After Vukovar the hatred is all the greater), Trouw, 19/11/91; 'Eerste vluchtelingen uit Dubrovnik komen aan in haven Brindisi' (First Dubrovnik refugees arrive in Brindisi harbour), Trouw, 20/11/91; 'Barbarij gemeld in en om Vukovar' (Barbarism reporte in and around Vukovar), Trouw, 21/11/91; 'Kindermoord Vukovar: een verzinsel' (Murdered children in Vukovar: a fabrication), Trouw, 22/11/91; 'Dubrovnik: parel en verzetshaard' (Dubrovnik: pearl and centre of resistance), NRC Handelsblad, 24/10/91; 'Oude stad van Dubrovnik onder vuur' (Old city of Dubrovnik under fire), NRC Handelsblad, 11/11/91; 'In Vukovar heerst nog steeds geen rust' (Still no peace in Vukovar) and 'Vukovar', NRC Handelsblad, 19/11/91; 'Vukovar bestaat niet meer', 'Serviërs: Vukovar is bevrijd van fascisme' (Vukovar has been freed from fascism) and 'Vukovar', NRC Handelsblad, 22/11/91; Vukovar, NRC Handelsblad, 25/11/91 (photos); Rieke Leenders, 'De kracht van het belegerde Dubrovnik', (The strenght of besieged Dubrovnik) NRC Handelsblad, 22/11/91; 'Dubrovnik in brand na beschieting' (Dubrovnik burns after shelling), NRC Handelsblad, 07/12/91; Peter Michielsen, 'Lot van Dubrovnik extra navrant omdat het geen enkel doel dient' (Dubrovnik's fate particularly distressing because it serves no purpose), NRC Handelsblad, 09/12/91.

¹²⁹⁴Russell, Prejudice, p. 243.

¹²⁹⁵ Payam Akhavan, 'Preface', in: Akhavan and Howse (eds.), Yugoslavia, p. xxiv.

¹²⁹⁶ Cf. Tanner, Croatia, pp. 265.

¹²⁹⁷ See e.g. 'Het is onze stad, ons land' (It is our city, our country), Trouw, 21/10/91.

¹²⁹⁸ See e.g. Levinsohn, Belgrade, pp. 60; Tanner, Croatia, pp. 261-263; Russell, Prejudice, pp. 222 and 234; Confidential interview (14). The memories of it still persist. See e.g. Nell Westerlaken, 'Een geteisterde stad herleeft' (A ravaged town comes back to life), de Volkskrant, 23/09/00.

¹²⁹⁹ For biting comments on this see e.g. Almond, War, p. 228.

¹³⁰⁰ Sreten Vujovic, 'An Uneasy View of the City', Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 131-132.

¹³⁰¹ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 15.

¹³⁰² ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EG/Joegoslavië September-October 1991, Van Schaik 1036 to Van den Broek, 29/10/91.

¹³⁰³ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01233, EG/Joegoslavië, November 1991, Van Schaik 1144 to Van den Broek, 12/11/91. Cf. Russell, Prejudice, p. 241: 'The fixation of the West with Dubrovnik's old buildings, at a time when the east Slavonian town of Vukovar was being bombed literally out of existence, smacked of Western cynicism at its worst.'

besieged barracks or to protect the Serbian population.¹³⁰⁴ Less than seven per cent of the population of Dubrovnik was Serbian.¹³⁰⁵

The shelling of Dubrovnik and Vukovar led to the decision of the EC ministers eventually to send a signal to Serbia. Furthermore, after the failure of the Yugoslavia Conference, which had forced it into a more or less neutral position, the EC no longer needed to restrain itself. Spurred on by Van den Broek,¹³⁰⁶ the EC ministers agreed on 28 October at a ministerial lunch in Brussels on restrictive measures against the parties in the Yugoslav conflict who were unwilling to cooperate in its solution. This referred to Serbia and the federation, which was given until 5 November to arrive at a more positive position on the Yugoslavia Conference.

In consultation with the Committees for Foreign Affairs and Defence in parliament on 28 October, the Dutch parliament appeared to agree with the less neutral EC position. It was clear from the contributions of the parliamentary committees that an oil embargo and freezing the federal bank accounts would be approved by the Dutch parliament.¹³⁰⁷ Doubts were expressed on its feasibility. Therefore Eisma (D66) asked whether the Dutch Marine could contribute to its enforcement.¹³⁰⁸

Although there was now a prospect of a clear step against Serbia, it was actually a sign of weakness. The sanctions were a substitute for the deployment of military resources, which the EC member states were not prepared for.¹³⁰⁹ After the EC had exhausted the political and diplomatic resources, only economic weapons remained. And even then it remained to be seen to what extent the Security Council would stand behind it, in view of the attitude of China and the Soviet Union. The EC actually hoped that its sanction measures would be adopted by the Security Council.

At least, so it seemed. The shift of the centre of gravity of the involvement with Yugoslavia from the EC to the UN made it possible for France and Great Britain in particular to play a double game, however. As president of the EC, the Netherlands furthermore found itself in an awkward position through the increasing involvement of the Security Council, because it was not a member of the Council and could therefore not directly influence the decision making process. The Maastricht Treaty, which was to be concluded in December, determined that member states of the European Union who were members of the Security Council should consult with the other member states and keep them fully informed. Furthermore, they would be obliged to defend the positions adopted by the Union, albeit with observance of their responsibilities under the UN Charter.¹³¹⁰ Even after that treaty had come into effect, this stipulation was far from always adhered to.¹³¹¹ Not to mention beforehand.

On the same day that the EC ministers had taken their decision to impose sanctions, Carrington spoke in New York with the five permanent members of the Security Council. The British permanent representative David Hannay did not wish his Dutch counterpart Van Schaik to be present.¹³¹² In the next meeting of the three EC members in the Security Council - Belgium, France and the United Kingdom - Van Schaik was also not allowed to attend, this time because the French permanent representative opposed it. Furthermore, the Frenchman managed to arrange that he would be the one to inform Van Schaik of what was discussed. The French ambassador had instructions from Paris no to cooperate in the creation of a resolution on selective sanctions, while France had agreed to do so within ¹³⁰⁴ 'EG veroordeelt Joegoslavisch leger' ('EC condemns Yugoslavian army'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/10/91. See also Libal, Limits, p. 58.

¹³⁰⁵ Bennett, Collapse, p. 169.

¹³⁰⁶ Helmut Hetzel, "In zwei Monaten entscheiden wir über die Anerkennung", Die Presse, 18/10/91; Both, Indifference, p. 127-128.

¹³⁰⁷ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 15.

¹³⁰⁸ Ibid., p. 3.

¹³⁰⁹ Interview H. Van den Broek, 02/12/99.

¹³¹⁰ Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 27.

¹³¹¹ See e.g. Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 28.

¹³¹² ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Van Schaik 1036 to Van den Broek, 29/10/91.

the EC. This created the impression that double agendas were being used, but there was little that Van Schaik could do.¹³¹³

Van Schaik did succeed on 31 October in organizing a discussion of the permanent representatives of the EC with Vance. Perez de Cuellar's envoy did not create the impression at the time that he was aware of any urgency. He said that the keywords were now 'patience' and 'perseverance' and he thought that 'seven weeks of negotiation in the Yugoslav crisis, in view of the problems, could not be considered a long time'. He also felt that it could still take 'considerable time' before the JNA would realize a Greater Serbia.¹³¹⁴

On 8 November the EC announced the sanctions against Yugoslavia on which the ministers had decided in principle on 28 October. These were the suspension and cancellation of the cooperation agreement and the ECCS agreement; the reintroduction of quantitative limitations for the import of textile products; scrapping Yugoslavia from the general preferential system; and suspension of support within the framework of PHARE (Pologne Hongrie: Aide à la Restructuration Economique, to which Yugoslavia was admitted on 4 July 1990). The Security Council would be requested to investigate the possibility of an oil embargo, because Russia provided a large part of the Serbian energy requirement. It was announced that the sanction measures would later be annulled for cooperative republics.

The abandonment of the EC's neutral position in the conflict was to have significant implications. Making a distinction between the constituent republics against which sanctions were and were not imposed would mean the de facto recognition of the separate constituent republics.¹³¹⁵ It was effectively the EC taking leave of Yugoslavia as an entity. As the Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Samaras said: 'We are pronouncing the patient dead before he has died!'¹³¹⁶

On 2 December the distinction between the republics became a fact when the EC, on the advice of the Dutch presidency, took 'positive compensating measures' for the sanctions towards the 'cooperative' republics Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia. The sanctions were otherwise mainly a political signal. Little effect was to be expected in the short term. Serbia was already fairly economically self-sufficient in 1991, and there were record grain and potato harvests in that year in the republic. The European Council of Ministers also expressly commented that the distinction in the sanctions 'in no way prejudged the recognition of republics'.¹³¹⁷ Like the EC, Washington announced sanctions, albeit not selective, but against all republics.

Peace after Vukovar

In the weekend of 9 and 10 November 1991, the rump presidium in Belgrade and Tudjman requested the UN to provide a peace-keeping force. Milosevic had prepared the letter containing this request in the greatest secrecy with Jovic and Branko Kostic, the Montenegrin chairman of the rump presidium. To prevent obstruction by the Croatian permanent representative of Yugoslavia, Darko Silovic, to the UN, use was even made of the unconventional method of sending the letter through the Romanian ambassador to the United Nations.¹³¹⁸ What were the reasons for the leaders in both Belgrade and Zagreb to take this step? First Belgrade. On 8 November, the international community finally seemed to have taken the two steps to which the Serbian president had proved to be sensitive between 1991 and 1995: a threat of sanctions and a possible American military intervention.

¹³¹³ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232, EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Van Schaik 1049 to Van den Broek, 31/10/91.

¹³¹⁴ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01233, EG/Joegoslavië, November 1991, Van Schaik 1069 to Van den Broek, 01/11/91.

¹³¹⁵ This consequence was also raised for discussion in the Dutch Ministerial Council, objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting, 25/10/91. Cf. Maarten Lak, 'The involvement of the European Community in the Yugoslav crisis during 1991', in: Van den Heuvel/Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 180.

¹³¹⁶ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01233, EC/Yugoslavia, November 1991, Nieman 298 to Van den Broek, 05/11/91.

¹³¹⁷ Eisermann, Weg, p. 70.

¹³¹⁸ Jovic, Dani, p. 408. See also Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 487.

It was often said that sanctions would not harm Milosevic. An argument put forward was that the Serbian president and his supporters would feel nothing personally, and on the contrary they would actually be better off because of smuggling. Furthermore, there would often be huge flaws in the implementation of the sanctions by the international community. And finally sanctions would only strengthen the Serbs in their nationalism and make them rally behind the great leader Milosevic.¹³¹⁹

All this may contain a kernel of truth, but Milosevic himself thought otherwise. Besides nationalistically motivated voters, his electoral support consisted largely of people who had voted for him because he promised not to erode the communist facilities that they profited from: civil servants, soldiers, pensioners, officials who were sensitive to his promise that they could not be fired, etc.¹³²⁰ As will be evident on other occasions, Milosevic feared that sanctions might erode his electoral basis and encourage social unrest.¹³²¹ It has already been seen that the war in Croatia was certainly less popular in Serbia than was supposed in other countries. In any case, the JNA had great difficulty filling its units. The Serbian economy was in a very poor state. After the economic and financial problems of the 1980s, the Serbian economy was heavily hit by the effective collapse of Yugoslavia. According to some, Milosevic had started the war against Croatia partly to divert attention from the economic problems of Serbia, for which he had no solution.¹³²² The war had sapped the Serbian economy even more, however.

By the end of October the waiting times at petrol stations in Belgrade had risen to four hours as a consequence of the suspension of the oil supply by the Croatian authorities.¹³²³ There were rumours that petrol would soon be rationed. With the prospect of winter, hardship loomed. It was not for nothing that Milosevic organized elections in these years - in 1990, 1992 and 1993 - always in December, shortly before the winter, so that the people would not yet discount the problems with the heating in their voting behaviour.¹³²⁴ Milosevic's wife Mira Markovic wrote at the end of 1993 that the winter in recent years in Yugoslavia was not simply a meteorological phenomenon, but, as she called it, also a social phenomenon.¹³²⁵ A political phenomenon would have been a more satisfactory description. Furthermore, despite Greater-Serbian ideas, there was a traditional arrogance among the Serbs towards the Serbs outside Serbia, who were known as the prečani,¹³²⁶ which was fuelled during the wars in Croatia and Bosnia. The assistance to the Serbian 'brothers' and the flow of Serbian Displaced Persons, first from Croatia and later from Bosnia, implied a heavy burden on the economy of Serbia, as Mira Markovic would not tire of writing in her published diaries.¹³²⁷ The question was how long the population of Serbia would be prepared to make sacrifices and - as a consequence of sanctions - take even heavier sacrifices into the bargain.¹³²⁸

The EC's decision to impose sanctions on 8 November came unexpectedly for Milosevic. Even after the first reports of possible selective sanctions by the EC, he incorrectly continued to assume that such restrictive measures could be imposed only through the UN. Should the EC wish to persist, he ¹³¹⁹ See e.g. Henk Hirs, 'Servië vreest isolement niet' ('Serbia not afraid of isolation'), Trouw, 05/08/91; 'Weinig kans op succesvolle boycot van EG tegen Servië' ('Little chance of a successful EC boycott of Serbia'), de Volkskrant, 07/11/91; Peter Michielsen, 'Mislukking vredesoverleg ligt ook aan EG' ('EC also to blame for failure of peace talks'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/11/91; 'Wanhoopsdaad' ('Act of despair'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/11/91; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 157.

¹³²⁰ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 174; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

¹³²¹ For Milosevic's already existing fear that the workers would turn their backs on him see Jovic, Dani, p. 130 (25/03/90).

¹³²² Cf. Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 54.

¹³²³ Nicole Lucas, 'Serviërs vrezen koude winter. Oliekort kan generaals dwingen tot onderhandelen' ('Serbs fear severe winter. Oil shortage could force generals to negotiate'), Trouw, 23/10/91.

¹³²⁴ Cf. Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 134.

¹³²⁵ Markovic, Night, p. 141 (13/11/93).

¹³²⁶ Cohen, Hearts, p. 296.

¹³²⁷ Mira Markovic did so in her diaries published between December 1992 and July 1994 in the fortnightly magazine Duga. They were later published under the title Noc i dan. This book appeared in an English translation as Night & Day. A Diary, December 1992-July 1994. Reference will be made to the English translation below. Night, pp. 56 (04/05/93), 74 (14/06/93), 75 (18/06/93), 96 (05/08/93), 108 (02/09/93), 114 (11/09/93), 119-120 (27/09/93).

¹³²⁸ Cf. Henk Hirs, 'Vredesbeweging in Belgrado machteloos' ('Belgrade peace movement powerless'), Trouw, 28/11/91.

was counting on the orthodox Greece to act within the EC for its 'brother' Serbia and block any negative economic steps that might be proposed. Milosevic had made a serious miscalculation. Even worse, after the EC had announced the sanctions, signals came that three other assumed supporters of Serbia, namely the Soviet Union, China and Romania, would not oppose UN sanctions. The invitation from Belgrade to the UN to send in Blue Helmets was partly an attempt to avoid the imposition of at least these sanctions.¹³²⁹

A second explanation for the willingness to end the war lay in the almost paranoid attitude of the JNA command, in particular Kadijevic, towards the West. This attitude of JNA general mostly gave the international community great problems. This time Kadijevic's distrust worked to the benefit of UN envoy Vance. After the failure of the peace conference in The Hague, and therefore the increased probability of international recognition of Croatia, the political and military command in Belgrade took account of an internationalization of the conflict.¹³³⁰ In view of the developments in the Soviet Union itself, the JNA could not expect help from Moscow in such an eventuality. The JNA command thought it had little to fear from the European powers. They rightly concluded that the WEU was not in a position to take a hard line. The JNA analysis was that it would be different if the United States was to come to their assistance.¹³³¹ The American military action in the Gulf War had made a deep impression on the Serbs.¹³³² And on each occasion during the conflicts in the first half of the 1990s, a credible threat of an American intervention would move the Serbian leaders in Belgrade to an accommodating attitude.¹³³³

A NATO summit took place in Rome on 8 November at which the Alliance's Strategic Concept was adopted. This strategy assumed that it could no longer be predicted, as it could during the Cold War, where the security threat for the alliance came from. The risks were 'multi-faceted in nature and multi-directional, which makes them hard to predict and assess'.¹³³⁴ One month later, the North Atlantic Cooperation Council was set up, which made clear that the NATO had reserved a task for itself in maintaining European security out-of-area. However, NATO was not yet ready for intervention in Yugoslavia. A few days before the meeting in Rome, the Secretary-General of the alliance, Manfred Wörner, had said that it was by no means certain whether his organization ever should or could intervene in internal conflicts.¹³³⁵ In Rome, the NATO therefore restricted itself to applauding the efforts of the EC, CSCE and NATO.¹³³⁶

However, the wrong impression was created in leadership circles in Belgrade as if the Rapid Reaction Force that was discussed on 8 November at the Rome summit was associated with a shady NATO plan to intervene in Yugoslavia.¹³³⁷ Kadijevic in particular deduced from reports of an emphasis at the NATO summit that force projection would be more important than territorial defence in future alliance strategy, that NATO was already in the process of preparing such a military intervention.¹³³⁸

The JNA's enthusiasm for the war in Croatia had considerably cooled in the meantime because of the long time required to seize Vukovar. The JNA had achieved less than expected militarily. There were rumours of corruption, nepotism and incompetence in the army. The morale within the JNA had plummeted so far and the scale of desertion and mutiny was so considerable that November 1991 was ¹³²⁹ABZ, DEU/ARA/00408. Fietelaars 412 to Van den Broek, 12/11/91.

¹³³⁰ See e.g. Jovic cited in Silber & Little, Death, p. 197.

¹³³¹ Ramet, Babel, p. 244.

¹³³² Fouad Ajami, Beyond Words, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 152.

¹³³³Cf. Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 160.

¹³³⁴ Cited in Shaw, Germany, p. 14.

¹³³⁵Zeitler, Rolle, p. 155.

¹³³⁶ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 12, p. 3.

¹³³⁷ Zametica, Conflict, p. 65.

¹³³⁸ Gompert, 'Serbia', p. 36 n. 1; David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, p. 144 n. 8.

deemed to be the most critical month in the existence of the Yugoslav army.¹³³⁹ Various operations had to be cancelled in that month because of morale problems.¹³⁴⁰ In those days, reservists in Belgrade demanded recognition that they were being sent into a war as opposed to, as the official line claimed, 'on exercise'. Furthermore they demanded guarantees that they would be relieved at the front.¹³⁴¹ Reservists in Cacak shot at police troops from Belgrade when they arrived to collect them, after which the police fell back.¹³⁴² A survey held at the beginning of December, proved that sixty per cent of the Serbs wanted peace in the first place.¹³⁴³ In December, the Serbian government found itself forced by personnel shortages to scrap the 45 day maximum duration of consecutive service at the front for reservists, which was introduced to reduce resistance to service. After that, reservists were required to serve for six months at the front.¹³⁴⁴

During the war in Croatia, the division between the political (Milosevic and Jovic) and the military (Kadijevic and Adzic) command in Belgrade persisted. It irritated the political leaders greatly that the JNA had such difficulty in moving away from the option of all-out war in Croatia. The army command was harming the international position of Serbia in this way. Furthermore, because the JNA did not withdraw immediately at the start of the conflict in the 'Serbian' parts of Croatia, much military equipment fell into Croatian hands during the barracks war. The political leaders accused Kadijevic of losing the war because he had not transformed the army in good time into a pure Serbian organization, so that there were now so many morale problems. Kadijevic thought that the political leadership put insufficient force behind the mobilization.¹³⁴⁵ In late October, Jovic and Milosevic started to have enough of Kadijevic's attitude. In their eyes Kadijevic was increasingly reproaching the politicians, while he military accomplished little.¹³⁴⁶ Kadijevic, who had never been a decisive officer, appeared to collapse psychologically under the pressure of the war in Croatia.¹³⁴⁷ An attempt by Milosevic and Jovic to sideline Kadijevic and replace him with Adjutant Colonel Vuk Obradovic stranded because of resistance from Adzic, however.¹³⁴⁸ Attempts by Mira Markovic to push Kadijevic aside with a coup had equally little success.¹³⁴⁹ On 25 October, matters developed into a violent quarrel between Kadijevic and Adzic on the one hand and Milosevic and Jovic on the other, in which Kadijevic threatened to set the army on the two political leaders if it received no more reservists. Jovic said that if Kadijevic no longer accepted the high command he had better go home.¹³⁵⁰ On 2 November, Jovic discussed with Milosevic that continuation of the war would lead increasingly to large-scale mobilizations in Serbia, which would be 'completely counterproductive to our policy'.¹³⁵¹ On 30 October, Milosevic blocked a plan of Kadijevic to attempt to liberate the barracks in Croatia by overwhelming force.¹³⁵² Kadijevic and Adzic finally got Milosevic's message. They were neither able nor ¹³³⁹Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 140. On the increasing problems of the JNA see also Ewoud Nysingh, 'Joegoslavisch leger kan oorlog niet beslissen' ('Yugoslavian army cannot determine outcome of war'), de Volkskrant, 26/10/91.

¹³⁴⁰ Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 78.

¹³⁴¹ Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis - an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 339.

¹³⁴² Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis - an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 339.

¹³⁴³ 'Kroatië en Servië ruilen gevangenen uit', ('Croatia and Serbia exchange prisoners'), de Volkskrant 11/12/91. For similar surveys see Ofelija Backovic & Milos Vasic & Aleksandar Vasovic, 'Who Wants to be a Soldier? The call-up crisis - an analytical overview of media reports', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 339.

¹³⁴⁴ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Kabinet Servië valt na interne ruzie' ('Serbian government falls after internal quarrel'), de Volkskrant, 13/12/91.

¹³⁴⁵ Cf. Jovic, Dani, pp. 385-387 and 402.

¹³⁴⁶ Jovic, Dani, pp. 392 and 401-402.

¹³⁴⁷ Mamula, Slucaj, p. 216; Jovic, Dani, p. 387.

¹³⁴⁸ Mamula, Slucaj, p. 215.

¹³⁴⁹ Mamula, Slucaj, pp. 224-227; Brey, Logik, pp. 121-122.

¹³⁵⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 403.

¹³⁵¹ Jovic, Dani, p. 407.

¹³⁵² Jovic, Dani, p. 407.

permitted to win the war against Croatia. On 22 October and again on 7 November, Kadijevic wrote to the state presidium that it was time to take the plunge on the desired geographical borders of the new Yugoslavia.¹³⁵³

While the JNA had to contend with considerable personnel and political problems, the Croatian National Guard, which started as a sort of gendarmerie but had developed into an army, grew vigorously. Whereas the guard had only four brigades at the start of the war, in October there were already 35.¹³⁵⁴ And they continued to expand. At the start of 1992, the Croatian army would have two-hundred thousand men, or 4.8 per cent of the Croatian population, in, by that time, 64 brigades.¹³⁵⁵

The guard was also becoming ever better equipped because of the equipment that had fallen into Croatian hands thanks to the siege of the JNA barracks. Kadijevic had considerable problems, not only with the loss of equipment, but also with the fact that approximately thirty thousand JNA soldiers were confined to their barracks as a consequence of Croatian blockades.¹³⁵⁶

According to the Dutch ambassador in Belgrade, Fietelaars, the Greater-Serbian ambitions as a consequence of the military setback in November 1991 had meanwhile been reduced to 'a Serbia-Minor of unexpectedly minimal dimensions and even less prosperity'.¹³⁵⁷

That 'Serbia-Minor' should at least include the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina, according to Belgrade. After the Croatian and Muslim representatives had accepted a declaration of sovereignty in the Bosnian parliament on 15 October, the Bosnian Serbs made an appeal to Belgrade for protection. On 9 and 10 November they voted in a referendum against the sovereignty of Bosnia. In the four wars that Milosevic conducted with parts of (former) Yugoslavia at the end of the twentieth century, he always made sure that he never had more than one opponent at a time. Now that a conflict over Bosnia-Herzegovina was on the horizon, it was time to end the war in Croatia.

A similar consideration applied to the other great nationalist of the former Yugoslavia: President Tudjman of Croatia. He also made claims on parts of Bosnia. Between 15 October and 12 November Bosnian-Croatian nationalists held three meetings with the knowledge of the authorities in Zagreb, which resulted in the decision that Croatia should realize its 'age-old dream' of a Greater Croatia. Tudjman also therefore needed to free troops and weapons. However, this was not possible as long as the war in Croatia itself continued. The Croatian commander, General Anton Tus, could at the time not even free up additional weapons for the heavily beleaguered Vukovar.

The months of Serbian siege had in the meantime given Vukovar a significance that was out of proportion. It would have been much better militarily for the JNA to have gone around the city. Now it had brought the offensive in the direction of Zagreb to a standstill. Milosevic and the JNA could not end the war in Croatia without considerable loss of face if Vukovar was not taken. Tudjman must also have understood that. Observers do not rule out that a silent pact existed between Tudjman and Milosevic that the fall of the city was a condition for a ceasefire.¹³⁵⁸

On 12 November, the EC Ministers of Foreign Affairs decided to request the Security Council to consider the idea of a UN peacekeeping force, which was put forward several days earlier by Milosevic and Tudjman. Meanwhile, the EC dispatched Carrington to Yugoslavia to assess the chances of an agreement.

Shortly after receiving signals from Belgrade and Zagreb on the willingness to accept a UN peace mission, Vance also left for Yugoslavia accompanied by Sir Murrack I. Goulding, the UN Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, to investigate the possibilities of a UN operation. On 16 November Vance and Goulding flew first to the Netherlands. They spoke there with ¹³⁵³ Kadijevic, Vien, p. 141-143.

¹³⁵⁴ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 187.

¹³⁵⁵ Ozren Zunec, 'Democracy in the 'Fog of War': Civil Military Relations in Croatia', in: Danopoulos & Zirker (eds.), Relations, p. '220.

¹³⁵⁶ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 160; Wijnaendts, Kroniek, pp. 101, 124-125 and 142.

¹³⁵⁷ ABZ, DIE/ARA/01233, EC/Joegoslavië, November 1991, Fietelaars 406 to Van den Broek, 03/11/91.

¹³⁵⁸ Tanner, Croatia, pp. 266 and 268.

Van den Broek, who told them that he thought that a peace operation was necessary. They then flew on to Belgrade. Various events made them realize that they should have no illusions about the nature of the conflict. The two UN diplomats arrived on 19 November, as Vukovar was falling.

The three-month siege of Vukovar was one of the clearest illustrations that perhaps both parties were lashing out in the Serbian-Croatian conflict, but that there was one, the Serbs, who struck the hardest. As the Montenegrin Major Veselin Sljivancanin, commander of the military police of the mechanized guard, said: 'And if they fire as much as a single shot, we strike back hard.'¹³⁵⁹ It made an indelible impression on the outside world that the Serbian mayor of Vukovar, Slavko Dokmanovic, and Major Sljivancanin granted Cyrus Vance and the International Red Cross no access to the hospital. 261 patients and medical personnel were later taken away in buses 'for questioning' and - as was to be revealed only in the autumn of 1992 - executed in the nearby village of Ovcara.¹³⁶⁰ Seselj was also ordered to execute wounded people after the fall of the city. According to a Serbian security officer in Vukovar, this instruction came from 'a particularly popular politician', which was an implied reference to Milosevic.¹³⁶¹ In total, 2642 Croats lost their lives in the siege of Vukovar and in the days following its capture.¹³⁶²

The exact scale of the tragedy of Vukovar was not yet clear to them, but Vance and Goulding could at least suspect that serious events were taking place there at the time of their visit to Yugoslavia. Shortly after their arrival, the British Undersecretary-General of the UN met a JNA officer whom he had known as a military observer in the war between Iraq and Iran in 1988, and whom he had gained great respect for at the time. When the soldier told Goulding that the Yugoslav army was supposed to be using flame-throwers to flush 'the rats' from the cellars of Vukovar, Goulding immediately had an impression of the problems that could be expected in a peace operation in Yugoslavia.¹³⁶³ The Serbian refusal to allow Vance and Goulding to visit the hospital in, the since then captured, Vukovar, confirmed the impression of a particularly dirty war.

Meanwhile, the position of Vance and Goulding went down well with Milosevic. They left open the possibility that UN troops would not be stationed along the border between Croatia and Serbia but along the existing front lines, so that the UN would in fact be preserving the status quo. In other words: The Croatian areas occupied by the Serbs would not have to be surrendered.

In this way, the UN was offering Milosevic more than he had bargained for. The Serbian president was, as was already apparent at the beginning of October in The Hague, prepared if necessary to give up the Serbs in Croatia in order to normalize relations with Croatia.¹³⁶⁴ He would then content himself with the rump Yugoslavia, consisting of Serbia, Montenegro and (parts of) Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia. One month later, in early November, Milosevic attempted to persuade the Krajina Serbs to accept a special status for their communities within Croatia. In so doing, Milosevic was no longer supporting territorial claims of the Serbs in Croatia. The Serbs in Croatia, whom he and his supporters had first stirred up to fight, were now suddenly told that they effectively had to rely on their own resources.¹³⁶⁵ ¹³⁵⁹ Nicole Lucas, 'Om half twee klinkt het eerste schot', Trouw, 10/10/91.

¹³⁶⁰ As an appendix to a report of 19 January 1993 in response to the exposure of a mass grave near Vukovar, Physicians for Human Rights attached a list containing 294 names of missing persons from the hospital and the surroundings, United Nations, S/25274, Appendix II, Appendix D; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 194. See also Dusko Doder, 'Red Cross caught in Yugoslavia crossfire', The Toronto Star, 04/12/91; Blaine Harden, 'Serbs Accused of '91 Croatia Massacre', The Washington Post, 26/01/93; 'Massacre in Vukovar', The Guardian, 26/01/93; Roger Cohen, 'Tribunal indicts 3 Serbia Officers', The New York Times, 10/11/95.

¹³⁶¹ Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, IV.A.

¹³⁶² Tanner, Croatia, p. 278.

¹³⁶³ Shawcross, Evil, pp. 62-63.

¹³⁶⁴ Cf. Obrad Kestic, 'Defeating 'Greater Serbia', Building Greater Milosevic', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, p. 61.

¹³⁶⁵ 'Servië bereid tot concessies om overleg te redder. Druk op Serviërs in Kroatië ('Pressure on Serbs in Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/11/91; 'Serbia: geen afscheiding minderheden' ('Serbia: no separation of minorities'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/11/91; 'President laat Servische minderheden in de steek' ('President leaves Serbian minority in the lurch') and Ulrike

There are other indications that the Serbs in Krajina and the attempt to conquer the Serbian regions in Croatia were 'a relative sideshow' for Milosevic.¹³⁶⁶ At the end of February 1991, Mesic observed to Milosevic's assistant Jovic that he did not understand the Serbian leadership's policy in Belgrade with regard to the Serbs in Croatia. According to Mesic, this issue could only be solved at the negotiating table, because the ratio of Serbs in Croatia to Croats was one to nine. Mesic said to Jovic that Serbian policy only made sense to him if Belgrade wished to appropriate a piece of Croatian territory. Jovic then answered Mesic that the Serbian leadership in Belgrade was completely uninterested in the Croatian Serbs. What Milosevic and his supporters actually wanted was two-thirds of the territory of Bosnia-Hercegovina.¹³⁶⁷ The captured Serbian area in Croatia served Milosevic only as a pawn with which he could assure himself of Tudjman's complicity in laying his hands on areas in Bosnia-Hercegovina.¹³⁶⁸ Tudjman himself said this in so many words to Vance in mid October:

'In a tête-à-tête conversation with Vance, Tudjman stated clearly that he had reached a verbal accommodation with Milosevic under which Croatia would receive satisfaction in regard to the areas of Croatia most heavily populated by Serbs (the Krajina and eastern Slavonia), meaning that Serbia would not seek territorial adjustments there. In return, Tudjman would support Milosevic in the latter's efforts to secure satisfaction in regard to the more heavily populated Serb-populated areas in Bosnia-Hercegovina... Tudjman said that Bosnia-Hercegovina could be persuaded - that he, in fact, had already discussed it with Izetbegovic.'¹³⁶⁹

Milosevic was aware of Tudjman's personal ambitions for a Greater Croatia from their earlier discussions. However, he had to be sure that the Croatian president would actually take part of the blame for the attack on the integrity of Bosnia-Hercegovina.

As it happens, the Serbian capture of Vukovar may have strengthened Tudjman's intentions. After the fall of the city, a wave of criticism of Tudjman broke out among Croats. He was accused of consciously abandoning Vukovar, where his party did not have a large following.¹³⁷⁰ After half a year of conflict, Croatia had 6651 dead and almost fourteen thousand missing persons.¹³⁷¹ 35 cities and villages had been virtually flattened. More than two-hundred thousand houses had been destroyed, about twelve per cent of the Croatian housing stock. Approximately 605,000 people had left hearth and home. Of these, 324,000 remained in Croatia; Bosnia and Serbia each received one hundred thousand, and sixty thousand ended up in Vojvodina.¹³⁷² Forty per cent of Croatian industry had been destroyed. More than a quarter of Croatian territory was in the hands of the Serbs, mainly the regions of Knin, Banija and West and East Slavonia. Together they formed the area that on 19 December 1991 would be declared the Republika Krajina, a republic that tolerated only Serbs in its territory. Tudjman therefore needed a success somewhere else.

On 2 January 1992, when the suspension of hostilities in Croatia went into effect, Milosevic confided in Tudjman that for him the Serbian issue in Croatia was indeed a problem of a minority, not a territorial issue. One week later, on 9 January, Milosevic even promised Tudjman that he would give Rudberg, 'Milosevic zaait tweedracht en oogst eenheid' (Milosevic sows discord and reaps unity), de Volkskrant, 02/11/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Ommezwaai Slobodan Milosevic: knieval of afleidingsmanoeuvre?' ('U-turn Slobodan Milosevic: a gesture of humility or a diversionary tactic?'), Trouw, 05/11/91; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 89.

¹³⁶⁶ Cohen, Serpent, p. 144.

¹³⁶⁷ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 126; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 82.

¹³⁶⁸ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 175.

¹³⁶⁹ Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 483.

¹³⁷⁰ Russell, Prejudice, p. 248; Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 77.

¹³⁷¹ Tanner, Croatia, p. 278.

¹³⁷² Weiss & Pasic, UNHCR, p. 44; Tanner, Croatia, p. 278; Bell-Fialkoff, Cleansing, p. 46.

up all the Croatian territory on the condition that the Croatian president was prepared to start a war in Bosnia-Hercegovina together with him.¹³⁷³

Stationing Blue Helmets along the front line in Croatia therefore suited Milosevic very well. It camouflaged his lack of interest in the area to the Serbs and it kept Tudjman under pressure. In the meantime, Milosevic could hope for a long-term impasse in Croatia, like the one in Cyprus, where UN soldiers had been stationed along the front line since 1964. Or he could hope for a plebiscite after a number of years had passed.¹³⁷⁴

At the same time, Milosevic would be able to present himself to the West as an apostle of peace by accepting Blue Helmets in the face of resistance from his Croatian Serbs, who felt betrayed, and resistance from maniacal opposition leaders in Belgrade, such as Seselj, who warned the West that if they were to intervene: '... tens of thousands of Western soldiers will perish. It will be all-out war, a war without mercy ... We will poison their food, we will poison their water. There will be no means that we will shun to oppose Western intervention.'¹³⁷⁵

After the fall of Vukovar, Milosevic had no further reason to oppose stationing a peacekeeping force in Croatia. A section of the JNA officers thought otherwise. As at the time of the end of the war in Slovenia, there were still officers who had difficulty accepting that the conflict was over. For example, General Zivota Panic, who had been responsible for the operation against the city, wanted to advance rapidly along the line of march to Zagreb set out by the JNA command in the summer of 1991. His orders were that he should capture Osijek as soon as Vukovar had fallen. He said later that in his opinion it would have been possible to be in Zagreb within two days of the fall of Vukovar. However, he was restrained by a personal order from Milosevic, who told him that it was not the intention to capture all of Croatia, but only the Serbian regions.¹³⁷⁶ Milosevic had the JNA leadership on his side. They were by then prepared to content themselves with achieving the more limited objective: occupying more than one quarter of Croatian territory. It was better to stop now that the JNA had provisionally made the maximum gain.

A pause for breath was also welcome for the Croats. The fact was that they would not be able to drive the Serbs out of their territory for the time being. The Croatian army may have proved themselves capable of attacking actions in West Slavonia in the autumn of 1991,¹³⁷⁷ but to launch a larger counteroffensive, the Croatian armed forces needed more mobility. The hastily formed armed forces could be modernized during a long-term pause in hostilities. Furthermore, it would be difficult for Zagreb to counterattack as long as the most important connecting roads (Zagreb-Karlovac-Rijeka; Zagreb-Karlovac-Zadar-Split-Dubrovnik; and Zagreb-Nova Gradiska-Vinkovci-Osijek) were constantly within range of Serbian firepower.

In brief, the time was ripe for stationing Blue Helmets. On 23 November in Geneva, Vance achieved a suspension of hostilities with Milosevic, Tudjman and Kadijevic. Croatia would immediately lift the blockades of JNA barracks and the JNA would withdraw all its units and equipment from Croatia. The ceasefire was soon violated, however. Nevertheless, in the coming weeks preparations continued for the dispatch of a peacekeeping force. On 27 November the Security Council in Resolution 721 undertook to take the necessary decisions as soon as Perez de Cuellar came with proposals for a peace operation in Yugoslavia.

¹³⁷³Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 223. See also Zimmerman, Origins, p. 183, who writes that Milosevic and Tudjman again discussed the division of Bosnia-Hercegovina in Brussels at the beginning of January 1992.

¹³⁷⁴interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01. The chairman of the Serbian Renewal Movement, opposition leader Vuk Draskovic, also proposed such a referendum at the end of November to a member of the Dutch embassy staff, ABZ, DEU/ARA, 26/11/91. And later Cosic's foreign affairs adviser, Svetozr Stojanovic, would also propose the same in an interview with Borba, 28-30 November 1992, cited in Stojanovic, Fall, p. 101.

¹³⁷⁵ Gwynne Dyer, 'How will it end in Yugoslavia?', The Washington Times, 17/11/91.

¹³⁷⁶ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 186-187. See also Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 191.

¹³⁷⁷ See e.g. Theo Engelen, 'Strijd laait hoog op in alle omstreden gebieden in Kroatië' ('Combat flares up in all disputed areas in Croatia'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/11/91.

On 2 January 1992 Vance would achieve a ceasefire in Croatia that this time would last. It would lead to the dispatch of an extensive UN peacekeeping force to the area. Vance's plan was seen by many as one of the few successes of international diplomacy in the former Yugoslavia in the 1990s.¹³⁷⁸ It will be clear from the above, however, that it was mainly the combatants themselves who had decided that a ceasefire was to their advantage. It was necessary not only to silence the weapons in Croatia, but at the same time to prepare for the following conflict, which would take place in Bosnia.

Meanwhile the fall of Vukovar provoked great emotion among Dutch policy makers. According to Both, in the eyes of senior Dutch Foreign Affairs officials, precisely this would move the Yugoslav crisis from a political to a moral level.¹³⁷⁹ Van Walsum drafted a memo for Van den Broek on 19 November, which unambiguously urged abandoning the policy of even-handedness, because otherwise the Netherlands would be overcommitted to the Serbian conquests.¹³⁸⁰

But the public in the Netherlands were not yet shown the worst pictures of Vukovar. For example, Othon Zimmermann, Algemeen Dagblad correspondent, took photos in Vukovar of piles of bodies. They were not printed in the newspaper.¹³⁸¹

On 21 November, the Dutch parliament held the first open debate on the situation in Yugoslavia. That took place at the request of VVD member of parliament Blaauw, who was responding to public statements of Minister Ter Beek that the Netherlands had a battalion of between 500 to 800 men ready for a UN operation. The announcements surprised Parliament. Blaauw demanded an emergency debate.¹³⁸² The members of parliament Van Traa, who reproached Blaauw for placing too much emphasis on emotion,¹³⁸³ and De Kok did not greatly appreciate the VVD member's initiative. They would have preferred to have the debate one week later, when Vance's findings with respect to the possibilities of stationing a peacekeeping force would have been known.¹³⁸⁴ The pictures of Vukovar, however, had made an impression on Blaauw, and not only on him. The liberal member of parliament compared them with West Beirut and Dresden. If this is how a city was treated, he found it difficult to speak of an internal conflict. 'Whose interior might that be?'¹³⁸⁵ He also had difficulty with the term civil war. 'This is total violence against Croats.'¹³⁸⁶ According to him it was a case of 'ordinary war between peoples'.¹³⁸⁷ The federal state of Yugoslavia had actually ceased to exist after the federal structure had been taken over entirely by Serbia.¹³⁸⁸ Van Traa did not agree with him. He felt that the fierceness of the conflict arose from the fact that it was a civil war.¹³⁸⁹ Leerling (RPF) also spoke of a civil war.¹³⁹⁰

The question of the nature of the war was partly determined by the matter of the recognition of the independence of republics that wished to separate themselves from Yugoslavia. In view of their proclamations of independence of June 1991, the first candidates for such recognition were Croatia and Slovenia, but Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina were also heading increasingly in that direction.

¹³⁷⁸ See e.g. Bertram, 'Diplomacy', p. 70.

¹³⁷⁹ Both, Indifference, p. 129 and 138.

¹³⁸⁰ Leonard Ornstein, 'Het stratego van de experts' ('The strategy of the experts'), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, pp. 12-13.

¹³⁸¹ Interview Othon Zimmermann, 28/04/00.

¹³⁸² Radio 1, VOO, Nieuwsradio, 19/11/91, 17.05 hours.

¹³⁸³ TK, 1991-1992, Proceedings, p. 1643.

¹³⁸⁴ Ibid., pp. 1643-1644.

¹³⁸⁵ TK, 1991-1992, Proceedings, p. 1640.

¹³⁸⁶ Ibid., p. 1640

¹³⁸⁷ Ibid., p. 1641.

¹³⁸⁸ Ibid. p. 1641.

¹³⁸⁹ Ibid. p. 1641.

¹³⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 1643.

Chapter 3

Recognition of Croatia and Slovenia and the significance of that for Bosnia

1. After Rome, an independent German initiative after all?

The crucial meetings of the European Community and NATO in Rome on 8 November 1991 resulted in more than a decision by the EC to impose selective sanctions and create a new strategy for the Atlantic alliance. This special EC meeting also significantly brought to the fore the issue of recognizing the independence of Croatia and Slovenia. Within the European Community, Germany had again and again pressed emphatically for recognition. In the meantime, one month had passed since Van den Broek had promised that recognition – a possible outcome of a successful International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia – would follow within two months.

After Carrington had adjourned the conference on 8 November for an indefinite period, Kohl and Genscher thought it necessary to ensure that the EC continue to pursue the course of recognition they considered to be the right one. However, they were only partially successful with their EC colleagues. In a joint declaration, the European politicians stated that recognition of republics could only be taken into consideration within the framework of a comprehensive political settlement that also embraced guarantees with regard to human rights and rights of minorities.¹³⁹¹

This position had come about mainly because the US opposed recognition without a comprehensive settlement, for two reasons, the first being the risk that the conflict might spread to Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo and Macedonia, and the second, the precedent this might set for the Soviet republics.¹³⁹² However, after Carrington's suspension of the Yugoslavia conference, a comprehensive political settlement of this nature seemed further away than ever. At a press conference after the meetings in Rome, Kohl declared that time was running out: 'It's about blood and suffering, with each day the conflict continues, more lives will be lost.' Moreover, according to the German government, further delay only served to reward Serb aggression. If no breakthrough had been made in the talks on the Yugoslav crisis by the end of the year, Bonn would recognize Croatia and Slovenia. Kohl and Genscher announced that they would invite the presidents of both republics to Bonn to conduct bilateral talks in preparation of recognition.¹³⁹³ The Bonn government was particularly interested in seeing the protection of minorities regulated by law so that the EC partners would no longer have to take exception to regulations that discriminated Serbs residing there.¹³⁹⁴

Despite Kohl's clarion calls, Bonn still considered it of prime importance to bring about a decision on recognition in a European context. Bonn did not want to upset relations, especially not with the government in Paris. Kohl and Mitterrand met up on 15 November, a week after the meetings in Rome. The Federal Chancellor informed the French head of state that his government would, by hook or by crook, move to recognize Croatia and Slovenia. In the light of public opinion in Germany, he felt that he had no choice. Mitterrand was clearly unhappy with Kohl's decision, but realized that the Chancellor was not to be deterred. As such, the French President did not go beyond insisting on a joint decision by the Twelve on recognition and on guarantees that the borders of the republics be legitimized and the rights of minorities respected.¹³⁹⁵

¹³⁹¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286. COREU from the Dutch EC presidency, 08/11/91, cpe/pres/hag 1410.

¹³⁹² ABZ, DIE/ARA/01232. EC/Yugoslavia September-October 1991, Meesman 1074 to Van den Broek, 24/10/91.

¹³⁹³ 'Bonn wil snel resultaten in Joegoslavië. Dreigement met erkenning' (Bonn wants fast results in Yugoslavia. Threat plus recognition), NRC Handelsblad, 09/11/91; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 142.

¹³⁹⁴ Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 961-962; Libal, Limits, pp. 79-80; Zeitler, Rolle, pp. 143 and 315.

¹³⁹⁵ Libal, Limits, p. 76.

Once Kohl realized that as far as Mitterrand was concerned, the lights were no longer red but had changed to amber, the German government invited a whole parade of dignitaries from the former Yugoslavia for discussions in Bonn. The idea was to synchronize watches regarding the date of recognition and to remove any remaining obstacles standing in the way of recognition. The first to visit Bonn on 22 November was the Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic, who had in past months continually impressed upon Western representatives that recognition of Croatia's and Slovenia's independence would mean war in Bosnia.

German insistence on rapid recognition of the independence of republics was based on the notion that it would restrain Serb aggression. That is, it would no longer be possible to define such aggression as internal use of force. Recognition having been established, any armed actions on the part of Serbia would give rise to an international conflict. As for Slovenia, such considerations were no longer relevant. The last JNA (Yugoslavian National Army) troops had already left there in October. Almost immediately after the Rome summit, an end to hostilities in Croatia also seemed possible, since the governments in Zagreb and in Belgrade had asked for peace troops to be stationed.

If the independence of the Croatian and Slovenian republics were recognized, the same could hardly be withheld for other republics. Accordingly, Bosnia and Macedonia, likewise in pursuit of independence, appeared on the horizon. The American Ambassador in Belgrade, Zimmermann, had already warned Washington in October 1990 that Milosevic had been fostering territorial ambitions with regard to Bosnia¹³⁹⁶, long before Croatia and Slovenia had declared their independence.

In a memorandum drawn up on 26 June 1991, the day after Croatia and Slovenia had declared independence, the Eastern European Division of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs pointed out that if Yugoslavia were to break up, Bosnia-Herzegovina would, by reason of its ethnic composition, be in danger of being divided up.¹³⁹⁷ At the time of the Brioni agreement, Minister Van den Broek had gained the impression through contacts with local parties that after Slovenia not only Croatia but also Bosnia-Herzegovina ran the risk of Serb actions. This due to the strong Serb presence there¹³⁹⁸. In his 13 July COREU, a circular to the other EC capitals, Van Walsum had had in mind an alteration of the Yugoslavian internal frontiers, and particularly the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Based on press reports about an agreement between Milosevic and Tudjman regarding a Croatia-Serbia division, it was there that he expected the greatest difficulties.

It was indeed difficult to imagine how Bosnia could continue to exist if the multi-ethnic Yugoslavian Federation were to split up. Bosnia-Herzegovina was not called Yugoslavia in miniature for nothing.¹³⁹⁹ In the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia, it was the only republic that had no dominant ethnic group. In 1991, 43.7 per cent of the then 4.4 million inhabitants called themselves Muslims, 31.4 per cent or 1.4 million Bosnians called themselves Serbs and 17.3 per cent Croats. Eight per cent of the population stated that they perceived themselves as Yugoslav or had 'no [ethnic] nationality'.¹⁴⁰⁰ Were Bosnia to disintegrate, how much more violent than in Croatia would the struggle be there? In Croatia, the war over Serb territory still had relatively clear territorial borders. The situation was different in Bosnia, where the various population groups intermingled. The question was whether the Serbs in Bosnia would take up a different stance than the Serbs in Croatia, who were striving towards autonomy ¹³⁹⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 83.

¹³⁹⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081, DEU; report through COREUs regarding the opinions of the EPC (European Political Cooperation) on Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, DEU/OE memorandum, 'Yugoslavia', for the benefit of the European Council, 28-29/06/91, 26/06/91.

¹³⁹⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287, EU/GBVB/Trojka, preparation of and report on visits by Troika to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, COREU Dutch EC presidency, 08/07/91, cpe/pres/hag 320.

¹³⁹⁹ Cf. Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from Former Yugoslavia', Baehr & Baudet & Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, p. 72; Van den Heuvel, 'Desintegratie', p. 153; Peternel, Joegoslavië, p. 24; Samary, Déchirure, p. 32; ABZ, 911.31 Yugoslavia. IDB report 8099/RC/90, Joegoslavië drijft verder uiteen, 12/11/90.

¹⁴⁰⁰ Burg & Shoup, War, p.27. See also A. Stam. 'Zuidslavische broedertwisten. Een historische schets van het Joegoslavische nationaliteitsvraagstuk', Oost-Europa Verkenningen (1991)15(June), p. 19; X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p.88.

or else association with Serbia. Were they to steer the same course, the problems would be incalculable. The Croatian government had already had to wage a full-scale war against the Serbs, who made up a mere 12 per cent of the population and who lived in fairly concentrated areas. How much more difficult would it be for the Bosnian government if the Serbs – who made up 31 per cent of the population and who were dispersed throughout the area – were to entertain the same hopes?

Reactions to the German recognition plan

The Bonn government has often been reproached for Germany's decision to press for recognition. Various reasons were put forward.

The first reason cited was that it was 'fine' for Bonn to talk. Recognition created a moral responsibility to support the new states. Should Serb aggression continue, a new state could not be left in the cold. In that respect, the German drive seemed rather strange, as the German government had deemed at the time that Germany's past and its constitution prohibited a deployment of troops in crisis regions. As such, Germany itself would not have to face the possible military consequences of its viewpoint. And if the West were not prepared or in a position to send troops, then it would, at the very least, have to reconsider the weapon embargo imposed on all parts of (former)Yugoslavia by the United Nations on 25 September. The fact of the matter was that each state had the right to defend itself against external aggression.¹⁴⁰¹

Another objection to recognition was that it would shut the door on the conciliation process initiated by the EC in September 1991 with the Yugoslavia conference presided over by Lord Carrington. But that objection was hardly very strong as the peace process was at a standstill and no one knew rightly how to get it going again.¹⁴⁰² From Belgrade's viewpoint, the EC would no longer be neutral after recognition, but that was in effect no longer the case anyway and certainly not after the decision of 8 November to impose selective sanctions.

Formally speaking, recognition by the European Community could be objected to on the grounds that it was essentially up to the United Nations to make a pronouncement on the right to self-determination. Moreover, recognizing Croatia meant recognizing a state, a third of whose territory was not in government hands. Those were, in point of fact, formal objections.

However, the most important argument against Germany's pressing on with recognition was that it would not only have seriously damaged burgeoning European foreign and security policies, but would also have brought about or at the very least accelerated the war over Bosnia.¹⁴⁰³ Mitterrand and Dumas, his Minister of Foreign Affairs, later on repeatedly expressed their regret that in respect of recognition they had let themselves be led by the German government¹⁴⁰⁴, whereas Genscher always insisted that Serb aggression in Croatia would have gone on had Croatia's independence not been recognized.¹⁴⁰⁵ That claim is as specious as that of Germany's critics, who believed that 'premature' recognition imposed by Bonn resulted in the break-out of war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Preparations for that war were already well underway in November and December 1991.

To verify that, it is necessary to outline the history of Bosnia. As so often in the recent history of (former)Yugoslavia, an unequivocal answer is not possible without in-depth cause and effect research. For this reason, the attention now turns to the history of Bosnia-Herzegovina, an aspect that until now has played a minor role in the text.

¹⁴⁰¹ Cf. Jonathan Eyal, 'Stop the West's Cynical Game in the Balkans', Wall Street Journal, 27/01/93.

¹⁴⁰² Cf. Van Walsum, Nederland, p. 66.

¹⁴⁰³ Cf. Bell, Way, p. 36; Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 37; Eisermann, Weg, p. 82; Kalaitzidis, Relations, pp. 4 and 26. For examples of criticism see Calic, 'Jugoslawienpolitik', p. 18.

¹⁴⁰⁴ Cf. ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Wijnaendts 217 to Kooijmans, 21/06/93; Olivier Lepick, 'French Perspectives', Danchev/Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 79.

¹⁴⁰⁵ Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 960, 963 and 966; Silber & Little, Death, p. 199.

2. The history of Bosnia-Hercegovina

Bosnia under the Ottomans

‘If you want to find the truth in Bosnia, you must ignore words and examine actions, and even then, you must be careful of the conclusions you draw.’¹⁴⁰⁶

Scarcely larger than the Netherlands, the area of Bosnia-Hercegovina had known foreign domination for many centuries. After a period of independence as a kingdom, Bosnia was a distinct entity and part of the Ottoman Empire from 1463 to 1878. Shortly after Ottoman rule had been established, large sections of the population converted to Islam, but thanks to the millet system which sanctioned separate religious groups, there was still room for followers of other religions. For instance under this system, education was left to a large extent to these communities themselves. The Ottoman rulers did however adopt a more positive attitude towards Christian Orthodox followers than towards Catholics. The popes, despised on account of the Crusades, had always been the enemy of the Turkish Empire. Moreover, the pope in Rome was elusive, unlike the Christian Orthodox patriarch, who resided within the national borders of the Empire. In fact, orthodoxy spread under Ottoman rule. Because Roman Catholics were considered less important, the number of conversions to orthodoxy grew. Added to that, several Catholics migrated from Bosnia to Croatia and Dalmatia, while Serbs entered Bosnia where they took up vacated positions, particularly in the rural areas.¹⁴⁰⁷

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries migration helped to increase the percentage of Serbs in Bosnia from ten to forty.¹⁴⁰⁸ There had been an Orthodox bishop in Bosnia as early as 1532 and the first Orthodox church was built in Sarajevo some decades later. But even the Catholics were doing relatively well in Bosnia. The Franciscans were granted the status of millet, treatment that other Catholics in the Ottoman Empire did not enjoy.¹⁴⁰⁹

As a result of the ousting of followers of the Islamic faith from Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro, the number of Muslims in Bosnia increased sharply in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.¹⁴¹⁰ Whilst the migration of Muslims from Serbia to Eastern Bosnia solved one problem for the adherents of the Greater Serb doctrine, it created a new one. Several Muslims leaving Serbia settled on the opposite bank of the Drina river in Eastern Bosnia. At the same time, Serbs from Eastern Bosnia moved to Serbia. In this way, an ever stronger Muslim buffer grew on the Western banks of the Drina, which then formed a divide between Serbia itself and the Serbs in Bosnia and Croatia.

Meanwhile, the consequence of the comparative tolerance shown by the Ottoman Empire towards dissidents was that no single ethnic group was numerically predominant in Bosnia. Towards the end of Turkish rule in 1878, 38.7 per cent of the population of Bosnia-Hercegovina was Islamic, 42.9 per cent Orthodox (Serb) and 18.1 per cent Catholic (Croatian).¹⁴¹¹

Conversely, century-long Turkish rule had resulted in marked socio-economic differences along ethno-religious lines.¹⁴¹² Around 1875, Bosnia's economy was dominated by agriculture. A census conducted twenty years later revealed that 88 per cent of the population was still employed in agricultural occupations.¹⁴¹³ The landowners were almost exclusively Islamites, whilst the permanent tenants – whose status was similar to that of serfs (known as kmetovi) – were mainly Orthodox (74 per ¹⁴⁰⁶ Maass, Neighbor, p. 85.

¹⁴⁰⁷ Fouad Ajami, ‘In Europe’s Shadows’, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, pp. 41-42.

¹⁴⁰⁸ Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 64.

¹⁴⁰⁹ Lampe, Yugoslavia, pp. 22-23.

¹⁴¹⁰ Cf. Zulfikarpasic, Bosniaks, p. 24.

¹⁴¹¹ X. Bougarel, ‘Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism’, Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 88.

¹⁴¹² Burg & Shoup, War, p. 17.

¹⁴¹³ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 75-76.

cent) and Catholic (21 per cent).¹⁴¹⁴ This inequitable distribution became the most significant bone of contention in the nineteenth and early twentieth century in Bosnia. Moreover, due to this disproportionate relationship, the foundation was laid for discrepancies between towns where Muslims were present in far greater force, and rural areas in which the presence of Serbs and Croats was comparatively stronger. As late as 1991 even, 70 per cent of the Bosnian Muslims lived in the cities, as opposed to 30 or 40 per cent of the Serbs.¹⁴¹⁵ Prior to the 1992 conflict, 56 per cent of Bosnian territory was in Serb hands, although they constituted no more than 31 per cent of the population.¹⁴¹⁶

In 1875, a peasant revolt broke out against the supremacy of Islamite landlords, a revolt which soon took on the character of an Orthodox rebellion striving to form an association with Serbia. The peasants were backed by Serbia and Montenegro, who declared war on the Ottoman Empire in 1876. Initially, Serbia was backed by Russia. However, during peace negotiations in 1878 in Berlin, Russia agreed that while Bosnia-Herzegovina would be separated from the Ottoman Empire, it would also become an Austro-Hungarian protectorate.

Bosnia under Habsburg rule

The entry of the Habsburg army in Bosnia was accompanied by fierce resistance from the Muslims, who not only feared a non-Islamic regime but also a shift in their hitherto favourable socio-economic status. In a conflict lasting almost three months, a final total of 268,000 Habsburg soldiers, most of them Croats and Serbs from Krajina, had to hold their own against 93,000 Muslim volunteers. An estimated 150,000 lost their lives in this war, 5,000 of whom fell on the Austrian side.¹⁴¹⁷ In the years leading up to the First World War, close to 100,000 Muslims took refuge in Turkey¹⁴¹⁸ and several tens of thousands in Kosovo, Macedonia or Sandzak, the region in Southern Serbia and Northern Macedonia. Most left because they did not want to live under Christian rule.

However, the greater majority of Muslims soon reconciled themselves to Austrian rule, one of the reasons being that this administration kept their socio-economic status intact. The Habsburg authorities also accepted the existence of a Bosnian community, divided into Muslim, Orthodox, Catholic and Jewish socio-political blocks existing more or less independently of one another and linked only by a sense of good neighbourliness (komsiluk). Accepting this situation was made easier for the Austro-Hungarian authorities in that they were able to secure the right to appoint both Orthodox Christian and Roman Catholic bishops in Bosnia. The Muslim hierarchy dissociated itself from Istanbul in 1882 and the Habsburg Emperor appointed the leader of this religious community, the Reis ul-ulema, as well.

At the end of the nineteenth century, despite these favourable arrangements for the Dual Monarchy, the nationalist sentiment that was then becoming so prevalent in Zagreb and Belgrade began penetrating the Croat and Serb communities in Bosnia. The lower clergy were by no means last when it came to being responsible for imparting nationalistic sentiment to both Serbs and Croats.

Attempts by the representatives of the Danube Monarchy to develop an all-embracing awareness of Bosnian identity (bosnjastvo) in reply were largely ineffectual. If the political loyalty of Bosnian citizens was at all projected onto a level higher than their own local surroundings, the level was generally not Bosnia but external centres such as Turkey, Austria-Hungary, Belgrade or Zagreb.

At the end of the nineteenth century, members of the Orthodox and Catholic churches started to define themselves more and more categorically as Serbs and Croats, respectively, under the influence of nationalist trends beyond the Bosnian borders. At the same time, no characteristic national ¹⁴¹⁴ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 78-79; Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 28.

¹⁴¹⁵ Harry Bauer & Thomas Kimmig, 'Frieden um jeden Preis. Ein Diskussionsbeitrag zum Krieg in Bosnien und seiner Wahrnehmung in der Bundesrepublik', Stefanov & Werz (Hg.), Bosnien, p. 48.

¹⁴¹⁶ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 28.

¹⁴¹⁷ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 35; Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 94-95; Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 87-88.

¹⁴¹⁸ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 140.

awareness grew among Muslims. Religious orientation remained preponderant. Lacking a Bosnian identity, individual Muslims described themselves in the first decades of the twentieth century as Serb, Croat, Yugoslav, Bosnian or as 'Turk'.¹⁴¹⁹ As Donia and Fine write: 'Muslims changed from one national identity to another with the same ease that an American might change political parties.'¹⁴²⁰ They do, however, point out that despite such public utterances, Muslims retained their own identity and frequently played a double role by taking an active part in Croat and Serb factions and in Muslim organisations.¹⁴²¹ On the other hand, the level of group consciousness among the Muslims was such that, despite individual declarations, they remained a clearly defined category in Bosnian society.¹⁴²² Differences between Muslims, Croats and Serbs manifested themselves in clothing, eating habits, house decorations and celebrations, for instance. The various groups lived primarily alongside one another. Villages were often ethnically homogenous. In the cities, there were not only separate districts for each group, centring round a church, mosque or synagogue, but also districts in which members of various ethnic entities commingled.

In response to resistance to the 'Catholic dominance' of the Habsburgers, group consciousness among the Muslims grew from 1878 onwards. In spite of the determination of the Austrian rulers not to favour Roman Catholics, the number of Croats increased during the Dual Monarchy. One consequence of this was, for example, that the percentage of Catholics in Sarajevo grew from 3.3 to 34.5 per cent between 1879 and 1910.¹⁴²³ Muslim activists seized upon the irritations of the Islamites with the Roman Catholic church's plan to consolidate their political power in Bosnia.¹⁴²⁴ As a result, the period of Austrian rule saw a rapid growth of separate Muslim organizations in almost all reaches of life.

The Serbs, and in particular the younger ones, became more radical, emphasizing their identity more and more despite attempts by the Habsburg rulers to steal a march on Serb nationalism by granting the Serbs religious and educational autonomy.

For all the Dual Monarchy's efforts to uphold the relatively harmonious relations between the ethnic groups during the Turkish period, they could not prevent the segmentation of society becoming yet more sharply outlined at the turn of the century. In the years between 1906 and 1908, one after the other, separate Muslim, Serb and Croat parties were established. When, after the adoption of a provincial constitution in 1910, a Bosnian parliament was formed, the Orthodox group won 37 seats, the Muslims 29, the Catholics 23 and the Jews one in elections in that same year. The Social Democrats were the only party not organized along ethno-religious lines. They won no seats at all.

At first, the Serb party and the landowner-dominated Muslim party collaborated in parliament, although the Serb party took the line that Bosnia-Herzegovina was Serb territory and Muslims were islamized Serbs. Croat parties likewise claimed that Bosnia was Croatian territory and that the Muslims were Croats who had converted to Islam. When Serb politicians tried to change property relations in the rural areas in 1911, the Muslim-Serb coalition was replaced by a political collaboration between Muslims and Croats. In both cases, the interests of both the Serb and the Croat coalition required that the position of the Muslim landowners not become the subject of debate.

During the short period of a Bosnian parliament under Austrian rule, various rudimentary hallmarks emerged of political life in Bosnia, the general tenor of which would continue to exist until 1992. Both Croats and Serbs needed Muslim support to secure a majority. As such, they contended that the Muslims were, in fact, part of their group, whilst at the same time laying claim to the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Muslims formed the swing factor, the group that always constituted part of the coalition. Making use of the strategic position they held in society, the Muslims tried at once to ¹⁴¹⁹ Duijzings Appendix, Geschiedenis en berinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

¹⁴²⁰ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, p. 111.

¹⁴²¹ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 111-112.

¹⁴²² Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 152.

¹⁴²³ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 36.

¹⁴²⁴ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 146.

safeguard their own social position and to counteract the centrifugal tendencies of the Croats towards Croatia and Serbs to Serbia. In consequence, the political Muslim leaders were not only respected for their multi-ethnic tolerance, but also criticised for political opportunism.

The 1910 constitution had been adopted after Vienna had taken a formal decision to annex the region because it feared renewed Turkish claims to Bosnia-Herzegovina. As mentioned earlier, this stirred up animosity among the Serbs in Serbia as well as in Bosnia. Serb resistance to this decision underpinned Gavrilo Princip's assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the overture to the First World War. Immediately after the assassination, riots broke out in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia, in the course of which Croats and Muslims molested Serbs and ransacked their houses and shops. At first, police and military did not intervene.

Bosnia remained all but undamaged during the war, and the only area hard hit was Eastern Bosnia. In the early stages of the war, Serb troops sent out punitive expeditions against Muslim villages. Later on, Austrian troops did the same to Serb villages. Moreover, Austrian rulers displaced an estimated 100,000 Serbs from Eastern Bosnia to the west of the area for fear that they would otherwise come to the assistance of Serb forces on the opposite bank of the Drina. In addition, 5,000 Serb families were driven to Serbia and Montenegro. Several thousand Bosnian Serbs were interned, and most of them did not survive.¹⁴²⁵ Hundreds of Serbs were executed on suspicion of treason or espionage, sometimes, but not always, after trial. Muslims and Croats, on the other hand, enlisted – some compulsorily – with the Schutzkorps, the territorial defence unit deployed by the Habsburg rulers in Eastern Bosnia to guard against Serb activities thought undesirable by the Austrians. The actions taken by the corps, which would eventually number 20,000 men, occasionally ended in dreadful atrocities.¹⁴²⁶

Bosnia during the first Yugoslavia

In 1918, once the First World War, and with it Austro-Hungarian rule, had ended and Bosnia-Herzegovina had been incorporated into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenians, the Bosnian Serbs turned against the Muslim landowners, merchants and tradespeople, assaulting and murdering them. In February 1917, the Serb government in exile had promised each soldier five hectares of land. Attracted by these assurances, some Bosnian Serbs had volunteered. Serbs who stayed in Bosnia were encouraged by the Serb government to stop paying rent to Muslim landowners.

By the end of 1918, it seemed the day of reckoning had come. Muslim landowners and smaller Muslim peasants were evicted in favour of the Serbs, large numbers of whom had previously been employed as tenants on Muslim property. This violence and these politics of economic inequity were followed by an exodus to Turkey of approximately one million Muslims, among them almost all persons of Turkish origin.

In February 1919, the Jugoslavenska Moslimanska Organizacija (JMO) was set up as a political party to safeguard, where possible, the position of the remaining Muslims. Incidentally, with the exception of the Communist party, all other political parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina also operated along ethnic lines during the interbellum years. The JMO had a very steadfast following, proof of the intensity of Muslim identity.¹⁴²⁷ The JMO leader Mehmet Spaho's loyal attitude towards the federal authorities in Belgrade, and participation in various government coalitions, were instrumental in helping his party to achieve a great deal for the Muslims, such as compensation for the expropriations. The party was also fairly successful in its attempts to retain Muslim autonomy with regard to religion, education and the Islamic (sharia) system of law. A further political success of Spaho's was that the frontiers of Bosnia-Herzegovina were maintained when Yugoslavia was divided into administrative zones. That changed ten years later, in 1929, when King Alexander attempted to replace the regional identities with a ¹⁴²⁵ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, p. 118; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 158.

¹⁴²⁶ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 163.

¹⁴²⁷ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 124-125.

Yugoslav consciousness. He divided Bosnia-Herzegovina into four parts, which, together with Croatia, Serbia, Montenegro and the Dalmatian coast, formed a banat (province). The Muslims were in the minority in each of the four banats and were considered inferior when it came to appointments.

Mehmet Spaho died in June 1939 during the discussions on the agreement between Cvetkovic and Macek. This settlement was effected entirely without consulting the Bosnians. Large sections of Bosnia then fell to Croatia, such as Posavina, Western Herzegovina and a large part of Central Bosnia. The rest, including the area around Banja Luka, Sarajevo and Eastern Bosnia was allotted to Serbia or remained linked to Montenegro.

Bosnia in the Second World War

After the capitulation of Yugoslavia in April 1941, the whole of Bosnia-Herzegovina was annexed by Ante Pavelic's 'independent' Croatia. Part of the JMO leadership opted for Ustashe rule, which promised Muslims equality and freedom of religion and education. Some Muslims also sided with the Ustashe in committing crimes against Serbs. The behaviour of the 13th Handzar (or 'Handschar' in German) SS Division was notorious. It largely comprised Muslims who were brought into action in Bosnia in 1944 against the partisans after having trained in France and Germany. The division committed atrocities against the Serbs in Northwest and Eastern Bosnia, especially in the area around Vlasenica.¹⁴²⁸ However, other Muslims protested openly against the atrocities committed by the Ustashe against the Serbs.¹⁴²⁹ Consequently, they themselves also fell victim to Ustashe terror. At the same time, Muslims were also subjected to Cetnik violence. Among the worst instances were the massacres that took place in December 1941 and January 1942 in Foca, Gorazde and Visegrad. On the bridges over the Drina, the throats of many thousands of victims were cut and their bodies then thrown into the river.¹⁴³⁰ Both Cetniks and Ustashe demonstrated a rampant fantasy when it came to devising ways of torturing and murdering.¹⁴³¹ Sexual crimes also occurred frequently.

In order to defend themselves, the Muslims entered into alliances with all parties to the conflict, even the Cetniks,¹⁴³² or else set up their own local militia known as 'green cadres'. Having said that, local relationships could change from one region to another and from one moment to another.

As the war progressed, more and more Muslims joined Tito's Partisan movement. Tito made Bosnia the operating base from which to fight for the liberation of the entire Yugoslav territory. During the Second World War in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Partisan movement always addressed the 'Serbs, Muslims and Croats'. In the view of Tito and his supporters, once it had been freed from fascism and national socialism, Bosnia would become a separate administrative entity in which the three large population groups would be treated on equal terms. The Communist party wanted Bosnia to be a separate republic after the war, serving as a buffer between the two biggest assailants in the first Yugoslavia: Croatia and Serbia. Tito believed that if Bosnia were to be divided between Croatia and Serbia, as the Cvetkovic-Macek agreement of 1939 had intended, this would have made both republics too large compared to Macedonia, Montenegro and Slovenia.

In any event, up until the end of the war, Tito's Partisan movement attracted only a few Muslims.¹⁴³³ In order to protect them from 'unwitting' Serbs – who even in the partisan movement were after Muslim blood – Muslim partisans were sometimes given Serb noms de guerre. Subsequently, ¹⁴²⁸ Lepre, Division.

¹⁴²⁹ Cf. Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 62-64.

¹⁴³⁰ Cf. Cekic, Aggression, p. 20.

¹⁴³¹ For examples, see Cekic, Aggression, p. 24.

¹⁴³² Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 188.

¹⁴³³ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 37.

the result of this camouflaging of Muslim partisans was that the number of Muslims in the communist resistance movement was underestimated.¹⁴³⁴

Because Bosnia became the nucleus in the struggle against the occupation of Yugoslavia, the number of casualties there was comparatively the largest. Realistic estimates vary from 316,000 to 382,000 dead as opposed to upwards of one million in the whole of Yugoslavia.¹⁴³⁵ By contrast, almost 300,000 people had lost their lives in Croatia during the Second World War, and about 150,000 in Serbia.¹⁴³⁶ In Bosnia, according to the calculations that came to a total of 382,000 victims, 209,000 of these were said to be Serbs, 57.5 per cent of the casualties in Bosnia (with the exception of 10,000 Jews and 9,000 'others'), 79,000 Croats (22 per cent) and 75,000 Muslims (20.5 per cent).¹⁴³⁷ Calculated thus, 16.7 per cent of the Serb population of Bosnia-Herzegovina died, 12.8 per cent of the Croat population and 8.6 per cent of the Muslim population.¹⁴³⁸ In other words, 1 in 6 Serbs, 1 in 8 Croats and 1 in 12 Muslims lost their lives in Bosnia during the Second World War. The Jewish and gypsy communities were all but wiped out.

Multi-ethnicity under Communism: harmony or precursor of violence?

With comparatively heavy losses during the war, Bosnia was also rather badly off during the period of peace under Communist rule. The Habsburg regime had brought about a period of economic modernization in Bosnia, particularly in infrastructure, forestry and mining, industry and banking. In the 1920s and 1930s, the Germans had invested in heavy industry. However, Bosnian industry did not develop fully until after the rift between Yugoslavia and the Cominform, when Tito's government developed a strong defence industry in Bosnia. This industry was aimed chiefly at extracting raw materials. The production of manufactured goods, however, lagged far behind the Yugoslav average. The same applied to employment, income and investments, even though for years Bosnia received more than twenty per cent from the federal development fund.¹⁴³⁹ After Kosovo, Bosnia was, in many respects – urbanization, literacy, infant mortality – the most backward area of Yugoslavia.¹⁴⁴⁰

After 1945, along with other religions, Islam was ousted under Communist rule. Islamic law courts were prohibited in 1946. Four years later, the wearing of veils was also forbidden by law, and the same thing happened to Muslim education and most Muslim organizations. Because of these measures, further expropriations or a Ustashe-tainted background, many Muslims fled abroad after the Second World War, in particular to Turkey. Turkish statistics suggest that a total of approximately 190,000 Bosnian Muslims emigrated to Turkey after 1945.¹⁴⁴¹

Tito and his following expected that the Muslims would, as a group, disappear in the course of time.¹⁴⁴² At the first Communist party congress after the war, it was said that Bosnia could not be divided up between Croatia and Serbia, 'not only because Serbs and Croats intermingle throughout the territory, but also because the region is inhabited by Muslims, who have not yet resolved their national identity', i.e. whether they were Croats or Serbs.¹⁴⁴³ Muslim party officials were compelled to declare whether they saw themselves as Croats or Serbs.

¹⁴³⁴ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. x; Ivo Banac, 'Bosnian Muslims: From Religious Community to Socialist Nationhood and Postcommunist Statehood, 1918-1992', Pinson (ed.), Muslims, pp. 143-144.

¹⁴³⁵ Cohen, War, pp. 109-111.

¹⁴³⁶ Cohen, War, p. 111.

¹⁴³⁷ Cohen, War, p. 109. Except for the Muslims, these figures differ considerably from those mentioned by Srđan Bogosavljević, 'Drugi Svetski Rat – Zrtve u Jugoslaviji', Republika, 01-05/06/95, cited in Hayden, Fate, p. 746, according to him, 72 per cent of the casualties were Serbs, 17 per cent Muslim and 4 per cent Croat.

¹⁴³⁸ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 38.

¹⁴³⁹ Calic, Krieg, pp. 61-63.

¹⁴⁴⁰ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 202.

¹⁴⁴¹ Cekic, Aggression, p. 27.

¹⁴⁴² Cohen, Hearts, pp. 69 and 71; Judah, Serbs, p. 154.

¹⁴⁴³ Cited in Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 197. See also Milovan Djilas in: Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 84-85.

The 1948 census contained the categories 'Muslim Serb', 'Muslim Croat' and 'nationally non-defined Muslim'. Of all the Muslims, 778,000 (or 89 per cent) stated that they belonged to the latter category, only 72,000 (eight per cent) called themselves Serbs and 25,000 (three per cent) Croat.¹⁴⁴⁴ By 1953, the category 'Muslim' was absent from the census form. Within the framework of Yugoslavism policy, it was now possible for Muslims to be registered as 'non-defined Yugoslav'. Almost 900,000 Bosnians, almost all Muslims, opted for this alternative.¹⁴⁴⁵

In the first decades after the Second World War, Bosnia had to contend with Serb dominance. This came not only at the expense of Muslims, but also Croats. After the fall of Rankovic, the Serb head of the state security service in 1966, the repression of the non-Serb groups eased off in Bosnia, too.¹⁴⁴⁶ In the light of the wrongs done to the Croats in Bosnia, Cvjetin Mijatovic, the prominent Bosnian-Serb Communist, went so far as to say that he was ashamed of being a Serb.¹⁴⁴⁷

However, after Tito had sought to join the Non-Alignment Movement, he started to trot out the Muslims in his own country in front of the non-aligned states. In Bosnia, too, religious practice was tolerated as long as it was not linked to manifestations of ethnic nationalism. Hence, the Muslim community in Communist Bosnia was eventually able to establish hundreds of new mosques.

Inadvertently, it was the Muslims living in the cities who benefited from the schooling campaigns organized by Tito's government. Thanks to his support, the Muslim community in Bosnia-Herzegovina emancipated in the 1960s. Moreover, because the party leadership renounced Yugoslavism, in the 1961 census, it was possible for the first time to state that one was 'ethnic Muslim'. Almost one million Bosnians claimed that status. In the Bosnian constitution of 1963, Muslims were recognized as being a constituent community in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In 1968, the Communist party leadership accepted the Muslims as such a community in both Bosnia-Herzegovina and Yugoslavia. The nationalist writer Dobrica Cosic turned against the decision in 1971, but to no avail. In 1971, the Yugoslav census spoke of 'Muslims in the sense of a nation'. The latter was embedded in the constitution of 1974. As from that date, the word 'Muslim' – as a people – has always been written with a capital M in Yugoslavia.

To the extent to which Muslims, Croats and Serbs in Bosnia felt the need to have a joint identity, this was still not to be found in a shared Bosnian, but rather a common Yugoslav background.¹⁴⁴⁸ However, this need was largely restricted to the intellectual upper classes in Bosnia. Of the circa eight per cent of the population that defined itself as Yugoslav in the 1981 census, three quarters were from the large cities.¹⁴⁴⁹ Incidentally, with the increased ethnic tension, the census held ten years later revealed a decrease in the number of Bosnians who described themselves as Yugoslavs to 5.5 per cent of the population. Exceptions were Tuzla and Sarajevo where 17 and 10.5 per cent, respectively, of the population called themselves Yugoslavs.

The recognition of the Muslims as a population group led to a social awareness as well as a religious revival among the Muslims. By recognizing them as a category, the statistics then revealed that under the social elite in Bosnia, the Muslims were subordinate to the Serbs.¹⁴⁵⁰ That discrimination was partly a consequence of a delayed reaction to large demographic shifts between the various population groups. In the 1961 census, the Serbs with 42.8 per cent were still a majority in the Bosnian population. With a percentage of 25.6, the Muslims were scarcely larger than the Croat section of the population (21.7 per cent). Ten years later, in 1971, the ratios had changed drastically, due especially to the relatively high number of births among Muslims and the increase in Croat and Serb migration. These latter groups had a fairly strong urge to move to Croatia and Serbia, respectively, with their stronger

¹⁴⁴⁴ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, pp. 175-176; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 198.

¹⁴⁴⁵ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 198.

¹⁴⁴⁶ Judah, Serbs, p. 153.

¹⁴⁴⁷ Marijan, War, p. 176 n. 5.

¹⁴⁴⁸ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 44; Krizan, Nationalisme, p. 71.

¹⁴⁴⁹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 42.

¹⁴⁵⁰ Calic, Krieg, pp. 77-78.

economies and better job opportunities, whereas the Muslims stayed in Bosnia.¹⁴⁵¹ In 1971, the population ratios were Serbs (37.3 per cent), Muslims (39.6 per cent) and Croats (20.6 per cent). The relative majority of Muslims would then continue to grow until, by 1991, the population ratios were Serbs (31.4 per cent), Muslims (43.7 per cent) and Croats (17.3 per cent).¹⁴⁵²

The effect of these shifts at a national level was that, on a regional level, there were more and more places with a Muslim majority and fewer and fewer with a Serb majority. Moreover, because the migration of minorities from the villages was the strongest to the cities, the villages became more and more homogenous in terms of ethnic composition and the cities more and more heterogeneous.¹⁴⁵³

There were those among the Muslim elite in the process of emancipating themselves, who thought that Muslims should become the leading nation in Bosnia-Herzegovina, given that the Croats and the Serbs had their own republics. A small group even went as far as to advocate the ethnic homogenization of all Bosnia.¹⁴⁵⁴

For the Communist party leadership in Sarajevo and Belgrade, the growth of a greater Muslim self-awareness was a problem. Of all Yugoslav republics, the Communists in Bosnia-Herzegovina were the most doctrinal.¹⁴⁵⁵ While one could be threatened with arrest for ideological aberrations in Belgrade or Zagreb, one would have actually been arrested in Sarajevo.¹⁴⁵⁶ Sarajevo was:

‘a city in which it was impossible to be an avowed dissident and from where intellectuals fled to Belgrade or Zagreb; a city in which the party was totally under the control of the media, and in which the student revolt of 1968 was most effectively suppressed; a city in which spies controlled the ideological attitudes of the people, right down to their private lives’.¹⁴⁵⁷

Ideological repression and mutual religious and ethnic tolerance went hand in hand in Bosnia. Expressions of nationalist hatred were ranked among the most serious crimes against the ideology.¹⁴⁵⁸ Communist leadership viewed propagating Islam as the best creed, which occurred in the context of Muslim emancipation, as a direct attack on the idea of brotherhood and unity.¹⁴⁵⁹

In the early 1980s, this concern about an Islam revival led to a campaign by the Communist government against ‘Muslim fundamentalism’, particularly in Bosnia and Macedonia. Muslim leaders were attacked in the press and Muslim clerics arrested for using their beliefs for political ends. Fear of such problems as foreign meddling in developments in Bosnia – especially by Iran, Libya, Cairo and Mecca – prompted this campaign.¹⁴⁶⁰ In 1983, this campaign culminated in the trial for hostile activities of 13 Muslim intellectuals, among them Alija Izetbegovic, Omer Behmen and Hasan Cengic. They had known each other for years and would, in the 1990s, take up prominent positions in the nationalist Muslim party SDA.

At the same time, publications from Communist and Serb nationalist quarters with a strong anti-Muslim character appeared in Sarajevo and Belgrade, including the novel Nož by Vuk Draskovic. It was a sign that the carefully maintained equilibrium between the groups was out of plumb.

¹⁴⁵¹ For statistics, see Detrez, Sloop, p. 253; Judah, Serbs, pp. 154-155.

¹⁴⁵² Lampe, Yugoslavia, p. 330.

¹⁴⁵³ For statistics, see Detrez, Sloop, p. 254.

¹⁴⁵⁴ Calic, Krieg, p. 76.

¹⁴⁵⁵ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 43; Draulans, Mirjana, p. 77; Slapsak, Joegoslavië, pp. 52, 55.

¹⁴⁵⁶ Nebojsa Popov, ‘Kriegerischer Frieden. Annäherung an ein Verständnis des Krieges in Bosnien-Herzegowina’, Stefanov & Werz (Hg.), Bosnien, p. 105.

¹⁴⁵⁷ Svetlana Slapsak, ‘Waarom Sarajevo?’, in: Dojcinovic & Keulemans (eds.), Hommage, p. 62.

¹⁴⁵⁸ Slapsak, Joegoslavië, p. 185.

¹⁴⁵⁹ Antic, Officials.

¹⁴⁶⁰ Antic, Officials.

Ethnic relations on the eve of the conflict

‘Rest and warmth existed side by side with violence and perversity. They were just two unavoidable sides of the same way of life.’¹⁴⁶¹

‘Until recently, I really thought that people were getting on reasonably well with one other, that it didn’t matter whether you were Serb, Croat or Muslim. But nowadays, it’s about the first question you’re asked. And you’re wary if he doesn’t belong ‘on your side’. So now I almost wonder whether it really used to be that good.’¹⁴⁶²

In the past, the various ethnic movements in Bosnia had, at best, existed side by side, that is to say when the climate in Bosnia-Herzegovina was politically stable. Where that was not so, there were conflicts between the ethnic groups. The political unrest in Yugoslavia as from the late 1980s did not leave Bosnia unaffected. Whoever was so inclined still saw equilibrium, others noted that the foundations of society had started to shift.

The different ethnic groups had intermingled to a limited degree only. However, at the end of 1991, a sociological study revealed that only 43 per cent of the Muslims, 39 per cent of the Croats and 25 per cent of the Serbs in Bosnia wanted a marriage partner of the same ethnic group.¹⁴⁶³ But actual practice showed that until then, the willingness to enter a ‘mixed marriage’ appeared to be even less. In 1981, a mere 15.3 per cent of all marriages were mixed.¹⁴⁶⁴ In 1991, 16 per cent of the children in Bosnia were born out of a mixed marriage.¹⁴⁶⁵ These figures are frequently cited in the literature, but the annual averages between 1962 and 1989 sooner reveal a mixed marriage percentage of 11 to 12, a rate which remained almost constant throughout that period.¹⁴⁶⁶ It should also be noted when considering this figure that the mixed marriages took place mainly between members of small ethnic groups, such as Jews and Montenegrins, for whom the chances of marriage within their own group were slim. Such marriages were far less frequent among the three large ethnic entities, viz. Croats, Muslims and Serbs. In those three groups, mixed marriages took place mainly between Croats and Serbs (in that order), and far less often among Muslims – 95 per cent of Muslim women and 93 per cent of Muslim men entered into homogenous marriages.¹⁴⁶⁷ Another marginal note is that mixed marriages were as good as confined to the cities, where in a few cases levels of 40 per cent were reached.¹⁴⁶⁸ It is often erroneously assumed that the percentage of such marriages was comparatively high in Bosnia.¹⁴⁶⁹ On the contrary, it is significant that precisely in Bosnia-Herzegovina where ethnic distribution was greater than in the rest of Yugoslavia, the percentage of mixed marriages between 1962 and 1989 was the lowest of all republics, with the exception of Macedonia.¹⁴⁷⁰

Villages were often more or less homogenous, though scattered at random. The census of April 1991 showed that of the 109 Bosnian municipalities (opštine), 37 had an absolute Muslim majority, 32 a Serb and 13 a Croatian. Fewer than a third of the opštine showed no clear-cut ethnic majority.

¹⁴⁶¹ Djilas, Land, p. 245.

¹⁴⁶² Muhamed Vlasic, employed by a travel organization in Mostar in N. Lucas, ‘Serviërs in Bosnië: kogels voor bier’(Serbs in Bosnia: bullets for beer), Trouw, 28/09/91.

¹⁴⁶³ Calic, Krieg, p. 58.

¹⁴⁶⁴ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 42.

¹⁴⁶⁵ Calic, Krieg, p. 45; Crnobrnja, Drama, p. 23.

¹⁴⁶⁶ Nikolai Botev, ‘Seeing Past the Barricades. Ethnic Inter-marriage in Former Yugoslavia, 1962-1989’, in: Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 225; Detrez, Sloop, p. 255.

¹⁴⁶⁷ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 42.

¹⁴⁶⁸ Sreten Vujovic, ‘An Uneasy View of the City’, Popov (ed.), Road, p. 136.

¹⁴⁶⁹ Cf. Ali & Lifschulz, ‘Bosnia’, p. 367; Cohen, Bonds, pp. 173 and 247; Crnobrnja, Drama, p. 23.

¹⁴⁷⁰ Nikolai Botev, ‘Seeing Past the Barricades. Ethnic Inter-marriage in Former Yugoslavia, 1962-1989’, Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, pp. 225 and 229.

The positive view Bosnian intellectuals and the West had of the inter-ethnic relations in Bosnia on the eve of the conflicts of the last decade of the 20th century was coloured mainly by information on ethnic tolerance in the capital Sarajevo or in Tuzla. Inhabitants of Sarajevo themselves put about the idea that there was no more cosmopolitan city in the Balkans, no city 'in which in such a small area so many languages, religions and cultures were in contact with one another and intermingled'.¹⁴⁷¹ And given that 'Bosnian culture (...), in particular in Sarajevo, in its purest form' was found there¹⁴⁷², the area would, it was repeatedly emphasized in Bosnia itself, act as a bridge between the West and the Orient.¹⁴⁷³ As is often the case with city-dwellers, those in Bosnia forgot that beyond their own cities, which they felt showed cosmopolitan tolerance, there were rural areas where quite different standards prevailed.¹⁴⁷⁴

Frequently, foreign journalists also reported that in Sarajevo, you could find a mosque, a Roman Catholic cathedral, a Christian Orthodox church and a Jewish synagogue, in virtually one and the same street. According to their reports, Muslims, Serbs, Croats, Jews, gypsies and Albanians lived alongside one another in 'Europe's truest melting pot'.¹⁴⁷⁵ Even when Sarajevo was surrounded by Serbs, there were still 80,000 Serbs alongside 200,000 Muslims and slightly less than 20,000 Croats.¹⁴⁷⁶

However, decades before the outbreak of the war, some observers felt that even in Sarajevo there existed a parallel reality, 'a deep and obvious separation between the ethnic groups, a separation characterized by both mistrust and apprehension'.¹⁴⁷⁷ 'Most of the peace and quiet rests on hypocrisy and on not wanting to attract the regime's attention ...'¹⁴⁷⁸ As a Croat resident of Bosnia said later: 'Yes, we lived in peace and harmony. We lived in peace and harmony because every hundred yards there was a policeman who made sure that we were really nice to one another.'¹⁴⁷⁹ Another observer noted:

'Undercurrents of intolerance could be spotted in unguarded chance remarks of hateful envy: snide comments about 'those' Croats, Muslims, and Serbs 'always sticking together'; occasional displays of rage over pork-barrel monkeys 'always benefiting them'; and furtive glances at Muslims going to the mosque in a largely Christian village, or at Christians going to their churches in predominantly Muslim towns. Confidentially, one was told of widespread mutual mistrust, at least in certain localities and sometimes even in Sarajevo.'¹⁴⁸⁰

At the end of the 1980s, consequently, the inter-ethnic situation in Bosnia was open to a dual interpretation. More than 90 per cent of those interviewed for a survey in Bosnia in 1990 did indeed say that where they lived, ethnic relations were good, and that was also the case at work, according to more than 80 per cent. However, 87 per cent considered the ethnic relations in Yugoslavia as a whole bad or very bad.¹⁴⁸¹

¹⁴⁷¹ Karahasan, Sarajevo, pp. 8-10. Cf. ibidem, p. 53; Weine, History, p. 21; Edo Barak in: Ineke Bijnagte, 'Korak. Een eskimo uit Sarajevo' (Korak. An eskimo from Sarajevo), De Groene Amsterdammer, 17/11/93, p. 8; Broekmeyer, 'Overpeinzing', p. 9; Kemal Kurspahic, 'Herzegovina en Bosnië zijn ondeelbaar' (Hercegovina and Bosnia indivisible), de Volkskrant, 31/12/91.

¹⁴⁷² Karahasan, Sarajevo, p. 9.

¹⁴⁷³ Cf. Hoessein Susic, cited in Clifford C. Cremer, 'Met pijl en boog tegen tank' (Bows and arrows against tanks), HP/De Tijd 15/01/93, p. 12.

¹⁴⁷⁴ Weine, History, p. 23.

¹⁴⁷⁵ Maas, Neighbor, p. 129. See also Anthony Lewis, 'War Crimes', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 55.

¹⁴⁷⁶ Max Arian, 'La Benovolencija', De Groene Amsterdammer, 09/06/93, p. 9.

¹⁴⁷⁷ Andrei Simic, 'Nationalism as a Folk Ideology. The Case of Former Yugoslavia', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 106. See also Cohen, Bonds, p. 247.

¹⁴⁷⁸ Slapsak, Joegoslavië, p. 187.

¹⁴⁷⁹ Bell, Way, p. 132.

¹⁴⁸⁰ Job, Furies, p. 69.

¹⁴⁸¹ Calic, Krieg, p. 59.

The Communist party in a tight corner

The Communist party in Bosnia also felt the increase in tension. Monitoring the combination of ideological purity and inter-ethnic tolerance was de facto in the hands of a few families from each of the three population groups that ruled the roost in the Communist elite in the republic.¹⁴⁸² While these families at the top of the political and social pyramid compromised to ensure that the republic remained governable, the rest of society had, in that respect, little experience. By the late 1980s, once the willingness to compromise had begun to erode as a result of the decline in the economy, relations throughout the whole of society became strained and arguments broke out at each level over the political and economic sources of power. At that point, the Communist party in Bosnia-Herzegovina itself became very disaffected by ethnic differences and tarnished by countless corruption scandals.

After the Communist League of Yugoslavia had fallen apart in January 1990 during the Fourteenth Party Congress and it had become clear that elections would also be held in Bosnia in which several parties would be able to participate, the executive of the Communist party employed a variety of means to discourage the formation of political parties with an ethnic or religious base. An opinion poll held in May 1990 demonstrated that this policy was still supported by 74 per cent of the Bosnian population.¹⁴⁸³ The party had little choice. Because it was organised along multi-ethnic lines – in 1982, 42.8 per cent of the members were Serbs, 35 per cent Muslim, 11.9 per cent Croat and 8.4 per cent Yugoslav¹⁴⁸⁴ – it could not play the nationalist card as Milosevic had done with his reconstructed Communist party in Serbia. At the same time, the oligarchic character of the Bosnian party leadership prevented reforms, which might have provided a solution to the threat of nationalism in the three ethnic groups.

A solution was urgently needed, however, because since the summer of 1989, Serb and Croatian mass meetings had been held in Bosnia that were tied up with the increase in ethnic tension elsewhere in Yugoslavia, notably in Kosovo, Slovenia and Croatia. At these meetings, Serbs declared their sympathy with Milosevic, and Croats their pursuit of independence. From the summer of 1989, the media in Belgrade began writing about the risks Serbs ran in Bosnia. Ostensibly, Serbs were being treated unfairly in terms of job opportunities and the migration of Serbs from Bosnia was termed ethnic cleansing. From 1989 onwards, a growing ethnic nationalism and a religious revival went hand in hand in Bosnia. More and more, the Orthodox church stepped into the limelight and gave Serb nationalists the opportunity to manifest themselves at religious gatherings.¹⁴⁸⁵ Religious feasts, such as the consecration of churches and mosques, became more ethnonationalist in character.¹⁴⁸⁶ Serbs accused Muslims of seeking to islamize the republic, evoking memories of Muslims collaborating with the Ustashe during the Second World War.¹⁴⁸⁷ Conversely, rumours did the rounds that Serbs in Bosnia were receiving and secretly training with weapons from pro-Milosevic circles.¹⁴⁸⁸ All parties claimed that the others were making lists of names of people from other ethnic groups who were to be murdered.¹⁴⁸⁹

So, not surprisingly, the support of 74 per cent for a ban on national parties was as large as it was lukewarm. It was a reflection of the awareness that division along ethnic lines carried great risks, judging by the occurrences of the Second World War. Be that as it may, as soon as the situation were to deteriorate, it was to be expected that the diverse population groups would fall back to their own ethnic party. As a consequence, the existence of the formerly dominant Communist party in Bosnia, which, ¹⁴⁸² Dusan T. Batakovic, 'Collective and Human Rights: Opposing Views from Former Yugoslavia', Baehr & Baudet & Werdmöller (eds.), Tights, p. 68.

¹⁴⁸³ X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p.99.

¹⁴⁸⁴ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 45.

¹⁴⁸⁵ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 35-36.

¹⁴⁸⁶ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 44.

¹⁴⁸⁷ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 218; Ramet, Milosevic, p. 102; appendix Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnie.

¹⁴⁸⁸ See for Srebrenica Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

¹⁴⁸⁹ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 147-148.

with the upheavals elsewhere in Eastern Europe, was under pressure anyway and now at even greater risk.

In the spring of 1990, the Communist party of Bosnia-Herzegovina attempted to deter ethnicization of politics by taking a great leap forward, that is to say by calling elections at very short notice. When it became clear that no other parties could organize themselves in such a short period, the Communist leaders had to abandon this plan as their legitimacy would otherwise be seriously damaged. The next attempt at repelling ethnicization was the Bosnian parliament's adoption in March 1990 of an electoral law forbidding political organisations with an ethnic basis. The Bosnian Constitutional Court declared the act unconstitutional, however.

With that, the road was open for the formation of political parties based on ethnic principles. The former Communist party was reconstructed into the Communist League – Social Democratic Party (Savez Komunističke – Socijalističke Demokratske Partije (SK-SDP)). Pluralism and the transition to a market economy were included in its programme. Furthermore, the party also devoted itself to preserving the federal Yugoslavia. That was also what the reformist party of the Federal Prime Minister Markovic wanted. This party appeared to have excellent prospects during the election campaign. That he attracted an audience of more than 100,000 to Mount Kozara, a location in a predominantly Serb area, illustrates this. Formally speaking, the only parties that were permitted in Bosnia-Herzegovina were autochthonous but in practice that did not stop Serbs or Croats from setting up parties that were closely connected to party formations in Belgrade, Knin and Zagreb. Approximately 40 new parties were established. However, the most important were three parties whose explicit premise was ethnic nationalism. In the run-up to the first, free post-war elections, all ethnic groups wanted to be represented by their own specific party. This had the appearance of an ethnic political contest.

3. Alija Izetbegovic's political career

The race was opened by the three most important men sentenced to imprisonment for 'national and Muslim fundamentalism' in 1983, Izetbegovic, Behmen and Hasan Cengic, who, with a few others, had set up the Party of Democratic Action (Stranka Demokratske Akcije (SDA)), a Muslim party. Of all the nationalist party leaders in Bosnia, the then 64-year-old Alija Izetbegovic was to be the most enigmatic.

Born in Bosanski Samac in 1925, his forefathers were Muslims who had been in commerce in Belgrade, but who had fled from Serbia to Bosnia in the nineteenth century. At the age of three, Izetbegovic moved to Sarajevo with his family, where he joined the Young Muslims (Mladi Muslimani), a movement with a hundred or so members established in 1939 to protect Muslim interests. After the Second World War, the Communists accused the movement of having had ties with the youth movement of the Ustashe. Izetbegovic would later deny that. He believed that the activities of the Young Muslims were aimed at putting Islam into practice, it being understood that its foremost task was the formation of a Muslim state.¹⁴⁹⁰ After the war, Izetbegovic co-founded the organization 'Fighters of the True Creed'. He was arrested in March 1946, accused of inciting 'religious hatred' and sentenced to three years' imprisonment.

After his release from prison in 1948, he studied law in Sarajevo. Subsequently, he became a legal adviser to two large companies. In 1970, Izetbegovic published the Islamska Deklaracija (Islamic Declaration). In the 1990s, in order to demonstrate that Izetbegovic was aspiring to a form of Muslim supremacy in Bosnia¹⁴⁹¹, Serb nationalists would frequently cite a number of pronouncements made in this manifesto. Incidentally, the word 'Bosnia' appears nowhere in the text. In this declaration, Izetbegovic emphasized that it was impossible for Islamic and non-Islamic institutions to co-exist peacefully. He also argued in favour of a regeneration of Islam by creating a pan-Islamic world 'from ¹⁴⁹⁰ Ivan Sabic, 'Covjek koji se ne mijenja', Danas, 19/03/93, p. 32.

¹⁴⁹¹ Cf. Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 292, for example.

Morocco to Indonesia'. He went on to proclaim that when Turkey was still an Islamic land, it was much more powerful than the secular state it later became. As soon as Islam was morally and numerically strong enough to bring down non-Islamic rule and replace it with an Islamic version, it should indeed, in his view, assume power. For that, Muslims would have to make up at least half of the population. Once that situation had been reached, peace or co-existence between the Islamic faith on the one hand and non-Islamic political and social institutions on the other would be out of the question. Providing they were granted freedom of religion and a normal life, Muslim minorities would demonstrate loyalty and discharge their civic duties, 'excluding those that prejudice Islam and Muslims', as long as Muslim were not yet in the majority.¹⁴⁹²

In the early 1980s, when the Communist authorities started to fear the Islamic revival that had begun to burgeon after the recognition of the Muslims as an ethnic group, they decided to prosecute its principal representatives. Among the Communist authorities, there were also Muslims who wanted to prevent Muslim awareness from becoming too overtly religious. Accordingly, in 1983, Izetbegovic was arrested and tried together with others for 'hostile activities' and 'fundamentalist aberrations', i.e. the pronouncements he made in the Islamic Declaration published 13 years earlier. The judiciary in Sarajevo saw in the actions of Izetbegovic and his followers and in his writing a reconfirmation of the Mladi Muslimani proclaiming the establishment of a Muslim state.¹⁴⁹³ Moreover, with the exception of Izetbegovic, all the defendants had secretly visited Iran at the beginning of 1983 to celebrate the anniversary of the Islamic revolution.¹⁴⁹⁴ This time Izetbegovic was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment, later reduced by the Federal Court in Belgrade to nine years' detention. The court in Sarajevo hearing the case in first instance, did, for that matter, make it clear that the trial was not against the Muslim creed or against Islamites in general, but concerned a group whose objective was an ethnically clean Muslim Bosnia-Herzegovina, and which aimed at substituting the socialist system of Yugoslavia with a social order based on the principles of Islam.¹⁴⁹⁵

In 1984, shortly after his conviction, Izetbegovic published Islam između istoka i zapada (Islam between East and West). The book received little attention in the West and if it was at all noted it was mainly glossed over, for instance in the magazine The New Republic.¹⁴⁹⁶

Izetbegovic's book, Islam Between East and West, (...) should have been a defence lawyer's dream. An amateurish work, an intellectual hodgepodge, it is the product of an anxious assimilé, a child of the western tradition reassuring himself that all the sources of his mind add up to a coherent whole, a man of our messy world born at the crossroads of cultures. This must be the only book on Islam with nine references to Dostoevski, seven to Albert Camus, nine to Hegel, three to Malraux, two to Rembrandt, ten to Bertrand Russell, eight to Kenneth Clark, and so on. This is not the work of a Muslim fundamentalist, or a traditional apologist.¹⁴⁹⁷

Reading this book might well have revealed that Izetbegovic had a somewhat fundamentalist streak, if fundamentalism is defined as the wish to base the organization and the workings of a social and politic ¹⁴⁹² For an overview of suchlike quotes, Cf. Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.), Conflict, pp. 129-130; Johnstone, 'Izetbegovic'; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 220; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 118; Zametica, Conflict, pp. 38-39. In a speech at the beginning of July 1990, Izetbegovic would even have considered that an Islamic majority of 70 per cent of the population was necessary, Silber & Little, Death, p. 208.

¹⁴⁹³ Yugoslav Press Agency, 'Trial of Muslim fundamentalists in Sarajevo', 1414 and 1906, 18/07/83 and 1433, 21/07/83, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 02/08/83.

¹⁴⁹⁴ Ljiljana Smajlovic, 'Strategy of Flirt', Vreme, 04/06/96.

¹⁴⁹⁵ Yugoslav Press Agency, 'Sentences Reduced on Muslim Nationalists', 1240, 30/05/84, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 02/06/84.

¹⁴⁹⁶ For a critical discussion in the West of both of Izetbegovic's publications, see Johnstone, 'Izetbegovic'.

¹⁴⁹⁷ Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 51.

system on religious notions. In his book, Izetbegovic positioned Islam in relation to the materialistic and in particular the socialist world, which represented values he could not subscribe to, among them rationalism, self-interest and uniformity.¹⁴⁹⁸

The book was Izetbegovic's attempt to set himself up as intermediary between East and West. As he would say later, the Bosnian Muslims lived with their hearts in the Islamic world and with their heads in Europe – religious by birth and European by education.¹⁴⁹⁹ According to Izetbegovic, Islam itself was in several respects a synthesis of the religious and the material world in particular.¹⁵⁰⁰ Whilst Christianity took care of inner well-being and socialism of outward well-being, Islam presented a synthesis of both.¹⁵⁰¹ Hence, Izetbegovic saw Islam not just as a religion, but as a fundamental principle for a social and political order.¹⁵⁰² Conversely, the social order should 'promote the ideals of religion and ethics'.¹⁵⁰³ For him, an Islam without a political component meant reducing it to religious mysticism, which was unacceptable, and at the same time, it meant accepting that others would decide the fate of the Islamites and that could not be tolerated.¹⁵⁰⁴ In Izetbegovic's view, the dualism of Islam was also expressed in the shabeed, 'Islam's greatest figure'. The shabeed was a fighter for God. He was at once a soldier and a saint, unlike the doctrine of the Christian West where religion and worldly dominance were separated.¹⁵⁰⁵ In Islam, the pursuit of moral perfection went hand in hand with the desire for happiness and power.¹⁵⁰⁶ Just as Islam denounces rulers who do not believe, so it denounces believers without power, Izetbegovic said.¹⁵⁰⁷ There is no distinction between law and theology in Islam. Consequently, Izetbegovic believed that Islamic law was superior to that of the West.¹⁵⁰⁸

The book also contained some pointers with regard to Izetbegovic's position with regard to the realities surrounding him, albeit rather unspecific ones. In his view, Islam takes up a position between historic determinism and idealism. Given circumstances and personal freedom of choice pertain to each other as communicating vessels.¹⁵⁰⁹ Izetbegovic's fatalism does not seem to be entirely consonant with this. For him, the most significant value of the Islam is the acceptance of fate.¹⁵¹⁰ The number of factors that man could influence were negligible in the light of what he had no hold over; man was the victim of chance. He was steeped in the circumstances in which he existed. In spite of every advance, man would continue to suffer. As such, it was better if he were to subject himself to God who governed his fate. That, at least, would give him a sense of security.¹⁵¹¹

Izetbegovic's fatalism in tandem with his endeavour to carry at least some weight in history, are also found elsewhere in his publications. For instance in June 1995, he said to the executive committee of his party, the SDA, that since history is decided by fate and God, its course is as it should be.¹⁵¹² He also felt that the SDA should work towards a nationwide revival of Muslim national awareness in Bosnia and emphasize their part in society.¹⁵¹³ He saw pending war in Bosnia-Herzegovina as an ordeal for the Muslims ordained by God.¹⁵¹⁴

¹⁴⁹⁸ Izetbegovic, East, pp. xviii and xxvii.

¹⁴⁹⁹ Cf. Izetbegovic, Govori, pp. xviii, 43 and 125.

¹⁵⁰⁰ Izetbegovic, East, p. xxv.

¹⁵⁰¹ Izetbegovic, East, pp. xxviii and xxx.

¹⁵⁰² Izetbegovic, East, p. xviii.

¹⁵⁰³ Izetbegovic, East, p. xix.

¹⁵⁰⁴ Izetbegovic, East, p. xxxi.

¹⁵⁰⁵ Izetbegovic, East, p. 213.

¹⁵⁰⁶ Izetbegovic, East, p. 225.

¹⁵⁰⁷ Izetbegovic, East, p. 227.

¹⁵⁰⁸ Izetbegovic, East, pp. 242-243.

¹⁵⁰⁹ Izetbegovic, East, p. 233.

¹⁵¹⁰ Izetbegovic, East, p. 289.

¹⁵¹¹ Izetbegovic, East, pp. 289-292.

¹⁵¹² Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 69.

¹⁵¹³ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 70.

¹⁵¹⁴ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 100.

In November 1988, Izetbegovic was released early from prison, at the instigation of such individuals as Seselj, then professor of sociology. Subsequently, he was assured of being surrounded by a small group of faithful followers with a somewhat circumscribed world view. The Izetbegovic who emerged from his books remained all but unknown in the West. In the eyes of the world's media, the leader of the SDA and later President of Bosnia was a timid man, who seemed to wear the cloak of leadership with a great sense of unease. 'He seemed diminished, rather than inflated, by the opulence of the presidential palace', wrote Zimmermann.¹⁵¹⁵ Western diplomats, military and journalists doubtless saw in him a pious Muslim, but by no means a fundamentalist.¹⁵¹⁶ 'A man of reason and reconciliation: a loner', Peter Michielsen of the NRC Handelsblad newspaper called him, a peculiar characterization in the light of a speech by Izetbegovic in the spring of 1991, cited in the same article, in which the Bosnian politician said that the Muslims would oppose a splitting-up of Bosnia,¹⁵¹⁷ 'taking up weapons', if need be. Kooijmans, the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs, who would succeed Van den Broek at the beginning of 1993, saw Izetbegovic as 'a tormented man. I felt immensely sorry for the man. Fate had thrown him in high relief. He had become a standard-bearer and could be nothing other than that'.¹⁵¹⁸ Western politicians and journalists almost always saw in him the advocate of a multi-ethnic Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁵¹⁹ Writing about the 1983 verdict, Martin van den Heuvel, an expert on Eastern Europe, said that under Communism, a sentence did 'of course not mean much. And Izetbegovic was above all a peaceful Muslim, an advocate of non-violence and harmonious co-operation between all peoples and religions in Bosnia. He was often compared to Ghandi because of his peace-loving behaviour'.¹⁵²⁰ Raymond Detrez, the Belgian expert on the Balkans, wrote that Izetbegovic in fact set no more store by religion in politics than Christian Democrat party chairman in Western Europe.¹⁵²¹ The enigma Izetbegovic was wasted on them.

Veering between a fatalistic attitude to life and the concept of being the executor of God's will, he often shilly-shallied or tended to retract decisions, a fatal attitude for a political leader who was to end up in such a tight corner. This did make him a moderator between various movements in his own party, but his vacillating posture and his revocations on prior agreements made him a statesman with whom it was difficult to do business. His wavering attitudes were criticized by Bosnian Serbs and Muslims alike. Rajko Dukic, the prominent SDS (Serb Democratic Party) man, said on that score:

'It is almost impossible to come to an agreement with Izetbegovic. There are no problems at the negotiating stage. You can say to him: this is a pen, that's what we'll agree on, tomorrow we'll discuss the notepad. The problem is that Izetbegovic doesn't turn up the next day. He always sent Cengic. And with him you could start all over again, as if nothing had happened the previous day.'¹⁵²²

The Muslim intellectual Muhamed Filipovic, who would join an opposition party, wrote that during negotiations Izetbegovic had the habit of:

'leaving each decision, particularly the important ones, till the following day. The most obvious reason for that was that he always had to discuss such ¹⁵¹⁵ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 172.

¹⁵¹⁶ Cf. Laura Silber, 'The terrifying logic of war', Financial Times, 02/09/95.

¹⁵¹⁷ Peter Michielsen, 'Bosnië meegesleurd in kolkend conflict' (Bosnia dragged into seething conflict), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/91.

¹⁵¹⁸ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

¹⁵¹⁹ Cf. Zimmerman, Ambassador, p. 9.

¹⁵²⁰ Van den Heuvel, Land, p. 117.

¹⁵²¹ Detrez, Balkan, p. 135.

¹⁵²² Interview R. Dukic, 14/06/00.

decisions with his most trusted friends, whom he had to turn to for support. There is no alternative way of interpreting this behaviour.¹⁵²³

Izetbegovic's principal confidants in the early days of the SDA were Omer Behmen and Hasan Cengic. Together with Sulejman Ugljanin, they were to become deputy chairmen of the SDA in 1991.

A contemporary of Izetbegovic, Behmen had been sentenced to eight years' imprisonment for Muslim fundamentalism during the 1983 trial. Prior to that, he had already been given a 20-year sentence on similar grounds. In all, he had spent 17 years in prison, a fact that did not make his dealings with the outside world any the easier. A particularly repressive prison regime and being spied on in prison, had made a suspicious man of him.¹⁵²⁴ Shortly after the foundation, he was given the lead of the extremely important executive committee of the SDA. Like Cengic, Behmen had good connections with the government of Iran¹⁵²⁵ and was to become Ambassador to Teheran in 1993.

Hasan Cengic was the son of Halid ('Hadzija') Cengic, one of the members of Mladi Muslimani. Hasan had studied theology at the university of Sarajevo and was an Imam. Izetbegovic was a shining example for him in the early 1980s and they became close friends. In the circle of fifty and sixty-year-olds around Izetbegovic, Behmen and his own father, who came from the Mladi Muslimani, Hasan Cengic became the link to the group of younger Muslims studying at the Sarajevo Medresa, the Islamic religious school. Cengic held radical Islamic positions. For instance, he was to turn against blood transfusions between Muslims and non-Muslims. At the invitation of the Iranian authorities, Cengic went on a study trip to Teheran in 1982. On return to Sarajevo, he was arrested and stood trial with others, including Izetbegovic and Behmen. On appeal, he was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and he remained in prison until 1986. After his release, he became Imam in the mosque in Zagreb, at which time it formed the core of the Islamic resistance to the government in Yugoslavia. This time, he was the link for Izetbegovic with circles in the Zagreb mosque, which would have an important share in the SDA. In 1990, he became SDA secretary. He fulfilled his most important role after 1992 by maintaining contacts with the Iranian government and organizing weapon purchases from his villa in Zagreb.¹⁵²⁶ As the chief weapon buyer in the Bosnian government army, he was also known as the Shadow Minister of Defence.

Apart from Behmen and Hasan Cengic, further individuals such as Enver Mujezinovic, Fikret Muslimovic and Bakir Alispahic who were also included in the circle of Izetbegovic familiars came from the KOS. In the 1980s, they had fought 'Muslim fundamentalism' and suddenly, in 1991 and 1992, they sided with Izetbegovic, whilst moving to take control of the new Bosnian security organizations. They frequently gave Izetbegovic radical advice, whilst giving him the impression that the intentions of Milosevic and the Bosnian Serb politicians and the military were not so bad. As a result, the idea took root among various leading Bosnian figures that the regime in Belgrade was controlling Izetbegovic via the KOS.¹⁵²⁷ Although that may not be ruled out altogether, particularly not prior to the outbreak of the war in Bosnia, the influence of the advisers had probably more to do with Izetbegovic's tendency to keep on the safe side and always confer with others. As the commander of the Bosnian government army said, 'His personality structure is highly interesting and even if he is against a particular suggestion, he never dismisses anything. His reactions were invariably that it was interesting and that he would think it over.'¹⁵²⁸ Obviously, that gave people close to him the chance to attempt to influence his way of thinking.

¹⁵²³ Muhamed Filipovic, 'Hasan Cengic's Conspiratorial Logic', Dani, 08/04/00.

¹⁵²⁴ Cf. 'Muslim nationalist prisoner interviewed by 'Borba'', 1656, 08/06/87, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 11/06/87.

¹⁵²⁵ John Pomfret & David B. Ottaway, 'U.S. Allies Fed Pipeline of Covert Arms to Bosnia', The Washington Post, 12/05/96.

¹⁵²⁶ For information regarding the role of Cengic, cf. John Pomfret & David B. Ottaway, 'U.S. Allies Fed Pipeline of Covert Arms to Bosnia', The Washington Post, 12/05/96; Tino Andic & Marko Juric, 'Muslimanska obavestajna sluzba AIS s dopustenjem ministra Suska djeluje pod krinkom humnitarnih organizacija u Zagrebu, Splitu i Rijeci, a bavi se nabavom oruza za Armiju BiH!', Globus, 11/10/96, pp. 14-16.

¹⁵²⁷ Cf. Halilovic, Strategija, p. 82; Alibabic, Bosna, passim.

¹⁵²⁸ Emir Imamovic, 'Izetbegovic wanted Sarajevo under siege', Reporter, undated, p. 7.

In 1989, Izetbegovic, Behmen and Cengic held talks about establishing a party in Zurich with Adil Zulfikarpasic, a rich Muslim businessman who lived there. Zulfikarpasic came from an aristocratic family that once owned land near Srebrenica. Like several sons from bey families, he had joined the Communist party in the 1930s. After the war, he held the position of deputy minister of trade in Bosnia. However, he was soon grew disgusted with the nepotism, greed and corruption of the Communists.¹⁵²⁹ He went abroad and became active in the diaspora, including such activities as promoting a Bosnian sense of identity with his magazine Bosanski pogledi (Bosnian ideas). The brainchild of Zulfikarpasic, the Bosniak Institute in Zurich also published a book about the trial of Izetbegovic cum suis and induced the Serb nationalist Dobrica Cosic in Belgrade to organize a protest against the trial. Izetbegovic's son, Bakir, later found a job at the Bosniak Institute. Izetbegovic's visit to his patron in Zurich was the beginning of a series of meetings between the future party leaders.

On 24 February 1990, a few weeks after the collapse of the Communist League of Yugoslavia, Izetbegovic and Zulfikarpasic agreed to found a party as soon as possible.¹⁵³⁰ Together with several others in Tuzla, on 27 March 1990, Alija Izetbegovic founded the Party of Democratic Action (Stranka Demokratske Akcije (SDA)). Among the forty founders were eight from the group of Mladi Muslimani and twelve from the Zagreb mosque. The movement presented itself as a 'political union of Yugoslav citizens who are part of the cultural and historic Muslim tradition' and appeared not only to focus on the Bosnian Muslims, but on those in Kosovo, Macedonia and Sandzak as well. In addition to such general objectives as a parliamentary democracy, the party also had more specific Islamic goals, including the introduction of Islamic feasts as national holidays and subsidies for building mosques. Izetbegovic became the party leader. Zulfikarpasic arrived in Bosnia two days after the party was founded and was appointed deputy chairman. The SDA grew rapidly under Izetbegovic and his followers. In November 1990, more than six months after its foundation, the party had 120 branches in Bosnia, 29 in other parts of Yugoslavia and 24 in the rest of the world, including one in the Netherlands.¹⁵³¹

That growth unnerved Serb nationalists. Allaying comments that a Muslim state would not be established until half the population was Muslim did nothing to set their minds at rest. By 1991, Muslims comprised 44 per cent of the population. Serb nationalists believed that Muslims had a predetermined plan to eventually outnumber the Serbs with high birth rates.¹⁵³² That would have been the case when extrapolating demographic developments even without such a plan.

4. Radovan Karadzic's political career

It was thus a matter of course that the Serb nationalists would organize themselves, although it was three and a half months after the formation of the SDA before the Serb Democratic Party (Srpska Demokratska Stranka (SDS)) was founded. Three thousand people attended the inaugural conference, among them not only the Serb leaders from Knin, Jovan Raskovic and Jovo Opacic, but Izetbegovic, the new SDA leader, was also invited. The SDS officially set itself the unconditional task of achieving equality for all Serbs in all social fields in Bosnia. From the onset, the SDS endeavoured to be a movement for the all Serb people rather than just a party. Consequently, membership was impossible.¹⁵³³

¹⁵²⁹ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 78-82.

¹⁵³⁰ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. xv.

¹⁵³¹ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 72.

¹⁵³² Sells, Bridge, p. 22.

¹⁵³³ Interview R. Dukic, 14/06/00.

The role of Dobrica Cosic

The almost seventy-year-old nationalist writer, Dobrica Cosic, played a significant part in the founding. In 1992 and 1993, Cosic was to step into the limelight as the President of Yugoslavia. During this period, however, he still played his favourite role, that of the great man behind the scenes, whose political activities among the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia were financially and logistically supported by the Serb secret police.¹⁵³⁴

Cosic had become a Communist in 1939 while studying at a secondary school of agriculture.¹⁵³⁵ He had been political commissioner of a partisan unit during the Second World War. Thanks in part to his friendship with Tito, he had become a prominent post-war member of the Communist party. However, the reputation he acquired stemmed largely from his authorship. First published in 1951, his first literary endeavour – Daleko je sunce (Far is the Sun) – was an immediate and overwhelming success. With one million copies, it was up till then the best sold book in Yugoslavia, which discussed the suffering of the Serb people under Ottoman oppression.

At the end of the 1950s, he led the jugoslovenstvo campaign and opposed nationalism, which appeared to be growing, particularly in Slovenia. Moreover, on account of Cosic's leadership and the close ties he had with Rankovic¹⁵³⁶ – the Serb head of the secret service – nationalist-minded individuals outside Serbia questioned the merit of the jugoslovenstvo campaign. In the early 1960s, Tito offered Cosic the job of chairman of the Serb Communist party, but he refused, having always been better able to face the half-light than the limelight.¹⁵³⁷ Cosic lost a powerful patron, however, once Rankovic had been sidelined. Furthermore, he became convinced that the Serbs would gain nothing from the Communist party, despite his long-cherished hopes. Cosic now began to see Yugoslavism, which he had previously defended with such force – contrary to many others outside Serbia – as a means for the Communist party oligarchies outside Serbia to express national sentiments. His Serb nationalism was now fired by talks held at the end of the 1950s with Slovenians, concluding that the break-up of Yugoslavia was inevitable.

In 1967, Cosic himself set the cat among the Communist pigeons with his talk of an existentialist threat of the Serbs from Albanian nationalism in Kosovo, after Rankovic and his rigid policy on Albania had been pushed to the sidelines.¹⁵³⁸ He warned that if Albanian nationalism were not put to an end, the Serbs would split up the multi-ethnic state of Yugoslavia in order to achieve their 'ancient historic goal' of establishing a Greater Serbia. A shocked Presidency adjourned the meeting, but Cosic had prompted a mental process which in time would prove unstoppable.¹⁵³⁹ On the grounds of his nationalism, he was ousted from the party's central committee a year later, resigning his party membership.

Outside the party, his authority as a Serb nationalist grew over the years. He was often called the 'father of the (Serb) nation'. His historic novels and political essays contributed substantially to the idea that Serbs were the victims of history. He stressed the genocide perpetrated against them during the Second World War and the way in which they were supposedly deceived by Tito after the war, who, in effect, followed an anti-Serb line.¹⁵⁴⁰ In 1977, in a speech to the Serb Academy of Science and Art, Cosic made what was to become a frequently quoted pronouncement that in peacetime, Serbs lose what they have won in wartime.¹⁵⁴¹ Initially, the text of the speech circulated illegally and it was only after Tito's demise that it was officially published in Stvarno i moguće, a collection of literary and political ¹⁵³⁴ For information regarding the line between the head of the Serb SDB Stanisic and Karadzic, cf. Berislav Jelinic, 'Croatian citizen is the primary financier of both Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic', National online, no. 294, 05/07/01.

¹⁵³⁵ The S. Djukic interview of 04/08/01 is one of the sources for biographic information on Cosic.

¹⁵³⁶ Christopher Cviic, 'Slovene and Croat Perspectives', Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, pp. 120-121.

¹⁵³⁷ Jovic, Dani, p. 192.

¹⁵³⁸ Libal, Serben, p. 105.

¹⁵³⁹ Gutman, Witness, pp. 17-18.

¹⁵⁴⁰ Cf. Mirko Dodevic, 'Populist Wave Literature', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 362.

¹⁵⁴¹ Brey, Logik, p. 89; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 170.

essays. When published in Nin, it was ascribed all the qualities needed for a Serb nationalist bible and instantly became a best-seller. Cosic worded it most succinctly in what became known as the Serb question (Srpsko pitanje):

‘Very broadly speaking, it is the demand for equality for the entire Serb nation and its republic in Yugoslavia, for recognition of the human and civil rights of the Serbs, wherever they live in Yugoslavia; it is the demand for a society in which the citizen and not the nation is the foundation of the state.’¹⁵⁴²

Cosic believed that like the Serbs, the Croats, Slovenians and Kosovo Albanians had the right to a state of their own. However, the Croats and Kosovo Albanians should bear Serb claims to the territory of Croatia and Kosovo in mind. Cosic also repeatedly spoke in support of non-Serb nationalists under arrest, such as Izetbegovic, Tudjman and Jansa, defending their right to freedom. After his release, Izetbegovic went to Cosic to thank him.¹⁵⁴³

As such, Cosic’s nationalism could be broadly defined as democratic or liberal, were it not that he always placed special emphasis on the rights of Serb citizens, while the same rights could also be claimed for Croatian citizens or Albanians in Kosovo.¹⁵⁴⁴

With his body of ideas, Cosic’s adherents in the Serb Academy of Sciences grew. In 1986, the Yugoslav Writers Association was the first Yugoslav institution to break up because the Slovenian authors feared Serb hegemony led by Cosic. Many say that Cosic was the driving force behind the infamous Memorandum of the Serb Academy of Sciences¹⁵⁴⁵, but he has always denied this.¹⁵⁴⁶

As from 1990, the nationalist writer saw – in Milosevic – the man who would at last stand up for the Serb people.¹⁵⁴⁷ Cosic’s support for Milosevic was very momentous. His backing meant that a permanent bridge was being built for Milosevic to the nationalist groups and the intelligentsia.¹⁵⁴⁸ In spite of that, Cosic remained in some respects sceptical towards Milosevic. He disagreed with Milosevic’s having built his party on the old Communist party. In Cosic’s view, Serbia needed a social democratic rather than a socialist party. Cosic understood that everything that smacked of Communism would have an enormous image problem in the West. Furthermore, Cosic thought that Serbia should not claim a full hold on Kosovo.¹⁵⁴⁹

Towards the end of the 1980s, he advocated for the Serbs to concentrate on their own people and leave the rest of Yugoslavia to the other ethnic groups.¹⁵⁵⁰ In the early 1990s, he attended the inception of the Serb Democratic Party (SDS) in Knin and maintained close contact with the leaders, Jovan Opacic and the psychiatrist Jovan Raskovic.¹⁵⁵¹ Raskovic’s SDS had set up a branch office in Bosnia as early as July 1990, and this office was particularly active in the regions bordering on the Croat Krajina. In subsequent months, Cosic developed the idea that the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia should be united territorially.¹⁵⁵² At the beginning of the war with Croatia, he called ‘pacifistic rhetoric (...)

¹⁵⁴² Quoted in Libal, Serben, p. 106. See also Levinsohn, Serbs, pp. 303-304.

¹⁵⁴³ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 118.

¹⁵⁴⁴ Cf. Drinka Gojkovic, ‘The Birth of Nationalism from the Spirit of Democracy. The Association of Writers of Serbia and the War’, Popov (ed.), Road, p. 334.

¹⁵⁴⁵ Cf. Bennett, Collapse, p. 81; Oliveira Milosavljevic, ‘The Abuse of the Authority of Science’, Popov (ed.), Road, pp. 274 and 276; Ramet, Babel, p. 200.

¹⁵⁴⁶ Interview S. Djukic, 04/08/01. Cf. Jdah, Serbs, p. 158

¹⁵⁴⁷ Cosic quoted in Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 306.

¹⁵⁴⁸ Jovic, Dani, p. 130. Cf. interview L. Perovic, 01/08/01.

¹⁵⁴⁹ Jovic, Dani, p. 194.

¹⁵⁵⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 28.

¹⁵⁵¹ Jovic, Dani, p. 193; Weine, History, p. 92.

¹⁵⁵² Cohen, Bonds, p. 142.

meaningless'. He called on the population to fight for Greater Serbia and praised Milosevic as the best Serb leader in fifty years.¹⁵⁵³

The role of Nikola Koljevic and Biljana Plavsic

Cosic entrusted a colleague and friend of Jovan Raskovic, Radovan Karadzic,¹⁵⁵⁴ with Serb party leadership in Bosnia. As it happened, Karadzic was not Cosic's first choice. By his own account, he preferred Nenad Kecmanovic, the Serb chancellor of the University of Sarajevo, who was known for his liberal views on Yugoslav and Bosnian politics. Kecmanovic was later to assume the leadership of the Bosnian branch of the reform-minded party of Ante Markovic, losing the contest for a place in the Bosnian Presidency from Nikola Koljevic and Biljana Plavsic. It was precisely these two who, with others, had urged Cosic not to appoint Kecmanovic as Bosnian Serb leader, but the initially reluctant Radovan Karadzic. Because Cosic was alone in putting Kecmanovic forward, he reconciled himself to the suggestion to entrust Karadzic with the leadership.¹⁵⁵⁵

The names Koljevic and Plavsic require some explanation. It is true that the SDS was a party of the Serbs, most of whom lived outside the large cities, and the furious attacks this party made on multi-ethnicity and modernity were often seen as a struggle between the countryside and the city. However, there were many professors among the SDA leadership. Plavsic was a professor of biology at the University of Sarajevo, Koljevic a professor of English, specializing in Shakespeare, and the man who was to become Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republika Srpska in 1992, Aleksa Buha, was professor of German philosophy, who had obtained his doctorate with a dissertation on Hegel.

Koljevic was regarded as the brain of the SDS and the man who attempted to justify ethnic cleansing intellectually. He has been compared to Alfred Rosenberg, the German Nazi race ideologue. Nikola Koljevic suffered from depression after the death of his seventeen-year-old son during a skiing accident in Austria in 1977. These depressions were caused by a bizarre guilt complex, which took on the character of a Shakespearean drama. He saw his son's death as a punishment for something he had done to his brother Svetozar. Like Nikola, Svetozar had specialized in English literature. The two brothers were both intelligent, but it was clear to all that Svetozar was the more brilliant of the two. When Svetozar received a scholarship to study abroad, he left his fiancée Milica Medic in the care of Nikola. On his return home, Svetozar's fiancée was pregnant, by Nikola. Nikola and Milica married soon after. The family wanted no trouble and forced Svetozar to marry Milica's sister. After the death of his son, Nikola withdrew more and more into Christian Orthodox mysticism. He believed that not only did God want to punish him for stealing his brother's fiancée, but also for having behaved like an Englishman up to then. In an attempt to put matters straight, he became an increasingly fanatic Serb nationalist. He was increasingly enthralled by philosophy professor and prominent member of the Serb Academy of Sciences and Art, Milorad Ekmecic, and Karadzic, who treated him for his depression.¹⁵⁵⁶ It was a tragic change for the worse. Until then, he had been known as a cultured man and was popular among his students.¹⁵⁵⁷ After the outbreak of war, he became the most militant prophet for the destruction of Sarajevo. Bosnian Muslim Ejup Ganic, who with Koljevic had become a member of the Bosnian Presidency in 1990, later compared him to a well-behaved little boy who had to do the most terrible things to be allowed to join the gang.¹⁵⁵⁸ On 17 January 1997, he took his own life.

¹⁵⁵³ Gutman, Witness, pp.18-19.

¹⁵⁵⁴ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 149; Weine, History, p. 125.

¹⁵⁵⁵ Interviews D. Cosic, 13/09/01 and V. Matovic, 02/08/01. According to Weine, History, p. 240 n. 6, before choosing Karadzic, apart from Kecmanovic had his eye on Svetozar Koljevic – the latter's brother Nikolai and Radovan Vukovic – to no avail. In the same interview, Matovic also speaks of a list of several names.

¹⁵⁵⁶ Thomas Deichmann, "Ik heb niets verkeerd gedaan" (I did nothing wrong), De Groene Amsterdammer, 13/08/97; Janine Di Giovanni, 'The Cleanser', The Guardian, weekend page, 01/03/97.

¹⁵⁵⁷ Cf. Bell, Way, p. 97; Judah, Serbs, p. 166.

¹⁵⁵⁸ Janine Di Giovanni, 'The Cleanser', The Guardian, weekend page, 01/03/97.

It was also Koljevic who invited the sixty-year-old Plavsic to join the SDS executive in 1990. In the words of the American journalist David Rieff, Plavsic was 'far and away the weirdest of the lot'.¹⁵⁵⁹ She was born in Tuzla and raised in Sarajevo, in a rich merchant family that had an aversion to the Communists. She received a university education in Zagreb, Prague and the United States. Finally, she became professor of biology at the University of Zagreb. Like the others in the SDS leadership, she did not enter politics until after the fall of Communism, where she soon proved to be a nationalist hawk.

In April 1992, President Izetbegovic sent her as member of the Presidency to Eastern Bosnia to investigate the atrocities perpetrated there by Serb troops and paramilitaries. To the horror of the world, she kissed Arkan in front of the cameras just after the latter's savage operations in Bijelina and called him 'a true Serb hero'. Shortly afterwards, she became a member of the Presidency of the Republika Srpska, with Karadzic and Krajisnik. As a politician, she would later play a leading role in ethnic cleansing and was frequently at the front, encouraging and thanking the soldiers. Like Koljevic, she justified ethnic cleansing with great – and in her case, social Darwinist – conviction. She termed Muslims 'genetically deformed' Serbs and ethnic cleansing a 'natural phenomenon'.¹⁵⁶⁰ Serbs had the 'biological right' to cleanse. 'As a biologist' she was under the impression that Bosnian Serbs were higher in rank than the Serbs in Serbia, as they had more often been compelled to adapt to new surroundings. Plavsic went so far in her fanaticism as to say that as far as she was concerned, six million Serbs could die for the good cause since six million would be left over to benefit from it. After that remark, Milosevic said she was of unsound mind: 'She does not belong in politics and urgently needs a psychiatrist.'¹⁵⁶¹

Together with Karadzic and Momcilo Krajisnik, Koljevic and Plavsic were to form the leadership of the SDS. It was no coincidence that Karadzic, like the leader of the SDS in Knin, Rankovic, was a psychiatrist. Among their patients, they had noted the suppressed traumas caused by the ethnic struggles during the Second World War. Things that were not allowed out into the open during the Communist regime came out in the psychiatrist's rooms. Both developed an ethnically based socio-political programme, based on the tales of woe they had heard and the therapies they employed.¹⁵⁶² The leadership of the SDS, whose individual members displayed countless unresolved traumas in their biographies, were just right for an electorate with a fear of the future or, as Tim Judah writes in his book on the history of the Serbs: 'In such times it seems that people are simply willing to surrender all critical faculties and be led by the mad (...)'¹⁵⁶³

The rise of Radovan Karadzic

Like a rocket, Radovan Karadzic, too, had risen from nowhere into the political firmament of the Yugoslav republic. Until the foundation of the SDS, few had ever heard of him outside of Bosnia.

He was born on 19 June 1945 in Petnica, a village in the Savnik district in the Montenegrin hills, not far from where Milosevic was born. His father, Vuk Karadzic, had originally belonged to the Cetniks during the Second World War, but later switched over to Tito's Partisan party. Six months after Radovan Karadzic was born, his father was arrested on account of his Cetnik past. Whilst Radovan was growing up, his father spent five years in prison. The circumstances in which he grew up with his family were destitute, in a village with a parochial outlook.¹⁵⁶⁴ His mother looked after the cattle and, when his father was released from prison, he soon resumed his shoemaker's craft. Karadzic left home at the age of fifteen to finish his secondary schooling in Sarajevo, after which he trained as a nurse and then ¹⁵⁵⁹ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 99.

¹⁵⁶⁰ For the social Darwinist justification of ethnic cleansing, cf. Inic, Portreti, pp. 268-274.

¹⁵⁶¹ Corine de Vries, 'Biljana Plavsic ging zelfs Milosevic te ver' (Biljana Plavsic even went too far for Milosevic), De Volkskrant, 11/01/01.

¹⁵⁶² Cf. Weine, History, especially pp. 95-98.

¹⁵⁶³ Judah, Serbs, p. 181.

¹⁵⁶⁴ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 114.

studied medicine. During the 1974/1975 academic year, he followed postgraduate studies in psychiatry and poetry at the Columbia University in New York, and studied medical depression in Copenhagen for a year. After having completed his studies, he became a psychiatrist, specializing in neurosis and depression. From 1979 to 1992, he worked at the psychiatric department at the Kosovo state hospital in Sarajevo.

Karadzic has never been able to forget his rural background. A neighbour in the Bosnian capital who had known him as a poor, shy young man with a 'hillbilly' head of hair, which was common in his village, called him 'provincial, a typical farmer who felt lost in the big city'.¹⁵⁶⁵ For that reason, he subsequently became an excellent representative of the struggle between the countryside and the city, which was one of the elements of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. On 11 December 1992, for instance, he said to a Serb magazine: 'So far, the Turks used to live in the cities and we in the woods, and now it is the other way around; we are in the cities and it is the Turks who are in the woods, and thanks to that, 'general winter' is going to be the enemy of our enemy'¹⁵⁶⁶. More than twenty years earlier, in 1971, he had already written in his poem Sarajevo: 'The city is burning like incense/our consciousness twists in the smoke./Empty clothes glide through the city. Red/dies the stone these houses were once built of. The plague!/Rest. A group of armoured poplars/climbs up in itself. The aggressor/travels through our veins/and sometimes you're a human, sometimes a creature of air./I know that this is all preparation for a cry...'.¹⁵⁶⁷

With hindsight, Karadzic's poems from the end of the 1960s reveal how he worked his way up from a nightmare to become a god, at once a creator and a destroyer. At first, the nightmare was synonymous with Montenegro, later it took on the form of the city. In his poems, Karadzic's actions were inspired by the anticipation of 'last days', in which each subtle distinction would disappear and he would bring about a regeneration and a rebirth for his followers.¹⁵⁶⁸ Looking back, this poetic struggling out of the city can be understood as a metaphor for the ethnic cleansing that was to take place under his direction.¹⁵⁶⁹

As likely as not, it was thanks to his origins that Karadzic had an inferiority complex, which he endeavoured to compensate with megalomaniac traits. Shy though he was at first in the Bosnian capital, he insisted later, as Seselj did, that he be addressed with the Cetnik title of 'duke'. During student demonstrations, Karadzic, who in those days looked like a hippie with his long hair, always walked in front, irrespective of whether the demonstration was in favour of Tito or against him.¹⁵⁷⁰ At the same time, he operated as police spy.¹⁵⁷¹ Karadzic's compensation urge probably did not diminish when he married Ljiljana Zelen, a fellow student from Sarajevo's high society, with whose parents the young couple lived. Thanks to his parents-in-law's money, his growing confidence began to surface.¹⁵⁷²

However, as a poet, Karadzic was not taken seriously in the Bosnian capital, which led to his hatred of artistic and intellectual circles in Sarajevo.¹⁵⁷³ Marko Vesovic, one of his fellow poets in ¹⁵⁶⁵ Tracy Wilkinson, 'Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy', L.A. Times, 23 & 07/95. Cf. Hirs & Hellinga, Geit, p. 178.

¹⁵⁶⁶ Quoted in Paul Garde 'The world's most wanted man', <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/karadzic/bosnia/bosnia.html> consulted on 01/03/00.

¹⁵⁶⁷ Quoted in Ugrecic, Cultuur, p. 76.

¹⁵⁶⁸ For examples, see Weine, History, pp. 119-124.

¹⁵⁶⁹ Weine, History, p. 122.

¹⁵⁷⁰ Tracy Wilkinson, 'Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy', L.A. Times, 23/07/95.

¹⁵⁷¹ Svetlana Slapsak, 'Waarom Sarajevo?', Dojcinovic & Keulemans (eds.), Hommage, p. 62; 'The World's Most Wanted Man', written and directed by Kevin Sim, PBS air date 26/05/98; Paul Hoggart, 'The wanted war criminal with wavy hair', The Times, 31/07/98; W. Nelan, 'Seeds of evil', Time, 29/07/96; Interview with Vladimir Srebrov, with Adil Kulenov, <http://www.barnsdle.demon.co.uk/bosnia/srebrov.html>, q.v., consulted 06/03/00; 'Vladimir Srebrov speaks out', BosNet, 15/11/99, <http://www.bosnet.org/archive/bosnet-bw3archive/9511/msg00342.html> consulted 06/03/00.

¹⁵⁷² Tracy Wilkinson, 'Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy', L.A. Times, 23/07/95; Weine, History, p. 108.

¹⁵⁷³ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 30.

Sarajevo, described him as ‘lazy and constantly dreaming about his own greatness.’ By contrast, Karadzic called himself one of the best psychiatrists and poets of all Yugoslavia.¹⁵⁷⁴ Among his psychiatrist colleagues, Karadzic was also noted for his mixture of laziness, ambition and megalomania.¹⁵⁷⁵

Back in Sarajevo, Karadzic took to crime, making diagnoses and writing prescriptions to help people to cheat the social insurance.¹⁵⁷⁶ Halfway through the 1980s, he came into conflict with the law. He was a good friend of Momcilo Krajisnik, who worked at the state company Energoinvest. With a grant intended for farmers, Krajisnik and Karadzic had had a house built for Karadzic. Although there was never enough evidence to prove this fraud conclusively, Karadzic and Krajisnik spent almost a year in prison in 1987. Later, Karadzic claimed that this imprisonment was for anticommunist activities.

At the end of the 1980s, Karadzic tried to improve his position at the psychiatric hospital in Belgrade. In the Serb capital, he would be surprised that he had far more trouble with his rural background than in Sarajevo. He returned to Bosnia with his tail between his legs. Initially, once non-communist parties were permitted, he founded the Green Party. However, it soon became clear to him that that party could never expect much support.

Meanwhile, during his stay in Belgrade, Karadzic had come into contact with Cosic, the Serb nationalist talent scout who made sure that Karadzic – craving recognition – finally got what he had always desired: greatness. In the SDS top, Karadzic held a position in which he could repair the communication breakdown between reality and his own world view by manipulating his surroundings. Where necessary, he was spurred on by Cosic who told him that he was to work at the Serb cause until, using a well-known expression by the Montenegrin poet prince Njegos, ‘the impossible became possible’¹⁵⁷⁷. Originally, Karadzic was not strongly anti-Muslim, even as Bosnian Serb party leader. He had several Muslims among his acquaintances, both in his student days and later as a psychiatrist.¹⁵⁷⁸ Until the end of the 1980s, he lived in Sarajevo, surrounded by Muslims. Neighbours had never noticed any hostility on the part of this man who was soon to say that because of century-long differences of opinion, Muslims, Croats and Serbs could no longer live in one state.¹⁵⁷⁹ However, shortly after his election as chairman of the SDS, for instance, Karadzic criticized the media in Serbia, who were cautioning against Muslim fundamentalism in Bosnia. He said that the Bosnian Muslims were also Slavs, with the same blood and the same language as the Serbs. He did not think it necessary that the Serbs should protect Christian Europe from Islam: ‘We Serbs are closer to our Muslims than to Europe’.¹⁵⁸⁰ Karadzic did, it appeared, have an ever growing penchant for Serb traditions.¹⁵⁸¹ More so than against the Muslims, Karadzic’s hatred was first directed towards the Communists.¹⁵⁸² But that hatred also resulted in his resurrecting their suppressed history and thus helping to topple Bosnia’s multi-ethnic house of cards.¹⁵⁸³

Karadzic’s friend Krajisnik became the most important executor of his politics. Those two would have formed a perfect team: Karadzic had all the grand ideas and Krajisnik was a good organizer who knew how to get things done.¹⁵⁸⁴ Yet their relationship was less dissimilar than it would seem on the surface. In this relationship, too, Karadzic was very much aware that he was a Montenegrin and that ¹⁵⁷⁴ Tracy Wilkinson, ‘Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy’, L.A. Times, 23/07/95; Samantha Powers, ‘The world of Radovan Karadzic’, U.S. News and World Report, 24/07/95; Weine, History, p. 108; ‘The World’s Most Wanted Man’, written and directed by Kevin Sim, PBS air date 26/05/98.

¹⁵⁷⁵ Weine, History, pp. 108, 112, 113 and 118.

¹⁵⁷⁶ Tracy Wilkinson, ‘Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy’, L.A. Times, 23/07/95.

¹⁵⁷⁷ Quoted in Weine, History, p. 109.

¹⁵⁷⁸ Cf. Weine, History, pp. 114 and 116-117

¹⁵⁷⁹ Tracy Wilkinson, ‘Bosnians Recall Karadzic, a Neighbour Turned Enemy’, L.A. Times, 23/07/95.

¹⁵⁸⁰ Quoted in Maas, Neighbor, p. 159.

¹⁵⁸¹ Cf. Weine, History, pp. 113 and 115.

¹⁵⁸² Cf. Weine, History, pp. 110

¹⁵⁸³ Cf. Weine, History, pp. 111

¹⁵⁸⁴ Andrew Purvis, ‘Under arrest’, Time, 17/04/00.

as a 'real' Serb, Krajisnik was more of an authority. In most cases, Karadzic allowed himself to be led more often than the other way round.¹⁵⁸⁵

After having finally opted for Karadzic, Cosic sung the new leader's praises to the Serb leadership.¹⁵⁸⁶ However, from the onset, relations between Milosevic and Karadzic were never warm.¹⁵⁸⁷ Milosevic waited until a month after the founding of the Bosnian SDS before inviting Karadzic to come to Belgrade.¹⁵⁸⁸ Milosevic would never have that degree of influence on Karadzic, Koljevic and Krajisnik as he had on the Serb leadership in Croatia.¹⁵⁸⁹ Karadzic had seen how Milosevic had treated Serb leaders in Croatia who did not fully comply with his wishes. He realized that he had to pursue a careful line with respect to the Serb President. He could not do without him nor rub him up the wrong way, but it could be dangerous if he were to become too dependent on the Serb leader in Belgrade.

There were strong personal differences between Milosevic and Karadzic. Where Karadzic was quite a balanced person, Milosevic was volatile and screamed constantly if presented with policy options. Milosevic was originally a Communist, Karadzic a vehement anti-Communist and deeply religious. He would later say that he had made no single decision without consulting the church.¹⁵⁹⁰ Irrespective of whether this was true or not, it indicated what his frame of reference was. Milosevic had no relationship at all with the church, using it only if it suited him personally. Karadzic's popularity was to grow among the Serbs, not only in Bosnia itself, but also in Serbia.¹⁵⁹¹ That was one of the reasons why Milosevic's wife, Mira Markovic, was not sympathetic towards Karadzic. She saw herself as the last Yugoslav Communist and detested Karadzic on account of his anti-Communism. If Karadzic phoned the Milosevic household, and Mira answered the phone, she always said that her husband was not at home. She never wanted Karadzic to set foot in her house.¹⁵⁹²

For opportunist reasons, they pretended that they had nothing to do with each other. The uneasy relationship between Karadzic and Milosevic remained hidden from the outside world. That also gave Milosevic the opportunity to avoid taking responsibility for Karadzic and his supporters. In turn, it was of great importance to Karadzic not to be made out to be Milosevic's marionette.¹⁵⁹³

Notwithstanding the distance between these two men, be it assumed or personal, Karadzic and Milosevic had close ties, both directly and indirectly through Kertes, who has already been discussed in Chapter 2 of this section.¹⁵⁹⁴ Kertes was the man who had been in charge of arming the Serbs in Krajina from 1990, and who became the head of state security and then minister of the Serbs in the diaspora. In the words of one of Kertes's close assistants, the Bosnian Serb leaders could not even drink a glass of water without being ordered or permitted to do so by Milosevic.¹⁵⁹⁵ Apparently, each week, Karadzic went to Bosnia to receive instructions from Milosevic, not only for himself, but also for Mladic, who travelled less outside Bosnia.¹⁵⁹⁶

5. Election contest in Bosnia in 1990

On 18 August 1990, the Croatian Democratic Union (Hrvatska Demokratska Zajednica Bosnia - HDZ) was formed, a full month after the founding of the SDS. The party was closely linked to the movement ¹⁵⁸⁵ Interviews V. Andreev, 07/07/00, V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01 and M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00.

¹⁵⁸⁶ Jovic, Dani, p. 193; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 149.

¹⁵⁸⁷ Interview B. Pellnäss, 03/11/99. Cf. Stoltenberg & Eide, Dagene, p. 107.

¹⁵⁸⁸ Obrad Kesic, 'Defeating 'Greater Serbia', Building Greater Milosevic', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, p.64.

¹⁵⁸⁹ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 173; interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

¹⁵⁹⁰ Nobjsa Popov, 'Traumatology of the Party State', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 103. For information regarding Karadzic's relationship with his religion, cf. Paul Mojzes, 'Religioznost Radovana Karadzica', Genocid, pp.295-298.

¹⁵⁹¹ Cf. Vojin Dimitrijevic, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 648.

¹⁵⁹² Interviews S. Djukic, 04/08/01; V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

¹⁵⁹³ Cf. Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 18.

¹⁵⁹⁴ Spasic, Lasica, pp. 234, 250-251; interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

¹⁵⁹⁵ Interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

¹⁵⁹⁶ Interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

of the same name in the 'homeland' Croatia and opted for independence from Bosnia-Herzegovina and the right of the Croats to separate from it. Soon the party was divided between moderates, who were in favour of keeping Bosnia-Herzegovina intact, and extremists hoping to unite a Croat part of Bosnia with Croatia. The moderates under Stjepan Kljuic lived for the most part in Sarajevo and North and Central Bosnia, where Croats were generally in the minority. The extremists, also known as the Herzegovina faction, under Mate Boban, lived chiefly in Western Herzegovina, where most of the cities and villages were predominantly Croatian. Kljuic had the upper hand, for the time being. With this Croatian party in Bosnia, the nationalist party trio was complete.

Despite the various ethnic backgrounds of these three parties, the election contest was, at first, relatively restrained. The parties had not yet honed their party programmes and were not battling with one another because, due to their ethnic background, there was no cause to fish for votes in the same pond. They mostly targeted the Communists, from whom they hoped to wrestle control, and any dissidents among their own ranks. Nevertheless, the election campaign led to tensions between the ethnic groups because the parties tried to organize rallies that were as large as possible, which then became shows of strength towards the others. Moreover, the symbols used at these meetings were offensive.

For example, it stung the Serbs that at a meeting of probably 100,000 party members and sympathizers in Foca on 25 August 1990, the SDA paid homage to the Muslims who had been slaughtered there during the Second World War by the Cetniks. On 27 September 1990, the SDA held a meeting in Novi Pazar in Sandzak in Serbia, where 50,000 people were present and where the idea of autonomy for Sandzak was proclaimed.¹⁵⁹⁷

At several rallies, Izetbegovic declared that if Croatia and Slovenia were to leave the Yugoslav federation, Bosnia could not stay behind because it would otherwise become part of Greater Serbia.¹⁵⁹⁸ After Slovenia and Croatia had left, Serbia – with Vojvodina, Kosovo and Montenegro – would then have four of the six votes in the Presidency. Izetbegovic was, for that matter, convinced that the Serbs had a tendency towards hegemony 'in their blood'.¹⁵⁹⁹ Since 1918, they had tormented the other Yugoslav peoples with those aspirations, employing the army and the police in particular.¹⁶⁰⁰

However, the SDS made it clear that any change in the status of Bosnia-Herzegovina or the position of the Serbs in Bosnia would have to be decided by referendum among the Serb peoples in the republic.¹⁶⁰¹ In the election campaign, Karadzic advocated a Yugoslav federation, consisting of Serbia, Montenegro, a large part of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Serb territories in Croatia and Macedonia, in short Greater Serbia.¹⁶⁰² Even the moderate Croat, Kljuic, let it be known that participation of Bosnia-Herzegovina in a 'rump' Yugoslavia would be completely off target. They would regard that as an 'occupation' and a cause for revolt.¹⁶⁰³ Hence, Izetbegovic and his party were caught up in a prisoner's dilemma. Whatever option the SDA chose – be it to remain part of Yugoslavia or to split off – it would always lead to violence on the part of one of the two other ethnic groups. In addition, the SDA was itself divided into a wing that advocated a Muslim state, which might come into being if Bosnia-Herzegovina were split up, and one that advocated a multi-ethnic, secular Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The perceptions of the SDA founders became more and more sharply divided. Zulfikarpasic was irked by the religious exclusivity of the party and the increasingly prominent position it assumed among the Muslim clerics. In his view, it was wrong for the SDA to be preoccupied with Sandzak, the ¹⁵⁹⁷ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 72.

¹⁵⁹⁸ 'Bosnië-Herzegovina gaat zijn eigen weg' (Bosnia-Herzegovina goes its own way), Trouw, 16/10/91; Grémaux & De Vries, 'Crisis', p. 37; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 47.

¹⁵⁹⁹ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 5.

¹⁶⁰⁰ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 68.

¹⁶⁰¹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 47.

¹⁶⁰² Chuck Sudetic, 'Ethnic Rivalries Push Yugoslavia to Edge', The New York Times, 14/10/90.

¹⁶⁰³ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 73; Kitty McKinsey, 'Bosnia fears it will be sliced up by Croatia and Serbia', The Ottawa Citizen, 04/08/91.

area in Serbia inhabited mainly by Muslims, because it underscored the religious character of the party. He was, on the contrary, a proponent of a party with a secular Bosnian national character. It worried him to see that Omer Behmen and Hasan Cengic in particular emphasized the religious character of the party more and more with readings from the Koran and speeches by Imams at mass meetings. These two were also responsible for building a kind of personality cult around Izetbegovic. Also, the hunt for jobs and the accompanying hypocrisy irritated him.¹⁶⁰⁴ Instead of becoming a middle-class party of the centre with support among the intelligentsia, as Zulfikarpasic had wished, the SDA became a populist party.¹⁶⁰⁵ He had no qualms about using the word 'fascism' and 'fundamentalism' for the development he so deplored.¹⁶⁰⁶ He gave up his intention of inviting to SDA meetings prominent individuals from the liberal European movement with whom he had good contacts, as they would get the impression of having ended up at a gathering in Egypt or Algeria.¹⁶⁰⁷

Izetbegovic, on the other hand, applauded the leading role the Imams played within the SDA because they could reach a large section of the Muslim electorate.¹⁶⁰⁸ Zulfikarpasic also blamed Izetbegovic for tolerating Salim Sabic in his entourage, according to Zulfikarpasic a KOS agent run by Belgrade, whose aim it was to bring the ethnic differences of opinion in Bosnia to a head.¹⁶⁰⁹ Sabic was an important representative of the mosque in Zagreb. He led a group of others from circles in that mosque who were said to exert considerable influence over Izetbegovic. Sabic was to become one of the deputy chairmen of the SDA and was later appointed head of the Islamic community in Croatia, as successor to Hasan Cengic. Neither did Zulfikarpasic agree that the SDA was secretly engaged in buying weapons and organizing military training courses.¹⁶¹⁰ Moreover, Zulfikarpasic was convinced that a form of co-operation with the Serbs had to be sought to avoid a drama in Bosnia.¹⁶¹¹

On 10 September 1990, the largest SDA rally in the election campaign in Velika Kladusa pushed Zulfikarpasic over the edge. In the presence of at least 200,000 people, the party made it clear that the Muslims were not prepared to live in a 'rump' Yugoslavia and that if need be they would take up arms to defend Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁶¹² Now, Zulfikarpasic really became frightened by what he saw and heard. There were hundreds of green flags, people in Arabic dress and portraits of Saddam Hussein. People were chanting 'Long live Saddam Hussein' and 'We're going to kill Vuk [Draskovic]'.¹⁶¹³ After this, Zulfikarpasic no longer trusted Izetbegovic and, on 18 September, along with a few allies, he and Muhamed Filipovic left the SDA.

They formed a new, liberal party for people of all ethnic backgrounds, although that could not be readily deduced from the name Muslimanska Bosnjacka Organizacija (MBO). Izetbegovic was able to prevent several SDA branches from following the schisms, using old Communist tactics, according to Zulfikarpasic.¹⁶¹⁴ Soon after the establishment of the MBO, the party had to cancel all election meetings because the SDA had arranged incidents and threatened MBO members. SDA members smashed windows at a secondary school in Srebrenica, for instance, because the head of the school was a prominent member of the MBO.¹⁶¹⁵ Izetbegovic himself felt little need to explain the substantial and ¹⁶⁰⁴ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. xv, 94, 110, 135-137 and 141.

¹⁶⁰⁵ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 153.

¹⁶⁰⁶ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 136-137 and 142.

¹⁶⁰⁷ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 137.

¹⁶⁰⁸ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 136.

¹⁶⁰⁹ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 140-141.

¹⁶¹⁰ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 139-140.

¹⁶¹¹ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 94, 138.

¹⁶¹² Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 72.

¹⁶¹³ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 141.

¹⁶¹⁴ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 143.

¹⁶¹⁵ Yugoslav press agency, 'Other reports in brief; Muslim Bosniak Organisation cancels meetings because of harassment', 1207, 13/11/90, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 15/11/90.

tactical differences. He believed that Zulfikarpasic and his associates had made an illegal attempt to gain control of the party. Izetbegovic and his supporters had thwarted that.¹⁶¹⁶

As the election campaign went on, feelings ran higher and higher and the demand for armed struggle grew louder. At a press conference in October 1990, Karadzic declared that the defence of territory and people no longer sufficed to protect the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina. He wanted the Federal Presidency of Yugoslavia to issue new instructions for their defence. In addition, the army garrisons in 'threatened' areas should be reinforced.¹⁶¹⁷ During SDA party meetings, those present now shouted for weapons to be handed out.¹⁶¹⁸

During the elections in November and December 1990, it emerged that the parties based on ethnic principles had won the race. The three largest ethnic-based parties gained 83.7 per cent of the vote, the SDA won 35.8 per cent, equal to 86 of the 240 parliamentary seats, the SDS polled 29.1 per cent (72 seats) and the HDZ 18.8 (44 seats).

In no other Yugoslav republic was the Communist loss as great as in Bosnia, where they won 18 seats, less than eight per cent of the votes. With 5.4 per cent of the votes, the alliance of reform-minded forces of Federal Prime Minister Markovic took 13 seats in parliament. The MBO of Zulfikarpasic and Filipovic obtained just two seats. The distribution of seats deviated only slightly from the demographic ratios among the ethnic groups.

For a long period, the hopes of humanitarian groups in the West were focused on those groups prepared to maintain a multi-ethnic society in Bosnia, although their numbers did decrease through emigration. However, the governments in Europe saw the leaders of the ethnic parties mainly as interlocutors.¹⁶¹⁹ They failed to live up to what Van den Broek said at the opening meeting of the Hague peace conference, namely that a lasting solution to the conflict could be achieved by building a bridge between the peace-loving forces inside and outside Yugoslavia.¹⁶²⁰

6. New political relations in Bosnia

Hand in hand, the three ethnic parties now began dismantling the undivided state of Bosnia-Herzegovina. After the elections, a Presidency came into being, consisting of two Muslims, two Serbs, two Croats and a representative of the other population groups. They all represented ethnically-oriented parties, who at this stage worked together to break (former) Communist power. However, from time to time, there were sometimes angry clashes among their supporters.

Izetbegovic became chairman of the Presidency, HDZ representative Jure Pelivan became Prime Minister and Momcilo Krajsnik the President of Parliament. Chairmanship of the Presidency was to rotate every twelve months. A cabinet was formed consisting of ten ministers from the SDA, seven from the SDS and five from the HDZ. As from this moment, a distribution of jobs and positions took place on the grounds of ethnic origin, at all administrative and official levels. Not only did this lead to countless conflicts, but also to an immobilisation and disbanding of the state machinery and to flagrant corruption.

Illustrative for the unworkable relations was the struggle that developed in the Bosnian Parliament about the text used for the swearing of the oath. The SDS demanded that the text be printed not only in Latin, but in Cyrillic script. Croatian members of parliament called for a text in 'Croatian', although there was a difference of just one letter in the oath between 'Croatian' and ¹⁶¹⁶ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 72.

¹⁶¹⁷ Tanjug report of 11/10/90, 11:07, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 15/10/90.

¹⁶¹⁸ Cf. Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

¹⁶¹⁹ This complaint came, for instance, from Prof. Vojin Dimitrijevic of the opposition Civil Alliance for Serbia and member of the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations, 'Interventie zal de lijdensweg verlengen' (Intervention will prolong the agony), Tribune 29(1993)8 p. 19.

¹⁶²⁰ Cf. Quaevlieg-Mihailovic, 'Betrokkenheid', p. 9.

‘Bosnian’¹⁶²¹. In reply to that, one SDS member said sarcastically that there should also be a text in ‘Muslim’.¹⁶²²

Moreover, the distribution of posts increasingly took on the character of a territorial division. Ethnically pure administrations were installed at local level. It became clear that there was considerable resistance to the ‘ethnicization’ of society among the public when Sarajevo TV organised a poll among its viewers about whether they thought the station should be divided up into three ethnic broadcasting stations, as the SDS had demanded. A total of 330,000 viewers voted against and only 35,000 were in favour. In response, the SDS took possession of the local station in Banja Luka in August 1991. From then on, politicians tried to organize all television stations in Bosnia along ethnic lines.

Meanwhile, the views held by the three nationalist parties on the future of Yugoslavia differed. The SDS wanted a federalist solution, and the HDZ wished to break away from Yugoslavia, but then Bosnia would, at the very least, have to become a confederation of three ethnic regions. For the SDA, upholding Bosnia-Herzegovina as an integrated, separate administrative entity was the most important. In February 1991, the SDA and the HDZ suggested that Parliament declare that laws of the Bosnian republic have preference over federal Yugoslav laws.

On 27 February 1991, Izetbegovic declared in the Bosnian Parliament: ‘I would sacrifice peace for a sovereign Bosnia-Herzegovina, but for peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina, I would not sacrifice sovereignty.’¹⁶²³ This was a remark the Serbs would hold against him for years, seeing it as proof that Izetbegovic himself had wanted war in Bosnia. For that matter, Izetbegovic had to vacillate between the multi-ethnicity he avowed as a means to uphold Bosnia-Herzegovina’s sovereignty, and the exclusiveness of his Muslim party.¹⁶²⁴ Confronted with this inconsistency, Izetbegovic declared that he had no choice but to lead an ethnic party as multi-ethnic parties would attract too few supporters.¹⁶²⁵ Izetbegovic did not manage to dispel suspicions among other ethnic groups. For instance, political relations deteriorated because the election results had reinforced Muslim triumphalism, which was already noticeable in the SDA at election time. During the discussions on the distribution of the three top positions in the republic, Izetbegovic remarked, for example, he felt it was logical for Bosnia to become a state for the Muslims, as Croats and Serbs each already had a state of their own.¹⁶²⁶ In December 1990, after the elections, Rusmir Mahmutcehajic, a prominent SDA member, wrote that Serbs and Croats now had to adapt all aspects of their development to those of the Bosnian Muslims.¹⁶²⁷

When Izetbegovic, also as president, spoke of ‘our people’, he meant the Muslims and not the Croats and Serbs.¹⁶²⁸ On state occasions, the SDA flag often flew alongside the Bosnian one. At party meetings, those present expressed their support for the Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and saw Arab clothing. The many green flags flying on such occasions, some with half moons, were a clear reference to Islam, not to any multi-cultural Bosnian identity. Not surprisingly, Izetbegovic drove the Serbs to distraction with his ethnic party. He was certainly no less clumsy, to phrase it carefully, than Tadjman when choosing symbols that offended other ethnic groups in their republics. For instance, the first three countries Izetbegovic visited after being inaugurated as president were Libya, Iran and Turkey. During a trip to Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey in July 1991, he conveyed the impression that he was looking to conclude an Islamic alliance. He also requested that Bosnia-Herzegovina be granted observer status as it were in the Organization of Islamic Countries. Karadzic said that with his journey, ¹⁶²¹ The difference between demokratija and demokracija.

¹⁶²² Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 53-55.

¹⁶²³ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 91; Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 56.

¹⁶²⁴ Cf. Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië, on the exclusive character of the SDA who refers to the repeated refusal of the SDA in Srebrenica to admit a Serb woman.

¹⁶²⁵ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 92; Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 219.

¹⁶²⁶ Cohen, Hearts, p. 186; interview R. Dukic, 14/06/00.

¹⁶²⁷ Mahmutcehajic, Bosnia, p. 30.

¹⁶²⁸ Izetbegovic, Govori, passim.

Izetbegovic had proven his most sombre suspicions that Bosnia would become an Islamic country.¹⁶²⁹ Shortly after the referendum of 29 February and 1 March 1992 on the independence of Bosnia, Izetbegovic was to set out on a pilgrimage to Mecca, where he was received by King Fahd of Saudi Arabia.

Karadzic feared serious acts of violence in Bosnia were Yugoslavia to fall apart. A civil war in Bosnia could lead to a mass slaughter among the Serbs. For this reason, on 21 February 1991, he requested the Serb member of the Yugoslav Presidency, Jovic, that the Serbs be protected by the JNA. Jovic informed him that he was, in theory, prepared to pledge such support, but could give no guarantees because the JNA itself was subject to serious ethnic tension and might split up.¹⁶³⁰ As early as the spring of 1990, when they had decided that Croatia and Slovenia could leave Yugoslavia, the question presented itself to Milosevic and Jovic how much store they would set by preserving Bosnia-Herzegovina in a rump Yugoslavia. There was little interest since it was assumed that an integrated Bosnia would produce few votes for Milosevic's party.¹⁶³¹ Always thinking of his own power, Milosevic did want to hold a referendum to allow the Serbs in Bosnia to choose autonomy.¹⁶³² Needless to say there were votes to be had in this group.¹⁶³³

Accordingly, at the meeting on 21 February 1991, Jovic enjoined Karadzic that he should resist any developments that stood in the way of a Greater Serbia. If there should be a vote on independence, he should leave Parliament before voting started. Furthermore, he could count on the support of the JNA. Karadzic promised to do everything possible to keep the Muslims within the rump Yugoslavia, but he, too, said that he could offer no guarantees, because in his view, the Muslims were working towards a Muslim state that included Sandzak and Kosovo.¹⁶³⁴

In the following months, SDS politicians vigorously proclaimed their opposition to Bosnia-Herzegovina's independence. For example, as soon as May 1991, the month prior to the declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia, the SDS Minister D. Balaban said that:

'If Bosnia becomes an independent and sovereign state, the Serb section of the population will not become a national minority within that state. If that happens the [Serb] communities will break away and proclaim their own autonomous province, with all the trappings of a state... Within 24 hours, at least one military unit will be called into being in each Serb community. The Serbs will not let themselves be surprised again as they had done in 1941.'¹⁶³⁵

On 21 June 1991, when President Izetbegovic spoke to US Secretary of State Baker, he told him that if civil war were to break out in Yugoslavia, it would be in Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁶³⁶

¹⁶²⁹ Silber & Little, Death, p. 213.

¹⁶³⁰ Jovic, Dani, pp. 273-274.

¹⁶³¹ Jovic, Dani, p. 152.

¹⁶³² Jovic, Dani, pp. 176-177.

¹⁶³³ This information from Jovic's diary refutes arguments that Milosevic long entertained the hope of holding on to the whole of Bosnia-Herzegovina for a rump state of Yugoslavia, after Slovenia and Croatia had left. Cf. for those views Kadrijevic, Vien, p. 159; Pedrag Simic, quoted in: Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 161.

¹⁶³⁴ Jovic, Dani, pp. 273-274; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 150.

¹⁶³⁵ Borba, 14/05/91, quoted in X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 100. See also Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 50.

¹⁶³⁶ 'US Secretary of State in Yugoslavia', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 27/06/91. A few days later Raymond van den Boogaard wrote that Bosnia-Herzegovina itself feared that it would become the largest battlefield if the Yugoslav crisis were to degenerate into a civil war, 'Angst voor provocaties Servië' (Fear of Serb provocations), NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/91.

Green Berets and Patriotic League

‘We are not afraid of weapons, which can be found everywhere, as weapons do not of their own accord find troops; we are afraid of troops who always find themselves weapons.’¹⁶³⁷

The conflicts in Slovenia and Croatia did indeed have immediate implications for Bosnia-Herzegovina. Early in June 1991 already, a few weeks before Croatia proclaimed its independence, two hundred Serb paramilitaries from the Serb Autonomous Region of Krajina held military exercises in the vicinity of Banja Luka. Milan Martić, the Serb Minister of the Interior in the autonomous region, declared that with this ‘invasion’ of his troops, the frontier between Bosnia and the Serb areas in Croatia had, to all intents and purposes, disappeared. That was Izetbegović’s cue on 9 June to declare that ‘the struggle for Bosnia has begun.’¹⁶³⁸

The following day, a meeting took place in the police station – the Dom Milicije – in Sarajevo under the auspices of the SDA, where official Muslim representatives from all over Bosnia decided to fight to defend the republic.¹⁶³⁹ During the meeting, the Council for the Defence of the Muslims was set up, comprising Izetbegović, Muhamed Cengić, Deputy Prime Minister and brother of Hasan Cengić, one of the founders, Ejup Ganić, member of the Bosnian Presidency, Rusmir Mahmutćehajić, Minister of Energy, Salim Sabić, co-founder of the SDA and confidant of Izetbegović, and Sulejman Ugljanin, the leader of the Muslims in Sandžak. A course was set, in which the Bosnian leadership would try to gain international recognition, while preparing to defend Bosnia.¹⁶⁴⁰ In that respect, a few things had already taken place.

Evrim Svrakić had founded the Green Berets (Zelene Beretke), more or less on his own initiative.¹⁶⁴¹ Part of his family had been murdered in Glamoc by the Serbs during the Second World War. He had become a member of the SDA shortly after it had been established. Having seen what happened in Croatia in the spring of 1991, he was afraid of a repeat of the terrible incidents during the Second World War. With family and friends, he set up an organization in Sarajevo that would undertake to organize the defence of the Muslims. He named the organization Bosna, but it would later become popular as ‘Green Berets’ (Zelene Beretke). At the time of the Dom Milicije meeting, the movement consisted of four hundred members.

With the SDA leadership’s blessing, Svrakić’s movement was able to grow. At the start of 1992, there were 52 groups (Bosne), each of which comprised forty to fifty people. Eventually, the Zelene Beretke had three thousand men in Sarajevo, ranging in age from fifteen to sixty. They were armed with the help of the Bosnian Ministry of the Interior under Alija Delimustafić. At the outbreak of war in April 1992, they were equipped with Kalashnikovs, rocket launchers, and 60 mm and 82 mm mortars. Some of the groups were destined to defend Sarajevo, another would operate in the city itself in order to capture barracks and weapons from the JNA. Only one professional officer from the JNA was active in the Zelene Beretke, Major Zijo Rujanac. Some of the commanders were criminals, including Musan Topalović (‘Caco’), with whom Izetbegović had become friendly in his years in prison in the 1980s, Ramiz Delalić (Celo II) and Jusuf Prazina (‘Juka’). They were to make an important contribution to the defence of Sarajevo at the beginning of the war. Zelene Beretke were also active in Konjic, Mostar and Travnik. According to Izetbegović, the Green Berets complied readily with the political leadership.¹⁶⁴²

¹⁶³⁷ General Aleksander Vasiljević, head of the KOS, to Izetbegović, on the outbreak of war in Bosnia, Mahmutćehajić, War, p. 21.

¹⁶³⁸ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, p. 228.

¹⁶³⁹ Izetbegović, Govori, pp. 6 and 53. Cf. Mahmutćehajić, War, p. 13; Marko Attila Hoare, Civilian-Military Relations in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992-1995, Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 181.

¹⁶⁴⁰ Mahmutćehajić, War, pp. 14-15.

¹⁶⁴¹ For more information on the Zelene Beretke, see Vildana Selimbegović, ‘Evrim Svrakić, Zelena Beretka: Mismo poceli, Atif završio’, Dani, January 1996, pp. 46-49.

¹⁶⁴² Izetbegović, Govori, p. 90.

A second organization that existed as an idea at least on 10 June was the Patriotic League (Patriotska Liga). It was meant as the military arm of the SDA. The deputy Minister of Defence, Munib Bisić would later maintain that, as early as April 1991, it was clear to the SDA leadership that a war would be unavoidable.¹⁶⁴³ Rusmir Mahmutćehajić, one of the political leaders of the Patriotic League, also said that, in the spring of 1991, it was a foregone conclusion among the leading Bosnian Muslims that war was unavoidable.¹⁶⁴⁴ As such, the Patriotic League was founded at the end of March 1991¹⁶⁴⁵, which was very early, given that it took place at a time when the large-scale supply of weapons to the Bosnian Serbs had yet to begin.

However, at the time of the Dom Milicije meeting, the Patriotic League comprised no more than a few individuals, who were active in their own right, collecting documentary material or misappropriating conscription cards, for instance. At the 10 June meeting, it was decided that the Patriotic League should be further enlarged. A political branch was appointed, under the leadership of President Izetbegović, Minister Rusmir Mahmutćehajić and Hasan Čengić. The military arm did not begin to take shape until after September 1991, after the first Muslim officers – Sulejman Vranh ('Sule'), Meho Karasić ('Kemo') and Sefer Halilović ('Halil') – had left the JNA to make up the military command. Together with a number of others, they made up the General Staff of the League. On account of their illegal activities, members could not stay at the same address for longer than two nights in a row.

The Bosnian Muslims prepare for war

In October 1991, Halilović and Karasić were ordered by the political leadership to organize the defence of Bosnia. Halilović's priority was to draft a plan for defending Sarajevo. Later, after a meeting between the League top with Izetbegović and the SDA top on 2 December, Izetbegović agreed to Halilović's Sarajevo defence plan and to his suggestion to subsequently prepare the defence of the entire republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Incidentally, on that occasion, Halilović got the impression that Izetbegović was not very interested in military preparations for independence. Moreover, he called the defence plan for all Bosnia 'megalomaniac'.¹⁶⁴⁶

Yet here, too, Izetbegović was ambiguous. Whilst publicly preaching peace to the gullible public¹⁶⁴⁷, behind the scenes he was still preparing the Muslims for war. An idealist on the outside, who continued to maintain that he was against the forming of paramilitary groups¹⁶⁴⁸, he was in actual fact a tactician evaluating what chances of success the use of violence would have. In November 1991, when the SDA mayor of Srebrenica, Ibisević, phoned to ask whether he should organize resistance in response to the JNA announcement that federal army troops would be passing through the city, Izetbegović replied that the mayor should only resist if he had sufficient weaponry and was sure that the Muslims could defend themselves.¹⁶⁴⁹ And one of the other leaders of the Patriotic League, Karasić, believed that, on the contrary, Izetbegović was urging the Patriotic League to work harder at the defence plans for Bosnia.¹⁶⁵⁰

¹⁶⁴³ Hannes Hofbauer, 'Neue Staaten, neue Kriege. Die Zerstörung Jugoslawiens (1991-1999)', idem (Hg.), Balkankrieg, p. 85.

¹⁶⁴⁴ Mahmutćehajić, War, p. 19; Marko Attila Hoare, 'Civilian-Military Relations in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992-1995', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 181. Ibidem, p. 260.

¹⁶⁴⁵ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 111; Mahmutćehajić, Bosnia, pp. 98; Mahmutćehajić, War, p. 20. The following information about the Patriotic League is based mainly on serial instalments by Sefko Hodžić, 'Meho Karasić Kemo – Tajne Patriotske Lige', Oslobodenje, 09 to 17/01/99 and 'Kako je nastajala Bosnić-Herzegovina. armija', Oslobodenje, 15/04 to 10/05/1997.

¹⁶⁴⁶ Halilović, Strategija, pp. 55-56.

¹⁶⁴⁷ Wijnaendts, for instance, thought that Izetbegović was not making any military preparations, interview H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00.

¹⁶⁴⁸ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 43.

¹⁶⁴⁹ Appendix, Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnić.

¹⁶⁵⁰ Meho Karasić quoted in Sefko Hodžić, 'Meho Karasić Kemo – Tajne Patriotske Lige (6)', Oslobodenje, 14/01/99.

There were discussions in the military top of the League about whether the defence should be based on small, well-armed and trained commandos or on mobilizing the masses, which would at first not be well-armed. Halilovic opted for the latter. He was counting on the members of the League to apprehend the arms themselves. Eventually, Halilovic's plan was chosen, but a small number of commando troops were installed, whose very object it was to accumulate arms.

Meanwhile, the General Staff of the League was recruiting more and more JNA deserters and setting up underground formations. As soon as the military arm of the League was formed in October 1991, it began to send co-ordinators to the separate regions of Bosnia to form units in secret, reconnoitre terrain and chart the movements of the JNA and Serb paramilitary groups. The SDA and the Muslims in the Ministry of the Interior checked the antecedents of those who registered in the League. On the eve of war, there were nine regional and almost one hundred municipal commandos. They were trained by military and members of the Bosnian police. Training consisted of such actions as making explosives, blocking roads and sabotaging bridges. In the spring of 1992, for example, members of the Patriotic League placed explosives on all bridges across the Drina to prevent units of the Uzice and Niksic Corps of the JNA from entering Eastern Bosnia. However, Izetbegovic ordered the explosives to be removed as he was frightened that using them would endanger recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁶⁵¹ The Patriotic League also secretly set about producing weapons, having components for their own hand grenade – later given the name Bosanka – manufactured all over Bosnia, for instance.

Various key persons at the Ministry of the Interior played an important role in the formation of the Patriotic League, including Minister Delimustafic, Deputy Interior Minister Jusuf Pusina, Assistant Interior Minister Avdo Hebib, and head of internal state security Bakir Alispahic. In the early months of 1991, Bosnian Interior Minister Delimustafic began buying Kalashnikovs and munitions for the League in Vienna.¹⁶⁵² Avdo Hebib was the chief contact between the Ministry and the League. On 10 April 1991, Hebib was arrested with a few assistants when they rode into Sarajevo with three trucks full of weapons. The military prosecutor of Sarajevo threatened to prosecute him¹⁶⁵³, after which the directors of the Ministry of the Interior kept a lower profile.

It was Halid ('Hadzija') Cengic, the father of Hasan and Muhamed who had the biggest hand in organizing the arms.¹⁶⁵⁴ In that respect, he had good contacts with Iran, as did his son Hasan. The Cengic family had made a name for themselves in the weapons trade. As Deputy Prime Minister, Cengic signed a contract for military collaboration with Turkey in March 1992, under the pretence of ensuring that Turkey would purchase arms from Bosnian weapon manufacturers who could no longer supply the Yugoslav army.¹⁶⁵⁵ Given the position of the Cengic family and the interests of the Bosnian Muslims, it would seem obvious to assume that the Turkish-Bosnian weapon transport was, in actual fact, going in the other direction. From late 1991 to early 1992, Hebib created a secret police to back Izetbegovic.¹⁶⁵⁶

From 7 to 9 February 1992, the regional commanders of the Patriotic League met in secret in Mehurici, a village near Travnik. Each commander was accompanied by two other men. Also present at the meeting were the General Staff and Hasan Cengic. Each co-ordinator reported how many men and weapons he had under his charge. It seems to have been established at this point that the Patriotic League had at its disposal 60,000 to 70,000 men under arms¹⁶⁵⁷, which is probably a slight exaggeration.

¹⁶⁵¹ Medina Delalic, 'SDA Strategy: Low Blows', Slobodna Bosna, 20/04/00; Obrad Kesic, 'Defeating 'Greater Serbia', Building Greater Milosevic', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, p. 62.

¹⁶⁵² Interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

¹⁶⁵³ Yugoslav Press Agency, 'Sarajevo military prosecutor charges Assistant Interior Minister with spying', 1436, 08/06/91, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 12/06/91.

¹⁶⁵⁴ Tino Andic & Marko Juric, 'Muslimanska obavestajna sluzba djeluje pod krinkom humanitarnih rijeci, a bavi se nabavom oruzja', Globus, 11/10/96.

¹⁶⁵⁵ Moore, Relations, p. 9.

¹⁶⁵⁶ Interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

¹⁶⁵⁷ Marijan, War, pp. 160-161.

Halilovic and Karisik reported separately that, in the spring of 1992, the League had 120,000 members, thirty per cent of whom bore arms. That would amount to about 36,000 armed men, which corresponds to the number of between 35,000 and 40,000 mentioned by Izetbegovic.¹⁶⁵⁸

On 25 February, the SDA top approved Halilovic's Bosnian defence plan. The basis of this plan was that the Patriotic League would defend the lives of the Muslims and the integrity of a multi-ethnic Bosnia against the JNA, SDS and 'extremist wing' of the HDZ. The League would collaborate as far as possible with the Croats.¹⁶⁵⁹ According to the handbook, the League would liberate all Bosnia within 67 days. That was a statement intended mainly to boost morale. The military command of the League actually surmised that it would need at least two to three years. Nonetheless, with that supposition, too, those who had drafted the plan were still too optimistic. They assumed that war in Bosnia would coincide with a conflict in Kosovo, Macedonia and Sandzak. They had also sent various persons to those regions to act as co-ordinators. Since, at that stage, things remained quiet, the JNA and Serb paramilitary groups could focus without restraint on Bosnia.

7. The consequences of the war in Croatia for Bosnia

Milan Martić's remarks of early June 1991 about the disappearance of the frontiers between Bosnia and Croatia had accelerated the Bosnian Muslims' military preparations. A few weeks later, when Croatia and Slovenia declared independence, threats regarding the borders of Bosnia-Herzegovina grew. Verbally, Serbs and Croats went for each other's throats. On the eve of the declaration of Croatia's independence, the Croatian Serbs announced that on 28 June they wanted to align their autonomous regions with Serb-dominated areas in Bosnia.¹⁶⁶⁰ On 27 June, a day earlier than announced, the union of the Bosnian and Croatian Krajinas was proclaimed in Bosansko Grahovo. In a declaration adopted at the time, it was said that the union of all Serbs was imperative. A day later, the SDS warned that a peaceful division of Bosnia was out of the question.¹⁶⁶¹

President Tudjman said in his declaration of independence to the Croatian Parliament that Croatia would respect all internal Yugoslav borders 'and those of Bosnia in particular'. Should Serbia aspire to a Greater Serbia, however, it would then raise the matter of the Croats in Bosnia. It was one of the three moments in his long speech that Tudjman had to pause for applause from the Croatian delegates.¹⁶⁶² Early in July 1991, the leader of the HDZ in Bosnia Stjepan Ključić, warned that if Croatia were to actively devolve from Yugoslavia, the Croats would not want to remain in a Bosnia that was still part of it.¹⁶⁶³

Once war had broken out in Croatia, this soon had even more consequences for Bosnia. Not only did the war fuel the memories of the Second World War, but it showed each day what the various population groups could do to one another. As early as the beginning of July, Serbs started fleeing from Croatia to Bosnia. Conversely, Serbs, Croats and Muslims went from Bosnia to Croatia to join the war.¹⁶⁶⁴ Early in December 1991, there were a total of approximately 10,000 Bosnians fighting in Croatia.¹⁶⁶⁵ 'No Vukovars here', boards along the roads in Bosnia announced towards the end of 1991,¹⁶⁶⁶ referring to the struggle between Serbs and Croats for this town. A total of 100,000 people ¹⁶⁵⁸ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 74. Incidentally, he called them the Green Berets, a term that was increasingly being used in the Bosnian forces in the making. In January 1992, the Serb leadership was said to have had access to information showing that the League had 96,000 armed men at its disposal. Interview D. Cosic, 13/09/01.

¹⁶⁵⁹ Marijan, War, p. 161.

¹⁶⁶⁰ Blaine Harden, 'Yugoslav Regions Assert Independence', The Washington Post, 26/06/91.

¹⁶⁶¹ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 152.

¹⁶⁶² 'President Tudjman's speech proclaiming the independence of Croatia', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 27/06/91.

¹⁶⁶³ 'Other reports on Bosnia-Herzegovina', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 11/07/91.

¹⁶⁶⁴ Cf. Gajic Glisic, Vojska, p. 116; Tanner, Croatia, p. 286; Marijan, War, p. 158.

¹⁶⁶⁵ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 428 n. 100.

¹⁶⁶⁶ Bell, Way, p. 33.

protested in Sarajevo on 12 November against the war in Yugoslavia, but it was illusory to think that the Croatian war would not also leave its mark on Bosnia.¹⁶⁶⁷

From September 1991, JNA units used Bosnia as an operating base for attacks on Croatia. That was initially the case in Bosanska Krajina, from where attacks on West Slavonia were launched. Croats and Muslims blocked the passage of JNA troops on their way to Croatia at various points. When Croatian and Muslim citizens attempted to stop a column of armoured cars on the road to Vukovar in September 1991 near Visegrad in Eastern Bosnia, the latter opened fire.¹⁶⁶⁸ Moreover, units under the command of General Nikola Uzelac of the Banja Luka Corps of the JNA started bombarding Croatian cities and villages from Bosnian territory.¹⁶⁶⁹ Tudjman then tried to convince Izetbegovic to launch Bosnian territorial defence against the JNA, so that the federal army would become implicated in a war on two fronts.¹⁶⁷⁰

Apart from the Bosnian Krajina, JNA units were also active in the area of Eastern Hercegovina. This took place in the light of the war in Croatia, in this case, the attacks on Dubrovnik and Prevlaka. On 20 September 1991, units of the Uzice and Podgorica Corps of the JNA fanned out in Central and Eastern Bosnia, where, they maintained, the Mostar airport was in danger.¹⁶⁷¹ In their wake, 3,000 Montenegrin reservists appeared in Mostar, who stirred up a lot of trouble with their undisciplined and trigger-happy behaviour. Their actions elicited reactions from armed Muslims on the spot, who set up barricades against the JNA.¹⁶⁷² In October, the village of Ravno near Trebinje – where Croats lived – was razed to the ground by the JNA and other volunteer units, in addition to ten or so other villages.¹⁶⁷³ Elsewhere in Bosnia, the presence of irregular troops, who were on their way to or from the front in Croatia, caused great trouble, firing at mosques, for instance¹⁶⁷⁴, or inciting and provoking the local population en route, as was the case in Foca, Bijeljina and Visegrad.¹⁶⁷⁵

The arrival of the Uzice and Podgorica Corps of the JNA on Bosnian territory induced the government in Sarajevo to mobilize territorial defences, all the more since the JNA was not only deployed to fight the war in Croatia, but was also starting to 'protect' Serb areas in Bosnia. The atmosphere of tension grew when the Bosnian government refused to co-operate in calling up Bosnian youth to fight for the JNA in Croatia. On 21 September, Izetbegovic demanded that all JNA troops, who had recently entered Bosnia-Hercegovina, make an about-turn and go back where they came from.¹⁶⁷⁶ Milosevic promised to withdraw certain JNA units, if Izetbegovic were to disband the Islamic paramilitary groups. In the end, neither took place.¹⁶⁷⁷ An agreement was made however, in which the Bosnian government promised to make sure that the JNA could move through Bosnia unhindered, while the JNA agreed to refrain from every kind of ethnic provocation.¹⁶⁷⁸ In October, Izetbegovic ¹⁶⁶⁷ Bell, Way, p. 33.

¹⁶⁶⁸ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 228.

¹⁶⁶⁹ Stipe Mesic orders JNA to withdraw to barracks', Croatian radio, 11/09/91, 15:00, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 13/09/91.

¹⁶⁷⁰ Kumar, Divide, p. 47.

¹⁶⁷¹ Cekic, Aggression, p. 166.

¹⁶⁷² Wilbur G. Landrey, 'In Yugoslav breakup, there is plenty of blame to go around', St. Petersburg Times, 27/09/91; Mahmutcehajic, Bosnia, pp. 41-42 and 82-84; Th. Engelen & R. van de Boogaard, 'Groot offensief van leger Joegoslavië' (Yugoslav army launches full-scale offensive), NRC Handelsblad, 21/09/91.

¹⁶⁷³ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 167 and 186.

¹⁶⁷⁴ Cekic, Aggression, p. 167.

¹⁶⁷⁵ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 276.

¹⁶⁷⁶ 'Izetbegovic message to Igalo signatories wants troop columns out of republic', Tanjug, 21/09/91, 17:15, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 23/09/91.

¹⁶⁷⁷ Sremac, War, p. 84.

¹⁶⁷⁸ 'Agreement reached between government and army in Bosnia-Hercegovina', Radio Sarajevo, 2000, 25/09/91, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 27/09/91; 'Other reports on Bosnia-Hercegovina', Radio Sarajevo, 1700, 28/09/91, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 03/10/91.

declared Bosnia's neutrality in the conflict between Croats and Serbs. 'It is not our war', said the Bosnian President.¹⁶⁷⁹

Where the polls in Bosnia had until mid-1991 shown a majority of 80 to 90 per cent in favour of retaining a federative Yugoslavia, there was now a change of heart.¹⁶⁸⁰ The feeling that one's own safety could be threatened by other groups intensified this. A survey in November 1991 revealed that almost 60 per cent of the Muslims and 70 per cent of the Croats thought that the Serbs had too much influence in Bosnia. Conversely, 52 per cent of the Serbs were of the opinion that Croats and 44 per cent that Muslims had too much say.¹⁶⁸¹ The fact that the map of Bosnia-Herzegovina was an ethnic patchwork, without the comparatively clear dividing lines as in Croatia, did nothing to alleviate that feeling of being threatened. On the contrary, the closer 'the others' got, the greater the perceived danger and the stronger the need to get rid of 'the others' before they struck. Visits to pubs took place more and more along ethnic lines and there were regular fights among Serb and Muslim pub-goers.¹⁶⁸²

Ethnic relations came under additional pressure because the war in Croatia also had economic consequences for Bosnia. In the autumn of 1991, Croatia forbade the export of foodstuffs to Bosnia, the first motive being to keep these products for its own market, but also because it wanted to prevent Bosnia from 're-exporting' them to Serbia. In the early part of 1992, Serbia took a similar step, intended also as punishment for Bosnia's neutrality. 30 per cent of the Bosnian working force was out of work in February 1992, a quarter had earnings of no more than DEM 50 per month.¹⁶⁸³

8. Serb preparations for war

Meanwhile, in consultation with political and military leaders in Belgrade, the Bosnian Serbs were also preparing for war. A day after the Karadjordjevo meeting, at which Milosevic and Tudjman had, in principle, agreed to divide Bosnia-Herzegovina, Seselj left for Bosnia to meet Karadzic 'to proclaim the uprising' there.¹⁶⁸⁴ In other words, Seselj was already active in Bosnia before he made a move in Croatia with his paramilitary troops.

In June 1991, the JNA confiscated weapons from the territorial defence in Bosnia, as it had done earlier in Croatia and Slovenia, fearing that these weapons would be used for an independence struggle.¹⁶⁸⁵ This appropriation was not successful everywhere. Whilst the JNA was impounding weapons in areas in which the Bosnian Muslims were in the majority, they began distributing them to Bosnian Serbs. To avoid the impression that the JNA was only disarming the territorial defence in Croatian and Muslim communities, the federal army even confiscated weapons in Serb localities only to distribute them in secret to Serbs in other places later on.¹⁶⁸⁶

By Mid-1991, the SDS in Bosnia-Herzegovina placed a summons that the JNA make weapons available to all Serbs of fighting age.¹⁶⁸⁷ The Serb sections of the Bosnian territorial defence and 'voluntary units' were to be brought together under the command of the JNA. Conscientious objectors would be regarded as traitors and punished.¹⁶⁸⁸ As in Krajina before, the first to be terrorized were moderate elements in the movement's own ranks.¹⁶⁸⁹

¹⁶⁷⁹ Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 228.

¹⁶⁸⁰ Calic, Krieg, pp. 87-88.

¹⁶⁸¹ Calic, Krieg, p. 80.

¹⁶⁸² Cohen, Hearts, p. 195.

¹⁶⁸³ Calic, Krieg, p.65.

¹⁶⁸⁴ Libal, Serben, p. 174.

¹⁶⁸⁵ Appendix, Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

¹⁶⁸⁶ Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 147.

¹⁶⁸⁷ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 42 and 182.

¹⁶⁸⁸ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 44-45.

¹⁶⁸⁹ Cf. Calic, Krieg, p. 93.

From May 1991, the Bosnian authorities stopped weapon transports meant for Serb (para)militaries.¹⁶⁹⁰ In September 1991, the Serb Minister of Information in the Bosnian government, Velibor Ostojic was prepared to admit to the Dutch newspaper Trouw correspondent Nicole Lucas that although the Bosnian Serbs were heavily armed, so were the other parties. He believed that the fact that all parties had organized themselves and procured arms was, in a way, advantageous. This, he thought, created a 'balance of fear'.¹⁶⁹¹

As from the end of May, Milosevic phoned Karadzic regularly.¹⁶⁹² The reports were tapped by the Federal Secret Service and the transcripts handed to Prime Minister Markovic. In August 1991, Milosevic referred Karadzic for initial assistance to JNA General Nikola Uzelac, the commander of the Banja Luka Corps, in charge of arming the Serbs in Bosnia. However, if he so wished, Karadzic could always go directly to the Serb President himself.¹⁶⁹³

In September 1991, Prime Minister Markovic disclosed the transcript of a conversation in which Milosevic instructed Karadzic to contact General Uzelac, who was in charge of carrying out the 'RAM' or outline plan of the JNA General Staff.¹⁶⁹⁴ Most authors believe that this plan dates from shortly before the telephone conversation in question. One of the co-founders of the Bosnian SDS, Vladimir Srebrov, believed that the plan dated from as early as the 1980s¹⁶⁹⁵, though this seems unlikely given both the contents and the names and ranks of the signatories.

According to Defence Minister Kadijevic, whilst planning the war in Croatia, the JNA had decided to take full control of Bosnia-Herzegovina with the aim of looking after Serb interests there, should that become necessary, because the role of the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina 'would be instrumental for the future of the Greater Serb nation'.¹⁶⁹⁶ When that was seen as aiming too high, the JNA confined itself to focusing on Serb areas in Bosnia. Protection of Serb residents there was not the only reason why the army command did that. Firstly, Bosnia was an important recruitment area – during the mobilization for the Croatian war, the Bosnian Serbs had caused the fewest problems.¹⁶⁹⁷ Secondly, a strong presence of the JNA in Bosnia was important to be able to station rapidly deployable forces who could, if necessary, be sent to Serb areas in Croatia.¹⁶⁹⁸ The realization of the RAM plan should be seen in that context.

According to Italian journalists, who it seems had insight into it – incidentally, it was only two pages long, said Srebrov – the document was drawn up by General Adzic, Major General Gvero, Major General Cedo Knezevic, Lieutenant-Colonel Radenko Radinovic and General Aleksander Vasiljevic.¹⁶⁹⁹ This plan of the JNA General Staff was based on a Greater Serbia at the expense of Croatia and Bosnia. The JNA set itself the target of creating a Greater Serbia, in collaboration with paramilitary groups from Serbia, Montenegro, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. The plan focused on provoking interethnic conflicts, followed by the occupation of strategic points by the JNA. To this end, the plan counted on the support of Bosnian-Serb militias. According to Srebrov, the plan was aimed at a kind of ¹⁶⁹⁰ Cf. Celic, Aggression, pp. 45-114, for a detailed report.

¹⁶⁹¹ N. Lucas, 'Doodvonnis voor Bosnië' (Death penalty for Bosnia), Trouw, 26/09/91. Others also entertained the notion that a balance of fear could prevent an armed ethnic conflict from erupting in Bosnia, Judah, Serbs, p.194.

¹⁶⁹² Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 152.

¹⁶⁹³ Williams & Cigar, 'War Crimes', IV.A; Celic, Aggression, p. 43; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 95-96; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 152-153.

¹⁶⁹⁴ Cf., for instance, F. Hartmann, 'Sévère réquisitoire du premier ministre M. Ante Markovic, contre l'armée' (Severe indictment of the army by Prime Minister Ante Markovic), Le Monde, 21/09/91; Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, p. 148.

¹⁶⁹⁵ Interview with Vladimir Srebrov, with Adil Kulenov,

<http://www.barnsdle.demon.co.uk/bosnia/srebrov.html> q.v., consulted on 06/03/00. A more extensive version of this interview was published in Vreme on 30/10/95; 'Vladimir Srebrov speaks out', BosNet, 15/11/99, <http://www.bosnet.org/archive/bosnet-bw3archive/9511/msg00342.html> consulted 06/03/00.

¹⁶⁹⁶ Kadijevic, View, p. 145. cf. ibidem, p. 97.

¹⁶⁹⁷ Kadijevic, View, p. 159.

¹⁶⁹⁸ Kadijevic, View, pp. 159-160.

¹⁶⁹⁹ Allen, Warfare, p. 56.

‘Endlösung’ of the Muslims in Bosnia, comparable to the treatment the Serbs underwent at the hands of the Ustashe during the Second World War: half would be killed, some converted to orthodoxy and a smaller number – those who could pay – would be ‘allowed’ to leave to Turkey.¹⁷⁰⁰

Whether the plan did indeed go that far is questionable. It seemed more likely to have been a plan for the process of ethnic cleansing, the aim of which was primarily to chase Muslims out of the area the Serbs had set their sights on. According to the plan, psychological warfare would play a significant part. Attacks on their religious and social structures would undermine Muslim morale, which would lead to panic, thus putting the Muslims to rout. The Slovenian newspaper Delo surmised that this plan had been flanked by another one aimed at breaking the morale of the Muslim population by executing Muslim men and raping Muslim women as soon as war broke out.¹⁷⁰¹ The state security and counter-intelligence service of the JNA, KOS, was also given an important role. The SDS top seemed to regard the KOS as the principal agents of its share in the plan.¹⁷⁰²

The SDS leaders such as Karadzic, Krajisnik, Plavsic, the future Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republika Srpska, Aleksa Buha, the future Minister of Information of the republic, Miroslav Toholj and the Bosnian Memorandum ideologist, Milorad Ekmečić, were among the first to receive weapons in June 1991.¹⁷⁰³ According to Jovan Divjak, a Serb, who after the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina would go on leading the territorial defence of Sarajevo, in the summer of 1991, 8,000 automatic weapons were handed out to local Serb militia in the Drvar region alone.¹⁷⁰⁴

In the same period, the first reports were published of attacks in Bosnia by Cetniks from Serbia and large-scale issuing of arms to local Serb militia by the JNA.¹⁷⁰⁵ Towards the end of the summer of 1991, the shelling of Muslim targets in Eastern Bosnia from the Serb side of the Drina began.

A compromise still possible?

In the year prior to the outbreak of war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, it was undoubtedly the SDS, Karadzic’s party – with the Belgrade leadership in the background – that was making preparations for military actions with a view to safeguarding the autonomy of at least those areas in Bosnia referred to as Serb. The Bosnian Muslims secretly tried to set up a defence with whatever means they had at their disposal.

Yet it goes too far to say that there were no more openings left to avert a war. In the course of the year preceding the war, there were a number of situations in which a compromise might have been possible. Of what subsequent value they would have been, we shall never know. The root lies in Izetbegović’s and the SDA leadership’s behaviour. Each time a compromise was within reach or even carried out in essence, it was always Izetbegović who backed out. The description below of the discussions in Split between Milošević, Tuđman and Izetbegović on the division of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the account of the attempts by Adil Zulfikarpasić to reach a settlement between Muslims and Serbs will uphold this. Later on in this section, this will also be shown to have been the case at other times, particularly the first months of 1992.

From the moment Milošević and Tuđman in Karadjordjevo had, in theory, reached a settlement on the partitioning of Bosnia-Herzegovina, there were rumours about further discussions. Two joint working committees were set up as a consequence of ‘Karadjordjevo’, which were to work out the ¹⁷⁰⁰ Interview with Vladimir Srebrov, with Adil Kulenov,

<http://www.barnsdle.demon.co.uk/bosnia/srebrov.html> q.v. consulted on 06/03/00. A more extensive version of this interview was published in Vreme on 30/10/95; Vladimir Srebrov speaks out, BosNet, 15/11/99, <http://www.bosnet.org/archive/bosnet-bw3archive/9511/msg00342.html> consulted, 06/03/00.

¹⁷⁰¹ Duijzings, 12/06/01, p. 133; Cohen, Bonds, p. 231.

¹⁷⁰² Cf. Cekić, Aggression, p. 42 n. 3.

¹⁷⁰³ For a detailed overview of the weapons handed out to SDS leaders, see Cekić, Aggression, pp. 86-88.

¹⁷⁰⁴ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 41.

¹⁷⁰⁵ Peter Michielsen, ‘Bosnië meegesleurd in kolkend conflict’ (Bosnia dragged into seething conflict), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/91; E. Nysingh, ‘Moslims blijven Tito trouw’ (Muslims stay faithful to Tito), de Volkskrant, 19/08/91; Cohen, Hearts, p. 195; Gow, Forces, p. 1; Zimmermann, US, p. 3.

details of the agreement on the map. The commission convened three times in April, but the ethnic confusion in Bosnia deadlocked their discussions.¹⁷⁰⁶ Dozens of these kinds of discussions on the apportionment of Bosnia-Herzegovina were to be held in subsequent years; some claim as many as 48.¹⁷⁰⁷

Milosevic left no stone unturned in arousing Tudjman's interest in a joint partitioning of Bosnia-Herzegovina. At a secret meeting in Tikves in April 1991, he presented Tudjman a document which would reveal that Muslims and their descendants, who had earlier emigrated from Bosnia to Turkey, were on the brink of returning and would take control in Bosnia. Milosevic believed this demonstrated that the Muslims were pursuing what was known as the 'Green Transversal' (a continuous Muslim area that would stretch from Turkey through Bulgaria, Macedonia, Kosovo and Sandzak to Bosnia-Herzegovina).¹⁷⁰⁸ Milosevic, who himself did not believe in the Green Transversal¹⁷⁰⁹, knew that Tudjman was obsessed by the fear of the emergence of a (fundamentalist) Muslim state in Bosnia.¹⁷¹⁰ A shocked Tudjman asked Milosevic for a copy of the document and waved it around at home during meetings. However, the 'top secret' document was nothing more than a plan that had been published in September 1990 in the satiric magazine Vox, in which various young people in Sarajevo were attacking sacred cows and bringing up taboo subjects. They had written the 'plan' in question in response to the increasingly loud claims to Bosnia-Herzegovina by Croats and Serbs.¹⁷¹¹

On 12 July 1991, at a meeting with Izetbegovic in Split, Tudjman and Milosevic came up with the idea for a partitioning of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Milosevic made no secret of his intentions. That very same day, he announced to US Ambassador Zimmerman that he did not mind if Croatia were to annex the Herzegovina region. He had little pity for the 'Muslim fanatic Izetbegovic'.¹⁷¹² In what was for him a typical move, Izetbegovic did not resist the partitioning during the meeting, but complained afterwards that he had had no chance to put his own opinion forward. Moreover, Izetbegovic declared that he had not protested because the Muslims could not do without the Croats in the fight against the Serbs. That was why Izetbegovic felt compelled to accept the plan in the presence of Tudjman.¹⁷¹³

Immediately after returning from Sarajevo, Izetbegovic started to speak out loudly against the plan. He called partitioning Bosnia the worst solution imaginable.¹⁷¹⁴ He might be prepared to discuss partitioning it into cantons.¹⁷¹⁵ Apparently, once he was back from Sarajevo, Izetbegovic felt pressure from the home front. Minister Rusmir Mahmutcehajic, Salim Sabic, who had succeeded Zulfikarpasic as Deputy Chairman of the SDA, and Deputy Prime Minister Muhamed Cengic let it be known that the ¹⁷⁰⁶ Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 129-130.

¹⁷⁰⁷ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 130.

¹⁷⁰⁸ Mile Stojic & Senad Pecanin, 'Punkerki kao ratnici Dzihada', Dani 29/03/99; Tudjman's assistant Hrvoje Sarinic, cited in 'His Master's Voice: the adventures of Hrvoje Sarinic in the land of the Serb aggressor', Bosnia Report, new series no. 8, January-March 1999.

¹⁷⁰⁹ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 130.

¹⁷¹⁰ Cf. ABZ, DEU/ARA/05252, Nederlof to Kooijmans, 07/12/93, no. ZAG-93.19.

¹⁷¹¹ Mile Stojic & Senad Pecanin 'Punkerki kao ratnici Dzihada', Dani 29/03/99.

¹⁷¹² Zimmermann, Origins, p. 150.

¹⁷¹³ Izetbegovic, Govori, pp. 122-123. Cf. Larrabee, Instability, p. 40; X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 102; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 132; M. Boroagovic and S. Rustempasic, 'The white paper on Alija Izetbegovic', http://www.xs4all.nl/~frankti/Bosnian_congress/izetbegovic_white_paper.html consulted on 17/02/00; Judy Dempsey, 'Serbs, Croats in secret border talks', Financial Times, 10/07/91; Tim Judah, 'Creation of Islamic buffer state discussed in secret', The Times, 12/07/91; Serviërs en Kroaten in geheim grens-overleg' (Serbs and Croats in secret border negotiations), Trouw, 11/07/91; Nicole Lucas, 'Bosnië vreest ten onder te gaan aan kempende bureu' (Bosnia fears fighting neighbours will be its downfall), Trouw, 15/07/91; André Roelofs, 'Kroatië bevestigt plan voor opdelen republiek Bosnië' (Croatia confirms plan for division of Bosnian republic), de Volkskrant, 13/07/91.

¹⁷¹⁴ 'Izetbegovic: division of Bosnia-Herzegovina the worst possible solution', Yugoslav news agency, 13/07/91, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 15/07/91.

¹⁷¹⁵ Charles Richards, 'Intrigue returns to a Sarajevo caught in the political crossfire', The Independent, 18/07/91.

integrity of Bosnia would be defended militarily.¹⁷¹⁶ Izetbegovic now said that an attempt to partition Bosnia 'would most certainly lead to a civil war in which Yugoslavia, the Balkans and maybe even Europe would get involved'.¹⁷¹⁷ Meanwhile, because he had taken part in a debate on partitioning, Izetbegovic had thwarted a joint initiative of his and Zulfikarpasic to visit Major, Kohl and Mitterrand in order to seek international support to prevent a civil war in Bosnia. The journey was cancelled immediately.¹⁷¹⁸

In the meantime, it had become clear to the Muslim leaders in Sarajevo from Tadjman's position, that no more than spurious support was to be expected from the Croats in a conflict with the Serbs. As such, Zulfikarpasic – who had always been of the opinion that a political solution for Bosnia would only be possible with the approval of the Serbs – consulted with Izetbegovic to reach an agreement to avoid a bloodbath. Zulfikarpasic was in no doubt that the confrontation between the three ethnic groups would have such results:

'This is a country of murderers (...) We are not the Lebanon, where various religions and ethnic groups live separately. In the space of one week, there will be 200,000 dead. No one is better than the other, be he Serb, Croat or Muslim. And yet, there is so much hatred here. If we could sell that, we would all be millionaires.'

If an agreement could not be made with the Serbs, there would be mass murder: 'The knives have been sharpened, the guns oiled'.¹⁷¹⁹

Izetbegovic agreed with Zulfikarpasic that something had to be done, but he was not prepared to contact the Serbs himself, fearing that he would come up against recriminations from his own party following. However, he did assent to Zulfikarpasic and Filipovic, the second-in-command of the MBO party, which had broken with the SDA, having discussions with the Bosnian Serb leadership.¹⁷²⁰

On the morning of 14 July, the two Muslims spoke to the Bosnian Serb leaders Karadzic, Krajisnik and Koljevic. Zulfikarpasic propounded the idea that Bosnia-Herzegovina should remain part of a union of states, which also included Serbia, Montenegro, Macedonia and maybe Croatia. The integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina would have to be maintained, however. To begin with, the Bosnian Serbs were not prepared to relinquish their regions, in which they were showing intensified autonomous behaviour. In contrast to Zulfikarpasic, who had said that a confrontation was imminent, they thought that that stage was already passed. Finally, they agreed and the deal was clinched verbally with Izetbegovic. A meeting with Milosevic was scheduled for Zulfikarpasic for the following day. Izetbegovic said that he was leaving for a short visit to the United States the following day, and he would sign the agreement on his return. At that point Koljevic said in front of the others, including Izetbegovic himself, that the President was lying. Even so, that same evening Koljevic announced the agreement on television and added that for the first time in months, he was relieved that an impending conflict between Muslims and Serbs had thus been averted. Karadzic also publicly backed the ¹⁷¹⁶ Charles Richards, 'Intrigue returns to a Sarajevo caught in the political crossfire', The Independent, 18/07/91; 'Bosnian government seeks official explanation on Tadjman statement', Yugoslav news agency, 17/07/91, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 19/07/91.

¹⁷¹⁷ 'Izetbegovic warns against civil war in Bosnia-Herzegovina', Tanjug, 21/07/91, 09:48, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 23/07/91. Cf. Kitty McKinsey, 'Bosnia fears it will be sliced up by Croatia and Serbia', The Ottawa Citizen, 04/08/91.

¹⁷¹⁸ Dusko Doder, 'Yugoslav Muslims Align With Serbs', The San Francisco Chronicle, 27/07/91.

¹⁷¹⁹ Dusko Doder, 'Yugoslav Muslims Align With Serbs', The San Francisco Chronicle, 27/07/91.

¹⁷²⁰ Cf. Zulfikarpasic, Bosniak, pp. 171-185 for a discussion of this meeting and the incidents that followed immediately after that; Dusko Doder, 'Yugoslav Muslims Align With Serbs', The San Francisco Chronicle, 27/07/91, in addition to the sources listed below.

agreement.¹⁷²¹ Zulfikarpasic was given a warm welcome by Milosevic who approved all parts of the agreement. In Zulfikarpasic's view, the Serb President considered the idea appealing that an ethnic group had suggested remaining part of Yugoslavia at a time when the rest of the world was blacklisting him.

On his return to Sarajevo airport from the United States, Izetbegovic declared on Bosnian television that he had heard that negotiations between Muslims and Serbs were underway and that he gave them his assent, hoping that they would come up with results.¹⁷²²

On 23 July, a two-hour meeting took place between Zulfikarpasic, Filipovic, Karadzic, Koljevic and Krajisnik with Izetbegovic in the latter's presidential office. At the end of the talks, Izetbegovic concluded that the parties had drawn up close to one another and he suggested that Filipovic and Koljevic draft an agreement. Filipovic, however, thought that there was still one obvious difference: the Serbs thought in terms of a Yugoslav federation, whereas the Muslims saw Bosnia as a part of a future confederation of states. It was decided that Filipovic and Koljevic would each draft an outline agreement, after which any remaining differences of opinion would be discussed two days later.¹⁷²³ Filipovic advised Kljuic on how the discussions were progressing so that the political top of the Bosnian Croats was also up to date.

However, shortly after, in a press declaration, the SDA leadership said that it did not approve the talks and had no wish for an agreement. The implication was that Cengic was behind this about-turn.¹⁷²⁴ Nevertheless, at the instigation of Zulfikarpasic, Izetbegovic visited his colleague Milosevic in Belgrade, after which meeting he indicated that he was no longer enthusiastic about the agreement.

Meanwhile the war in Croatia began to accelerate and Izetbegovic did not fancy taking sides with either the Serbs or the Croats.¹⁷²⁵ Even after Izetbegovic had rejected the plan, the SDS went on backing it in public. In support of the initiative, the SDS and the MBO, Zulfikarpasic's and Filipovic's party, held well-attended joint meetings at various locations in Bosnia. During one such meeting in Zvornik, Karadzic announced that Greater Serbia was a wonderful dream, but no more than that because Muslims and Serbs lived intermingled throughout Bosnia.

The longer Izetbegovic's signature was in coming, the more watered down the interest among the Bosnian Serbs. After a few weeks, mutual distrust returned. On 7 August, Izetbegovic said that he could not accept an agreement to which Croats were not a party, nor a Yugoslavia to which Croatia and Slovenia did not belong. 'We have not written them off yet,' he said. One of the Bosnian Serb leaders, Koljevic, replied that neither Muslims nor Serbs would be dictated to by Tudjman. He could not understand Izetbegovic's consideration for the Croats; if it was so that two parties were conspiring against a third, then that was not Muslims and Serbs against Croats, but Muslims and Croats against Serbs, who were continually being voted down in the Bosnian Parliament and the Presidency.¹⁷²⁶ On 12 August, Milosevic convened a meeting in Belgrade of representatives of three of the four republics that had not (yet) seceded from Yugoslavia: Serbia, Montenegro and Bosnia. Izetbegovic was invited on behalf of Bosnia. He declined with thanks. One person who did attend, however, was the chairman of the Bosnian Parliament, Momcilo Krajisnik.

In the third week of August, Izetbegovic made it known that he would publicly oppose a permanent participation of Bosnia-Herzegovina in a Yugoslavia dominated by Milosevic. He announced that he was going to organize a referendum on secession, which would, he believed, show ¹⁷²¹ Dusko Doder, 'Yugoslav Muslims Align With Serbs', The San Francisco Chronicle, 27/07/91; 'Bosnian Serbs and Muslims 'about to reach historic agreement' on Yugoslavia', Belgrade home service, 25/07/91, 13:00, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 29/07/91.

¹⁷²² Muhamed Filipovic, 'Hasan Cengic's Conspiratorial Logic', Dan, 08/04/00.

¹⁷²³ Muhamed Filipovic, 'Hasan Cengic's Conspiratorial Logic', Dan, 08/04/00.

¹⁷²⁴ Muhamed Filipovic, 'Hasan Cengic's Conspiratorial Logic', Dan, 08/04/00.

¹⁷²⁵ Yugoslav news agency, 31/07/91, 12:28, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 06/08/91.

¹⁷²⁶ 'Controversy over 'historic accord between' Serbian and Muslim parties in Bosnia', Yugoslav news agency 07/08/91, 11:46, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 12/08/91.

that three quarters of the Bosnians were against the idea of Bosnia having permanent ties with Yugoslavia.¹⁷²⁷ A few months earlier, Izetbegovic had opposed a proposal put forward by Milosevic to organize a referendum on independence among each large ethnic group in each Yugoslav republic. Izetbegovic had warned that that 'could cause an explosion that would completely shatter Bosnia-Hercegovina and that in the future, people would shoot at one another through their windows (...) The population of Bosnia-Hercegovina is as mixed as grain and flour'.¹⁷²⁸ At this point, Izetbegovic evidently had no problem with a referendum that would sideline the Bosnian Serbs. Krajisnik declared right away that if such a referendum were to be organized, the Serbs would walk out of the Bosnian Parliament.¹⁷²⁹

Autonomous regions

Shortly after that, the Bosnian Serbs made it clear that they were going their own way. Between September and November, they proclaimed five autonomous Serb regions¹⁷³⁰: Eastern and 'Old' Hercegovina, around Rudo and Trebinje, Bosanska Krajina with Banja Luka as centre, Romanija, east of Sarajevo, Semberija, and Ozren-Posavina in North Eastern Bosnia with Bijeljina as centre (see map in this section). In those regions, Bosnian Serbs began to assemble illegal paramilitary formations, which were trained and armed by the JNA.¹⁷³¹ Non-Serb residents were discriminated and terrorized. Serb leaders did not take Bosnian legislation seriously if it was in conflict with Yugoslavian legislation. Mobilization was carried out against the will of the government in Sarajevo. In October, JNA General Uzelac ordered a general mobilization of the population of Northwest Bosnia. Taxes were no longer paid into the Bosnian state treasury by autonomous regions. In fact, as from the summer of 1991, several businesses elsewhere in Bosnia only paid taxes to parties with whom they were on friendly terms.¹⁷³² At their request, JNA troops secured the borders of the regions declared autonomous by the SDS.

¹⁷²⁷ Blaine Harden, 'Bosnia Braces for Arrival of Ethnic Violence', The Washington Post, 23/08/91.

¹⁷²⁸ Quoted in Kumar, Divide, p. 45.

¹⁷²⁹ Blaine Harden, 'Bosnia Braces for Arrival of Ethnic Violence', The Washington Post, 23/08/91.

¹⁷³⁰ Srpske Autonne Oblasti

¹⁷³¹ Ramet, Babel, p. 243.

¹⁷³² Calic, Krieg, p. 88.

Under normal circumstances, it was the Muslims who were able to wield influence in Bosnia, so that as a result, decisions that were taken favoured the Croats and the Serbs by turns. In the situation in which Muslims and Serbs appeared to be heading straight towards a conflict, the Croats had now become the swing factor. They supported the Muslims in their pursuit of independence, but also backed the Serbs in their attempt at easing away parts of Bosnia. In that respect, they were in the comfortable position that they could support the Muslims and then have the Serbs do the dirty work. As Tudjman was said to have remarked to one of the Bosnian HDZ leaders: 'You should always ask the same as the Serbs, but after they have asked it first.'¹⁷³³

However, that did not mean that the government in Zagreb was not busy working through its own agenda, in close collaboration with Bosnian Croat leaders. On 13 and 14 June, Tudjman conferred in Zagreb with the Croatian leaders in Bosnia, among them Mate Boban, on the implementation of the Croat share in the partitioning of Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁷³⁴

In the autumn of 1991, the Bosnian Croats held several meetings¹⁷³⁵, which on 12 November resulted in a decision by the chairmen of the Croatian crisis staff of Herzegovina and that of Travnik that the Croatian people should realize their 'ancient dream' of a Greater Croatia. The first steps in that direction were that Croatia should declare its own 'banovina' (district) in Bosnia-Herzegovina, and hold a referendum. At the same time, the Bosnian Croat nationalists realized that even inside the HDZ, there were people who were against these 'historic interests' and who continued to support a sovereign Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁷³⁶

On that twelfth of November, the Bosnian Croats formed the Croatian Sava valley community (Bosanska Posavina) in the eight municipalities in the North of Bosnia, with Bosanski Brod as the centre.

Six days later, on 18 November, whilst Vukovar was on the verge of falling, the 'Croatian Democratic Community of Herceg-Bosna' was proclaimed in the thirty municipalities in the West Herzegovina region, where Croats were in the majority. The Bosnian Croat leaders said that despite this autonomy, they would continue to respect the authority of the Bosnian government on condition that Bosnia were independent of Yugoslavia.

Finally, on 27 January, the Croatian Community of Central Bosnia was proclaimed as the third autonomous Croatian region in Bosnia. As such, more and more regions were removed from Sarajevo government rule.

Towards the end of 1991, once things had quietened down on the Croatian front, the issuing of arms to Bosnian Croats started from Croatia.¹⁷³⁷ In the months to follow, Croats who had taken part in the struggle in Croatia returned to Bosnia.

9. Towards independence for Bosnia-Herzegovina

On 9 October, Milosevic's party held a conference in Pec. In his speech to the delegates, party ideologist Mihailo Markovic said in no uncertain terms that the new Yugoslavia would comprise Serbia, Montenegro and an area consisting of Bosnia and Knin. If the Muslims so wished, they could also be part of this new Yugoslavia. If they did not want this, then they would have to reckon on being surrounded by Serb territory.¹⁷³⁸

¹⁷³³ Mahmutcehajic, War, p. 17.

¹⁷³⁴ Other participants were: Vladimir Soljic, Bozo Raic, Ivan Bender, Pero Markovic and Dario Kordic, 'Plans for a 'Greater Croatia'', Bosnia Report, New Series no. 1 (November-December 1997).

¹⁷³⁵ On 15 October in Grude, on 22 October in Busovaca and once again on 12 November in Grude.

¹⁷³⁶ 'Plans for a 'Greater Bosnia'', Bosnia Report, New Series no. 1 (November-December 1997); Cekic, Aggression, pp. 37-38 and 329-332; idem, Causes, pp. 52-53.

¹⁷³⁷ Cekic, Aggression, p. 243; Donia & Fine, Bosnia, p. 239; Marijan, War, p. 160.

¹⁷³⁸ Quoted in Malcolm, Bosnia, p. 229.

The die was cast within a week, on 15 October 1991. In the Bosnian Parliament, the Muslim and Croatian delegates adopted – there were no negative votes and a few abstentions – a declaration of sovereignty initiated by the SDA. This proclamation did not yet constitute formal independence, but established conditions under which internal laws could take precedence over those of the federation, stipulations Slovenia and Serbia had already included in their constitutions. Moreover, representatives of Bosnia-Herzegovina would no longer take part in activities of the Federal Presidency and Parliament, if representatives of all other republics did not do so either. As soon as Croatia seceded from Yugoslavia, a start would be made realizing the right to self-determination, ‘including secession of the population groups of Bosnia-Herzegovina (Muslims, Serbs and Croats)’.¹⁷³⁹ One of the aims of this bill was to prevent JNA troops from moving across Bosnian territory.

The Serb SDS felt that Parliament could not adopt such a bill because the Bosnian constitution required a two-thirds majority for an amendment and the bill had been adopted by 142 to 240 votes. Radovan Karadzic warned the other two parties: ‘I seriously ask you to take note that what you are doing is not good. Do you want to send Bosnia-Herzegovina in this direction, the same fast track to hell and suffering that Slovenia and Croatia are following? Do not be sure that you will not send Bosnia-Herzegovina to hell, or that you might not be bringing the Muslim population to ruin, because the Muslims cannot defend themselves if war breaks out.’¹⁷⁴⁰ Those were far less mild words than those spoken by Mihailovic. Izetbegovic did not dispute that there could be a ‘bloodbath’, given that 200,000 Bosnians were already armed to the teeth.¹⁷⁴¹ However, he believed that Karadzic’s words had stated exactly why groups other than the Serbs did not want to remain part of Yugoslavia.¹⁷⁴² Out of protest, the Bosnian Serb members of parliament had left the chamber before the vote, obediently following the instructions Jovic had received from Karadzic eight months earlier. When the other members left Parliament after the vote, they were wearing bullet-proof jackets and were escorted by armed police. They were afraid of being attacked by their Serb colleagues.¹⁷⁴³

That same day, UN envoy Cyrus Vance reported to EU mediator Carrington, with the Dutch diplomat Wijnaendts as go-between, that all his recent interlocutors – Gligorov, Tupurkovsky, Djukanovic, Kostic, Izetbegovic, Bogicevic, the Bosnian Prime Minister Jure Pelevan and the Bosnian Foreign Minister Silajdzic – regarded the adoption of the declaration of sovereignty by the Bosnian Parliament as ‘a seminal event in the current crisis’. In their view war in Bosnia-Herzegovina was now imminent.¹⁷⁴⁴

On 24 October, in response to these events, the Serb delegates in the Bosnian Parliament decided to establish their own Serb Parliament under the chairmanship of Krajisnik, also chairman of the Bosnian Parliament. Meanwhile, they would also remain part of the Bosnian Parliament.¹⁷⁴⁵ On 9 and 10 November, the new Bosnian Serb representatives organized a plebiscite among the Serbs on the question whether they wanted to become part of Greater Serbia. The response was an almost unanimous ‘yes’.

The twelve-month period ended in November 1991, after which Izetbegovic, as chairman of the seven-strong Bosnian Presidency had to make way for one of the other members. However, he refused to relinquish his seat, pleading special circumstances. As from that moment, he became the de ¹⁷³⁹ Quoted in Hayden, Blueprints, p. 93.

¹⁷⁴⁰ Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 77-78. Similar quotes in Cekic, Aggression, p. 288; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 247; Oslobodjenje, 15/10/91, quoted in X. Bougarel, ‘Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism’, Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 100; Silber & Little, Death, p. 215.

¹⁷⁴¹ U. Rudberg, ‘Soevereiniteit van Bosnië wekt woede Serviërs’ (Bosnian sovereignty stirs up Serb anger), de Volkskrant, 16/10/91.

¹⁷⁴² Silber & Little, Death, p. 215.

¹⁷⁴³ ‘Bosnië-Herzegovina gaat zijn eigen weg’ (Bosnia-Herzegovina going its own way), Trouw, 16/10/91; U. Rudberg, ‘Soevereiniteit van Bosnië wekt woede Serviërs’, de Volkskrant, 16/10/91.

¹⁷⁴⁴ ABZ, PVNY. Vance to Wijnaendts, 15/10/91

¹⁷⁴⁵ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 289-291.

facto president of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The SDS backed Izetbegovic's decision. However, it was one of the SDS last actions in an interethnic context.

Now that the conflict in Croatia was coming to an end and Bosnia seemed on the verge of one, the final touches could be put to military preparations. After the referendum among the Bosnian Serbs on 9 November 1991, the distribution of arms to the Serbs was accelerated.¹⁷⁴⁶ According to Divjak, during the winter of 1991-1992, the Bosnian Serb volunteers received another 51,000 automatic rifles and 800 rocket launchers and guns.¹⁷⁴⁷

Bosnian Serbs get the upper hand in the JNA

On 5 December, Milosevic instructed his entourage to start negotiations on the withdrawal of the JNA from Macedonia, which had declared its independence on 22 November.¹⁷⁴⁸ With a ceasefire in Croatia and the JNA pulling out of Slovenia and Macedonia, Milosevic could give all his attention to Bosnia-Herzegovina. Jovic's diary states that, as early as December, Milosevic had given the order to ensure that the Bosnian troops be made up of as many Bosnian Serbs as possible so that when Bosnia-Herzegovina declared independence only the command would have to be changed.¹⁷⁴⁹

Within three weeks, 85 per cent of the JNA troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina came from that republic.¹⁷⁵⁰ Although Croats and Muslims continued to leave the JNA, the JNA troops doubled in Bosnia from 50,000 to somewhere in the region of 90,000 to 100,000 soldiers in the period from December 1991 to March 1992.¹⁷⁵¹ After a reorganization, the officer's corps comprised 92.6 per cent Serbs and seven per cent Montenegrins. The federal army had approximately 500 tanks, 400 armoured vehicles and 1,000 mortars.¹⁷⁵² At almost the same time, the federal state security operation Jedinstvo (Unity) got off the ground by order of Petar Gracanin, the federal Minister of the Interior. Representatives of the federal state security were placed next to existing department heads in all large cities in Bosnia.¹⁷⁵³

On 21 November, the Slobodna Bosna newspaper published a secret plan, which it had been able to attain, showing that with the help of paramilitaries to be trained by the JNA, the SDS was going to blockade Sarajevo.¹⁷⁵⁴ In December, the JNA began digging in artillery in the hills around Sarajevo, with guns pointing towards the city. This was just the beginning of a large-scale deployment of the JNA and Serb units at strategic positions in Bosnia, which took place in late 1991 and early 1992.¹⁷⁵⁵ In the first days of January 1992, Major General Ratko Mladic, who had lead the war in Krajina, began organizing 'volunteer formations' in Bosnia.¹⁷⁵⁶ He was able to recruit almost 70,000 men, half of whom resided in Sarajevo and surrounding areas.¹⁷⁵⁷ In areas in which Serbs were not in the majority, they were ordered to establish parallel municipal councils that were wholly Serb. A 'crisis staff' was set up in each locality, consisting of representatives of the SDS and Serb police. In collaboration with the JNA, they organized arms for the Serb population and created a climate of war. In addition, they made lists of HDZ and SDA activists.

¹⁷⁴⁶ Cekic, Aggression, p. 48.

¹⁷⁴⁷ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 41.

¹⁷⁴⁸ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 186.

¹⁷⁴⁹ Jovic, Dani, p. 420; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 187.

¹⁷⁵⁰ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 188.

¹⁷⁵¹ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 41.

¹⁷⁵² Domazet-Loso, Aggression, p. 139.

¹⁷⁵³ Spasic, Lasica, p. 237; interview Spasic, 16/09/01.

¹⁷⁵⁴ Cohen, Hearts, p. 158; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 97.

¹⁷⁵⁵ Cf. Cekic, Aggression, pp. 115-154 for a detailed overview of the movements of and positions taken up by the JNA and Serb soldiers.

¹⁷⁵⁶ Cekic, Aggression, p. 198.

¹⁷⁵⁷ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 200 and 319-321.

And meanwhile, the European Community tackled the question of whether Bosnia-Herzegovina should be recognized.

10. Recognition by the European Community and the United States

Double game by Izetbegovic

Apparently, Izetbegovic was fully convinced that a break-up of the Republic of Yugoslavia would lead to the outbreak of civil war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. For this reason, he had made several attempts early in 1991 to prevent the break-up together with Macedonian President Kiro Gligorov.¹⁷⁵⁸ By the end of April 1991, he told the EC Ambassadors in Belgrade that any attempt by one of the three ethnic groups to split up Bosnia-Herzegovina would certainly lead to civil war.¹⁷⁵⁹

On 21 November, the day before Izetbegovic was to visit Bonn to attend the recognition talks between the German government – that had taken the initiative – and the leaders of the region, UN envoy Vance and UN Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Goulding travelled to Sarajevo. They talked to Izetbegovic and his Foreign Minister Haris Silajdzic. Izetbegovic again pointed out the danger of fights breaking out between Croats and Serbs and asked that a peacekeeping force be deployed. Milosevic was against it however. He was also against the UN setting up headquarters in Sarajevo to carry out peace operations in Croatia, fearing that Izetbegovic would take advantage of the UN presence to effect Bosnia's secession from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Bosnian Serbs also spoke out against deployment.¹⁷⁶⁰

Meanwhile, Hansjörg von Eiff, the German Ambassador in Belgrade, shared Izetbegovic's worries about what would happen to Bosnia after German or EC recognition of Croatia and Slovenia. Nearly overstepping the mark in respect of his authority, he gave Izetbegovic elaborate instructions, before the latter's visit to Bonn on 22 November, about the arguments he should use in Bonn to prevent Genscher from forcing through recognition among the EC partners.

However, while visiting Kohl and Genscher in Bonn, Izetbegovic did not bring up the issue of recognition at all.¹⁷⁶¹ Disappointed, US Ambassador Zimmermann concluded that Izetbegovic was playing a double game. Apparently, the Bosnian President was hoping that the recognition of Bosnia's independence would lead to a Western intervention in support of his government the minute Serb cannons would threaten his country.¹⁷⁶² Izetbegovic was indeed pursuing the course that had been determined at the Dom Milicije at Sarajevo on 10 June, i.e. pressing for recognition while preparing for war at the same time.

On 25 November, three days after Izetbegovic, Croatian Foreign Minister Ivan Separovic arrived in Bonn. After he had aired his worries about the precarious situation in his country and the lack of Western aid, Genscher reminded him of the final recognition date set by Van den Broek, two months after 10 October. The German Minister did however point out to his Croatian colleague that Zagreb should create a climate in which the rights of minorities were better protected.¹⁷⁶³

The next day, 26 November, a meeting of Christian Democrat government and party leaders was held at Stuyvenberg Castle near Brussels. Attended by German Chancellor Kohl and Prime Ministers Andreotti, Lubbers, Martens, Mitsotakis and Santer, the meeting decided to recognize Croatia and Slovenia before Christmas.¹⁷⁶⁴ The outcome was not made public. The status of the agreement is ¹⁷⁵⁸ Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 10.

¹⁷⁵⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Fietelaars 124, 07/05/91.

¹⁷⁶⁰ Shawcross, Evil, pp. 63-64.

¹⁷⁶¹ Libal, Limits, p. 77; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 176; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 193.

¹⁷⁶² Zimmerman, Ambassador, pp. 16-17; Origins, pp. 176 and 178.

¹⁷⁶³ Libal, Limits, p. 77; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 316.

¹⁷⁶⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 131.

not entirely clear, but it must at least have encouraged Bonn that the term of 10 December set by Van den Broek as an ultimatum would not again be deferred.

On 27 November, the day after the meeting at Stuyvenberg Castle, Kohl announced in the Bundestag that the German government would recognize Croatia and Slovenia before Christmas.¹⁷⁶⁵ Although he said that a unilateral action of Germany would be dangerous and unsound, he also said unanimity would not be required. He just hoped that as many EC countries as possible would support Germany's position. Neither should the issue of recognition be linked to the conclusion of the Treaty of Maastricht in any way, he warned, i.e. Yugoslavia should not dominate the important EC summit taking place in Maastricht, the Netherlands, on 9 and 10 December.¹⁷⁶⁶ The unanimity that was so crucial for the summit's success would no longer be put to risk by the issue of the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia after the Maastricht Agreement had been adopted by the 12 EC member states on 9 and 10 December, German Chancellor Kohl must have thought. Recognition should therefore be effected between 10 December, i.e. the day of the Maastricht summit, and Christmas.¹⁷⁶⁷ Later, it was officially decided to avoid the subject of Yugoslavia in Maastricht. Yugoslavia would be discussed during a special European Political Cooperation (EPC) meeting the week after the summit. The day after Kohl's announcement, Italian Prime Minister Andreotti said the Italian government would back Germany, in the 'conviction' that other governments would follow suit.¹⁷⁶⁸

In spite of a telegram sent by the Dutch Ambassador in Bonn¹⁷⁶⁹ about the agreement that had been reached, it seems that Van den Broek was not aware of such a settlement.¹⁷⁷⁰ This was possibly the result of deficient communication between Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Broek and Lubbers.¹⁷⁷¹ However, Foreign Affairs staff might have known the truth if they had read the newspapers more carefully. Interviewed by Die Welt on the subject of the forthcoming EC summit in Maastricht on 9 and 10 December, Lubbers - described by the German newspaper as unusually clear for a Prime Minister renowned for his 'clever but often also vague diplomatic phrasing' - said the German and Italian announcements regarding the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia did not come as a surprise. Only the actual moment was new: 'But we have to close the books on this matter, in any case before the end of the year.'¹⁷⁷² The magazine did not fail to conclude that the Prime Minister appeared to disregard the objections made by Van den Broek. Dutch daily newspaper De Volkskrant quoted the crucial statements made by Lubbers in the German newspaper.¹⁷⁷³

On 3 and 5 December, respectively, Kohl received Slovenian President Kucan and Croatian President Tudjman and told them that Germany, and as many other EC member states as possible, would recognize both countries before Christmas.¹⁷⁷⁴ In a telephone conversation with Mesic about this time, Kohl announced that he did not intend to postpone German recognition until all EC countries were in agreement.¹⁷⁷⁵ Almost at the same time, i.e. on 5 December, the Croatian Parliament recalled

¹⁷⁶⁵ Axt, Jugoslawien, p. 352; Eisermann, Weg, p. 74; Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 958; J.M. Bik, 'Bonn erkent Kroatië nog vóór Kerstmis' (Bonn recognizes Croatia before Christmas), NRC Handelsblad, 28/11/91.

¹⁷⁶⁶ 'Italy, Germany prepared to recognize Slovenia and Croatia', Agence France Presse, 28/11/91.

¹⁷⁶⁷ Libal, Limits, p. 78.

¹⁷⁶⁸ 'Italy, Germany prepared to recognize Slovenia and Croatia', Agence France Presse, 28/11/91; Zeitler, Rolle, p. 196; 'Servische terroristen bereiden aanslagen op EG-politici voor' (Serb terrorists plan attacks on EC politicians), NRC Handelsblad, 28/11/91, 'Rome steunt Kohl in eis tot erkenning' (Rome supports Kohl's demand for recognition), de Volkskrant, 29/11/91.

¹⁷⁶⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Kroatië, memorandum Van der Tas to DGPZ, 28/11/91.

¹⁷⁷⁰ Both, Indifference, p. 132.

¹⁷⁷¹ Both, Indifference, p. 132.

¹⁷⁷² Helmut Hetzel, 'Ruud Lubbers, der Handlungsreisende in Sachen EG' (Ruud Lubbers, commercial traveller in EC matters), Die Welt, 30/11/91.

¹⁷⁷³ 'EG erkent Kroatië en Slovenië dit jaar' (EC recognizes Croatia and Slovenia this year), de Volkskrant, 30/11/91.

¹⁷⁷⁴ 'Beim Bonn-Besuch des Präsidenten; Kohl sagt Tudjman Anerkennung Kroatiens vor Weihnachten zu' (During the president's visit to Bonn; Kohl promises Tudjman recognition of Croatia before Christmas), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 06/12/91; Libal, Limits, p. 81.

¹⁷⁷⁵ Eisermann, Weg, p. 74.

Mesic as President of the collective Federal Presidency, a decision that would have retroactive effect from 8 October, the day on which the Brioni moratorium expired and Croatia considered itself independent. Federal Foreign Minister Budimir Loncar, a Croat, had resigned two weeks earlier on 20 November.

After having obtained Kohl's promise, Tudjman no longer objected to the deployment of UN forces in the disputed areas in Croatia instead of along its border with Serbia.¹⁷⁷⁶ Formal recognition is within reach, so sovereignty of the entire Croatian territory will only be a matter of time and military power, Tudjman must have thought. Vance's peace plan was ready for submission to the Security Council on 11 December.

Many objections to German rush

In spite of the promises regarding recognition made at Stuyvenberg Castle, the German government had not yet won the day, which was apparent from the Mitterrand interview published in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung on 29 November. The French head of state declared that although his country was not against the recognition of Croatia's independence, it could only come about if all EC countries supported it and after the rights of the Serb minority in Croatia had been guaranteed. It seemed that Mitterrand even wanted to discuss the borders of Croatia. 'Will the internal frontier within Yugoslavia separating Serbia and Croatia automatically become an international frontier?', the French head of state contemplated aloud.¹⁷⁷⁷ Nor did he seem in much of a hurry with regard to recognition: 'I do not think that the recognition of Croatia would improve matters at this moment.'¹⁷⁷⁸

There were also many objections against an early recognition of Croatia and Slovenia at the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Officials were aware of the enormous implications it could have for the Yugoslavia conference. The Slovenians would see no need at all to negotiate. The Croatians would perhaps be willing to talk, if only to obtain the area that was now under Serb control. To make matters worse, Serbia would no longer regard the EC as a neutral mediator if it recognized Croatia and Slovenia. Nor would it be very willing to continue talks about a Yugoslavia that no longer comprised Croatia and Slovenia. Recognition would also affect the establishment of a peace force, which was now under discussion following Resolution 721 of the Security Council. Serbia would probably not accept the presence within the peace forces of troops from countries that intended to recognize Croatia. If, on the other hand, recognition took place when peace forces were already stationed in the area, the safety of the troops could be jeopardized. The British government had expressed serious concerns about this matter to the Hague and wanted a carefully arranged organisation of UN peace forces before proceeding to recognition. The danger of Serb reprisals following the recognition of Croatia also involved the observers of the European Monitoring Mission, the ECMM.¹⁷⁷⁹

Besides, for months now, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in the Hague had been aware of the seriousness of developments within Bosnia-Herzegovina. News reaching the Foreign Office, both through its diplomatic post at Belgrade and through the media, was very alarming. According to Fietelaars, the Dutch Ambassador in Belgrade, there was an 'escalation of the polarization' of the three ethnic groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina as early as the end of April 1991.¹⁷⁸⁰ No more than Izetbegovic did D.R. Hasselman, Dutch Counsellor of the Embassy in Belgrade, entertain any illusions with regard to a conflict in Bosnia. In the summer of 1991, he expected the problems in Bosnia to be far more ¹⁷⁷⁶ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 197-198.

¹⁷⁷⁷ In early December, Mitterrand used similar words on Dutch television: 'France supports EC recognition for Croatia, Slovenia', Agence France Presse, 05/12/91.

¹⁷⁷⁸ 'Mitterrand: Frankreich will in Maastricht den Erfolg' (Mitterrand: France wants Maastricht to be successful), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 29/11/91.

¹⁷⁷⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Kroatië, memorandum from DEU/OE to DGPZ via DEU, 06/12/91 no. 157 and Speaking note of the British Embassy, 'Consequences of recognizing Croatian independence', 02/12/91.

¹⁷⁸⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Fietelaars 124, 07/05/91.

serious than those occurring at the time in Croatia. Also, in his view, possible frustrations of JNA units that were being withdrawn from Slovenia and sent to Bosnia should be taken into account. However, given the ethnic diversity and the excessive violence that was expected, Hasselman thought that a monitoring mission in Bosnia would ‘not be the proper technical instrument’ for peacekeeping.¹⁷⁸¹ In early August 1991, Izetbegovic had told the European Troika that he hoped observers would also be sent to Bosnia at some point as he did not rule out the possibility that, after Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina would become a victim of Milosevic’s Greater Serbia aspirations.¹⁷⁸²

By the end of September, Fietelaars also recommended that observers be sent to Bosnia. He reported movements of JNA troops and equipment from Serbia and Montenegro to Bosnia, which he interpreted as an attempt to realize the Greater Serbia objective. He observed the JNA provocations against the Muslims and a marked growth of Serb militias, which, in its turn, prompted the forming of Muslim militias. Events that took six months to happen in Croatia took only a week in Bosnia, according to Fietelaars. The Bosnian Presidency, whose member Ejup Ganic was Fietelaars’s contact, asked him daily for the immediate deployment of observers in those parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina where incidents had occurred.¹⁷⁸³ The day Fietelaars reported this to the Hague, the Dutch daily newspaper Trouw featured an article in which Ganic said he had been pleading for the deployment of observers in Bosnia for more than six months now – in vain. ‘It could still do some good,’ he added. ‘Two weeks from now it will be too late.’¹⁷⁸⁴

When, by the end of October, Dutch helicopters deployed for the monitoring mission were called back to the Netherlands as they had been grounded for weeks because of the dangerous situation in the Yugoslav airspace¹⁷⁸⁵, and, shortly after, the EC observers posted in the area around Vukovar and Dubrovnik had to be recalled because hostilities had broken out, Van den Broek still favoured the presence of the remaining observers in Bosnia-Herzegovina. He praised their stabilizing influence on ‘a potentially explosive situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina’, where the Serbs held their referendum against Bosnian independence on 9 and 10 November.¹⁷⁸⁶

Others were also aware that Bosnia would quickly erupt into violence. A ‘joke’ going around in Yugoslavia at the time said: ‘Why is there no fighting in Bosnia? Because Bosnia will get to the finals directly.’¹⁷⁸⁷ In July, Nijaz Durakovic, leader of the formerly communist Social Democratic Party in Bosnia said it would be an understatement to say that Bosnia was on the verge of civil war, as it was already in the middle of one.¹⁷⁸⁸ On 7 August, Volkskrant commentator Koen Koch warned that Croats, Serbs and Muslims in Bosnia would thrash out among themselves where the borders of Croatia and Serbia and a future Muslim state would run: ‘As the violence in Croatia is much worse than the violence in Slovenia, the bloodbath in Bosnia will be much worse than the violence in Croatia.’¹⁷⁸⁹ According to Trouw correspondent Nicole Lucas, by the end of September 1991, leading politicians of the various ethnic groups in Bosnia were in agreement about what would happen if Europe did not find a solution for Bosnia: ‘There will be a civil war worse than ever before in history. Lebanon will seem a nursery game compared to the cruelties that will take place here.’¹⁷⁹⁰

At the beginning of November 1991, Second Secretary of the Embassy, J.L. Werner, learned from Karadzic in Sarajevo that he had forced Milosevic to extend his protection to the Serbs outside Serbia. This, according to Karadzic, had led Milosevic to reject the propositions of Carrington, ¹⁷⁸¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Hasselman 232, 23/07/91.

¹⁷⁸² ABZ, DEU/ARA/03287, EU/GBVB/Trojka, preparation and reporting of the Troika visits to Yugoslavia, July/August 1991, Hasselman 250 to Van den Broek, 03/08/91.

¹⁷⁸³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Fietelaars 337, 26/09/91.

¹⁷⁸⁴ N. Lucas, ‘Doodvonnis over Bosnië’ (Death sentence for Bosnia), Trouw, 26/09/91.

¹⁷⁸⁵ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 11, p. 3.

¹⁷⁸⁶ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 12, p. 1.

¹⁷⁸⁷ Kaplan, Ghosts, p. 22.

¹⁷⁸⁸ David Hearst, ‘Conflict erupts over EC observers’, The Guardian, 13/07/91.

¹⁷⁸⁹ K. Koch, ‘Falende trojka’ (The Troika has failed), de Volkskrant, 07/08/91.

¹⁷⁹⁰ Nicole Lucas, ‘Doodvonnis voor Bosnië’ (Death sentence for Bosnia) Trouw, 26/09/91.

although he was personally inclined to accept them. There is no doubt that Karadzic, who liked to give the impression that he exerted real influence over Milosevic, was boasting. However, this did not alter the fact that the JNA was distributing weapons to Serbs, which, according to the Secretary of the Embassy, only made the break-out of a civil war in Bosnia-Herzegovina more likely.¹⁷⁹¹

The Hague was also aware of the fact that by the end of November and at the beginning of December – except during Izetbegovic's visit to Bonn –, the Bosnian and Macedonian governments had urgently requested the EC countries not to proceed to recognition too soon. However, they also made it clear that, if recognition took place, they also wanted to be recognized as independent states, as they did not want to stay part of a rump Yugoslavia. The Bosnian government pressed for the establishment of UN peace forces in Bosnia prior to EC recognition of Croatia. The British government was sensitive to these arguments. Given the ethnic patchwork in Bosnia-Herzegovina and possible JNA reprisals against Croats in Bosnia after the recognition of Croatia, London expected violence to break out.¹⁷⁹² The Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs shared the British concerns, but seemed, as yet, more preoccupied with the potential consequences for Macedonia and Kosovo, which were expected to have both internal and international implications.¹⁷⁹³

Meanwhile, the British and the French mounted another offensive against early recognition. By the end of November, Foreign Office staff had told journalists that British recognition of Croatia and Slovenia would soon come to pass now that the deployment of peace forces in Croatia seemed likely. Recognition would probably even take place before Christmas, they said.¹⁷⁹⁴ Apparently, Minister Hurd felt the need to explain his country's formal position once more declaring in The Times of 3 December that any Yugoslav republic that wanted to could gain independence: 'This is a matter of judgement and timing rather than principle.' As such, his position on record had shifted towards that of the French government, which had already accepted recognition on 9 October, although it questioned the timing of it. As a result of the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia would also want to gain independence soon, Hurd said in The Times. And this would threaten the peace in these countries. According to the British Minister, it was an illusion to think that the recognition of independence would stop the fighting. The West was not prepared to supply troops to protect the new states. Moreover, if recognition was pushed through too hastily, it would be impossible for the international community to demand adequate protection of minorities from the governments of the states that wanted to be recognized.¹⁷⁹⁵

The day Hurd's article was published in The Times, Mitterrand criticised the German government's intention in a personal conversation with Kohl. He told the German Chancellor that recognition would have no impact on the fighting in Yugoslavia.¹⁷⁹⁶ As he had done a few weeks earlier, Kohl replied that internal pressure in his country left him no choice.¹⁷⁹⁷ Nor did contacts between American President Bush and Chancellor Kohl after the summit in Rome have the outcome Washington desired.¹⁷⁹⁸ In the first week of December, UN envoy Vance also gave up hopes that Bonn could be made to change its mind and sighed, 'My friend Genscher is out of control.'¹⁷⁹⁹

When it was clear that Kohl and Genscher would stick to their intentions, Hurd at last accepted that the EC would probably recognize the independence of Croatia and Slovenia before the year was ¹⁷⁹¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Memorandum Chef de Poste to DEU/OE and DAV, 13/11/91, BEL 4659.

¹⁷⁹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Kroatië, Speaking note of the British Embassy, 'Consequences of recognizing Croatian independence', 02/12/91.

¹⁷⁹³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Kroatië, memorandum from DEU/OE to DGPZ through DEU, 06/12/91 no. 157.

¹⁷⁹⁴ Adrian Bridge & Sarah Helm, 'UK ready to recognize Croatia and Slovenia', The Independent, 29/11/91.

¹⁷⁹⁵ Douglas Hurd, 'Averting a Balkan Tragedy', The Times, 03/12/91.

¹⁷⁹⁶ Favier & Martin-Roland, Décennie, p. 243.

¹⁷⁹⁷ Eisermann, Weg, p. 75.

¹⁷⁹⁸ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844, Meesman 1259 to Van den Broek, 14/12/91.

¹⁷⁹⁹ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 177.

out, even if it would be impossible to impose conditions for recognition.¹⁸⁰⁰ On 3 December, the EC Foreign Ministers met in Brussels. After the meeting, Danish Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen announced that the EC would recognize Croatia and Slovenia at the special EPC meeting on 16 December. Hurd confirmed this statement of his Danish colleague.¹⁸⁰¹ The British Minister had made a remarkable U-turn in the matter of the timing of recognition since the publication of his letter in The Times that very morning. However, this quick reversal – and probably previous statements of Hurd’s staff as well – was explicable, as the need for the United Kingdom to oppose recognition was considerably diminished. The fear – mostly felt by staunch British ally the United States – that recognition would affect the situation in the Soviet Union was virtually gone. In December 1991, it was clear to anyone willing to recognize it that the Soviet Union would break up, with or without a Yugoslav precedent. British concerns that the WEU might be deployed in Yugoslavia had also been removed nor could the British government have continued to cherish much hope that the conference presided over by their fellow countryman Carrington could still succeed and should not be thwarted by recognition.

In spite of this, the governments in London and Paris had still not accepted Bonn’s attitude entirely. Before Hurd’s public change of heart and before the Dutch Embassy in Washington reported the American government’s failure to make Kohl and Genscher change their minds, the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in the capacity of EC President, had taken up a position that was based on the expectation that recognition could be postponed by demanding Croatian guarantees regarding the observance of human rights. It was thought at the ‘Monkey Rock’ (Foreign Ministry) in the Hague that the German government would support this view.¹⁸⁰² The Dutch EU Presidency intended to use these conditions to stall recognition until 1 March 1992. However, there were facts Foreign Affairs officials failed to anticipate. Firstly, they had yet to understand that their own Prime Minister Lubbers had meanwhile accepted that recognition would take place before the year was out. Secondly, the German government was busily conferring with the government in Zagreb to remove any objections to the lack of protection of minorities as quickly as possible.¹⁸⁰³ Thirdly, a few days after the Dutch position was determined in the Hague, Hurd declared that the United Kingdom would accept early recognition, if necessary even without conditions being imposed. Lastly, the Paris government realized that an EC recognition forced through by Germany was unavoidable. After Kohl’s message to Mitterrand indicating that Germany would recognize Croatian independence no matter what, French Foreign Minister Dumas proposed that the Directors General for Political Affairs of the German and French Ministries of Foreign Affairs formulate recognition criteria. Genscher agreed to this. The criteria proposed by the two Directors General were an attempt to make certain demands which had not been made at the Yugoslavia conference, including demands with regard to human rights, the rights of minorities and the inviolability of borders. Prior to the special EPC meeting of 16 December, Kohl and Mitterrand agreed to these terms.¹⁸⁰⁴

The European summit held at Maastricht on 9 and 10 December had been successful after all, which must have been quite a relief for the Dutch government after the rejection of its draft treaty on ‘Black Monday’. A week later, on 16 and 17 December, Yugoslavia would be on the agenda of an EPC meeting of Foreign Affairs Ministers, where Germany was expected to push through recognition of Croatian and Slovenian independence. Both Bonn and the Hague were warned against this German ¹⁸⁰⁰ Hella Pick, ‘Early recognition “is unstoppable”’, The Guardian, 05/12/91.

¹⁸⁰¹ ‘EG erkent Slovenië en Kroatië op 16 december’ (EC recognizes Croatia and Slovenia on 16 December), NRC Handelsblad, 04/12/91; ‘EG zal zelfstandigheid Slovenië en Kroatië binnenkort erkennen’ (EC to recognize Slovenia and Croatia soon), de Volkskrant, 04/12/91.

¹⁸⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00404, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Kroatië, memorandum from DEU/OE to DGPZ through DEU, 06/12/91 no. 157 and Speaking note of the British Embassy, ‘Consequences of recognizing Croatian independence’, 02/12/91.

¹⁸⁰³ Libal, Limits, pp. 79-80; ‘Duitsland scherpt boycot Servië en Montenegro aan’ (Germany intensifies boycott of Serbia and Montenegro), NRC Handelsblad, 05/12/91.

¹⁸⁰⁴ Favier/Martin-Roland, Décennie, pp. 242-243; Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 959.

intention on innumerable occasions before this meeting took place. In his report to Perez de Cuellar of 10 December, UN envoy Vance, working out the preconditions for peace operations in Croatia, stated his fear that recognition would lead to an outburst of violence which would jeopardize the establishment of a peace force.¹⁸⁰⁵ The UN Secretary-General himself was worried about the risks recognition entailed for the minorities in the independent republics, particularly the danger that ‘an early, selective recognition could widen the conflict and fuel an explosive situation, especially in Bosnia and Hercegovina’.¹⁸⁰⁶ In a letter to the EC President, he warned that a premature recognition of the two republics could have a destabilizing effect.¹⁸⁰⁷ There was even an usually sharply-worded correspondence between Perez de Cuellar and Genscher about the matter of recognition. The UN Secretary-General declared that recognition would only be possible within a general settlement for Yugoslavia, as proposed by Carrington, to which Genscher retorted that the conference chaired by Carrington had not yielded any results in weeks, for which the Serbs were mostly to blame, and that any further postponement of recognition would only lead to more violence on the part of the Serbs.¹⁸⁰⁸

The American government indicated it shared the objections of Perez de Cuellar, Vance and Carrington in a letter to EC President Van den Broek. Washington feared that, once its independence was recognized, Croatia would be less inclined to refrain from the use of violence, and hinder Vance’s attempts to enable peace operations. For this reason, the American government wanted the EC to stick to the agreement of 8 November, which stipulated that recognition would only be possible as part of a general settlement for Yugoslavia.¹⁸⁰⁹ In addition to the other objections, the American government expected that recognition of the two republics would cause the JNA to intervene in Bosnia-Hercegovina. Recognition would also imply that the US were prepared to protect the republics’ borders, which, at the time, they were not all willing to do.¹⁸¹⁰ American diplomats also urged the Foreign Ministries of the other EC countries to postpone recognition.¹⁸¹¹ Even Germany’s own Ambassador in Belgrade, Von Eiff, urgently requested the government in Bonn to refrain from early recognition.¹⁸¹² Finally, the ECMM argued that recognition of Croatia would result in more Serb aggression and would ‘directly threaten the lives’ of observers.¹⁸¹³

On 15 December, the Security Council adopted Resolution 724, urging all countries to refrain from any actions that could increase tensions or delay a peaceful outcome of the conflict in Yugoslavia. It could hardly have been a secret that this resolution was mostly meant for Germany and that it was sponsored by the United States, France and Great Britain. The resolution was fairly unique in Western diplomacy.

Still, as a final attempt to prevent the German government from recognizing Croatia and Slovenia, it had failed. In its initial wording, the resolution referred explicitly to the recognition intended by Germany, but after Genscher had embarked on a telephone offensive, the governments in London and Paris that had let themselves be led by Washington, decided to delete the warning against recognition from the draft.¹⁸¹⁴ This demonstrated once again that the British and French governments were not prepared to go to any length to stop Germany.

¹⁸⁰⁵ Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 492.

¹⁸⁰⁶ UN document S1991/23280, Annex 4, quoted in the UN Srebrenica Report, par. 10; Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 493.

¹⁸⁰⁷ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181 no. 20, p. 7.

¹⁸⁰⁸ Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, pp. 493-494; Weller, Response, p. 587.

¹⁸⁰⁹ ABZ, 911.13, Joegoslavië, verhoudingen en partijen, deel III, 1990 - September 1991, C. Howard Wilkins Jr. to Van den Broek, 13/12/91; Gompert, Serbia, p. 36.

¹⁸¹⁰ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 1236 to Van den Broek, 06/12/91; Meesman 1259 to Van den Broek, 14/12/91.

¹⁸¹¹ Zimmerman, Origins, pp. 176-177; ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 1259 to Van den Broek, 14/12/91.

¹⁸¹² Zimmerman, Origins, pp. 176-177.

¹⁸¹³ ‘Waarnemers EG waarschuwen tegen erkenning Kroatië’ (EC observers warn against recognition of Croatia), de Volkskrant, 12/12/91; ‘Erkenningskwesie Kroatië’ (The issue of Croatia’s recognition), de Volkskrant, 16/12/91; Folkert Jensma, ‘Europese Unie sluit gelederen op ‘t nippertje’ (European Union closes ranks just on time), NRC Handelsblad, 17/12/91.

¹⁸¹⁴ Eisermann, Weg, p. 77; Libal, Limits, p. 82.

Germany's success in the matter of recognition

Against this background, the Foreign Ministers at the special EPC meeting of 16 December were to address the question whether to go ahead with the recognition of the Yugoslav republics and in what manner. The Ministerial meeting was preceded by a meeting of Directors General. At this Political Committee meeting, Dutch Director-General for Political Affairs Van Walsum, who was acting on instructions from Van den Broek, made a final attempt to suspend recognition. Senior officials of the Dutch Foreign Ministry probably still had the date of 1 March 1992 in mind.¹⁸¹⁵ In Both's opinion, the Dutch Foreign Ministry urged for suspension of the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia as it realized too late how recognition would affect the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In spite of continual warnings from the Dutch Embassy in Belgrade and the Dutch press, the Minister and Foreign Affairs staff had temporarily forgotten about the consequences for Bosnia, which had been such an important part of Van Walsum's famous COREU message of 13 July.¹⁸¹⁶ It is hard to believe, but the final efforts of the Dutch Ministry with regard to recognition seem only to have been based on the warnings received the week before and the adoption of Resolution 724. There is no other explanation than that.

It became apparent during the Political Committee meeting that doubts had arisen among the representatives of Italy, Denmark, Belgium and Luxembourg too, who were under the impression of all these warnings and who had appeared, until then, to support Germany. Suddenly, Germany found itself in an isolated position. 'Most EC partners do not follow Genscher,' cheered Dig Ishta, spokesperson of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs.¹⁸¹⁷

However, Ishta's own Minister was not cheering. To Van Walsum's amazement, Van den Broek was not pleased at all when informed by him of the results. What had happened? On 15 December, Mitterrand had sent a letter to Lubbers, Kohl and Major, stating that, in spite of Perez de Cuellar's warnings against recognition, the unity of the twelve EC countries should be preserved as to both the timing of and the terms for recognition. If Croatia and Slovenia agreed to the terms, they should be simultaneously recognized by the twelve EC countries.¹⁸¹⁸ The letter to Lubbers was to be delivered by French Ambassador Jean-René Bernard, who sent it to J.M.P.H. Merckelbach, senior adviser of the Ministry of General Affairs, on 19 December. However, the accompanying letter shows that Bernard had already informed Merckelbach of the nature of Mitterrand's letter on 16 December. It seems that Van den Broek was notified of this while Van Walsum was still trying to thwart German insistence at the meeting. This would explain his rather piqued reaction to Van Walsum's report, describing the matter as 'complex' and recognition as 'unavoidable'.¹⁸¹⁹ Once again, it was clear how close-knit the Bonn-Paris axis was and to what extent the partnership of Germany and France had been able to hoodwink the Dutch EC Presidency.

At the meeting of Foreign Ministers that took place the same day, the Directors General were overruled by their political bosses who wanted no dissension at the time the Maastricht Treaty was being signed. In the early morning of 17 December, the EC Ministers found a solution that was in line with the French and German proposition. They proposed to set criteria with regard to the inviolability of borders and the protection of human rights and minorities for states asking for recognition before 23 December. This was opposed by Greek Foreign Minister Samaras and his Dutch colleague Van den Broek. Samaras had already informed the other EC Ministers at the meeting of 28 October 1991 that his country would never accept the recognition of an independent state bearing the name of Macedonia. Then, on 16 December, he managed to add 'no hostile propaganda' against neighbouring countries that were also EC member states as a condition for the recognition of parts of the former ¹⁸¹⁵ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 1259 to Van den Broek, 14/12/91.

¹⁸¹⁶ Both, Indifference, p. 134.

¹⁸¹⁷ Zeitler, Rolle, pp. 320-321.

¹⁸¹⁸ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek, box 7 (1991), Joego chairmen, Mitterrand to Lubbers, 15/12/91.

¹⁸¹⁹ Both, Indifference, p. 134.

federal republic of Yugoslavia. This included the stipulation that no names could be used that ‘imply territorial demands’, which was a reference to the name of Macedonia.

Van den Broek says he himself tried to change the course of events by pointing out to his colleagues that Vance and Carrington had advised against recognition, and by saying that one should not simply ignore this. The other eleven countries argued that consensus within the EC was more important, an argument that had been supported by Van den Broek himself throughout the Dutch Presidency. Van den Broek was also sympathetic to the argument that if recognition were suspended, Serbia could draw out the talks to block recognition of Croatia.¹⁸²⁰ ‘The Germans held on to the essence of their point of view. As a result, the views of the other partners were gradually adjusted to that of Germany, during talks that lasted until after 1am,’ Van den Broek wrote afterwards to the Dutch Embassy in Belgrade. Nor would he himself have been pleased to see dissension over foreign policy during the Dutch EC Presidency¹⁸²¹ which was why he did not criticize Genscher too harshly in the press:

‘I could have done so with regard to the role he played when he complicated matters during the attempt to formulate an (...) overall solution for Yugoslavia. However, in December we had to admit that one third of Croatia was de facto occupied. Only by recognizing Croatia’s independence could one speak in terms of one country terrorizing another, which would then become the basis for subsequent Security Council resolutions, or (...) a sanction policy or similar actions against the country we already perceived as the aggressor.’¹⁸²²

According to several authors, Germany’s concession to Great Britain, i.e. enabling it to opt out of the Social Charter of the Maastricht Treaty, had smoothed out British opposition, after which there was nothing else France could do but formulate a few conditions for recognition.¹⁸²³

British Prime Minister Major vehemently denies that the United Kingdom had received certain promises from Germany regarding the Maastricht Treaty in exchange for its support of recognition.¹⁸²⁴ Authors claiming the opposite offer no more proof than a few references to press articles. The most important one is Newhouse’s publication of August 1992 in which the author uses various arguments that contradict rather than prove a connection between the Maastricht Treaty and recognition¹⁸²⁵. The article goes on to quote a senior diplomat who:

‘agrees that the Germans made no direct link between the treaty and recognition.’ He adds, ‘But just before and during the meetings on the sixteenth, they said, “We have been helpful to you. We backed John Major when he was in some tight corners. We backed you French against the Americans on defence. You owe us something.”’¹⁸²⁶

¹⁸²⁰ Leonard Ornstein, ‘Minister Van den Broek: ‘Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg’ (Minister van den Broek: “Let’s start with a warning shot”) Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10; also, ‘Het stratego van de experts’ (The stratego played by the experts), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 12.

¹⁸²¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00411, COREUs regarding the EPS position in the matter of Yugoslavia, October-December 1991, Van den Broek 190 to the Belgrade Embassy, 17/12/91. Cf. Both, Indifference, pp. 134-135.

¹⁸²² Interview H. van den Broek, 15/11/99.

¹⁸²³ Both, Indifference, p. 133; Bell, Way, p. 37; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 112; Hannes Hofbauer, Neue Staaten, neue Kriege. Die Zerstörung Jugoslawiens (1991-1999), also (Hg.), Balkankrieg, p. 68; Kumar, Divide, p. 50.

¹⁸²⁴ Major, Autobiography, pp. 533-534.

¹⁸²⁵ Newhouse, Round, p. 65. This article appears in edited form as Newhouse, ‘Bonn’.

¹⁸²⁶ Newhouse, Round, pp. 65-66.

So even according to this much-quoted source there was not really a quid pro quo deal. When trying to persuade other countries, German diplomats may have used a few examples of generous German concessions made to those countries in the recent past.

Another source is an article published in The Independent almost two years after the decision to recognize Croatia and Slovenia. In this article two anonymous ‘senior Whitehall sources’ claim there had been a deal between Kohl and Major. ‘One UK official’ – the article does not clarify whether this is one of the sources mentioned – was quoted saying: ‘Kohl supported us on the crucial points we needed at Maastricht and we gave in on recognition in return.’¹⁸²⁷ The possibility that such an exchange of favours really took place cannot be excluded. On the other hand, it would be difficult to conceive how German pressure for recognition, which dated from the first six months of 1991, could have been subdued much longer given the increasing criticism of Serb actions. Besides, the other EC countries could not rule out the possibility that Germany – perhaps together with or followed by other countries – would proceed to recognize Croatia and Slovenia by itself, given the nature of some statements made by Kohl following the joint statement of Germany and Italy in Venice on 15 September. It seems that the British and French governments found it of the utmost importance that EC unity be preserved.

Which was why they assumed that their colleagues from the other EC member states would probably give in if Kohl and Genscher stuck to their points. And that is exactly what happened in early December, i.e. even before the summit in Maastricht took place. It is apparent from statements made by Hurd that, by 5 December, he had accepted the fact that Germany could not be stopped. After the conclusion of the Maastricht Treaty, for which consensus had been required, there was now nothing to prevent Bonn from pursuing a solo path. The treaty was no longer at issue. However, the EC countries also considered the matter of recognition as a first test to see whether the community was able to operate as a unity after the conclusion of the Treaty. Or, as an anonymous senior EC diplomat put it: ‘It will be very bad news indeed if the aspiration to a common policy falls at the first fence.’¹⁸²⁸ Dumas declared that the unity of the EC was more important to him than the Yugoslavia ‘epiphenomenon’: ‘The break-up of Yugoslavia is a tragedy, the break-up of the European Community, however, would be a catastrophe’¹⁸²⁹. Immediately after the conclusion of the Maastricht Treaty, which provided for a common foreign and security policy, it was clear that this common EC policy could be moulded to the will of whichever member state was the most determined as was the case shortly afterwards when Greek opposition against the recognition of Macedonia dragged on for a year and a half, in spite of the wishes of eleven other countries.

It has been suggested that Mitterrand agreed to the recognition of Croatia in exchange for Kohl’s agreeing to accept 1 January 1999 as the commencing date of the European Monetary Union.¹⁸³⁰ The then Dutch Ambassador in Paris, Wijnaendts, did not want to suggest there was a direct connection between German concessions regarding the monetary union and the French attitude towards recognition. ‘That is not the way it works.’ However, he thought Mitterrand must have realized that Kohl expected support from Paris in the matter of recognition without having to mention it. As such, Wijnaendts believed there had been a ‘silent understanding’.¹⁸³¹

Other authors claim that Germany had promised France an intensification of the existing European Union instead of expansion and agreed to a less representative European Parliament than it originally intended.¹⁸³² However, there is no proof to confirm either of these ‘deals’.

¹⁸²⁷ Michael Sheridan, ‘United Nations: What’s gone wrong? The high cost of peace-keeping. Failure in Yugoslavia’, The Independent, 01/11/93.

¹⁸²⁸ John Palmer, ‘German plan to recognize Croatia puts EC in turmoil’, The Guardian, 16/12/91.

¹⁸²⁹ Favier & Martin-Roland, Décennie, p. 244.

¹⁸³⁰ Ronald Havenaar, ‘Passie en bederf in Parijs en Bonn’ (Passion and corruption in Paris and Bonn), review by Kenneth Dyson & Kevin Featherstone, The Road to Maastricht. Negotiating Economic and Monetary Union, NRC Handelsblad, 10/03/00.

¹⁸³¹ Interview H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00.

¹⁸³² Edwina S. Campbell & Jack M. Seymour Jr., ‘France, Germany, and the Yugoslav Wars’, Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, p. 306.

The EC Ministers had agreed that the arbitration commission presided over by French judge Badinter would determine whether the criteria for recognition had been met. Republics that met the requirements could then be recognized on 15 January 1992. However, the German government had already broken any possible link between the recommendations of the Badinter Commission and the implementation decision of 15 January by Genscher's statement in the morning of 17 December, immediately after the EC Ministers had in principle decided to agree to recognition, by saying that his government in Bonn would announce its intention to recognize Croatia and Slovenia on 19 December. Apparently, the German government wanted to avoid the scenario of being unable to proceed with recognition because the Badinter Commission advised against it.¹⁸³³

The German government eventually announced its intention to recognize the independence of Croatia and Slovenia on 18 December, a week before Christmas and without waiting for the opinion of the Badinter Commission. As a gesture of 'courtesy' towards the EC partners, the government in Bonn decided to suspend actual recognition until 15 January.

Obviously, this was an insult to the Badinter Commission, although Germany should not bear the sole blame. After all, the governments of the other EC member states had accepted that this would happen, as is apparent from the explanation given by Van Eenennaam, head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV) of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs, at the Defence Council on 18 December:

"The majority of the "12" holds that there are risks to a premature and selective recognition and is supported in this by the UN Secretary-General and the Security Council. The outcome for now is that preservation of the unity of the "12" comes foremost. Republics that want to be recognized by the middle of January 1992, may obtain this recognition subject to certain conditions. Countries who want to recognize them sooner may do so. Germany will send diplomats no sooner than after 15 January."¹⁸³⁴

The adamant German position partly¹⁸³⁵ originated from Kohl's wish that the matter of Croatia and Slovenia's recognition be concluded by the time the congress of his party took place in Dresden on 17 December. Kohl got his intended ovation at the congress when he spoke of a 'grosser Erfolg' for German foreign policy. The Anglo-Saxon press translated Erfolg (success) as 'victory' or 'triumph',¹⁸³⁶ making it a case of sour grapes for those politicians who had tried to steer Kohl and Genscher away from recognition. After that, a veritable anti-German hysteria broke out in Great Britain, with the use of expressions such as 'overmighty Hun' and comparisons between Genscher and Hitler.¹⁸³⁷ The Economist came up with a new word for recognition: 'wreckognition'.¹⁸³⁸

11. Fears for Bosnia

Outside Germany, there was a general reaction of stupefaction or anger to the decision of the EC to proceed with recognition. Lord Carrington was thoroughly disillusioned and left the meeting of 16 December before it was closed.¹⁸³⁹ He was furious that he had been deprived of the one weapon that ¹⁸³³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00411, COREUs regarding the EPS position in the matter of Yugoslavia, October-December 1991, Van den Broek 190 to the Belgrade Embassy, 17/12/91; Genscher, Erinnerungen, pp. 961-962.

¹⁸³⁴ KAB. Defence Council report, 18/12/91.

¹⁸³⁵ According to Jakobsen, Multilateralism, p. 376, it was the most important reason.

¹⁸³⁶ For examples cf. Eisermann, Weg, p. 80. This faulty translation also appeared in relevant literature. Cf. Maull, Germany, p. 104; Silber & Little, Death, p. 200. Oscar Garschagen, 'Kohl erg blij over EG-besluit over Kroatië' (Kohl very pleased with EC decision about Croatia), De Volkskrant, 18/12/9, also said that Kohl had spoken in terms of a 'big triumph'.

¹⁸³⁷ Cf. Tanner, Croatia, p. 272.

¹⁸³⁸ The Economist, 18/01/92, pp. 48-49, quoted in Eyal, Europe, p. 50.

¹⁸³⁹ Kadijevic, Vien, pp. 23-24; Marijnissen & Glastra van Loon, Oorlog, p. 74.

could be used to enforce the protection of minorities.¹⁸⁴⁰ Yugoslav Prime Minister Markovic resigned on 20 December, officially because he did not agree to the federal budget for 1992, 81% of which was reserved for the army.¹⁸⁴¹ The always overly optimistic Prime Minister had waited until his last hope, the EC, had also abandoned him. Now, people had nearly forgotten about him already. According to Dutch newspaper Trouw, his position over the last few months had been 'less useful than that of an empty battery in a broken radio'.¹⁸⁴² Hardly anyone noticed his political demise. Fietelaars called it the end of 'a serial coup' against the remaining federal institutions of Yugoslavia which had started with the coup against the Federal Presidency on 3 October.¹⁸⁴³

Germany's solo path also left a bitter taste in the mouths of the Dutch. In a speech before the Evangelical Academy in Tutzing, Bavaria, Junior Minister Piet Dankert said that Germany

'had made a big fuss about the matter, preferring powerful language to sound arguments. Sometimes it seemed as if Germany's recognition was at stake instead of Croatia's. A very inauspicious beginning of a common European foreign and security policy. (...) Also, it would have done the German government credit if it had defended the Dutch EC Presidency against mostly unjustified and sometimes even vicious attacks by sections of the German media.'¹⁸⁴⁴

The German attitude was not forgotten by the Netherlands or by other countries. In early June 1993, Van Walsum, recently appointed Ambassador in Bonn, was taken to task by Genscher's successor Klaus Kinkel for commenting to the Bonn newspaper General-Anzeiger that the recognition might have been unwise.¹⁸⁴⁵

Many expected a bloodbath to follow in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Vance and various media repeated their warning that the recognition of the independence of Croatia and Slovenia would sooner cause the war to spread to Bosnia-Herzegovina than put an end to war in Croatia.¹⁸⁴⁶ Disappointed, American Ambassador Zimmermann telegraphed from Belgrade to Washington that the Croatian death toll of ten thousand would now be multiplied by ten in Bosnia.¹⁸⁴⁷ Bosnian Foreign Minister, Muslim Haris Silajdzic, warned that, within a few months, Bosnia might number 200,000 to 300,000 dead.¹⁸⁴⁸ Vance sent his special adviser, American diplomat Herbert Okun, to Izetbegovic and Ejup Ganic, a member of the Bosnian Presidency. They told him they had decided to ask for international recognition and asked him to send 10,000 peace troops to Bosnia immediately. Izetbegovic expected total war to break out in Bosnia if the West did not intervene.¹⁸⁴⁹ Okun said he did not expect the Security Council to take such steps, to which Ganic replied that Bosnia did not want to miss the boat now the EC had decided to set it in motion.¹⁸⁵⁰

¹⁸⁴⁰ Major, Autobiography, p. 533; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 112; Silber & Little, Death, p. 200; Newhouse, 'Round', p. 66.

¹⁸⁴¹ Theo Engelen, 'Markovic treedt af als premier van Joegoslavië' (Markovic resigns as Prime Minister of Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 21/12/91.

¹⁸⁴² 'EG wil VN-troepen in Bosnië-Herzegovina' (EC wants UN forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina) Trouw, 21/12/91.

¹⁸⁴³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00411, COREUs regarding the EPC position in the matter of Yugoslavia, October-December 1991, Fietelaars 424 to Van den Broek, 20/11/91.

¹⁸⁴⁴ 'Staatssecretaris Dankert in Beieren: Duitsland vervult cruciale rol in Centraal- en Oost-Europa' (Junior Minister Dankert in Bavaria: Germany has a prominent part to play in Central and Eastern Europe), Staatscourant (Netherlands Government Gazette), 15/01/92.

¹⁸⁴⁵ Daan Dijkman & Bart Rijs, 'Henry Wijnenendts', HP/De Tijd, 11/06/93, p. 24; interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

¹⁸⁴⁶ Gutman, Witness, pp. 4-5, 7.

¹⁸⁴⁷ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 178.

¹⁸⁴⁸ Gutman, Witness, p. 7.

¹⁸⁴⁹ Gutman, Witness, p. 8.

¹⁸⁵⁰ Michael Sheridan, 'United Nations: What's gone wrong? The high cost of peace-keeping. Failure in Yugoslavia', The Independent, 01/11/93. Also cf. Perez de Cuellar, Pilgrimage, p. 491.

In common with the governments of Slovenia, Croatia and Macedonia, Bosnia-Herzegovina informed the EC within a week after its decision on principle to proceed with recognition that it too wanted to qualify for recognition. The governments of the other republics, Serbia and Montenegro, did not. They insisted they would preserve the former republic of Yugoslavia. Not seeking recognition, they avoided being required to offer guarantees regarding minorities, such as the Albanians in Kosovo.¹⁸⁵¹

The response of Serb leaders in Bosnia followed soon after the Bosnian government had asked for recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina as an independent republic on 20 December.¹⁸⁵² Maps were circulating among Bosnian Serb leaders as early as December, with colours indicating areas that were coveted by the Serbs to create a corridor around Banja Luka between Belgrade and the Serb areas in Croatia.¹⁸⁵³ On 18 December, the autonomous Bosnian Serb region of Bosanska Krajina declared itself part of Yugoslavia instead of Bosnia-Herzegovina. An EC decision to recognize Bosnia-Herzegovina would therefore not apply to this territory. On 21 December, the day after recognition had been applied for, the Serb Parliament in Bosnia decided to proclaim the areas where Bosnian Serbs constituted a majority a 'Serb republic' within Bosnia-Herzegovina, with effect from 14 January 1992.¹⁸⁵⁴ Apparently, the Bosnian Serbs did not want to lose any time. Only two days later, on 23 December, Karadzic declared that Bosnia-Herzegovina no longer existed.¹⁸⁵⁵ He expected that Bosnia's declaration of independence would cost at least half a million lives.¹⁸⁵⁶ Nor was the proclamation of the Serb Republic in Bosnia to wait until 14 January; it was proclaimed as early as 9 January 1992. This Bosnian Serb republic or 'Republika Srpska' considered itself entitled to 60 per cent of the Bosnian territory.¹⁸⁵⁷

Dutch Counsellor of the Embassy Hasselman declared that, after the EC decision of 16 December, a 'timely arrival of, above all, a sufficiently strong' UN peace force in Bosnia would be crucial to prevent bloodshed.¹⁸⁵⁸ The EC thought so too and pressed for the deployment of a preventive UN peace force in Bosnia.¹⁸⁵⁹ This was indeed done through Van den Broek who was about to lay down the EC Presidency. On the next-to-last day of 1991, he consulted with his colleague De Deus Pinheiro in Portugal, the country that would take over the Presidency from the Netherlands two days later. Carrington and Vance were also attending. Again, Carrington urged the twelve member states to delay their recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina. However, Van den Broek had no intention of going back on the promised recognition. The Dutch Minister held that Serbia should not be rewarded for 'faits accomplis' and for holding Bosnia hostage. Besides, he thought it would not matter at all whether the Twelve recognized Bosnia if Milosevic really intended to cause trouble by trying to redraw Bosnia's borders too.¹⁸⁶⁰ Meanwhile impressed with the potential consequences for Yugoslavia of the decision on principle regarding recognition, he urgently asked his discussion partners again to ask for a UN peace force to be deployed in Bosnia-Herzegovina as soon as possible, as 'otherwise the threat of another Croatia would become very real'. However, the Dutch Minister was told by those present that ¹⁸⁵¹ Cf. Gied ten Berge and Mient Jan Faber, 'EG-Ministers maken het nog bonter dan de Duitsers' (EC Ministers make it even worse than the Germans did), de Volkskrant, 19/12/91.

¹⁸⁵² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Silajdzic to Van den Broek, 20/12/91.

¹⁸⁵³ Gutman, Witness, p. 9.

¹⁸⁵⁴ Cekic, Aggression, p. 298.

¹⁸⁵⁵ Quoted in Eyal, Europe, p. 61.

¹⁸⁵⁶ Theo Engelen, 'Serviërs in Bosnië willen hun republiek opdelen' (Serbs in Bosnia want to split up their republic), 23/12/91.

¹⁸⁵⁷ Sremac, War, p. 87.

¹⁸⁵⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00402, Joegoslavië/Binnenlandse politiek/Bosnië-Herzegovina, Hasselman 454, 23/12/91.

¹⁸⁵⁹ EG wil VN-troepen in Bosnië-Herzegovina' (EC want UN troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina), Trouw, 21/12/91; 'EG wil snel VN-macht naar Bosnië sturen' (EC wants to send UN forces to Bosnia soon), de Volkskrant, 21/12/91; Unclassified State Department report, annex 13. The Charge of the Light Blue Brigade: UNPROFOR First Deploys Fall-Winter 1992, p. 1.

¹⁸⁶⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00775, Van den Broek 64 to Lisbon Embassy, 31/12/91; Both, Indifference, p. 145.

the Serb government objected to a peace force, and the Security Council would not decide to deploy a force without the consent of Belgrade. The UN also feared that the establishment of a peace force in Bosnia would lead to requests for the same from Macedonia, Kosovo and Vojvodina, which could then not very well be refused, although such forces had better be deployed in 'the real crisis areas' the UN thought were in Croatia.¹⁸⁶¹ Vance had for several months stuck to the classic UN opinion that a peace force should be deployed only after a conflict has erupted and not before.¹⁸⁶²

In his report to the Security Council of 5 January 1992, Boutros-Ghali, who had succeeded Perez de Cuellar as UN Secretary-General, held that 'for now' there was no reason to send peace forces to Bosnia-Herzegovina. For now, only observers were sent to the areas in Bosnia that bordered on Croatia. It seems that Vance did not want to endanger the arrangements made for Croatia by the stationing of peace forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which was so strongly opposed by Milosevic.¹⁸⁶³

On 15 January 1992, the EC recognized Slovenia and Croatia, although, according to the Badinter Commission, the latter had not offered sufficient guarantees with regard to the rights of minorities.¹⁸⁶⁴ Germany was the only EC country to open embassies in Ljubljana and Zagreb right away, which amounted to nothing more difficult than granting a diplomatic status to the consulates general already there. Presently, 43 other countries followed the EC's example. They did not include the United States. The Vatican needed no example and had already recognized the republics on 13 January.

The recognition of Macedonia did not meet with objections of the Badinter Commission.¹⁸⁶⁵ Contrary to Bosnia-Herzegovina, Macedonia had nothing to fear from Milosevic, who had expressed his contempt for Macedonia in the presence of Zimmermann in July 1991. 'A nonentity', the American Ambassador heard him say, 'a detail, so insignificant that we don't even need to worry about it. It will disintegrate. The Macedonian nationalists will gravitate toward Bulgaria, Macedonia's Albanians will join Albania, and the rest of the Macedonians can stew in their own juices.'¹⁸⁶⁶

However, Macedonia's request for recognition was not complied with immediately because of the objections of Greece, which focused on the country's name. Greek resistance would only end in the spring of 1993. Early in 1992, the Netherlands were even faced with a short-lived Greek trade boycott, as Van den Broek had been too eager to recognize Macedonia's independence.

Bosnia-Herzegovina would not be recognized immediately. The Badinter Arbitration Commission thought it not clear whether all sections of the population would be in favour of independence. The twelve EC countries would therefore await the outcome of the referendum recommended by the Badinter Commission.¹⁸⁶⁷ It is doubtful what the commission and the EC meant to achieve by a referendum. In previous months, it had become absolutely clear what the political parties in Bosnia thought and they received massive support from their ethnic followers.

The entire issue of recognition had become a terrible mess. The republics that basically met the requirements for recognition – i.e. Bosnia and Macedonia – were not recognized (yet). Croatia, although it did not guarantee protection of its Serb minority, was recognized, because the EC countries thought they could not fall out of step with Germany. The EC also disregarded the fact that the Croatian President Tudjman had repeatedly demonstrated his eagerness with regard to certain parts of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Had the EC received any guarantees from Croatia that it would respect the independence of Bosnia it had desired so much for itself?

¹⁸⁶¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00775, Van den Broek 64 to Lisbon Embassy, 31/12/91. Minister Van den Broek claims to have warned Vance twice that observers should be sent to Bosnia-Herzegovina which was likely to become the next target of Serb aggression, Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: 'Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg'' (Minister Van den Broek: "Let's start with a warning shot"), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, p. 10.

¹⁸⁶² Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 16; also, Origins, p. 172.

¹⁸⁶³ Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 153. Cf. unclassified State Department report, annex 13. The Charge of the Light Blue Brigade: UNPROFOR First Deploys Fall-Winter 1992, p. 1.

¹⁸⁶⁴ Terrett, Dissolution, p. 164.

¹⁸⁶⁵ Terrett, Dissolution, p. 165.

¹⁸⁶⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 150.

¹⁸⁶⁷ Terrett, Dissolution, p. 162.

Tudjman and Milosevic would later claim that the independence of Slovenia and Croatia triggered off a chain reaction. After all, what was granted to these territories could not be denied to Bosnia-Herzegovina. If Yugoslavia was allowed to break up, why not Bosnia – often called ‘small Yugoslavia’ because of its ethnically heterogeneous population – as well? This seemed an argument that supported the claims of a Greater Serbia and a Greater Croatia. However, Tudjman disregarded the fact that he himself refused to apply this argument to the areas in Croatia that were claimed by Serbs. Moreover, Milosevic refused to recognize the right of separation of the Albanians in Kosovo, a right he had assigned to the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia.

Bonn’s expectation that the recognition of Croatia (and of Bosnia at a later date) would prevent further Serb aggression was totally unfounded and could certainly not be based on the reality represented by the former Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The fact that the war in Croatia came to an end was the result of the attitude adopted by the conflicting parties, not because Germany had supported recognition. Although the prospect of recognition might have made it easier for the government in Zagreb to accept the establishment of peace forces – which it had itself requested – on Croatian territory instead of along its borders.

The war that should have been prevented was the war in Bosnia. Demanding a useless referendum before it would proceed to recognize Bosnia, the EC had afforded all the parties in Bosnia – Croats, Muslims and Serbs – time to prepare for the conflict. Florence Hartmann, a Frenchwoman, wrote: ‘The recognition of the Yugoslav republics, often described as premature, eventually came too late to prevent more bloodshed.’¹⁸⁶⁸ Recognition as such had little to do with the outbreak of conflict in Bosnia. It would have made a difference if the countries that recognized Bosnia had been prepared to use military means to prevent a conflict. As both Hurd and Mitterrand had told the German government in early December: recognition would not affect the conflict in Yugoslavia if no troops were made available at the same time. And as Dumas had told Mitterrand on 3 December when they discussed the German insistence on recognition: ‘There was no miraculous solution for Yugoslavia as nobody was prepared to intervene militarily even then.’¹⁸⁶⁹ Given the lack of opportunity and willingness to intervene militarily, Bonn’s urge for recognition was the German version of ‘doing something’, or the ‘ethics of conviction’ (for an explanation of this term, see Chapter 1 of this section).

12. The EC and the Dutch Presidency: an assessment

In the introduction to this section, the importance of perceptions is explained: the Western perception of Yugoslavia and vice versa, the Dutch perception of international politics, the clarity of policy targets, the policy instruments including institutional capacity, the political will, the interaction between policy circuits, and policy timing. At this point in the report, we take stock of how the European Community, the most important actor in the first six months of the Yugoslav conflict, operated, focusing especially on the role of the Netherlands as President.

The conclusion of this Chapter is that the West did not adequately assess the power of the actors it was dealing with in Yugoslavia. It was a delusion to continue pinning one’s hopes on the influence the federal government and presidency of Yugoslavia could wield in the summer of 1991. People such as Markovic and Mesic were of no real account anymore in June and July 1991. Nor was it very useful to help Mesic retain his position as President of the collective Federal Presidency. It is a miracle he lasted for five months, i.e. until 5 December when he retired with retroactive effect from 8 October. There were few illusions about the actions of Milosevic, his staff and his confidants such as Jovic and Jovanovic. The EC was aware of their aspirations to a Greater Serbia. However, it was clear at the same time that no solution could leave out Serb leadership. Any other external actor would have been facing the same tensions.

¹⁸⁶⁸ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 188.

¹⁸⁶⁹ Favier & Martin-Roland, Décennie, p. 245.

However, the EC did not realize that Milosevic actually did not set that much store by the ‘Serb’ areas in Croatia. Greater Serbia was no principle but a means to maintain power. The EC had more room for manoeuvring than it realized, but in the early stages of the conflict the Community did not fully recognize the cynicism of the Serb leading figure.

Nor was the European Community sufficiently aware of the JNA’s true part. Initially, the twelve EC countries expected that the JNA would be prepared to accept the authority of the federal government. Later on, the JNA was too easily thought of as an extension of the Serb leadership. The EC did not understand the great tensions that were felt in the highest ranks of the JNA during the first months of the conflict about the question as to whether the army should try preserve the integrity of Yugoslavia or pursue the goal of a Greater Serbia. In other words, the JNA was a more or less independent factor manoeuvring between federal and Serb levels. It was unknown that the irresolute attitude of the army also caused major tensions with the Serb leadership. Later, Yugoslav Defence Minister Kadijevic would write slightlyingly:

‘The high-ranking officials of the EC went through several stages in their attitude towards the army. The first consisted of their attempts to have Mesic appointed President of the Yugoslav Federal Presidency in order to gain control over the army, preventing it from being used to serve Serb interests or from following an independent course. During this time, EC officials who visited Yugoslavia did not even consider involving JNA officials in their talks.

The second stage of the EC attitude towards Yugoslavia is characterized by the attempts to regain control over the army through the Federal Executive Council, i.e. Prime Minister Markovic’s attempts (...). The fact that these were entirely unconstitutional made it easier for us to thwart them.

The third stage began when Mesic, Drnovsek, Tupurkovski and Bogicevic left the Federal Presidency and EC officials, refusing to recognize the ‘rump or Serb Presidency’ as they called it, decided to establish direct contact with the army. It was then that the EC encouraged the JNA to operate independently, although they had previously accused us of acting without permission of the civil authorities.¹⁸⁷⁰

Kadijevic even suggests that eventually the West would have been prepared to support the JNA if it brought down Milosevic. But the JNA did not do this.¹⁸⁷¹

The fact that the JNA remained such an unknown factor to the Community was partly the result of Germany stressing in the early stages of the conflict that the Troika should not attribute a political role to the JNA.¹⁸⁷² Unfamiliarity with the JNA also suited German policy. It made it possible to depict the JNA as a powerful panzered Goliath dealing brutally with a few small Davids. It was not sufficiently clear within the EC that the JNA was in fact seriously weakened by desertion. It had trouble filling its ranks and made little progress against weak opponents.

If possible, the EC had even less insight into the role played in the conflict by the paramilitary forces. First, it was not understood that they were not guerrilla forces but rather criminal elements using the regular army’s artillery. Secondly, it was often assumed that these gangs were not centrally organized, operating instead on their own, whereas in reality they followed the orders of the authorities. As a result of all these misconceptions, the member states had little inclination to intervene.

¹⁸⁷⁰ Kadijevic, View, pp. 38-39.

¹⁸⁷¹ Kadijevic, View, p. 91.

¹⁸⁷² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00081. DEU; COREUs regarding the EPC position in the matter of Yugoslavia, June-September 1991, COREU Bonn, 30/07/91, CPE/BON 370; Genscher, Erinnerungen, p. 943.

The EC was invariably late in identifying problem areas. At first, the Community focused on Slovenia although there were enough signs indicating that Milosevic was prepared to give up the area without much resistance. The EC response to the outbreak of hostilities in Croatia came too late although it had been imminent ever since the declaration of independence the year before. Then it was only after much vacillating that the ECMM obtained its mandate for Croatia while the attitude of the Dutch Foreign Ministry was not the best example of forcefulness. Subsequently, the EC failed to take the necessary steps to alleviate rapidly mounting tensions in Bosnia-Herzegovina although they had been noted. According to Both, the Dutch Presidency was temporarily out of touch with that reality.

Although the 'COREU' (telegram to all EC capitals) sent by Director General for Political Affairs Van Walsum on 13 July may demonstrate a flawed assessment of the feasibility of the proposals set out in it, it did serve to clarify, a few weeks after the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia, that the EC did not want to tamper with the republics' borders. The one matter the EC intended to be adamant about if the republics gained more autonomy or even independence was the protection of the rights of minorities. Eventually, however, it mishandled the matter. The EC was unable to make arrangements for the Albanians in Kosovo or the Serbs in Croatia. Nor did it succeed in making it perfectly clear to Milosevic that the position of the Serbs in Croatia was inextricably linked to that of the Albanians in Kosovo. The Yugoslavia conference was really over the moment this was put to Milosevic. The protection of the rights of the Serbs came to nothing because of Bonn's wish for an early recognition of Croatia. And obviously, the problem of the precarious position of the various ethnic groups in Bosnia was not solved by demanding a referendum that would sooner increase the tensions than remove them.

A missed opportunity?

‘Stage one: We say that nothing is going to happen.

Stage two: We say that something might happen, but we should not get involved.

Stage three: We say that we possibly ought to do something, but there is nothing we can do.

Stage four: We say that perhaps it might have been possible to do something, but it is too late now anyway.’¹⁸⁷³

When trying to realize its objectives without compromise, one of the greatest obstacles the EC had to cope with was the absence of a military component within the European Political Cooperation (EPC). In early September 1991, Delors compared the Community to an adolescent faced with an adult crisis.¹⁸⁷⁴ He said the crisis in Yugoslavia had probably come ten years too soon. Economic aid and recognition were the only instruments the EC had at its disposal. Ten years later, the EC might perhaps have been able to establish a peace force.¹⁸⁷⁵ ‘The glaring contrast between the abundance of declarations issued by the twelve member states and their military non-existence has undoubtedly done much to encourage Milosevic to resort to violence, first in Croatia and then in Bosnia’, Van Walsum says looking back.¹⁸⁷⁶ However, given the attitudes adopted by Bonn, London and Rome, it is doubtful whether the EC could have deployed a military component effectively even if it had been available.

¹⁸⁷³ Prime Minister Jim Hacker in the television series Yes Prime Minister, quoted in Tromp, Verraad, p. 14.

¹⁸⁷⁴ Cf. Eyal, Europe, pp. 71-72: ‘The European Community has tried to run before it could walk’.

¹⁸⁷⁵ William Drozdiak, ‘Lack of an Armed Option Limits EC’s Yugoslav Peace Initiative’, The Washington Post, 05/09/91.

¹⁸⁷⁶ ABZ, BZ 109. Van Walsum 33 to Van Mierlo, 26/01/98.

Nor were NATO or the WEU called to the fray during the first months of the conflict, although military experts feel they could have made a great difference with comparatively few means.¹⁸⁷⁷ It has been asked why NATO was not put to action against JNA artillery during the siege of Vukovar. This was open terrain, unlike the later situation in Bosnia with its mountains and forests. Moreover, at this stage of the conflict there were no UN troops that could be taken hostage as a response to air strikes. But NATO argued that air strikes would not have sufficed and that none of the countries was prepared to deploy ground forces.¹⁸⁷⁸

Western use of limited military means might also have prevented much bloodshed at the time of the shelling of Dubrovnik. American general John Galvin, the highest ranking NATO officer in Europe ('SACEUR' in military circles, or Supreme Allied Commander Europe) had made plans in anticipation of such a deployment, but President Bush, prompted by his military advisers, was against intervention.¹⁸⁷⁹ At a hearing of the American Congress, Galvin would later state that NATO air strikes could have put an end to the bombing of both Dubrovnik and Vukovar.¹⁸⁸⁰

On 26 November 1991, the ECMM changed the usually factual character of its reports that reached the European capitals through the EC Presidency. 'In the last analysis the JNA is a cowardly army, fighting for no recognisable principle, but largely for its own status and survival', was one of the crucial statements. The report called attention to the JNA's high degree of desertion and low morale. 'There is thus good reason to believe that selective show of force – to intimidate and hit the JNA in places where it hurts – can show its bluster and bluff.' The suggestion was made to strike back against the ships that were bombing Dubrovnik and the batteries holding hospitals under fire.¹⁸⁸¹ The report was leaked and the outspoken recommendation caused much commotion and irritation,¹⁸⁸² but nothing else. In the Netherlands, Bart Tromp wrote that he supported the ECMM's point of view.¹⁸⁸³

The notion must have appealed to Van Walsum as well. As a former artilleryman, he was much angered by television shots of a Serb battery firing a village after which its soldiers did not try to get away as quickly as possible – as they usually do in a war in expectation of counter-fire – but instead stayed around smoking, perfectly at ease, having nothing to fear. He wanted the West at least to show that a price would have to be paid for such actions. During talks with the Ministry of Defence, he proposed bombing a military air base in Serbia as a retaliation against the artillery attacks on Vukovar,¹⁸⁸⁴ but the answer was that military action without access to ground forces was not possible.

French General Jean Cot, UN Commander in the former republic of Yugoslavia from July 1993 to March 1994, would later write he was convinced that the Serbs might have been stopped in October 1991, if three ships, three dozen aircraft and 3,000 troops had been deployed at Dubrovnik and Vukovar as a clear indication of EC determination.¹⁸⁸⁵ He was not the only one to think so at the time, nor is he now.¹⁸⁸⁶ Shortly after laying down the office of Deputy Secretary of State early in 1993, ¹⁸⁷⁷ Cf. Jakobsen, 'Multilateralism', p. 374; S.L. Woodward, 'Redrawing Borders in a Period of Systemic Transition', Esman/Telhami (eds.) Organizations, p. 222.

¹⁸⁷⁸ Owen, Breakup, p. 38.

¹⁸⁷⁹ Zimmermann, Ambassador, p. 14; also, Origins, p. 158; F. Stephen Larrabee, 'US Policy in the Balkans: From Containment to Strategic Reengagement', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, pp. 281 and 294 n. 21; Anthony Lewis, 'War Crimes', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, pp. 60-61.

¹⁸⁸⁰ Tromp, Verraad, p. 208.

¹⁸⁸¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/03308. COREU from the EC Presidency, 03/12/91, cpe/pres/hag 1662.

¹⁸⁸² Cf. ABZ, DEU/ARA/03308, De Vos van Steenwijk (Ottawa) 177 to Van den Broek, 05/12/91; 'EG-waarnemers: federale leger heeft vermoord' (EC observers: federal army has committed murder), Trouw, 03/12/91; 'Joegoslavisch leger moordt en brandschat' (Yugoslav army kills and plunders), NRC Handelsblad, 03/12/91; 'Joegoslavisch leger walste dorpen plat' (Yugoslav army razed villages to the ground), de Volkskrant, 03/12/91.

¹⁸⁸³ Tromp, Verraad, p. 26 (11/12/91).

¹⁸⁸⁴ Interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

¹⁸⁸⁵ Quoted in: Van Eekelen, Security, p. 142.

¹⁸⁸⁶ Cf. Bertram, 'Diplomacy', p. 79; Callahan, Wars, pp. 101 and 237; E.A. Hammel, 'Lessons from the Yugoslav Labyrinth', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, pp. 34-35; Michael Ignatieff, 'Introduction: Virtue by Proxy', Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. xviii; Newhouse, 'Round', p. 64; Simms, Hour, p. 98; J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Joegoslavië, een typisch geval van

Eagleburger said that in the summer and autumn of 1991 there had been opportunities for the West to intervene with comparatively few means, which would have stopped the tragedy from unfolding.¹⁸⁸⁷ At the time of the Dubrovnik bombings, WEU Secretary-General Van Eekelen proposed sending navy vessels to the besieged city. Paris and Washington were willing, but the United Kingdom was not¹⁸⁸⁸ and so it did not come off. Holbrooke, as well, would later hold the view that NATO should have been put to action in 1991 or 1992.¹⁸⁸⁹

Indeed, there was ample opportunity to chase away the besiegers from Dubrovnik and Vukovar. It may well be asked whether such a successful action of western ships and aircraft would have put an end to Serb aggression in general.¹⁸⁹⁰ It seems, however, that a few sharp military blows might have curbed the violence. As regards timing, October and November 1991 might still have afforded an opportunity to intervene with comparatively few military means, as in those first months of the conflict the Milosevic regime appears to have been very much impressed by the intervention power displayed by the West against Iraq.¹⁸⁹¹ Petar Lukovic, vice editor of Vreme in Yugoslavia, was also convinced that a western military intervention in 1991, when the front line stretched no more than fifty kilometres would, 'in twenty-four hours (...) have scared the shit out of Milosevic's army or the Croatian army or anybody'.¹⁸⁹²

The EC not only lacked a military instrument, but also a central body to assess and set out a policy for the crisis, i.e. an integrated crisis control centre to deal with the conflict in Yugoslavia. Regular meetings of officials (the Political Committee, Coreper and the ad hoc group) about Yugoslavia could not make up for that. Political analysis of the situation in Yugoslavia continued to take place on a national level. The most important system for information exchange was the COREU network. That EC and EPS analysis mostly depended on a rotating presidency that always needed time to settle in seems amateur. In this respect, the Netherlands even had the advantage of having acted on behalf of EC President Luxembourg in Belgrade during the first six months of 1991.

Press comments in the period of the Dutch EC Presidency

As will become apparent later on, the press were often held responsible for the eagerness of Dutch politicians to dive into the Yugoslavia issue. The following demonstrates that there was not that much enthusiasm in the first six months of the war and that the Dutch press rather advised politicians not to get involved than otherwise.

According to the Dutch weekly Vrij Nederland, the EC Presidency made Van den Broek more enemies than friends, mostly because of Black Monday and the arguments with Germany about Yugoslavia.¹⁸⁹³ Especially abroad, the Dutch Presidency was judged very negatively. The French newspaper Le Monde stated that this presidency was unanimously considered 'the most disastrous in the entire EC history'.¹⁸⁹⁴ We already pointed out how harshly Van den Broek was criticized, not only by Genscher but also by the German press. Criticism usually focused on his lack of knowledge about the situation in Yugoslavia, which incidentally he himself did not consider a shortcoming at all. It was 'te weinig' en 'te laat', Armex, 78(1994)1 p. 25; Secretary-General of the Austrian Foreign Ministry, Albert Rohan, quoted in Mock (Hg.), Balkan-Dossier, p. 108.

¹⁸⁸⁷ Don Oberdorfer, 'A Bloody Failure in the Balkans', The Washington Post, 08/02/93.

¹⁸⁸⁸ Alain van der Horst, 'We moeten onze tanden laten zien' (We should show our teeth), HP/De Tijd, 23/06/93, p. 28; Cohen, Bonds, p. 234.

¹⁸⁸⁹ Cohen, Serpent, p. 157.

¹⁸⁹⁰ Cf. David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, p. 129.

¹⁸⁹¹ Philip J. Cohen, 'Ending the war and securing peace in former Yugoslavia', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 41.

¹⁸⁹² Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 122.

¹⁸⁹³ Leonard Ornstein & Max van Weezel, 'Van den Broek kan de wereld weer aan, dertel als een veulen' (Van den Broek, frolicsome like a foal, able to face the world again), Vrij Nederland, 11/04/92.

¹⁸⁹⁴ Quoted in Philip Freriks, 'Actie Dumas heeft diepere achtergrond' (There is more to Dumas' action), de Volkskrant, 10/10/91.

especially his harsh attitude towards Croatia that led to him being described by a German academic publication in 2000 as ‘professionally incompetent and, in this matter, partial to the Serbs’.¹⁸⁹⁵ The Germans also thought the EC President was quick to take offence. ‘Generally speaking, the Dutch Presidency was not very competent, which made it very sensitive to criticism and correction of the other EC members’¹⁸⁹⁶ According to some, this did not only apply to the Minister alone. At the time, the culture of the Dutch Foreign Ministry was described by Hans Moleman in De Volkskrant as ‘a curious mixture of pride and brisk ingenuousness’.¹⁸⁹⁷

Still, there was not only criticism. Van den Broek was praised by Delors who said the Dutch Presidency had shown understanding of the Yugoslav problem and had unwaveringly tried to find solutions whenever obstacles presented themselves. At the same time, however, he concluded that the targets – protection of human rights, democracy, no recognition of borders that were redrawn after the use of violence and recognition of the right to self-determination of the Yugoslav peoples – were incompatible.¹⁸⁹⁸ Under the direction of Van den Broek, the EC had taken some new initiatives, such as sending observers to the area and organizing a Yugoslavia conference. The Troika had been actively engaged in shuttle diplomacy. And, in spite of differences of opinion, Van den Broek had successfully preserved a consensus in the matter of Yugoslavia.

Criticism of the Dutch EC Presidency not only originated abroad. At home, newspaper NRC Handelsblad monitored general EC policy very closely, and the Dutch Presidency in particular. Several matters were criticized. The Presidency’s policy was labelled unrealistic, at least inappropriate for Yugoslavia. ‘There seem to be two Yugoslavia’s: one where the parties are butchering one another and at best drive civilians into shelters, and another where diplomats are meeting and observers are deemed to travel about’, was the editorial comment in NRC Handelsblad of 18 September 1991.¹⁸⁹⁹ According to the paper, this lack of realism also stemmed from the Dutch inclination for consensus. In the case of Yugoslavia, this was meant to lead to impartiality: Croatia was as guilty as Serbia and incidents such as the Croats opening fire on Wijnaendts’s helicopter were seized on to maintain the balance.¹⁹⁰⁰ The Dutch government knew nothing about Yugoslavia and relied for too long on the federal government, although it held no real power anymore, said columnist J.L. Heldring.¹⁹⁰¹

Secondly, the lack of objectives and vision was denounced. NRC Handelsblad observed that the Serbs had taken advantage of the fact that the EC had not sufficiently thought through its actions in advance.¹⁹⁰² There was general criticism that Van den Broek’s actions lacked vision. During the first weeks of his official involvement in the Yugoslav issue, Van den Broek demonstrated great diligence. However, it could not be denied that his actions did not seem to spring from a thorough assessment of underlying reasons and relations. Nor were there any clear objectives. Even his own party criticized Van den Broek’s policy for its lack of vision with regard to Yugoslavia during the EC Presidency.¹⁹⁰³

Most actions were motivated by the aim to bring about ceasefires that were broken before the ink on the agreement had dried and gave rise to unrealistic expectations.¹⁹⁰⁴ Jan Tromp commented in De Volkskrant that Van den Broek should not have ‘set himself up as a self-important would-be ¹⁸⁹⁵ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 148.

¹⁸⁹⁶ Zeitler, Rolle, pp. 162-163.

¹⁸⁹⁷ Hans Moleman, ‘Aperots maakt er het beste van’ (Foreign Ministry makes the best of it), de Volkskrant, 12/10/91.

¹⁸⁹⁸ ‘Delors: v. Broek goed in kwestie Joegoslavië’ (Delors: “Van den Broek knows how to deal with Yugoslavia”), NRC Handelsblad, 23/10/91.

¹⁸⁹⁹ ‘De vrede van Igalo’ (The peace of Igalo), NRC Handelsblad, 18/09/91.

¹⁹⁰⁰ ‘De vrede van Igalo’, NRC Handelsblad, 18/09/91.

¹⁹⁰¹ Cf. J.L. Heldring, ‘De kop van Jut’ (Fry your strength), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/91.

¹⁹⁰² ‘Een dubbele tragedie’ (Double tragedy), editorial, NRC Handelsblad, 10/09/91.

¹⁹⁰³ Olaf van Boetzelaer, ‘EG-politiek in Joegoslavië baseerde zich op onvoldragen analyse’ (EC politics in Yugoslavia were based on lack of analysis), CD/Actueel, 11(1991)(23 November) p. 20.

¹⁹⁰⁴ Cf. Maarten Lak, ‘The involvement of the European Community in the Yugoslav crisis during 1991’, Van den Heuvel & Siccama (eds.), Disintegration, p. 182.

general'.¹⁹⁰⁵ Serb Foreign Minister Jovanovic also stressed the fact that Van den Broek's attitude of prominence in Yugoslavia not only stemmed from the presidency: 'Van den Broek was the most ambitious to be visible.'¹⁹⁰⁶ This would soon affect his reputation.¹⁹⁰⁷ Van den Broek's image was damaged as there was something ridiculous about announcements of solutions that were invariably followed by another breaking of the truce.

An editorial comment in NRC Handelsblad at the end of August 1991 raised the question whether Van den Broek had not thrown himself too enthusiastically on the matter of Yugoslavia: 'His staff – if it had had the necessary knowledge of the region's psychology and history – might have prevented him from taking this fresh approach to crisis management, in a region the Netherlands were so unfamiliar with.'¹⁹⁰⁸ However, Hans Oversloot, Political Science professor at Leiden University, stated in Trouw that the departmental staff should not be the first to blame. Minister Van den Broek himself had been neglecting his Eastern European advisers for years.¹⁹⁰⁹

Shortly after Van den Broek's proposal of a WEU peace force that had not been well thought-out, NRC Handelsblad editor Frits Schaling wondered if the Dutch EC Presidency might be suffering from hyperventilation. His criticism mainly focused on the Dutch draft treaty for the European Political Union, but did not fail to mention the unsuccessful attempts to end the Yugoslav conflict.¹⁹¹⁰ According to NRC Handelsblad, Van den Broek's actions in the matter of Yugoslavia became 'increasingly embarrassing'. In an in-depth analysis, the editor said that the Minister had allowed himself to be used 'as a miner's canary' by the EC member states: 'without protection, without means of power, without compassion.' This was partly caused by his insufficient understanding of the historic and psychological factors in the Balkans and the fact that the Netherlands appeared to be lacking direction without the coordination of the US. The commentator concluded that not only Van den Broek's reputation had been damaged but that of the Netherlands also:

'The only solution in the matter of Yugoslavia is to wait until the chaos, confusion and tragedy have become intolerable. This may seem to be in bitter contrast with the harrowing television images, but up to now, pseudo actions and good intentions have caused more damage than the Netherlands can bear.'¹⁹¹¹

After Carrington's decision to postpone the Yugoslavia conference early in November, the editorial comment said: 'This showed an unexpected sense of reality; the series of ceasefires and threats uttered by the Community were starting to verge on the ridiculous.' The commentator concluded that the EC had bitten off more than it could chew with Yugoslavia.¹⁹¹²

The third point of criticism was the awkward position held by the Dutch Presidency in its relation with the Bonn-Paris axis, which relation had by the end of August recovered from a short rupture during the first two months of the Yugoslav conflict. NRC Handelsblad admitted it was hard for the Minister to secure a position between Bonn and Paris, but also wondered 'what the Netherlands would gain by such a Presidency, if it did nothing but display the country's irrelevance time and ¹⁹⁰⁵ Jan Tromp, 'Van den Broek had geen Minister meer moeten willen wezen' (Van den Broek should not have wanted to be a Minister anymore), de Volkskrant, 08/10/91.

¹⁹⁰⁶ Interview Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

¹⁹⁰⁷ Cf. Bertrand de Largentaye, 'The Role of the European Community', Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, p. 33.

¹⁹⁰⁸ 'Bijbaantje' (Job on the side), NRC Handelsblad, 30/08/91.

¹⁹⁰⁹ Hans Oversloot, 'Van den Broek en de fictie van Nederlands Oost-Europa beleid' (Van den Broek and the fiction of a Dutch Eastern-Europe policy), Trouw, 18/09/91.

¹⁹¹⁰ Frits Schaling, 'Nederland hyperventileert als voorzitter van de EG' (The Netherlands is hyperventilating as EC President), NRC Handelsblad, 21/09/91.

¹⁹¹¹ 'Van den Broek', NRC Handelsblad, 23/09/91.

¹⁹¹² 'Vier maanden later' (Four months later), NRC Handelsblad, 06/11/91.

again'.¹⁹¹³ Moreover, Van den Broek could be blamed for not having developed a personal rapport with his German and French colleagues.¹⁹¹⁴

Finally, criticism concerned the fact that the EC did not have the means required to deal with the crisis in Yugoslavia properly. According to NRC Handelsblad, a solution could only be reached if the Serb occupation of areas in Croatia had been brought to an end by military means. Peacekeeping was not sufficient – only peace-enforcement would enable a return to the status quo ante. As long as the EC was unable to intervene militarily, it had better 'get out of the adventure quickly' and free itself of 'this dead-end job'.¹⁹¹⁵

Peter Michielsen, in particular, sharply criticised the EC's actions in NRC Handelsblad, describing them as too late, half-hearted and unrealistic.¹⁹¹⁶ In his opinion, the EC should either have stayed out of the conflict as much as possible or assume a firmer attitude by immediately imposing sanctions on Serbia and recognizing Croatia and Slovenia.

'It might have done some good. Instead, the EC thought it could put an end to a bloody vendetta by addressing the heads of the family in a fatherly and admonishing manner – a dialogue that unfolded on several levels and, contrary to what the Hague may think, did not earn the Dutch any praises but mostly scorn, damaging the reputations of both the Netherlands and the EC.'¹⁹¹⁷

He thought 'the EC would not be able to end the war as long as the rapacious warlords in the region managed to find ample reason to continue it'. He reproached EC politicians for 'the useless farce of their calls for peace and their statements'. Faced with the inflexible determination of the Serbs to occupy 'their' territory in Croatia, they could achieve nothing with their 'international code of behaviour and social conventions, which, being based on voluntariness, agreement and consensus, were quite useless in Yugoslavia'.¹⁹¹⁸ Treading on the Yugoslav 'minefield' would sooner lead to an increase of violence than bring about the intended peace.¹⁹¹⁹ 'After all, despite their good intentions, the attempts made by the EC have only increased the mutual embitterment, hatred and distrust and tarnished the image of the EC and the EC protagonists, and that of Minister Van den Broek in particular.'¹⁹²⁰

All his warnings that interference from abroad, however well-intentioned, would have a contrary effect on the conflict in Yugoslavia made it even more remarkable that, on the last day of the ¹⁹¹³ 'Bijbaantje', NRC Handelsblad, 30/08/91.

¹⁹¹⁴ 'Van den Broek', NRC Handelsblad, 23/09/91. Cf. Philip Freriks, 'Actie Dumas heeft diepere achtergrond', de Volkskrant, 10/10/91, on the bad relationship between Van den Broek and Dumas, and cf. Ben Knippen, 'Lubbers mag de top in Maastricht redden' (Lubbers is called upon to protect the Maastricht summit from failure), NRC Handelsblad, 03/12/91, about the Dutch Foreign Ministry's brittle relationship with Germany and France.

¹⁹¹⁵ 'De vrede van Igalo', NRC Handelsblad, 18/09/91.

¹⁹¹⁶ Cf. Peter Michielsen, 'EG-actie inzake Joegoslavië even halfslachtig als haar hele beleid' (EC steps in the matter of Yugoslavia are as half-hearted as its entire policy), NRC Handelsblad, 09/11/91.

¹⁹¹⁷ Peter Michielsen, 'Na duizend doden gaat Van den Broek eindelijk ultimatum stellen' (With 1,000 dead, Van den Broek starts setting ultimatums), NRC Handelsblad, 11/10/91. In common with the German government, he was in favour of recognizing Croatia and Slovenia, hoping it would curb Serb violence, Peter Michielsen, 'Roeren in Joegoslavisch kruitvat leidt niet tot vrede' (Treading the Yugoslav minefield does not bring peace), NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/91.

¹⁹¹⁸ Peter Michielsen, 'Joegoslavië vecht tot boedel is verdeeld' (Yugoslavia fights until the loot is divided), NRC Handelsblad, 26/09/91.

¹⁹¹⁹ Peter Michielsen, 'Roeren in Joegoslavisch kruitvat leidt niet tot vrede', NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/91; idem, 'Hollands paternalisme past niet in Joegoslavië' (Dutch paternalism not fitting in Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/91; also, 'EG kreunend naar erkenning Kroatië en Slovenië' (EC unwillingly recognizes Croatia and Slovenia), NRC Handelsblad, 17/12/91.

¹⁹²⁰ Peter Michielsen, 'Mislukking vredesoverleg ligt ook aan EG' (EC also to blame for failure of peace talks), NRC Handelsblad, 07/11/91.

year 1991, Michielsen and Elsbeth Etty co-wrote an article bearing the title ‘European action for peace is what Yugoslavia needs’.¹⁹²¹ This article is discussed in detail in the Wieten appendix to this report.

Apparently, the article resulted from frustration about the lack of interest for the war. Its tone was emotional and concluded by saying:

‘perhaps something might be achieved if a great number of peace activists were to appear on the battlefield. A well-organized action for peace, for example with international peace brigades or peace camps established between the contending parties, might convince both the Serbs and the Croats of the seriousness of Europe’s desire that the conflict should end.’¹⁹²²

The article was in line with the article of journalists Anet Bleich and Ewoud Nysingh that appeared in De Volkskrant on the same day. The latter had a similar tone and content and also called for ‘a European action for peace organized by concerned citizens that could make it clear to the contending parties that the times of war in Europe were over.’¹⁹²³ Both articles called for the existing Dutch peace movement – that had once managed to mobilize hundreds of thousands of people to protest against nuclear missiles – to come out of hiding. It was at this point an unusual call for intervention, all the more so as it was published by NRC Handelsblad.

Mient Jan Faber, general secretary of the Interchurch Peace Council or IKV, replied that his organization had already discussed the idea of an international peace brigade in July 1991, ‘together with our Yugoslav friends’, but putting the plan to work ‘had to date proven impossible because of the war’. Referring to a range of mostly small-scale activities, he pointed out that he and others were already ‘working themselves to death’ trying to put a stop to the war in Yugoslavia. He regretted the fact that these activities had not received any press coverage nor had they induced the Foreign Ministry or the Ministry of Defence to grant him any subsidies.¹⁹²⁴

The editorial comment in Trouw hardly ever dealt with foreign affairs, but even this newspaper now commented that the EC policy did not accomplish much: ‘Whether the EC likes it or not, the Yugoslav leaders (and Serb President Milosevic in particular) will do what they want.’¹⁹²⁵ The EC had failed the ‘Yugoslavia’ exam.¹⁹²⁶ R.C.R. Siekmann, who works for the T.M.C. Asser Instituut voor Internationaal Recht (Asser Institute for International Law) in the Hague, regularly contributed to the editorial page of the Trouw newspaper. In September, he said that the EC and WEU had proven powerless in the Yugoslav crisis. The time for diplomatic mediation was over. Force was required now, which was ‘no business for the EC’. Though he doubted whether the UN, the proper organization to take such actions, would proceed to use force.¹⁹²⁷ Without it, actions of both the EC and the UN would be mere rituals. Like Peter Michielsen in NRC Handelsblad, Siekmann perceived a contrast between the EC’s ‘diplomatic fantasies’ and ‘thinking along abstract lines’ on the one hand and grim reality in the former federal republic of Yugoslavia on the other.¹⁹²⁸

¹⁹²¹ NRC Handelsblad, 31/12/91.

¹⁹²² NRC Handelsblad, 31/12/91.

¹⁹²³ Anet Bleich & Ewoud Nysingh, ‘Joegoslavische oorlog schreeuwt om actie van burgers’ (Yugoslav war cries out for citizens’ action), de Volkskrant, 31/12/91.

¹⁹²⁴ Mient Jan Faber, ‘Juist de media laten het afweten in Joegoslavië’ (It is the press that is failing in Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 03/01/92. Also cf. ‘Media lijden aan beeldversmalling over de oorlog’ (The media’s coverage of the war is insufficient), NRC Handelsblad, 07/01/92.

¹⁹²⁵ ‘De EG en Joegoslavië’ (The EC and Yugoslavia), Trouw, 05/09/91.

¹⁹²⁶ Frits van Exter, ‘Europa zakt voor examen ‘Joegoslavië’ (Europe fails ‘Yugoslavia exam’), Trouw, 23/09/91.

¹⁹²⁷ R.C.R. Siekmann, ‘Erkenning Kroatië als politiek signaal’ (Recognition of Croatia as a political signal), Trouw, 21/09/91. Also cf. ‘Europese vredesmacht in Kroatië beter dan boycot’ (European peace force in Croatia better than boycott), Trouw, 18/10/91 and ‘Vredesactie op drijfzand’ (Peace action built on quicksand), Trouw, 12/09/91; Herman Verbeek, ‘EG gaat boekje te buiten’ (EC is overstepping the mark), Trouw, 13/09/91.

¹⁹²⁸ R.C.R. Siekmann, ‘Rituele diplomatie’ (Ritual diplomacy), Trouw, 10/10/91.

Herman Verbeek, a member of the Green party of the European Parliament, said in Trouw that the EC had overestimated itself in the Yugoslavian conflict:

‘Minister Van den Broek was not to be envied. As acting chairman of the European Council, he was ordered to go to Yugoslavia, which he was happy to do. He went there four times – four times he was treated like a boxing ball. The Dutch Minister is unfamiliar with Yugoslavia, lacks the experience of operating within such an intricate political web and makes all the mistakes a junior diplomat would make. The pompous tone, the bragging in the press, the blind and consistent prejudice against the Serbs – he was the perfect tool for politicians in Yugoslavia.’¹⁹²⁹

Although the unusual editorial comment in Trouw of 16 October could sympathize with those who thought that the fighting in Yugoslavia should be allowed to go on until common sense prevailed, the commentator ‘had much more sympathy for and was even in awe of’ the continuing attempts of the EC and Van den Broek to find a solution at the negotiation table: ‘No matter how exhausting, the most sensible course to take is to negotiate until you drop. Hoping the miserable despondency of the smoking battlefield would gradually leave its traces at the negotiation table too.’¹⁹³⁰ In a Trouw interview, Voorhoeve said the EC had done about all it could do. He attributed the fact that nothing more was done to the UN and NATO being unwilling to take any action. Nor did he have the impression that Dumas, Genscher or Hurd would have done much better than Van den Broek as EC President.¹⁹³¹

The first debate about Yugoslavia, and EC policy in particular, unfolded in the opinion pages of Trouw. In their contribution to this section, Doeke Eisma, a member of parliament for the D66 party, and party worker Bob de Rooter defended the EC policy against increasing criticism. They understood why the Community had not yet imposed sanctions against Serbia: negotiations with Serbia were forthcoming. According to them, it was only logical that Croatia and Slovenia had not been recognized yet – secession should not be made too easy. True, the EC might sometimes be in two minds about things or even inconsistent, but the authors considered EC policy a way of ‘pumping the brakes’ ‘to prevent getting into a skid it would be impossible to get out of’.¹⁹³² Heleen Bakker and Mark van Barschot, international secretary and national leader of the Young Democrats respectively, did not agree with the senior democrats at all. They criticized the EC for having supported the party that was most guilty, i.e. Serbia, by insisting on the preservation of Yugoslavia’s unity for far too long, while Serbia continued the aggression. In their view, the EC should recognize Croatia and be prepared to guarantee its independence at the same time.¹⁹³³ Jan Emck, a member of the IKV, criticized the Young Democrats, saying that the EC had no other choice than to pursue an ‘ad hoc zigzag policy’¹⁹³⁴ as long as it was unclear whether the international community of the 1990s would, with regard to countries that were splitting up, prefer the establishment of ethnically homogeneous areas to the preservation of the internal frontiers. The ‘ill-fated decision’ of the EC to proceed to recognition induced IKV member Laurens Hogebrink to a diatribe against the EC. Apparently, the unity of the twelve member states was considered more important than the reality in Yugoslavia, where the decision to recognize the republics would threaten the safety of areas that had not been drawn into the war so far.¹⁹³⁵

¹⁹²⁹ Herman Verbeek, ‘EG gaat boekje te buiten’, Trouw, 13/09/91.

¹⁹³⁰ ‘Een hek om Joegoslavië?’ (A fence around Yugoslavia?), Trouw, 16/10/91.

¹⁹³¹ Bettina Hubo, ‘Joris Voorhoeve: Kritiek op optreden niet terecht. ‘Joegoslavië een slangenkuil’ (Joris Voorhoeve: Criticism of EC is unfounded. ‘Yugoslavia is a snake pit’), Trouw, 20/11/91.

¹⁹³² Doeke Eisma & Bob de Rooter, ‘Groeiende kritiek op EG-beleid Joegoslavië is ongerechtvaardigd’ (Increasing criticism of EC policy is unfounded), Trouw, 26/11/91.

¹⁹³³ Heleen Bakker & Mark van Barschot, ‘Angst EG voor ‘precedent’ speelde Servië in de kaart’ (EC fear to create a precedent played into Serbia’s hands), Trouw, 03/12/91.

¹⁹³⁴ Jan Emck, ‘Gewoon een ouderwetse oorlog’ (Just an ordinary war), Trouw, 12/12/91.

¹⁹³⁵ Laurens Hogebrink, ‘De blindheid van de EG’ (The EC’s blindness), Trouw, 28/12/91.

Koen Koch attacked the EC policy in De Volkskrant: intentions were good, but the outcome had a contrary effect.¹⁹³⁶ However, De Volkskrant readers would in general encounter more sympathy and appreciation for the EC, and more confidence that it could help find a solution to the problems than the readers of NRC Handelsblad or Trouw. The EC should at least be praised for its ‘courage’.¹⁹³⁷ After the war in Croatia had escalated in the first half of September, the editor of De Volkskrant commented that the EC should not be ashamed to admit that it ought to hand the matter over to the UN for lack of military means and the absence of a truly uniform foreign policy.¹⁹³⁸ After the UN had brought about a ceasefire, the EC would get a second chance to show its true worth ‘as an honest mediator’.¹⁹³⁹ Whereas Trouw called Van den Broek’s middle of September proposal to deploy a WEU force ‘an act of desperation’¹⁹⁴⁰, the editor of De Volkskrant called it ‘a solution’¹⁹⁴¹. The latter paper thought it ‘inappropriate’ to scorn the laborious attempts of Van den Broek and Carrington to solve the issue of Yugoslavia.¹⁹⁴² However, by the middle of October, the editor, ‘with all due respect for Van den Broek’s striving for peace in the Balkans’, wondered ‘whether his concept of a political solution had anything to do with reality.’ The paper was unable to understand why the Minister expected the political issue to be solved within two months, although this had proven impossible in the previous three months. In fact, the situation had only become worse.¹⁹⁴³

On the other hand, De Volkskrant did not think the Yugoslavia conference had been altogether useless when Carrington was forced to postpone it in November. After all, ‘a coherent EC peace plan had now been drawn up, which afforded all the parties a reasonable way out of the conflict’. If Milosevic did not want to accept the plan, the EC was justified in imposing sanctions against Serbia.¹⁹⁴⁴ And although the EC actions in Yugoslavia ‘had not exactly been an unqualified success’, ‘it is better to do something than nothing at all’. After the Yugoslavia conference had been postponed and the EC would have no other option than to hand the matter over to the UN, that ‘something’ would, for the time being, be limited to humanitarian aid. None of the European countries would be willing to fight side by side with the Croatians: ‘The Balkan war is not a Hollywood movie with “good guys and bad guys”’. They cannot be distinguished along ethnic lines in Yugoslavia.¹⁹⁴⁵

13. Conclusion: The role of the Dutch EC Presidency with regard to the conflict

Reviewing the role of Van den Broek with regard to the issue of Yugoslavia, it is clear that the first weeks seemed to be characterized by much promptness of action resulting from a great sense of responsibility. Yugoslavia was the EC’s test case: would the Community be able to manage a crisis? There is no doubt whatsoever that it was not easy for the Dutch Presidency. It had to cope with an internal ‘great power Cooperation with a multilateral face’¹⁹⁴⁶ There were many different attitudes among the countries, particularly during the first crucial months of the Presidency, i.e. after 1 July 1991. Or, as it was formulated on the other side of the Atlantic: ‘The Europeans revealed themselves to be ¹⁹³⁶ Koen Koch, ‘Falende trojka’, de Volkskrant, 07/08/91.

¹⁹³⁷ Cf. Ewoud Nysingh, ‘EG moet druk opvoeren op Joegoslaven’ (EC should increase pressure on Yugoslavia) De Volkskrant, 31/08/91; ‘Vredesconferentie’ (Peace conference), de Volkskrant, 07/09/91; ‘Vredesmacht’ (Peace force), de Volkskrant, 19/09/91.

¹⁹³⁸ ‘Uitzichtloze burgeroorlog’ (Hopeless civil war), de Volkskrant, 16/09/91; Theo Koelé & Co Welgraven, ‘Wordt Joegoslavië Van den Broeks Vietnam? (Will Yugoslavia become Van den Broek’s Vietnam?)’, Trouw, 18/09/91.

¹⁹³⁹ ‘Sprankje hoop’ (Glimmer of hope), de Volkskrant, 23/09/91.

¹⁹⁴⁰ Theo Koelé & Co Welgraven, ‘Wordt Joegoslavië Van den Broeks Vietnam?’, Trouw, 18/09/91.

¹⁹⁴¹ ‘Vredesmacht’, de Volkskrant, 19/09/91.

¹⁹⁴² ‘Onduldbaar geweld’ (Intolerable violence), de Volkskrant, 05/10/91.

¹⁹⁴³ ‘Geven en nemen’ (Give and take), de Volkskrant, 12/10/91.

¹⁹⁴⁴ ‘Sancties tegen Servië’ (Sanctions against Serbia), de Volkskrant, 06/11/91 and ‘Verdeeldheid’ (Division), De Volkskrant, 09/11/91.

¹⁹⁴⁵ Ewoud Nysingh, ‘Europa kan slechts erger voorkomen’ (Europe can only prevent the worst from happening), de Volkskrant, 20/11/91.

¹⁹⁴⁶ Jakobsen, Multilateralism, p. 372.

Europeans, incapable of united action, guided by separate historical and cultural temperaments'¹⁹⁴⁷. In Yugoslavia itself, Van den Broek found the negotiating parties to be so unreliable that he was unable to respond to it adequately, and this caused him to lose heart very quickly. After his disappointment in Belgrade at the beginning of August, which he was unable to hide sufficiently from the press, he was no longer the international protagonist. Other ran off with that role within five weeks, which was not so bad in itself, but Van den Broek found it hard to deal with.

Early in September, Van den Broek seemed to achieve something after all by having Milosevic agree to the deployment of observers in Croatia and persuading the Serb head of state to participate in the conference at the Hague, but it is more likely that these were the results of the political 'massage' Mitterrand had been giving the Serb leader for two days. Then, at the time of the Yugoslav conference, the initiative was taken from him almost completely.

By the end of August, the Bonn-Paris axis had recovered from its breakdown, but Van den Broek did not know how to turn this to his advantage. On the contrary, he felt he was constantly crossed by it. In September, Van den Broek was engaged in a number of - not very salutary - fights with Minister Genscher. The failure of the WEU peace force proposal was Van den Broek's swan song. The increasingly important role of the UN as of the end of September was something of a relief to the EC and, apparently, even to Van den Broek himself.¹⁹⁴⁸ 'It seems it is still difficult for us to admit that Eastern European history is not written by the West and that our possibilities to turn the tide are limited.'¹⁹⁴⁹

Van den Broek had learned his lesson the hard way. The notion that a solution could be found for the region if only unity were preserved in Brussels was repeatedly proven wrong during the Dutch EC Presidency. Meanwhile, the opportunity for an early military intervention had been lost. At an early stage of the conflict, Fietelaars had written that events that took six months to happen in Croatia would only take a week in Bosnia. The West would not be afforded enough time to intervene. When it happened, the West was indeed still focusing on the former conflict, i.e. the one involving Croatia.¹⁹⁵⁰

Meanwhile, Van den Broek had thrown himself with much dedication on the matter of Yugoslavia. In early October 1991, an official of the Foreign Ministry said:

'Right from the start, we at the Ministry have been aware that, as EC President, we were the very last ones that could say: let the citizens of Yugoslavia fend for themselves. Although this attitude was perceived in some other countries: let them battle it out, there is nothing we can do about it.'¹⁹⁵¹

The more or less accidental involvement of the Netherlands in the Yugoslavia crisis in the beginning had developed into an emotional involvement of politicians and political staff, which they found it hard to extricate themselves from afterwards. Van den Broek's actions had earned him a reputation for decisiveness abroad, even if his energy was not always properly targeted. But the self-righteousness of Dutch politicians began to cause irritation. The blame was entirely political – the government had given Van den Broek free rein and Parliament was applauding his actions. And what about the press? They criticized him and issued warnings.

¹⁹⁴⁷ The editors, 'Stop Serbia Now', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 165.

¹⁹⁴⁸ Cf. Rob Meines, 'Steun van VN verwacht voor optreden EG' (UN support of EC actions expected), NRC Handelsblad, 23/09/91.

¹⁹⁴⁹ André Gerrits in: Intermediair, 29/01/93, quoted in Anstadt, Servië, p. 156.

¹⁹⁵⁰ Cf. J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'VN-vredesmacht: er is nog hoop' (UN peace force: there is still hope), NRC Handelsblad, 04/12/91, who labelled the establishment of a peace force in Croatia as 'too little, too late' and thought it wiser to send preventive peacekeeping forces to Bosnia.

¹⁹⁵¹ Rob Meines, 'Succes voor shuttlediplomatie Den Haag' (Successful shuttle diplomacy of The Hague), NRC Handelsblad, 10/10/91.

Chapter 4

UNPROFOR and the Dutch contribution

1. United Nations peace operations: peacekeeping and peace-enforcing

Although the regimes in Belgrade and Zagreb had expressed their desire for a United Nations peacekeeping force as early as November 1991, it was not until early 1992 that UN peacekeeping troops were actually deployed in Croatia. There were several reasons for this. Firstly the UN wanted a clear signal that a truce would hold this time. Secondly it had to be clear that not only the governments of Tudjman and Milosevic but also the Croatian Serbs would agree to the presence of UN peacekeepers. Finally, the UN needed time to reach a decision and to implement it accordingly.

On 2 January 1992 the UN envoy Cyrus Vance brought about a ceasefire in Croatia. This was now the 15th truce but this time it held through the following months, notwithstanding regular skirmishes. Six days after the ceasefire agreement the Security Council resolved to send 50 military liaison officers to oversee the maintenance of the truce (Resolution 727). In this capacity they were to work closely with the ECMM, the monitoring mission of the EC. Furthermore the liaison officers were to serve as quartermasters (military personnel making advance preparations) for a possible peacekeeping force.

Following the end of the Cold War it seemed that the changed international climate would also create new opportunities for the United Nations. Almost since its creation by the Allies in 1945, at the end of the Second World War, the global organization had had difficulties with the realization of its central aim: the promotion and maintenance of peace. This was due to the enmity between the Soviet Union and the United States. These two major powers, like the other three permanent members of the Security Council (China, France and the United Kingdom) held the power of veto. By means of a dissenting vote the two superpowers were able to paralyze the decision-making process in this vital body of the UN, which worked for peace and security throughout the world. At the inception of the United Nations it was envisaged that a Military Staff Committee would bring together the permanent members of the Security Council to cooperate in the strategic leadership of troops supplied to the international organization. In practice, however, this committee never really got off the ground.

The option of dispatching peacekeeping missions by the United Nations was created more or less in spite of the UN Charter and the impasse between the superpowers. Peacekeeping missions were fully in line neither with Chapter VI of the Charter, which contained provisions for traditional forms of dispute settlement such as mediation or fact-finding, nor with Chapter VII, which provided only for purely military or 'green' operations intended to maintain international peace and security.

Thus the latter form of action, known as peace-enforcement, did indeed permit the use of force. Such operations, for instance, had been conducted in 1950 when North Korean troops invaded South Korea, and in 1991 after Iraq had occupied Kuwait. Generally speaking the Security Council had balked at such actions. During the Cold War the major power blocks were not prepared to intervene in each other's spheres of influence, but even outside these areas they remained highly cautious. No military action was taken, for instance, during the genocide that was carried out in Cambodia under the regime of Pol Pot.

It had become traditional in peacekeeping that three conditions should be met. The involved parties should agree to the deployment of UN troops; there should be a ceasefire; and the UN troops should only use their (light) weapons for self-defence. In such situations the UN troops usually created a buffer zone between the parties in conflict, while attempts were made to initiate and successfully conclude peace talks between the former warring factions. But the UN blue helmets did not guarantee peace. Peacekeeping operations could last decades, as became evident in the case of the force deployed to separate the military parties in Cyprus in 1964.

As it was assumed that the former parties to the conflict would in principle observe the ceasefire, such UN forces were generally small in size. The peacekeepers often acted more as observers than as real peacekeepers. They did not intervene in the internal affairs of the host country. As such peacekeeping operations were actually situated halfway between Chapters VI (peacemaking) and VII (peace-enforcing) of the UN Charter, they were christened ‘chapter six-and-a-half operations’ by Dag Hammarskjöld, the UN Secretary-General of the time.¹⁹⁵²

The UN had initiated the first peacekeeping operation in May 1948. It was intended to support the ceasefire between Israel and the Arab countries: the United Nations Truce Observation Organization, the UNTSO. From 1948 onwards this UN observer organization monitored the ceasefire lines between Israel and its neighbours. The body still consisted of military observers only. The first operation involving peacekeeping troops dates from 1956, when UN troops were deployed in response to the Suez crisis. During the Cold War era the peacekeeping forces were almost always supplied by smaller and non-aligned countries. The states with a permanent seat on the Security Council usually did not contribute troops. In the years up to 1978, 13 such peacekeeping operations took place – and not one in the ten years that followed.

A certain degree of resignation arose regarding the long duration and lack of perspective that sometimes accompanied peacekeeping operations, such as those in Cyprus and in Lebanon. Above all the operation conducted by UNIFIL (United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon) led to considerable doubts about the usefulness of peacekeeping operations. In this case the use of peacekeeping troops had not been based on prior agreement by the parties in conflict. The mandate was unrealistic: UNIFIL was supposed to intervene between the parties; if necessary to motivate the Israeli troops to withdrawal, and to restore the authority of the Lebanese government in Southern Lebanon. And all this without the use of force. When Israeli troops invaded Lebanon in June 1982 and the UN troops could do little else than record this invasion, many regarded this as the definitive fiasco for UNIFIL. Many of the problems experienced by UNIFIL in Lebanon were to be repeated in Yugoslavia at the start of the 1990s.

At the end of the 1980s, as the Cold War evaporated, the governments of the Soviet Union and the United States started to assign a larger role to the UN in the management of regional conflicts.¹⁹⁵³ Furthermore, the close of the Cold War in the late 1980s also brought an end to the blocking of resolutions in the Security Council. The Soviet Union took a considerably more flexible attitude than it had before and played an active role in ending international conflicts in Afghanistan, Angola and El Salvador, as well as in the Iraq-Iran war. It was in this climate that five new UN peacekeeping operations, all of the classical type, took place in 1988. In the same year the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to the UN for its peacekeeping operations.

At the same time, it became clear that the end of the Cold War did not mean a world free of conflict. It was precisely the disappearance of the stand-off between the two superpowers that created space for conflicts that were often not so much wars between states as struggles within states, as in the case of Yugoslavia. The UN was not designed to deal with such domestic or intrastate conflicts. In fact, the organization was set up to deal with conflicts between states. Article 2, Section 7 of the UN Charter forbade intervention in the internal affairs of a state. On the other hand the task of the global organization was to work against threats to peace. And it was the end of the Cold War which made it politically easier for the UN to intervene in individual states. This meant that a self-confident organization had room to manoeuvre with regard to intrastate conflicts, but that there was also a potential for considerable lack of clarity and for disunity.

At the start of the 1990s there were calls for a new type of UN-approved operations which would occupy the middle ground between peacekeeping and peace-enforcing, known as VI - operations or quasi-peace-enforcement. At the start of 1992 Brian Urquart, the former Undersecretary-General of ¹⁹⁵² Vos, Altaar, p. 9; Klep/Van Gils, Korea, p. 22.

¹⁹⁵³ See for instance Dore, Japan, p. 86.

the UN and dubbed the 'father of peacekeeping', advocated military intervention that was intended to restore a certain degree of order and security so that humanitarian aid could continue and a process of reconciliation could be started. It was exactly this sort of humanitarian intervention which, in contrast to the classical cases, did not have to be limited to conflicts between states but could also be conducted in domestic situations where state authority had fully or partially broken down.¹⁹⁵⁴

June 1992 saw the publication of the report An Agenda for Peace by the Secretary-General of the UN, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, which summarized a range of new peacekeeping operations. These included the preventative deployment of peacekeeping units, the protection of humanitarian convoys in conflict areas and the provision of support for the democratic reconstruction of societies torn apart by conflict. The enthusiasm for peacekeeping operations remained high. While 13 such operations took place in the period up to 1988, UN troops were deployed 20 times in the period between 1988 and 1993. Between 1990 and 1993 the costs incurred by the UN for peacekeeping operations increased by a factor of seven: from 400 million dollars to 3 billion dollars per year.¹⁹⁵⁵ As a result of the increased interest in peacekeeping operations, the UN created a new body entitled the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) and headed by the Ghanaian diplomat Kofi Annan, a visionary and a man little bound by conventions who was later to become the Secretary-General of the UN.

However, the United Nations was also subject to a large number of handicaps at the start of the 1990s. One fact that was easily forgotten in the euphoria accompanying the end of the Cold War was that the UN was still dependent on the political will of the member states. The United Nations was in fact no more than the sum of the almost 200 member states. The actual power was held by the Security Council, and within the Council by the five permanent members holding the power of veto. Therefore much depended on the degree of freedom that the major powers were prepared to grant the Secretary-General, and on his personal attitude.

As the UN does not have its own military forces, the dispatch and mandating of peacekeeping missions is preceded by a long and complex decision-making process. First of all the Secretary-General of the UN must prepare proposals for such a mission. Then he must consult the member states. The 15 members of the Security Council then make a decision on the operation and its mandate, i.e. the aim, the powers and the resources of the peacekeeping force. This mandate, generally set out in a resolution of the Security Council, is the only legal basis for the operation since the UN Charter itself contains no provisions regarding peacekeeping. It is thus extremely important that the mandate be clearly formulated. A mandate is however often the result of political compromises and thus intentionally ambiguous.

A resolution by the Security Council requires a majority of nine votes, and moreover none of the veto-holding powers may vote against it. The General Assembly, which has had a Committee on Peacekeeping Operations since 1965, then defines the budget and the distribution of costs. Finally, national governments then have to decide whether and how they wish to participate in an operation. This usually begins with a behind-the-scenes gearing of supply and demand, carried out between the UN Secretariat and the Permanent Representatives stationed in New York, i.e. the ambassadors of the individual countries. Once it is virtually certain that a country can make a particular offer, this is followed by a formal request from the Secretary-General. Even once the Security Council has approved a peacekeeping operation, the crucial question remains as to whether the Secretary-General will manage to 'extract' enough troops from the member states. This inertia in the decision-making process and its implementation makes the United Nations less suited to acute crisis management.

Once a UN peacekeeping mission has been decided, the Secretary-General appoints a commander to lead the force in the field. At the start of the 1990s, the process of military advice to the Secretary-General was a complicated affair. As described, the Military Staff Committee envisaged in the ¹⁹⁵⁴ A. Kamsteeg, 'VN: naar de humanitaire interventie?' (UN: Towards humanitarian intervention?), Nederlands Dagblad, 10/06/92.

¹⁹⁵⁵ Milton J. Esman & Shibley Telhami, 'Introduction', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 3.

Charter never really got off the ground. From 1992 onwards it was the DPKO at the UN headquarters in New York which was charged with implementing peacekeeping operations. But for a long time the DPKO was seriously understaffed.¹⁹⁵⁶ At the start of 1994 the department had a staff of 267 including secretaries¹⁹⁵⁷, which was a low level for such an important UN department; it was viewed as the weakest department within the UN.¹⁹⁵⁸ As a result it had trouble holding its own against the Department of Political Affairs, the policy-forming body of the Secretary-General that was set up at the start of 1993, and the Department of Humanitarian Affairs.

Another factor was that following the creation of the DPKO, the Field Operations Division – which had a staff of 195 and formed the core of every UN peacekeeping operation – continued to function under the Department of Administration and Management. As a result the stream of information from and to the field flowed along different circuits.¹⁹⁵⁹ It was only at the end of 1993 that this department came under the DKPO, under the name Field Administration and Logistics Division (FALD). But this brought no end to the impracticable relationships, because FALD continued to lead an isolated existence within the DKPO. It was only in September 1993 that the UN set up a planning and operations department, originally headed by the Dutch Marines Colonel C.P.M. van Egmond.¹⁹⁶⁰ An operations centre that was available round the clock was also lacking for much of 1993.

Military personnel had considerable difficulty with the culture of UN bureaucracy. Some of them called the administration of the United Nations ‘the last bastion of Communism’. They objected to the bureaucratic tendency to shift responsibilities instead of taking them on, combined with strong compartmentalization which lead to problems firstly being pushed up high within one’s own compartment (department of the UN Secretariat) before they could move over the boundary to another compartment. Conversely, many members of the UN bureaucracy had trouble with military operations and the accompanying culture. They objected to the fact that many military personnel were not inclined to allow for political necessities in their plans.¹⁹⁶¹

Another disadvantage of the UN peacekeeping operations lies in the responsibility, or rather the lack of it, taken by the Security Council. More than a few of the 15 members of the Security Council do not dispatch troops to actual peacekeeping operations. Furthermore the Council itself is not subject to any form of control. As a result the Security Council can easily lack a full sense of responsibility for the operations that it has itself created. In 1995 the EC mediator in the Yugoslavian conflict, Lord Owen, lamented that nothing sharpens the minds of politicians and public so well than when the lives of their own soldiers are in danger.¹⁹⁶² But in practice this situation rarely occurs in the Security Council.

In 1992 a number of other developments took place that further hindered the work of the UN in peacekeeping operations. Even though the United States did not directly participate in peacekeeping missions, its attitude towards such operations had always proved highly important. As remarked earlier, an isolationist tendency occurred in the US at the start of the 1990s. In March 1992 a Defence Planning Guidance Document drawn up by the Pentagon was leaked, revealing that the defence chiefs in Washington assigned no role whatsoever to the UN as a form of collective security. President Bush Senior did indeed decide, at the end of his period of office, to send American troops to Somalia as part of a UN peacekeeping operation. Nonetheless, during his farewell speech at the West Point military academy the American head of state warned that the government in Washington would judge such forms of armed intervention on their merits from case to case.¹⁹⁶³ After President Gorbachev had made ¹⁹⁵⁶ Hillen, Helmets, p. 160.

¹⁹⁵⁷ DCBC, no. 1836. Permanent Representative in New York to Ministry of Defence/DAB/CDS, 16/05/95, no. 3079.

¹⁹⁵⁸ Interview J. Baxter, 16/10/00.

¹⁹⁵⁹ Cf. MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 106.

¹⁹⁶⁰ On his activities see Van Egmond, ‘Peacekeeping’; Robert van de Roer, ‘VN te velde gedoemd tot doormodderen’ (UN in the field doomed to muddle through), NRC Handelsblad, 08/10/94.

¹⁹⁶¹ Interview Colonel R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

¹⁹⁶² Owen, ‘Grenzen’, p. 373.

¹⁹⁶³ Dore, Japan, p. 116.

way for Boris Yeltsin in Russia, at the end of 1991, nationalism in this country grew stronger. Moscow increasingly complained that the American government was using the UN for its own ends.

On 1 January 1992 the Egyptian Boutros Boutros-Ghali became Secretary-General of the UN, succeeding Perez de Cuellar. He had the reputation of being someone who did not take a strong lead and moreover he had a 'poor standing' with the American government.¹⁹⁶⁴ Even before his appointment Boutros-Ghali had let it be known that he had little enthusiasm for a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia. He knew that whatever happened the UN had something to lose. The organization would be criticised if it did nothing and then, Boutros-Ghali felt sure, terrible things would happen in the Balkan country. But the Egyptian knew that the UN would equally come under fire, so to speak, if it did do something but after a while, as he expected, was forced to withdraw from Yugoslavia.¹⁹⁶⁵

2. The UN peacekeeping force in Croatia: a new round with new nationalists

'Laszlo just laughed as he told me the secret way to predict Milosevic's every move.

"Don't ask what strategy is best for achieving a Greater Serbia or the survival of this thing that everyone calls 'rump Yugoslavia' (...) Ask what strategy will keep Milosevic in power, and that's the one he will follow."¹⁹⁶⁶

Boutros-Ghali's sombre view was understandable, especially considering the attitude of the Croatian Serbs. In contrast to Milosevic, Milan Babic, the political leader of the Croatian Serbs who had forced Jovan Raskovic from his position in 1990, was totally opposed to the arrival of a UN peacekeeping force. It was favourable for the Serbs that the Vance peace plan stipulated that 27 percent of Croatian territory would remain in Serb hands until a definitive arrangement could be made. Furthermore the UN troops would not be stationed along the Croat-Serb border, but within the area of Croatia controlled by the Serbs. However, the plan demanded the withdrawal of the JNA from Croatia and the disarming of the Croatian Serb militias. Babic was possibly prepared to countenance the disarming of his militias, but in this case the Croats should disarm too and the federal army should remain in the Serb areas. Moreover, the 'Autonomous Serbian Area' should then be recognized as 'one of the republics of the Yugoslav Federation'.

This position brought Babic into open conflict with Milosevic.¹⁹⁶⁷ The disparity between Babic and Milosevic tended to create the impression in the West that the Serbian president was a moderating factor whose life was being made difficult by radical Serbs. This was how Vance saw things, for instance.¹⁹⁶⁸ Milosevic seemed to be 'making best of a bad job'¹⁹⁶⁹ and to have assumed the role of a ¹⁹⁶⁴ See for instance R. Kuethe, 'Een knik in de brandslang. De Verenigde Naties, 50 jaar oud, schitteren alleen op de bijvelden' (A kink in the fire-hose. The United Nations, 50 years old, shining only in the subsidiary areas), Elsevier, 17/06/95.

¹⁹⁶⁵ Shawcross, Evil, p. 65.

¹⁹⁶⁶ Maass, Neighbor, p. 201.

¹⁹⁶⁷ Theo Engelen, 'Serviërs onderling oneens over voortgang van vredesproces VN' (Serbs divided on progress of the UN peace process), NRC Handelsblad, 09/01/92; idem, 'Vredesplan in gevaar door koppige Serviërs in Krajina' (Peace plan endangered by stubborn Serbs in Krajina), NRC Handelsblad, 29/01/92; 'Joegoslavië balanceert tussen oorlog en vrede' (Yugoslavia in the balance between war and peace), Trouw, 13/01/92; Nicole Lucas, 'Serviërs en Kroaten worden oorlogsmoe' (Serbs and Croats become tired of war), Trouw, 14/01/92; Heller, Brasiers, p. 93.

¹⁹⁶⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00775, Van Schaik 1399 to Van den Broek, 12/12/91.

¹⁹⁶⁹ Peter Michielsen, 'Servische president Milošević heeft eieren voor zijn geld gekozen' (Serbian president Milosevic makes the best of a bad job), NRC Handelsblad, 10/01/92.

‘dove’.¹⁹⁷⁰ Milosevic reinforced this impression by publicly declaring that the JNA should keep out of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁹⁷¹

For a long time during the war in Croatia Milosevic had had only a limited hold over the JNA but since January 1992 his power over the JNA had increased, partly due to the resignation of Minister of Defence Kadijevic for reasons of health.¹⁹⁷² He was temporarily replaced by his Vice-Commander Adzic, who was less inclined to the Yugoslavian position and more to the Greater Serbian one. While in the guise of a ‘dove’ Milosevic had long been making preparations for his next war, the one in Bosnia. He was determined that Babic should not stand in his way. UN emissary Goulding had repeatedly declared that the UN would only send troops when all parties, including the Serbs in Croatia, had agreed to this move.¹⁹⁷³ In addition, Milosevic wanted to prevent the Serb leaders in Croatia and Bosnia from becoming too powerful. This was why, on 8 January, Milosevic blocked a plan by Babic for the Serb areas in Croatia to merge with the autonomous Serb regions in Bosnia-Herzegovina. He warned Babic then that not all Serbs could live in one state and that the Serbs in the homeland (matika) could not let themselves be hostage to the Serbs who lived outside Serbia, here doubtless referring to the sanctions which had been imposed on Serbia because of the war in Croatia.

Proclamation of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia

Meanwhile the preparations for the war in Bosnia continued. At the urging of Milosevic, on 9 January Karadzic proclaimed the autonomous ‘Serbian Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina’.¹⁹⁷⁴ The decision would be implemented as soon as the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina was recognized. At the same time the Bosnian Serb leadership declared that they no longer recognized the Bosnian President and the Minister of Foreign Affairs as the legitimate representatives of the Bosnian Serbs.¹⁹⁷⁵ However, all this did not prevent the Bosnian Serb representatives (at least for the time being) from continuing to form part of the Bosnian parliament and other representative bodies.

Thus the two Serb areas outside Serbia, at the urging of Milosevic, remained separate. By now Milosevic had lost practically all interest in the Serb area in Croatia, while he feigned lack of interest in the Serb area in Bosnia. On 10 January, one day after its creation, Milosevic told the American ambassador Zimmermann that he would not recognize the Serb republic in Bosnia.¹⁹⁷⁶

Milosevic’s irritation with Babic’s resistance to the arrival of a UN peacekeeping force in Croatia increased when the Holy Synod, the highest organ of the Serb Orthodox Church, came down on the side of Babic and accused Milosevic of betraying the interests of the Serb people.¹⁹⁷⁷ When at the start of February 1992 Babic stuck by his position that Krajina could not be regarded as Croatian territory and that both the disarming of the Serb militias and the withdrawal of the JNA were out of the question,¹⁹⁷⁸ he was ordered to Belgrade. Members of the federal presidium, the high command of the JNA and the leaders of the Bosnian Serbs and Biljana Plavsic attempted to convince him that he need have no worries about the withdrawal of the JNA. The Bosnian Serbs would soon secede from Bosnia, ¹⁹⁷⁰ Nicole Lucas, ‘“Slobo” Milošević meet zich de rol van “vredesduif” aan’ (‘Slobo’ Milosevic assumes the role of ‘dove’), Trouw, 24/02/92.

¹⁹⁷¹ ‘Servië eist dat Kroatië verloren gebied opgeeft’ (Serbia demands that Croatia give up lost territory), NRC Handelsblad, 17/01/92.

¹⁹⁷² Although at the time there was intense speculation about other reasons for his resignation, according to Kadijevic himself in his memoirs this really was due purely to reasons of health, Kadijevic, Viem, pp. 166-168.

¹⁹⁷³ Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Serviërs in Kroatië wijzen VN-plan af’ (Serbs in Croatia reject UN plan), De Volkskrant, 29/01/92; ‘Voorlopig geen VN-vredesmacht naar Joegoslavië’ (No UN peacekeeping force for Yugoslavia for the time being), De Volkskrant, 30/01/92.

¹⁹⁷⁴ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 227.

¹⁹⁷⁵ Amnesty International, Abuse, p. 6.

¹⁹⁷⁶ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 179.

¹⁹⁷⁷ Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Servisch-orthodoxe kerk treedt uit schaduw van de staat’ (Serb Orthodox Church emerges from the shadow of the state) and ‘Servische tovenaarsleerling’ (Serbian sorcerer’s apprentice), De Volkskrant, 21/01/92; Ton Crijnen, ‘Servische kerk uit Tito’s schaduw’ (Serb Church emerges from Tito’s shadow), Trouw, 27/01/92.

¹⁹⁷⁸ Leurdijk, ‘Rol’, p. 160.

they told him. Thanks to the areas in Bosnia that would then fall into Serb hands, a Serb corridor would continue to exist between Serbia proper and Krajina, so that Babic need not fear losing practical support from Belgrade.¹⁹⁷⁹ But Babic refused to be convinced. In order nonetheless to obtain his signature to the Vance peace plan, he was then subjected by his hosts in Belgrade, for three consecutive days, to intimidation practices reminiscent of the era of the unalloyed Communists.¹⁹⁸⁰ In the end Babic signed the plan, but said later that he had done this at a moment that he had fallen asleep from pure exhaustion.¹⁹⁸¹

When Babic, even after signing the document, still refused to recognize the advantages of the Vance plan for the Serb people of Krajina, the other Croatian Serb leaders, encouraged by Belgrade, started a campaign of defamation against him. On 9 February Milosevic convened the parliament of the Croatian Serbs; not as was customary in Knin, the power base of Babic, but in Glina. The ‘parliament’ thus convened by Milosevic accepted the Vance plan under great pressure from Belgrade and the JNA¹⁹⁸² and subsequently sent Babic home on 17 February.

On 28 February the autonomous Serb areas in Croatia were united to form the Serbian Republic of Krajina. The appointed president was Goran Hadzic, secretary of the Vukovar department of the SDS, who had been put forward by the SDB, the Serbian state security service. This effectively sidelined Babic. A few months later, in Benkovac, he was shot in the head under unexplained circumstances. He survived the attack but subsequently withdrew from politics for some time.

‘To be as sure as possible that a United Nations force would succeed’: the birth of UNPROFOR

Once it had become clear that Milosevic was resolved to break Babic’s resistance and that the Serb area in Croatia would get a leadership that did not reject the Vance plan, on 15 February Boutros-Ghali proposed to the Security Council that a peacekeeping force be created to implement the Vance plan. In a rather apologetic tone he declared:

‘If it is only now that I am proposing such a force, it is because of the complexities and the dangers of the Yugoslav situation and the consequent need to be as sure as possible that a United Nations force would succeed in consolidating the ceasefire and thus facilitate the negotiations of an overall political settlement.’

In referring to problems in his declaration, Boutros-Ghali was thinking not only of the situation in Croatia itself but also of the willingness of potential donor countries to provide troops and funds – a willingness he estimated to be low. However, the Secretary-General felt the risk of a too small body of troops to be ‘less grievous than the danger that the delay in its despatch will lead to a breakdown of the ceasefire and to a new conflagration in Yugoslavia’.¹⁹⁸³

On the basis of this ‘recommendation’ the Security Council accepted Resolution 743 on 21 February, providing for the stationing of a peacekeeping force in Croatia as a contribution to the maintenance of the ceasefire. The peacekeeping force was given the name of United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR). Against the custom of UN abbreviations for peacekeeping operations, every reference to the area was omitted from the name because it might well generate new difficulties between Croats and Serbs.

¹⁹⁷⁹ Jovic, Dani, pp. 430-435; Silber & Little, Death, pp. 202-203.

¹⁹⁸⁰ Ewoud Nysingh, ‘De zetbaas van Milošević kijkt niet voor geweld’, (Milosevic’s figurehead does not submit to violence), De Volkskrant, 05/02/92; Nicole Lucas, “‘Slobo’ Milošević meet zich de rol van “vredesduif” aan’, Trouw, 24/02/92; Gajic-Glisic, Vojska, pp. 136-140.

¹⁹⁸¹ Tanner, Croatia, p. 280.

¹⁹⁸² Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Parlement Krajina wil wél vredeslager’ (Krajina parliament now accepts peacekeeping force), De Volkskrant, 10/02/92.

¹⁹⁸³ UN document S/23592, cited in UN Srebrenica Report, par. 13.

UNPROFOR in Croatia was to comprise 14,000 peacekeeping troops, consist of twelve infantry battalions with a total strength of 10,400, a logistics and support staff of 2480, 100 military observers and 530 political functionaries. This made it the biggest UN operation since the one conducted in the Congo between 1960 and 1964, which at its climax involved almost 20,000 troops. At its greatest strength, when it was also active in Bosnia, UNPROFOR was to involve 50,000 participants, mostly military but also with an important civilian component. The troops in Croatia would later be known as UNPROFOR I, to distinguish the force from UNPROFOR II which was active in the Bosnian theatre.

The 12 battalions of UNPROFOR I included a French, a Belgian and a Danish infantry battalion but the majority of the participants came from countries outside the European Community: from Argentina, Canada, Jordan, Kenya, Nepal, Nigeria, Poland, Russia and Czechoslovakia. In addition there was a very large French logistics battalion. The United Kingdom, which constantly showed great hesitation about any form of intervention in (former) Yugoslavia, contributed only a medical unit. The British government felt, with reference to the efforts of its soldiers in the Persian Gulf and Cyprus, that they were 'already doing more than enough'.¹⁹⁸⁴

It was intended that UNPROFOR should create the conditions for a political solution to the conflict. On the one hand UNPROFOR was in this phase therefore a classic peacekeeping operation, intended to separate troops of opposing forces, equipped with light weapons and in position with the agreement of both parties. On the other hand UNPROFOR was also required to make a contribution to peace by achieving a demilitarization and enabling the return of some 300,000 Displaced Persons from the areas in question. The task of UNPROFOR was thus to effect a return to the status quo ante and therefore contained elements of peacemaking.

These different goals of UNPROFOR were hard to reconcile. Demilitarization, effecting the return of the Croatian population and incorporation of Croats into the police forces were all things that the Serb leaders could be expected to oppose. At the same time these same leaders needed to be persuaded to participate in talks which should lead to a definitive peace agreement.

The peacekeeping troops were to be stationed in the United Nations Protected Areas (UNPAs) in Eastern Slavonia (Sector East), Western Slavonia (Sector West) and Krajina (Sectors North and South) (see map in Part I, Chapter 2, Section 2). Moreover, from 30 June 1992 onwards UNPROFOR also became responsible for separating troops in the areas known as pink zones: areas where many Serbs lived and Serb militias were also present, but which lay outside the UNPA areas (Resolution 762). The peacekeeping operation was originally planned for a period of 12 months.

Only once the UNPAs were demilitarized would UN military observers also start patrolling in limited areas within bordering Bosnia-Herzegovina. This demilitarization was never to happen, however, and the area as such was never brought under the administration of the UN. Following the arrival of UNPROFOR the Serbs continued to hold authority in this area.

The Bosnian president Izetbegovic, following the EC decision on recognition in principle that was taken on 16 December, had urgently appealed to the European governments and the United Nations to send peacekeeping troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina as a preventative measure. It transpired, however, that Vance opposed this move.¹⁹⁸⁵ Just as at an earlier point the Brioni agreement and its implementation by the ECCM had confined the international approach to the Yugoslav problem to Slovenia, while the crisis in Croatia was already looming, now UNPROFOR confined itself to the Serb areas in Croatia, while the signs of an approaching crisis in Bosnia were already plentiful.¹⁹⁸⁶

The Serb leaders could thus be satisfied. Their aims in Croatia had been achieved and they now envisaged a situation there similar to the one in Cyprus, where a UN peacekeeping force had already been stationed for decades in order to separate opposing troops, and which had led to two ethnically ¹⁹⁸⁴ Eyal, Europe, p. 58.

¹⁹⁸⁵ Also see Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 153.

¹⁹⁸⁶ Cf. Leurdijk, 'Rol', p. 159.

pure areas on that Mediterranean island. The result that had been achieved in Croatia could serve as a blueprint for the Serbs in Bosnia. Following a quick conquest of territory they too could call in the support of the UN to monitor the areas they controlled in Bosnia and thus see the situation created by them accepted as the status quo.¹⁹⁸⁷ The chance of such a course of events taking place in Bosnia was increased even further by the withdrawal of the JNA from Croatia under the terms of the peace agreement. Now the army had its hands free to intervene in the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The Croatian government was considerably less satisfied. It had provisionally accepted the presence of UN peacekeeping troops on its territory, but following their arrival increasingly saw them as a hindrance in extending its authority over the parts of Croatian territory that, it said, were occupied by the Serbs. What made things even worse for Zagreb was that the Serbs still had weapons at their disposal. The JNA may have withdrawn but the army had left behind a large part of its weapons. These weapons came into the hands of a Serb police force that numbered no less than 15,000 men and, together with the militias, would grow into a force of 38,000 men by the end of 1994. This force had at its disposal over 200 tanks, 150 armoured vehicles and also rockets that threatened the major Croatian cities.

Furthermore it was out of the question that the displaced Croatian population could return to the areas where UNPROFOR was present. Because UNPROFOR was unable to bring the UNPA areas under its administration, the Serb warlords had a free hand there. Ethnic cleansing and murders continued 'quietly' under the gaze of the UN troops, although the UNPROFOR mandate, contrary to the opinion of some authors,¹⁹⁸⁸ authorized UN troops to protect citizens against Serb aggression.¹⁹⁸⁹ UNPROFOR even found itself compelled to prevent the return of Croats because the situation in the UNPAs and pink zones was not considered safe enough for Croats. In November 1992 Boutros-Ghali had to report to the Security Council that after more than six months of deployment UNPROFOR had been unable to prevent Serbs continuing to commit acts on other ethnic groups such as murder, burning and other destruction of houses, devastation of churches, killing of livestock and armed robbery.¹⁹⁹⁰ The Director of Civil Affairs of the UN operation, the Irishman Cedric Thornberry, had to admit that the so-called protected areas were the scene of full-blown anarchy.¹⁹⁹¹

This was why, in the following years, Tudjman and his followers were to repeatedly object to the six-monthly extensions following expiry of the UNPROFOR mandate. Because of this critical attitude by the authorities in Zagreb there was an almost constant danger that the Croatian government would attempt to take over the UNPA areas by force. Occasional skirmishes did indeed take place and it was only possible to halt these under intense international pressure.¹⁹⁹²

¹⁹⁸⁷ Cf. Stojanovic, Fall, p. 101.

¹⁹⁸⁸ Philip J. Cohen, 'Ending the war and securing peace in the former Yugoslavia', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, p. 42; Norman Cigar, 'The Serbo-Croatian War, 1991', ibidem, p. 81.

¹⁹⁸⁹ United Nations Department of Public Information, United Nations, 1993 and 1994/1995, p. 3; Blokker & Muller & Raic, 'VN-vredesmachtten', p. 387.

¹⁹⁹⁰ Zeitler, Rolle, p. 52.

¹⁹⁹¹ Tanner, Croatia, p. 282.

¹⁹⁹² Declaration by Petar Sarevic, Croatian ambassador in Washington, in: United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, United Nations, pp. 73-88; MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 115; 'Kroatië voert strijd tegen Serviërs op' (Croatia intensifies struggle against Serbs), De Telegraaf, 01/02/93; 'Blaauwhelmen in Kroatië blijven langer, maar garanderen niets' (Blue helmets in Croatia stay on longer, but guarantee nothing), Trouw, 22/02/93; Scheffers, Ambassadeur, p. 21; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Memorandum from DEU/OE to DGPZ, 17/12/92, no. 150/92; Van Oordt 007 (Budapest) to Kooijmans, 21/01/93; Van Oordt 028 to Kooijmans, 11/02/93; PR New York to Kooijmans, 12/02/93, nyv/2084; MID. MID, Developments in the Former Yugoslav Federation, 72/92, 05/10/92; 82/92, 06/11/92; 84/92, 11/11/92; 92/92, 30/11/92; 96/92, 11/12/92; 98/92, 16/12/92; 01/93, 05/01/93; 08/93, 22/01/93; 0/93, 28/01/93; 12/93, 04/02/93; 13/93, 08/02/93; 14/93, 11/02/93; ABZ, 911.31, Yugoslavia. Political Relations and Parties, Part V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID, Developments in the Former Yugoslav Federation, 97/92, 14/12/92; 07/93, 20/01/93; 09/93, 25/01/93; 21/93, 22/03/93; 22/93, 25/03/93; 23/93, 31/03/93; 24/93, 05/04/93; 28/93, 22/04/93; Part VII, March 1993 to March 1994 inclusive, 36/93, 27/05/93; 44/93, 05/07/93; 53/93, 03/09/93; 54/93, 08/09/93; 55/93, 13/09/93; 57/93, 20/09/93; 58/93, 28/09/93; 60/93, 12/10/93; 61/93, 19/10/93; 67/93, 01/12/93; DCBC, no. 2117, MID, Developments

In fact the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs considered it possible that the Croatian government could use force of arms at any moment to assert its authority in the Croatian Serb areas. In December 1992 the Director-General of Political Affairs, Van Walsum, wrote in a memorandum to Minister Van den Broek that he thought it ‘was not on the cards at the moment’ that Croatia would ‘reconquer the lost territory’. But the minister noted here that ‘things might turn out differently’.¹⁹⁹³ That was an interesting analysis by a government that was itself contributing to UNPROFOR.

3. The previous history of Dutch contributions to peacekeeping operations

Since the start of the 1950s, making a military contribution in the international arena to support international peace and security has been among the tasks of the Ministry of Defence and the Dutch armed forces.¹⁹⁹⁴ The first UN operation in which the Netherlands was involved was the Korean War. This was not a peacekeeping operation, however. The first peacekeeping operation in which Dutch officers participated was the United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization (UNTSO), the monitoring organization which supervised the ceasefire lines between Israel and its neighbouring states from 1948 onwards. From 1956 onwards the Netherlands participated in this operation for many years with 15 military observers. In the second half of 1958 Dutch military observers formed part of the United Nations Observation Group in Lebanon (UNOGIL) which was intended to combat illegal infiltrations and weapons imports in Lebanon. From August 1960 to October 1963 the Netherlands contributed a small medical contingent and staff personnel to the Opération des Nations Unies au Congo (ONUC). In 1963 and 1964 Dutch military observers were involved in the United Nations Yemen Observation Mission (UNYOM), which supervised the separation of forces in the civil war in Yemen. Equally, Dutch observers were involved in the United Nations India-Pakistan Observation Mission (UNIPOM) between September 1965 and February 1966 to uphold the ceasefire in the armed conflict between India and Pakistan. In all these cases the Netherlands thus provided only small groups of observers. In September 1963, however, Minister of Foreign Affairs J.M.A.H. Luns offered to supply the United Nations with a permanent contingent of 300 marines for peacekeeping operations. Two years later the Dutch government doubled the number of available marines to 600 and also augmented the available resources by a supply ship, four transport and communication helicopters and a number of ships for patrol duties. The Royal Netherlands Army would, if requested, also make a contribution: an armoured infantry battalion and an independent medical company. The Air Force for its part held a Fokker Friendship and three Alouette helicopters in readiness.

But it was not until 1979 that the UN once again requested the Dutch government to participate in a peacekeeping operation: the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL). This time a large group of Dutch military personnel would be involved. The Netherlands supplied a contingent of 800 men for the UNIFIL operation, consisting mostly of the 44th Armoured Infantry Battalion, supplemented by elements of the 43rd. The Dutch government originally agreed to a participation lasting one year, but later extended this by four years. However, the invasion of Lebanon by Israeli troops in June 1982 reduced the Dutch enthusiasm for participation just as strongly. As early as October 1983 the Dutch government brought back the greater part of the battalion and two years later it withdrew the remaining contingent due to risks to the soldiers and the impracticability of the mandate.

in the Former Yugoslav Federation, 14/94, 17/03/94; 2116, 15/94, 22/03/94; 2115, 16/94, 28/03/94. ABZ, Communications Archive, COREU Danish EC Chairmanship, 10/01/93, cpe/pres/cop 52; idem, COREU of the Danish EC Chairmanship, 24/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 913.

¹⁹⁹³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Memorandum from DGPZ to Van den Broek, 09/12/92, no. 195/92.

¹⁹⁹⁴ Van der Doel and Loef, Geef acht, p. 2. For a historical overview of the Dutch participation in UN peacekeeping operations see Klep & Van Gils, Korea.

This was a decision that was long to be held against the Netherlands at the UN Secretariat.¹⁹⁹⁵ The military adviser to the Dutch Permanent Representative at the United Nations, Colonel R.P.H. van Veen, and his deputy Major E.A.W. Koestal, noticed that there was still a considerable lack of understanding about this when they took up their positions in 1993. According to the UN the operation had not involved such high risks and the argument that there was little prospect of progress carried no water either. Some UN operations had lasted longer. Moreover the financial settlement of the Dutch contribution had become a long drawn-out issue.¹⁹⁹⁶ It was also regrettable that the Royal Netherlands Army had not evaluated the experiences gained during the peacekeeping operation in Lebanon with a view to facilitating the future deployment of Dutch troops for such purposes.¹⁹⁹⁷

The Ministry of Defence was also aware of the poor impression that the Dutch government had made with the withdrawal from UNIFIL. At the start of 1992 the Deputy Director of General Policy Affairs, J.H.M. de Winter, wrote that when contributing Dutch troops to a peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia the government should realize that the operation would be of unlimited duration. He added that in view of the UN reaction to the UNIFIL events it would be 'difficult, if not impossible, to withdraw Dutch units before the end of the operation without seriously snubbing the UN.'¹⁹⁹⁸

When peacekeeping operations were en vogue again at the end of the 1980s, the Netherlands was ready to play its part. It began in 1989 and 1990 with a contingent of 60 Dutch military policemen who took part in the United Nations Assistance Group for Namibia (UNTAG), which assisted Namibia on the road to independence. In the wake of the Gulf War a Dutch unit with a strength of about 600 men carried out humanitarian tasks in support of the Kurds in Northern Iraq (until 1993). In mid-1991 the Dutch government decided to provide 15 military and ten police observers to the UN for participation in the operation United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM II) in Angola.

The Netherlands also took part in a peacekeeping operation outside the context of the UN. From 1982 onwards it provided an interservice communications company and a unit of the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee (the Dutch military police) to the Multinational Force and Observers (MFO) in the Sinai which supervised observance of the 1979 peace treaty between Egypt and Israel.

4. Dutch participation in a peacekeeping force in Croatia

When in November 1991 a peacekeeping force in Croatia became ever more likely, the Dutch parliament also began to consider the matter. In preceding years Parliament had acquired the right to be heard on the dispatch of Dutch troops for peacekeeping operations. In January 1979 Parliament had been completely surprised when the Van Agt/Wiegel government decided to contribute the 44th Armoured Infantry Battalion to UNIFIL.¹⁹⁹⁹ Following the commotion around the non-voluntary dispatch of conscripts on this operation, Parliament passed the Brinkhorst amendment that requested the government in the future to take decisions on participation in a UN peacekeeping force only following consultation with Parliament.²⁰⁰⁰

With the amendment of Section 33 of the Military Service Act in October 1987, the Frinking amendment was also adopted: this stressed the desirability that Parliament should 'in good time' be able to debate the non-voluntary dispatch of conscripts outside the Netherlands in those cases where the Netherlands was not subject to existing obligations.²⁰⁰¹ The following governments gave a broad interpretation to this resolution and since then the government has informed Parliament about all cases involving the dispatch of conscripts; in fact, since UNIFIL this dispatch has always been on a voluntary ¹⁹⁹⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 24; Bais, Mijnenveld, pp. 36 and 67.

¹⁹⁹⁶ Interviews A.W. Koestal, 24/05/00; C. Minderhoud, 02/06/00; and R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

¹⁹⁹⁷ Hoffenaar & Schoenmaker, Blik, p. 370.

¹⁹⁹⁸ CRST, no. 251. Memorandum from De Winter to the Political Council, 10/01/92, D92/007.

¹⁹⁹⁹ Berghorst, News, pp. 34-35.

²⁰⁰⁰ TK, 1978-1979, 15 441, no. 7.

²⁰⁰¹ TK, 1987-1988, 16 521 no. 13.

basis. The 1991 Defence White Paper also stated that: ‘Dutch participation in a peacekeeping force will always be subject to parliamentary consultation. (...) In practice the mandatory dispatch of conscripts for action in dangerous situations outside the NATO context is already always subject to such parliamentary consultation.’²⁰⁰²

After the Ministry of Defence had announced the establishment of an airmobile brigade composed fully of volunteers in the 1991 Defence White Paper, at the start of 1992 Parliament asked Minister Ter Beek whether it would also be informed in advance if this unit were to be dispatched outside NATO territory. The minister agreed to this.²⁰⁰³ In May 1992 Minister Ter Beek stated that the point of information to Parliament about the dispatch of military personnel had a basis in customary law.²⁰⁰⁴ A year later, when considering the Defence Priorities Review, the member of parliament E. van Middelkoop (GPV – one of the small Christian parties) advocated ‘a stronger formal basis’ for this customary law by means of legislation or a constitutional provision.²⁰⁰⁵ In January 1994 the government sent Parliament a previously promised memorandum on the involvement of Parliament in the dispatch of military personnel. Here the government made reference to Van Middelkoop’s proposal and wished to retain the established practice of informing Parliament by means of a letter before moving to implement a decision to dispatch troops.²⁰⁰⁶ Nonetheless, developments moved towards a constitutionally anchored right of approval by Parliament for dispatch of troops, but this exceeds the limits of this part of the report;²⁰⁰⁷ this subject will be returned to in Part II. Suffice to say that in the period described here the government and Parliament agreed that Parliament should be informed before troops were dispatched.

It is in this light that one should view the first plenary debate in Parliament on 21 November 1991 on the situation in (former) Yugoslavia; this debate has been previously discussed (see Chapter 2 of this part of the report). The debate took place at the request of Blaauw, member of parliament for the VVD (Liberals), who responded to public statements by Minister Ter Beek that the Netherlands had a battalion of 500 to 800 men ready for a UN operation. As the reports had surprised Parliament, the VVD man demanded an emergency debate.²⁰⁰⁸ Blaauw and Leerling, member of parliament for the RPF (one of the small Christian parties), had noticed a discrepancy between Ter Beek’s words to the press, where he had mentioned the use of aircraft, ships and ground troops in the context of the Western European Union and a Dutch contribution of 500 men, and the letter from the government to Parliament on 20 November²⁰⁰⁹ in which such military resources were not mentioned. Blaauw left no doubts about the direction in which he wished to see this discrepancy resolved. He wanted to see ‘action’ taken at last.²⁰¹⁰

At this moment, however, it was not clear to Blaauw which international organization had the initiative to end the conflict. He asked whether it was NATO, the UN or the CSCE?²⁰¹¹ Blaauw was supported by L. Sipkes, member of parliament for GroenLinks (the Green Left party). In her case the feeling of powerlessness induced by images of Vukovar and Dubrovnik was transformed into anger: ‘It’s just crazy to say that we should accept that there’s no one who can prevent or stop this senseless

²⁰⁰² TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3, p. 74

²⁰⁰³ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, ‘Kamer heeft twijfels over luchtbrigade. Stapsgewijze goedkeuring’ (Parliament has doubts about airmobile brigade. Step-by-step approval), NRC Handelsblad, 06/02/92; ‘Kamer voortaan sneller ingelicht over luchtbrigade’, (Parliament now to be informed more rapidly about airmobile brigade), NRC Handelsblad, 07/02/92.

²⁰⁰⁴ TK, 1991-1992, 22 300 X, no. 88, p. 8.

²⁰⁰⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p.4968.

²⁰⁰⁶ TK, 1993-1994, 23 591 no. 1.

²⁰⁰⁷ For this see Parliamentary Documents no. 23 591; DJZ. Memorandum from Ybema to the Political Council, 29/10/93 no. JZN93/0775/IJB; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, pp. 28-33; Megens, ‘Vredesoperaties’.

²⁰⁰⁸ Radio 1, V.O.O., News Radio, 19/11/91, 17.05 hours.

²⁰⁰⁹ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181 no. 13.

²⁰¹⁰ TK, 1991-1992, Proceedings, p. 1641.

²⁰¹¹ Ibidem.

bloodshed²⁰¹² But various other parliamentarians doubted whether it would be possible to meet the conditions for the stationing of a peacekeeping force: a ceasefire and agreement by the warring factions. Van Traa, member of parliament for the PvdA (Labour), thus advocated that strong use should be made of the sanctions weapon instead.²⁰¹³

Minister Van den Broek believed that the initiatives of the UN and the EC complemented each other. The UN would provide a peacekeeping force and in the meantime the EC would continue to work on a political solution. To this end it was necessary that the party taking the most aggressive attitude, Serbia, should be selectively subjected to sanctions.²⁰¹⁴ Minister of Defence Ter Beek told Parliament that if the Netherlands were to be asked to contribute to a UN peacekeeping force, he would consider a maximum of one battalion. If air transport were needed for Displaced Persons, he also wanted to offer an F-27.²⁰¹⁵ Sipkes thanked the minister for this, above all now that the 'WEU fuss' seemed to be over.²⁰¹⁶ This led Van Traa to remark that 'the relationship between GroenLinks and the Minister of Defence has never been as good as it is today'.²⁰¹⁷

When at the end of November 1991 the UN Secretariat informally sounded out the Dutch government about a possible participation in a peacekeeping force in Croatia, the Dutch Permanent Representative in New York, R.J. van Schaik, informed the UN both verbally and in writing of the 'Dutch readiness to provide up to 800 men', shortly after clarified as 'one battalion'.²⁰¹⁸ The Ministry of Defence had drawn up plans for dispatch of one marines battalion, to be relieved after two or three months by an armoured infantry battalion; this was because a marines battalion was also to be deployed in Cambodia, where it was hoped to contribute to the establishment of a democratic society following the civil war in the country.²⁰¹⁹ It was an ambitious aim to participate in peacekeeping operations with two battalions simultaneously, above all in view of the sweeping cuts being made in the Dutch armed forces at the time.

5. Defence in a changed world

The tone for a new defence policy for the Netherlands, as for the other 15 NATO countries, had been set during the NATO summit in London in July 1990. The central themes there were: smaller, more flexible and more mobile armed forces and more multinational units. A few months later, on 19 November 1990, the treaty on conventional forces in Europe (the CFE agreement) was signed, in which the member states of NATO and the Warsaw Pact committed themselves to a major reduction in their conventional armed forces to mutually equal levels. This move finally ended the threat from the Soviet Union, which had determined Western defence policy for 40 years. In 1991 Washington announced that the American contribution to NATO would be reduced from the 300,000 Americans stationed in Europe up to that time down to 100,000. The Canadian government announced that it would fully withdraw its troops from Europe. A main NATO force of half a million men would remain, together with a rapid intervention force of four divisions with a total strength of 70,000.

²⁰¹² Ibidem, p. 1641.

²⁰¹³ Ibidem, p. 1644.

²⁰¹⁴ Ibidem, p. 1646.

²⁰¹⁵ Ibidem, pp. 1648-1649.

²⁰¹⁶ Ibidem, p. 1649.

²⁰¹⁷ Ibidem, p. 1650.

²⁰¹⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 91; ABZ, PVNY. Van Schaik 1295 to Van den Broek, 29/11/91; ABZ, PVNY. Van Schaik to Goulding, 03/12/91, no. 8239; ABZ, 00775, Van den Broek to PR New York, 02/12/91, celer 399.

²⁰¹⁹ DARIC, Medical Affairs HKKM, Yugoslavia 1991, box 32. Organization of UN unit for deployment in Yugoslavia, 22/11/91; BDL, exh.no. BDL 91070409/252. File for ICOSO, Available units of the Marine Corps for UN operations, 28/11/91; BDL. File for Air Force Staff for meeting, authored by A.C.L. Adema, 02/12/91; BDL, exh.no. BDL 91070383/252. Memorandum from J. Waltmann to COCSB, 02/12/91, S91/139/3815; KM, UN operations, marines staff dossiers, 5.10822, exh. 06/01/92, no. 13106/4431, note from the Defence Staff on UN activities in Yugoslavia and Cambodia, 06/12/91; interview J.C. Groeneveld, 17/02/98.

The policy response to the changed perception of international security and the position of the Netherlands within the new international world order was the subject of the 1991 Defence White Paper²⁰²⁰ presented by Minister Ter Beek at the end of March 1991. This made the Netherlands the first NATO country to present a policy document following the signing of the CSE agreement. This was prompted in part by the hope of signalling to its allies that following the end of the Cold War there was no need for them to shift towards renationalization.²⁰²¹

According to the document, there was no longer any prospect of a major surprise war in the heart of Europe caused by the Soviet Union: ‘the Cold War is over’.²⁰²² The Minister of Defence predicted that the disappearance of the great threat in the East might prompt a return to patterns of national defence, but described such a development as ‘highly undesirable.’²⁰²³ According to the government, the collective and integrated nature of the NATO alliance with its considerable American contribution still provided the best basis for stability in Europe. The Dutch government recognized however that Europe would now be expected to make a relatively larger contribution to the alliance. It declared its wish to provide strong support for the multinational forces, partly in the hope that this would prevent Germany from following its own, aggressive path in the future.²⁰²⁴

According to the Defence White Paper, the uncertainty resulting from the collapse of the Soviet Union could lead to armed conflicts within and outside Europe, against which military action might have to be taken. The document noted that ‘new tension [was] present particularly in the Balkans (...) as a result of a resurgence of nationalism and major economic problems’.²⁰²⁵ It was true that a ‘wave of democratization’ was flowing through Eastern Europe, but according to the document this was being slowed in Yugoslavia by ‘sharp internal differences’.²⁰²⁶

In the view of the government there was a supplementary role for the CSCE, an organization which did not confine itself to military security in the narrower sense but which also focussed on human rights and minorities. The government believed that the European Political Union (EPU), then being established, also had tasks with regard to defence policy. Consequently the Netherlands had urged that the EPU include the possibility of participation in UN peacekeeping operations and joint actions outside the NATO treaty area.

The document took an optimistic view of the chances for UN peace operations thanks to the more constructive attitude of the Soviet Union: ‘The UN now has the chance to engage not only in peacekeeping, but also in peace-enforcing.’²⁰²⁷ Against this new background the 1991 Defence White Paper cited the following main tasks, besides the protection of Dutch territory in Europe and the Antilles and Aruba: contributing to the defence by NATO, to multinational operations outside the NATO treaty area and to peacekeeping operations.

Simultaneously to the reorientation of the defence policy, the government wanted to carry out financial cuts to the armed forces which in seven years should lead to a 30% reduction in personnel. However, these cuts and reorganization should not be at the expense of effective fighting capability in the new situation. Restructuring should not mean dismantling, and Minister Ter Beek did not want to have to nail a sign to his door saying ‘Closed for renovation’ during the restructuring period.²⁰²⁸

²⁰²⁰ TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3

²⁰²¹ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 77; Lieutenant Colonel H. Sonneveld, ‘Vierkant beschouwd: ‘Defensienota 1991: voorbarig en onvolledig’ (A frank view: 1991 Defence White Paper premature and incomplete) Carré 14(1991)7/8, pp. 16-17.

²⁰²² TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3, p. 9.

²⁰²³ TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, nr. 3, p. 21

²⁰²⁴ P.G.S. van Schie, ‘Vrede en veiligheid in het nieuwe Europa (Peace and security in the new Europe), Liberaal Reveil 32(1991)4, p. 123.

²⁰²⁵ TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3, p. 9.

²⁰²⁶ TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3, p. 16

²⁰²⁷ TK, 1990-1991, 22 991, no. 3, p. 30

²⁰²⁸ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 181; Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het eergevoel van Relus ter Beek’ (The sense of honour of Relus ter Beek), Vrij Nederland, 18/03/95; Marcel Reijmerink, ‘Vooral luisteren naar de generaal’ (Listening closely to the general), Algemeen Dagblad, 15/06/95.

Restructuring and cost cutting should go hand in hand, and the Royal Netherlands Army should undergo the greatest changes in both instances. The personnel of this part of the armed forces was to be reduced from 65,000 to 40,000 men. The number of divisions was reduced from three to two and the number of brigades in these from ten to seven. In order to have a rapid deployment force for crisis management situations, i.e. operations outside the framework of the classical collective defence carried out in the NATO context, one of the armoured infantry brigades was to be reformed to an airmobile brigade equipped with combat and transport helicopters. In this way the Netherlands planned to retain its status as an interesting alliance partner, not only strongly cutting costs but modernizing at the same time.

The personnel of this airmobile brigade, with a ready status, were thus the first troops designated to fulfil the Dutch government's increased offer for UN peacekeeping operations. On 19 December 1985 the Netherlands had made a new promise to the UN, basically stating that the Netherlands could provide 300 marines, one frigate, three helicopters and 30 military policemen within 48 hours. Within a week the Netherlands would be able to provide another 300 marines, several frigates and a supply ship. Within a period of three to six months the Dutch government, 'depending on circumstances and availability' would offer other units. On 21 May 1990 the Secretary-General of the UN, Perez de Cuellar, had asked all member states to announce what personnel and materiel they could provide to meet the new requirements of the United Nations.²⁰²⁹ The Defence White Paper constituted the Netherlands' answer to this request: an infantry battalion, a signal company, a medical unit, personnel for staff functions and officer observers. The Dutch government was in fact one of the few to respond to the Secretary-General's question.²⁰³⁰

Confronted with the heavy cuts, the armed forces felt the need to show their indispensability in the new international constellation. The marines had a relatively easy task here because their units contained few conscripts. Conscripts could only be dispatched on a voluntary basis.

The dispatch of conscripts outside the Netherlands had led to political or social resistance and legal objections several times since the Second World War.²⁰³¹ When in the mid-1960s the Dutch government decided to put several units of the armed forces at the disposal of the United Nations, some lawyers raised the question as to whether conscripts could be deployed against their will for tasks on behalf of the United Nations. The government thought they could, but when assigning the conscripts in question it applied the volunteer principle. When the Secretary-General of the United Nations asked for a Dutch contribution to UNIFIL, the Dutch government (at the time the Van Agt/Wiegel government) saw itself however compelled to dispatch conscripts against their will. The majority of Parliament supported the government, but saw itself forced to conduct a resolution requesting the government to apply the principle of voluntary dispatch as far as possible. In the end 120 men were dispatched against their will. The media and parliament spent weeks discussing the legality of this non-voluntary deployment. After the Dutch National Servicemen's Association (VVDM) had instituted summary proceedings against the State of the Netherlands, and then the Supreme Court of the Netherlands had ruled in its favour in February 1980, the only way that the non-voluntary dispatch could be maintained was by means of a legal trick.

This is why in 1988, as described, the government amended Section 33 of the Military Service Act. Since then the first article has read: 'Conscripts can be assigned to carry out active service outside the Netherlands.' Subsection 2a then stated that dispatch was possible in the context of a peacekeeping operation if those involved gave their permission. If they did not give this they could then be ordered to go on the mission, but this then required a Royal Decree authorizing deployment and prior consultation with Parliament. Non-voluntary dispatch of conscripts thus remained possible. In practice, however, this no longer took place since the participation in UNIFIL. At the start of their military service, conscripts could state whether they were prepared to carry out their service in peacekeeping operations outside the national borders, but they were allowed to revoke this permission later, 'right up to the aircraft steps' so to speak.

²⁰²⁹ DARIC, archive DS, box 12, 02/05/91, S91/139/1409. Perez de Cuellar to the Dutch government, 21/05/90, SPA/Q/05.90.

²⁰³⁰ Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 121.

²⁰³¹ For the history of the problems concerning the dispatch of conscripts, see J. Hoffenaar, 'De inzet van dienstplichtigen bij operaties buiten NAVO-verband' (The use of conscripts in operations outside the NATO context), Carré 15(1992)2/3, pp. 33-36 and the notes on this by the major of the military legal department, mr. W.B. Kroon, 'Uitzending van Nederlandse militairen' (Dispatch of Dutch military personnel), Carré 15(1992)6, pp. 16-17. Also see Klep & Van Gils, Korea, pp. 72-74.

This meant that the marines had an advantage over the army since they had almost no conscripts in their ranks. Only in the course of 1993 would the army have a prepared unit consisting fully of volunteers: the Airmobile Brigade. However, the fact that the marines would simultaneously supply a battalion for Cambodia and a battalion for Yugoslavia generated resistance in the army. This was why the Ministry of Defence devised a distribution of tasks in which the marines, above all in view of their experience in the tropics, would go to Cambodia, while the army was earmarked for operations in the former Yugoslavia.²⁰³²

However, following the offer of a battalion which Minister Ter Beek made to the UN at the start of December, he indicated that he did not wish any public preparation of a battalion for Yugoslavia until the wishes of the UN became clearer.²⁰³³ Almost immediately after this it transpired that the UN had reconsidered and would not be taking up the Dutch offer of a battalion. The first reason for this was that the UN strove for a geographical distribution of the troop-contributing nations. The second reason was that the Serbian government accused the Netherlands, as EC chairman, of bias in the conflict.²⁰³⁴

6. Dutch troops to Yugoslavia: 'a responsible and acceptable risk'

Although this seemed to be the end of Dutch participation in a peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia, the Dutch government continued to strive for the stationing of such a force, not only in Croatia but also in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In the weekend of 9 and 10 February 1992 Minister Van den Broek called on the UN to deploy a preventative peacekeeping force in Bosnia-Herzegovina, as he had already asked the UN envoy Cyrus Vance in a closed circle at the end of 1991.²⁰³⁵

During the meeting held within the framework of the European Common Foreign Policy on 17 February 1992, Van den Broek gave considerable attention to the mandate to be issued to the UN peacekeeping force that had been announced two days previously by Boutros-Ghali. Once again the Dutch minister pointed to the dangerous situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina and expressed the hope that the peacekeeping force would be stationed there too, even though he appreciated the organizational and financial problems associated with this. On 4 March Van den Broek again urged the Dutch Permanent Representative to the UN to discuss the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina with the representatives of the other EC member states and of the US.²⁰³⁶

After Boutros-Ghali had definitively decided to propose a peacekeeping force to the Security Council, the UN had once again informally asked the Netherlands to make a contribution to the UN peacekeeping force. This took place during a meeting organized by the UN Secretariat on 13 February for thirty potential troop-contributing nations, including the Netherlands. The Dutch government was asked for a signal unit of 300 men, five military observers, eight military police officers and 30 civilian ²⁰³² Klep & Van Gils, Korea, p. 102.

²⁰³³ CDS, box 12. S91/139, draft memorandum from Van den Breemen to COCSB, 05/12/91; KM, UN operations, marines staff dossiers, 5.10822, Exh. 06/01/92, no. 13106/4431, memorandum from Van den Breemen to COCSB, 10/12/91; Defence Staff, 1414, exh.no. BDL 9107238/252, A.A. Wijgerse to COCSB, 16/12/91, S91/139/4019.

²⁰³⁴ DARIC. Memorandum from Barth to Ter Beek, 17/12/91, D91/666; CRST, 1109. Memorandum from De Winter to the Political Council, 10/01/92, D92/007; report of meeting of the Defence Council, 18/12/91; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 91.

²⁰³⁵ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Parlement Krajina wil wèl vredesleger' (Krajina parliament now accepts peacekeeping force), de Volkskrant, 10/02/92.

²⁰³⁶ ABZ, DEU/Staten-Generaal. Van den Broek to PR New York, 04/03/92, celer 54.

police observers. On 19 February, in response to this, the Dutch government conditionally offered a signal unit comprising 300 men.²⁰³⁷ Following this, and before a formal request from the UN had been received, the Dutch Ministerial Council decided on 28 February to offer a signal unit of 300 men, five military observers and eight military police officers as a contribution to UNPROFOR. The formal request was not sent by the Dutch Permanent Representative at the UN in New York until 4 March.²⁰³⁸ The signal battalion would ultimately consist of 310 soldiers, and three military observers and six military policemen would be dispatched as well. These would be drawn from the 108th Signal Battalion in Garderen, including about 200 conscripts who would be dispatched on an exclusively voluntary basis.

In a signal battalion consisting of various smaller units who could to some extent train each other 'on the job', the use of conscripts was not a great problem. The loss of conscripts who did not wish to be dispatched could be covered for. But in combat units, who had to be welded into a single unit during their training, such a loss did present problems. In practice such combat units were composed mostly of conscripts. In August 1992 the departing Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, General M.J. Wilmink, spoke out strongly for the combat units:

‘The army cannot responsibly deploy combat units there in the short term. It is not possible with conscripts selected on a voluntary basis, who then need to be formed into new units. These volunteers need three to six months of hard training to create new, tightly-knit units with members who in the most extreme case must be loyal to each other unto death.’²⁰³⁹

The conscripts also formed a problem in units which, due to lack of enthusiasm, could not be manned with a sufficient number of volunteers. In early 1992 a shockwave went through the upper echelons of the Ministry of Defence when it transpired that the Dutch government could not meet a request by the United Nations for a medical unit of 120 men for Cambodia, although such a unit formed part of the standing offer that the government had made a year before. This experience would be a major factor in the decision to suspend, or abolish, conscription later in the year.²⁰⁴⁰

However, the dispatch of the signal battalion did not yet generate such difficulties. As 1 (NL) United Nations Signal Battalion it would be responsible for carrying out communication between the central UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo, the regional offices, the logistical headquarters and the 12 UNPROFOR battalions. The Dutch government had now ascertained from both the UN and from Belgrade that, in contrast to the term of Dutch chairmanship of the EC, the Dutch troops would not be subject to an increased security risk due to supposed Dutch bias during this period.²⁰⁴¹ Nonetheless the Dutch troops dispatched to Yugoslavia would often encounter a negative attitude by Bosnian Serb ²⁰³⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155, Van Schaik 146 to Van den Broek, 14/02/92; Van den Broek to PR New York, 18/02/92, celer 035; Van Schaik 159 to Van den Broek, 20/02/92; Theo Engelen, ‘VN-topman: vredesleger Kroatië 13.000 man’ (UN top man: peacekeeping force for Croatia 13,000 men), NRC Handelsblad, 14/02/92; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, pp. 91-92.

²⁰³⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Van Schaik 207 to Van den Broek, 04/03/92.

²⁰³⁹ Guido van de Kreeke, ‘Zandhaas heeft weer toekomst’ (Fresh prospects for foot-slogger), De Telegraaf, 22/08/92.

²⁰⁴⁰ Bert Steinmetz & Jan van der Ven, ‘Omvormen leger lastige klus’ (Restructuring of army a difficult task), Het Parool, 07/11/92; Leonard Ornstein/Max van Weezel, ‘Het warme bad en de koude douche van Relus ter Beek’ (The warm bath and the cold shower of Relus ter Beek), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 9; interview D. Barth 08/10/99.

²⁰⁴¹ ‘Nederlandse militairen niet naar Joegoslavië’ (Dutch troops will not go to Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 07/01/92; TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 19, p. 3. See also ABZ, DPV/ARA/00143. Memorandum DPV/PZ, 14/02/92; Memorandum DPV/PZ, ‘Yugoslavia/UN peacekeeping force’, 28/02/92; 00155, Van Schaik 146 to Van den Broek, 14/02/92; Van den Broek to embassy in Belgrade, 21/02/92; Van Schaik 170 to Van den Broek, 22/02/92; Fietelaars 72 to Van den Broek, 26/02/92; ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from Minderhoud to PR, 20/02/92; KAB. Defence Council report, 19/02/92; ANP report, ‘BZ: geen extra risico voor Nederlandse troepen in Joegoslavië’ (Foreign Affairs: no extra risk for Dutch troops in Yugoslavia), 25/02/92, 1448; ‘Den Haag vraagt garanties VN’ (The Hague asks for UN guarantees), NRC Handelsblad, 25/02/92; ‘Deelnemen aan VN-macht stuit op Haags voorbehoud’ (Participation in UN force subject to reservations in The Hague), de Volkskrant, 26/02/92; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, p. 93.

troops, including the Commander General Ratko Mladic, because they were compatriots of the abhorred 'Bruka' (Serbo-Croat for 'disgrace'), i.e. Minister Van den Broek, who had led EC actions in the first six months of the conflict in Yugoslavia.²⁰⁴²

On 3 March, the Ministers Van den Broek and Ter Beek informed Parliament by letter about the offer and added that the deployment of the Dutch troops involved 'a responsible and acceptable risk'.²⁰⁴³ This term 'acceptable risk' requires some explanation, because Minister Ter Beek would repeatedly use it in troop dispatch decisions during these years. The minister took this primarily to mean a political risk. He had to take the decision on his political responsibility and the base of political and public support had to be big enough that, should there indeed be casualties among the Dutch contingent in a peacekeeping operation, a sufficient degree of support would remain.²⁰⁴⁴ 'Acceptable risk' was thus not a calculable quantity, but rather an estimate by the minister and his advisors with regard to the political and social climate in the Netherlands. The minister was thus 'firmly convinced that it is impossible to create any kind of computer program that will indicate whether or not you should dispatch troops. You just have to have wide support.'²⁰⁴⁵

Although casualties among Dutch troops were acceptable, this acceptability also depended on the usefulness of a Dutch presence in the conflict area. 'I constantly have to weigh up the risks to the safety of the assigned troops against the importance of their presence in the former Yugoslavia', said the minister.²⁰⁴⁶ An 'acceptable risk' was thus not the same as a 'risk to safety'. With regard to such risks Ter Beek always listened to the information of his military advisors.²⁰⁴⁷ They supported his calculation, and they were not the only ones. 'Acceptable risk' was thus, as H.F. Dukers, Commander of the first marines battalion in Cambodia, put it: 'A political term for domestic use. The minister has to use this term, but it won't help you in the field.'²⁰⁴⁸ The highest military advisor to the minister, the Chief of Defence Staff General A.K. van der Vlis, also had trouble with the expression: 'I don't know precisely what this term means. I think we agree that personnel run a degree of risk that we can accept within our profession and our ethics. In crisis management operations you impose more restrictions than when defending your own territory.'²⁰⁴⁹ Put in these broad terms the civil service advisors to the minister also found the expression workable: 'What is acceptable also depends on the type of operation and who is participating in it. I would add that the verdict of alliance partners is also highly important.'²⁰⁵⁰ The politicians took the same line, as here for instance the PvdA parliamentarian Valk: 'It's not an exact science of course, in the sense of here's the limit and no further. You have to weigh things up: what are you actually doing it for, what do you want to achieve by sending troops?'²⁰⁵¹

There were still some difficulties to be overcome regarding the first decision to dispatch troops to Yugoslavia. One problem was that the Dutch government had held up the recognition of Croatia, which the EC countries had agreed to on 15 January, because it considered the guarantees on the protection of minorities to be insufficient (see previous chapter). On 22 February the chairman of the Council of Europe actually vindicated the Badinter Commission – which had objected to recognition of Croatia due to the republic's minorities policy – by sending a letter to President Tudjman about the ²⁰⁴² See for instance W.A.M. van Dijk, 'UNMO-actie naar Zepa' (UNMO operation to Zepa), Carré 16 (1993)7/8, p. 20; Honig/Both, Srebrenica, p. 246. See also Peter Michielsen, 'VN-vredesmacht moet prille vrede bewaken' (UN peacekeeping force must protect fresh peace), NRC Handelsblad, 28/02/92.

²⁰⁴³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 19, p. 3.

²⁰⁴⁴ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99; Bert Steinmetz & Jan van der Ven, 'Omvormen leger lastige klus', Het Parool, 07/11/92.

²⁰⁴⁵ Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 127.

²⁰⁴⁶ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 176.

²⁰⁴⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 95.

²⁰⁴⁸ Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 56.

²⁰⁴⁹ A.K. van der Vlis & W.F. van Eekelen, with the collaboration of C. Homan, 'Lessen uit vredesoperaties', Weerdenburg (red.), Lessen, p. 56.

²⁰⁵⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing J.H.M. de Winter, p. 145.

²⁰⁵¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing G. Valk, 31/05/00, pp. 249-250.

constitutional shortcomings on this point.²⁰⁵² But after President Tudjman had promised at the end of February that Croatian legislation would be amended with regard to the protection of the rights of minorities, the Dutch government saw no further reason to block recognition and the dispatch of troops could go ahead.²⁰⁵³

A few months later, however, the Badinter Commission would conclude that even the Croatian constitution of 8 May 1992 still failed to meet the requirements for the protection of minorities, as formulated by Lord Carrington. This was however irrelevant to the governments of Western Europe. They had already decided on recognition in principle on 15 January and had then, as in the case of the Netherlands and France, after initial hesitation now implemented this for practical reasons.

Another problem related to the UN's request to the Dutch government for dispatch of 30 police officers who were to ensure the safety of the local population and supervise the local police to see that it conducted its tasks objectively and correctly. In the letter to Parliament of 3 March, the Ministers Van den Broek and Ter Beek did not yet mention this request. The Netherlands had never before contributed civil police officers to a UN peacekeeping operation. In the recent past the Netherlands had rejected requests for similar deployments in El Salvador and Iraq due to the reorganization taking place within the Dutch police force, the safety risks and language problems.²⁰⁵⁴ This time however the top echelon of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs felt more inclined to cooperate, partly because the Netherlands had made a strong showing as EC chairman 'and it would now be difficult to lag behind the rest'.²⁰⁵⁵ In divergence from the recommendations of her civil servants, however, Minister Ien Dales considered that the dispatch of Dutch civil police was 'not necessary'.²⁰⁵⁶ After this the request was passed to her colleague the Minister of Justice, Ernst Hirsch Ballin, who might possibly provide personnel from the national police force. After extensive consultation the Ministry of Justice also decided not to contribute any personnel.²⁰⁵⁷

The CDA (Christian Democrats) member of parliament A.B.M. Frinking, supported by Blaauw, complained during an procedure debate about the way that the government had provided information about the UNPROFOR participation.²⁰⁵⁸ Reports had appeared about it in the press even before the Council of Ministers had taken a decision on dispatch.²⁰⁵⁹ Some of these publications resulted from the fact that the spokesman of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Dig Ishta, had answered journalists' questions 'off the cuff'.²⁰⁶⁰ The press reports had caused a considerable commotion because they spoke of the dispatch of conscripts.²⁰⁶¹ As acting chairman of the Permanent Parliamentary Committee for Foreign Affairs, Van Traa told the government that the committee wished for verbal consultation 'if necessary during the spring recess, before one Dutch soldier be sent to Yugoslavia'.²⁰⁶²

²⁰⁵² Terrett, Dissolution, p. 169.

²⁰⁵³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181 no. 18 and no. 20, pp. 6-7.

²⁰⁵⁴ ABZ, DOV/ARA/00155. Memorandum from DPV to Van den Broek, 27/02/92, no. DPV-266/92; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 94.

²⁰⁵⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Th.C. de Graaf to Hoekema, 28/02/92, with appendix: Deputy Director of Police to Dales, 27/02/92.

²⁰⁵⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Head DPV to Van den Broek, 12/03/92, no. DPV-355/92.

²⁰⁵⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Van den Broek 098 to PR New York, 29/04/92.

²⁰⁵⁸ DAV. Deetman to the ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence, 10/03/92; appendix: report of procedure debate, 10/03/92, D92/210/6878.

²⁰⁵⁹ 'Kabinet wil 300 militairen naar Joegoslavië sturen' (government to send 300 troops to Yugoslavia) and Wio Joustra, 'Nederland levert vaak militairen voor vredesoperaties van VN' (The Netherlands often supplies troops for UN peacekeeping operations), de Volkskrant, 15/02/92; 'VN-macht naar Joegoslavië. Nederland stuurt mogelijk 300 man verbindingstroepen' (UN force to Yugoslavia. The Netherlands may send 300 signal troops), Trouw, 24/02/92; 'Den Haag vraagt garanties VN', NRC Handelsblad, 25/02/92; 'Deelnemen aan VN-macht stuit op Haags voorbehoud', de Volkskrant, 26/02/92.

²⁰⁶⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Memorandum from DPV/PZ to DPV, 26/02/92, no. 254/92.

²⁰⁶¹ Postscript from DPV/PZ on ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Memorandum from DPV to Van den Broek, 27/02/92, no. DPV-266/92.

²⁰⁶² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Memorandum from PS to DEU and DPV, 28/02/92, no. 19/92.

On 12 March 1992 verbal consultation took place with the Committees for Foreign Affairs and for Defence.²⁰⁶³ They generally approved the dispatch. In view of the positions of the parties in the Yugoslav conflict, the members of parliament wanted to know, among other things, on what the estimate of an 'acceptable risk' was based and how large the chance was that peacekeeping could turn into peace-enforcing. Blaauw and the CDA parliamentarian De Kok asked whether the mandate area could be extended to Bosnia-Herzegovina if circumstances there should deteriorate. Van den Broek, who himself had repeatedly advocated such an extension, now appeared, obviously better informed through international consultation, to take a less favourable view of this and declared that the situation in Bosnia seemed 'reasonably manageable at the moment'.²⁰⁶⁴ The mandate would, according to Van den Broek, explicitly not involve peace-enforcing.²⁰⁶⁵ Ter Beek explained that the instructions on the use of force related to both self-defence and the protection of lives among the local population.²⁰⁶⁶

On 9 March a group of UNPROFOR quartermasters, commanded by the Indian Lieutenant General Satish Nambiar, arrived in Yugoslavia. The Deputy Commander was the French Major General Philippe Morillon. The Chief of Staff was the Canadian Brigadier General Lewis W. MacKenzie, who had acquired considerable experience in peacekeeping operations in the Gaza Strip, Cyprus, Cairo and Central America. Contrary to a previous plan, Boutros-Ghali decided not to appoint a Special Representative because he wanted to emphasize that the responsibility for finding a political solution lay with the EC, a responsibility that he at that time did not (yet) want to see combined with the peacekeeping role of the UN.²⁰⁶⁷ Instead of sending a special representative he added a Director of Civil Affairs to the operation: the Irishman Cedric Thornberry.

On 3 April the Dutch signal battalion arrived in Zagreb as the first full UNPROFOR unit. From the Croatian capital it deployed in the North, South, West and East sectors in Croatia into which UNPROFOR was divided, and shortly afterwards in the fifth sector, Sarajevo in Bosnia. The battalion was split up into small communications centres, stationed with the various units to which they were assigned. As a result the battalion was spread over 22 locations. From this point it was to be in service until 1 September 1994 and would comprise a total of some 2000 military personnel. UNPROFOR was formally deployed in Croatia on 7 April through acceptance of Security Resolution 749 and its headquarters was established in Sarajevo, partly for reasons of safety. But this safety was to be short lived.

²⁰⁶³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 20.

²⁰⁶⁴ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 20, p. 6.

²⁰⁶⁵ Ibidem.

²⁰⁶⁶ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, nr. 20, p. 8.

²⁰⁶⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00143. Van Schaik 156 to Van den Broek, 18/02/92.

Chapter 5

The start of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina: March 1992 – May 1992

1. New plans for dividing up Bosnia-Herzegovina

On 9 January, as described in Chapter 2, Milosevic promised to give up all Croatian territory if the Croatian president was prepared to start a war together with him in Bosnia-Herzegovina.²⁰⁶⁸ On the same day the autonomous Serb Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina was proclaimed, several days earlier than announced. It consisted of five so-called autonomous areas and a number of districts.

During these days the division of Bosnia was high on the agenda of the Serbs and Croats. According to Haris Silajdzic, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Rusmir Mahmutcehajic, Deputy Prime Minister of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Bosnian Serb leader Koljevic conducted talks about division with Tudjman on 14 January in Zagreb.²⁰⁶⁹ Koljevic was reportedly acting there on behalf of Milosevic.²⁰⁷⁰ On the same day Tudjman tried for over an hour to convince the American ambassador Zimmermann of the desirability of such a division of Bosnia between Croatia and Serbia. The Croatian president told the American diplomat that otherwise the Bosnian Muslims would make Bosnia into a fundamentalist Muslim state, using methods that included the import of half a million Turks. He warned about the Green Transversal (an unbroken region of Muslims) that would stretch from Bosnia via Sandzak and Kosovo to Turkey, and he called the Bosnian President Izetbegovic a puppet of Turkey. Asked about the source of his information, Tudjman frankly admitted that he based his opinions on information from Milosevic.

As described in Chapter 3, in April 1991 Milosevic had impressed Tudjman with the plan for the Green Transversal and the return of a large number of Muslims from Turkey; this 'plan' was in fact a copy of an article from the satirical magazine Vox that was published in Sarajevo. Zimmermann informed the Croatian president that his ideas about division of Bosnia-Herzegovina could not expect to meet with the sympathy of the Americans.²⁰⁷¹

According to the statements of various Serb leaders, the share of Bosnia-Herzegovina demanded by the Serbs amounted to about two-thirds. Karadzic said in January 1992, for instance, that in the event of the independence of Bosnia the Serbs should get 66 per cent of the territory.²⁰⁷² This claim was supposedly based on the 'fact' that the Serbs, who were comparatively strongly represented in rural areas, had already owned more than 60 per cent of the land before 1992.²⁰⁷³ On 11 February Milosevic told Zimmermann that, in contrast to Croatia, the Serbs in Bosnia were not oppressed. To back this up he cited the circumstance that the Serbs in Bosnia only made up 35 (in fact: 31) per cent of the population but owned 64 per cent of the land. The real purpose of this remark was more probably to get the American ambassador used to Serbian claims for two-thirds of Bosnian territory than to show goodwill towards Bosnia, because Milosevic constantly referred to Izetbegovic as a dangerous Muslim fundamentalist. Moreover, so reasoned Zimmermann, would not Milosevic, who constantly ²⁰⁶⁸ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 223; Oscar Garschagen, 'Croatie mag van Milosevic intact blijven' (Milosevic lets Croatia remain intact), de Volkskrant, 10/01/92.

²⁰⁶⁹ Judy Dempsey, 'Secret talks reopened on Bosnia', Financial Times, 16/01/92; Peter Sartorius, 'Jugoslawien-Konflikt: Ist der Krieg in Bosnien-Herzegowina noch zu vermeiden?' (Yugoslavia conflict: can the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina still be avoided?), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 07/02/92.

²⁰⁷⁰ According to Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 253 Milosevic had already sent Koljevic to Zagreb on 8 January.

²⁰⁷¹ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 181-182.

²⁰⁷² Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 26. See also Cigar, Genocide, pp. 39-40.

²⁰⁷³ Cf. Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 97. In fact the figure was 56 per cent. [See Chapter 3].

said that he was willing to grant Tudjman his share of Bosnia, want to take a bite of the apple himself?²⁰⁷⁴

While the Serb leaders put their claims on the table and tried to tempt the Croatian government into becoming an accomplice, the atmosphere in Bosnia-Herzegovina was deteriorating day by day. The JNA, the Yugoslav army, took up strategic positions around various Bosnian towns at the end of 1991 and start of 1992 and, in the first months of 1992, the federal army organized training courses for territorial defence forces to which exclusively Serbs were invited.

The various ethnic groups increasingly shut themselves off from each other. Police forces split up along ethnic lines, whereby one of the groups often made itself the sole master of the stock of weapons.²⁰⁷⁵ From the start of January onwards bomb attacks took place in Mostar and other towns, the various ethnic groups repeatedly set up roadblocks and the army laid mines around military buildings as a prevention against attacks.²⁰⁷⁶

2. The referendum in Bosnia

It was against this background that on 24 January the parliament of Bosnia-Herzegovina dealt with the issue of the referendum on the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina; this referendum was required by the European Community before being able to proceed with recognition of Bosnian independence. The Bosnian Serb leaders opposed such a referendum, which would lead to independence, while Izetbegovic and his supporters were in favour of it. The Croats, who were strongly divided between moderates who advocated a multi-ethnic state of Bosnia-Herzegovina and radicals who wished for a part of Bosnian territory to join up with Croatia, were the ones who would tip the balance.

The actual parliamentary treatment was preceded by two days of intensive consultations between all involved parties. The preliminary discussions seemed to indicate a compromise along the following lines: the referendum would be held throughout Bosnia and be open to all citizens. The question however should not simply be whether voters were for or against independence, but would offer several options for the future status of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The referendum would thus have a more advisory nature than a binding one.

Izetbegovic and Karadzic had opposed each other in the referendum issue like two fighting-cocks, but on the evening prior to the parliamentary treatment they too were eventually able to agree to this solution. Typically for his way of doing things Izetbegovic refused however to sign an agreement to this effect, remarking that that was still possible the next day. The following morning, 'as if nothing had happened in the previous two days', the Bosnian president announced that he could not agree to the compromise.²⁰⁷⁷

This meant that the referendum had to be debated by parliament on 24 January in its original form, and that the Muslims and Serbs were once again opposed to each other. During an adjournment of the parliamentary session, Karadzic and the leading politician of the SDA (Izetbegovic's party) and Deputy Prime Minister Muhamed Cengic were, however, once again able to agree on a way out of the ²⁰⁷⁴ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 179. Cf. Zimmermann, 'Ambassador', p. 16, where Milosevic is said to have claimed 70 per cent of Bosnian territory. Milosevic also told Mesic that his ultimate aim was to incorporate two-thirds of Bosnia into Serbia, 'Davor Butkovic, 'Mesic. I drugi su hrvatski politicari svjedocili pred istra[iteljima] Suda u Haagu!', Globus, 16/05/97, pp. 15-16

²⁰⁷⁵ For information on this deteriorated climate see for instance Ludwig Boltzmann Institute, Operations, Section 5.1.

²⁰⁷⁶ 'Schietpartij in Croatië bedreigt bestand' (Shooting in Croatia threatens truce), de Volkskrant, 11/01/92; 'Politici Servië en Croatië naar VN voor overleg' (Serb and Croat politicians to the UN for consultation), de Volkskrant, 22/01/92; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Honderden woedende Croaten op barricades in explosief Bosnië' (Hundreds of angry Croats on barricades in explosive Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 05/02/92; idem, 'Leger Joegoslavië zegt Croaten in Mostar wacht aan' (Yugoslav army issues warning to Croats in Mostar), de Volkskrant, 06/02/92; 'Croatië 'onvoorwaardelijk' akkoord met VN-vredesplan' (Croatia agrees 'unconditionally' to UN peace plan), de Volkskrant, 07/02/92; 'Spanningen in Bosnië lopen op na aanslag' (Tensions increase in Bosnia following attack), de Volkskrant, 26/02/92.

²⁰⁷⁷ Muhamed Filipovic, 'Hasan Cengic's Conspiratorial Logic', Dani, 08/04/00.

crisis. They agreed that a political and territorial arrangement should be made first. The referendum would then be held directly after this. Karadzic declared to the parliament, following the reaching of this compromise, that the parties had never been so close to an agreement as they were now, a remark greeted with cheers by the delegates. But then Izetbegovic took the floor and declared that the referendum could not be made subject to any conditions.

At this moment – by now it was half-past three in the morning – Krajisnik decided as parliamentary chairman to adjourn the meeting until ten o'clock. After the Serb members of parliament had left, however, an SDA delegate reconvened the non-Serb members of parliament an hour later. The referendum was put to the vote and all 130 of the parliamentarians present voted in favour.²⁰⁷⁸ The referendum was to be held on the weekend of 29 February and 1 March.

The Bosnian Serb politicians, who felt excluded from the decision, were furious. They pointed out that the Bosnian constitution required the agreement of all three ethnic groups for changes in the status of the territory.

In the weeks prior to the referendum a series of armed incidents took place, for instance when police from Sarajevo tried to intercept weapons consignments being sent to the Serbs in the autonomous areas²⁰⁷⁹ or during blockades by Croats of JNA installations in Hercegovina.²⁰⁸⁰

The day before the referendum, Karadzic declared that the referendum did not exist for the Bosnian Serbs. They would not participate in it, but they would not hinder the referendum either.²⁰⁸¹ On the other hand the SDS, Karadzic's party, warned that Serbs who took part in the referendum would be regarded as traitors. During the weekend of the referendum some local SDS functionaries refused to allow the setting up of voting stations if the Serb names were not first removed from the electoral lists.²⁰⁸² In many of the districts controlled by the Serbs the voting stations did not open at all.²⁰⁸³ Whether pressurized by the SDS or not, Bosnian Serbs stayed away from the voting stations in their masses. 63.7 per cent of the registered voters, i.e. chiefly Muslims and Croats, did go to the polls; 99.4 per cent of these voted for independence.

On the evening of 1 March, the second day of the referendum, the tensions between Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Serbs culminated in an incident in Bascarsija, the old Muslim quarter of Sarajevo. A wedding celebration was taking place during which the Serb wedding guests, as was customary at that time,²⁰⁸⁴ waved Serb flags. Suddenly shots were fired at the celebrants, killing the father of the bridegroom and wounding an Orthodox priest. Immediately after this incident supporters of the SDS set up roadblocks around the old quarter of Sarajevo. The attack on the wedding guests proved to be the spark that lit the powder keg. These developments must have surprised at least part of the SDS leadership.²⁰⁸⁵ The most important leaders were in Belgrade at that moment. But it was not to be long before the SDS mastered the situation and declared that the siege of Sarajevo would be lifted only when the preparations for the independence of Bosnia-Hercegovina were stopped. Furthermore they wanted greater influence on the police and television in Sarajevo. Karadzic took a hard line when speaking ²⁰⁷⁸ Hayden, Blueprints, pp. 96-97.

²⁰⁷⁹ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Serviërs Bosnië onder bevel leger' (Bosnian Serbs under army command), NRC Handelsblad, 24/02/92.

²⁰⁸⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Oorlog funest voor Mariaverering in Medjugorje' (War disastrous for Veneration of the Virgin Mary in Medjugorje), NRC Handelsblad, 26/02/92.

²⁰⁸¹ Amnesty International, Abuse, p. 7.

²⁰⁸² Kumar, Divide, p. 51.

²⁰⁸³ Amnesty International, Abuse, p. 7.

²⁰⁸⁴ Meier, Jugoslavië, p. 376. See also the report on a wedding celebration in the small Bosnian town C/Gacko six months earlier in E. Nysingh, 'Muslims blijven Tito trouw' (Muslims remain faithful to Tito), de Volkskrant, 19/08/91: 'The Serb wedding guests make an ear-splitting noise. They ride in convoys through Gacko, they sound their horns and shoot automatic weapons into the air. Serbian and Yugoslav flags wave from the opened windows. The residents of Gacko, a small town in Bosnia-Hercegovina with a Muslim majority, seem to take no notice.' In fact, at a later point in the article the journalist writes that 36 per cent of the population in Gacko was Muslim and 44 per cent Serb.

²⁰⁸⁵ Cf. Meier, Jugoslavië, p. 376.

from Belgrade. He warned that developments threatened in Sarajevo 'which would make Northern Ireland look like a holiday resort'²⁰⁸⁶ and said he feared 'a war on the same scale as the one between India and Pakistan'.²⁰⁸⁷ In a counter-action, Croats and Muslims set up barricades around Serb neighbourhoods of the Bosnian capital. Following this the first openly armed members of the Muslim militias appeared.²⁰⁸⁸

Supporters of independence who wanted to demonstrate their loyalty to an undivided Bosnia held a demonstration on 2 March, with slogans such as 'Remove the barricades, we are unarmed'. The demonstrators were fired on, resulting in several wounded. Hasty consultation between leaders of the SDS and SDA, where the SDA leaders promised to meet the demands of the Serbs for greater influence on the police and media, then brought about a return to calm. But it seemed likely that this calm would be only temporary. The fact that the SDS agreed so easily appeared to be chiefly because Milosevic did not want the arrival of UNPROFOR, which was to have its headquarters in Sarajevo, to be disrupted.²⁰⁸⁹

On 3 March Izetbegovic declared the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina. At the same time he announced that if the Serbs once more tried to paralyze daily life in Sarajevo, there were between 200,000 and 300,000 people ready to prevent this.²⁰⁹⁰ Two days later Izetbegovic sent a letter to the government leaders of the European Community, requesting that they recognize the independence now that the referendum demanded by the EC had been held and a majority of the population had voted for independence.²⁰⁹¹

The shots fired on the wedding guests, often seen as the overture to the war in Bosnia, are often mentioned in the international literature without examination of the question as to who committed the crime. Authors speak for instance of 'unidentified gunmen'.²⁰⁹² Muslims said that the Serbs themselves were responsible for the shooting in Bascarsija.²⁰⁹³ The French author Bougarel comes close to the truth when he writes that several weeks after the shooting a Muslim stated on the radio that he was responsible. It was Ramiz Delalic, nicknamed Celo II,²⁰⁹⁴ who was known as a criminal who had spent eight years in prison on a charge of rape. Delalic was a member of the Green Berets. It actually became public that 'Celo II' was involved in the Serb wedding shooting just two days after the incident, when the Bosnian Minister of Internal Affairs issued an arrest warrant for him and his accomplice Suad Sabovic in connection with the attack.²⁰⁹⁵ Delalic went underground and was not found, but a few weeks later he, like several other criminal elements, would lead the defence of Sarajevo. Although Delalic once again claimed the 'honour' of the attack in August 1992,²⁰⁹⁶ for a long time it appeared impossible to institute proceeding against him because victims were threatened or beaten up, after which they firmly withdrew their statements. In June 1999 Delalic was arrested in Sarajevo after he had wounded a policeman during a traffic check. But a year later he was able to escape abroad when he was released on bail while investigations against him were conducted. After earlier investigations had thus not provided any definite proof for the involvement of Celo, in August 2001 the public prosecutor in Sarajevo decided to reopen the investigation because, in his opinion, it had ²⁰⁸⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Gewapende Serviërs omsingelen Sarajevo' (Armed Serbs surround Sarajevo) NRC Handelsblad, 02/03/92.

²⁰⁸⁷ 'Oorlog dreigt in Bosnië-Herzegovina' (War threatens in Bosnia-Herzegovina), de Volkskrant, 03/03/92.

²⁰⁸⁸ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Gewapende Serviërs omsingelen Sarajevo', NRC Handelsblad, 02/03/92.

²⁰⁸⁹ Henk Hirs, 'Bosnië gered door misrekening Serviërs' (Bosnia saved by Serb miscalculation), Trouw, 04/03/92.

²⁰⁹⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Sarajevo in de greep van geruchten' (Sarajevo in the grip of rumours), NRC Handelsblad, 04/03/92.

²⁰⁹¹ AZ, appendix to 92M002475, Izetbegovic to Lubbers, 05/03/92.

²⁰⁹² E.g. Kumar, Divide, p. 39. Meier, Jugoslavië, p. 376 writes of 'ein Krimineller muslimischer Nationalität'.

²⁰⁹³ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 10.

²⁰⁹⁴ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 10.

²⁰⁹⁵ 'Other reports on Bosnia-Herzegovina', Tanjug 1900, 03/03/92, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 05/03/92; 'Other reports on Bosnia-Herzegovina', Tanjug, 2159, 03/03/92, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 06/03/92.

²⁰⁹⁶ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 257.

been too superficial up to then.²⁰⁹⁷ Since then various media have reported the existence of a secret indictment against Delalic by the Yugoslavia Tribunal in relation to crimes that he committed during the war in Bosnia.²⁰⁹⁸ On 1 February 2002, the subdistrict court in Sarajevo granted permission for the reopening of the investigation of Delalic in connection with the murder of the father of the bridegroom on 1 March 1992.

3. The Cutileiro Plan and its thwarting by the Americans

Due in part to the referendum, the American government started to take a more active attitude towards the developments in the former Yugoslavia and Bosnia in particular. The American government was in a dilemma after the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia by the EC. It had not been in favour of the recognition and had stuck by the position that an American recognition would follow only later within the context of a general solution to the Yugoslav issue.

But such a solution still seemed far away. However, the American government felt that shifting to the European position had its disadvantages too. If Croatia and Slovenia were to be recognized, but the same were not to happen simultaneously for Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, which had also requested recognition, then this could give the wrong signal to the JNA, namely that this army had a free hand with regard to the latter two areas. The American Deputy Secretary of State Eagleburger thus believed that the EC, by recognizing only two republics, had caused further destabilization of the former Yugoslavia. If the American government were to proceed with recognition then it would do this simultaneously for the four republics that wished recognition. The American government preferred however to await the result of the referendum in Bosnia.²⁰⁹⁹

On 10 January 1992 the Dutch ambassador to Washington, Meesman, had already reported to The Hague that it was strange that Bosnia and Macedonia could count on more sympathy at the American State Department than could the other republics of the former Yugoslavia.²¹⁰⁰ On this same 10 January, when Milosevic and the Bosnian Serb leadership were busy dividing up Bosnia, the American government warned the regime in Belgrade not to take any action to threaten the territorial integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina. When the Serbian member of the Federal Presidium, Borisav Jovic, visited the United States on 27 January, Eagleburger told him that a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina would be totally unacceptable to the American government. Three weeks later, on 19 February, Izetbegovic visited Washington and on the occasion he received 'strong support' for the integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina.²¹⁰¹

Prior to the referendum the European Community was also studying the question of what should be done about Bosnia. As described in Chapter 3, Lord Carrington had already been seriously worried in December 1991 about the consequences that the recognition of the former Yugoslav federal republics would have for Bosnia-Herzegovina. These concerns were not allayed following his visit to Sarajevo on 6 January 1992. Almost immediately after returning he reactivated the Yugoslavia Conference, which he had adjourned in November 1991. With the reopening of the conference, which no longer convened in The Hague but now in Brussels, Carrington had the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina particularly in mind. After Carrington had visited Bosnia again on 5 and 6 February, the ²⁰⁹⁷ 'Sarajevo court to re-investigate killing that precipitated Bosnian war', SRNA news agency, Bijeljina, 1157, 15/08/91, BBC Worldwide Monitoring, 15/08/01.

²⁰⁹⁸ 'Sefer Halilovic accused of war crimes in Grabovica; Zagreb's Daily', Global News Wire, ONASA News Agency, 22/09/01; 'BIH Press Review', ibidem, 24/09/01.

²⁰⁹⁹ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 1276 to Van den Broek, 20/12/91; Meesman 1289 to Van den Broek, 31/12/91; Meesman 50 to Van den Broek, 10/01/92; Meesman 137 to Van den Broek, 01/02/92; Meesman 160 to Van den Broek, 05/02/92.

²¹⁰⁰ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 50 to Van den Broek, 10/01/92.

²¹⁰¹ Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 99-100.

British mediator called together the representatives of the three major ethnic groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina in Sarajevo in order to reduce tensions.

On 1 January Portugal had taken over the EC chairmanship from the Netherlands. Carrington had asked the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs, De Deus Pinheiro, to take on the leadership of the talks. The Portuguese EC chairmanship had obviously learned from its Dutch predecessor: the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs treated the Yugoslavia issue as a matter of secondary importance²¹⁰² and confined itself chiefly to silent diplomacy, thus reducing the chance of attracting heavy criticism.

The core of the Portuguese efforts was formed by talks in Lisbon that commenced on 21 February under the leadership of the Portuguese diplomat Jose Cutileiro who worked on behalf of Minister De Deus Pinheiro, and Lord Carrington. From the start Cutileiro made it clear that an agreement between the three Bosnian leaders would have to satisfy two conditions: the inviolability of the external borders of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the acceptance of the existence of three separate ethnic groups, each with their own interests.

The basis of the talks was a cantonization of Bosnia according to the Swiss model. This was above all a wish held by the Croat and Serb leaders in Bosnia. In September 1991 Karadzic had said that a solution for what he saw as the problem of Bosnia-Herzegovina would be massive population migrations.²¹⁰³ A month later the Bosnian Croat nationalist leader Stjepan Kljucic had advocated a tripartite division of Bosnia-Herzegovina along ethnic lines. And in December 1991 the Bosnian Serb nationalists had themselves tabled a concrete plan in which 70 per cent of Bosnia would consist of Serb cantons.

On 15 February, following the Lisbon talks, Karadzic told Zimmermann he was highly enthusiastic about developments in the Portuguese capital. Cutileiro had obtained the agreement of all three parties for cantons on an ethnic basis within a unified state of Bosnia.²¹⁰⁴ The next day Karadzic, together with Koljevic, had a meeting with two advisors of Tudjman, Zvonko Lerotic and Josip Manojlic. They discussed a division of Bosnia, but an agreement was prevented because both parties claimed the Sava Valley, also known as Posavina, in the north of Bosnia. Many Croats lived there, but the area was also of great importance to the Serbs because it was to form the link, through Bosnia, between Serbia and the Serb areas in the east of Bosnia on the one hand and the Serb area in Croatia on the other hand.²¹⁰⁵

²¹⁰² Williams, Legitimacy, p. 140.

²¹⁰³ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 87.

²¹⁰⁴ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 189.

²¹⁰⁵ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 254.

On 25 February Zimmermann also saw Izetbegovic, who according to the American ambassador was correspondingly unhappy about the developments in Lisbon. He had felt pressured by Cutileiro and then agreed to the recognition of three separate cantons in Bosnia, but on his return to Sarajevo his party colleagues had accused him of weakness. Zimmermann, according to his own account, told Izetbegovic that he should keep to his promise but he had also cheered the Bosnian president by telling him that in the further course of the talks he would have more opportunity to put forward his position.²¹⁰⁶

The discussions with Karadzic and Izetbegovic prompted Zimmermann to advise his government to proceed rapidly with the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina. In fact he had already come to this conclusion in the course of February, and his government had done the same. Radicalization was particularly evident among the Croats in Bosnia. On 5 February 1992 in Siroki Brijeg, the party congress of the Bosnian HDZ (the Croat Democratic Association of Bosnia) had sidelined its leader, the more moderate Stjepan Kljuic who had advocated the participation of the Bosnian Croats in the referendum on 29 February and 1 March. In his stead the congress elected the fanatical Mate Boban, who was in favour of the 'Croat' areas in Bosnia joining up with Croatia. It was generally assumed that Tudjman was responsible for this shift in power.²¹⁰⁷ After this power transfer Herzegovina witnessed violent incidents between Croats and Serbs, such as shootings, bomb attacks and arson.²¹⁰⁸ On 26 February Secretary of State Baker told a committee of the American Senate that he was engaged in 'reviewing our recognition policy on the Yugoslav republics on an almost daily, or certainly weekly basis'.²¹⁰⁹

According to Zimmerman, Izetbegovic needed support, all the more because the American ambassador had little faith in the talks being held under the leadership of Cutileiro. Either they would lead to the tripartite division about which Karadzic was obviously so enthusiastic, or the Bosnian Serb leader would prolong the talks in order to create more autonomous Serb areas in Bosnia in the meantime. Zimmermann told Washington that recognition of Bosnia would help to provide protection ²¹⁰⁶ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 190.

²¹⁰⁷ Tanner, Croatia, p. 286; Woodward, Tragedy, p. 279.

²¹⁰⁸ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Honderden woedende Croaten op barricades in explosief Bosnië', de Volkskrant, 05/02/92.

²¹⁰⁹ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

against aggressive Serb aims. This was the same reasoning that the German government had applied earlier to argue for recognition of Croatia: recognition would be able to stop aggression because it would no longer be a question of an intra-state conflict but of a war between states. According to Zimmermann, the American government could further achieve this aim by telling Milosevic that it would grant him the long-hoped-for recognition of a federation of Serbia and Montenegro as successor state to the old Yugoslavia in exchange for his recognition of Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia.²¹¹⁰ The National Security Council and the State Department were now also convinced that recognition of a state such as Bosnia, which in American eyes met all democratic requirements, was desirable.²¹¹¹

Following the referendum of 29 February and 1 March the policy-makers in Washington became seriously concerned about, as they called it, Serb attempts to destabilize the situation in Bosnia. They understood that recognition provided no guarantee that hostilities could be prevented but, as they saw it, the most broadly based recognition possible was the best medicine existing at that moment for the Bosnian crisis.²¹¹²

On 4 March Zimmermann was charged by Baker to deliver a message to Milosevic in which the American government demanded that Karadzic should not in any way thwart the result of the referendum in Bosnia. Baker's policy was now directed at preventing Izetbegovic from agreeing to the Cutileiro Plan for the division of Bosnia and informing him that the United States would support his government in the UN if any difficulties should arise. But according to a high-placed official in the State Department no guarantees against Serb aggression were given and nothing was put down on paper, 'because Baker didn't believe it would happen'.²¹¹³

On 4 March, the same day that Zimmermann was instructed to deliver his message to Milosevic, Baker wrote a letter to the leaders of the European Community in which he urged recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The American government wanted as many countries as possible to recognize Bosnia-Herzegovina so as to increase this republic's chances of survival. Furthermore Washington wanted to avoid bearing sole responsibility for this new state.²¹¹⁴ On 10 March Baker personally urged the European foreign ministers in Brussels to recognize Bosnia and Macedonia.²¹¹⁵ Should this not happen, then the US would not recognize the independence of Croatia and Slovenia.²¹¹⁶ On the same day the EC and the United States declared that they would coordinate the policy of recognition with regard to the former Yugoslav republics.²¹¹⁷ On 6 April, so they agreed, the ministers of the EC would jointly take a decision on the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia.²¹¹⁸

According to Ralph Johnson, at that time the Principal Assistant to the Secretary of State charged with the American policy on Yugoslavia, on 10 March Baker also urged his European discussion partners to halt their plans for cantons.²¹¹⁹ In any event Johnson himself told the Dutch ²¹¹⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 191-192. Regarding Zimmermann's expectation that recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina would hold back Serb aggression, see also, David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

²¹¹¹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 192.

²¹¹² ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Coreu of the Portuguese EC chairmanship, 05/03/92, cpe/pres/lis 423.

²¹¹³ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

²¹¹⁴ David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, pp. 129-130; ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 219 to Van den Broek, 25/02/92; Coreu of the Portuguese EC chairmanship, 05/03/92, cpe/pres/lis 423. For information on the American urging for recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina by the EC countries, see also interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

²¹¹⁵ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Coreu of the EPS Secretariat, 11/03/92, cpe/sec 260;

²¹¹⁶ Chenu, 'France', p. 370 n. 6; ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 301 to Van den Broek, 18/03/92.

²¹¹⁷ Terrett, Dissolution, pp. 82-83.

²¹¹⁸ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Coreu of the EPS Secretariat, 11/03/92, cpe/sec 260; Meesman 301 to Van den Broek, 18/03/92.

²¹¹⁹ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

ambassador Meesman that the American government was concerned about the course of the talks that Minister of Foreign Affairs De Deus Pinheiro was conducting with the Bosnian parties.²¹²⁰

On 16 March the three Bosnian leaders met again in Sarajevo for a discussion with Cutileiro on the canton plan. Karadzic placed a heavy burden on the conference by declaring that, if the plan were not accepted, a civil war would follow with hundreds of thousands of dead and hundreds of destroyed towns, after which Bosnia would consist of three parts anyway.²¹²¹ In other words: the choice was up to Izetbegovic. With Karadzic's knife on the table, the three Bosnian leaders reached an agreement late in the evening of 17 March.

The Cutileiro Plan, which was to be presented the following day, envisaged an independent Bosnia-Herzegovina that would be divided into three cantons according to the Swiss model. These would consist of 13 areas distributed over Bosnia and would be divided on an ethnic basis, taking into account 'economic, geographic and other criteria'.²¹²² Each of the cantons would be controlled by one ethnic group which was entitled to conduct its own economy and politics, while the foreign, security and monetary policy would remain the prerogative of the central government and the parliament of Bosnia. Each of the three ethnic entities would be assigned an equal number of delegates in the upper house of the parliament; decisions on important issues would be passed if 80 per cent of the delegates voted in favour.

Furthermore a special tribunal would be created to decide on disputes between the central authority and the cantons. The tribunal would consist of one member of each of the cantons and four foreigners. The plan left the difficult questions of authority over the army and police still unresolved. Moreover the map on which the internal borders were drawn also needed to be discussed. According to the provisional map there would be two Muslim areas, four Croat areas and seven Serb areas. The Muslims would control 45 per cent, the Serbs 42.5 and the Croats 12.5 per cent of the Bosnian territory. The difficulty of dividing up Bosnia-Herzegovina into ethnic areas was demonstrated by the fact that according to this map 50 per cent of the Bosnian Serbs would live outside the areas of their own ethnicity, while the corresponding figures for the Bosnia Croats and the Bosnian Muslims were 59 per cent and 18 per cent respectively.

Although Karadzic had constantly objected to an independent Bosnia-Herzegovina, he called the acceptance of the Cutileiro plan a great event in the history of Bosnia; according to him this now saved the country from civil war.²¹²³ Washington was less enthusiastic. Following this round of talks the Principal Assistant to the Secretary of State Johnson once again expressed his concern in Washington to the Dutch ambassador Meesman. In his opinion the Bosnian Serb leaders would stretch out the talks under Cutileiro and in the meantime would convince the Serb population in Bosnia of the need to secede and to join with Serbia.²¹²⁴

A week after the end of the talks, on 26 March, Izetbegovic withdrew his acceptance of the plan. The Bosnian President, who on 18 March had still declared that the Cutileiro Plan was an acceptable compromise that provided a solid basis for further talks,²¹²⁵ now said that he had only agreed because he had been told that otherwise the EC would not go ahead with recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina.²¹²⁶ It is not clear which persons or governments within the EC had given this indication, ²¹²⁰ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 301 to Van den Broek, 18/03/92.

²¹²¹ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

²¹²² Hayden, Blueprints, p. 99.

²¹²³ Sremac, War, p. 92; Theo Engelen, 'Doorbraak in overleg over de toekomst van Bosnië' (Breakthrough in consultations on future of Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 19/03/92; David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

²¹²⁴ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 301 to Van den Broek, 18/03/92.

²¹²⁵ Theo Engelen, 'Doorbraak in overleg over de toekomst van Bosnië', NRC Handelsblad, 19/03/92.

²¹²⁶ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

but the British government in particular seems to have indicated at an early stage that it would prefer to see a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina.²¹²⁷

According to others Izetbegovic withdrew his acceptance on the urging of the American ambassador in Belgrade, Warren Zimmermann.²¹²⁸ It is not unimaginable that the American government did indeed tell Izetbegovic that he could achieve more by sticking to the principle of an integral Bosnia-Herzegovina that was about to be recognized.²¹²⁹ However, the rejection of the Cutileiro Plan meant that Izetbegovic, supported by the American government, ran the risk of the bloodbath foretold by Karadzic.²¹³⁰ Actually it was the Croats who were the first to withdraw their acceptance of the agreement because on further consideration they wanted more territory than they had been promised.²¹³¹

The rejection of the Cutileiro Plan by Izetbegovic triggered a stream of developments. The Bosnian Serb leaders now saw even more clearly that if they wanted to form a state accommodating all Serbs, and not just the half, then territorial conquest and driving out the non-Serb population was the only alternative to a voluntary migration. The day after Izetbegovic's withdrawal of his acceptance, 27 March, the Bosnian Serb parliament declared the independence of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina, previously declared autonomous on 9 January. On the same day the Bosnian government appealed to the UN to send peacekeeping troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina. This request was in vain; the UN Secretariat pleaded budgetary problems that forced it to limit the number of crisis areas where the UN could be active.²¹³² The European Community had in principle accepted a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina into separate ethnic communities, as long as these would be held together by a coordinating central authority. Karadzic realised that Izetbegovic and his government could count on little support from either the UN or the EC if the Bosnian Serbs were to press ahead with their aims. He was ready to fulfil the threatening words he had spoken during the last round of talks under the leadership of Cutileiro.

4. The recognition of the multi-ethnic Bosnia-Herzegovina

On 6 April the ministers of the EC declared that as of the following day they would recognize Bosnia-Herzegovina. One day later the US did the same. Both the EC and the American government postponed the actual recognition, originally planned for 6 April, by one day out of respect for the memory of the Germany attack on Yugoslavia 51 years earlier.²¹³³ In total 72 states recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina on 7 April. Actually it was a long time before Western governments actually established diplomatic contacts with the government in Sarajevo. The American government, for instance, first opened an embassy in the Bosnian capital on 4 July 1994.

The Netherlands and Bosnia-Herzegovina decided on 15 December 1992 to establish diplomatic relations at the level of ambassador. To begin with this led only to the appointment of a temporary Bosnian chargé d'affaires in Brussels, who was also accredited with the Dutch government. The Netherlands conducted the relations from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague. The government postponed the appointment of a Dutch ambassador or temporary chargé d'affaires in Sarajevo because the security situation and the communications would make proper functioning ²¹²⁷ Stjepan Mesic, quoted in: Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 104-105.

²¹²⁸ R. Dolecek, 'I accuse!', http://www.snd-us.com/history/dolecek/dolecek_accuse.htm; Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 162; Sremac, War, p. 92; interviews A. Buha, 17/12/99 and V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

²¹²⁹ Cf. Cohen, Bonds, p. 243.

²¹³⁰ Cohen, Bonds, p. 244.

²¹³¹ Hayden, Blueprints, p. 100; Paul Shoup, 'The role of domestic and international actors in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian drama', Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, pp. 252-253.

²¹³² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00143. Van Schaik 190 to Van den Broek, 27/02/92.

²¹³³ ABZ DEU/ARA/00083. Van den Broek 59 to embassy in Belgrade, 07/04/93; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 140; Zimmermann, Origins, p. 194.

practically impossible. In the summer of 1994 the Eastern European department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs considered that the Dutch involvement in the rebuilding of Sarajevo justified the Netherlands following the example that had now been given by France, the United Kingdom, the United States, Germany, Italy, Austria, Croatia, the Vatican, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Iran and Turkey by also appointing an ambassador, or at least a temporary chargé d'affaires. The idea was that political reporting from the Bosnian capital could provide a useful supplement to that from Belgrade, Zagreb and by G.C.M. Baron van Pallandt, the ambassador to Albania, who was based in The Hague.²¹³⁴ Nonetheless it was not until March 1996 that a Dutch diplomatic representation was opened in Sarajevo.²¹³⁵

The West, and the Netherlands in particular, was not only slow in appointing personnel to realize diplomatic relations following the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The West and the UN also neglected to enable or to organize the defence of the new state. At the start of 1992 the CIA had already warned that in the event of recognition of Bosnia a major international effort would be needed to counter Serb aggression and to keep the state together.²¹³⁶ However, the new state of Bosnia-Herzegovina was affected by the UN arms embargo that had been imposed in September 1991 on all areas of the former Yugoslavia. By maintaining this embargo Bosnia was deprived of its legitimate right to defend itself from external aggression, a right that was granted to each state under Article 51 of the UN Charter.

The West abandoned Bosnia-Herzegovina not only militarily but also morally. On the one hand Western politicians argued in favour of a multi-ethnic state of Bosnia-Herzegovina, but on the other hand they strengthened the nationalist leaders in Bosnia and Serbia by conducting negotiations exclusively with them; they ignored the democratic forces that were striving for multi-ethnicity and that had pinned their hopes on help from the West.²¹³⁷ When at the end of June the American government set out its view to the Dutch government, via its embassy in The Hague, that the Bosnian government should not be pressured to negotiate directly 'with what in fact are extremist Bosnian Serbs who follow a policy of terrorism', the Dutch response was that there was 'little point in casting doubt on this. But however despicable the behaviour of Karadzic and his followers may be, they do represent the most important power factor on the Serb side'.²¹³⁸

Another illustration of the lack of support for democratic forces was the subsidy policy of the Dutch government. At the start of 1994 a memorandum was sent by the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs about a subsidy for the Dutch organization Press Now, which provided support to independent media in the former Yugoslavia. The Dutch government found the aim a sympathetic one, but: 'For reasons of a political nature a reserved policy has been conducted to date regarding individual Dutch ²¹³⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05293. Memorandum from DEU/OE to deputy DGPZ, 29/07/94, no. deu-609; Memorandum from DEU to PLVS, 11/08/94, no. 644/94.

²¹³⁵ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum from Deputy DEU to AP and others, 27/11/95, no. DEU-995/95. Originally a temporary chargé d'affaires was active there. An ambassador was appointed in June 1996.

²¹³⁶ Patrick Glynn, 'See No Evil', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 135.

²¹³⁷ See for instance the quote from June 1991 by the Serb writer Milo Dor at the start of De vernooëting van Joegoslavië: 'I think that pragmatism in Yugoslavia will win out under the pressure of the Americans and the European Community.' Or Milovan Djilas in March 1991: 'My greatest hope rests in Europe: I cannot imagine that Europe would stand for a mass slaughter of Serbs, Croats, Albanians in Kosovo, etcetera.' in: Rick Kuethe, 'Van oude partizanen, de dingen die voorbijgaan' (Of old partisans, the things that pass) Elsevier, 23/03/91, p. 39. See also the appeal by Tanja Petovar, chairwoman of the Yugoslav Helsinki Committee to the West for 'a great deal of contact, not only between governments but also between independent groups of people', Nicole Lucas, De stuiptrekkings van een stervend systeem (The twitchings of a dying system), Trouw, 04/07/91; Gied ten Berge/Mient Jan Faber, 'EG-ministers maken het nog bonter dan de Duitsers' (EC ministers go even further than the Germans), de Volkskrant, 19/12/91; Slavko Curuvija, 'Westen vergeet democraten Servië' (The West forgets Serb democrats), de Volkskrant, 28/01/92; S.L. Woodward, 'Redrawing Borders in a Period of Systemic Transition', Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 221.

²¹³⁸ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844, Circ. Van den Broek 386, 25/06/92.

support for independent media in Serbia. The prevention of an undesirably exposed position has always stood in the way of aid other than in a multilateral context.²¹³⁹

Bosnia in the Central and Eastern Europe Foundations of Dutch political parties

Another example of how Bosnia-Herzegovina was abandoned by the Netherlands was seen in the provision of grants to Dutch political parties for the promotion of pluriform societies in Eastern Europe. At the start of the 1990s the major Dutch political parties had foundations which maintained contacts with sister parties in Eastern Europe and which were able to provide these parties with some support in the development of a pluriform society. To this end they could utilize a grant scheme set up by the Dutch Ministry of the Interior for 'General Education and Training of Political Functionaries in Central and Eastern Europe'.

To facilitate this task, the political parties represented in Parliament received a basic sum of 50,000 guilders plus a sum of maximally 10,333 guilders per parliamentary seat. In addition the parties themselves supplied a relatively small sum. CDA (Christian Democrats), PvdA (Labour), VVD (Liberals), D66 (Democrats), GroenLinks (Green Left), RPF (party allied to the Dutch Reformed Church) and the Centrum Democraten (extreme right) utilized this scheme, which was extended for several years in succession as long as the political parties in Central and Eastern Europe were considered still to be in a state of development. At the time of the scheme's inception, the countries for which the grants were intended were Bulgaria, the GDR, Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia – and Yugoslavia.

In the VVD the contacts with Central and Eastern Europe were handled by the D.W. Dettmeijer Foundation until 1992. In that year this foundation, as well as several other foundations of the VVD, was dissolved, after which the activities of the VVD with regard to Central and Eastern Europe were taken over by the Prof. mr. B.M. Telders Foundation and the Haya van Someren Foundation. In its contacts with Central and Eastern Europe, the VVD chiefly focussed on parties in countries which could be considered for rapid entry into the European Community, such as Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia and – later – Slovenia.²¹⁴⁰

In contrast to the VVD, the Alfred Mozer Foundation of the PvdA and the Eduardo Frei Foundation of the CDA also directed considerable attention towards areas where the political (and economic) structure was less developed. In February 1993 the PvdA and the Alfred Mozer Foundation requested that the grant scheme be extended to Serbia, Kosovo, Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.²¹⁴¹ In September of the same year the Eduardo Frei Foundation of the CDA made the same request for Serbia and Montenegro. However, Minister Dales turned them down flat by telling the foundations that they themselves should provide the required moral support and should supply the accompanying financial help from their own funds. According to the minister, this provided 'adequate opportunities for anticipating possible positive developments in both states in the near future'.²¹⁴²

In 1994 the geographic scope of the subsidy was finally extended to the republics of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and the countries of the former Yugoslavia. But an ²¹³⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00782. FRY, assistance for independent media via Press Now, 19/01/94, NH-056/94.

²¹⁴⁰ See also Michiel Zonneveld & Jan van der Ven, 'Subsidiegeld Oost-Europa split VVD' (Subsidy for Eastern Europe splits VVD), Het Parool, 17/09/92; 'VVD sust conflict over 'fraude' van Blaauw' (VVD calms conflict over 'fraud' by Blaauw) NRC Handelsblad, 13/05/93; 'VVD'er Blaauw op onverkiesbare plaats' (VVD politician Blaauw on non-electable standpoint) Het Parool, 13/10/93, VVD party leadership, documents of meetings, central committee, agenda item 12 of meeting of 10/10/94; agenda item 5B of meeting 25/05/95; agenda item 6 of meeting 06/06/95.

²¹⁴¹ CDA Secretariat, Foreign Affairs Committee, 9316020, Alfred Mozer Foundation to Eduardo Frei Foundation, 25/02/93, no. 30.088 with appendix. J.M. Wiersma, deputy vice-chairman PvdA International Affairs, and B.J. van den Boomen, Director of Alfred Mozer Foundation to Dales and Van Rooij, 21/02/93.

²¹⁴² CDA Secretariat, Foreign Affairs Committee, 93160596, Dales to W.K.N. Schmelzer, Chairman of Eduardo Frei Foundation, 13/10/93, BW93/2082.

exception was made for countries where civil war was underway at that time, such as Bosnia.²¹⁴³ In 1995 the political parties and their foundations nonetheless asked the Dutch government to extend their efforts to the countries in a state of civil war as well. The government rejected this move because, it said, the political situation in these countries was underdeveloped. The foundations felt that this was precisely the argument for starting activities in these countries, but they failed to convince the ministry with this reasoning.²¹⁴⁴

In March 1996 Alfred Mozer Foundation (PvdA), the Eduardo Frei Foundation (CDA), the Haya van Someren Foundation (VVD), the Institute for Education and Cooperation in Central and Eastern Europe (D66) and the Eastern Europe Training and Education Project (GroenLinks) once again asked that the grant scheme be extended to Bosnia-Herzegovina.²¹⁴⁵ The Ministry of the Interior rejected this request because the current grant scheme was set to expire at the end of that year.²¹⁴⁶ In the course of 1996 it was decided to extend the scheme by another year, but the Ministry of the Interior still did not consider it possible to alter the existing scheme in the requested direction. In the second half of 1996 the Ministry of Foreign Affairs then proposed an ad hoc possibility for providing support to sister parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This ministry now realized that the Netherlands also needed to make a contribution to the implementation of the Dayton Agreements. A situation thus arose in which a development explicitly forbidden by the Ministry of the Interior was promoted by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.²¹⁴⁷

It is not appropriate to examine this problem further within the confines of this report, but it is still worth describing because other aspects of the West's policy too, and thus also of the Dutch government, placed such emphasis on higher-level diplomatic involvement and on military involvement while neglecting the democratic and multi-ethnic potential contained in the Bosnian and Serbian societies. If the political goal of the West was to bring about a form of ethnic division in Bosnia, as seemed to be indicated by the Cutileiro Plan, then this omission was still comprehensible up to a point. But it was less understandable for a government such as that of the Netherlands which stressed the realization of a multi-ethnic society, against the dominant political trend in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Above all because the Netherlands took such a leading role in the high-level politics and, as will be seen, thus damaged its relations with traditional (alliance) partners, while these partners would certainly not have objected to the Netherlands making its own contribution at a lower level – an opportunity which, for instance, the Eastern Europe foundations of the Dutch political parties would have provided. It is never too late or too early for such political initiatives, even if here it was just to encourage groups in Bosnia who still upheld the principle of multi-ethnicity. The success of military intervention, including peacekeeping operations, is indeed highly dependent on the political and military developments in the region itself. And in Bosnia, as soon as the first skirmishes broke out in March 1992, this were certainly not positive.

5. The start of the war

In the last full week of March, in and around the towns of Bosanski Brod in the north, Jajce and Mostar in the centre and Neum in the south of Bosnia, fighting broke out between the JNA and Serb militias on one side and Croat and Muslim militias on the other. These encounters, which sometimes ²¹⁴³ Alfred Mozer Foundation, memo Arjen Berkvens to Wim van Gelder, q.v, re 'Subsidy scheme 'General Education and Schooling of Political Functionaries in Central and Eastern Europe'.

²¹⁴⁴ Alfred Mozer Foundation, memo Arjen Berkvens to Wim van Gelder, q.v., 'Subsidy scheme 'General Education and Schooling of Political Functionaries in Central and Eastern Europe'.

²¹⁴⁵ Alfred Mozer Foundation, J.W. Wiggers to the head of the Administration and Legislation department of the Ministry of the Interior, 28/03/96.

²¹⁴⁶ Alfred Mozer Foundation, Ministry of the Interior to Eduardo Frei Foundation, 11/04/96, BW96/624.

²¹⁴⁷ Alfred Mozer Foundation, memo Arjen Berkvens to Wim van Gelder, q.v., 'Subsidy scheme 'General Education and Schooling of Political Functionaries in Central and Eastern Europe'.

involved prolonged mortar and artillery bombardments, cost dozens of lives. Fighting had already broken out at the start of the month in Bosanski Brod, an industrial town with a population of 33,000, consisting of 43 per cent Croats, 35 per cent Serbs and 12 per cent Muslims. At this time Serb fighters attempted to take a bridge over the River Sava in order to prevent troops reaching the town from Croatia. Local Croats resisted this attempt with the support of the regular Croatian Army. Following a ceasefire of several weeks the JNA and Serb militias once again opened fire, and looting took place in the Croat quarter of the town. Croats took revenge on Serbs in the nearby village of Sijekovac, resulting in several deaths and the burning of houses. On Sunday 29 March several hundred Croats and Muslims tried to flee the town during a lull in the fighting. All men aged between 18 and 55 in this group were however prevented from leaving by the Patriotic League,²¹⁴⁸ the paramilitary grouping of Bosnian Muslims (see Chapter 3).

After Karadzic had said on 31 March that those parts of the police force controlled by the Serbs would take no further orders from the Bosnian government,²¹⁴⁹ Izetbegovic mobilized the territorial defence force and the police reserve of Bosnia-Herzegovina on 4 April. Of course, he could only do this for those parts of Bosnia where Muslims and Croats held authority. By 15 April at the latest the militias, which had shot up like mushrooms all over Bosnia, should allow themselves to be incorporated into the territorial defence force. The Patriotic League was also commanded to put itself under the command of the territorial defence force. When Izetbegovic gave this mobilization order, he declared in a speech on radio: 'Citizens of Sarajevo, sleep peacefully tonight, there will be no war.' ('Narode, spavaj mirno, rata nece biti.')²¹⁵⁰ Izetbegovic had been making such statements for the past half-year,²¹⁵¹ but this time the reassuring effect failed to work. The Bosnian Serb leaders demanded that the President withdraw the order immediately. Izetbegovic refused to do this.

During this weekend members of the different ethnic groups set up barricades at various points in Sarajevo. On Sunday 5 April fighting broke out in the suburbs. Explosions were heard all over the city. Nonetheless there were still many people in the Bosnian capital who resisted the growing ethnic tensions. Following a call from the peace movement, the trade unions and the television station, between 60,000 and 100,000 demonstrators gathered in front of the Bosnian parliament to show their rejection of the nationalist parties. They demanded new elections, waved portraits of Tito and chanted slogans against the 'murderers'. But the demonstration was brutally disrupted by gunmen of the SDS, Karadzic's party, who were positioned on the roof of the Holiday Inn hotel that accommodated the headquarters of the SDS. Several demonstrators were killed. According to various observers, members of the SDA, Izetbegovic's party, also fired on the demonstrators.²¹⁵² If this is true, it was the last act in the joint dismantling by the SDS and the SDA of the desire for a pluriform society in Bosnia. Following this shooting Muslim fighters stormed the SDS headquarters in the Holiday Inn hotel, where they arrested a number of gunmen. The SDS politicians made themselves scarce. Then Bosnian Serbs bombarded the old – i.e. Muslim – quarter of the city with shells. In the night of 5/6 April the JNA, commanded by Colonel-General²¹⁵³ Milutin Kukanjac, took Sarajevo's airport.

On 7 April, the day that the European Community and the United States recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Bosnian Serb parliament decided definitively to implement the Serb Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina. This was to be based in Pale, a ski resort just outside Sarajevo. The SDS withdrew ²¹⁴⁸ 'Croaten en Islamieten ontluchten strijd Bosnië' (Croats and Muslims flee from conflict in Bosnia) de Volkskrant, 30/03/92.

²¹⁴⁹ Amnesty International, Abuse, p. 7.

²¹⁵⁰ Biography of Izetbegovic, Gale Research Company, 1996.

²¹⁵¹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 78; M. Boroagovic and S. Rustempasic, 'The white paper on Alija Izetbegovic', http://www.xs4all.nl/~frankti/Bosnian_congress/izetbegovic_white_paper.html, consulted on 17/02/00. They date a similar statement to January 1992.

²¹⁵² X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 102; VN, S/1994/674/Appendix VI, pp. 152-154; MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 136.

²¹⁵³ This is a rank comparable to lieutenant general.

its two members, Koljevic and Plavsic, from the collective presidium of Bosnia and asked all other functionaries still active in Bosnian political bodies to follow their example. As reason for their departure from the Bosnian presidium, Koljevic and Plavsic cited Izetbegovic's mobilization order for the territorial defence force. From this time onwards Koljevic and Plavsic formed the presidium of the Republika Srpska. Karadzic would first join this on 12 May and would then immediately become the de facto president of the Bosnian Serb republic. But before this was to happen, the presidium of the Republika Srpska declared on 15 April that there was an immediate threat of war and ordered mobilization of the territorial defence force throughout the territory controlled by the republic. All those subject to military service were ordered to report to the local headquarters of the territorial defence force.²¹⁵⁴

Between March and June the Bosnian Serb forces, supported by the JNA and paramilitaries from Serbia, took control of a large part of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The territorial goals of the Republika Srpska were Northern and Western Bosnia (around Banja Luka), Eastern Bosnia (the Drina Valley), Eastern Herzegovina (to the east of the River Neretva) and the Posavina Corridor. According to the 1981 census, the population mix in the north-west of Bosnia was 63% Serb, 15% Muslim and 10% Croat. Eastern Bosnia, separated by the Drina, bordered on Serbia and in the strategic planning of the Serbian military formed a buffer zone for the Serbian motherland. The Posavina, the Sava Valley, was of great strategic importance to the Serbs due to the link it provided with the Serb areas in Croatia. It has already been mentioned that talks between Croats and Serbs on a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina had failed precisely on the question of who should control this latter area, around the town of Brcko. The valley was also important because within Bosnia it was to connect the north-western and the eastern areas of the Bosnian Serbs. Fighting for possession of this valley, known as the Posavina Corridor, would continue throughout the war. Just to the north of the valley, at the start of the war, there was a small area separated from the rest of Bosnia that was held by the Croats. They knew they could rely on the support of the Patriotic League and the Green Berets. This area included the town of Bosanski Brod, on the border of Croatia and Bosnia. On 5 April the Croatian Army moved into the town.

Apart from the Sava Valley, the interests of the Bosnian Croats were located chiefly in West-Herzegovina (to the west of the Neretva). It was thus possible to divide the general spheres of interest in Herzegovina with the Serbs, with the exception of the town of Mostar which lay on the Neretva and was to be heavily contended, all the more so because the Muslims wished to control it as well. In April 1992 fighting broke out here involving all three ethnic groups. This fighting was to last almost two years. It became clear that the Croats were prepared to push through their claims in West-Herzegovina by force of arms when, at the end of March and the start of April, Croat forces operating from their stronghold in the town of Tomislavgrad (Duvno) fought for possession of the strategically important Kupres Pass (see map in Part I, Chapter 3, Section 8 of this report), where the JNA had taken up positions in the previous months. During talks between the political leaders the Serbs had in fact agreed to Croat domination of West-Herzegovina, but this area still contained many military bases and installations that the JNA was not prepared to give up without a fight. Moreover the Kupres Pass provided access to Central Bosnia, where the mix of the various ethnic groups was considerable.

The armed forces: the creation of the ABiH

On 8 April the Bosnian Croat leader Mate Boban instituted the Croat Defence Council, Hrvatsko Vijeće Obrane (HVO), as the military branch of the Croat Nationalist Party HDZ in Herceg-Bosna, the name for the part of Bosnia-Herzegovina claimed by the Croats. The HVO was a Croat militia originally consisting of soldiers who had gained their first battle experience in Croatia. Since the Bosnian government, at the start of the war, had to direct all its attention to the defence of Sarajevo, the HVO was given a free hand as long as it attacked the Bosnian Serb forces. The government in Sarajevo expected that in the course of time the HVO would place itself under the command of the Bosnian territorial defence force, but this never happened. The HVO had a strength of between 35,000 and 45,000 and could count on the support of about 15,000 troops of the regular Croatian Army, the Hrvatska Vojska (HV).²¹⁵⁵ Moreover the HVO depended heavily on the Croatian Army for its supplies. During the first six months of the war the HVO supported the still-weak Bosnian government army. Finally, the Croat armed forces also contained paramilitaries such as the Croatian Defence Force, the Hrvatske Obrambene Snage (HOS), the armed wing of the Croatian Party of Rights, the Hrvatska Stranka Prava (HSP), which wanted to see Croat territory extended to the Drina.

²¹⁵⁴ ICTY (IT-98-33), D73/9, Decision no. 03/11/92 by Presidency of the RS.

After Izetbegovic had mobilized the territorial defence force, seven of the nine regional staffs and 73 of the 109 municipal staffs declared their loyalty to his government.²¹⁵⁶ On 8 April Izetbegovic placed the leadership of the territorial defence force in the hands of Colonel Hasan Efendic, a Muslim. His appointed deputy was the Serb Jovan Divjak, while the appointed Chief of Staff and Head of Operations was the Croat Stjepan Siber. The appointment of Efendic was a blow for Sefer Halilovic, one of the leaders of the Patriotic League, who had felt that the territorial defence force should be subordinate to the Patriotic League and not the other way around. Another problem in the eyes of Halilovic was that the Patriotic League consisted mostly of supporters of the SDA, while the army was expressly Bosnian instead of being a Muslim army. As a result, members of the Patriotic League had to place themselves under the command of Serb officers who shortly before had still been on their secret arrest lists. A reconciliation between the two groups was soon achieved, however, when Halilovic was given command of the new army's Operations Centre. Other leading figures from the Patriotic League were kept happy with important posts at the Ministry of Defence.

Efendic issued an order that officers of the JNA had until 20 April to join the territorial defence force. If they did not do this they would be regarded as the enemy. In these days about a hundred officers of the JNA went over to the Bosnian armed forces.²¹⁵⁷ These included several later key players, such as the future Chief of Staff of the Bosnian Army Enver Hadzihasanovic and also Rasim Delic, at that time fairly unknown but to become the commander of the government army (the ABiH) in the summer of 1993. But generally speaking few officers shifted from the JNA to the Bosnian government, resulting in highly deficient training of the government troops in the early days.²¹⁵⁸ On 27 April Izetbegovic demanded that all federal troops should leave Bosnia.

As early as 14 April Efendic had issued instructions for the defence of the sovereignty and independence of Bosnia, including the recommendation that weapons depots should be seized and garrisons blockaded. These instructions were even more optimistic than those of the Patriotic League from the end of February (see Chapter 3). According to Efendic's instructions, the liberation of Bosnia should be achieved within 45 days at the latest.

Besides the territorial defence forces, the Patriotic League and the Zelene Beretke, the Bosnian armed forces consisted chiefly of troops of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, numbering some 30,000 men and led by Commander Dragan Vikić. On 24 April it was established that the Bosnian armed forces already numbered more than 100,000 men. However, this was not as significant as might seem because there was a serious shortage of weapons.

On 23 May Izetbegovic relieved Efendic of the command of the Bosnian armed forces, telling him that the army needed a younger commander. According to Efendic himself the real reason was that he had a Serb wife. The official explanation was that as of 20 May the territorial defence force had ceased to exist and thus also the post held by Efendic. Moreover, it was said, after almost 45 years he was entitled to a pension. On 5 July 1992 the collective presidium of Bosnia-Herzegovina announced ²¹⁵⁵ Detrez, Sloop, pp. 280-281; Calic, Krieg, p. 99.

²¹⁵⁶ The following passage on the history of the creation of the Bosnian Army is based on the serial by Sefko Hodzic, 'Kako je nastajala armija Bosnië i Hercegovine', Oslobodenje, 15/04 t/m 10/05/1997.

²¹⁵⁷ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 280.

²¹⁵⁸ Jovan Divjak, 'The First Phase, 1992-1993: struggle for survival and genesis of the Army of Bosnia-Herzegovina', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 161.

the formation of the Armija Bosne i Hercegovine (ABiH) as the sole official army force of the Bosnian state. The appointed commander was Sefer Halilovic, meaning that his dream of holding the highest position in the Bosnian armed forces had now been achieved after all. At the age of 40 Halilovic was indeed considerably younger than Efendic, but he was also much less experienced. He had never been to higher military college and he did not have a particular reputation as a strategist. According to many he thanked his appointment chiefly to his membership of the SDA.²¹⁵⁹

The ABiH rapidly developed a corps structure that was linked to at first four and later six regions. The Bosnian government army had to be built up almost from scratch, but there was a strong motivation in the population to join its ranks. As a result the Bosnian government army could be formed around the many tens of thousands of men who volunteered for service in April.²¹⁶⁰ In early 1993, according to its Deputy Commander Divjak, the army comprised around 200,000 men, not all of whom however were armed. In 1994 the government army reportedly reached a size of 250,000 men.²¹⁶¹ Gow assumes an operational size of 40,000 troops in early 1993. A year later this size had doubled, while there were then 120,000 men available in reserve.²¹⁶²

Despite the arms embargo, the ABiH managed to obtain light weapons from abroad. Furthermore an armaments industry was set up on the territory of the Bosnian government in which 15,000 people were reported to be working at the start of 1994. The materiel produced here included rifles and shells.²¹⁶³ Important armaments factories were located in Sarajevo, Gorazde, Vitez, Konjic, Zenica and Tuzla. In the two years between the start of the war and early 1994, the Bosnian government is reported to have achieved a production of 20,000 automatic rifles, 100,000 mines, 50,000 hand grenades and 11 million rounds for small arms.²¹⁶⁴ During the siege of Sarajevo, the city was even able to achieve an annual production of 40,000 82 mm mortar shells.²¹⁶⁵ However, the lack of heavy weapons would remain a constant hindrance for a more offensive strategy by the Bosnian government army.

In the course of the conflict mercenaries fought for all three parties. The Serbs received assistance chiefly from Russians, Ukrainians, Romanians and Greeks. At the start of 1993, for instance, 70 Russian specialists appear to have been active on the Serb front at Srebrenica.²¹⁶⁶ On the Croat side the foreign auxiliaries were mostly adventurers and figures of extreme right-wing persuasion. A large proportion of these came from Germany, Great Britain and Sweden.²¹⁶⁷ In Central Bosnia men from Muslim countries came to fight, and were referred to as mujaheddin. In all cases there seem to have been no more than a few hundred up to maximally 2000 persons of each nationality.²¹⁶⁸ The highest reports include 2500 Russians on the Serb side at the start of 1993²¹⁶⁹ and several thousand Iranians on the Bosnian side in the summer of 1992.²¹⁷⁰ In both cases the numbers seem to have been exaggerated as a result of war propaganda.

²¹⁵⁹ 'Bez hapsenja Radovana Karadžića i njemu slicnih definitivno se ne može očekivati nikakav napredak', Ljiljan, 12/11/97, pp. 7-9; interview A. Makar, 16/06/00 and confidential interview (5).

²¹⁶⁰ Jovan Divjak in Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 267.

²¹⁶¹ Jovan Divjak, 'The First Phase, 1992-1993: struggle for survival and genesis of the Army of Bosnia-Herzegovina', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 162.

²¹⁶² Gow, 'Forbes', p. 2.

²¹⁶³ VN, S/1994, 674/Appendix III, p. 29.

²¹⁶⁴ Calic, Krieg, p. 102.

²¹⁶⁵ Rusmir Mahmutcehajic in Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 263.

²¹⁶⁶ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 240-241.

²¹⁶⁷ Cekic, Aggression, p. 249. For the Dutch figures in this category refer to Chapter 2.

²¹⁶⁸ For divergent figures see Cekic, Aggression, p. 240; Calic, Krieg, p. 100; Dzamic, Psi, pp. 206-207; Gow, 'Year', p. 3; Vego, 'Army', p. 66; VN, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III; ABZ, 910 Yugoslavia, part 4, 'Informal meeting of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs (Gymnich) in Bocket Hall (VK), 12-13 September 1992', appendix to secure fax no. 15 from Foreign Affairs /DEU to Washington embassy, 24/09/92.

²¹⁶⁹ Cekic, Aggression, p. 241.

²¹⁷⁰ Sahara, 'World', p. 388.

The conflict around Sarajevo

In the months of April and May the defence of Sarajevo still relied to an important extent on persons with a criminal background, such as the former pop singer Musan Topalovic ('Caco'), who had become a friend of Izetbegovic during the latter's imprisonment in 1980s, Jusuf Prazina ('Juka') and Ramiz Delalic ('Celo II'), who has already been discussed due to his suspected part in the shooting of the Serbian wedding guests on 1 March. These criminals formed part of the Green Berets, which had strong links with the government in Sarajevo and the Bosnian government army (the ABiH).²¹⁷¹ However, they repeatedly committed breaches of the Geneva Convention.²¹⁷² They 'lifted' men from the streets and forced them to dig defence lines at the front. The indispensability of these criminal elements in the first months of the war made them virtually immune to the law, even when they committed acts about which the Bosnian state was less happy. They gained control, for instance, of the food supply and aid facilities in Sarajevo. Celo became commander of the 109th Mountain Brigade. Topalovic was appointed as commander of 10th Brdaska Brigade. Their units successfully defended Mount Trebevic to the south of Sarajevo, but at the same time they were notorious for their misdeeds. Topalovic intimidated the non-Muslim population of Sarajevo: he had defenceless Serbs and Croats kidnapped, tortured and murdered. Hundreds were killed in this way. Then he had the bodies of the victims dumped in Kazani, a ravine on the front line.²¹⁷³ In fact Muslims also became victims of his actions. His followers kidnapped rich residents of Sarajevo in order to extract high ransoms, they participated in extortion and they raped women. As time went on Topalovic accepted the authority of the army headquarters less and less, and heeded only the links with the SDA. Izetbegovic is said to have been a regular visitor to Caco's headquarters.²¹⁷⁴

When a new Bosnian government took office under the leadership of Prime Minister Haris Silajdzic in late 1993, with respect for human rights as a key element of its programme, figures such as Topalovic were finally dealt with. On 26 October army troops and police surrounded his headquarters. During the storming of the building 18 people were killed, including nine soldiers and policemen. Topalovic was arrested and killed the same night at the headquarters of the First Army Corps. 'Shot while attempting to escape' was the official explanation. Delalic was arrested at the same time.

Alibabic, the chief of police of Sarajevo at the time, was convinced that Izetbegovic and his party had used Topalovic to create a mono-ethnic army and a pure Muslim state.²¹⁷⁵ In 1996 Izetbegovic gave his personal permission for a ritual reburial of Topalovic, which turned into a demonstration by 25,000 people. When General Jovan Divjak protested at this display being staged for someone who had probably been responsible for the deaths of many Croats and Serbs, Izetbegovic wrote back to him that up to October 1993 he had no knowledge of the serious crimes for which Topalovic had been responsible: 'Until then I thought that all his actions had been no worse than making people dig trenches and bothering people.'²¹⁷⁶ Divjak knew that this was not true. As early as 27 May 1993 he had written the President a letter in which he summarized the crimes of Topalovic in detail. In September 1993, following the action against Delalic and Topalovic, the Minister of Internal Affairs Bakir Alispahic declared that he had been made to wait for months for top-level permission ²¹⁷¹ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.B.1.(b). For Prazina see also Hans Moleman, 'Sarajevo viert feestje bij vertrek laatste Joegoslavische militairen' (Sarajevo celebrates departure of the last Yugoslav military), de Volkskrant, 06/06/92.

²¹⁷² United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.B.1.(d).

²¹⁷³ On these practices by 'Caco' see for instance Othon Zimmermann, 'Caco', moordenaar/held', ('Caco', murderer/hero) Algemeen Dagblad, 06/12/97.

²¹⁷⁴ Othon Zimmermann, 'Caco', moordenaar/held', Algemeen Dagblad, 06/12/97.

²¹⁷⁵ Othon Zimmermann, 'Caco', moordenaar/held', Algemeen Dagblad, 06/12/97.

²¹⁷⁶ Othon Zimmermann, 'Caco', moordenaar/held', Algemeen Dagblad, 06/12/97.

before being allowed to conduct this operation.²¹⁷⁷ Prazina later went over to the HVO and was eventually discovered murdered in Belgium.²¹⁷⁸

The defenders of Sarajevo, which is situated in a valley, found themselves confronted with Serb troops who occupied most of the hills around the city from which they bombarded the city with their superior firepower. The first heavy bombardments took place on 21 April. Serb groups then began with attacks on Ilidza and Grbavica, suburbs of Sarajevo, but the defenders of the city were partially able to prevent this loss of territory.²¹⁷⁹

After heavy artillery bombardments of Sarajevo had taken place on 1 May, the following day Bosnian Serb troops penetrated into the suburbs of Sarajevo; in the weeks that followed heavy house-to-house fighting took place. The attack was carried out simultaneously with an attempt to oust Izetbegovic. He landed at Sarajevo's airport on 2 May following a visit to Lisbon and was then taken prisoner by the JNA unit stationed there. It hoped to exchange the Bosnian President for the JNA commander of Sarajevo, General Kukanjac, and 400 men of the JNA who were surrounded in their barracks in the centre of the city by troops of the territorial defence force. Weeks of negotiations had already taken place to facilitate the departure of these troops from the city, but Sefer Halilovic was only prepared to allow this if they left behind their weapons. Kukanjac was not prepared to agree to this.

At the same time there seem to have been plans to use the imprisonment of Izetbegovic to allow Fikret Abdic to take over power. Abdic was a Muslim who was known to favour an agreement with the Serbs. In the elections to the presidium in 1990 he had received more votes than Izetbegovic and was seen as a rival to the president. Abdic had however voluntarily renounced his position on the condition that Alija Delimustafic became Minister of Internal Affairs. Delimustafic was suspected of being a member of the KOS, the military counter-intelligence service of the JNA. The UNPROFOR Chief of Staff, General Mackenzie, and the representative of Lord Carrington in Sarajevo, the Irish Major Colm Doyle, were able to free President Izetbegovic from his unpleasant position in exchange for free passage for Kukanjac and his troops out of the city. Despite the agreements made by their government, Bosnian troops shot dead several JNA soldiers during their departure. In the meantime the coup against Izetbegovic had failed thanks to the efficient action of Vice-President Ganic and Minister Mahmutcehajic. Delimustafic was then compelled to resign from his ministerial post because of suspicions about his role in the matter. He left for Austria and was later not prepared to talk about the affair.²¹⁸⁰

In the following weeks the JNA tried to penetrate further into the city.²¹⁸¹ After Serb troops had fully conquered the suburb of Grbavica in mid-May, the offensive came to a stop at the Bratstvo i Jedinstvo Bridge over the River Miljacka, which flows through the centre of the city. This was due to the lack of Serb infantry. The Romanija Corps of the JNA, that was stationed around Sarajevo, had some 29,000 men available to cover a front line of 64 kilometres. This was too little to carry out an effective attack.²¹⁸² The shortage of troops among the Bosnian Serb forces was so big that they did not ²¹⁷⁷ J.F. Burns, 'New Horror for Sarajevo: Muslims Killing Muslims', The New York Times, 31/10/93.

²¹⁷⁸ See also 'Power-starved Sarajevo faces prolonged shortage', Agence France Presse, 05/01/94.

²¹⁷⁹ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Servische militia in aanval in Sarjevo', (Serb militia in attack on Sarajevo) NRC Handelsblad, 21/04/92; idem, 'Om Sarajevo wordt fel gevochten' (Fierce fighting around Sarajevo), NRC Handelsblad, 22/04/92; idem, 'Sarajevo is binnen drie dagen een luguber oord geworden' (Sarajevo becomes a dismal place within three days) and 'Nietsonziende woestheid kenmerkt strijd in Sarajevo' (Battle in Sarajevo marked by ruthless fury) NRC Handelsblad, 23/04/92; 'Moslims bij Sarajevo op de vlucht gedreven' (Muslims at Sarajevo forced to flee) NRC Handelsblad, 25/04/92; 'Servische strijders vallen Sarajevo aan' (Serb fighters attack Sarajevo) de Volkskrant, 22/04/92; "'Servische' wijk in Sarajevo onder vuur' (Serb district in Sarajevo under fire), de Volkskrant, 23/04/92.

²¹⁸⁰ Marko Attila Hoare, 'Civilian-Military Relations in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992-1995', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 184 and 186-187; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 131; Silber & Little, Death, pp. 237-238 and 243 n. 3.

²¹⁸¹ 'Sarajevo toneel van hevige straatgevechten' (Sarajevo scene of heavy street-fighting), de Volkskrant, 15/05/92.

²¹⁸² Jovan Divjak, 'The First Phase, 1992-1993: struggle for survival and genesis of the Army of Bosnia-Herzegovina', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 163-164.

have enough qualified personnel to man the artillery on the hills around the city. These specialist troops were thus forced to shift from position to position.

The failed attack on Sarajevo rendered the Bosnian Serb forces unwilling to undertake house-to-house fighting against Muslims for the rest of the war. The forces around Sarajevo thus mainly confined themselves for the next three-and-a-half years to weakening the population through a state of siege and artillery bombardment. On the other hand the government army saw no opportunity to break through the surrounding Serb forces on the hills, so the result was a stalemate leading to miserable conditions for the population, who also had to reckon with mortar and artillery bombardments and also sniper fire. It should be mentioned that during the siege the population of Sarajevo continued to comprise a large proportion of Serbs and Croats. In the meantime the Bosnian Serb leaders pressed for agreements for a permanent division of the city, either by means of a green line as in Nicosia, or by means of a wall such as the one that until recently had divided Berlin in two.

6. Ethnic cleansing in Bosnia

While the attention of the West was mostly directed towards the developments around the capital Sarajevo, there was considerable activity by Serb paramilitary groups elsewhere in Bosnia in the months from April through to June. Serb paramilitaries were chiefly active in the north-west and east of Bosnia, in towns such as Brcko, Dobo, Prijedor, Bratunac, Bijeljina, Foca, Visegrad and Zvornik. They allowed journalists and representatives of international aid organizations to enter the areas where they were operating only in very small numbers. Since telephone and telex links were also interrupted, the media had to rely mostly on accounts by Displaced Persons and they could present news only with delay and great caution. Insofar as news did emerge, to begin with it was mostly from Eastern Bosnia.

Bosnian Serb crisis staffs or war councils were set up in all towns in East and Northwest-Bosnia; these usually consisted of the chief of police, the commander of the local military unit and the head of the SDS. They had often been able to acquire the weapons of the local police and/or the territorial defence force, thus enabling them to act against the Croat and Muslim population in their town and the surrounding villages. Furthermore the practice became established whereby local political leaders invited, or even paid, paramilitaries such as Arkan to act in their municipality, possibly in cooperation with the local Serb militia.²¹⁸³

Despite such local initiatives the actions by these paramilitary groups were primarily concerted by political and military authorities. Research has repeatedly shown that this was not a matter of independently operating, local warlords, as was often thought in the West. These paramilitaries could indeed be seen to operate within the existing power relationships.²¹⁸⁴ Insofar as concretely established the signs point towards Belgrade, and in particular to President Milosevic.²¹⁸⁵ The Serb paramilitary units were correspondingly deployed mostly in the areas claimed by the Serbs, but where they still encountered large groups of Muslims or Croats, and in the area where the Serbs needed to create a continuous region between Serbia and the Serbian centres in Croatia.

In Bosnia the ethnic cleansing took two forms. First of all the classical method, already described, which had already applied in Croatia before and which aimed to put the population of a certain place to flight within days, if not hours. In addition there was a slower variant, used in three types of situation. Firstly, in places where the Serbs had come to power relatively easily, from within the local community. From their positions of power they exerted gradual pressure to make the Muslim population leave. Secondly, Croats or Muslims were sometimes so many in number that a rapid Serb cleansing was impossible. And thirdly, the Serbs knew all too well that it would be unwise to apply open, large-scale cleansing when the eyes of the world were upon them. An example of the slow variant was provided by Banja Luka, where the SDS had come to power through a local coup. After this the process went roughly as described. To begin with Muslim men were dismissed from positions of authority and later from every independent position. Moreover, Muslims were called up to serve in the Bosnian Serb army. When they refused to enlist they were dismissed from their job. Since the job was often linked to an apartment or house – a legacy of the Communist past – those who refused military service not only lost their job but the home for their family as well. Sometimes at this stage people ‘disappeared’, either murdered or sent to camps. Possessions such as cars were confiscated.

²¹⁸³ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, I.C and I.D and 1.D.2.

²¹⁸⁴ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III; Archive PR New York, Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, Statement by Mr. Cornelio Sommaruga, Saving Lives in Bosnia-Herzegovina, 03/10/92, appendix to ICRC to Permanent Representative to the UN, 03/10/92; Calic, Krieg, pp. 104-105.

²¹⁸⁵ See for instance Seselj, quoted in Silber & Little, Death, p. 223; ABZ, 999.21, Part 74, Hoekman 323 to Van den Broek, 10/06/92; ABZ, 910, Yugoslavia general correspondence, part 4, Jul'92-Feb'93. Deputy CdP Washington to head DEU, 13/08/92, PA-117681.

A good illustration is provided by the decision taken by the Serb war council in the small town of Celinac near Banja Luka in September 1992. It imposed a curfew of 4pm to 6am on non-Serbs. The decree also forbade them to gather in catering establishments and other public places; to bathe and swim in rivers; to hunt and to fish; to move to another town without permission; to carry a weapon; to travel by car; to gather in groups of more than three people; to have contact with relations outside the town; to use any communication resources other than the telephone at the post office; to wear uniform; and to make property transactions without permission.²¹⁸⁶

The case of Banja Luka proved that the slow variant of cleansing could also be effective: at the end of 1993 just 40,000 Muslims were still there compared to the 350,000 who had lived there before the war.²¹⁸⁷ In both kinds of cleansing the Bosnian Serb aggressors often forced the Croats and Muslims before their departure to sign declarations that they were leaving their homes voluntarily and waiving ownership of all possessions that they left behind.²¹⁸⁸

Even more than had been the case in Croatia, the streams of Displaced Persons that appeared in Bosnia in April and May were not a side-effect of the war but rather the intentionally achieved result, because the Bosnian Serbs were trying to ‘cleanse’ areas of Muslims and Croats. Men and women were often separated from one another during the cleansing actions. Men in particular were often held for shorter or longer periods in camps, schools, sports halls and many other temporary detention centres. The conditions under which this took place were often appalling. There was a shortage of food, water, hygiene and space, people were mistreated, tortured, murdered, and there was sexual abuse particularly of women.²¹⁸⁹

In April and May the JNA, paramilitaries and militias together drove the Muslims out of virtually all of Eastern Bosnia, from the towns Bijeljina, Zvornik, Bratunac, Visegrad and Foca. Ultimately enclaves remained around Srebrenica, Zepa, Cerska and Gorazde, where Displaced Persons from the surrounding areas sought refuge. A brief summary is given below of the events in several East-Bosnian towns in the month of April. The cleansing actions in Northwest-Bosnia are dealt with in the following chapter.

On 1 April Arkan entered Bijeljina in the north-east of Bosnia with his unit. This town of about 100,000 inhabitants had a population made up of almost 60 per cent Serbs and more than 30 per cent Muslims. Arkan’s Guard, which now comprised more than a thousand men, had been renamed the Arkan Tigers because they kept a live tiger as a mascot.²¹⁹⁰ In Bijeljina the Arkanovci started the process ²¹⁸⁶ Anna Husarska, ‘Dateline Banja Luka: City of Fear’, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 74.

²¹⁸⁷ Cigar, Genocide, p. 58.

²¹⁸⁸ See for instance R. Gutman, ‘Ethnic Cleansing? Yugoslavs try to deport 1,800 Muslims to Hungary’, Newsday, 03/07/92; ‘UN: Serbs Press Point. 200,000 Bosnians imperiled’, Newsday, 20/08/92; Marjolein Sebregts, ‘Vannacht waren het er tien’ (‘Last night there were ten’) Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 29; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 268; Maass, Neighbor, pp. 9 and 87.

²¹⁸⁹ See for instance the amended indictment from the ICTFY of 13/07/98 against Dragoljub Kunarac with regard to Foca, <http://www.un.org/icty/indictment/english/kun1ai980819e.htm>, consulted on 10/03/00.

²¹⁹⁰ This is illustrated in Haviv, Blood, p. 71.

of ethnic cleansing in Bosnia with the execution of 27 Muslims on 1 April.²¹⁹¹ Following the cleansing the Arkan Tigers could expect their reward in the form of mass looting. Reports of the execution of the 27 Muslims prompted Izetbegovic to send Biljana Plavsic to the town to institute an investigation. Instead of doing this she gave her notorious kiss to Arkan and praised him as a true Serb hero. After the Arkanovci had carried out their dirty work with the approval of the JNA, they left the town in the hands of the local SDS committee, which continued the repression against the remaining Muslims so that they too ultimately fled.

At the end of March units of Seselj had already arrived in Zvornik, a town on the Drina where the population was over 60 per cent Muslim.²¹⁹² The town occupied a strategic position on both the Belgrade-Sarajevo line and the Belgrade-Tuzla line. Seselj's men warned the Muslims in the town and the immediate surroundings that they had ten days to hand in their weapons. On 7 April units of Seselj, accompanied by some of Arkan's men and the Beli Orlovi, Draganovci and a large number of smaller groups, arrived in the neighbouring village of Grbavci, where they killed Muslims who had not handed in their weapons. The next day the JNA, together with paramilitary units and supported by the Serb territorial defence force, attacked Zvornik; during the fighting it was not possible to make any clear distinctions between the groups. A Muslim unit managed to defend the town for several days but was unable, partly due to lack of ammunition, to withstand the artillery bombardments, mostly coming from tanks on the Serbian side of the Drina.

Following the fall of Zvornik the paramilitary groups were given a free hand while the JNA kept the town surrounded.²¹⁹³ The paramilitary groups were reportedly led by Marko Pavlovic, who was reported to be a member of the Serbian state security service. The Arkanovci committed the most crimes. Torture, rape and murder were the order of the day for more than a week. Houses of Muslims were plundered and then set on fire. Jose Maria de Mendiluce, the highest representative of UNHCR in the region, arrived in Zvornik while the Serb paramilitaries held sway and described later what he observed: 'I saw kids put under the treads of tanks, placed there by grown men, and then run over by other grown men (...) Everywhere, people were shooting. The fighters were moving through the town, systematically killing all the Muslims they could get their hands on. It was an intoxication (...)'.²¹⁹⁴ In the following weeks too, until July, serious mistreatment of Muslims continued incidentally in and around Zvornik, this time mostly by Seselj's Cetniks. The remaining Muslims were then deported, either to Serbia or to the Muslim area around Tuzla.

On 5 April the first shells were fired at the more southerly Visegrad, a town of 20,000 inhabitants with a Muslim majority. On the same day helicopters of the JNA landed there. The next day Arkanovci attacked the town together with the Uzice Corps of the JNA, Seselj's Cetniks, Beli Orlovi and local Serbs. At the same time a member of the Patriotic League threatened to blow up the dam on the Drina near Visegrad.²¹⁹⁵ Muslims then fled in panic, for fear both of the Serb paramilitaries and a flood, while the Serbs headed for higher ground. On 14 April units of the Uzice Corps entered the town, after which the SDS took over government of the municipality. The Muslims were encouraged to return; the JNA would guarantee their safety and President Izetbegovic had ordered that the dam should be left intact. Many Muslims followed this call and, with the exception of a few whose names were on Serb lists, were allowed back into the town. After this peace seemed gradually to return to Visegrad. At the end of May, however, the JNA started a gradual withdrawal. Then paramilitary groups arrived in the ²¹⁹¹ Shocking photographs of the action of the Arkan Tigers in Bijeljina in: Haviv, Blood, pp.56-61. For more information about the events in Bijeljina see Duijzings' Appendix, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

²¹⁹² For a report on the events around Zvornik see Ludwig Boltzmann Institute, "Operations". See also Sremac, War, p. 95 and Duijzings' Appendix, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

²¹⁹³ Williams & Cigar, III.B.2; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2 (Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, III.C, Anticevci; Captain Dragan units; Dusan the Great; Cetniks led by Dragan Ignjatovic, Ljubisav, and Mile Mijatovic; Paramilitary Forces from Padinska Skela; White Eagles (Beli Orlovi); IV.A.46.

²¹⁹⁴ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 200. For more observations by Mendiluce in Zvornik see Silber & Little, Death, p. 223 town again, including men who seem to have been from the Uzice Corps but had changed uniforms. Mass murders, looting and arson then followed. Part of the population was deported or killed in concentration camps.²¹⁹⁶

²¹⁹⁵ Medina Delalic, 'SDA Strategy: Low Blows', Slobodna Bosna, 20/04/00.

On 16 April, following days of bombardment by the Uzice Corps of the JNA, Serb units took Foca, a town where the numbers of Muslims (51.6%) and Serbs (45.3%) had been virtually balanced up to then. Following the fall of the town, paramilitaries conducted large-scale plundering. A few days later, when foreign aid providers were allowed to visit the battered town, they wondered where the population had gone.²¹⁹⁷ The place resembled a ghost town.²¹⁹⁸ The Serbs, who were now in control after the capture of the town, had killed the local elite and everyone whom they believed to be a member of the SDA. The Muslims who had been unable to flee were captured, the men and women separated and interned in separate camps. In the meantime the town had ceased to be called Foca and had been renamed Srbinje.

On 6 and 7 May Serb troops took the town of Brcko without much resistance. They herded the non-Serb men together and issued verdicts on them during 'trials' lasting a few minutes. Hundreds of men are said to have been killed in this way.²¹⁹⁹ So just a month after the start of the war the Serbs had conquered Brcko and the nearby village of Doboij, meaning they had created a corridor between the Serb areas in Northwest-Bosnia and Eastern Bosnia. In mid-May however this corridor came under heavy attack from Croat and Muslim forces, after which only a narrow strip remained.

New administrative constellations in Bosnia

At about the same time, on 6 May, Karadzic and Boban made territorial agreements on Bosnia-Herzegovina during a meeting in the Austrian town of Graz: Serbs and Croats were to divide up Bosnia and leave only a small part of the republic to the Muslims.²²⁰⁰ However, a definitive agreement once again failed to materialize due to disagreement on the Posavina Corridor, the ownership of Mostar and the border between the Serb and Croat areas in Herzegovina.²²⁰¹ The talks between the Croat and Serb leaders of Bosnia were not however without significance. When in mid-May the defenders of Sarajevo made an attempt to attack the Serb troops in the rear at Ilidza, they found that a Croat unit stationed at Kiseljak stood in their way.

The Croats were well aware that they held a key position in the conflict and were prepared to enter into frequently changing alliances. On 21 May representatives of Croatia and Bosnia signed a political and military cooperation agreement in Zagreb. The Bosnian Croats of the HDZ accepted the political hegemony of Izetbegovic, in exchange for which the SDA accepted the presence of the military arm of the HDZ, the HVO, on a large part of Bosnian territory. This agreement was followed by a defence pact on 18 June and a treaty of friendship and cooperation on 21 July 1992. All this did not prevent the Bosnian Croat leaders from declaring their own 'Croat Community of Herceg-Bosna' with its capital in Mostar. Mate Boban became the head of this new autonomous area, within which Boban and his followers exerted authority over army, police and education. The region had its own flag ²¹⁹⁶ Esad Hecimovic, 'Na Haskoj potjernici nema Milana Lukica zlocinca odgovornog za brutalna ubistva vise od 3.000 Bosnjaka iz Visegrada', Ljiljan, 28/05/97, p. 33.

²¹⁹⁷ 'Foca met de grond gelijk gemaakt' (Foca razed to the ground), NRC Handelsblad, 21/04/92.

²¹⁹⁸ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 90.

²¹⁹⁹ United States Senate, Ethnic Cleaning, p. 7.

²²⁰⁰ X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker & Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 102; Caroline de Gruyter, 'In Croatia is iedereen goed' (In Croatia everyone is good), Elsevier, 08/08/92, pp. 32-33; Sremac, War, p. 99.; Vjera Bogati, 'Serbs and Croats hatched deal on fate of Mostar', IWPR's Tribunal Update no. 240, Part II, October 15-20, 2001.

²²⁰¹ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 282; Kumar, Divide, p. 55; Glenny, Fall, p. 194; Ulrike Rudberg, 'Leiders Croaten en Serviërs verdelen gebieden in Bosnië' (Croat and Serb leaders divide up areas in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 09/05/92; Peter Michielsen, 'Lot Bosnië al bezegeld door geheim akkoord' (Fate of Bosnia already sealed by secret agreement), NRC Handelsblad, 13/05/92.

which was derived from the Croatian one and the residents used the kuna, the Croatian currency. The Bosnian Croats viewed this development as a step towards separation from Bosnia; in many respects the area functioned thereafter as a part of Croatia.

In this time the HVO experienced a large influx of recruits from the Bosnian Muslims who lived in the area it controlled. An important part of this recruitment took place, with the knowledge of the government, through the Muslim organization Zmaj od Bosne (Dragon of Bosnia). In Hercegovina the proportion of Muslims in the HVO was the lowest (20 per cent), in Central-Bosnia it was 40 per cent and in the Posavina area it was no less than 80 per cent. Conversely, at the start of June 1992 the Bosnian territorial defence forces, shortly before they were converted into the Bosnian government army, consisted of 18 per cent Croats and 12 per cent Serbs.

Elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia too, issues of new authority and administration were being dealt with. On 10 December the Badinter Commission had declared that Yugoslavia was in a state of dissolution. Serbia and Montenegro, however, had not submitted a request for recognition to the EC as had the four other former republics, namely Bosnia-Hercegovina, Croatia, Macedonia and Slovenia, in December 1991. Indeed, Serbia and Montenegro took the position that instead of the Federation of Yugoslavia being dissolved, they were in fact continuing it, while the other republics had seceded. The background to this situation was the issue of who would get the assets of the Yugoslavian State. If Serbia and Montenegro were together to be regarded as the legal successor of Yugoslavia, then they would be entitled to the corresponding possessions. The same would however not apply, if Milosevic had his way, to the liabilities: according to the regime in Belgrade, the issue of the state debts should be handled by a commission set up to oversee the distribution of these among the former parts of Yugoslavia. Furthermore Serbia and Montenegro, as the legal successor to Yugoslavia, could continue to occupy the position in international organizations previously held by that country. Moreover, Serbia and Montenegro, by not asking the EC for recognition, had prevented conditions being set for them with regard to the protection of minorities – conditions that the other republics had had to satisfy.

If the idea of a continuation of the State of Yugoslavia, albeit in a more modest form, were to be abandoned and it were to be assumed that Yugoslavia had disintegrated, then the six former republics should have issued a claim for the division of the possessions of the dissolved federation. In that case Serbia and Montenegro, possibly jointly, would have to reapply for a place in international organizations. This question of state succession was a thorny problem which the EC preferred to leave well alone. The ministers of the community thus took the position that the parties involved should solve it for themselves during the Yugoslavia Conference. They still had no desire to undertake ‘derecognition’, the reverse action to recognition. In a certain sense it actually suited the EC that the issue was unresolved. As long as there was something resembling a central Yugoslavian authority, they could retain their ambassadors in Belgrade and maintain contacts with the Yugoslavian mission to the UN in New York.²²⁰²

Following the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia by the European Community, the Milosevic regime had in the meantime decided to establish a ‘new’ or ‘third’ Yugoslavia which would consist of at least Serbia and Montenegro. Milosevic and his supporters said at that time that they hoped all of Bosnia too would form part of the ‘third’ Yugoslavia. If not, then in any case they wanted the ‘Serb’ parts of Bosnia to form part of it.²²⁰³ On 27 April 1992 the federal assembly of the former Socialist Federation of Yugoslavia accepted the constitution for a new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to comprise Serbia and Montenegro. The new federation claimed to be the successor to the old Yugoslavia and to take that country’s place in international organizations. In Serbia and Montenegro this was referred to as a third Yugoslavia.

²²⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00083. Van den Broek to embassy in Belgrade, 17/03/92, celer 045.

²²⁰³ Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Servië reageert voorzichtig op erkenning rivalen’ (Serbia responds cautiously to recognition of rivals), de Volkskrant, 17/01/92; idem, ‘Serviërs gekant tegen referendum in Bosnië’ (Serbs set against referendum in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 24/01/92.

7. The response of the international community

The large majority of the international community did not however recognize the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) as the legal successor to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). On 11 May the foreign ministers of the EC stated that Serbia was the major aggressor in Bosnia and that withdrawal of federal troops from Bosnia-Herzegovina was a condition for, at the least, reducing the bloodshed. The EC states decided to withdraw their ambassadors from Belgrade until further notice, and shortly after this the United States, Norway, Sweden and Austria followed suit. The EC ministers also proposed suspending Yugoslavia as a member of the CSCE. This move was not taken for the time being due to the opposition of Russia but the CSCE did decide shortly afterwards to exclude Serbia, which held the Yugoslavian seat at this organization, from participation in the decision-making on the crisis in the former Yugoslavia until the end of June. Furthermore the EC ministers threatened further economic sanctions and the exclusion of Yugoslavia from other international organizations. The position taken by the EC ministers meant international isolation of the regime in Belgrade. After this a total freeze on diplomatic relations was repeatedly mooted. The Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs was not in favour of this, however, chiefly because the military attaché in Belgrade was a useful contact for the Ministry of Defence and the intelligence services, and his presence was also important for the Dutch UNPROFOR troops.²²⁰⁴

On 4 July the Badinter Commission declared that the process of dissolution in which the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had been engaged in was now at an end. In other words, the FRY could not be the legal successor to the SFRY, because this no longer existed. There was thus no continuity and the FRY could thus also not take the place of the old Yugoslavia in international organizations. On 22 September the General Assembly of the United Nations was to accept Resolution 47/1 which also established and declared that if the FRY wished to form part of the organs of the UN it must submit a corresponding request.²²⁰⁵ Nevertheless, even after this the EC countries decided to maintain their embassies in Belgrade and the Yugoslavian embassies in their own capitals for practical reasons, to enable contacts with the 'new Yugoslavia'.²²⁰⁶

The actions of the Serbs in Bosnia had thus, in a little over a month since the outbreak of the war, led to a hardening of the EC's attitude towards Serbia. Until shortly before, events had seemed likely to take a different course. All the efforts of the EC and the US seemed in fact to be aimed at keeping the Belgrade regime happy. During the General Council in Luxembourg on 6 April the French Foreign Minister Dumas, against the will of Genscher but with the support of Van den Broek, had arranged for the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina to be accompanied by efforts to lift the sanctions against Serbia. The French line was intended to prevent an isolation of Serbia, because this would only encourage Serbia to intervene on the side of the Serbs in Bosnia.²²⁰⁷ It was only by linking the lifting of sanctions to a number of strict conditions that Genscher, who was spending his last days as Foreign Minister, was able to prevent the implementation of this plan.²²⁰⁸ At the end of April the head of the ECMM mission also stressed the need to 'dose' the international pressure on Serbia: too much would be counterproductive and lead to a 'fortress mentality' that would make Serbia even more intractable for the international community.²²⁰⁹

In mid-April the American Principal Assistant to the Secretary of State, Johnson, had travelled to Sarajevo. Izetbegovic asked him for NATO air attacks against Bosnian Serb positions. But Johnson ²²⁰⁴ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Report of the interdepartmental meeting on possibilities for strengthening sanctions against the FRY on 20/01/93.

²²⁰⁵ On this issue see for instance Jovanovic, 'Status'.

²²⁰⁶ See for instance ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Engels 293 to Van den Broek, 30/09/92; coreu The Hague, 07/10/92, cpe/hag 609.

²²⁰⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00083. Van den Broek 59 to embassy in Belgrade, 07/04/92.

²²⁰⁸ Folkert Jensma, 'EG erkent Bosnië, maar stelt besluit over Macedonië uit' (EC recognizes Bosnia but postpones decision on Macedonia), NRC Handelsblad, 07/04/92.

²²⁰⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00083. Van den Broek 067 to embassy in Belgrade, 29/04/92.

told the Bosnian president that he should not expect military intervention from external parties.²²¹⁰ Shortly after this, in Belgrade on 19 April, Johnson told Milosevic that the American government was prepared to consider recognition of Serbia and Montenegro as the state of Yugoslavia, on the condition that Belgrade would refrain from supporting and approving the aggression in Bosnia. If Belgrade continued to do this, then the United States would make efforts to isolate Milosevic's regime politically and economically.²²¹¹ The response was far from encouraging. General Zivota Panic, who was to succeed Adzic a few weeks later as Chief of Staff, told him that Serbia had 'borne the Turkish yoke' for five centuries, 'so it can certainly stand a little isolation'.²²¹²

At the start of the war in Bosnia the EC (and the US as well) thus had to change its policy within the space of a few weeks and shift to a course that shortly before had been rejected as counterproductive. According to Van Walsum isolation was now the only weapon that the international community had and moreover the only weapon to which Milosevic was sensitive.²²¹³ Another remaining option, of course, was the deployment of an international force in Bosnia. As described, for budgetary reasons the UN Secretariat had no desire to send a peacekeeping force to Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek continued however to urge UN planning in this direction, with an eye to eventualities in Bosnia. He requested the Dutch Permanent Representative in New York, Van Schaik, to consult on this with his colleagues from the other EC member states and from the US. Moreover the Dutch minister hoped that the presence of the UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo would exert a moderating influence on the parties.²²¹⁴

One of the reasons for locating the headquarters there was to take up a neutral position between Zagreb and Belgrade. Besides this, Sarajevo was viewed as safe. However, almost immediately after establishing the headquarters in Sarajevo the leadership of UNPROFOR found itself in the midst of fighting. 'It was the only known case in military history', wrote the British war reporter Martin Bell ironically, 'where a headquarters staff received messages of sympathy and concern from the front-line troops in the field.'²²¹⁵ In the meantime UNPROFOR had no mandate to intervene in the situation in Bosnia. The situation was to some extent comparable to the one previously experienced by the ECMM headquarters in Zagreb, which was also set up outside the actual conflict zone and which suddenly found itself in the middle of a conflict for which it had no mandate.

On 7 April the UN Under-Secretary-General Goulding announced in discussions with the Security Council that the United Nations was considering increasing its involvement in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Three days later in Geneva the Bosnian Foreign Minister Haris Silajdzic asked Boutros-Ghali to send peacekeeping troops to Bosnia. However, the UN Secretary-General told Silajdzic that he would do better to ask the EC; the United Nations wanted to confine itself to the peacekeeping operation in Croatia. A few days later Izetbegovic repeated the request to Goulding, after the ceasefire arranged by the EC had immediately been broken. Notably, Izetbegovic declared on this occasion that he once more advocated a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina into cantons. His only special requirement here was that the accompanying map be drawn by experts from abroad.²²¹⁶ In the following weeks it appeared that Boutros-Ghali had little desire to send a UN peacekeeping force without a clear mandate into an area where peace had not been achieved.²²¹⁷

On 23 and 24 April the Security Council convened for consultations on the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This took place following formal requests by Algeria and Austria and calls by Germany, ²²¹⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 197.

²²¹¹ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 198.

²²¹² Ian Traynor, 'The bloody agony of Bosnia', The Guardian, 25/04/92.

²²¹³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00083. Van den Broek 144 to embassy in Moscow, 14/05/92.

²²¹⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00143. Van den Broek to Van Schaik, 04/03/92, celer 54.

²²¹⁵ Bell, Way, p. 24.

²²¹⁶ VN, S/23836.

²²¹⁷ Unclassified State Department report, appendix 13. The Charge of the Light Blue Brigade: UNPROFOR First Deploys Fall-Winter 1992, p. 1.

the Netherlands and the Organization of the Islamic Conference.²²¹⁸ The Security Council passed a declaration by its chairman in which all parties were called upon to observe the ceasefire of 12 April and support was expressed for the mediation efforts of the EC, which were now being undertaken by Carrington and Cutileiro.²²¹⁹ A fact-finding report by Vance on 24 April did indeed establish a serious deterioration of the situation in Bosnia, but at the same time remarked that in view of the limited resources of the UN and the widespread nature of the violence a UN peacekeeping operation in Bosnia was impossible. Boutros-Ghali supported this position.²²²⁰ Nonetheless Boutros-Ghali made a gesture by announcing that as per 1 May, 41 UN observers would be sent to the Bosnian towns of Medjugorje, Mostar, Stolac and Trebinje, although earlier plans had provided for this only once the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia had been demilitarized.²²²¹ In a conversation with Mitterrand the UN Secretary-General also promised to discuss with the Security Council the possibility of sending observers who would investigate the possible deployment of a peacekeeping force.²²²²

At the start of May Goulding and his colleague Shashi Tharoor visited Belgrade, Sarajevo and Zagreb. The emphasis of their visit came to rest on the deteriorating conditions in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Around this time the ECMM observers left Bosnia because their safety was in danger. The UNPROFOR Commander Nambiar explained to Goulding and Tharoor that he was now hardly in a position to lead the operation in Croatia because he and his staff were almost fully occupied with the problems in Bosnia. Moreover the freedom of movement of the staff was seriously curtailed by the bombardments.²²²³ He wished to transfer his headquarter to Belgrade or Zagreb. The Deputy Commander Morillon advocated that in this case a symbolic presence should still be maintained in Sarajevo.²²²⁴ At the end of his visit Goulding indicated that he did not currently see a role for the United Nations in Bosnia, because the UN was already stretched to its limits. According to him the EC should take a more active role. Goulding was also not in favour of a symbolic presence of UN troops who would have the task of protecting humanitarian missions in Bosnia, which were subject to considerable risks.²²²⁵

Following this report, on 12 May Boutros-Ghali told the Security Council that although the situation was 'tragic, dangerous, violent and confused' it was not suitable for peacekeeping, because the required agreement of the parties was lacking and thus a workable mandate was not possible.²²²⁶ Three days later however, on the urging of Belgium, France and Great Britain, the Security Council empowered the Secretary-General through Resolution 752 to once again investigate whether a peacekeeping force could be sent to Bosnia. He was also asked to look for ways of protecting humanitarian convoys. In the same resolution the Security Council called on the JNA to withdraw from the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This also applied to 'elements of the Croatian Army'. Finally, all irregular forces in Bosnia should be dissolved and disarmed. In the view of Boutros-Ghali, Resolution 752 marked the start of the disaster of the UN's Bosnian adventure.²²²⁷ On 30 May he again attempted ²²¹⁸ Owen CD-ROM, Statement by the President of the Security Council, 24/04/92. see also J.M. Bik, 'Duits-Nederlands voorstel voor VN-overleg over Bosnië' (German-Dutch proposal for UN consultation on Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 24/04/92.

²²¹⁹ United Nations Department of Public Information, United Nations, pp. 9-10.

²²²⁰ VN, S23836. For the rejection of a peacekeeping force by Vance and his arguments see also Neso Djuric, 'Vance: No peacekeeping troops for Bosnia', UPI, BC Cycle, 15/04/92.

²²²¹ 'EG-missie onder vuur' (EC mission under fire), Trouw, 23/04/92; ABZ, 00143, Van Schaik 387 to Van den Broek, 22/04/92; VN, S/23900.

²²²² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00143. Dossier note by DPV/PZ regarding 231^{ste} CoPo, Lisbon, 06 and 07/05/92, 28/04/92.

²²²³ UN, S/23900.

²²²⁴ Morillon, Croire, p. 42.

²²²⁵ ABZ, Communications Archive, coreu of EG chairman Portugal, 12/05/92, cpe pres lis 955. see also Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.) Conflict, p. 312; Theo Engelen, 'Voorlopig geen vredesmacht VN naar Bosnië' (No UN peacekeepers to Bosnia for the time being), NRC Handelsblad, 07/05/92; 'Toestand Bosnië uitzichtloos' (Bosnian situation hopeless), Trouw, 11/05/92.

²²²⁶ UN, S/23900.

²²²⁷ Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 40.

to convince the Security Council that the dissolution and disarming of the irregular forces in Bosnia was only possible within the framework of a general political solution for Bosnia. If this did not come about, then an international military force would have to take on the job.²²²⁸

In the meantime, the UNPROFOR headquarters had left Sarajevo in two convoys on 16 and 17 May. A little less than a hundred soldiers, mostly French but also with a few Dutch troops, stayed behind. They continued to offer mediation to the warring factions, to supervise the exchange of imprisoned, wounded or dead soldiers and to undertake other humanitarian tasks.

In order to preserve impartiality Nambiar promised that from now on the UNPROFOR headquarters would alternate between Belgrade and Zagreb, starting in Belgrade. The UNPROFOR headquarters thus set itself up in this city. But after sanctions had been announced against Serbia at the end of May and the diplomatic staff in Belgrade had been reduced, the UN Secretariat no longer found it wise for UNPROFOR to remain in Belgrade. Firstly the UN Secretariat felt that UNPROFOR would seem weak if it continued there at full strength while most of the ambassadors had departed, and moreover it feared reprisals against the UNPROFOR headquarters. Nambiar was therefore directed to relocate to Zagreb, which was done at the end of July.²²²⁹

On 22 May the United Nations recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina as its 177th member state (Resolution 46/237 of the General Assembly). With the resolution of 15 May and the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina as a member state the United Nations took the position that the war in Bosnia was an international conflict, with the aggression in fact originating from the regime in Belgrade. All following UN resolutions would continue this line of reasoning. As already remarked, the UN did not however take the next logical step, namely lifting the arms embargo against the new state to enable it to defend itself against an armed attack. Not to mention the possibility that the UN might go so far as to take on a trusteeship for Bosnia, as was also advocated at the time.²²³⁰

8. The 'withdrawal' of the JNA, the creation of the VRS and the rise of Mladic

As shown in Chapter 3, Milosevic and his right-hand man Borisav Jovic had already realized as early as the end of 1991 that, as soon as Bosnia became independent, the JNA would be regarded as an aggressor. Consequently in December of that year preparations were conducted on Milosevic's orders to ensure that 85 per cent of the JNA personnel was comprised of Bosnian Serbs. This enabled a withdrawal on paper. On 8 May Lieutenant General Adzic, the interim Minister of Defence since the departure of Kadijevic, signed an order for the restructuring of the JNA in Bosnia-Herzegovina. A new army was to be created in the Republika Srpska: Vojaska Republike Srpske (VRS). The joint chiefs of staff of this Bosnian Serb army were: Lieutenant General Mladic, who became chairman; Major General Manojlo Milovanovic, Chief of Staff; Major General Milan Gvero, Assistant Chief of Staff for Morale and Information; Major General Djordje Dukic, Assistant Chief of Staff for Logistics; Colonel Zdravko Tolimir, Head of Security; and Colonel Mico Grubor, Head of Mobilization.

This order was one of Adzic's last acts. Together with 37 other generals and (vice) admirals he was dismissed at almost the same moment. His successor as Chief of Staff was General Zivota Panic, who, unlike his predecessors, was no longer to be Minister of Defence as well. This post was now taken by a civilian. All these measures were intended to strengthen Milosevic's hold on the JNA and to remove the last attachments to Yugoslavia, still represented under the generals.

On 19 May 1992 the JNA officially withdrew from Bosnia-Herzegovina, but only 14,000 men left Bosnia.²²³¹ As planned, the federal army left behind 85 per cent of its officers and troops, amounting to some 75,000 men. The same applied to its equipment and supplies: about a thousand pieces of heavy artillery, 300 to 400 tanks, almost the same number of armoured vehicles, 35 aircraft, 21

²²²⁸ Review of International Affairs, (1992)1005-6(1 June/1 July), p. 14; Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 41.

²²²⁹ Morillon, Croire, pp. 87-88.

²²³⁰ see Sharp, Balkans, pp. 2 and 12.

²²³¹ Vego, Federal Army, p. 445.

helicopters and air defence systems.²²³² Thanks to the legacy of the JNA in Bosnia the Bosnian Serbs gained a major material advantage which they could maintain because the arms embargo imposed by the international community prevented the Bosnian government from redressing the balance.

Following the 'withdrawal' of the JNA from Bosnia the federal armed forces were definitively renamed the Army of Yugoslavia (Vojaska Jugoslavije, VJ). Milosevic declared on television that Serbia was not in a state of war and that not a single soldier who was a citizen of Serbia was to be found outside the Serbian borders. Meanwhile the obituary notices of soldiers killed outside Serbian territory told a different story.²²³³ Milosevic was later to admit to Morillon that parts of the Serbian army remained active in Bosnia until May 1995.²²³⁴ The first strategic echelon of the new Yugoslavian army was correspondingly reported to be active on both banks of the Drina.²²³⁵ These were mostly several smaller units of the VJ, such as the 66th and 82nd Parachute Brigades.²²³⁶ Furthermore both Serbia and Montenegro continued to provide logistical and medical support as well as intelligence to the VRS. An integrated air defence system also remained in service between Serbia and the Serb parts of Bosnia.²²³⁷ Even the command structure linking the VJ and the VRS would never fully disappear.²²³⁸ Promotions, transfers and dismissals of officers of the VRS were conducted on the orders of the General Staff of the VJ, the successor to the JNA in Belgrade,²²³⁹ and Belgrade continued to pay the salaries of VRS officers higher than the rank of major. The salaries in the highest ranks were even increased from 500 to 1500 German marks per month.²²⁴⁰

The VRS incorporated not only the remaining part of the JNA but also elements of the territorial defence force and irregular local units. The VRS was to have seven corps, including the Drina Corps in Eastern Bosnia. The weak point of the VRS remained its relatively low manpower. From the peak in 1992, when the VRS had 86,000 men at its disposal, this number declined to about 60,000 in 1994, of which 45,000 are reported to have been operational at this time.²²⁴¹ There are however authors who assume a much lower effective fighting strength. It has been claimed that as early as 1992 only 35,000 of the 80,000 VRS troops were operational. Moreover, some of them regularly left their posts to conduct civilian activities.²²⁴² Their successes were chiefly due to their heavy firepower. When faced with a motivated and well-armed opponent they suffered defeats.²²⁴³ Indeed, the morale of the Bosnian Serb troops was low: they were poorly trained and organized; there was a lack of competent leadership. In Bosnia too, draft-dodging and desertion were rife among the Serbs. In total this is reported to have ²²³² United States Senate, Cleansing, pp. 7 and 28; Gow, 'Forces', p. 1; Cuvalo, Dictionary, p. 59; MID/KL. Operations Directorate, Royal Netherlands Army, Intelligence and Security Department, Intelligence Section, Supintrep Enclave Srebrenica, no. 30370/4/021194, p. 2; idem, Royal Netherlands Army, Intelligence Bureau, Infomap former Yugoslavia, July 1996, no. 35286/4/250696, p. 17; VN, S/1994/674/Appendix VI, p. 11; KL, Operations Directorate, AIV, Intelligence Section, no. 27383/4/191193, Manual Tactical Action Warring Factions in the Former Yugoslavia, November 1993, p. 5. see also Vego, 'Federal Army', p. 447.

²²³³ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 130; Ulrike Rudber, 'Geen suiker te koop, wel handgranaten: sfeer in Servië is bedrukt' (No sugar, but hand-grenades, on sale: depressed atmosphere in Sarajevo), de Volkskrant, 30/04/92.

²²³⁴ Ed Vulliamy, 'The general who told troops to tear up UN mandate' and "Only passivity is dishonourable", The Guardian, 12/01/96. see also Calic, 'Frage', p. 150. For the lasting links between the VJ and the VRS see also Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 274-275.

²²³⁵ Domazet-Loso, 'Aggression', p. 143.

²²³⁶ Gow, 'Forces', p. 2; Bram Versteeg, 'Uitspraak tribunaal brengt Milosevic in het nauw' (Verdict of tribunal puts pressure on Milosevic), Algemeen Dagblad, 17/11/98.

²²³⁷ VN, A/47/747, The situation in Bosnia and Hercegovina. Report of the Secretary-General, 03/12/92, p. 4; Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 209-210.

²²³⁸ Zimmerman, Origins, p. 186.

²²³⁹ Vego, 'Federal Army', p. 448.

²²⁴⁰ Ed Vulliamy, 'Serbian lies world chose to believe', The Guardian, 29/02/96. see also Jovic quoted in Julian Borger, 'The Observer profile: Europe's last dinosaur', The Observer, 29/12/96; Esad Hecimovic, 'Na Haskoj potjernici nema Milana Lukica zlocinca odgovornog za brutalna ubistva vise od 3.000 Bosnjaka iz Visegrada', Ljiljan, 28/05/97, p. 33.

²²⁴¹ Gow, 'Forces', p. 1.

²²⁴² VN, S1994/674, Appendix III, p. 26.

²²⁴³ Vego, 'Federal Army', pp. 447-448.

involved between 120,000 and 150,000 men, twice the size of the Bosnian Serb army. A large proportion of those evading military service went to Serbia, and as a consequence mocking reference was made to a 'Belgrade Corps' of the VRS.²²⁴⁴ This drain of manpower in the VRS was not confined to the ordinary troops. At the start of the war in Bosnia only 52 per cent of the eligible JNA officers had followed the call to join the Bosnian Serb forces. Moreover, by the end of 1994 almost half of the VRS officer corps had left for Serbia. Due to this exodus and to losses the VRS had only 21 per cent of the number of officers it needed.²²⁴⁵ Desertion in particular increased as the impression grew that the main aim of the war was to enrich the Bosnian Serb leadership.²²⁴⁶ Moreover, many left when the number of casualties in the army's own ranks started to increase. By the end of the war the VRS would have suffered more than 18,000 dead and double this number of wounded.²²⁴⁷

General Mladic

As recounted, the appointed commander of the VRS was General Ratko Mladic, until then commander of the JNA troops in Knin. Mladic was born on 12 March 1943 in the village of Bozinovici near Kalinovik, almost 50 kilometres south of Sarajevo, as the son of two partisans. His father Nedjo was killed in a clash on 12 March 1945, i.e. on his son Ratko's second birthday. The simultaneity of these events must have been an annually recurring trauma for Ratko. According to Mladic himself he longed to revenge the death of his father all through his life.²²⁴⁸ It was long said that Croat Ustashe had killed his father, but Mladic later reportedly admitted that his father was killed by Cetniks.²²⁴⁹

Mladic joined the JNA and the Communist Party. Within the JNA he had a reputation as a good organizer who was highly successful in exercises.²²⁵⁰ At the start of 1991 he was appointed as Chief of Staff for Logistics at the Pristina Corps in Kosovo. A few months later he became, with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, Chief of Staff of the Ninth Army Corps in Knin, the centre of Krajina. When many Croats left the federal army, Mladic became the commander of the corps and was promoted to Major General.

During the fighting in Croatia he gained the reputation of being a real soldier's officer and a courageous fighter who led his men into battle from the front.²²⁵¹ He himself said that offence lay more in his nature than defence.²²⁵² He impressed people with his good memory for the names of soldiers, so that they were later surprised and flattered that he recognized them.²²⁵³ In the course of the war Mladic gained an almost mythical reputation, with comparisons being made to King Lazar and his battle against the Turks. At the same time, however, he was said to be unscrupulous, cruel, clever but not intelligent and no great strategist.²²⁵⁴ Milosevic is reported to have personally insisted that Mladic become the commander of the Bosnian Serb army. It is precisely Mladic's cruelty which seems to have recommended him to Milosevic. In mid-1994 the former State Department official George Kenney ²²⁴⁴ Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 213.

²²⁴⁵ Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 214.

²²⁴⁶ Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 212-213.

²²⁴⁷ Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 214.

²²⁴⁸ Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁴⁹ Cuvalo, Dictionary, p. 170.

²²⁵⁰ Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁵¹ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 171; Bill Hewitt et al, 'Driven by personal demons, this Serbian general has made war in Bosnia', People, 13/06/94; interview D. Milovanovic, 17/12/99

²²⁵² Roger Cohen, 'Conflict in the Balkans: Serbian strategy', The New York Times, 17/04/94.

²²⁵³ Interview V. Matovic, 16/12/99.

²²⁵⁴ MID. AVI, OVIC, doc. no. 99015, Information document political and administrative information/organization Bosnia and Hercegovina, 21/07/97, p. 75; idem, letter from head MID, mr. J.C.F. Knapp, 12/07/95, DIS 95/12.13.4/1658; Vego, Federal Army, p. 446; interviews V. Andreev, 07/07/00, C. Bildt, 13/12/00, B. Pellnäss, 03/11/99 and V. Matovic, 16/12/99; Colonel Andrei Demurenko, Chief of Staff of Sarejevo Sector in 1995, quoted in Thomans, 'Lessons'; Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94; Robert Block, 'Vredelievende moordenaar met een volkse aanpak' (Peace-loving murderer with a common-man's approach), Trouw, 23/09/95.

remarked: 'He doesn't seem to have internal inhibitions, which is one reason they put him in charge. He knows how to test the edge of what is possible and always push.'²²⁵⁵

In Bosnia too the actions of Mladic, who in Krajina had acquired the title 'butcher of Knin',²²⁵⁶ were to be marked by cruelty. In May 1992 radio messages were intercepted in which he personally ordered that Sarajevo be 'set on fire' and in the process to stop using 82 and 120 millimetre mortars and instead to employ 155 millimetre howitzers.²²⁵⁷ At the start of the 1990s Mladic, who as a Communist officer had taken the Yugoslav position for many years and who seems to have been a fierce Communist,²²⁵⁸ became a fervent Serb nationalist with a great interest in Serb history and myths. He himself said that the war had made him 'the greatest Serb'.²²⁵⁹ He believed that the Serb borders should come to lie 'where Serb blood has been spilled, the blood of every individual Serb soldier and officer, excepting none, not only in this war but in all previous ones too. As far as I'm concerned this war will be over when the Muslims hand me their weapons.'²²⁶⁰

Some who experienced him at close quarters doubted the mental stability of Mladic, even before the suicide of his 22-year-old daughter Ana in March 1994,²²⁶¹ which was to seriously disturb his balance.²²⁶² Mladic was said to be extremely hot-tempered.²²⁶³ According to some he had a suspicious, if not paranoid, nature.²²⁶⁴ He surrounded himself with a close circle of confidants²²⁶⁵ and said that he was constantly afraid that something would happen to his family.²²⁶⁶ However, his wife is reported to have been already killed at the start of the war during artillery bombardments near Sarajevo.²²⁶⁷

According to some he was a megalomaniac. He himself said: 'If I had been a surgeon, I would have been a super-surgeon. If I had been a lawyer, I would have been a super-lawyer. But I'll never be a Frank Sinatra, because I don't have a super voice.'²²⁶⁸ When President Izetbegovic, during negotiations in Geneva, doubted whether the Serbs would keep promises they had made, Mladic answered him: 'When I guarantee you something, it's the same as if the Almighty guarantees you something.'²²⁶⁹ After the fall of the Zepa enclave in July 1995 he told a bus full of Muslim citizens: 'No Allah, no UN, no NATO can save you. Only I can.'²²⁷⁰ During the war in Bosnia Mladic increasingly took on the role of the cat that plays with mice, someone with the power of life and death.

While members of the JNA were often convinced that the secession of the republics from the Yugoslav federation was prompted by foreign forces, Mladic came to view the disintegration of Yugoslavia and the following wars as an almost supernatural event. He liked to refer to UNPROFOR, NATO, the great Western powers and the Muslim states as the gods of war.²²⁷¹ In his view they were the ones who dictated the course of the war. The Muslims, Croats and UN peacekeeping troops were ²²⁵⁵ Bill Hewitt et al, 'Driven by personal demons, this Serbian general has made a war in Bosnia', People, 13/06/94.

²²⁵⁶ John Burns, 'Serbian General Is Either a Snake or a Charmer, Depending on the Beholder', The New York Times, 08/08/93.

²²⁵⁷ Bill Hewitt et al, 'Driven by personal demons, this Serbian general has made war in Bosnia', People, 13/06/94.

²²⁵⁸ Interview S. Djukic, 04/08/01.

²²⁵⁹ Mladic quoted in Sreten Vujovic, 'An Uneasy View of the City', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 138.

²²⁶⁰ Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁶¹ Roger Cohen, 'Conflict in the Balkans: Serbian strategy', The New York Times, 17/04/94; interviews J. Cot, 19/04/00, R. Dukic, 14/06/00 and V. Matovic, 16/12/99; Milos Vasic, the military member of staff of Vreme, quoted in Judah, Serbs, pp. 230-231.

²²⁶² Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 25-26; Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁶³ Interviews R. Dukic, 14/06/00, M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00 and Z. Stankovic, 01/10/98.

²²⁶⁴ Interviews R. Dukic, 14/06/00 and Z. Stankovic, 01/10/98.

²²⁶⁵ Interviews R. Dukic, 14/06/00, M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00 and Z. Stankovic, 01/10/98.

²²⁶⁶ Interview B. Spasic, 16/09/01.

²²⁶⁷ Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁶⁸ Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94.

²²⁶⁹ Robert Block, 'Vredelievende moordenaar met een volkse aanpak', Trouw, 23/09/95.

²²⁷⁰ Robert Block, 'Vredelievende moordenaar met een volkse aanpak', Trouw, 23/09/95.

²²⁷¹ See for instance Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 33, 87, 89 and 191.

the local executors of the fate devised by these gods.²²⁷² These gods had proved capable of making Yugoslavia fall apart. First of all the Communist regime of Tito had, according to Mladic, disadvantaged the Serbs and then the war had ‘come over’ the Serbs as ‘an undesired wind’ that suddenly stormed across Yugoslavia.²²⁷³ What else could the Serb population of Bosnia do than undertake heroic resistance?²²⁷⁴ The end of the war would be determined not by him but by the gods of war in the West. A scenario was developing that could not be stopped by Serb mortals.²²⁷⁵ Due to this attitude Mladic was not able to think in terms of an ultimate strategy. In late 1993 this was also the impression gained by the Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command (the UN organization in Sarajevo), Brigadier General Ramsay: ‘He lacks the breadth of strategic vision to achieve peace’.²²⁷⁶ This concept of superior Western power did not detract from Mladic’s pride in the fact that his own part in the struggle was securing him a place in the history books.²²⁷⁷

Conflicts often broke out between Mladic and Karadzic, the political leader of the Bosnian Serbs. Although Mladic himself had shifted from Communism to Serb nationalism, he found it hard to forgive Karadzic that the latter made references to his anti-Communism and had been an open dissident during his student days.²²⁷⁸ Milosevic, who had made it a speciality to exploit differences between persons or groups, took advantage of this situation too. In fact he could generally get along much better with Mladic than with Karadzic.²²⁷⁹ Although Commander in Chief in name, Karadzic was to have no real authority over Mladic; the only person to have that was Milosevic.²²⁸⁰ But Mladic always had difficulty with politicians in general²²⁸¹ and he profited from the fact that in time of war it was difficult for politicians to place constraints on military commanders. Moderate tones were soon no longer to be heard from the army itself. Criticism of Mladic among VRS officers is said to have fallen silent out of fear of the VRS commander.²²⁸² Mladic was also too stubborn to take the advice of other officers.²²⁸³

9. The Dutch attitude to the war in Bosnia

At the start of 1992 reports in the Dutch media were still marked by complaints by a limited number of emotionally involved journalists about the general indifference of Netherlands to the situation in the former Yugoslavia. This was a continuation or result of the combined action of four journalists of NRC Handelsblad and De Volkskrant on 31 December 1991.²²⁸⁴ The content of the newspapers in the first months of 1992 confirmed the impression of a low involvement by the newspapers and their readers in the events in the former Yugoslavia. In NRC Handelsblad and Trouw there was a drop in the number of articles dealing with the situation in the conflict-torn Balkan country. These reports were mostly factual journalism or atmospheric impressions from Yugoslavia. There were few opinion columns or readers’ letters on the subject. In NRC Handelsblad there was a continuation of the critical commentaries on Western involvement. After the Dutch parliament had agreed to the dispatch of the signals battalion, ²²⁷² Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 34 and 87.

²²⁷³ Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 39 and 87.

²²⁷⁴ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 89.

²²⁷⁵ Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 33, 37 and 87.

²²⁷⁶ NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Ramsay to BHC Fwd Sarajevo, etc. 30/10/93, ‘Soldier, statesman and diplomat – General Ratko Mladic meeting at Sokolac 28/10/93’.

²²⁷⁷ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 37.

²²⁷⁸ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

²²⁷⁹ Interview S. Djukic, 04/08/01.

²²⁸⁰ Interviews C. Bildt, 13/12/00; J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99; F. Briquemont, 22/06/00 and R. Smith, 12/01/00; Djukic, Vetra, p. 240; Morillon, quoted in Ed Vulliamy, ‘Only passivity is dishonourable’, The Guardian, 12/01/96.

²²⁸¹ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

²²⁸² Interview A. Makar, 16/06/00 and B. Pellnäss, 03/11/99.

²²⁸³ Interview V. Matovic, 16/12/99.

²²⁸⁴ Mischa de Vreede, ‘Oorlogskinderen’ (War children) and Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘De dood van een groot journalist-in-wording’ (The death of a great journalist-in-the-making), NRC Handelsblad, 09/01/92.

an editorial commentary said that the mandate for UNPROFOR I was no better than that for UNIFIL (the peacekeeping force in Lebanon at the end of the 1970s). The commentator pointed out that the Netherlands had withdrawn from this last operation in 1985 due to the impracticability of the mandate. Since the UNPROFOR mandate had hardly been discussed by Parliament, the newspaper felt that Dutch politicians were open to the accusation that the troop dispatch was more about their own prestige than about real peacekeeping.²²⁸⁵

Insofar as a general tone could be made out, it was one of reservation in the other newspapers too during this period. The Algemeen Dagblad, for instance, was prompted by the fighting that broke out in Bosnia after the referendum at the start of March to advocate that this region should not be recognized for the time being.²²⁸⁶ An exception to the apathy was formed by Hylke Tromp, Professor of War Studies in Groningen, who at the start of 1992 once again advocated military intervention. Besides humanitarian motives, his main reason was that the neighbours of Yugoslavia, as well as Turkey, threatened to become involved in the conflict.²²⁸⁷

The outbreak of the war in Bosnia led to some increase in opinion-forming contributions, but not to a major increase. Generally speaking, Dutch journalists viewed Serb political and military leaders as the instigators of the conflict. A tendency could already be discerned not to trouble readers with the details of the conflict. At the start of March, for instance, De Volkskrant published a photograph of the funeral of a Serb, with a cross in the centre bearing the name of the man in Cyrillic script; the caption stated only that it was ‘one of the victims of the violence between Serbs and Bosnian Muslims’.²²⁸⁸ A month later NRC Handelsblad captioned an almost identical photograph of the same funeral with the words ‘funeral ceremony in Sarajevo in Bosnia-Hercegovina’.²²⁸⁹ In neither case was it mentioned that the funeral was of a Serb, and thus that Serbs were also being killed in the conflict. In this respect the series ‘In tijd van oorlog’ (In time of war) in Trouw, in which from early 1992 onwards Nicole Lucas described the effect of the Milosevic regime on daily life in Belgrade, broke a pattern that was beginning to establish itself.

In NRC Handelsblad, even following the outbreak of the war in Bosnia, there was still little enthusiasm for Western involvement in the events there. Raymond van den Boogaard, for instance, argued from his base in Sarajevo for the uselessness of any attempt at Western intervention:

‘So the Yugoslav civil war, a war for territory, enters its second summer and there seems to be no one, either in Yugoslavia or abroad, who can prevent it. Ministerial visits, the dispatch of observers, the dispatch of peacekeeping troops – none of it has any sense if there is a lack of will to find a solution for the Yugoslav legacy through peaceful negotiations. Moreover, the Yugoslav politicians recognize that every civilized solution suggested by foreign parties will be based on the idea of a multinational society, and that is precisely what they don’t want.’²²⁹⁰

According to NRC Handelsblad neither the EC nor the US was able to stop the Serb violence in Bosnia,²²⁹¹ not even by peace-enforcing because the warring factions lived in such heavily intermingled ²²⁸⁵ ‘Vlagvertoon’ (Waving the flag), NRC Handelsblad, 17/03/92.

²²⁸⁶ ‘Bosnië nog niet erkennen’ (No recognition for Bosnia yet), Algemeen Dagblad, 03/03/92.

²²⁸⁷ Hylke Tromp, ‘Militaire interventie in Joegoslavië kan groter bloedbad voorkomen’ (Military intervention in Yugoslavia can prevent greater bloodbath), de Volkskrant, 04/01/92.

²²⁸⁸ Photograph by Ewoud Nysingh, ‘Duizenden Bosniërs in vredesbetoging’ (Thousands of Bosnians in demonstration for peace), de Volkskrant, 06/03/92.

²²⁸⁹ Photograph by Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Joegoslavische burgeroorlog is niet te beëindigen’ (Yugoslav civil war impossible to stop), NRC Handelsblad, 09/04/92.

²²⁹⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Joegoslavische burgeroorlog is niet te beëindigen’, NRC Handelsblad, 09/04/92.

²²⁹¹ ‘Bosnisch bestand’ (Bosnian truce), NRC Handelsblad, 13/04/92.

areas and the area had a tradition of guerrilla war.²²⁹² The newspaper advised the West to wait until the political and military leaders in Bosnia had themselves had enough of the fighting and then immediately to dispatch peacekeeping troops, as had been done in Croatia. The paper 'could no longer imagine' that ethnic cleansing could now be reversed.²²⁹³

De Volkskrant, which had taken a more pro-active position in the summer of 1991, now also adopted a more reserved position in the first months of 1992. According to Oscar Garschagen writing at the end of April, sanctions were the only tool that the European Community could apply against Yugoslavia, and one should not harbour too many illusions about the effect they would have: this would take a long time.²²⁹⁴ An editorial commentary of 5 May went further and advocated the total economic and political isolation of Yugoslavia if the Serb aggression in Bosnia did not stop. If this did not help either, then 'military intervention by the UN should not be ruled out'.²²⁹⁵ A week later Ewoud Nysingh wrote that it was 'unfortunately right' that no UN peacekeeping force was being sent to Bosnia: 'No country is prepared to send soldiers into the Bosnian hornets' nest, where everyone with a gun does as he pleases. This would result in many deaths in the UN force.' Talks with Belgrade should continue and thus it should not be fully isolated, 'however guilty Milosevic may be'. Once the regime in Belgrade were to cooperate in a ceasefire then a peacekeeping force could be dispatched and talks could be held on 'the provision of far-reaching autonomy for the three population groups' in Bosnia.²²⁹⁶

Caroline de Gruyter, who had reported in Elsevier about the Yugoslavian conflict from the start, wrote a few weeks after the outbreak of the conflict in Bosnia that even if a European army were already to exist, intervention there would amount to 'sheer suicide'.²²⁹⁷ After two months of war in Bosnia she wrote that the only remaining realistic possibility was the separation of the ethnic groups in Bosnia. 'How do you arrange that, with a military intervention? That is not only impracticable, it is also unfair to the Serbs who have lived their whole life there, and of whom many have refused to participate in this war.'²²⁹⁸ She did not consider the removal of Milosevic an option. His replacements would probably dream no less strongly of a Greater Serbia than he did.²²⁹⁹

The fairly general opinion that troops should be sent only when a real ceasefire had been achieved, and the growing acceptance of an ethnic division in Bosnia, was countered by the daily newspaper Trouw on 22 April. On this day the paper published articles by several advocates of more extensive intervention in Bosnia. Sonja Licht, the chairwoman of the Helsinki Citizen's Assembly in Belgrade, and Mient Jan Faber, General Secretary of the Interchurch Peace Council IKV, expressed their anger on the Podium Page about the lack of initiative shown by the EC and the UN. They described the Cutileiro Plan as unrealizable in view of the distribution of the ethnic groups and considered the plan, from a moral perspective, to be 'highly dubious, to put it mildly'. In line with several opposition politicians in the former Yugoslavia, they advocated the institution of a UN trusteeship for the entire region.²³⁰⁰ On the same page the CDA politician A.M. Oostlander, member and rapporteur for Yugoslavia of the European Parliament, pointed out that at that moment the Netherlands had fewer UN troops stationed in the former Yugoslavia than Belgium did. He criticized the 'exorbitantly expensive' Airmobile Brigade, which he claimed would not become operational for the ²²⁹² 'Ongrijpbaar Bosnië' (Bosnia intangibles), NRC Handelsblad, 11/05/92.

²²⁹³ 'Geen alternatief' (No alternative), NRC Handelsblad, 05/05/92.

²²⁹⁴ Oscar Garschagen, 'EG moet Servië tot keus dwingen' (EC must force Serbia to choose), de Volkskrant, 23/04/92.

²²⁹⁵ 'Ultimatum' (Ultimatum), De Volkskrant, 05/05/92.

²²⁹⁶ Ewoud Nysingh, 'Druk op Servië opvoeren, maar blijven praten' (Increase pressure on Serbia, but keep talking), de Volkskrant, 12/05/92.

²²⁹⁷ Caroline de Gruyter, 'Een Bosnische worst' (A Bosnian sausage), Elsevier, 02/05/92, p. 58.

²²⁹⁸ Caroline de Gruyter, 'Balkan Storm brengt geen bevrijding' (Balkan Storm will bring no liberation), Elsevier, 06/06/92, p. 47.

²²⁹⁹ Caroline de Gruyter, 'Balkan Storm brengt geen bevrijding', Elsevier, 06/06/92, p. 47; Caroline de Gruyter, 'De prins tuigt het witte paard op' (The prince saddles the white horse), Elsevier, 20/06/92, p. 46.

²³⁰⁰ Sonja Licht & Mient Jan Faber, 'VN moeten van Joegoslavië 'mandaatgebied' maken' (UN must make Yugoslavia a 'mandate area'), Trouw, 22/04/92.

next five years. In his opinion the Dutch government could better spend the money on peacekeeping operations and on the economic and social reconstruction of Eastern Europe.²³⁰¹ The opinion contributions of this day remained, however, an isolated phenomenon.

Nonetheless, the outbreak of hostilities in Sarajevo had led to increasing concern about the fate of some 60 Dutch troops of the signals battalion who were still stationed in the Bosnian capital. In particular the military trade unions and members of the CDA urged that their safety be ensured.²³⁰² The Dutch government took the position that although the deteriorated situation in the former Yugoslavia made the task of UNPROFOR more difficult, it did not make it impossible. According to Minister of Defence Ter Beek the Dutch troops were in no great danger. 'Locally the situation appears in many cases to be much quieter than the overall picture given by the media', he assured Parliament on 12 May.²³⁰³

However, the developments did prompt the Minister to activate the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC) by manning it continuously. The Defence Crisis Management Centre, which was set up during the Gulf War, was entrusted by the Chief of Defence Staff with policy control and evaluation during crisis management operations.²³⁰⁴ The Defence Crisis Management Centre convened in a bunker under the Ministry of Defence on the Plein (Central Square) in The Hague. This bunker had been built in 1984 as an 'Emergency Base' for the minister and his staff in the event of a nuclear war. Until the start of the 1990s, however, it was hardly used.²³⁰⁵ This changed after the arrival of crisis management operations. Peacekeeping operations could be of a 'inter-service nature' and were indeed so during the Yugoslavia conflict. Planning, coordination and operational leadership could best be undertaken from a single point. The most suitable person to carry this out was the Chief of Defence Staff, the highest military advisor to the minister, who was supported in this task by the Defence Crisis Management Centre.

Furthermore, the political sensitivity of peacekeeping operations contributed to this development.²³⁰⁶ During a peacekeeping operation the Dutch government retains full command over the dispatched units (as anchored in Article 98, Section 2 of the Constitution: 'The government has full command of the armed forces.').²³⁰⁷ This means that the government can withdraw such troops at any moment, as it actually did in the case of UNIFIL in 1985. The Dutch government thus also remains responsible for the administrative command, i.e. aspects such as legal status, disciplinary matters etc.

During peacekeeping operations the tasks, location and deployment duration of a unit are normally defined before it is dispatched. This is followed by a transfer of operational control. This means that a UN commander may deploy a supplied national unit at his own discretion as long as this is in accordance with the defined tasks, the agreed resources and within the agreed geographical constraints. Deviations from the agreed goals are only possible after consultation with, and agreement by, the troop-supplying nation. Transfer of operational control thus means that the dispatching country ²³⁰¹ A.M. Oostlander, 'Geen dure defensieplannen voor later, nú actie' (No expensive defence plans for later, action now), Trouw, 22/04/92.

²³⁰² See for instance Def, 927, SG DV 91/92, memorandum from Kreemers to Ter Beek and Van Voorst to Voorst, 22/04/92, V-440/92 with appendix press release 'VVDM bezorgd over Joegoslavië' (VVDM concerned about Yugoslavia), 24/04/92 and press release AVNM defence editor, 22/04/92; DGP, 373, exh. GO/92-5732/Z 205K, CMHF to the chairman of the Centrally Organized Military Council, 07/05/92.

²³⁰³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 28, p. 2.

²³⁰⁴ For more extensive information on the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC) see the appendix on the Ministry of Defence, on the CD-ROM that accompanies the Dutch edition of the report.

²³⁰⁵ Information the bunker in, for instance, Leonard Ornstein, 'Onder de grond speelt de oorlogsstaf de Balkan' (The war staff plays the Balkans underground), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, pp. 12-13; Gerrit den Abtman, 'In de bunker klopt het hart van het crisiscentrum' (The heart of the crisis centre beats in the bunker), Algemeen Dagblad, 15/07/95; Rob Schoof, 'Vloeren kraken en faxen ratelen in Crisiscentrum' (Floors creak and faxes rattle in Crisis Centre), NRC Handelsblad, 13/07/95.

²³⁰⁶ For the following passages on the transfer of competencies and the permanent responsibility of the Minister of Defence, see for instance BSG, no. 550. Memorandum G.H. de Keizer to Voorhoeve, 29/08/95, no. 95000860.

²³⁰⁷ Cf. The tenth point of attention of the evaluation form for decisions with regard to the dispatch of peacekeeping troops, TK, session year 1994-1995, 23 591 no. 5, p. 11.

remains closely involved in the operational development of a peacekeeping operation, especially when there is a danger that the implementation of the task may be compromised.²³⁰⁸ The dispatching country is not formally allowed to issue any order after control is transferred, but close consultation remains necessary.²³⁰⁹

However far the transfer of control went, the Minister of Defence remained politically responsible for the actions of the Dutch units that were provided to the UN. It was thus his task to constantly take account of the interests of the dispatched units and if necessary to consult with the competent authorities. In view of this permanent involvement by the minister and his close advisors, it is not so surprising that in April 1992, shortly after the creation of UNPROFOR, the Defence Crisis Management Centre started to be manned on a 24-hour basis in order to monitor developments during peacekeeping operations from the policy perspective.

The Chief of Defence Staff was actually strongly dependent for his information on the armed forces. When a unit had been dispatched as part of a peacekeeping operation, the armed forces remained responsible for the administrative command and logistics in the broadest sense, including personnel facilities and care, medical care, training, transport and supplies. The required information was therefore supplied to the bunker by the Crisis Staffs of the individual Armed Forces. Information was also obtained from radio and television broadcasts and the ANP news service. The contacts between the separately dispatched staff officers and the Defence Crisis Management Centre initially also followed an indirect route, via the Armed Forces. The activation of the centre on 2 April 1992 meant that staff officers in the Defence Crisis Management Centre followed developments seven days a week, 24 hours a day, and recorded their findings on a daily basis in situation reports for the government and for high-ranking civil servants and military personnel.

Following the developments in Sarajevo the Ministry of Defence considered transferring the Dutch troops from the UNPROFOR headquarters to a safer environment. Locations in Belgrade and Zagreb were accordingly examined. This fact was however 'known only in limited quarters' 'in order to prevent disquiet, both in the Netherlands and in Yugoslavia'. In fact the location of the UNPROFOR headquarters was the responsibility of the UN. Since the commander of the signals battalion, Lieutenant Colonel H. Vermaas, did not view the situation as threatening enough to necessitate evacuation, the Dutch government did not take the politically sensitive decision to intervene in the choice of the location for the UNPROFOR headquarters.²³¹⁰

In addition to concern about the dispatched Dutch troops and ideas about their relocation, calls for stronger intervention were now also heard. It was the CDA member of parliament De Kok who opened the discussion. De Kok had a clear involvement in the events in the former Yugoslavia. At the start of September 1991 he had been among the first willing to travel to Yugoslavia as an observer. 'In Yugoslavia – and other Central European countries too – Western parliamentarians have authority', he said at the time in a radio broadcast.²³¹¹ During a television programme on Sunday 10 May he advocated the dispatch of a military intervention force, preferably by the UN, to the former Yugoslavia. In his opinion action should primarily be taken against Serb airfields and aircraft, and be carried out by Western European air forces operating from Italy and from aircraft carriers. He said he was aware that there was a lack of international support for such an action, but he wanted the Ministers Van den Broek and Ter Beek to try and persuade the opponents of intervention in the CSCE.²³¹² Otherwise, the former marine explained to Het Parool, the entire concept of new, flexible Dutch armed forces, as set out in the Defence White Paper, threatened to 'fall on its face'. If the government refused to do what De Kok wanted, then he would resist the investment of six billion guilders in the Airmobile Brigade

²³⁰⁸ Cf. DJZ, 784 and 785. DJZ/Sre/IJB, memo from H-IJB to P-DJZ, 30/08/95 no. 95000873.

²³⁰⁹ For illustrations regarding the deployment of Dutch marines in Cambodia see Bais, Mijnenveld, pp. 64-70.

²³¹⁰ NIOD, Coll. Vandeweyer. Disk 1, file Vragcds.vra, memo from HOZ to CDS, z.d.

²³¹¹ Radio 1, KRO, Echo's Magazine, 03/09/91, 8.10am.

²³¹² 'CDA-Kamerlid De Kok wil in Joegoslavië militair ingrijpen' (CDA MP De Kok wishes military intervention in Yugoslavia), Trouw, 11/05/92.

that had been announced in the White Paper: ‘If there is a lack of political will to end such widespread butchery, then you’d do better to invest the money for an intervention force in other things.’²³¹³ De Kok expressed himself in a rather unparliamentary manner, but it was certainly not the last time that this argument would be used in the discussion on intervention in Yugoslavia. According to De Kok the job could be done within the space of an hour: ‘Then the Serb generals will know what to expect if they continue. The only language they speak is that of force.’²³¹⁴

De Kok's statements were followed the next day by an article by his party colleague and member of the European Parliament Oostlander, who had already spoken out in favour of more action several weeks earlier. In NRC Handelsblad he contended that the international community could no longer deal with Milosevic, his accomplice Karadzic, who applied ‘a variant of National Socialism’, and Boban without using military means. He too advocated the use of air and sea power and he also made reference to the new defence concept and once more to the ‘very costly Airmobile Brigade’.²³¹⁵

De Kok and Oostlander received little support from the Dutch government and from Parliament for their views. De Kok had not consulted his party prior to making his statements and was forced by the leadership to withdraw his remarks.²³¹⁶ Outside De Kok’s party too, politicians were quick to argue for the inadvisability of his suggestion. His fellow party member Van den Broek stressed that he did not consider the time ripe for military intervention. The competent body here was the Security Council, said the minister, and this would only take such action when the involved parties agreed to it, which was not the case.²³¹⁷ The PvdA member of parliament Van Traa indicated that he thought little of De Kok’s proposal because it was ‘impossible from the start’.²³¹⁸

The MPs Van Heemskerck Pillis-Duvekot (VVD) and Eisma (D66) criticized De Kok heavily for his ‘thinking out loud’ during a debate on 12 May. At the same time Van Traa told him that it was important to prevent the 60 Dutch soldiers who remained in Sarajevo from becoming hostages.²³¹⁹ De Kok himself, according to the report of the debate, made no further mention of his proposal because, as he declared, he had now understood that ‘if there is no international consensus on this, (...) there [was] no point in raising the possibility.’²³²⁰ However, he did not consider it wrong to have expressed his thoughts because he had a right to his personal opinions and was not a ‘party minion’.²³²¹

Minister Van den Broek emphasized on behalf of the government that the Bosnian government’s appeal for military assistance could not be answered because there was no consensus on this in the Security Council and the CSCE.²³²² The minister later told Parliament that he took a reserved position because he did not want to make statements which would manoeuvre either himself or later the EC into the role of an ‘impotent shouter’.²³²³ The interventionist position was taken in this debate

²³¹³ Frans Peeters, “Actie in Joegoslavië kan in één uur slagen” (‘Action in Yugoslavia can achieve success in one hour’), Het Parool, 12/05/92.

²³¹⁴ ‘CDA-Kamerlid De Kok wil in Joegoslavië militair ingrijpen’, Trouw, 11/05/92.

²³¹⁵ Arie Oostlander, ‘Stop geweld in Bosnië-Herzegovina met militaire middelen’ (Stop the violence in Bosnia-Herzegovina with military means), NRC Handelsblad, 11/05/92. see also ‘Europarlementariër Arie Oostlander: Nut interventiestrijdmacht niet duidelijk’ (European MP Arie Oostlander: Usefulness of intervention force not clear), Europa van Morgen, 10/06/92, pp. 305-306.

²³¹⁶ ‘Ter Beek wil naar Joegoslavië om soldaten mentaal te steunen’ (Ter Beek to visit Yugoslavia to give soldiers moral support), de Volkskrant, 13/05/92.

²³¹⁷ ‘EG zegt Servië wacht aan’ (EU issues warning to Serbia), Trouw, 12/05/92.

²³¹⁸ ‘CDA-Kamerlid De Kok wil in Joegoslavië militair ingrijpen’, Trouw, 11/05/92.

²³¹⁹ ‘Tweede Kamer: geen interventie VN in Bosnië’ (Parliament: no UN intervention in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 13/05/92.

²³²⁰ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 28, p. 5.

²³²¹ ‘Ter Beek wil naar Joegoslavië om soldaten mentaal te steunen’, de Volkskrant, 13/05/92; ‘Van den Broek ziet niets in militaire actie tegen Serviërs’ (Van den Broek rejects military action against Serbs), Trouw, 13/05/92.

²³²² TK 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 28, p. 9.

²³²³ Interview H. van den Broek, 02/12/99.

by the GroenLinks (Green Left) MP Sipkes, who asked about the possibilities for creating safe zones in Bosnia for threatened persons.²³²⁴

The criticism from other politicians did not silence De Kok and Oostlander. At the start of June De Kok told Het Parool that he wanted to teach the ‘cowardly Serbs’ a lesson: ‘You need to cut through the Serbs’ lifelines in one blow, get to the nerve bundles. They are cowards and if you do it well, they’ll just take to their heels’. He also felt that the Netherlands should participate in a blockade of Dubrovnik: ‘If we send a few ships to that city, then they [the Serbs] will run like rabbits. (...) The Netherlands can’t allow it morally and ethically that people are being slaughtered in front of our eyes, can it? We have the moral obligation to do something.’²³²⁵ In the same month of 1992 Oostlander submitted a resolution to the European Parliament which urged air bombardments of Serb artillery positions around Sarajevo.²³²⁶ This was not accepted.

Nevertheless the frustration about the inaction regarding Bosnia, which had obviously motivated De Kok and Oostlander to make their statements, slowly began to emerge in the media. Very cautiously, journalists and contributors chose a middle path between doing something and doing nothing. A day after De Kok’s first remarks, an editorial in NRC Handelsblad advocated a limited operation in Bosnia, as would actually be realized a few months later:

‘Perhaps it would be better for the international community to confine itself to trying to reduce the human suffering of the war as much as possible by giving UN troops a task that they can handle – accompanying consignments of food and medicine to Bosnia – and by ensuring relief for the Displaced Persons from Bosnia, already numbering 700,000, in the neighbouring countries. Little more than this is feasible, however painful the conclusion may be.’²³²⁷

The editorial commentary in Trouw on 12 May argued that although there was no international readiness to intervene militarily in the ‘hornets’ nest’ of Yugoslavia, Europe could also not leave the former Yugoslavia to ‘a gang of brigands who are dragging it to disaster’: ‘Otherwise we will remain stuck with muddling on and impotent anger.’²³²⁸ On the same day De Volkskrant published, under the title ‘The West must prevent the devastation of the Balkans’, a declaration signed by various international academics and artists, such as the war studies expert John Galtung, Milovan Djilas and – from the Netherlands – Cardinal Simonis and once again Mient Jan Faber. They advocated contacts with the democratic opposition in the former Yugoslavia, the setting up of temporary UN protectorates in crisis areas in Bosnia and a harder line against undemocratic elements in Croatia and against the Green Berets in Bosnia. The West should halt negotiations with nationalist leaders.²³²⁹

Sam Muller, assistant at the Department of International Public Law of the University of Leiden, took the opposite line with ‘an appeal to remain realistic’ made in opposition to calls by Oostlander and De Kok for military intervention. It was not to be expected that the UN would accept a corresponding resolution. Moreover, he claimed that few Europeans would be prepared to sacrifice

²³²⁴ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 28, p. 8.

²³²⁵ Jan van der Ven, ‘Ingrijpen in Servië voor CDA al reëel’ (Intervention in Serbia already realistic for CDA), Het Parool, 05/06/92. Similar statements by the former Dutch defence attaché De Vogel in Nicole Lucas & Co Welgraven, “‘We moeten Servië ook militair op de vingers durven tikken’” (“We should be prepared to penalize the Serbs with military action too”), Trouw, 03/06/92.

²³²⁶ See also ‘Oostlander wil militair ingrijpen Bosnië-Hercegovina’ (Oostlander wants military intervention in Bosnia-Hercegovina), Dagblad de Stem, 05/06/92.

²³²⁷ ‘Ongrijpbaar Bosnië’, NRC Handelsblad, 11/05/92.

²³²⁸ ‘Struikrovers’ (Brigands), Trouw, 12/05/92.

²³²⁹ Janos Kis et al, ‘Westen moet verwoesting van Balkan voorkomen’ (The West must prevent devastation of Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 12/05/92.

their lives for a hopeless attempt to separate the warring factions in Bosnia.²³³⁰ M. van den Doel, on the staff of the Clingendael Institute for International Relations, felt that intervention was also militarily impossible in view of the range of parties in the conflict. UN troops who tried to enforce peace would themselves be drawn into the fighting, which according to Van den Doel would then take the form of a guerrilla war. In his opinion it would be better to send troops to Kosovo and Macedonia to prevent the conflict from spreading to these areas. Moreover the Security Council should impose a no-fly regime on the Serb air force which – rather in contradiction of his general idea – UN troops should be able to enforce with Stinger anti-aircraft missiles.²³³¹ In a reader's letter, De Kok and Oostlander wrote that although many people seemed not to realize it, 'the idea of intervention is accepted in Dutch political circles in The Hague. An intervention force is due to be created at a cost of many billions of guilders, in the form of a mobile brigade.' They were not put off by the fact that the idea of intervention had little international support: 'Politicians should never just accept the trend of the day, certainly not when so much human suffering is involved.'²³³²

The announcement on 15 May that 200 of the total of 300 UN peacekeeping troops in Sarajevo were to leave the city prompted many to advocate concrete action on Bosnia by the international community. On 16 May De Volkskrant carried an editorial commentary that recommended a total trade embargo against Serbia and military action to facilitate humanitarian aid and to open Sarajevo's airport for the supply of food and medicines.²³³³ André Roelofs felt that 'public opinion in Europe (...) [should] gradually be getting seriously concerned about the awkwardness of the international efforts for peace'. He considered it 'a blunder' that UN units had been sent to Sarajevo without sufficient resources for self-defence and without the option of calling in air support.²³³⁴

On 22 May 1992 the Dutch Ministerial Council devoted detailed discussions to the situation in Yugoslavia for the first time since 28 February 1992. Attention was focussed on the problem of Displaced Persons.²³³⁵ At first sight it seems remarkable that this issue should be given relatively so much more attention than in other policy documents of the Dutch government regarding Yugoslavia, and moreover that the issue of Displaced Persons was such a frequently discussed subject in the minutes of the Ministerial Council regarding the former Yugoslavia. The explanation for this is that the other, mostly diplomatic and military, aspects of the Yugoslav question were chiefly matters for the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and of Defence. These issues were submitted to the Government meetings in well-prepared form and led to little discussion with colleagues in view of the 'non-intervention principle' by which ministers generally did not comment on affairs that did not concern their own department.²³³⁶ The issue of Displaced Persons, however, also involved the Ministers of Justice, of Finance, of Welfare, Health and Culture, and of Education and Science. This is why the minutes of the Ministerial Council meetings contain relatively frequent references to Yugoslavia with regard to the (possible) streams of Displaced Persons from this country.²³³⁷

In 1991 7000 Yugoslavs had come to the Netherlands. At the start of 1992 the Ministry of Justice changed its policy, allowing the Yugoslavs, on an individual basis, to exceed the maximum residence of six months granted to tourists pending further developments in their country.²³³⁸ The High ²³³⁰ Sam Muller, 'Militair ingrijpen in Bosnië-Herzegovina niet de oplossing' (Military intervention in Yugoslavia not the solution), NRC Handelsblad, 14/05/92.

²³³¹ M. van den Doel, 'Militair ingrijpen in Bosnië-Herzegovina niet de oplossing', NRC Handelsblad, 14/05/92.

²³³² Ton de Kok & Arie Oostlander, 'Interventie' (Intervention), NRC Handelsblad, 18/05/92.

²³³³ 'Isoler Belgrade' (Isolate Belgrade), de Volkskrant, 16/05/92.

²³³⁴ André Roelofs, 'Europa kan niet weglopen van Joegoslavië' (Europe cannot walk away from Yugoslavia), De Volkskrant, 16/05/92.

²³³⁵ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meeting of 22/05/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²³³⁶ Cf. R.B. Andeweg, 'Tweeërlei Ministerraad. Besluitvorming in Nederlandse kabinetten' (Dual Ministerial Council. Decision-making in Dutch governments), idem (ed.), Ministers, pp. 26-27.

²³³⁷ Interviews W. Kok, 08/05/00 and J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

²³³⁸ Radio 1, IKON, De andere wereld van zondagmorgen, 26/01/92, 9.30am.

Commissioner for Refugees had already established that following two months of war there were 1.3 million Displaced Persons in Bosnia-Herzegovina alone. The basic principle applied by the Dutch government, in line with that of the High Commissioner, was that relief should as far as possible be provided in the region itself. Faced with the situation in Bosnia, judged to be dramatic, the Ministerial Council examined the question as to whether the international community was taking a sufficiently tough attitude to Serbia and whether the Dutch government was making a sufficient effort in this respect. The Ministerial Council meeting of 22 May established that the Dutch government had called for further economic sanctions against Serbia, but that resistance had been met within the EC from France, Greece and, to a lesser extent, Spain, while within the CSCE this move had been resisted by Russia and in the Security Council by China and the non-aligned states.²³³⁹ A little more than a week later, however, the Dutch government got its way.

10. More American involvement?

In the third week of May the American policy of restraint began to change. This shift came about because news of atrocities in the Bosnian war reached the West and through a change in American public opinion. Moreover, Washington could reportedly no longer tolerate the indecision of the EC. On 20 May the American government rescinded the landing rights of the Yugoslavian airline JAT and withdrew its military attachés from Belgrade. Their Yugoslavian colleagues in the United States were ordered to leave the country and the Yugoslavian consulates in New York and San Francisco were told to close their doors. Two days later Secretary of State Baker spoke of a 'humanitarian nightmare' in Bosnia which the world could not ignore.²³⁴⁰

On 24 May, during an international conference in Lisbon on aid for countries of the former Soviet Union, Baker issued an urgent appeal to the rest of the world to call for a halt to the bloodshed in Bosnia. Baker and diplomats close to him gave the impression that the American government was prepared to provide logistical support and air cover for humanitarian convoys, on the condition that other countries be prepared to bear the greater part of the burden of such an international operation.²³⁴¹ Baker also advocated the relief of Sarajevo airport.²³⁴² In a following press conference Baker spoke of a minimum of 2225 deaths in Bosnia in the previous month, 7600 wounded and 2500 missing. He called the practice of ethnic cleansing conducted by Serbs against Muslims as 'all too reminiscent of something that we sat back and witnessed a number of years ago', an implicit reference to the extermination of the Jews by the Nazis. Equally implicit was the accusation he directed at the EC, or those who were seeking 'reasons not to act, or arguing somehow that action in the face of this kind of nightmare is not warranted at this time.'²³⁴³

As if to add strength to Baker's words, on 27 May in Sarajevo a mortar attack took place on a crowd of people queuing for bread. Eighteen people were killed and 160 were wounded. The human slaughter was appalling. Western television companies broadcast only short fragments of footage of the havoc after the attack, so that viewers had no time to make out severed body parts.²³⁴⁴

²³³⁹ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meeting of 22/05/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study; Oscar Garschagen, 'Baker wil van EG and VN zware sancties tegen Servië' (Baker urges EC and UN to impose heavy sanctions against Serbia), de Volkskrant, 25/05/92; 'EG bereidt boycot tegen Servië voor' (EC prepares boycott against Serbia), NRC Handelsblad, 27/05/92.

²³⁴⁰ Don Oberdorfer, 'Baker Urges U.N. To Sanction Serbs. Armed U.S. Role Not Ruled Out', The Washington Post, 25/05/92.

²³⁴¹ Don Oberdorfer, 'Baker Urges U.N. To Sanction Serbs. Armed U.S. Role Not Ruled Out', The Washington Post, 25/05/92.

²³⁴² Oscar Garschagen, 'Baker wil van EG and VN zware sancties tegen Servië', de Volkskrant, 25/05/92.

²³⁴³ Don Oberdorfer, 'Baker Urges U.N. To Sanction Serbs. Armed U.S. Role Not Ruled Out', The Washington Post, 25/05/92; 'VN eisen van EG harder optreden tegen Servië' (UN demands that EC take tougher line on Serbia), Trouw, 25/05/92.

²³⁴⁴ Maass, Neighbor, p. 134.

Bosnian Serbs claimed that the attack was the work of Muslims.²³⁴⁵ They were supported by MacKenzie, the Canadian Chief of Staff of UNPROFOR.²³⁴⁶ This was the first major incident in the Bosnian war which raised doubts as to whether the Bosnian Muslims had possibly fired on their own people. Doubt was easy to cast; the truth was mostly impossible to ascertain. Many UN military personnel were inclined to believe in Muslim intent. According to them, members of the Bosnian (Muslim) forces repeatedly provoked fire from Serb units, not only on military positions but also on civilian targets with the aim of mobilizing international public opinion against the Serbs. They also claimed that many Bosnian Muslim forces attacked civilian targets and UN troops in the hope of creating the impression that the Serbs were responsible for this.²³⁴⁷

Izetbegovic had a number of influential ministers, such as Vice-President Ejup Ganic, the Minister for Foreign Affairs Haris Silajdzic, the Ambassador to the UN Muhamed Sacirbey and the Minister of Humanitarian Aid Lagumdzija, who had studied in the United States and had been highly impressed by this country. They were thus also sometimes known as the ‘American mafia’. Their policy was strongly focussed on obtaining American intervention.²³⁴⁸ They had no great interest in an atmosphere of quiet in and around Sarajevo, whereby the siege of the city would drop out of the world’s consciousness.²³⁴⁹ Izetbegovic too believed at that stage of the war that sooner or later the international community would intervene to help the Bosnian government,²³⁵⁰ and in fact a large part of Sarajevo’s population still thought this too.²³⁵¹

There was another reason to be cited for firing on friendly targets: criminality. In Sarajevo one can still hear today how Muslim defenders blackmailed residents of flats with the threat that otherwise they would be fired on. After Sarajevo’s airport had been opened again in June 1992, shelling took place there when the prices on the black market dropped. Following the bombardment the airport was closed and the transport into the city of food and other necessities took place through a tunnel under the airport and the Serb lines. The traffic through these tunnels was mostly in the hands of criminals. After a while soldiers of the government army started to notice that they were engaged in defending not their houses, but the black market.²³⁵² ‘[N]o seasoned observer in Sarajevo doubts for a moment that Muslim forces have found it in their interest to shell friendly targets’, wrote General Charles G. Boyd in 1995. Before this he spent almost three years as deputy commander of the US European Command of NATO and in those years had travelled regularly through Yugoslavia.²³⁵³

Journalists, by contrast, often had more difficulty believing that the Bosnian government army provoked incidents against its own people. They felt that the UN’s tendency to impartiality played into the hands of the military. ‘Thankfully, we have not always been so circumspect’, wrote Peter Maass for ²³⁴⁵ Sremac, War, pp. 7-98; Bilatovic, Mladic, p. 83; Ulrike Rudberg, ‘Artillerievuur richt bloedbad to in Sarajevo’ (Artillery fire causes bloodbath in Sarajevo), de Volkskrant, 29/05/92.

²³⁴⁶ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 194; Maass, Neighbor, p. 31. See also Wijnaendts, Kroniek, p. 181.

²³⁴⁷ Leonard Doyle, ‘Muslims “slaughter their own people”’, The Independent, 22/08/92; MID/CO. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 65/92, 11/09/92; 68/92, 22/09/92; 69/92, 25/09/92; 01/93, 05/01/93; 16/93, 22/02/93; 17/93, 25/02/93; ABZ, 911.31, Yugoslavia. Political relations and parties, Part V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID/CO. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 93/92, 04/12/93; Cf. ibidem 25/93, 13/04/93; 27/93, 19/04/93; Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994, MID/CO. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 31/93, 06/05/93.; 32/93, 10/05/93; 63/93, 02/11/93; 70/93, 15/12/93; 64/92, 08/09/92; 74/92, 12/10/92; 75/92, 15/10/92; DCBC, 2129, MID/CO. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 02/94, 11/01/94; 2126, 05/94, 25/01/94; 2125, 06/94, 31/01/94; 2124, 10/94, 15/02/94; 2120, 11/94, 18/02/94; 2119, 12/94, 22/02/94; 2118, 13/94, 25/02/94; L. MacKenzie, ‘Interventie zal in Bosnië geen vrede brengen’ (Intervention will not bring peace in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 06/02/93; Eyal, Europe, p. 67.]

²³⁴⁸ Among other sources, interview H. Silajdzic, 16/04/98.

²³⁴⁹ Morillon, Croire, pp. 95-96.

²³⁵⁰ ‘Die Welt muss sich einmischen’ (International community must intervene). Spiegel Interview with Bosnia’s President Alija Izetbegovic’, Der Spiegel, 29/06/92.

²³⁵¹ Charles Lane, ‘Dateline Sarajevo’, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 73.

²³⁵² Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 133.

²³⁵³ Boyd, Peace, p. 28.

instance, ‘and did not demand, during World War II, that Winston Churchill provide proof that the bombs exploding in London were German rather than British.’²³⁵⁴ The editors of The New Republic wrote following another large attack, that took place on the market of Sarajevo in February 1994, that shortly afterwards everyone was talking about ‘crater analysis’. They added ironically:

The little bomb fell, in the words of a British soldier, ‘in a range bracket that straddles both sides’. The sadists, lucky again. ‘When they kill me,’ the president of Bosnia said the day after the massacre, ‘they will probably say I committed suicide.’ With the authority, no doubt, of ‘bullet-hole-analysis’. This whole controversy is a Goebbels-like fake.²³⁵⁵

Whichever side was responsible, the attack on the Sarajevo bread queue led to a trade embargo by the European Community against Serbia and Montenegro on 28 May. The EC obviously took to heart Baker’s accusation that they were being too weak.²³⁵⁶ The American government then successfully worked, supported by Muslim states and Turkey, for a much more powerful boycott by the UN.²³⁵⁷

The European embargo was followed two days later by acceptance of Security Council Resolution 757. It was possible for this resolution to be passed because the Russian government, which up to then had resisted such moves, would be sorely in need of the goodwill and above all the credits of the G7 countries a little over a month later. A Russian veto of the resolution would have prevented this goodwill.²³⁵⁸ Resolution 757 punished the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia with sanctions that were heavier than those ever before imposed by the United Nations on a country. Import and export, together with transport to and from Serbia and Montenegro, were forbidden, financial transactions were almost totally forbidden, all scientific, cultural and sporting contacts were broken off and the level of diplomatic representation was drastically reduced. Only the supply of food and medicines to Yugoslavia was still permitted. As a consequence of the resolution Yugoslavia was also excluded from participation in the Olympic Games and the European Football Championships.

The resolution kept open the option, with reference to Chapter VII of the UN Charter, for military measures intended to bring about a peaceful solution to the crisis in the former Yugoslavia. Possibilities considered here were a marine blockade or closure of the airspace over Yugoslavia for military supply aircraft.²³⁵⁹ The sanctions were to remain in place until Serbia and Montenegro complied with Resolution 752, which among things condemned the military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Furthermore the resolution demanded that ‘all parties and others concerned create immediately the necessary conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to Sarajevo and other destinations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the establishment of a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport (...)’. Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali was given the task of making efforts to achieve this.

According to the Dutch Minister Van den Broek, this practically complete trade boycott was ‘a first step’ by the Security Council against Serbia. If Serbia were to conduct a policy of starvation against the Muslim areas, military protection of the aid convoys could form a following step.²³⁶⁰ The government parties were generally in agreement with the minister. Furthermore, they felt that the government should take the initiative in providing aid to Displaced Persons in Yugoslavia. De Kok ²³⁵⁴ Maass, Neighbor, p. 161.

²³⁵⁵ The editors, ‘The Abdication’, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 168.

²³⁵⁶ ‘Belgrade niet immuun’ (Belgrade not immune), De Volkskrant, 29/05/92.

²³⁵⁷ Janny Groen, ‘VS willen toch snel harde actie tegen Servië’ (US now wants tough action against Serbia taken quickly), de Volkskrant, 30/05/92.

²³⁵⁸ Andrei Edemskii, ‘Russian Perspectives’, Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 35.

²³⁵⁹ ‘VN-sancties tegen Servië’ (UN sanctions against Serbia), de Volkskrant, 01/06/92.

²³⁶⁰ Radio 1, NCRV, Hier and Nu, 31/05/92, 1.10pm.

wanted relief on the spot, for instance by the creation of a Safe Area protected by UN troops, as had been done for the Kurds following the end of the Gulf War.²³⁶¹

Meanwhile the American government began to show its scepticism. On 1 June an anonymous American functionary said that the Europeans 'couldn't organize a convoy of three cars if their lives depended on it'. The growing mutual irritation between the United States and Europe about the approach to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia became evident when a French diplomat commented in return that the American government was just trying to divert attention from the fact that it itself had ignored the events in ex-Yugoslavia for almost a year.²³⁶² Europe's 'finest hour', that seemed to have struck with the outbreak of the war in Slovenia, was now clearly over.

But the Netherlands, with American support, now seemed to rehabilitate itself from the criticism aimed at it during the EC chairmanship. This was also indicated by J.H. Sampiemon in NRC Handelsblad:

'Is there a secret American-Dutch agenda with regard to the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia? As a notorious international moralist, The Hague will certainly applaud the sharp rebuke, initiated by Washington, of the remaining Yugoslavia, the republics of Serbia and Montenegro.'²³⁶³

According to the commentator H.J.A. Hofland the Netherlands no longer needed to be ashamed that in the second half of 1991 it had expressed opinions which now, thanks to Secretary of State Baker, seemed to be becoming internationally accepted.²³⁶⁴ The commentators obviously remembered that Minister Van den Broek had conducted a strong anti-Serb policy. This was actually only the partial truth, as is revealed for instance by the limited interpretation of the ECMM mandate, the COREU from Van Walsum that called into question the borders of Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, the inertia in convening the Yugoslavia Conference, the criticism of the decision by the Croatian government to extend the war and the attempts to postpone the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia.

11. The political and military situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina

At the start of February the Bosnian government had included not only nine Muslims but also six Serbs and five Croats. The resignation of the Serbs had necessitated a revision of the government. On 31 May 1992 Izetbegovic formed a government of national unity which also gave space to parties that did not take a purely ethnic-national position.

Around this time the Serbs held almost 70 per cent of the territory in Bosnia-Herzegovina, more than a million people had already been driven from their homes and thousands, or possibly tens of thousands, had died. The strategy of the Bosnian Serbs had been focussed on a speedy conquest. Plans had been drawn up to take Sarajevo within one to one-and-a-half weeks and the rest of Bosnia-Herzegovina in three to four months. These plans had not succeeded because the Bosnian Serbs had underestimated the resistance put up by government and Croat forces.²³⁶⁵ The Bosnian Serb leaders particularly regretted the fact that the Bosnian capital had not fallen into the hands of Serbs, as these leaders had often had to leave behind their own homes and possessions in the Bosnian capital and were now compelled to make do with the insignificant ski-resort of Pale as capital of their 'republic'. Banja ²³⁶¹ 'Van den Broek sluit militaire actie tegen Servië niet uit' (Van den Broek does not rule out military action against Serbia), Trouw, 01/06/92.

²³⁶² Wio Joustra, 'Rol van vredestichter gaat United Nations nog erg moeilijk af' (Role of peacemaker still very hard for United Nations to fill), de Volkskrant, 02/06/92.

²³⁶³ J.H. Sampiemon, 'Wat resteert, is een wrede status quo' (What remains is a cruel status quo), NRC Handelsblad, 14/05/92.

²³⁶⁴ H.J.A. Hofland, 'Over There! (bis)' ('Over There!' (again)), NRC Handelsblad, 27/05/92.

²³⁶⁵ Jovan Divjak, 'The First Phase, 1992-1993: struggle for survival and genesis of the Army of Bosnia-Herzegovina', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 156-157; Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 216; Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 129-130.

Luka, the biggest Serb city, was not a candidate for the capital because Karadzic enjoyed relatively low popularity there.

Although the Bosnian Serb forces had not achieved everything their leaders had hoped for, they had still conquered somewhat more than the two-thirds share of Bosnia-Herzegovina that they had talked about before the fighting started. The territorial gains they had made in these first two months would remain virtually unchanged in the following three years, despite many armed confrontations and large numbers of dead and wounded. Following May 1992 the main aim of the Bosnian Serb authorities was to retain as much of their territory as possible in diplomatic and military terms, or through exchange of areas to acquire more of the territory they especially wanted.²³⁶⁶ The Bosnian Serbs would thus profit from the greatest possible retention of the status quo, which was weighted strongly in their advantage. Karadzic declared: 'We have what we want. We control 70 per cent of the region, but we claim only 64 per cent of it. All we need now is a homeland fixed in a treaty'.²³⁶⁷

The strategy of the Bosnian Serb leadership was thus, following the first months of the war, a defensive one. As the VRS had a relatively low manpower it was difficult to properly occupy the front line that totalled almost 1500 kilometres in length. At the same time the manpower level reduced the opportunities for going on the attack. This was why after the first months of war the VRS tactics were mostly confined to conducting sieges of towns and enclaves. This cautious strategy had a negative influence on morale. It could be expected that, despite the arms embargo, the light weaponry of the Bosnian government army would improve, together with the training of the ABiH troops.

Another weak point of the VRS was the connection between the Serb areas in the east of Bosnia and in the west. The Serb military had been able to conquer the Posavina Corridor, but at some points the area they held was no wider than two or three kilometres. The Croat and Muslim forces were on the two opposite sides of the corridor. When attempting to widen this strip the Serbs would chiefly encounter the Croats, who were less than enthusiastic about the existence of good supply lines to the Serbs on Croat territory.

This was why, on 15 July, the Serbs started a major offensive to secure the Posavina Corridor. During this offensive it immediately became clear that an extra deployment of Bosnian Serb troops on one front led to the very serious weakening of another front. The offensive on the Posavina Front thus allowed the Bosnian troops in Srebrenica, who had been able to throw off a Bosnian Serb dominance in May 1992, to substantially increase their territory in the summer of 1992. At the same time the Bosnian government army was able to push back the besieging Serb troops for some distance around Sarajevo.

Actually, after mid-1992 the situation for the Bosnian Serbs could only get worse in the long run if the victories already achieved were not to be fixed in an agreement with the Bosnian government. The attention given to this weakness was to be temporarily diverted in late 1992 and above all in early 1993 by the outbreak of hostilities between the ABiH (the Bosnian government army) and Croats. The long-term goal of the Bosnian government, which was dominated by Muslims, was a more or less centralistic united state, to which end they had to reverse the Serb conquests as far as possible through both negotiation and military actions. This goal applied in particular to those areas which had had a Muslim majority before April 1992, such as Eastern Bosnia.²³⁶⁸

12. Political changes in Belgrade

In early 1992 Dobrica Cosic and other nationalistic intellectuals realized that from the international perspective, with the recognition of Croatia and Bosnia, the idea of a Greater Serbia had become a non-²³⁶⁶ Interviews A. Buha, 17/12/99 and M. Toholj, 14/12/99.

²³⁶⁷ Quoted in Mønnesland, Land, p. 393.

²³⁶⁸ MID, MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 66/92, 14/09/92;, 71/92, 01/10/92; DCBC, 2125. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 06/94, 31/01/94.]

starter.²³⁶⁹ Cosic was seriously disappointed by the development undergone by Milosevic,²³⁷⁰ and he was not alone. As described, in January the Serb-Orthodox Church sided with Babic, at that time still the leader of the Croat Serbs, in his conflict with Milosevic and accused the Serbian president of bartering away the interests of the Serb people. A few weeks later the independent weekly Vreme, published in Belgrade, listed 70 of Milosevic's 'successes', such as war with Croatia, a stream of Displaced Persons, international isolation, inflation, a growth in violent crime and an exodus of the nation's elite.²³⁷¹ In mid-February, in Belgrade in the space of five days, the Democratic Party was able to collect 200,000 signatures to a petition calling for the resignation of Milosevic.

In the eyes of many nationalists Milosevic had not turned out to be the man who had the interests of the Serb people at heart. Cosic felt himself to be roundly betrayed by the Serbian president.²³⁷² Consequently Cosic's villa, actually situated quite close to that of Milosevic, became in early 1992 a meeting place for nationalist intellectuals who felt that Milosevic had done their cause more harm than good. This group was added to by persons from political and military circles and from the intelligence and security services, not only from Serbia but also from Serb circles in Croatia and Bosnia. One of the members of this group was Nikola Koljevic, one of the Bosnian Serb leaders. The group was convinced that Cosic should replace Milosevic. Cosic himself did not however wish to become politically active, despite the great pressure exerted on him by his supporters.²³⁷³ One of the reasons he gave was his weak health: he had problems with his circulation, his heart and his prostate gland. In the previous years he had undergone major surgery three times.²³⁷⁴ Instead of becoming politically active, on 8 April Cosic warned Milosevic in a letter that his leadership was doomed and urged the Serbian president to form a government of national unity. As soon as Milosevic had received the letter he invited Cosic to a conversation, also attended by Kosta Mihajlovic, one of the authors of the memorandum issued by the Serbian Academy of Science and Arts in 1986 (see Chapter 4 of the section 'History preceding the conflict...' in this report).

Criticism of Milosevic increased following the outbreak of the war in Bosnia; this criticism was expressed in many sections of society. Some leaders of the Orthodox Church criticized the crimes committed by Serbs in Bosnia. In their opinion Milosevic should be replaced by a moderate non-Communist who would be internationally acceptable. These circles focussed their hopes on persons such as Prince Aleksandar Karadjordjevic, the son of the former King Petar, who visited Belgrade in June 1992.²³⁷⁵ In the same month the Serb Orthodox Church in Belgrade organized a 'prayers for peace' march against Milosevic and against the participation of Serbia in the conflicts in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Ten thousand Serbs took part in this march, carrying a variety of bells. During the demonstration the churches of Belgrade rang their bells,²³⁷⁶ and the procession was led by Patriarch Pavle.²³⁷⁷ He had already expressed his support for a march by 50,000 demonstrators on 9 March, organized to commemorate the bloody suppression of another demonstration on the same date a year before. When speaking to the demonstrators on that occasion he had addressed Milosevic and the Serbian government with the words: 'For you, all the bloodshed and all the misfortune in the insanity of this fratricidal war has not revealed the truth that no good can come of such evil.'²³⁷⁸ On 29 May the ²³⁶⁹ The following is based chiefly on Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 126 v.v.

²³⁷⁰ This is also indicated by interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

²³⁷¹ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Volksmenner Milosevic vreest nu 'de straat'' (Demagogue Milosevic now fears 'the street'), de Volkskrant, 20/02/92. See also Judah, Serbs, pp. 276-278.

²³⁷² Cosic quoted in Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 306.

²³⁷³ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 165; idem, Autoritet, pp. 5-6; interviews V. Matovic, 02/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²³⁷⁴ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 198; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²³⁷⁵ Cohen, Serpent, p. 155.

²³⁷⁶ 'Servisch protest tegen oorlog' (Serb protest against war), De Stem, 15/06/92.

²³⁷⁷ 'Patriarch loopt voorop in Belgrado' (Patriarch leads the protest in Belgrade), NRC Handelsblad, 15/06/92; 'Duizenden Serviërs protesteren tegen oorlogsgeweld' (Thousands of Serbs protest against war violence), de Volkskrant, 15/06/92; Ramet, Babel, p. 202.

²³⁷⁸ Thomas, Serbia, p. 112.

Serb Orthodox Church issued an official statement for the first time since the Second World War in which it criticized Serb authorities. In the declaration the Orthodox bishops called for the formation of 'a government of national salvation': 'We remind those in power that no one's seat is more important than the fate and the freedom of the entire people and that no one has a monopoly on the people and the future of our children.'²³⁷⁹

After 18 members of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences had written an open letter at the end of November 1991 in which they called for an immediate end to what they saw as the senseless war in Croatia,²³⁸⁰ a meeting of the Academy followed on 4 June 1992 at which 37 academics demanded the resignation of Milosevic.²³⁸¹ The Academy became violently divided between the supporters and opponents of Milosevic.²³⁸²

The group around Cosic is said to have maintained contacts both with nationalist politicians in Moscow and with Western intelligence and security services, including the CIA, about the attitude of foreign countries to a coup against Milosevic. At the start of May Koljevic approached the American ambassador Zimmermann, according to him with the knowledge of Cosic, but heard from the diplomat that Zimmermann did not regard him and several other Serb nationalists as the solution, but in fact as 'major problems'.²³⁸³

In mid-May the majority of the opposition, divided until then, joined together in the Democratic Movement of Serbia (DEPOS). It refused to participate in the elections on 31 May for the parliament of rump Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) which had been announced shortly before and which had left the opposition too little time to prepare. The Albanians in Kosovo did not participate in the elections either, so that only 56 per cent of the electorate voted. Of these cast votes, another 12 per cent were declared invalid. The resulting parliament consisted mostly of Milosevic supporters, Milosevic's wife Mira Markovic, who had her own Communist party, and the extreme nationalist Seselj. While the party of Milosevic gained 43 per cent of the votes, the party of Seselj surprised with an electoral success of 30 per cent. Another surprise was in store for Milosevic on 25 June when a faction under the leadership of Cedomir Mirkovic split off from his party because it advocated a more reform-oriented policy. In the months following the elections, students repeatedly demonstrated against Milosevic's war policy and demanded his resignation. The leading opposition figure, Vuk Draskovic, who now increasingly changed his nationalist position for a more democratic one, said that the enemy of the Serbian people was based in Belgrade and resembled Saddam Hussein.²³⁸⁴ Other opposition parties urged a coalition government without Milosevic in which the opposition would have to be represented in order to prevent a civil war.

Milosevic's economic problems were mounting up as well. After the United Nations had declared a boycott of Serbia and Montenegro on 30 May queues immediately formed at filling stations, where no more than 12 litres of fuel was issued per car.²³⁸⁵ Milosevic instructed his propaganda department to present the sanctions to the Serb people as proof of a worldwide conspiracy against his regime, in the hope of appealing to nationalist sentiments among the population. Nonetheless, just as in November 1991, Milosevic was seriously concerned about the effect of sanctions on the already shaky economy. The joint gross national product of Serbia and Montenegro had roughly halved since 1989. The industrial output had dropped by tens of percentage points since the previous summer, and at the end of April 750,000 citizens of Yugoslavia were registered as unemployed. Inflation had reached 40

²³⁷⁹ 'Servische kerk hekelt regering' (Serb church denounces government), NRC Handelsblad, 20/05/92.

²³⁸⁰ 'Servische academici: deze oorlog is zinloos' (Serb academics: this war is senseless), de Volkskrant, 27/11/91.

²³⁸¹ Olivera Milosavljevic, 'The Abuse of the Authority of Science', Popov (ed.) War, p. 295.

²³⁸² Olivera Milosavljevic, 'From Memorandum to 'Collective' Responsibility', Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia, Elite, p. 18.

²³⁸³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 201.

²³⁸⁴ Ramet, Babel, p. 202.

²³⁸⁵ Ulrike Rudberg, "Servië is rijk, het voedde de halve wereld" (Serbia is rich, it feeds half the world), de Volkskrant, 02/06/92; Nicole Lucas, 'We overleven het wel, zeggen de Serviers' (Serbs say 'we'll survive'), Trouw 02/06/92.

per cent per month and in the month of April it was no less than 80 per cent. Official figures predicted an inflation of 17,500 per cent for all of 1992; it was ultimately to be many times higher. The average monthly income had dropped below 100 guilders.²³⁸⁶ Even moderately conducted sanctions could thus be disastrous for Milosevic's image. Moreover, many Serbs in Serbia did not wish to pay for the costs of a war fought for the Serbs outside Serbia, whom they often described as primitive.²³⁸⁷

On 28 May, even before the Security Council had decided on widespread sanctions, Milosevic said on Serbian television that Yugoslavia was a 'medium-sized country with a great development potential' but in the same broadcast he admitted with regard to the economy that he '[did not] believe that there is a single citizen of Serbia who does not feel concern today'.²³⁸⁸ On 1 July the Belgrade regime was forced to freeze the wages and salaries in Yugoslavia and to devalue the dinar by 80 per cent. At the same time petrol was rationed to 20 litres per month.²³⁸⁹ In August 1992 most of the large factories had to close due to lack of fuel and raw materials.²³⁹⁰ A serious energy shortage was predicted for the winter. In Belgrade alone there were 200,000 apartments that could only be heated with oil. The sanctions led to a dramatic increase in unemployment. The Dutch embassy in Belgrade reported that social unrest was considerable as a result of the economic decline.²³⁹¹ Reports appeared in Serbian newspapers and magazines that a civil war would soon break out in Serbia. Milosevic had to think of a ruse.

After the creation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) at the end of April, and the acceptance of a constitution that provided for a president, Cosic was subjected to growing pressure from friends and the Orthodox Church to become politically active and to take up a state post.²³⁹² Milosevic himself and leading figures in his party, the SDS, also started to pressure Cosic now.²³⁹³ The motives cited for this were disparate. According to an advisor of Cosic, Milosevic needed a true nationalist because Milosevic himself, originally from Montenegro, would otherwise now encounter difficulties with the extreme nationalist opposition in Serbia, such as Seselj and his party.²³⁹⁴ According to another party this Montenegrin background presented no problems at all, but Milosevic hoped to boost his popularity again with the appointment of Cosic.²³⁹⁵

In the first week of June Milosevic offered Cosic the presidency of the new Yugoslavia. In view of the letter of 8 April and other messages that Cosic had sent the Serbian leader,²³⁹⁶ it can have been no secret to Milosevic and his party leadership that Cosic was taking an increasingly sceptical attitude towards the President of Serbia and his policy. Milosevic must however have calculated that he would be wiser to put Cosic, who was at his best as a manipulator behind the scenes, into a position in the limelight, where he would moreover be virtually powerless. Following the elections Milosevic's party, together with the Montenegrin Democratic Party of Socialists and Seselj's party, now dominated the federal parliament. It was not the Serbian people but this parliament that chose the president. It could also dismiss him.

²³⁸⁶ 'Het nieuwe – 'derde'- Joegoslavië' (The new – 'third' – Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 28/04/92; Theo Engelen, 'Voor Milosevic is het erop of eronder' (Sink or swim for Milosevic), NRC Handelsblad, 29/05/92; Nicole Lucas, 'We overleven het wel, zeggen de Serviers', Trouw 02/06/92; Judah, Serbs, p. 267.

²³⁸⁷ Cf. Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 118.

²³⁸⁸ Quoted in Cohen, Serpent, p. 161.

²³⁸⁹ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023 Memorandum from ASI to TZ/dossier, 02/09/92, no. 3212.

²³⁹⁰ Richard Becker, 'The role of sanctions in the destruction of Yugoslavia', Nato, p. 119.

²³⁹¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01802. Engels 283 to Van den Broek, 14/09/92.

²³⁹² Interview V. Matovic, 16/12/99.

²³⁹³ Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 165-166; interviews V. Matovic, 02/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01; Oliveira Milosavljevic, 'The Abuse of the Authority of Science', Popov (ed.) War, p. 295; Djukic, Vetru, p. 192.

²³⁹⁴ Interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

²³⁹⁵ Interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²³⁹⁶ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 166.

By this time Cosic was not only dissatisfied with Milosevic, but unhappy with the opposition too.²³⁹⁷ He felt that it was more intellectually than politically oriented; besides this, the opposition was fragmented and spent more time in discussions with each other than with the population.²³⁹⁸ Under these circumstances Cosic had little alternative than to play a more visible role on the political stage himself. On 15 July the Milosevic-controlled parliament elected Cosic to the position of President of Yugoslavia.

Cosic's policy as president was chiefly focussed on the international community. Here, he believed, lay the key to improving the lot of the Serbian people. He thought that if he could clarify what he saw as the historical roots of the conflict, the West would gain a better understanding of the Serb standpoint.²³⁹⁹ Moreover, Cosic was convinced that as long as Communists or ex-Communists were in power, the West would not be prepared to lift the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and also that no favourable agreements could be made for the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. The policy of the brand-new federal president was thus aimed at getting a new government into power in Serbia.²⁴⁰⁰ Furthermore a confederation should be created in Bosnia: an idea he felt to be justified, as he told his foreign contacts, because not only Serbs but all three parties in Bosnia were guilty of crimes.²⁴⁰¹ At the same time he signalled to the Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia that in the current international climate they could not expect to join with Serbia or rump Yugoslavia.²⁴⁰² Autonomy was the most they could hope for.

Cosic's policy was to gain the support of a man who until then had been a total outsider in Serbian politics: Milan Panic.²⁴⁰³ Prior to his appointment Cosic had suggested to the leadership of the SDS that the future prime minister of rump Yugoslavia should be a Serb who had gained a positive reputation working abroad. The leadership of the SDS had agreed to this.²⁴⁰⁴ With this move, in fact, Cosic and the SDS immediately broke a provision of the new constitution stipulating that if the president of the federation was a Serb, the prime minister should be a Montenegrin.

Shortly before the election of Cosic by the parliament, intimates of Milosevic proposed to Cosic and his advisors that Milan Panic be appointed as prime minister. He was an unknown quantity to Cosic, but he agreed to this candidate.²⁴⁰⁵ Panic had fled Yugoslavia in 1955, at the age of 25, supposedly to take part in a cycle race in the Netherlands. In fact he went to the United States. Here, following studies in biochemistry in California, he set up the pharmaceuticals company International Chemical and Nuclear (ICN), which at the start of the 1990s achieved a global annual turnover of half a billion dollars. In 1990 ICN had entered into a joint venture with the Yugoslavian state company Galenika. In this way the dynamic self-made man Panic had become acquainted with President Milosevic. Milosevic invited Panic to dinner when the Yugoslavian American was visiting Belgrade on business and offered him the office of prime minister of Yugoslavia. Milosevic saw Panic as the ideal man for a campaign directed at the West for removal of the sanctions against Yugoslavia.²⁴⁰⁶

However, the arrival of Panic was delayed by several weeks because the pill magnate was conducting negotiations with the government in Washington to prevent the American authorities taking action against his company as part of the UN sanctions regime if he should accept the ²³⁹⁷ Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 307.

²³⁹⁸ Stojanovic, Autoritet, pp. 26 and 33.

²³⁹⁹ Stojanovic, Autoritet, pp. 34, 38-41 and 47.

²⁴⁰⁰ Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 171 and 186-187.

²⁴⁰¹ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 188.

²⁴⁰² Stojanovic, Fall, p. 191; idem, Autoritet, pp. 42-43; interviews S. Djukic, 04/08/01; V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

²⁴⁰³ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 169; interview S. Djukic, 04/08/01.

²⁴⁰⁴ Interviews V. Matovic, 02/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²⁴⁰⁵ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 167; Djukic, Vetra, p. 197; interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

²⁴⁰⁶ According to Mira Markovic this was the only motive for her husband (and herself) to choose Panic, quoted in Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, no page numbers, n. 149. see also John F. Burns, 'Bosnia Loses Any Hope of Being Saved', The New York Times, 25/07/93.

Yugoslavian state function.²⁴⁰⁷ On 4 July Panic finally arrived from the US in Belgrade to take up office. He was accompanied by John Scanlan, who had been the American ambassador to Belgrade between 1985 and 1989. Scanlan had left the American foreign service in 1991 and had then become vice-president of Panic's pharmaceuticals company, charged with supervising the expansion of the company in the former Communist world.

Panic, who quickly acquired the nickname of 'the Ross Perot of the Balkans',²⁴⁰⁸ turned to his task with energy. During his inaugural speech he called for peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Five days after his appointment he travelled to Sarajevo where he met Izetbegovic. After this meeting he criticized 'cheap politicians who have played the nationalist card and brought about a civil war'.²⁴⁰⁹ In the summer Panic was to sack one of the most important executors of Milosevic's policy of illegal arming of nationalists and paramilitaries, Mihalj Kertes. Panic also placed himself at the head of the Ministry of Defence, although this was only accepted by the army high command after it had been assured that final authority would be held by Cosic.

Immediately after his arrival Panic told Milosevic that there was only one way to get the sanctions against Yugoslavia lifted: Milosevic himself should disappear from the political stage. In order to sweeten the bitter pill of resignation for Milosevic the pharmaceuticals man offered ex-Prime Minister Milosevic a well-paid job as director of a planned American-Yugoslavian bank in California.²⁴¹⁰ Milosevic did not immediately refuse the offer. In fact, he himself had announced at the start of June that he was prepared to step down if this could lead to the lifting of sanctions against Yugoslavia.²⁴¹¹

Following this Panic contacted the Bush government to obtain a visa for the Milosevic family. However, Panic's position both at home and abroad was weak. Many foreign politicians and diplomats saw Panic as a puppet of Milosevic, who would be sidelined as soon as the international community had lifted the sanctions.²⁴¹² Moreover, the attitude of the international community towards Cosic and Panic was made more difficult because they were President and Prime Minister respectively of Federal Yugoslavia, which still claimed to be the successor to the old Yugoslavia. As described, the international community did not recognize the new Yugoslavia and the legal succession.²⁴¹³ Finally, to many in the West Milosevic seemed, despite all that had happened, to be a man one could do business with when necessary. After all, had not Milosevic pushed through acceptance of the Vance Plan against the resistance of Milan Babic? And who else apart from Milosevic would be able to get the Bosnian Serb leadership to end the aggression in Bosnia?

Another disadvantage of Cosic and Panic was that they had not been able to get the existing opposition against Milosevic within Serbia on their side.²⁴¹⁴ The opposition felt that they had almost managed to push Milosevic aside at the moment that Cosic and Panic accepted their posts, and thus, in the opinion of the opposition, had saved the Serbian leader.²⁴¹⁵ At the end of June, following repeated demonstrations by the opposition, Milosevic agreed to elections for the presidency of Serbia at the end of the year. After this announcement and with Cosic and Panic in their posts, the protests against Milosevic subsided. Milosevic harvested the first fruits of the appointment and Cosic and Panic stood there empty-handed. When Cosic invited representatives of the opposition for talks, most of them refused because they said they did not recognize the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, its constitution, ²⁴⁰⁷ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 167; interviews V. Matovic, 02/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²⁴⁰⁸ Gregory Crouch, 'Can-do Entrepreneur Will Tackle Balkan War', Los Angeles Times, 03/07/92.

²⁴⁰⁹ Thomas, Serbia, p. 123.

²⁴¹⁰ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 147; Djukic, Milosevic, p. 55.

²⁴¹¹ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Servische president Milosevic flirt met aanbod tot ontslag' (Serbian President Milosevic flirts with offer to resign), de Volkskrant, 05/06/92; Theo Engelen, 'Sleutel voor vrede in handen van president Servië' (Key to peace in hands of Serbian president), NRC Handelsblad, 06/06/92; Djukic, Milosevic, p. 56.

²⁴¹² Stojanovic, Fall, p. 169.

²⁴¹³ See for instance APVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van Schaik 753 to Van den Broek, 07/08/92.

²⁴¹⁴ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 178; idem, Autoritet, p. 10.

²⁴¹⁵ Stojanovic, Autoritet, pp. 24-27.

and thus not the president either.²⁴¹⁶ Talks conducted by Cosic and Panic with the Albanian leaders in Kosovo in late 1992 were to remain equally fruitless.²⁴¹⁷

On 10 July Panic met James Baker in Helsinki, where he pressed for an assurance that the sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro would be lifted in exchange for the resignation of Milosevic. Baker said this was out of the question: the lifting of sanctions was not a matter for the US, but for the UN. Panic returned to Belgrade having accomplished nothing.

Shortly after this Panic made a new attempt and requested a conversation with Deputy Secretary of State Eagleburger. But the latter rejected a meeting with Panic out of hand, citing the order from President Bush that the United States should keep out of the Bosnian question. Eagleburger himself was not happy with Panic's appointment. He is said to have believed that Panic, by accepting the office of prime minister of rump Yugoslavia, had thwarted the opportunity for removing Milosevic.²⁴¹⁸ It does indeed seem that Cosic and Panic had disrupted Anglo-American plans. The British Foreign Minister Hurd was later to tell Cosic that the British government had been planning to oust Milosevic and to have him replaced by Aleksandar Karadjordjevic. However, following the appointment of Cosic the government in London had abandoned the plan.²⁴¹⁹

Aware that he could not count on American help, Panic turned to Cosic and his circle. With their support Panic once again tried to convince Milosevic to step down. Cosic did indeed side with Panic in this matter.²⁴²⁰ Almost from the moment that he took up office, Cosic, just like Panic, was constantly at odds with Milosevic.²⁴²¹ There were strong personal differences between Cosic and Milosevic. One major factor was the age difference of 20 years in a society strongly stratified by generations. Moreover, Cosic came from the world of art and literature while Milosevic was uncultivated. Cosic took the long-term view, while Milosevic decided things from day to day.²⁴²² Finally there were major differences about the policy to be followed, whereby Cosic's main concern was the Serbian people and Milosevic primarily followed his own interest.²⁴²³ Although Panic, with his background in American corporate culture, was also a very different person to Cosic, the two soon managed to get along. Panic, who had been away from Yugoslavia for more than 20 years, made a number of political blunders to begin with, but Cosic valued his intentions.²⁴²⁴ According to various persons involved, Milosevic's resignation had actually been one of the conditions on which Cosic accepted his post.²⁴²⁵

Panic was also able to obtain the support of Milosevic's confidant, the media man Dusan Mitevic. The Chief of Staff of the Yugoslavian army, Zivota Panic (no relation to the Yugoslavian prime minister), was more hesitant.²⁴²⁶ According to Cosic, three weeks after the accession of his government Panic submitted a written agreement to Milosevic in which the latter would promise to resign. If he did this the sanctions would immediately be lifted, Milosevic would become president of the Serbian-American Bank and Milosevic and his family would be granted visas for the United States. The agreement was to be signed by Milosevic and Baker. According to Cosic this was the only time that Milosevic genuinely considered stepping down as president. He seemed seriously concerned about his own fate.²⁴²⁷ Two days later, however, he called to say that he would not sign. According to Cosic, Mira ²⁴¹⁶ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 168.

²⁴¹⁷ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 231.

²⁴¹⁸ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 148-153; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²⁴¹⁹ Djukic, Vetra, p. 209.

²⁴²⁰ Jovic, Dani, p. 480.

²⁴²¹ Interviews S. Djukic, 04/08/01; V. Matovic, 02/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²⁴²² Interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

²⁴²³ Cf. Stojanovic, Fall, p. 171.

²⁴²⁴ Interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

²⁴²⁵ Interviews D. Cosic, 13/09/01; V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01; Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 169 and 215.

²⁴²⁶ See also Robin Alison Remington, 'The Yugoslav Army: Trauma and Transition', in: Danopoulos & Zirker (eds.), Relations, pp. 166-167.

²⁴²⁷ Djukic, Vetra, p. 201.

Markovic had talked her husband out of the idea.²⁴²⁸ Afterwards Milosevic did not want to be reminded of the episode and denied that he had ever made an agreement with Panic about resigning.²⁴²⁹ When Milosevic also realized that Panic had been cold-shouldered by the American government and had been bluffing, he knew that he had nothing really to fear from Panic and he regained his energy.²⁴³⁰ The world once again appeared as the Serbian president liked to imagine it: it consisted of enemies and of people who could be used or abused.²⁴³¹ A newly self-assured Milosevic stated that the role of Cosic and Panic was simply to be the executors of his policies.²⁴³² But they were not yet prepared to accept this view of things.

13. Conclusion

The war in Bosnia had been predicted long in advance. However, it was only two months after its outbreak that the West was able to formulate a concrete response in the form of a UN boycott. But the means to enforce this were not yet available. Worse still, the coincidentally present peacekeeping troops had left the Bosnian capital. Once again the West was lagging behind events when a conflict erupted in the former Yugoslavia.

This reserve was due to a combination of reasons. To begin with there was an unwillingness to deploy troops in a state that was still awaiting recognition. But the chief motives were probably the lack of UN resources and the absence of agreement by the Bosnian Serbs. Furthermore, the Secretary-General of the UN, Boutros-Ghali, felt that the rich European Community should do something while the leaders of the EC said they were waiting for the UN. This was not to be the last time in the Bosnian conflict that the parties passed the buck back and forth.

The European Community accepted a form of ethnic division in Bosnia from the very start. The speed at which Serb troops realized this in practice betrayed their thorough preparation. Of the parties in Bosnia, only the government in Sarajevo still took a multi-ethnic position. The Bosnian Serb and Bosnian Croat leaders strove for the autonomy or secession of ethnically homogenous areas. The ferocity of the conflict and the rapid escalation quickly created a situation in which intervention was difficult, if not impossible.

Reversing the process of ethnic homogenization would require a major effort by the West, in all likelihood not only at the negotiating table but also by military means. In view of the hesitation in the Western camp during the first year of war in the former Yugoslavia, it was unclear whether the Western governments were able to make, and wished to make, this military effort. In this respect the (Bosnian) Serb policy of quickly achieving a fait accompli had proved successful.

The question was whether the Serb leaders would manage to capitalize politically on their military successes by means of a favourable peace agreement. Or would public opinion in the West finally turn against the ethnic cleansing, and in a way that pressured the Western governments to do more? This was the Bosnian government's gamble. Concrete reports about the brutal acts of Serb troops in East and Northwest-Bosnia were still scarce and in the Netherlands – but not only there – politicians and media were still taking a reserved stance on the war in Bosnia. Nonetheless, in the course of May enough information reached the West to generate the first signs of a growing readiness for more humanitarian or military action.²⁴³³ The path between doing nothing and doing something started to be explored. The risk that this involved was that half-measures would be decided on, a nightmare for the military since the lessons of the Vietnam War.

²⁴²⁸ Djukic, Vetra, 201.

²⁴²⁹ Interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

²⁴³⁰ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, pp. 148-153; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

²⁴³¹ Cf. Inic, Portreti, p. 146.

²⁴³² Inic, Portreti, p. 136.

²⁴³³ See also for instance Stephen S. Rosenfeld, 'Idee van militair ingrijpen tegen Servië wint terein in VS' (Idea of military intervention against Serbia gains ground in US), NRC Handelsblad, 26/05/92.

The West had more opportunities for political manipulation in the former Yugoslavia than for military action, either by supporting the opposition in Bosnia and Serbia or by exploiting the differences between Milosevic on the one side and Cosic and Panic on the other. However, the politicians and diplomats of the West showed little creativity in this respect. They quickly assumed that the only negotiation partners in the former Yugoslavia were the nationalist leaders – the most pessimistic scenario – even though remarks attributed to Eagleburger and Hurd indicate that at least one attempt to manipulate Serbian politics was made by the governments in Washington and London.

Furthermore, the European Community and the United States, which was starting to play a stronger role, took a position on the Yugoslavian legal succession based more on pragmatism than on principles. This was in glaring contrast to the lack of haste showed by these countries when it came to opening diplomatic offices in Sarajevo. In this respect too they revealed that they continued to view the Milosevic regime as the most important negotiation partner. Unless the West was prepared to take military action to reverse the fait accompli in Bosnia that the Serbs had presented to the world, then Milosevic would remain the central point of contact. It was through him that Europe, the United States and the UN had to continue to exert pressure on the Bosnian Serbs and prevent a conflict breaking out elsewhere, for instance in Kosovo or Macedonia.

Chapter 6

Emotionalization of the debate following reports about the camps ('Omarska'): June 1992 – August 1992

1. The peace mission begins its task in Bosnia; UNPROFOR-II gets underway

Resolution 757, which was passed by the Security Council on 30 May, contained the most far-reaching embargo ever imposed on a country by the UN, but at the time it was accepted there were no enforcing measures attached to it. The resolution also required that all parties should immediately establish the conditions for the unhampered delivery of humanitarian aid to Sarajevo and other destinations in Bosnia-Herzegovina. One of these conditions was that there would be a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport.

However, after the acceptance of Resolution 757, the Bosnian Serbs did not back down at all; for example, they continued to occupy the airport of the Bosnian capital. The question was whether countries or international organizations would be prepared to enforce the stipulations of this resolution by military means. Many governments regretted what was happening in Bosnia, but at the same time there was not a single government which thought that it touched on vital interests of their own state,²⁴³⁴ and therefore they were not very willing to become deeply involved in the situation in Bosnia, for instance by putting the lives of their own military at risk. On the other hand, in the media there was growing pressure on the Western governments to 'do something'.²⁴³⁵

On 2 June the WEU Assembly met. The Dutch MP De Hoop Scheffer had the task of reporting on Yugoslavia and the sanctions against that country. De Hoop Scheffer said that 15 July, the date fixed by the UN to report on the effectiveness of the embargo, was too late. The Assembly then appealed to the governments of the member states to consider the use of military force in the Yugoslav conflict. As usual, the British Foreign Minister Douglas Hurd stepped on the brake: 'Neither the UN, the EC, the NATO, the WEU or any other combination of initials can make peace or drive out the fear and hatred in Eastern Europe by force.'²⁴³⁶

However, on 5 June Cedric Thornberry, UNPROFOR's Director of Civil Affairs, managed to reach an agreement with the conflicting parties in and around Sarajevo as to opening the airport. According to this agreement, humanitarian aid would be delivered to Sarajevo under UN supervision, ²⁴³⁴ Cf. Andreatta, War, Bert, Superpower, pp. xxiii, 12, 68-69, 74-75 and 78; Steven L. Burg, 'Negotiating a Settlement: Lessons of the Diplomatic Process', Blank (ed.), Wars, p. 52; id., 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esman/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 262; Callahan, Wars, pp. 43-44, 97; Haass, Intervention, p. 72; J.L. Heldring, 'Een mutatie in de staat' ('A change in the state'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/06/95; Steven A. Holmes, 'Backing Away Again, Christopher Says Bosnia Is Not a Vital Interest', New York Times, 03/06/93; Klep, 'Offer', p. 14; Koslowski, 'Bosnien', p. 366; Newhouse, 'Round', p. 68; Koen Koch, 'Joegoslavië, Oost-Europa en de strategie van neo-containment', in: De Vries e.a., Continent, pp. 117-118 and 129; F. Stephen Larrabee, 'US Policy in the Balkans: From Containment to Strategic Reengagement', Danopoulos & Messas (eds.), Crises, p. 281; Bruce K. MacLauray, 'Foreword' in: Woodward, Tragedy, p. vii; Woodward, Tragedy, pp. 6-7; Moore, 'Report', p. 1; Newhouse, 'Round', p. 68; James Baker in: Van der Roer, Frontdiplomaten, p. 125; Don Oberdorfer/Marc Fischer, 'Bush Turns Aside Bosnian Plea for Military Intervention', The Washington Post, 10/07/92; J.H. Sampiemon, 'In Bihac klinkt echo van 1914' ('In Bihac an echo of 1914 can be heard'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/11/94; Doug Seay, 'U.S. and Bosnia: Too late, wrong war', Heritage Foundation Report, 20/07/92; Shawcross, Evil, p. 114; Simms, Hour, pp. 11 and 14; Richard H. Ullman, 'Introduction: The World and Yugoslavia's Wars', id. (ed.), World, p. 3; Infantry Major General ret'd. J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Ingrijpen in Joegoslavië?' ('Intervene in Yugoslavia?'), Carré 1992, no. 12, pp. 13-14; Wettig, 'Rolle', pp. 125-126.

²⁴³⁵ Cf. also Woodward, Tragedy, p. 273.

²⁴³⁶ 'Roep om militaire interventie in Joegoslavië luider' ('Call for military intervention in Yugoslavia louder'), de Volkskrant, 03/06/92.

without discrimination and purely on the grounds of need. The conflicting parties promised not to obstruct the humanitarian work in any way and guaranteed the safety of the aid workers. For this purpose, corridors between the airport and the city would be created, which would be supervised by UNPROFOR.²⁴³⁷

In a report to the Security Council on 13 May the head of the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations Murrack Goulding had warned against the deployment of UN troops in Bosnia, a country torn apart by war. Nevertheless, after the 'airport agreement' on 8 June the Security Council decided in Resolution 758 to send a thousand UN troops to Sarajevo, as well as sixty military observers and forty policemen. They were to assume control of the airport so that an airlift could be arranged to send food and medical supplies to the suffering inhabitants of the Bosnian capital. The resolution stipulated that the conflicting parties were not to obstruct air traffic and must therefore withdraw their weapons out of the field of fire of the airport. Resolution 758 was based on Resolution 757, which referred expressly to Chapter VII of the UN charter, thus authorizing the use of force. It was strange that the mandate of the Resolution 758 was for classic peacekeeping, in which only self-defence was permitted. Conditions for the implementation of the resolution were a lasting ceasefire and acceptance by the parties involved.

Major General Lewis MacKenzie, who had up till then been Force Commander Nambiar's Chief of Staff, was put in charge of implementing the resolution. In addition to the hundred French soldiers who had remained in Sarajevo when Nambiar moved the headquarters to Belgrade, he also had the Canadian battalion, which withdrew from sector East in Croatia, at his disposal. However, the Canadian battalion was to fulfil this task only temporarily; at the end of July it returned to East Croatia to resume its original task. In the meantime it had been replaced by three smaller infantry companies consisting of five hundred men each: Frenchbat 2, an Egyptian and a Ukrainian battalion. Together, these three supposedly reflected the religious background of the three parties in the conflict, namely Catholic, Muslim and Orthodox.

Irritation between UNPROFOR and the inhabitants of Sarajevo

MacKenzie, who had experience of classic peacekeeping operations, was not to have an easy time carrying out his task. Later he was to complain that he had experienced 17 ceasefires, the longest of which had lasted four days.²⁴³⁸ On 11 June he moved into Sarajevo with an advance guard of 150 Canadian troops and a few French military observers. A few weeks later the rest of the Canadian troops joined them. This was the beginning of the UNPROFOR operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina; it was called UNPROFOR II, to distinguish it from the operation in Croatia, UNPROFOR I. In fact, in common parlance the term UNPROFOR continued to be used to refer to the mission in the former Yugoslavia in general. Later in this report this usage will be adopted; the term UNPROFOR will be used when strictly speaking UNPROFOR II is meant.

When MacKenzie arrived in Sarajevo, he was welcomed by cheering inhabitants.²⁴³⁹ However, their enthusiasm was soon to fade, in the first place because a ceasefire was not effected, so that in practice the airport was still not open. Moreover, the inhabitants came to realize that UNPROFOR had not come to fight on the side of the Bosnian government. The sole purpose of UNPROFOR II was to ensure the safe provision of food to the people of Sarajevo. This led to reproaches by the Sarajlije, the inhabitants of the Bosnian capital, that the United Nations was just making sure they could die with full stomachs.²⁴⁴⁰ The population asked the blue helmets to distribute weapons instead of food, and they ²⁴³⁷ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 200.

²⁴³⁸ United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, p. 57.

²⁴³⁹ See for example Hans Moleman, 'Aankomst VN-konvooi geeft burgeres Sarajevo weer hoop' ('Arrival of UN convoy restores hope to Sarajevo woman'), de Volkskrant, 11/06/92.

²⁴⁴⁰ See for example. Maas, Neighbor, p. 30.

nicknamed UNPROFOR SERPROFOR²⁴⁴¹ or SRBOFOR.²⁴⁴² Passers-by greeted the white UNPROFOR armoured vehicles in Sarajevo with raised middle fingers or with shots.²⁴⁴³ More and more frequently, blue helmets were the targets of Bosnian government army firing; for example, around Sarajevo more UNPROFOR troops were killed by the ABiH than by the VRS.²⁴⁴⁴

This ingratitude had the effect of a cold shower on many of the UNPROFOR troops and increased the tendency to believe that none of the parties in the Bosnian conflict could be trusted.²⁴⁴⁵ The UN troops realized that it was in the interests of the Bosnian government and its army, as the weakest party, to provoke military intervention, but they did not appreciate the means by which this was done.²⁴⁴⁶ Moreover, each provocation by the ABiH, the government troops, led to a severe over-reaction from the Serb side in the form of artillery or mortar fire.²⁴⁴⁷ Provocations during which ABiH troops fired from positions near hospitals, densely populated areas and UN posts were particularly notorious among the blue helmets. This firing would then provoke a Serb reaction with heavy artillery, after which the Serbs were seen as the culprits.²⁴⁴⁸ There was also irritation with the Bosnian authorities who obstructed the restoration of food, electricity and water supplies because it would detract from the image of the Muslims as victims.²⁴⁴⁹

MacKenzie was extremely irritated at the attitude of the Muslims, which led to the idea that none of the parties could be trusted. 'Dealing with Bosnia is a little bit like dealing with three serial killers', MacKenzie told the Armed Services Committee of the American House of Representative in May 1993, after the conclusion of his task in Yugoslavia. 'One has killed fifteen. One has killed ten. One has killed five. Do we help the one that has only killed five?'²⁴⁵⁰

The Canadian commander seemed to have been traumatized by the incidents surrounding the abduction of the Bosnian president Izetbegovic at the beginning of May.²⁴⁵¹ At that point he had managed to persuade the JNA (Yugoslavian National Army) to release the Bosnian president in exchange for free passage for the JNA unit which was trapped in Sarajevo. While this agreement was being implemented, Muslims carried out a surprise attack on the retreating JNA troops, some of whom were killed. After this incident, MacKenzie saw many other incidents in the light of duplicity on the part of the Muslims. MacKenzie, who did everything in his power to attain a ceasefire, was of the opinion that the Bosnian government forces did just as much to prevent it as the VRS and probably more.²⁴⁵² The Canadian commander was also extremely irritated by the alleged firing of the ABiH on their own troops.²⁴⁵³ At a certain point he told his Serb and Muslim partners that peace might be achieved if only they were to stop shelling themselves.²⁴⁵⁴ As the first commander of UNPROFOR II, MacKenzie set the tone for his troops and for his successors.

²⁴⁴¹ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Gebulder laat Sarajevcani weinig hoop' ('Booming leaves little hope for Sarajevcani'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/07/92.

²⁴⁴² Theo Engelen, 'Muslims voelen zich alleen staan' ('Muslims feel isolated'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/92.

²⁴⁴³ John Daniszewski, 'VN-leger maakt zich in Bosnië niet populair' ('UN army not making itself popular in Bosnia'), Trouw, 24/07/92.

²⁴⁴⁴ Confidential report (1); Draulans, Mirjana, p. 113.

²⁴⁴⁵ See for example Van der Kroon, Defence, p. 97; the Dutch UN observer Gerard Wondergem, cited in: Anstadt, Scheuren, pp. 157-158.

²⁴⁴⁶ See for example MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 225, 230 and 292; interview T. Quiggin, 13 and 14/10/97.

²⁴⁴⁷ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 200, 227, 228, 238, 274, 292.

²⁴⁴⁸ See for example the interview with V. Andreev, 07/07/00; MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 200 and 309.

²⁴⁴⁹ Confidential report (1); the statements of the Belgian blue helmets Captain Jan Seger and Major François Robert in: Draulans, Mirjana, pp. 105-106; confidential information (75).

²⁴⁵⁰ Bennett, Collapse, p. 194 n. 28; Maas, Neighbor, p. 32; Gutman, Witness, p. 169.

²⁴⁵¹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 165.

²⁴⁵² MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 216 and 255.

²⁴⁵³ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 255-256, 267, 308.

²⁴⁵⁴ Maas, Neighbor, p. 30. See also 'Strijd Sarajevo' ('Conflict in Sarajevo'), de Volkskrant, 23/07/92.

The Bosnian authorities strongly resented the fact that MacKenzie accused them of duplicity. In turn, they accused him of being biased.²⁴⁵⁵ The authorities in Sarajevo were also annoyed with Morillon, the UNPROFOR commander in Sarajevo, because he advised against any threat of force by the West, because it would stand in the way of the work of the UN troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina.²⁴⁵⁶ After some time the Bosnian government launched a propaganda campaign against MacKenzie in which all the stops were pulled out.²⁴⁵⁷ For example, MacKenzie was ‘accused’ of having a Serbian wife – which was not the case – to whom he had been introduced by the ‘Serbian terrorist, Mila Mulronej’, the wife of the Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulronej.²⁴⁵⁸ Mila Mulronej had in fact been born in Serbia, but had moved from Belgrade to Canada for good at the age of five. Later it was alleged that at the beginning of June MacKenzie had visited a brothel in Vogosca, where Croatian and Muslim women were held against their will by Serbs. However, the ‘evidence’ relating to this allegation could not possibly have been true, since MacKenzie was staying in Belgrade at the time.²⁴⁵⁹ It was true that other UNPROFOR soldiers had made use of these women, and it was partly because the UN tried to cover this up that the rumours about MacKenzie were so persistent.²⁴⁶⁰ Eventually, at the end of July, MacKenzie came to the conclusion that the hostility of his ‘hosts’ was becoming too great a threat to his own life and those of his staff. He therefore decided to resign from his post.²⁴⁶¹ He was by no means the last representative of the United Nations to fall victim to smear campaigns and threats in the Bosnian capital, nor was he the last to be forced to leave the country to save his life. This proved how limited the capacities of the small UNPROFOR force in Bosnia were.

2. New security structures in the conflict

Some had already secretly wondered if it might not be possible for the NATO to take action in Yugoslavia. The NATO was a military organization with more possibilities and a more forceful image than the ‘soft’ UN. However, up till then the NATO, in accordance with its own treaty, had not been authorized to carry out peacekeeping operations. As was made clear in Chapter 1, the WEU and the CSCE also had their shortcomings, but in June and July of 1992 these organizations had undergone developments which increased their chances of becoming involved in the crisis in the former Yugoslavia.

In this context, an important role was reserved for the Dutch Minister Van den Broek, who had suggested in the spring of 1992 that from that point on NATO should be allowed to make a contribution to peacekeeping operations in the framework of the CSCE. For a number of reasons, this was a clever idea. Van den Broek succeeded in winning the approval of the French government for the reasoning that only NATO had the necessary infrastructure at its disposal to carry out a peacekeeping operation on behalf of the CSCE. The consequence was that the WEU, on which Paris had always placed high stakes, sank below the horizon and the NATO, to which the Netherlands attached so much importance, came into the spotlight. Moreover, Van den Broek’s plan gave NATO a new right to exist now that the Cold War was over. In addition, the plan offered the countries of Eastern Europe a security structure, something they sorely needed after the disappearance of communism and the Warsaw pact. ‘It is not always “Black Monday” for Dutch diplomacy,’ wrote the NRC Handelsblad jubilantly with respect to Van den Broek’s plan, referring to the rejection of the Dutch plans for the ²⁴⁵⁵ Morillon, Croire, p. 96; Eisermann, Weg, p. 118.

²⁴⁵⁶ Theo Engelen, ‘Militair geweld bemoeilijkt VN-opdracht in Joegoslavië’ (‘Military force makes UN task in Yugoslavia more difficult’), NRC Handelsblad, 11/07/92.

²⁴⁵⁷ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 274 and 290-291.

²⁴⁵⁸ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 293.

²⁴⁵⁹ Roy Gutman, ‘Bosnia Outrage. Ex-prisoner says UN troops sexually assaulted detainees’, Newsday, 01/11/93; Sells, Bridge, pp. 208-209 n. 43. Nevertheless, this allegation continued to haunt MacKenzie even in more serious literature. See for example Cuvalo, Dictionary, p. 160; Rathfolder, Sarajevo, p. 188

²⁴⁶⁰ Strobel, Policy, pp. 101-102.

²⁴⁶¹ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, pp. 290, 293.

European Community on 30 September 1991.²⁴⁶² Of course, there was still one drawback: the CSCE, with its 52 members, could only make decisions with the biggest possible majority (unanimous minus one, to prevent Yugoslavia from blocking every decision) and Russia might well prove to be a major troublemaker in relation to operations in the former Yugoslavia if they were aimed against Serbia.

On 4 June 1992 the meeting of the foreign ministers of the NATO member states decided in Oslo to accept Van den Broek's plan. However, the deployment of NATO troops would have to be examined in each separate case. In his farewell speech on 24 June, the Supreme Allied Commander of the NATO, General John Galvin, said that the NATO was the most suitable organization to intervene in Yugoslavia. It would be able to ensure 'deterrence, recovery and the maintenance of peace and humanitarian missions'.

His successor, General John Shalikasvili, was much more cautious in his statements. In his opinion, any peace mission to Yugoslavia would have to be prepared for the worst.²⁴⁶³ An American plea to use NATO resources to enforce the sanctions pursuant to UN Resolution 757 failed at once, on 4 June. Hurd, Dumas and Claes opposed the idea,²⁴⁶⁴ but the Dutch Minister Van den Broek embraced it. He supported the use of NATO resources to escort food convoys to the war zones, saying 'I admit that it is easier said than done. But I don't think that because it is so difficult and so risky we should do nothing.'²⁴⁶⁵ This statement was a typical one for Van den Broek, and it showed how much more prepared the Dutch government was than its European partners to deploy military resources in the former Yugoslavia. In the Dutch government meeting of 5 June there was also optimism about the new situation which had arisen as a result of the decision to allow the possibility of deploying NATO troops for peacekeeping operations outside the NATO's treaty area.²⁴⁶⁶

As yet, Van den Broek was not in favour of military intervention which went further than the protection of humanitarian convoys. In his opinion this would be possible only if there was wide international support. And that would not be the case until all diplomatic, political and economic means were exhausted.²⁴⁶⁷

By his enthusiasm, Minister Van den Broek placed himself in the international public eye. The French government had declared that it was willing to supply a large portion of the 1100 troops needed to implement UN Resolution 758 and that it was looking for partners.²⁴⁶⁸ 'Paris', wrote Wijnaendts, the Dutch ambassador in Paris, 'was fervently hoping that the Netherlands, which had constantly played an important role in the Yugoslav crisis, would also be prepared to make a contribution.'²⁴⁶⁹ However, Van den Broek made it clear that this time he 'did not want to be in the front line.' 'Defence will of course ²⁴⁶² 'Den Haag en de vrede' ('The Hague and peace'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/04/92. See also 'Navo in beginsel bereid militairen te leveren voor vredesoperaties' ('Nato willing in principle to contribute troops for peace operations'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/05/92; 'CVSE en NAVO' ('CSCE and NATO'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/05/91; B.J. van Eenennaam, 'Nederland blijft internationaal een belangrijke rol spelen' ('The Netherlands continues to play an important role internationally'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/05/92; 'Vredesmacht NAVO dichterbij' ('NATO peace force closer'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/05/92; Leonoor Meijer, 'Joegoslavië gruwelijke voorbode' ('Yugoslavia gruesome herald'), Trouw, 12/06/92.

²⁴⁶³ 'Navo tot interventie in staat' ('Nato capable of intervention'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/06/92.

²⁴⁶⁴ Theo Koelé, 'Optreden Navo in Joegoslavië is (verre) toekomstmuziek' ('Nato action in Yugoslavia in the (distant) future'), de Volkskrant, 03/06/92; 'Navo deinst terug voor optreden in ex-Joegoslavië' ('Nato shrinks from action in the former Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 05/06/92; Sally Jacobsen, 'NATO Foreign Ministers Approve Peacekeeping Role', AP, 04/06/92.

²⁴⁶⁵ Oscar Garschagen, 'VS zien rol NAVO bij afdwingen VN-sancties' ('US see a role for NATO in enforcing UN sanctions'), de Volkskrant, 05/06/92.

²⁴⁶⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 05/06/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²⁴⁶⁷ Jan van der Ven, 'Ingrijpen in Servië voor CDA al reëel' ('Intervention in Serbia already a real possibility for CDA'), Het Parool, 05/06/92; Leonoor Meijer, 'Joegoslavië gruwelijke voorbode', Trouw, 12/06/92.

²⁴⁶⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155, memorandum from head of DPV to AMAD, 09/06/92, no. DPV-886/92.

²⁴⁶⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155, Wijnaendts 230 to Van den Broek, 10/06/92.

be very pleased to hear this', commented Hoekema, head of the directorate of Political UN Affairs, spitefully.²⁴⁷⁰

It was indeed the case that Van den Broek's caution met with the support of the other ministers. At their meeting of 12 June, the government took the position that if the UN were to ask for assistance in the implementation of the recent UN resolutions, other Dutch efforts in the former Yugoslavia and the contribution made by the Netherlands to the peacekeeping force in Cambodia should be taken into account. Nevertheless, in response to a formal request by the UN Secretariat at the beginning of July, the Dutch government would provide 54 extra troops because it had become necessary to expand the Dutch signals unit, as well as several military observers.²⁴⁷¹ Later this number was raised from 54 to 65.²⁴⁷²

A few weeks after the decision made by the NATO on 4 June, the WEU ministers made a similar one, at Petersberg near Bonn on 19 June. In future, the WEU would be allowed to supply troops in areas of tension. They were to be deployed for humanitarian aid, crisis management operations, peacekeeping and peacemaking.²⁴⁷³ With this last term, peacemaking, the WEU went one step further than the NATO, which had agreed only to peacekeeping operations. The WEU would be able to act at the request of the UN, the CSCE and the European Union. The ministers also stipulated that a group of experts was to examine what contribution the WEU could make to the implementation of the Security Council resolutions in relation to Yugoslavia.²⁴⁷⁴

During a meeting at Helsinki on 9 and 10 July the CVSE designated itself as a regional organization in the sense of Chapter VIII of the UN charter. This means that they too would be authorized to carry out peacekeeping operations. Since the CSCE itself did not have troops at its disposal, for purposes of implementation it would have to rely on the NATO and the WEU. Finally, in December, the NATO declared that it was prepared to carry out peacekeeping operations under the authority of the UN Security Council. Gradually phenomena such as 'interlocking institutions' and 'double hatting' were becoming observable.

The CSCE meeting of 9 and 10 July was strongly focused on the Yugoslav crisis. As early as 15 April the CSCE had decided that territorial conquests and borders altered by means of violence would not be recognized and that the return of Displaced Persons to their homes must be guaranteed. On the eve of the meeting, Rest-Yugoslavia (consisting of Serbia and Montenegro) was suspended from membership for three months. Initially the Russian government was unwilling to allow a condemnation of Serbia during the conference. However, when the Russian delegation eventually decided to go along with the other member states, Van den Broek demanded his share of the credit. During the gala dinner on 9 July he had sat next to his Russian colleague Andrei Kozyrev and discussed the issue with him in depth. This must surely have had some effect.²⁴⁷⁵ Prime Ministers Lubbers also went out of his way to make the Dutch position absolutely clear. During the conference he told his audience that the selfishness of the West was almost as much of a threat to the security of Europe as nationalism in the East.²⁴⁷⁶

²⁴⁷⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155, memorandum from head of DPV to AMAD, 09/06/92, no. DPV-886/92.

²⁴⁷¹ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 01/07/92, S92/061/2239; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. 12/06/92, DPV/PZ-910/92; CRST. Memorandum from DAB for Ter Beek, 22/06/92, D92/272; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, p. 97.

²⁴⁷² ABZ, 00155, Boutros-Ghali to the Permanent UN Representative of the Netherlands, 09/07/92; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. PR New York to Van den Broek, 10/07/92, nyv-4777; SG 1991/1992. DS, Memorandum from Waltmann to Ter Beek, 10/08/92.

²⁴⁷³ Western European Council of Ministers, Petersberg Declaration, Bonn, 19/06/92, <http://www.weu.int/eng/comm/92-petersberg.htm>.

²⁴⁷⁴ Extraordinary meeting of the WEU Council of Ministers with States of Central Europe, 'Declaration on the Yugoslav crisis', Bonn, 19/06/92, <http://www.weu.int/eng/comm/92-bonn-b.htm>

²⁴⁷⁵ Guikje Roethof, 'Helsinki', De Groene Amsterdammer, 15/07/92, p. 4.

²⁴⁷⁶ Parliament records, R9200163 70.

But the slim success achieved in the suspension of Rest-Yugoslavia paled in comparison with the rude awakening which Izetbegovic underwent during the conference in a talk with the American president Bush Sr. In this talk the American president made it clear that the Bosnian government should not count on foreign intervention.²⁴⁷⁷ Mitterrand's spokesman rubbed it in firmly once again; there could be no question of military intervention, because that would lead to 'an unpredictable, extremely risky chain reaction'.²⁴⁷⁸ This led to an adjustment of the Bosnian government's politics. On many occasions during the following weeks Bosnian government spokesmen declared that all they were asking for was arms and possibly Close Air Support.²⁴⁷⁹ The Bosnian military could take care of the ground war themselves; after all, the Bosnian government had plenty of troops. It was odd that few people seemed to realize that the Bosnian government was asking for what the Americans were later to call a 'lift and strike' policy, i.e. lifting the arms embargo and launching air raids. It is remarkable that in the debate about whether or not there should be military intervention, this voice from Sarajevo was so seldom heard.

Implementation of the embargo: beginning of NATO involvement in the conflict

In the sideline of the CSCE meeting in Helsinki on 10 July, the WEU Ministers of Foreign Affairs decided to dispatch a squadron for a navy blockade to supervise the embargo which had been imposed on Yugoslavia by Security Council Resolutions 713 and 757.²⁴⁸⁰ Although in May the American government had accused the European governments of being too slack, they were not happy with this form of European 'decisiveness'.²⁴⁸¹ They preferred the NATO to go into action rather than the WEU, and arranged for a NATO squadron to set out as well. The Dutch government, worried about the disagreement between Europe and the US as to how to approach the crisis in Yugoslavia, stated by the mouth of Minister Van den Broek that without American participation 'the political signal would be too weak'²⁴⁸² and pressed for a joint operation by the WEU and the NATO. But this alternative appealed even less to the American government, because they were afraid that such a combined venture would be dominated by the WEU.

The NATO then claimed a very large area in the Adriatic Sea as its operational territory, but WEU president Italy was opposed to this because the WEU had been the first to bring the idea forward. By way of compromise, a boundary was then drawn between Brindisi in Italy and the point at which the border between Albania and Montenegro meets the sea. South of that boundary the WEU ²⁴⁷⁷ Theo Engelen, 'Moslims voelen zich alleen staan', NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/92; 'Dit bloedbad moet stoppen' ('This bloodbath must stop'), Trouw, 10/07/92.

²⁴⁷⁸ 'Bosnië smeekt om hulp' ('Bosnia begs for help'), de Volkskrant, 10/07/92.

²⁴⁷⁹ Silajdzic said this on 15 July; on 22 July Izetbegovic sent a letter to the Security Council in which he stated that military intervention could be limited to air strikes mainly against Serb artillery positions and airports, Giersch, Konfliktregulierung, p. 275; at the UNHCR conference on 29 July Vice-Premier Zlatko Lagumdžija said 'I do not expect us to be liberated. We will do that ourselves, just as long as the world gives us the resources', Lidy Nicolassen, 'Geneefs overleg bewijst lippendienst aan vluchtelingen' ('Consultations in Geneva pay lip service to refugees'), de Volkskrant, 30/07/92. 'Either the UN passes a resolution authorizing military intervention or they allow us to procure weapons,' said Ganic on 1 August, 'Bosnian Leader: We Might Not Last', Newsday, 01/08/92; James Gow & James Tilsley, 'The Strategic Imperative for Media management', Gow & Paterson & Preston (eds.), Bosnia, p. 109. On 5 August Izetbegovic declared that the international community had done nothing to stop the aggression against Bosnia; this was why he wanted the arms embargo to be lifted, Theo Engelen, 'Bosniërs 'Klaar voor bevrijding van Sarajevo' ('Bosnians "Ready for the liberation of Sarajevo"'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92. A few days later the Permanent UN Representative of Bosnia-Herzegovina Sacirbey declared that all the Bosnian government expected from the West was that it should use air strikes to eliminate the Bosnian Serb guns around the cities that were in the hands of the Bosnian government, and the Bosnian Serb airforce. In addition, the West should supply arms, Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 123.

²⁴⁸⁰ Extraordinary meeting of WEU Council of Ministers on the situation in Yugoslavia, Declaration, Helsinki, 10/07/92, <http://www.weu.int/eng/comm/92-helsinki.htm>

²⁴⁸¹ 'WEU en NAVO zorgen voor verrassinkje' ('WEU and NATO deliver a little surprise'), de Volkskrant, 11/07/92.

²⁴⁸² Herman Amelink & Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, 'WEU en Navo zenden marine naar Joegoslavië' ('WEU and NATO send navy to Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/07/92.

was to operate, and north of it the NATO. The consequence of this division was that NATO scarcely needed to monitor any ships, since every ship first had to pass through the WEU zone.²⁴⁸³ Nevertheless, 16 July, the day on which Operation Maritime Monitor started, marks the entrance of NATO into the Yugoslav conflict.

Although Resolutions 713 and 757 were both adopted under Chapter VII of the UN charter, thus authorizing the use of force, the NATO and WEU ships were initially not permitted to do anything except monitor, i.e. register which ships passed. It was not until after 16 November 1992, when the Security Council passed Resolution 787, prohibiting the transit of oil and oil products, that NATO and the WEU were allowed to halt ships, inspect them and send them back. But this sanction regime was not watertight either; it could be evaded practically without any trouble by way of the Danube, because the neighbouring countries Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania were unable or unwilling to monitor the embargo effectively. On 5 April 1993 the WEU countries finally decided to supply patrol boats and a police presence to close this Danube gap. The embargo had by then already been in force for one and a half years. However, it was to take several more months before the first WEU ship actually appeared on the Danube.

On 17 April 1993 the Security Council also introduced a general embargo against Serbia and Montenegro, not only at sea and in the air but also on land and on the Danube (Resolution 820). The North Atlantic Council of NATO then decided that if necessary NATO would also enter the territorial waters of Yugoslavia. In June 1993 NATO and the WEU came to an agreement about joint command of the implementation of the sanctions. This gave rise to Operation Sharp Guard, whose objective was to enforce all sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro on water. This sanction regime was to last until 18 June 1996, and in its framework a total of 73,000 ships were halted, 5800 inspected and 1400 taken to a port and inspected.²⁴⁸⁴

An American offer

In mid-June the international community began to realize that the inhabitants of Sarajevo were on the point of starving to death. The American reaction to this news was rather inconsistent, due to differences between the State Department and the Pentagon. The State Department was prepared to go even as far as deploying ground troops to deliver humanitarian relief to Bosnia, although emphatically not to bring about a political solution. The Pentagon on the other hand was hesitant even about using aircraft and ships to support humanitarian aid. The American Defence Minister Dick Cheney stressed that the fighting in Bosnia should be regarded as a civil war, not as an international conflict. In his opinion it definitely did not pose a threat to international peace. On 28 May he had made a rather unusual statement for an American Defence Minister, namely that the American government was not considering deploying troops in Bosnia, 'because we have not been asked to'.²⁴⁸⁵ Cheney was supported by Chief of Staff Colin Powell, who was afraid the conflict might escalate if the American government were to supply armed forces. Powell, who was traumatized by the American experiences in Vietnam and the Lebanon and had seen success in the wars in Panama and against Iraq, named three conditions for the deployment of American troops: overwhelming force, clear objectives and a swift conclusion of the operation. In the case of Bosnia these conditions were not met.²⁴⁸⁶ According to the Pentagon, even large-scale air raids could not influence the actions of the Serb military.²⁴⁸⁷ As for limited air raids, Powell wanted nothing to do with them. When he was asked in September 1992 if he was not in favour ²⁴⁸³ Van Eekelen, Sporen, p. 244; Folkert Jensma, 'Varend bewijs van Europese geschillen in Adriatische Zee' ('Floating evidence of European disputes in Adriatic'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/92; Ruud Kersten, 'Van Eekelen: 'Terugschieten dus' ('So shoot back'), Leids Dagblad, 29/07/92; Kreemers, 'Balkan-express', pp. 9-10.

²⁴⁸⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 76; Van Eekelen, Security, pp. 153-159.

²⁴⁸⁵ Quoted in Almond, War, p. 253.

²⁴⁸⁶ Čalic, Krieg, p. 162; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, pp. 77-78.

²⁴⁸⁷ Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 78.

of them, he answered: 'As soon as they tell me it is limited, it means they do not care whether you achieve a result or not. As soon as they tell me "surgical", I head for the bunker.'²⁴⁸⁸ If so-called surgical intervention was not successful, the demand for more far-reaching deployment would follow, and that was exactly how things had gone wrong for the Americans in Vietnam.²⁴⁸⁹

If Powell's conditions were incompatible with a classic peacekeeping operation, it was even more difficult to meet them in the case of Bosnia-Herzegovina, where no ceasefire lasted more than a few days.

Initially President Bush's security adviser Brent Scowcroft could not choose between the position of the State Department and that of the Pentagon. 'On the one hand they are afraid to get involved in an extremely nasty conflict. On the other hand there was a bloodbath going on there while they just stood by and watched. 'I don't know what the best reaction is,' said the security adviser in a speech to the Atlantic Council in Washington on 22 June.²⁴⁹⁰ However, Scowcroft did move towards Secretary of State Baker's position after American intelligence services had reported that the Bosnian Serbs were trying to starve out Sarajevo and could only be stopped by a convincing threat of military intervention.²⁴⁹¹

Bush and his advisers realized that the reputation of the American nation and the president himself were starting to suffer as a result of the reports of atrocities and the threat of starvation in Bosnia. More and more American news commentators asked what had happened to Bush's new world order and to American leadership.²⁴⁹² On 7 January 1992 the American president, who had previously sent military troops to Panama and Kuwait, had adopted a position that was difficult to abandon in the election year of 1992: 'I don't want to send young men into a war where I can't see that they are going to prevail and prevail rapidly.'²⁴⁹³ Bush finally decided that military action in relation to the former Yugoslavia was needed after all, but he definitely did not want to deploy American ground troops, as he was convinced that they would be a cherished target for Serb guerrillas.²⁴⁹⁴ This position meant that the governments of other countries, especially the European allies, would have to bear the risks of any ground operation. Although the American government had become more involved in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia than a year earlier, they still clung to the point of view that the Europeans themselves should take care of stability on their own continent. The government in Washington was prepared to lend a helping hand, but the Europeans had to show that they were willing to shoulder the greatest risks.

On 15 June the American government made its first concrete offer to the secretaries-general of the NATO and the UN. The gist of their proposal was that they were prepared to make a contribution to humanitarian relief in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This assistance could take several forms, including support in planning, intelligence, and communications, and supplying ground vehicles and helicopters.

²⁴⁸⁸ Michael R. Gordon, 'Powell Delivers a resounding No On Using Limited Force in Bosnia', The New York Times, 28/09/92.

²⁴⁸⁹ Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, pp. 78-79.

²⁴⁹⁰ Moore, 'Pase', p. 5; Maarten Huygen, 'Bosnië plaatst VS voor dilemma' ('Bosnia place US in a dilemma'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/92. See also Eisermann, Weg, pp. 122-123; Barton Gellman, 'Administration Is Sharply Divided On Whether to Expand Balkan Role', The Washington Post, 09/07/92; 'VS: pas hulp na bestand' ('US: aid only after truce'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/92; Maarten Huygen, 'VS willen luchtdekking geven aan Bosnië' ('US want to give Bosnia air cover'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/07/92; Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 121; Reneo Lukic & Allen Lynch, 'U.S. Policy Towards Yugoslavia: From Differentiation to Disintegration', Raju & Thomas & Friman (eds.), Conflict, pp. 272-274; Sanya Popovic, 'Debating Operation Quagmire Storm: U.S. Crisis Management in Bosnia', ibid., pp. 293-294. See also ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844, Meesman 613 to Van den Broek, 25/06/92.

²⁴⁹¹ Barton Gellman, 'Military Uneasy at Balkan Commitment', The Washington Post, 02/07/92.

²⁴⁹² See for example Anthony Lewis, 'Bush washes hands of Bosnian blood', St. Louis Post-Despatch, 19/06/92; Jim Hoagland, 'It's All or Nothing in the New World Order', The Washington Post, 23/06/92; 'The World Watches Murder', The New York Times, 24/06/92; Barton Gellman, 'Military Uneasy at Balkan Commitment', The Washington Post, 02/07/92. See also Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, p. 77.

²⁴⁹³ Jim Hoagland, 'It's All or Nothing in the New World Order', The Washington Post, 23/06/92.

²⁴⁹⁴ Barton Gellman, 'Military Uneasy at Balkan Commitment', The Washington Post, 02/07/92.

The American offer would have to be part of a collective effort, preferably by the NATO.²⁴⁹⁵ However, Boutros-Ghali informed the American government at once that he did not wish to make use of American intelligence; the fact that in general the UN was not keen on working with intelligence is discussed in detail in Chapter 1 of the Appendix to this report dealing with intelligence.²⁴⁹⁶ Boutros-Ghali objected in particular to the deployment of espionage aircraft above the former Yugoslavia.²⁴⁹⁷

'The faster the better'

In this scheme, the American government wanted its European allies to take responsibility for the transport of humanitarian relief supplies by road. They therefore asked the Dutch authorities to provide lorries and drivers to deliver humanitarian aid in the framework of the NATO.²⁴⁹⁸ In one of the few cases connected to policy on Yugoslavia in which the Dutch Ministry of General Affairs took part in an interdepartmental consultation about the Yugoslav issue²⁴⁹⁹ it was decided that in principle the Netherlands was willing to lend the assistance requested. In view of the situation in Bosnia, the Dutch convoys might have to travel under military escort. In that case, as the officials and military involved realized, the borderline between peacekeeping and peace-enforcing could be crossed very easily. For this reason, the Dutch authorities made it a condition that the Security Council should make military protection possible. Even before this guarantee had been given it was decided to mention the Dutch conditional offer at international consultations during the following days: on 24 June in the NATO Council; on 26 June at the WEU ad hoc group which was examining the possible deployment of member states' resources in the former Yugoslavia; and on 29 June at the Committee of Senior Officials of the CSCE. In this way the Dutch government showed that it was serious about finding a solution to the humanitarian crisis in Bosnia.²⁵⁰⁰

In the meantime the American attitude to the Serbs seemed to be growing even harsher. On 25 June various highly-placed American officials declared that if it did not soon become possible to deliver food and medical supplies to Sarajevo, the use of force, preferably in the form of air raids against Serb artillery in the hills around Sarajevo, could not be ruled out. The Russian ambassador to the United States, Vladimir P. Lukin, declared that if it came to this point his country would be prepared to take part in a military operation.²⁵⁰¹

On 26 June the American government informally asked the heads of government of the European Union, who had assembled in Lisbon for a European Council, to assist the population of Sarajevo by means of an airlift and escorts for aid convoys overland.²⁵⁰² The American fleet in the Mediterranean would serve as a co-ordination point, the United States were prepared to carry out supporting air raids and European armed forces would escort the aid operation on the ground.²⁵⁰³ According to various media reports, American troops in Germany had already been showing signs of increased activity in connection with the planned airlift.²⁵⁰⁴ The 82nd American Airborne Division was said to be preparing itself there for an offensive on and around the airport of Sarajevo and American ²⁴⁹⁵ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844, Meesman 582 to Van den Broek, 15/06/92. See also Meesman 596 to Van den Broek, 20/06/92.

²⁴⁹⁶ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844, Van Schaik 594 to Van den Broek, 23/06/92.

²⁴⁹⁷ Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, p. 77.

²⁴⁹⁸ ABZ, PRNY. Bosnia-Hercegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van den Broek, 18/06/92, circ. 364.

²⁴⁹⁹ Cf. appendix about the Ministry of Defence (n.b. CD-ROM that goes with the Dutch edition of this report)

²⁵⁰⁰ SG 1991/1992. DS, Memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 24/06/92, S92/061/2173; Def 488, SG, Departmental consultation 1992-1996, list of decisions made during the departmental consultation of 27/06/92.

²⁵⁰¹ Stanley Meisler & Duyle McManus, 'Allies talk of using force to aid Sarajevo', Los Angeles Times, 26/06/92.

²⁵⁰² 'VS werken aan luchtbrug Sarajevo' ('US working on airlift Sarajevo'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/06/92.

²⁵⁰³ See also Simms, Hour, p. 55; Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 121.

²⁵⁰⁴ 'VS werken aan luchtbrug Sarajevo', NRC Handelsblad, 26/06/92; Maarten Huygen, 'Bosnië plaatst VS voor dilemma', NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/92.

Sixth Fleet warships were making their way to the Adriatic Sea.²⁵⁰⁵ The American forces were said to be already drawing up targets for attack.²⁵⁰⁶

The Dutch Prime Minister Lubbers was no less eager about the prospect of deploying military resources in the former Yugoslavia than Minister Van den Broek had been on 4 June during the meeting of the foreign ministers of the NATO states in Oslo. On 17 June, during an oral consultation with the permanent parliamentary committee for Foreign Affairs and Defence, the MPs had said that they thought military intervention was in the offing, but that they did not want to urge it yet.²⁵⁰⁷ In fact, Lubbers was running ahead of the Dutch parliament when he reacted enthusiastically to the American suggestion on television, saying: ‘Now, at this moment, I can only speak for the Netherlands, and that is: the faster the better, that is our attitude and that is how we will approach the talks with our European colleagues.’²⁵⁰⁸ Supported by Van den Broek, Lubbers urged colleagues from the United Kingdom, France and Belgium, who occupied seats in the Security Council, to work on a resolution permitting the use of military force to support aid convoys.²⁵⁰⁹ The Dutch ministers’ duo was successful; the summit did not rule out the possibility of military support for humanitarian operations and asked the Security Council to pass a resolution authorizing it. However, this result had not been achieved without a struggle. Just as had been the case in NATO, there was not a single country that supported military intervention without reservations, but even the deployment of military resources to protect aid convoys gave rise to problems. When the meeting was over, Lubbers was willing to ‘reveal that there were significant differences of opinion. There were countries that were very detached. There were also countries that said: “things cannot go on like this, with these inhuman conditions, we must take a more active position (...)” You know that the Netherlands belongs to this latter group.’²⁵¹⁰ The other countries, the Prime Minister continued, were Italy and Germany, but those two countries had historical reasons of their own for not wanting to send troops. Therefore their position counted less than that of the Netherlands, which could deploy troops, suggested the Dutch Prime Minister.²⁵¹¹ The British government had also made things difficult. In a fit of trans-national historic awareness, the British Prime Minister John Major had motivated his objections to the deployment of military resources by referring to the encirclement of French troops in Dien Bien Phu in Vietnam in 1954.²⁵¹² Major also referred to estimates by intelligence services that military intervention in the former Yugoslavia would require the deployment of 100,000 troops.²⁵¹³ However, the Dutch Prime Minister said he could understand why a country like the United Kingdom was hesitant; after all, no one knew what would happen if troops were deployed. But Lubbers himself felt no hesitation, he said. The situation in Sarajevo brought back memories of the Netherlands in the winter of starvation in 1945. The ‘umpteenth feeble declaration’ was therefore not good enough for him.²⁵¹⁴

3. The grand French gesture: Mitterrand goes to Sarajevo

The sequel to the summit in Lisbon was as unexpected as it was spectacular; without informing the other European heads of government during the meeting, the French president Mitterrand decided to ²⁵⁰⁵ Herman Amelink, ‘Westen gaat met tegenzin af op het bijna onvermijdelijke’ (‘West reluctantly heads for the almost inevitable’), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92; Theo Engelen, ‘Leider Serviërs tegen VS: interventie wordt ‘een soort Vietnam’ (‘Serb leader to US: intervention will be “a sort of Vietnam”’), NRC Handelsblad, 02/07/92; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 292.

²⁵⁰⁶ Ed Vulliamy, ‘The Secret War’, The Guardian, 20/05/96.

²⁵⁰⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 27.

²⁵⁰⁸ TV, RIT4, Avondnieuws, 26/06/92, 7.30pm.

²⁵⁰⁹ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 14/08/92, 11.07pm.

²⁵¹⁰ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 27/06/92, 11.05pm.

²⁵¹¹ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 03/07/92, 11.05pm.

²⁵¹² Oscar Garschagen, ‘EG en BS willen luchtbrug op Sarajevo openen’ (‘EC and BS want to open airlift to Sarajevo’), de Volkskrant, 27/06/92.

²⁵¹³ Peter Dobbie, ‘Yugoslav crisis deepens as French president heads for war zone’, Mail on Sunday, 28/06/92.

²⁵¹⁴ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 27/06/92, 11.05pm.

fly directly from the Portuguese capital to Sarajevo. Only at the very last moment before his departure did he inform his Portuguese hosts and Chancellor Kohl of his intentions, in general terms.²⁵¹⁵

Mitterrand was accompanied on his journey by the French Minister of Health Bernard Kouchner, founder of the international organization Médecins sans Frontières. Kouchner had also been Minister of Human Rights in the previous French government; he had then turned humanitarian aid into a French export product.

The reason given for the French lightning tour of the Bosnian capital was that an appeal had reached President Mitterrand from Bosnia. The French philosopher Bernard-Henry Lévy, who had visited Sarajevo a short time before, had been given a message from President Izetbegovic for his French fellow-president. Among other things, Izetbegovic had written: 'We are the ghetto of Warsaw. Will the ghetto of Warsaw be allowed to die again?'²⁵¹⁶ The French head of state was said to have been deeply moved by this. He passed on the comparison with the Jews of the Warsaw to the heads of government in Lisbon.²⁵¹⁷ Then, driven by emotion, he had decided to go in person to bolster the morale of the inhabitants of the besieged city.

However, according to another interpretation there were less noble motives for this grand gesture on the part of the French president. On 26 June Boutros-Ghali had issued an ultimatum to the Bosnian Serb military to leave the airport of Sarajevo within 48 hours and to place their heavy weapons under the supervision of the UN. President Bush then contacted several countries which had taken part in the international coalition in the Gulf War to ask if they would be prepared to carry out air raids in order to lift the blockade of the airport.²⁵¹⁸ Even before the Lisbon summit it had been clear that Mitterrand was not keen on action by the NATO or an ad hoc coalition forged for Bosnia, because in his view this would lead to too great an American involvement.²⁵¹⁹ Moreover, Mitterrand was irritated by Baker's plea for action. According to the French president the government in Washington was 'telling the Europeans once again what they ought to do in Yugoslavia.'²⁵²⁰

What really triggered Mitterrand's lightning visit to the Bosnian capital, according to this interpretation, was the American proposal to lend military support, possibly in the form of air raids, for the delivery of humanitarian aid. Mitterrand made no secret of the fact that he was prepared to deploy French troops in the former Yugoslavia for humanitarian purposes, but not for any action that threatened to lead to war. When the Süddeutsche Zeitung asked the French president in May 1994 if the French government could not do more, Mitterrand reminded them that this had been his position for two years: 'I have been criticized for this. I have not deceived anyone.'²⁵²¹ According to an American interpretation this was why Mitterrand deliberately wanted to frustrate Washington's plan by visiting the Sarajevo airport himself and making sure it was opened.²⁵²² The French head of state accomplished his mission; the Bosnian Serb leaders promised him that their military would hand over the airport to UNPROFOR. It was implied that this agreement was reached after Mitterrand, in the days preceding ²⁵¹⁵ Dumas, Fil, pp. 360 and 362; 'Mitterrand baant weg voor noodhulp' ('Mitterrand paves the way for emergency aid'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92; Oscar Garschagen, 'Franse president heeft genoeg van getreuzel over Bosnië' ('French president has had enough of dawdling on Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 29/06/92.

²⁵¹⁶ Jan Gerritsen, 'Een bestudeerd mooi gebaar van een president' ('A carefully studied gracious gesture by a president'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92.

²⁵¹⁷ Oscar Garschagen, 'Franse president heeft genoeg van getreuzel over Bosnië', de Volkskrant, 29/06/92; Favier/Martin-Rolland, Décennie, p. 298.

²⁵¹⁸ Ed Vulliamy, 'The Secret War', The Guardian, 20/05/96; Hartmann, Milosevic, pp. 291-292.

²⁵¹⁹ 'Navo tot interventie in staat', NRC Handelsblad, 25/06/92.

²⁵²⁰ 'Irritatie over Baker' ('Irritation at Baker'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92.

²⁵²¹ 'Francois Mitterrand blickt auf 13 Jahre im Amt zurück' ('Francois Mitterrand looks back on 13 years in office'), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 26/05/94.

²⁵²² ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Yugoslavia in general, Meesman 760 to Van den Broek, 13/08/92; Barry Schweid, 'Baker Says Bush Considered Gulf War-Style Response in Bosnia', 28/09/95; Eisermann, Weg, p. 122. There were similar insinuations in the French media as well, Philip Freriks, 'President zonder Grenzen' ('President without borders'), de Volkskrant, 30/06/92. See also Favier & Martin-Rolland, Décennie, pp. 298-299

the Lisbon summit, had had intensive contact with Milosevic via Jacques Blot and Serge Boidevaix, the director for Europe and the Secretary-General of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs respectively.

On his return from Sarajevo, Mitterrand had assured the Serb president by telephone that the airport would be used only for humanitarian relief and that it would certainly not fall into the hands of the Bosnian government. Thereupon Milosevic had ordered Mladic to free the airport.²⁵²³ Karadzic also consented, having realized by now that if Sarajevo were really starved out the result would be huge international indignation and in its wake possibly military intervention.

In fact, Mitterrand rescued the Bosnian Serb leaders from the awkward predicament they had got themselves into since their troops had proved unable to capture Sarajevo or even to divide it into two.²⁵²⁴ On 29 June the Bosnian Serb troops withdrew from the airport, so that there was no longer any need for the American government to take military action.²⁵²⁵ A few days later the airlift to Sarajevo began and a hundred and fifty tons of food and medical supplies were flown in daily to keep the three hundred thousand inhabitants of Sarajevo on their feet. However, contrary to prior agreements, the warring factions did not remove their heavy weapons and anti-aircraft artillery from around the airport, so that the resupply of Sarajevo by air continued to hang by a thread. Nevertheless, by 4 January 1996, in spite of various interruptions, UNHCR had been able to carry out a total of almost thirteen thousand flights.²⁵²⁶ On 13 July the Security Council decided in Resolution 764 to expand the number of UN troops destined for the airport of Sarajevo by five hundred, to 1600 altogether. Their tasks would include manning a radar post to track down artillery.

After the first euphoria about Mitterrand's visit, the authorities of Sarajevo began to see clearly that the opening of the airport for humanitarian missions had only taken place instead of military action. Just over a week after the airport was opened, the Bosnian Defence Minister Jerko Doko, a Croat, said he wished it had never happened: 'It is only delaying the liberation of Sarajevo.'²⁵²⁷

Not everyone in Dutch politics was entirely pleased with Mitterrand's grand gesture either. Frits Bolkestein, leader of the VVD (Liberal Party), called the French president's solo performance 'underhand'²⁵²⁸ and saw it as evidence of the bankruptcy of European foreign policy.²⁵²⁹ In his opinion the Dutch government should register a very clear protest against the French head of state's conduct.²⁵³⁰

By contrast, Prime Minister Lubbers spoke positively about Mitterrand's visit, even if it had possibly been merely a reaction to an American attitude which seemed to imply that the government in Washington no longer regarded the crisis in Yugoslavia as a purely European affair. 'If two people do something good together, I can only be pleased,' he said.²⁵³¹

The PvdA (Labour) and the CDA (Christian Democrat Party) agreed to the EC decision to deploy military troops to assist with humanitarian aid. But CDA MP De Kok, who in the preceding weeks had strongly advocated action by the airforce and navy, made the point that his party was 'extremely wary' about the deployment of ground troops. If the Dutch government wanted to contribute troops, his parliamentary group would find this extremely difficult to accept.²⁵³² In contrast, PvdA MP Valk was prepared to accept the risk that Dutch troops might become involved in a ground war. In his opinion, without further foreign intervention the conflict might well escalate and spread to ²⁵²³ Favier/Martin-Rolland, Décennie, pp. 298-299 and 302; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 292.

²⁵²⁴ Silber & Little, Death, p. 254.

²⁵²⁵ Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, p. 89.

²⁵²⁶ Judah, Sebs, p. 213.

²⁵²⁷ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'In Sarajevo worden de bevelen fluisterend gegeven' ('In Sarajevo the orders are given in whispers'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/07/92. See also Heller, Brasiers, p. 133.

²⁵²⁸ 'Alom bewondering maar ook vraagtekens' ('Universal admiration but also question marks'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92.

²⁵²⁹ TV, Nederland 1, KRO, Brandpunt, 28/06/92, 9.20pm.

²⁵³⁰ 'Alom bewondering maar ook vraagtekens', NRC Handelsblad, 29/06/92.

²⁵³¹ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 03/07/92, 11.05pm.

²⁵³² Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 28/06/92, 1.08pm.

neighbouring countries.²⁵³³ The Dutch Secretary-General of the WEU, Van Eekelen, shared this opinion, saying ‘what is the alternative, if we put up with this and the matter escalates further; we will get civil war in Kosovo, Macedonia will be divided up, Albania, Greece, Turkey, Bulgaria will be involved? Then we will be right back in 1912 with a Balkan war and then we really will have problems.’²⁵³⁴

4. Aid overland to Sarajevo?

Mitterrand’s action, which led to the Bosnian Serbs handing over the airport of Sarajevo to the UN, put paid to the planned military action which had been decided on by the Council of European ministers and heads of state in Lisbon. This meant that the Dutch offer to assist with transport by road also remained up in the air. After Boutros-Ghali had reported to the Security Council that the Bosnian Serb forces had handed over control of Sarajevo airport to UNPROFOR, on 29 June the Security Council appealed in Resolution 761 to all member states to make a contribution to the humanitarian efforts in Sarajevo and environs. In response to this resolution, the Dutch ministries of General Affairs, Foreign Affairs, Defence and Development Cooperation decided to make their conditional offer to contribute to the transport of food and medical supplies by road more specific. In addition to an F-27 transport plane, to be supplied by the Royal Netherlands Airforce, the Royal Netherlands Army would provide a transport unit consisting of about one hundred military drivers and thirty lorries. A large number of the drivers would be national servicemen; in this case this was not a problem, because enough soldiers had volunteered for the task.²⁵³⁵

An offer with consequences

The transport plane was put into action quickly. From 3 July on, the F-27 flew to Zagreb and Sarajevo daily with relief supplies. The drivers and their lorries presented more problems. At the beginning of July the Dutch government reported to UNHCR and the UN that they were prepared in principle to supply 30 lorries and 120 troops, but that their decision would depend on the final status of the operation and on the protection and safety guarantees which could be given to the Dutch unit.²⁵³⁶ Defence and the Army had pointed out to the other Dutch authorities that there were serious safety risks involved in the deployment of transport units. In mid-June, for example, 18 Swedish drivers had discontinued their transports to Sarajevo for reasons of safety, even though they had been escorted by armed UNPROFOR troops.²⁵³⁷ Moreover, the UNHCR head of operations informed the Permanent UN Representative of the Netherlands in Geneva J.F. Boddens Hosang that ‘there is no way to have a convoy [from Zagreb to Bosnia] unless somebody is going to clear the way’.²⁵³⁸ According to the Dutch government, the Royal Netherlands Army’s transport unit, which was preparing for dispatch on 11 July and would be placed at the disposal of UNHCR, would have to be protected by an UNPROFOR ²⁵³³ Ibid.

²⁵³⁴ TV, Nederland 1, VARA, Achter het Nieuws, 21/07/92, 10.06pm.

²⁵³⁵ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff to Ter Beek, 30/06/92, OZ366.

²⁵³⁶ ABZ, DIO/2003/00065. PR Geneva to W. Blatter (UNHCR), 02/07/92; Boddens Hosang 498 to Van den Broek, 03/07/92; Boddens Hosang 502 to Van den Broek, 04/07/92; PR New York to Van den Broek, 06/07/92, nuv-4419; PR Geneva to Van den Broek, 07/07/92, hum/gev-0338/92; ABZ, PVNY. Van den Broek to PR New York, 16/07/92, celer 178; Van den Broek, 08/07/92, circ 428.

²⁵³⁷ SG 91/92. SG, memorandum from Defence Staff to Ter Beek, 10/07/92; ABZ, PVNY. Van den Broek to PV New York, 16/07/92, celer 178.

²⁵³⁸ ABZ, DIO/2003/00065. Boddens Hosang 512 to Van den Broek, 09/07/92.

fighting unit.²⁵³⁹ The Dutch Ministry of Defence also wanted the troops to operate in uniform, with blue berets, and with military status.²⁵⁴⁰

The Dutch conditions gave rise to many objections from UNHCR and the UN. The UNHCR wanted the Dutch soldiers, who would operate under its aegis, to conform to the rules and regulations of its organization, i.e. they would have to wear civilian clothes and be unarmed. The UN and UNHCR wanted to preserve a clear distinction in clothing between UNPROFOR and UNHCR, so that there would be no misunderstandings among the population and the warring factions as to the different roles of the two organizations. The UN let it be known that it was impossible for UNPROFOR to protect the convoy because at that time UNPROFOR's mandate in Bosnia did not extend outside the route from the airport near Sarajevo to the Bosnian capital itself, whereas the lorries would have to travel through Bosnia.²⁵⁴¹ Boutros-Ghali was not prepared to ask the Security Council to expand the UNPROFOR mandate, because he believed that by then UNHCR's relief operations, which outside Sarajevo took place without protection, were functioning reasonably well.²⁵⁴²

In interdepartmental consultations in the Netherlands it had been decided that the Netherlands itself would not be able to deploy any other ground troops than the signals unit which had already been sent and the transport personnel it had agreed to supply.²⁵⁴³ In other words, the Dutch government itself would not be able to offer the protection which it believed the transport unit needed. So apart from the question of principle as to whether the mandate of UNPROFOR II would permit a military escort for the Dutch lorries, there was also the practical question of which country would protect the unit. Only one thing was clear: this protection would not come from the Netherlands.

On 24 July, because the situation in Bosnia continued to be unsafe, Minister Ter Beek ordered the ad hoc transport unit for Yugoslavia, which had already been formed, to disband. However, the government kept the offer open and waited to see if the UN changed its mind with regard to the Dutch conditions.²⁵⁴⁴ The Dutch government had now manoeuvred itself into an awkward position; in June 1992 it had declared at several international forums that it was strongly in favour of firmer action in the former Yugoslavia, but when it came to the crunch it had to go around other countries cap in hand trying to secure protection for the offer it had made so eagerly.²⁵⁴⁵ This lopsided position, which will be discussed in more detail later in this chapter, would prove to be one of the main reasons why the Dutch government, in view of its position in international forums, could scarcely do otherwise than provide combat troops itself.

Quarrel between Boutros-Ghali and the Security Council

On 7 July 1992 the G7, the forum of the leaders of the seven major industrialized countries, met in Munich. Led by President Bush and his team, the conference adopted a firm stance with respect to the regime in Belgrade, which they regarded as being chiefly to blame for the conflict.²⁵⁴⁶ With the exception of the British government, the G7 leaders held out the threat of a Security Council resolution

²⁵³⁹ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 07/07/92, no. 92/0701; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, pp. 84-85. See also ABZ, PVNY. Van den Broek to PV New York, 16/07/92, celer 178.

²⁵⁴⁰ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 07/07/92, no. 92/0701.

²⁵⁴¹ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 07/07/92, no. 92/0701; Def 868, SG 91/92 SG, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 10/07/92.

²⁵⁴² SG 1991/1992. SG, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 10/07/92.

²⁵⁴³ SG 1991/1992. DS, memorandum from Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 24/06/92, S92/061/2173.

²⁵⁴⁴ SG 1991/1992. SG, Memorandum from Defence Staff for CDS, 27/07/92, no. S92/061/2491; ABZ, DIO/2003/00065, Foreign Affairs (DIO/Jugoslavia) to PR Geneva, 28/07/92, DIO/Joegoslavië-552/91; G. Landman to G. Welter, 27/07/92, DIO/92-690.

²⁵⁴⁵ As shown for example by the comments made by Jacobovits de Szeged in the North-Atlantic Council, NATO, Summary record of a meeting of the NAC held on 08/07/92, 28/07/92, C-R(92)47; Summary record of a meeting of the NAC held on 09/07/92, 27/07/92, C-R(92)47bis.

²⁵⁴⁶ Political statement by Dr. Klaus Kinkel, Federal News Service, 07/07/92.

authorizing force if the parties in Bosnia did not open land corridors from Split or Zagreb to Sarajevo for humanitarian convoys. Douglas Hurd, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, which had held the presidency of the EU since 1 July, continued to oppose the use of force. In his opinion it could only lead to disaster and possibly thwart the negotiations being led by Carrington.²⁵⁴⁷

According to the leaders of the other countries at the G7 summit, the reason Hurd continued to oppose the use of force was that the British government needed a large proportion of its severely reduced armed forces in Northern Ireland and thought that British public opinion would be against possible British victims in Bosnia.²⁵⁴⁸ Around that time John Casey, for example, indeed wrote in the Daily Mail that no matter how terrible the war in the former Yugoslavia was, ‘it is not worth the bones of one British soldier’, almost an echo of the words of the German statesman Otto von Bismarck that the Balkans were not worth the healthy bones of one Pomeranian musketeer.²⁵⁴⁹ However, the other G7 leaders were starting to get fed up with the British point of view and also with the fact that Hurd constantly hid behind Lord Carrington’s continuing attempts at conciliation. When the G7 summit was over, Mitterrand and Dumas declared that as far as they were concerned Carrington could stop his negotiations. A wider forum should be created to discuss the problems of the former Yugoslavia.²⁵⁵⁰ Hurd was not too pleased with this opinion, but ten days later something happened that made it impossible for him to ignore the French advice.

Led by Lord Carrington and the Portuguese diplomat Cutileiro, consultations between representatives of the warring factions resumed in London from 15 July. Initially the discussions did not seem very promising, partly because the Bosnian Foreign Minister Haris Silajdzic refused to confer with ‘child murderers’, a reference to Karadzic.²⁵⁵¹ Moreover, declared Silajdzic, the Jews had not negotiated with Hitler either.²⁵⁵² However, on 16 July Karadzic agreed that the VRS would store its heavy weapons in 62 depots which would fall under international supervision. This would be a solution, for example, to the problems around the airport of Sarajevo, which had to be closed every so often because fighting had broken out, and for the Gorazde enclave, which was being heavily bombed in those days by the Bosnian Serbs. On 17 July, one day after Carrington had managed to get Karadzic to agree, the Security Council, on the insistence of the British Permanent Representative Sir David Hannay, agreed to an expansion of UNPROFOR’s mandate, which meant that the UN troops would be charged with supervising the surrender of heavy weapons. The Security Council asked Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali to present a report within three days as to how this decision was to be implemented.²⁵⁵³

This decision gave rise to a serious dispute between the Security Council and Boutros-Ghali, who had already been unable to expect much sympathy from the governments in Washington and London.²⁵⁵⁴ As early as May, Boutros-Ghali had intimated that ‘our plate is full’ as far as UN peace operations were concerned.²⁵⁵⁵ Now he was confronted with a decision which the Security Council had made without consulting him beforehand. According to Boutros-Ghali it would require 1100 extra UN troops for a period of three months to collect the heavy weapons, while Carrington had not succeeded ²⁵⁴⁷ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 121.

²⁵⁴⁸ Annika Savill & Steve Crawshaw & Andrew Marshall, ‘Britain isolated over Yugoslavia’, The Independent, 08/07/92.

²⁵⁴⁹ John Casey, ‘Why we should walk away from this bloody war’, Daily Mail, 29/06/92.

²⁵⁵⁰ Annika Savill & Steve Crawshaw & Andrew Marshall, ‘Britain isolated over Yugoslavia’, The Independent, 08/07/92; Olivier Lepick, ‘French Perspectives’, Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 80.

²⁵⁵¹ ‘Overleg in Londen over Bosnië levert niets op’ (‘London talks on Bosnia produce nothing’), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/92; Henk Strabbing, ‘Londens overleg met partijen Bosnië mislukt’ (‘London talks with Bosnian parties fails’), de Volkskrant, 16/07/92.

²⁵⁵² ‘Partijen Bosnië komen in Londen nader tot elkaar’ (‘Bosnian parties come closer together in London’), NRC Handelsblad, 17/07/92.

²⁵⁵³ United Nations Department of Public Information, United Nations, Statement by the President, 17/07/92, pp. 22-23.

²⁵⁵⁴ Harvey Morris, ‘Give me the battalions for peace’, The Independent, 03/08/92; interview J.A. Schear, 30/11/00. See also Boutros-Ghali, Umwanquished, pp. 42-45.

²⁵⁵⁵ Patrick E. Tyler, ‘U.N. Chief’s Dispute With Council Boils Over’, The New York Times, 03/08/92.

in bringing about an effective ceasefire. In Boutros-Ghali's view, the European Community had reached an agreement for which the UN was going to have to pay the cost. In his opinion this was turning things upside down; the Security Council was authorized to entrust certain tasks to a regional organization, but not vice versa.²⁵⁵⁶ In a confidential letter, Boutros-Ghali reproached the Security Council with not having considered for a moment whether or not the agreement was feasible. They had not even waited for advice from the UNPROFOR commander and from himself. If they had, then Boutros-Ghali would have responded that he thought the plan was 'unrealistic'. He had in fact told Carrington this as soon as the agreement had been reached in London.²⁵⁵⁷ This was why Boutros-Ghali was particularly annoyed that Hannay had managed to force the decision through in the Security Council. The Secretary-General was so irritated that the British Minister Hurd felt obliged to go to New York by Concorde on 22 July in order to pacify him. This did not really help.²⁵⁵⁸

For quite some time the Egyptian Secretary-General had been calling the Yugoslav conflict 'the Vietnam of the United Nations',²⁵⁵⁹ a 'quagmire into which we are being sucked further and further'. He was aggrieved that up to that point in 1992 the Security Council had spent sixty percent of its time on this conflict, while the number of conflicts laid before the UN for solutions since the end of the Cold War had constantly increased. In his view, Europe itself should have been doing more to solve the conflict. In this specific case it would take the UN three months to raise the 1100 troops and the resources required for monitoring, whereas the major European countries could do it themselves within four days. Demonstratively, Boutros-Ghali delivered the letter the Security Council wanted from him concerning the implementation of the decision two days late. The substance of the letter was quite plain: he criticized the Security Council for paying too much attention to Yugoslavia at the expense of other conflicts which were by no means less gruesome, such as that in Somalia, where according to him ten times as many people had been killed.²⁵⁶⁰

On 24 July, during a closed session of the Security Council, Boutros-Ghali again compared the costly peacekeeping operation in the former Yugoslavia with the civil war in Somalia. In May the Secretary-General had made a proposal to the Security Council to deploy five hundred troops in Somalia to protect food convoys. After lengthy hesitation, the Security Council had finally approved only the dispatch of fifty observers. In view of the UN's perpetual deficit the Security Council had to choose, and Boutros-Ghali made it perfectly clear which conflict he thought the Security Council should concentrate on. Many Africans call the conflict in the former Yugoslavia 'the war of the rich', he told his audience. He pointed out that the television pictures from the Balkan country showed well-nourished victims, in contrast to those from Africa. Europe should solve its own conflicts.

In turn, the Security Council made it clear that it was not impressed by the Secretary-General's objections.²⁵⁶¹ Several members accused Boutros-Ghali of miscommunication, intellectual arrogance and an overly independent attitude. The Security Council was of the opinion that the Secretary-General's task was to implement its decisions, whereas Boutros-Ghali thought that the status of the UN secretariat was equal to that of the Security Council or the General Assembly.²⁵⁶² The affair became positively sordid when the Secretary-General, remembering an experience in his native Egypt, suggested that the differences of opinion between certain members of the Security Council and himself ²⁵⁵⁶ Herman Amelink, 'Boutros houdt zijn bedenkingen' ('Boutros maintains his objections'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/92; Harvey Morris, 'Give me the battalions for peace', The Independent, 03/08/92; Eisermann, Weg, p. 115.

²⁵⁵⁷ 'Boutros Ghali in conflict met V-raad' ('Boutros Ghali in conflict with Security Council'), NRC Handelsblad, 21/07/92.

²⁵⁵⁸ 'Boutros blijft dwarsliggen over rol VN' ('Boutros continues to dissent on UN role'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/92.

²⁵⁵⁹ See for example Patrick E. Tyler, 'U.N. Chief's Dispute With Council Boils Over', The New York Times, 03/08/92.

²⁵⁶⁰ Matthias Nass, 'Der Pharao will nicht nur Sekretär sein' ('The Pharaoh does not want to be just a secretary') and id., 'Auf uns richten sich zu grosse Hoffnungen' ('Excessively high hopes are pinned on us'), Die Zeit, 07/08/92.

²⁵⁶¹ Seth Faison, 'U.N. Chief Mired in Dispute With Security Council', The New York Times, 24/07/92.

²⁵⁶² Harvey Morris, 'Give me the battalions for peace', The Independent, 03/08/92. See also 'VN hebben weer secretaris-generaal die weet wat hij wil' ('UN has a Secretary-General who knows what he wants again'), de Volkskrant, 04/08/92.

might well be due to the fact that he was a 'wog', or 'westernized oriental gentleman,' the degrading name given to Westernized Arabs and Indians in the British colonial era.²⁵⁶³

The fact that the UN Secretary-General did not have much faith in peacekeeping operations in the former Yugoslavia was not the only thing to emerge from this entire discussion. Six months after he had taken office, his independent attitude toward the Security Council had also become clear, an attitude which was to lead to more and more serious disagreements with the permanent members of the Security Council, especially the United States.²⁵⁶⁴

It also became clear how acute the need was for better co-ordination between the efforts of the EC and its mediator Lord Carrington on the one hand and the activities of the United Nations in relation to the former Yugoslavia on the other. 'It is extremely irregular for the United Nations to be asked to help with the implementation of a politico-military agreement when this organization has had any share in the discussions about it,' wrote Boutros-Ghali to the Security Council.²⁵⁶⁵ And in a declaration on 23 July the UN Secretary-General said that not only did he still have objections to the Security Council's decision, but that there was also 'a lack of clarity as to the respective roles of the United Nations and the European Community in the implementation of the agreement reached in London'.²⁵⁶⁶ It was plain that a distinction whereby the UN was to keep the peace and the EC was to look for a political solution to the conflicts in ex-Yugoslavia, as Boutros-Ghali had himself suggested at the beginning of 1992, could no longer be drawn.

Eventually the Security Council accepted Boutros-Ghali's view that in Bosnia-Herzegovina the conditions were not yet such that the UN could undertake the supervision of heavy weapons. The Security Council invited the Secretary-General to make a list of what resources member states could supply in order to make this supervision possible. The Security Council also asked the EC to provide a broader basis for the discussions about Yugoslavia.²⁵⁶⁷ On 6 August Boutros-Ghali also informed several European organizations directly that in his opinion Europe ought to be in a better position to solve conflicts than other regions. He asked the CSCE to supervise the surrender of heavy weapons by the parties in Bosnia. He sent a copy of his letter to the WEU and the NATO.²⁵⁶⁸ The strange situation thus arose that the quarrel Boutros-Ghali had begun because he thought the UN should do less in Yugoslavia actually led to the United Nations being dragged deeper into the conflict. Finally, Boutros-Ghali's dispute with the government in London and its diplomatic representatives as to the division of responsibilities between the European Community and the Security Council also showed that a scenario had begun which was to include many scenes entitled 'passing the buck'.²⁵⁶⁹

5. Refugee streams and policies relating to them

One area in which both responsibilities and people have traditionally been moved around is that of refugee policy. In the month of June, but especially in July the disconcerting size of the refugee stream from Bosnia began to dawn on the West; it was the biggest in Europe since the Second World War.

²⁵⁶³ Patrick E. Tyler, 'U.N. Chief's Dispute With Council Boils Over', The New York Times, 03/08/92. See also Willem Offenbergh, 'VN-bureaucratie werkt niet zoals Boutros-Ghali wil' ('UN bureaucracy does not work as Boutros-Ghali wants it to'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/07/92; Willem Offenbergh, 'Boutros-Ghali en VN-raad ruziën door' ('Boutros-Ghali and UN Security Council continue to wrangle'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92; Harvey Morris, 'Give me the battalions for peace', The Independent, 03/08/92.

²⁵⁶⁴ Cf. P.R. Baehr, 'Kan Annan de Naties Verenigen?' (Can Annan Unite the Nations?), International Spectator, 51(1997)2, p. 53; Meisler, 'Boutros-Ghali'.

²⁵⁶⁵ Herman Amelink, 'Boutros houdt zijn bedenkingen', NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/92.

²⁵⁶⁶ 'Boutros blijft dwarsliggen over rol VN', NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/92.

²⁵⁶⁷ United Nations Department of Public Information, United Nations, Statement by the President, 24/07/92, pp. 23-24; Eisermann, Weg, p. 116.

²⁵⁶⁸ 'NAVO bestudeert mogelijk gebruik geweld in Bosnië' ('NATO examines possibility of using force in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 07/08/92.

²⁵⁶⁹ Günther Bächler, quoted in Čalic, Krieg, p. 236.

According to the High Commissioner for Refugees, by the beginning of June there were 1.7 million displaced people throughout the whole of Yugoslavia. The largest group among them were the almost eight hundred thousand Bosnians, almost a fifth of the total population of 4.4 million.²⁵⁷⁰ By the end of July the UNHCR estimated that two and a quarter million Bosnians had fled from the violence.²⁵⁷¹ The refugees told their tales of murder, arson, travelling, deportation and missing family members, which made it clear that they had not fled from the violence of war but because of ethnic cleansing, a form of violence deliberately aimed at forcing certain ethnic groups to leave their home environment.²⁵⁷²

However moving the stories in the papers were, one after another the governments in Western Europe introduced restrictions with respect to the refugees. The Dutch government was no exception. Since the war in Yugoslavia had broken out in the summer of 1991, thousands of Yugoslavs had arrived in the Netherlands. Most of them entered the country as tourists and often they found shelter with relatives, acquaintances or people met during holidays. The policy problems began when they remained in the Netherlands longer than three months and applied for benefits. Another problem was that they had no health insurance.

In 1992 there were widely varying figures in circulation as to the exact number of Yugoslavs who had sought asylum. For example, in the second half of 1991 the statistics quoted in the media for asylum applications made by refugees from the (former) Yugoslavia ranged from 1395 to more than three thousand, and for the first five months of 1992 from 1321 to more than 3200.²⁵⁷³ For the two periods together a figure of 6800 asylum seekers is quoted.²⁵⁷⁴ According to the reliable figures of the UNHCR, in the Netherlands there were 2733 asylum applications from (former) Yugoslavs in 1991 and 2725 in the whole of 1992.²⁵⁷⁵

One of the objectives of the Dutch government in their efforts to provide humanitarian aid in the former Yugoslavia had always been to ensure that relief for displaced and homeless people, i.e. refugees who did not apply for asylum, was given to as large as possible an extent in the states of ex-Yugoslavia themselves, so as to keep down the numbers of refugees coming to the Netherlands. Moreover, the Dutch government wanted its policy to avoid creating the impression of complicity with ²⁵⁷⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Ondanks de air conditioning stinkt het' ('In spite of the air conditioning it stinks'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/06/92; Alfred van Cleef, 'VN: twee miljoen mensen zijn op de vlucht' ('UN: two million people have taken flight'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/06/92; 'Bosnische vluchtelingen overspoelen Zagreb' ('Bosnian refugees flood Zagreb'), Trouw, 10/07/92; 'VN waarschuwen voor vluchtelingencrisis rondom Joegoslavië' ('UN warns of refugee crisis around Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 22/07/92; 'Europa zit in zijn maag met Joegoslavische vluchtelingen' ('Europe does not know what to do about Yugoslav refugees'), Trouw, 28/07/92; 'Vluchtelingenstroom uit Kroatië en Bosnië blijft groeien' ('Refugee stream from Croatia and Bosnia continues to swell'), de Volkskrant, 10/07/92; 'VN rekenen op vlucht 400 duizend Bosniërs' ('UN expects flight of 400 thousand Bosnians'), de Volkskrant, 28/07/92.

²⁵⁷¹ Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esman & Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p. 251.

²⁵⁷² Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Ondanks de air conditioning stinkt het', NRC Handelsblad, 11/06/92; idem, 'Wij noemden elkaars namen niet' ('We did not utter each other's names'), NRC Handelsblad, 20/07/92; id., 'Exodus vluchtelingen uit Bosnië' ('Exodus of refugees from Bosnia') and 'Geen vlucht maar een exodus' ('Not a flight but an exodus'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/07/92; John F. Burns, 'Vooral Moslims zijn slachtoffer van moorden Bosnië' ('Muslims in particular are the victims of Bosnian murders'), de Volkskrant, 24/06/92; 'Komst tienduizend vluchtelingen uit Bosnië gemeld' ('Arrival of 10,000 refugees from Bosnia reported'), de Volkskrant, 25/07/92; Blaine Harden, 'Bosnia Bleeds Under Serb "Purification"', The Washington Post, 23/06/92.

²⁵⁷³ Alfred van Cleef, 'VN: twee miljoen mensen zijn op de vlucht' ('Two million people have taken flight'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/06/92; 'Kosto wil Joegoslaven opvangen in kazernes' ('Kosto wants to house Yugoslavs in barracks'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/92; 'Asielverzoeken ex-Joegoslaven komen in behandeling' ('Asylum applications of ex-Yugoslavs are dealt with'), Trouw, 03/02/93, in which a figure is quoted of 2700 asylum applications from Yugoslavia in 1991 and 2725 in the first seven months of 1992. See also TK 1991-1992, Aanhangsel no. 390 (Questions put by Wiebenga).

²⁵⁷⁴ 'Opvang voor Joegoslaven' ('Relief for Yugoslavs'), Trouw, 16/07/92.

²⁵⁷⁵ UNHCR, Background Paper on Refugees and Asylum Seekers from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Geneva, May 1996, Table 3; UNHCR, Refugees and Asylum-Seekers in Europe. A Statistical Overview of Citizens from The former Yugoslavia 1991-1995, Geneva s.a., Table 3.

ethnic cleansing.²⁵⁷⁶ This policy was supported by the parliamentary groups, which from May onwards argued in favour of designating certain areas in the region as safe havens, in which camps could be set up and refugees could be assisted, with safe protection by international troops.²⁵⁷⁷

In December 1991 the German government had decided unilaterally not to admit any more planes from Yugoslavia on to its territory. As a consequence of this decision, a constant flow of planes carrying Yugoslav refugees from Skopje and Sofia had been arriving at Beek airport in Limburg. Most of these refugees came from Kosovo and Macedonia.²⁵⁷⁸ By the beginning of June 1992 these flights had become so frequent that there were almost daily landings at Beek airport.²⁵⁷⁹ Of the approximately 25,000 Yugoslavs who landed at Beek airport in the first six months of 1992, about 15,000 travelled straight on to relatives in Germany.²⁵⁸⁰ When the German authorities began to place restrictions on the influx of Yugoslav refugees in June, there was an immediate effect on the climate of admissions at Beek. Until then the refugees had always been admitted as tourists, but in the weekend of 13 and 14 June the Dutch customs at the airport sent almost a hundred Albanians from Kosovo back because they did not have enough money to stay in the Netherlands.²⁵⁸¹ When the press began to pay more and more attention to the refugees arriving at Beek, in late June the Ministry of Transport, Public Works and Water Management refused landing permits for several planes carrying Yugoslav refugees.²⁵⁸²

Confronted with the flights landing at Beek airport, the German government's restrictive regulations against the admission of Yugoslavs, overcrowded asylum seekers' centres and budget overrun for aid to refugees, the Dutch government decided to introduce compulsory visas for people from the former Yugoslavia as of 1 July 1992.²⁵⁸³ The visas could be issued only by the Dutch embassy in Belgrade, which caused great difficulties for the refugees, most of whom after all came from Kosovo and Macedonia. It led to an immediate reduction in the number of planes from Skopje landing at Beek.²⁵⁸⁴

The next incident involving refugees was triggered by Hasan Huremovic, an employee of Merhamet, a foundation in Rotterdam which assisted Bosnian Muslims. He presented the Dutch government with a fait accompli when he promised 332 Bosnian Muslims who had fled to Croatia admission to the Netherlands even though they did not have the visas required. After Huremovic had managed to draw the attention of the Dutch press to his refugees by reporting that there were six coachloads of Bosnian Muslims waiting for permission from the Dutch government,²⁵⁸⁵ by 28 July the ²⁵⁷⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 22/05/92, 19/06/92, 26/06/92, 09/07/92 and 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²⁵⁷⁷ De Kok and Valk in Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 31/05/92, 1.10pm; 'Kamerleden terug van vakantie voor Joegoslavië-debat' (MPs back from holidays for Yugoslavia debate), de Volkskrant, 06/08/92; Rob Meines, 'Verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië' (Dissension over intervention in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

²⁵⁷⁸ 'Joegoslaven zonder visum worden niet toegelaten' (Yugoslavs without visas not admitted), NRC Handelsblad, 07/07/92.

²⁵⁷⁹ Alfred van Cleef, 'Ik wil niet doden en ik wil niet gedood worden' (I do not want to kill and I do not want to be killed), NRC Handelsblad, 13/06/92.

²⁵⁸⁰ 'Kosto wil Joegoslaven opvangen in kazernes', NRC Handelsblad, 24/06/92.

²⁵⁸¹ 'Servisch protest tegen oorlog' (Serb protest against war), De Stem, 15/06/92.

²⁵⁸² Radio 1, IKON, De andere wereld van zondagmorgen, 28/06/92, 9.30am.

²⁵⁸³ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/06/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²⁵⁸⁴ 'Joegoslaven zonder visum worden niet toegelaten', NRC Handelsblad, 07/07/92.

²⁵⁸⁵ 'Vluchtelingen gestrand bij grens Slovenië' (Refugees stranded at Slovenian border), NRC Handelsblad, 27/07/92; 'Vluchtelingen tijdelijk naar Nederland' (Refugees come to the Netherlands temporarily), 'Merhamet wil met politiek niets meer te maken hebben' (Merhamet wants nothing more to do with politics) and 'Komst vluchtelingen deze week verwacht' (Refugees expected to arrive this week), NRC Handelsblad, 28/07/92; 'Groep doorgelaten na toezegging Nederland' (Group let through after Dutch promise), NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/92; Harm van den Berg, 'We rijden nu toch, daar ging het me om' (We are moving now anyway, that was what it was about), NRC Handelsblad, 01/08/92; Ward op den Brouw & Anneke Visser, 'Bosnische lasser schudt Nederlandse instanties wakker' (Bosnian welder makes Dutch authorities wake up), NRC Handelsblad, 21/08/92; Henny de Lange, 'Het begon met z'n familie. Hasan Huremovic haalt ex-landgenoten hier zelf heen' (It started with his family. Hasan Huremovic brings ex-compatriots here himself), Trouw, 19/08/92; Rik Zaal, Dutch government had little choice but to relent. These Muslims were the first former Yugoslavs to be admitted into the Netherlands in the framework of the Displaced Persons Regulation, which went into force as of 1 August.

By virtue of this Temporary Regulation for the Relief of Displaced Persons, asylum applications from Yugoslavs were put aside for the time being; the government tolerated their presence temporarily. This saved the Yugoslav refugees a great deal of red tape, but the main idea behind the regulation was that when the situation in Yugoslavia had become 'normal' again, they would have to return to their countries of origin. The Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs initially objected to the regulation because they thought it implied complicity with ethnic cleansing; the ministry continued to favour relief in the region itself.²⁵⁸⁶ Nevertheless, the regulation remained in force and in the first six months after its introduction 7200 ex-Yugoslavs were to be eligible for it.²⁵⁸⁷

On 28 and 29 July the audience survey department of the NOS (Netherlands Broadcasting Authority) conducted a representative opinion poll for Veronica's current affairs programme Nieuwslijn among 685 Dutch people over the age of 14 about their opinions on the admission of Yugoslav refugees. The outcome was that almost 80% of those questioned were in favour of admitting people who had been forced to flee from their homes by ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia, even though the question was put in such a way that it suggested that there were areas there where it was safe. Almost 16% of those questioned were against admission. Of those in favour, as many as one in eight thought there should be no restrictions at all on the number of refugees admitted. One in seven declared they were prepared to offer shelter to one or more refugees in their own homes.²⁵⁸⁸

The refugee problem became even more dramatic when the Croatian government, which had already taken in more than half a million refugees, announced in mid-June that it was 'absolutely impossible' to 'accommodate even one more new refugee'. The government in Zagreb would not close the borders with Bosnia, but it would immediately transfer all new refugees to the borders with Austria, Slovenia and Italy. The government said it was compelled to take this measure because so many countries had closed their borders to refugees from Bosnia or had introduced stringent visa requirements, so that Croatia, which was already on the brink of economic collapse, was turning into 'one vast refugee camp'. Moreover, the West was only giving the Croatian government financial aid for a limited number of the refugees.²⁵⁸⁹ In the succeeding days the Croatian authorities did in fact put refugees from Bosnia on the train to Austria, Germany and Italy. This led to scenes in which trains carrying refugees came to a standstill at the border between Croatia and Slovenia because the passengers did not have the visas required.²⁵⁹⁰ The Croatian authorities even sent able-bodied male Muslim refugees back to Bosnia en masse, because in President Tudjman's opinion their place was there, fighting.²⁵⁹¹

On 28 July 1992 UNHCR reported that by then 2.2 million Croatians, Muslims and Serbs had taken flight. Half a million of them had sought refuge outside the former Yugoslavia. Germany had taken in the largest number: two hundred thousand. Then came Hungary (54,000), Austria (50,000),

'Kosto', de Volkskrant, 19/08/92. For a critical discussion of the role of the media in this affair, see Auke Kok, 'De Bosniërs komen!' ('The Bosnians are coming!'), HP/De Tijd, 07/08/92.

²⁵⁸⁶ See also Frinking, cited in: 'Joegoslavië', CDA/Actueel, 06/06/92, p. 18.

²⁵⁸⁷ 'Asielverzoeken ex-Joegoslaven komen in behandeling', Trouw, 03/02/93.

²⁵⁸⁸ Kijk- en Luisteronderzoek NOS, 'Vluchtelingen uit het voormalige Joegoslavië', 30/07/92, B92-130; TV, Nederland 2, VOO, Nieuwslijn, 30/07/92, 10.00pm.

²⁵⁸⁹ 'Kroatië kan vluchtelingen niet bergen' ('Croatia cannot accommodate refugees'), NRC Handelsblad, 14/07/92.

²⁵⁹⁰ 'Vluchtelingen Bosnië na dagen toegelaten' ('Bosnian refugees admitted after days'), de Volkskrant, 20/07/92; Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Vluchtelingen uit Kroatië niet gewenst' ('Refugees from Croatia not wanted') and 'Treinen tenslotte toegelaten' ('Trains finally admitted'), NRC Handelsblad, 20/07/92; J.A. Hoeksma, 'Vluchtelingen afdoen als "ontheemden" is onaanvaardbaar' ('Dispensing with refugees as being "Displaced Persons" is unacceptable'), NRC Handelsblad, 22/07/92; 'Het gesol met vluchtelingen' ('Messing around with refugees'), Trouw, 20/07/92.

²⁵⁹¹ 'Bosnische mannen massaal door Kroatië teruggestuurd' ('Bosnian men sent back en masse by Croatia'), de Volkskrant, 22/07/92.

Sweden (44,000), Switzerland (17,000), Italy (7000), Turkey (7000), the Netherlands (6300), Luxembourg (3200), Norway (2300), Czechoslovakia (1700), France (1100) and the United Kingdom (1100).²⁵⁹² According to the UN Commission for Refugees the end of the refugee flow was not yet in sight. The Commission did not believe the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina was likely to end soon and thought that the feelings of hatred and revenge were so great that it would be a very long time before the refugees would dare to return to their homes. According to the UNHCR, there was a danger that a 'permanent refugee population in the heart of Europe' would result.²⁵⁹³

As we have seen, after Croatia Germany took in the largest number of refugees. Since the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina had broken out, two hundred thousand refugees had fled to Germany, 140,000 of whom had applied for asylum. As a result, the constitutionally guaranteed right to asylum in Germany came under political pressure. On 20 July Klaus Kinkel, who had succeeded Genscher as Minister of Foreign Affairs, failed to persuade his fellow ministers from the other EC countries to make agreements on national quotas for refugees from Bosnia-Herzegovina so that every country would take in a certain percentage of the refugees.²⁵⁹⁴

UNHCR and the Conference in July 1992

It was against this background that Sadako Ogata of Japan, High Commissioner for Refugees, decided to hold a conference in Geneva on 29 July on a Comprehensive Humanitarian Response to the war in Bosnia. At this conference both the financing of relief for Displaced Persons in the region itself and the willingness of Western countries to accept refugees would be discussed. In addition to UNPROFOR, the High Commission for Refugees had a significant role in UN involvement in the war in Bosnia; UNHCR was the member of the UN family that had been providing aid to refugees who had crossed international boundaries since 1951, but recently it had been spending more of its resources on support for all humanitarian victims of war. The most striking example was the aid given to the Kurds in the north of Iraq after the Gulf War in a zone which was proclaimed a safe haven.

On 25 October 1991, months before UNPROFOR had been set up, UN Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar had designated UNHCR as the UN's 'lead agency' in (former) Yugoslavia. This organization would be charged with providing relief for internally Displaced Persons in Yugoslavia. UNHCR had agreed with this designation on condition that its activities would not stand in the way of the deployment of UN peace forces.²⁵⁹⁵ However, it was not clear exactly what the status of a 'lead agency' was. There was no regulation or agreement in which this task was laid down, and at that time the co-ordination in the field suggested by the term 'lead agency' had no corresponding institution at the central level of the UN. It was not until April 1992 that the United Nations set up a Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA), which was supposed to co-ordinate the humanitarian activities of UN organizations and bring them to the attention of the Security Council. However, not much came of this. An analysis made in 1994 states: 'In any event, DHA in New York functioned in quiet – some would say, invisible – ways.'²⁵⁹⁶ and 'In short, there was a limited value-added element in DHA's involvement.'²⁵⁹⁷

UNHCR itself interpreted its mandate in Yugoslavia as the 'prime responsibility for logistics, transport, food monitoring, domestic needs, shelter, community services, health, emergency transition activities in agriculture and income generation, protection/legal assistance, and assistance to other ²⁵⁹² Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 157.

²⁵⁹³ 'Europa zit in zijn maag met Joegoslavische vluchtelingen', Trouw, 28/07/92.

²⁵⁹⁴ J.M. Bik, 'Kinkel ventileert 'machteloze woede' ('Kinkel gives vent to "helpless rage"'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/07/92.

²⁵⁹⁵ Lidy Nicolassen, 'Miljoenen op drift in het Jaar van de Terugkeer' ('Millions drifting in the Year of Return'), de Volkskrant, 15/02/92.

²⁵⁹⁶ Minear et al., Action, p. 108.

²⁵⁹⁷ Ibid., p. 109.

agencies in sectors under their responsibility'.²⁵⁹⁸ In short, UNHCR wanted to make sure that all the needs of those who had been forced to take flight in the region or had been stricken by the war locally were met. From late 1991 on UNHCR devoted itself to aid, including the prime responsibility for logistics and transport. UNHCR co-ordinated all inter-governmental aid, ensured the co-ordination of the efforts of the UN and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and civilian aid linked up with military efforts. In this context, UNHCR would work mainly with UNICEF, which had a tradition of assisting all parties in civil wars (from November 1991), the WHO (from July 1992) and the WFP, which went into action in the former Yugoslavia as of November 1992. The term 'lead agency' by no means implied that other UN organizations were subordinate to UNHCR.²⁵⁹⁹ Moreover, on 6 December 1991, Perez de Cuellar asked UNHCR to take on an additional task, as well as the usual one of providing aid to Displaced Persons, namely that of inspecting the living conditions of people who had been driven from their homes, because while there were as yet no peace troops present the UN 'wanted to do something' in Yugoslavia.²⁶⁰⁰

In the light of the enormous task UNHCR would eventually have to confront, the Commission began in Yugoslavia in a relatively small way. In October 1991 the refugee organization had only a modest office in Belgrade. A few weeks later José-Maria Mendiluce, a Basque diplomat, arrived as Special Envoy for humanitarian action in Yugoslavia. At the time, the arrival of the first UNHCR aid workers passed practically unnoticed by the outside world. Nevertheless, as early as 1991 UNHCR offered its first assistance to Displaced Persons in Croatia and Serbia. But it was not until April 1992 that the UNHCR's activities in the former Yugoslavia really got underway,²⁶⁰¹ at that point UNHCR found itself in a war zone in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The organization was no longer responsible only for refugees, but for an entire population which was in danger of being expelled or starved. The UNHCR's policy was focused on doing as much as possible to provide the population with reasonable living conditions locally, so that they did not need to flee.²⁶⁰² The result was that the UNHCR's target group in Yugoslavia grew from half a million in December 1991 to several million a few months later. In December 1991 there were 19 UNHCR staff members in Yugoslavia, a year later 337, and in November 1993 as many as 678, of whom 226 were international and 452 local. UNHCR, which was responsible for food convoys in Bosnia, had 350 vehicles at its disposal with a total capacity of four thousand tons. Eventually UNHCR was spending half of its budget on the war in the former Yugoslavia. By the end of 1992 Yugoslavia had grown to be 'the largest, most complex and risky operation (...) ever undertaken by humanitarian organizations', according to Mendiluce.²⁶⁰³

The leadership of UNHCR was in the hands of Sadako Ogata, the High Commissioner for Refugees. She combined intelligence and diplomacy with resolution and dedication. She was a good organizer and in general had a well-developed sense of choosing the right moment to use her authority.²⁶⁰⁴ On taking office in February 1992 she had found an organization whose morale was low, mainly due to allegations that UNHCR had been inadequately prepared for the emergency situation which had arisen after the Gulf War. The organization had been taken by surprise by the flight of the Kurds from Saddam Hussein's regime, which led to pictures of miserable people shivering in the freezing cold on mountain slopes in the north of Iraq. Yugoslavia offered UNHCR a new chance, and Ogata, competent as she was, grasped it eagerly. She became, as she herself put it, the 'desk officer for the former Yugoslavia'.²⁶⁰⁵ However, she left the real work to Mendiluce.

²⁵⁹⁸ Quoted in Minear, Action, p. 26.

²⁵⁹⁹ See LL. A UNHCR Handbook for the Military on Humanitarian Operations, Geneva 1995, p. 24.

²⁶⁰⁰ Mercier, Crimes, p. 48.

²⁶⁰¹ Mercier, Crimes, p. 28.

²⁶⁰² Mercier, Crimes, p. 51.

²⁶⁰³ Minear et al., Action, p. 26.

²⁶⁰⁴ Cf. Zimmermann, Origins, pp. 220-221.

²⁶⁰⁵ Weiss & Pasic, 'UNHCR', p. 50; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 197.

Mendiluce, who had had experience in Northern Iraq helping the Kurds, was soon to observe in Yugoslavia that ‘Kurdistan was a teaparty compared to what we are facing here’.²⁶⁰⁶ As was described in Chapter 5, when he arrived in Zvornik at the beginning of April, he found himself in the midst of the Serb paramilitary actions against the local Muslims. He then told the local commanders on his own authority that the population was under the protection of UNHCR. In this way he had been able to save hundreds of lives, but the price he paid was that he co-operated with ethnic cleansing by taking these Muslims out of the city.²⁶⁰⁷

This was not a new dilemma; as early as mid-October 1991 the Croatian Minister of Interior Affairs Ivan Vekic had accused the observers of the European monitoring mission, the ECMM, of being involved in the ‘deportation of the Croats of Ilok’ and assisting ‘the enemy’, after they had helped Croats who had signed documents ‘voluntarily’ giving up their possessions to leave.²⁶⁰⁸ In July 1992 irritation arose again, this time on the part of UN staff, after UNPROFOR troops and UNHCR personnel had given assistance to a convoy taking seven thousand Bosnian Muslim refugees from Bosanski Novi in north-western Bosnia to the Croatian town of Karlovac. According to the Serb authorities, these seven thousand people were leaving the area voluntarily, because it was scourged by violence. On arrival in Karlovac, when the ‘refugees’ felt free to talk, they said they had been forced to sign documents declaring that they gave up all their property. The UN authorities realized, to their indignation, that they had been accessories to ethnic cleansing.²⁶⁰⁹ Between the beginning of June 1992 and mid-1993 UNHCR practice vacillated between on the one hand protecting people in their own homes and villages and on the other helping people to escape from life-threatening situations.²⁶¹⁰ However, from the summer of 1992 onwards, the policy at the top of the organization was, as Mendiluce later formulated it, ‘I prefer 30.000 evacuees to 30.000 bodies.’²⁶¹¹ The International Red Cross had the same policy line: ‘We saw only one way out – to help people to get away and at the same time denounce “ethnic cleansing”’.²⁶¹²

How to prevent more refugees fleeing from Bosnia: the birth of the Safe Area concept

Representatives of seventy countries attended the conference convened by Ogata on 29 and 30 July. Most of them were ministers and secretaries of state, but there was also a delegation from the International Red Cross (ICRC). On behalf of the Netherlands a delegation from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was present, led by Junior Minister P. Dankert. At this conference it emerged that the Western governments were not very willing to accept refugees in their own territory.²⁶¹³ The United Kingdom, France and Italy were particularly reluctant.²⁶¹⁴ A spokeswoman for the British delegation declared that her government wanted to save the refugees the long journey to the United Kingdom.²⁶¹⁵ Many governments did promise considerable financial support for UNHCR. The meeting again made it clear that the governments of Western Europe believed that relief for the victims of ethnic cleansing practices should, to as great an extent as possible, be provided in the former Yugoslavia itself. It would ²⁶⁰⁶ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 200.

²⁶⁰⁷ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 201.

²⁶⁰⁸ Theo Engelen, ‘Strijd laait hoog op aan alle fronten in Kroatië’ (‘Conflict flares up on all fronts in Croatia’), NRC Handelsblad, 18/10/91. For an example of one of these ‘documents of voluntary departure’, see ‘Bosniërs tekenden voor ‘permanente emigratie’ (‘Bosnians signed for “permanent emigration”’), de Volkskrant, 25/08/92.

²⁶⁰⁹ Silber & Little, p. 247; Maas, Neighbor, pp. 72-73; Lidy Nicolassen, ‘Geneefs overleg bewijst lippendienst aan vluchtelingen’, de Volkskrant, 30/07/92.

²⁶¹⁰ Minear et al., Action, p. 67.

²⁶¹¹ Minear et al., Action, pp. 66-67; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 208.

²⁶¹² Mercier, Crimes, p. 6.

²⁶¹³ Folkert Jensma, ‘Portemonnees open maar grenzen dicht in Genève’ (‘Purses open but borders closed in Geneva’), NRC Handelsblad, 30/07/92; Lidy Nicolassen, ‘Vluchtelingenconferentie wil Bosniërs op Balkan houden’ (‘Refugee conference wants to keep Bosnians in Balkans’), de Volkskrant, 30/07/92.

²⁶¹⁴ ‘Geen oplossing’ (‘No solution’), de Volkskrant, 31/07/92.

²⁶¹⁵ NOS Laet, 29/07/92.

be even better if the flight of people from ethnic cleansing could be prevented, but then some form of safety would have to be offered to them. This was in fact the UNHCR's objective. The next question was how it should be done. On the eve of the conference in Geneva the French government therefore proclaimed that security zones should be created in Bosnia itself for the relief and protection of Displaced Persons; these zones would be similar to the Safe Areas which had been created for the Kurds after the Gulf War. The French Chief of Staff Admiral J. Lanxade was said to have discussed this matter with his American colleague General Powell in Washington on 24 July.²⁶¹⁶

During the conference the idea of 'preventive protection' was put forward, in concordance with an agreement reached between the Croatian and Bosnian governments on 22 July about providing relief for Bosnian displaced people in Safe Areas in Bosnia itself. This 'preventive protection' was intended to stop the population being put to flight, both in areas where conflicts had already broken out and in regions where tension was rising. The idea was widely approved since the European governments, and in particular the Austrian government, were afraid of the large refugee flow from the former Yugoslavia.²⁶¹⁷ Many delegations therefore made statements about setting up safe havens, demilitarized zones or protected areas. In all these cases it was assumed that international troops would provide military protection, on condition that the warring factions in Bosnia consented. The UN would have to design a political regulation for this purpose.²⁶¹⁸

At the conference it was decided to set up a 'Follow-up Committee on the Comprehensive Response to the Humanitarian Crisis in the Former Yugoslavia', in which representatives from 35 countries, from the European Commission, the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, the International Red Cross and various other international organizations would participate. The Committee suggested to Boutros-Ghali that the UN Department for Humanitarian Affairs should investigate the idea of safety zones and their feasibility in the former Yugoslavia.²⁶¹⁹

The Dutch government stated at once that it was in favour of such safety zones. However, UNHCR considered that there should first be a greater UNPROFOR presence and the International Red Cross was initially not in favour because it was afraid that zones like this would have the effect of provoking even larger streams of people.²⁶²⁰ This idea was eventually to lead to a paper by UNHCR and the International Red Cross on preventive action and Safe Areas, which was presented on 17 December 1992. The UNHCR conference at the end of July can therefore be regarded as the cradle of the concept of Safe Areas.²⁶²¹

There is another reason why the UNHCR conference at the end of July 1992 is worth mentioning, although most of those attending did not realize it at the time. During the conference Cornelio Sommaruga, president of the International Red Cross, reported that in Bosnia civilians were being put into internment camps on a large scale and that torture and summary executions were taking place in the framework of ethnic cleansing. He described these actions as practices which by now had been thought to exist only as themes in museums about the Second World War.²⁶²² The leader of the International Red Cross had decided to abandon his traditional policy of confidentiality and had deliberately grasped the opportunity of the conference to jolt the ministers attending it and ²⁶¹⁶ 'Europa zit in zijn maag met Joegoslavische vluchtelingen', Trouw, 28/07/92.

²⁶¹⁷ Interview I. Khan, 28/01/2000.

²⁶¹⁸ Lidy Nicolassen, 'UNHCR ontwerpt aparte status voor tijdelijke vluchteling' ('UNHCR creates separate status for temporary refugee'), de Volkskrant, 31/07/92.

²⁶¹⁹ ABZ, DIO/2003/00063. Follow-up Committee on the Comprehensive Response to the Humanitarian Crisis in the Former Yugoslavia, Second Meeting, 04/09/92, Working Document. Advance copy, appendix to PR Geneva to F. van Wulfften Palthe, 24/08/92, fax no. hum/gev-0579/92.

²⁶²⁰ ABZ, DIO/2003/00063. Van den Broek 252 to PR Geneva, 13/10/92.

²⁶²¹ Interview I. Khan, 28/01/2000.

²⁶²² Records of PR Geneva, Statement by Cornelio Sommaruga, 29/07/92; Cohen, Hearts, p. 217; Mercier, Crimes, pp. 53 and 199-202; Mark van Driel, 'Met NAVO-bommen ging te veel mis' ('Too much went wrong with NATO bombs'), de Volkskrant, 13/08/99.

international public opinion with the news of the camps.²⁶²³ Although Sommaruga's words were difficult to misunderstand, they had little effect on those present.²⁶²⁴ This was all the stranger because on the same day that Sommaruga gave his speech, an article appeared in the British newspaper The Guardian in which the existence of Serb concentration camps in Bosnia was reported.

6. Reporting on the complicated relations in Bosnia

‘Kriege haben es an sich, dass es viel schwieriger ist, zu recherchieren; viel problematischer, die Wahrheit herauszufinden. Was ist Wahrheit? Im Krieg wird schlagartig klar, dass es viele Wahrheiten gibt – vielleicht mehr als in anderen Situationen.’²⁶²⁵

[‘A characteristic of wars is that it is much more difficult to investigate them; much more of a problem to discover the truth. What is truth? In war it suddenly becomes clear that there are many truths – perhaps more than in other situations’.]

‘The television is the pressure cooker of public indignation and the pan in which political indignation is pre-cooked (...) Anyone in favour of intervention in the Balkans should perhaps first try to get camera crews sent,’ wrote Gijsbert van Es on 5 August 1992 in NRC Handelsblad.²⁶²⁶ It was as though his tip was taken at once: on 6 and 7 August 1992 television pictures were broadcast throughout the whole world of an emaciated Bosnian Muslim behind barbed wire. These film fragments, which became known in the Netherlands as ‘the pictures of Omarska’,²⁶²⁷ would etch themselves on the retinas of television viewers more deeply than any other image of the war in Bosnia and in the opinion of many authors they contributed to the discussion on possible military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina.²⁶²⁸ In the following section these pictures will be examined in detail; the discussion will include both the history of the origin of the pictures and the doubts which later arose as to the authenticity of these fragments. The space devoted to these pictures is justified because with the help of this much talked about case an attempt can be made to establish the relative influence (or lack of it) of the media on the policies of the Western governments with respect to Yugoslavia. The discussion will show that many of ‘the pictures of Omarska’ were not what they seemed; for example, they were not pictures of Omarska.

It is first necessary to outline the relations that existed in Bosnia at that moment and how they were reported. The situation in Croatia in 1991 and early 1992 had already been complicated for outsiders, but the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina was even more difficult to comprehend. In the era preceding the conflict, an inhabitant of Bosnia had a rich choice of identities. At the national level he could choose one of three identities: he could decide to define himself as a Yugoslav, a Bosnian, or a Muslim/Serb/Croat/other ethnicity. After Yugoslavia had disintegrated, there were still two possibilities left. A Serb, for instance, could choose for the Serb nationalism of the SDS of Karadzic, Koljevic, Krajisnik and Plavsic, but he could also choose for the Bosnian government and the Bosnian ²⁶²³ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 55 and 110-111.

²⁶²⁴ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 53 and 138.

²⁶²⁵ Andreas Braun, reporter for the Stuttgarter Zeitung, quoted in Richter, Journalisten, p. 106.

²⁶²⁶ Gijsbert van Es, ‘Televisie als snelkookpan’ (‘Television as pressure cooker’), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

²⁶²⁷ See for example Rik Kuethe, ‘Definitie van horror’ (‘Definition of horror’), Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 28; Gerbert van Genderen Stort, ‘Gerecht zonder aangeklaagden’ (‘Court without defendants’), HP/De Tijd, 04/06/93, p. 29; Peter de Waard, ‘Dubieuze beelden van een ‘dodenkamp’ (‘Dubious pictures of a “death camp”’), de Volkskrant, 10/03/00; Marjolijn de Cocq, ‘Het grote belang van de kleine vissen’ (‘The great importance of the small fry’), Haagsche Courant, 11/08/01. They were also referred to as the pictures of Manjaca; Caroline de Gruyter, ‘Kroaten rijgen kettingen van Servische vingers’ (‘Croats make chains from Serb fingers’), Elsevier, 03/10/92, pp. 46-47.

²⁶²⁸ See for example Eisermann, Weg, p. 121; Silber & Little, Death, p. 252; M. Borogovac and S. Rustempasic, ‘US administration announces further support for Serbian plan for Bosnia’, Bosnia Storm 08/03/95.

government's army, the ABiH. President Izetbegovic was the leader of a Muslim party, but at the same time head of a multi-ethnic state. Not only outsiders, but even the people concerned experienced a great deal of conceptual confusion with regard to their own identity. For example, in 1990 Izetbegovic's SDA still rejected the term Bosnjak to refer to the identity of their own followers, but in September 1993 they embraced it.

A factor which made relations even more complicated was that during the war fundamental differences of opinion had arisen within the separate ethnic groups, a topic often neglected in Western news coverage of Yugoslavia and of Bosnia in particular.²⁶²⁹ On the Serb side there were major differences of opinion between the political and military leaders, personified by Radovan Karadzic, president of the Serb Republic, and Ratko Mladic, commander of the Bosnian Serb army. There was also tension between the political leaders of the Serb Republic in Pale and the Bosnian Serb military and political leaders in Banja Luka. Within the limited territory that comprised his state in 1993, the Muslim president Alija Izetbegovic had to deal with what was in fact a separatist movement by troops in the Bihac region led by Fikret Abdic, who, as was discussed in Chapter 5, had been his rival since May 1992. There was also constant tension between extremist and more moderate elements in the Bosnian Croat group.

Croats and Serbs in Bosnia tended to be oriented towards Croatia and Serbia respectively. The fact that large groups of the population of Bosnia felt special ties with Croatia and Serbia respectively added extra layers to the conflict. Just as there had been tension between Babic, the Serb leader in Croatia, on the one hand and Milosevic on the other, there were also differences of opinion between Karadzic in Bosnia and Milosevic in Serbia.

The presence of criminal elements whose interests sometimes coincided with the strategy as a whole and sometimes did not, made things even more obscure. Finally, in Bosnia, unlike Croatia, there was no question of more or less clear front lines; the warring factions' areas overlapped, so that various enclaves and corridors were fought over by coalitions whose composition changed occasionally. For example, Croats and Serbs collaborated in Neretva Valley while simultaneously fighting against each other in the Posavina corridor.

It was not easy for correspondents on the spot to create a coherent picture for American or West European newspaper readers and television viewers on the basis of infrequent reports from this hotch-potch of data. Until a very short time before the parties now in conflict with each other in Bosnia had lived side by side. When negotiating about ceasefires, which they would soon violate again, or exchanging prisoners or corpses, they would also cordially exchange stories about the fortunes of families on either side of the dividing line and eat and drink together as if there were no frontlines, no shots had been exchanged and no houses had been set on fire. In some places warring factions lent or sold each other arms. Journalists were sometimes baffled by the reality of such events, which did not correspond with the three-way division into Croats, Muslims and Serbs which had become fixed in their own images of Bosnia.²⁶³⁰ And even during the war in Croatia, as it turned out, the complexity of the conflict and the confusion it brought down on the journalists themselves made it difficult for them to get Western readers interested in events taking place in the former Yugoslavia. But at least Croatia was familiar to many West Europeans as a holiday destination; the journalists found it much more difficult to explain the complicated situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina to the public. They could not assume that their readers were at all familiar with the ethnic and geographic relations in this area.²⁶³¹

Engaged journalism

Another reason why readers had not felt much involvement with the war in Croatia was that it was difficult for both reporters and readers to identify with one of the warring factions. In most Western ²⁶²⁹ Cf. Mirjana Prosic-Dvornic, 'Serbia. The Inside Story', Halpern & Kideckel (eds.), Neighbors, p. 317.

²⁶³⁰ Cf. Loyd, War, p. 115.

²⁶³¹ Richter, Journalisten, p. 182.

countries there was little sympathy not only for the Serbs but also for the Croats. Bosnia was different: from the outset the Muslims were seen as the party under attack and as victims of ethnic cleansing. Those most to blame for the conflict were the Serbs. Most attempts at investigative journalism during the war in Bosnia were focused on finding more convincing proof of the victimization of Muslims.²⁶³²

However, investigative journalism had its limitations. For example, reporters never succeeded in discovering the whole truth about the three great massacres in Sarajevo of May 1992, February 1994 and August 1995.²⁶³³ Paul Moorcraft, who covered wars for a quarter of a century, including the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, believed that in this war there was such a thing as ‘the tyranny of victimology’: ‘The Bosnian Muslim atrocities and their intransigence tended to be ignored by the media.’²⁶³⁴ For example, of the 71 photos relating to the Bosnian war published by The Washington Post in the first six months of 1992, 31 were devoted to Muslim victims and three to Serb victims, which, even if one takes account of the fact that in this phase of the war the Serbs were making the most victims, still presents a distorted picture.²⁶³⁵ German television broadcasting stations were not even at all interested in acquiring material on film about Serbs who had been killed.²⁶³⁶ When in the spring of 1993 a Dutch UN military observer met a group of Dutch newspaper journalists in Tuzla who were travelling along the front with ABiH officers, and asked them if they were also going to visit the Serb side, they told him they were not, because ‘the Serb story is known well enough’.²⁶³⁷

Some journalists were so emotionally involved in events such as ethnic cleansing that they used their articles to try to prod their governments into taking a more active approach to military intervention.²⁶³⁸ Moreover, editors often altered reports from correspondents if they were not in keeping with the fixed image of Serb perpetrators and Muslim victims.²⁶³⁹ This was also the case in the newsrooms of Dutch newspapers and broadcasting companies. It was even suggested that in choosing correspondents editors allowed themselves to be influenced by the question of whether or not the person concerned was anti-Serb enough.²⁶⁴⁰ Adept of this form of engaged journalism justified it by saying it was difficult not to become emotionally involved when ethnic cleansing and mass murder were taking place.²⁶⁴¹ Daily Telegraph correspondent Alec Russell wrote of his experiences: ‘[A]nalogies with Nazi Germany rightly have to be used with extreme caution in newsprint. But in Bosnia in 1992 correspondents (...) struggled to find a lesser comparison.’²⁶⁴² ‘If the bad news about Bosnia could just be brought home to the people, I remember thinking, the slaughter would not be allowed to continue’, wrote David Rieff, who worked in Bosnia from September 1992 on.²⁶⁴³ ‘Indifference was not an option open to us’, said BBC correspondent Martin Bell.²⁶⁴⁴ According to him, a ‘journalism of attachment’ arose in Bosnia.²⁶⁴⁵

This attachment did not only derive from the journalists themselves; it was also a deliberate goal of the Bosnian government, who lacked heavy weapons and therefore regarded foreign journalists as their ‘artillery’, as the Bosnian Minister of Foreign Affairs and future Prime Minister Haris Silajdzic put it,²⁶⁴⁶ or as their most reliable allies.²⁶⁴⁷ Nevertheless, journalists were divided as to the appropriateness

²⁶³² Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 162-163.

²⁶³³ Cf. Richter, Journalisten, p. 167.

²⁶³⁴ Moorcraft, Conflict.

²⁶³⁵ Sremac, War, p. 103.

²⁶³⁶ ‘Een Servisch lijk verkoopt niet’ (‘A Serb corpse does not sell’), Elsevier, 03/10/92, p. 48.

²⁶³⁷ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

²⁶³⁸ See for example Richter, Journalism, pp. 206 en 257.

²⁶³⁹ Bell, Way, p. 29; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 163.

²⁶⁴⁰ Appendix Jan Wieten, Srebrenica en de journalistiek, pp. 57 and 59-60.

²⁶⁴¹ Richter, Journalisten, pp. 186-187, 227 and 250.

²⁶⁴² Russell, Prejudice, p. 259.

²⁶⁴³ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 9. See also ibid., pp. 169-170; Richter, Journalisten, pp. 62-63.

²⁶⁴⁴ Bell, Way, pp. 99-100. See also Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 217

²⁶⁴⁵ Martin Bell, ‘I know he’s a war criminal but I can’t help liking him’, Mail on Sunday, 06/06/99.

²⁶⁴⁶ Quoted in: Sremac, War, p. 24.

²⁶⁴⁷ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 217-218.

of this sort of attachment. Some of them clung to the ethos of objective and impartial reporting.²⁶⁴⁸ The fact that it was mainly the emotionally involved journalists who wrote books or published volumes of their articles can lead all too easily to the distorted impression that ‘attachment journalism’ was dominant amongst the correspondents. This kind of emotional stance was often more pronounced in editorial offices and newsrooms than among the journalists operating in the war zone.

During the war in Croatia journalists had been able to move fairly freely along the front lines and even pass them, though sometimes at the risk of their own lives. In the early months of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina the situation was quite different. Often Serb paramilitaries refused to give journalists access to the areas where they were carrying out ethnic cleansing or threatened reporters who approached nevertheless. In early April 1992 Arkan had made an exception by inviting the photographer Ron Haviv to Bijeljina, where his Tigers were wreaking havoc at the time. Haviv took a number of shocking photos there, including one showing an Arkan Tiger kicking the body of a dead woman. The woman had run to a man who had previously been shot and killed, and had then been shot herself. This and several other horrifying photos taken by Haviv were printed in the American magazine Time.²⁶⁴⁹ It cannot be ruled out that at the early stages of ethnic cleansing Arkan deliberately wanted publicity for the actions of his paramilitaries so as to increase fear of them and to encourage Muslims to leave Eastern Bosnia. Later it no longer made sense to permit the media to be present during actions because their reports on ethnic cleansing had a negative effect on world opinion. Haviv’s photos, for example, caused some commotion in the West, though not for long.

Because they were often refused access to the scenes of conflict, journalists were unable to verify most of the reports on events in eastern and north-western Bosnia at first hand;²⁶⁵⁰ often they had to depend on rumours,²⁶⁵¹ or they were unwilling to check reports on the spot because they considered the risks too great. From the summer of 1992 on most journalists were of the opinion that due to danger of shooting they could only travel through Bosnia as part of UN convoys.²⁶⁵² Certain parts of Bosnia, such as the strategic area around Brcko, where a great deal of fighting took place throughout the whole war, were thus seldom or never visited by journalists.²⁶⁵³ A considerable number of the foreign journalists stayed in Zagreb, Sarajevo or Belgrade and for the real work made use of so-called ‘stringers’, local workers who supplied reports and photos.²⁶⁵⁴

After the war broke out in Bosnia the vast majority of the foreign journalists stayed in Sarajevo, mainly at the Holiday Inn.²⁶⁵⁵ It must be said that this was not only because they wanted to avoid combat areas; outside Sarajevo it was often impossible to find good telephone connections.²⁶⁵⁶ Journalists were also tied to one place by the high broadcasting frequency of some media. For instance, the British war correspondent Martin Bell, who worked for BBC television, wrote that a colleague who worked for the radio had to deliver 28 bulletins a day. No wonder this man never left Holiday Inn; he scarcely had time to get hold of information by telephone from the local UN spokesman.²⁶⁵⁷ Moreover, it was at least possible for a journalist to do his work (or some of it) at the Holiday Inn. The hotel became ‘a grandstand from which you could watch the snipers at work.’²⁶⁵⁸ ‘In Sarajevo, I could stand ²⁶⁴⁸ See for example Richter, Journalisten, pp. 185-187.

²⁶⁴⁹ ‘The killing goes on’, Time, 20/04/92; Haviv, Blood, pp. 18-19, 60-61.

²⁶⁵⁰ For the problems involved in objective reporting on the war in Yugoslavia see for example Peter Brock, ‘Dateline’; id., ‘Meutenjournalismus’, in: Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp. 15-36.

²⁶⁵¹ Bell, Way, pp. 19, 50.

²⁶⁵² Richter, Journalisten, p. 204.

²⁶⁵³ Cf. Richter, Journalisten, p. 252.

²⁶⁵⁴ Cf. Karskens, Pleisters, p. 271; Loyd, War, pp. 81 and 179; Richter, Journalisten, p. 151; Sadkovic, Media, p. 11; interview P. Milinov, 17/11/99.

²⁶⁵⁵ Peter Brock, ‘Meutenjournalismus’, in: Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, p. 26.

²⁶⁵⁶ Richter, Journalisten, p. 227.

²⁶⁵⁷ Bell, Way, pp. 28-29.

²⁶⁵⁸ Maass, Neighbor, p. 146.

at my window, out of the line of fire, and watch more drama unfold in five minutes than some people might see in a lifetime,' wrote the American journalist Peter Maass.²⁶⁵⁹

The concentration of journalists in Sarajevo had an unmistakable effect on reporting. 'You knew that the Serbs were shooting at people – at you', said NCRV radio reporter Wouter Kurpershoek, 'and because of that you were less inclined to say anything positive about them.'²⁶⁶⁰ Victims had little difficulty in talking to foreign journalists – on the contrary.²⁶⁶¹ The consequence was that the journalists mainly told the story of the Muslims. It was easy for them to lose sight of the fact that sixty thousand of the more than three hundred thousand inhabitants of Sarajevo were Serbs. And even if they did not lose sight of this fact personally, it was a detail which neither they nor their editors were sure they should burden their readers with.

