Any journalist who did take the trouble to widen his outlook and move outside Sarajevo to try to learn something about the Serb side of the story had to overcome many obstacles. For example, a journalist who travelled to Pale (just outside Sarajevo), where the highest Bosnian Serb authorities were ensconced, not only exposed himself to firing, but also had to confront numerous roadblocks. In addition, he ran the risk of being robbed or taken for a spy.²⁶⁶² Since the efforts made by journalists to reach Pale were often not rewarded by the 'government' of the Serb Republic, most journalists decided not to leave Sarajevo for a trip of this nature.²⁶⁶³ Pale was also the place where the journalists had to fetch permits to enter any area inside the Serb Republic they wished to visit. Decisions on granting these permits were quite arbitrary.²⁶⁶⁴ Travelling without permits was dangerous, because in general the attitude towards foreign journalists in the Bosnian Serb area was hostile.²⁶⁶⁵ But even travelling with permits did not guarantee that a journalist would not get into trouble. Local authorities often turned out to have different views on the significance of a permit than the authorities in Pale. The VRS also often made things very difficult for journalists.²⁶⁶⁶ There was a high risk of being arrested in the Bosnian Serb area,²⁶⁶⁷ and from early 1993 onwards the only Western European television broadcasting companies the VRS gave access to enter the areas they controlled were the BBC and RAI 1.²⁶⁶⁸ From September 1993 on the Bosnian Serb authorities did not allow any more reporters at all to enter the enclaves in East Bosnia.²⁶⁶⁹ However, the most dangerous areas to work in were those controlled by Bosnian Croats. Sometimes they went as far as sending journalists into the line of fire in the hope that their opponents would shoot them.²⁶⁷⁰

There is no doubt that it was dangerous for television crews with cameras to travel past roadblocks. There was a good chance that their equipment would be confiscated. Even the enterprising Martin Bell from BBC television sometimes restricted his work area for several weeks to the street in front of the Holiday Inn, which went in one direction towards the airport of Sarajevo, and in the other to the presidential palace in the capital.²⁶⁷¹ This was the street which was regularly under fire from Serb snipers – it was also known as 'Sniper Alley' – so that often pictures of Muslim victims could be taken. It even led Bell to ask when he had ever taken pictures of Serb victims; but, he added, 'even to raise ²⁶⁵⁹ Maass, Neighbor, p. 148.

²⁶⁶⁰ Judith Neurink, 'Angst en stress in Sarajevo' ('Anxiety and stress in Sarajevo'), De Journalist, 28/08/92, p. 16.

²⁶⁶¹ Richter, Journalisten, p. 161.

²⁶⁶² See for example Richter, Journalisten, pp. 208 and 229; James Gow & Richard Paterson & Alison Preston, 'Introduction', idem (eds.), Bosnia, p. 3.

²⁶⁶³ Bell, Way, pp. 112-113.

²⁶⁶⁴ Richter, Journalisten, pp. 154 and 221.

²⁶⁶⁵ Richter, Journalisten, p. 154.

²⁶⁶⁶ Interview W. Lust, 19/07/00.

²⁶⁶⁷ Richter, Journalisten, p. 214.

²⁶⁶⁸ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

²⁶⁶⁹ Richter, Journalisten, p. 127 n. 3.

²⁶⁷⁰ Richter, Journalisten, pp. 221 and 261.

²⁶⁷¹ Bell, Way, p. 114.

these questions is to risk being branded as an apologist for the Serbs, which I am not, and never was.²⁶⁷²

In view of the grave risks they ran as soon as they left the relative protection of their hotel, the journalists gathered in Sarajevo's Holiday Inn decided shortly after the beginning of the war in Bosnia to pool their film material. This was a unique event in the media world, where normally the quest for scoops is all-important. In Sarajevo there was no question of the usual 'typische Berufsneid – Journalisten waren existentiell bedroht, mussten näher zusammenrücken.' ['typical professional jealousy – journalists were existentially threatened, had to draw closer together.']²⁶⁷³ It goes without saying that this pooling of films, which continued until the summer of 1995, did not contribute to the diversity of reporting. It meant that only one camera needed to go to a combat zone; as Bell put it, 'It penalized the brave. It rewarded the indolent, who need not leave the hotel'.²⁶⁷⁴

The adage that journalists are not where the news is but news is where the journalists are became all too true due to the concentration of journalists in Sarajevo.²⁶⁷⁵ Koljevic was later to say that the Bosnian Serb leaders were quite happy that the journalists focused on Sarajevo. It meant that in the spring of 1992 the Serbs were free to do as they pleased in northern and north-western Bosnia.²⁶⁷⁶

7. First information about camps in north-western Bosnia

The ethnic cleansing which took place in the Drina River area in eastern Bosnia in the first half of 1992 has already been discussed in Chapter 5. Up to this point little attention has been paid to north-western Bosnia, an area where 700,000 Muslims lived, but which the Serbs seriously wanted as a link between Serbia and the Serb areas in eastern Bosnia on the one hand and the Republika Srpska in Croatia on the other.

In north-western Bosnia ethnic cleansing began in late April in towns such as Banja Luka, Prijedor and Kozarac (see map in Chapter 3, Section 8).²⁶⁷⁷ Some of the Muslims who were forced to leave their homes in these towns were put into camps from May on. In some cases this was done with object of persuading them by means of a short stay in wretched conditions to leave the area claimed by the Bosnian Serb authorities. In other cases people were imprisoned in order to be able to exchange them for Serbs who had fallen into the hands of Croats and Muslims.

An investigative team sent by the American Senate would later conclude that by the summer of 1992 approximately 170,000 people had been placed in Bosnian Serb camps, most of them Muslims. Only a small number were prisoners of war. The American team established that people in the camps were raped, beaten and starved. The investigators said there was proof of 'organized killing', but often the murders in the camps were of a 'recreational and sadistic' nature.²⁶⁷⁸ The team set up by the UN at the beginning of October 1992 to investigate the violation of human rights in the former Yugoslavia was eventually to inspect 715 prison camps; some were run by Bosnian Serbs (237), others by Croats (77) and Muslims (89), by Croats and Muslims together (4) and in other cases it was not even possible to establish clearly who was in charge (308). In general the conditions in the Bosnian Serb camps were worse than in the camps run by Croats and Muslims.²⁶⁷⁹

The most important Bosnian Serb detention centres in north-western Bosnia were the Keraterm factory near Prijedor, which manufactured ceramic products and thermal insulation materials, ²⁶⁷² Bell, Way, p. 114.

²⁶⁷³ Rupert Neudeck quoted in Richter, Journalisten, p. 169. See also ibid., pp. 207, 216.

²⁶⁷⁴ Bell, Way, p. 64.

²⁶⁷⁵ Bell, Way, p. 59. Cf. Dominic Lawson: 'So now we know what the British and American troops will be chanting in Bosnia and Somalia: "We're here because the networks are here,"' quoted in Dore, Japan, p. 138.

²⁶⁷⁶ Silber & Little, Death, p. 253.

²⁶⁷⁷ For a description of the events that took place there see for example the Bassiouni report, UN, S/1994/674, Appendix, clauses 151 - 182; United States Senate, Cleansing, pp. 8-9.

²⁶⁷⁸ Vulliamy, Seasons, pp. 114-115.

²⁶⁷⁹ Čalic, Krieg, p. 134.

and the camps Manjaca, Omarska and Trnopolje (see map in Chapter 3, Section 8). The worst of these camps was the iron-ore mine at Omarska, near Prijedor, where between three and five thousand people, mainly men with Croat or Muslim backgrounds, were imprisoned. The guards beat the prisoners frequently, in many cases to death, and the inmates were undernourished.²⁶⁸⁰

In May and June 1992 Bosnian government agencies and private individuals in Sarajevo gathered information about the stream of refugees which was being caused in north-western Bosnia by ethnic cleansing and tried to engage the interest of world opinion for this question. Information was for example, issued by the Bosnian Red Cross, the Bosnian Esperanto Association and the Bosnian United Nations Association.²⁶⁸¹ The information included reports of camps in which Croat and Muslim civilians were imprisoned.

The existence of such camps was in violation of the laws of war as set down in the Geneva treaties and protocols. All areas which could be regarded as legal successors of Yugoslavia were bound by the acceptance of the four Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols of 1950 and 1979 respectively. The second Additional Protocol was specifically about internal conflicts.²⁶⁸² Moreover, on 22 May 1992, at the invitation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, representatives of the presidium of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the SDS, the SDA and the HDZ, signed an agreement binding themselves to respect the provisions of the Geneva Conventions. In this agreement the parties promised to give the ICRC free access to all detained civilians.²⁶⁸³ The committee led by Frits Kalshoven, which set out in October 1992 to investigate serious violations of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international human rights in the former Yugoslavia, assumed that in view of the nature of the conflict and the agreements entered into by the parties, the law that was applicable to international conflicts was also applicable to all conflicts taking place in the former Yugoslavia.²⁶⁸⁴ Finally, on 31 December 1992 the Bosnian government yet again explicitly stated that it would honour the Geneva Treaties and Protocols. The displacement of the population, unless for its own safety or for urgent military reasons, is expressly prohibited in the first Geneva Protocol. The same is true of many other measures which were taken in the framework of ethnic cleansing, such as artillery attacks on civilian targets, starvation and the torture and murder of prisoners.

At the same time that private organizations were reporting the existence of camps in Serb-dominated areas, the government in Sarajevo had no more than eyewitness accounts at its disposal. The Bosnian authorities were not in a position to actively gather information in the area. However, on 3 June 1992 a group of Bosnian humanitarian organizations published a list with the names of 94 Serb camps in Bosnia, in which a total of 105,348 prisoners were said to be detained, and 11 camps in Serbia and Montenegro with another 22,710 detainees.²⁶⁸⁵ On 27 July UNHCR issued a special report about the Omarska camp,²⁶⁸⁶ which however received little attention.

²⁶⁸⁰ Amnesty International, Bosnia-Herzegovina. Gross abuses of basic human rights (AI Index: EUR 63/01/92), p. 23.

²⁶⁸¹ See for example Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96; Gesellschaft für bedrohte Völker, Rückkehr in Würde. See also Silber & Little, Death, p. 251.

²⁶⁸² Mercier, Crimes, pp. 19 and 223 n. 3. The Slovenian government, in its declaration of independence of 25 June 1991, stated that it would respect all principles of international law and all treaties to which the federal state of Yugoslavia had bound itself with regard to its territory. Soon after the arrival of the ECMM mission in Zagreb the Croatian authorities had issued a similar declaration. On 27 November 1991 a 'memorandum of understanding' between the federal government of Yugoslavia, the Croatian and the Serbian authorities had been created under the leadership of the International Committee of the Red Cross in which the parties had explicitly undertaken to respect large sections of the 1949 Geneva conventions and the first Additional Protocol, Mercier, Crimes, p. 37; Lieutenant-Colonel J.W. Beekman of the military legal service, 'EG-waarnemers in het voormalige Joegoslavië; de juridische aspecten' ('EC observers in the former Yugoslavia: the legal aspects'), Carré (1993)10, pp. 7-8.

²⁶⁸³ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 106-108 and 203-207.

²⁶⁸⁴ United Nations, S/25274, Appendix I, clause 45; in its final report the committee, in the meantime chaired by Bassiouni, upheld this view, United Nations, S/1994/674, 27/05/94, Appendix, clause 44; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.

²⁶⁸⁵ The list is printed in United States Senate, Cleansing, p. 35.

²⁶⁸⁶ Silber & Little, Death, p. 252.

In late June and early July the Bosnian government tried to draw attention in the West to the existence of Serb prison camps. When Mitterrand went to Sarajevo on 28 June, Izetbegovic told the French head of state about the camps and gave him the list of 94 plus 11 camps. Izetbegovic asked Mitterrand to do everything he could to have a committee sent to investigate the violations of human rights. There was no reaction from Paris, not even when in the course of July the French embassy in Zagreb sent information to Paris confirming the existence of the camps.²⁶⁸⁷ On 9 July Izetbegovic touched briefly on the Serb camps during a speech at the CSCE conference in Helsinki: 'My country was a peaceful multicultural, multinational and multireligious community. Today there are 27 concentration camps and innumerable mass graves. Schools and football stadiums are places where torture and murder take place', the president said in his speech.²⁶⁸⁸ During the conference the Bosnian Minister of Foreign Affairs Haris Silajdzic compared the violence of Serbs against Croats and Muslims in Bosnia with the atrocities committed by the Nazis during the Second World War. Both condemned the passivity of the international community. However, the two Bosnian statesmen's allegations made little impression on the many dignitaries present, including the American president Bush and his Secretary of State Baker. Izetbegovic told the press that in the margins of the meeting, during a personal encounter, he had again spoken to Bush about the 'concentration camps' and a 'genocide', which by that time had cost the lives of between forty and sixty thousand civilians.²⁶⁸⁹

In view of the presidential elections, in which Bush was a candidate, the American president and his government were not very receptive to information which might lead to a greater involvement in the conflict in Bosnia in the form of deploying American ground troops. Bush and most of his advisers expected that information of this nature would lead to more disadvantages than advantages.²⁶⁹⁰ Bush's suppression machinery worked extremely well. According to his closest assistants the president usually reacted to information about Yugoslavia by saying: 'Tell me again what this is all about.'²⁶⁹¹ The conflict was too complicated for the American president to be able to remember which party wanted what. It was also too complicated to be able to formulate clear objectives.²⁶⁹²

In the meantime international aid organizations had also gathered a certain amount of information about Serb prison camps. On 2 July a confidential paper on camps in Bosnia was completed at UNHCR, based mainly on information from the Danish UNPROFOR battalion. Danish blue helmets in Dvor in Croatia had inspected camps just over the border in Bosnia.²⁶⁹³ The UNHCR paper was distributed the next day at a meeting of representatives of UNPROFOR, the International Committee of the Red Cross and the European monitoring mission ECMM at Topusko in northern Bosnia. In the report the Omarska, Keraterm and Trnopolje camps were referred to as 'reported concentration camps'. The camp at Manjaca was also mentioned. In this report the frustration at 'our inability to do anything other than write reports and stand by' came to the fore. The paper also drew attention to the fact that the UNPROFOR mandate was only for Croatia and Sarajevo.²⁶⁹⁴

According to Mendiluce, the UNHCR's envoy in the former Yugoslavia, UNHCR handed over the report to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) because camps were 'classic ICRC ground'.²⁶⁹⁵ In the preceding period the ICRC itself had been 'blind' for a few weeks, because the ²⁶⁸⁷ Cohen, Hearts, p. 217; Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 293.

²⁶⁸⁸ 'Bosnië smeekt om hulp' ('Bosnia begs for help'), de Volkskrant, 10/07/92.

²⁶⁸⁹ Guikje Roethof, 'Helsinki', De Groene Amsterdammer, 15/07/92, p. 4.

²⁶⁹⁰ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 171; Don Oberdorfer, 'A Bloody Failure in the Balkans', The Washington Post, 08/02/93.

²⁶⁹¹ Michael Dobbs, 'Bosnia Crystallizes U.S. Post-Col War Role', The Washington Post, 03/12/95; Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p. 105; Silber & Little, Death, p. 201.

²⁶⁹² Halberstam, War, pp. 43-44.

²⁶⁹³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 293.

²⁶⁹⁴ 'Polemique à l'ONU autour de la diffusion interne des informations sur les camps de detention' ('Controversy at UN over the internal diffusion of information about the detention camps'), Agence Franse Presse, 07/08/92; Stephen Engelberg & Chuck Sudetic, 'Conflict in the Balkans: In enemy Hands', The New York Times, 16/08/92; Aengus Finucane, 'The Changing Roles of Voluntary Organizations', Kevin M. Cahill (ed.), Framework, p. 253; United States Senate, Cleansing, p. 11.

²⁶⁹⁵ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96.

organization had temporarily withdrawn from Bosnia. The reason was that Frédéric Maurice, who had been destined to become head of the ICRC in Bosnia, had died as a result of injuries sustained on 18 May, when an ICRC convoy had been fired at while driving into Sarajevo. According to some reports, the shooting of Maurice was a deliberate attempt on the part of the Bosnian Serbs to secure the departure of the ICRC, just after the ECMM monitors had left Bosnia because it was becoming increasingly unsafe.²⁶⁹⁶

Representatives of the ICRC had only just resumed their activities in Bosnia at the beginning of July when news reached them that there were more than ten thousand detainees in Manjaca and Trnopolje.²⁶⁹⁷ On 14 July several ICRC representatives visited the Bosnian Serb army's camp at Manjaca, where they were shocked by what they found: 2300 starving men in six cowsheds. Four hundred men there were on the brink of death.²⁶⁹⁸ Patrick Gasser, head of the ICRC delegation, felt compelled to bring a dietician who had had experience during the famine in Somalia to the camp.²⁶⁹⁹ Gasser himself flew to the ICRC headquarters in Geneva to make a report. On arrival, according to his own statement, he met with unbelief: the return of camps in Europe was considered impossible.²⁷⁰⁰ At that same time the ICRC had been aware of the existence of a camp at Omarska for weeks, but the organization had not succeeded in obtaining permission from the local authorities who ran this camp to inspect it.²⁷⁰¹ In the case of Omarska the ICRC therefore had to rely on information from a Bosnian Serb doctor who worked for the Red Cross. He reported that apart from diarrhoea there were no health risks in the camp. By 6 August, when the pictures of emaciated prisoners behind barbed wire were broadcast on television, the ICRC had visited 4200 prisoners in ten camps in Bosnia, of which three were in Serb hands.²⁷⁰² However, it was not until 29 July that president Sommaruga of the International Committee of the Red Cross went public with his charges against the camps.

In retrospect, it is also remarkable that the media showed so little interest in the first reports of the camps. In the Netherlands, for example, Trouw placed the speech in which Izetbegovic spoke of the camps on the front page,²⁷⁰³ but NRC Handelsblad made no mention of it, while De Volkskrant placed the Bosnian president's words on page 5. On 27 July Trouw reported a letter from Izetbegovic to Carrington which had been made public the previous day. In this letter, as examples of continuing Serb aggression against the Bosnian people, the Bosnian president made mention of 'new mass murders' in the area of Prijedor in the north-west of Bosnia and '57 Serb concentration camps'.²⁷⁰⁴ NRC Handelsblad and De Volkskrant paid no attention to the topic. In view of the commotion which was to arise shortly after, it is striking not only that so little attention was paid to the subject in the Dutch media at this phase, but also how little space it was given when it was actually reported. For many in the Netherlands – and elsewhere – the conflict in the former Yugoslavia was apparently still associated with lunacy. As Nicole Lucas wrote in Trouw on 25 July:

‘Times of war have actually made Yugoslavia, a country where you could imagine yourself in four or five different worlds, a surprisingly uniform country. Because whether it's Vukovar or Mostar, Pakrac or Zvornik, all that is left is a scrapheap, a pile of rubble, on top of which totally bereft people are desperately wondering if they will ever be able to lead normal lives again and whether they

²⁶⁹⁶ Stephen Engelberg & Chuck Sudetic, 'Conflict in the Balkans: In enemy Hands', The New York Times, 16/08/92.

²⁶⁹⁷ Mercier, Crimes, p. 108.

²⁶⁹⁸ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96.

²⁶⁹⁹ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 112-113.

²⁷⁰⁰ Mercier, Crimes, p. 110; Ignatieff, Honor, p. 1344.

²⁷⁰¹ Mercier, Crimes, p. 112.

²⁷⁰² Con Coughlin & Philip Sherwell, 'Death in the Balkans', Sunday Telegraph, 09/08/92.

²⁷⁰³ 'Dit bloedbad moet stoppen' ('This bloodbath has to stop'), Trouw, 10/07/92, but mentioned only 23 camps.

²⁷⁰⁴ 'Nieuwe kaart van Bosnië' ('New map of Bosnia'), Trouw, 27/07/92.

ever really have. ‘Can you understand it at all,’ people sometimes ask me in the Netherlands, often a little testily. More and more often I have to say: “No”²⁷⁰⁵.

Moreover, it was extremely difficult for the media to report the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, because often it was impossible to check allegations of atrocities. The Western media were flooded with biased reports from the ministries of information and press agencies in the various capitals of the former Yugoslavia. There was also no scarcity of film footage and photographs whose authenticity could not be established. Often parties offered pictures of corpses with captions in which the ethnicity of the perpetrators and victims had been changed at will. According to Balkans specialist Milan Andrejevich of Radio Free Europe, after a year of war in Yugoslavia the foreign media were so desperate about the difficulty of establishing authenticity that they just did whatever occurred to them. Tim O’Sullivan of the British magazine PR Week was of the opinion that it was so difficult to apply the rules of journalism that most reporters just ignored them altogether.²⁷⁰⁶

Roy Gutman’s reports: concentration camps in Bosnia

In the midst of this general confusion there was one journalist who had sunk his teeth into the issues of ethnic cleansing and the camps in north-western Bosnia and was to make an important contribution to reporting them in the West. This was the American Roy Gutman, who worked as a correspondent for Newsday, a newspaper of which more than 800,000 copies were published daily in New York and Long Island and which had a good reputation for investigative journalism. In 1991, after the Gulf War had ended, Gutman had revisited Yugoslavia for the first time in 16 years. Soon afterwards he had become office manager for Newsday in Bonn.

Gutman was extremely frustrated by the lack of interest in the Croatian and Bosnian wars in the United States. He compared the attitude of the West towards Bosnia with that of the British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain towards Czechoslovakia in 1938.²⁷⁰⁷

On 3 July, the same day that UNHCR sent its report on the camps to the International Committee of the Red Cross, Gutman reported a transport of eighteen hundred Muslims in eighteen railway carriages from the Bosnian village of Kozluk, near Zvornik, to the Yugoslav-Hungarian border. It was, as Gutman wrote in Newsday, ‘a practice not seen in Europe since the end of World War II’.²⁷⁰⁸ This comparison with the Third Reich and the Second World War gained a more and more prominent place in Gutman’s reports.²⁷⁰⁹ A few weeks later, for example, he quoted a Muslim student who had left Banja Luka and had said that the Muslims there had felt like Jews in the Third Reich. According to the same article, Croat and Muslim authorities had reported nightly rail transports of people through Banja Luka. These Muslim leaders said that the men subjected to these transports were executed or taken to camps, ‘some of which, the leaders say, are in fact death camps’.²⁷¹⁰

On 9 July 1992 Gutman was asked by the SDA leader in Banja Luka, whom he had met a year earlier, to come and witness the practices of ethnic cleansing for himself.²⁷¹¹ According to Gutman’s contact, Muslims were deported from Banja Luka in cattle cars. Gutman’s source said it reminded him

²⁷⁰⁵ Nicole Lucas, ‘In tijd van oorlog’ (‘In times of war’), Trouw, 25/07/92.

²⁷⁰⁶ Caroline de Gruyter, ‘Kroaten rijgen kettingen van Servische vingers’, Elsevier, 03/10/92, p. 47.

²⁷⁰⁷ Interview Gutman on <http://globetrotter.berkeley.edu/conversations/Gutman/gutman-con6.html>, consulted on 29/02/00.

²⁷⁰⁸ Roy Gutman, ‘Ethnic Cleansing’. Yugoslavs try to deport 1,800 Muslims to Hungary’, Newsday, 03/07/92, see also Gutman, Witness, pp. 20-23; the last expression also in Roy Gutman, ‘Like Auschwitz’. Serbs pack Muslims into freight cars’, Newsday, 21/07/92.

²⁷⁰⁹ In the comments accompanying a later edition of his articles, Gutman again spoke of ‘Third Reich practices’, Witness, p. ix.

²⁷¹⁰ R. Gutman, ‘If Only They Could Flee. Muslims, Croats held in city’, Newsday, 26/07/92.

²⁷¹¹ Gutman, Witness, p. vii.

of the Jews who were transported to Auschwitz.²⁷¹² Gutman then succeeded in becoming the first Western journalist to penetrate to the north-west of Bosnia, an area scourged by ethnic cleansing. However, the Bosnian Serb military authorities in Banja Luka did not give him permission to visit Omarska.

He was given permission to visit the interrogation camp at Manjaca near Banja Luka, on 14 July, on the same day as the ICRC delegation led by Patrick Gasser. Normally the ICRC did not like to have journalists accompany them on their visits to camps, fearing that it might result in the gates then remaining closed to the ICRC itself. But on this occasion Gasser gave Gutman and Ed Vulliamy, correspondent for The Guardian, the opportunity to go with them and gather the information Gasser thought was needed to make the world wake up. However, Gasser asked the two journalists not to go inside the camp with the delegation.²⁷¹³ For unknown reasons, Vulliamy never published anything about this visit.

The camp at Manjaca was originally an agricultural complex. In the summer of 1992 Muslims and Croats were detained there. Gutman was not given access to the barracks of the camp, but he did see men's heads being shaved and guards with rubber clubs. He was also able to 'interview' eight men in the presence of the guards: VRS members asked most of the questions and the conversations were filmed by a camera crew from the Bosnian Serb army. Gutman concluded from these conversations and from interviews with several men outside the camp that the VRS's statement that Manjaca was a camp for prisoners of war was untenable. Not all the men he had spoken to in the camp had taken part in combat. Gutman's impression was that as many Muslims and Croats as possible had been assembled in the camp in order to exchange them for Serbs. The prisoners told Gutman of random maltreatment they had undergone and of incidental deaths.

On 19 July Gutman's article about Manjaca appeared in Newsday. It described Manjaca as one of a series of 'new detention facilities, which one American embassy official in Belgrade (...) routinely refers to as "concentration camps"'. Gutman added his own comment: 'It is another example of the human rights abuses now exploding to a dimension unseen in Europe since the Nazi Third Reich.'²⁷¹⁴ And according to Gutman, it had to be borne in mind that according to leading Muslims, Manjaca was 'a first-class camp', because it was run by the regular Bosnian-Serb army, in which a certain discipline still prevailed. According to Gutman it was much worse in other camps in northern Bosnia, where the local police were in control. It is interesting, in the light of the reports that were to shake the world a few weeks later, that Gutman reported the presence of several barbed wire fences around the camp: 'With its multiple perimeters of barbed-wire fence, its newly dug minefields and its guard posts, the former army exercise grounds have the appearance of a Stalag 17 or the former East-West German border.'²⁷¹⁵

After his article on Manjaca Gutman decided for himself that what he had heard in Banja Luka and the surrounding area about the camps was so serious that his reporting needed to be based on verifiable data. But, as he wrote later in the introduction to his volume of articles on the war in Bosnia: 'Having set such lofty standards, I immediately made an exception and wrote about the Omarska camp.'²⁷¹⁶ Gutman's article about the camp at Omarska, which the Bosnian Serb authorities did not permit the ICRC to visit at that time, also appeared in Newsday on 19 July. It was based on third-hand information, from a Muslim aid organization in Banja Luka which had informed Gutman of the testimony of a Muslim woman. Gutman wrote that Omarska was an open mine where thousands of Muslims were being held prisoner. Only a third of the prisoners had protection against the elements. The rest had to stay in the burning sun and when it rained they stood in the mud. Food was scarce and so were medical and sanitary facilities, so that sickness and disease were rife. Every day six to ten

²⁷¹² R. Gutman, 'Like Auschwitz'. Serbs Pack Muslims into Freight Cars', Newsday, 21/07/92; Gutman, Witness, p. 36.

²⁷¹³ Mercier, Crimes, p. 110; Ignatieff, Honor, p. 136.

²⁷¹⁴ R. Gutman, 'Prisoners of Serbia's War. Tales of hunger, torture at camp in north Bosnia', Newsday, 19/07/92.

²⁷¹⁵ Ibid.

²⁷¹⁶ Gutman, Witness, p. xii.

people died. According to Gutman there were more and more indications that Omarska was a 'death camp'.²⁷¹⁷

Two days later another article by Gutman appeared in Newsday. Again he wrote that according to Muslim authorities Omarska was a death camp, where young men were detained.²⁷¹⁸ In addition, on the basis of a witness's description, he reported on the camp in Trnopolje, where apparently mainly women, children and old men were held. The witness had seen how his neighbour, Ilijaz Hadzic, who had been chairman of the SDA in Kozarac, together with his wife and three children were executed in the camp at Trnopolje when he refused to give the names of other SDA activists. At night guards would select women prisoners and then rape them. Eventually the thousands of imprisoned inhabitants of Kozarac were transported by rail in abominable conditions to the town of Zenica, which was in Muslim hands.

Gutman's reason for not sticking to his intention to describe only verified reports was that if Omarska really did turn out to be a death camp, it should be put down in black and white 'to alert others'.²⁷¹⁹ He thought that a story by an experienced reporter in a serious newspaper would be sure to draw the attention of the American government. So as to leave nothing to chance, at his request colleagues from Newsday in Washington brought his articles to the attention of the authorities: the CIA, the White House and members of the American Congress. There was not a single reaction.²⁷²⁰

On 2 August two new articles by Gutman appeared in Newsday, this time about the Omarska and Trnopolje camps and the camp at Luka near Brcko. Evidently in an attempt to succeed in drawing attention this time there was a heading with five-centimetre-high letters, at the top of the front page: 'The Deathcamps of Bosnia'. According to Gutman's report, more than a thousand civilians had been killed in the Omarska and Luka camps and thousands more were being detained, in anticipation of a certain death. This report was based on the testimony of two released prisoners with whom Gutman had spoken.²⁷²¹

For the article about the camp at Luka near Brcko, Gutman had spoken with a 53-year-old civil servant, who claimed to be one of the 150 survivors of a group of 1500 prisoners the rest of whom had been shot by firing squads or had their throats cut between mid-May and mid-June. Along with the other detainees, the witness had been forced to watch the murders. According to his testimony inhabitants of Brcko had also been processed into cattle fodder by means of cremation and rape had also taken place. Several prisoners were said to have had their genitals torn off or their noses cut off. Eventually a group of a hundred and twenty men, including the witness, had been released.²⁷²² Later, it was established that of the eight thousand people who were detained in this camp three hundred had been killed by the beginning of July 1992.²⁷²³

In the other article Gutman wrote mainly about the former mining complex of Omarska, where thousands of Muslims and Croats were said to be enclosed in metal cages without food or sanitary facilities. They included the elite of Prijedor, wrote Gutman. In this case he based his reports of the rape, torture and mass executions which were said to have taken place there on the testimony of a 63-year-old Muslim building contractor, who had been released from the camp in the first week of June on grounds of his advanced age. According to the contractor every few days ten to fifteen prisoners in the camp were executed. In addition he alleged that during the short period he had been in the camp, 35 to 40 men had died as a result of maltreatment. He himself had also been repeatedly beaten up, so that he was now missing seven teeth.

²⁷¹⁷ Gutman, Witness, p. 34.

²⁷¹⁸ Gutman, Witness, p. 41.

²⁷¹⁹ Gutman, Witness, p. xii.

²⁷²⁰ Gutman, Witness, p. xii; Harry Kreisler, 'Witness to genocide. Conversation with Roy Gutman', <http://globetrotter.berkeley.edu/conversations/Gutman/gutman-con7.html> consulted on 10/03/00.

²⁷²¹ Gutman, Witness, p. 44.

²⁷²² Gutman, Witness, pp. 50-51.

²⁷²³ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 61.

Later Gutman would write about these two articles: ‘Why did I publish a story with only two witnesses? I was convinced that the lives of thousands of people were at stake and that we should take the journalistic risk in their interests.’²⁷²⁴ Gutman reported little about Trnopolje, but in view of later debates about the nature of this camp it is interesting that Gutman wrote that he had talked to a woman who had been in the camp without being a prisoner.²⁷²⁵

One day after the publications about ‘The Deathcamps of Bosnia’, on 3 August, Gutman wrote an article about camps in Bosanski Samac. Although according to a written statement by one of the detainees the prisoners had been forced to watch the murder of fifteen fellow-prisoners, Gutman thought that in this case the term ‘death camp’ was not applicable. What did worry him was that the camps in Bosanski Samac were not on the list of 94 Bosnian Serb detention centres which Bosnian agencies had in the meantime sent to UNHCR. It therefore seemed likely that the number of camps in Bosnia was even larger than had been assumed up to that point.²⁷²⁶

On 5 August Gutman could write a new article about Omarska, after talking the day before to the 53-year-old Muslim ‘Hujca’ in Zagreb, who had been detained in the camp for twelve days in May. According to this source, every night seven or eight prisoners were taken at random by guards from a storage room where six to seven hundred internees were kept, and then executed. Gutman also reported that he had heard from a 30-year-old member of the Bosnian Muslim armed forces that he had heard from a 15-year-old boy who had been detained in Omarska for a week, that some men had been taken from the open mine and had never returned.²⁷²⁷

The effect of Gutman’s reports on the American government

Gutman’s articles of 2 August did have the desired effect: both inside and outside the United States they attracted a large amount of interest from other media and from authorities. On 4 August the Security Council, in a statement by its president Li Daoyu from China, expressed its deep concern about ‘continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law and in particular reports of the imprisonment and abuse of civilians in camps, prisons and detention centres throughout the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina’. The Security Council asked for ‘immediate, unimpeded and continued access to all such places’. Those who committed these violations of human rights, warned the Council, would be held individually responsible for their deeds.²⁷²⁸

Gutman’s articles of 2 August also had a significant effect on the American presidential election campaign. Until then the American media had devoted much less attention to the wars in the former Yugoslavia than the European media. Moreover, reporting on Yugoslavia displayed ignorance and confusion and contained many errors. The neglect of the conflicts was reinforced by the fact that no direct American interests were involved and that as far as war reporting was concerned the American media had financially exhausted themselves during the Gulf War.²⁷²⁹

During an election campaign in the United States, a sitting president who is also a candidate tends not to plunge into perilous foreign adventures, being aware that the voters are primarily interested in domestic affairs. And if he himself is not sufficiently aware of this fact, his opponents will not fail to rub it in, just as in this case the Democratic rival candidate William Jefferson Clinton, governor of Arkansas, and his followers passed the message on to Bush: ‘It’s the economy, stupid.’

²⁷²⁴ A. de Vries, ‘Het journalistieke risico’ (‘The journalistic risk’), De Groene Amsterdammer, 31/01/96.

²⁷²⁵ Gutman, Witness, p. 49.

²⁷²⁶ Gutman, Witness, p. 54.

²⁷²⁷ R. Gutman, ‘Serbs’ death camps. How the Guards Chose the Victims’, Newsday, 05/08/92; see also Gutman, Witness, pp. 60–63.

²⁷²⁸ United Nations Department of Public Information, The United Nations, p. 24; J. Friedman, ‘The UN Demands Access’, Newsday, 05/08/92.

²⁷²⁹ Eyal, Europe, p. 66.

At the beginning of June 1992 The New York Times reported that up to that point of the year less foreign news had been broadcast in the evenings by the major American television networks than in the previous three years. Some of the explanations given by the networks for this were: greater interest in national issues, the emphasis on domestic topics in the election campaign and – specifically in relation to Yugoslavia – ‘the difficulty of explaining a complicated conflict to viewers who lack a vested interest in the outcome’. Besides, according to Peter Jennings, anchorman of ABC’s World News Tonight, initially there was not a single journalist who understood what was going on in Yugoslavia and ‘you can’t get the public to understand if the journalists don’t understand’. Some networks admitted that they had given insufficient coverage to the developments in Yugoslavia. One producer, who wished to remain anonymous, said that news about Yugoslavia was very much determined by scenes of violence: ‘Everybody seems to want to go for the blood. (...) It’s back to “Cut me a minute of bang-bang.” But nobody wants to go into the issues behind the bangs.’²⁷³⁰

Indeed, the 1992 American election campaign did show an even greater lack of interest in foreign politics than otherwise. Ex-president Richard M. Nixon said shortly before the summer of 1992 that in 44 years he had never seen a campaign in which foreign politics was so little discussed.²⁷³¹ Attempts by Bush to make leeway with his successes in foreign politics were not very successful, partly because some of the American voters condemned Bush for not having pushed on to Baghdad at the end of the Gulf War for reasons of international politics, with the consequence that Saddam Hussein was still giving off signals of contempt for the West.²⁷³²

At the end of July Clinton decided that it might be to his advantage to launch an attack on President Bush’s foreign policy. He observed that he could sow dissent in Bush’s camp by raising the possibility of air strikes on Serb troops in Bosnia, since some of the Republican politicians were also in favour of them.²⁷³³ As a result of Gutman’s articles, Clinton and several Democratic representatives urged the American government to try to persuade the Security Council to use force to stop the violation of human rights, without ruling out the deployment of American armed forces. ‘If the horrors of the Holocaust taught us anything, it is the high cost of remaining silent in the face of genocide’, said Clinton.²⁷³⁴

Gutman’s articles about the camps, which were soon to be followed by others, led the media to ask a question which was awkward for the authorities, namely how much they had already known about the camps before Gutman published his reports. Had private individuals exposed what the authorities had wanted to keep secret?²⁷³⁵ Or was the attitude of the Western governments inspired by the old adage ‘I’ll believe it when I see it’?²⁷³⁶ Gutman himself could not believe that in an era of espionage satellites he had been the first to see anything of the camps. According to him the American government had wanted to keep quiet about the camps because if the public at large had known about them the government would have been forced into active intervention.²⁷³⁷ To support his conviction Gutman could point to remarks such as that made by Bush at the beginning of July, after the economic summit of the G7 in Munich, when he said that the American government did not intend to send troops to every ‘hiccup here or there’.²⁷³⁸

²⁷³⁰ Bill Carter, ‘Networks Cutting Back on Foreign Coverage’, The New York Times, 10/06/92.

²⁷³¹ H. Lenselink, ‘Buiten onze grenzen’ (‘Outside our borders’), De Banier, 14/05/92, p. 13.

²⁷³² S. Friedman, ‘Focus On. The Shaky New World Order’, Newsday, 18/08/92.

²⁷³³ George D. Moffett III, ‘Bush Dilemma in Balkan Crisis Seen Benefiting Rival Clinton’, The Christian Science Monitor, 10/08/92.

²⁷³⁴ J. Friedman, ‘The UN Demands Access’, Newsday, 05/08/92.

²⁷³⁵ M. Kempton, ‘War Crimes Beneath Notice’, Newsday, 09/08/92.

²⁷³⁶ Hans Leber, ‘Laat ze de oorlog uitvechten’ (‘Let them fight the war out’), Twentsche Courant, 05/08/92.

²⁷³⁷ Gutman, Witness, pp. xiii-xiv.

²⁷³⁸ Quoted in Gutman, Witness, p. xvii.

Later it would emerge²⁷³⁹ that as early as mid-May President Bush had ordered the CIA to carry out an intensive investigation of the conditions in Bosnia. The results were intended to be for the benefit not only of the American government but also of UNPROFOR. The CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency had deployed both agents and espionage satellite for the purpose and tapped messages in the region. In June, on the basis of its findings, the CIA had informed the president of atrocities committed by Bosnian Serb armed forces, such as torture and executions, which had led to thousands of deaths. However, the American government decided not to make the results of the investigation public because they were fragmentary and not unequivocal, which made them no different from journalistic reporting. As the CIA had initially concentrated on the situation in towns and villages where ethnic cleansing was taking place, it was not until the end of July that the intelligence service began to focus their attention on the camps. However, the president did not give the service permission to deploy U-2 espionage aircraft, because it would be 'too provocative' for the Serb authorities. In fact, the American government still hoped to persuade Milosevic to adopt a more peaceful stance by diplomatic means. Then Keyhole satellites were deployed which did in fact localize camps, but their significance escaped the CIA. The American intelligence service is said to have thought that the camps were a logical result of the refugee flows which had been set in motion. Later the American diplomat Ron Neitzke denied this:

'There were photographs. We had them in 1992. If you looked you could see a little outbuilding suddenly blimping into a circus full of people. You would have reports, perhaps fragmentary, about a concentration camp at site X, and it would have been possible to look at site X and see. Somebody simply had to collate the fragmentary evidence from refugees and intercepts with the photographs. But we were determined not to see it because all this could lead to pressure for intervention... It was not a technical screwup that we did not see the camps. This was willed. In the end, the Central Intelligence Agency is a political tool of the administration.'²⁷⁴⁰

George Kenney, who worked at the Yugoslavia section of the State Department, said later:

'By June and certainly by July, we were getting reports from Northern Bosnia that, if we had wanted to look closely, would have been very disturbing. In July, we had maybe a dozen reports of really barbaric things being done by the Serbs. The reports were anecdotal, but they came from good local contacts who had proved reliable in the past.'²⁷⁴¹

Jon Western, who worked at the State Department on the human rights situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina, also saw reports on atrocities which, as he himself said, looked very similar to what was familiar from accounts of the Second World War. Initially he and his colleagues thought it might be disinformation, but at a certain point a pattern emerged and it became possible to form a picture of the camps and the crimes which were being perpetrated there by collating the statements of witnesses.²⁷⁴²

It was the young diplomat Henry Kelly at the American embassy in Belgrade in particular who, thanks to telephone contacts with people in Banja Luka and Prijedor, was able to spark off a stream of reports on an almost daily basis which received wide distribution in the State Department. His reports

²⁷³⁹ The following passage is based on K. Royce and P.J. Sloyan, 'The U.S. Waited. Back in June, CIA Told Bush of Atrocities', Newsday, 14/08/92. See also Patrick Glynn, 'See No Evil', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 134.

²⁷⁴⁰ Cohen, Hearts, p. 173.

²⁷⁴¹ Cohen, Hearts, p. 217.

²⁷⁴² Danner, 'Clinton', p. 58.

showed that a large number of Muslim men ‘disappeared’ in the area surrounding Banja Luka and Prijedor:

‘That they were disappearing into concentration camps was something that emerged incrementally. We would hear about ‘processing points’. By the end of May, ‘transit centres’. Then ‘detention camps’, then ‘factories and mines’- and it coalesced into the reality: a gulag. The names appeared: Omarska, Kereterm [Keraterm], Brcko.’²⁷⁴³

Western sent the gist of the reports he saw upwards in the hierarchy of the State Department to Minister Baker and to senior officials in the Pentagon and the White House. It was, said Western, as though his information vanished into a big black hole: ‘We could send things up and nothing would come back.’²⁷⁴⁴ Kenney tried in vain to persuade his superiors to use the word ‘genocide’ in official reports to refer to the atrocities which had been established.²⁷⁴⁵ Jim Swigert, second man at the American embassy in Belgrade, said about this: ‘As I’ve read the definition of genocide, this was genocide. But we did not want to say that. The marching orders from President Bush were that Yugoslavia was essentially a European problem and we were to stay out of it.’²⁷⁴⁶ Paul Williams, who in 1992 was working in the Office of the Legal Advisor for Europe and Canada at the State Department, said that it was impossible for American government spokesmen to disclose what was known about the camps:

‘The next question would have been: ‘And what is the US government doing about it?’ And the answer would have been: ‘Nothing.’ And since this was an unacceptable answer for political reasons, we simply didn’t make the public aware of the concentration camps.’²⁷⁴⁷

When in early August public indignation about the camps started to make things difficult for Bush, photo analysts were ordered to re-examine all the available satellite photos. One thing at least was shown by photos taken of the open mine in Omarska on 5 August, three days after Gutman’s ‘Deathcamp’ articles: by then there were no longer any prisoners there.²⁷⁴⁸

The problems caused for Bush by Gutman’s publications were exacerbated by the way Tom Niles, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, reacted during a routine session of the International Relations European Subcommittee of the House of Representatives on 4 August, when representatives asked him for information about the ‘death camps’ reported by Gutman. Niles’s defensive attitude annoyed the members of the subcommittee, especially the chairman, the Democratic representative Tom Lantos, who had himself survived a Hungarian concentration camp during the Second World War. It was particularly unfortunate for the American government that Richard Boucher, assistant spokesman for the State Department, had admitted to the press the day before that the American government was in possession of reports similar to those of the media about Serb camps in Bosnia where civilians were being tortured and murdered. He had also said that the American government had reports about camps run by Bosnian Muslims and Croats, although there was no evidence of maltreatment in those camps.²⁷⁴⁹ ‘Either Mr. Boucher is lying or you are lying’, Lantos told Niles.²⁷⁵⁰

²⁷⁴³ An official from the State Department, quoted in Ed Vulliamy, ‘Bosnia’s secret war’, The Gazette, 02/07/96.

²⁷⁴⁴ Danner, ‘Clinton’, p. 61.

²⁷⁴⁵ Ibid.; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 96.

²⁷⁴⁶ Ibid.

²⁷⁴⁷ Paul Williams, in: Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 313. See also the statements made by State Department official John Fox in Strobel, Policy, p. 151 and Danner, ‘Clinton’, p. 58.

²⁷⁴⁸ Cf. Cohen, Hearts, p. 220.

²⁷⁴⁹ Don Oberdorfer, ‘U.S. Verifies Killings in Serb Camps’, The Washington Post, 04/08/92; id., ‘State Dept. Backtracks On Atrocity Reports’, The Washington Post, 05/08/92; Strobel, Policy, p. 150.

When it also emerged that the American government's first reaction to the reports on the camps was that they were not prepared to do more than support the Red Cross in its attempts to gain access to the camps and to improve the prisoners' lot,²⁷⁵¹ Lantos remarked that the words 'Munich' and 'appeasement' just kept ringing in his head.²⁷⁵²

The press gained the impression that the American government had something to hide; their suspicions were strengthened by a remark made by General Lewis MacKenzie, commander of UNPROFOR II in Bosnia, who said on 4 August that during the previous five months his troops had received 'a ton of paper' from the Serbian and Croatian governments about camps where, as was claimed, thousands had allegedly been killed.²⁷⁵³ These were said to be 'sophisticated reports', not individual allegations. The Canadian general stated that he had sent the information on through the UN command line, but that hardly any action had been taken because it was too dangerous to visit the camps in Bosnia because of the combat taking place in the surrounding areas. The UN headquarters in New York denied ever having received such reports. In other words: the information had never left the headquarters of UNPROFOR Commander Nambiar in Zagreb. UN spokesmen said that the commander had evidently ignored the information because an inquiry into excesses of this nature did not fall within the scope of his mandate.²⁷⁵⁴

However, the Bosnian mission at the UN claimed that they had long since passed on information about the camps.²⁷⁵⁵ According to later (inconsistent) statements by the Bosnian UN ambassador Muhamed Sacirbey, he had given information about camps to Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali from the end of April on²⁷⁵⁶ or on 15 May.²⁷⁵⁷ There is no known written document confirming this. However, it is clear that Muhamed Sacirbey, the Bosnian UN Permanent Representative, submitted the list of the 94 plus 11 camps to the chairman of the Security Council on 29 July.²⁷⁵⁸ According to an American official, the reaction at the UN had then been: 'It's from the Bosnians, therefore exaggeration.'²⁷⁵⁹ On 12 August the same list was sent to all missions of the CSCE, dated 26 July²⁷⁶⁰, so that it can be assumed that it was not until the end of July that the government in Sarajevo informed its diplomatic representatives abroad of the existence of the list.

Due to the remarks of MacKenzie and Sacirbey, now the UN came under fire as well as president Bush. At the beginning of August it was made known that the report sent by UNHCR to UNPROFOR and other organizations on 3 July had never reached the UN headquarters in New York either.²⁷⁶¹ It was implied that this was a consequence of Boutros-Ghali's attitude; he had, after all, accused the Security Council of concentrating on 'the rich man's war' in the former Yugoslavia.²⁷⁶²

Rapporteurs of the American Senate's Committee on Foreign Relations later said that the lack of initiative on the part of the United Nations after the UNHCR report of 3 July was typical of the organization's systematic incapacity to react to large-scale human rights crises. Reporting violations of ²⁷⁵⁰ Cohen, Hearts, p. 174.

²⁷⁵¹ David Binder, 'No U.S. action seen on prison camps', The New York Times, 04/08/92; Don Oberdorfer, 'U.S. Verifies Killings in Serb Camps', The Washington Post, 04/08/92; J. Friedman, 'The UN Demands Access', Newsday, 05/08/92.

²⁷⁵² Cohen, Hearts, p. 174.

²⁷⁵³ J. Friedman, 'The UN Demands Access', Newsday, 05/08/92; 'VN-generaal wist van excessen' ('UN general knew of excesses'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

²⁷⁵⁴ 'VN-generaal wist van excessen', NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92. See also Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 119.

²⁷⁵⁵ J. Friedman, 'Report Secret. UN unit knew of Bosnia detentions; so did U.S.', Newsday, 06/08/92.

²⁷⁵⁶ Silber & Little, Death, pp. 251-252.

²⁷⁵⁷ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96; Silber & Little, Death, pp. 251-252.

²⁷⁵⁸ VN, S/24365.

²⁷⁵⁹ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96.

²⁷⁶⁰ OVSE Vienna, 07 34.4, I Bosnia Herzegovina [April-August 92, CSCE Communication no. 234 to the points of contact, 12/08/92 with the List of Concentration Camps and Prisons at the Territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina as an appendix, 26/07/92]

²⁷⁶¹ CNN, News, 'ITN Reporter Was Allowed in Serb Detention Camps', 06/08/92; 'Polemique à l'ONU autour de la diffusion interne des informations sur les camps de detention', Agence Franse Presse, 07/08/92.

²⁷⁶² Aengus Finucane, 'The Changing Roles of Voluntary Organizations', Kevin M. Cahill (ed.), Framework, p. 253.

human rights fell outside UNPROFOR's mandate and was not the task of the UNHCR, whose job was to supply relief and humanitarian aid for refugees. The rapporteurs therefore recommended that the United Nations set up a special human rights unit which would react immediately to incipient crises in the field of human rights.²⁷⁶³

It was not only that something had gone wrong in the line of communication from UNPROFOR to the UN headquarters; the question also arose why UNHCR, which had itself drawn up a report about the camps at the beginning of July, had not reacted more promptly. Mendiluce defended UNHCR by saying that the High Commission did not have a mandate to visit camps and had done what it could by handing over the data it had to the ICRC. 'We were up to our eyeballs in thousands of expulsions and two million refugees', said the organization's spokesman, Ron Redman.²⁷⁶⁴ Moreover, added Mendiluce, media interest in the camps was to some extent misplaced, since most of the crimes took place during attacks on towns and villages in the framework of ethnic cleansing and not in the camps themselves: 'The whole of Bosnia-Herzegovina is becoming a sort of concentration camp. This has been well known.'²⁷⁶⁵

So Mendiluce passed the responsibility on to the ICRC, which defended itself by saying that it would have been refused access to the camps if it had given too much publicity to their existence.²⁷⁶⁶ 'If we had seen extermination camps, we would have shouted', said Pierre Gauthier, spokesman of the ICRC, in defence of his organization.²⁷⁶⁷ The ICRC refused to say anything else about what it had done with the information.²⁷⁶⁸ But in fact the ICRC had sent on all the information it had about camps to the American State Department and to other diplomats involved, 'not just the Americans', from mid-June on. Throughout the whole month of July the ICRC passed on information to the American, British and French diplomats about the atrocities taking place in the Bosnian-Serb camps.²⁷⁶⁹

There was another authority which had apparently known more about the Serb prison camps in Bosnia. On 7 August the Vatican issued a statement saying that it had at its disposal 'more than certain reports' confirming the existence of camps in which thousands of Bosnians were imprisoned. It made several details known about persecuted Catholic leaders and faithful. For example, the Vatican knew that the priest of Ljubica was imprisoned with several of his parishioners in the camp at Omarska. Unlike the UN, the Vatican was able to escape criticism by calling for immediate military intervention. 'Keeping quiet without doing everything possible to stop the aggression against a helpless population, is a sin of omission', according to a statement issued by the Holy See on 7 August. In the opinion of the Vatican, in this case military intervention did not mean 'heading for war, but preventing war'.²⁷⁷⁰

8. The warring factions' public relations

Around the end of July more attention was devoted to the phenomenon of the camps in Europe than in the United States, where at that time Gutman was conducting his solitary journalistic crusade. For example, on 29 July an article about camps in northern Bosnia by correspondent Maggie O'Kane appeared in The Guardian. She wrote about several camps, including the one at Trnopolje, which according to her – although she had not actually visited it herself – was the best of all the camps. There was food for the inmates and villagers could also bring food to the camp. She had talked to a woman, ²⁷⁶³ United States Senate, Cleansing, p. 12.

²⁷⁶⁴ J. Friedman, 'Report Secret. UN unit knew of Bosnia detentions; so did U.S.', Newsday, 06/08/92. See also M. Kempton, 'The UN's Silence Shall Be Its Shame', Newsday, 13/08/92; M. Schram, 'Denying the Horror That's Beyond Bosnia', Newsday, 13/08/92.

²⁷⁶⁵ Stephen Engelberg & Chuck Sudetic, 'Conflict in the Balkans: In enemy Hands', The New York Times, 16/08/92.

²⁷⁶⁶ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96. See also Ignatieff, Honor, p. 134.

²⁷⁶⁷ Con Coughlin & Philip Sherwell, 'Death in the Balkans', Sunday Telegraph, 09/08/92.

²⁷⁶⁸ R. Howell, 'Outrage. At UN, Pressure For Armed Reply', Newsday, 07/08/92.

²⁷⁶⁹ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia's secret war', The Gazette, 02/07/96.

²⁷⁷⁰ Marc Leijendekker, 'Vaticaan dringt aan op interventie in Bosnië' ('Vatican urges intervention in Bosnia'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/08/92.

Rozalija Hrustic, who had been brought to the camp with her family from Kozarac. Later they were released without being harmed in any way. However, some of their friends had to stay. Her 62-year-old husband later decided to revisit these friends at the camp. When he went there, he saw a large group of women and children being transported to Zenica in cattle trucks. Because the trucks stood still in the burning sun for long periods during the journey, and the Serb guards did not allow other Muslims to bring water for the women and children, four women and seven children died on the way. In her article, O’Kane referred to Trnopolje several times as a concentration camp.²⁷⁷¹ The term ‘concentration camp’, especially in English, has a technical meaning and dates from the Boer War in Africa. But the phrase ‘concentration camp’ is also associated with a specific era: it is generally used to refer to the Nazi camps of the Third Reich and in particular to extermination camps such as Auschwitz en Treblinka. Referring to the prison camps as concentration camps drew European journalists to northern Bosnia like a magnet. ‘Concentration camp’ was a catchword.²⁷⁷²

However, one day earlier, on 28 July, a small group of British journalists had already set out for the former Yugoslavia whose reports were to make history. When Gutman’s first articles appeared, Karadzic and Koljevic were in London for talks led by the United Kingdom which held the EU presidency at the time. The press in the British capital confronted the Bosnian Serb leaders with the reports on the concentration camps. However, Karadzic repeatedly denied the existence of concentration camps to the media. According to him there were prisoner of war camps, but so there were in every war, he said. But the press persisted and then Karadzic did something he must have deeply regretted later.

Both the civilian and the military authorities in Serbia and the Republika Srpska had devoted relatively little attention to their PR abroad,²⁷⁷³ unlike the other conflicting parties in the former Yugoslavia. In Chapter 1 the PR successes of the Slovenian government in June and July 1991 were discussed. Soon after, the Croatian Authorities managed to mobilize the entire population for a campaign intended to manoeuvre the country into a victim role vis-à-vis the Serbs in the eyes of Westerners.²⁷⁷⁴ In fact, in the summer of 1991 the Croatian government’s goal was to get as many foreign journalists as possible to come to Zagreb.²⁷⁷⁵ Croatian generals liked to take journalists with them to the front, something Serbian generals hardly ever did. The consequence was that during the conflict in Croatia journalists were active mainly on the Croatian front.²⁷⁷⁶ And whereas in the summer of 1991 the Croatian public relations machinery was sending the song Peace in Croatia out into the world, accompanied by a glib video clip, the Serbs restricted themselves to ‘statements in armoured language, proclaimed by men with martial moustaches’, as two Dutch journalists put it.²⁷⁷⁷

To polish up their countries’ image in the United States, the Slovenian and Croatian governments had turned to American PR firms such as Ruder Finn Global Public Affairs, Hill and Knowlton, and Waterman & Associates, which could influence the American press, policy makers and ‘think tanks’.²⁷⁷⁸ On 18 May 1992 the Bosnian government also entered into a contract with Ruder Finn. However, the Serbian government’s PR office in the United States, Bill M. Wise’s Wise

²⁷⁷¹ Maggie O’Kane, ‘Muslims’ nightmare under the long hot Yugoslav sun’, The Guardian, 29/07/92.

²⁷⁷² According to one journalist, within 24 hours of the appearance of O’Kane’s article, as many as 350 journalists set out for northern Bosnia. Phillip Knightley, ‘Es stellt sich heraus, dass der Stacheldraht nur ein Symbol war’ (‘It turns out that the barbed wire was only a symbol’), Novo, (1997)27(March/April).

²⁷⁷³ Interview M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00; Sremac, War, pp. x, 2, 4, 5, 21, 60, 72.

²⁷⁷⁴ Ugresic, Cultuur, pp. 105-107.

²⁷⁷⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘In Kroatië is de tijd van de keuzes voorbij’ (‘In Croatia the time for choices is over’), NRC Handelsblad, 13/07/91.

²⁷⁷⁶ Caroline de Gruyter, ‘In Kroatië is iedereen goed’ (‘In Croatia everyone is good’), Elsevier, 08/08/92, p. 32.

²⁷⁷⁷ Arno Kantelberg and Bart Rijs, ‘Zonder helden of schurken’ (‘Without heroes or rogues’), HP/De Tijd, 13/09/93, p. 8.

²⁷⁷⁸ For the role of Ruder Finn see Dray, Myth; Jacques Merlino, ‘Da haben wir voll ins Schwarze getroffen. Die PR-Firma Ruder Finn’, Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp. 153-158; Johanna Neuman, ‘Croats, Serbs wage media war in USA’, USA Weekend, 23/05/92; Tom O’Sullivan, ‘War: PR Battles in the Balkans’, PR Week, 13/08/92; id., ‘Truth is the first casualty in PR offensive’, The Independent, 21/08/92.

Communications, discontinued its activities in June 1992 because of the sanctions then imposed by the United Nations on Rest Yugoslavia.²⁷⁷⁹ Later other firms in the US also refused to work for the Belgrade regime, not only because of the sanctions, but also because they were afraid their other customers would leave if they accepted the job.²⁷⁸⁰ The lobbying firm Ian Greer Associates, which had spent nearly a hundred thousand British pounds on attempts to influence conservative MPs and Minister of Defence Malcolm Rifkind in particular on behalf of Milosevic's regime since 5 December 1991, also broke off its activities because of the sanctions.²⁷⁸¹

Without direct foreign advisers²⁷⁸² the Serb authorities in Belgrade and Pale made a mess of their public relations. Press conferences in Belgrade were seldom in English.²⁷⁸³ Serbian and Bosnian Serb propaganda efforts were almost entirely focused on domestic consumption or on the Serb diaspora,²⁷⁸⁴ which led to the comment from Serb critics that 'the "propaganda war" was not lost – it was not even waged in an organized fashion because of indifference to the "foreign factor"'.²⁷⁸⁵

For a long time Milosevic disregarded organized PR abroad. Personally, Milosevic had much less desire than the Croatian and Bosnian leaders to make use of the diaspora to further the interests of Serbia, their old homeland, because he had always distrusted the Serbian emigrants as being anti-communist.²⁷⁸⁶ An example of his disregard for PR took place at the end of 1991; the Serbian deputy Prime Minister Darko Prohaska had then made initial contacts with the renowned PR firm Saatchi & Saatchi. As soon as Milosevic heard about this, he fired Prohaska and the contacts were broken off.²⁷⁸⁷ It was not until 1998 that Milosevic observed that in his opinion his government's biggest problem with Washington was bad PR.²⁷⁸⁸

Foreign journalists who had dealings with Bosnian Serb authorities often found that they were treated rudely. For example, Todor Dutina, head of SRNA, the Bosnian Serb News Agency, had the habit of telling journalists when he first met them that in his opinion their profession consisted in principle of criminals.²⁷⁸⁹ The press centre in Pale, which was led by Karadzic's daughter Sonja, was often declared closed by the heads of the VRS at crucial moments in the war.²⁷⁹⁰ When it was open, its employees often tried to make journalists pay for information.²⁷⁹¹ Mladic proclaimed loudly that he did not need the press, 'because history will show that I am right'.²⁷⁹² On the other hand, like Minister of ²⁷⁷⁹ Tom O'Sullivan, 'War: PR Battles in the Balkans', PR Week, 13/08/92.

²⁷⁸⁰ Caroline de Gruyter, 'Kroaten rijgen kettingen van Servische vingers' ('Croats make chains out of Serb fingers'), Elsevier, 03/10/92, p. 48; Carol Matlack & Zoran B. Djordjevic, 'Serbian-Croatian PR war', The National Journal, 14/03/92.

²⁷⁸¹ For these activities see David Leigh & Ed Vulliamy, 'Sleaze: Blood money: How Serbia bought British favours', The Guardian, 16/01/97; id., 'Handel mit dem Tod. Wie und warum London für Milosevic nützlich war' ('Trade in death. How and why London was of use to Milosevic'), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 31/01/97.

²⁷⁸² After the furore which arose over the pictures from Trnopolje, the Serbian American National Information Network, abbreviated to SerbNet, was set up in Chicago, to propagate the Serbian position. SerbNet made use of two PR firms: McDermott & O'Neill & Associates, and David A. Keene & Associates, Gutman, Witness, pp. 168-171. SerbNet was set up by the American Member of Congress Helen Delich Bentley, who was of Serbian descent. For her PR activities on behalf of Serbia see Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 84; Brad K. Blitz, 'Serbia's War Lobby: Diaspora Groups and Western Elite', Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, pp. 197-202. Another PR organization run by the Serbian diaspora in the United States was the Serbian Unity Congress (SUC), which was founded in 1991 and made use of the PR firm Manatos & Manatos from 15 September 1992 on. For the SUC see Blitz 'War', pp. 204-213 and 222-229.

²⁷⁸³ Sremac, War, p. 72.

²⁷⁸⁴ Vojin Dimitrijevic, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Popov (ed.), Road, p. 638; Brad K. Blitz, 'Serbia's War Lobby: Diaspora Groups and Western Elite', Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, pp. 195-196.

²⁷⁸⁵ Ibid., p. 639.

²⁷⁸⁶ Sremac, War, p. 72.

²⁷⁸⁷ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 139.

²⁷⁸⁸ Sremac, War, p. 6.

²⁷⁸⁹ Bell, Way, p. 102.

²⁷⁹⁰ Bell, Way, p. 110.

²⁷⁹¹ Judah, Serbs, p. 221.

²⁷⁹² Bell, Way, p. 104.

Defence Kadrijevic,²⁷⁹³ he complained that the Croatians had bought themselves good PR in the West, and that the Serbian people had not understood that this was a prerequisite of modern warfare.²⁷⁹⁴

This negative attitude on the part of the Serbian leaders towards foreign media was reinforced by the fact that both in the Republika Srpska and in Serbia itself there was a feeling that the Serbian nation was victimized and misunderstood by the rest of the world. In other words: public relations would not be of any help in the West anyway.²⁷⁹⁵ Moreover, on the Serbian side there was a lack of familiarity in dealing with free media and public opinion which dated from the communist era.²⁷⁹⁶ The Bosnian Muslims, on the other hand, were less tainted by the communist past, and immediately sensed the importance of good relations with journalists. 'I am not saying they deliberately abused us, I am saying they used us intelligently,' said the French General Morillon.²⁷⁹⁷

If an attempt was made on the Serbian side to do something about PR, it was often done amateurishly. Serbs often failed to understand that the Western media, focused as they were on sound bites and one liners, were not interested in lengthy expositions about six centuries of victimization dating from the Battle of Kosovo,²⁷⁹⁸ a chapter of history which according to the American journalist Peter Maass to the Serbs seemed to be as familiar as mother's milk.²⁷⁹⁹ Nor were Western journalists interested in propaganda films full of atrocities committed against the Serbs during the Second World War which were supposed to serve as a justification for their actions in 1992. 'If there was an Academy Award for the Crudest, Goriest Propaganda Film, then the Serbs would win, hands down', said Maass.²⁸⁰⁰

Serbian and Bosnian Serb authorities also hindered themselves in their efforts to create a positive image abroad by the way they tried to deter Western intervention. In order to do this they had to portray themselves as bogeymen. For example, they pointed out that they were in a position to create a second Vietnam²⁸⁰¹ or to avenge themselves by attacking Western capitals and nuclear power plants.²⁸⁰² By choosing this 'top dog' position, they confirmed the victim role of the Bosnian Muslims by implication.²⁸⁰³

Worried by the negative reporting and the first accounts of Serb internment camps, the government of the Republika Srpska decided in the summer of 1992 to do a remarkable about-turn: they launched a publicity offensive.²⁸⁰⁴ Karadzic and his associates hoped to achieve success by staging a grand disappearing act. If they could wipe out the traces of their crimes as thoroughly as possible, the West would have to admit that nothing could be proved. It was a campaign which seemed to dovetail ²⁷⁹³ Kadrijevic, Vien, p. 137.

²⁷⁹⁴ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 89.

²⁷⁹⁵ See for example the interview with M. Toholj, 14/12/99; Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 315; Simic, 'Yugoslavia', p. 46.

²⁷⁹⁶ Cf. Peter Brock, 'Meutenjournalismus', in: Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, p. 21; Levinsohn, Belgrade, p. 32; Stojanovic, Fall, p. 177.

²⁷⁹⁷ Morillon, Croire, p. 133.

²⁷⁹⁸ Sremac, War, p. 29; interview M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00.

²⁷⁹⁹ Maass, Neighbor, p. 91.

²⁸⁰⁰ Maass, Neighbor, p. 88.

²⁸⁰¹ Even Milan Panic did this, 'Bosniërs vinden plannen V-raad onvoldoende' ('Bosnians consider Security Council plans inadequate'), Het Parool, 11/08/92.

²⁸⁰² See for example the repeated threat by the Bosnian Serb leaders to make terrorist attacks on nuclear power plants in Western Europe: 'Belgrado noch Sarajevo blij met VN-resolutie' ('Neither Belgrade nor Sarajevo pleased with UN resolution'), Trouw, 12/08/92; 'Karadzic: aanslagen' ('Karadzic: attacks'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/08/92 or the threat from Belgrade to strike Rome, Vienna, Budapest, Zagreb and the nuclear power plant in Krsko, Guikje Roethof, 'Krijgshaftig. Hoe wil Ter Beek eigenlijk aanvallen?' (Martial. But how does Ter Beek want to attack?) De Groene Amsterdammer, 02/09/92.

²⁸⁰³ Cf. Norman Cigar, 'Serb War Effort and Termination of the War', Magas & Zanic (eds.), War, p. 217.

²⁸⁰⁴ See for example the statements made by the Bosnian Serb commander of Bratunac Dimitri Sibalic or Šibelic, 'In mijn gebied heerst totale informatie-vrijheid' ('In my area there is complete freedom of information'), in: Bart Rijs, 'Sporen van een massamoord' ('Traces of a mass murder'), HP/De Tijd, 28/08/92, p. 11, and 'Buitenlandse journalisten! Mooi! Heel mooi! Dan heeft de waarheid eindelijk de kans!' ('Foreign journalists! Great! Just great! Then truth will finally have a chance'), Bart Rijs, 'Reis naar het einde van Bosnië' ('Journey to the end of Bosnia'), HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 22. See also, Bell, Way, p. 140; Silber & Little, Death, p. 249.

with the idea of ‘plausible deniability,’ which had been the rationale behind many Serb crimes, such as the habit of putting as little as possible on paper and making victims of ethnic cleansing sign documents stating that they voluntarily gave up their property.

So Karadzic took the plunge and invited journalists to come and see for themselves if there were concentration camps. The television feature ITN News and the newspaper The Guardian accepted the challenge. Penny Marshall of ITN News at Ten, her cameraman Jeremy Irvin, and Ian Williams of ITN Channel 5 News flew to Belgrade on 28 July, the day before the appearance of O’Kane’s controversial article. They were also joined by Ed Vulliamy, reporter for The Guardian, who had covered the war in Yugoslavia from as early as the summer of 1991 and who had let the chance slip to report on the Manjaca camp a few weeks earlier.

9. Trnopolje: the famous pictures

‘Ironically, the first television images that shocked the world came from Trnopolje, the ‘best’ camp. No one ever saw the worst camps when they were at their worst.’²⁸⁰⁵

When the British journalists were held up by red tape in Belgrade for several days, they took the opportunity to visit two of the camps in Serbia which were on the list of 94 plus 11 and to film there: the recreation centre at Loznica, where according to the list 1380 prisoners were detained and Subotica, where there were said to be 5000. However, both of these turned out to be purely refugee camps, in which Serbs were also accommodated. On 3 August the British journalists were able to fly from Belgrade to Pale. There they managed to obtain permission from Karadzic, who in the meantime had returned from London, to visit Omarska and Trnopolje. A visit to a prison in the vicinity of Pale, at the invitation of Karadzic, failed to supply proof of the existence of death camps.

On 5 August the ITN team and Vulliamy reached Banja Luka, from where they were taken to Omarska and Trnopolje under Bosnian Serb military escort. Omarska made an unpleasant impression on the British reporters, but they found no incontrovertible evidence that it was an extermination camp. However, there were several buildings to which the British journalists were not given access. What Marshall and her fellow travellers did not know was that almost immediately after the appearance of Gutman’s article about Omarska on 2 August, the Bosnian Serb authorities had decided to shut down the camp as soon as possible. When the ICRC was permitted to visit the camp on 12 August, one week after the British journalists, there were ‘only’ 173 prisoners left. By the time Vulliamy and the ITN team arrived, most of the prisoners, like those of Keraterm, had been taken to the Manjaca and Trnopolje camps,²⁸⁰⁶ which was to give the British journalists’ trip a twist which had not been intended by the Bosnian Serb authorities. After the visit to Omarska on 5 August they had only one more opportunity to find the proof they were looking for: Trnopolje.

The camp at Trnopolje covered a large area on which several buildings stood, including a school. It was originally not a prison camp but a transit camp for women, children and older men, mainly from the district of Prijedor and in particular from the town of Kozarac, which had 15,000, mainly Muslim, inhabitants.²⁸⁰⁷ After the Bosnian Serb army had shelled Kozarac in the spring, soldiers had told the Muslim inhabitants that they would be safe if they went to Trnopolje, where the primary school had been set up as a camp.²⁸⁰⁸ Groups of men who had been imprisoned in Omarska and had been classified by the Bosnian Serb camp leaders there as ‘not dangerous’ were also taken to this camp.²⁸⁰⁹ Shortly before the arrival of the ITN team, prisoners from Omarska and Keraterm who had to be removed from the eye of world opinion after Gutman’s articles had also been brought here to Trnopolje. So at the beginning of August there were several thousand people at Trnopolje.²⁸¹⁰

²⁸⁰⁵ Maass, Neighbor, pp. 41-42.

²⁸⁰⁶ Gutman, Witness, pp. xiii and xxxii; Ian Traynor, ‘We moesten over lijken en hersenen stappen’ (‘We had to step over corpses and brains’), de Volkskrant 07/10/92; Van Cleef, Wereld, pp. 137-138. In that same month the Bosnian government had quoted a figure of 11,000, eyewitnesses a figure of 8000, Amnesty International, ‘Bosnia-Herzegovina. Gross abuses of basic human rights’ (AI Index: EUR 63/01/92), p. 23; R. Gutman, ‘Deadly Transfer. Many reported killed, missing in move from Serb camp’, Newsday, 26/08/92.

²⁸⁰⁷ Cf. Van Cleef, Wereld, pp. 95-96.

The camp was guarded mainly by Serbs from the direct vicinity. Some of those at Trnopolje, including some men of fighting age, had themselves chosen to stay in the camp because the situation outside the camp was even more dangerous.²⁸¹¹ Vulliamy recorded the story of a man who had tried to reach Trnopolje, but had been picked up by soldiers on the way and taken to Omarska.²⁸¹² Several people who had left the camp to revisit their houses or farms did not return, so that those in the camp thought it was safer to stay there. Marshall was later to say in her report that the people who had been brought to the camp did not really know themselves whether they were prisoners or refugees.²⁸¹³ The American journalist Peter Maass, who visited Trnopolje a few days after the ITN team, observed that apart from former prisoners of Omarska and Keraterm the inmates of the camp were mainly women and children from the direct vicinity, and that they were there voluntarily:

‘Yes, voluntarily. It was one of the strangest of situations in Bosnia – people seeking safety at a prison camp. Trnopolje was no picnic, but the known brutalities dished out there were preferable to the fates awaiting Bosnians who tried to stay in their homes.’²⁸¹⁴

Although the situation in the camp was much better than in the other camps in north-west Bosnia,²⁸¹⁵ this does not mean that the Trnopolje camp offered complete protection to its inmates. There were incidental cases of rape²⁸¹⁶ and on one evening a gang referred to as El Manijakos is said to have carried out mass rape. According to a report by Amnesty International issued in October 1992 on serious violations of human rights in Bosnia between April and August 1992, reports of rape reaching this organization came mainly from the camp at Trnopolje.²⁸¹⁷ The Yugoslavia tribunal was later to establish that ‘[b]ecause this camp housed the largest numbers of women and girls, there were more rapes at this camp than at any other’.²⁸¹⁸ Men were also tortured and murders took place in the camp, mainly among the local Muslim elite.²⁸¹⁹ People from the camp were sometimes allowed out of the camp for half an ²⁸⁰⁸ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 66.

²⁸⁰⁹ See for example Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 67; Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 103.

²⁸¹⁰ According to the ITN bulletin there were 2000 prisoners there when Penny Marshall visited the camp. During a visit six days later, the ICRC counted approximately 4000 internees, Amnesty International, ‘Bosnia-Herzegovina. Gross abuses of basic human rights’ (AI Index: EUR 63/01/92), p. 23.

²⁸¹¹ See for example Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 105.

²⁸¹² Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 102.

²⁸¹³ Nightline, ABC News, 06/08/92.

²⁸¹⁴ Maass, Neighbor, pp. 41-42.

²⁸¹⁵ United Nations, S/1994/674, Appendix, clause 171. For the nature of the camp see also ‘Trnopolje detention camp. Helsinki Watch Report, October 1992 –February 1993.

²⁸¹⁶ R. Gutman, ‘Bosnia Rape Horror’, Newsday, 09/08/92; Gutman, Witness, p. 64; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 66.

²⁸¹⁷ Amnesty International, ‘Bosnia-Herzegovina. Gross abuses of basic human rights’ (AI Index: EUR 63/01/92).

²⁸¹⁸ Quoted in Ed Vulliamy, ‘We are all guilty’, The Observer, 11/05/97. See also the tribunal’s charge against Simo Drljaca and Milan Kovacevic, case no. IT-97-24-I.

²⁸¹⁹ Trnopolje detention camp. Helsinki Watch Report, October 1992 –February 1993. According to the Yugoslavia tribunal’s charge against Slobodan Kuruzovic, commander of the camp at Trnopolje, hundreds of men were tortured and murdered there, Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 288. Cf. Van Cleef, Wereld, pp. 96-97, 251, 254. According to the main text of the Bassiouni report: ‘Rapes, beatings and other kinds of torture, and even killings, were not rare.’, United Nations, S/1994/674, Appendix, clause 171. According to an appendix of the same report a large number of men were murdered. This allegation does not include any indication of time, United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, IV.A.32. Sells, Bridge, p. 19 classifies Trnopolje along with Manjaca and Batkovic as concentration camps as opposed to the ‘killing camps’ Omarska, Brcko-Luka, Susica and Keraterm: ‘killings and torture were common, but the majority of detainees did hour or an hour to look for food. If they were given permission to do this, they always had to leave something of value behind in the camp. If they came back too late, they were beaten up or killed. If they did not come back at all, they were shot dead as soon as they were found.²⁸²⁰ Diphtheria was also rife in the camp.²⁸²¹

The British journalists visit the camp

‘In war reporting access is everything, or nearly everything.’²⁸²²

In Trnopolje, unlike Omarska, the ITN team was allowed to film everywhere. In the school building the team filmed blankets on the floor and belongings marking off sleeping places. According to pictures which were never broadcast, the ITN team talked to a nineteen-year-old Serb guard called Igor, the son of the camp commander cum Red Cross Official (!) Pero Curguz.²⁸²³ Igor, who had been stationed in Knin since 1991, had been appointed as bodyguard of camp commander Slobodan Kuruzovic a few days previously. He told the team that the Bosnian Serb army brought food and water for the people in the camp and asked the film crew to talk to a group of people standing in the shade of a tree behind a low fence. Igor explained that the group included some friends of his who were staying at the camp and a former teacher of his.

‘Do you want to live together again?’, asked the ITN team. ‘I want’, answered Igor, ‘now a very big problem.’ Then the interviewer asked one of the men behind the low fence, without barbed wire, Azmir Causevic, who had been introduced as a friend of Igor’s: ‘Is he a guard?’ Answer: ‘Yes.’ ‘Is he your friend?’ Answer: ‘Yes.’ He said that they used to play in the street together. ‘Are you prisoners?’ ‘We are not in jail.’ Then another friend of Igor’s arrived on the other side of the fence and shook Igor’s hand. The film crew asked him: ‘What are you doing here? What is this place?’ But the man they addressed did not seem to understand. Then the ITN team turned to Igor again: ‘Are you here to keep people in?’ ‘No, I have a commander. He says I am here to protect, first me and these people.’ Then the cameraman filmed some of the little tents the people in the camp had set up to protect themselves from the blazing sun.²⁸²⁴

The Serb camp commander cum Red Cross official Pero Curguz told the Britons that new inmates had arrived at the camp that day. They were a group from the Keraterm camp. At the medical centre the British journalists asked the interned doctor Idriz Merdzanic: ‘Have there been beatings?’, at which he nodded his head. He did not want to answer the next question, ‘Many?’ Later at an unguarded moment he gave the British journalists an undeveloped film with pictures of men’s tortured upper bodies.²⁸²⁵

Then the camera crew made its way to the southern side of the camp. There was a small field there with a transformer house, a barn and farm equipment. Between this field and the northern side of the camp there was a fence made of chicken wire and – from chest height up – barbed wire. Along the other sides of the field where the men who had been transferred from Keraterm and Omarska had been taken there was a wall, a low fence, or no boundary at all between the site and the road going past survive’. Report of murders also in Gutman, Witness, p. 85; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 67. Report of the torture of a man in the Trnopolje camp in United States Senate, Cleansing, p. 23.

²⁸²⁰ Supplemental United States Submission of information to the United Nations Security Council in Accordance with Paragraph 5 of Resolution 771 (1992) and Paragraph 1 of Resolution 780 (1992), released on October 1992.

²⁸²¹ ‘Trnopolje detention camp. Helsinki Watch Report, October 1992 –February 1993’.

²⁸²² Bell, Way, p. 162.

²⁸²³ For father Curguz’s curious double function see also Van Cleef, Wereld, pp. 249-251.

²⁸²⁴ Information about the footage which was not aired has been taken from <http://www.srpska-mreza.com/lm-f97/deichmann-press.html>, ‘ITN vs Deichmann and Truth – Report on Jan. 31 press conference’.

²⁸²⁵ Nightline, ABC News, 06/08/92; T. Deichmann, ‘Es war dieses Bild, das die Welt in Alarmbereitschaft versetzte’ (‘It was this picture that put the world on alert’), Novo (1997)26 (January/February). The photos were published in the Daily Mail on 07/08/92; ITN’s Penny Marshall tells how she made the world wake up’, Sunday Times, 16/04/92.

it, but there were armed Serbs on guard (see map of the camp in this section).²⁸²⁶ The Britons stepped through a gap in the fence. In the camp itself, on the other side of the barbed wire, a crowd of curious people assembled, including those who had recently arrived from the Omarska and Keraterm camps. Penny Marshall first had a conversation with a Muslim on the other side of the fence called Mehmet, who spoke a little English. Later, in the bulletin which went on air, he would hardly appear at all, but in the film he was clearly visible next to the person who was to become the main figure of the ITN broadcast. Mehmet told Marshall that everything was ‘very fine, nothing wrong, but it’s very hot’.²⁸²⁷

Then one of the Britons pointed to a person who was coming forward from the background, a man with his T-shirt in his hand, whose ribs were clearly visible in his bare upper body.²⁸²⁸ The cameraman zoomed in on him. This was to become the familiar picture of the emaciated Muslim Fikret Alic. The pictures also show clearly that there were three strands of barbed wire only at the top of the fence from behind which the cameraman was filming; below them was chicken wire. Then Marshall began a conversation with Alic.

On 6 August the British Channel 4 News broadcast the pictures at 7 pm, followed three hours later by ITN’s News at Ten. In the pictures broadcast on television the emaciated Alic was the central figure. Both broadcasts bore the character of eyewitness accounts, by Penny Marshall and Ian Williams respectively. In their commentaries, Marshall and Williams said that these people were refugees who had lost their homes and belongings, but that there was no first-hand evidence of atrocities in the camp. Later a sharp controversy would arise as to whether or not the pictures had been doctored; this will be discussed at greater length in section 11.

However, the text was not entirely free of suggestion. Marshall began her report by saying ‘The Bosnian Serbs don’t call Omarska a concentration camp’, thereby implying that others might well have a different opinion. Williams said that he had visited ‘seven alleged camps which were on the original Bosnian list of alleged concentration camps.’ Of five it could be said that ‘they are not concentration camps, at most they are refugee collection centres’, but there was ‘grave concern’ about ‘severe mistreatment’ in two of the others. Again, it seemed to be implied that Omarska and Trnopolje were in fact concentration camps.

Williams’s report was followed on ITN by a background story entitled ‘Crimes of war?’, in which black and white pictures of prisoners of war were shown and it was explained that war crimes had been prohibited after the horrors of the Nazi era. Then American politicians were asked for their reactions to the ITN films of Omarska and Trnopolje. They included the presidential candidate Bill Clinton, who reacted by saying: ‘you can’t allow the mass extermination of people and just sit by and watch it happen’.²⁸²⁹ In a lengthy interview Democrat and concentration camp survivor Tom Lantos said that ‘those horrendous pictures’ reminded him of ‘the concentration camps that the Nazis had during World War Two, minus the gas chambers (...)The civilised world stood by during the early 1940’s because they didn’t know what was going on. Well, we now know what is going on.’ In ITN’s News at Ten the influential American senator Alfonso d’Amato made similar statements.²⁸³⁰ Lantos also appeared on the programme and said that by 1992 the world should be able to distinguish the Churchills from the Chamberlains.

²⁸²⁶ Ed Vulliamy, ‘Poison in the well of history’, The Guardian, 15/03/00; Eric Alterman, ‘Bosnian camps: a barbed tale’, The Nation, 28/07/97.

²⁸²⁷ This paragraph is based on the account of Phillip Knightley, who saw the uncut ITN tapes, ‘Es stellt sich heraus, dass der Stacheldraht nur ein Symbol war’ (It becomes clear that the barbed wire only a symbol was), Novo(1997)27(March/April).

²⁸²⁸ Photos taken by Ron Haviv prove that this man, Fikret Alic, was by no means the only emaciated man in the camp’, Blood, pp. 87-89.

²⁸²⁹ Don Oberdorfer & Helen Dewar, ‘Clinton, Senators Urge Bush to Act on Balkans’, The Washington Post, 06/08/92.

²⁸³⁰ See also ‘Nightline’, ABC News, 06/08/92.

Comparisons with Jews and Nazis

‘We are not paid to moralize.’²⁸³¹

The impact these pictures made as they went around the world was enormous. After seeing just 45 seconds of uncut ITN footage by satellite, Tom Bettag, producer of the American television network ABC’s programme Nightline decided to scrap the programme planned for that evening in favour of one featuring the ITN pictures. ‘We knew those pictures would have enormous impact. It has clearly changed the political climate’, he was to say scarcely 24 hours later.²⁸³² ‘They are the sort of scenes that flicker in black and white images from 50-year-old films of Nazi concentration camps’, wrote the Daily Mail the morning after the broadcast.²⁸³³ This was ‘footage reminiscent of scenes from Nazi concentration camps’, wrote Gutman’s paper Newsday.²⁸³⁴ Above the photo of Alic on its front page, the Daily Mirror placed the heading ‘Belsen 92’, and the Star ‘Belsen 1992’. With the pictures of Serb ‘concentration camps’, everything suddenly became “‘crystal clear” in the West. Metaphorically speaking, the Serbs became the Nazis, and the Muslims became the Jews of World War II’.²⁸³⁵

This was a reversal of the alliances that had existed until then. The regime in Belgrade had constantly emphasized that in the past there had always been close ties between Serbs and Jews and that in their historic role as ‘victims’ the lot of the Serbs was very similar to that of the Jews.²⁸³⁶ After the Jews, the Serbs were believed to be the people who had suffered most during the Second World War. It was not without reason that the nationalist Dobrica Cosic had been one of the founders of the Association of Serb-Jewish Friendship. In the United States, Serbs had run an aggressive campaign in an attempt to win the support of the Jewish community for their side, realizing that it was the best organized ethnic lobby in the country.²⁸³⁷

Traditionally, Belgrade considered Israel, Russia and Greece as its best friends. The state of Israel had in fact always taken a strongly pro-Serb position.²⁸³⁸ In the autumn of 1991 Serbia had successfully placed a large secret arms order in Israel.²⁸³⁹ It was not until 5 August 1992 that Israel had decided to offer humanitarian aid to Bosnia.²⁸⁴⁰ On the same day Deputy Minister Yossi Beilin had broken the silence observed by the Israeli government since the outbreak of the hostilities. He then sharply condemned the reports about the camps, but added at once that Israel would never forget the special ties which had existed in the past between Serbs and Jews.²⁸⁴¹

The day after the pictures of Trnopolje were broadcast, the Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said that the Jews, who remembered the Holocaust, were particularly afflicted by the reports, though he immediately added that in comparison with the extermination of the Jews during the Second World War, the murders in the Balkans were ‘on a very small scale’.²⁸⁴² Nevertheless, it was a remarkable reaction from a government and a nation which during practically the entire conflict from 1991 to 1995 had painstakingly avoided offending the Serbian regime and its henchmen, on the basis of the incorrect and unjustified view that during the Second World War the Serbs, unlike the Croats and

²⁸³¹ James Harff, director of PR firm Ruder Finn, quoted in Nadja Tesich, ‘New and old disorder’, NATO, p. 188.

²⁸³² Quoted in: R. Ciolli, ‘Bosnia Reports Prompt Outrage. Prison camp images drive home urgency’, Newsday, 08/08/92.

²⁸³³ ‘The Proof’, Daily Mail, 07/08/92.

²⁸³⁴ R. Howell, ‘Outrage. At UN Pressure For Armed Reply’, Newsday, 07/08/92. Similar utterances in Sandra Sanchez, ‘Horror in Serbian prison camps’, USA Today, 07/08/92.

²⁸³⁵ Mestrovic, Balkanization, p. 51.

²⁸³⁶ Levinsohn, Belgrade, pp. 15-17, 53, 259-260, 273; Sremac, War, pp. 30 and 61; Daniel Kofman, ‘Israel and the War in Bosnia’, Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, p. 93.

²⁸³⁷ Carol Matlack & Zoran B. Djordjevic, ‘Serbo-Croatian PR War’, The National Journal, 14/03/92.

²⁸³⁸ See also Daniel Kofman, ‘Israel and the War in Bosnia’, Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, pp. 91-92.

²⁸³⁹ Gajic Glisic, Vojvka, pp. 23 and 47.

²⁸⁴⁰ Gwen Ackerman, ‘Israel Breaks Silence, Offers Aid to Distressed Yugoslavia’, The Associated Press, 05/08/92.

²⁸⁴¹ Gwen Ackerman, ‘Israel Breaks Silence, Offers Aid to Distressed Yugoslavia’, The Associated Press, 05/08/92.

²⁸⁴² R. Howell, ‘Rabin Calls On World for Action’, Newsday, 08/08/92. See also Hugh Orgel, ‘Israeli cuts Bosnia mission short as Rabin demands end to atrocities’, The Ethnic NewsWatch. Jewish Telegraphic Agency, 11/08/92.

the Muslims, had been on the side of the Jews.²⁸⁴³ This statement of Rabin's also reflected the divided reactions of the Jewish community, in which on the one hand Jewish organizations said that they observed the same indifference on the part of the world community as at the time of the extermination of the Jews during the Second World War,²⁸⁴⁴ while on the other hand someone like Simon Wiesenthal thought that any comparison with the Nazi extermination camps was completely misplaced.²⁸⁴⁵

In the United States the Jewish mood turned against Serbia as a result of the reports and pictures of the camps. James Harff, director of the PR firm Ruder Finn regarded this about-face as the greatest success in enhancing the image of his customers in Zagreb and Sarajevo.²⁸⁴⁶ In the past, Tudjman had made anti-Semitic remarks and Izetbegovic was initially not an obvious protégé of the Jewish community. All this had now changed. After Gutman's articles, on 5 August two hundred demonstrators led by the Anti-Defamation League and the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors held a protest march in front of the United Nations building in New York, with the support of twenty American Jewish organizations. The national director of the Anti-Defamation League, Abraham H. Foxman, himself a survivor of the Holocaust, pointed out to the demonstrators that what was going on in Bosnia was not the same as what had happened during the Holocaust. But in his opinion there were so many similarities that an international military force should be sent if necessary.²⁸⁴⁷ Maynard Wishner, chairman of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council called on Boutros-Ghali to begin at once with mobilizing 'whatever U.N. peacekeeping forces are appropriate'.²⁸⁴⁸ Nobel prize winner Elie Wiesel wrote a letter informing the demonstrators that Jews in particular, who had such vivid memories of persecution, should take action in the free world against the systematic torture and murders.²⁸⁴⁹ On 5 August Harff also managed to persuade the B'nai Brith Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee and the American Jewish Congress to put an advertisement in The New York Times under the heading 'Stop the Death Camps'.²⁸⁵⁰

On 7 August the ITN Lunchtime News again devoted attention to Trnopolje. This time the British television company showed pictures of Dutch, Turkish and American broadcasts in which the camps were compared with photos of Nazi concentration camps. ITN quoted from the commentary of the ABC broadcast: 'Faces and bodies that hint at atrocities of the past. But this is not history, this is Bosnia. Pictures from the camps: A glimpse into genocide.' and: 'The Dutch talked of concentration camps. In Muslim Turkey they said ITN's pictures resembled Hitler's camps and brought the greatest disgrace to mankind. And the Germans said the pictures were reminiscent of World War Two.' Against a background of British morning newspapers and the familiar picture of Alic behind barbed wire, ITN reported that 'today's British press was unequivocal in its interpretation of the pictures, adding more pressure on the government to take action to intervene in the Yugoslav crisis.'

²⁸⁴³ Cf. Igor Primoratz, 'Israel and genocide in Croatia', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, pp. 195-206.

²⁸⁴⁴ G. DeWan, 'Newsday Student Briefing Page on the News', Newsday, 11/08/92. See also 'A Demand for Action', The Ethnic NewsWatch. Northern California Jewish Bulletin, 07/08/92; 'A Terrible Throwback', The Ethnic NewsWatch. Baltimore Jewish Times, 07/08/92; Nancy Hill-Hotzman, 'Balkans: Jewish groups react to reports of tortures and murders', Los Angeles Times, 08/08/92; Cohen, War, p. 122.

²⁸⁴⁵ F. Bruning, 'Human-Rights Probe of Serbia Urged', Newsday, 14/08/92. For a more detailed survey of the Jewish and Israeli attitude to Serb war practices in the early 1990s see Cohen, War, pp. 122-128; Primoratz, Israel.

²⁸⁴⁶ Jacques Merlino, 'Da haben wir voll ins Schwarze getroffen.' Die PR-Firma Ruder Finn', Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp. 155-156.

²⁸⁴⁷ 'Jewish Community Rallies for Action to End Atrocities in Bosnia', U.S. Newswire, 05/08/92.

²⁸⁴⁸ Debra Nussbaum Cohen, 'Jewish groups express outrage over atrocities in Bosnia', The Ethnic NewsWatch; Jewish Telegraphic Agency, 05/08/92.

²⁸⁴⁹ Cheong Chow, 'US Jews calling on Bush, UN action for camps', The Boston Globe, 10/08/92.

²⁸⁵⁰ Allison Kaplan & Tom Tugend, 'US Jews call for action against Serb atrocities', The Jerusalem Post, 06/08/92.

Impact on public image

With this bulletin, ITN itself raised the question of the impact made by its pictures. The pictures strengthened a feeling that had been present for some time, namely that this time the population of the free world would not be able to say, as they had during the Holocaust, that they had known nothing of the mass slaughter which was taking place. As the Dutch commentator W.L. Brugsma would later write: 'Due to the disastrous invention called television, the saying "What you don't know won't hurt you" no longer applies.'²⁸⁵¹

Nevertheless, this is only relative. Television is highly dependent on the possibilities of visualizing a situation. As far as television newsrooms are concerned, if there are no pictures of a subject, it cannot be news.²⁸⁵² 'What cannot be shown in images, receives little attention (...) For instance, we were inadequately informed about the genocide in Congo because no cameras were set up there', said the Belgian philosopher Bart Pattyn, an expert in media ethics.²⁸⁵³ The difference in Bosnia was that the cameras there had found the pictures the West was looking for.

Even before the pictures of Fikret Alic behind barbed wire had been broadcast Milosevic had been compared with Hitler,²⁸⁵⁴ the Muslims' lot with that of the Jews in the Holocaust,²⁸⁵⁵ the actions of Croatian and Bosnian Serbs with those of the Sudeten Germans in the late 1930s²⁸⁵⁶ and incidents such as murder, rape, ethnic cleansing and deportation with those of the Second World War in general.²⁸⁵⁷ But thanks to the pictures of the emaciated Fikret Alic behind barbed wire, the image of the aggressive Serbs could be definitively linked to the actions of the Nazis during the Second World War. In the course of almost fifty years of peace in Europe, the Second World War had become a frame of reference for right and wrong. How much more effectively it could be used to make a divide between rogues and heroes, now that there was a war going on with ethnic cleansing which looked very similar to the pictures in Schindler's List and now that there were again camps which evoked memories of what an earlier film had made known as the Holocaust?²⁸⁵⁸

The pictures of Fikret Alic behind barbed wire were an answer for journalists and newsrooms who were wrestling with the problem that the public at large had lost track of the war in Bosnia.²⁸⁵⁹ The reports about refugees had already offered some elements the public could identify with, but it was not until the picture of Fikret Alic in the camp that there was something they could grasp hold of, in the form of a human figure.²⁸⁶⁰

An analogy with the Nazi concentration camps and in particular the death camps or extermination camps of fifty years earlier was soon made. Even those who queried such a comparison admitted the possibility that it might as yet turn out to be justified. In Newsday for example the following appeared:

²⁸⁵¹ W.L. Brugsma, 'Wat weet dat deert' ('What you know hurts you'), HP/De Tijd, 27/08/93, p. 46.

²⁸⁵² Liesbet Walckiers, 'De media en de derde Wereld' ('The media and the third world'), Becker (red.), Massamedia, p. 129.

²⁸⁵³ Bart Pattyn, 'Verveling en mediagebruik' ('Boredom and media custom'), Becker (red.), Massamedia, p. 91.

²⁸⁵⁴ See for example 'Milosevic Isn't Hitler, But...'; The New York Times, 04/08/92. The American senator Bob Dole had even said that Milošević was worse than Hitler, Maarten Huygen, 'Bosnië plaatst VS voor dilemma' ('Bosnia places US in a dilemma'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/06/92.

²⁸⁵⁵ See for example John Omicinski, 'War in Yugoslavia: The new Holocaust? Is Slobodan Milosevic the Hitler of 1992?', Gannett News Service, 29/07/92.

²⁸⁵⁶ 'Belgrado niet immuun' ('Belgrade is not immune'), de Volkskrant, 29/05/92.

²⁸⁵⁷ Richard J. Sideman, chairman of the American Jewish Committee, San Francisco, 'Brutalities in Bosnia', The San Francisco Chronicle, 30/07/92.

²⁸⁵⁸ For a striking example of this 'almost parallel' see T. Cushman and S.G. Mestrovic, 'Introduction', id. (ed.), This Time, especially pp. 6-9.

²⁸⁵⁹ Caroline de Gruyter, 'In Kroatië is iedereen goed', Elsevier, 08/08/92, p. 32.

²⁸⁶⁰ Michael Schiffler, analyst at the Center for War, Peace and the Media in New York, a few days after the broadcast of the ITN pictures, cited in R. Ciolli, 'Bosnia Reports Prompt Outrage. Prison camp images drive home urgency', Newsday, 08/08/92.

‘Is this the same as 1942? Is this a Final Solution? The answer to that is no. This is not systematic annihilation. (...) The Serbs, while imprisoning the Muslims, are not systematically killing them, though the conditions in which they are keeping them guarantee that many will die. (...) Yet, to some degree, this analogy is irrelevant because this is not a question of comparative suffering. The direct historical parallel to the Holocaust is to be found in the actions of the perpetrators and the bystanders (...) What is going on in Bosnia is not yet a Holocaust and we must ensure that it does not become one.’²⁸⁶¹

Nevertheless the analogy with the Nazi camps persisted for a long time. At the beginning of December 1992 the otherwise so diplomatic former American Minister of Foreign Affairs George Shultz advised television makers to show films of concentration camps from the Second World War the next time they devoted attention to Bosnia: ‘The message is the same.’²⁸⁶² A year after the ITN broadcast the British newspaper The Independent wrote: ‘The camera slowly pans up the bony torso of the prisoner. It is the picture of famine, but then we see the barbed wire against his chest and it is the picture of Holocaust and concentration camps.’²⁸⁶³

The notion upheld by Serb propaganda that Croats and their Muslim confederates had been fascists in the Second World War and that ‘therefore’ everything that Croats and Bosnian Muslims did in the 1990s should be regarded with the deepest suspicion vanished into thin air in the West. The dichotomy between Serb war criminals and Bosnian Muslim victims became a fixed idea.

The reports of Serb outrages made many outside Serbia deaf to any further Serb arguments. According to some, the Serbs had lost their right to be heard.²⁸⁶⁴ The reasoning was that their statements could not be trusted. Because the Serb camps were put on a par with concentration camps in the Second World War, anyone who asserted a different point of view was suspected of being a revisionist.²⁸⁶⁵ After the Bosnian Serb authorities had given the International Committee of the Red Cross permission to inspect Trnopolje, the American Assistant Secretary of State for international organizations John Bolton commented that during the Second World War the Nazis had also managed to mislead the Red Cross during visits to concentration camps. In his opinion it was also unlikely that much interest could be aroused in Croat or Muslim camps in which Serbs were held prisoner²⁸⁶⁶ and which, as was the case in the Croat-run camp in Mostar and the Muslim-run camp at Celebici fifty kilometres west of Sarajevo, were no less or little less atrocious than those of the Bosnian Serbs.²⁸⁶⁷ An ICRC report of 4 August, in which it was concluded after visits to ten camps in Bosnia that all parties in the conflict were guilty of serious human rights abuses was to a large extent snowed under in the ²⁸⁶¹ D. Lipstadt, ‘Bosnia’s Horror Is Not a Holocaust. But the outrage also is not a question of comparative suffering’, Newsday, 13/08/92. See also Patrick Cockburn, Independent on Sunday, 09/08/92; Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.), Conflict, pp. 73-74.

²⁸⁶² E. Sciolino, ‘Clinton faults Bush over Bosnia policy’, New York Times News Service, 11/12/92, 2053EST. See also Wall Street Journal, 23/02/93, p. A1: ‘Nazi-like detention camps’, quoted in T. Cushman and S.G. Mestrovic, ‘Introduction’, id. (ed.), This Time, p. 20.

²⁸⁶³ Independent, 05/08/93.

²⁸⁶⁴ See Thomas Cushman/Stjepan G. Mestrovic, ‘Introduction’, id. (eds.), Time, p. 15: ‘(...) the Serbs relinquished the right to be heard. Genocide committed by Serbian leaders in the name of Greater Serbia has nullified their right to be heard as an equal in the community of nations.’ Cf. M. Borogovic and S. Rustempasic, ‘The white paper on Alija Izetbegovic’, http://www.xs4all.nl/~frankti/Bosnian_congress/izetbegovic_white_paper.html consulted on 17/02/00, which finds the crimes committed by the Serb leaders against Bosnia so heinous ‘that they take away the right of their perpetrators to belong to the human race, let alone accuse anyone of anything.’

²⁸⁶⁵ Jacques Merlino, ‘Da haben wir voll ins Schwarze getroffen.’ Die PR-Firma Ruder Finn, Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, p. 156.

²⁸⁶⁶ Cf. Peter Brock, ‘Meutenjournalismus’, in: Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp. 29-30; Dorothea Razumovsky, ‘Gott will es!’, in: ibid., p. 98.

²⁸⁶⁷ For Mostar see Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.), Conflict, p. 75; for Celebici see Marlise Simons, ‘A War-Crimes Trial, but of Muslims, Not Serbs’, The New York Times, 03/04/97; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 180.

media uproar.²⁸⁶⁸ There was also practically no interest in reports from (Bosnian) Serb leaders that possibly thousands of Serbs had died in Bosnian prison camps.²⁸⁶⁹ Shortly before the appearance of the films made at Trnopolje a Reuter photographer had printed a photo of Serb prisoners of war being forced by Bosnian Croats to give the Hitler salute; this was certainly also a picture evoking memories of the Second World War. However, this photo was scarcely shown in the West.²⁸⁷⁰

When the ITN images appeared, they were, in the words of the then acting desk officer for Yugoslavia of the State Department George Kenney, 'ruinous for the Bush administration's hands off policy'. The pictures 'could not but result in significant US actions'.²⁸⁷¹ This seemed correct; a whole range of measures taken by national governments and international organizations followed in the wake of the pictures of Trnopolje. Immediately after hearing about the report, the American President George Bush, in a hastily convened press conference, urged a Security Council resolution authorizing the use of force in order to make sure humanitarian convoys reached their destinations.²⁸⁷² On the evening of 6 August the NATO Political Committee decided to make plans to open corridors for humanitarian convoys. The member states were asked to indicate what resources they would be able to deploy.²⁸⁷³ On 13 and 14 August the UN Human Rights Committee held an emergency meeting for the first time since its foundation, with the situation in the former Yugoslavia as the sole point on its agenda. In fact the American government had already put forward a proposal for a meeting of this kind, which had been supported by the twelve EC countries, before the ITN broadcasts of the pictures of Trnopolje.²⁸⁷⁴ The motive for the American initiative was the American government's deep concern about the mounting atrocities in the former Yugoslavia and the difficulties confronting the ICRC there. The government in Washington also saw this initiative as a gesture towards the Islamic countries.²⁸⁷⁵

Mazowiecki is appointed rapporteur; the call for military intervention is heard

The committee demanded the release of all prisoners who were being held arbitrarily and also immediate free access for the ICRC to all camps and prisons. It decided to appoint the former Polish Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki as special rapporteur on the former Yugoslavia, with the task of reporting on human rights abuses and war crimes. His reports were also to be sent to the Security Council. On 13 August the Security Council passed Resolutions 770 and 771. Resolution 770 demanded access to the camps for aid organizations. The resolution also authorized the nations to make it possible to deliver humanitarian relief to Sarajevo and other places in Bosnia-Herzegovina if necessary, either on a national basis or through regional organizations, and 'by all possible means'.

Resolution 770 was the first to authorize the use of force by the international community in Bosnia, in order to deliver relief supplies, but it did stipulate that this should take place 'in co-operation with the United Nations'. It was only the second time in the UN's existence that the organization had used the phrase 'by all possible means' in a resolution. The first time had been in the resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq, after troops from that country had invaded Kuwait. Resolution 771 held out the prospect of punishment for war criminals from the former Yugoslavia.

²⁸⁶⁸ See for example F. Bruning, 'Human Rights Probe of Serbia Urged', Newsday, 14/08/92.

²⁸⁶⁹ 'Serbs Vow Fresh Offensive', Newsday, 10/08/92; R. Howell, 'Outrage. At UN, Pressure For Armed Reply', Newsday, 07/08/92; Sremac, War, pp. 116-117.

²⁸⁷⁰ Caroline de Gruyter, 'In Kroatië is iedereen goed', Elsevier, 08/08/92, pp. 32-33, where the photo was in fact shown.

²⁸⁷¹ G. Kenney, 'How media misinformation led to Bosnian intervention', <http://www.suc.org/politics/conc-camps/html/Kenney.html>, consulted on 26/02/00.

²⁸⁷² 'World News Night with Peter Jennings', ABC News, 06/08/92; Jonathan Miller, 'Death-camp scoop made the world sit up', Sunday Times, 09/08/92; ITN's Penny Marshall tells how she made the world wake up', Sunday Times, 16/08/92.

²⁸⁷³ Stephen Robinson & Peter Almond & John Hibbs, 'NATO orders relief plan for Bosnia', The Daily Telegraph, 07/08/92.

²⁸⁷⁴ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844.COREU The Hague, 06/08/92, cpe/hag 439; Wagenmakers 564 to Van den Broek, 06/08/92.

²⁸⁷⁵ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 740 to Van den Broek, 06/08/92.

On 14 August the French government announced that it would make 1100 troops available for Bosnia. Confronted with a temporary consensus in British public opinion and the media as to military intervention²⁸⁷⁶ and with strong domestic criticism of his leadership with respect to the Bosnian crisis,²⁸⁷⁷ the British Prime Minister John Major cut short his holiday and called for an emergency Ministerial Council meeting on 18 August, at which it was decided to supply 1800 light infantry troops for the security of the UN convoys. Chancellor Kohl said that the German constitution, which prohibited the deployment of military troops outside the NATO area, should be revised.

The camps after the furore

Before going into the impact of the pictures in further detail, it seems appropriate to discuss what happened to the prisoners in the camps. After the TV broadcasts about Omarska and Trnopolje, the Red Cross was allowed to visit many Bosnian Serb camps. Camera crews of other television companies, UNHCR representatives and well-known people such as the French Minister Kouchner and the Israeli peace activist Elie Wiesel followed in the footsteps of ITN and the Red Cross. Inasmuch as people continued to be imprisoned in Serb camps, in general their lot immediately improved as a result of visits and inspections like these.²⁸⁷⁸ The women and children who had been in Trnopolje were permitted to leave a few days after the ITN pictures. Room had to be made for yet more prisoners from the Omarska and Keraterm camps, which had to be displayed to the world press in a spotless condition. On 13 August, eight days after Marshall and Williams made their films, Fikret Alic managed to hide amidst a transport of women and children and to escape from the camp. Later he ended up in Denmark. Reporters who visited Trnopolje one and a half weeks after the ITN teams, observed that the newly arrived men were allowed to go to houses and gardens in the vicinity under supervision in order to get hold of food, although by then there was practically nothing left except maize.²⁸⁷⁹ A few weeks later these internees were released and taken to Croatia.²⁸⁸⁰ After the furore over the camps, caused first by Gutman's and O'Kane's articles and later by the ITN broadcast, the inmates of the camps were generally no longer in direct bodily danger, although some former camp detainees still died in incidents during transports.²⁸⁸¹ These transports were in fact the final episode of ethnic cleansing.

Between July and December 1992 the Red Cross visited 10,800 prisoners in 16 camps: 8100 imprisoned by Bosnian Serbs, 1600 in the hands of the Bosnian government and 1100 detained by Bosnian Croats.²⁸⁸² Gradually they were released and on 1 October the ICRC concluded an agreement with the Bosnian Serb authorities stipulating that the remaining 7000 prisoners in 11 camps were to be released at the end of that month.

However, the ICRC was faced with a dilemma in relation to the prisoners' future lot. If the Red Cross and the international community succeeded in getting the prisoners released, they would not be able to return to their homes. Even if those homes were still fit to live in, it was still too dangerous. For example, of a group of 15 people who were released from Manjaca, 13 were murdered when they returned to their homes.²⁸⁸³ But if the prisoners could not go back to their homes, the question was, where could they go? The governments in their Europe were not eager to welcome the former camp inmates.²⁸⁸⁴

²⁸⁷⁶ Simms, Hour, p. 44.

²⁸⁷⁷ See for example Michael Binyon, 'Evidence mounts of executions and beatings in Serb-run camps', The Times, 07/08/92; Craig R. Whitney, 'Balkan Scenes Stir Europe, But Action Remains Elusive', The New York Times, 08/08/92.

²⁸⁷⁸ Ian Traynor, 'We moesten over lijken en hersenen stappen', de Volkskrant 07/10/92.

²⁸⁷⁹ Marjolein Sebregts, 'Vannacht waren het er tien' ('Tonight there were ten of them'), Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 29.

²⁸⁸⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Statement by Ogata, Geneva, 09/10/92.

²⁸⁸¹ See for example Vulliamy, Seasons, pp. 107 and 158; Gutman, Witness, p. 101.

²⁸⁸² Mercier, Crimes, p. 226 n. 23.

²⁸⁸³ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 113.

²⁸⁸⁴ Nina Bernstein, 'Too dangerous to release Bosnian captives', Newsday, 30/08/92.

The human rights organization Amnesty International also pointed out these problems in a report issued on 23 October.²⁸⁸⁵ Amnesty International admitted that the fate awaiting the prisoners upon their release might well offer them little more security than they had had during their imprisonment. They therefore called on the international community to monitor the safe return of the former prisoners to their homes or, if those released did not want this because they feared for their safety, to ensure there was 'an appropriate place of refuge'.²⁸⁸⁶ However, there was not a single European country that guaranteed to accept former camp internees on any significant scale.²⁸⁸⁷ After the first large group of released prisoners, 1560 people from Trnopolje, had arrived in a transit camp at Karlovac in Croatia, it turned out that there was not a single country that was prepared to take them. This meant that no new prisoners in Bosnia could be picked up by the International Committee of the Red Cross, because in Karlovac they would have to take the place of the group of 1560. The result of the attitude of the governments in the countries outside Bosnia-Herzegovina was that the ICRC had to ask the Bosnian Serb authorities to keep camps like Trnopolje open for months longer than the end of October, the date the Bosnian Serb leaders and the Red Cross had eventually agreed on.²⁸⁸⁸

In the autumn of 1992 the Bosnian Serb authorities were even forced to open a new camp in Kotor Varos, on the outskirts of Banja Luka, to relieve Croats and Muslims who were trying to escape from the intimidation and incidental murders in their home surroundings. Every time the ICRC succeeded in getting a number of inmates out of the Bosnian Serb camps, their places were immediately filled by others who preferred the relative safety of the camp to the 'freedom' outside.²⁸⁸⁹ It is unpleasant to have to acknowledge that the pictures which caused such a commotion in the West had so little effect on international readiness to accept victims of the camps.

In the following months, thousands more prisoners were in fact released from the Bosnian Serb camps. On 18 December the last 418 prisoners from the Manjaca camp were released and taken to Karlovac in Croatia under supervision of the ICRC.²⁸⁹⁰ According to the ICRC, by about 1 January 1993 all but 2700 of the internees had been released from camps whose existence had been confirmed.²⁸⁹¹ Then the CIA produced a report, which found its way to various newspapers, that approximately 70,000 more people were being detained in camps run by all three parties in Bosnia.²⁸⁹² According to the CIA, information obtained by satellite espionage, conversations with prisoners who had been released or had run away, and reports made by humanitarian organizations seemed to indicate the existence of previously unknown camps.²⁸⁹³ However, this figure was entirely unfounded.²⁸⁹⁴ Apparently the American authorities, who had kept their knowledge of the camps silent for so long in the past, now wanted to give the impression that they could search better than the ICRC and other humanitarian organizations. In August 1993 the Red Cross named the figure of 6474 detainees still remaining in 51 camps, distributed throughout Bosnia.²⁸⁹⁵ In reports issued in April 1993 and addressed to all three parties in the Bosnian conflict, the International Committee of the Red Cross stated in bold terms that the conditions in which these people were detained were still no better than they had been in the summer of 1992.²⁸⁹⁶

²⁸⁸⁵ Amnesty International, 'Bosnia-Herzegovina. Gross abuses of basic human rights' (AI Index: EUR 63/01/92).

²⁸⁸⁶ p. 13.

²⁸⁸⁷ Mercier, Crimes, p. 115; Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 113; Gutman, Witness, pp. 87 and 105-107.

²⁸⁸⁸ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 64-65; Vulliamy, Seasons, pp. 113 and 158.

²⁸⁸⁹ Vulliamy, Seasons, pp. 113-114.

²⁸⁹⁰ 'Veiligheidsraad veroordeelt verkrachtingen' ('Security Council condemns rape'), Brabants Nieuwsblad, 19/12/92.

²⁸⁹¹ Mercier, Crimes, p. 226 n. 23.

²⁸⁹² Gutman, Witness, p. 141.

²⁸⁹³ Interview Lord Owen, 27/06/01.

²⁸⁹⁴ Mercier, Crimes, p. 117.

²⁸⁹⁵ Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.), Conflict, p. 74.

²⁸⁹⁶ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 116-117.

10. The consequences of the pictures in the Netherlands: a stronger call for intervention

Dutch newspaper readers, radio listeners and television viewers were not entirely dependent on foreign coverage of the war in Bosnia. Dutch journalists such as Raymond van den Boogaard, Dick Verkijk, Harmen Roeland and soon Willem Lust as well were on the spot when the war began. Nicole Lucas was still in Belgrade as a correspondent for Trouw, and Theo Engelen in Ljubljana for NRC Handelsblad. The last article from Belgrade by Ulrike Rudberg, who had been a correspondent for De Volkskrant in the Serbian capital since 1988, appeared in that paper on 7 July 1992.²⁸⁹⁷

The Dutch journalists in the region were also much more inclined to take a stand in the conflict in Bosnia than during the war in Croatia the previous year. Harold Doornbos, correspondent for Zuid-Oost Pers and Radio 1, commented: 'It is not that I would defend the Bosnian government, but in the broad political spectrum they are in the right. It has been a war with a clear aggressor.'²⁸⁹⁸ Herman van Gelderen, who worked for RTL Nieuws, thought that it was 'completely understandable' that he supported the Bosnian Muslims, considering how they had been victimized: 'Besides, the Croats were on the wrong side in the Second World War and the Serbs were communists. In that sense you do have prejudices and I had little affinity with those two parties. That may be a subconscious factor in your reports.'²⁸⁹⁹ At the end of 1992, radio reporter Dulmers took a strange decision for a reporter: he decided not to report the unloading of weapons destined for Croats and Muslims from an Iranian plane at the Zagreb airport, which constituted a violation of the UN embargo: 'At that time the relations [between the conflicting parties] were so lop-sided that I thought it was relevant not to report it.'²⁹⁰⁰

From June on reports on refugees from Bosnia also started to feature in the Dutch press. Articles appeared about the refugee camps and buildings in Croatia, where by the beginning of June more than a quarter of a million refugees from Bosnia had already been received. The topic led to graphic descriptions of gym halls where the air conditioning was unable to dispel 'the stifling stench', of the insufficient number of showers and toilets and of excrement lying around.²⁹⁰¹ The refugee stories were a godsend to the journalists in the region, who had always found it very difficult to describe the complexity of the conflicts in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. Thanks to the refugees, the war even came closer. Dutch journalists scoured the asylum seekers' centres in their own country in search of newsworthy stories. The human interest element in the reports on the former Yugoslavia rose.²⁹⁰² In the NOS news bulletins supplementary reports on human suffering made their appearance at the same

²⁸⁹⁷ Ulrike Rudberg, 'Wat heeft u eigenlijk bij ons in Belgrado te zoeken?' ('What are you actually doing here in Belgrade?'), de Volkskrant, 07/07/92.

²⁸⁹⁸ Quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 263.

²⁸⁹⁹ Quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 263.

²⁹⁰⁰ Karskens, Pleisters, p. 263.

²⁹⁰¹ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Ondanks de air conditioning stinkt het' ('In spite of the air conditioning, it stinks'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/06/92. See also Nicole Lucas, 'Laat ons, we hebben te veel meegemaakt' ('Leave us alone, we've been through too much'), Trouw, 01/07/92.

²⁹⁰² See for example Alfred van Cleef, 'Ik wil niet doden en ik wil niet gedood worden' ('I don't want to kill and I don't want to be killed'), NRC Handelsblad, 13/06/92; id., 'De trein rijdt weg en niemand zwaait' ('The train is leaving and nobody is waving'), NRC Handelsblad, 21/07/92; 'Het gezin Alihagic heeft alleen nog wat foto's' ('The Alihagic family has only a few photos left'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/07/92; Harm van den Berg, 'Bosniërs overnachten in bus' (Bosnians spend the night in coach), NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/92; id., 'Vluchtelingen Sheila niet gerust op vertrek uit Bosnië' ('Refugee Sheila feels anxious about leaving Bosnia'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/07/92; Anneke Visser, 'Ik ben ongelukkig want mijn vader is nog aan het front' ('I am unhappy, because my father is still at the front'), NRC Handelsblad, 03/08/92; Jan Sloothaak, 'Berooid en vermoeid, maar veilig in Zeewolde' ('Destitute and weary, but safe in Zeewolde'), Trouw, 03/08/92; 'Serviërs hebben mijn hele dorp afgeslacht' ('Serbs massacred my whole village'), Trouw, 04/08/92; 'Ontheemde Bosniërs zwerven opgejaagd rond door Europa' ('Homeless Bosnians roam anxiously around Europe'), de Volkskrant, 21/07/92; Ineke Jungschleger, 'Janny zwerft al sinds half april' ('Janny has been wandering around since mid-April'), de Volkskrant, 31/07/92; Rob Gollin, 'Bosniërs veilig, maar te moe om blij te zijn' ('Bosnians safe, but too tired to be glad'), de Volkskrant, 03/08/92; Frans van Deijl, 'Ik hou van jou, mijn Bosnië' ('I love you, my Bosnia'), HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, pp. 24-27.

time as the streams of refugees²⁹⁰³ and the current affairs programmes on television also devoted a great deal of attention to the refugees.²⁹⁰⁴

When the Dutch media sent reports of their own from Bosnia, almost all of them came from Sarajevo. Of the three major daily newspapers, NRC Handelsblad, De Volkskrant and Trouw, it was Trouw that made the most exceptions to this pattern. For example, after Mostar was proclaimed capital of Herceg-Bosna, the Croat community in Bosnia, Nicole Lucas sent reports from there. One of her reports on that city opened with the sentence: 'Only the old bridge, from which daredevils used to jump down into the Neretva for a few cents, does not need to be removed from the travel books.'²⁹⁰⁵ Sixteen months later that bridge too was bombarded into rubble. Another report in Trouw about the situation elsewhere in Bosnia was a short article pointing out to the reader that although it had been the siege of Sarajevo that had led to the most indignation in the West up to that point, the East Bosnian town of Gorazde, where 70,000 people had been packed together under heavy artillery fire for three months, was 'possibly the symbol of the greatest horrors of the conflict' and looked like becoming a second Vukovar.²⁹⁰⁶ In Gorazde, according to a Bosnian observer who was quoted, there was by then 'nothing left to destroy'.²⁹⁰⁷ From the end of July on, reports by the British war correspondent Maggie O'Kane appeared in De Volkskrant, providing information about the fortunes of the encircled town of Gorazde and about Foca, which had been 'cleansed'.²⁹⁰⁸ On 31 July her article about the concentration camps, which had appeared two days previously in The Guardian and had caused such an uproar, also appeared in De Volkskrant.²⁹⁰⁹

Up to the end of July, in the written media there was no significant pressure to intervene in Bosnia-Herzegovina. A commentary by a senior editor in NRC Handelsblad on 16 June still voiced the opinion that it was 'almost hopeless' for the outside world to undertake anything in the former Yugoslavia: 'conferences mean time gain for conflicting parties and sanctions make warring leaders popular rather than controversial in their own countries'. According to this newspaper, an intervention force would soon be compelled to fly for safety itself. 'The conclusion is that the outside world cannot influence conflicts such as that in the former Yugoslavia (...), except by giving the conflicting parties the opportunity to talk and to offer humanitarian aid. Apart from that the outside world – unfortunately – is helpless.'²⁹¹⁰

De Volkskrant had struck a note in favour of intervention a few days earlier. If the sanctions had no effect, then according to an editorial of 13 June the time for military intervention was approaching. De Volkskrant took a stand against the idea that for troops from other countries Sarajevo was not worth dying for because there were no vested interests. 'It reminds one,' the newspaper reprimanded supporters of this idea, 'of the discussion just before the Second World War about dying for Danzig, the free city claimed by Nazi Germany. That was not necessary either, the European democracies thought at the time. That conclusion was morally reprehensible and turned out to be politically short-sighted. The same is true of Sarajevo today.'²⁹¹¹ The newspaper supported the EC decision made in ²⁹⁰³ Willemse, Joegoslavië, p. 213.

²⁹⁰⁴ IKON, Kenmerk, 20/06/92; EO, Tijdsein, 07/07/92; NCRV, Hier en Nu, 20/07/92; Veronica, Nieuwslijn, 30/07/92 and 06/08/92; KRO, Brandpunt, 02/08/92.

²⁹⁰⁵ Nicole Lucas, 'Mostar is geen bezienswaardigheid meer' ('Mostar is no longer a place worth seeing'), 08/07/92. See also Nicole Lucas, 'In tijd van oorlog' ('In times of war'), Trouw, 25/07/92.

²⁹⁰⁶ 'Niemand kent Gorazde, maar het is er erger dan in Sarajevo' ('Nobody knows Gorazde, but it's worse there than in Sarajevo'), Trouw, 16/07/92.

²⁹⁰⁷ 'EG en VN pogen vredesoverleg Joegoslavië te coördineren' ('EC and UN attempt to coordinate peace talks Yugoslavia'), Trouw, 24/07/92.

²⁹⁰⁸ See for example Maggie O'Kane, 'Gorazde wordt tweede Vukovar' ('Gorazde is becoming a second Vukovar'), de Volkskrant, 24/07/92; id., 'Welkom in Foca, 'gereinigd' van Bosnische Islamieten' ('Welcome to Foca, "cleansed" of Bosnian Muslims'), de Volkskrant, 28/07/92.

²⁹⁰⁹ Maggie O'Kane, 'De school is nu een concentratiekamp voor Islamieten' ('The school is now a concentration camp for Muslims'), de Volkskrant, 31/07/92.

²⁹¹⁰ 'Twee burgeroorlogen' ('Two civil wars'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/06/92.

²⁹¹¹ 'Sterven voor Sarajevo' ('Dying for Sarajevo'), de Volkskrant, 13/06/92.

Lisbon at the end of June: ‘The international community will not be able to put an end to the civil war by means of military action. The situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina, with its three population groups and different militias, is too complicated for that. But the international community does have the moral duty to rescue the 300,000 inhabitants of Sarajevo, if necessary with the help of military force.’²⁹¹² A month later an editorial in De Volkskrant said it was ‘understandable’ that the major powers did not want to deploy ground troops to intervene in Bosnia-Hercegovina, but according to the newspaper they could try to eliminate the Serb artillery from the air. And they should also ensure a complete sea and air blockade.²⁹¹³

There were few opinion articles in the major Dutch newspapers in the months of June and July 1992. Those that did appear were often by foreigners. It is striking that in this phase Serbs were allowed to voice their opinions in the Dutch opinion pages, complaining about the UN embargo.²⁹¹⁴ De Volkskrant even gave ample space to the foreign affairs adviser of the Yugoslav president Cosic, Svetozar Stojanovic, stating only that the author was ‘a Serbian sociologist’.²⁹¹⁵ Stojanovic said that it was ‘incomprehensible that of all peoples the Serbs, who had lived through a horrific genocide, now had to sacrifice itself for higher interests and yield voluntarily. Was it not much more the case that a people which has undergone a lot like this had earned a special status and special guarantees from the international community?’²⁹¹⁶

On 3 July it was again Hylke Tromp who called for intervention. He declared himself against a step-by-step approach, beginning with military supervision of humanitarian convoys. In his opinion the politics of Belgrade needed to be changed and this would only be possible if the same overwhelming force was used as that used against Iraq a year earlier. He thought it was not impossible that Milosevic would then make the best of a bad job and yield before military operations actually began.²⁹¹⁷

Hylke Tromp’s brother Bart thought that if the West did not undertake military intervention, the war in the former Yugoslavia would escalate into a third ‘real Balkan war which would eclipse the preceding ones in size, duration and consequences’.²⁹¹⁸

The existence of camps in the framework of ethnic cleansing was initially ignored in the Netherlands, as elsewhere. For example, Volkskrant reporter Hans Moleman had seen long lists in Sarajevo of missing Muslims who had been killed or imprisoned in camps. He did nothing about them. ‘Somehow or other everybody ignored those lists. Why was that? I think because as a journalist there you spent the whole day organizing things, to survive as a journalist and to write your stories of that moment. At that time you didn’t have the perspective.’²⁹¹⁹ EO reporter Emerson Vermaat knew of another reason why journalists like himself did not visit the camps: ‘Even if you knew where they were. You just didn’t get there. Your guide is scared and he charges four hundred German marks a day and that is a lot for the budget.’ Moreover, the EO reporter was hampered by the prejudices of his editors. Programme maker Feike ter Velde was not so interested in crimes against Muslims, he told Vermaat: ‘Those Serbs are Christians too, aren’t they? Must you take the side of the Muslims?’²⁹²⁰ The stand taken by the EO editors was unique. At other newsrooms in the Netherlands the war in Bosnia was ‘a handle (...) for all sorts of moral views’, but certainly not in favour of the Serbs. According to NRC ²⁹¹² ‘Lissabon en Sarajevo’ (‘Lisbon and Sarajevo’), de Volkskrant, 29/06/92.

²⁹¹³ ‘Stop verdrijving’ (‘Stop expulsion’), de Volkskrant, 29/07/92.

²⁹¹⁴ See for example Slavko Curuvija, ‘Isolment van Servië is geen oplossing’ (‘Isolating Serbia is not a solution’), NRC Handelsblad, 25/06/92.

²⁹¹⁵ Nevenka Tromp-Vrkic pointed out this omission, ‘Servische politiek is zelf debet aan slecht imago in de wereld’ (Serbian politicians have themselves to blame for their bad image in the world’), NRC Handelsblad, 16/07/92.

²⁹¹⁶ Svetozar Stojanovic, ‘Het Westen sluit de ogen voor de rampspoed van Servië’ (‘The West turns a blind eye to the misfortunes of Serbia’), de Volkskrant, 29/06/92.

²⁹¹⁷ Hylke Tromp, ‘Conflict Joegoslavië vraagt om herhaling van Desert Storm’ (‘Conflict in Yugoslavia requires a repetition of Desert Storm’), de Volkskrant, 03/07/92.

²⁹¹⁸ Bart Tromp, ‘Derde Balkanoorlog is in voorbereiding’ (‘Third Balkan war is in preparation’), Het Parool, 25/07/92.

²⁹¹⁹ Moleman, quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 261.

²⁹²⁰ Vermaat, quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 261.

Handelsblad correspondent Raymond van den Boogaard there were times when the editors regarded any query as to the Muslims being in the right as ‘suspicious’.²⁹²¹

The reports about the camps had not escaped the notice of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but their reaction was extremely cautious. On 4 August the management of the Information Service had suggested to Van Walsum, Director-General of Political Affairs should say that officials of the Ministry in contacts with the press – if asked – that the Dutch government was ‘deeply concerned’ about the press reports of human rights abuses in ‘prison camps in the former Yugoslavia’. However, it was added that there were no data ‘which can be regarded as conclusive evidence’. According to the draft statement, the government appealed to ‘the parties in the conflict’ to give the UNHCR and the Red Cross access to the camps. The draft’s absolute neutrality with respect to the conflicting parties was at least as remarkable as the cautious wording.²⁹²²

This was soon to change. On the same day, 4 August, the NOS television news bulletin broadcast an interview with the Bosnian UN Ambassador Muhamed Sacirbey, in which he said that Serbs were torturing Croats and Muslims in ‘concentration camps’.²⁹²³ The next day the CDA MP Jaap De Hoop Scheffer, who had seen the television pictures from his holiday accommodation in North Brabant (Netherlands), requested a debate with the Ministers Van den Broek, Ter Beek, D’Ancona (Welfare, Health and Culture) and Junior Minister Kosto (Justice), the last two because they shared responsibility for the relief of refugees. De Hoop Scheffer thought that interrupting the summer recess ‘pales into insignificance in relation to the barbaric situation in the region concerned, as expressed in phenomena such as concentration camps, ethnic cleansing and apartheid politics’.²⁹²⁴ He wanted to exchange ideas with the government about the deployment of Dutch armed forces in UN operations ‘to alleviate the unfathomable human tragedy in the Balkans’.²⁹²⁵ In his opinion, the Dutch government should be prepared to co-operate with ‘unorthodox solutions’.²⁹²⁶ However, he was opposed to deploying ground troops, which would have to consist of half a million troops who would have to operate in wooded and mountainous territory, in a complex conflict with numerous parties. ‘Besides, the war has strong religious overtones. You can’t solve it.’²⁹²⁷

One of the topics De Hoop Scheffer wanted to raise in the debate with the government was the possibility of creating ‘places of refuge (...) in the region itself’.²⁹²⁸ This idea was beginning to find wide support among Dutch politicians. On 4 August, even before the interview with Sacirbey was broadcast, PvdA MP Valk had argued in favour of solving the refugee problem by creating ‘safety zones’, on the lines of those for the Kurds in northern Iraq.²⁹²⁹ In the same broadcast Frits Bolkestein, leader of the VVD parliamentary party in the Parliament, had said in response to reports of the existence of concentration camps in the former Yugoslavia that if sending international observers could not put an end to these abuses, the United Nations would have to intervene actively: ‘Surely you cannot accept the fact that people are slaughtering each other on a large scale without trying to do anything about it.’²⁹³⁰ Valk did not want to rule out the use of force in setting up the safe zones.²⁹³¹ On 7 August, the day after the ITN pictures had been broadcast, Ria De Bruijn Beckers, chairman of the GroenLinks (Green Left) parliamentary party in the Parliament, said she was in favour of deploying military resources to ²⁹²¹ Quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p. 264.

²⁹²² ABZ, arch-DVL/BZ. Memorandum from DVL/Foreign Affairs to DGPZ via DEU/OE, 04/08/92, no. 838/92.

²⁹²³ NOS-T.V. Journal, 04/08/92.

²⁹²⁴ TK, 1991-1992, 22181, no. 22, p. 1; see also Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 05/08/92, 12.05pm; ‘Kamerleden terug van vakantie voor Joegoslavië-debat’ (‘MPs back from holidays for Yugoslavia debate’), de Volkskrant, 06/08/92.

²⁹²⁵ ‘Kamerleden terug van vakantie voor Joegoslavië-debat’, de Volkskrant, 06/08/92.

²⁹²⁶ Rob Meines, ‘Verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië’ (‘Dissension over intervention in Bosnia’), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/91.

²⁹²⁷ ‘Kamerleden terug van vakantie voor Joegoslavië-debat’, de Volkskrant, 06/08/92.

²⁹²⁸ Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 05/08/92, 12.05pm.

²⁹²⁹ Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 04/08/92, 5.05pm.

²⁹³⁰ Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 04/08/92, 5.05pm.

²⁹³¹ Rob Meines, ‘Verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië’, NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

create safety zones, and also referred to the Kurds in northern Iraq. She was also in favour of using military force to ensure the safety of food convoys and to liberate the concentration camps.²⁹³²

The pictures in the Netherlands

In the Netherlands Gutman's article about the Omarska and Brcko camps, published in Newsday on 2 August, attracted a great deal of attention.²⁹³³ However, in NRC Handelsblad Peter Michielsen warned that caution should be observed. Reports about 'concentration camps' where Serbs were detaining thousands or possibly even tens of thousands of civilians, and where torture, starvation and summary executions were said to take place, had been circulating for many months, he wrote. 'That the concentration camps are there has no longer been doubted by anyone for a long time', but there was no concrete proof of brutalities having taken place in them.²⁹³⁴ Notwithstanding the lack of proof, it may be regarded as striking that the NRC Handelsblad had not previously devoted any attention to the reports about camps.

On 7 August many newspapers placed photos from the ITN broadcast on their front pages.²⁹³⁵ It can be safely said that there was a huge increase of attention for the war in Bosnia. For example, the time devoted to the former Yugoslavia in the current affairs programmes on Dutch television soared after the ITN pictures. In the preceding period the subject of Yugoslavia was raised six times per month in these programmes, whereas in August 1992 this was suddenly 19 times (see Table 1). In the major newspapers more than twice as many articles appeared in August as compared with the average per month over 1992.²⁹³⁶

Table 1: number of times attention was devoted to the former Yugoslavia in current affairs programmes on Dutch television, 1991-1993²⁹³⁷

2 nd half 1991	35	September 1992	11
January 1992	-	October 1992	6
February 1992	2	November 1992	2
March 1992	2	December 1992	8
April 1992	4	January 1993	8
May 1992	6	February 1993	13
June 1992	6	March 1993	7
July 1992	6	April 1993	5
August 1992	19

According to Kees Schaepman, journalist of the weekly Vrij Nederland, 'the desire to teach the ex-Yugoslavs, and especially the Serbs, a lesson, only really flared up after the television pictures of thin men behind barbed wire. Concentration camps!²⁹³⁸ In retrospect, Dutch politicians and civil servants also believed that 'the pictures of Omarska' (which were really of Trnopolje) had been of great ²⁹³² Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 0708/92, 12.04pm.

²⁹³³ 'Rode Kruis eist toegang tot kampen Bosnië' ('Red Cross demands access to camps in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 03/08/92; 'Opschudding over concentratiekampen' ('Uprouar over concentration camps'), NRC Handelsblad, 03/08/92.

²⁹³⁴ Peter Michielsen, 'Excessen in Bosnië: wel aanwijzingen, maar geen bewijzen' ('Excesses in Bosnia: indications, but no proof'), NRC Handelsblad, 03/08/92.

²⁹³⁵ On that day Trouw placed a photo of a starving child in Somalia on the front page, 'Somalië, 1992' ('Somalia, 1992'), Trouw, 07/08/92. The photo of Fikret Alic and his fellow-sufferers appeared on the front page the next day, 'Levende geraamtes in gevangenkamp' ('Live skeletons in prison camp'), Trouw, 08/08/92.

²⁹³⁶ Appendix Scholten & Ruigrok & Heerman, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten (They are shooting in Sarajevo), p. 195, appendix on the CD-ROM that goes with the Dutch version of this report.

²⁹³⁷ Based on Willemse, Joegoslavië, pp. 244-257. The programmes included in the survey were: Aktua (TROS); Brandpunt (KRO); Diogenes (VPRO); Hier en Nu (NCRV); Kenmerk (IKON); Nieuwslijn (Veronica); Televisier (AVRO); and Tijdsein (EO).

²⁹³⁸ Kees Schaepman, 'De vredeshaviken willen actie' ('The peace hawks want action'), Vrij Nederland, 19/09/92.

influence on public opinion with respect to the conflict in Bosnia. According to the then vice-premier Wim Kok they had ‘a tremendous catalytic, galvanizing effect’.²⁹³⁹

The pictures came as a shock, often bringing memories of the Second World War to the surface. For example, for Bishop Bär of Rotterdam, and Bishop of the Army, they evoked memories of the time he himself had spent in a Japanese camp during the Second World War. He said on the radio that the ‘civilian internment camps (...) just [had to be] removed by the international community with all its might’.²⁹⁴⁰ In HP/De Tijd, Gerard Driehuis spoke of ‘the Dachau-like pictures from the Serb concentration camps’.²⁹⁴¹ The SGP (one of the Christian parties) MP B.J. van der Vlies found it ‘shocking (...) to have it confirmed by real pictures through the media that not so very far from our country concentration camps have been set up again’. And at the very moment, he wrote in the party paper, that there was an invitation lying on his desk from the PTT (Dutch Post Office) to attend the ceremony marking the issue of a postage stamp commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the first deportation trains from the camp at Westerbork.²⁹⁴²

In the Nederlands Dagblad a photo collage from the Second World War was placed to accompany an article about the crisis in Yugoslavia, with the caption: ‘The atrocious misery of the concentration camps of the Second World War: category once but never again’.²⁹⁴³ The article pointed out that before the broadcast of these pictures, Dutch public opinion had been fairly unmoved by television images of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. ‘Just like the weather and sports, they were part of the ritual of news bulletins.’ What was going on in Somalia and the Central Asian republics of the former Soviet Union, for example, was no less terrible, said the paper, ‘until last week Auschwitz, Birkenau and Sobibor loomed on the screen again.’ According to the paper, the pictures had touched on Dutch feelings of guilt in relation to minorities, caused by the Second World War. It may have been ‘a very sound feeling, but it has very little to do with the actual situation in Yugoslavia. It strikes at the self-image of the West – and of the Netherlands in particular – as a model of peacefulness, progressiveness and tolerance’.²⁹⁴⁴

Stichting 40-45, an organization involved in providing aid for people who had been in the resistance and war victims, wrote a letter to the government because of the similarities between the pictures shown and the experiences of the Second World War. Social workers employed by this organization were confronted with problems their clients had with the pictures. The deputy director of the organization, Koolster, hoped that at least there would be a rapid solution to the problems in Yugoslavia, because this time nobody could say, as they had in the 1930s with respect to German Jewish refugees: ‘We did not know’.²⁹⁴⁵

In favour of intervention or against?

In response to the pictures from Trnopolje, the media in the Netherlands also flung themselves into the problem of: ‘To intervene or not?’ One device employed by the weeklies in particular to contribute to the discussion was to consult various ‘experts’, asking them whether or not they thought there should be military intervention. This rather unspecified question usually produced a broad spectrum of answers, often making it difficult to attach a conclusion to the summary of collected opinions.

²⁹³⁹ Interviews W. Kok, 08/05/00. Similar information in interviews with J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00 and E. van Middelkoop, 08/10/99.

²⁹⁴⁰ Radio 2, AVRO, Radiojournaal, 09/08/92, 1.04pm; see also Kees Schaeapman, ‘De vredeshaviken willen actie’, Vrij Nederland, 19/09/92.

²⁹⁴¹ Gerard Driehuis, ‘De leed-formule’ (‘The suffering-formula’), HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, p. 7.

²⁹⁴² B.J. van der Vlies, ‘Kort en bondig’ (‘Short and snappy’), De Banier, 20/08/92, p. 5.

²⁹⁴³ Willem Bouwman, ‘Wijzelf staan op het spel; actie is geboden’ (‘We ourselves are at stake; action is needed’), Nederlands Dagblad, 15/08/92.

²⁹⁴⁴ Willem Bouwman, ‘Wijzelf staan op het spel; actie is geboden’, Nederlands Dagblad, 15/08/92.

²⁹⁴⁵ Radio 1, NOS, Radio Olympia, 14/08/92, 12.04pm.

The first category of experts consisted of military or ex-military staff, mostly retired generals. Although Resolution 770, which was passed on 13 August, authorized the use of force to support humanitarian operations, interviews with Dutch ex-military staff indicated that they were not enthusiastic about this idea. Firstly it was not clear to them what goal the international community was aiming to achieve in Yugoslavia.²⁹⁴⁶ ‘Protecting a convoy is not a goal’, said ex-Commander of the Royal Netherlands Army and former Chief of Defence Staff General C. de Jager.²⁹⁴⁷ Retired General H. Roos, who had been Army Commander until 1985, thought that it was not only a clear objective that was missing; there was also no ‘worst case scenario’ in case the Serbs continued to fight for a long period. A second objection of the ex-military staff had to do with the restrictions imposed on the use of force by the UN military. ‘There is no such thing as waging a little bit of war’, said De Jager. Roos objected to a mandate which did not authorize ‘peace enforcing’. He had himself been active in Lebanon, where restricting action to peacekeeping had led to UNIFIL being compelled to leave prematurely: ‘A built-in ceiling as far as the use of force is concerned is always dangerous.’²⁹⁴⁸ The former Commander of the First Army Corps, Lieutenant General (retired) W.J. Loos, also believed that restricted intervention was impossible. If corridors for humanitarian convoys needed to be made safe, then force had to be authorized to control the flanking territory. A third objection of the ex-military staff derived from the approach they favoured: they thought there were too few troops available. If half a million troops who had been able to be deployed and trained in peace and quiet had been needed to liberate Kuwait, ‘a bare expanse of sand’, then in Bosnia, in view of the nature of the terrain, considerably more would be needed, said Loos.²⁹⁴⁹ Lieutenant Colonel I. Duine, tactics lecturer at the Royal Military Academy (KMA) in Breda (Netherlands), thought that the territory surrounding the last twenty kilometres of the road from Split to Sarajevo, which were in the hands of the Serbs, were perfectly suited to guerrilla operations. The deployment of planes and helicopters by the West would certainly not stop Bosnian Serb fighters from carrying them out. For example, they would be able to lay mines at night.²⁹⁵⁰ The former military attaché in Belgrade, the retired Colonel S.W. Schouten, foresaw a dilemma in establishing the number of troops that needed to be deployed: if too few troops were deployed, then the West would run military risks; if too many were deployed, then the resistance of the parties in the conflict would rise in proportion.²⁹⁵¹ It was difficult to advise those who did want intervention. General Berkhof said, ‘I think we should intervene, but I haven’t the faintest idea how’.²⁹⁵²

Of 11 Korea veterans whom Vrij Nederland asked for their opinions on military intervention, the majority also reacted negatively. One of these was the former military attaché in Belgrade J. Bor, who commented: ‘Let’s start digging graves, because any military involvement in Yugoslavia will be a disaster.’ According to him, in Bosnia-Herzegovina alone there were six different armies, which would be out to get hold of the UN military’s equipment. Others spoke of ‘a fatal adventure’ and the danger that UN military troops would become sitting targets.²⁹⁵³

After the pictures of Fikret Alic were broadcast, the Association of National Servicemen (VVDM) expressed the fear that the government might make a rash decision to take part in military intervention on the grounds of the pictures. The VVDM warned that the Dutch national servicemen did not have the training for a ‘guerrilla war’ in the former Yugoslavia and that the risks were still ²⁹⁴⁶ See for example also the military historian Colonel J. Schulten in NOS Laat, 12/08/92.

²⁹⁴⁷ Remco Meijer, ‘Een harde job’ (‘A hard job’), Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 33, in which similar remarks were also recorded by the retired Lieutenant General W.J. Loos.

²⁹⁴⁸ Remco Meijer, ‘Een harde job’, Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 31.

²⁹⁴⁹ Remco Meijer, ‘Een harde job’, Elsevier, 22/08/92, pp. 31-32.

²⁹⁵⁰ Hans Moleman, ‘Krachtiger VN-optreden in Bosnië riskante onderneming’ (‘More forceful UN action in Bosnia dangerous undertaking’), de Volkskrant, 11/08/92.

²⁹⁵¹ Remco Meijer, ‘Een harde job’, Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 32.

²⁹⁵² ‘Ingrijpen of niet?’, Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 30.

²⁹⁵³ EV, ‘Militair ingrijpen. Was het de moeite waard?’ (‘Military intervention. Was it worthwhile?’), Vrij Nederland, 14/08/92, p. 10.

inadequately known.²⁹⁵⁴ Jan Blokker wrote that he had not expected anything else from the national servicemen's lobby, but he wondered when they would have to yield 'to the Tromps, to Van den Broek, to the editorial writer of De Volkskrant, or even to Mient Jan Faber'.²⁹⁵⁵

The Dutch media also devoted plenty of attention to the opinions of the retiring UN Commander General Lewis MacKenzie. According to HP/De Tijd he said that any military intervention, not excluding the supervision of convoys, would lead to 'getting bogged in a quagmire', and 'an escalation of combat and still more deaths'.²⁹⁵⁶ According to Elsevier he thought that to bring peace to Bosnia a million troops would be needed.²⁹⁵⁷

Mixed reactions emerged from diplomatic circles. The former NATO Permanent Representative C.D. Barkman was prepared to go a long way: liberation of the camps if possible, safeguarding humanitarian relief, selective air strikes, supplying arms and Dutch military training for Bosnian Muslims and Kosovo Albanians.²⁹⁵⁸

It turned out that the largest number of advocates of some form of intervention was to be found among scientists, but the majority were 'old hands', people who had argued in favour of intervention at an earlier stage: Voorhoeve and Van den Doel, director and temporary staff member (seconded by the Royal Netherlands Army) of Clingendael respectively, wrote an article in De Volkskrant as early as 5 August under the title 'The Netherlands must take the first step towards action in Bosnia'. It was the clearest and most far-reaching plea for military intervention up to that point, a statement in the true sense of the word. According to them, the 'massacres' were no less heinous than the crimes committed by the Nazis in Poland in 1939. Even if not all the available reports were true, according to these two authors the genocide treaty had been violated, which meant that other countries were bound to intervene.

As was mentioned in Chapter 2, Voorhoeve had already expressed the opinion that this treaty offered grounds for intervention at an earlier stage, namely on 29 June 1991, during the Slovenian war. Since then, according to Voorhoeve and Van den Doel, the EC, the CSCE and the UN had 'failed dismally'. They thought that now at long last 'moral obligations [should] outweigh any objections that might be made against intervention on the grounds of "national sovereignty" or "military risks"'. Military intervention should focus on creating Safe Areas under international supervision protected by lightly armed units, the liberation of prisoners from the 'concentration camps' and safeguarding the supply and distribution of humanitarian aid. Voorhoeve and Van den Doel did not rule out the use of force in ensuring the safety of the refuge areas and the access corridors. They were aware of the heavy demands which would have to be met if the camps were to be liberated: firstly demilitarization of the Serb zones in Croatia, so that operations could be carried out from those areas; the deployment of fighter aircraft to achieve supremacy in the air above Bosnia; and the elimination of artillery and mortar in a wide radius around the area of operations. Then commandos and special forces would have to carry out the operations. Possibly the military intervention would have to be carried out by NATO, the WEU or an ad hoc coalition without the permission of the UN. 'The CSCE will probably not be able to reach an agreement about it either. But crime cannot be fought by paralysis.' If the government in Washington was not willing to take the lead in action of this sort, then the government in Paris would have to do it.²⁹⁵⁹

Elsewhere Voorhoeve also stated that he realized that the liberation of the camps was a difficult job, but that it had to happen: 'With a 100,000 troops rather than 10,000.' And he used an argument

²⁹⁵⁴ 'Van den Broek acht militair ingrijpen in Bosnië noodzakelijk' ('Van den Broek deems military intervention in Bosnia necessary'), de Volkskrant, 08/08/92.

²⁹⁵⁵ Jan Blokker, 'Consistent', de Volkskrant, 11/08/92.

²⁹⁵⁶ Frans van Deijl and Auke Kok, 'Mission impossible', HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p. 18.

²⁹⁵⁷ Remco Meijer, 'Een harde job', Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 32.

²⁹⁵⁸ 'Ingrijpen of niet?' ('To intervene or not?'), Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 30.

²⁹⁵⁹ J.J.C. Voorhoeve & M. van den Doel, 'Nederland moet initiatief nemen tot actie in Bosnië' ('The Netherlands must take the first step towards taking action in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 05/08/92.

which was in fact seldom heard in the Netherlands: he wondered if people realized what the consequences would be for Europe if there was a large group of Muslims without a homeland but with the support of Islamic countries²⁹⁶⁰ In other words: did Europe want a second PLO?²⁹⁶¹ At the end of August, in an opinion article written jointly with Clingendael staff member R. Apeslagh, Voorhoeve added another point to his action list, namely that a Safe Area should be set up in Vojvodina to protect the Hungarian population there.²⁹⁶²

In August 1992 Voorhoeve became the champion interventionist, publishing numerous articles. One of the most striking features of his articles is the tone used towards other countries. In this sense too Voorhoeve was in the forefront. As it became increasingly clear that the governments in other countries wanted something quite different from the interventionists in the Netherlands, their attitude towards other countries soured. For example, Voorhoeve criticized the 'weak' foreign politics of the United States in recent times. Prime Minister John Major of the United Kingdom, 'the greatest obstructionist', was 'hypocritical'. If, as he said, the situation in Bosnia was comparable with that in Northern Ireland and was therefore not suitable for intervention, then the British troops should also withdraw from Northern Ireland, according to Voorhoeve.²⁹⁶³

Clingendael staff member Van den Doel had done an about-face, from being against to being in favour of military intervention. In June and July he had still been opposed to intervention. In June he had pointed out that in his view this conflict, which was taking place in a wooded and mountainous territory, had the character of guerrilla warfare, which made ground operations difficult, whereas they were exactly what would be needed. In his opinion, using only naval blockades and air strikes would not lead to results. It was not clear what solution they were expected to achieve. On the other hand, he did not believe that the West would be able to supply enough troops for a ground operation.²⁹⁶⁴ Even in July he had impressed upon supporters of military intervention that an analogy between the conditions in Kuwait during the Gulf War and the situation in the former Yugoslavia was false. In his opinion the situation in Yugoslavia was different, for example, because there was not just one opponent, but many warring groups, which moreover would not obey Milosevic; the terrain was mountainous and wooded rather than a sandpit; and according to him the fighters in Yugoslavia used guerrilla methods which could only be combated by Russian and American elite troops. At that stage he had therefore still thought it would be better for the West to limit itself to psychological warfare.²⁹⁶⁵ At the beginning of August he no longer ruled out 'limited, humanitarian action which could be executed very rapidly'. Like his director Voorhoeve, he became a fervent supporter of such action.²⁹⁶⁶

Oostlander on the other hand was a veteran interventionist. He proposed European military actions from the air and the sea with simultaneous material support from the Bosnian government ²⁹⁶⁰ 'Ingrijpen of niet?', Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 30. See also J.J.C. Voorhoeve & M. van den Doel, 'Argumenten tegen ingrijpen in Bosnië zijn niet sterk' ('Arguments against intervention in Bosnia are not strong'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92.

²⁹⁶¹ Voorhoeve, quoted in: Caroline de Gruyter, 'Wachten op een Churchill' ('Waiting for a Churchill'), Elsevier, 15/08/92, p. 32.

²⁹⁶² R. Apeslagh & J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 'Westen moet uitbreiding van burgeroorlog voorkomen' ('West must prevent expansion of civil war'), de Volkskrant, 27/08/92.

²⁹⁶³ Alexander Münninghoff & Martijn Delaere, 'De Serviërs gedragen zich als de nazi's' ('The Serbs behave like Nazis'), Haagsche Courant, 08/08/92.

²⁹⁶⁴ Michiel Zonneveld, 'Actie in Joegoslavië kan jaren duren' ('Action in Yugoslavia may take years'), Het Parool, 10/06/92.

²⁹⁶⁵ M. van den Doel, 'Koewit en Joegoslavië zijn onvergelykbaar' ('Kuwait and Yugoslavia are incomparable'), de Volkskrant, 07/07/92. For another reaction to Hylke Tromp's article, see Wil van Daalen, 'Militaire interventie zal Joegoslavië niet helpen' ('Military intervention will not help Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 08/07/92: 'Als ik dergelijke taal lees, staat mijn verstand stil en zou ik bijna terug gaan verlangen naar het machtsevenwicht van de Koude Oorlog.' ('When I read language like this, my mind freezes and I would almost like to return to the Cold War power balance').

²⁹⁶⁶ Laurent Heere, 'Militaire actie in Bosnië onvermijdelijk' ('Military action in Bosnia inevitable'), Rotterdams Dagblad, 06/08/92; id., 'Tijd van praten is voorbij' ('Time for talking is over'), Haagsche Courant, 07/08/92. See also M. van den Doel, 'Verkeerd signaal VN aan Servië' ('Wrong signal from UN to Serbia'), Het Parool, 17/08/92; M. van den Doel, 'Westen dient snel te interveniëren in conflict Balkan' ('West must intervene rapidly in Balkan conflict'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/08/92; Laurent Heere, 'Militaire actie in Bosnië onvermijdelijk', Rotterdams Dagblad, 06/08/92.

troops. ‘The Netherlands has not been a trend setting nation for a long time, but there is nothing wrong with taking the lead to some extent with a view to convincing our EC colleagues.’²⁹⁶⁷ And the main editorial of De Volkskrant on 13 August asserted that in fact the Netherlands could and should exert influence, as it had when the placement of cruise missiles had been an issue.²⁹⁶⁸ Jan Blokker had the impression that the desire to lead the way was mainly in the interest of domestic goals: ‘The Netherlands is very good, from wall to wall – perhaps with a tiny exception in the case of Green Left: this is the great consolation for what is going on in Yugoslavia – that as far as collective moral indignation is concerned we have not been left completely empty-handed after communism’.²⁹⁶⁹

Koen Koch thought he could detect a similar need for self-congratulation in a certain complacency surrounding the willingness of private citizens to take in refugees. He was not much in favour of military intervention: now that ethnic cleansing by the Bosnian Serbs was apparently almost complete, intervention would come too late.²⁹⁷⁰ Columnist Paul Scheffer compared “‘limited” intervention (...) to at best wishful thinking, at worst a cheap salving of people’s own consciences’.²⁹⁷¹ Bart Tromp thought that military intervention had become ‘inevitable’ after the television pictures of Serb prison camps.²⁹⁷² Because he was apparently not completely sure of this inevitability, he summed up seven consequences of failure to intervene: the war in Croatia would be resumed, because Serb aggression in Bosnia was also a threat to Croatia; acceptance of the partitioning of Bosnia-Herzegovina would have consequences for the situation in Kosovo; the Islamic world would blame the Western world for negligence; Turkey would get involved in the matter, so that there would be a threat of confrontation with Greece; the example of ethnic cleansing might be imitated in the countries of the former Soviet Union; and finally the pretensions of the European Community, the United Nations and the new world order would receive a blow.²⁹⁷³ Hylke Tromp thought that only an ultimatum imposed on all conflicting parties in the form of the threat of ‘total deployment of military resources’ might still lead to a ceasefire in Bosnia. Anything else, starting with Resolution 770, would lead to prolonged bloodshed.²⁹⁷⁴

Of the newspapers NRC Handelsblad, Trouw and De Volkskrant, the last continued to be the most fervent supporter of more radical intervention. The senior editorial commentary of the De Volkskrant voiced the opinion that military protection of humanitarian convoys only, as laid down in Resolution 770, was not enough. The newspaper warned that the action taken might prove to be ‘too little, too late’²⁹⁷⁵ and said that in passing Resolution 770 the Security Council had behaved like the mountain that had brought forth a mouse.²⁹⁷⁶

De Volkskrant journalist Anet Bleich joined the interventionists again. Although she admitted that she was ‘no authority on the military metier’, in her opinion the answer to the question of what the international community, and Europe in particular, should do with regard to Bosnia-Herzegovina was ‘devastatingly simple’: an end should be put to the war by deploying military resources ‘on as large a scale as necessary’.²⁹⁷⁷

²⁹⁶⁷ Arie M. Oostlander, ‘Europa moet in Bosnië geweten laten spreken’ (‘Europe must follow conscience in Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 11/08/92. See also Arie M. Oostlander, ‘Scenario van de jaren dertig’ (‘1930s scenario’), Trouw, 07/08/92.

²⁹⁶⁸ ‘Nederlandse keuze’ (‘Dutch choice’), de Volkskrant, 13/08/93.

²⁹⁶⁹ Jan Blokker, ‘Dom, slecht, slim’ (‘Stupid, evil, clever’), de Volkskrant, 15/08/92.

²⁹⁷⁰ Koen Koch, ‘Een huis op zand’ (‘A house on sand’), de Volkskrant, 22/08/92.

²⁹⁷¹ Paul Scheffer, ‘Rechtsgevoel tegen nultarief’ (‘A sense of justice at zero rate’), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92.

²⁹⁷² Tromp, Verraad, p. 38.

²⁹⁷³ Tromp, Verraad, pp. 40-41 (19/08/92).

²⁹⁷⁴ Hylke Tromp, ‘Huidig interventiebeleid leidt tot langdurig bloedvergieten’ (‘Present intervention policy will lead to prolonged bloodshed’), de Volkskrant, 14/08/92; Berry Kessels, ‘Beperkt ingrijpen Bosnië wordt ramp’ (‘Limited intervention Bosnia will be a disaster’), De Gelderlander, 13/08/92.

²⁹⁷⁵ ‘Partij kiezen’ (‘Taking sides’), de Volkskrant, 12/08/92.

²⁹⁷⁶ ‘Verstopperij spelen’ (‘Playing hide-and-seek’), de Volkskrant, 15/08/92.

²⁹⁷⁷ Anet Bleich, ‘Partijen Bosnië vechten voor bloed en bodem’ (‘Parties in Bosnia fight for blood and soil’), de Volkskrant, 18/08/92.

Looking over the opinion pages and editorials, nothing much had changed. The arguments in favour of intervention – moral reasons: the risk of escalation to Kosovo or outside the former Yugoslavia; the possibility of creating a precedent for not intervening in situations elsewhere; damage to the image of the EC, the UN and the NATO in particular; reactions from the Islamic world – were for the most part not new. Nor were most of the names of the advocates of intervention. But the frequency of the appearance of interventionist articles had risen sharply. ‘Since the television pictures of the camps in Bosnia two out of three of the Dutch have been in favour of direct military intervention in what was once Yugoslavia. Professors, MPs, columnists make warlike utterances’, as Kees Schaepman summarized the mood in Vrij Nederland. ‘There is only one group that is not so keen: the military, who in choosing their profession must surely have taken the possibility of war into consideration. What good to us are soldiers who are not keen on fighting if that is exactly what we want them to do? (...) It is like an Umwertung aller Werte: the warmongers are professors or MPs, reflection and sense are wearing uniforms.’ Schaepman thought there was a sort of ‘Yugo-storm’ going on in the Netherlands, which reminded him of a stage war: ‘always the same extras, who after walking around in the wings for a while storm onto the stage again to give the impression that a real army is advancing.’²⁹⁷⁸

The Dutch public and the refugee issue

But there was more involved. Both in the days just before and in the weeks after the Trnopolje pictures, the reports of the existence of camps led for the first time to a substantial stream of letters from private individuals being published in papers.²⁹⁷⁹ In general, the letter writers did not understand why ‘the mighty powers of the earth, placed on their thrones of justice and peace by our mandate,’ permitted the daily violation of the most elementary human rights.²⁹⁸⁰ According to Hylke Tromp the Dutch population had taken their politicians in tow: ‘I cannot remember such – rightly – enraged statements about any political conflict whatsoever since 1945.’²⁹⁸¹ However, it was remarkable that a demonstration on the Beursplein in Amsterdam on 14 August, organized by the Yugoslav peace group Mi za Mir, drew fewer than a hundred protesters. The majority of those who did come were Croats, Muslims and Serbs.²⁹⁸²

However, the most important gauge of the Dutch public’s attitude was the reaction to the refugee issue. Like Valk, in the days following the broadcast of the Trnopolje pictures, De Hoop Scheffer declared his support for the admission of more refugees to the Netherlands, as a supplement to the ‘safe havens’ in the region itself.²⁹⁸³ In anticipation of the consultation with the Parliament which De Hoop Scheffer had requested, Minister D’Ancona and Junior Minister Kosto declared that the ²⁹⁷⁸ Kees Schaepman, ‘De vredeshaviken willen actie’, Vrij Nederland, 19/09/92.

²⁹⁷⁹ See for example Jaco Rosenbach, ‘Vluchtelingen’ (‘Refugees’), de Volkskrant, 04/08/92; ‘Geachte redactie, Waarom wordt er niet ingegrepen in Bosnië?’ (‘Why is there no intervention in Bosnia?’), de Volkskrant, 05/08/92; M.J. van Haaster, ‘Servië’ (‘Serbia’), and M. Buurman, ‘Neutraliteit’ (‘Neutrality’), de Volkskrant, 06/08/92; Marcel Buurman, ‘Guerrilla-oorlog’ (‘Guerrilla warfare’), de Volkskrant, 10/08/92; ‘Geachte redactie. Alleen Joegostorm kan overslaan vuur voorkomen’ (‘Only Jugostorm can prevent the fire from spreading’ and ‘Soms geloof je je ogen niet’ (‘Sometimes you cannot believe your eyes’), de Volkskrant, 12/08/92; ‘Wereldbestuurders lieten geweld escaleren’ (‘World leaders allowed violence to escalate’), de Volkskrant, 15/08/92; ‘Geachte redactie. Slachtoffers Servië hebben niks aan ongewapende vredesmacht’ (‘Unarmed peace force is of no use to victims of Serbia’), de Volkskrant, 26/08/92; ‘Brieven’ (‘Letters’), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92 with meaningful headings such as ‘Niks neutraliteit’ (‘No to neutrality’), ‘Holle retoriek’ (‘Hollow rhetoric’), ‘Concentratiekampen’ (‘Concentration camps’), ‘Ingrijpen kan’ (‘Intervention is possible’), ‘Smakeloos’ (‘Tasteless’), ‘München’ (‘Munich’), ‘Geen oliebelangen’ (‘No oil interests’) and ‘Niet zwijgen’ (‘Do not be silent’).

²⁹⁸⁰ André Kusters, ‘Sterven voor Sarajevo’ (‘Dying for Sarajevo’), Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 7. For a detached reaction from a private individual see Koos Nuninga, ‘Joegoslavië is echt geen Koeweit’ (‘Yugoslavia is really not Kuwait’), de Volkskrant, 14/08/92

²⁹⁸¹ Berry Kessels, ‘Beperkt ingrijpen Bosnië wordt ramp’, De Gelderlander, 13/08/92.

²⁹⁸² ‘Joegoslavisch protest’ (‘Yugoslav protest’), de Volkskrant, 15/08/92; ‘Lubbers wil snel troepen sturen naar Bosnië’ (‘Lubbers wants to send troops to Bosnia quickly’), NRC Handelsblad, 15/08/92.

²⁹⁸³ Radio 2, AVRO, Radiojournaal, 09/08/92, 1.04pm.

Dutch government was prepared to accept several thousand extra refugees from the former Yugoslavia.²⁹⁸⁴

The pressure of public opinion to do more for the refugees was great. In August 1992, moved by the pictures in the media, within a fortnight 7000 host families and 3000 volunteers offered their services for the relief of displaced people, in response to a campaign held by the Dutch Refugee Association in consultation with the Ministry of Welfare, Health and Culture, and after a call from the Dutch Bishops and the Dutch Deaconate of the Reformed churches.²⁹⁸⁵ Town councils and housing corporations also made housing available.²⁹⁸⁶ By mid-August, according to a questionnaire presented by the broadcasting company Veronica, as many as 1.9 million people were prepared to take Yugoslavs into their homes.²⁹⁸⁷ Later it turned out that most of the refugees preferred central accommodation amidst fellow refugees, so that in the long run only 230 of the offers made by host families were taken up, by a total of six hundred former Yugoslavs.²⁹⁸⁸ In almost all of these cases considerable irritation and tension arose between the host families and their guests. Of those 230 families, 170 gave up after three months, partly on the advice of the Dutch Refugee Council, partly at their own request. The refugees who had been staying with these host families then returned to the Temporary Relief Centre. On evaluation, the Dutch Refugee Council decided that the project was not worth repeating.²⁹⁸⁹ Anyway, in general the stream of Yugoslavs arriving in the Netherlands remained limited. While the Ministry of Justice had announced in mid-July that three unoccupied barracks in Zuidlaren, 's-Hertogenbosch and Roermond were being made ready to receive an extra 1500 Yugoslavs,²⁹⁹⁰ the ²⁹⁸⁴ TV, Nederland 2, NOS Journaal, 10/08/92, 6.00pm; also in the 8.00pm NOS-Journaal on Nederland 3, that same day; TV, RTL4, Nieuws, 11/08/92, 7.30pm. See also Willem Offenbergh, 'Nederland te terughoudend' ('The Netherlands too reserved'), and 'Kosto'enkele duizenden vluchtelingen welkom' ('Kosto says several thousand refugees are welcome'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/08/92; 'd'Ancona meer vluchtelingen naar Nederland' (Dd'Ancona more refugees to the Netherlands'), NRC Handelsblad, 12/08/92.

²⁹⁸⁵ Marianne Fennema, 'Opvang vluchtelingen' ('Reception of refugees'), CD/Actueel, 05/09/92, p. 12; Dutch Refugee Council's 1992 annual report, pp. 15-16. Cf. objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study. See the Dutch Refugee Council's advertisement in the framework of this campaign in for example NRC Handelsblad and de Volkskrant, 13/08/92. And further 'Veel animo voor opvang Bosniërs' ('Much enthusiasm for taking in Bosnians'), Trouw, 17/08/92; 'Ruim vierduizend gastgezinnen willen Joegoslaven opvangen' ('More than four thousand host families willing to take in Yugoslavs'), de Volkskrant, 20/08/92; Jeroen Trommelen, 'Bedje en zitje beter dan kale kamer' ('Bed and sofa better than bare room'), de Volkskrant, 27/08/92; 'Kerkleden opgeroepen voor vluchtelingenwerk' ('Church members called upon for refugee work'): Trouw, 14/08/92; Wilma Kieskamp, 'Gastvrijheid zonder fruithapjes' ('Hospitality without fruit puree'), Trouw, 03/09/92; Anneke Visser, 'Veel onduidelijkheid bij gastgezinnen over opvang vluchtelingen' ('Much about reception of refugees not understood by host families'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/08/92.

²⁹⁸⁶ See for example 'Leiden bereid om meer Bosniërs op te nemen' ('Leiden prepared to accept more Bosnians'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/08/92; 'Leiden maakt plaats voor vluchtelingen' ('Leiden makes room for refugees'), PRO, vol. 1 (1992) no. 2, pp. 8-11; 'Bij 470 gezinnen Joegoslavisch kind welkom' ('470 families prepared to welcome Yugoslav child'), de Volkskrant, 07/08/92; 'Corporaties gevraagd om huizen voor vluchtelingen' ('Corporations asked for houses for refugees'), Trouw, 12/08/92.

²⁹⁸⁷ Wilma Kieskamp, 'VluchtelingenWerk: we kunnen het aan' ('Dutch Refugee Association: we can cope'), Trouw, 19/08/92.

²⁹⁸⁸ 'Liever niet in gastgezin. Minimaal aantal Joegoslaven wil particuliere opvang' ('Preferably not in a host family. Minimum number of Yugoslavs wants shelter in private homes'), Trouw, 28/09/92; Dutch Refugee Council's 1992 annual report, p. 16; Dutch Refugee Council's 1993 annual report, p. 24.

²⁹⁸⁹ Jeroen Trommelen, 'Gastgezin is mooi, maar het moet niet te lang duren' ('Host family is fine, but it must not go on for too long'), de Volkskrant, 14/12/93. There had been an earlier warning against this course of events: Paul Oosterhoff, 'Gezinsopvang van vluchteling brengt niets dan ellende' ('Reception of refugees in families will bring nothing but trouble'), de Volkskrant, 28/08/92.

²⁹⁹⁰ 'Scherpe kritiek op opvang Joegoslaven' ('Keen criticism of reception of Yugoslavs'), Trouw, 17/07/92; 'Regering wil Joegoslaven onderbrengen in kazernes' ('Government wants to house Yugoslavs in barracks'), de Volkskrant, 17/07/92; 'Rode Kruis klaar voor opvang ontheemden uit voormalig Joegoslavië' ('Red Cross ready to receive Displaced Persons from the former Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/07/92. Prime Minister Lubbers made a personal effort for the reception of refugees in Zuidlaren by urging Wilpstra, the mayor of that town, to provide shelter for Displaced Persons from Yugoslavia, curious situation arose that the existing central reception capacity was not fully utilized. During the Ministerial Council meeting of 20 August 1992, one of the ministers voiced the opinion that the government could no longer use the argument that the admission of Yugoslav displaced people should be restricted because it was tantamount to complicity with ethnic cleansing. According to this minister this damaged both the image of the Netherlands abroad and the credibility of the government's policy on the former Yugoslavia. The policy of the government meant in practice that the admission of refugees from Yugoslavia was to an ever-increasing extent supplementary to efforts to offer people a safe abode in the region itself.²⁹⁹¹

In the third week of August Kosto and D'Ancona wrote to the Parliament that in their opinion the EC should set up refugee camps along the borders of Bosnia-Herzegovina. With this idea, the Netherlands was one step ahead of the rest of the Community, according to Kosto. The Ministries of Justice and of Welfare, Health and Culture went even further; on 25 August, even before a reaction from the EC partners had been announced and even before the Dutch government had been able to talk about it, they sent a mission to Zagreb to find out how this plan could be implemented.²⁹⁹² The delegation selected about 2000 refugees on the spot who would be allowed to come to the Netherlands, and kept open the possibility of re-uniting families, which might have led to an additional 1000 admissions. After the gates of the Netherlands had been opened for these individuals, the principle of relief in the region itself would again be given priority.²⁹⁹³

As has already been discussed, this position led to problems when the UNHCR started to look for countries which were prepared to accept people from the prison camps. In October 1992 the UNHCR appealed to the Dutch government to accept 1600 Bosnians. However, the government said they first wanted to concentrate on the 6000 Displaced Persons already in the Netherlands. Soon after, UNHCR asked the Dutch government to accept 1750 Displaced Persons at short notice, while Ogata announced that soon after that another 3700 Displaced Persons in all would have to be accommodated in third countries, thereby implying that the Netherlands should also accept some of them.²⁹⁹⁴ During the Ministerial Council meeting of 30 October there was talk of a number of 200 people whom the Netherlands would be able to accept. This was thought to be enough to induce other EC member states to take their share of these refugees. This proposal led to critical remarks by various ministers who pointed out that the High Commissioner's request was about people from camps, who were daily at risk of being murdered, and who might also include rape victims. These problems turned out to be a matter of daily concern to the government, which along with the German government made efforts to ²⁹⁹¹ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, 27/08/92, 04/09/92 and 13/11/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

Wim Phylipsen/Grazielle Runchina, 'Soldaten maken plaats voor vluchtelingen' ('Soldiers make room for refugees'), de Volkskrant, 29/07/92.

²⁹⁹² Radio 1, Veronica Nieuwsradio, 24/08/92, 6.05pm. The mission consisted of: Hilbrand Nawijn, director of Immigration Affairs at the Ministry of Justice, Eddy Engelsman, director of Refugees, Minorities and Asylum Seekers at the Ministry of Welfare, Health and Culture, Klaas van den Tempel from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ton Teunissen from the Red Cross, Jaap Hoeksma, vice-chairman of the Dutch Refugee Council, Ahmed Aboutaleb, public relations official at the Ministry of Welfare, Health and Culture, Gert Riphagen, spokesman for the Ministry of Justice, and Dragan Sakovic, civil servant at the Ministry of Welfare, Health and Culture, who also functioned as interpreter.

²⁹⁹³ For this subject see also Max van Weezel, 'De verfijnde Balkan-oorlog tussen WVC en Justitie' ('The subtle Balkan War between Welfare, Health and Culture, and Justice'), Vrij Nederland, 03/10/92, pp. 7-11; Louis Cornelisse, 'Dit is natuurlijk mensonterend' ('This is of course degrading'), Trouw, 27/08/92; id., 'Op zoek naar de 'meest kwetsbaren'' ('Looking for "the most vulnerable people"'), Trouw, 28/08/92; Ward op den Brouw, 'Missie naar Kroatië stuit bij grens al op strubbelingen' ('Mission to Croatia runs into trouble even at the border'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/08/92; id., 'Delegatie ziet meest in opvang in Kroatië' ('Delegation has most faith in reception in Croatia') and 'Nederland zegt opvang 2.000 vluchtelingen toe' ('The Netherlands agrees to accept 2,000 refugees'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/08/92; Ward op den Brouw, 'Nederlandse delegatie met granaat beschoten' ('Dutch delegation shelled'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/92.

²⁹⁹⁴ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 23/10/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

procure an international agreement at least to liberate all inmates of camps.²⁹⁹⁵ However, these efforts had very meagre results.

The reactions of Dutch politicians

Before the emergency debate requested by De Hoop Scheffer, politicians had already been asked for their reactions to the pictures of the Trnopolje camp. According to Rinus Ferdinandusse, senior editor of Vrij Nederland, the citizens of the Netherlands expected their politicians, now that ‘every evening there was murder, slaughter and sorrow on the screen, if there are concentration camps and rumours of concentration camps’, to ‘take charge. Even if they do not know what to do themselves.’²⁹⁹⁶ However, the ministers were out of the country; it was the holiday season and there were Olympic Games on. Not to worry. On 7 August the media visited the members of the government to ask for their comments on the pictures broadcast the previous evening. NOS radio reporter Ruud de Wit found Prime Minister Lubbers in Barcelona, where he was attending the semi-final of the Dutch volleyball team at the Olympic Games, and asked him: ‘I don’t know if you saw the pictures on television yesterday evening of concentration camps, the mutilated children (...) Isn’t it about time we, as the European Community, did a little more in Yugoslavia?’ The Prime Minister replied that he thought it was better not to react, because he was having ‘a little time off’. The broadcast of the report clearly implied that the Prime Minister was ‘undoubtedly having a great time’ and that the listeners had been able to hear for themselves that Lubbers had given no substantive reaction to the pictures.²⁹⁹⁷ On his return to the Netherlands the Prime Minister was also asked if he thought the Olympic Games should have carried on after the pictures of ‘concentration camps’ had been shown; Lubbers said he thought they should.²⁹⁹⁸

Minister Pronk of Development Co-operation did not see the pictures himself immediately, because at that moment he was in Tanzania. Unaware of the pictures, on 7 August – following in the footsteps of Boutros-Ghali – he expressed criticism of the Western world, which in his opinion devoted too much attention to Yugoslavia and too little to Somalia.²⁹⁹⁹ However, three days later, back home again, the minister gave an analysis of Milosevic’s ‘Hitlerite politics’ during top-level talks of his party, the PvdA.³⁰⁰⁰

In the television programme ‘NOS Laat’ on 7 August Van den Broek said he expected that the pictures ‘[would] not fail to have an effect and [that] the pressure to arrive at stronger measures now and perhaps also to take a few more risks in the matter, [would] only [be] reinforced’.³⁰⁰¹ In the same broadcast anchor woman Maartje van Weegen asked De Hoop Scheffer for his comments on the pictures.³⁰⁰² Both Van Weegen and De Hoop Scheffer said that the pictures were indeed terrible, but at the same time both warned that these ‘concentration camps’ were not extermination camps.

Van Weegen asked if De Hoop Scheffer did not find it curious that at such a crucial moment Lubbers and Kok were out of the country. De Hoop Scheffer expected that they would return soon: ‘I ²⁹⁹⁵ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 30/10/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

²⁹⁹⁶ Rinus Ferdinandusse, ‘Kampen op de Balkan’ (‘Camps in the Balkans’), Vrij Nederland, 08/08/92.

²⁹⁹⁷ Radio 1, NOS, Radio Olympia, 07/08/92, 1.04pm.

²⁹⁹⁸ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen, 14/08/92, 11.07pm.

²⁹⁹⁹ ‘Beter ingrijpen in Somalië’ (‘Better to intervene in Somalia’), Trouw, 08/08/92. Van den Broek supported Pronk on this matter, Radio 1, NOS, Radiolympia, 07/08/92, 5.07pm.

³⁰⁰⁰ Max van Weezel, ‘De verfijnde Balkan-oorlog tussen WVC en Justitie’, Vrij Nederland, 03/10/92, p. 11; Leonard Ornstein/Max van Weezel, ‘Het warme bad en de koude douche van Relus ter Beek’ (‘The hot bath and the cold shower of Relus ter Beek’), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p.11. According to Valk, after the pictures Pronk radiated a sense of: ‘what is going on here is the purest fascism!’, interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

³⁰⁰¹ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Laat, 07/08/92, 10.25pm.

³⁰⁰² The other interviewees were Joris Voorhoeve, director of Clingendael, the publicist Paul Scheffer and the retired Major General Vogel, of whom the first two, like Van den Broek, were afraid that if the West was not prepared to undertake some form of military action, the conflict threatened to escalate; Vogel saw no definite indications of this.

presume that the Prime Minister and the vice-premier will soon be back in the Netherlands, because these pictures, but also the rest of the developments, will have to lead to government policy'. He urged the deployment of military troops: 'they will have to make it possible to collect the huge numbers, the hundreds of thousands, possibly millions of refugees there, in sanctuaries, in camps, protected by military troops. Just think for a moment of the Kurds in northern Iraq.'³⁰⁰³

After the coverage of the camps, the CDA parliamentary party deliberately chose to support a 'hard line' in the Yugoslav conflict.³⁰⁰⁴ This meant that the 'surgical intervention' favoured by Kok and Oostlander in the preceding months, was 'a stage already passed'.³⁰⁰⁵ After the Trnopolje pictures the question of military intervention led to differences of opinion within GroenLinks. At the end of August 1992, the executive committee of 'Green Left' concurred with the declarations of the Security Council demanding access to all prison camps and advocating the possibility of military protection for aid convoys in Bosnia. The committee also argued in favour of other measures, including reinforcing the monitoring of economic sanctions against Serbia. However, in spite of pressure from within the party, the leaders of 'Green Left' were not yet ready for large-scale military intervention. Maarten van Poelgeest, a member of the executive committee, said:

'Military intervention, if necessary on a large scale, is morally justified – if it helps. But that is the problem. Various politicians are crying out for intervention much too readily. But will it not lead to escalation? That is my biggest problem with it. I am pessimistic about the conflict, the mutual hatred runs so deep. I do not think it can be solved in this way. Intervention might lead to a sort of Lebanon, so that you might be stuck in a bloody conflict for years.'³⁰⁰⁶

The parliamentary consultation on 12 August: pressure for Safe Areas

On 11 August Van den Broek and Ter Beek sent a letter to the permanent parliamentary committees in preparation for the consultation requested by De Hoop Scheffer.³⁰⁰⁷ In this letter the ministers ascertained the deterioration of the humanitarian situation due to the escalation of fighting in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, ethnic cleansing and concentration camps, for which Serbia was held mainly responsible. In view of the international situation the ministers were not really able to do much more at that moment. The Security Council was still working on UN resolutions, NATO and the WEU were still engaged in making plans for the military support of humanitarian relief and for the monitoring of heavy weapons, and the EC conference on Yugoslavia was on its last legs now that the British government had announced that in the near future they wanted to conduct these talks on a broader basis. As far as its own measures were concerned, the government could only report that since the beginning of July an F-27 had been flying to Zagreb and Sarajevo regularly with aid supplies and that the offer of a transport unit – about which the Parliament had not previously been informed – was still open.

³⁰⁰³ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Laat, 07/08/92, 10.25pm.

³⁰⁰⁴ CDA Secretariat, Foreign Affairs Committee, working group for Central and Eastern Europe, July – December 1992, H9.729, report by the working group for Central and Eastern Europe, 02/09/92.

³⁰⁰⁵ CDA Secretariat, Foreign Affairs Committee, working group for Central and Eastern Europe, July – December 1992, H9.729, report by the working group for Central and Eastern Europe, 02/09/92.

³⁰⁰⁶ Hansje Galesloot, 'Heftige discussie in GroenLinks over militaire interventie. Volstaat humanitaire hulp Bosnië?' ('Heated discussion in GroenLinks on military intervention. Is humanitarian aid in Bosnia enough?'), GroenLinks, August/September 1992. For the discussion in GroenLinks see also 'Debat over nut en nadeel van militaire interventies. Wapens en mensenrechten, een ongemakkelijk duo' ('Debate on usefulness and drawbacks of military interventions. Weapons and human rights, an uneasy duo'), GroenLinks, October 1992. See also Gudrun Gutovski/Hans Feddema, 'Vuur is niet met vuur te blussen' ('Fire cannot be extinguished by fire'), NRC Handelsblad, 12/08/92.

³⁰⁰⁷ TK 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, pp. 15-21.

The letter found no favour in the eyes of most MPs. The general impression was that it was too lukewarm. This was the first time since the outbreak of the hostilities in the former Yugoslavia that there was a clear difference in views between the government and the Parliament. On the eve of the debate, Blaauw had declared in response to the ethnic cleansing: ‘This cannot go on, it may not go on and something must be done about it’. The next day, before the Parliamentary debate, stumbling over his own words, he said on the radio of the government’s letter:

‘A letter full of good intentions, good possibilities, lots of conferences announced, many inquiries started up again, but direct, practical measures get stranded again and again either because there has to be agreement in a wider context or because there must first be a Security Council resolution, and so we just muddle along and the population in Bosnia is under artillery fire, is being displaced, ‘ethnically cleansed’ to use an abominable word, and so on.’

De Hoop Scheffer thought there were ‘many weak passages’ in the letter.³⁰⁰⁸ Valk (PvdA) expressed a less critical opinion of the contents of the government’s letter, although he did think it was couched in a ‘somewhat nebulous, typically Foreign Affairs kind of prose’.³⁰⁰⁹

There was an unusually large amount of public interest in the parliamentary debate on 12 August. The Parliament itself also showed interest: whereas normally only a handful of parliamentarians turn up at oral consultations of this kind, in this case more than thirty MPs had broken off their holidays in order to attend the consultations.³⁰¹⁰ An exceptional feature of this General Consultation, which did not take place in the plenary hall but in the Troelstra Room in the new Parliament building, was that there was a shortage of chairs. The public gallery was fully occupied. Extra chairs had to be brought for the MPs and D66 (Democrat Party) MP Hans van Mierlo, who arrived late, even had to remain standing. ‘It was clear that the People’s Representatives were experiencing a Historic Day’, wrote Auke Kok in HP/De Tijd.³⁰¹¹ It was also exceptional that this General Consultation was reported on the front pages of the major newspapers. With all this attention, the mood of the debate on the afternoon of 12 August was unmistakably more emotional than on previous occasions. It was characterized by a grim “‘this-has-got-to-stop” note’, as one journalist reported³⁰¹² and the main editorial of De Volkskrant saw in the debate ‘an end to Dutch aloofness’.³⁰¹³

A curious situation arose as a result of the MPs’ criticism of the government’s letter. On 17 June the MPs had already said during an oral consultation of the permanent parliamentary committees of Foreign Affairs and Defence that they could see military intervention approaching, but did not want to urge it yet.³⁰¹⁴ At the NATO summit of 4 June Van den Broek had welcomed the American suggestion of military protection for humanitarian convoys. During the EC summit in Lisbon a few weeks later, Van den Broek and Lubbers urged colleagues from the United Kingdom, France and Belgium, who had seats in the Security Council, to work on a resolution authorizing the use of military force to support aid convoys. The government had maintained this position. On 7 August, for example, the Director-General of Political Affairs Van Walsum had complained to Jeremy Greenstock, the British Deputy Director of Political Affairs at the Foreign Office, about the helplessness displayed by the EC under British presidency. He had intimated that by then it was about time for action to which ³⁰⁰⁸ Rob Meines, ‘Nederland kan Servie niet alleen stoppen’ (‘The Netherlands cannot stop Serbia alone’), NRC Handelsblad, 13/08/92. See also Auke Kok, ‘Helden op het Binnenhof’ (‘Heroes in the Binnenhof’), HP/de Tijd, in which De Hoop Scheffer called the letter ‘much too weak’.

³⁰⁰⁹ Radio 1, VARA, Wednesday edition, 12/08/92, 12.04pm.

³⁰¹⁰ ‘Kamer en kabinet voor VN-actie in Bosnië’ (‘Parliament and government in favour of UN action in Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 13/08/92.

³⁰¹¹ Auke Kok, ‘Helden op het Binnenhof’, HP/De Tijd, 21/08/92.

³⁰¹² Rob Meines, ‘Nederland kan Servie niet alleen stoppen’, NRC Handelsblad, 13/08/92.

³⁰¹³ ‘Nederlandse keuze’, de Volkskrant, 13/08/93.

³⁰¹⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 27.

Serbia did not consent. However, Greenstock had countered that the British Prime Minister John Major was personally opposed to any ‘slipping’ into military intervention.³⁰¹⁵ The Dutch government could hardly be accused of a lack of will and effort.

Now, almost two months later, on 12 August, the parliamentarians were for the first time urging active intervention on a larger scale in view of humanitarian aspects of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina. According to Valk, the reason for this more rigorous position was ‘continued firing in cities such as Sarajevo, pictures of prison camps and concentration camps and the merciless ethnic cleansing:

‘Europe cannot allow people to be driven from house and home, imprisoned, tortured or executed on the grounds of their ethnic or religious backgrounds. Acceptance of this would create a precedent for other regions. If this conflict is not controlled, it may spread to other regions, Islamic reactions may be provoked and a Balkan war could even be sparked off. The credibility of international security organizations is also at stake. It must also be borne in mind that in this whole situation there are unreliable opponents involved, who resort to blackmail and will not yield to purely political pressure.’³⁰¹⁶

As Valk later said, the pictures of the camps had ‘set public opinion ablaze’. At that time he received dozens of telephone calls from people begging for the borders to be opened to the refugees from Bosnia. If the politicians were also overwhelmed by emotions, then he was not ashamed of it: ‘I am glad emotions play a role in politics. If this is interpreted as “emotions have blinded us,” then I do not agree.’³⁰¹⁷ De Hoop Scheffer shared this opinion: ‘In politics emotions may, no, must play a role’.³⁰¹⁸ Valk’s fellow party member Van Traa was later to assert that it was ‘easy to say that parliamentarians should not let themselves be carried away by public indignation in this way, but the daily reality was that we were bombarded with telephone calls and letters from people who wanted us to do something’.³⁰¹⁹ Sipkes (Green Left Party) also received telephone calls: ‘It was close. For many Dutch people it was a holiday country. Of course you are sensitive to these things in politics. Sensitive to what comes from the population. It was so close. “Do something about it!” “Surely this can’t go on!” “I camped there,” “I stayed there.” This is the sort of messages and phone calls you get.’³⁰²⁰ She herself had been on holiday during the first half of August, so that she had not immediately seen the pictures of the camps and at the debate on 12 August not she but Beckers, the chairman of her parliamentary party, spoke. When Sipkes came back from her holiday, she noticed the change the pictures had caused among Dutch parliamentarians: ‘Something had completely changed. I experienced this myself when I came back. “What is different exactly? Where did this intensity suddenly come from?” Then it eventually turned out that it had in fact been the pictures.’³⁰²¹

Minister Van den Broek, who had not failed to take note of the MPs’ disparaging assessment of the government’s letter, saw in it, according to one of the reporters who was present at the parliamentary debate there at the time, ‘the sign to go all out’.³⁰²² Van den Broek shared the ‘feelings of shock, rage and horror’ experienced by the MPs; according to the report of the consultations, ‘the ethnic cleansing and deportations which are the result of Serbian expansionist politics in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina reminded him of the blackest period in recent history.’ On the other hand he

³⁰¹⁵ ABZ, coll. Van den Broek, box 12 (1992). Memorandum DGPZ to Van den Broek, 07/08/92, no. 115/92.

³⁰¹⁶ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 3.

³⁰¹⁷ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

³⁰¹⁸ Auke Kok, ‘Helden op het Binnenhof, HP/De Tijd, 21/08/92.

³⁰¹⁹ Both, Indifference, p. 241 n. 1

³⁰²⁰ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

³⁰²¹ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

³⁰²² Jaap Jansen, ‘Vragen van leven en dood’ (‘Questions of life and death’), Elsevier, 22/08/92.

thought that the latest developments were not entirely unexpected.³⁰²³ At earlier points the international community had also been unable to solve the conflict in the former Yugoslavia by political, diplomatic or economic means. However, recent events had brought about a change in the attitude of the international community, said the minister. In the opinion of Van den Broek, military intervention was necessary for humanitarian reasons, as a precedent, for the sake of stability in the neighbouring countries and to prevent the conflict from spreading, for example to Kosovo. But Van den Broek was definitely opposed to unilateral lifting of the arms embargo in favour of Bosnia-Herzegovina.³⁰²⁴ Ter Beek also thought that 'both for humanitarian reasons and to prevent creating a precedent passivity (...) was entirely inappropriate'.³⁰²⁵

A cautious note in these consultations was struck by the SGP MP Van Dis. Military protection of aid convoys might lead to escalation. According to the report of the oral consultations, this caused him to feel 'some hesitation'.³⁰²⁶ He made a plea for first exhausting all political and diplomatic resources. What he thought could be done, was to set up protected areas on Bosnian territory for the relief of Displaced Persons. According to the party paper De Banier Van Dis also remarked that the consequences of possible military action should first be known, 'because once we have agreed to a military intervention, we cannot opt out later. The risks entailed in military intervention in a complicated and obscure civil war are great'.³⁰²⁷

However, Minister Van den Broek said he thought the risks entailed in doing nothing were considerably greater than those attached to a military effort. He even warned MPs that a detailed discussion of the dangers involved in military intervention might make an undesirable impression on the government in Belgrade.³⁰²⁸ Ter Beek was more cautious: Defence personnel would have to be certain at all times 'that only acceptable risks will be taken'.³⁰²⁹

In general the MPs thought that any form of military action should take place in the framework of the UN. The Netherlands might well have to make a contribution, but the discussion as to the goal and nature of this contribution, and the size of the units to be deployed would have to take place in Parliament beforehand. During the debate, De Hoop Scheffer said that he had been particularly annoyed by the lack of European decisiveness: 'Did it really have to be left to the United States to submit resolutions to the Security Council?'³⁰³⁰ That very morning a colleague had shown him a picture of a concentration camp dating from 1933. Then the world had also waited too long to do anything about the situation.³⁰³¹ He asked if the organization of safe havens for refugees was also covered by the resolutions.³⁰³² If it was not, then the Dutch government should make sure that it was. The NATO, which had the requisite troops and command structure at its disposal, would have to implement the UN resolutions. De Hoop Scheffer also pointed to the danger of UNPROFOR troops being taken hostage and therefore asked for a different mandate, 'with proportionate safeguards'.

Valk also thought more should be done. The West should not acquiesce to ethnic cleansing, he said. He could not immediately think of a political solution, but he did think that in the meantime economic and military pressure on Serbia should be stepped up. Furthermore, he was in favour of providing protection for humanitarian convoys, sending observers to concentration camps, and inasmuch as civilians were detained in these camps, liberating them, and setting up and protecting safety zones.

³⁰²³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 11.

³⁰²⁴ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p.13.

³⁰²⁵ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 13.

³⁰²⁶ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181 no. 22, p. 7.

³⁰²⁷ 'Oorlog op Balkan heeft ook gevolgen voor Nederland' ('War in the Balkans also has consequences for the Netherlands'), De Banier, 03/09/92, pp. 6-7.

³⁰²⁸ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 12.

³⁰²⁹ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 13.

³⁰³⁰ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 2.

³⁰³¹ Auke Kok, 'Helden op het Binnenhof', HP/De Tijd, 21/08/92.

³⁰³² TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 2.

However, somewhat contrary to the Dutch reaction in response to the UNHCR conference of the end of July, Minister Van den Broek was not overjoyed at the idea of safe havens: ‘Setting up so-called safe havens for refugees might give the Serb leaders the impression that the international community is willing to make provisions for the people they are forcibly expelling from the areas they have conquered.’³⁰³³ If it proved necessary to set up Safe Areas of this nature for humanitarian reasons alone, it would have to be made clear that the facilities were temporary.

Judging by the objectivized minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting, the debate, in which such a new mood and such a thirst for action on the part of Parliament had emerged, made a great impression on the government.³⁰³⁴ After the Ministerial Council meeting of 14 August, Prime Minister Lubbers stated: ‘It is better not to watch passively.’ And contrary to the usual principle, he declared: ‘In case of doubt we should do something.’ The Prime Minister did rightly point out that this had already been the opinion of the government even before the summer holiday. However, he said it was ‘very important’ that in the parliamentary debate two days earlier it had emerged that there was ‘national consensus’ on possible military intervention. The Prime Minister also wanted ‘some haste’ in providing humanitarian support for the population of Bosnia.³⁰³⁵ After the parliamentary consultations and the Security Council’s adoption of Resolution 770, authorizing the military protection of humanitarian convoys, the Dutch government strove after rapid implementation of the resolutions by the NATO and the WEU.³⁰³⁶

11. Doubts about the images from Trnopolje

‘Es war dieses Bild von diesem Stacheldraht, und diese ausgemergelten Männer, das Alarmglocken in ganz Europa läuten liess. Ich glaube, wäre der Bericht ohne dieses Bild vermittelt worden, wäre die Wirkung längst nicht so stark gewesen, obwohl sich nichts an den Fakten geändert hätte.’ [It was this image of barbed wire with these emaciated men that caused the alarm to be sounded all over Europe. I think that if they had reported the news item without this image, it would not have had such an impact, even though the facts would have been exactly the same]³⁰³⁷

My mother got that boy with the pan to walk past four times because she wanted to make a symbol.

True pictures are nonsense. Only amateurs think they have to be natural. A professional can go a long way towards creating a scene.³⁰³⁸

Six months after the images from Trnopolje media expert Jaap van Ginneken said in the Nieuwslijn programme, broadcast by the Dutch TV channel Veronica, that the images recorded proved nothing about the existence of concentration camps, let alone extermination camps: ‘All you know is that a man ³⁰³³ TK, 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 22, p. 12.

³⁰³⁴ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁰³⁵ ‘Lubbers: heel gauw beroep op Nederland. Premier wil meer druk op Servië’ (‘Lubbers: very soon appeal to the Netherlands. Prime Minister wants more pressure on Serbia’), Het Parool, 15/08/92.

³⁰³⁶ Radio 2, AVRO, Radiojournaal, 14/08/92, 6.00pm; Radio 1, KRO, Echo Magazine, 20/08/92, 6.10pm.

³⁰³⁷ Penny Marshall in documentary broadcast by the German television channel Südwestfunk ‘Kozarac – Etnisch gesäubert’ (Kozarac – ethnically cleansed), quoted in T. Deichmann, ‘Es war dieses Bild, das die Welt in Alarmbereitschaft versetzte (It was this picture which alerted the world)’, Novo, (1997)26 (January/February).

³⁰³⁸ Joost Elffers, son of Emmy Andriess, who in 1944 took the photo of the little boy with the pan that became the symbol of the Hunger Winter in the Netherlands, in: Marie Louise Schipper, ‘Daar staat Pim weer met z’n pannetje’ (‘Pim is standing over there holding his little pan again’), de Volkskrant, 04/05/00.

is standing there with an emaciated torso behind barbed wire. That is what you see. You still don't know what it means'.³⁰³⁹ Indeed, there was some room for doubt.

Ed Vulliamy went to Trnopolje as a newspaper journalist with the ITN team. On 7 August, the morning after the ITN programme, The Guardian published his account. The story in no way radiated the sensation that the pictures from Trnopolje were giving rise to in the other media at that same time. Literally Vulliamy wrote the following: 'Trnopolje cannot be called a "concentration camp" and is nowhere as sinister as Omarska: it is very grim, something between a civilian prison and transit camp. The Yugoslav Red Cross has a small station here, and there are meagre cooking facilities.' Vulliamy also quoted Fikret Alic in his article: 'It is a prison camp, but not a PoW [Prisoner of War] camp. We are not fighters. They came to our village, Kozarac (...) they put us on the buses and brought us to Kereter [Keraterm] for a while, and then here.' Vulliamy further reported that a few other people had come voluntarily to the camp to escape the fighting going on around their villages. 'Here is complete confusion – political and physical. The camp is a ramshackle fenced-in compound around a former school. The men stand stripped to the waist, in their thousands, against the wire in the relentless afternoon heat (...)' He quoted the Bosnian Muslim Inar Gnoric, who told him that though conditions in the camp were certainly hard, it was safer there than in the surrounding neighbourhood: 'We are refugees, but there are guards and the wire fence'. Vulliamy also reported in his piece that there were camps where, according to the Bosnian Serb authorities, Muslims were holding Serbs prisoner.³⁰⁴⁰

Consequently Vulliamy was not very happy with the way the ITN report was received by other newspapers. He later complained that the day after the ITN images had appeared on the screen he had to give 54 television and radio interviews in the course of which he had to spend more time stating that Omarska was neither an Auschwitz nor a Belsen than in telling about the atrocities he had actually discovered in the camps.³⁰⁴¹ When an American radio station called him and he thought he could hear background noises from an NSDAP gathering in Nuremberg and the announcement 'There are still extermination camps', he put the phone down.³⁰⁴² A few weeks after the broadcast Ian Williams, a member of the ITN team, said; 'The power of the images seemed to be two steps ahead of the proof they were supposed to provide'.³⁰⁴³ A year after the programme Penny Marshall also said that she had had a great deal of difficulty in removing the sensational side from her reporting about Trnopolje: 'I bent over backwards, I showed guards – Bosnian Serb guards – feeding the prisoners. I showed a small Muslim child who had come on his own volition. I didn't call them death camps. I was incredibly careful, but again and again we see that image being used'.³⁰⁴⁴

The American journalist, Peter Maass, who visited the camp a few days after the ITN team and Vulliamy, saw no barbed wire. 'A few thousand Bosnians were penned in, not by barbed wire but by the roaming presence of armed guards and the knowledge they had nowhere to flee to. The entire countryside was in the hands of the Serbs'.³⁰⁴⁵ Nor did Penny Marshall see any barbed wire on her return to the Trnopolje camp a week after her first visit; she wrote that it must have been removed in the meantime.³⁰⁴⁶ But Maass too saw emaciated people. 'I was surprised at the mere fact that they still ³⁰³⁹ TV, Netherlands 2, VOO, Nieuwslijn, 23/02/93, 10pm.

³⁰⁴⁰ Ed Vulliamy, 'Shame of Camp Omarska', The Guardian, 07/08/92.

³⁰⁴¹ Vulliamy, Seasons, p.xii; Eric Alterman, 'Bosnian camps: a barbed tale', The Nation, 28/07/97. See for instance Vulliamy in Harry Smith & Paula Zahn, 'CBS this morning', 7August1992, 7.00E.T.: "And apart from this one camp Omarska, none of them, although they were pretty ghastly – they were no holiday camps – would – could be called concentration camps." "These are rather grotesque analogies of Auschwitz and Dachau and so on, which are very unhelpful in my view."

³⁰⁴² Vulliamy in BBC report on war reporting in the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, broadcast by AVRO Televisier, 16/02/93.

³⁰⁴³ Quoted in Aart Brouwer, 'De nieuwe censor' ('The new censor'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 30/04/97.

³⁰⁴⁴ The Independent, 05/08/93. Similar words from Ian Williams, quoted in Julia Hartley-Brewer, 'ITN reporter 'bent over backwards for accuracy'', The Guardian, 01/03/00.

³⁰⁴⁵ Maas, Neighbor, p.41.

³⁰⁴⁶ 'ITN's Penny Marshall tells how she made the world wake up', Sunday Times, 16/08/92. For images of this second visit see NOS Journaal (Dutch national TV news), 12/08/92.

could talk. Imagine, talking skeletons!³⁰⁴⁷ He was of the opinion that the emaciated individuals were former prisoners from Omarska and Keraterm.

The (Bosnian) Serb authorities were shocked at the enormous public relations damage that the ITN reports had caused abroad.³⁰⁴⁸ But after the images had been broadcast, attitudes in the West were still not so black-and-white that there was nobody prepared to state their doubts. The first to do so was the American journalist Peter Brock who, following a procedure much loved by the protagonists in the conflict,³⁰⁴⁹ tried to swap the ethnic labels. He stated that the emaciated figure behind the barbed wire in the ITN film was not a Muslim but a Serb.³⁰⁵⁰ It was easy enough to disprove his statement. Alic had escaped to Denmark, where he arrived as a refugee. Then Brock said that he had been mistaken and that his statement had referred to a thin man pictured in Newsweek of 17 August 1992. According to Brock this man was the Serbian Slobodan Konjevic, arrested for plundering, who looked so thin because he had been suffering from tuberculosis for ten years.³⁰⁵¹ The Gesellschaft für bedrohte Völker was, however, able to trace this man too. He was the Muslim Ilijas Garibovic, who meanwhile had moved to Switzerland.³⁰⁵² But that was not the last word to be said on the subject of the Trnopolje camp.

In 1996 the UN Tribunal for The former Yugoslavia sat several times, with Dusan (Dusko or Dule) Tadic in the dock. Tadic was a Bosnian Serb who had taken part in ethnic cleansing in Prijedor and Kozarac. He had been arrested in Germany in February 1994 and handed over to the Tribunal in The Hague. He was eventually found guilty of murder, torture and ill-treatment in Omarska and of the deportation of people to the Omarska, Keraterm and Trnopolje camps. There was only one witness who alleged that Tadic had also been responsible for atrocities in Trnopolje. This witness, originally designated as witness L, was a certain Dragan Opacic. In the course of the trial, however, the prosecutor had to withdraw Opacic as a witness because it had become clear that his allegations were not based on fact. According to Tadic's defence counsel, M. (Mischa) Vladimiroff of the then law firm Vladimiroff and Spong, this witness was acting on instructions from the Bosnian police.³⁰⁵³

The ITN images were also used in the courtroom. On 6 and 7 June Vulliamy was called as witness for the prosecution and he was asked to comment on the unedited film material shot by ITN. In the interests of the defence Vladimiroff wanted an expert to underline the media's interest in Tadic prior to his trial in order to prove that witnesses might have been influenced by earlier press reporting. To this end he called Thomas Deichmann, a free-lance journalist from Frankfurt and co-founder of the magazine Novo, that called itself an advocate of value-free debate 'in einer Zeit der Risikoscheu und des Kulturpessimismus', conformism, (self)censorship and state control,³⁰⁵⁴ but was, in fact, a Trotskyite magazine with a limited circulation.³⁰⁵⁵ Deichmann had been trained as an engineer but had gone into journalism at a later stage and had had experience with media research. In the German magazine Die Woche he had earlier sown doubts about the claim by a Croatian woman who said that she had been raped in camp Omarska but who, according to Deichmann, was a member of the Information Service of the Croatian government. That article had been a direct attack on Gutman, the journalist who put ³⁰⁴⁷ Maas, Neighbor, p.41.

³⁰⁴⁸ Esad Hecimovic, 'Karadžić priznaje samo zlocine koje su počinili pojedinci i paravojne grupe', Ljiljan, 18/02/98, pp.30-31; Vulliamy, Seasons, p.107; 'Laat ze maar komen, die Amerikanen' ('Let the Americans come'), NRC Handelsblad, 14/08/92.

³⁰⁴⁹ See for instance Tom O'Sullivan, 'War: PR Battles in the Balkans', PR Week, 13/08/92.

³⁰⁵⁰ P.Bock, 'Dateline Yugoslavia: The Partisan Press', Foreign Policy, (1993)93(December).

³⁰⁵¹ Brock in: Bitterman (Hg.), Serbien, p.16sq.

³⁰⁵² Nonetheless in the Netherlands anthropologist René Grémaux and historian Abe de Vries were still claiming in 1995 that he was Slobodan Konjevic, René Grémaux & Abe de Vries, 'Het falen van de media in de Bosnische oorlog' ('The failure of the media in the Bosnian war'), Trouw, 20/07/95.

³⁰⁵³ 'They were looking for the best picture', LM 97. On Vladimiroff's defence of Tadic see also the television documentary De Duivelskunstenaar by Jan Reiff.

³⁰⁵⁴ For Novo's official aims see 'Dafür steht Novo', <http://www.novo-magazin.de/daafuehrstehtnovo.htm> and 'Wilkommen bei Novo', <http://www.novo-magazin.de> both visited on 27/02/00.

³⁰⁵⁵ Paul Stoop, 'Bilder lügen nicht – oder vielleicht doch?' (Images don't lie – or do they?), Der Tagesspiegel, 06/02/97; Luke Harding: Second front: A shot that's still ringing?, The Guardian, 12/03/97.

out the first reports on the concentration camps. The article was published at a time when the German government was wondering whether to hand Tadic over to the Yugoslavia Tribunal in the Hague and, after some savage attacks in the initial stage, ended with words that placed serious doubts on the usefulness of publication: ‘Möglicherweise wurde sie tatsächlich vom Lagerleiter in Omarska und anderen Wachposten vergewaltigt. Doch Zweifel an ihrer Glaubwürdigkeit sind angebracht’ Maybe she was indeed raped by camp commanders in Omarska and other guards. But doubts have arisen about her credibility).³⁰⁵⁶

When Deichmann appeared as an expert witness he turned out to have had doubts about the ITN report. At a later stage Deichmann gave various versions about how he started to have these doubts. According to one version it was Deichmann’s wife who first pointed out something curious in the ITN film. When she was watching the film with him one evening she is alleged to have noticed that the barbed wire was fixed to the fence posts on the same side as Alic. Normally speaking, according to Deichmann, the barbed wire should have been attached on the outside of the posts.³⁰⁵⁷ Elsewhere Deichmann claimed that he, ‘[a]ls studierter Bauingenieur mit praktischer Berufserfahrung auch im Gärtnereibetrieb’ (being a civil engineer who also had professional experience in gardening), had immediately noticed the unusual method used to fix the wire.³⁰⁵⁸

When Deichmann discussed this discovery with Vladimiroff, the latter is alleged by Deichmann to have said that he had himself done an on-site check on Opacic’s allegation that there had been wire around the entire camp – witness L had even made a drawing of it – and had found no proof.³⁰⁵⁹ For Deichmann this had been a reason to go there and check for himself. He discovered that there had once been a barbed wire fence around the area where the transformer housing and the shed stood in the southern part of the camp, but not around the camp area itself. His conclusion had therefore been that it was not Fikret Alic and his fellow-sufferers who had been standing behind the barbed wire but, in fact, the ITN team when they were shooting their famous film (see sketch on page in this section).

Deichmann’s findings appeared in Novo in January 1997 and, around the same time, in various German, Italian, Swiss, Austrian and Swedish publications. In the Netherlands the article appeared in De Groene Amsterdammer.³⁰⁶⁰ The article stated that the ITN team had framed the emaciated man behind the barbed wire both figuratively and literally while knowing that the barbed wire had a function completely different from the one suggested. In addition Deichmann took the ITN team to task for never attempting to correct the erroneous associations that their images had created. In fact, according to Deichmann, Trnopolje had not been a prison camp, let alone a concentration camp, but an assembly station set up spontaneously by Muslim refugees themselves, local Bosnian Serbs subsequently providing security guards. Deichmann admitted that civilians had been mistreated in the camp and that there were ‘reports’ of a few rapes and murders, but that without the camp the number of Muslim victims would have been much larger.³⁰⁶¹ The comparison with the Nazi concentration camps was, for him, a step too far. He called on the television makers to return the prestigious prizes they had been awarded for their reporting.³⁰⁶²

³⁰⁵⁶ Thomas Deichmann, ‘Wurden westlichen Medien zu Handlangern der Propaganda? Der Fall der Kroatin Jadranka Cigelj legt dies Verdacht nahe’ (‘Have the western media become the henchmen of propaganda? The case of the Croatian woman Jadranka Cigelj reinforces this suspicion’), Die Woche, 04/11/94. In the Netherlands, his point of view is reflected in, for instance, Abe de Vries, ‘Het journalistieke risico’ (‘The journalistic risk’), De Groene Amsterdammer, 31/01/96.

³⁰⁵⁷ Thomas Deichmann, ‘The picture that fooled the world’, LM 97.

³⁰⁵⁸ T. Deichmann, ‘Es war dieses Bild, das die Welt in Alarmbereitschaft versetzte’, Novo, (1997)26(January/February).

³⁰⁵⁹ T. Deichmann, ‘The picture that fooled the world’, LM 97. ‘They were looking for the best picture’, ibid. In 1996 Vladimiroff visited the Trnopolje camp, with thanks to J. Reiff for the unedited film material of this visit.

³⁰⁶⁰ T. Deichmann, ‘Het beeld dat loog (The picture that lied)’, De Groene Amsterdammer, 22/01/97. In Germany the article appeared in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, the Süddeutsche Zeitung, Tagespiegel, Leipziger Volkszeitung and Konkret; in Italy in Il Corriere della Sera, l’Unità and Il Sole; in Switzerland in Weltwoche; in Austria in Wiener Standard; and in Sweden in Helsingborgs Dagblad. See also Thomas Deichmann, ‘Misinformation: TV Coverage of a Bosnian Camp’, Covert Action Quarterly, (1998)65(Fall), pp.52-55.

³⁰⁶¹ Thomas Deichmann, ‘The picture that fooled the world’, LM 97.

³⁰⁶² The ITN team gained awards including the British Association of Film and Television Award (BAFTA), the Royal Television Award and prizes at the Film and TV Festival in New York and the Scoop and News Festival. Vulliamy was

On 23 January the British magazine LM announced that it was shortly to print Deichmann's article, meanwhile already published in many places outside the United Kingdom, under the heading 'The Picture That Fooled the World'. LM was a magazine with approximately ten thousand subscribers. It was founded in 1988 as Living Marxism, the party organ of the British Revolutionary Communist Party and became LM in 1997. The party and its magazine had always opposed Western interference in the Balkans. Rather than a lack of interest in the West, the magazine claimed that it was precisely the pursuit of national interests in the Balkans by various Western countries that had led to war in the former Yugoslavia, a thesis also borne out willingly in Belgrade. The groups behind LM attempted to minimize Serb misdeeds and laid a great deal of emphasis on 'Muslim atrocities'.³⁰⁶³

By announcing publication of the article, Deichmann and LM were entering territory in which ITN could make use of the stringent British libel laws. On 23 January ITN made it known that the company was sticking to its reporting on 'the detention camps, which were not referred to as "Nazi-style concentration camps"'. The following day, before LM went on sale, its editors received a fax from ITN's lawyers, Biddle & Co, warning them not to distribute but to destroy the February issue of LM, in which Deichmann's article was to appear, and to offer an apology to ITN. The editors took no notice of the warning. ITN, Penny Marshall and Ian Williams then proceeded to a libel action against LM. ITN warned other media in the United Kingdom not to follow LM's example. Subsequently all the major media kept silence on this sensitive matter since a libel conviction in the British courts can lead to sky-high damage claims.

On 31 January 1997 the editor of LM, Mick Hume, and Deichmann held a press conference on the occasion of the publication of the latter's article. During the conference Deichmann said that he had the complete unedited tapes of the ITN team in his possession, from the team's arrival in Belgrade up to and including Marshall's second visit to Trnopolje, shortly after the first.³⁰⁶⁴ Deichmann showed some of the material during the press conference, as well as a film he himself had made on location in late 1996. How Deichmann got hold of the raw ITN tapes he could, 'naturally' not say,³⁰⁶⁵ but it has been alleged that he obtained them via Tadic's defence attorney.³⁰⁶⁶

Vulliamy was the only one of the original visitors to Trnopolje to react in the press to Deichmann's criticism, that mainly related to the nature of the camp and the significance of the barbed wire. In his article published on 7 August 1992 in The Guardian Vulliamy had himself referred to the multi-functional nature of the camp. But Vulliamy had been marked by the war in Bosnia. He belonged to that group of journalists who, during the war, had been of the opinion that neutrality was not a virtue appropriate to journalists. In the course of a 1999 congress on norms of conduct applicable to journalists he had stated to his audience: '[N]eutrality is supposed to be the bedrock of our profession. So what do we do when we get to these points in history when neutrality, as any good Swiss gold banker will tell you, is not neutral at all but complicity in the crime?' By remaining neutral, claimed Vulliamy, a journalist would play along with 'the bullies of history and discard the peace and justice promised us by the generation that defeated the Third Reich. We create a mere intermission before the next round of atrocities. There are times when we as reporters have to cross the line.'³⁰⁶⁷ given the Amnesty International Award for Journalism in the Interest of Human Rights and the James Cameron Award and was acclaimed International Reporter of the Year.

³⁰⁶³ For the links between circles in Belgrade, the Revolutionary Communist Party and LM see Luke Harding, 'Second Front: a shot that's still ringing', The Guardian, 12/03/97; Daniele Conversi, 'Moral Relativism and Equidistance in British Attitudes to the War in the Former Yugoslavia', Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, pp.256 and 278 n. 52.

³⁰⁶⁴ <http://www.srpska-mreza.com/lm-f97/deichmann-press.html> 'ITN vs. Deichmann and Truth – Report on Jan. 31 press conference'.

³⁰⁶⁵ Paul Stoop, 'Bilder lügen nicht – oder vielleicht doch?', Der Tagesspiegel, 06/02/97.

³⁰⁶⁶ Eric Alterman, 'Bosnian camps: a barbed tale', The Nation, 28/07/97.

³⁰⁶⁷ Vulliamy, 'Neutrality'. See also summaries of the presentations and discussions of the Journalist Covering Conflict: Norms of Conduct congress, sponsored by the Carnegie Commission on Preventing Deadly Conflict at the School of International and Public Affairs, Columbia University, New York, 28/04/99,

In the introduction to his book, Seasons in Hell, published in 1994 and based on his war reporting from Bosnia, Vulliamy wrote that he had originally refused to use the term 'concentration camp' for the camps in Bosnia because of the echoes of the Holocaust in the term. Later he abandoned his objection since, in the strict sense of the term, the Bosnian camps were concentration camps, though not on the scale of the Nazi camps, for which he believed the terms 'extermination camps' or 'death camps' should be reserved.³⁰⁶⁸ In 1996, in an article in The Nation published in Washington, he once again described the 1992 camps, with particular reference to Omarska, as 'a network of such camps – with their echo of the Third Reich'.³⁰⁶⁹ It failed to introduce any further clarity into the debate with Deichmann, particularly because in his reaction to Deichmann's claims Vulliamy did not always advance the most rational of arguments. For example, he said it came as no surprise to him that criticism of the ITN pictures came from a country with a tradition of denial as regards the existence of concentration camps.³⁰⁷⁰

On 2 February 1997 in The Observer Vulliamy dealt extensively with Deichmann's article in LM. He accused the German journalist of revisionism à la David Irving, the Holocaust-denier, and suggested that he alone knew what the situation had been on 5 August 1992 in Trnopolje, and not Deichmann. According to Vulliamy the Omarska, Keraterm and Trnopolje camps and others were not well-organized extermination camps such as the Nazis had set up. They were 'camps in which civilians were concentrated prior to deportation, meanwhile tortured, beaten, raped, mutilated or murdered'. Vulliamy thus distanced himself from comparisons with the Third Reich's death camps but, on the other hand, he watered down his stated point of view by continuing to talk of 'a tin-pot version of the Nazi pogrom' and by writing in his English-language text that the Bosnian Serbs had made their region 'Muslimfrei' (with an implicit reference to the Third Reich's Judenfrei slogan).

With reference to the barbed wire fence he wrote that the men who had come to Trnopolje from Keraterm and Omarska were to be found in 'a small fenced-in area. They were not able to move around, and were watched by armed guards. One of the four sides of this area was made of barbed wire. It was an existing fence on one side of a garage area which had been reinforced with new barbed wire and chicken wire'.³⁰⁷¹ This last signalled a fairly close approach to Deichmann's claims. Vulliamy withdrew behind the statement: 'ITN filmed that which was before our eyes. The prisoners were there, the fence was there'.³⁰⁷² In early August 1992 he had not been preoccupied with 'myopic obsessions as to which side of which pole the old barbed wire or fresh barbed wire was fixed'. For him, what was more important was the account given by Fikret Alic concerning the murder of 250 men that he had witnessed in Keraterm.³⁰⁷³ Vulliamy's consideration was justified, but of course missed completely the fact that it was not Fikret Alic's story that had shocked the world, seeing that his account had scarcely received any attention in August 1992, but rather it was the man's emaciated body behind barbed wire. Later Ian Williams was to say that the ITN report had never suggested that there had been barbed wire around the entire camp: 'What it showed was that there was a compound in which men were clearly imprisoned'.³⁰⁷⁴

Vulliamy believed that LM had poisoned the wells of history and had succeeded in reducing the genocide – as he saw it – in Bosnia to the level of a media debate and chatter among jaded intellectuals, a form of post-modern ennui.³⁰⁷⁵ Richard Tait, ITN's editor in chief and driving force behind the libel

<http://www.ccpdc.org/events/journalists/report.htm> visited on 27/02/00; Ed Vulliamy, 'I must testify', The Guardian, 22/04/98.

³⁰⁶⁸ Vulliamy, Seasons, p.xii.

³⁰⁶⁹ E. Vulliamy, 'Middle Managers of Genocide', The Nation, 10/06/99.

³⁰⁷⁰ Ed Vulliamy, 'Diary of the Damned', The Observer, 20/04/97.

³⁰⁷¹ E. Vulliamy, 'I stand by my story', The Observer, 02/02/97.

³⁰⁷² 'Now for the moment of truth', The Guardian, 21/02/00.

³⁰⁷³ Ed Vulliamy, 'Poison in the well of history', The Guardian, 15/03/00.

³⁰⁷⁴ Julia Hartley-Brewer, 'ITN reporter bent over backwards for accuracy', The Guardian, 01/03/00.

³⁰⁷⁵ Ed Vulliamy, 'Poison in the well of history', The Guardian, 15/03/00.

action against LM, believed that Deichmann and LM had managed to divert attention away from the crimes committed by the Serbs in the camps towards wild claims about what the ITN team might or might not have seen in Trnopolje.³⁰⁷⁶

Meanwhile ITN had been bringing up the heavy guns to bear on Deichmann's story. The TV company let it be known that any organ of the press that dared to follow the example of LM and publish Deichmann's story would have to reckon with legal procedures. The Independent on Sunday had invited the British author Phillip Knightley to write an article on the ITN affair, which was to be published on 2 February. In this article, Phillip Knightley attempted to clarify the complex status of the inmates of the Trnopolje camp (simultaneously a refugee, prison and transit camp) and wrote that the barbed wire in ITN's film should be seen as a symbolic representation of reality. However, the newspaper no longer dared publish the article.³⁰⁷⁷

So the discussion about the barbed wire was not insignificant to the extent that it opened up the fundamental question of whether journalists are expected to reveal reality in so far as possible or are allowed to give snippets that would suggest a reality perhaps happening elsewhere but not amenable to presentation at that precise moment. Opinions were divided, as illustrated by a famous television debate, in response to Deichmann's criticism, between the Amsterdam professor of communication sciences, Cees Hamelink and the editor in chief of the Dutch TV current affairs programme Netwerk, Cees Labeur. Labeur regarded the actions of the ITN team legitimate in the context of committed journalism. Hamelink said, on the contrary, that the reader and viewer would never again be able to trust the journalist if the latter went to work in this way.³⁰⁷⁸ Labeur's point of view was shared by several other Dutch television makers. Peter Tetteroo, editor of the KRO's Brandpunt current affairs programme, for example, speaking of reporting from Yugoslavia in general, said: 'You are constantly on the lookout for the man, the woman, the thing that can stand as a symbol for what you want to say. And it doesn't matter if the parties in the conflict refuse to let you see this, that or the other, because in this way you still succeed in getting your story across. (...) Editing and communications technology provide you with more than enough opportunities to put across what you want to say (...)'.³⁰⁷⁹

Meanwhile in London it was no longer a question of debate but of a bitter legal wrangle. On 20 February ITN sued the Two-Ten Communications company, part of Press Association, for libel and demanded a courtroom apology because the company had put out a press release about LM and Deichmann's forthcoming article. On 24 February LM's printers, Russell Press in Nottingham, were warned by ITN's lawyers that they could expect to face legal action should they print any future copies of LM. In April 1997 Two-Ten Communications decided to offer a courtroom apology.

Three years after ITN had dragged LM before the courts because of Deichmann's article the case came before the High Court in London in late February/early March 2000. For hours the jury and judges pored over ITN's film material. Here a major factor was the testimony of Idriz Merdzanic, the doctor interned in Trnopolje who had given to the ITN team the roll of photographic film with the images of torture. He stated to the court that Trnopolje was not a centre for people driven from their homes but an internment camp where people were tortured, raped and murdered.³⁰⁸⁰ LM itself had been unable to find a witness to support Deichmann's version. The court ordered LM to pay damages of GBP 375,000 to ITN, Penny Marshall and Ian Williams. In addition the magazine was ordered to pay costs amounting to GBP 300,000. LM had found support in the shape of such luminaries as Noam Chomsky, Margaret Drabble, Doris Lessing, Paul Theroux and Fay Weldon, who believed that freedom

³⁰⁷⁶ Eric Alterman, 'Bosnian camps: a barbed tale', The Nation, 28/07/97.

³⁰⁷⁷ It was later published as 'It turns out that the barbed wire was only a symbol', Novo, (1997)27 (March/April), pp.24 sqq. On 2 February 1997 The Independent did publish an apology for the impression it gave of Deichmann's claims in the article 'ITN 'may sue over article'', 'ITN coverage of Bosnia, 1992', The Independent, 02/02/97.

³⁰⁷⁸ Middageditje, 09/06/97.

³⁰⁷⁹ Willemse, Joegoslavië, p.225.

³⁰⁸⁰ 'Die Wahrheit vor und hinter dem Stacheldraht' ('The truth on either side of the barbed wire'), Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 16/03/00.

of the press was under threat, but their – partly financial – support was unable to prevent LM going bankrupt.

During the trial the judges had stated that under British libel law it was not a question of whether the ITN report had been ‘inaccurate, unfair or misleading’ but whether Deichmann’s claim was correct when he stated that Marshall and Williams had ‘deliberately’ given a distorted representation of the facts.³⁰⁸¹ The twelve-member jury decided that such had not been the case. In his closing speech Judge Morland said: ‘Clearly Ian Williams and Penny Marshall and their television teams were mistaken in thinking they were not enclosed by the old barbed-wire fence, but does it matter?’³⁰⁸² The jury and judges, like Knightley had actually already done in his article that the Independent on Sunday had decided not to publish because of ITN’s threats of legal action, opted not for the factual but for the symbolic value of the images.³⁰⁸³

The (im)potent media

‘If the journalists had not done their J’accuse!-like work, the Bosnian Serbs would never have been chased off by bombs.’³⁰⁸⁴

Can it be said, in the aftermath of the ITN images of ‘Omarska’, that the media played a crucial role with regard to policy on Yugoslavia? ‘[W]e are all brought right to the battlefield, right to the cemetery, right to the death camps. The people react, and then the people in power react’, stated the Democratic Senator of Connecticut, Joseph Lieberman who, after seeing the pictures, sharply criticized President Bush because of the latter’s hesitant attitude towards the conflict.³⁰⁸⁵

With regard to the relationship between the media and politics in general,³⁰⁸⁶ and the decision-making relative to (former) Yugoslavia in particular, there are four main schools of thought which, put briefly, come down to the following:

1. the media had no influence on politics;
2. it was politics that influenced the media rather than the other way round;
3. the media and the politicians followed the same line;
4. the media most certainly influenced politics.

The first school of thought, well represented among the journalists who worked on the front lines in Yugoslavia, states that all the media interest in the conflict had little if any influence on policy-making.³⁰⁸⁷ Frank Westerman, who worked for De Volkskrant in Belgrade, was of the opinion that ‘If you measure things in terms of influence, you come to the conclusion that it could all have been done in the former Yugoslavia with one tenth the number of journalists who were there. Because it didn’t ³⁰⁸¹ Julia Hartley-Brewer, ‘ITN wins damages in libel victory’, The Guardian, 15/03/00; Aart Brouwer, ‘Bizarre smaad’ (‘Bizarre case of libel’), De Groene Amsterdammer, 22/03/00. H. Seifert, ‘Nach dem Prozess vor dem Ruin’ (‘After the trial the run up to the ruins’), Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 17/03/00.

³⁰⁸² Helen Guldberg, ‘Media: Question and be damned’, The Independent, 21/03/00. ‘Bosnië-foto niet in scène gezet’ (‘Bosnia photo not created’), de Volkskrant, 16/03/00, gave a wrong impression of the situation.

³⁰⁸³ Vgl. Henri Beunders, ‘Oorlog’ (‘War’), p.21.

³⁰⁸⁴ Cees Labeur in TV programme Middageditje, 09/06/97.

³⁰⁸⁵ R. Ciolli, ‘Bosnia Reports Prompt Outrage. Prison camp images drive home urgency’, Newsday, 08/08/92. See also D. Lipstadt, ‘Bosnia’s Horror Is Not a Holocaust. But the outrage also is not a question of comparative suffering’, Newsday, 13/08/92: ‘Unlike previous generations we cannot say ‘we didn’t believe’. We cannot claim we did not know’.

³⁰⁸⁶ On this, see also Appendix, Jan Wieten, Srebrenica en de journalistiek.

³⁰⁸⁷ Cf. Karskens, Pleisters, p.255.

matter a damn whether you reported it or not (...) It was the politicians who hesitated to intervene for years, no matter what we wrote, whatever pictures we took'.³⁰⁸⁸

This attitude often expresses disillusion on the part of journalists who, when they first started work in the former Yugoslavia, had still believed 'that if you showed enough people something that was flagrantly evil, they would react to try to stop it'.³⁰⁸⁹ The war in Bosnia, where journalists were not reined in by strict military censorship – as was the case during the Gulf War, was the first real TV war.³⁰⁹⁰ '[N]o slaughter was more scrupulously and ably covered', said Rieff,³⁰⁹¹ and yet many journalists felt that politicians in the West refused to let the media force them into war or military intervention. In the long term the images of violence and victims led, according to Rieff, more to indifference than to indignation on the part of the wider public.³⁰⁹² Journalists deprived of their original notion that they could influence policy on Yugoslavia, often speak in terms of having lost a fight with the Western politicians, diplomats and military men: 'We lost. They won. The hollow men usually do'.³⁰⁹³ 'That campaign has been lost'.³⁰⁹⁴ Despite all the risks to life and limb taken in order to get the war down in print or on film. This sense of disillusion often led to the journalists in question becoming demotivated. As in the case of Peter Maass, who came to the conclusion that in the end all he was hunting for was 'war porn': the woman who had been raped almost every day for two months; the man who crawled across a minefield after his legs had been blown off; the doctor who amputated limbs without anaesthetic, and so on: 'You were on the lookout for these stories, not because anybody back home was going to do anything about it, but because it was good copy. The agony of Bosnia was being turned into a snuff film'.³⁰⁹⁵ And when journalists from this group did not themselves become disillusioned, they would be confronted by the disappointment of the inhabitants of Sarajevo that all the words published by the journalists had not created any greater readiness on the part of the West to intervene. When Rieff returned after a brief leave, for example, he was asked by a friend of his in the Bosnian capital: 'Another safari? What do you hope to see this time? More corpses, more destruction? We should charge you admission'.³⁰⁹⁶

A second school of thought said that the news tracked policy and not the other way around:³⁰⁹⁷ 'Martin Bell's brilliant work in Bosnia did strike a chord with the general public, but such gems are unlikely to speed a change in policy unless diplomacy is already moving in that direction'.³⁰⁹⁸ It was also alleged that politicians used the media to realize their own aims.³⁰⁹⁹

A third school of thought suggests that the message voiced by the media with regard to intervention was not different from that of the politicians, but that the media ran with the hare and hunted with the hounds. This school of thought finds reinforcement for its ideas in research that shows that in general the media follow rather than form opinion when it is a question of military conflict.³¹⁰⁰

According to a fourth school of thought, finally, the Western media most certainly did influence policy with regard to (former) Yugoslavia in the direction of (greater) intervention.³¹⁰¹ It is mostly assumed that the influence exerted itself on members of parliament, who, in turn, passed the pressure

³⁰⁸⁸ Quoted in: Karskens, Pleisters, p.268.

³⁰⁸⁹ Loyd, War, p.111. See also Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.216.

³⁰⁹⁰ Moorcraft, Conflict.

³⁰⁹¹ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.223.

³⁰⁹² Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.216.

³⁰⁹³ Loyd, War, p.112. Cf. Bell, Way, p.22

³⁰⁹⁴ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.10. See ibid., pp.41 and 222.

³⁰⁹⁵ Maass, Neighbor, p.247.

³⁰⁹⁶ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.224.

³⁰⁹⁷ Seib, Politics, pp.62-63.

³⁰⁹⁸ Moorcraft, Conflict.

³⁰⁹⁹ Seib, Politics, pp.62-63.

³¹⁰⁰ H. van Dort, 'Sterven voor Srbica?' ('Dying for Srbica?'), Carré (1999)6, p.18; Michael Ignatieff, 'The Stories We Tell. Television and Humanitarian Aid', Moore (ed.), Choices, p.299.

³¹⁰¹ See, for instance, Silber & Little, Death, p.252.

on to the government. Parliamentarians have regularly said that they were subjected to great influence and even pressure from the reporting, particularly that published in De Volkskrant and NRC Handelsblad and shown on television.³¹⁰²

Adherents of this school of thought often point to the steadily stronger distortion that they allege television has been showing in the last few years. Real-time reporting, made possible by satellites, and increased commercial competition, it is alleged, have taken away that moment of critical journalistic reflection, a development that has already led to calls for journalists to slow down.³¹⁰³ As a result, the distance between information and manipulation, it is said, has been reduced. The commercial television companies in the Netherlands and abroad³¹⁰⁴ are also accused of having contributed to a more emotion-based presentation.³¹⁰⁵ “Emo-television” floods not only the reporting of home-grown stories but it has also become difficult to “sell” a subject from abroad if it is not accompanied by a stiff dose of emotion. Of course, this applies first and foremost to television. But the other media do not escape this evolution’, states radio journalist Liesbet Walckiers of Flemish Radio and Television (VRT). In fact it is television that sets the agenda as far as the news is concerned.³¹⁰⁶

Adherents of this school of thought speak of a so-called CNN effect, that limits the elbow-room for policymaking on the part of governments because the media pushes them at least to do ‘something’ with regard to situations crying to heaven for intervention.³¹⁰⁷ Various Western military men, diplomats and politicians have felt extremely annoyed, partly following the crises in Yugoslavia, at this alleged media influence on foreign policy. The End of Mission report delivered by Force Commander Janvier of UNPROFOR accused the media of having been ‘the self-appointed leaders of the “something must be done” group’, who exerted enormous pressure on the UN and the troop-contributing nations.³¹⁰⁸

The British Minister of Foreign Affairs, Douglas Hurd, also complained in September 1993 about foreign correspondents whom he called ‘founder members of the ‘something must be done’ school’. Of all the conflicts in the world they had picked out the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina for intervention. ‘But nothing more clearly separates the commentator from those who carry the responsibility for the decision,’ said Hurd.³¹⁰⁹ He stated that there was nothing new in mass rapes, firing at civilians, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and the torching of towns and villages. The only thing that was new was that a selection of these crimes could be seen in another part of the world within hours.³¹¹⁰ Hurd’s French counterpart, Hubert Védrine, alleged that the French intellectuals had formed an alliance with the media in order to plead for intervention.³¹¹¹ In May 1993 Boutros-Ghali expressed the opinion that simplifying and exaggerated reporting on television had caused public emotions to arise

³¹⁰² See, for instance, Jan Hoekema, quoted in Both, Indifference, p.50; review by Gerrit Valk of Klep & Van Gils, Korea, in: BMGN vol. 115, issue 4, p.657.

³¹⁰³ Joan Hemels, ‘Journalisten: spelbrekers en onruststokers in de samenleving?’ (Journalists: society’s killjoys and troublemakers?) Becker (red.) Massamedia, p.35; Marc Hooghe, ‘Neutraliteit en betrokkenheid. Evoluties in de Vlaamse journalistiek sinds de zaak Dutroux’ (Neutrality and involvement. Evolutions in Flemish journalism since the Dutroux case), ibid., pp.57 and 60-61.

³¹⁰⁴ For this development in Belgium see, for instance, Marc Hooghe, ‘Neutraliteit en betrokkenheid. Evoluties in de Vlaamse journalistiek sinds de zaak Dutroux’, Becker (red.), Massamedia, pp.50-51 and 55.

³¹⁰⁵ Richard Schoonhoven, ‘New Concessions Act presents broadcasting companies with a complex dilemma. Tensions between collaboration and autonomy’, Becker (red.), Massamedia, pp.16-17; Joan Hemels, ‘Journalisten: spelbrekers en onruststokers in de samenleving?’, ibid., p.30.

³¹⁰⁶ Liesbet Walckiers, ‘De media en de derde Wereld’ (‘The media and the Third World’), Becker (ed.), Massamedia, pp.128-129.

³¹⁰⁷ Callahan, Wars, p.78; Jett, Peacekeeping, pp.29-30; Seib, Politics, pp.60-61.

³¹⁰⁸ Headquarters UNPF, Force Commander’s End of Mission Report, 31/01/96, Executive Summary, par. 14.

³¹⁰⁹ William Russell, ‘Public debate run by media, not by events, says Hurd’, The Herald, 10/09/93. See also Hoge, Pervasiveness, p.138; Hugo Young, ‘Commentary: Hurd’s world in camera, not in the camera’s’, The Guardian, 14/09/93.

³¹¹⁰ Hurd quoted in Bell, Way, p.137.

³¹¹¹ Védrine, Mondes, pp.625-643.

that undermined the work of the UN.³¹¹² The Japanese Yasushi Akashi, appointed at the beginning of 1994 as Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the UN for the former Yugoslavia, later complained that the UN had allowed itself to be led in the conflict largely by 'a media-driven agenda in reaction to public opinion'. The need 'to do something' and the desire on the part of some to adopt a high profile towards the press had, he claimed, led to a proliferation of unenforceable mandates.³¹¹³ Finally the experienced American diplomat George Kennan had already been grumbling in 1992 that if this media trend continued there would be no room left for 'what have traditionally been regarded as the responsible deliberative organs of our government'.³¹¹⁴

Many media experts reject the pessimism of politicians and diplomats such as Hurd, Védrine and Kennan when they complain that their policy is determined by the media. These experts believe that politicians themselves can temper the emotional effect produced by television if they set out a clear political course, explain it and subsequently stick to it.³¹¹⁵ Then they can quietly 'sit out' the media storm that sometimes blows up.³¹¹⁶ It is only when authorities fail to sketch the background against which a foreign political crisis should be interpreted, if they themselves do not have any clear policy in mind or are unable to explain their policy clearly to the public, that the media come along and fill the vacuum by directing attention to alternative policies.³¹¹⁷ Seen from this angle, complaints of politicians about media influence are at the same time complaints against themselves, and the influence of the media is only possible because of the politicians' lack of political courage, clarity and consistency. In the concrete case of Bosnia, it can be added that many Western governments made themselves extra dependent on reporting in the media by taking so long to open diplomatic missions after Bosnia-Herzegovina had been recognized, missions that could have provided them with their own direct information.³¹¹⁸

In view of the fact that the relationship between the media and policy is evidently subjected to the attitudes of politicians and thus can vary from day to day, it is understandable that in their descriptions of the effect of the media, authors writing about policy towards Yugoslavia advance elements from various schools of thought simultaneously. Thus, for example, in the book written by Both, who studied Dutch policy towards the wars in Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1995, we find the third and fourth schools of thought. On the one hand Both seems to espouse the third school of thought (media and foreign policy following the same line) when he writes: 'Editorials, television interviews, opinion polls, parliamentary debates and the advice emanating from the officials in the Foreign Ministry all pointed in the same direction: giving moral, political and military support to the Bosnian Muslims'.³¹¹⁹ On the other hand, in line with the fourth school of thought (the media certainly had an influence), he suggests that the 'Omarska' pictures when seen in the Netherlands led, just as in ³¹¹² John Burns, 'The Media as Impartial Observers or Protagonists. Conflict Reporting or Conflict Encouragement in The former Yugoslavia', Gow & Paterson & Preston (eds.), Bosnia, pp.1992-93.

³¹¹³ Akashi, Limits, p.1992.

³¹¹⁴ Quoted in Seib, Politics, p.61. The Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs, J.J. Van Aartsen, made similar statements in 1999, J.J. van Aartsen, 'Buitenlands beleid moet zich niet laten leiden door CNN' ('Foreign policy must not be guided by CNN'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/99.

³¹¹⁵ Cf. Hoge, Pervasiveness, pp.142 and 144.

³¹¹⁶ Moorcraft, Conflict.

³¹¹⁷ Bell, Way, pp.142-143; James Gow/Richard Paterson/Alison Preston, 'Introduction', idem (eds.), Bosnia, p.7; Haas, Intervention, p.86; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p.14; Warren P. Strobel, 'The Media and U.S. Policies Toward Intervention. A Closer Look at the 'CNN Effect'', Crocker & Hampson with Aall (eds.), Chaos, pp.358 and 360; Strobel, Policy, pp.219 and 225; R.H. Sandee, 'Zorgvuldig en weloverwogen. De besluitvorming over crisisbeheersingsoperaties' ('Careful and well-considered. How decisions are taken on crisis management operations'), Carré, 21(1998)12, p.29; Rob de Wijk in Marijnissen & Glastra van Loon, Oorlog, pp.1992-93.

³¹¹⁸ Cf. Bell, Way, p.39.

³¹¹⁹ Both, Indifference, p.147.

France, the United Kingdom and the United States, to pressure being put on the government to initiate military intervention.³¹²⁰

The historian Michael Ignatieff puts forwards an explanation that links together the latter two schools of thought – the media and the politicians were following the same line and the media influenced politics.³¹²¹ According to his notion, television does indeed follow current moral judgements but the medium also has certain distorting effects. Television has a tendency, for instance, to create a feeling of identification in the viewers. To this end individuals, such as Fikret Alic behind the barbed wire of Trnopolje, are pictured without any clarification of the extent to which such an image is representative. The medium of television also omits to mention the mechanisms that underlie victimhood and offers little room for statements or explanations regarding the political context of which the victim is part.³¹²² Ignatieff is of the opinion that the television images themselves did not cause Western policymakers to change their view on intervention in Bosnia but they certainly provided the supporters of intervention, who had long been crying scandal at the lack of large-scale military action on the part of the West, with material that enabled them to swell their ranks. Thus ‘the moral stories we tell through television are less influential than their visual impact would suggest, but they are not as unimportant as sceptics would imply; and (...) they do play a continuing role in structuring the interventions, humanitarian and otherwise.’³¹²³

Nick Gowing, in the context of a research project for the Harvard University John F. Kennedy School, interviewed more than a hundred diplomats and senior military men about the role that they thought the media had played in forming the policy towards Yugoslavia in the 1990s, and concluded that the idea that shocking images of ethnic conflicts determine foreign policy is ‘a self-perpetuating myth’. He pointed out that the bombing of Vukovar or Dubrovnik, for instance, had not led to military intervention. The idea that images did have influence was reinforced by politicians who pretended they were ‘doing something’. The only effect brought about by the television images was to highlight the lack of will and the impotence of Western leaders. Images on television sometimes threaten to thwart the agenda of policy makers by arousing reactions from the public. Partly for this reason they are tempted to reject such images as emotional and fleeting.³¹²⁴ The Dutch political scientist Philip Everts believed at an earlier stage that the influence of the media on foreign policy consists mainly in setting the political agenda. The media, he claimed, do not determine what people think but what they think about.³¹²⁵ Finally the parliamentary journalist with Trouw, Willem Breedveld, interviewed for this report, gave a similar explanation for the link between the third and fourth schools of thought, in what one would be tempted to call a formula: ‘News is that which confirms an expectation. Preferably in a surprising manner’.³¹²⁶

12. Increasing readiness to initiate military intervention before the Trnopolje images

With these four schools of thought as background, we will now examine the influence of the television images of Fikret Alic in the Trnopolje camp on public opinion and policy. Here the main emphasis is on the situation in the Netherlands, but where possible comparisons are made with what was ³¹²⁰ Both, Indifference, pp.145-146; “What really engaged the Dutch, as well as Western, moral consciousness, were the TV images of Serb-run concentration camps full of emaciated non-Serb prisoners. ITN’s television production of 6August1992 triggered the kind of response that neither written journalism, nor the siege and fall of Vukovar, nor events in Bosnia until then had provoked. ... Like in Britain, France or the US many Dutch commentators now argued the case for a military intervention against the Serbs ...”

³¹²¹ Michael Ignatieff, ‘The Stories We Tell. Television and Humanitarian Aid’, Moore (ed.), Choices, pp.287-302.

³¹²² Michael Ignatieff, ‘The Stories We Tell. Television and Humanitarian Aid’, Moore (ed.), Choices, pp.293-295.

³¹²³ Michael Ignatieff, ‘The Stories We Tell. Television and Humanitarian Aid’, Moore (ed.), Choices, p.300.

³¹²⁴ Nick Gowing, ‘Behind the CNN Factor’, The Washington Post, 31/07/94; Gowing, Pictures.

³¹²⁵ Everts (ed.), Controversies, p.56.

³¹²⁶ Interview W. Breedveld, 11/10/00.

happening in other countries. Three aspects are dealt with. First, the question of the extent to which, prior to the broadcast of the images, public opinion in the West had been charged with emotion and whether this had been accompanied by comparisons between the Serbs and the Nazis. The second aspect is the extent to which there were individuals questioning the strong reactions to the images. And, in the third place, the question of the influence of the images on the actions of politicians in the West. Here influence is defined as a mechanism that moved politicians to do something that they would not have done had the images of Trnopolje not been shown on television. Some of the matters in the previous paragraph will receive special attention, such as the role of parliament as mediator between public opinion and government, any impotence on the part of politicians demonstrated by the ITN documentary and the follow-up to that in the media and, finally, the question as to whether the media set the agenda of the public and political debates.

Well before the ITN programme went out on 6 August a break in the trend could be seen in American journals as regards the amount of interest shown by the printed press in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. As early as in June 1992 the number of articles about the war published in the main printed media had more than doubled in comparison to previous months. This trend continued quietly in July and August and then subsided somewhat.³¹²⁷ Not only did the quantity increase but the content of the articles also changed. Many American commentators expressed their indignation at the lack of activity on the part of European leaders with regard to Yugoslavia, but also criticized their own President Bush, who allowed his re-election campaign to take pride of place over a more active attitude to Yugoslavia.³¹²⁸ Something similar was happening in Europe. As early as the end of June American journalists concluded that public indignation in Europe regarding the events in Bosnia was growing as a result of 'a barrage of television images' that illustrated the Serb attacks on Sarajevo with bloody pictures.³¹²⁹

The resultant ethnic cleansing and streams of refugees led to pressure on Western governments to do more. In the United Kingdom, prior to the broadcast of the ITN film, the former Labour Foreign Minister Lord Owen, the Liberal Democrat leader Paddy Ashdown and former premier Margaret Thatcher had criticized the then Prime Minister, John Major, for what they saw as too little effort to stem Serb aggression in Bosnia.³¹³⁰ Owen, who was very impressed by Maggie O'Kane's 29 July article had, for instance, written an open letter to Major the following day in which he drew a comparison with camps in 'the early stages of the Nazi holocaust'. He called for NATO air attacks on artillery, tanks, armoured cars and aircraft in the former Yugoslavia.³¹³¹ This produced a reaction from Major in which he stated that the British government's efforts were focused on humanitarian help and on exerting pressure on the warring factions to negotiate, followed by the announcement 'This may take time'.³¹³² This answer did not, at any rate, satisfy Major's predecessor, Margaret Thatcher. In an article in The New York Times, published on 6 August before the ITN broadcast of the same date, she called ethnic cleansing a combination of cruelties that Hitler and Stalin had used on other peoples. She therefore argued for the lifting of the weapons embargo imposed on the Bosnian government and for NATO military action against Serbia. Alliance aircraft should, she said, bomb objects such as bridges

³¹²⁷ Sadkovich, Media, p.111.

³¹²⁸ See, for instance, William Pfaff, 'Before Any Intervention, Clarify the Political Goal', International Herald Tribune, 18/06/92; idem, 'Europe Can't Afford to Appease Serbia', International Herald Tribune, 03/08/92; Anthony Lewis, 'Joegoslavië laat Bush'falen als president zien' ('Yugoslavia shows Bush's failure as president'), de Volkskrant, 04/08/92; Daniel Johnson, 'Europe's bloodstained lies', Times, 05/08/92.

³¹²⁹ Stanley Meisler & Duyle McManus, 'Allies talk of using force to aid Sarajevo', Los Angeles Times, 26/06/92.

³¹³⁰ See, for instance, Hans Nijenhuis, 'Wil het Westen ingrijpen?' (Does the West want to intervene?), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

³¹³¹ Owen, Odyssey, pp.15-16.

³¹³² Owen, Odyssey, pp.19-20.

over the Drina and Serb military convoys and the heavy guns stationed around Sarajevo and Gorazde.³¹³³

Spoken and written words about the activities of the Serbs in terms referring to the Third Reich and the Second World War were also apparent before the ITN broadcast. Oostlander, writing in the NRC Handelsblad as early as 11 May said that there was little difference between the regime of Karadzic and that of Hitler. In that month he called for a surgical military strike on the part of the WEU, without ground troops, against the Serb ‘national socialists’, since that was the only language they would understand.³¹³⁴ In other newspapers too comparisons were drawn with fascism and the Second World War.³¹³⁵ In a broadcast put out by the Dutch television programme NOS Laat on 27 July the vice-chairman of the VluchtelingenWerk (Refugee Work) organization made several comparisons between the circumstances of the refugees from Yugoslavia and the fate of refugees from Hitler’s Germany in the 1930s, following which presenter Charles Groenhuijsen closed the subject saying that it was typical of the problem that his studio guest had had to refer several times to the Second World War.³¹³⁶ Two days later Minister H. Schoor of the German federal state North Rhine-Westphalia did the same in the TV programme NOS Laat.³¹³⁷ ‘More and more the actions of the Serbs in Bosnia are being compared to Nazi practices in the Second World War’, wrote NRC Handelsblad on 5 August.³¹³⁸

The Dutch media had also argued for more effective action on the part of the West in Bosnia prior to the broadcasting of the images from ‘Omarska’. Examples of this were, for instance, the pleas for some form of military intervention voiced by De Kok, Oostlander, Faber and the brothers Tromp. The interventionist core-piece by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel also appeared before the ITN broadcast: on 5 August. On 29 July the editorial in Trouw called for WEU and NATO intervention with the use of force to create the desired situation in the former Yugoslavia rather than leaving the territory to its fate.³¹³⁹

As early as the beginning of July the Legerkoerier noted that ‘minds’ were slowly turning to thoughts of military intervention.³¹⁴⁰ While the majority of (former) army staff were still resisting the idea of military intervention, there were some among them who began to feel some sympathy for action. Retired general Govert Huyser, for instance, who had advised against intervention in June because of the lack of a clear goal and an obvious enemy,³¹⁴¹ was now wanting to go further. He thought an action involving a hundred thousand men plus tanks and artillery would be advisable. From Sarajevo they should deal ‘a rapid, hefty blow’ and liberate the prison camps. At the same time barracks, weapon depots and communications centres of the Yugoslavian Army and the Ministry of Defence in Belgrade should be taken out. In brief: ‘The military command structure should be completely paralysed’.³¹⁴² At the end of July Van Eekelen also called for a massive intervention on the part of WEU ground troops to protect aid convoys and actually return fire.³¹⁴³

³¹³³ Margaret Thatcher, ‘Stop the Excuses. Help Bosnia Now’, The New York Times, 06/08/92. Margaret Thatcher appeared in print in almost identical terms, ‘Nog even en het is te laat voor een actie tegen Servië’ (‘Just a little longer and it will be too late for a campaign against Serbia’), de Volkskrant, 10/08/92.

³¹³⁴ Arie Oostlander, ‘De onverantwoordelijkheid van Europa’ (‘The irresponsibility of Europe’), CD/Actueel, 23/05/92, p.21.

³¹³⁵ Ten Cate, Eén, pp.106-107.

³¹³⁶ NOS Laat, 27/07/92.

³¹³⁷ NOS Laat, 29/07/92.

³¹³⁸ Hans Nijenhuis, ‘Wil het Westen ingrijpen?’ NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

³¹³⁹ ‘Vluchtelingen (1) and (2)’, Trouw, 29/07/92.

³¹⁴⁰ Wiebren Tabak, ‘Het collectieve geweten van de wereld’ (The collective conscience of the world), Legerkoerier, 07/07/92, p.22.

³¹⁴¹ Generaal b.d. Govert Huyser, ‘Interventie in Joegoslavië is niet realistisch’ (‘Intervention in Yugoslavia unrealistic’), Limburgse Courant, 10/06/92.

³¹⁴² Laurent Heere, ‘Militaire actie in Bosnië onvermijdelijk’ (‘Military campaign in Bosnia unavoidable’), Rotterdams Dagblad, 06/08/92; idem ‘Tijd van praten is voorbij’ (‘Time for talking is over’), Haagsche Courant, 07/08/92.

³¹⁴³ Bart Tromp, ‘Derde Balkanoorlog is in voorbereiding’ (‘Preparations for third Balkan war underway’), Het Parool, 01/08/92.

At the end of July the former military attaché in Belgrade, retired Brigadier General De Vogel, who in 1991 had still been hesitant about interference in Croatia (see Chapters 2 and 3), revealed himself as a supporter of limited intervention in Bosnia. This should be based on air strikes on Serb targets and on the barricading of the Yugoslavian navy in the bay of Kotor. He did not support large-scale use of ground troops: 'Otherwise you land in the morass of a civil war where friend and enemy can scarcely be distinguished one from the other'.³¹⁴⁴ Comparisons between Yugoslavia in the Second World War, Vietnam and Afghanistan, he said, came immediately to mind.³¹⁴⁵

The debate on intervention heated up particularly in the week prior to the television transmission of the images from Trnopolje, with the ranks of the interventionists on the increase³¹⁴⁶. The Netherlands Institute of International Relations 'Clingendael' played an important part here with a great number of publications and interviews with Voorhoeve and Van den Doel. At the beginning of July Dick Leurdijk, Clingendael's UN specialist, had also called for precision bombing of military targets in Serbia and on the Serbian militia in Bosnia-Herzegovina.³¹⁴⁷

On 4 August the historian Hermann Walther von der Dunk wrote in the NRC Handelsblad criticizing 'the hollow rhetoric' of the West in the face of the crimes committed in the name of Greater Serbia. Without solid military intervention, he wrote, the ethnic cleansing and murders on the part of the Serbs would not be halted. In his view the Netherlands occupied a special position among the countries of the West because of its 'loud-mouthed cowardice' whose origins were to be found in the country's pre-war policy of neutrality and its post-war slavish attitude towards the United States.³¹⁴⁸

On 5 August the dailies and weeklies offered a wide spread of contributions to the intervention debate. Not only did Voorhoeve and Van den Doel publish their views in De Volkskrant, but editor André Roelofs concluded on the same day in the same morning daily that limited military intervention, at least taking out the Serbs' heavy arms and possibly creating safe havens, now seemed inevitable.³¹⁴⁹ On 5 August NRC Handelsblad contained several contributions on the subject of military intervention in the former Yugoslavia. The editorial on that day was the first in which NRC Handelsblad made an unbridled plea for immediate military intervention: 'Each day that passes means so much less to protect'.³¹⁵⁰ In his contribution that day columnist Henk Hofland called it a 'scandal' that the West was doing nothing about the 'brutal behaviour' of the Serbs in Bosnia.³¹⁵¹ And also on that day NRC Handelsblad published a contribution of two authors on the question of whether the West was willing and able to intervene.³¹⁵²

It was clear that the press was one of the initiators of the intervention debate. For example De Groene Amsterdammer, in its 5 August issue, published the results of a discussion on intervention organized by the paper between Hylke Tromp, General De Vogel, the Utrecht professor of human rights Peter Baehr, and the publicist Paul Scheffer. Tromp was, as could be expected after his previous statements, a supporter of large-scale military intervention since 'further muddling through' would lead to a second Vietnam.³¹⁵³ Scheffer did not wish to exclude military intervention but, he said, the aims would have to be clear: was it about stopping the ethnic cleansing or getting rid of Milosevic? Baehr ³¹⁴⁴ Max Arian and Joke van Kampen, 'Te wapen' (To arms), De Groene Amsterdammer, 05/08/92, p.4.

³¹⁴⁵ J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Een strategie voor militair ingrijpen in Joegoslavië' ('A strategy for military intervention in Yugoslavia'), Vrij Nederland, 25/07/92, pp.10-11.

³¹⁴⁶ See Ten Cate, 'Eén' ('One'), p.105.

³¹⁴⁷ Wiebren Tabak, 'Het collectieve geweten van de wereld', Legerkoerier, 07/07/92, p.22.

³¹⁴⁸ H.W. von der Dunk, 'Lauwheid omdat Balkan niet in politiek schema past' ('Tepidity because Balkans do not fit into political programme'), NRC Handelsblad, 04/08/92.

³¹⁴⁹ André Roelofs, 'Kunnen we nog blijven zuchten en protesteren?' ('Can we carry on sighing and protesting?'), de Volkskrant, 05/08/92.

³¹⁵⁰ 'Ingrijpen noodzakelijk' ('Intervention necessary'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

³¹⁵¹ 'Sterven voor Sarajevo' ('Dying for Sarajevo?'), NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

³¹⁵² Hans Nijenhuis, 'Wil het Westen ingrijpen?' and Peter Michielsen, 'Kan het Westen ingrijpen?', NRC Handelsblad, 05/08/92.

³¹⁵³ Max Arian and Joke van Kampen, 'Te wapen', De Groene Amsterdammer, 05/08/92, p.4.

was of the opinion that international law did not allow for military intervention and that Tromp's argument of systematic violation of human rights would imply interventions in all parts of the world. Moreover, he and Scheffer believed, there was the risk of more people being killed because of the escalation that would follow intervention.

Also on 5 August the Nijmegen polemologist Leon Wecke called for limited intervention: 'Perhaps the failed peacekeeping force should be called back and we should bomb the Serb mortars in the Sarajevo hills in order to get them to stop their messing about'. In addition he called for action to liberate the prison camps, provided – of course – that they existed, which would not surprise him in view of the nature of the conflict. He was opposed to sending ground troops. There was no readiness on the part of the West to supply sufficient men. The situation on the ground was too complex. It was better to let the war be fought to a standstill since then at least would the balance of powers be set.³¹⁵⁴

On the morning of 6 August Trouw thus correctly commented that the call for military intervention was becoming louder. The paper gave the following reasons: the reports of starvation in besieged towns in Bosnia, ethnic cleansing and deportation, the floods of refugees and the 'concentration camps' where torture was practised.³¹⁵⁵ The paper claimed that the politicians' readiness to intervene was growing at the same pace as the flood of refugees.³¹⁵⁶

It was not only among the speech-making elite, who filled the opinion and commentary pages of the Dutch press, that one could speak of an increasing preparedness to undertake some kind of action in the interests of Yugoslavia, a preparedness that was leading to growing preference for military intervention. The VluchtelingenWerk association for refugees indicated that incoming telephone calls showed growing involvement, with private individuals calling to offer shelter for refugees from the former Yugoslavia. Since mid-July the organization had been receiving ten to fifteen such calls a day.³¹⁵⁷ The Mensen in Nood (People in Need) foundation in Den Bosch, that had started collecting clothing offered by private individuals for Yugoslavia on 29 July, said that on the first day the phone had not stopped ringing right from the start.³¹⁵⁸ But the Dutch Interchurch Peace Council (IKV) – just like Pax Christi – proved unable to mobilize people. Either they were on holiday or they were watching the Olympic Games in Barcelona, stated secretary Mient Jan Faber.³¹⁵⁹ Foreign affairs commentator J.L. Heldring therefore asked in the NRC Handelsblad, with reference to the large-scale demonstrations that the IKV had succeeded in organizing in previous years against the placing of medium-range missiles and against the Gulf War, where the demonstrations were now.³¹⁶⁰

An AVRO/Nipo poll on 6 August, the day the ITN images were shown, provided proof of what the silent majority was thinking. The poll showed that 22% of those questioned were already closely following the reports from Yugoslavia, 56% reasonably closely and 18% scarcely at all. It further emerged that 83% of the Dutch population supported a more generous attitude towards the admission into the Netherlands of refugees from the former Yugoslavia. Of this representative sample of the Dutch population 87% agreed with Dutch participation in military intervention in the former Yugoslavia. Two-thirds of those questioned said that they would maintain this view even if Dutch soldiers were killed. More than 60% of the respondents even wanted military action designed to put a complete stop to the war in the former Yugoslavia.³¹⁶¹

³¹⁵⁴ Hans Leber, 'Laat ze de oorlog uitvechten' (Let them fight their own war), Twentsche Courant, 05/08/92.

³¹⁵⁵ 'Interventie vergt offers (1)' (Intervention translates into casualties), Trouw, 06/08/92.

³¹⁵⁶ 'Interventie vergt offers (2)', Trouw, 06/08/92.

³¹⁵⁷ J.A. Hoeksma, vice-chairman of the VluchtelingenWerk association in NOS Laet, 27/07/92; 'Particulieren bieden hulp bij opvang Bosniërs' (Private individuals offer help in receiving Bosnians), NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/92.

³¹⁵⁸ 'Particulieren bieden hulp bij opvang Bosniërs', NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/92.

³¹⁵⁹ 'Particulieren bieden hulp bij opvang Bosniërs', NRC Handelsblad, 29/07/92.

³¹⁶⁰ J.L. Heldring, 'Waar blijft het protest?' ('Where's the protest?'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/07/92 and 'Schijnheiligheid troef' ('Hypocrisy laid bare'), NRC Handelsblad, 31/07/92.

³¹⁶¹ Radio 2, AVRO, Radiojournaal, 09/08/92, 1.04pm; De Boode & Everts, 'Ontwikkelingen', pp.187-188; Nederlanders keuren militair ingrijpen in ex-Joegoslavië goed' ('Dutch approve of military intervention in ex-Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 10/08/92. Six months later 66% of those interviewed in a NIPO poll were still of the same mind, 'Slachtoffers aanvaardbaar

In so reacting, the Dutch population went much further than the ‘humanitarian help with a military fringe’ under the UN umbrella which, at the time, was as far as the Dutch parties of the coalition government – CDA, PvdA and VVD – were prepared to go.³¹⁶² Nonetheless support among members of parliament for harder action seemed to be growing even before the ITN footage was broadcast. NRC Handelsblad summarized the mood among parliamentarians on 6 August, a few hours before the programme went out, as follows: ‘The senseless violence must at some time be brought to an end; and if it cannot be negotiated, then by the use of force’.³¹⁶³

The conclusion is therefore justified that broader public opinion in the Netherlands was far and away in favour of military intervention even before the showing of Trnopolje images and was even in favour of very strong action. A debate about intervention had already started. The parliamentarians too had shifted in that direction, though less far than public opinion.³¹⁶⁴ The parliamentary debate that took place on 12 August had already been requested by De Hoop Scheffer before the ITN programme was broadcast, following claims made by Sacirbey about the existence of camps. During the debate on 12 August it became apparent that the members did not think that the government had gone far enough in adopting a position towards Bosnia-Herzegovina. And yet this was more an optical than a fundamental difference. There had been a basic readiness on the part of the Dutch government, even before the summer, ‘to do something’ to contribute towards a solution in the former Yugoslavia that could be regarded as just. The question as to whether the international community and, more specifically, the Netherlands should do something about the war in Bosnia had not been, as the then vice-premier Kok later put it, ‘not really relevant’ for the Dutch government:

‘The question of whether we should do something or not, that is: are we going to let this slip away, as it were, - an incident in history in which we have no involvement and for which we have no responsibility - this question has roughly speaking never been subjected to critical discussion – in the sense of: surely we can leave it to others to deal with.’³¹⁶⁵

In late July/early August there was, nonetheless, some sort of bottom-up movement to get the Dutch government to do more, and this was apparent in the readiness of local councils, housing associations and private individuals to offer accommodation and thus exert pressure to admit refugees from the former Yugoslavia. The movement started, however, before the images from Trnopolje were broadcast. It had been partly set in motion by information in the press about the existence of the camps but, as far as can be judged, also by reports of ethnic cleansing, floods of refugees and the bombing of Sarajevo. Comparisons with the situation under the Third Reich and during the Second World War were also not uncommon. In that sense the Trnopolje pictures added to Breedveld’s ‘formula’ that news is that which confirms an expectation in a surprising manner.

bij actie in ex-Joegoslavië’ (‘Casualties acceptable in campaign in ex-Yugoslavia’), de Volkskrant, 02/02/93. This opinion was diametrically opposed to Wecke’s opinion that support would dwindle if there were more victims, Hans Leber, ‘Laat ze de oorlog uitvechten’, Tweentsche Courant, 05/08/92. See also L. Wecke, ‘Als er veel soldaten sneuvelen is het uit met steun voor de actie’ (‘If a lot of soldiers fall, support for the campaign will crumble’), Trouw, 23/02/93.

³¹⁶² Van den Broek in NOS TV news, 07/08/92; De Hoop Scheffer and Valk in Radio 2, Avro Radiojournaal, 09/08/92, 1.04pm; Blaauw and De Hoop Scheffer in TV, Nederland 3, NOS Laat, 11/08/92, 10.30pm; ‘Kamerleden terug van vakantie voor Joegoslavië-debat’ (‘MPs back from vacations for debate on Yugoslavia’), de Volkskrant, 06/08/92; Rob Meines, ‘Verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië’ (‘No unanimity on intervention in Bosnia’), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

³¹⁶³ Rob Meines, ‘Verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië’, NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

³¹⁶⁴ Cf. ‘Groeicende verdeeldheid over ingrijpen in Bosnië’ (‘Growing willingness among politicians to intervene’), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92.

³¹⁶⁵ Interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

13. Opponents of intervention after the images of Trnopolje

In many ways the influence of the images of Trnopolje can be put in perspective. In the first place there were some who continued to object to the emphasis that many media were placing on the Bosnian conflict, at the expense of interest in the civil war in Somalia. In the United States, in the days following the broadcasting of the Trnopolje images, commentary appeared in The New York Times, The Washington Post and a broadcast by ABS News which defended this position earlier adopted by Boutros-Ghali.³¹⁶⁶ Minister Pronk in the Netherlands expressed similar thoughts. The sociologist Jacques van Doorn, writing in HP/De Tijd of 21 August, called the conflict in Bosnia a major drama in European terms but modest in terms of – for instance – the Caucasus, Afghanistan, Cambodia, East Timor and various African countries. He did not think anything could be achieved by a military intervention on the part of the United Nations or the European Community since it is national interests that prevails in those international organizations. Bosnia, he said, was like a house on fire. ‘Looking on helplessly is insufferable, but it has become too risky to enter the house (...) It means that we have to wait until the flames die out for lack of fuel, a prospect that is scarcely acceptable. Thus the discussion will drag on and with the courage of despair sporadic attempts will be made to save what can be saved.’³¹⁶⁷

Secondly, focusing again on the debate in the Netherlands, even after the showing of the Trnopolje images, there remained opponents of intervention. They warned against a lack of long-term aims for Bosnia, the lack of military means for an effective approach, the difficulties posed by the terrain, the many-sided character of the enemy, the risk of a guerrilla war and tensions within the EC and NATO should too many disagreements arise between countries for and against intervention.³¹⁶⁸ In addition, according to some writers, modesty suited the Netherlands in the international debate on intervention. For example, professor of social history Henri Beunders referred to the pro-intervention calls made by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel as ‘remarkable, if not superficial’.³¹⁶⁹

According to foreign affairs commentator G.B.J. Hiltermann in de Telegraaf the otherwise ever-careful Clingendael institute had turned into ‘a pugnacious political non-think tank’. He warned of the guerrilla war that would be waiting for a Western intervention force in the ‘scarcely accessible terrain’, in the same way that life had been made difficult for Hitler’s ‘37 divisions’.³¹⁷⁰

The journalists Frans van Deijl and Auke Kok reacted in HP/De Tijd to Voorhoeve’s proposals to have the Serb ‘concentration camps’ liberated by commandos. According to the two journalists the Dutch commandos were not the Rambo-types capable of doing such a thing. They were trained mainly as observers and reconnaissance troops. Commandos from other countries could perhaps liberate the camps without too much difficulty, but would then find themselves in dangerous enemy territory with the freed detainees. Van Deijl and Kok reckoned that 400,000 soldiers would be required to ensure safe conduct for the convoys ‘and even then success is not guaranteed’. Thus it was a ‘mission impossible’.³¹⁷¹ According to the two journalists the chances of success of any air support were doubtful because of the probable presence of anti-aircraft missiles, that could be fired from the shoulders of Serbian ‘wild men’ operating around Sarajevo. And should the West be prepared to use military means to deliver an ultimatum to all the warring factions, they would have to anticipate ‘a death toll that would far surpass the consequences of the clean war against Iraq – 100,000 victims’.³¹⁷²

³¹⁶⁶ Strobel, Policy, p.138.

³¹⁶⁷ J.A.A. van Doorn, ‘Een pleidooi voor rekolonisatie’ (‘A plea for recolonisation’), HP/De Tijd, 21/08/92, p.12.

³¹⁶⁸ Peter Michielsen, for example, was of the opinion that military intervention to stop or reverse the ethnic cleansing would require such a large military contingent that it was unrealistic, Peter Michielsen, ‘Etnisch zuiveren: Servisch patent’ (‘Ethnic cleansing: Serb patent’), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92. For a similar opinion see J.W. van der Meulen, ‘Militaire interventie op Balkan kan weinig uitrichten’ (‘Military intervention in Balkans can accomplish little’), Het Financieele Dagblad, 21/08/92.

³¹⁶⁹ Henri Beunders, ‘Prijs Balkan-interventie is te hoog’ (‘Price of Balkan intervention is too high’), de Volkskrant, 07/08/92.

³¹⁷⁰ G.B.J. Hiltermann, ‘Onmacht van de ‘beschaafde wereld’ (‘Impotence of the “civilised world”’), de Telegraaf, 22/08/92.

³¹⁷¹ Frans van Deijl & Auke Kok, ‘Mission impossible’, HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p.18.

³¹⁷² Frans van Deijl & Auke Kok, ‘Mission impossible’, HP/De Tijd, 21/08/93, p.20.

In his response Beunders qualified the small piece' by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel published in De Volkskrant on 5 August as 'an example of Gesinnungsethiek that places good intentions above consequences'. As possible consequences of the proposals made by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel Beunders saw conflict escalation, internationalization, a rift in NATO, the WEU or the EC, while it was not possible to indicate what the final aim was to be in Bosnia. Ethnic cleansing using peaceful methods, for instance, could lead to long-term irredentism. And thus Beunders called for 'caution, especially for a small country such as the Netherlands', whose concrete military contribution Voorhoeve and Van den Doel had been unable to specify. Voorhoeve, whose doctoral dissertation was entitled Peace, Profits and Principles, should have known better, claimed Beunders: 'The self-preservation of a small country such as the Netherlands, dependent on trade and surrounded by large neighbours, requires us not to march at the front in military interventions but to provide humanitarian help and to continue to bang the drum for diplomatic solutions'. The call for military intervention, stated the Rotterdam professor, came from people unable to stand impotence and wanting to do something without being prepared to think about the consequences. In view of the limited capabilities of the Netherlands, he called for 'an exercise in impotence'.³¹⁷³

H.J. Neumann, chairman of the CDA (Christian Democrat) Foreign Affairs Committee, expressed the opinion that the politicians needed to think about the consequences both of doing nothing and of military intervention. As regards the latter, he felt that both government and parliamentarians had better seek the advice of military experts and experts on the region.³¹⁷⁴ In Trouw the parliamentary journalist Willem Breedveld wrote that military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina was 'not only a question of morality or justice but above all a matter of effectiveness and efficiency': 'It is like a fire brigade commandant, from whom you cannot and may not expect that he should send his men blindly into a burning house'. First the risks and consequences have to be weighed, not only for his own men but also for the neighbouring buildings. He warned Dutch parliamentarians that the strong moral awareness that the ethnic cleansing in Bosnia could not be allowed to form a precedent did not give them carte blanche to ignore the promptings of their intelligence.³¹⁷⁵ The editorial in NRC Handelsblad had disagreed with this position a few days before: 'The military strategist and the diplomatic politician may in their wisdom decide that all that can be done is hose down the neighbouring buildings, but the agitated citizen wants to get into the burning house to save whatever he can'. The NRC Handelsblad commentator agreed that foreign policy based only on conviction and not on the consequences of political and military action was irresponsible, but in his view, there was more. The West's own interests were at stake. Every day that passed without intervention undermined the authority of the EC and NATO.³¹⁷⁶ According to some, this affected not only the image of NATO in the eyes of the world but also in the eyes of citizens in the member states. 'The Yugoslavia question', wrote columnist Hofland in NRC Handelsblad

'is by no means any longer confined to the civil war and the question of blame. It has become a European question because it shows the extent of the gap between peoples and governments. The political elite doubts its electorate because they do not know to what extent the people are prepared to have their peaceful and comfortable lives taken away. The electorate doubts the decision-making capacities of the politicians because the latter have already ³¹⁷³ Henri Beunders, 'Prijs Balkan-interventie is te hoog', de Volkskrant, 07/08/92.

³¹⁷⁴ H.J. Neumann, 'Bosnië dwingt tot keuze tussen schande of oorlog' ('Bosnia forces choice between shame or war'), de Volkskrant, 12/08/92.

³¹⁷⁵ Willem Breedveld, 'Ingrijpen uit morele verontwaardiging is niet genoeg' ('Intervention out of moral indignation is not enough'), Trouw, 29/08/92.

³¹⁷⁶ 'Europa en de Balkan' ('Europe and the Balkans'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/08/92.

demonstrated that they are unable to put a stop to a bloody crisis that horrifies everyone'.³¹⁷⁷

The political philosophers Ido de Haan and Tsjalling Wierstra reacted violently to the 'realists' who were against intervention. They stated that the realists first created their own facts and then used them as a basis for preferring non-intervention. And this, they said, was some kind of 'moral perversity': 'If this sort of despicable attitude is supposed to represent high-ground morality, then it is clear that a sense of reality is perhaps good but not the sort of thing you can leave to realists'.³¹⁷⁸

These animated reflections demonstrated the tensions existing between the supporters of intervention and those in favour of doing nothing. The comparisons with guerrilla-like and bogged-down situations such as Yugoslavia in the Second World War, Vietnam and Lebanon and the calculations that stated that a hundred thousand soldiers or more would be the minimum requirement for intervention failed to impress the interventionists but simply increased their feelings of impotence, an emotion that came back time and time and again in the pages of the newspapers in August 1992.³¹⁷⁹ It was scarcely possible for the two parties to convince one another. For those who wanted more action than politicians or military regarded as possible 'politics stinks (...) through the deodorant of caution', as Hofland put it.³¹⁸⁰ A stalemate had developed in which the arguments on both sides were used again and again. A debate in which alternatives to military intervention would be sought did not take place and it was remarkable how, for instance, the limited readiness of the Dutch government to accept refugees was completely banished to the background. Exceptions were the professor of modern history at the University of Amsterdam, M.C. Brands and the reporter with RTL 4 Nieuws, Michiel Bicker Caarten, both of whom said that they thought that military intervention made no sense, because the aim was unclear, but at the same time pointed out that the Netherlands most certainly could do something by accepting refugees.³¹⁸¹

The majority of the best-known opinion-makers in the Netherlands, when confronted with the question 'intervention: yes or no?' began to be more clearly defined as being pro-intervention. In favour were particularly: Voorhoeve, Van den Doel, Leurdijk, the brothers Tromp, Wecke, Oostlander, Faber, Van Eekelen, Huyser, De Vogel, Bleich, Von der Dunk and Hofland. Against were: most of the military, Beunders, Brands, Van Doorn, Koch, Hiltermann, Michielsen, Scheffer and Jan Marijnissen, chairman of the Socialist Party.³¹⁸² In addition Van den Doel, Huyser and De Vogel had shifted from an anti-interventionist point of view to an opinion calling for intervention.

Nuances in images

A third remark that places the effect produced by the ITN images of Trnopolje in perspective relates to the effect they had on the visualization of the conflict by people themselves. While it has been shown, on the one hand, that even before 6 August comparisons had been made between the actions of the Serbs and events under the Third Reich, after that date there were individuals who criticized this analogy. Moreover it continued to be said, at least in the Netherlands, that the Serbs were not the only ³¹⁷⁷ H.J.A. Hofland, 'Het dragelijke van de ondragelijkheid' ('The bearable part of what is unbearable'), NRC Handelsblad, 02/09/92.

³¹⁷⁸ Ido de Haan & Tsjalling Swierstra, 'Realisten praten in Balkan-debat recht wat krom is' ('Realists in debate on the Balkans argue what is wrong is right'), de Volkskrant, 28/08/92.

³¹⁷⁹ For the latter cf. Appendix Scholten & Ruigrok & Heerma, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten, p.250.

³¹⁸⁰ H.J.A. Hofland, 'De politiek stinkt' ('Politics stink'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/08/92.

³¹⁸¹ M.C. Brands, 'Militair ingrijpen vereist heldere doelen' ('Military intervention requires clear objectives'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/08/92; Michiel Bicker Caarten, 'Servië is geen nazi-Duitsland' ('Serbia is no Nazi Germany'), de Volkskrant, 07/08/92.

³¹⁸² For the latter see Jan Marijnissen, 'Rampzalig waanidee' ('Disastrous delusion'), Trouw, 20/08/92; idem, 'Nieuwe kruistochten? SP tegen militaire interventie in voormalig Joegoslavië' ('New crusades? SP against military intervention in the former Yugoslavia'), Tribune 17 (1992)(11September), pp.14-15.

guilty ones in the conflict. The Dutch press, for instance, made little use of the term ‘concentration camps’. In general the Dutch media stuck to the term ‘prison camps’.³¹⁸³ It is known that the editorial staff of NRC Handelsblad consciously did everything they could to avoid the use of the term ‘concentration camp’.³¹⁸⁴

Vulliamy and the ITN journalists themselves were not alone in rejecting the comparison drawn between the images of Trnopolje and the Second World War concentration camps. Stephen Engelberg and Chuck Sudetic, for example, writing in The New York Times, said that the camps were part of the series of measures aimed at removing other ethnic groups from the territory claimed by the Serbs. They were not meant as places of extermination. Nor did the murders that occurred there have the systematic character of the Third Reich’s extermination camps. Many deaths were caused by drunken Serb soldiers beating their victims. Sometimes small groups were executed. And detainees died from sickness, hunger and bad hygiene. According to the reports they had, some hundreds of detainees had died in the camps and not the 17,000 that the Bosnian authorities had started to report. And thus they refused to use the word ‘genocide’.³¹⁸⁵ The American weekly Time expressed itself in similar terms. According to Western diplomats, quoted in the magazine, most of the camps were ‘harsh but not murderous detention sites where enemies, civilian and military, are warehoused before expulsion or exchange’.³¹⁸⁶

In NRC Handelsblad Peter Michielsen wrote that there was no question of the camps being extermination camps. ‘One should bear in mind that the stories of abuse originated with individuals who had been set free, not with people who had escaped. How many Jews were let out of Auschwitz?’³¹⁸⁷ Arie Elshout and Bert Lanting wrote in Het Parool that no matter how reprehensible their behaviour might be, the Serbs were not pulling in members of other ethnic groups from all over the former Yugoslavia to a camp in order to destroy them. They preferred to see them leave.³¹⁸⁸ The editor in chief of Vrij Nederland Rinus Ferdinandusse did, however, want to draw a comparison with the Second World War, but not the usual one: ‘They are not mass extermination camps, but handy storage sites such as each party constructs when wishing to isolate another. The Netherlands too put its members of the fascist NSB and the SS in a camp, and that is a black page in our history. But during and because of war no human standards apply’.³¹⁸⁹

As in other countries, the reports about the camps caused the Serbs to be highlighted in the Netherlands as the major violators of human rights. In almost 80% of the headlines and opening paragraphs where NRC Handelsblad, de Telegraaf, Trouw or De Volkskrant reported in August 1992 on human rights violations in Bosnia, such as camps, ethnic cleansing and deportation, a link was made to the Serbs, in something over 10% to the Croats and in more than 4% to the Muslims.³¹⁹⁰ But it would seem, however, that this is not essentially different from the situation before the images were broadcast. It is only the frequency of the total number of reports on human rights violations – and thus on the Serbs’ responsibility – that shows a rise. It is, in fact, remarkable how there was still space in the Dutch newspapers after ‘Trnopolje’, especially in the opinion-forming contributions, for voices putting into perspective the Serb violations of human rights either by questioning their nature and extent or by highlighting the behaviour of other parties in the conflict. Among the latter the Croats were indeed second worst.

³¹⁸³ Appendix Scholten & Ruijgrok & Heerman, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten, p.198.

³¹⁸⁴ Appendix Jan Wieten, Srebrenica en de journalistiek, pp.55-56.

³¹⁸⁵ Stephen Engelberg & Chuck Sudetic, ‘Conflict in the Balkans: In enemy Hands’, The New York Times, 16/08/92.

³¹⁸⁶ J.F.O. McAllister, ‘Atrocity and Outrage’, Time, 17/08/92.

³¹⁸⁷ Peter Michielsen, ‘Het geweten spreekt wel wat laat’ (‘Our pangs of conscience have come a bit late’), NRC Handelsblad, 13/08/92.

³¹⁸⁸ Arie Elshout & Bert Lanting, ‘Servië moet voelen als het niet luistert’ (‘Serbia must feel the consequences if it does not listen’), Het Parool, 06/08/92.

³¹⁸⁹ Rinus Ferdinandusse, ‘Nederland grijpt in’ (‘The Netherlands intervene’), Vrij Nederland, 14/08/92, ³¹⁹⁰ Appendix Scholten & Ruijgrok & Heerman, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten, pp.195-196.

Mient Jan Faber, who travelled through South Serbia in early August and visited the refugee camps there, declared on his return to the Netherlands that he supported military intervention to protect helpless people but that intervention should also take place ‘at places where the Muslims operate under the banner of hard religious nationalism’, and Faber had understood from UN military personnel ‘that it is extremely difficult to enter into agreements with the Muslims because they do not stick to their word’.³¹⁹¹ In the NOS newscast he declared that Serbs, Croats and Muslims were all guilty of serious human rights violations.³¹⁹²

For the cultural anthropologist René Grémaux, who had resided several years in Yugoslavia for study purposes and was to become a trainer at the Dutch Centrum voor Vredesvraagstukken (Peace Research Centre) it was not even a question. In his opinion Europe had been ‘for months in the firing line of a propaganda war waged by Croats and Muslims using the big guns’. He rejected the black-and-white picture of ‘Serb attackers’ and ‘Bosnian defenders’ that dominated the judgement of politicians and military via the media. He gave the Serb authorities carte blanche for future wrongdoing by stating: ‘If the demonization of everything Serbian predominates and increasingly determines the policy pursued by international bodies, we should not be surprised if Serbs behave in accordance with the image we have accorded them’. He turned against the characterization of the Serb detention centres as concentration camps, though he did admit that one should have no illusions about the treatment meted out to the detainees ‘and certainly not in the case of those with blood on their hands’. They were presumably ‘ordinary camps (...) which belong to the usual horrors of war’. He preferred to place the Serbs and the Jews on the same level: ‘The understanding shown for Israel’s use of force in order to prevent Jews ever again going like lambs to the slaughter is quite evidently not shown to the Serbs’.³¹⁹³

Dutch journalists did their own limited research into camps in Bosnia and the results were relatively harmless for the Serb image. The NOS newscast on 7 August carried an interview, from the Willem I barracks in Den Bosch, by Betty Lamers with a Bosnian woman refugee who had been in the Trnopolje camp. She declared that she had not been beaten there.³¹⁹⁴ On the same day the NOS newscast showed pictures of a Serb internment camp in Butmir, where the inmates looked reasonably well. Karadzic was given the opportunity to say that human rights had not been violated in the Serb camps and that any reports that this was the case could be ascribed to Muslim propaganda.³¹⁹⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard also took a look at this place and described it as: ‘The Serb prison with probably the best imaginable conditions in Bosnia’. The Muslims he found there were not underfed. Their main problems were boredom and isolation.³¹⁹⁶ After the images of Trnopolje the NOS television news repeatedly showed images of other Serb camps such as Manjaca, Omarska and Bosanski Brod. Each time it appeared that the prisoners looked well.³¹⁹⁷ A few days after the broadcast of the Trnopolje film the journalist Ewoud Nysingh (De Volkskrant) was the first to succeed in visiting a camp of the extremist Croatian Defence Force (HOS) in Capljina, south of Mostar, where Serbs were held ³¹⁹¹ ‘Faber bepleit militair ingrijpen ter bescherming burgers’ (‘Faber urges military intervention for protection of civilians’), de Volkskrant, 08/08/92.

³¹⁹² NOS Journaal, 07/08/92, 10 pm.

Bart Rijs, who had recently visited Srebrenica and the nearby Bratunac, where a slaughter of Muslims by Serbs had just taken place, wrote at the end of August that horror stories of ethnic cleansing could be heard throughout Bosnia, ‘from both Serbs and Muslims’. But eye-witnesses could seldom be found and in Bratunac and Srebrenica he had found no further trace of woundings. He put this question to his readers: ‘Is it really now possible to speak of genocide being committed on Bosnian Muslims? Or is it exaggeration and war propaganda meant to induce foreign intervention?’ [Bart Rijs, ‘Sporen van een massamoord’ (‘Traces of mass murder’), HP/De Tijd, 28/08/92, p.11.]

³¹⁹³ René Grémaux, ‘Positie Serviërs door propaganda eenzijdig belicht’ (‘Biased portrayal of position of Serbs by propoganda’), de Volkskrant, 14/08/92.

³¹⁹⁴ NOS Journaal, 07/08/92, 8.00 pm.

³¹⁹⁵ NOS Journaal, 07/08/92.

³¹⁹⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Butmir, Sevische gevangenis dient als modelinstelling’ (‘Butmir, Serbian prison serving as a model institution’), NRC Handelsblad, 15/08/92.

³¹⁹⁷ NOS TV-Journaal, 08/08/92, 09/08/92, 11/08/92.

prisoner. The prisoners, who looked thin, did not dare to talk to Nysingh because of the presence of the Croatian Major General Blaz Kraljevic. Nysingh did not learn much from his visit and in the end was afraid that his presence was endangering the lives of the prisoners.³¹⁹⁸

14. The somewhat longer term after Trnopolje: the Netherlands is willing, but the rest of the world ...

Not only had the 'public' visualization of the situation and public opinion been strongly influenced before the ITN images went out across the world, other things were going on in the field of policy. On 6 August, prior to the ITN programme, the EC for instance demanded that the Bosnian-Serb authorities allow Red Cross observers to visit the camps.³¹⁹⁹ And after the programme the influence on policy outside the Netherlands – two UN resolutions, the making available of 1,800 British and 1,100 French troops – was not great. Resolution 770, which permitted the use of force accompanying humanitarian aid, in fact expressed the viewpoint already adopted by the EC during the Lisbon summit, after which Mitterrand's visit to Sarajevo removed the reason. In The New York Times of 8 August readers were told that while it was true to say that on television, in newspapers and in magazines pressure was being applied to European politicians to do more about the Serb aggression in Bosnia-Herzegovina, there had not yet been any demonstrations in the major European cities and the European leaders were showing little appetite for firmer action.³²⁰⁰

The pictures from Trnopolje seemed to have practically no effect on American policy. Bush stated forcefully that he refused to have his policy set by emotions called up by the images. On 8 August he declared: 'I don't care what the political pressures are. I am not going to get bogged down in some guerrilla warfare'.³²⁰¹ The American president did not argue with the fact that 'the shocking brutality of genocide in World War II, in those concentration camps, are burning memories for all of us, and that can't happen again'. And the American government would continue to insist that the international community be given access to the camps. But at the same time he also said that everyone calling for the American military to be sent in was not carrying his presidential responsibilities. 'Before one soldier is committed to battle, I want to know how that person gets out of there', stated the American president.³²⁰²

Bush knew that he had the support of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who confirmed that support via the chairman's assistant, Lieutenant General Barry R. McCaffrey, when he announced to the Senate that if the West wished to do more than supply humanitarian aid the line between peace-keeping and peace-enforcement would soon be crossed.³²⁰³ McCaffrey said that 400,000 soldiers would be needed for peace-enforcement and he sketched in powerful terms the difficulties that an army of this size would encounter: 'You are dealing with 23,000 square miles of a country slightly larger than South Vietnam. It is four times bigger than Northern Ireland, with 200,000 armed people in it, and so if you ask me how long it would take to subdue those combatants or disarm them, or deter them, it would be a tremendous military challenge on broken-up ground and forested terrain'.³²⁰⁴

³¹⁹⁸ Ewoud Nysingh, 'Kamp voor Serviërs: lijkt verdomme wel een hotel' ('Camp for Serbs 'looks an awful lot like a hotel') and 'Geloof niets van wat hij zegt' ('Do not believe anything he says'), de Volkskrant, 11/08/92.

³¹⁹⁹ 'EC demands access to Serb detention camps', Press Association Newsfile, 06/08/92.

³²⁰⁰ Craig R. Whitney, 'Balkan Scenes Stir Europe, But Action Remains Elusive', The New York Times, 08/08/92.

³²⁰¹ Maggie Fox, 'Public opinion moves towards military intervention', Reuter, B-wire, 09/08/92, 15:58:59. See also Tony Smith, 'New Reports of Atrocities; Bush, U.N. Commander Counsel Caution', The Associated Press, 07/08/92; J. Sirica, 'Crisis and politics. Bush hits back at aid criticism', Newsday, 08/08/92.

³²⁰² J. Sirica, 'Bush: No Quick Solution. Balks over troops for Bosnia relief', Newsday, 09/08/92.

³²⁰³ United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, p.30; S. Friedman, 'View From Pentagon. Aide: Force could be used to get to camps', Newsday, 12/08/92.

³²⁰⁴ United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, pp.39-40; Steven L. Burg, 'The International Community and the Yugoslav Crisis', Esmen/Telhami (eds.), Organizations, p.256; Adolf Carlson, 'No Balm in Gilead: The Employment of Military Force in the War in The former Yugoslavia and Prospects for a Lasting Peace', Blank (ed.), Wars, p.77.

Even Clinton went no further in his criticism of Bush than to insist on sending in air power, a call that earned him blame on the part of the media for wanting to 'combat genocide on the cheap'.³²⁰⁵ But a few days after the ITN images had been broadcast the Senate did agree, by 82 votes to 13, to the use of military means by the UN to get the humanitarian aid into Bosnia and to the insistence that the camps be opened for international inspection. But Bush's announcement in May to Boutros-Ghali that the American government, with an eye to Congress and the electorate before the presidential elections in November, would give no more money to the UN, remained in force, which meant that large-scale use of UN military in Bosnia was in effect made impossible.³²⁰⁶

Probably the most tangible contribution to American policy made by the indignation that arose through the reporting on the Bosnian-Serb camps was the readiness shown by the American government to agree to the establishment of a commission of experts to collect evidence for a possible war tribunal.³²⁰⁷ However the intention to set up a commission of this type had already been there before the transmission of the ITN images.³²⁰⁸

Even though after the reports about concentration camps the American newspapers and weeklies gave considerably more space to the war in the former Yugoslavia than in the previous eighteen months,³²⁰⁹ this scarcely had any effect on the American government's preparedness to contemplate military action. As stated by the American diplomat Zimmermann: even if American television had broadcast round-the-clock reports of Serb atrocities the Bush government would not have budged.³²¹⁰ American policymakers declared that all they had done after the Trnopolje pictures had been shown was give the impression that they were doing something.³²¹¹ National security adviser Scowcroft said of the media storm following the ITN images: 'We just sort of rode it out'.³²¹² Gutman too was of the opinion that his contributions and that of ITN about the camps had had 'zero' effect on American policy.³²¹³ The American public was more inclined to follow its president than the media. It was only in a poll held on 6 August that supporters of Bush's policy towards Yugoslavia and its opponents were in balance (38% each). Subsequent polls in August, however, showed a majority for those in support of the presidential policy. In fact, from August the public continued to follow the president, first Bush and then Clinton, whether he was more or less inclined to intervene.³²¹⁴

In the United Kingdom public opinion was even more tepid than in the United States.³²¹⁵ After the enormous reverberations caused by the Trnopolje images in the morning papers on 7 August, the effect quickly ebbed away. In any case, in the period up to September 1993 the British newspapers gave even more space to opinions against than for intervention. And although Bosnia took pride of place on British television, a great deal of attention was also paid to other disaster areas, especially Somalia and

³²⁰⁵ J. Schell, 'Fighting Genocide on the Cheap', Newsday, 09/08/92.

³²⁰⁶ Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, pp.72-73.

³²⁰⁷ F. Bruning, 'Human-Rights Probe of Serbia Urged', Newsday, 14/08/92; K. Royce and P.J. Sloyan, 'The U.S. Waited. Back in June, CIA Told Bush of Atrocities', Newsday, 14/08/92.

³²⁰⁸ 'VS onderzoeken oorlogsmisdaden in ex-Joegoslavië' ('US investigates war crimes in ex-Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 06/08/92.

³²⁰⁹ James J. Sadkovic, 'The response of the American media to Balkan neo-nationalisms', Mestrovic (ed.), Genocide, pp.121-125.

³²¹⁰ Quoted in Warren P. Strobel, 'The Media and U.S. Policies Toward Intervention. A Closer Look at the 'CNN Effect'', Crocker & Hampson with Aall (eds.), Chaos, p 367; Strobel, Policy, p.148 with supporting references to Eagleburger, Scowcroft and Kenney.

³²¹¹ Strobel, Policy, pp.147, 152 and 219; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p.95. Michael N. Barnett, 'The Politics of Indifference at the United Nations and Genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia', Cushman & Meštrovic (eds.), Time, p.150.

³²¹² Strobel, Policy, p.148.

³²¹³ Strobel, Policy, pp.152-153.

³²¹⁴ Richard Sobel, 'U.S. and European Attitudes toward Intervention in the Former Yugoslavia: Mourir pour la Bosnie?', Ullman (ed.) World, pp.147, 149, 150 and 163; Major, Autobiography, p.539; Simms, Hour, p.56.

³²¹⁵ Owen, Odyssey, p.21.

the Sudan, sometimes Angola and Georgia. According to Young the variety and quantity of attention was fatal rather than stimulating for pro-intervention public opinion.³²¹⁶

According to Prime Minister Major himself the wide spectrum of opinions in his country ensured that there was no proposal of a serious alternative to the fairly cautious attitude of his government to intervention in the former Yugoslavia.³²¹⁷ Scarcely a word of opposition to the Major government's cautious policy was uttered by his own Conservative Party,³²¹⁸ An important exception was Margaret Thatcher, who believed that the West should guarantee multi-ethnicity in Bosnia or lose its credibility. For her it was clear that the international community was dealing with Serb aggression and not with civil war. She called not only for military intervention but also for a lifting of the arms embargo imposed on the Bosnian government. At the time of the Serb attack on Srebrenica in early 1993 she advanced, in her usual powerful manner, that this was happening 'in the heart of Europe and we have not done any more to stop it. It is in Europe's sphere of influence. It should be in Europe's sphere of conscience'.³²¹⁹ Her statements sometimes even made some on the left long for her return as leader. However her successor, John Major, hit back hard by saying that as regards Bosnia nobody had the monopoly of care or conscience. And the British Minister of Defence, Rifkind, dismissed Thatcher's statements as 'emotional nonsense'.³²²⁰ During the entire period of the war in the former Yugoslavia between 1991 and 1995 the British parliament paid relatively little attention to the situation there. It took almost six months after the declarations of independence by Croatia and Slovenia before the British parliament dealt with the Yugoslavia question on 12 December – at half past three in the morning. After that there was scarcely any opposition to government policy either. During the entire conflict in Bosnia the Labour Party was opposed to military intervention.³²²¹ Despite very solid reports from Bosnia itself most of the newspapers in the United Kingdom were just as reluctant to take up a clear anti-government position.³²²²

In France a clique of intellectuals, journalists, artists and other opinion-makers appeared to be exerting major influence on the government through debates.³²²³ Unlike in the Netherlands, however, the French parliament was in a weak position. The role of the representatives of the French people in determining policy on peace operations could even be said to have been 'non-existent'. At best the French parliament served as a sounding board for the government in this area of policy.³²²⁴ The French parliament could therefore not act as a sounding board for public opinion.

The German public was very involved in the developments in the former Yugoslavia. In late 1992, for example, 85% of the German population were of the opinion that the question of Yugoslavia was the most important international problem of the day.³²²⁵ However there was at the same time a somewhat widespread feeling that for constitutional and historical reasons German troops would not be called upon.

³²¹⁶ Hugo Young, 'Commentary: Hurd's world in camera, not in the camera's', The Guardian, 14/09/93.

³²¹⁷ Major, Autobiography, pp.535-536.

³²¹⁸ Simms, Hour, p.49.

³²¹⁹ Simms, Hour, p.50.

³²²⁰ Simms, Hour, p.51.

³²²¹ Simms, Hour, pp.297-299.

³²²² Simms, Hour, pp.300-306.

³²²³ Confidential report (1); interview H. Wijnaendts, 08/06/00; Védrine, Mondes, pp.627-629; Lionel Charles & Gérard Toulouse, 'Genèse d'un colloque', Allain e.a., Ex-Yugoslavie, p.13; Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p.37; Martin Sommer, 'Niet mee eens – petitie volgt' ('Disagreement – petition forthcoming'), de Volkskrant, 26/01/01.

³²²⁴ Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p.32-33.

³²²⁵ Everts, Duitsland, p.190. SE further, for instance, Axt, Jugoslawien, p.354; W. Beusekamp, 'Duitse leger moet naar Bosnië' ('German army must go to Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 04/02/93; Maull, Germany, pp.121-123; Heinz-Günther Stobbe, 'Realpolitik' und dritter Balkankrieg. Thesen zum Versagen der europäischen Politik auf dem Balkan', Bremmer (Hg.), (Sch)erben, pp.113-115; Martin Lettmayer, 'Da wurde einfach geglaubt, ohne nachzufragen', Bittermann (Hg.), Serbien, pp.37-49.

The British and French governments continued to oppose any form of military intervention. They were prepared to do no more than place more emphasis on humanitarian aid than had already been the case since Mitterrand's solo visit to Sarajevo.³²²⁶ Moreover the governments of both countries, just like the United States, referred to the Security Council in matters of action – and they were all members of the Council with the right of veto.³²²⁷

The Major government, true enough, had made 1,800 troops available, but under strict conditions. The offer of 1,800 men had been a compromise 'between what is militarily desirable and what public opinion was demanding'.³²²⁸ Prior to the ITN broadcast Prime Minister Major had adopted the stance that the situation in the former Yugoslavia was such that solutions imposed from outside were impossible³²²⁹ and he did not waver from that opinion. The Minister of State of the British Foreign Office Douglas Hogg stated to the assembled press on 13 August during a visit to Sarajevo that he had made it clear to the Bosnian government 'that there was no cavalry over the hill. There is no international force coming to stop this'.³²³⁰ The British military would be going primarily to protect the humanitarian convoys. The basic principle was 'to do all in our power to limit the conflict'. The British government was not prepared to do more. The American and British Chiefs of Staff had calculated that it would take 400,000 troops – three times the size of the British army – to keep the three warring factions apart.³²³¹ British experts had calculated that an intervention force of no more than 60,000 troops would cost an annual amount of GBP2.5 billion.³²³² The British Minister of Defence, Rifkind, also let it be known that as soon as British troops were fired on the contingent would be withdrawn.³²³³ The British point of view remained that in Bosnia there was no question of 'objectives worth dying for'.³²³⁴ Moreover it took until the end of October, almost two-and-a-half months, before the troops promised by the United Kingdom arrived in Bosnia.

Nor did the UN take more action after the images. The deputy commander of UNPROFOR, General P. Morillon, warned against military intervention immediately after the broadcast. It would, he said, cost more than a hundred thousand dead and wounded.³²³⁵ On 12 August Boutros-Ghali wrote in a letter to the Security Council that the safety of the UN troops already present in the former Yugoslavia would be threatened if there should be military intervention.³²³⁶ A day later the French president Mitterrand declared that not a single member of the Security Council was considering a military intervention and the French government would not propose it: 'ajouter la guerre à la guerre ne résoudra rien' ('adding another war to the war will not solve anything').³²³⁷

As early as 6 August the North-Atlantic Council had given the Military Committee the green light to examine possible ways of putting troops in. There were three options on the table: reinforce the monitoring of economic sanctions; monitor the handing in of heavy weaponry; military support for the aid transports.³²³⁸ A decision was to be taken a week later. But on 14 August the NATO Secretary-

³²²⁶ Cf. Tardy, France, pp.161-162.

³²²⁷ See, for instance, Michael N. Barnett, 'The Politics of Indifference at the United Nations and Genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia', Cushman & Meštrovic (eds.), Time, p.150; Tardy, France, pp.163-165 and 169.

³²²⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/02053. Loudon 409 to the Foreign Affairs ministry, 19/08/92.

³²²⁹ Letter from Major to Ashdown dated 4 August 1992, quoted in Vulliamy, Seasons, p.119.

³²³⁰ Geciteerd in Almond, War, p.250.

³²³¹ McCaffrey in United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, p.38; Major, Autobiography, p.535.

³²³² Calic, Krieg, p.161.

³²³³ Sharp, Balkans, p.14.

³²³⁴ This was how British diplomat Greenstock thought to put into words the standpoint of the British government and public opinion during a meeting of the Permanent Council of the WEU, ABZ, 999.21, part 74, Hoekman 676 to Van den Broek, 09/12/92.

³²³⁵ Tony Smith, 'New Reports of Atrocities; Bush, U.N. Commander Counsel Caution', The Associated Press, 07/08/92.

³²³⁶ 'UN approves use of force in Bosnia', The Gazette, 14/08/92.

³²³⁷ Mitterrand interview with Sud Ouest, 13/08/92, quoted in Tardy, France, p.168.

³²³⁸ United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, p.25; 'Bush wil militairen inzetten in Bosnië, Navo maakt plan' ('Bush wants to deploy military in Bosnia, NATO makes plans'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/08/92; 'NAVO bestudeert

General Wörner announced that his advisers needed a further ten days to study various scenarios. The images of Trnopolje, therefore, had not led to a feeling of urgency even within NATO. A NATO diplomat told the press that there was still a long way to go before NATO really would send troops to Bosnia. ‘And it might even never come to that.’³²³⁹

This delay irritated both the Dutch government³²⁴⁰ and the Dutch parliamentarians. They complained that NATO could have suspected from the Lisbon summit that a resolution was about to be adopted that would permit the use of force for humanitarian ends. Why, then, did they need so much time? Blaauw, for example, was ‘saddened’ and ‘embarrassed’ by this ‘blow in the face not only for the prestige of the UN and the Security Council but also of NATO’. He advised Lubbers and his colleague Major to make a visit and take with them his soul-mate Kohl: ‘And then the Conservative-Christian-Democrat family can get round the table and discuss how we are to solve this problem in Europe.’³²⁴¹

In the NATO discussions held in Brussels there was a heavy option on the table: send 115,000 soldiers to escort transport convoys from Split to Sarajevo. The Netherlands let it be known that lighter options should be considered, even though it realized that this would bring greater security risks.³²⁴² Since that also represented the standpoint of other countries, the North-Atlantic Council ordered the military to elaborate a plan based not on holding a route but on escorting aid convoys. The WEU was also engaged in similar planning at the time. Both organizations calculated that five to six thousand troops would suffice for a light option of this type. The international community would then have to accept the fact that the guards at the roadblocks in Bosnia would decide whether and at what rate the convoys would be allowed to pass through.³²⁴³ On 25 August the NATO Council gave its approval to this option.³²⁴⁴ It was a pretty slim result.

Keep quiet, unless...

Discussions in NATO and the WEU were going too slowly, a fact noted not only by Dutch parliamentarians but also on 20 August by the Dutch Ministerial Council meeting.³²⁴⁵ And thus Minister Van den Broek and Premier Lubbers launched the plan to implement military operations, outside NATO and the WEU but with UN permission, to protect humanitarian aid to Bosnia.³²⁴⁶ Van den Broek’s list included Belgium, Denmark, France, the United Kingdom, Italy, Spain and Turkey. With this intention the government, that had still been feeling parliamentary pressure on 12 August, mogelijk gebruik geweld in Bosnië’ (‘NATO studying possible use of force in Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 07/08/92; ‘Inzet grondtroepen zal minimaal zijn’ (‘Deployment of ground troops will be limited’), de Volkskrant, 12/08/92.

³²³⁹ ‘Bosnië’ (‘Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 15/08/92. See also ‘Navo huivert bij gedachte aan optreden Bosnië’ (‘NATO shudders at thought of duties in Bosnia’), Trouw, 14/08/92; Folkert Jensma & Jan Gerritsen, ‘Navo stelt besluit over Bosnië uit’ (‘NATO delays decision on Bosnia’), NRC Handelsblad, 15/08/92. ‘Navo ‘bestudeert’ resolutie’ (‘NATO ‘reviewing’ resolution’), Trouw, 15/08/92.

³²⁴⁰ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³²⁴¹ NCRV, Hier en Nu, 16/08/92, 13.10 uur. In diezelfde uitzending sprak ook De Hoop Scheffer zijn terleurstelling uit.

³²⁴² Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³²⁴³ ‘NAVO maakt plannen voor Bosnië minder ambitieus’ (‘NATO making less ambitious plans for Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 21/08/92; ‘NAVO-top wil 6000 man naar Bosnië sturen’ (‘NATO leaders want to send 6,000 troops to Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 25/08/92.

³²⁴⁴ ‘Serviërs en moslims stellen zich hard op’ (‘Serbs and Muslims take a hard line’), Trouw, 26/08/92.

³²⁴⁵ See also Van den Broek in Radio 1, VARA, Friday edition, 14/08/92, 5.05pm, where he said that he did not know whether other countries or organizations were at that stage, but that he had put in a strong plea that the WEU and NATO should consider the implementation of the recent Security Council resolutions.

³²⁴⁶ Ewoud Nysingh, ‘Bosnische president wordt grote verliezer in Londen’ (‘Bosnian president will be the big loser in London’), de Volkskrant, 25/08/92; ‘Nederland kondigt initiatief Bosnië aan als besluitvorming in Navo nog lang duurt’ (‘The Netherlands announces Bosnian initiative – if decision to be taken within NATO takes much longer’), NRC Handelsblad, 21/08/92.

surpassed parliament in dynamism. Now the members of parliament began to be somewhat wary. Parliament fully approved of Van den Broek's plan as long as it was only designed to put pressure on NATO and the WEU, but as soon as it became reality, said CDA, PvdA and VVD members, the United States should be added to the list.³²⁴⁷ Surprise was also expressed in the Vrede en veiligheid (Peace and security) working party of the CDA's Foreign Policy Committee at this 'forceful' language on the part of the government.³²⁴⁸

Van den Broek's intention was 'not wrong', wrote the Nieuwsblad van het Noorden, 'but the question is whether the tone is not a little too shrill in contrast to the contribution that our country can really make. If Great Britain, France and Italy fail to adopt this line, our pluckiness will look a little ludicrous'.³²⁴⁹ 'If nobody apart from France and a couple of other countries participate, Dutch readiness could perhaps seem a little gratuitous', wrote Jaap Jansen in the Elsevier weekly. 'Or is the Netherlands about to take up arms without further thought and will the Royal Netherlands Army be providing Europe's mercenaries?'³²⁵⁰

Almost immediately after Van den Broek's plan was announced an historic interview with the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Brigadier General Willink, was published in both De Telegraaf and Het Binnenhof. He stated that the Netherlands would be unable to supply fighting units because it was impossible to send conscripts unwilling to go.³²⁵¹ This led many organs of the press to comment that it would be better for the Dutch government to leave aside the rhetoric.³²⁵² In fact on 6 August Trouw had already asked the question of whether the Dutch parliamentarians had sufficient oversight of the consequences of intervention, especially the sacrifice in terms of Dutch lives, and whether they were prepared to accept such consequences. Was that not the case, the politicians would do better to keep quiet, no matter how embarrassing that might be.³²⁵³ The retired Brigadier General E.P.B. Tomasso, ex-commander of the Dutch UN battalion in Lebanon, expressed similar sentiments. The only solution in Yugoslavia, he said, was massive intervention. Were 'we, spoiled Europeans' not prepared to do such a thing, 'we should stop right now with that very noncommittal philosophizing about military intervention in the hell's kitchen of the Adriatic'.³²⁵⁴

'The Netherlands is faced with (...) the question of how to get the military fist to the spot where the political mouth has been shouting in strong terms for some time now', was the conclusion reached by the editorial in NRC Handelsblad.³²⁵⁵ But the start to an answer had already been given. On 22 August in an interview with Trouw Minister Pronk had shown himself to be a supporter of military intervention going beyond the protection of aid convoys. The military, he said, should take a look at how best an intervention could be organized. 'As an amateur' the minister himself was not a good judge of this. But he did think that as soon as possible his colleague Ter Beek should be able to make

³²⁴⁷ 'Kamer wil Van den Broeks plan voor actie in Bosnië eerst zien' ('Lower House wants to see Van den Broek's plan for campaign in Bosnia first'), de Volkskrant, 22/08/92.

³²⁴⁸ CDA-secretariaat, Commissie Buitenland, werkgroep Vrede en veiligheid, 1992, H4.184, agenda point 3, report of the working party, 24/08/92.

³²⁴⁹ 'Krijgshaftige dadendrang' ('Bellicose thirst for action'), Nieuwsblad van het Noorden, 21/08/92.

³²⁵⁰ Jaap Jansen, 'Vragen van leven en dood' ('Questions of life and death'), Elsevier, 22/08/92.

³²⁵¹ Guido van de Kreeke, 'Zandhaas heeft weer toekomst' ('Foot-slogging has future again'), De Telegraaf, 22/08/92; Rik in 't Hout, 'Generaal Wilink onthult: 'Nederland niet in staat snel troepen te leveren' (Generaal Wilink discloses: 'The Netherlands is incapable of contributing troops quickly'), Het Binnenhof, 22/08/92.

³²⁵² Solo-actie uit den boze ('Solo campaign absolutely forbidden'), Algemeen Dagblad, 22/08/92; the former commander of the first army corps, retired Lieutenant General W.J. Loos in Remco Meijer, 'Een harde job' ('A hard task'), Elsevier, 22/08/92, pp.31-32; J.L. Heldring, 'De Brezjnev-doctrine van Jan Pronk' ('The Brezhnev doctrine of Jan Pronk'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/08/92; Guikje Roethof, 'Krijgshaftig: Hoe wil Ter Beek eigenlijk aanvallen' ('Bellicose – How does Ter Beek actually want to attack?'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 02/09/92.

³²⁵³ 'Interventie vergt offers (2)', Trouw, 06/08/92.

³²⁵⁴ E.P.B. Tomasso, 'Bittertafelstrategen' ('Cocktail strategists'), NRC Handelsblad, 14/08/92.

³²⁵⁵ 'Het Nederlandse Leger' ('The Royal Netherlands Army'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/08/92.

available an airmobile brigade for rapid intervention.³²⁵⁶ This idea was enthusiastically supported by Rob Meines in NRC Handelsblad and Kees Lunshof in de Telegraaf.³²⁵⁷ It prompted Ter Beek to remark that Pronk had good insight into the future of the Royal Netherlands Army.³²⁵⁸ This put the Airmobile Brigade in the interventionists' sights.

15. Sights on the airmobile brigade

In the Dutch government's White Paper for Defence memorandum for 1991, which had seen the light at the end of March 1991, the government had expressed its intention of setting up an airmobile brigade. The idea was that this would make available a unit that could be called on rapidly in times of crisis management operations, i.e. operations falling outside the system of collective defence in a NATO context. The memorandum characterized the unit as consisting of one of the armoured infantry brigades transformed into an airmobile brigade fitted out with fighter and transport helicopters. In that way the Netherlands hoped to remain a significant ally, one that not only was making severe spending cuts but also and at the same time was in a process of modernization. The Airmobile Brigade would be part of the NATO rapid intervention force. It would act as a sort of fire brigade prior to the sending in of mechanized units. The transport helicopters required for the Airmobile Brigade were to be acquired in the period up to and including 1995. In the beginning they would be leased. After 1995, according to the memorandum, 40 helicopters would be purchased. Detachments from the existing Airmobile Brigade consisting of three light infantry battalions could be rapidly deployed for UN peacekeeping operations because of their complete readiness and because it would be the only unit in the Army completely manned by volunteers.

The operational personnel of this brigade would then form the first contribution to the increased Dutch participation in UN peace operations (see Chapter 4). The brigade linked up with the French airmobile concepts (experience in Algeria), those of the United States (Vietnam), the United Kingdom (Falklands) and Germany (Fallschirmjäger).³²⁵⁹ The concept was based on the idea that the tank, that had played a major role in the idea of large-scale war, had come to the end of its development and that large-scale movements of troops over the ground could easily be discovered by satellite. Helicopters had, in recent years, shown major developments with the addition of night-vision equipment, greater load-bearing capacity and fitting out as a weapons platform. A tank had a range of only three kilometres, an Apache helicopter eight. Moreover, in view of developments in the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact, it could no longer be expected that an attack from the East would take place across a broad front without a long warning time. And thus some people in the Royal Netherlands Army wanted to get away from the unilateral fixation on mechanized fighting (with track vehicles rather than wheeled), that had characterized the Army as long as they could anticipate engagement on the lowland plains of northern Germany.

In the Netherlands the great defender of the airmobile concept was infantry Brigadier General J.W. Brinkman. Until April 1993 Brinkman had been deputy head of the Planning department of the Royal Netherlands army and, later, commander of the Airmobile Brigade. Brinkman's finest hour was probably when the Airmobile Brigade was first mentioned publicly in the White Paper of Defence of 1991. At the time the brigade was given a double task. On the one hand, it was to contribute to a rapid ³²⁵⁶ Willem Breedveld & Louis Cornelisse, 'Jan Pronk bekeerd: Soldaten tegen Servië' ('Jan Pronk for, soldiers against Serbia'), Trouw, 22/08/92.

³²⁵⁷ Rob Meines, 'Ander Nederlands defensiebeleid vergt nog meer durf van politici' ('A different Dutch defence policy requires even more nerve from politicians'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/08/92; Kees Lunshof, 'Politiek kleineert risico's in Bosnië' (Political circles play down risks in Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 25/08/92. See also A. van Staden and J.B. Veen, 'Defensie is nog steeds een grabbelton' ('Department of Defence is still a lucky bag'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/09/92 concentration of NATO forces in response to a Warsaw Pact troop concentration. On the other, the brigade was to have been deployable for UN peace-keeping operations.

³²⁵⁸ 'Ook de PvdA weet het niet' ('Even the PvdA is uncertain'), Trouw, 31/08/92.

³²⁵⁹ For foreign precursors of the Dutch airmobile brigade concept see colonel of the grenadiers R.J. van Vels, 'Helimobiliteit, een nieuwe dimensie?' ('Helicopter mobility, a new dimension?'), Carré(1992)2/3, pp.29-32.

Practically from the start of the conflict in Yugoslavia, therefore, the Airmobile Brigade was referred to as a unit to be deployed. In the summer of 1991 retired Brigadier General De Vogel wrote that a lightly armed battalion of the airmobile brigade would be preferred for deployment in the former Yugoslavia rather than an armoured infantry battalion equipped with armoured vehicles, heavy mortars and anti-tank weapons since it would have a provocative rather than a dampening effect on the warring factions. At the same time he also pointed to the problem: a battalion of that sort was not yet operationally available.³²⁶⁰ Polemologist Wecke wrote soon afterwards that the GroenLinks ('Green Left') political party was taking an inconsistent standpoint by stating that it was in favour of military intervention in times of flagrant crimes against human rights but was against the Airmobile Brigade: 'If the Airmobile Brigade, seen by GroenLinks ('Green Left') as undesirable, is nonetheless created, the same brigade will most certainly be a factor to keep in mind elsewhere for peacekeeping or peace enforcement where rapid deployment is required.'³²⁶¹ As early as autumn 1991 Polemologist Hylke Tromp, speaking in the television programme Het Capitool had put the case for military intervention in Yugoslavia, with the argument: why, otherwise, does the Netherlands have its new Airmobile Brigade?³²⁶²

From early 1992 recruitment for the brigade started with spectacular TV spots commissioned by the Royal Netherlands Army showing helicopter landings on a dam, and adverts were placed in weekly and monthly magazines. In April 1992 the commander of the Air Mobile Division for Central Europe (still existing only on paper), of which the Dutch Airmobile Brigade was to become part, the Dutch Major General Pieter Huijsman, said in an interview with Elsevier: 'If my division had existed it is not unimaginable that they would now be deployed in Yugoslavia'.³²⁶³

In a long television interview of Ter Beek by Ton Elias and Catharine Keijl on 21 June 1992 the possibility of deploying the Airmobile Brigade for peacekeeping was also discussed. The minister said that the marines and the new brigade would be able to complement one another very nicely. 'In addition, we currently have two marine battalions. With their deployment in Cambodia (...) the remaining forces in the Netherlands that can undertake this sort of activity are pretty limited.' From this, Elias had drawn the conclusion that the army was therefore changing into 'a flexible unit that can be deployed everywhere. Say Yugoslavia, say northern Iraq'.³²⁶⁴ Two months later Wilmink said – in the interviews already referred to – that in view of the problem posed by the conscripts, only the Airmobile Brigade could be deployed for missions such as represented by ex-Yugoslavia. But this would not happen before 1994 because only then would the Brigade be up to strength and operational.³²⁶⁵ Whether intentionally or not, Wilmink (who was on the point of retiring) had set politicians, press and experts on a track: it was not possible to deploy fighting troops until the airmobile brigade was a fact. The countdown could begin.

16. The London conference

At the 7 July G7 meeting in Munich Mitterrand had proposed calling a wider conference on Yugoslavia, intended to co-ordinate the activities of the EC and the UN. In addition a conference of this kind ³²⁶⁰ J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Zo'n Europese vredesmacht staat niet zo gauw in het lid' ('Such a European peace force does not stand in line that quickly'), Vrij Nederland, 31/08/91, pp.26-27.

³²⁶¹ Leon Wecke, 'Het glibberige pad naar de nieuwe wereldorde' ('The slippery path to the new world order'), de Helling 4(1991)3, p.19.

³²⁶² Daan Dijksman, 'Een héél rare oorlog' ('One very strange war'), HP/De Tijd 07/02/92, p.7.

³²⁶³ Bert Bommels, 'Landmacht de lucht in' ('Army takes to the skies'), Elsevier, 04/04/92, p.23.

³²⁶⁴ TV, RTL4, De Vierde Kamer, 21/06/92, 11.05pm.

³²⁶⁵ Rik in 't Hout, 'Generaal Wilmink onthult: "Nederland niet in staat snel troepen te leveren"' ('Generaal Wilmink reveals: 'Netherlands incapable of contributing troops at short notice') and idem., 'Zonder dienstplicht zakt leger volledig in elkaar' ('Without compulsory military service the army will collapse entirely'), Het Binnenhof, 22/08/92.

would provide an opportunity for involving the Muslim countries, the United States, Russia and Turkey in the approach to the problems. Initially the government in London did not react positively to the proposal, feeling that it was by way of criticism of Carrington. After the row between the British government and Boutros-Ghali, in which the latter had stated that 'he was not just going to be steamrolled by the British', the British government had, however, perceived that better agreement was required between EC and UN initiatives³²⁶⁶ and Hurd announced the conference on 25 July.³²⁶⁷ Thus the conference was in no way called, as has been claimed,³²⁶⁸ because of pressure exerted by the images of Trnopolje. A total of forty countries were invited to the conference, held on 26 and 27 August 1992 in London under the joint chairmanship of UN Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali and the United Kingdom as chairman of the EC. As well as the member countries of the EC, participants included the five permanent members of the Security Council, the G7 countries, the troika countries of the OSCE, the Islamic conference and the countries bordering on the former Yugoslavia.

One problem was the representation of Serbia and Yugoslavia at the conference. Milosevic, who naturally understood that the Serbs would be given a dressing down at the conference, started off by making his presence and that of the president of Montenegro Bulatovic dependent on at least de facto recognition of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) that had come into being at the end of April. The West, however, was not prepared to recognize the FRY, which could have led to Milosevic staying at home. The British government was keen to have Cosic and Panic, president and premier of the FRY, attend the conference at least as private persons so that the Belgrade regime would be bound as widely as possible by the results of the conference.³²⁶⁹ By way of solution Germany suggested that Cosic and Panic should be allowed to participate as leaders of a combined Serb-Montenegrin delegation, which could also include Milosevic.³²⁷⁰

This still did not go far enough for Panic. He was dead set against Milosevic going to London. In contrast to Serbia, with its presidential system, the federation of lesser Yugoslavia had a chancellor-based system where the prime minister had the weightiest function. On these grounds Panic claimed for himself the leadership of the delegation from rump-Yugoslavia. He was irritated about the fact that the West kept Milosevic on his feet by continuing to accept him as a partner in discussions and negotiations. He believed that Yugoslavia's foreign relations were the prerogative of the federal premier and thus there was place for Milosevic in his delegation. But the British government insisted that Milosevic attend the conference.³²⁷¹

In consequence the conference was faced with a divided Serbian leadership. Cosic, Panic and Milosevic were all three present but failed to radiate harmony. Of the three, indeed, the West was still inclined to regard Milosevic as the most serious partner in the discussions. And though Cosic believed that it would be to Serbia's advantage if he were to explain Belgrade's point of view to the foreign powers, the representatives of the international community had different ideas. And Cosic gave every reason for this. In his expressions of nationalism he was certainly as cutting as Milosevic. When questioned by a foreign journalist he declared, for instance, that of course there were Serb camps, but they were detention camps such as existed in all wars:

'Of course I do not deny that cruelties could take place. But in the Croatian camps, which are also very numerous, even greater crimes are committed, ³²⁶⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Memorandum from Director-General of Political Affairs at the Foreign Ministry (DGPZ) to Van den Broek, 13/08/92, no. 121/92.

³²⁶⁷ 'Partijen Bosnië nemen deel aan humanitair overleg' ('Bosnian parties participate in humanitarian discussions'), de Volkskrant, 30/07/92; Woodward, Tragedy, p.302.

³²⁶⁸ See, for instance, Hartmann, Milosevic, p.296.

³²⁶⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Engels 257 to Van den Broek, 14/08/92.

³²⁷⁰ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum from chief of DEU to DGPZ, 18/08/92, no. 151/92; ABZ, 345170, Loudon 412 to Van den Broek, 20/08/92.

³²⁷¹ Djukic, Milosevic, p.57; Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p.157

which I dare not describe to you. As regards the Muslims, they do not take any prisoners: they simply kill or murder.³²⁷²

In the same discussion he qualified the opposition between Croatia and Serbia as opposition between a religious state and a democracy, between fundamentalism and tolerance.³²⁷³ The Serb was the new Jew.³²⁷⁴ Germany was occupied in realizing its intentions, dating back to 1918, by smashing Yugoslavia.³²⁷⁵ Consequently, Cosic had little international credit.

At the same time many governments began to harbour scepticism about the level of authority that the conference could accord to Panic.³²⁷⁶ In the eyes of many Western policy makers Panic was 'a loose cannon'³²⁷⁷ and the general expectation was that he would always lose to Milosevic if it came to the crunch.³²⁷⁸

The disunity between Cosic, Panic and Milosevic led to unusual scenes in the course of the conference. When, in his capacity as chairman, Major asked Milosevic at a given moment if he could agree with the declaration on Bosnia-Herzegovina drawn up by the conference, Panic reacted by saying that it was not Milosevic but he himself who spoke on behalf of the delegation and that Milosevic was not permitted to speak until he, Panic, had given him permission to do so.³²⁷⁹ Before the eyes of the conference delegates Milosevic reacted stoically.³²⁸⁰ But behind the scenes he wrangled with Panic and even threatened to hit him.³²⁸¹

The official aim of the meeting was to increase and broaden international pressure on the warring factions in Bosnia. The British government hoped that this would lead to the acceptance of a number of principles. These included: a stop to the fighting and to the ethnic cleansing; respect for human rights and the rights of minorities; changes to borders would only be made after mutual agreement; and further negotiations would be started, while sanctions would still apply.³²⁸²

Despite these express intentions it was unclear in many capitals what precisely the government in London wished to achieve with the conference.³²⁸³ There seemed to be several mutually exclusive aims. In the first place, the delegations present would have to express their condemnation, in short declarations, of the Serb activities in Bosnia and Croatia. Secondly, a declaration of principles would have to be accepted by the conference participants, preferably also by Serbia. Third, a plan of approach to Bosnia-Herzegovina must be drawn up. Fourth, the conference would have to create a permanent structure under international supervision for negotiations between the parties to the conflict as a replacement for the EC's Yugoslavia conference. Fifth, there would need to be discussions on tightening the sanctions. Sixth, the settling of the long, drawn-out problem of the elimination of Serbian heavy weaponry, either by diplomatic or by military means. And finally it would be a good thing if the conference could finally ensure a lasting ceasefire in Bosnia. Six days before the start of the ³²⁷² Schiffer, Temps, pp.25-26.

³²⁷³ Schiffer, Temps, pp.22-23.

³²⁷⁴ Schiffer, Temps, p.30.

³²⁷⁵ Schiffer, Temps, pp.24-29.

³²⁷⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³²⁷⁷ Owen, Odyssey, p.28. See also Peter Michielsen, 'Milan Panic: veel woorden, maar weinig macht' ('Milan Panic. Many words, but little power', NRC Handelsblad, 14/08/92.

³²⁷⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Engels 257 to Van den Broek, 14/08/92.

³²⁷⁹ Doder & Branson, Silber & Little, Death, p.260; ABZ 345170, Loudon 421 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 28/08/92.

³²⁸⁰ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p.158.

³²⁸¹ Silber & Little, Death, p.258.

³²⁸² ABZ, DPV/ARA/02051. COREU British chairmanship of EC, 20/08/92, cpe/pres/lon/1004; PV New York to Van den Broek, 21/08/92, fax 5731A; PV New York to Van den Broek, 21/08/92, fax 5802, Statement by the Representative of the United Kingdom on behalf of the European Community and its members on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, 24/08/92.

³²⁸³ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia – The Secret War: Tragic Cost of Allies' Hidden Hostility', The Guardian, 21/05/96; ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Van den Broek 241 to Moscow embassy, 18/08/92.

conference the British director of Political Affairs at the British Foreign Office, Appleyard, during a Comité Politique-discussion, qualified the conference as an ‘unpredictable exercise’ and a ‘high risk operation’.³²⁸⁴

An advantage, perceived by Dutch authorities, of better co-ordination between the EC and the UN was that in future any agreements not adhered to by the warring factions could be much more quickly dealt with by concrete measures taken by the Security Council.³²⁸⁵ At the same time, prior to the conference, the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs had considerable objections to the cautious attitude of the British government, which seemed to indicate a policy of even-handedness, something that would be to the Serbs’ liking. The declaration in the ‘statement of principles’ sent round on the evening before the conference offered less than other statements made by the EC on such essential questions as minorities, the international status of Yugoslavia and the sanctions.³²⁸⁶

The government in The Hague was not particularly happy with this. It was of the opinion that the international community was exerting too little pressure on the regime in Serbia. Van den Broek wanted the conference to issue a strong condemnation of the Serb policy of ethnic cleansing, should accept the principle that peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina should not be based on a division of the region into ethnic areas and should insist on the perpetrators of human rights crimes being brought to trial.³²⁸⁷ It turned out that for support of his harder position Van den Broek could only count on the German and – to a lesser extent – the Danish government. After the meeting of the British cabinet on 18 August, in the course of which it was also decided to deploy 1,800 British soldiers, the position of the government in London appeared to change and it turned out to be prepared to underline more clearly in the draft declaration of principles Serbian responsibility for the events in Bosnia and particularly the ethnic cleansing. The text also pointed explicitly once again to the responsibility on the part of states, as mentioned in resolution 771, to gather information about human rights offences.³²⁸⁸

The governments of France, Spain, Italy and Greece wished however that the London conference should not lead to a direct condemnation of Serbia. They were of the opinion that it would be better to involve in the results of the conference all the parties in the Bosnian conflict in order to end the war there.³²⁸⁹ It was clear that there was still severe disunity in the European Community regarding the way in which Serbia should be approached. And disunity over the attitude to be adopted vis-à-vis the FRY was no less great. While some countries, such as France, supported suspending Yugoslavia from international organizations, the Dutch government – for example – stuck to the view that Yugoslavia no longer existed and that the FRY had to make a fresh application for membership of international organizations.³²⁹⁰ Despite the British concessions to the Dutch view, therefore, prior to the conference the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague felt that ‘we would have to rely entirely on ourselves’ during the conference.³²⁹¹

The conference produced an enormous quantity of declarations and agreements. For example, the parties to the conflict agreed to a Programme of Action regarding Humanitarian Questions, where they once more declared that they were bound by the Geneva Convention and the Additional Protocols. A declaration of principles laid down thirteen principles that a peace agreement would have to satisfy, including: the integrity of all state borders; the regulation of questions of state leadership

³²⁸⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Van den Broek 120 to London embassy, 21/08/00.

³²⁸⁵ See, for instance, ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085, Biegman 886 (Van den Broek) to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 23/09/92; COREU Den Haag, date and number unknown. [Assign. DGPZ 29/09/92.]

³²⁸⁶ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum of chief DEU to DGPZ, 18/08/92, no. 151/92; ABZ, 245170, COREU The Hague, 18/08/92, cpe/hag/461.

³²⁸⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. COREU The Hague, 21/08/92, cpe/hag/471; ABZ, 508360, Van den Broek 211 to PV New York, 21/08/92.

³²⁸⁸ ABZ, 508360, D’Ansembourg 796 to Van den Broek, 21/08/92. See also ibid., D’Ansembourg 797 to Van den Broek, 24/08/92. See also ABZ, 345170, Loudon 412 to Van den Broek, 20/08/92.

³²⁸⁹ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 412 to Van den Broek, 20/08/92.

³²⁹⁰ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 413 to Van den Broek, 20/08/92.

³²⁹¹ Hoekema quoted in Both, Indifference, p.148; Dutch-language quotation in 1999 version, p.247 n. 9.

through consensus and arbitration; the refusal to recognize territory gained by force; opposition to and reversal of ethnic cleansing; allowing the international community access to the camps and their closure over time; and guarantees of human rights and the rights of minorities.³²⁹² In fact the principles stated nothing new when compared to countless other previous declarations, as Ministers Kinkel and Van den Broek observed.³²⁹³

There was no reference at all to sanctions on failure to observe the principles, while the declaration proclaimed that if Serbia and Montenegro observed the principles they would once again become valued members of the international community.³²⁹⁴ In addition it was agreed that the current embargo would be made even stricter and observers would be stationed at the Serbian borders to monitor compliance.³²⁹⁵ An CSCE commission led by the British Sir John Thompson would investigate the situation in the camps. Moreover it was agreed that a study would be made of the possibility of establishing Safe Areas.

The British Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Douglas Hogg, signed a document together with Karadzic and Koljevic stating that the Bosnian-Serb leadership promised to notify the positions of all the heavy artillery – further specified as all 82 mm mortars and heavier guns – that were to be grouped around the four towns of Sarajevo, Bihac, Gorazde and Jajce. This concentration would have to take place within seven days, after which the weapons would be placed under UN control.³²⁹⁶ The Bosnian Serbs further promised that they would withdraw from a further unspecified ‘substantial’ part of the territory they had occupied.

One of the aims of the London conference was to create a permanent consultative structure to replace the EC peace conference. At the start of the conference it was announced that Lord Carrington was quitting his post as mediator on behalf of the EC. Some believed that this had occurred at the insistence of Boutros-Ghali, who had made his co-chairmanship of the conference dependent on Carrington’s departure, since he had still not forgiven him for his performance in mid-July.³²⁹⁷ Boutros-Ghali denied having played this part. He stated that Carrington was sick of the lack of concessions on the part of Croats, Muslims and Serbs.³²⁹⁸

A new mediator: Lord David Owen

Carrington’s successor was David Owen. He was to form a duo with Vance, Boutros-Ghali’s representative in the peace process. Vance and Owen had got to know one another in the late 1970s, when they had attempted jointly, as foreign ministers of the United States and the United Kingdom respectively, to solve the Rhodesia question. The choice of Owen was remarkable for two reasons. First because shortly beforehand he had written an open letter to Major in which he called for the bombing of Serb positions. That had been sufficient reason for the French foreign minister, Dumas, to express a ‘réservation mentale’ with regard to Owen. When he noticed that he was getting little support in this, he left the meeting room demonstratively.³²⁹⁹ Owen’s appointment was even more remarkable since he was generally regarded as ‘undiplomatic’³³⁰⁰ and to be the possessor of ‘an unlimited capacity for bluntness’.³³⁰¹ He had the reputation of being ‘an unbelievable know-all, difficult to work with, vain, ³²⁹² Ramcharan, Conference, pp.3-4 and 33-34.

³²⁹³ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 416 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 26/08/92.

³²⁹⁴ Silber & Little, Death, p.262.

³²⁹⁵ Ramcharan, Conference, pp.43-45.

³²⁹⁶ Ramcharan, Conference, p.39.

³²⁹⁷ Glenny, Fall, p.215.

³²⁹⁸ Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p.48.

³²⁹⁹ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 416 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 26/08/92.

³³⁰⁰ O. Garschagen, ‘Clinton geeft Bosniërs slechts moreel gelijk’ (‘Clinton agrees with Bosnians only on moral issues’), de Volkskrant, 06/02/93.

³³⁰¹ Hieke Jippes, ‘David Owen: zo bot als nodig’ (‘David Owen. As blunt as necessary’), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/92.

and a man who makes no attempt to hide his feelings'.³³⁰² The British shadow foreign minister remarked on Owen's appointment that he was known for his 'many qualities, but not as a mediator. Indeed, he has Balkanized a few political parties himself'. He had just about ruined everything that he himself had striven for.³³⁰³

He first gained his reputation as 'kamikaze pilot' and 'enfant terrible' when, at the end of the 1970s as Foreign Minister of the Labour party, he had antagonized the anti-Europeans in his own party. Out of dissatisfaction with what he regarded as the too leftist developments in Labour he left the British workers' party and in 1981 was co-founder of the Social Democratic Party which, after a very promising start, had only moderate success – partly because of the British constituency-based electoral system. His then fellow party member Roy Jenkins compared him to the tree in an English fairy story that killed off all life for miles around.³³⁰⁴ 'Appointing Owen as dove of peace', sneered the Dutch weekly De Groene Amsterdammer, 'is like sending a pyromaniac to do repairs in an oil refinery'.³³⁰⁵ However Owen did seem to stand as symbol for the changes that British policy towards Yugoslavia was alleged to have undergone in mid-August. At the end of September, for example, he declared that the Bosnian Muslims must not become the victims of 'Realpolitik'. If the West were to allow that to happen, the entire Muslim world would react, 'and rightly so'.³³⁰⁶

The birth of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia (ICFY)

It was agreed in London that the meeting would be followed by a peace conference in Geneva, under the joint chairmanship of the EC chairman and the UN Secretary-General, to be known as the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, (ICFY). Owen (for the EC) and Vance (for the UN) would be joint chairmen of the conference Steering Committee, which would consist of the countries that had also taken part in the London conference. The Steering Committee would mainly serve as an advisory body, coming together approximately ten times in the subsequent three-and-a-half years, and would never take a formal decision. The actual activities involved in the negotiation process lay with Owen and Vance, who informed the members of the Steering Committee verbally and in writing of the progress of discussions with the leaders of the parties to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. There were to be six working parties dealing with parts of a peace plan based on the principles agreed in London. The working parties would occupy themselves with, respectively: Bosnia-Herzegovina; humanitarian aspects; ethnic and minority problems, including Kosovo, Vojvodina, Sandzak and Macedonia; succession of states and the distribution of the assets of the old Yugoslavia; economic questions; confidence-inspiring measures and verification. The principal working parties were the Bosnia group under the leadership of the Finn Matti Hisaari and the humanitarian aspects group chaired by High Commissioner for Refugees Ogata.

During the conference it became clear that the British government intended it to serve as a safety valve. In the words of the American diplomat Victor Jackovitch, who attended the conference as representative of the State Department, the British design more or less amounted to allowing the Serb leaders to make promises that both the British and other governments knew beforehand they would never keep: 'It was a landmark in handling the war (...) a beginning of the policy of doing nothing'.³³⁰⁷ It was clear that of the two schools of thought at the conference, the one that gained the upper hand ³³⁰² W. Rebergen & W. Jansen, 'David Owen en Cyrus Vance: vreemd koppel op oorlogspad' ('David Owen and Cyrus Vance. Strange couple on the warpath'), Trouw, 13/02/93. Tromp, Verraad, p.46 (02/09/92) called him "the most brilliant failure in British politics since Randolph Churchill". See also Maas, Neighbor, p.254.

³³⁰³ Simms, Hour, p.137.

³³⁰⁴ Ko Colijn & Paul Rusman, 'David Owen wil de Nobelprijs voor de vrede' ('David Owen wants the Nobel Peace Prize'), Vrij Nederland, 11/09/93, p.15.

³³⁰⁵ Misha Rasovich & Hans van Willigenburg, 'David Owen: werelddokter op huisbezoek in Bosnië' ('David Owen. World's doctor making a house call in Bosnia'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 05/05/93, p.15.

³³⁰⁶ Quoted in Almond, War, pp.260-261.

³³⁰⁷ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia – The Secret War: Tragic Cost of Allies' Hidden Hostility', The Guardian, 21/05/96.

was that which was striving for the Belgrade regime's agreement to end the conflict in the former Yugoslavia rather than that whose supporters wanted Serbia to be dealt with firmly. The first school of thought included such people as Boutros-Ghali, who set the tone of the conference with a speech totally lacking in criticism of Serbia.³³⁰⁸ The Dutch delegation, led by Minister Van den Broek, belonged to the latter school of thought together with the delegations of the United States, Canada, Germany, Austria, Slovenia and Turkey. In his first speech the Dutch minister demanded that strong pressure be put on Serbia as the party mainly guilty of ethnic cleansing. For him the conclusion was clear: immediate and full implementation of resolutions 770 and 771, the placing of the heavy weapons under international surveillance, the admission of international observers into Kosovo, a tightening of the trade embargo, exclusion of Yugoslavia from all international bodies and the setting up of a war crimes tribunal to deal with the former Yugoslavia. He was not prepared, in the worst-case scenario, to exclude military intervention.³³⁰⁹ Apart from Van den Broek, the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, Hikmet Cetin, was the only other delegation leader not to exclude the use of force against Serbia.³³¹⁰

The fact that in the end Prime Minister Major made a powerful closing statement was, as reported by the Dutch delegation, 'particularly the result of the forceful joint performance on the part of the Dutch and German delegations'. Despite British, French and Italian opposition both delegations had also succeeded in persuading the Twelve to support the idea of a black list of individuals guilty of serious breaches of human rights. Van den Broek, Kinkel and Eagleburger also supported Silajdzic in his opposition to the description of the conflict in Bosnia as a spontaneous civil war. They succeeded in having an indirect reference to the Serb aggression included in the declaration on Bosnia.³³¹¹

Meanwhile the FRY delegation had let the British chairman know that they would leave the meeting if a declaration on Serbia should be drawn up in the form of the condemnation wished for by the Netherlands and Germany. Within the delegation itself it was Milosevic who mainly opposed the requirement that Serbia should recognize the borders of the former Yugoslav republics. He stated that he had no problem with any of the other points, such as halting Serbia's interventions in Bosnia and Croatia and the restoration of the constitutional rights of the inhabitants of Kosovo and Vojvodina.³³¹² Boutros-Ghali was absolutely determined to prevent the FRY delegation from leaving the conference and the British chairmanship, supported by Eagleburger, believed that Karadzic and Izetbegovic had promised too much to allow this to be marred by the departure of the FRY delegation. From the British side, therefore, a proposal was put before the Dutch and German delegations that Major would be satisfied with a verbal warning to Serbia at the close of the conference. Van den Broek was strongly opposed to the idea. 'Hardliners' such as Minister Kinkel and himself, as Minister Van den Broek qualified them, had repeatedly submitted points in the course of the conference with the assurance that they would be included in a separate declaration on Serbia. If the declaration failed to get off the ground, Van den Broek believed that little would be left of the essential pressure on Serbia. He thus made his 'dissatisfaction' known to Hurd 'in unmistakable terms'.³³¹³ After enormous pressure from Hurd and Eagleburger (let's grab this text and run) Van den Broek finally agreed to a somewhat watered-down British text, mainly because in its closing passages it stated that if the Serbs failed to cooperate in the implementation of the London agreements, the Security Council would be asked to apply severe sanctions against the Serbs 'leading to their total isolation'.³³¹⁴

Premier Major then solved the question further by making the statement at the very last moment and then immediately closing the meeting, without further discussion or voting. In that way ³³⁰⁸ Ramcharan, Conference, pp.58-64.

³³⁰⁹ Ramcharan, Conference, pp.145-148; ABZ 345170, COREU of the British chairmanship of the EC, 27 August 1992, cpe/pres/lom 1080; Loudon 416 to BZ, 26/08/92; Both, Indifference, pp.148-149. Cf. Major, Autobiography, p.537.

³³¹⁰ Ramcharan, Conference, p.115.

³³¹¹ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 421 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 28/08/92.

³³¹² For the declaration see Ramcharan, Conference, pp.53-54.

³³¹³ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 421 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 28/08/92.

³³¹⁴ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 421 to Van den Broek, 28/08/92.

the declaration became part of the conference documentation but it was not submitted to formal acceptance.³³¹⁵

After the conference a triumphant British premier Major said that the parties in the conflict in Bosnia had now accepted a yardstick 'by which they would be judged'.³³¹⁶ But he soon began to manipulate the yardstick himself by declaring on television that not everything that had been agreed would be implemented exactly that way and as quickly as agreed: 'Some people may not be able to deliver immediately or in full'.³³¹⁷ A British ambassador at the Foreign Office was, however, markedly more critical and said that everything achieved in London 'rested on the sands of Milan Panic's promises'.³³¹⁸

'Verbal agreements are one thing; deeds are something else', said Bosnian president Izetbegovic when he left the London conference.³³¹⁹ What counts is what the coming weeks really bring, was what the British Foreign Minister Hurd seemed to think too, and his German colleague Kinkel was sceptical.³³²⁰

Remarkably enough, Minister Van den Broek was not so sombre. 'Time will tell what the conference was worth', was his judgement. At any rate, he was pleased that the EC no longer carried all the responsibility for a Yugoslavia conference that had 'dominated and sickened' the work of the Twelve. What he did fear, however, was that the United Kingdom would in future allow its attitude to Yugoslavia to be dominated more by its position as permanent member of the Security Council than as EC member state.³³²¹

In the Dutch media there was intense disappointment with 'London'. The general conclusion was that more than a year after the conflict in Yugoslavia had broken out the international community had issued a heap of statements without any means of enforcing them and had thus not advanced a single step.³³²²

But the conference had achieved precisely what the American delegation leader Eagleburger had had in mind. On 13 August Eagleburger was presented as interim Minister of Foreign Affairs because Baker had gone off to lead Bush's election campaign. Eagleburger was considerably less inclined than Baker to involve himself with Bosnia. He was deeply convinced that the West should not really get involved with the former Yugoslavia again until the warring factions had exhausted themselves.³³²³ As he stated in mid-September: 'I have said this 38,000 times and I have to say this to the people of this country as well. This tragedy is not something that can be settled from outside and it's about damn well time that everybody understood that. Until the Bosnians, Serbs, and Croats decide to stop killing each other, there is nothing the outside world can do about it'.³³²⁴ Since there was lack of international preparedness to intervene militarily he supported a mechanism that would keep itself permanently occupied with the crisis in the former Yugoslavia, more humanitarian help, stricter sanctions and preventive diplomacy in the neighbouring countries and those areas of the former ³³¹⁵ Major, Autobiography, p.537. According to Silber & Little, Death, p.260, this was a proposal made by the Russian minister of foreign affairs Kozyrev.

³³¹⁶ Vulliamy, Seasons, pp.159-160. Cf. Silber & Little, Death, p.260.

³³¹⁷ Quoted in Almond, War, p.262.

³³¹⁸ Glenny, Fall, p.217.

³³¹⁹ Carol J. Williams, 'Western leaders concede failure to halt Bosnia strife', Los Angeles Times, 29/08/92.

³³²⁰ Steve Crawshaw & Tony Barber, 'Inside Story: Peace? What Peace?', The Independent, 30/08/92.

³³²¹ ABZ, 345170, Loudon 421 to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 28/08/92.

³³²² See, for instance, 'Realpolitik in London', 'Kroniek van een jaar EG-bemoeienis' ('Chronicles of a year of EC meddling' and Ewoud Nysingh, 'De onderhandelaars zijn weer terug bij af' ('The negotiators are starting all over again'), de Volkskrant, 29/08/92; Joris Cammelbeeck & Martin Sommer, 'Thirst for action and powerlessness', de Volkskrant, 29/08/92; Folkert Jensma, 'Londoen' biedt weinig ruimte voor euforie' ('London' offering little room for euphoria), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/92; 'Een papieren zwaard' ('A paper sword'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/92; 'De hoop van de wanhoop (1) en (2)' ('The hope of despair (1) and (2)'), Trouw, 29/08/92.

³³²³ Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitiek, p.95.

³³²⁴ Quoted in Danner, Clinton, p.66.

Yugoslavia that had not (yet) been dragged into a crisis.³³²⁵ And that was exactly what the conference had agreed on.

Back in Belgrade Milosevic recovered from the bruising he had suffered as a result of the behaviour of Panic during the conference. He denied having agreed to anything at all in London.³³²⁶ During a meeting with his closest confidants held in his weekend house in Pozarevac the decision was taken that Panic had to be removed from the scene as quickly as possible. On 31 August Seselj submitted a motion of no confidence in Panic in the Yugoslav parliament. But Cosic gave a powerful speech in favour of Panic, and the Montenegrin representatives made clear that they would not support the motion.³³²⁷ The whole affair thus seemed to turn against Milosevic. At that Milosevic's spokesman announced that his party, the SDS, would not support the motion. After three days of violent opposition to Panic and the outcome of the London conference that he had accepted, the parliament finally had to vote in favour.

17. Debate in Parliament, 27 August: resistance to 'hypocrisy'

The images of Trnopolje had aroused a sentiment of powerlessness among Dutch parliamentarians. A year's experience with the problem of Yugoslavia had also contributed: nothing that the international community did seemed to have any effect. On 12 August the members were still working off their frustrations on the government, but it had meanwhile become clear that it was not the government that needed urging on.³³²⁸ On the evening of 27 August during an emergency debate, this time instigated by the VVD, the report of the memorable emergency discussions of 12 August came up in a plenary session of the Lower House. It occurred at a time that the conference was still going on in London. At that moment Van den Broek was struggling to get a severe condemnation of Serbia, but the house was unaware of the fact. And the next day the WEU was to meet to decide its position with regard to military protection for humanitarian convoys. Because of this the debate seemed more designed to give the speakers in the house free rein to express their longings than to lead to a real exchange of thought with the government. And what the parliamentarians had to say seemed mainly directed at foreign heads of government. This trend had become clear among politicians shortly before in an interview with De Hoop Scheffer in Vrij Nederland. Though prior to the discussion in the house on 12 August he had given as motive for requesting the debate the need to exchange thoughts with the government regarding the deployment of Dutch soldiers and the creation of Safe Areas, in an interview shortly after the debate he said that he had wanted to show how divided Europe really is. 'A debate of this kind forces the Dutch government to adopt a position in public', he said. 'Then we'll see how divided Europe is on the question of Yugoslavia. Then the cracks in Europe can be seen for what they're really worth.'

The British chairmanship in particular had made 'a very poor impression' on him. The caution exhibited by the Bush government had also been a thorn in his side.³³²⁹

The disappointment at the attitude of the international community with regard to the former Yugoslavia was spoken about on 27 August pretty well the length and breadth of the house. According to Van Middelkoop (GPV) 'the overwhelming political emotion (...) was one (...) of considerable powerlessness'. He recalled the words that premier Lubbers had spoken two weeks before, that in the case of doubt it was better to do something, but of this not much had been seen apart from international meetings.³³³⁰ Various politicians did not shrink from condemning the rest of the world ³³²⁵ See Eagleburger's speech in Ramcharan, Conference, pp.116-120.

³³²⁶ Doder/Branson, Milosevic, p.158.

³³²⁷ Djukic, Milosevic, p.57.

³³²⁸ Interview E. van Middelkoop, 08/10/99.

³³²⁹ Leonard Ornstein, 'CDA'er De Hoop Scheffer bleef in zij vakantie doordenken' ('CDA [man] De Hoop Scheffer still thinking things over during his vacation'), Vrij Nederland, 15/08/92.

³³³⁰ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings, p.6151.

from their seats in The Hague. The VVD parliamentarian Blaauw expected nothing from the agreements that were now known to have been arrived at in London. In fact, they were worthless if they were not enforced, ‘certainly not as far as the negotiators from the former Yugoslavia are concerned’.³³³¹ ‘Little has changed in the last two weeks’, Blaauw complained. He was of the opinion that ‘hypocrisy reigns’ in the international community and ‘people are speaking with forked tongues’ and the community ‘sat there with its arms folded’. This constant ‘passivity and half-baked activity are nothing less than a form of international provocation that can lead to long and cruel conflicts’.³³³² Sipkes considered that the performance of the EC and NATO was slowly but surely ‘turning into a travesty’.³³³³ It was ‘just a bit too much’ for her that individuals who belonged in a war trial setting were flying home from London ‘with all signs of deference’.³³³⁴ De Hoop Scheffer believed that the international community had come together at that moment in London to do ‘a re-sit’: ‘We all know that you fail if you don’t pass the re-sit’. The European Community had, he believed, awarded ‘a degree in inaptitude’.³³³⁵ Leerling (RPF – one of the Christian parties) asked the government whether NATO, that had always stood ready during the Cold War, was suddenly overpowered by fear: ‘Surely Serbia isn’t a superpower?’³³³⁶

Against this background it was understandable that members of parliament supported the government in its stance in international bodies, a stance described as ‘activist’ (Valk)³³³⁷ or ‘assertive’ (Van Middelkoop)³³³⁸. It was ‘right that the Dutch government should continue to insist on achieving a result in all the international forums of discussion’ (De Hoop Scheffer).³³³⁹ Leerling too understood ‘that the Dutch government wants more than can be achieved internationally at the moment. My compliments to the government for this’.³³⁴⁰

A number of parliamentarians reached far back into history looking for moral justification for the Dutch attitude: it was found in the Second World War. Blaauw thought that the Netherlands was duty bound to carry heavy international responsibilities ‘towards those who paid the ultimate price, whether in concentration camps, before the firing squad, on the Normandy beaches or wherever else, for our freedom and our human rights’.³³⁴¹ Van Middelkoop, speaking against the background of the disunity in the EC and NATO, wondered ‘where, at the time, the Americans, the Canadians and many others found the courage and the willingness to sacrifice themselves in order to liberate Europe from the scourge of national-socialism’. He wanted to know once and for all where the retired generals were who had known it all so much better than anyone else during the Gulf War.³³⁴²

It was noticeable that in order to take the proposed measures the Netherlands had to lean heavily on France and the United Kingdom. This was seen, for instance, in the range of suggestions for more involvement proposed by Blaauw. He asked for strict application of the embargo against Serbia and Montenegro. Blaauw wanted the government to find out whether it could make units available for the provision of military protection for the promised transport units. He realized that the willingness of conscripts would be a problem. For this reason it could at first be British and French troops who would provide protection but then the Netherlands could offer a unit to relieve those already there. In addition the Netherlands could make F-16s available, both for enforcing a ban on flights over Bosnia and for protecting the aid convoys. And a halt should be called, using force if necessary, to the camps.

³³³¹ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6148.

³³³² TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6147.

³³³³ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6149.

³³³⁴ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6150. Leerling made a similar remark, ibid., p.6154.

³³³⁵ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6152.

³³³⁶ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6154.

³³³⁷ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6150.

³³³⁸ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6152.

³³³⁹ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6152.

³³⁴⁰ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6154.

³³⁴¹ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6147.

³³⁴² TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6152.

For this Blaauw thought of ‘air mobile units, not available in our country; and so for this too we will need allies’.³³⁴³ Blaauw said he was fully aware of the risks for the troops deployed, including Dutch soldiers, as a result of this stance. Which is why he wanted a decision on deployment to be taken exclusively in a plenary meeting.³³⁴⁴

From the point of view of the constitution this argument was not airtight. In fact the government had to take the decision, not parliament. However, there was a great deal to be said for the argument that the house should only speak on such a decision in a plenary session. However the discussion on the government decision to deploy the airmobile brigade more than a year later was not conducted in a plenary session but in the course of verbal consultations. Like Blaauw, Valk and De Hoop Scheffer insisted on stricter application of the embargo and the introduction of a ban on flying.³³⁴⁵ They repeated their preference for the setting up of safe havens, with military protection if needs be.³³⁴⁶

Leerling warned against aiming too high. He could not imagine that the hundreds of thousands of refugees could ever return home. A military force of several hundred thousand would be needed for that and it was unrealistic to expect that this would be forthcoming. But he did have difficulty with having to recognize that violence evidently paid off. At any rate, military intervention was perhaps necessary to liberate the camps: ‘Whatever the case, we can’t look on helplessly’.³³⁴⁷

Eisma, member of parliament for D66, took a different line. He warned his colleagues that ‘it [would be] wrong from a moral point of view for us to put together recommendations mainly based on emotions. In such a case we would possibly be taking insufficient account of the undesirable consequences of the actions we are calling for. So much is at present certain: we can do a lot less than we would like to do’.³³⁴⁸ He thought that preventive measures in areas such as Vojvodina and Kosovo should have the highest priority.³³⁴⁹ Eisma’s words were characteristic of the moderate opinion of D66’s lower house members in these years. The former Yugoslavia dossier was dealt with mainly by the triumvirate formed by the spokesmen for Foreign Affairs and Defence, Eisma and Ter Veer respectively, and party chairman Van Mierlo. This trio, according to Eisma, was able to resist fellow party members who wanted intervention because of the reports in the media. Eisma continually alluded to the unclear political context in Bosnia. He wanted to prevent the Netherlands from sending out troops without the participation of other countries. And Van Mierlo, who had ambitions regarding the ministerial post of Foreign Affairs, constantly told his party members: ‘Be careful, because soon I will be on that post and then of course I’ll have to be able to bring about what we’re now calling for’.³³⁵⁰ In the debate on 27 August Van Dis (SGP) somewhat echoed Eisma: ‘Our heart says: help! Put right what is wrong! But common sense will have to count the cost very carefully. Is that not what the dilemma is and is it not proof of our own impotence?’³³⁵¹

But the stance adopted by Eisma and Van Dis was in the minority, so that Minister Ter Beek was able to conclude that the principal significance of parliament’s contribution as far as the government was concerned was: ‘Do something, don’t sit back, don’t be passive but do something’.³³⁵² Minister Lubbers, acting as interim Foreign Minister while Van den Broek was in London, said that he was in ‘the remarkable situation’ of having heard the house put forward a proposal containing nothing the government was unwilling to do.

³³⁴³ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6148.

³³⁴⁴ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6147.

³³⁴⁵ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings pp.6150-6153.

³³⁴⁶ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings pp.6150 and 6152.

³³⁴⁷ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6155.

³³⁴⁸ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6155.

³³⁴⁹ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6156.

³³⁵⁰ TCBU, discussion with Eisma, 06/04/00, pp.3 and 6.

³³⁵¹ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6157.

³³⁵² TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6158

‘In former times it sometimes came about that our Minister of Foreign Affairs too, on behalf of the Dutch government, made statements and set conditions regarding instrumentalization; which body should act in a particular situation. The house will note that he has repeatedly stated here that he would set this aside if matters could be settled as quickly as possible. That is therefore my response to the suggestions and questions.’³³⁵³

Parliament’s message was understood. On 1 September Van den Broek wrote a letter to the house stating that the Dutch government was moving towards the opinion that only external military intervention could bring about a solution to the conflict; the economic, political and diplomatic tools were pretty well exhausted.³³⁵⁴

18. Conclusion

The months of June, July and August had shown that the international community had little taste for military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In June Minister Baker was able to prolong this attitude against the wishes of the Pentagon, but the American initiative to take armed action was headed off by Mitterrand’s solo visit to the Bosnian capital. After that any American enthusiasm for military action ebbed away. The toothless nature of the international community’s approach was illustrated by the decision to monitor temporarily only at sea to check whether the embargo against rump-Yugoslavia was being adhered to. There was no question of enforcement and opportunities for getting around the embargo long persisted via the overland route or along the Danube.

The pictures that the British ITN television company had taken in Trnopolje raised a substantial echo in the media and had shocked public opinion, but they failed to lead to military intervention. On the contrary, it had become clear – though in August 1992 it was far from being as clear as outlined here – how cynical the attitude of the American government was with regard to the gross violations of human rights in Bosnia-Herzegovina since they had suppressed the reports in order not to be forced into military intervention. What also became obvious was the lack of alertness of parts of the UN in their reaction to this sort of report.

The media also played a remarkable role. At first they failed to examine the available information and when, eventually, the words ‘concentration camps’ and ‘death camps’ had been uttered the headlines screamed them out and the ITN film was shown time after time on television.

In fact the effect occasioned by those images should be put into perspective. In the case of the Netherlands it appeared that the debate on military intervention had already been gaining momentum before the pictures were shown and before the newspaper reports of Serb camps. This can mean two things. Either the sombre opinion of some representatives of the printed media that they had so much less influence than television³³⁵⁵ is not supported by the chronology of the Dutch debate on military intervention. Or the cumulative effect of pictures of the shelling of Sarajevo, of famine in the Bosnian capital and of floods of refugees had already had an influence earlier. At any rate, the pictures shot in Trnopolje at most intensified the discussion about intervention but the number of media participants in the discussion remained limited to a few dozen. The outcome of this investigation thus further underlines the findings of the investigation carried out by political scientist P. P. Everts into the relationship between Dutch foreign policy and public opinion. Everts believes that Dutch foreign policy, as in most other countries, is still a matter decided by an elite.³³⁵⁶

In the weeks following the commotion about the camps the British and French governments promised respectively 1,800 and 1,100 soldiers, not for military intervention but to protect the aid

³³⁵³ TK 1991-1992, Proceedings p.6161.

³³⁵⁴ TK 1991-1992, 22 181, no. 24, pp.1-2.

³³⁵⁵ See, for instance, Glenny, Fall, p.210.

³³⁵⁶ Everts, Laat, p.243.

convoys. It became very clear that the British government had placed severe restrictions on the actions of its own troops. The next chapter will show that the idea that resolution 770 would permit the use of force had very little value. The member states of NATO and the WEU were prepared to provide troops only for a limited implementation of the resolution.

And in the summer of 1992 Boutros-Ghali also indicated that he regarded the conflict in the former Yugoslavia more as a stumbling block than as an opportunity for the UN to adopt a high profile. The extension of the Yugoslavia conference, born during the London conference, scarcely held any promise as far as that was concerned. This was again emphasized when it turned out to be difficult during the conference even to repeat in statements what had earlier been advanced as a demand made on Serbia by the international community. In addition, not a single one of the agreements was accompanied by sanctions. It was clear that the international community was prepared to put in humanitarian effort, but no more than that. It provided space for governments to bow to some extent to the pressure of public opinion so as to give the impression that they were doing something.

The Dutch government and parliamentarians did not resign themselves to this sort of limited action. Statements such as those made by L. Metzemaekers in het Financieele Dagblad, that all discussions about military intervention were academic because of the refusenik attitude of the international community,³³⁵⁷ or by D.-J. van Baar, that as long as other countries refused to undertake real military action, the Netherlands should not engage in such ‘tough talking’,³³⁵⁸ were not appreciated by the Lower House.

In mid-August De Groene Amsterdammer noted that while ‘the whole of the Netherlands’ was in agreement about armed intervention in Bosnia, in other European countries such enthusiasm was limited – in the United Kingdom, for instance, where not even 30% of the population were in favour of military intervention. Military experts in France and the United Kingdom were pointing out the dangers; putting in German troops was, in view of the past, not a sensible option; and Russia was dead set against intervention.³³⁵⁹ On the other side of the media-political spectrum de Telegraaf also noted that the Netherlands ‘has been pretty well in the vanguard’ by announcing a military contribution towards humanitarian aid in Bosnia. This morning daily said that it was ‘a relief, after our country in the past, under pressure from the Left, often had to play a minor role in the military-political field and was only too ready to leave to others the defence of values which are also ours’.³³⁶⁰

The impression grows that the arguments put forward by the interventionists in the Netherlands passed over to the people’s representatives and the government more easily than in other countries. And articles in the major Dutch newspapers in August 1992 carried the conviction that other countries and international organizations were more cautious than the Dutch political world and society in general.³³⁶¹ ‘When it is a question of relieving need in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Netherlands tops the list. At least, that is the impression that comes across from the tone with which any possible intervention is discussed’, wrote Guikje Roethof in De Groene Amsterdammer at the beginning of September. She blamed the Dutch ministers and parliamentarians for ‘playing up to the public’ and ‘practically expressing the voice of the people’.³³⁶²

The question is whether it was really so, and whether ministers and parliamentary representatives were parroting the public. Unfortunately there are no public opinion statistics for the period prior to the summer of 1992, so that it is difficult to determine when public opinion showed a majority in favour of military intervention. But it is certain that Ministers Van den Broek and Lubbers were already supporting harder action against Serbia and the Bosnian Serbs in June.

³³⁵⁷ L. Metzemaekers, ‘Discussie Joegoslavië en militair ingrijpen is louter academisch’ (‘Discussion on Yugoslavia and military intervention is merely an academic exercise’, Het Financieele Dagblad, 05/08/92.

³³⁵⁸ Dirk-Jan van Baar, ‘Nederland gidsland’ (‘The Netherlands, lead country’), Intermediair, 14/08/92.

³³⁵⁹ Jake van Kampen, ‘Op de plaats rust’ (‘Stand at ease’), De Groene Amsterdammer, 19/08/92, p.7.

³³⁶⁰ ‘Niet te karig’ (‘Not too frugal’), de Telegraaf, 21/08/92.

³³⁶¹ Cf. Appendix Scholten & Ruigrok & Heerma, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten, pp.205-207.

³³⁶² Guikje Roethof, ‘Krijgshaftig’ (‘Bellicose’), De Groene Amsterdammer, 02/09/92.

This conclusion seems to match up with the statements made by decision-makers in the year 2000 to the Tijdelijke Commissie Besluitvorming Uitzendingen van de Tweede Kamer (The Interim Parliamentary Committee for Decision-making regarding Deployment), otherwise known as the commissie-Bakker (the Bakker Committee). Although it is true to say that for their motivation and actions relative to the deployment of the military to the former Yugoslavia they make reference to heart-rending scenes pictured in the media, they also state that these images merely reinforced them in the convictions they already had.³³⁶³ At any rate, the ministers were a step ahead of organized public opinion. The debate on intervention did not start in the Netherlands until July. Because the verbal discussions of 12 August took place at an unfortunate time – unfortunate in view of the fact that things had still not crystallized out in the major international forums – the government wrote a letter to parliament that occasioned the optical illusion that the house had overtaken the government in the debate on intervention. It would seem much more likely that on 12 August parliament, in its capacity as link between general public and government, jacked itself up to the level of readiness to intervene that had already been achieved by public and government.

Shortly after that the government seemed to take yet another step forward – in case of need intervene outside the confines of NATO and the WEU – a step parliamentarians were reluctant to take. At the end of August it was clear that the Dutch parliament and government had little more to say to one another. It was the refusal of the international community that had to be given impetus – but how? The feeling of powerlessness in the matter led Dutch politicians to adopt ever shriller tones towards other national governments and international organizations, perhaps not the most effective way of achieving their end and, moreover, a dangerous occupation. An obvious reaction, in popular terms, is ‘Do it yourself’. And, as it turned out in August 1992, the Netherlands could not deploy a fighting force as long as the airmobile brigade was not set up. That required a wait of eighteen months.

The Dutch stance on intervention: ‘eventually the rest will follow’

Then there remained the question of the origin of the difference in readiness to intervene between the Netherlands and other countries. ‘The Dutch politicians’ enthusiasm for military involvement is difficult to explain’, wrote Kees Lunshof in de Telegraaf on 25 August.

‘Their enthusiasm was already present before the general public had become seriously concerned at seeing the pictures of the concentration camps. So that was not the origin. It also had nothing to do with power politics or commercial considerations. There are no immediate Dutch interests at play in Yugoslavia. It would seem to have been mainly inspired by feelings of idealism and solidarity, factors that have always played an important part in Dutch foreign policy. And participation is also fitting in encouraging international justice. That too is something highly valued in the Netherlands. (...)’

Our taste for involvement also has some political spin-off. The Netherlands likes to make clear its place on the world map, something that is especially a driving force in the foreign ministry. At the same time it blew new life into the defence machine that had lost its bearings after the fall of communism (...) At the same time we thereby constitute an example for our large neighbour, Germany, that does so little in the international military field.³³⁶⁴

A number of explanations listed by Lunshof can certainly be endorsed. Some individuals believe that the Netherlands has a greater tendency than other countries to adopt an idealistic stance in foreign policy. Some years ago, before the conflict in Yugoslavia broke out, Van der List wrote that the relative lack of influence and responsibility enjoyed by the Netherlands beyond its own borders was the cause of the ground swell in ‘Gesinnungsethik’ in this country. The field of Dutch foreign policy constituted a ‘playground for people who, though they are doubtless sincere in their concern at suffering in the world, have little comprehension of the complexity of international politics’.³³⁶⁵ Piet Dankert, Junior Minister for foreign affairs in the Lubbers/Kok government said shortly after his resignation ‘The Netherlands is relatively isolated from the rest of the world. We are internationalists, but on an abstract level. And we suffer from an over-estimation of ourselves, since we have too little realization of the extent to which we need other countries politically speaking’.³³⁶⁶

³³⁶³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p.444.

³³⁶⁴ Kees Lunshof, ‘Politiek kleintert risico’s in Bosnië’, de Telegraaf, 25/08/92.

As early as 1971 the later Foreign Minister Max van der Stoel wrote, in an article about intervention, that the tendency on the part of the Netherlands to involve itself critically in the affairs of other countries was very strongly developed.³³⁶⁷ And here we see the incapacity on the part of Dutch opinion-makers and decision-takers to imagine that their opposite numbers in other countries do not share their thoughts, can cause problems.

The former diplomat and ex-secretary of state at the foreign office E.H. van der Beugel remarked in 1985 that there was also a gap between the way the Netherlands saw itself and how others perceived the country: ‘In consequence we often over-estimate our own role, which constantly leads to errors of judgement, misunderstandings and irritation’. He quoted Van der Stoel, meanwhile ex-Foreign Minister, who said that as soon as he crossed the Dutch border he turned a switch ‘because outside the Netherlands there was nobody who thought about foreign policy as we did’.³³⁶⁸

This type of self-limitation would seem no longer to be present in the Dutch politicians responsible for policy in the early 1990s. Evidently it had become too difficult to perform the gymnastics involved in activities abroad and defending such actions to parliament. With regard to areas such as human rights and development co-operation the Dutch politicians regarded their country as leading the field. Thus the council adviser to the Ministry of General Affairs charged with foreign and security policy, J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, did not find it at all strange that with regard to Yugoslavia there was a yawning gap between what the Netherlands wanted and what the rest of the world wanted. A gap of this type was not uncommon, and did not necessarily cause problems: ‘Eventually the rest will follow’.³³⁶⁹ According to premier Lubbers it was a usual pattern in Dutch behaviour for the country itself to undertake something and then assume that this would spread automatically like a patch of oil on water.³³⁷⁰ Evidently the Dutch government had not learned its lesson on Black Monday, when it turned out that the rest of the EC was not as docile as had been expected. Moreover a fault of Dutch diplomacy frequently noted is the failure to convince others in the international circuit, working on the assumption that others will follow the Dutch proposals or at least not block them.³³⁷¹

In former years, relative to areas of policy other than that on Yugoslavia, Dutch diplomacy had developed the habit of taking the most far-reaching stance inside the EC in the knowledge that one or more of the other member states would not go so far in community decision-making. This then enabled the Dutch government, for instance, to boast back in the home country that: ‘we were quite prepared, but the others were not – unfortunately’. In this way Dutch representatives to the EC were able to place the blame squarely on other countries who, moreover, often had to do the subsequent dirty work.³³⁷² This does not mean that Dutch diplomacy was working in a similarly calculating way in the Yugoslavia question. Emotions relative to the matter were too sincere for that. But it could indicate ³³⁶⁵ Van der List, Mensenrechten, p.96.

³³⁶⁶ Dankert in: Rehwinkel & Nekkens, Regerendernijds, p.143.

³³⁶⁷ Van der Stoel, Aspecten, p.115.

³³⁶⁸ Van der Beugel, Nederland, p.131.

³³⁶⁹ Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00.

³³⁷⁰ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

³³⁷¹ Castermans-Holleman, Mensenrechtenbeleid, p.265.

³³⁷² Van Walsum, Nederland, pp. 47-48; Everts, Nederland, p. 1.

that to a certain extent Dutch diplomacy had more of an eye for the desirability than for the feasibility of its own proposals in international negotiations. The awareness that they were playing for their own home front instead of in an international arena could thus have been reinforced.

In May 1992 foreign commentator J.L. Heldring stated that Dutch ministers who preached morality abroad, and consequently aroused irritation there, were doing a wonderful job of representing Dutch culture. 'But whether they do a wonderful job of representing our interests is another matter.'³³⁷³

This stance, characterised by being in the vanguard abroad, could perhaps be a reflection of political culture in the Netherlands itself. The sociologist-philosopher J.W. Duyvendak once stated that new political issues get onto the political agenda much more quickly in the Netherlands and Germany than in France. Moreover, he writes, politicians in the Netherlands often lead the way in changes to politics and mentality, 'if only from fear of being accused of backwardness'.³³⁷⁴ In the Netherlands the formers of public opinion found it relatively easy to get the question of intervention in Yugoslavia onto the political agenda. Once the Cold War was out of the way, some of the Dutch opinion-formers and decision-makers were given the opportunity of replacing security policy with peacemaking policy.

Another internal explanation of avant-gardism abroad could be that the extent to which governments support human rights issues is connected to the extent of secularization in a society. Some authors believe that public indignation regarding violations of human rights increases because human rights questions in a secularizing society replace the framework of moral concepts that religions used to provide.³³⁷⁵ In its capacity as a strongly secularized nation the Netherlands would, it is said, almost automatically be a jump ahead of other nations in questions affecting human rights.

A further remarkable fact is that Dutch politicians, in hindsight too, so emphatically retained the right to showing emotions with regard to the humanitarian problem as posed in the former Yugoslavia. Even Kok, the then vice-premier and leader of the social-democratic fraction in the government, stated:

'In your capacity as leader too, at one stage you are rational, and you think: no, of course we must first do this or that. The next minute you are more emotional. You are also a citizen, a person, and in that sense you have to assume your responsibilities.'³³⁷⁶

The admission of emotions, including into the field of foreign policy, meant that in the Netherlands the concept of national interest or some other form of etatism was not very strongly developed. 'In the Yugoslav case (...) Western media (...) failed to penetrate the armoury of "national interest" which continues to shield foreign policy-making from appeals to humanitarianism.'³³⁷⁷ But it would seem fairly clear that not much penetration was required in the Netherlands.

According to R. (Rob) de Wijk, the lack of a developed feeling of national interest explains why, in the Netherlands, emotions are so often decisive in deploying units in a crisis area.³³⁷⁸ At the beginning of this chapter it appeared that many countries failed to see the happenings in the former Yugoslavia as a problem affecting their own national interests. In the Netherlands, on the contrary, idealistic aims in foreign policy are tightly interwoven with questions of national interest. The government can hardly retreat into a position stating that ideals are all well and good but that national interest requires a different stance. Article 90 of the Dutch constitution states: 'The Netherlands

³³⁷³ J.L. Heldring, 'Onze cultuur weerspiegeld' ('Reflections of our culture'), NRC Handelsblad, 12/05/92.

³³⁷⁴ Duyvendak, Sonplessse, p.67. See further ibid., pp.68-72

³³⁷⁵ See, for instance, A.H.M. van Iersel, 'De inzet van Pax Christi in de brede maatschappelijke discussie over Defensie', Van den Berg & Boerefijn & Weerdenburg, Wijis, pp.55-56.

³³⁷⁶ Interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

³³⁷⁷ Carruthers, Media, p.218.

³³⁷⁸ Rob de Wijk, 'Nationale belangen en prioriteiten in het buitenlands en veiligheidsbeleid', Instituut Defensie Leergangen, Criteria, pp.43-44. See also J.L. Heldring, 'Nederland marginaliseert zichzelf' ('The Netherlands is marginalising itself'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/02/92.

encourages the development of international justice'. And article 98: 'There is a fighting force to defend the interests of the state'. At the time the government pointed out that the interests stated here also implicated article 90.³³⁷⁹ In this way the Dutch government committed itself in principle to the international system of justice. The question now is whether that means that this basic assumption is scarcely distinguishable from other vital interests of the country.

There is a major lack of clarity in this area. The well-known commentator on foreign policy, J.L. Heldring, stated as early as 1973 that the striving for international justice, constituting such an essential element of Dutch foreign policy, did not spring from 'the brain or the inspiration of the Dutch people, but (...) to a large extent [is] inspired by the Dutch state's own interests, since the country is so much smaller than its neighbours'.³³⁸⁰

In the details provided in 1995 by the Dutch government to Parliament, accompanying the tools for assessing whether a military peace mission should be deployed, there is just as much confusion of concepts relative to the question of whether the establishment of an international system of justice should also be regarded as a national interest. On the one hand, the government writes that the promotion of human rights and international justice '[must] not be seen exclusively as an ideal to be striven for but also as a national interest'.³³⁸¹ On the other hand, the government speaks of two separate aims which, however, are so tightly interwoven that the government regarded it as 'undesirable to make a sharp distinction between the two'.³³⁸² The Dutch government still had insufficient grasp of the fact that its own interpretation of the encouragement of the international system of justice as a national interest was not shared to the same extent by other countries. Despite the rhetoric about a new world order, the inadmissibility of war on European soil, the importance of multi-ethnicity and suchlike, in the 1990s most countries let themselves be guided by their national interest in the narrow sense of the term.³³⁸³

After a series of errors of judgement on the part of the foreign affairs ministry, including the attitude of Minister Van den Broek with regard to Yugoslavia during the EC chairmanship in 1991, the editorial in NRC Handelsblad on 1 April 1992 concluded that an appeal 'to self-evident moral rightness plays no part outside the national borders, or at least does so to a much lesser extent than The Hague hopes (...) This lesson in self-relativization will have to be taken to heart by the Netherlands to avoid any new international pitfalls'.³³⁸⁴

A further factor was that Dutch history following the police actions in the Netherlands' East Indies at the end of the 1940s had seen no further independent intervention on the part of the Royal Netherlands Army in conflicts of any significance. 'High points' of Dutch military history were the limited conflict with Indonesia over New Guinea in 1962 and the deployment of marines to stop riots on the island of Curaçao in 1969. Dutch governments and politicians had for decades been able to comment on deployment by other nations without themselves having to carry immediate responsibility. In those other countries, such as the United Kingdom and the United States, there was a deep understanding, based on experience, of the dangers of politics based on Gesinnungsethik. Thus Stephen J. Hadley, American Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Policy, declared in August 1992 during a hearing of the American Senate:

'...that our Nation has learned to be careful about committing its military forces and risking the lives of the men and women in uniform who serve this Nation.

³³⁷⁹ TK1992-1993, p.5014 (Ter Beek, 19/05/93); Coolen, VN-operaties, pp.43-44; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p.23.

³³⁸⁰ J.L. Heldring, 'De staat is amoreel', Heldring (red.), Moraal, p.54. Cf. M. van der Stoel, 'Koopman en dominee', ibid., p.82.

³³⁸¹ TK 1994-1995, 23 591, no. 5, pp.7-8.

³³⁸² Ibid., p.9. Cf. also the first point of emphasis: 'Uitzending van militaire eenheden geschiedt op grond van Nederlandse belangen (waaronder de bescherming van de internationale vrede en veiligheid) en/of de bevordering van de internationale rechtsorde.' Ibid.

³³⁸³ Cf. Weiss, Interactions, p.7.

³³⁸⁴ 'Buitenlandse zaken' ('Foreign affairs'), NRC Handelsblad, 01/04/92.

We have learned to weigh our international responsibilities and the national interest at stake against the potential loss of life and the availability of other means to achieve its objectives. We have learned to insist on clearly stated objectives for the use of military forces, objectives that are realistically attainable, with a clear understanding of (...) what constitutes success.³³⁸⁵

A further explanation can be that it was precisely the feeling of a lack of heroism earlier in the twentieth century that played a role. Examples advanced included the feeling of shame at the lack of assistance given to Jews during the Second World War: ‘This time we’ll hold our own them!’³³⁸⁶ From that point of view the comparison drawn between the Serb operation in Bosnia in 1992 and the behaviour of the Nazis would have provided an extra stimulus encouraging the Dutch population ‘to do something’. It is, for instance, remarkable how prominent a part was played by references to the Second World War as an explanation for people’s stance – as, for instance, during the parliamentary debate on 27 August. Premier Lubbers referred to the Hunger Winter of 1945 as an explanation for his own forceful performance at the Lisbon summit at the end of June. He was to do the same again in December 1992 at the EC summit in Edinburgh. In all the comparisons drawn between the situation in Bosnia in 1992 and the Second World War this variant was scarcely heard, which can allow us to assume that it was an authentic statement of the Dutch premier. In one of his discussions with the NIOD Lubbers also stated that Van den Broek and himself were ‘marked’ by the Second World War, Van den Broek because his father spoke to his occupied fatherland from London as ‘The Rotterdammer’ for Radio Oranje and Lubbers because his father was taken hostage during the war.³³⁸⁷

Still more can be said about these two politicians who represented the Netherlands at the top in international bodies. In Chapter 1 it has already been stated that both men had an exaggerated opinion of their own status abroad, resumed in the statement by Lubbers that the Dutch government was not occupied with building up a position in the Yugoslavia file as chairman of the EC: ‘The Netherlands already had a position’.³³⁸⁸ It was pointed out that that led to a noblesse oblige attitude on the part of the Dutch government, meaning that the Netherlands should take a more active stance than countries such as Ireland or Austria. In August 1992 Kees Lunshof noted in de Telegraaf that Lubbers and Van den Broek, ‘who, with support from Ter Beek, have long been advocating a strong military intervention on the part of the world community, including the Netherlands’, were no longer having the brake put on them – as during the Gulf War – by vice-premier and PvdA leader Kok.³³⁸⁹ In Van den Broek’s case there was another exceptional factor in that as chairman of the EC he had made a major emotional investment in the Yugoslavia question. In case it had been forgotten, during the Parliament’s debate of 27 August premier Lubbers ‘called to mind that the Dutch government, particularly in the person of Minister Van den Broek, was involved at a very early stage and intensively in this problem. I recall his intensive involvement, in terms of mental effort and time’.³³⁹⁰

The way in which the government and parliament finally found agreement on 12 August, and most certainly in the 27 August debate, reminds one of the relatively docile – even if not laudatory – attitude of parliament towards Van den Broek during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC. Perhaps the feeling of ‘an un-Dutch large measure of unity’ played a part, as the Algemeen Dagblad put it after the parliamentary discussion of 12 August,³³⁹¹ in the field of policy on security. The 1980s had seen major political splits in the years-long debate about the medium-range missiles. During the Gulf War the ³³⁸⁵ United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Situation, p.17.

³³⁸⁶ Auke Kok, ‘Helden op het Binnenhof’ (‘Heroes in the Binnenhof’, HP/De Tijd, 21/08/92).

³³⁸⁷ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 15/10/99.

³³⁸⁸ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

³³⁸⁹ Kees Lunshof, ‘Politiek kleineert risico’s in Bosnië’, de Telegraaf, 25/08/92.

³³⁹⁰ TK1991-1992, Proceedings, p.6161.

³³⁹¹ ‘Kamerdebat verhelderend’ (‘Parliamentary debate revealing’, Algemeen dagblad, 13/08/92).

PvdA had at first been cautious. In the summer of 1992 there was a new consensus. The feeling of unity lent itself less to critical voices.

Finally, two points should be mentioned as worthy of attention, with an eye to chapters still to come. First of all, August 1992 saw the birth of a new conflict in the Netherlands: 'Cautious generals versus impatient politicians'.³³⁹² Secondly, because of the rise of public opinion a geographical shift in accent had taken place with regard to Dutch reporting on the former Yugoslavia. Up till then, while the newspapers carried fewer reports on Yugoslavia, the reports had been coming mainly from the region itself. The expansion of the number of interested parties, however, led to the former Yugoslavia being given a steadily more domestic Dutch policy character, that required interpretation in the direction of policy on Yugoslavia. While those for and against military intervention bombarded one another with a limited series of arguments already advanced, it sometimes seemed as if it was only old national Dutch conflicts that had to be settled – for instance when Heldring assessed the readiness for action among supporters of the IKV, or when André Roelofs, who was of the opinion that Heldring had not clearly stated whether he was for or against military intervention, reacted with a further question: 'When will Heldring determine his position?'³³⁹³ Wrestling with Yugoslavia became more; the Netherlands wrestling with itself.

³³⁹² H.J.A. Hofland, 'Het Joegoslavische debat' ('The debate on Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 10/08/92. See also J.L. Heldring, 'Bezint eer gij begint' ('Look before you leap'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/08/92.

³³⁹³ André Roelofs, 'Waar blijft de vredesbeweging deze dagen?' ('Where is the peace movement hiding these days?') de Volkskrant, 08/08/92.

Chapter 7

The Autumn after 'London': September 1992 – October 1992

1. After 'London'

Although there were people who thought the Conference of London a triumph for the Netherlands - if perhaps a short-lived one - because Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Broek managed to get a sharp condemnation of Serbian policy included in the conference documents, the prevailing feeling among the Dutch members of Parliament was frustration at the absence of any visible results. In October Maarten Van Traa declared that Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers should for once make that exasperation known to John Major.³³⁹⁴ If disappointment in the Netherlands about the results of the conference was already considerable, it could only grow greater, with the leadership of the Bosnian Serbs failing to comply with all the agreements in turn while the major Western powers, with Great Britain in the lead, did little to persuade the Bosnian Serbs and Serbian authorities to be more cooperative.

Illustrative of the degree to which the agreements at the London conference had become bogged down were two discussions between the Dutch Director General of Political Affairs, Van Walsum and his French colleague Dejammet on 8 and 9 September 1992. The discussion of 8 September took place after Van Walsum had raised the question in the Comité Politique of whether the measures agreed on in London about heavy weapons for instance had any chance of succeeding as long as the EC had not reached any position on imposing sanctions in the case of non-compliance. Dejammet told Van Walsum that any reference to more far-reaching measures would arouse the hopes of Izetbegovic and his entourage that the international community would sooner or later decide to intervene militarily; the Twelve, he said, were playing with fire if they encouraged the Bosnian Muslims in this idea. According to Dejammet UNPROFOR had more to fear at that moment from the Croatian and Muslim sides than from the Serbs. In his view international recognition had 'gone to Izetbegovic's head and he now imagined he could lay claim to the whole territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina'.³³⁹⁵

Van Walsum appealed for an understanding of the Croatian and Muslim position because the involvement of the UN up till then had mainly contributed to the consolidation of the Serb conquests. 'Of course no-one was arguing for Tudjman reconquering the whole of Croatia or Izetbegovic doing the same with the whole of Bosnia-Herzegovina', said Van Walsum, but after all the statements that the Serbian conquests would not be accepted, one could not suddenly just go along with the status quo. In any eventual ruling the Serbs would have to give up a good deal of territory, because otherwise resentment about their territorial claims would simmer for years among the Croats and Muslims. Van Walsum doubted whether the Serbs would accept a surrender of territories without more far-reaching military steps being taken against them by the international community.³³⁹⁶

After the discussion between Van Walsum and Dejammet on 8 September, the news came that two of the French UN troops had been killed by Muslim fire. Next day therefore the French diplomat could argue with all the more conviction to Van Walsum that any play with more far-reaching military measures would only make Izetbegovic 'more aggressive and irresponsible'. Jeremy Greenstock, the official in charge of formulating Yugoslav policy at the British Foreign Office, also took up the position that everything should be avoided that might give Izetbegovic any false hopes of military intervention.³³⁹⁷

³³⁹⁴ Radio 1, VOO, Nieuwsradio, 12/10/92, 18.10 p.m..

³³⁹⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Van den Broek to the embassy in Paris, 10/09/92, celer, 062.

³³⁹⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Van den Broek to the embassy in Paris, 10/09/92, celer, 062.

³³⁹⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Van den Broek to the embassy in Paris, 10/09/92, celer, 062.

From these discussions it emerged that the European Community was still following the course of the Cutileiro Plan, namely that of a division of Bosnia-Herzegovina along ethnic lines. According to the British journalist and Balkan expert Micha Glenny, Izetbegovic himself abandoned his hope of a multi-ethnic Bosnia as a result of the Conference of London, and accepted that a division of the territory between the three ethnic groups was unavoidable.³³⁹⁸ The Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Broek must have got a similar message. When he attended the General Assembly of the UN in September 1992 and spoke to Izetbegovic, he thought he was doing the right thing towards the Bosnian president in stressing that he should continue to make it very plain 'that it is not his intention to found a unitary Muslim state. This was also necessary to dispel any unfounded fears by Bosnia's neighbours and the Russian federation.'³³⁹⁹ The question of what Izetbegovic's intentions actually were – a multi-ethnic state or a smaller Muslim one – would long continue to torment Western politicians and diplomats.³⁴⁰⁰

The Bosnian government under Izetbegovic's leadership had however for the time being not much choice in the matter. While the Bosnian Serbs had control of about seventy per cent of the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Bosnian Croats, who had proclaimed their autonomous Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna on July 3, had control of about fifteen to twenty percent of Bosnian territory, even though a large number of Muslims were still resident in the Croatian region. The real authority of the Bosnian government was confined to a mere ten to fifteen percent of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Muslims were confined to cities such as Sarajevo, Tuzla and Gorazde and they had control over territory around Srebrenica, Zepa and Cerska and in the Bihac region.

Bosnian Croats versus Bosnian Muslims...

After sporadic encounters over the preceding half year,³⁴⁰¹ the situation became even worse for the Muslims when fierce fighting broke out in October 1992 with the Croats, who up till then had taken the side of the Bosnian government. The war zone was mainly in and around Travnik, Novi Travnik and Vitez in Central Bosnia where Croats and Muslims lived side-by-side. The fighting resulted initially from differences of interpretation about the long-term constitutional future of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The leaders of the Bosnian Croats hoped that in the long term they would be able to bring about a union with Croatia of their autonomous 'Croatian community of Herceg-Bosna', in which the Muslims were increasingly second-class citizens. Fighting was only exacerbated by the fact that no fusion between the forces of the Bosnian Muslims (ABiH) and the army of the Bosnian Croats (HVO) had occurred, since both organizations had preserved their separate military structures. After what initially seemed like a basically good collaboration, the HVO and the ABiH started increasingly accusing each other of betrayal and desertion in the summer of 1992.³⁴⁰² In part the conflict was fuelled by quarrels between Croats and Muslims about the control of the corridors along which weapons and humanitarian convoys could enter Bosnia and by which refugees attempted to leave the country. Those who had control of these routes were able to exact payment.³⁴⁰³

A role was also played by Croatian irritation about the arrival of Arabic fighters in Central Bosnia to reinforce the Bosnian Muslims.³⁴⁰⁴ To an important extent fighting between Croats and ³³⁹⁸ Glenny, Fall, p. 216.

³³⁹⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05244. Biegman 884 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 22/09/92. See also H. van den Broek, 'Hollands Dagboek' (Dutch Diary), NRC Handelsblad, 26/09/92.

³⁴⁰⁰ See also Chapter 12.

³⁴⁰¹ See for instance Matijan, 'War', p. 167; Andrejevich, 'Bosnia', p. 4.

³⁴⁰² Detrez, Sloop, p. 283. See also Heller, Brasiers, pp. 146-149.

³⁴⁰³ Cf. Theo Engelen, 'Kroaten en moslims ook in gevecht om financieel gewin' (Croats and Muslims also in conflict for financial gain) and 'Aan oorlog in Bosnië wordt veel verdiend' (Plenty of money is made from war in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 23/10/92.

³⁴⁰⁴ Cf. Moore, 'Month', p. 4; Ed Vulliamy, 'Arabische strijders in Bosnië als "pinguïns in de woestijn"' (Arab fighters in Bosnia like 'penguins in the desert'), de Volkskrant, 17/09/92.

Muslims was also the result of tensions that arose because many Muslims in North-West Bosnia who had been purged by the Bosnian Serbs sought refuge in Central Bosnia. Not only did the ethnic demographic balance change as a result; the same was true of the military balance between the HVO and the ABiH.³⁴⁰⁵ In response the Croatian forces began ‘cleansing’ the Muslim population in the towns of Prozor and Gornji Vakuf. The result of these engagements was that the Muslims in Central Bosnia were pressed even harder.

...and Bosnian Croats with Bosnian Serbs against Bosnian Muslims

Meanwhile after a meeting between Boban and Karadzic in Graz at the beginning of May 1992 discussions continued between the Bosnian Croats and Serbs over a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The two parties attained a reasonable degree of agreement, on points including the military support they would lend each other in their struggle against the Muslims.³⁴⁰⁶ On 5 October the president of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia Cosic and the Croatian president Tudjman were in agreement about an ‘orderly’ exchange of populations between the Croatian and Serbian territories of Bosnia-Herzegovina.³⁴⁰⁷ It has been asserted that in the framework of this partnership the Croats would withdraw almost immediately from Bosanski Brod in the strategic Posavina corridor and that in exchange the Serbs would surrender the peninsula of Prevlaka to the south of Dubrovnik to the Croats.³⁴⁰⁸ Others assert that this exchange dated back to an agreement in May or July and that the surrender of Mostar by the VRS at the end of July also formed part of this exchange.³⁴⁰⁹ It is unclear whether an exchange was really agreed on or whether the military balance of power was the decisive factor, in particular the Serbian artillery and tanks.³⁴¹⁰ In any case the strategically important Posavina corridor was now firmly in Bosnian-Serb hands.

The conflicts between Croats and Muslims also made it possible for the Serbs to capture the town of Jajce in Central Bosnia at the end of October. The Croats and Muslims had defended Jajce against the VRS for five months. After the fall of Jajce fighting between Croats and Serbs virtually ceased in Bosnia. The Muslims on the other hand found themselves in a war on two fronts that became even more ferocious at the beginning of 1993 due to Croatian actions.³⁴¹¹

The failure to comply with the agreements of London

The agreements of London called for various points to be implemented -- the concentration of heavy weapons, the setting-up of escorts for convoys, the implementation of a no-fly zone over Bosnia and a stricter application of economic sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro. In London Karadzic had agreed to the VRS providing information about the positions of all heavy weapons within four days; these would then have to be grouped around four cities, namely Sarajevo, Bihac, Gorazde and Jajce within a few days, after which the weapons were to be put under UN control. From the start however

³⁴⁰⁵ Marijan, ‘War’, p. 169; Ed Vulliamy, ‘Arabische strijders in Bosnië als “pinguïns in de woestijn”’, de Volkskrant, 17/09/92; Heller, Brasiers, pp. 157-160.

³⁴⁰⁶ ‘The unholy alliance’, Bosnia report, new series no. 1, November/December 1997.

³⁴⁰⁷ ‘Transferts de population entre la Croatie et la Serbie’, Agence France Presse, 05/10/92. See also ‘Un mouvement contre la démilitarisation de la presqu’île de Prevlaka s’organise au Montenegro’, Agence France Presse, 05/10/92.

³⁴⁰⁸ Detrez, Sloop, p. 282; Meier, Jugoslavië, pp. 373-374; Mønnesland, Land, pp. 394-395; ‘Val Bosanski Brod zou resultaat zijn van deal Servië en Kroatië’ (Fall of Bosanski Brod may be result of deal between Serbia and Croatia), de Volkskrant, 08/10/92.

³⁴⁰⁹ See for instance Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 283.

³⁴¹⁰ According to Marijan, ‘War’, pp. 164-165 and Judah, Serbs, p. 208 the latter was the case. The defenders were unable to withstand the Serb artillery and tanks. The Bosnian government first assumed that the decisive factor must have been the military balance of power, Press Conference by the Delegation of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Federal News Service, 16/10/92, but later came to the conclusion that there must have been a ‘deal’, Paul Lewis, ‘Belgrade Signs 2nd Pact With Croatia’, The New York Times, 21/10/92; Eisermann, Weg, p. 138.

³⁴¹¹ See Chapter 9.

the Bosnian-Serb leaders obstructed the implementing of the agreement. Deadlines were not met and definitions were altered.³⁴¹² In the end the VRS only put a limited amount of the heavy weapons under the control of international observers, saying that they would use them again whenever they needed them.³⁴¹³

The control of heavy weapons was in practice watered down not just because the Bosnian-Serb leadership reneged on the agreement, but mainly because the British government that also held the chairmanship of the EC was averse to every form of additional military involvement in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. The UN moreover had insufficient personnel and finances to supervise the heavy weapons. Initially the Security Council therefore wanted to make their control part of the operations for escorting the convoys.³⁴¹⁴

On 14 September the Security Council passed Resolution 776, by which UNPROFOR, that had done nothing till then except keep the airport of Sarajevo open, was given new tasks with regard to the carrying out and protection of humanitarian aid convoys and the escorting of prisoners released in Bosnia-Herzegovina to be evacuated by the Red Cross. The idea in Resolution 770 of individual countries or other international organizations, such as NATO or the WEU, protecting these convoys was thus abandoned.

Besides an expansion of tasks, the resolution also expanded the territory in which UNPROFOR II was to be active. Its operations were no longer confined to Sarajevo and its airport; theoretically, they were expanded to cover the whole of Bosnia.

A reference in a draft of the resolution to the supervision of heavy weapons was scrapped at the request of the British government. London's preferred option was for a phased approach to the implementation of the points agreed upon in London and it wanted to treat this issue and that of the no-fly zone over Bosnia separately. The UN Secretariat also argued for first seeing if Karadzic kept his word about the concentration of heavy weapons and met with his demands by stating that the weapons did not need to be concentrated in the whole of Bosnia but only around the four points initially designated as concentration points for the whole of Bosnia - Sarajevo, Bihac, Gorazde and Jajce.³⁴¹⁵

The caution of the British chairmanship was also displayed with regard to the tightening of EC sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro. Germany, Spain, Holland and to a lesser extent Denmark were in favour of providing a political signal with a resolution about stricter implementation. The British government however exploited the conflict between the advocates of an immediate political signal and those members who stressed the feasibility of a sanction ruling.³⁴¹⁶ This provoked great irritation in the Dutch government that was a keen advocate in both the EC and the CSCE of tightening the sanctions.³⁴¹⁷ During the meeting of EC Ministers of Foreign Affairs in Luxemburg on 5 October Van den Broek therefore insisted that measures should be taken against those who did not comply with the agreements of London, such as the immediate implementation of a flight prohibition

³⁴¹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Highly confidential memorandum, hfd DAV/MS, 'Militaire maatregelen i.g.v. niet-naleving van in Londen gemaakte afspraken' (Military measures in case of failure to comply with agreements made in London), 08/09/92; 'VN en Europa zetten Serviërs onder tijdsdruk' (UN and Europe give Serbians a deadline), de Volkskrant, 07/09/92.

³⁴¹³ Moore, 'Month', p. 2.

³⁴¹⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. Biegman 820 to Van den Broek, 02/09/92; Van den Broek 227 to PR New York, 04/09/92; Biegman 828 to Van den Broek, 04/09/92; Van den Broek to PR New York, 08/09/92, celer 230; Biegman 832 to Van den Broek, 09/09/92; 'Navo biedt 6.000 militairen aan voor VN-macht Bosnië' (NATO offers 6,000 troops to UN peacekeeping force in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 03/09/92.

³⁴¹⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. Biegman 830 to Van den Broek, 05/09/92; Biegman 832 to Van den Broek, 09/09/92; Biegman 856 to Van den Broek, 14/09/92.

³⁴¹⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01802. Kronenburg 253 to Van den Broek, 27/08/92; PR, EC to Van den Broek, 28/08/92, bre 1330.

³⁴¹⁷ See for instance ABZ, DPV/ARA/01802. The evasion of the embargo on trade with Serbia and Montenegro by Dutch firms, 01/09/92.

over Bosnia, the supervision of heavy weapons, a tightening of the sea blockade and taking measures against the FRJ (Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) in all international bodies.³⁴¹⁸

Meanwhile on 22 September the former Yugoslavia was in fact debarred from the UN, a measure that the Dutch government had always advocated. However, even on this issue no agreement could be reached – the governments of France and Greece felt that the term ‘debarred’ went too far. Accordingly, the wording chosen was that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ‘will no longer take part in the activities of the General Assembly’.³⁴¹⁹

2. Humanitarian aid after London

‘Historians will show that the most important allies of the Bosnian Serbs have been the peacekeeping forces of the United Nations. Their strategic role in this conflict has essentially been to act as hostages. They provided the cover that the slaughter needed.’³⁴²⁰

Operations of the emergency-relief type display the character of a ‘mission impossible’ almost right from the start. It is human need here that forces one to pursue courses that would be impermissible under other circumstances’.³⁴²¹

In reality UNPROFOR II had a double task from August 1992 onward: firstly, facilitating humanitarian supplies and secondly the creation of a climate that would make negotiations possible. The word ‘peacekeeping’ that is often used as a hallmark of the mandate of the UNPROFOR II operation is therefore not actually correct. The support of humanitarian tasks is not any normal part of peacekeeping, even if it does occur in practice; normally speaking it only takes place when the required climate for negotiations has already been created. It was also by no means the case that UNPROFOR II kept the conflicting parties separate, as would occur with a traditional peacekeeping operation. Hostilities continued, occasionally interrupted by short armistices.

In its dual task UNPROFOR had to focus its attention on both UNHCR, which it supported in its humanitarian activities and on the negotiators Owen and Vance, who were already acting with a mandate from the European Community and the UN. Both UNHCR, that needed permission from the warring factions in order to get aid to its destination, and the mediators aimed to achieve good relations with all the different groups involved in the conflict. This meant that both bodies imposed strict restrictions on any use of force by UNPROFOR. Humanitarian efforts were given the utmost priority, over and above all the tasks the Security Council had laid down in its mandates.³⁴²² Furthermore, UNPROFOR that only had a few thousand troops was both protector to ensure the provision of aid and a potential victim of any reprisals taken by the warring parties.

There was a great deal of criticism of this choice for humanitarian action over either military intervention or a complete abandonment of the theatre of war to the warring factions. The Bosnian Permanent Representative to the UN, Muhamed Sacirbey, would level the charge that ‘the humanitarian agenda has been hijacked by those prepared to use humanitarian ideals as a means of promoting inaction’.³⁴²³ In Holland the Director General of Political Affairs, Van Walsum, was for the same reason not very enthusiastic about the deployment of Dutch soldiers for what he called ‘grocery ³⁴¹⁸ ABZ,DVN/2007/00001. Van den Broek 12 to the embassy in Luxemburg, 06/10/92. The minister was urged to adopt such a position in ABZ, DEU/ARA/01248. Memorandum DEU/OE for Van den Broek, 30/09/92, no. DEU/OE-120.

³⁴¹⁹ R. Meines, ‘Compromis in VN over Joegoslavië’ (UN compromise over Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 23/09/92.

³⁴²⁰ The editors, ‘The Abdication, Cont’d’, in: Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 173.

³⁴²¹ Kooijmans, ‘VN-vredesoperaties’, p. 46.

³⁴²² Cf. Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 164.

³⁴²³ Minear et al., Action, p. 100.

deliveries'.³⁴²⁴ British diplomats are said to have told their American counterparts that the presence of UNPROFOR ground forces for humanitarian purposes was deliberately intended to prevent the air force from being used. If it were, it might have provoked attacks on or hostage-taking of UN personnel on the ground.³⁴²⁵

Although this looks too much like speaking with benefit of hindsight, it is a fact that once the ground troops were there, they did indeed have that effect. It became a mantra for the West to say that military intervention would jeopardize the humanitarian aid.³⁴²⁶ The Bosnian government stated that when it came down to it they would have preferred the humanitarian efforts to be stopped and the arms embargo lifted instead.³⁴²⁷

Furthermore, the aid only reached those it was intended for to a very limited degree. In June 1992 UNPROFOR and the Bosnian Serb leadership had reached an agreement by which 23 percent of all the aid supplies flown to Sarajevo would be given to the Bosnian Serbs, regardless of whether they needed them or not. Under the same agreement the Bosnian Serbs were entitled to inspect all humanitarian supplies arriving by air or land and to prevent parts of them getting through should they wish.³⁴²⁸ Between 1992 and 1994 another thirty to fifty percent of the humanitarian aid was 'lost' at roadblocks.³⁴²⁹ At the beginning of 1994 only twenty percent of all aid reached its destination, while half of all aid ended up with the troops of the warring factions.³⁴³⁰

The Bosnian Serb government also exacted a fee from UNHCR for allowing lorries to pass through. In the summer of 1993 it paid $350 per truck. For military escort vehicles the price was even higher.³⁴³¹ According to a statement of the ICRC at the end of 1993 only ten percent of all humanitarian aid reached its destination.³⁴³² Humanitarian aid thus helped to keep both the armies and the other military elements in existence, providing them with an economic argument for continuing the war.³⁴³³ An anonymous official of an important NGO complained at the end of 1993 that: 'We've prolonged the war by being here. If there had been no humanitarian intervention, the war would have been over sooner. It might have been ugly, but it would be over.'³⁴³⁴

The warring parties meanwhile violated the agreements made in London to the effect that nothing would be done to impede aid convoys. At the beginning of September an Italian transport plane was shot down in Sarajevo with the death of the crew of four. A few days later the army of the Bosnian government fired on a convoy bringing food, water and fuel to the peacekeeping force in Sarajevo. Two French soldiers were killed, which had the above-mentioned effect on the second discussion between Van Walsum and his colleague Dejammet. Five others were wounded in the same incident.³⁴³⁵

On 21 September Serbian women and children blocked an aid convoy of eighteen UN trucks, accompanied by French troops at Bratunac and Milici making the short journey to Srebrenica. They said that they had lost their menfolk due to the activities of Muslim combatants from Srebrenica and ³⁴²⁴ Interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

³⁴²⁵ Simms, Hour, p. 81.

³⁴²⁶ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 15.

³⁴²⁷ Simms, Hour, p. 78.

³⁴²⁸ Gjelten, 'Professionalism?'

³⁴²⁹ Bougarel, Bosnie, p. 125; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 96 and 101.

³⁴³⁰ Weiss, Interactions, pp. 120-121.

³⁴³¹ Almond, War, p. 398 n. 18.

³⁴³² 'Tien procent van hulp bereikt burgers Bosnië' ('Only ten per cent of aid reaches Bosnian civilians'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/12/93.

³⁴³³ Cf. 'Een akelig dilemma (1)' (A distressing problem (1)), Trouw, 09/09/92; Charles Dobbie, 'Humanitaire bijstand kan oorlog verlengen' (Humanitarian aid can prolong war), NRC Handelsblad, 22/07/95; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, pp. 96-97 and 102.

³⁴³⁴ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 121.

³⁴³⁵ Theo Engelen, 'VN stellen moslims verantwoordelijk voor dood VN-militairen' (UN holds Muslims responsible for death of UN soldiers), NRC Handelsblad, 10/09/92.

that they had been forced by the Muslims to leave their homes in Srebrenica. The convoy had to return to Sarajevo, mission unaccomplished.³⁴³⁶

Meanwhile gloomy assessments were heard of the number of people in Bosnia who would die from hunger and cold in the approaching winter. Figures ranged from 400,000 to a million.³⁴³⁷ The UNHCR and UNPROFOR decided that aid should be focused on the areas where large concentrations of Muslims still lived. Apart from Sarajevo, these were Bihac, Banja Luka, Mostar and Tuzla. To avoid exclusive dependence on air transport, the port of Split had to be put to use to convoy vital necessities by road. The infantry battalions promised by France, Great Britain, Canada and Spain would be deployed along with a transport battalion and a French engineers battalion.

3. Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo

Resolution 776 of 14 September reinforced the humanitarian character of the UNPROFOR operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina even further. It gave UNPROFOR new tasks with regard to the carrying out and protection of humanitarian aid convoys and also the conveying of released prisoners to be evacuated by the Red Cross. At the same time the number of UN soldiers in Bosnia was increased from 1500 to 7500. For this operation a special headquarters was to be set up in Bosnia-Herzegovina to be under the command of the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb. The relation between the two headquarters would prove a difficult one.³⁴³⁸ The operation in Bosnia ended up being led by the French General Philippe Morillon, who up till then had been Nambiar's Chief of Staff.³⁴³⁹ However, it was not until the end of October and the beginning of November that the headquarters of UNPROFOR in Bosnia-Herzegovina became operational.

The headquarters ('Main') of UNPROFOR was called 'Bosnia-Herzegovina Command' and was established in the Dalmacija hotel in Kiseljak, about 25 kilometres West of Sarajevo at the crossroads leading to Mostar, Vitez and Tuzla. The hotel, built for the Winter Olympics of 1984, was more or less converted into a fortress, where 600 soldiers and civilians worked and slept in accommodation originally intended for a maximum of 200 hotel guests. The headquarters consisted in practice of the staff of the Northern Army Group (Northag) of the NATO, that in the context of troop reductions was about to be disbanded and was thus immediately available. The advantage of using this former NATO staff was the shared language (English) and familiar procedures. It initially consisted mainly of British, Belgian, Dutch and a few American officers. The Germans did not move to Kiseljak for political reasons.³⁴⁴⁰ Later, the other troop-contributing nations also claimed their share of the staff. The headquarters was initially led by Morillon's Chief of Staff, the British officer Rody Cordy-Simpson and later by Brigadier General Vere Hayes.

Besides Headquarters Main there was 'Headquarters Forward', stationed in Sarajevo in the Delegates Club, the former residence of the president of the Communist Party of Bosnia. The location of Headquarters Forward was a tacit acknowledgment that the commander in chief in Bosnia was mainly concerned with political issues. The commander of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command was therefore usually resident in Headquarters Forward.

Not only did the headquarters take a while to set up, the same was true of the deployment of the promised troops. High Commissioner for Refugees, Ogata, urged the contributing governments to ³⁴³⁶ 'Servische vrouwen en kinderen werken VN-konvooi tegen' (Serbian women and children block UN convoy), de Volkskrant, 22/09/92.

³⁴³⁷ See LL. French report, Bosnia Herzegovina, contribution of Morillon's chief of staff, enclosure 2 for letter no. NLO 93/075/360, 24/11/93; Morillon, Croire, p. 99; Press Conference by the Delegation of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Federal News Service, 16/10/92.

³⁴³⁸ Cf. Gow, Triumph, p. 115.

³⁴³⁹ For the setting up of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command see Morillon, 'Operations'.

³⁴⁴⁰ See also Folkert Jensma, 'Navo mag geen Navo heten' (NATO is not allowed to be called NATO), NRC Handelsblad, 09/10/92.

send them with dispatch, because she expected their arrival to have a restraining effect on the ethnic cleansing of the Serbs that was apparently still increasing especially round Banja Luka. The need for humanitarian aid in Central Bosnia was also becoming more pressing due to interruptions in air traffic in Sarajevo as a result of shelling and the lack of trucks.³⁴⁴¹ The High Commissioner's appeal received full backing from the Dutch government.³⁴⁴²

Eventually out of the units promised, the new French battalion was deployed in Bihac so that France now had two battalions in Bosnia-Herzegovina (Sarajevo and Bihac) and two in Croatia. In December a French battalion of engineers was to be stationed in Kakanj. The British battalion set up camp between Vitez and Tuzla, and a Spanish battalion was deployed in Mostar. The Canadian battalion was to be deployed in Banja Luka, something that the UNHCR had wanted for some time to avoid the criticism that the international community was only bringing aid and protection to Croatian and Muslim territories. However, the Bosnian Serb command was against any posting of foreign troops on Serbian soil. UNPROFOR therefore decided to station them in the vicinity of Kiseljak, where they could, if required, intervene in Sarajevo, or else in Tuzla.³⁴⁴³ The position taken by the VRS meant that any deployment in North-West and East Bosnia was out of the question. This meant that ethnic cleansing and fighting could be carried on in these areas largely outside the gaze of world opinion, for instance around the Muslim enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa en Gorazde.

4. To shoot or not to shoot?

‘The UN might as well have deployed women and children.’³⁴⁴⁴

The British government was initially opposed to Resolution 770,³⁴⁴⁵ because according to its estimates it would need a hundred thousand troops to carry out a policy that allowed for the use of force to ensure that food supplies reached their destination. If there was a switch to the use of firepower with any smaller force it could eventually only lead to UNPROFOR having to back down. The British government was of the opinion that a convoy should only be allowed to proceed after negotiating with the people who manned the roadblocks.³⁴⁴⁶

In order to ensure the peaceful character of humanitarian aid the British government had adopted the position that the operation to implement resolution 770 should take place under a UN umbrella and not under that of the CSCE, which might have led to NATO or the WEU getting involved. However, the British approach could not be implemented straightway because Boutros-Ghali preferred to ensure the free passage of goods by means of agreements with the warring parties. He did not want UN units to resort even to such force as was permitted in the words of Resolution 770 - ‘all measures necessary’.³⁴⁴⁷ UNHCR, the organization primarily responsible for the humanitarian aid in the former Yugoslavia, backed by the governments of France and Great Britain, initially feared that any military protection of convoys would in fact attract violence.³⁴⁴⁸

³⁴⁴¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. Ogata to Van den Broek, 28/09/92.

³⁴⁴² ABZ, Yugoslavia/UNSC. Resolution 771 (1992), COREU The Hague, 01/10/92, cpe/hag 586; memorandum from DEU for Van den Broek, 08/10/92, no. 222.

³⁴⁴³ Morillon, Croire, pp. 130-131.

³⁴⁴⁴ The editors, ‘The Abdication, Cont’d’, in: Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 173.

³⁴⁴⁵ ‘Westen verdeeld over optreden in Bosnië’ (West divided over Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 08/08/92.

³⁴⁴⁶ ABZ, Yugoslavia, resolution 770 (1992). Memorandum DGPZ for head of DEU, 19/08/92, no. 152/92; Text of a message from John Major to Lubbers, 19/08/92; Loudon 409 to Foreign Affairs, 19/08/92.

³⁴⁴⁷ ABZ, PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, S/24000, 26/05/92.

³⁴⁴⁸ ABZ, PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van Schaik 604 to Van den Broek, 24/06/92; Van Schaik 607 to Van den Broek, 25/06/92; Van den Broek to PV New York, celer 178; ABZ, 00064, Boddens Hosang 481 to Van den Broek, 24/06/92; Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Veiligheidsraad: meer militairen naar Bosnië’ (Security Council: more troops to Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 15/09/92.

Deputy Secretary General for peacekeeping operations Goulding was also of the opinion that if the use of force were permitted in escorting convoys, for instance by returning sniper fire, the UNPROFOR operation would cease to be a 'peacekeeping' operation and become a 'peace-enforcing' one.³⁴⁴⁹ To get Boutros-Ghali to relent and agree to a UN operation to implement Resolution 770, the option of resorting to force had therefore to be renounced.³⁴⁵⁰ The relations between the British government and Boutros-Ghali, that were strained in mid-July, were excellent a month later with respect to this issue. Together they stood as guarantors that no force would be employed to get the humanitarian convoys to their destination.³⁴⁵¹

While a number of parties assumed that the phrase 'all measures necessary' included the use of force to get the emergency aid to its destination, in practice it was decided not to resort to this possibility. When aid convoys were stopped for long periods at roadblocks the troops must have felt enormously frustrated, but most of the politicians, diplomats and soldiers did not want to employ force to get through these blockades because they were opposed to any blurring of the boundaries between the two sorts of peacekeeping operations – 'peacekeeping' and 'peace-enforcing'.³⁴⁵² The former was based on impartiality, while the latter meant that one side inevitably ended up in the role of enemy.³⁴⁵³

However, not every organization was against a shift from peacekeeping to peace-enforcing. In fact the French government had always assumed that there was a continuum between the two types of operation. This was also the reason why the French government had always opposed any intervention on the part of the General Assembly of the UN in peacekeeping operations. Exactly because they could end up as peace-enforcing operations it argued that the Security Council alone should be concerned with peacekeeping operations.³⁴⁵⁴

In the new optimism about the potential role the United Nations could play after the Cold War was over, the chance increased that the gap between peacekeeping and peace-enforcing would be filled. Around New Year 1993 Boutros-Ghali wrote that the UN operation in Bosnia had opened up a new dimension with regard to the traditional peace operations, namely on the issue of the provision of humanitarian supplies and in particular that of the circumstances under which UN troops were permitted to open fire. He stressed that the instructions now permitted the use of force if armed persons prevented the execution of their mandate: 'This license, used sparingly in the past, may be resorted to more frequently if the United Nations is to assert the Security Council's authority over those who, for personal gain or war objectives, try to rob or destroy humanitarian supplies destined for suffering civilian populations.'³⁴⁵⁵

While Boutros-Ghali appeared to make more room for the use of force with this statement, the British government remained absolutely against the use of every form of force in breaking through the roadblocks.³⁴⁵⁶ The fact that the UNPROFOR escorts for convoys never resorted to firepower to get them past these blockades provoked a good deal of criticism in the press. What was the point of having troops escorting convoys? Convoys of religious groups or private aid organizations managed without military aid and still arrived at their destination.³⁴⁵⁷

³⁴⁴⁹ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Van Schaik 758 to Van den Broek, 11/08/92. See also C. de Gruyter, 'Wachten op een Churchill' (Waiting for a Churchill), Elsevier, 15/08/92, pp. 31-32.

³⁴⁵⁰ ABZ, Yugoslavia, resolution 770 (1992). D'Ansembourg 783 to Van den Broek, 19/08/92.

³⁴⁵¹ PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van Schaik 753 to Van den Broek, 07/08/92; D'Ansembourg 783 to Van den Broek, 19/08/92.

³⁴⁵² See for instance Brigitte Stern, 'Introduction', in: Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 3.

³⁴⁵³ See for instance Biermann & Vadset, Workshop, p. 9; idem, 2nd Workshop, p. 35.

³⁴⁵⁴ Brigitte Stern, 'Introduction', in: Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 5; Marie-Claude Smouts, 'Political aspects of peace-keeping operations', ibidem, p. 19; Yves Daudet, 'Legal aspects', ibidem, pp. 43-44.

³⁴⁵⁵ Boutros-Ghali, 'Nations'.

³⁴⁵⁶ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 159.

³⁴⁵⁷ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 205.

'The Force shall not use force...'

Another problem was that Resolution 776 did not provide any clarity about the use of force. While it was intended to supplement Resolution 770 that had made the use of force for the protection of the transporting and distribution of humanitarian aid possible, Resolution 776 unlike Resolution 770 did not make any reference to Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Even the clarification that the implementation of the resolution would be carried out with 'all measures necessary' as was stated in Resolution 770 was absent from Resolution 776.

Resolution 776 stated that the rules for traditional peace operations about the use of force should apply. While this difference between the two resolutions might have provoked some astonishment in anyone not privy to the underlying motives of Boutros-Ghali and the British government, there was still more uncertainty about the use of force in Resolution 776. On the one hand it granted the UN observers an exceptional task in negotiating with the liaisons of the warring parties and local warlords to ensure that convoys reached their destination.³⁴⁵⁸ In other words, the principle of 'words instead of bullets' was adopted. On the other hand the Security Council decided that UNPROFOR in carrying out its humanitarian task in Bosnia did not have to restrict itself to force in self-defence, but could also use it if UNPROFOR was prevented from carrying out its mandate. In Boutros-Ghali's report that the Security Council accepted in passing Resolution 776 it was added that this interpretation was 'particularly relevant' given the tense situation in the territories in Bosnia in which UNPROFOR had to operate under the new mandate.³⁴⁵⁹ Shortly after the resolution was passed General Nambiar managed to muddy matters even further by stating that the rules concerning the use of force would be interpreted very strictly, but that a looser interpretation, more deterrence of aggression, was conceivable.³⁴⁶⁰ The French General, Morillon, who was in charge of the UN operation in Bosnia after MacKenzie's departure made things plain as a pikestaff however: 'we have absolutely no intention to force our way through blockades'.³⁴⁶¹

The notion that self-defence also justified force against people trying to obstruct the execution of the UN mandate was not new. In 1964 the Secretary General of the UN had issued a memorandum on operational questions for the peacekeeping operation in Cyprus; it contained a detailed passage about the principles of self-defence. He upheld existing notions such as: peacekeeping troops should not take the initiative in using force; they should only resort to it in the last instance; and the force used should be restricted to a minimum. He also stipulated that peacekeepers were entitled to defend their positions and resist any attempt to disarm them; in general they were permitted to oppose any violent attempts to prevent the execution of the mandate of the peacekeeping force. Since then the following formula has been consistently used for peacekeeping operations: 'The Force shall not use force except in self-defence. Self-defence would include resistance to attempts by forceful means to prevent it from discharging its duties under the mandate of the Security Council'.³⁴⁶² It was the norm for UN peacekeeping operations that 'self-defence' was also understood to include 'mission defence'. This norm was also included in the setting up of UNPROFOR, the rules for the use of force by the peacekeeping forces – the 'Rules of Engagement'.³⁴⁶³

Before examining the lack of clarity that arose in the Netherlands about this instruction on the use of force, it is worth taking a look at some later developments in the UNPROFOR operation on this issue. It was once more raised in February 1993 with regard to the extension of UNPROFOR's mandate in Croatia. At a meeting of troop-contributing nations held in London on 8 February, the ³⁴⁵⁸ See also ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. J.M. Baril, 'Tasks of military observers for the implementation of Security Council, res. 776 of 14 Sept. 1992', 15/10/92.

³⁴⁵⁹ UN, S/24540; S/1995/444.

³⁴⁶⁰ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Veiligheidsraad: meer militairen naar Bosnië', NRC Handelsblad, 15/09/92.

³⁴⁶¹ Quoted in Moore, 'Month', p. 3.

³⁴⁶² Siekmann, 'VN-vredesinstrumentarium', p. 139. See also Harrison & Nishihara (eds.), UN Peacekeeping, p. 50.

³⁴⁶³ See LL. Exh. S92/061/1380. Operation directive, no. 21 of the BLS, appendix F: UNPROFOR Force Commander Directive Nr. 1: Rules of Engagement, 24/03/92.

United Kingdom once more repeated its objections to fighting its way through with the aid convoys. The British were supported in their position by Goulding, who was present at this meeting. According to him this approach would call for a different mandate and different means. There could only be a question of an approach like this, if UNHCR had indicated that it could no longer carry out its activities.³⁴⁶⁴

However, four days later at a meeting in New York with representatives of troop-contributing nations to UNPROFOR, Goulding again stated explicitly that the UNPROFOR mandate did allow the use of force if it was prevented from carrying out its task. An obstacle here, however, was the standard equipment and lightly armed character of a UN battalion that the Secretary General normally asked for. With an appeal to the security of the peacekeeping forces, the French government had even announced that it could only agree to any extension of the mandate of UNPROFOR I if heavier arms were permitted than was normally the case with UN peacekeeping operations.³⁴⁶⁵ On 12 February 1993 Goulding informed the representatives of the troop-contributing nations that Boutros-Ghali had in the meantime responded positively to the wish of countries like France to increase their capacity for self-defence.³⁴⁶⁶ In extending the mandate of UNPROFOR I on 30 March 1993, Resolution 815 also referred explicitly to Chapter VII to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of UNPROFOR. On this occasion China gave a motivation for its vote in which it pointed out that the reference to Chapter VII could only have a bearing on UNPROFOR I in Croatia and should not serve as a precedent for any other regions of the former Yugoslavia. Including Bosnia.³⁴⁶⁷

In July 1993 the Rules of Engagement for UNPROFOR II were altered due to the expansion of the mandate to include the protection of Safe Areas. In this new protocol the standard formulation for the use of force was virtually identical: 'The UNPROFOR troops may use their weapons to resist attempts by forceful means to prevent the Force from discharging its duties.'³⁴⁶⁸ This brief about the use in force did therefore in principle leave open the possibility for breaking through an armed roadblock using firepower. However, the governments of most countries backed the position that was also that taken by the Director of Legal Affairs of the Dutch Ministry of Defence, S.B. Ybema, namely that this definition of self-defence was 'much too broad and thus undesirable': 'Self-defence is merely responding to force that is used against one's own troops.'³⁴⁶⁹ Some critics were of the opinion that in Bosnia what was involved was not a UN Protection Force, but a UN Self-Protection Force.³⁴⁷⁰

5. The transport company and the Dutch image problem

The question of the UNPROFOR briefing on the use of force also had implications for the Dutch government, because there was still an offer open to provide a transport unit. The actual realization had been delayed by the very question of the extent to which and the way in which this unit would receive protection. On 14 September, the day when resolution 776 was adopted, Defence Minister ter Beek, who had just returned from a visit to the Dutch marines in Cambodia, informed reporters of De Volkskrant that the West should not commit itself now to sending ten thousand troops to the former Yugoslavia: 'The answer is no. And I'm also telling you that on the basis of my responsibility for the people I would send there.'³⁴⁷¹ The minister felt that a clear political purpose was lacking, without ³⁴⁶⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. Kooijmans 011 to embassy in London, 09/02/93, Strictly confidential.

³⁴⁶⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Wijnaendts to Kooijmans, 08/02/93; Kooijmans to PR New York, 18/02/93, celer 36.

³⁴⁶⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 142 to Kooijmans, 12/02/93.

³⁴⁶⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. PR New York to Kooijmans, 29/03/93, nrv 3492.

³⁴⁶⁸ Force Commander's Policy Directive No. 13: Rules of Engagement, printed in Berkowitz, 'Rules', p. 637-646. See also Siekmann, 'VN-vredesinstrumentarium', p. 140.

³⁴⁶⁹ BDL. BDL, no. 92027270/252, memorandum Ybema for the CDS, 06/05/92, no. JZN92/0279/IJB. See also Harrison & Nishihara (eds.), UN Peacekeeping, p. 50, 67 n. 47.

³⁴⁷⁰ Weiss, Interactions, p. 113.

³⁴⁷¹ Wio Joustra & Jan Tromp, 'Er bestaan geen militaire operaties zonder risico's' ('There is no such thing as a military operation without risks'), de Volkskrant, 15/09/92.

which, in his view any military operation would end up literally and figuratively in a minefield. The minister also saw the prospect of a switch in public opinion: ‘The climate with regard to Yugoslavia is currently defined by TV images of atrocities. But it could soon be dominated by images of dead UN soldiers.’³⁴⁷² Then too, as minister he would have to be able to answer for his choices.

While the Dutch Minister of Defence was primarily concerned with the safety of any Dutch troops (self-defence), the Dutch Foreign Office was above all unhappy about the obstacles that the warring parties in Bosnia might employ to block humanitarian convoys. Out of frustration about the UNHCR’s ‘roadblock by roadblock’ approach, the ministry and its diplomats even started to demur on the position of UNHCR as the leading agency in Bosnia-Herzegovina in favour of a stronger role for the Deputy Secretary General of the UN, Jan Eliasson, who was director of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs.³⁴⁷³ But to no avail.

After the Security Council passed Resolution 770 on 13 August and the United Kingdom and France had offered 1800 and 1100 soldiers respectively to carry out the resolution, the possibility arose that the Dutch transport unit would be deployed as an UNPROFOR unit for the benefit of UNHCR. With that, all the problems associated with the deployment of Dutch troops under the UNHCR flag ceased (see Chapter 6). The Dutch government contacted the British and French governments to fit in the Dutch offer of forty to fifty trucks with the undertaking of those countries to protect the convoys.³⁴⁷⁴

On 18 August Van den Broek instructed Wagenmakers, the Dutch Permanent Representative in Geneva, to inform UNHCR that the earlier offer of thirty trucks with a capacity of 250 tons and 120 drivers could be raised to sixty with a potential load of 500 tons and 200 drivers.³⁴⁷⁵ On 19 August he informed Van Schaik, the Permanent Representative in New York, that he hoped that consultations of the military experts of the UN, the United States, France and the United Kingdom would be productive, given the extremely limited progress in other international organs such as NATO and WEU with regard to the implementation of Resolution 770. The idea apparently fitted in with Van den Broek’s concept of forming if need be a coalition of the willing outside NATO and WEU (see Chapter 6). With the Dutch offer of a transport unit in mind, the course of these discussions was of some weight for the Netherlands and the Rules of Engagement in particular were ‘of vital importance’ for the Dutch government.³⁴⁷⁶

After the Conference of London the Dutch government raised its offer of sixty trucks and about two hundred troops yet again. On 1 September the Permanent Representative in New York received instructions to inform the UN secretariat that the Dutch offer could if required amount to a hundred trucks with a staff of 250.³⁴⁷⁷ Just over a week later, on 10 September, the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General H.G.B. van den Breemen, visited the UN, where he offered the military advisor to the UN, general M. Baril, an autonomous transport unit of about sixty vehicles with a total capacity of five hundred tons and three hundred personnel. In the long term the offer could even be raised to a hundred trucks (750 tons) and five hundred personnel. To the request of the UN for a signals unit for UNPROFOR II, Van den Breemen promised 75 personnel and twenty observers to supervise the heavy arms.³⁴⁷⁸ A short while later the Belgian government through its Chief of Defence Staff let it be known that it would gladly cover UNPROFOR II’s total transport requirements jointly with the Netherlands – seven hundred troops and a hundred trucks. They would be able to ³⁴⁷² Wio Joustra & Jan Tromp, ‘Er bestaan geen militaire operaties zonder risico’s’, de Volkskrant, 15/09/92.

³⁴⁷³ PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van Schaik 604 to Van den Broek, 24/06/92; Van Schaik 607 to Van den Broek, 25/06/92; ABZ, DIO/2003/00062. Boddens Hosang 379 to Van den Broek, 03/06/92.

³⁴⁷⁴ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study; PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van den Broek 209 to PR New York, 19/08/92.

³⁴⁷⁵ PVNY. Bosnia-Herzegovina/emergency aid, May 1992 – August 1995, Van den Broek 211 to PR Geneva, 18/08/92.

³⁴⁷⁶ ABZ, Yugoslavia, Resolution 770 (1992), Van den Broek 209 to PR New York, 19/08/92.

³⁴⁷⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Van den Broek to PR New York, 01/09/92, celer 224.

³⁴⁷⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Biegan 839 to Van den Broek, 10/09/92.

supply a comparable but smaller unit than the Netherlands. The commander of the unit would be Dutch and his deputy a Belgian.³⁴⁷⁹ The Dutch government endorsed this proposal.³⁴⁸⁰ The protection of the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion thus created would be the responsibility of the British battalion.

In a memorandum for Ter Beek, Waltmann, the Deputy Chief of Operations and Command and Information Systems, remarked with regard to the danger that personnel of the Dutch transport unit might run that: 'There is always a risk of a mine or a sniper. But the danger is greater for the escorting personnel than for the driver of a truck.'³⁴⁸¹ In the Ministerial Council meeting of 20 August 1992 it was warned that the Netherlands would suffer from an image problem if the impression was raised that the Dutch government was willing to supply drivers, while letting the dirty work be done by the escort units of the United Kingdom and France. The Council also stated that due to the principle of voluntary participation for conscripts, the Netherlands was not in a position to supply any combat unit.³⁴⁸² Two days later this position was announced publicly in interviews with the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Wilmink (see Chapter 6).

The risk of the Netherlands being saddled with an image problem could be seen for instance when Gomersall, the deputy head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs of the British Foreign Office visited his counterparts in The Hague on 14 October. Gomersall rejected far-reaching military measures. The Directorate, however, thought that threatening the Serbs with reprisals would have a deterrence rather than an escalatory effect. It did not look very good that at the same time the Directorate had to urge the British infantry battalion to speed up its preparations for deployment in Bosnia, because the personnel of the Dutch transport unit depended on them for protection.³⁴⁸³ As the Dutch government made abundantly clear to the UN and UNHCR, they would not deploy the promised transport company until this protection was available.³⁴⁸⁴ Meanwhile on 1 October the Dutch government had received a formal request from Boutros-Ghali to send extra Dutch troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina to contribute to the implementation of Security Council Resolution 776.³⁴⁸⁵

New criticism of the other powers by the Dutch Parliament

Prior to this a full debate was held on 16 September in the Dutch Parliament, characterized by frustration at the international community's failure to make any progress with regard to the former Yugoslavia.³⁴⁸⁶ The Dutch Parliament's criticism of the other powers was again fairly biting. 'The impression slowly begins to dawn that the more diplomatic measures are taken with regard to the contending parties, the worse the fighting gets', said Sipkes.³⁴⁸⁷ According to her the EC lacked any clear policy. 'EC policy changes almost every day.'³⁴⁸⁸ She thought that Foreign Secretary Van den

³⁴⁷⁹ BSG, Memorandum Defence Staff for Ter Beek, 18/09/92, no. S92/061/2881.

³⁴⁸⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Van den Broek to PR New York, 18/09/91, celer 246; 'Nederland en België bundelen hulptransporten naar Sarajevo' (Netherlands and Belgium provide joint relief transport to Sarajevo), de Volkskrant, 26/09/92.

³⁴⁸¹ Guikje Roethof, 'Krijgshaftig. Hoe wil Ter Beek eigenlijk aanvallen?' (Warlike language, but how does Ter Beek intend to put it into practice?), De Groene Amsterdammer, 02/09/92.

³⁴⁸² Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 20/08/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁴⁸³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00581. Van den Broek 158 to the embassy in London, 15/10/92.

³⁴⁸⁴ ABZ, DIO/2003/00063. Loudon 418 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 26/08/92; Van den Broek 252 to PR Geneva 13/10/92; DPV/ARA/00154, Van den Broek 296 to PR New York, 12/10/92; head of DPV to PR New York, 13/10/92, DPV-1741/92; Biegan 1003 to Van den Broek, 13/10/92; note DIO/Yugoslavia – transport battalion/UNPROFOR II, 23/10/92.

³⁴⁸⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00154. Boutros-Ghali to the Dutch Permanent Representative 01/10/92.

³⁴⁸⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings pp. 54-79.

³⁴⁸⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 54.

³⁴⁸⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 55.

Broek, whose criticism was mainly addressed to Serbia should be sharper about the absence of any coherence in the actions of the EC, NATO and WEU.³⁴⁸⁹ De Kok described the measures taken by the international community against Serbia as ‘unimpressive’.³⁴⁹⁰ Blaauw could not help thinking that the UN, ‘the last bulwark for the protection of individual rights and human rights’ was as spineless as its predecessor the League of Nations.³⁴⁹¹ Van Traa felt that in the discussions with the international community the Dutch government should make it quite clear that the ships in the Adriatic Sea in charge of monitoring the UN embargo against Serbia and Montenegro, ‘were not sailing around just for fun’. If the international community did not apply the sanctions more seriously the Dutch government should recall their frigate.³⁴⁹² He also thought that the entire Dutch Parliament was prepared to run the risk of Dutch soldiers being wounded or killed in Bosnia. According to him the question was not ‘whether we are taking too big a risk, but whether the international community was prepared to take any risk at all’.³⁴⁹³ According to PvdA (Labour) member Van Traa, it had sometimes looked in the preceding period as though only the Netherlands was capable of bringing peace to Bosnia.

‘That was almost like an echo of the discussion of previous years about the Netherlands as a model country. This is of course not the case. We do indeed have the responsibility to participate vigorously in what is possible. But we are still dependent on the willingness of a credible coalition and this willingness does not add up to very much. (...) It is of course important that the government is undiplomatic enough to call a spade a spade. In a sense it might now be timely to sound the alarm in Europe. That is something you can only do once (...) You could wonder whether within the European Community it isn’t perhaps the smaller countries (...) that ought to try something.’³⁴⁹⁴

Minister Van den Broek, who had been absent from the previous debate on 27 August because he was at the Conference of London, did however have an excellent grasp of the atmosphere that had prevailed over what was now three debates – on 12 and 27 August and now again on September 16. He told Parliament that the government did not blame Parliament for its ‘tone of frustration, impatience and a certain sense of impotence’. ‘In any case we think we have the right, within the political context, to interpret this in such a way that these cries of distress and encouragement are aimed over our heads at the international community as a whole’. According to him, ‘there really wasn’t very much difference of opinion between Parliament and the government’ throughout the three debates.³⁴⁹⁵

Ter Beek also thought that the position of the government and parliament was the same. He thought that this was ‘also important when what is involved is discharging the responsibility for the dispatch of Dutch troops, which was primarily the task of the Minister of Defence, but also of the government and the members of Parliament that support the policy’.³⁴⁹⁶ Once again he was confirmed in his opinion that the Dutch contribution to the peacekeeping operations of the UN, that he saw as a substantial one, enjoyed broad political and social support.³⁴⁹⁷ And the government too was impatient about the tardiness of the international community in taking new measures against the aggressors in the former Yugoslavia, because as Van den Broek said, ‘we get the feeling that with every day that passes

³⁴⁸⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 76.

³⁴⁹⁰ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 56.

³⁴⁹¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 66.

³⁴⁹² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 79.

³⁴⁹³ TK, 1991-1993, Proceedings p. 63.

³⁴⁹⁴ TK, 1991-1993, Proceedings, p. 63.

³⁴⁹⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 67.

³⁴⁹⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 72.

³⁴⁹⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 73.

the politics of facts on the ground pursued by certain parties and particularly the Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina becomes more entrenched'.³⁴⁹⁸

6. Confusion about the Rules of Engagement

During the debate a number of the parties asked the minister for more clarity about the Rules of Engagement under Resolution 776. They wanted to know whether besides self-defence, the defence of tasks assigned to the peacekeeping force in its mandate was included and whether deterrent action was permitted if there was a threat of aggression.³⁴⁹⁹ Ter Beek had apparently been misinformed by Ybema, the head of Legal Affairs of his department who was of the opinion that the defence of the mandate as an element in self-defence was an innovation.³⁵⁰⁰ Furthermore, the Minister of Defence appeared not to be aware of the news that the Dutch Permanent Representative at the UN had sent to The Hague some days after the passage of Resolution 770 in which it appeared that Boutros-Ghali in fact rejected all forms of force except pure self-defence.³⁵⁰¹ Apparently the Defence Department also did not realize that the wording of Resolution 776 was so different from that of Resolution 770 with regard to the use of force that a broad interpretation of the notion of 'self-defence' could not be taken for granted, let alone by the British infantry troops supposed to defend the Dutch transport unit. In his answers to the questions in Parliament, Ter Beek referred to the wording in the report of Boutros-Ghali on which Resolution 776 was based, which still operated on the basis of the 'broad' definition of self-defence.

The minister therefore informed Parliament that the Secretary General of the UN had indicated that self-defence also implied defence of the mission. In his own interpretation the minister went to quite an extreme. First of all he thought that since self-defence was interpreted as meaning the defence of the mandate, one could speak of an expansion of the Rules of Engagement, which was certainly not the case; since Cyprus 1964 this definition of self-defence had been the norm. But he also believed that under this 'expansion', it was henceforth permitted to 'disarm combatants who were clearly trying to prevent UNPROFOR by force from carrying out their tasks, or who had already done so. In such situations UN troops were permitted to use force, even if it had to be at the lowest viable level and proportionate'.³⁵⁰² The UN soldiers could then hand the disarmed combatants over 'to the competent authorities'.³⁵⁰³ According to the minister deterrent force was also permitted.³⁵⁰⁴ When Sipkes remarked that in her opinion the moment had already come for the UN troops in Bosnia to use deterrent force, Ter Beek replied that it was not for him, but for the commander on the spot to judge that. He added that the rules were not being expanded so far as to amount to peace-enforcing,³⁵⁰⁵ as Van Middelkoop understood it.³⁵⁰⁶ The Rules of Engagement were merely 'expanded' to increase the safety of personnel.³⁵⁰⁷ Eisma thought that if it were true what the minister was saying – that the UN troops were entitled to make use of deterrent force – the chance of escalation was 'enormous'.³⁵⁰⁸ The minister was not willing to go into specific instances – for instance the one raised by CDA (Christian Democrats) member De Kok as to what would happen if the UN headquarters in Bosnia came under fire. 'Will nothing be done then either?'.³⁵⁰⁹ This excessively broad interpretation of the concept of self-

³⁴⁹⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 69.

³⁴⁹⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 55 (Sipkes), p. 57 (De Kok), p. 60 (Eisma), p. 61 (Van Middelkoop), p. 66 (Van Dis).

³⁵⁰⁰ DV. BDL, no. 92027270/252, memorandum from Ybema for the CDS, 06/05/92, no. JZN92/0279/IJB.

³⁵⁰¹ ABZ, Yugoslavia, resolution 770 (1992), D'Ansembourg 783 to Van den Broek, 19/08/92.

³⁵⁰² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 74.

³⁵⁰³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 75.

³⁵⁰⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 75.

³⁵⁰⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 75.

³⁵⁰⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, pp. 61 and 72.

³⁵⁰⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 75.

³⁵⁰⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 75.

³⁵⁰⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 74.

defence in the international political situation would inevitably lead in future to even more frustration among Dutch MPs when UNPROFOR failed to respond more vigorously in the case of road blocks.

The lack of clarity about the use of force was not confined to Parliament. UNPROFOR troops in Bosnia also had difficulties with it. General J.W. Brinkman, the Commander of the Airmobile Brigade from April 1993 to September 1994 and then Chief of Staff of BH Command, later wrote:

‘Is actively looking for and then eliminating a sniper covered by the right to self-defence or is one supposed to wait till the next person is killed? And what is supposed to be one’s response if a logistical convoy is at risk of being plundered? Does this fall under the right to self-defence and are the troops allowed to protect their own materiel and goods? In the civil war in Bosnia it was significant that the more experience a country had of this sort of operation the more loosely it interpreted the UN mandate, the usual result being that they were much tougher. Generally speaking the warring factions respected this.’³⁵¹⁰

In the interpretation of the Rules of Engagement by the different national units in Bosnia the briefings they received from their national capitals also played a role. For instance, there was a considerable difference in the use of force of the French battalion in Bihac that was given plenty of freedom by Paris and the British contingent in Vitez, that had a strict interpretation imposed by London.³⁵¹¹ Nonetheless the British battalion did not hesitate to fire back if they were first attacked. Between November 1993 and May 1994 the British battalions escorting convoys answered fire from one of the warring factions 67 times, using heavy 30 mm cannons for this purpose.³⁵¹²

Confidential briefings of the Dutch Parliament

Another interesting aspect of the debate of 16 September was that Eisma asked Ter Beek whether they could be kept informed, if need be confidentially, about the advice of the military regarding the risks attached to the operations that Dutch UN soldiers were engaged in.³⁵¹³ It was an interesting request, on the one hand because it meant that a member of parliament was fishing for military expertise, different from anything he could get from the dailies and weeklies, so as to form his own opinion. On the other hand, there was the risk that Parliament in asking for the advice was coming dangerously close to being a partner in shaping policy. That desire was also implicit in the arguments Eisma employed: ‘Why, when it is our job to prepare a decision in partnership with the government and if need be give our consent to that decision, should we not have access to these reports?’³⁵¹⁴ Whatever the case, Ter Beek showed little enthusiasm for this request :

‘It may be disappointing for Mr Eisma but he’ll have to make do with me and not with the briefings of military experts, because it is on the basis of these briefings that I decide on a position. It is my task to give an account of this and Mr Eisma should say whether he agrees or not. But he can’t enter by way of me (...) into discussion with the military experts, because he is in discussion with me.’ ‘(...) After all, I don’t ask you how you have been briefed by your party staff before debating with you, do I?’³⁵¹⁵

³⁵¹⁰ J.W. Brinkman, ‘Plaats en betekenis van moraliteit in het maken van afwegingen. Een militaire invalshoek’, Interventie. Kernvraag (2000) 3, pp. 50-51.

³⁵¹¹ Gow, Triumph, p. 112.

³⁵¹² Gow, Triumph, pp. 128 and 180 n. 68.

³⁵¹³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 59.

³⁵¹⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 59.

³⁵¹⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 59.

Constitutionally speaking Eisma called the comparison ‘not entirely appropriate’.³⁵¹⁶ He stuck to his point that Parliament should be given a briefing ‘with all the information and all related military matters (...) We have had a briefing for less important matters.’³⁵¹⁷ In the end Ter Beek declared that if the Permanent Committee asked him he would arrange for such a briefing ‘with conviction and pleasure’.³⁵¹⁸

In a letter of 6 October 1992 Van den Broek and Ter Beek informed Parliament that they had replied to the request of Boutros-Ghali for Dutch troops to implement Resolution 776. The Netherlands would provide two transport companies with a total of about 385 men as a contribution to a combined Dutch and Belgian transport battalion, to be quartered in Vitez and Banja Luka; 95 signals personnel to supplement the 380 signals corps already there; twenty observers and forty officers and other personnel for the UNPROFOR headquarters that was being set up in Bosnia-Herzegovina.³⁵¹⁹ With the dispatch of these 540 troops the total Dutch contribution to the UN force in the former Yugoslavia came to about 940. With the dispatch of still more troops the number would rise to 1100 at the beginning of 1993.³⁵²⁰ As the reason for this considerable effort the government gave ‘the grave injustice that has been and is being done to many people in Bosnia-Herzegovina’, the expectation that an expanded international force in Bosnia could have a deterrent effect on the violation of human rights and the possibility that an UNPROFOR force of some scope might contribute to a political solution to the problem.³⁵²¹ It was the government’s idea that in supplying these troops what was involved were ‘responsible and acceptable risks.’ ‘Conclusive guarantees of safety’ were however impossible.³⁵²² In its letter the government mentions that under the self-defence of UN forces, ‘situations were also included in which persons attempted with force to prevent the UN forces from carrying out their mandate’.³⁵²³ The entire Ministerial Council, which a month earlier had authorized Prime Minister Lubbers, Deputy Prime Minister Kok and Ministers Ter Beek and Van den Broek to deploy the troops,³⁵²⁴ was only informed about the decision to do so on 9 October, three days after Parliament was informed. They gave their consent.³⁵²⁵

On 7 October 1992 the Standing Committee for Defence did indeed request and receive a confidential briefing from military experts of the Ministry of Defence.³⁵²⁶ It was the first of a series of confidential briefings concerning operations in the former Yugoslavia. On 22 February 1994 the Committee would receive a briefing about the security and weaponry of Dutchbat. The Parliamentary Committees for Defence and Foreign Affairs jointly received a briefing on 18 October 1994 about the impossibility or otherwise of Dutchbat pulling out of Srebrenica³⁵²⁷ and on 31 May 1995 another confidential briefing followed.

Ter Beek himself was not present at these briefings but wished to be informed by the Defence Staff about the meetings afterwards: ‘I was not so much interested in what the ministry briefers told the members of parliament – of course I knew about that – as I was in what the members of parliament

³⁵¹⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 59.

³⁵¹⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 76.

³⁵¹⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 78.

³⁵¹⁹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 29.

³⁵²⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 31, p. 6.

³⁵²¹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 29, p. 1.

³⁵²² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 29, p. 4; TK, session 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 816 (Ter Beek, 22/10/92).

³⁵²³ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 29, p. 4.

³⁵²⁴ BSG, Besluitenlijsten Politiek Beraad (lists of decisions Political Consultations) 1992-1996. Besluitenlijst, 14/09/92.

³⁵²⁵ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 09/10/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁵²⁶ Those present were: Achttienribbe-Buijs (PvdA), Blaauw (VVD), Van Dis (SGP), Eisma (D66), Van Heemskerck Pillis-Duvekot (VVD), De Hoop Scheffer (CDA), De Kok (CDA), Frinking (CDA), Leerling (RPF), Sipkes (GL), Van Traa (PvdA), Valk (PvdA), Ter Veer (D66) and Van Vlijmen (CDA). During these and other confidential briefings there were no staff of Dutch Intelligence present.

³⁵²⁷ Cf. Both, Indifference, p. 260.

thought of them. I hoped in this way to profit from them.³⁵²⁸ Another way that the Defence Department might profit from the confidential briefings was that it meant that the Foreign Office, with which in other matters it acted jointly in Parliament, would not be able to keep an eye on it. The Foreign Office, however, was well aware of this risk - it was one reason why this ministry sent 'a "spy"' to the briefing.³⁵²⁹ On the other hand these confidential briefings and the absence of Ter Beek was advantageous for the members of parliament because the military men responsible were much more open about their hesitations in these private sessions. In public sessions of the committee they would have been less inclined to speak out.³⁵³⁰

During the briefing of 7 October 1992 Commander J. Waltmann of the Defence Staff and Brigadier General Bastiaans, Deputy Chief of Operations of the Royal Netherlands Army informed the members present about the political and military situation in the former Yugoslavia, the options with regard to the deployment of UN troops, UNPROFOR's mandate, the activities of the different international organizations active in the region and the Dutch contribution to them. The information was generally known and the members' interest was correspondent, according to an internal report of the Defence Department. The only time it really became exciting was when members of parliament had the opportunity to ask questions and make comments. Frinking, De Hoop Scheffer, De Kok and Van Traa requested information about the powers accorded to the new command structure in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In Van Heemskerck's opinion – mistakenly as we saw above – the Rules of Engagement went further than was normally the case with peacekeeping. She asked whether the light arms the force possessed were sufficient and whether the choice here was a political or a military one.

In response Waltmann explained that UN troops were not permitted to intervene in the case of breaches of human rights – their mandate in Bosnia did not go as far as this. There was also no question of protection by air power, except for the removal of the wounded by transport helicopter. Bastiaans described the humanitarian aims as primary. Any military activity would have to remain modest, so that it would still be possible for neutral UN troops to provide aid 'tomorrow and the day after'. According to the heads of the Defence department the result of the briefing was that the initially 'forceful language' of a number of members of parliament made way for concern about the risks to Dutch troops.³⁵³¹

During a full debate on 22 October 1992 the members of parliament with the exception of the member for the extreme right-wing party, Hans Janmaat, endorsed the decision of the government to send troops, something that was hardly surprising after their 'great impatience in August', as the PvdA member Van Traa described it.³⁵³² Apparently impressed by the confidential briefing held two weeks earlier, the members of parliament set great store during this debate by the personal safety of the Dutch

³⁵²⁸ TCBU, interview A.L. ter Beek, 23/03/00, p. 15; see also TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 104.

³⁵²⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00154. Memorandum from DPV for Van den Broek via DGPZ and S, 06/10/92, no. DPV-1689/92.

³⁵³⁰ TCBU, interview D. Eisma, 06/04/00, p. 4.

³⁵³¹ According to the Bakker committee set up by Parliament that enquired into the decision-making process around the deployment of Dutch troops to peacekeeping operations, there is no report of this meeting. TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 104. The NIOD, however, found written reports of the two introductions both in the Ter Beek collection and in the archive of the Groen Links (Green Left) Parliamentary party: 'Briefing Yugoslavia', confidential and 'Military situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina', confidential, both undated. In the first report a general survey is given of Yugoslavia and its history; of the political situation in the countries that formerly belonged to Yugoslavia and also of the situation in Kosovo and Vojvodina; of the strength and arms of the different parties to the conflict; the activities of international organizations with regard to the former Yugoslavia; and finally of the Dutch contribution. The second report gives a summary of the military situation in the different parts of Bosnia; the combat resources of the different parties, their attitude to UNPROFOR, UNPROFOR itself; the concept of operations of the Dutch/Belgian transport battalion; its deployment and the risks aid convoys incurred in Bosnia. The second report is also found in the Kreemers collection. The presentations were accompanied by slides. Also found was: NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek, confidential memorandum by Frans Princen, 'Impressie van de vertrouwelijke briefing van de Vaste Commissie voor Defensie van de Tweede Kamer op 7 oktober 1992' (Impression of the confidential briefing of the Permanent Committee for Defence on 7 October 1992), 08/10/92.

³⁵³² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 811.

troops.³⁵³³ However, they were persuaded by Ter Beek that through agreements with the warring factions, the command structure on the spot, the protection provided by British and Canadian infantry battalions, the location and the routes used by the convoys and the protective measures taken with regard to the equipment of trucks and drivers, everything had been done to keep risks to an acceptable level - acceptable that is in relation to the appalling situation of the population of Bosnia-Herzegovina. On 1 March 1993, to emphasize the importance it attached to the safety of Dutch military personnel in the region, the government also attached the frigate Abraham Crijnssen to the British task group Ark Royal in the Adriatic Sea that would provide cover for UNPROFOR troops in the event of an evacuation.³⁵³⁴

During the debate on 22 October 1992 De Kok requested more clarity over the powers the Minister of Defence had with regard to the UNPROFOR command structure: 'Does he have an insight into what is going on? Does he have an emergency brake for unexpected circumstances?'³⁵³⁵ According to Ter Beek he did have such a brake on the grounds of the supreme authority of the Dutch government over the deployment of Dutch troops (article 98 of the constitution. See also Chapter 5). He was empowered if need be to recall the Dutch contingent, but he acknowledged straightway that it was not a decision he would take lightly. Decisions about the data and routes of convoys were the task of the UN commanders in consultation with the representatives of UNHCR. Ter Beek also pointed out that Dutch officers were present at virtually all the levels of the UNPROFOR command structure.³⁵³⁶ With Parliamentary approval 160 quartermasters of the Dutch transport unit departed on 31 October, followed on 7 and 10 November by the main force.

Lack of clarity in the Netherlands about how to deal with roadblocks

Despite the fact that, as early as August, the UN, UNHCR and Britain were adamantly opposed to the use of force when convoys were stopped at roadblocks, both the Dutch Parliament and Government continued to ask questions on this subject in August. On 19 August, the day after Van den Broek had instructed him to make the higher offer of sixty trucks and two hundred drivers to UNHCR, Wagenmakers, the Dutch Permanent Representative in Geneva, asked the High Commissioner what significance should be given to the words 'all measures necessary' in Resolution 770. UNHCR's answer stressed that the only realistic way of ensuring that convoys could continue on their way consisted of frequently exhausting negotiations with the warring factions. For the sake of ongoing aid UNHCR thought it of the utmost importance that the parties saw the stance of the aid workers as impartial and neutral.³⁵³⁷

In the margins of the London Conference Van den Broek raised the issue of the military escorting of convoys with Ogata. She said that she would have no objection if UNHCR on the spot deemed it necessary; it would then need to be a 'non-offensive use' of troops. She continued to argue for lengthy and difficult negotiations if necessary to ensure that the convoys reached their destination. Her preference, she told Van den Broek, was therefore for civilian drivers.³⁵³⁸

On 17 February 1993 CDA MP De Kok asked a question in Parliament about whether UN convoys were entitled to use force to reach their destination. Minister P.H. Kooijmans who succeeded Van den Broek as Minister of Foreign Affairs on 2 January 1993, replied that if a convoy protected by UNPROFOR was blocked, it was for the UNPROFOR commander to decide on the appropriate ³⁵³³ See also Hans Moleman, 'VN-missie moet met creativiteit Kamer nachtmerries besparen' (With creativity the UN can spare Parliament some nightmares), de Volkskrant, 23/10/92.

³⁵³⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 33.

³⁵³⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 806.

³⁵³⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 819.

³⁵³⁷ PVNY. Wagenmakers 588 to Van den Broek, 19/08/92. See also ABZ, 2003/00063, Follow-up Committee on the Comprehensive Response to the Humanitarian Crisis in the Former Yugoslavia, Second Meeting, 04/09/92, Working Document. Advance copy, enclosure by PR Geneva to F. van Wulfften Palthe, 24/08/92, fax no. hum/gev-0579/92.

³⁵³⁸ ABZ, DIO/2003/00063. Loudon 418 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 26/08/92.

action. Where possible he would consult the senior UNHCR official in the convoy. Up till now, the minister said, it had never proved necessary to use military means to force a passage, 'in order to ensure the safety of UN staff and to see that the relief operations in general were not endangered.'³⁵³⁹

On 9 March 1993 Parliament passed Van Traa's motion asking the government to find out whether measures were available if necessary to use force to ensure that UN convoys reached their destination.³⁵⁴⁰ Minister Kooijmans had no objection to the motion, although he also did not see that it would achieve anything. In fact Resolutions 770 and 776 already offered the possibility of the use of greater force, he said. The troop-contributing nations proved unwilling to do so however. For that they needed to be more heavily armed and have a broader mandate.³⁵⁴¹ Nonetheless the motion was passed a week later, with the PvdA, CDA, D66, Groen Links, GPV, RPF and SGP voting for it and the other parties against.³⁵⁴²

The Dutch Permanent Representative at the UN then informed Kooijmans that a contributing factor to the UNHCR position of negotiating instead of opening fire was that what was involved was usually not just one roadblock, but several on the same route. When force was resorted to at one road block, one would have to be prepared to engage in combat the whole length of that route. Furthermore, if that were to happen the road blocks further along the route would be reinforced in response. In fact, if a decision was taken to resort to force, a secure corridor would have to be achieved. The NATO and WEU plans for this situation of August 1992 had however concluded that to achieve this would require a force of a hundred thousand and no country envisaged the possibility of supplying or contributing to such a force.

Finally in the rejection of the use of force the commanders of the UNPROFOR units protecting the convoys were well aware that a confrontation at one spot could well lead to reprisals against UN personnel at another, entirely different one.³⁵⁴³ On 5 April Kooijmans therefore informed Parliament with regard to Van Traa's motion, that contacts with the UN Secretariat had indicated that UNHCR was opposed to the use of force to ensure that aid convoys reached their destination.³⁵⁴⁴ Prior to that answer to Parliament, some ministers had also expressed irritation during a Ministerial Council meeting about the non-violent response expected at these roadblocks.³⁵⁴⁵ Ter Beek said: 'if they come up against an obstacle, let them drive around it'; a viewpoint that Prime Minister Lubbers in particular did not feel very happy about.³⁵⁴⁶

It was not just UN diplomats and cautious governments who were against the use of force in the framework of Resolutions 770 and 776. The experience of the troops involved indicated that they regarded negotiations at roadblocks as being far preferable to force. At the beginning of 1994 the Dutch Army attaché in London noted down at the presentation of the commander of the British battalion for the period from May to November 1993 about his experience that riding in a Warrior (a heavy armoured vehicle) through a roadblock meant that the convoy could proceed straightway but that afterwards this might mean that they were denied the use of the road for days on end. A few hours delay as a result of negotiations was therefore preferable.³⁵⁴⁷ Opening fire would have even more serious consequences than just riding through. As Sergio Vieira de Mello, the highest civilian UN

³⁵³⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Appendix to Proceedings, no. 390.

³⁵⁴⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 37.

³⁵⁴¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3874.

³⁵⁴² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3394 (16/03/93).

³⁵⁴³ ABZ, Yugoslavia Resolution 770 (1992), D'Ansemborg 264 to Kooijmans, 22/03/93.

³⁵⁴⁴ TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 44.

³⁵⁴⁵ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings on 26/03/93 and 02/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁵⁴⁶ Interview R.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

³⁵⁴⁷ CRST. Colonel G.C.W. Soetermeer, Dutch Army attaché, a DOKL OZ, attn. H Sitcen, 28/02/94 no. 2602/1827, with supplement: 'Aantekening naar aanleiding van presentatie Britse BC over ervaring UK(VN-)bataljon in periode mei-november 1993' (Notes on the presentation of British commander about experience of a British UN battalion in period from May to November 1993).

administrator in Sarajevo from the end of 1993, once wrote: 'Shooting your way through only works once. After that you're at war, and for all practical purposes the humanitarian effort is over.'³⁵⁴⁸

An international enquiry of 1996 of UNPROFOR officers who had served in Bosnia showed that about eighty percent of them concurred with the attitude that patience was the best way of ensuring that humanitarian convoys reached their destination.³⁵⁴⁹ There were some officers who felt that at any rate threatening with force could do no harm. For instance, the Swedish Commander of the Norwegian battalion, Hendrikson said that if a convoy was stopped at a roadblock, 'I tell them they let me through or I'll blow their fucking heads off. Sure, sometimes they don't, and I have to go back, but it doesn't hurt to try it. You have to in the Balkans. You act the tough guy or they piss all over you.'³⁵⁵⁰ How cautiously UNPROFOR acted in reality can be seen from the fact that it was not until the beginning of November that UNPROFOR troops first resorted to the right to self-defence, after an aid convoy escorted by British troops came under heavy fire thirty kilometres south of Tuzla.³⁵⁵¹

7. The No-Fly Zones

In London the no-fly zone over Bosnia was proposed as one of the confidence-building measures. After the Conference of London the Dutch authorities were strong advocates of a Security Council resolution to set up a 'no-fly zone' over Bosnia. During an EPS lunch in New York on 22 September with the temporary Secretary of State, Eagleburger, Van den Broek spoke out for the deployment of flying radar stations, the 'AWACS', to record outlawed movements of aircraft. Later he recalled that almost all his colleagues were theoretically in favour of a no-fly-zone, but that there were many practical problems involved in making it stick. Once more Douglas Hurd took the lead in playing 'a discouraging role'.³⁵⁵²

At the beginning of October an American draft resolution was finally presented to the Security Council for enforcing a no-fly zone over Bosnia. The American government had been brought round after realizing that any interruption of humanitarian relief flights to Sarajevo would mean the deaths of many thousands of Muslims in the coming winter.³⁵⁵³ Since the Bosnian Muslims and Croats had very few if any planes, the prohibition was mainly directed at the Serbs who despite the agreements of London still bombarded residential and industrial areas in Bosnia repeatedly. Van den Broek was pleased with the explicit allusion to Chapter VII of the UN Charter and with the mention of enforcement in this draft resolution. He was also enthusiastic about the role assigned to NATO; he saw it as the only organization with the means and infrastructure to supervise and enforce a compliance with the resolution in the short run.³⁵⁵⁴

The allusion to Chapter VII proved unacceptable however to Russia and China, both permanent members of the Security Council. The British chairman of the Security Council aimed therefore for a two-stage approach.³⁵⁵⁵ UNPROFOR was asked to devise a 'suitable mechanism' to ³⁵⁴⁸ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 169.

³⁵⁴⁹ Biermann & Vadset, 2nd Workshop, p. 30.

³⁵⁵⁰ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 169.

³⁵⁵¹ MID. MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation, 83/92, 08/11/92.

³⁵⁵² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Biegman 886 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 23/09/92. See also ABZ, DEU/ARA/05244. Biegman 884 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 22/09/92; PVNY. Van den Broek to Permanent Representative New York, 30/09/92, celer 263; J. Groen, 'V-raad studeert op meer stappen tegen Servië' (Security Council studying more measures against Serbia), de Volkskrant, 24/09/92.

³⁵⁵³ John M. Goshko, 'A Reluctant Expansion of Policy. Bosnia "No-Fly" Zone Needed to Protect Aid, Eagleburger Says', The Washington Post, 11/10/92. See also 'Vliegverbod boven Bosnië' ('No fly-zone over Bosnia'), NRC Handelsblad, 03/10/92.

³⁵⁵⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Van den Broek 275 to PR New York, 05/10/92.

³⁵⁵⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Memorandum DGPZ to Van den Broek, 07/10/92, no. 161/92; ABZ,999.241 Yugoslavia, No Fly Zone. Confidential memorandum of DAV to Van den Broek, 06/10/92, no. MS-183/92.

supervise compliance. Enforcement of the no-fly zone would only become possible after violations had occurred and this required a new resolution.

This caution was prompted not merely by the position adopted by Russia and China, but mainly by the British and French governments that feared an escalation of the conflict if force were used straightway. They shared Boutros-Ghali's anxiety about the safety of UN personnel on the ground if the no-fly zone were enforced.³⁵⁵⁶ This approach resulted in Resolution 781, passed on 9 October, which proclaimed the prohibition without mentioning sanctions. It, for that matter, also referred to Resolution 770 and thus indirectly to Chapter VII.

The no-fly zone was instituted at once. Monitoring would be carried out by observers on thirteen airfields in Croatia, Bosnia, Serbia and Montenegro and by the NATO AWACS that were already present in the region to assist in the recording of violations of the embargo at sea over the Adriatic. From the beginning of November AWACS aircraft would also be stationed in Hungary, NATO's first out-of-area-operation. The stationing of observers at the airfields was made possible by its endorsement of the Yugoslav and Croatian Presidents, Cosic and Tudjman on 30 September in a joint statement in the presence of the mediators Owen and Vance.³⁵⁵⁷ Some weeks later Van den Broek spoke in noticeably sharper terms than presented in the resolution. He argued for selective military action in the form of vigorous enforcement of the arms embargo and the no-fly zone.³⁵⁵⁸

According to many insiders an enforcement of the no-fly zone would in fact have scarcely any effect on the war on the ground. After the resolution there were hardly any more bombing raids by the Bosnian Serbs.³⁵⁵⁹ The VRS did continue on a modest scale to make use of helicopters for transporting troops and supplies.³⁵⁶⁰ If these had been fired on, the lightly-armed UN troops on the ground would have been an easy target for reprisals. Finally enforcement would have jeopardized the neutrality the UN aimed to preserve with a view to negotiations. Bart Tromp wrote therefore that a resolution enforcing the no-fly zone was 'at best a gesture and at worst a military move that was politically stupid.'³⁵⁶¹

Without sanctions however the no-fly zone did not mean very much. A fleet of AWACS reconnaissance planes of the NATO recorded repeated violations.³⁵⁶² The follow-up resolution proposed in this case remained a distant prospect because the French and British governments did not want the Security Council to pass it until UNPROFOR II was fully operative in the region. With regard to violations of the no-fly zone then a minimalist approach emerged, with the international community turning a blind eye.

On 10 November the Security Council finally passed Resolution 786, making enforcement possible. Verification could now be carried out not just by the AWACS but also by stationing observers from the European monitors mission in three airports in Croatia and by UNPROFOR in Zagreb, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia and Montenegro. Yet, thereafter the Serbs and – to a lesser degree the Croatians – continued to violate the no-fly zone and the Bosnian government refused to allow observers onto the airfield of Tuzla, where according to British sources Iranian planes flew in considerable quantities of weapons.³⁵⁶³ The failure of enforcement to materialize was exacerbated by consecutive elections in the United States, Russia, and Serbia in November and December 1992.³⁵⁶⁴

³⁵⁵⁶ Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, pp. 99-100; Favier & Martin-Rolland, Décennie, p. 306.

³⁵⁵⁷ For the text of the statement see Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 456-458.

³⁵⁵⁸ Leonard Ornstein, 'Minister Van den Broek: Ik zou zeggen: beginnen met een schot voor de boeg' (Van den Broek: 'I'd say, let's start with a shot across the bows'), Vrij Nederland, 31/10/92, pp. 9-10.

³⁵⁵⁹ United Nations Department of Public Information, The United Nations, p. 10.

³⁵⁶⁰ Gow, Triumph, pp. 132-133.

³⁵⁶¹ Tromp, Verraad, p. 49 (30/09/92).

³⁵⁶² See for example DPV/ARA/01806. Biegan 1001 to Van den Broek, 14/10/92; Van den Broek to PR New York, 30/10/92, celer 360.

³⁵⁶³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Biegan 1344 to Van den Broek, 04/12/92. See also appendix Intelligence, Chapter 4.

³⁵⁶⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Biegan 1143 to Van den Broek, 03/11/92; Biegan 1396 to Van den Broek, 16/12/92; Jacobovits 2005 to Van den Broek, 18/12/92.

One practical problem was that the troop-contributing nations had only provided 29 of the required 79 observers by the beginning of December.³⁵⁶⁵ It is a question though how much the UN really insisted on it. Boutros-Ghali had very little enthusiasm for the no-fly zone.³⁵⁶⁶

Both the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and N.H. (Niek) Biegman, appointed Dutch Permanent Representative at the United Nations in September 1992, expressed great frustration about the inaction over violations of the no-fly zone on the part of the United States, France and the United Kingdom.³⁵⁶⁷ Biegman: ‘They don’t know nor do they want to know.’³⁵⁶⁸ During a CoPo-meeting Van Walsum remarked ‘that we shouldn’t allow ourselves to be totally hypnotized by the risks that would arise for UNPROFOR I and II if force were resorted to in implementing the ‘no-fly zone’. After all UNPROFOR I had done little more than consolidate the Serbian occupation of a third of Croatia, and the task of UNPROFOR II could be substituted through air supplies, even though weather conditions for flights over Bosnia were ‘far from ideal’.³⁵⁶⁹

8. En route to the Tribunal

From the beginning of October 1991 the EC and CVSE had adopted the position that those responsible for the violence in Yugoslavia should be made to answer for their deeds under international law.³⁵⁷⁰ Resolution 771 of 13 August 1992 had called on all the countries and relevant international humanitarian organizations to provide the Security Council with information about serious human rights violations in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. Explicit mention was made of serious violations of the Geneva Conventions. At the same time the Security Council asked Boutros-Ghali to come up with proposals about what should be done afterwards on the basis of the information provided. The prospect thus emerged of bringing perpetrators of war crimes to trial.

While war prevailed in at any rate part of the soil of the former Yugoslavia and the international community was not prepared to enforce peace, the resolution made for an awkward situation. It was not inconceivable that among those with whom the West would have to deal to solve the conflict there would be people who might be considered for such a trial. After Resolution 771 was passed Western negotiators therefore ran the risk of incurring the odium of having sat down and talked with people seen internationally as war criminals. Potential suspects would gain nothing from cooperating in their own extradition or that of any of their accomplices who might compromise them. Their readiness to contribute to achieving peace in their own territories might even be reduced, because to do so might facilitate their own extradition or arrest.

Nonetheless the Netherlands spoke out within both the EC and the UN for gathering evidence about war crimes and setting up a UN tribunal for trying war criminals in the former Yugoslavia following the model of the tribunals of Nuremberg and Tokyo at the end of the Second World War.³⁵⁷¹

³⁵⁶⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. PR New York to Van den Broek, 10/12/92 nyy-10221.

³⁵⁶⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. D’Ansembourg 1418 to Van den Broek, 22/12/92.

³⁵⁶⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Van den Broek 404 to PR New York, 18/11/92; Biegman 1344 to Van den Broek, 04/12/92.

³⁵⁶⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Biegman 1143 to Van den Broek, 03/11/92.

³⁵⁶⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Memorandum DGPZ for Van den Broek, 09/12/92, no. 195/92.

³⁵⁷⁰ See for instance Frits Schaling, ‘Ultimatum EG aan strijdende Joegoslaven’ (EC ultimatum to conflicting parties in Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 07/10/91; Steven L. Burg, ‘Negotiating a Settlement: Lessons of the Diplomatic Process’, in: Blank (ed.), Wars, p. 41.

³⁵⁷¹ See for instance ABZ, DEU/ARA/03286. Van den Broek to PR Geneva, 25/09/92, celer 238; coreu Den Haag, 01/10/92, cpe/hag 584; 00001, memorandum from P. Peters for head of DIO/Joegoslavië, 30/09/92, no. 653/92; Van den Broek, 268 to PR New York, 01/10/92 508363, Van den Broek 141 to embassy London, 28/09/92; COREU Den Haag, 02/10/92, cpe/hag 594; Van den Broek 031 to PR Strasbourg, 19/10/92; 00085, COREU Den Haag, 17/09/92, cpe/hag 547; Meesman 896 to Van den Broek, 02/10/92; 0755, Van den Broek 142 to embassy London, 28/09/92; COREU Den Haag, 28/09/92, cpe/hag 576; TK 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 72; Wio Joustra, ‘Nederland wil internationaal tribunaal oorlogsmisdaden’ (Netherlands calls for international war crimes tribunal), de Volkskrant, 26/08/92.

In September 1992 the Netherlands made the first concrete proposals within the EC for an investigation into war crimes and the possible trial of the perpetrators. At the same time the American government declared itself in favour of instituting a UN commission for war crimes perpetrated in the former Yugoslavia. In October Washington was however not yet in favour of a tribunal. The American government feared that a UN tribunal for war crimes would have the effect of creating a precedent and therefore argued that war criminals should be tried by their own national courts.³⁵⁷² In the former Yugoslavia that might of course only happen once the political climate there had changed. According to the American approach the UN commission should initiate enquiries itself and draw up a report stating the responsibility of both public authorities and individuals. This would provide a basis for prosecution. The Assistant Legal Advisor of the State Department, Edward Cummings, informed Meesman, the Dutch ambassador in Washington, that reports such as these could ‘also have a deterrent effect’.³⁵⁷³ On Van Walsum’s advice, a coordination of the Dutch and American initiatives was attempted.³⁵⁷⁴

Cummings also told Meesman that UN negotiator Vance was no supporter of a UN commission for war crimes, ‘because he wanted to keep the possibility of an amnesty if that would improve the chances of a final solution to the conflict’.³⁵⁷⁵ David Owen too wanted to keep open the possibility of a general amnesty – ‘with a few exceptions’, as he said in a briefing for the EC ministers on 13 October.³⁵⁷⁶ The former Polish Prime Minister, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, who had been appointed special reporter for the former Yugoslavia by the UN Commission for Human Rights in the middle of August to report on violations of human rights and war crimes, on the other hand, argued in favour of the institution of a commission for war crimes.

On 5 October a declaration was signed by the Twelve in Luxembourg supporting the Dutch proposal for a fact-gathering operation on war crimes. The next day, 6 October, the Security Council passed Resolution 780 that set up a committee of experts to report back to the Secretary-General of the UN about serious violations of the Geneva conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law. The chairperson of the committee of five was the Dutch emeritus professor of international humanitarian law, Professor Frits Kalshoven.³⁵⁷⁷

9. The continuation on the debate on intervention in the Netherlands

From the beginning of September the debate on intervention that had raged so fiercely in Dutch dailies and weeklies in August had more or less died down apart from a few brief flare-ups.³⁵⁷⁸ In the reports about Bosnia the emphasis was now on the events themselves (still mainly in Sarajevo) and the international debate.

In general the Dutch press judged the operations of the international community in Bosnia after the Conference of London to be powerless.³⁵⁷⁹ Commentator J.H. Sampiemon thought that it should ³⁵⁷² For Eagleburger’s reluctance over an international tribunal see also Cigar, Genocide, p. 116.

³⁵⁷³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Meesman 896 to Van den Broek, 02/10/92. Also found in ABZ, 508363; ABZ, DVN/2007/0001. Memorandum from J.G. Lammers (plv. JURA) for Van den Broek, 02/10/92, no. 48/92.

³⁵⁷⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Memorandum from plv. JURA for Van den Broek via S and DGPZ, 02/10/92, no. 48/92, marginal note by Van Walsum.

³⁵⁷⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Meesman 896 to Van den Broek, 02/10/92.

³⁵⁷⁶ ABZ, DVN/2007/0001. Briefing Lord Owen: suggestion of amnesty in the context of a political solution, undated.

³⁵⁷⁷ For how his appointment took place see ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Van den Broek 282 to PR New York, 08/10/92.

³⁵⁷⁸ See for instance Major General L.P. van Oppen, retired. ‘Aarzelings om in te grijpen in voormalig Joegoslavië is terecht’ (Hesitation about intervening in former Yugoslavia is right), Algemeen Dagblad, 01/09/92; J. Emck, ‘Een keus uit twee kwaden. Militaire interventie of werkeloos toezien bij volkerenmoord? (A choice of two evils. Military intervention or standing by and doing nothing to stop genocide?)’, Trouw, 02/09/92; J.-P. Chevènement, ‘De enige oplossing is een confederaal Joegoslavië’ (The only solution is a Yugoslav confederation), de Volkskrant, 05/09/92.

³⁵⁷⁹ See for example ‘Ultimatum’, NRC Handelsblad, 08/09/92; W. Offenbergh, ‘VN kunnen geen vuist maken’ (UN is powerless) and Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Soldaten voelen zich schietschijf’ (Troops feel like target), NRC Handelsblad, 10/09/92; J. Cammelbeeck, ‘Uitsluiten van Belgrado toont machteloosheid’ (The exclusion of Belgrade shows powerlessness), de Volkskrant, 26/09/92.

choose between winning the conflict in Bosnia or leaving, but in any case it could not just continue muddling along as it had done up till then.³⁵⁸⁰ At the end of October he declared his personal choice: 'It has transpired that the rather popular demand for intervention, which in any case should be under the UN flag and with the consent of the parties concerned has considerably limited the chance of success. The experience being gained at present with interference from outside in conflict areas such as Yugoslavia (...) suggests great caution.'³⁵⁸¹

In the Volkscrant Koen Koch detected a steep decline in concern for Yugoslavia and a lack of decisiveness. He explained it by pointing to the absence of any local Dutch self-interest in what happened in the former Yugoslavia. Henceforth in his opinion journalists should present any politician in favour of intervention with the crucial question of how many dead Dutch soldiers he thought acceptable.³⁵⁸² Voorhoeve and Van den Doel came up with suggestions for replacing the existing 'package of stopgaps': the enforcement of a total no-fly zone for the Yugoslav air force; the handing over of heavy weapons to the UN followed by their de-activation; the setting up of a demilitarized zone for refugees where the UN would also have a headquarters; embarking on a psychological war against Serbia and Montenegro to impress upon the populations there that it was in their own interest to bring the war to an end. Finally permanent observers should be stationed in Kosovo and Vojvodina.³⁵⁸³

Another member of the Clingendael Institute, the East European expert, Martin van den Heuvel thought by contrast that there was nothing left that the West could do. The Serbs had control of the territory they wanted. They would not just give it up. If the West still wanted to resort to military intervention, it would have to be prepared to accept hostage-taking in Serbian territory and terrorist attacks in their own cities.³⁵⁸⁴ Anet Bleich, on the contrary, thought that the new plea by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel perfectly reflected her own feelings on the matter. Only a 'disciplined superior force' probably containing 'considerably more than a hundred thousand troops' (...) 'will still have a chance of bringing the conflicting parties to their senses – in the first place the Serbs, but not only them – drunk as they were on their blood and soil philosophy'.³⁵⁸⁵

The reports of Theo Engelen and Raymond van den Boogaard in NRC Handelsblad displayed an increasingly critical tone towards Izetbegovic and the Bosnian Muslims. Engelen reported on the great indignation in the UN about the incident in which the Bosnian government army fired on a convoy transporting food, water and petrol for the peacekeeping force in Sarajevo, with two French soldiers being killed.³⁵⁸⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard wrote amongst other things about the power of the 'Muslim king of the underworld' Jusuf Prazina over the black market in the Bosnian capital³⁵⁸⁷ and about the terror that the Muslims were increasingly inflicting there on the Croats and Serbs. 'Notions of a "holy war"', that initially did not appear to play any role among the moderate Muslims of Bosnia were ³⁵⁸⁰ J.H. Sampiemon, 'Winnen of iets anders' (Winning or something else), NRC Handelsblad, 01/10/92.

³⁵⁸¹ J.H. Sampiemon, 'De illusie van de nieuwe wereldorde' (The illusion of a new world order), NRC Handelsblad, 29/10/92.

³⁵⁸² K. Koch, 'De schaamte voorbij' (Beyond shame), de Volkscrant, 11/09/92.

³⁵⁸³ J.J.C. Voorhoeve & M. van den Doel, 'Is het doek voor Bosnië gevallen?' (Is it curtains for Bosnia?), de Volkscrant, 16/09/92.

³⁵⁸⁴ Martin van den Heuvel, 'Vanuit Belgrado bezien is het Westen een tandeloze terriër' (Belgrade sees West as a dog that's all bark and no bite), de Volkscrant, 19/09/92.

³⁵⁸⁵ Anet Bleich, 'Lethargisch en benepen' (Lethargic and faint-hearted), de Volkscrant, 19/09/92. See also Anet Bleich, 'Andere tijden' (Other times), de Volkscrant, 03/10/92.

³⁵⁸⁶ Theo Engelen, 'VN stellen moslims verantwoordelijk voor dood VN-militairen' (UN holds Muslims responsible for dead UN troops), NRC Handelsblad, 10/09/92.

³⁵⁸⁷ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Soldaten voelen zich schietschijf', NRC Handelsblad, 10/09/92; idem, 'Na elk Joegoslavisch akkoord meer strijd' (Conflict breaks out again after every pact in Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 22/10/92. See also Theo Engelen, 'Aan oorlog is Bosnië wordt veel verdiend' (Plenty of profit made in war in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 23/10/92.

now clearly winning terrain under the pressure of their hopeless situation.³⁵⁸⁸ De Volkskrant too reported on the war profiteers from the Sarajevo underworld.³⁵⁸⁹

10. Conclusion

If it was already plain during the Conference of London that all the international commotion about the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina from mid-July to well into August had had little effect on the measures the West was prepared to take against Serbian aggression, the way the agreements of London were implemented made the conclusion inevitable that for the time being the VRS and the Bosnian Serb leadership had little to fear from the West. Barely two months after the images of Trnopolje were broadcast Bart Tromp complained:

‘The war in Yugoslavia has by now disappeared from the front pages. You get used to anything, everything becomes normal and what is normal is no longer newsworthy. Two months ago the recent reports about the systematic murder of three thousand Bosnians would have been newsworthy enough for leading articles. Now they don’t even get reported on the TV news. Gradually a process of total indifference is setting in.’³⁵⁹⁰

That may have been true of the international community as a whole, but it was not the case with the Dutch government and parliament. There at least passions were kept alight. The Dutch government chose the hard line for every possible measure against Serbia and the Bosnian Serb leadership without the members of Parliament urging any restraint. As was acknowledged in the privacy of the government, the government was increasingly suffering from an image problem, because it had not itself supplied any combat unit to be deployed in Bosnia. It is striking how many conditions the Dutch government attached to the deployment of a transport unit as part of a UN operation in comparison with the complete absence of any conditions later on in making the Airmobile Brigade available. One cannot help thinking that the latter stance may be explained by the former.

Meanwhile the war in Bosnia continued. Not only did the West do little to prevent the war, but some of its measures even fostered the conflict – such as the fact that a very considerable part of the humanitarian aid fell into the hands of the warring factions. In any case, at no point did the actions of the international community after the Conference of London give any unambiguous message that the Serb and Bosnian Serb leadership would be advised to seek a solution to the conflict by way of the negotiation table.

³⁵⁸⁸ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Overleg begint met een schone lei’ (Discussions begin with a clean slate), NRC Handelsblad, 18/09/92.

³⁵⁸⁹ ‘Militaire’ patjepeeërs vullen Sarajevo’s machtsvacuüm’ (‘Military’ bullyboys fill power vacuum in Sarajevo), de Volkskrant, 22/09/92.

³⁵⁹⁰ Tromp, Verraad, p. 46 (30/09/92).

Chapter 8

Safe Areas as spin-offs from humanitarian action, November – December 1992

1. Apathy

Execution of the UN Security Council's resolution 776, passed on 14 September 1992, met with great problems. The Spanish and French presence – both countries had promised to provide a battalion in the framework of the resolution – proved to be less than expected. The main force from the Dutch B transport company arrived in Zagreb in early November. However, it took more than a month and a half to deploy it fully because the Bosnian Serb authorities did not allow the Dutch company and the Canadian battalion assigned to protect it access to Banja Luka, with the exception of 70 Canadian and 25 Dutch soldiers. Other UNPROFOR II units experienced similar problems. The Dutch A company and the accompanying staff and back-up company were not stationed in the same base as the British battalion assigned to protect them, as had been the original intention, but in Busovaca. Only this British battalion, the Dutch A company and the Belgian company in Pancevo were able to deploy themselves fully in November and make a start with aid convoys.³⁵⁹¹ Finally, the UN decided at the end of December that the Dutch B transport company should be deployed in the small town of Santici near Vitez.

Thus, the already fairly meagre action the international community had decided to undertake was largely thwarted by the Bosnian Serb authorities. International consultation in November about how to handle the problem of Yugoslavia was thus understandably marked by a certain apathy, and the parties to the consultation hardly bothered to hide this from one another. During an informal session following a meeting of the Comité Politique on 3 November, that had been largely devoted to the Yugoslav question, the directors of Political Affairs of the twelve foreign ministries aired their personal opinion that no single European country – including France and Great Britain who had so far been playing the major role – was yet prepared to fight a war on the ground in the former Yugoslavia. This meant that the international community was doing nothing more than 'a glorified humanitarian operation, aimed at limiting human suffering while accepting the inevitable', i.e. the creation of a Greater Serbia.³⁵⁹² The Dutch Director-General of Political Affairs Van Walsum and his German counterpart Chrobog found it difficult, however, to accept the fait accompli of ethnic cleansing passively. Non-recognition of the Serb territorial gains, 'indefinitely, if necessary' was 'the only weapon left in our hands', according to Van Walsum.³⁵⁹³ The Dutch report of a subsequent meeting of the Comité Politique devoted to a discussion of the former Yugoslavia also spoke of 'dossier fatigue and a feeling of frustration'.³⁵⁹⁴

³⁵⁹¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Van den Broek 477 to PR New York, 15/12/99; DAV/MS-228/92, memo deputy DAV to DGPZ, 16/12/92. See also Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Bosnië-gangers de bergen in over rul zandpad' (Route to Bosnian destinations runs over sandy mountain paths) and "'De meesten zijn positief ingesteld'" (Most have a positive attitude), NRC Handelsblad, 16/11/92; 'Eerste Nederlands konvooi in Bosnië verloopt soepel' (First Dutch convoy in Bosnia experiences no difficulties), de Volkskrant, 25/11/92.

³⁵⁹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. London to BZ, 05/11/92, 07:32, Hoekman 601.

³⁵⁹³ Ibid.

³⁵⁹⁴ ABZ, DDI-DAV/999.241/DAV/MS/Joegoslavië/NAVO/Coördinatie/No Fly Zone/Joegoslavië/Operation Deny Flight/Sept-Dec 1992. Van den Broek 093 to PR EC Brussels, 18/11/92.

2. The idea of safe regions

Despite the sluggishness in international consultation arising from the frustration caused by the lack of progress after the London conference, the idea of creating safe regions for the Muslims in Bosnia came increasingly under discussion in the conference rooms of the international organizations. These regions were known under various different names, such as Safe Areas, safe havens and safe zones. The supporters of the idea often used the terms interchangeably, apparently without any clear understanding of the legal distinction between them.

In addition, the various plans came from different stables. As mentioned in Chapter 6, the idea of safe regions first achieved a really prominent place on the international agenda during the UNHCR conference on 29 and 30 July 1992. The Austrian government had however, as temporary member of the UN Security Council and within the framework of the CSCE, been propagating the idea of internationally protected zones for the Muslim population of Sarajevo and other Bosnian cities since mid-April 1992. According to Vienna, the international community could provide civilians within these zones with the necessities of life, and facilitate proper functioning of the Bosnian government.³⁵⁹⁵ There was initially little international sympathy for this idea of the Austrian government. One important reason why the authorities in Vienna kept on propagating this initiative forcefully was their growing fear of a flood of refugees from Bosnia. They hoped that the creation of safe regions might even facilitate the repatriation of refugees.³⁵⁹⁶

The growing flood of refugees also led other countries to study the idea more seriously; this explains why it was greeted so enthusiastically during the UNHCR conference at the end of July. The CSCE Steering Group on the Yugoslav crisis also had 'a substantive discussion' on 26 August to clarify the concept of 'safe havens', but they reached no concrete conclusions because of the complexity of the subject matter.³⁵⁹⁷

The CSCE Committee of Senior Civil Servants did however give its full support in early November to the creation of safe zones in Bosnia, especially in the regions where most Displaced Persons were living, 'in order to facilitate the safe return of refugees'.³⁵⁹⁸

The French government had also been thinking seriously since July about the concrete realization of the idea of safe zones (zones sûres). At the end of October, they launched the idea of building villages for refugees that would come under the protection of the French UNPROFOR battalion in Bihac. One of the advantages of this approach was that, according to the French government, it would not require a new mandate from the Security Council. The German government, which had no troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina itself, was prepared to take care of the accommodation and infrastructure for such a zone.³⁵⁹⁹ Various other Western governments remained chary of the idea of safe regions, because they could be seen as supporting the ethnic cleansing desired by the Bosnian Serb authorities. However, the Bosnian Minister of Foreign Affairs Silajdzic stated during a visit to the government in Bonn in mid-November that he was also in favour of the establishment of safe regions.³⁶⁰⁰

³⁵⁹⁵ Mock (ed.), Balkan-Dossier, p. 96 and 107.

³⁵⁹⁶ ABZ, 999.0 VN/Operaties/UNPROFOR/Joegoslavië/Oct-Dec 1992. 'Erklärung des österreichischen Vertreters im Konsulatausschuss des Konfliktverhütungszentrums' (Statement by the Austrian representative in the Consular Committee of the Conflict Prevention Centre), 23/11/92.

³⁵⁹⁷ CSCE Vienna, 07 34.4, I Bosnia Herzegovina April–August 92, Chairman's summary of the meeting of the CSCE Steering Group on the Yugoslav Crisis, 26/08/92.

³⁵⁹⁸ ABZ, 999.0 VN/Operaties/UNPROFOR/Joegoslavië/okt-dec 1992. 'Erklärung des österreichischen Vertreters im Konsultatiausschuss des Konfliktverhütungszentrums', 23/11/92.

³⁵⁹⁹ ABZ, 999.241/Joegoslavië/No Fly Zone/sept-dec 1992. PV New York to Foreign Affairs, 16/11/92, No. nyv/9360; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 79/92, 29/10/92.

³⁶⁰⁰ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 86/92, 16/11/92.

One of the main advocates of safe havens for Displaced Persons in the autumn of 1992 was the Polish special reporter on human rights for Yugoslavia, Tadeusz Mazowiecki. In a report he had prepared, which appeared on 16 November 1992, he named ethnic cleansing as the main cause of the serious violations of human rights occurring in Bosnia-Herzegovina, such as attacks on civilian targets, arrests, ill-treatment and torture, rape, mass deportation and arbitrary summary execution.³⁶⁰¹ Mazowiecki spoke out in favour of safe havens in his report to the Commission on Human Rights of the UN General Assembly and in the introduction he gave during a special meeting of the Commission held on 24 November that was devoted to discussion of the report. He went so far as to say that if the Commission did nothing to further the creation of the safe havens, the whole meeting would be 'pointless'.³⁶⁰²

The International Red Cross, that had spoken out against the establishment of safe regions as late as the end of July because this would attract more refugees and thus simply increase the number of Displaced Persons requiring help and protection, came out in favour of the creation of protected zones at the end of October when its chairman Cornelio Sommarugua spoke to a meeting of senior diplomats in Geneva. He considered the agreement of the three parties involved to be of crucial importance in this connection. The Austrian Foreign Minister Alois Mock quickly adopted his idea – but without the essential condition that the parties concerned should give their agreement – and submitted to the Security Council (of which Austria was still a temporary member) the concept of safe havens protected by a new contingent of UN troops in the former Yugoslavia with a special mandate for this purpose, UNPROFOR III. In particular the permanent members of the Council showed little enthusiasm for the idea in this form, however. They were afraid that a very large force would be required to monitor the zones and enforce their safety.³⁶⁰³ The argument that the international community would be supporting ethnic cleansing by creating safe regions was also repeated, while in addition some countries feared that such regions would lead to ghettoization as was known to have happened in the Palestinian refugee camps in the Gaza strip. Mock did manage, however, to gain the support of a number of non-aligned countries such as Morocco and Venezuela. By way of compromise, on 16 November the Security Council passed Resolution 787, which invited Boutros-Ghali and Ogata to study the scope and requirements for the establishment of Safe Areas.³⁶⁰⁴ The International Red Cross was also involved in this study.³⁶⁰⁵ On 25 November, a conference of Balkan states, convened at the invitation of Turkey, likewise expressed its support for the establishments of safe regions.³⁶⁰⁶

The mediators Owen and Vance had let it be known in the meantime that they were 'very strongly opposed' to the concept of Safe Areas, which according to Owen was suddenly the flavour of the day with all those who thought that 'something' should be done in Bosnia.³⁶⁰⁷ Owen and Vance also believed that establishing such Safe Areas would lead to further ethnic cleansing, and would encourage the Serbs to commit further acts of aggression:³⁶⁰⁸ the Bosnian Serbs would go on driving the Muslims into smaller and smaller enclaves, which UNPROFOR would then have to defend and administer.³⁶⁰⁹

³⁶⁰¹ UN, A/47/666; S/24809.

³⁶⁰² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00585. Biegan 1286 to Kooijmans, 24/11/92.

³⁶⁰³ See e.g. the reservations of the British government in this connection, ABZ, DDI-DAV/999.241/DAV/MS/Joegoslavië/NAVO/Coördinatie/No Fly Zone/Joegoslavië/Operation Deny Flight/Sept-Dec 1992. Van den Broek 093 to PR EC Brussels, 18/11/92.

³⁶⁰⁴ ABZ, 999.241/Joegoslavië/No Fly Zone/sept-dec 1992. PV New York to Foreign Affairs, 16/11/92, nyv/9360.

³⁶⁰⁵ The Austrian Foreign Minister again advocated Safe Areas to the chairman of the Security Council on 21 December 1992, ABZ, DDI-DAV/999.241/DAV/MS/Joegoslavië/NAVO/Coördinatie/No Fly Zone/Joegoslavië/Operation Deny Flight/Sept-Dec 1992. D'Ansembourg 1418 to Van den Broek, 22/12/92.

³⁶⁰⁶ UN, A47/742; S/24869; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 91/92, 27/11/92.

³⁶⁰⁷ Owen CD-ROM. Owen's Private Secretary to UK, EC Presidency, 26/11/92 re Visit of Lord Owen to Madrid, 25/11/92, 26/11/92.

³⁶⁰⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00585. Boddens Hosang 797 to Van den Broek, 27/11/92.

³⁶⁰⁹ Owen CD-ROM. Owen's Private Secretary to UK, EC Presidency, 26/11/92 re Visit of Lord Owen to Madrid, 25/11/92, 26/11/92.

The UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Sadako Ogata, also had serious reservations about the idea of Safe Areas. She therefore insisted that the question of these areas should be dealt with within the framework of the conference on Yugoslavia by the working group for humanitarian issues chaired by herself, and not by the working group on human rights. In this way Ogata, in her dual capacity as High Commissioner for Refugees and as chair of the working group on humanitarian issues, ensured that she would have a firm grasp on the formulation of the standpoint in Geneva about the establishment of Safe Areas. The working group she chaired proved to share the concerns of those who expected that the Safe Areas would give rise to great military and political problems, such as the tendency to attract even more refugees and the moral dilemma of cooperating with ethnic cleansing. Moreover, the Safe Areas would lead to an increase in the number of people that were dependent on humanitarian aid. However, the main concern felt by the Yugoslavia conference was the fear that once the Safe Areas were established, the parties to the conflict in Bosnia might be less strongly motivated to seek a political solution. The working group therefore adopted the standpoint that safety should be brought to the population, and not vice versa.³⁶¹⁰

At the beginning of December, the International Red Cross and the UNHCR still disagreed strongly about the desirability of safe zones. The former took the view that the most important thing was to mitigate the humanitarian plight of the population in the most effective way. The organization therefore appealed to the international community in late October, and again in early December, to establish safe havens, in view among other things of the reluctance of Western governments to offer a new home to refugees.³⁶¹¹ Ogata's UNHCR was afraid, however, that such action would help to consolidate the results of ethnic cleansing.³⁶¹² And Owen and Vance warned Sommaruga (the chairman of the International Red Cross) that if the Security Council did embrace his idea it was to be expected that the parties to the conflict would not agree with the establishment of the Safe Areas, and would not demilitarize them.³⁶¹³

'A false feeling of security'

The concept of Safe Areas was under discussion in the Netherlands too. In particular the MP Valk from the PvdA (Labour) had been advocating this for some time, but the (Christian Democrat) CDA fraction also thought it was not a bad idea while Green Left characterized it as an attractive option, comparable with the measures used to deal with the plight of the Kurds in Northern Iraq. Prof. J.J.C Voorhoeve (director of the Netherlands Institute of International Relations - generally known as the Clingendael Institute from its location in Clingendael Park in The Hague - and later Minister of Defence) and M. Van den Doel (staff member of the Clingendael Institute, on temporary secondment from the Army) had already put the idea forward in August 1992, in their contributions to the debate on the possibility of intervention in the former Yugoslavia (see Chapter 6). Apparently encouraged by Security Council resolution 787, Voorhoeve (sometimes in cooperation with Van den Doel) returned to this issue repeatedly in the media. For example, the day after the resolution had been passed he said that he was in favour of deploying fifty to a hundred thousand well armed troops to establish at least two Safe Areas in Bosnia and to achieve a few more aims such as freeing prisoners from the camps by means of a hit-and-run operation.³⁶¹⁴ A few days later, he and Van den Doel argued for the establishment of one large demilitarized zone in central Bosnia that could serve as a base for the ³⁶¹⁰ Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1403-1404.

³⁶¹¹ Owen, Odyssey, pp. 69-70; Ingrid Harms and Ursula den Tex, 'Kan de hulpverlening nog hulp verlenen?' (Can the aid organizations still supply aid?), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 25.

³⁶¹² Newland, Conflict, p. 101.

³⁶¹³ Owen, Odyssey, p. 70.

³⁶¹⁴ H. Goudriaan, 'Toekijken werkt als boemerang' (Observation has boomerang effect), Trouw, 17/11/92.

transport of supplies to towns and for housing refugees.³⁶¹⁵ According to Van den Doel, air strikes might force the Serbs to cooperate. During the operations, the UN peacekeeping forces in Bosnia would have to be concentrated to reduce the risk of hostage-taking and humanitarian aid would have to be temporarily suspended.³⁶¹⁶

These calls to action by Voorhoeve and Van den Doel elicited a furious response from De Kok (from the CDA fraction in Parliament). In May of the same year, he and Oostlander (also from the CDA) had advocated surgical military intervention with precision bombardments of Serb lines of supply and artillery emplacements, which in their view would have made sense at the time. Van den Doel had responded then, however, that intervention was impossible (see Chapter 5). And now that the situation had been made even more chaotic by the attempts by the Bosnian Muslims to provoke UN intervention and the three parties to the conflict were fighting one another with the aid of foreign mercenaries, Van den Doel's director Voorhoeve had suddenly (according to De Kok) become an advocate of military intervention. De Kok does not seem to have been aware of the numerous contributions to the debate made by both Voorhoeve and Van den Doel since July, in which they revealed themselves to be the warmest possible advocates of intervention. In any case, he decided to refrain from being a forerunner in the call for military intervention in the future:

‘Is it possible to win such an unconventional war? This is surely the first question a general – but above all also a politician – must ask himself. Which Western general is capable of drawing up a feasible plan for military intervention on the basis of this complicated situation? What should the aims of a Western intervention force be? Moreover, the risk that such intervention would ignite the whole Balkan powder-keg is greater now than it has ever been. And the resulting damage in humanitarian terms could well be even greater than it is now.’³⁶¹⁷

In De Kok's opinion, ‘giving a display of impotence is not part of a politician's job description’.³⁶¹⁸ Nevertheless, impotence was very largely the feeling reflected in many comments on the situation made in the Netherlands in the autumn of 1992, including those coming from other members of De Kok's own CDA fraction. This was due to the fact that the Dutch government actually agreed with the views on intervention aired in Parliament, though other governments did not. Maarten van Traa, a member of the PvdA fraction in Parliament, therefore suggested that the Dutch government, together with e.g. Germany and Belgium, should try to persuade France and England of the need for military intervention. Blaauw would also like to see Van den Broek take action on the international scene, to persuade the Netherlands' partners in the international community to force through the flight embargo, naval blockade, elimination of heavy weapons, liberation of the prisoners being held in camps and creation of safe havens in Bosnia itself to offer refuge to the Displaced Persons. Van Middelkoop presented similar views in a debate in Parliament, because if no action was taken ‘we won't know where to hide our faces when the winter has gone by ... we will smother in our feelings of guilt’. The D66 (Democrats) and GroenLinks (Green Left) fractions had reservations, however. Eisma (D66) thought that military intervention in pursuance of humanitarian aims was ‘politically not feasible: why try it, when you know it isn't going to work? You need to opt for the most effective ways and means. Our ³⁶¹⁵ J.J.C. Voorhoeve and M. van den Doel, ‘Zonder VS geen oplossing voor conflicten in ex-Joegoslavië’ (No resolution of conflicts in former Yugoslavia without US), NRC Handelsblad, 21/11/92.

³⁶¹⁶ Huib Goudriaan, ‘Schets voor ingrijpen met hoofdrol voor luchtmacht’ (Sketch for intervention with main role for air force), Trouw, 08/12/92.

³⁶¹⁷ T. de Kok, ‘Voormalig Joegoslavië. Militaire interventie is nu te laat’ (Former Yugoslavia. Military intervention is already too late), CD/Actueel, 12/12/92, p. 8.

³⁶¹⁸ ‘Westerse politici mede schuldig aan drama Bosnië’ (Western politicians bear the blame for the Bosnian drama), Utrechts Nieuwsblad, 19/11/92.

choice is limited objectives, for whose realization ample resources are available.’ Sipkes (Green Left) feared that military action on the ground in order to free the prisoners from the camps or to establish safe zones would cost more lives than it would save.³⁶¹⁹

The Dutch Chief of Defence Staff, General A.K. van der Vlis, was on the side of those who urged caution. Appearing in the TV programme Het Capitool on 22 November, he summed up the many arguments against the establishment of safe havens for Displaced Persons. This step would take the international community across the boundary between peacekeeping and peace enforcement, he claimed, since maintaining a safe haven means protecting people from one party against those from another party, if necessary by force. About a hundred thousand soldiers would be needed to ensure this. Effective logistic support would have to be arranged for them in a region where a guerrilla-type conflict was raging. Since a strong political will would be required to deal with such a complicated situation, leadership would have to come from the big countries. General Van der Vlis wondered whether such an operation would be possible without American participation. And finally, there was the moral objection that the establishment of safe havens could be seen as support for the Serb ethnic cleansing policy.³⁶²⁰ Arguments very similar to those presented by General Van der Vlis were also found repeatedly in analyses of the situation prepared by the Dutch military intelligence service MID.³⁶²¹

While Van den Broek had expressed some reservations about the idea of safe zones as late as August 1992 (see Chapter 6), the Dutch government argued during the EC summit held in Birmingham on 16 October 1992 that if the Serb prison camps in Bosnia were cleared up, the prisoners released should be cared for in the immediate vicinity of UNPROFOR concentrations.³⁶²² This solution was doubtless chosen for want of a better one, in view of the fact that the Western governments did not appear willing to absorb substantial numbers of ex-prisoners themselves. The Dutch proposal elicited no response at all from other EC member states, however.³⁶²³

A report issued shortly after that by the chairman of the International Red Cross, Sommaruga, showed the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs clearly just how big the problem was becoming: according to Red Cross estimates, there would soon be a hundred thousand Displaced Persons in Bosnia requiring aid. The Dutch ambassador-at-large C.R.J. Kröner stated during a meeting of the Comité Politique held mid-November that the only appropriate way of ensuring that these Displaced Persons did not present themselves on the doorsteps of potential European host nations was the establishment of safe havens – which would naturally require military protection. The only support he got was from the director-general for political affairs of the German Foreign ministry Chrobog, who said that the plight of the Bosnian Displaced Persons must be the ‘imperative humanitarian priority’ for the international community.³⁶²⁴ In fact, the Netherlands quite often found support for its far-reaching stance on the Yugoslav question from Germany; this had already appeared e.g. during the London conference. However, attempts by the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs to gain support from its counterpart in Bonn for its proposal to establish safe havens failed because the German ministry of Foreign Affairs felt unable to recommend peace enforcement while Germany was not contributing any troops itself.³⁶²⁵

³⁶¹⁹ Westerse politici mede schuldig aan drama Bosnië, Utrechts Nieuwsblad, 19/11/92.

³⁶²⁰ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Het Capitool, 22/11/92, 12 noon: ‘Stafchef waarschuwt voor ingrijpen Balkan’ (Chief of Defence Staff warns against intervention in Balkans), Trouw, 23/11/92; ‘Generaal huiverig voor veiligheidszones Bosnië’ (General unhappy about idea of Safe Areas in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 23/11/92; Van der Vlis: Pas op met veiligheidszones’ (General Van der Vlis says, ‘Take care with Safe Areas’), Defensiekrant, 26/11/92.

³⁶²¹ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 79/92, 29/10/92; 80/92, 02/11/92; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 87/92, 18/11/92; MID/CO. MID-CO, ‘Options in zet VN’ (Options for UN intervention), 30/11/92.

³⁶²² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 812 (22/10/92).

³⁶²³ ABZ, 910 Joegoslavië/algemeen correspondentie/deel 4, July 1992-Feb 1993. Zendbrief DEU-82852, 10/11/92

³⁶²⁴ ABZ, DDI-DAV/999.241/DAV/MS/Joegoslavië/NAVO/Coördinatie/No Fly Zone/Joegoslavië/Operation Deny Flight/Sept-Dec 1992. Van den Broek 093 to PV EC Brussels, 18/11/93.

³⁶²⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Smit 538 to Van den Broek, 04/12/92.

The Dutch Ministers of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek and Defence Ter Beek also made a plea for the establishment of safe havens during the WEU meeting in Rome on 20 November.³⁶²⁶ Earlier in the same month, the Secretary-General of the WEU, Van Eekelen, had also advocated the establishment of Safe Areas in Bosnia by analogy with the situation of the Kurds in Iraq.³⁶²⁷ In response to this, the WEU Council of Ministers invited the WEU Contingency Planning Group (CPG) to study the possibilities of Safe Areas. It was hoped that this study might provide a basis for UN decision-making in this field.

In the meantime, Harm Hazewinkel, the head of the Eastern Europe office of the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs, had also initiated a study of the scope for the establishment of safe havens in the wake of the passing of Resolution 787. He thought that it might be possible to establish these safe havens on the basis of negotiation and according to him they should not last longer than six months, and should be linked either to the coast or to Zagreb via a humanitarian corridor and an escape route. If it proved impossible to reach agreement in the negotiation process within a fortnight – the onset of winter was already imminent – UNPROFOR might set up the safe havens itself. This option would require expansion both of UNPROFOR's mandate and of the number of troops at its disposal. A third possibility was to make use of areas which were in the hands of the Bosnian Muslims or the Croats, to designate these as safe havens and to protect them by means of a UN peacekeeping force. Hazewinkel mentioned Mostar and Srebrenica as possible candidates. According to him, a display of force might provide an effective defence of these enclaves. If necessary, this could be backed up by the threat of Western air strikes in response to heavier offensives. Hazewinkel was well aware that such safe havens might attract an increasing number of refugees and also recognized the risk that they might reinforce the process of ethnic segregation in Bosnia-Herzegovina, but he claimed that there was no alternative. One could try to limit their scope by declaring them to be 'temporary emergency measures,' intended to help one hundred thousand Displaced Persons through the winter.³⁶²⁸

When it appeared that the French government was thinking about establishing a zone sûre in Bihac with German assistance, the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs considered that this might provide a precedent for it to realise its own ideas about safe zones. Working along the same lines as the Franco-German joint venture, the ministry's Directorate for International Organizations (DIO) entered into consultation with the British Overseas Development Administration about the possibilities of setting up a big winter camp in Vitez which would provide room for about twenty thousand Displaced Persons, 'under the smoke of the UNPROFOR units'.³⁶²⁹

The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs was however not without its doubts about the Franco-German approach. This appears from the report of a discussion Van Walsum had on 24 November with his French counterpart Dejammet about the interpretation of the concept of zones sûres. According to Dejammet, the French zone sûre was identical with the English 'Safe Area'. It was fundamentally different from a safe haven, which was supposed to be protected by a stationary military force with a special mandate from the Security Council. Zones sûres, on the other hand, were set up in the lee of an existing concentration of UNPROFOR II troops. Van Walsum asked Dejammet how safe such a zone sûre really was, since in the case of an attack on it the UNPROFOR troops in the vicinity would have neither the mandate nor the equipment to defend it effectively. Dejammet conceded this, but tried to reassure Van Walsum by stating that the relations between the various parties in the Balkans were all based on intimidation. He claimed that Karadzic would never dare to attack a zone sûre. Van Walsum

³⁶²⁶ Statement by Prime Minister Lubbers on TV, Nederland 3, Nova, 20/11/92, 11 pm.

³⁶²⁷ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 80/92, 02/11/92.

³⁶²⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Memorandum from head of DEU (drafted by head of DEU/OE) to DGPZ, 24/11/92, No. 286/92; underlined in original.

³⁶²⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Memorandum from head of DEU to DGPZ, 24/11/92, No. 286/92; memorandum from DIO/Joegoslavië to M, 27/11/92, No. 847/92; ABZ, 2001/00023, memorandum from DEU to AP and others., 16/11/92, No. 278/92; memorandum from DEU to AP and others, 18/11/92, No. 283/92; memorandum from wnd. DEU to AP and others, 30/11/92, No. 290/92.

was not so sure about this. According to him, the very meek and mild stance adopted by the international community so far had reduced the deterrent effect of its forces almost to zero. Dejammet had to agree that if the Bosnian Serb forces did attack and start carrying out ethnic cleansing, the UNPROFOR units would have no mandate to intervene. This led Van Walsum to advise Foreign Minister Van den Broek to be cautious about following the Franco-German example: 'In my opinion, we must not get involved in an operation that creates a false feeling of security.' Since the Dutch UNPROFOR troops were unarmed, The Hague would have to find out whether the British were prepared to defend such a zone 'beyond the rules of engagement of UNPROFOR II'. Van Walsum therefore advised the minister to keep on aiming for real safe havens.³⁶³⁰

It soon became clear that the British plans for safeguarding the population in the vicinity of Travnik, Vitez and Zenica were unlikely to give this region the status of a zone sûre. Unlike Bihac, the region was not an enclave. The British were therefore ultimately more in favour of protecting the population in Central Bosnia by means of patrols. As long as uncertainty remained about the extent of the protection offered by the British, the DIO was not in favour of British-Dutch cooperation on the zones sûres, especially because the planned joint British-Dutch mission assigned to investigate the possibilities of such an operation would have to drive from Sarajevo to central Bosnia through the Serb front lines. 'This involves great security risks', according to a memo from DIO's department of Legal and Social Affairs, 'to which officials of this department should not be exposed.'³⁶³¹ This was not an argument that Foreign Minister Van den Broek wished to consider, however.³⁶³²

The DIO agreed with Van Walsum, moreover, that one drawback of the zones sûres was the lack of any real guarantee that the Displaced Persons seeking refuge there would not be subjected to external aggression. If one wished to avoid both this unsafe situation and a mass exodus of refugees from Bosnia, then according to the DIO the only solution was to establish safe havens, special zones under solid military protection. As the DIO put it, 'Safe havens are inevitable in this situation, and we would do well to make the necessary preparations for them as soon as possible.' The DIO was fully aware that the establishment of safe havens would lead to a need for peace enforcement, as would the humanitarian corridors required to maintain supplies to the safe havens. It concluded that both UNPROFOR's mandate and the number of troops at its disposal would have to be enlarged to meet these needs.³⁶³³ The very same day on which Van Walsum advised Van den Broek to aim at the establishment of real safe havens, 24 November, The Hague sent a COREU message advocating such 'genuine "safe havens", protected by UNPROFOR forces, mandated by a new Security Council resolution and equipped accordingly'. The Hague proposed that these questions should be discussed not only under the aegis of the EC, but also in the UN, NATO and WEU.³⁶³⁴

Two days later, on 26 November, the Netherlands made a plea in favour of safe havens in the EPC's ad hoc group on Yugoslavia.³⁶³⁵ It was stated in this connection that '[th]e choice was between offering a very large number of refugees the hospitality of our own country or ensuring that adequate facilities were in place to take care of them in Bosnia.' However, after the British diplomat Greenstock, speaking on behalf of his country which was currently chairing the EC, argued that the establishment of safe havens would lead to 'all out military intervention', the representatives of the other EC countries were very reserved in their response to the Dutch proposal. It was nevertheless decided to keep the matter under discussion.³⁶³⁶ The American government was not enthusiastic about safe havens or anything of that ilk either, arguing that they would support ethnic cleansing and that they would make

³⁶³⁰ PVNY. Memorandum from DGPZ to Van den Broek, 24/11/92, No. 184/92, Appendix to DGPZ to PR New York, personal, 24/11/92.

³⁶³¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Memorandum from DIO/Joegoslavië to Van den Broek, 03/12/92, No. 857/92.

³⁶³² ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Memorandum from Van Walsum to DAV, 07/12/92, No. 194/92.

³⁶³³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Memorandum from DIO/Joegoslavië to M, 25/11/92, No. 842/1992.

³⁶³⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00755. COREU message from The Hague, 24/11/92, cpe/hag 735.

³⁶³⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. COREU message from EPC secretariat, 27/11/92, cpe/sec 1120.

³⁶³⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00755. Van den Broek to London embassy, 27/11/92, celer 179.

the Bosnian Muslims completely dependent on the international community.³⁶³⁷ When the Russian Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Churkin visited The Hague at the end of November, however, Van Walsum managed to get him to promise that the Russian government would support a Security Council resolution giving UNPROFOR a mandate for the establishment of safe havens. Churkin stated that the Russians would be prepared to cooperate in the light of the humanitarian emergency in Bosnia.³⁶³⁸ However, the Western permanent members of the Security Council remained opposed to the establishments of safe havens because of the risks of contributing to ethnic cleansing and of ghettoization, the need to increase the scale of military involvement and the switch from peacekeeping to peace enforcement.³⁶³⁹

Van den Broek had apparently – despite the public words of warning uttered by the Dutch Chief of Defence Staff – got his teeth into the idea of safe regions as the new panacea for the problems in Bosnia, and was not prepared to let go. The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs was disappointed that, despite Dutch support, the Commission on Human Rights of the UN Economic and Social Council was not prepared to include the idea of safe regions in a draft resolution after discussion of the Mazowiecki report. Van den Broek ordered the Dutch Permanent Representative to the UN in Geneva, J.F. Boddens Hosang, to do all in his power to push through acceptance of this idea.³⁶⁴⁰ Boddens Hosang initially had little success with this initiative. UNPROFOR and the troop-contributing nations for the operations in the Balkans could not see where the extra troops needed to protect the Safe Areas would come from. Hence, the Netherlands failed to find support for practically every suggestion in this direction, even from the representatives of Austria which was generally regarded as ‘the father of the safe-area idea’.³⁶⁴¹

Boddens Hosang therefore turned to The Hague for further instructions. Should he remain out of step with all Western countries and the co-chairmen of the Yugoslavia conference? Or should he, in pursuance of the aim to get the Safe Areas included in the resolution, join forces with a number of Islamic countries under the leadership of Bosnia, Bangladesh, Iran, Jemen, Jordan, Pakistan and Tunisia? Boddens Hosang suggested that the latter position would show the world ‘very clearly’ that the Dutch view of Safe Areas differed from – and was more positive than – that of the other Western countries.³⁶⁴² During the weekend of 28 and 29 November Turkey and the United States, who had shared the initiative to call the meeting, finally decided after urging from the Bosnian government among others that a passage about the need for relief corridors, Safe Areas and security zones should be included in the resolution. The Netherlands was the first of the EC member states to co-sponsor the new draft text put forward by Turkey and the USA.³⁶⁴³ The Turkish-American draft resolution was finally passed with 45 votes in favour. Only Little Yugoslavia voted against, while Cuba abstained. Boddens Hosang was full of praise for ‘the unexpected change of course’ by the USA, ‘which we warmly welcomed’, and no less for the performance of his own country: ‘The Dutch intervention gave clear expression to our country’s stance, fully in line with the overall voting picture and contrasting sharply with the flat, uninspiring attitude manifested by the rest of the Twelve.’³⁶⁴⁴ The Commission on Human Rights also passed a resolution making states responsible for human rights violations committed by their citizens. It urged that persons who could be held responsible for crimes against humanity and serious human rights violations should be brought to trial. The Commission gave the Serbs the main responsibility for the conflict in Bosnia and put up the question in the resolution

³⁶³⁷ ABZ, 910 Joegoslavië/algemeen correspondentie/deel 4, July 1992-Feb 1993. Meesman 990 to Van den Broek, 24/11/92.

³⁶³⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Van den Broek to PR New York, 27/11/92, celer 438.

³⁶³⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Biegman 1323 to Van den Broek, 30/11/92.

³⁶⁴⁰ ABZ, DEU/2000/00585. Van den Broek 281 to PR Geneva, 26/11/92.

³⁶⁴¹ ABZ, DEU/2000/00585. Boddens Hosang 797 to Van den Broek, 27/11/92.

³⁶⁴² ABZ, DEU/2000/00585. Boddens Hosang 799 to Van den Broek, 28/11/92.

³⁶⁴³ ABZ, DEU/2000/00585. Boddens Hosang 806 to Van den Broek, 01/12/92.

³⁶⁴⁴ ABZ, DEU/2000/00585. Boddens Hosang 812 to Van den Broek, 03/12/92.

whether genocide had been committed in this region. On 18 December, the General Assembly of the UN went on to brand ethnic cleansing as genocide in resolution 47/121, and requested Boutros-Ghali to set up a tribunal for war crimes committed in Yugoslavia.

In the meantime, the WEU Central Planning Group had made a distinction between three types of safe regions:

- Safe havens, i.e. demilitarized zones 25 kilometres in circumference, in which the population could be protected against both internal and external violence and intimidation. This variant would require 100 to 300,000 troops, air support and a preparation time of about four months.
- Safe Areas: regions, which should preferably be substantially free of conflict beforehand, where refugees could be offered ‘a reasonable degree of security’ by a brigade of peacekeeping troops; and
- Relief zones: regions containing an existing UN battalion, which would only come into action in response to external violence aimed at the civilian population to be protected. In this variant, the UNPROFOR troops could not expect air support. The limited expansion of UNPROFOR II forces required for this variant could be achieved on the ground in about a month.³⁶⁴⁵

On 3 December, the WEU ad hoc group on political and military affairs in the former Yugoslavia rejected the safe haven option as unrealistic.³⁶⁴⁶

This decision worried Van Walsum, who was deeply concerned about the outcome of any scenario not involving safe havens. In his view, the West was still in the ‘appeasement’ phase in its dealings with Milosevic and Mladic, whom he saw as implacably continuing ‘their march towards a Greater Serbia’. As long as the West was not prepared ‘to cross the Rubicon between the “appeasement” phase and the “enforcement” phase’, Van Walsum claimed, ‘we are playing with fire in our experiments with half-hearted security zones’. Van Walsum was deeply troubled by the whole situation, since the WEU studies were seen as the result of a Dutch request while the two remaining options which the WEU intended to subject to further study were ‘so risky’ that Van Walsum wondered whether the Netherlands could ‘take the responsibility for them’.³⁶⁴⁷

Van Walsum started by discussing the matter with his British counterpart Appleyard, since the idea of a British-Dutch Safe Area in the region around Vitez was still under consideration. Appleyard told Van Walsum that it was not possible at that moment to get a guarantee from the British ministry of Defence that British UNPROFOR units would defend a Safe Area. On the other hand, Appleyard stated that he could not imagine that the British would fail to defend a Safe Area if the need arose. Van den Broek shared this conviction, and therefore wished the possibility of cooperation with the British to be subjected to ‘intensive’ further study.³⁶⁴⁸ The fact that Van Walsum had stood completely alone at the meeting of the Comité Politique on 2 December with his ideas on new steps in Bosnia did not seem to discourage Van den Broek at all. He is reported to have spread the message in the corridors of Parliament at this time: ‘We’ll just try, try, try again and you’ll see, we’ll get there one day’.³⁶⁴⁹

The Directorate for General Policy of the Dutch ministry of Defence (Dutch abbreviation DAB) and General A.K. van der Vlis, Chief of the Dutch Defence Staff, drew up a sort of interim balance sheet of the situation in the former Yugoslavia in a memorandum dated 8 December 1992, to provide background information for Dutch representatives at a number of international meetings

³⁶⁴⁵ NIOD, Ter Beek Collection, ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’ (Memorandum about possible expansion of military operations in former Yugoslavia), appendix to memo Barth to Ter Beek et al., 08/12/92, D92/555; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00585. Memorandum from Van Walsum to DAV, 07/12/92, No. 192/92; Wio Joustra, ‘WEU acht spoed met safe havens ondoenlijk’ (WIO thinks it is impossible to set up safe havens quickly), de Volkskrant, 09/12/92.

³⁶⁴⁶ NIOD, Ter Beek Collection, ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, appendix to memo Barth to Ter Beek et al., 08/12/92, D92/555.

³⁶⁴⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00585. Memorandum from Van Walsum to DAV, 07/12/92, No. 192/92.

³⁶⁴⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00585. Memorandum from Van Walsum to DAV, 07/12/92, No. 194/92.

³⁶⁴⁹ Rob Meines, ‘Den Haag zoekt steun voor ingreep in Bosnië’ (The Hague seeks support for intervention in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 04/12/92.

planned for the coming days. In the first instance, it was intended as briefing material for Prime Minister Lubbers and Minister of Foreign Affairs Van den Broek, who would be attending the EC Council of Ministers meeting in Edinburgh on 11 and 12 December.³⁶⁵⁰ According to the authors of this memorandum, the situation in the whole region was ‘dramatically bad’ and unstable.³⁶⁵¹ In Croatia, President Tudjman was threatening not to renew the mandate of UNPROFOR, which was due to expire in March. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, there was the risk of ‘a human tragedy of enormous extent’: according to UNHCR, hundreds of thousands of people could perish during the coming months due to ethnic cleansing, military conflict and the winter. In the meantime, US President Bush, who had been defeated by Clinton in the presidential elections and was in charge of a caretaker government in the period leading up to Clinton’s inauguration, had decided to contribute twenty to thirty thousand US troops to the UN force in Somalia. This was a deliberate choice on the part of the American administration, who believed that action in Somalia posed fewer risks to American military personnel than in the former Yugoslavia.³⁶⁵² According to the Directorate for General Policy and General Van der Vlis, this increased the pressure on the European states to do something in the former Yugoslavia. European intervention was also necessary to prevent Islamic countries from offering Bosnia-Herzegovina military support.

The authors of the memorandum did not regard peace enforcement as a feasible option, in view of the large number of troops it required and the lack of international consensus on the political objectives. They also thought that the scope of the operations involved in the Safe Areas option according to the WEU proposal led to a high risk of escalation of the conflict if this option was pursued. They therefore concluded that the Dutch government should think provisionally in terms of the use of ‘relief zones’, which could be set up quickly and with the aid of limited resources, before the winter started to take its toll. However, even relief zones, ‘by far the most realistic option’, would confront the decision-makers with difficult questions such as whether the international community would be able to provide the protection in the long term, what action should be taken in response to bombardment with heavy weapons and whether a relief zone should be completely demilitarized.

If the international community were to opt for the Safe Areas variant, the Royal Netherlands Army could do little more than supply supporting units as long as the Airmobile Brigade was not yet operational. An armoured infantry unit could not be sent, in view of the voluntary basis on which Dutch soldiers doing their National Service were deployed, and the marines were not available because they were already in Cambodia. The Dutch Air Force could supply a fighter squadron, and guided missiles if required, for air support of Safe Areas. As mentioned above, the WEU did indeed opt for the Safe Areas variant on 15 December.³⁶⁵³

The Directorate for General Policy and General Van der Vlis felt that there were serious objections to the idea of enforcing a no-fly zone – a plan which received strong support in particular from the American government.³⁶⁵⁴ This would lead to peace enforcement, and could have consequences for the UN personnel on the ground. Nevertheless, particularly in view of the ³⁶⁵⁰ BSG. Besluitenlijsten politiek beraad (List of decisions taken during political consultation of Dutch Parliament) 1992-1993, besluitenlijst (list of decisions), 07/12/92.

³⁶⁵¹ NIOD, Ter Beek Collection. ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, appendix to memo Barth to Ter Beek et al., 08/12/92, D92/555.

³⁶⁵² A. Elshout, ‘VS tonen zich kieskeurige supermogenheid’ (US proves to be selective superpower), Het Parool, 03/12/92; M. Huygen, ‘Geen Amerikaan waagt het ingrijpen Somalië te hekelen’ (No American dares to criticize intervention in Somalia), NRC Handelsblad, 09/12/92; Tom Kuijt, ‘Amerikanen meten met twee maten’ (Americans apply double standards), Het Parool, 09/12/92; Paul Brill, ‘Een alibi om in Bosnië niets te doen’ (An alibi for inaction in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 05/12/92; Patrick Glynn, ‘Why Africa? Anywhere but Bosnia’, The New Republic, 28/1/92; Tim Zimmermann, ‘The Crisis that’s too tough to tackle. Saving Somalia is easier than stopping Serbia’, U.S. News & World Report, 21/12/92; Strobel, Policy, pp. 138-139.

³⁶⁵³ NIOD, Ter Beek Collection. ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, appendix to memo Barth to Ter Beek et al., 08/12/92, D92/555.

³⁶⁵⁴ See e.g. ‘UN chiefs urge no intervention in Bosnia’, Press Association Newsfile, 16/12/92.

psychological threat emanating from jet fighters, the Netherlands could make an F-16 squadron available.³⁶⁵⁵

Officials from Foreign Affairs made a number of critical comments on some of the ideas contained in this White Paper on Defence.³⁶⁵⁶ Relief zones were considered to be escalation-sensitive; only real safe havens would not be subject to this risk. Foreign Affairs did not think that the presence of international jet fighters would have much of a deterrent effect if the Serbs got to know their rules of engagement. Enforcement of the no-fly zone would have to be coupled with either air-lifts of the necessary supplies or better armouring for the convoys on the ground.

On the same day that the Directorate for General Policy and the Chief of Defence Staff presented their memorandum to Minister of Defence Ter Beek, the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs Van Eenennaam also submitted a new policy review to Foreign Minister Van den Broek.³⁶⁵⁷ The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs was in favour of giving the Serbs a strong signal – somewhere in between the current situation and large-scale military intervention. Van Eenennaam pointed out once again that a proposal to deal with the Serb heavy weapons had been made several months before. According to that proposal, if these heavy weapons had not been concentrated at a specified location by a specified date, they would be taken out by air strikes. This would reduce the level of violence. Seen from this point of view, a no-fly zone was the ‘next best’ option. Van Eenennaam noted further that while the Netherlands was a front-runner in the efforts to boost Western effectiveness in Bosnia, its words were not very credible as long as the Dutch ministry of Defence could only offer to supply a few F16s. If the Netherlands really wanted to play a credible spearhead role, there were three options open to it according to Van Eenennaam: annulling the voluntary basis for the deployment of National Service troops, formation of an armoured infantry battalion in the short term or withdrawing the marines from Cambodia so that they could be deployed in the former Yugoslavia. The best option at the moment would seem to be for the Dutch Air Force to contribute to enforcement of the no-fly zone and for a start to be made with the creation of relief zones. Van Eenennaam thought that Van den Broek should put pressure on Defence Minister Ter Beek to make a contribution to this last-mentioned effort.³⁶⁵⁸

Subsequent interdepartmental consultation showed officials from Foreign Affairs clearly that the only option considered really safe by Van Walsum, that of the safe haven, was seen as unrealistic by their colleagues from Defence because of the lack of political will at an international level, because it would be impossible to put together a military force of the required size and because even if this did prove possible the troops would take too long to deploy. It was decided that it would be best to employ a step-by-step approach, starting with relief zones and making use of the UNPROFOR II battalions already present. While Van Walsum was not at all happy with the step-by-step approach, Van Eenennaam had in fact already betted on relief zones even before the start of the interdepartmental consultation. Another point revealed during this consultation, in response to questions from Foreign Affairs, was that the ministry of Defence would be unable to supply an operational unit (e.g. an armoured infantry battalion) in the short term. The head of the Directorate for Political UN Affairs J.T. (Jan) Hoekema commented that there was ‘a real problem (...)’ here, ‘if we are unable to deploy more forces in Yugoslavia to meet internationally agreed commitments’.³⁶⁵⁹

While officials at Foreign Affairs and Defence were subjecting the possibilities of establishing some form of safe regions to a joint review, UK Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd wrote a letter to Van ³⁶⁵⁵ NIOD, Ter Beek Collection. ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, appendix to memo Barth to Ter Beek et al., 08/12/92, D92/555.

³⁶⁵⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Copy of ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, 08/12/92, provided with marginal comments.

³⁶⁵⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Memo from head DAV to minister, 08/12/92, No. 92/1590.

³⁶⁵⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Copy of ‘Notitie over mogelijke uitbreiding van militaire operaties in voormalig Joegoslavië’, 08/12/92, provided with marginal comments.

³⁶⁵⁹ ABZ, DDI-DOA, 00463. Memorandum from head DPV to Van Walsum, 10/12/92, No. DPV-2225/92.

den Broek to inform him that the British government had decided against a joint British-Dutch Safe Area. Hurd mentioned the facts that the proposed Safe Area would in his opinion need a new UN mandate, and would also require a larger military force, as reasons for the decision. Moreover, the creation of a Safe Area could put UN neutrality at risk. According to Hurd, the presence of UNPROFOR II alone would be enough to make an area safe without the need for special measures. In fact, the region in central Bosnia where British and Dutch troops were currently operating had already become a 'relief area'.³⁶⁶⁰

While the British government thus rejected the idea of a British-Dutch Safe Area, the WEU ad hoc group on political and military affairs in the former Yugoslavia gave the WEU Central Planning Group a mandate a few days later, on 15 December, to study the scope for Safe Areas at locations where UNPROFOR troops were already present. Italy, then chairing the WEU, would also contact the UN concerning this matter.³⁶⁶¹ The WEU concentrated its study mainly on the idea of a Safe Area in or near Sarajevo. This was considered to need about 15,000 extra military personnel.³⁶⁶² On 18 December, the EPC ad hoc group on Yugoslavia also unanimously confirmed the need for 'the creation of Safe Areas (not safe havens)'.³⁶⁶³ On 1 February 1993, the WEU submitted a report on the possibility of a Sarajevo Safe Area to Boutros-Ghali, who forwarded it to UNPROFOR Force Commander Nambiar for advice.³⁶⁶⁴

In the meantime, on 17 December 1992, Sadako Ogata had sent Boutros-Ghali the UNHCR standpoint on Safe Areas, as requested in resolution 787. According to her, Safe Areas should only be created as a last resort. It would be much better to try to create a secure climate for all minority groups throughout Bosnia-Herzegovina. It should be borne in mind that the parties to the conflict were either opposed to Safe Areas or wanted to use them to realize their own military objectives. Not only did the creation of Safe Areas consolidate lines of confrontation; at the same time, the various parties to the conflict would probably resist this process so that attacks both on and from the enclaves could not be excluded. The establishment of such Safe Areas would force UN troops into a peace-enforcement role, and could limit the freedom of movement of people in these areas and possibly also their right to asylum. Ogata wrote that the UNHCR standpoint had been arrived at after consultation with the International Red Cross, which had in the meantime set its sights lower as regards Safe Areas.³⁶⁶⁵ The meeting of the Follow-Up Committee of the Conference on the former Yugoslavia the day before had shown little sign of the latter, however. At this meeting, the International Red Cross had supported a solution in which towns where an ethnic minority was still present, such as Mostar or Zenica, would be declared Safe Areas. UN troops would be stationed there, and these towns would also offer shelter to people who had had to flee their homes and who had been unable to find refuge anywhere else. These Safe Areas should only be regarded as an emergency measure. The International Red Cross explicitly excluded the possibility that towns that were under siege could be declared Safe Areas. Other solutions (such as a ceasefire) would have to be found there.³⁶⁶⁶ At the same meeting, Cyrus Vance repeated his warning against the establishment of Safe Areas. He pointed out the confusion that had arisen between terms like safe havens and security zones. He and Owen still feared that Safe Areas would only contribute to the process of ethnic cleansing. Vance claimed that the best safe haven was a general

³⁶⁶⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Message from the Foreign Secretary to Mr Van den Broek, appendix to R.P. Flower to De Gooijer, 10/12/92.

³⁶⁶¹ Van Eekelen, Security, p. 161; ABZ, 999.241. Embassy London to Van den Broek, fax No. 1023. WEU-restricted, 16/12/92.

³⁶⁶² Van Eekelen, Security, p. 161.

³⁶⁶³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00755. Van den Broek, 21/12/92, celer circ 849.

³⁶⁶⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Italian chair of WEU to all WEU embassies, 03/12/92, weu/rom 404; Italian chair of WEU to all WEU members, 14/01/93, weu/rom 14; Italian chair of WEU to all WEU members, 11/02/94, weu/rom 24. See also DCBC, 2691. 'Safe Areas. Minutes of the meetings regarding study of Safe Areas for humanitarian purposes'.

³⁶⁶⁵ UNHCR, Fund 19, Sub-fund 6, File: Safe Areas, Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 17/12/92; Mercier, Crimes, pp. 211-213.

³⁶⁶⁶ Mercier, Crimes, pp. 125-126 and 209-210; Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 231-232.

ceasefire.³⁶⁶⁷ Three days later, on 19 December, Vance again rejected the idea of Safe Areas in a speech to the Security Council because, he said, they meant cooperation with ethnic cleansing.³⁶⁶⁸

3. A month of meetings

Foreign Minister Van den Broek continued to adopt the active stance in the international arena also required of him by the Dutch Parliament not only with regard to Safe Areas but also more generally. During the meeting of the WEU Council of Ministers on 20 November in Rome, Van den Broek responded at length to a remark by the British Secretary of State Hamilton that the international community was doing more in Bosnia than some participants at the meeting seemed to be suggesting. Van den Broek appeared to take this remark personally, and said that he had never suggested this and in fact never could have suggested it as the representative of a country like the Netherlands that has made a (very) substantial contribution right from the start and at present has more than 1000 troops in the region, but that in the light of the massive human tragedy unfolding there, 'action should prevail rather than satisfaction'. We can all be grateful for all contributions made, but it is our duty to point out what still has to be done.

Van den Broek went on to say that at a given point the use of force might help to attain peacemaking objectives. His argument was supported by his Turkish and Portuguese counterparts.³⁶⁶⁹ It was clear that the moment when he would be prepared to countenance the use of force was no longer far off.

The month of December was full of meetings at international level where the topic of the former Yugoslavia was discussed. The Defence Planning Committee, the half-yearly meeting of the Ministers of Defence and the Chiefs of Defence Staff of the NATO member states, was planned for 10 and 11 December in Brussels, followed by the meeting of the EC Council of Ministers in Edinburgh on 11 and 12 December, the meeting of the CSCE Council of Ministers in Stockholm on 14 and 15 December, the WEU ad hoc group on the former Yugoslavia on 15 December, a ministerial conference on Yugoslavia in Geneva on 16 December as a follow-up to the conference on Yugoslavia held in London in August and the half-yearly meeting of the NATO Council of Ministers in Brussels on 17 December. This plethora of meetings offered the Dutch government an opportunity to try to get some momentum again into the Yugoslavia dossier.

First of all, however, the Organisation of Islamic States met on 1 December, with the position of Muslims in Bosnia-Herzegovina as the main item on the agenda. There was great dissatisfaction within the Organisation about the Security Council's rejection in mid-November of their request for lifting of the arms embargo on Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Organisation passed a resolution repeating its demand for this embargo to be lifted and requesting that the UN should take military action against the Serbs, the concrete effects of which should start to be noticeable by 15 January 1993. In the absence of such action, the Organisation would take its own steps.³⁶⁷⁰ The Organisation of Islamic States, founded in 1971, was not considered however to be of much practical significance: its main value was as a platform for the expression of Muslim views. The only direct consequence of the above-mentioned resolution was that the UN General Assembly asked the Security Council on 18 December to lift the arms embargo on Bosnia-Herzegovina. The MID correctly characterized the position of the Organisation of Islamic States and the Arab League as follows some six months later:

³⁶⁶⁷ Ramcharan, Conference, p. 213.

³⁶⁶⁸ Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 150.

³⁶⁶⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. Hoekman 635 to Foreign Affairs, 23/11/92.

³⁶⁷⁰ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, deel V-VI (Yugoslavia. Political relationships and parties, part V-VI), May 1992–April 1993; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 88/92, 20/11/92 and 93/92, 04/12/92.

‘Despite all the verbal support for the Bosnian Muslims, there is hardly any sign of independent military action by Islamic states (i.e. action not sanctioned by the Security Council) in favour of the Bosnian Muslims. On the other hand, these states will doubtless do their best to extract political and propagandistic advantage out of what they see as the lack of effective action by the West.’³⁶⁷¹

In the meantime, the attacks on Sarajevo actually intensified,³⁶⁷² which led the UN Commander for Sarajevo, the Egyptian Brigadier General Hussein Ali Abel Razek, to harden his stance. He commented openly in early December that the UN operation so far had been a failure. According to him, Western military intervention was the only way to protect the Muslims against Serb aggression.³⁶⁷³ Phillippe Morillon, Commander of the UN Forces in Bosnia, who had been opposed to military action against the VRS up to this time, seems to have changed his mind after the attacks on Sarajevo.³⁶⁷⁴ The French Chief of Defence Staff J. Lanxade supported Morillon’s standpoint after a visit to Bosnia. Lanxade characterized UNPROFOR’s mandate as practically inoperable, the command structures as malfunctioning and the discipline of some national contingents as below par, and concluded: ‘ou on emploie la force ou on se retire’ (either we use force, or we withdraw).³⁶⁷⁵

Dutch opinions

In the meantime, there was great disappointment in Dutch political circles about the stance of the British government (which had succeeded the Netherlands as chair of the EC) concerning the Yugoslav question. In an internal memo of the PvdA fraction in Parliament written in mid-November, Maarten Van Traa urged that Yugoslavia should be returned to the top of the Twelve’s agenda after the British chairmanship had expired. According to him, the international community’s lack of willingness to do anything about this issue was starting to assume ‘criminal traits.’³⁶⁷⁶ He thought that the Dutch government should use ‘undiplomatic means’, possibly in cooperation with the Belgian and German governments, in order to put an end to the ‘sit-on-the-fence’ attitude of France and the UK. Prime Minister Lubbers and Van den Broek might, for example, be able to achieve this by appearing on French and British TV.³⁶⁷⁷ During the debate on the budget for Foreign Affairs at the end of November in Parliament, the mood of the MPs about the former Yugoslavia was ‘practically uncontrollable’, according to Van Walsum.³⁶⁷⁸ On the other hand, the top figures in Foreign Affairs were not too unhappy about this trend since, as Van Walsum commented in retrospect, the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs, under the leadership of Van den Broek, had to fight very hard against the ³⁶⁷¹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, deel VII, May 1993-March 1994; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 43/93, 29/06/93; cf. 56/93, 16/09/93. Cf. Calic, Krieg, p. 227. For previous involvement of this Organisation with the conflict in Bosnia see Moore, ‘Aspects’, p. 41; interview W. Claes, 12/03/01.

³⁶⁷² See e.g. ‘Serviërs beginnen offensief in diverse delen van Bosnië’ (Serbs start offensive in various parts of Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 02/12/92.

³⁶⁷³ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 189; “‘Vredesmissie van VN in Bosnië is mislukt’” (UN peace mission in Bosnia fails), de Volkskrant, 07/12/92.

³⁶⁷⁴ JF, ‘Croatian leader urges western action against Serbs’, New York Times News Service, 12/12/92, 1821EST.

³⁶⁷⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Wijnaendts 486 to Van den Broek, 10/12/92; Marie-Claude Smouts, ‘Political aspects of peace-keeping operations’, in Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 20.

³⁶⁷⁶ NIOD, PvdA Collection. Memo Maarten van Traa to PvdA committee on Foreign Affairs re committee meetings 19/11/92, 16/11/92, No. BUZA/029.92.

³⁶⁷⁷ NIOD, PvdA Collection. Memo Maarten van Traa to members of PvdA fraction, for purposes of policy discussions within the fraction 24/11/92, 20/11/92, No. F/111.

³⁶⁷⁸ Interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00. Cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III (Starting point III), deposition by A.P. van Walsum, 22/05/00, p. 11. See also ‘Machteloos Nederland wil van alles in Joegoslavië’ (Impotent Holland has wide range of wishes in Yugoslavia), Trouw, 26/11/92; ‘Nederland staat nog alleen met plan voor Bosnië’ (Holland stands alone with plan for Bosnia) and Rob Meines, ‘Den Haag zoekt steun voor ingreep in Bosnië’ (The Hague seeks support for intervention in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 04/12/92.

Dutch ministry of Defence – and in fact against just about all other European ministries of Defence – to gain any understanding of the need for military intervention.³⁶⁷⁹

After the relaxed mood that held sway in September and October 1992, a few voices were once again raised in the printed media in favour of intervention. Two elements played a role here: firstly, reports of the continuing humanitarian need of the population of Bosnia against the background of the problems faced by aid convoys in getting to their destinations³⁶⁸⁰ and secondly, the worries the international community was starting to feel about the possible spread of the conflict to Kosovo and Macedonia. The latter topic will be dealt with in greater detail in Chapter 9. It will only be discussed here insofar as this threat provided new fuel for the debate about intervention.

The main mood reflected in the printed media was outrage at the lethargy shown by the EC, NATO and UN in taking further steps against Serbia, while people in Bosnia were starving to death and being subjected to murderous attacks and torture. After the UN Security Council had voted in favour of tighter sanctions on 16 November, for example, a leader in NRC Handelsblad commented, ‘Maybe now we will see some, albeit slow, change. Of course, this all comes too late for the thousands who have already suffered death and maltreatment and for the countless victims who have been terrorized into leaving their homes and losing all their possessions. Nothing can be done to change that situation.’³⁶⁸¹ The main voice raised in the NRC Handelsblad against Western inaction was that of the columnist H.J.A. Hofland. In one article entitled ‘Grenzen aan het gedogen’ (The limits of tolerance) he wrote, for example,

‘The question arises again and again what Western political civilization thinks it can allow itself to permit, what must be vigorously rejected in theory while it can be tolerated in practice – even when the proofs of wide-scale criminality are delivered to our homes daily by the media.’³⁶⁸²

He called the toleration of the ‘incredible crimes’ that had been committed in the former Yugoslavia during the past year and a half, not only by politicians but also by intellectuals and artists,

‘The bankruptcy of Europe. While its consequences may be less severe than those of the Depression of the ‘thirties (though that remains to be seen), its content is actually even more depressing – if only because European pretensions have become so much grander in the intervening period. This bankruptcy is perhaps reflected most clearly by the feeling of futility, the vague suspicion that it is starting to get pathetic, even somewhat ridiculous, every time one prepares to write yet another of the long series of comments on Yugoslavia.’³⁶⁸³

He knew the arguments against military intervention, but ‘How long can we allow ourselves to keep on hesitating?’ The international community had showed its good intentions by increasing the severity of the blockade one year after it had first been instituted.

‘Would it not be wise, humane and in accord with European political civilization if even more of these ‘intentions’ were formulated? ... Who knows, ³⁶⁷⁹ Interview A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00.

³⁶⁸⁰ Cf. Anet Bleich, ‘Safe havens in Bosnië: een zinnig voorstel’ (Safe havens in Bosnia: a sensible suggestion), de Volkskrant, 24/11/92.

³⁶⁸¹ ‘Kalmpjes aan’ (More haste, less speed), NRC Handelsblad, 18/11/92.

³⁶⁸² H.J.A. Hofland, ‘Grenzen aan het gedogen’ (The limits of tolerance), NRC Handelsblad, 02/12/92.

³⁶⁸³ H.J.A. Hofland, ‘Grenzen aan het gedogen’, NRC Handelsblad, 02/12/92.

that might even lead to European honour being saved before the last house in Sarajevo is shot to rubble.³⁶⁸⁴

If even television viewers could see where the Serb gun emplacements round Sarajevo were located, it should not be beyond the ability of the Western military forces to put them out of action, Hofland argued.³⁶⁸⁵ He started to feel a bit more hopeful when in December Western awareness began to grow of a possible conflict in Kosovo that could form the seed of a Balkan war. This would make intervention in the former Yugoslavia not just a humanitarian action but a form of national self-interest. According to Hofland, the West was 'now in the first phase of self-defence'.³⁶⁸⁶ And that had the advantage that since the countries of Western Europe, according to the columnist, were unable either to undertake any significant intervention or even to defend themselves, the American government would have to step in.³⁶⁸⁷

André Roelofs similarly commented in De Volkskrant that the lack of military action by Western countries was due to the idea that the situation in the former Yugoslavia did not affect any of their essential interests. According to him, however, peace, security, stability and human rights in Europe were indivisible. In his view, intervention was inevitable 'for the sake of the victims, but also in our own interests.'³⁶⁸⁸

Mient Jan Faber, also writing in De Volkskrant, pointed out the risks of conflicts in Kosovo and Macedonia. According to him, this meant that the West would have to make large parts of the Balkans a protectorate and use military force to set up safe havens where Displaced Persons could be taken care of. Peace enforcement was the only means available to the West to avoid being confronted with a series of ethnic wars.³⁶⁸⁹ This elicited a response from within his own camp, from Erik Hummels and Jan Smit, members of the Quakers' segment of the Interchurch Peace Conference. They argued that the peaceful means for resolving the conflict in the former Yugoslavia had not yet been exhausted. According to them, peace enforcement would only lead to war enforcement because the Yugoslavs, who had long been accustomed to assume an independent stance in international politics, would see members of a UN military force as intruders. They believed, moreover, that the idea that the West could restore order in the Balkans had its source in a Western sense of superiority: 'The objective is not to salve our conscience, or to blow new life into the Dutch peace movement: those are all forms of Western ethnocentricity.'³⁶⁹⁰ The staff member of the Eastern Europe Institute at the University of Amsterdam Nevenka Tromp-Vrkic believed, however, that the establishment of a UN protectorate over large areas of the former Yugoslavia was probably the only possible solution.³⁶⁹¹

Yet another contributor to De Volkskrant, Anet Bleich, commented on the choice between 'to intervene or not to intervene' facing the European Community in a bantering, almost demagogic tone:

'Peace, democracy, economic growth, free trade, learning to live in a unified Europe, in old or new multi-ethnic and multicultural relationships? That's not really what we realists are bothered about, is it? Oilseeds and white wine, how ³⁶⁸⁴ H.J.A. Hofland, 'Grenzen aan het gedogen', NRC Handelsblad, 02/12/92.

³⁶⁸⁵ 'Een Saigon voor de VN' (A Saigon for the UN), NRC Handelsblad, 09/12/92.

³⁶⁸⁶ H.J.A. Hofland, 'Meer dan humanitair' (More than humanitarian), NRC Handelsblad, 23/12/92.

³⁶⁸⁷ H.J.A. Hofland, 'Europa 1993' (Europe 1993), NRC Handelsblad, 30/12/92.

³⁶⁸⁸ André Roelofs, 'Waarom doet Westen niets in Joegoslavië?' (Why does the West do nothing in Yugoslavia?), de Volkskrant, 19/11/92.

³⁶⁸⁹ Mient Jan Faber, 'Wanneer dringt de Balkan-hel echt tot ons door?' (When will we finally become aware of the Hell of the Balkans?), de Volkskrant, 16/11/92.

³⁶⁹⁰ Erik Hummels and Jan Smit, 'VN-interventie gooit slechts olie op het vuur' (UN intervention simply throws oil on the flames), de Volkskrant, 23/11/92.

³⁶⁹¹ Nevenka Tromp-Vrkic, 'Politieke oplossing voor ex-Joegoslavië komt zeker te laat' (A political solution for the former Yugoslavia will certainly come too late), de Volkskrant, 19/12/92.

to stay friends with the farmer and keep refugees out of our own back yard – *that is the question.*³⁶⁹²

Nor was she much impressed by the arguments against safe havens put forward by General Van der Vlis. According to her, if the Allies had used the same arguments in 1944 they would never have undertaken the Normandy landings.³⁶⁹³ She regarded the stance of ‘our pacifist-minded generals’ as ‘pernicious’³⁶⁹⁴ and thought that the Dutch Parliament should ‘rise out of the swamp of largely self-induced impotence’. It should start by stating that it wanted to make a contribution to the safe havens option itself and should then send its Foreign Minister and Defence Minister, Van den Broek and Ter Beek, off to seek support for such an initiative from Washington, Paris, London and other capitals.³⁶⁹⁵ Alman Metten, a member of the socialist fraction of the European Parliament, wrote in De Volkskrant on the same day that, having regard to the war in the former Yugoslavia among other things, ‘the Netherlands [should] drop its modest attitude of ‘we’re only a small country’, play an activist role (if possible in a Benelux framework) and not be afraid of bold initiatives’.³⁶⁹⁶ A.M. Oostlander, member of the CDA fraction in the European Parliament, also tried to urge the Dutch Parliament to stop dragging its heels behind the lead given by the government, as it had been doing since August according to him. ‘Members are actually advocating a neutral course, which is incompatible with the Christian Democrat tradition of dealing with National Socialists.’ In fact, Oostlander had noticed that the Dutch Parliament had already adopted a more active stance, but it needed to go further and put other governments under pressure with the aid of public opinion in the countries concerned. In this context, it would be a good thing to ‘have Great Britain’s wretched Yugoslavia policy subjected to solemn condemnation’.³⁶⁹⁷

The leader article in the Protestant daily Trouw on Christmas Eve argued that military intervention in Bosnia was needed ‘without delay. The use of military force to create a no-fly zone above Bosnia can be no more than an initial move, especially in view of the fact that aeroplanes and helicopters play little or no part in the battles taking place in Bosnia-Hercegovina.’³⁶⁹⁸

While the voice of interventionists was not heard as loudly on the opinion pages as it had been in August, the opposition was even less noticeable. Hardly any arguments against intervention could be found in Trouw and De Volkskrant, while J.L. Heldring continued his lonely battle against interventionism in the columns of NRC Handelsblad. ‘Criticizing humanitarian missions is a thankless task’, he wrote. ‘You run the risk of being pigeonholed as an inhumanist.’ But he still did his best to do so. In his opinion, no operation should be started in the former Yugoslavia as long as its outcome is completely uncertain. Even if tens of thousands of troops did manage to create safe havens, the West had no guarantee that the population would not start butchering one another again when these safe havens were removed years later, ‘so such an intervention, though undertaken with the noblest of motives, could well turn out to be completely ineffective in the long run’.³⁶⁹⁹

EC summit in Edinburgh

The idea of Safe Areas, or safe havens, represented a concrete objective for the Dutch government, but it was making very little progress in persuading others of its feasibility. In the meantime, winter was ³⁶⁹² Anet Bleich, ‘Europa gaat steeds meer op de Balkan lijken’ (Europe is getting to look more and more like the Balkans), de Volkskrant, 17/11/92.

³⁶⁹³ Anet Bleich, ‘Safe havens in Bosnië: een zinnig voorstel’, de Volkskrant, 24/11/92.

³⁶⁹⁴ Anet Bleich, ‘Het funeste pacifisme van de generaals’ (The pernicious pacifism of the generals), de Volkskrant, 11/12/92.

³⁶⁹⁵ Anet Bleich, ‘Safe havens in Bosnië: een zinnig voorstel’, de Volkskrant, 24/11/92.

³⁶⁹⁶ Alman Metten, ‘Crisis Europa vergen brutaliteit van Nederland’ (European crises demand Dutch brutality), de Volkskrant, 24/11/92.

³⁶⁹⁷ Arie Oostlander, ‘Luchtaanvallen moeten de Serviërs dwingen in te binden’ (Air strikes needed to force Serbs to withdraw), de Volkskrant, 07/12/92.

³⁶⁹⁸ ‘Een trieste conclusie (2)’ (A sad conclusion (2)), Trouw, 24/12/92.

³⁶⁹⁹ J.L. Heldring, ‘Interveniëren of niet?’ (To intervene or not to intervene?), NRC Handelsblad, 11/12/92.

approaching and it was feared that many tens or hundreds of thousands in Bosnia would not survive it. Van Walsum commented at the meeting of the Comité Politique held on 2 December that by this time he knew all the arguments against any proposal leading to harder action against Serbia by heart, but the overall result was that the Twelve were showing themselves to the rest of the world as passively accepting the use of force as a means of territorial expansion and ethnic cleansing. His French and British counterparts, on the other hand, argued that the international community had only two choices in dealing with the former Yugoslavia: either limiting itself to the protection of humanitarian aid, or waging all-out war.³⁷⁰⁰

Officials in Foreign Affairs' Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (Dutch abbreviation DAV) were of the opinion that international policy-making with regard to Bosnia-Herzegovina had got stuck fast because EC governments were only able to think about the options available in such black and white terms: it was either peacekeeping or all out war.³⁷⁰¹ The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs tried to break this impasse by proposing what they called a 'passive enforcement operation'. While it was doubtless impossible at that moment to convince the West to undo all the Serb territorial gains in Bosnia-Herzegovina the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs suggested to Foreign Minister Van den Broek that it might well be possible to halt further Serb advances and at the same time to deal effectively with the humanitarian emergency in the regions that had not yet been conquered by the Serbs. Such an operation might be expected to lead to 'a sort of Cyprus situation' which would, it is true, doubtless call for a large body of troops to be stationed in the conflict zone for many years, but where a certain level of peace could also be restored.

The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs considered this operation to be 'feasible, because the Serbs are unlikely to attack regions under such international protection.' The directorate realized that great powers of persuasion would be needed to convince decision-makers not only internationally but also at home – especially the Dutch Chief of Defence Staff - of the merits of this idea. It did not expect any support at all from within the EC. It was therefore suggested that Van den Broek should launch the plan in a newspaper like the International Herald Tribune or the Financial Times, so that he could appeal over the heads of his European counterparts to European political opinion, the Clinton government in spe and the Arab and/or Islamic states.³⁷⁰² The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs had apparently already forgotten how irritated Foreign Affairs itself had been the year before when independent voices, in particular from Bonn, had been raised during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC.

Within this framework of creative thinking, Van Walsum wanted to make an attempt even before the EC summit to be held in Edinburgh on 11 and 12 December 'to breach (...) the solid front of those who believe that further action [in Bosnia] will inevitably lead to all out war'.³⁷⁰³ His eye fell on Srebrenica in this connection. On 22 November, General Morillon had demanded that aid convoys should be granted access within a week to Srebrenica and Gorazde, the two town in Eastern Bosnia that had been held under siege for months by the Bosnian Serbs and that had so far proved to be inaccessible for humanitarian aid convoys (see Chapter 7). If this demand was not met, the Security Council would have to make more troops available according to Morillon.³⁷⁰⁴ UNHCR even threatened to stop aid to Serbian towns in Eastern Bosnia until supplies were allowed to reach Srebrenica and Gorazde.³⁷⁰⁵ Talks between Morillon and Mladic yielded the concession that aid supplies would be

³⁷⁰⁰ ABZ, Communications archives. Bot 415 to Van den Broek, 02/12/92.

³⁷⁰¹ See also Rob Meines, 'Den Haag zoekt steun voor ingreep in Bosnië', NRC Handelsblad, 04/12/92.

³⁷⁰² ABZ, 999.0 VN/Operaties/UNPROFOR/Joegoslavië/okt-dec 1992. Memo DAV (DAV/MS/RM AHG) to M, 03/12/92, No. DAV/MS-218/92.

³⁷⁰³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Memorandum DGPZ to DEU, DAV, DPV and JURA, 03/12/92, No. 189/92.

³⁷⁰⁴ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 89/92, 23/11/92.

³⁷⁰⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. 'Voormalig Joegoslavië - spreekpunt UNPROFOR II inzet transportbataljon' (Former Yugoslavia – agenda item UNPROFOR II deployment transport battalion), memo DIO/Joegoslavië for WEU Council of allowed to get through to Srebrenica; however, the convoy from Belgrade bringing these supplies was held up at the Bosnian-Serb border by a mob of Serbs.³⁷⁰⁶ The convoy was finally allowed to complete its journey to Srebrenica on 28 November, where UNHCR found the population starving and without medical supplies.³⁷⁰⁷ The next convoy was also stopped on the way to Srebrenica, but finally reached its destination on 5 December. Van Walsum therefore ordered a study to be carried out of the possibility of air-lifting supplies to the hospital in Srebrenica.³⁷⁰⁸ The preliminary conclusion was that this idea was not feasible because of concerns about the safety of the aircraft used for the transport.³⁷⁰⁹ Besides, the next convoy reached Srebrenica a few days later, on 10 December.³⁷¹⁰

The Military Liaison office of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs sent Van Walsum a memorandum shortly after that, stating that air-lifting supplies ‘could not be wholeheartedly recommended’. The fact that even flights carrying aid supplies to Sarajevo, which had been agreed on by all parties, were nevertheless shot at made it clear that the air space above Bosnia was definitely not safe; in addition, the mountainous terrain round the Muslim enclaves made it difficult for the crew to determine the right approach path and to drop the supplies accurately, the VRS would probably object to military flights over strategic territory, and finally air-lifts were expensive and only delivered a limited capacity. The only remaining possibility, according to the Military Liaison office, was ‘more robust’ support for the convoys travelling by road.³⁷¹¹ As mentioned in Chapter 7, however, this was not an acceptable option either.

Foreign Affairs was not alone in its feverish search for ways of pulling international policy on Yugoslavia off the sandbanks. Dutch Prime Minister Lubbers had also been convinced since early December that the international community had not been doing enough about the region. He summed up the situation as follows: Milosevic’s regime had not been sufficiently isolated; the sanctions had not been enforced strictly enough; the no-fly zone had not been imposed; and aid convoys still experienced great difficulties in reaching their destinations.³⁷¹² Both the ministry of Foreign Affairs and the premier knew that the majority of Dutch public opinion shared their irritation and will to action. Just as had been the case a year before, at the end of 1992 sixty-six percent of those surveyed by the NIPO polling organization on 20 and 21 December no longer believed that the Yugoslav crisis could be solved by negotiation. The same percentage believed that the UN should undertake military intervention and that Dutch troops should take part in this action, even at the expense of a certain number of casualties.³⁷¹³ Even Hans Van Mierlo, the leader of the Social Democrat D66 fraction in Parliament, who together with Eisma and Ter Veer (also from D66) often did his best to temper the mood of the Dutch government and Parliament when they got too heated in their pursuit of a solution to the problems of Yugoslavia, stated during D66’s annual congress held at the end of November 1992 that the Netherlands must continue to keep in step with the international community ‘even though we are disappointed at the size of the steps they are agreed on taking’ but must at the same time ‘stubbornly go Ministers, Rome, 20/11/92–VDT, 19/11/92; ‘VN binden hulp aan Serviërs aan voorwaarden’ (UN sets conditions on aid to Serbs), NRC Handelsblad, 24/11/92; ‘VN ‘pokeren’ met hulp aan Moslims’ (UN turns aid to Muslims into a poker game), de Volkskrant, 25/11/92; ‘Konvooien van UNHCR naar Moslim-steden Bosnië fiasco’ (Fiasco of UNHCR convoys to Muslim cities in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 26/11/92.

³⁷⁰⁶ ‘Gorazde wel, Srebrenica nog niet geholpen’ (Gorazde has already received aid, but Srebrenica has not yet), NRC Handelsblad, 27/11/92.

³⁷⁰⁷ ‘Belegerde stad in Bosnië krijgt VN-hulp’ (Besieged Bosnian town receives UN aid), de Volkskrant, 30/11/92.

³⁷⁰⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Memorandum DGPZ to DEU, DAV, DPV and JURA, 03/12/92, No. 189/92.

³⁷⁰⁹ Ibid., memorandum DAV to DGPZ, 03/12/92, No. DAV/MS-220/92.

³⁷¹⁰ See also ibid., memo deputy DAV to DGPZ, 16/12/92, No. DAV/MS-228/92.

³⁷¹¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Memorandum deputy DAV for DGPZ, 16/12/92, No. DAV/MS-228/92.

³⁷¹² Nederland 3, Nova, 04/12/92, 10.30 pm.

³⁷¹³ J. van der Meulen, ‘Veiligheid hier en daar’ (Security here and there), Maatschappij & Krijgsmacht, 16 (1994) 1, p. 2; De Boode & Everts, Ontwikkelingen, p. 188.

on advocating the taking of greater steps (...) even though this involves us in heavier military responsibilities. We can't go on as we are now.'³⁷¹⁴

The question was however what the Dutch government could achieve abroad. Why, for example did a country like Belgium not take as active a stance as the Netherlands? This question seems to underlie an interview the Dutch journalist Verbakel had with the Belgian Foreign Minister Claes in the political talk show Het Capitool on Dutch TV on the afternoon of Sunday 6 December, on the eve of the EC summit in Edinburgh. Verbakel asked the Belgian Foreign Minister the following question: 'Our Dutch Foreign Minister claims that the moment is approaching when we can no longer avoid taking forceful action. What do you think?' Claes's lengthy answer is worth citing in extenso, as he seems to be holding up a mirror in which his Dutch counterpart and the Dutch premier Ruud Lubbers could view themselves.

Claes: 'I believe we have to be very careful. It is not my job to interpret the attitude of my Dutch colleague. I completely agree with him when he says that we are making ourselves ridiculous, to the extent that the decisions we take are not respected and are not even carried out. (...) Whether the conclusion to be drawn from that is that you have to start developing a military scenario - a 'peace making' scenario in present-day parlance - is another matter altogether. I am not a specialist. But I know what the specialists from the Pentagon, the British General Staff and the French General Staff tell me. And also what certain Belgian generals tell me. Firstly, intervention in Bosnia is not guaranteed to yield success in the short term. Secondly, you are practically certain to suffer considerable losses among the troops you deploy. And thirdly, civilian losses will be high. The most important consideration, however, is the risk of sinking into a bottomless swamp as happened in Lebanon.'

'Verbakel: Isn't it strange that Mr. Van den Broek doesn't recognize that?'

'Claes: I can't really comment on that.'

'Verbakel: Lubbers appears to expect that a large number of countries will follow the Dutch lead at the European summit in Edinburgh?'

'Claes: I wouldn't like to make a prediction about that. However, I would sound a warning about excessive optimism with respect to the Security Council. It seems to me you can't simply say, 'We're off to war, hurrah! Long live violence', without legal backing from UNO and the Security Council.'

'Verbakel: You call yourself a socialist. They are much more cautious, much more detached than our Christian Democrat Minister of Foreign Affairs, aren't they?'

'Claes: I don't know if caution is the right word. I would prefer to speak of realism.'³⁷¹⁵

A few hours later, Dutch KRO television broadcast a special issue of the current affairs programme Brandpunt, entitled 'Joegoslavië exit – ingrijpen ja of nee' [Exit Yugoslavia – do we intervene or don't we?] and lasting 2½ hours. Authorities like Van den Broek, Van Eekelen and Owen appeared on the programme, alongside prominent commentators and experts. They were accompanied by a wide range of well known Dutch personalities such as the actress and singer of Croatian origin Tatjana Simic, chess player Hans Böhm, cabaret artiste and TV presenter Jos Brink and programme-maker and author Boudewijn Büch. The programme could not be characterized as the acme of balanced TV debate. It was stated that the main theme of the evening was ‘how is it possible that the history of torture and deportation we went through fifty years ago seems to be being repeated today?’³⁷¹⁶ Viewers could phone up and say whether they were for or against military intervention in Yugoslavia or to put questions to experts like Dick Verkijk, a Dutch journalist with a good knowledge of Eastern Europe. The balance between yes and no votes was displayed on a barometer during the broadcast. At the start of the programme, 88 percent were for intervention and 12 percent against. At the end, 91 percent of the callers were for and nine percent against. Presenter Fons de Poel rounded off with the words, ‘Intervention or not? Let’s hope we never have to say, “Wir haben es nicht gewusst. [‘We never knew what was going on’ – a reference to the claims of innocence by the general German population in response to the revelations of genocide after the Second World War]’.

³⁷¹⁴ D66, party management documents, speech by Hans Van Mierlo at D66 annual congress in Nijmegen, 28/11/92.

³⁷¹⁵ Dutch TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Het Capitool, 06/12/92, noon.

The programme showed many images of both Croatia and Bosnia, while refugees told their stories of ethnic cleansing, torture and executions. Some of the facts presented were distorted, however. For example, fragments from Radio Television Novi Sad of murders committed on Serbs by Croats and Muslims were used during the programme, while the accompanying commentary characterized the images as evidence of Serb crimes against Muslims. One viewer who phoned the broadcasting company to correct this was told that the programme makers were not interested.³⁷¹⁷ The Serb Information and Cultural Centre in the Netherlands later submitted a complaint about the programme to the Dutch Council for Journalism, claiming that the makers showed anti-Serb bias and failed to take due care that the commentary matched the images (for example, the commentary on pictures of a woman complaining about atrocities stated that she was Muslim while she was in fact Serbian). The Council stated in its ruling that the discrepancy between pictures and commentary did amount to the giving of false information. It concluded that the editors of Brandpunt had not done all they could to avoid errors, but regarded the errors committed as of minor importance. The Council found further that the editors could have made more effort to present the standpoint of the Bosnian Serbs, but concluded on balance that the limits of social acceptability had not been transgressed. The complaint was therefore rejected.³⁷¹⁸

This broadcast illustrated the increasingly activist mood of the Dutch public after a quiet interlude of more than three months. Many of the voices raised came from Church circles. For example, the Netherlands Council of Churches sent a letter to Foreign Minister Van den Broek early in December, urging military intervention to support the establishment of protected zones for civilians in Bosnia. The synods of the hervormde, gereformeerde and Lutheran churches supported this call in a letter to their congregations. The Ecumenical Action section of the Netherlands Council of Churches started collecting signatures for a petition requesting the government to raise its voice in favour of more European action on the former Yugoslavia. The IKV (Interchurch Peace Council) started a postcard campaign as part of an international campaign organized by the Helsinki Citizens Assembly for peace and human rights: pre-printed postcards were sent both to the Dutch government and to the joint UN/EC Peace Conference on the former Yugoslavia, urging the establishment of ‘safe havens’ and ‘open borders’ for the refugees in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The Dutch Joint Aid Organizations announced that they were going to hold a collection campaign for the former Yugoslavia, with the aid of the Luxembourg broadcasting channel RTL4 and ³⁷¹⁶ Ingrid Harms and Ursula den Tex, ‘Kan de hulpverlening nog hulp verlenen?’, Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 24.

³⁷¹⁷ DPPN, archives of D66 party secretariat. Incoming correspondence on Europe (Oost-Europa 1989-1993), M.K.-S. to D66 secretariat, 15/12/92, 192.3536.

³⁷¹⁸ ‘Het Servisch Informatie- en Cultuurcentrum tegen de redactie van KRO-Brandpunt’ (Complaint brought by Serbian Information and Cultural Centre against the editors of the KRO programme Brandpunt), De Journalist, 05/11/93, p. 36. See also Anstadt, Servië, p. 161.

the Dutch public broadcasting companies, in the second week of December They also called for military intervention, since they feared that their aid would not reach its destination without this intervention.³⁷¹⁹ The Red Cross, one of the participating joint aid organizations, had already made a plea in November for the establishment of safe havens under military protection.³⁷²⁰ The Roman Catholic, gereformeerde and hervormde churches in the Dutch province of Noord-Brabant announced that they were going to ring the church bells for five minutes at seven o'clock on the evening of Thursday 10 December in protest against the events in Bosnia.³⁷²¹

Against this background, Prime Minister Lubbers and Foreign Minister Van den Broek made their intended stance during the coming EC summit in Edinburgh perfectly clear. Van den Broek, who had also appeared in the Brandpunt programme about Yugoslavia on 6 December, stated during a meeting of EC ministers held the following day that 'some form of military intervention seems almost inevitable'. He was thinking in this connection about the use of force to create a no-fly zone above Bosnia, and the establishment of Safe Areas for refugees. According to him, 'a period of laissez-faire, broken promises and statements not backed up by force' had to be brought to an end.³⁷²²

In the second week of December, the Dutch weekly Vrij Nederland summed up the debate about intervention in Yugoslavia that had been going on during the past year and a half as follows:

'Things can't go on like this any longer. There has to be some form of intervention. It will take some time, however, before the powers that be make up their minds about how or where the action should be taken and by whom, whether it should be small- or large-scale and whether it should involve the use of land, sea or air forces. Only after all these decisions have been taken can the actual intervention start. And even then, it is uncertain whether such action will really bring peace and security.'³⁷²³

According to the authors, however, only one option was discussed to ease the lot of those suffering persecution and forced displacement in Bosnia:

'Relocation of refugees in protected zones in their own country. This appears to be a realistic option, at least from a political viewpoint. Opinions are strongly divided about whether it will prove to be feasible in practice. Is it really still possible to create safe havens now that winter has started and the war is continuing unabated? How do you get the troops there? Which troops are we talking about anyway? And how will they defend themselves? It is not clear whether the establishment of protected zones would not be the start of much more far-reaching military involvement.'³⁷²⁴

But on the other hand, 'Do we have to wait until all the pros and cons have been neatly debated to everyone's satisfaction? By that time, it will be too late.'³⁷²⁵

³⁷¹⁹ 'Militair ingrijpen moet: Kerken luiden noodklok over Bosnië-Herzegovina' (Military intervention necessary; Church bells ring alarm on Bosnia-Herzegovina), Trouw, 04/12/92; 'Ingrijpen in Bosnië. Hulporganisaties: Hulp komt anders niet ter plekke' (Intervention in Bosnia. Aid organizations say it's the only way to ensure aid reaches destination), Trouw, 08/12/92.

³⁷²⁰ 'Rode Kruis smeekt om actie' (Red Cross begs for action), Trouw, 19/11/92.

³⁷²¹ 'Militair ingrijpen moet: Kerken luiden noodklok over Bosnië-Herzegovina', Trouw, 04/12/92.

³⁷²² 'Navo waarschuwt Servië' (NATO warns Serbia), Trouw, 08/12/92. See also Jos Klaassen, "EG moet actie in Joegoslavië overwegen" (EC must consider action in Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 08/12/92; P. Lewis, 'U.N. Security Council closer to military action against advancing Serbs', New York Times News Service 09/12/92, 2026EST.

³⁷²³ Ingrid Harms & Ursula den Tex, 'Kan de hulpverlening nog hulp verlenen?', Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 24.

³⁷²⁴ Ingrid Harms & Ursula den Tex, 'Kan de hulpverlening nog hulp verlenen?', Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 25.

³⁷²⁵ Ibid.

Prime Minister Lubbers seems to have been in a similar mood. The day before the European summit in Edinburgh, he explained the role the Dutch government intended to play during the summit in extremely strong – or, as De Volkskrant put it, ‘distinctly un-Lubberian’³⁷²⁶ – terms during the debate on this topic in Parliament. He wanted to see firmer action to ensure adequate food supplies, and referred once again to his own experiences during the ‘hunger winter’ of 1944/45 in the Netherlands at the end of the Second World War.

‘So I think we have to step up the discussion. Of course, we have to take care not to make it too personal. And I am really not convinced that the Netherlands is on the defensive here. I am sure that people throughout Europe are starting to think more and more that we don’t need to be ashamed about being too impractical or anything like that. That is not so.’

It appears, thus, that Lubbers also wanted to appeal to the population of the EC member states over the heads of their governments. According to him, people had been feeling ill at ease for a long time about the uncertainty as to who should take the lead in dealing with the problems of the former Yugoslavia: the EC, the WEU or the UN Security Council. ‘Honestly speaking’, said Lubbers, ‘and to put it in very plain language, I don’t give a damn. It is scandalous to have wasted so much time on this matter.’³⁷²⁷ In response to comments about the emotional tone of his speech, Lubbers responded that that was how he was built.³⁷²⁸

Minister of Defence Ter Beek tried to slow things down, as cited in Vrij Nederland. General Van der Vlis had convinced him of the risks of measures that went further than pure humanitarian aid. He did not exclude a study on safe havens and a no-fly zone. ‘But we shouldn’t talk about these things too lightly.’

‘The Netherlands tends to speak in strong terms at international meetings, but we get hardly any support from other countries. The Germans point to their constitution, which does not allow them to deploy troops beyond their own borders. The English are even less prepared to go along with us. We are saddled with two big brothers who don’t want to take the lead. That can be irritating. But I don’t see the Netherlands marching into Yugoslavia on its own.’³⁷²⁹

Seen from the Dutch viewpoint, it looked as if Yugoslavia was the only point on the agenda at the European summit. In fact, however, the topics discussed in Edinburgh were mainly concerned with the financing of the European Community and the Danish question. The Danes had rejected the Maastricht Treaty in a referendum held on 2 June 1992. This was in principle a threat to the planned implementation of the Treaty on 1 November 1993, since this implementation required the consent of all EC member states. The result of this referendum was however overturned on 18 May 1993, when the Danes voted in a new referendum to accept the Treaty on condition that Denmark did not introduce the euro. The problem of caring for Displaced Persons from the former Yugoslavia was also ³⁷²⁶ ‘Lubbers roept EG in harde termen op tot ingrijpen in Bosnië’ (Lubbers issues forceful call to EC to intervene in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 11/12/92.

³⁷²⁷ Nederland 3, Nova, 10/12/92, 10.30 pm. Cf. Martijn Delaere, ‘Eensgezind ten strijde’ (United into battle), Het Binnenhof, 19/12/92; Pascal Barollier, ‘Le Premier ministre néerlandais pour une intervention militaire en Bosnie’ (Dutch prime minister supports intervention in Bosnia), Agence France Presse, 10/12/92; ‘Nach dem Scheitern der Friedensbemühungen NATO erörtert Militärintervention in Jugoslawien’ (NATO considers military intervention in Yugoslavia after peace efforts fail), Süddeutsche Zeitung, 11/12/92.

³⁷²⁸ Radio 1, NOS, Met het oog op morgen (With an eye on tomorrow), 18/12/92, 11.07 pm.

³⁷²⁹ Leonard Ornstein & Max van Weezel, ‘Het warme bad en de koude douche van Relus ter Beek’ (A hot bath and a cold shower for Defence Minister Relus ter Beek), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 11.

placed on the agenda of the Edinburgh summit at the request of the Dutch government,³⁷³⁰ but this was certainly not the main topic of interest for the other European ministers.

The creation of a no-fly zone above Bosnia-Herzegovina announced by the UN was once more confirmed at the summit. It was also agreed that the EC would urge the United Nations to enforce this no-fly zone. The participants at the summit further confirmed that there could be no question of partitioning Bosnia; the acquisition of territory by force would not be recognized. The Dutch proposal to create safe regions was greeted with 'extreme reserve' by the Belgian Foreign Minister Claes, whose views were particularly important because Belgium was a temporary member of the Security Council at the time. Claes motivated his stance by mentioning his fear that Iranian manipulation could lead to formation of an Islamic republic in the southern part of the former Yugoslavia.³⁷³¹

It followed in his opinion that the best thing was to do nothing.³⁷³² It appears from the minutes of a Dutch government meeting held about this time that the United Kingdom was still not ready for military intervention because the British believed that this could only lead to escalation. They could expect Claes to back them up, since he expected more results from diplomatic activity. The French standpoint lay somewhere between that of the UK and Belgium on the one hand and the Netherlands on the other. A further problem in this connection was that France was not prepared to take part in a NATO operation. In brief, there was not enough support internationally for the Dutch standpoint that inaction was the worst conceivable option.³⁷³³

Applause for Defence Minister Ter Beek

Vice-premier Wim Kok thus had little good news about the Edinburgh summit to report to his party members during the PvdA party congress held in Amsterdam on Saturday 12 December:

'They will be asking us later where we were, where the whole Western community was. We have all seen what has been going on, as we watched the TV images in our own living rooms. Don't expect any easy answer from me. I don't find it easy to deal with the whole issue either. We will go on advocating action against events that we cannot allow to happen.'³⁷³⁴

The European summit in Edinburgh had however decided to urge the UN to enforce the no-fly zone. Defence Minister Ter Beek therefore stated at the PvdA congress that he was prepared to send Dutch F16 fighters if the Security Council did give a mandate for this operation: 'If they don't listen to our words, they will have to feel the consequences of our action. That seems to be the only language they understand.'³⁷³⁵ By taking a decision of this kind, the Dutch government passed in principle the boundary between peacekeeping and peace enforcement. As one retired Dutch general put it, as soon as one Serb plane was brought down, that meant war.³⁷³⁶ It was no coincidence, however, that Ter Beek, who had stated in the issue of Vrij Nederland appearing that very week that one should not speak lightly of the enforcement of a no-fly zone, felt obliged to make a gesture at the party congress by ³⁷³⁰ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 13/11/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷³¹ Claes had already said this on Nederland 3, NOS, Het Capitool, 06/12/92, noon. See also Eisermann, Weg, p. 142.

³⁷³² Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 14, 15 and 18/12/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷³³ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 15/12/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷³⁴ 'F 16's mogen van Ter Beek' (Ter Beek OKs sending of F 16s), Trouw, 14/12/92. See also the statements made by Vice-premier Wim Kok in the TV programme Het Capitool the day after, where he called the results of the Edinburgh summit as regards Yugoslavia 'meagre' (Nederland 3, Het Capitool, 13/12/92, 12.00 noon).

³⁷³⁵ 'F 16's mogen van Ter Beek', Trouw, 14/12/92.

³⁷³⁶ Wio Joustra, 'Van den Broek vecht tegen eerste natuurwet' (Van den Broek fights against the first law of nature), de Volkskrant, 10/12/92.

announcing the Dutch government's willingness to make a contribution to this initiative. Two years before, the PvdA congress had not been able to summon up much enthusiasm for participation in the Gulf War and Ter Beek, who had passed a difficult couple of hours on that occasion, had not forgotten.

The PvdA's attitude towards the former Yugoslavia was quite different, however. 'We have continually argued that more active steps should be taken than were ultimately taken by the international community', wrote the PvdA fraction in Parliament in its policy report for the years 1990-1992.³⁷³⁷ The question of Yugoslavia has been one of 'intense' concern to the fraction.³⁷³⁸ They found it difficult to deal with the fact that the Netherlands, as member of the EC and of the UN, shared the responsibility for the decisions taken by these bodies which, in the eyes of the PvdA fraction, were inadequate. They were also ashamed of the half-hearted implementation of the decisions that had been taken. The PvdA congress passed a resolution on 12 December 1992, regretting that the attitude taken by the Netherlands with respect to the former Yugoslavia 'has so far not been widely copied within the European Community'³⁷³⁹ and giving expression to the party's serious concern about 'the lack of an effective reaction from the international community'. The congress made a plea for, among other things, the use of military resources to enable humanitarian convoys to reach their destinations, the establishments of safe regions for refugees and 'the reception of more Bosnian refugees by the member states of the European Community. With the Netherlands in the lead.'³⁷⁴⁰

Defence Minister Ter Beek recalled later that he was able to speak openly at this congress about his readiness to do something for Bosnia. 'They applauded me at that congress. I have subsequently sometimes spoken bitterly about the different reception I got at the congress a couple of years before, when the Gulf War was under discussion. It was jeers then, and cheers now.'³⁷⁴¹ In fact, the PvdA was not the only Dutch political party advocating far-reaching measures in connection with the former Yugoslavia that weekend. The (Liberal) VVD party also held its congress during the same weekend, in Bussum, where the party leader Frits Bolkestein made a plea for precision operations to liberate those imprisoned in concentration camps, and the creation of safe havens.

Not everyone welcomed the offer Ter Beek made at the congress. The press reported that Foreign Affairs would have preferred the more mediagenic deployment of ground troops, e.g. marines. Ter Beek did not want to recall them from Cambodia, however.³⁷⁴² The Dutch military in the former Yugoslavia were not very happy about Defence Minister Ter Beek's premature announcement. The Dutch Commander of the UNMOs, Colonel J.H.L. Benda, told Junior Minister Baron B.J.M. van Voorst tot Voorst, when the latter visited Croatia and Bosnia two weeks later, that there was a noticeable hardening of the attitude of the Serbs towards the Dutch observers the day after Ter Beek announced his decision at the PvdA congress.³⁷⁴³

Serious unrest also arose among the troops in the Dutch communications and transport battalion when they noted a more aggressive attitude among the VRS soldiers at roadblocks.³⁷⁴⁴ And the former Commander of the Dutch UNPROFOR communications battalion, Lieutenant Colonel H. Vermaas, issued a warning in the Dutch press that enforcement of the no-fly zone could lead to hostage-taking of Dutch troops.³⁷⁴⁵ General H.A. Couzy, who had succeeded General Wilmink as

³⁷³⁷ Beleidsverslag PvdA (Policy report PvdA) 1990-1992, p. 149.

³⁷³⁸ Ibid.

³⁷³⁹ Beleidsverslag PvdA 1992-1994, p. 68.

³⁷⁴⁰ Idem, p. 69.

³⁷⁴¹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99. See also Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 177.

³⁷⁴² Wio Joustra, 'Buitenlandse Zaken wil mariniers terug' (Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs wants to recall marines), de Volkskrant, 15/12/92.

³⁷⁴³ 'Nederlanders in Unprofor bezorgd over eventueel afdwingen vliegverbod (1)' (Dutch UNPROFOR forces concerned about possible enforcement of no-fly zone), 29/12/92, ANP, 19.41.

³⁷⁴⁴ G. den Elt, 'Onrust in VN-bataljon' (Unrest in UN battalion), Algemeen Dagblad, 30/12/92.

³⁷⁴⁵ 'Vrees voor gijzeling' (Fear of hostage-taking) and T. Lagas and L. Meijer, 'VN-commandant: Landmacht was niet voorbereid' (UN commander claims ground troops were unprepared), Trouw, 29/12/92.

Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army on 10 September and who had accompanied Baron Van Voorst tot Voorst during his visit, said that if the Netherlands did actually send F 16s to Bosnia, the Dutch troops and observers would have to be withdrawn from certain regions there which would cause the whole operation on the ground to be shut down.³⁷⁴⁶ The chairman of the Dutch Association of Officers (Dutch abbreviation NVO), Colonel Stuiver, also demanded that the Dutch troops should be withdrawn in such a case. He was not confident that the defence system would be able to continue to operate adequately under such circumstances. According to him, the Netherlands had embarked on this Yugoslav adventure 'without a proper organization, and without having been able to build up a proper attitude'. Furthermore, he claimed that Defence Minister Ter Beek did not even have the courage to clear things up within his own ministry.³⁷⁴⁷

On 9 December, the Security Council had announced in connection with the heavy fighting round Sarajevo that measures could be taken against those responsible if the fighting did not stop immediately. A few days later, Secretary-General Wörner of the NATO received a letter from Boutros-Ghali in which the latter requested NATO support for the implementation of future UN resolutions concerning the former Yugoslavia, among other things by making plans for the establishment of safe havens.³⁷⁴⁸

On 14 December, the NATO Council decided to ask the NATO Military Committee to prepare plans for enforcement of the no-fly zone, for safe havens and for measures to prevent the conflict from spreading to Kosovo.³⁷⁴⁹

The NATO Council of Ministers met on 17 December. Among other things, the Council declared at that time that NATO could carry out peacekeeping operations directly for the United Nations as well as for the CSCE (see Chapter 6). The alliance would moreover in principle react positively to requests from Boutros-Ghali for contributions to operations in the former Yugoslavia.³⁷⁵⁰

During this meeting, Van den Broek confirmed the Dutch government's readiness to contribute Dutch F-16s for enforcement of the no-fly zone above Bosnia-Herzegovina, on condition that other countries contributed ground troops for this operation.³⁷⁵¹ The Dutch ministry of Defence gave further details of this offer to SHAPE (the NATO headquarters) in late 1992 or early 1993, stating that the Netherlands was prepared to provide six F-16 aircraft for reconnaissance purposes, and twelve for interception.³⁷⁵²

The hard-line Dutch stance concerning the no-fly zone earned Van Walsum a reprimand from the Russian deputy minister of Foreign Affairs Churkin during a meeting of the Council for North-Atlantic Cooperation, the joint body in which NATO could discuss matters with members of the former Warsaw Pact. This meeting also took place on 17 December. The Russian reaction was surprising, since they had seemed perfectly willing to accommodate the Dutch stance on Safe Areas not so long before. Churkin told Van Walsum that the Dutch 'refusal to think about the consequences' of enforcement of the no-fly zone was in sharp contrast to the careful approach of the mediators Owen and Vance. This led to a heated discussion. Van Walsum replied that the Netherlands thought more than some other countries about the consequences of a failure to find an answer to violent territorial expansion and ethnic cleansing. Churkin pointed out that while the flight restrictions had already been violated more than two hundred times, the flights observed were of no military significance. Van Walsum appeared not to be interested in such facts, and said that it must finally be made clear to 'the ³⁷⁴⁶ Nederland 3, NOS, Journal (News), 29/12/92, 8.00 pm; Gerard den Elt, 'Onrust in VN-bataljon', Algemeen Dagblad, 30/12/92.

³⁷⁴⁷ AVRO, Radiojournaal (News), 03/01/93, 12.07 pm.

³⁷⁴⁸ Leurdijk, Nations 1994, p. 8.

³⁷⁴⁹ ABZ, 999.241. Van den Broek 501 to PR NATO, 17/12/92, Strictly confidential.

³⁷⁵⁰ Leurdijk, Nations 1994, p. 9.

³⁷⁵¹ ABZ, 999.241. Van den Broek circ 862, 30/12/92.

³⁷⁵² According to ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Vertrouwelijk memorandum van DAV aan Kooijmans (Confidential memorandum from DAV to Kooijmans), 07/01/93, No. MS-002/93, this occurred on 6 January 1993; according to ibid., memorandum from DAV to Kooijmans, 22/03/93, No. DAV/MS-93/063, it occurred on 30 December 1992.

Serbs' that they had to take Security Council resolutions seriously. Churkin retorted that Russia would never tolerate action against Serbia.³⁷⁵³

US Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger, on the other hand, informed his British, French and Dutch counterparts that the United States was prepared to make air force units available not only for enforcement of the no-fly zone but also to protect UN ground troops.³⁷⁵⁴ The French government, however, did not wish all enforcement to come from NATO. It had had bad experience with this approach during the Gulf War. France wanted any actions that were undertaken to be under the responsibility of the Secretary-General of the UN.³⁷⁵⁵ The United States, in its turn, did not feel much for this idea, especially as it was known that Boutros-Ghali had strong reserves about enforcement with special reference to the consequences this could have for UN ground forces.³⁷⁵⁶ Churkin's remark to Van Walsum about Vance and Owen's dislike of enforcement of a no-fly zone was correct. Vance had stated his complete opposition to the use of force, including the enforcement of the no-fly zone. Cosic, the President of the rump state of Yugoslavia, had threatened him with reprisals if the step to enforcement was taken. Another fact of equal importance was that Owen and Vance were nearly ready to go public with a peace plan for Bosnia-Herzegovina. Boutros-Ghali therefore asked the Security Council at the end of December to delay the passing of a resolution on enforcement of the no-fly zone 'for a reasonable period of time'.³⁷⁵⁷

In the meantime, the Dutch ministry of Defence had also been shocked by the effect that mere talking about enforcement of the no-fly zone could have on the security of UN ground troops.³⁷⁵⁸ Defence therefore urged Foreign Affairs to send a clear statement of the Dutch position on this matter to the relevant Dutch diplomatic missions, having regard among other things to the 'importance Parliament is likely to place' on the safety of UN ground troops.³⁷⁵⁹ The Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs therefore sent a circular to Dutch diplomatic representatives abroad, stressing that an operation aimed at enforcement of the no-fly zone would only be allowed to begin after adequate measures had been taken to protect the safety of UN ground forces. Even after such measures had been taken, 'serious consideration would have to be given' to possible risks to UN ground personnel.³⁷⁶⁰ The ministry of Defence issued similar instructions to Dutch NATO and UNPROFOR officers.³⁷⁶¹

Dutch isolation in Edinburgh

Dutch Prime Minister Lubbers and Foreign Minister Van den Broek had in the meantime made hardly any progress in persuading their fellow participants at the Edinburgh summit to do something about Yugoslavia. 'The will just isn't there', declared Van den Broek at the end of the summit.³⁷⁶² Lubbers ³⁷⁵³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Jacobovits 2004 to Van den Broek, 18/12/92.

³⁷⁵⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Jacobovits 2005 to Van den Broek, 18/12/92.

³⁷⁵⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Memorandum DGPZ to DPV, 22/12/92, nr. 202/92.

³⁷⁵⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. D'Ansembourg 1418 to Van den Broek, 22/12/92. For details of Boutros-Ghali's reserves about enforcement, see also in this dossier, D'Ansembourg 1422 to Van den Broek, 23/12/92 and D'Ansembourg 1426 to Van den Broek, 24/12/92.

³⁷⁵⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Boutros-Ghali to Gharakan, 30/12/92, appendix to PR New York to DPV/PZ, 30/12/92, nyv 10815.

³⁷⁵⁸ For the initially rather laconic position adopted by Dutch Defence staff see ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209, memorandum from head of DPV to DGPZ, 17/12/92, No. DPV-2272/92.

³⁷⁵⁹ ABZ, 999.241/Joegoslavië/No Fly Zone/sept-dec 1992. Memorandum from deputy DAV to DGPZ, 23/12/92, RM-63/92.

³⁷⁶⁰ ABZ, 999.241. Van den Broek circ 862, 30/12/92.

³⁷⁶¹ DS. Van den Breemen to Lieutenant General Folmer, Brigadier General Stoffels and Colonel Kampman, 24/12/92, S/92/061/3823; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 107.

³⁷⁶² 'EG en Navo weigeren ingrijpen in Bosnië' (EC and NATO reject intervention in Bosnia), Trouw, 12/12/92. The next day, his assessment was somewhat more positive: Van den Broek spoke of 'a number of concrete matters where progress was booked – though we would like to see it all happening faster', Radio 1, AVRO, Radiojournaal (News), 13/12/93, 1.10 pm.

told RTL4 TV reporters that he had felt like ‘one crying in the wilderness’ during his stay in the Scottish capital.³⁷⁶³ He told the Dutch Parliament that he had been the only one who had really been urging that something should be done. It became clear to me once more that the Netherlands occupies a separate position as far as its degree of involvement is concerned. That doesn’t mean that other people are unconcerned about the business, but the balance they draw between what is politically desirable and what they consider feasible, their risk analysis, apparently leads to different results than ours.³⁷⁶⁴

Lubbers was, as he put it himself, ‘traumatized’ by the international division on the subject of the former Yugoslavia; ‘everything the Netherlands argued for was only accepted six months later – and by that time the whole situation had changed (...) The Dutch foreign policy position can be characterized as eccentric.’ The Edinburgh summit was illustrative of the whole situation for Lubbers: ‘There we were, making our plea for action as we had done so often before. And you could see from the expression on the faces of the other participants that they were thinking “There they are again, with that bee in their bonnet!” You felt completely isolated, regarded as someone with the remarkable conviction that the issue of the former Yugoslavia should be treated with priority at the conference. (...) Any argument you put forward was met with counter-arguments.’³⁷⁶⁵

Van den Broek was not present at the government meeting of 15 December when the results of the Edinburgh meeting were evaluated. The mood there was also one of great disappointment about the results – or rather, lack of results – achieved at the EC summit as regards the former Yugoslavia. The Netherlands would not be able to take diplomatic initiatives in this field until the United States took the lead. It was expected that when this happened the UK, France and Belgium would shift their stance successively in the direction of military intervention. The only thing to be done at the moment, thus, was to wait for the USA. The government meeting feared, in the meantime, that the position adopted by the Twelve would have a demoralizing effect and would damage the credibility of the EC in the eyes of its own citizens. The current position of the European Community was compared with that of Europe in the 1930s.³⁷⁶⁶

One of the ministers made the suggestion during the government meeting that a military peacekeeping force should be stationed in Kosovo and Macedonia as a matter of priority in order to ensure that the violence in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which apparently could not be stopped, did not spread to these regions. It was felt, however, that it would be difficult to get support for this idea in the Netherlands, because the dominant mood was in favour of stopping the violence in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The minister in question felt that this mood was particularly noticeable in Parliament.³⁷⁶⁷ He seems to have forgotten what the government had said on this issue of its own accord during the preceding period.

While the results may have been disappointing in the eyes of the Dutch ministers, the stance taken by Lubbers and Van den Broek in Edinburgh did enjoy wide support from Dutch politicians in general. CDA spokesman Ton de Kok was ‘glad that our government in any case had the courage to say in Edinburgh what had to be done, even though they knew that the representatives of other countries would say nothing and apparently couldn’t care less.’³⁷⁶⁸ A few months later, De Kok would write that the Dutch ministers in Edinburgh ‘went to the limits of political acceptability. Had they gone

³⁷⁶³ TV, RTL4, Avondnieuws (Evening News), 11/12/92, 7.30 pm.

³⁷⁶⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings (16/12/92), cited in De Ruiter, Crisis, p. 379.

³⁷⁶⁵ Max van Weezel and Leonard Ornstein, ‘Lubbers zit er niet om lellen uit te delen’ (Lubbers doesn’t mind giving everyone a clip round the ear), Vrij Nederland, 22/01/93.

³⁷⁶⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 15/12/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷⁶⁷ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 15/12/92, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

³⁷⁶⁸ Martijn Delaere, ‘Eensgezind ten strijde’, Het Binnenhof, 19/12/92. For a further statement from the same author concerning the lack of progress in Edinburgh, see Dutch Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu, 14/12/92, 7.07 am.

one step further, their behaviour would have looked suspiciously like political masochism.’³⁷⁶⁹ Maarten van Traa of the PvdA praised the Dutch attempt to put the topic on the agenda, and ‘the willingness to take risks which I was pleased to see them show. We can demonstrate this further by supplying aircraft, as Ter Beek rightly proposed.’ When the Dutch marines had completed their task in Cambodia, the Netherlands could according to him also offer to contribute combat troops for the operations in the Balkans. ‘Then we will have more than played our part, and will have shown enough readiness to share the risks involved to have a full say in all discussions.’³⁷⁷⁰ Brigadier General (retired) De Vogel - a self-styled spokesman on Defence matters – also expressed his agreement with this approach: ‘This is important, because otherwise we run the risk of appearing to want to take a moral lead without daring to share the risks.’³⁷⁷¹

Vice-premier Wim Kok did not regard the isolation that Lubbers and Van den Broek had experienced in Edinburgh as a reason to change course. A little more than a month after the summit, he said on Dutch radio:

‘Of course, the Netherlands cannot determine what other people think – we are only a medium-sized country in an international context – but we do have the right to our own opinion. And the right to continue our protest. Of course, the Dutch government has done that very clearly on past occasions, but the more the situation there escalates the more important it is that the voice of the Netherlands continues to be heard on the international stage, stating our opinion that things can no longer be left to develop under their own momentum.’³⁷⁷²

While Lubbers and Kok learned nothing from the events of the Edinburgh summit, Van den Broek realized that the Netherlands was not really free to go on airing its opinion on the international stage, no matter what the reaction. He welcomed the growing awareness in Parliament that the Netherlands ‘can no longer permit itself simply to raise an admonishing finger’.³⁷⁷³ But by the time that Van den Broek aired this conclusion, in mid-January 1993, he was no longer a minister.

4. Kooijmans takes over from Van den Broek

His participation at the Edinburgh summit was the last important act of Hans van den Broek as Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs. At that time – but that was ‘the best kept secret in The Hague for years’ – his nomination as European Commissioner for foreign and security policy had already been confirmed. He was replaced as Foreign Minister on 2 January 1993 by Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans, professor of International Law at the University of Leiden and, like Van den Broek, member of the CDA. Since Lubbers’ government had no more than a year and a half to run before the next general election, Kooijmans was regarded as a stopgap appointment when he took office.³⁷⁷⁴ His combination of proven ³⁷⁶⁹ T. de Kok, ‘Haagse politici valt over Bosnië geen passiviteit te verwijten’ (Dutch politicians cannot be accused of passivity about Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 25/03/93.

³⁷⁷⁰ Martijn Delaere, ‘Eensgezind ten strijde’, Het Binnenhof, 19/12/92.

³⁷⁷¹ Martijn Delaere, ‘Eensgezind ten strijde’, Het Binnenhof, 19/12/92. It may be mentioned that Brigadier General (ret) De Vogel had pointed out that military intervention was out of the question not long before that, at a meeting of the Atlantic Commission devoted to the Yugoslav conflict: ‘The terrain and the weather conditions, the multiplicity of parties involved ... and the surfeit of weapons available to the warring factions make successful intervention impossible The same reasons which make military intervention a very tricky business also hamper the present peacekeeping operations There is little point to peacekeeping in this form’ As cited by Venema, Betrokkenheid, p. 9.

³⁷⁷² Radio 1, KRO, Echo, 12/01/93, 7.07 am.

³⁷⁷³ J. Bron Dik, ‘De Hollanditis ligt gelukkig achter ons, er is weer internationaal respect (Thank goodness we are cured of Hollanditis and can once again enjoy international respect)’, CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 4.

³⁷⁷⁴ P. Baehr, ‘Pleitbezorger van de mensenrechten. Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)’ (Human rights advocate Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)), in Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, pp. 283 and 284.

expertise, independence of thought, ability to take quick decisions and the fact that he was not a ‘party baron’ predisposed many in his favour.³⁷⁷⁵ ‘A minister has seldom enjoyed such a smooth honeymoon’, De Telegraaf commented three months after his appointment. He was praised by both left- and right-wing commentators as ‘friendly, inspiring, well balanced, intelligent, courteous, almost charismatic’.³⁷⁷⁶

His main field of expertise as professor was human rights – a subject about which he also had strong personal convictions. He already knew the ministry, and the workings of the civil service system, well from his time as junior minister for disarmament affairs in the ministry of Foreign Affairs during the life of the government led by Joop Den Uyl (1973-1977) when he (Kooijmans) had still been a member of the ARP (the Dutch ‘Anti-Revolutionary’ Party). He had wide international experience, e.g. as delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations (1967, 1973-1976), chairman of the Dutch delegation to the UN Commission for Human Rights (1982-1986 and 1992), chairman of this Commission (1984-1985) and UN observer on torture (1985-1992).

His ambitions as minister were initially modest, since he was well aware of the temporary nature of his appointment.³⁷⁷⁷ The experience of being in government gave him a taste for more, but this was hindered by the fact that the CDA lost its place in the coalition after the general elections of 1994.³⁷⁷⁸ The regal distance Kooijmans kept between himself and the nitty-gritty of politics also applied to the relationship between his department and the ministry of General Affairs (roughly equivalent to the Cabinet Office in the UK), which had been troubled during Van den Broek’s time by the disagreement between the Foreign Minister and Prime Minister Lubbers about who had the last word on foreign policy. Kooijmans also had an appreciably better relationship with Minister Pronk of International Development than his predecessor.³⁷⁷⁹

The department was happy with its new minister because he could listen to his civil servants better than Van den Broek and concentrated on the main lines of policy, leaving departmental staff more room for initiative.³⁷⁸⁰ Kooijmans took decisions on the basis of papers prepared by lower-level civil servants more often than his predecessor had.³⁷⁸¹ Parliament valued the interim minister’s thorough knowledge of his dossiers and his open style of consultation.³⁷⁸²

Kooijmans tried to steer an intermediate course between the pro-Atlantic stance of his predecessor and one with greater stress on a Europe-oriented policy. He was well aware that relations with the USA would be mainly determined by the ability of the European countries to maintain a common policy.³⁷⁸³ Kooijmans’ policy would, however, above all bear the stamp of his specialization as a human rights expert.³⁷⁸⁴ He had already shown as early as 1991 that he was prepared under certain ³⁷⁷⁵ Interviews M. Hennis, 09/03/99 and J.M Vos, 24/06/99.

³⁷⁷⁶ P. Nijman and E. Bode, ‘Tussenpauz denkt al aan verlenging. Hoogleraar Kooijmans heeft het naar zijn zin als minister van Buitenlandse Zaken’ (Stopgap minister is already thinking of prolongation. Professor Kooijmans likes his new job as minister of Foreign Affairs), De Telegraaf, 20/03/93.

³⁷⁷⁷ Interview M. Hennis, 09/03/99.

³⁷⁷⁸ P. Baehr, ‘Pleitbezorger van de mensenrechten. Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)’, in: Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, pp. 292; C. Janssen and T. Ruigrok, ‘Peter Kooijmans’, HP/De Tijd, 12/03/93, p. 16; P. Nijman and E. Bode, ‘Tussenpauz denkt al aan verlenging. Hoogleraar Kooijmans heeft het naar zijn zin als minister van Buitenlandse Zaken’, De Telegraaf, 20/03/93.

³⁷⁷⁹ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99; Casper Janssen & Thomas Ruigrok, ‘Peter Kooijmans’, HP/De Tijd, 12/03/93, p. 16; O. van Boetzelaer, ‘Het is niet zinnig premier grotere rol op buitenlands terrein te ontzeggen’ (It is not a good idea to deny Prime Minister bigger foreign policy role), CD/Actueel, 28/08/93, p. 14.

³⁷⁸⁰ Interviews P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99; J.L. Sandee, 12/06/00; R. Swartbol, 24/02/99; and J.M. Vos, 24/06/99; D. Ishta geciteerd in C. Janssen and T. Ruigrok, ‘Peter Kooijmans’, HP/De Tijd, 12/03/93, p. 16; Dankert in Rehwinkel and Nekkers, Regerendernijds, p. 144.

³⁷⁸¹ Interview K. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

³⁷⁸² P. Baehr, ‘Pleitbezorger van de mensenrechten. Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)’, in Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 291.

³⁷⁸³ P. Baehr, ‘Pleitbezorger van de mensenrechten. Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)’, in Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, pp. 289-290.

³⁷⁸⁴ P. Baehr, ‘Pleitbezorger van de mensenrechten. Pieter Hendrik Kooijmans (1993-1994)’, in Hellema et al. (eds.), Ministers, p. 291; Dankert in Rehwinkel and Nekkers, Regerendernijds, p. 144.

conditions to advocate humanitarian intervention that was not sanctioned by international law. Respect for national sovereignty should not, according to him, be allowed to put a brake on compliance with humanitarian needs.³⁷⁸⁵ Moreover, Kooijmans was a strong advocate of the deployment of Dutch troops in UN peacekeeping operations.³⁷⁸⁶

Before he became Foreign Minister, Kooijmans had been on several missions to Yugoslavia. He had for example been a member of a CSCE mission that visited all the constituent republics and autonomous provinces of Yugoslavia from late 1991 to early 1992 in order to inventory the human rights situation there. He had thus also visited Bosnia on that occasion, and characterized it as ‘a peaceful place’ at that time.³⁷⁸⁷ During that visit, he had however spoken to someone in Sarajevo whose name meant nothing to him at the time, but who struck him by his ‘somewhat pathological style of argument’. He would often encounter this man’s name subsequently. It was Karadzic.³⁷⁸⁸

Later in 1992, Kooijmans also took part as observer on torture in the mission led by Tadeusz Mazowiecki, special reporter to the UN Commission on Human Rights. He had visited Kosovo during this trip. When he later wished to go to Banja Luka, to visit Omarska and Prijedor among other places, he was stopped at the border crossing near the river Una though he had a permit for his visit from the authorities in Pale. This taught him about the apparent existence of separate little ‘kingdoms’ in Srpska.³⁷⁸⁹ At the moment when Prime Minister Lubbers phoned him to ask whether he was prepared to take Van den Broek’s place, Kooijmans was sitting in the Palais des Nations in Geneva, writing his report for the UN Commission on Human Rights.³⁷⁹⁰

5. Appeasement or enforcement?

The passivity the representatives of the Dutch government had encountered in their foreign contacts in December 1992 was motivated by the expectation that the objectives of giving expression to a Greater Serbia idea in Bosnia had already been more or less accomplished, as W.F. Van Eekelen, the Secretary-General of the WEU put it.³⁷⁹¹ This same feeling led the French representative on the WEU Permanent Council to state on 9 December that in his ‘more personal opinion’:

‘“ethnic cleansing” is an irreversible process. The houses of those who have been chased out have after all been destroyed, and such terrible atrocities have been committed that the Displaced Persons will probably refuse to return. One day, we will have to take account of this reality on the ground.’³⁷⁹²

Precisely the same line of reasoning was expressed by the new Dutch Foreign Minister Kooijmans. Van Walsum had a talk with his new political master-to-be on the morning of 29 December, and wasted no time in asking Kooijmans whether he was going to sail an appeasement or enforcement course in dealing with the Yugoslavia dossier. Kooijmans began with a remark which is worth bearing in mind

³⁷⁸⁵ O. van Boetzelaer, ‘Rol Verenigde Naties’ (The role of the United Nations), CD/Actueel, 11/05/91; O. van Boetzelaer, ‘Kooijmans kan de juiste man op de juiste plaats zijn’ (Kooijmans could be the right man at the right place), CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 10; O. van Boetzelaer, ‘Het is niet zinnig premier grotere rol op buitenlands terrein te ontzeggen’, CD/Actueel, 28/08/93, p. 15; M. Meijer, ‘Kooijmans: Verenigde Naties moeten bij vredesoperaties eigen grenzen kennen’ (Kooijmans says United Nations must know its own limits in peacekeeping matters), CD/Actueel, 28/10/95, p. 12.

³⁷⁸⁶ P. Nijman and E. Bode, ‘Tussenpaus denkt al aan verlenging. Hoogleraar Kooijmans heeft het naar zijn zin als minister van Buitenlandse Zaken’, De Telegraaf, 20/03/93.

³⁷⁸⁷ P. Nijman and E. Bode, ‘Tussenpaus denkt al aan verlenging. Hoogleraar Kooijmans heeft het naar zijn zin als minister van Buitenlandse Zaken’, De Telegraaf, 20/03/93. With regard to these CSCE missions, see Terrett, Dissolution, pp. 85-86.

³⁷⁸⁸ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

³⁷⁸⁹ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

³⁷⁹⁰ In this connection see TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5002 (19/05/93).

³⁷⁹¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. Hoekman 676 to Van den Broek, 09/12/92.

³⁷⁹² ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. Hoekman 676 to Van den Broek, 09/12/92.

when considering his future stance. The minister-to-be thought that the argument for appeasement was in any case:

‘difficult to reject, (...) since it was unrealistic to think that the territorial fait accompli would never be recognized. Ethnic cleansing, no matter how detestable it may be, can after all never be completely undone, as it was hardly conceivable that the various ethnic groups would ever be able to live in peace alongside one another after all that had happened.’³⁷⁹³

Van Walsum countered this argument by claiming that the idea that the Serbs had already accomplished their territorial aims and the gains they had achieved must be recognized was an error, ‘since there are still plenty of terrible deeds that can be committed in the name of the Great Serbia idea. There were plenty of people, not only in Belgrade but also here and there among the boundaries of the Twelve, who would not be at all displeased if all Muslims were driven out of the former Yugoslavia.’

Kooijmans also thought that if it proved impossible to achieve international action against Serb expansion and ethnic cleansing, then the arms embargo on the Bosnian Muslims should be lifted.³⁷⁹⁴ This was a fairly original thought in a European context. The American Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger had tried to move the European Community to lift the arms embargo on Bosnia-Herzegovina two weeks before, during the CSCE conference – but without success, since the European countries were of the opinion that such a measure would lead to escalation of the violence caused by the war and would impede the peace negotiations.

6. Panic and the presidential elections in Serbia: a lost chance for the West?

‘If Europe is unable to distinguish between those Bosnian and Serbian leaders who pursue their interests by force of arms and those of us who are seeking to direct Yugoslavia on the path of peace and democracy, then we are all doomed to endless conflict and tragedy in the Balkans.’³⁷⁹⁵

While Kooijmans was getting ready for a peaceful take-over of office from his predecessor Van den Broek in the Netherlands, a fierce struggle for power was being waged in Serbia. Elections were due to be held on 20 December 1992 for the Presidency of Serbia, the federal parliament and the parliaments of Serbia and Montenegro.³⁷⁹⁶

Vance and Owen had hoped that Cosic would challenge Milosevic, but Cosic had stated at the end of October that he would not run as initially announced. The reason for this was his poor health. Cosic, who had already undergone three operations in previous years, had recently been operated on again, this time for a prostate complaint.³⁷⁹⁷ In addition, Cosic’s advisors told him that there was little point in contesting the presidency of Serbia. Even if he did win the election, the expectation was that Milosevic would get himself elected President of Yugoslavia the very next day by the Parliament (which he more or less had in his pocket), thus reversing both the roles and the balance of power.³⁷⁹⁸ Milosevic had already told Panic once, when the latter had expressed his surprise that the Serbian leader had

³⁷⁹³ PRNY. Memorandum from DGPZ to DEU, DAV and DPV, 29/12/92, No. 206/92.

³⁷⁹⁴ PRNY. Memorandum from DGPZ to DEU, DAV and DPV, 29/12/92, No. 206/92.

³⁷⁹⁵ Milan Panic, cited in Marcus Tanner, ‘Panic Exhorts Voters to Choose Peace Over War’, The Independent, 18/12/92.

³⁷⁹⁶ On these elections see e.g. Andrejevich, Radicalization.

³⁷⁹⁷ Owen, Odyssey, pp. 54-55 and 60; Owen CD-ROM. Owen’s Private Secretary to UK, EC Presidency, 26/11/92 re Visit of Lord Owen to Madrid, 25/11/92, 26/11/92; Stojanovic, Autoritet, p. 52; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01; Djukic, Milosevic, p. 60.

³⁷⁹⁸ Interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

agreed to the nomination of Cosic as President of Yugoslavia, that it didn't matter was position he, Milosevic, actually occupied, since he was to the Serbs what Ayatollah Khomeini was to the Iranians.³⁷⁹⁹

Owen saw Federal Premier Milan Panic as the best alternative to Cosic, but considered that, as an outsider in Serbia, he would have no chance in the elections in a straight fight against Milosevic.³⁸⁰⁰ After the London summit, Panic had continued to work to promote agreement between the authorities in Belgrade and other parts of the former Yugoslavia.³⁸⁰¹ In mid-October, for example, he had made an (abortive) attempt to arrange talks with the Albanian leaders in Kosovo. In an address to the European Parliament's Foreign Affairs and Security Committee in November 1992, Panic said that if he managed to introduce democracy in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Bosnia-Herzegovina 'will not disappear. For me, it is another country, and we will recognize it.'³⁸⁰²

Although there had long been speculation that Panic might stand as a candidate for the presidency of Serbia, it was not until 30 November – only three weeks before the date of the elections – that he officially put his name forward, thus formally challenging Milosevic. That was rather late. Moreover, Panic only received open support from President Cosic at the eleventh hour.³⁸⁰³ After his new operation, Cosic was hardly able to support Panic's campaign. Since Cosic's illness and operation had been declared state secret, the public at large could easily interpret his absence during Panic's election meetings as a lack of support for Panic.³⁸⁰⁴ It may be mentioned by the way that sources from Panic's camp did inform the EC missions about the severity of Cosic's medical condition, which might even mean an end to his political career.³⁸⁰⁵ Moreover, Cosic seemed to have got cold feet. His argument that as President of Yugoslavia he should be strictly impartial hardly rings true against the background of the political relations prevailing in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia at the time.³⁸⁰⁶

Panic promised both the Serbian voters and the international community that he would bring peace to the region if he won the elections. However, Western governments doubted whether he had much real power: after all, he had no party organization behind him, and depended on the support of the opposition. An important reason for the lack of confidence in the West about Panic's chances of electoral success was that Milosevic had once again shown clearly on 19 October that when it came to a struggle between himself on the one hand and Cosic and Panic on the other, he had the real power.

On that evening, the Serbian police occupied the Federal police headquarters. This building housed a huge British-made monitoring centre financed in 1990 by all the republics, with wire-tapping facilities making it possible to listen in to forty thousand telephone calls at the same time. It also contained files with details of the organization of paramilitary units and other information Milosevic did not want to fall into the hands of third parties.³⁸⁰⁷ The occupation took place while Cosic and Panic were in Geneva for talks hosted by Owen and Vance. When they complained about the affair to Milosevic on their return, he first pretended to know nothing about it and then treated it as a property question rather than as a veiled coup.³⁸⁰⁸

Cosic and Panic understood that normally speaking, they could not disregard this threat of usurpation. Part of the army would actually have been prepared to intervene and stage a counter-coup, ³⁷⁹⁹ Paul Williams & Norman Cigar, 'Bivsi pravni strucnjaci Pentagona u svojoj stugiji optuzuju: Slobodan Milosevic teski je ratni zlocinac i mora biti izveden pred sud u Haagu!', Globus, 30/08/96, p. 57.

³⁸⁰⁰ Owen CD-ROM. Owen's Private Secretary to UK, EC Presidency, 26/11/92 re Visit of Lord Owen to Madrid, 25/11/92, 26/11/92.

³⁸⁰¹ Cf. MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 64/92, 08/09/92; 68/92, 21/09/92; 74/92, 12/10/92; 5/92, 15/10/92; 80/92, 02/11/92.

³⁸⁰² Cohen, Bonds, p. 273 n. 67.

³⁸⁰³ See also MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 76/92, 20/10/92; 77/92, 22/10/92.

³⁸⁰⁴ Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 182 and 198; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

³⁸⁰⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. Engels 357 to Van den Broek, 23/11/92.

³⁸⁰⁶ Dukic, Vetra, p. 220; Djukic, Milosevic, p. 61; Thomas, Serbia, p. 126.

³⁸⁰⁷ Dukic, Vetra, p. 215; Thomas, Serbia, p. 124.

³⁸⁰⁸ Cf. Djukic, Milosevic, p. 58.

but Cosic and Panic would not have dared to go so far at a moment when Serbs were at war.³⁸⁰⁹ According to Cosic himself, he did visit the General Staff to test their feelings on the matter, but when he asked them for their opinion no one replied. This did not give him the confidence he needed to reverse the action of the Serbian police.³⁸¹⁰ Milosevic had played for high stakes, and had won. This made it perfectly clear how the balance of power in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia lay.

Panic had already asked the West to relax the sanctions before he declared his candidature, as a sign that the population of Serbia and Montenegro could expect better times ahead if they voted for him instead for Milosevic. He did this e.g. in an emotional address to the European Parliament in early November.³⁸¹¹ The Western governments hesitated to support Panic, however,³⁸¹² and announced shortly after his departure from Brussels that the sanctions against Serbia would be tightened.³⁸¹³

Owen, on the other hand, had initially thought that Panic should be given a chance.³⁸¹⁴ He had urged in early October that the sanctions should be relaxed in order to improve the position of Cosic and Panic relative to Milosevic. This move did not appeal to the EC ministers at all, however, as long as the situation in Bosnia showed no marked improvement. British Foreign Minister Douglas Hurd even felt obliged to gloss over Lord Owen's 'can-do' optimism by sketching Owen to his colleagues as 'an active man of independent spirit, who feels the need to put forward controversial ideas from time to time'.³⁸¹⁵ Within the EC, the governments of France, Italy and Spain supported the idea of relaxing the sanctions for humanitarian purposes, e.g. delivering fuel oil for heating, in order to strengthen the position of Cosic and Panic. Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands in particular were against the idea, however.

While Van den Broek had been in New York to attend the UN General Assembly, he had asked Izetbegovic on 22 September what he thought of Panic. The Bosnian President had replied that he was convinced that Panic's intentions were good, but that he did not have much power. According to Izetbegovic, the existing sanctions should be maintained because of the links between the Yugoslav army and the VRS. Van den Broek agreed. He believed that relaxing the sanctions would only strengthen the position of Milosevic and Karadzic.³⁸¹⁶ Another important consideration was his conviction that Cosic and Milosevic largely shared the same views. It appeared from remarks that Cosic had made during a visit to Rome on 26 October that he would like to see Bosnia-Herzegovina divided into three parts; he also warned against the risks of Muslim fundamentalism in the region.³⁸¹⁷ According to Dutch diplomacy, it did not matter so much which particular person was in power at a given time: 'The Serbs have to learn that their behaviour is unacceptable.' This meant that the sanctions should not be relaxed; in fact, the possibility of tightening them should be investigated.³⁸¹⁸ On 16 November the Security Council passed resolution 787, authorizing a tightening of the trade embargo against Serbia and Montenegro that had been instituted in May. This resolution gave NATO and the WEU powers to intercept, search and send back shipping. It also prohibited the transit of a wide range of goods, including oil and petroleum products.

³⁸⁰⁹ Djukic, Milosevic, p. 59; interview V. Matovic, 02/08/01.

³⁸¹⁰ Dukic, Vetra, p. 216.

³⁸¹¹ Nicole Lucas, 'Milan Panic smeekt om steun EG' (Milan Panic begs EC for support), Trouw, 06/11/92.

³⁸¹² MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 66/92, 14/09/92; 68/92, 22/09/92; 69/92, 25/09/92; 71/92, 01/10/92; 76/92, 20/10/92; 82/92, 06/11/92; 83/92, 08/11/92; 85/92, 13/11/92; 87/92, 18/11/92; 91/92, 17/11/92; Carolne de Gruyter, "'Wie de man van de toekomst is? Ik!'" (Who is the man of the future? Me!), Elsevier, 19/12/92, p. 31; interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

³⁸¹³ Frank Westerman, 'Sancties zijn doodsteek voor Panic' (Sanctions are death blow for Panic), de Volkskrant, 10/11/92.

³⁸¹⁴ ABZ, 910 Joegoslavië/algemeen correspondentie/deel 4 juli 1992-febr 1993. Joegoslavië algemene, informele bijeenkomst van Ministers van Buitenlandse Zaken (Gymnich) in Bocket Hall (informal meeting of Foreign Ministers (Gymnich) at Bocket Hall), 12-13/09/92; interview H. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

³⁸¹⁵ ABZ, DEU/2002/0001. Van den Broek 12 to Luxembourg embassy, 06/10/92.

³⁸¹⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05244. Biegman 884 (Van den Broek) to Foreign Affairs, 22/09/92.

³⁸¹⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01802. Hoekman 592 to Van den Broek, 03/11/92; Van den Broek 152 to Belgrade embassy, 06/11/92.

³⁸¹⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. Hoekman 676 to Van den Broek, 09/12/92.

When Panic invited the diplomats present in Belgrade to the celebration of the first hundred days of his government, to be held on 24 October, the reaction of the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs was also very negative. According to Foreign Affairs, there was nothing to celebrate and all that Panic and his associates wanted was recognition of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The British government, which had initially wanted to promote the presence of the European partners as a gesture of support for Panic in his confrontation with Milosevic, finally decided to advise EC member states to disregard the invitation.³⁸¹⁹ As a result, the EC missions did not attend the celebrations, which displeased Panic.³⁸²⁰

However, signals arriving from Yugoslavia in October and later indicated that Panic did definitely have a chance against Milosevic. For example, an opinion poll commissioned by the publication Borba indicated that sixty percent of the inhabitants of Belgrade supported Panic while only 22 percent intended to vote for Milosevic.³⁸²¹ But even this sign of a possible change in what was left of Yugoslavia was not enough to persuade Western governments to adopt a more positive attitude to Panic, who asked in vain for at least a temporary, provisional lifting of the sanctions.³⁸²² The decisive point was that the American government believed that Milosevic would not accept a defeat at the polls by Panic, if this were to happen. Moreover, Washington was unsure whether the Yugoslav army would obey Panic's orders if he were to win the election.³⁸²³

Tension increased as the election date approached. Rumours circulated in Belgrade that the United States and Russia would lift the sanctions if Panic won the election, but would tighten them if Milosevic was re-elected.³⁸²⁴ The West gave no concrete promise to this effect, however, though Owen and Vance did urge the population of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to vote for a policy of peace, and not for one of war.³⁸²⁵ And the governments of the United States and Russia issued a joint statement in which it was said that the Serbian people had the choice between returning to the community of nations and remaining an internationally isolated pariah, with all the economic consequences that entailed.³⁸²⁶

Four days before the elections, on 16 December, US Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger stated during a meeting of the Follow-Up Committee of the Conference on former Yugoslavia that Milosevic, the rabid nationalist Seselj and Karadzic should be put on trial for war crimes: 'They need, especially, to understand that a second Nuremberg awaits the practitioners of ethnic cleansing.' Eagleburger also mentioned war crimes committed by other parties in the Bosnian conflict, e.g. the Bosnian Muslim-Croat camp Celebici, where Serbs were killed in August 1992, and the massacre of sixty Serbian soldiers and civilians in September 1992 in Kamenica (near Srebrenica), for which Bosnian Muslims were responsible.³⁸²⁷

Seselj later stated that this attack by Eagleburger was the secret of his electoral success. According to Seselj, such remarks from one of the leaders of the wicked outside world actually encouraged many Serbs to vote for him. Even democrats in Belgrade believed that these remarks had ³⁸¹⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00085. Engels 317 to Van den Broek, 23/10/92 (two copies with different marginal notes); COREU message The Hague, 23/10/92, cpe/hag 656, COREU message British chairmanship of EC, cpe/pres/lon 1605; COREU message European Commission, 23/10/92, cpe/cee 415; COREU The Hague, 23/10/92, cpe/hag 658.

³⁸²⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. Engels 332 to Van den Broek, 05/11/92.

³⁸²¹ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 72/92, 05/10/92. See also Ramet, Babel, p. 203.

³⁸²² Thomas, Serbia, p. 131.

³⁸²³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Jacobovits 2005 to Van den Broek, 18/12/92.

³⁸²⁴ Cf. MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in voormalig Joegoslavië 72/92, 05/10/92 and ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, deel V-VI, mei 1992-april 1993, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 97/92, 14/12/92.

³⁸²⁵ Owen CD-ROM. Co-Chairmen's message on Yugoslav elections, 15/12/92; Ramcharan, Conference, p. 1220; Eisermann, Weg, p. 146.

³⁸²⁶ Eisermann, Weg, pp. 146-147.

³⁸²⁷ Owen CD-ROM. Intervention by Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger, 16/12/92; Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 232-236; Elaine Sciolino, 'U.S. names figures it wants charged with war crimes', The New York Times, 17/12/92.

only helped Milosevic and Seselj to win votes. Eagleburger himself was unapologetic about the possible adverse side-effects of his statements. He defended himself by saying that it was the last opportunity the administration of President Bush, which had been defeated in the November elections, had to speak out on this issue in front of a forum of this kind. Further, he did not believe that his statements had influenced the result of the election, 'and I frankly don't give a damn if it did because I think it was important to do and I hope we'll do some more of it.'³⁸²⁸

Svetozar Stojanovic, Cosic's foreign affairs advisor, was convinced that a remark of this kind was based on Western calculation. He saw evidence for this idea e.g. in the fact that the American government turned down a proposal from Cosic in the autumn of 1992. This proposal had been contained in a secret message conveyed to Washington at Cosic's request by Scanlan, one of Panic's advisors and former American ambassador in Belgrade, in which the Yugoslav President asked for American support in exchange for improvement of Yugoslav relations with the US.³⁸²⁹ According to Stojanovic, the rejection of this proposal could be explained on the basis of the consideration that, in the view of himself and Cosic, the West preferred to deal with the opportunist Milosevic, who only exploited the Serbian question for his personal ends and changed his standpoint from day to day, than with a confirmed nationalist like Cosic. Unlike the case with Cosic, the West could put Milosevic under pressure regularly by threatening to put him on trial, as Western diplomats had subsequently confirmed to Stojanovic.³⁸³⁰

Even without such a calculation on the part of the Western powers, Panic's election campaign was experiencing enough difficulties. He had to go the Constitutional Court twice after announcing his candidature, because the Electoral Commission initially declared his candidature invalid on the grounds that he had not been resident in Serbia for a full year before the elections. During his very short electoral campaign, Panic did not manage to convince the Kosovo Albanians that a vote for him would mean a major change in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Albanians decided that the elections had nothing to do with them, and decided to boycott them. A further big handicap for Panic during the election campaign was Milosevic's firm grasp of the media; for example, the state television was under Serbian, not Federal, control. Nevertheless, an opinion poll carried out a week before the election still gave Panic a six percent lead on Milosevic.³⁸³¹

What many people who hoped for changed failed to observe, however, was that while Panic had a lot of support in Belgrade and a few other big cities, the Serbian countryside (where media exposure was often limited to Serbian television) remained true to Milosevic.³⁸³² International observers further found evidence of serious electoral fraud.³⁸³³ Milosevic's final share of the votes was somewhat more than 53 percent, with 32 percent for Panic. In view of the handicaps under which Panic had laboured and the fraud committed by Milosevic's camp, it may be concluded that Panic had not done at all badly. Under only slightly different circumstances, Milosevic would have won less than half the votes. This would have made a second round of voting necessary, which would have given Panic a new chance.

Did Panic ever have a real chance of winning? The answer to this question depends on one's assessment of what Milosevic would have done if he had lost the election. Would he have accepted the voice of the electorate, or would he have seized power after all either by changing the constitution or ³⁸²⁸ Don Oberdorfer, 'A Bloody Failure in the Balkans', The Washington Post, 08/02/93.

³⁸²⁹ Interview S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

³⁸³⁰ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 215; Dukic, Vetra, p. 232. Cf. interviews S. Djukic, 04/08/01; S. Stojanovic, 03/08/01.

³⁸³¹ Bosnet, 15/12/92, 8:06:30PST.

³⁸³² Cf. Raymond van den Boogaard, 'Milosevic beheerst de provincie' (Milosevic controls the countryside), NRC Handelsblad, 18/12/92; F. Westerman, "'Milan Panic zal alleen van Belgrado president zijn'" (Milan Panic will only be President of Belgrade), de Volkskrant, 16/12/92; De Hoop, Servië, p. 441.

³⁸³³ Eisermann, Weg, p. 147; Thomas, Serbia, p. 135; Henk Hirs, 'Het is een rommeltje in Servische stembureaus' (Shambles in Serbian polling stations), Trouw, 21/12/92; idem, 'Milan Panic eist nieuwe verkiezingen in Servië' (Milan Panic demands new elections in Serbia), Trouw, 22/12/93. See also Doder and Branson, Milosevic, pp. 168-172; M. van Silfhout, 'Overledenen stemmen bij Servische verkiezingen' (The dead return to vote in Serbian elections), Democraat 26 (1993) 1.

by making use of his support among the police and the military? Western governments believed that he would have taken the latter course, and were therefore not prepared to give Panic any further support. The West was not only disinclined to intervene by use of military force in the developments in the former Yugoslavia; it also hesitated to intervene politically by supporting one of the candidates in the electoral struggle, e.g. by indicating that it might lift sanctions if their preferred candidate won.

Those who had hoped that the ballot box might bring about real change were even more disappointed by the results of the parliamentary elections. Milosevic's Socialist Party won 101 seats, while Seselj's party won another 73. The Serbian electorate was apparently not yet tired of war and nationalism. On 29 December, the parliament, dominated by Milosevic and Seselj, passed a motion of no confidence against Panic. He was allowed to stay on until a successor had been nominated. Milosevic forced him to resign in February 1993, and the pharmaceuticals magnate returned to the United States after six months as Prime Minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Cosic remained in power for longer, but after Panic's departure it was clear that he did not play a significant role. That applied not only to his position in domestic politics: he was also a spent force on the international political scene. At the end of a visit to the European Parliament on 30 March 1993, where he reacted to all criticism by replying that it was not true or that the MEP in question had never experienced the situation on the ground, the Spanish member of the European People's Party Concepcio Ferrer summed up the feeling of the House by telling Cosic: 'We do not speak the same language. That is the worst thing that can happen between peoples. You say you don't understand us. Well, we don't understand you.'³⁸³⁴ With the assistance of Seselj, Milosevic also managed to force Cosic to resign in May 1993, after the latter had been suspected of trying to persuade the army to stage a coup.³⁸³⁵ The man who had been so good at operating behind the scenes had proved that when elected to office, he did not have the skills needed to play the political game according to the rules applying in Belgrade.

7. Conclusion

As Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers said himself, the Dutch government had 'an eccentric foreign policy' with regard to the former Yugoslavia compared with its European partners. Even after the disappointing results at the Edinburgh summit, however, it was not prepared to change course. Both Lubbers and Foreign Minister Van den Broek seemed to expect that the rest of the European Community would follow the Dutch lead sooner or later. The only thing to do at the moment was to wait and see whether the new American government under President Clinton, which was due to take power on 20 January 1993, would follow a more forceful line. The Dutch government expected that if the government in Washington was willing to play a more active role, the British government would play along and other governments would follow in its wake.

The Dutch media, Parliament, the ministry of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Minister Van den Broek shared the idea that Dutch ministers should appeal to public opinion in other European countries over the heads of their own governments. According to some proponents of this activist stance, the governments of these countries should actually be condemned en passant for their hesitation to take action with respect to the former Yugoslavia. In the meantime, the Dutch government was not prepared to try to influence the balance of power in the former Yugoslavia by a more cooperative attitude towards Panic in his electoral battle against Milosevic. Unlike some other European governments, the Dutch government did not expect any positive effect from this move.

On the other hand, the Dutch government did put a lot of energy into promoting the idea of Safe Areas, which it saw not only as a solution of the refugee problem but also as a possible route for action that might break the international stalemate between provision of humanitarian aid and all-out war. At the same time, Director-General for Political Affairs Van Walsum of the Dutch ministry of Foreign Affairs warned that this idea was associated with very high risks. As long as other countries were not prepared to take more military risks in the former Yugoslavia, no real guarantee could be given that the population in the 'Safe Areas' really were safe. Nevertheless, international planning, which had been initiated partly on the urging of the Dutch government, was aiming precisely in the direction of Safe Areas – which were clearly not as well protected as the safe havens which in Van Walsum's opinion offered the only really effective protection under the circumstances. The knowledge that the Netherlands itself could only supply support units and not combat units for the establishment of these areas means that the Dutch government had no other choice than to go along with this proposal even though it was realized that it did not offer the highest possible degree of safety. While the Dutch government tried to promote the realization of this idea on the ground, it was at the same time following quite another route by advocating the effective enforcement of a no-fly zone. The government in The Hague, in this case in particular the ministry of Defence, was rather late in giving signs that it recognized the risks Dutch involvement in such an operation could cause for the UN troops (including Dutch contingents) on the ground. However, the discussions of the establishment of Safe Areas and the enforcement of a no-fly zone above Bosnia, which got going in December 1992, would soon come to a halt as a result of the launching of the Owen/Vance peace plan.

³⁸³⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. Bot 125 to Kooijmans, 01/04/93.

³⁸³⁵ Cohen, Bonds, p. 352; Djukic, Milosevic, p. 62; Ramet, Babel, p. 203; Dukic, Vetra, pp. 227-229; Libal, Serben, pp. 185-186; Stojanovic, Autoritet, pp. 55-56.

Chapter 9

The rapes in Bosnia and the Vance-Owen peace plan, January-February 1993

1. Campaigns in the Netherlands

As mentioned in the previous chapter, churches were seething with activities related to Yugoslavia at the beginning of December 1992. The Secretary of the Raad van Kerken (Dutch Council of Churches), the Reverend W. R. van der Zee, noted with some regret at the time that a petition by the Raad's Ecumenical Campaigns Section and a postcard campaign by the Interkerkelijk Vredesberaad (Interchurch Peace Council Netherlands, IKV) were running in parallel. Van der Zee told the newspaper Trouw that he still wanted to unite the two campaigns under a single name.³⁸³⁶ At the same time Deventer PvdA (Labour) alderman Marian ter Velde came to the conclusion that there were so many Yugoslavia campaigns being run by individuals and small organizations that chaos loomed. She therefore took the initiative to organize a meeting at the RAI Congress Centre in Amsterdam on 12 December, which was intended to stimulate the creation of a co-ordinating point for all campaigns focusing upon the former Yugoslavia. During that meeting it transpired that even more petitions were in circulation, such as one to Junior Minister Hans Van den Broek about rapes with the title 'Meisjes werden geslacht als lammetjes' ('Girls were slaughtered like lambs').³⁸³⁷ Many of the campaigns – to collect clothing or Christmas parcels, for example – were local in nature. In this field, too, the Samenwerkende Hulporganisaties (United Aid Agencies) noted a proliferation of initiatives during December 1992.³⁸³⁸ In short, there was no lack of good intentions and activities.

It is unnecessary, and would be impossible, to mention all these activities here. Below is a concise summary, which has several purposes. Firstly, it is intended to provide some idea of the range of groups in the Netherlands that were focusing upon Yugoslavia, as well as their motives. Secondly, it looks at the nature of the activities being carried out. And thirdly, it provides an insight into the main areas upon which those activities focused at that time.

Not surprisingly given what was happening in the former Yugoslavia, the events there were a subject of interest for the Dutch peace movement and in particular for the two largest religious peace organizations, Pax Christi and the IKV.

Pax Christi

Pax Christi was active with regard to Bosnia-Herzegovina from the beginning of the war there.³⁸³⁹ A delegation from this peace movement was actually in Sarajevo between 3 and 11 April 1992, when the hostilities in the region broke out. The organization had a separate 'Working Group on Central Europe and the Balkans, the members of which included Jan ter Laak, Secretary of Pax Christi. Both the international organization and the Dutch section regularly held public meetings, as well as arranging visits by and to Yugoslavs. The movement maintained contacts with the Serbian Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches in Yugoslavia. Contacts were later also established with the Muslim community. Pax Christi Netherlands participated in various demonstrations alongside other groups and sent letters to the government about ethnic cleansing, the reception of refugees and the need for safe havens. On 31

³⁸³⁶ 'Militair ingrijpen moet'. Kerken luiden noodklokken over Bosnië-Herzegovina' ('Military intervention a must'. Churches sound alarm bells over Bosnia-Herzegovina'), Trouw, 04/12/92.

³⁸³⁷ 'Coördinatie moet chaos bij hulp aan Joegoslavië voorkomen' ('Co-ordination needed to prevent chaos in aid to Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 14/12/92.

³⁸³⁸ Romana Abels, 'Heel Nederland zamelt in' ('All the Netherlands is collecting'), Trouw, 12/12/92.

³⁸³⁹ For more details of this organization's activities, see its publications listed in the bibliography.

July 1992, for instance, the Dutch section of Pax Christi wrote to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Junior Minister of Justice to point that the Netherlands had, relatively speaking, accepted only one fifth of the number of refugees taken in by Germany. The Netherlands and the other EC countries were urged to match German efforts.³⁸⁴⁰

Despite all these endeavours, Pax Christi Secretary Jan Ter Laak had to admit in early 1993 that the peace movement had been taken by surprise by the war in Yugoslavia. Since 1970, the organization had been building up contacts in Eastern Europe, an example followed ten years later by the IKV. Yugoslavia, however, had been neglected. Only in late 1989 had Pax Christi begun to pay attention to the Kosovo question, when a delegation of Kosovo Albanians visited the Netherlands at Pax Christi's invitation. Ter Laak described the fact that there was no Pax Christi organization in predominantly Catholic Croatia as 'remarkable'. He also noted that the IKV was more divided than was Pax Christi by discussions as to whether active military intervention in Bosnia was permissible. In April 1992, following his return from Sarajevo, he had himself said that he was not opposed in principle to this.

The Helsinki Citizens' Assembly (HCA), an international organization for peace and human rights founded in Prague in 1990 and to which both Pax Christi and the IKV were affiliated, had been concerned about the situation in Yugoslavia even before conflict broke out there.³⁸⁴¹ On 7 July 1991, shortly after the outbreak of war in Slovenia, the HCA organized a meeting in Belgrade under the title 'Disintegration of Yugoslavia – Integration of Europe', attracting about 150 participants from throughout Yugoslavia and from many European nations, the United States and Canada. One of them was the Bosnian academic Zdravko Grebo, who at the event warned that Bosnia-Herzegovina could not exist without Yugoslavia and that if the two were to split it would lead to a major catastrophe.³⁸⁴² As early as May 1991 the HCA had founded 'The Balkans' Peace and Integration Project', through which it tried to organize democratic groups in the region to maintain contacts with one another across national boundaries, frontlines and ethnic divisions. In so doing the HCA looked mainly to the lower echelons of Yugoslav society, since it believed that the atmosphere at the highest levels had already become too poisoned by ethnic nationalism. A culminating point in these activities came on 5-8 November 1992, with the 'Citizens' and Municipal Peace Conference' held at Ohrid in Macedonia. This meeting called for 'protected zones' under the auspices of the EC and the UN in both Bosnia-Herzegovina and the United Nations Protected Areas (UNPAs) in Croatia. Such areas should be demilitarized and efforts made to restore community life, the economy, government and justice. The Conference identified Sarajevo and Tuzla as cities which might be suitable for such an approach.³⁸⁴³ On 16 March 1993, the Vereeniging Hugo de Groot (Hugo Grotius Association) was founded as the Dutch arm of the Helsinki Citizens' Assembly. This focused entirely upon Yugoslavia, with its activities including encouragement of the democratic media and support for women who had been raped.

The IKV

The Interkerkelijk Vredesberaad (Interchurch Peace Council Netherlands, IKV), which in the early 1980s had brought throngs of people onto the streets to protest against cruise missiles, was – as has already been discussed several times – under fire from all sides in the media because it was playing no conspicuous part in the Yugoslavia issue and had been unable to mobilize any demonstrators (see Chapters 3 and 6).³⁸⁴⁴ Although approximately two thirds of respondents in opinion polls since the ³⁸⁴⁰ Pax Christi International, Cry, pp. 20-21.

³⁸⁴¹ For a summary of HCA's activities pertaining to (former) Yugoslavia, see Ter Veer, Assembly, pp. 175-179.

³⁸⁴² S. Licht, 'Yugoslavia and Europe. What are the lessons Europe should learn?', Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, pp. 26-27; ditto, 'The book for peace', ibidem, p. 187.

³⁸⁴³ 'Final Declaration of the Citizens and Municipal Peace Conference CPC and MPC', Palau & Kumar (eds.), Ex-Yugoslavia, pp. 174, 181-183.

³⁸⁴⁴ See also, for example, H. Leber, 'Laat ze de oorlog uitvechten' ('Let them fight out the war'), Tweentsche Courant, 05/08/92; Schennink, Bosnië-Herzegovina, pp. 198-199.

summer of 1992 had been in favour of military intervention, it did indeed remain difficult to organize demonstrations about the situation in Yugoslavia. At those that were held, the number of participants often barely exceeded 100. The largest demonstration to date had taken place in early September 1991 to mark the opening of the Conference on Yugoslavia in The Hague. That attracted 10,000 people, but virtually all of them came from the former Yugoslavia. Dutch citizens were often few and far between at the other protests, too.³⁸⁴⁵ On Saturday 6 February 1993, a demonstration in Amsterdam organized by the 'Committee to Stop the Murders in Bosnia' attracted almost 10,000 protestors – who according to the press were all Muslims. Amongst other things, they were demanding military intervention in Bosnia and protesting against the rape of Bosnian women.³⁸⁴⁶ Less than two weeks later, a total of almost 3000 former Yugoslavs demonstrated at nine locations across the Netherlands against ethnic cleansing and for the demolition of the concentration camps.³⁸⁴⁷ Two days later came a national demonstration in Haarlem by approximately 2000 Bosnian refugees from asylum centres. They called upon 'Europe and the world' to stop the aggression in Bosnia-Herzegovina.³⁸⁴⁸

Mi za Mir

On 3 October 1992, the Mi za Mir ('We for Peace') movement organized a 'solidarity meeting' on Dam Square in Amsterdam.³⁸⁴⁹ Ma za Mir had been founded almost a year earlier, on 13 October 1991, by young Serbians and Croatians who had fled to the Netherlands to escape the war and conscription. They were joined later by young Yugoslav Muslims. The objective of this movement, which began with 40 members and would eventually have some 150, was to make a contribution to ending the war and to preventing its spread to other parts of the former Yugoslavia. It also wanted to take in more people who had fled the violence.³⁸⁵⁰ Because it was the only ethnically-mixed peace movement of former Yugoslavs outside the region itself, Ma za Mir acted as a co-ordination point for reports about the war on behalf of radio stations and independent journalists in the former Yugoslavia. It also co-ordinated simultaneous demonstrations in different Yugoslav cities from Amsterdam. The movement organized regular discussion evenings, which were attended mainly by other young Yugoslavs.³⁸⁵¹ In the first year of its existence, Ma za Mir made a vain call to young Dutch people for solidarity.³⁸⁵² A protest by the group at the Beursplein in Amsterdam on 14 August 1992 attracted less than 100 demonstrators, hardly any of them Dutch.

However, the action organized by Ma za Mir on 3 October 1992 in solidarity with the victims of the war in the former Yugoslavia was able to count upon broad support from groups including the Vereniging Dienstweigeraars (Dutch Association of Conscientious Objectors), the Amsterdams Studentenpastoraat (Amsterdam Student Chaplaincy), the IKV, Pax Christi, Vrouwen voor Vrede (Women for Peace), the Steunpunt Vredesgroepen in Voormalig Joegoslavië (Support Centre for Peace Groups in the ³⁸⁴⁵ See, for example, Rob Meines, 'Even schrikken in Den Haag' ('A fright for The Hague') and ditto, 'EG-conferentie opent met harde beschuldigingen' ('EC conference opens with serious accusations'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/91.

³⁸⁴⁶ 'Bijna tienduizend moslims protesteren tegen gruweldaden in Bosnië' ('Almost 10,000 Muslims protest against atrocities in Bosnia'), ANP, 06/02/93, 16:52.

³⁸⁴⁷ 'Ex-Joegoslaven demonstreren in Den Bosch en Roermond' ('Former Yugoslavs demonstrate in Den Bosch and Roermond'), ANP, 18/02/93, 18:28 and 'Demonstraties ex-Joegoslaven' ('Former Yugoslavs demonstrate') ANP, 18/02/93, 20:19.

³⁸⁴⁸ 'Europa met elke doodgevroren Bosniër een illusie armer' ('Every Bosnian frozen to death makes Europe one illusion the poorer'), Trouw, 22/02/93.

³⁸⁴⁹ I. Jungschleger, 'Joegoslavische vredesgroep hoopt op steun jongeren' ('Yugoslav peace group hopes for youth support'), de Volkskrant, 05/10/92.

³⁸⁵⁰ NIOD, Coll. Blaauw., Mi za Mir to Weisglas, 09/12/91.

³⁸⁵¹ Anet Bleich, 'Hoe krankzinniger, hoe meer steun' ('The crazier they are, the more support they get'), de Volkskrant, 04/02/92. For more on this movement, see also Alfred van Cleef, 'Bruggehoofd voor vrede in Joegoslavië' ('Bridgehead for peace in Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/06/92.

³⁸⁵² Hugo Camps, 'Onze onverschilligheid is dodelijk voor Oost-Europa' ('Our indifference is deadly for Eastern Europe'), Elsevier, 24/10/92, p. 39.

former Yugoslavia), Vrouwen tegen Kernwapens (Women Against Nuclear Weapons) and the Doopsgezinde Vredesgroep (Mennonite Peace Group).

The peace movement gropes and fumbles

Notwithstanding that support, the turnout on the day was so miserable that the weekly Vrij Nederland, writing about the IKV's participation in the demonstration, mused that the organization would 'think three times' before using this means again.³⁸⁵³ The IKV now turned all its attention to the HCA's postcard campaign for open borders and safe havens (see Chapter 8).³⁸⁵⁴ This international action would eventually elicit some 160,000 cards, a large proportion of them from the Netherlands. Earlier in the same year, at the end of October, Amnesty International had also organized a letter-writing and postcard campaign calling upon the Dutch people to demand in their own words that the parties negotiating in Geneva protect human rights.³⁸⁵⁵

It seemed to be difficult to find appropriate forms of action. Another project devised by the IKV was an attempt to bring schools in the Netherlands and the former Yugoslavia into contact with one another. But IKV Secretary Mient Jan Faber complained in autumn 1992 that when he had asked the fifth form of a secondary school in Maassluis what Yugoslavia meant to them, he had received the reply, 'Holiday, mountains and lovely sea, sir'.³⁸⁵⁶ Even within the IKV, the fire had died: 'There is still sympathy with Yugoslavia, but it doesn't come out in any concrete form.'³⁸⁵⁷ Faber resisted the black-and-white view that the Serbs were solely and completely in the wrong, and the Croats unblemished, and turned on CDA (Christian Democrat Party) MEP Arie Oostlander, 'who regards Mr Izetbegovic, the President of Bosnia, as the one who is being sacrificed and so must be defended.'³⁸⁵⁸

Faber was also an opponent of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro, because he believed that they were driving the population into the arms of the extremists and were unfair to the democrats still remaining in those regions. His constantly recurring complaint was that Western politicians and diplomats spoke only with nationalist leaders and not with democratic forces. Meanwhile, he did maintain contacts with representatives of churches, peace groups and democrats in the former Yugoslavia, but with many difficulties: 'We carry on, even though we are sometimes fighting a losing battle.'³⁸⁵⁹

A major protest planned by the IKV in Brussels in spring 1994 failed due to differences of opinion with Pax Christi and other, smaller peace groups over the desirability of military intervention and an international demonstration.³⁸⁶⁰ Moreover, the objective of the demonstration – to encourage the international community to take seriously agreements made with the warring parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina – seemed to have been achieved when NATO issued an ultimatum calling for the withdrawal of heavy weapons following the attack on the market in Sarajevo on 5 February 1994.³⁸⁶¹

³⁸⁵³ Ingrid Harms & Ursula den Tex, 'Kan de hulpverlening nog hulp verlenen?' ('Can the aid agencies still deliver aid?'), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 26.

³⁸⁵⁴ See also 'Kaartactie voor safe havens Bosnië krijgt veel respons' ('Huge response to postcard campaign for safe havens in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 19/12/92.

³⁸⁵⁵ See, for example, the advertisement 'Mensenrechten zonder grenzen. Kom in actie voor Joegoslavië?' ('Human rights without frontiers. Take action for Yugoslavia'), de Volkskrant, 23/10/92.

³⁸⁵⁶ Hugo Camps, 'Onze onverschilligheid is dodelijk voor Oost-Europa' ('Our indifference is deadly for Eastern Europe'), Elsevier, 24/10/92, p. 39.

³⁸⁵⁷ Hugo Camps, 'Onze onverschilligheid is dodelijk voor Oost-Europa', Elsevier, 24/10/92, p. 40.

³⁸⁵⁸ J. Lagendijk, 'Herstel de multi-etnische samenleving!' ('Restore the multiethnic society'), de Helling, 5(1992) 3, pp. 11-12.

³⁸⁵⁹ C. Brendel, 'Boycot van Joegoslavië is onrechtvaardig: Faber: Vooral democratische en vredelievende krachten worden getroffen' ('Boycott of Yugoslavia is unjust. Faber: democratic and peace-loving forces are hardest hit'), Algemeen Dagblad, 10/06/92.

³⁸⁶⁰ J. van Nederpelt and T. Pitstra, 'Joegoslavië. De pacifistische valkuilen van GroenLinks' ('Yugoslavia: GroenLinks' pacifist pitfalls'), de Helling, 9(1996) 2, p. 29; Schennink, Betrokkenheid, pp. 232-233.

³⁸⁶¹ Schennink, Betrokkenheid, p. 232.

And Faber, who had been one of the first interventionists, had faced criticism within the IKV itself in autumn 1992 from members who continued to assume a pacifistic standpoint (see also Chapter 8).³⁸⁶²

Politicians grope and fumble, too

‘Five-hundred thousand people demonstrated against cruise missiles (...) Only a few people are demonstrating against the genocide in Bosnia-Hercegovina,’ wrote Ton de Kok in December 1992.³⁸⁶³ A month later he remarked that if Dutch society really was in favour of military intervention in Bosnia, then ‘public opinion should express that far more clearly’.³⁸⁶⁴ But it was not easy for the IKV and other groups to organize demonstrations. The protests against the war in Yugoslavia were, after all, as the political scientist Andries van den Broek wrote at the beginning of 1992, already supported by the entire Dutch political establishment, including the government. ‘What particular, distinctive note did the peace movement have to add to this?’, he asked.³⁸⁶⁵

GroenLinks (Green Left) MP Leoni Sipkes also highlighted this problem. ‘You were fine! You didn’t have to demonstrate against the Dutch government, because we pretty much agreed with it. But as a parliamentarian, and as an ordinary citizen, you felt absolutely powerless.’³⁸⁶⁶ The Dutch government wanted action, but its European partners did not. With that in mind, Sipkes and PvdA MP Jantien Achttienribbe-Buijs decided on 11 December 1992 to send a letter to all their female fellow parliamentarians in the other EC member states and at the European Parliament. This asked them to ‘make every effort to create safe havens in the former Yugoslavia so that basic human rights can be restored there’ and to support the acceptance of refugees, in particular women who had been sexually abused.³⁸⁶⁷

In general, the activities of the national political parties with respect to Yugoslavia were, unlike the contributions from their parliamentary groups, modest in nature. The most active was GroenLinks. In a policy decision about the situation in the former Yugoslavia taken at the end of August 1992, the party executive backed the UN Security Council resolutions demanding access to all prison camps and calling for the possible military protection of aid convoys in Bosnia. Amongst other things, the GroenLinks leaders also demanded stronger checks upon observance of the economic sanctions against Serbia. Because the situation in Bosnia subsequently deteriorated further, the party executive hardened its standpoint in early December 1992. The GroenLinks leadership, which – as it had demonstrated at the time of the Gulf War – still contained a strongly pacifist element, now demanded strict enforcement of the no-fly zone over Bosnia, ‘if necessary by the downing of aircraft which violate this ban’, an extension to the mandate of the UN troops escorting aid convoys, the transfer of prisoners to camps under international supervision and the creation of UN-mandated safe havens in Bosnian territory. On Thursday 17 December, the party organized a march in Amsterdam with torches and candles to show its solidarity with the people of Bosnia-Hercegovina.

This was the first in a series of torchlight marches, silent demonstrations and prayer services held during December 1992 and January 1993. Locations included The Hague, Utrecht and Westerbork (formerly the site of a Nazi deportation camp); the participants were Pax Christi, the Anti-Discriminatie ³⁸⁶² See also H. Feddema, ‘Debat over militair ingrijpen verlamt de vredesbeweging’ (‘Debate on military intervention paralyzes the peace movement’), Trouw, 24/10/92.

³⁸⁶³ Ton de Kok, ‘Voormalig Joegoslavië. Militaire interventie is nu te laat’ (‘Former Yugoslavia: too late now for military intervention’), CD/Actueel, 12/12/92, p. 8.

³⁸⁶⁴ ‘Joegoslavië’ (‘Yugoslavia’), CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 18.

³⁸⁶⁵ Andries van den Broek, ‘Aan burgeroorlog in Joegoslavië valt voor vredesbeweging weinig eer te behalen’ (‘Little honour for peace movement over civil war in Yugoslavia’), de Volkskrant, 06/01/92. Schennink, Betrokkenheid, p. 230, also cites the drive of the Dutch government and elected representatives as a cause of the lack of political initiative in relation to (former) Yugoslavia by campaign groups.

³⁸⁶⁶ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

³⁸⁶⁷ NIOD, Coll. GroenLinks, dossier ‘Yugoslavia – Women’. J. Achttienribbe-Buijs and L. Sipkes to colleagues, 11/12/92; interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

Overleg (Anti-Discrimination Platform), Vrouwen tegen Kernwapens (Women Against Nuclear Weapons) and the Appèlgroep Westerbork (Westerbork Protest Group). These actions were co-ordinated by the provisional 'peace movement co-ordination centre' Samen voor Vrede (Together for Peace), participants in which included Vrouwen voor Vrede, the Amsterdamse Vrouwen Initiatiefgroep (Amsterdam Women's Initiative Group) and Women's Exchange Programme International. These silent demonstrations attracted more participants than was usually for protests against the wars in the former Yugoslavia. The first, on 26 December 1992, was attended by 4000 people.³⁸⁶⁸ From then on, the Appèlgroep Westerbork organized such an event on the last Sunday of each month. These continued to draw more people than most demonstrations: 5000 on 31 January and 2500 on 28 February 1993.³⁸⁶⁹

Additionally, GroenLinks joined the IKV/HCA postcard campaign demanding safe havens and open borders for refugees from the former Yugoslavia. Despite its higher degree of activism compared with other parties, some dissatisfaction did arise within GroenLinks' own ranks about the amount of its commitment to issues related to the former Yugoslavia. There was a prevailing sense of political paralysis, and no open discussion on the subject was triggered beyond the parliamentary party and the executive.³⁸⁷⁰ This was in marked contrast with GroenLinks' equivalent in Germany, the Grünen, which was actually in danger of splitting into Pazifisten and Bellizisten ('Pacifist' and 'Belligerent') factions.³⁸⁷¹ In a later analysis, GroenLinks senator Ton Pitstra and Jacques van Nederpelt, Lecturer in International Economic Relations at the Hogeschool van Utrecht, wrote in 1996:

'Instead of issuing firm statements as they did during the Cold War ("The Netherlands out of NATO!"), people in progressive circles now often keep their opinions to themselves. Rather than clear choices and slogans like 'Boycott Outspan!', there was now confusion and silence. The warm feeling of belonging which had united the Left during the turbulent years of the demonstrations against cruise missiles was lacking.'³⁸⁷²

On 28 November 1992, shortly before the PvdA Party Conference passed its resolution about the former Yugoslavia on 12 December (Chapter 8), the CDA Party Council adopted a resolution urging the governments of the European Community to be more generous in opening their borders to refugees from the former Yugoslavia than had been the case up until then. However, the CDA also came up against the inconsistency that seemed to exist between clear interventionist standpoints and a lack of political activism when it came to the former Yugoslavia. For example, the party was forced to cancel a planned public meeting on the issue – at which such political heavyweights as Professor H. J. Neuman, Chair of the CDA Foreign Affairs Committee, Minister Hans van den Broek and Member of Parliament Jaap De Hoop Scheffer were due to speak³⁸⁷³ – because of 'a very disappointing number of registrations'.³⁸⁷⁴ However, on 12 February 1993 a conference did go ahead on 'The National Question and the Violence in Yugoslavia'. This was organized by the CDA Academic Institute, in conjunction with the party's Foreign Affairs Committee and the European People's Party group in the European ³⁸⁶⁸ See also, for example, the advertisement placed by the Appèlgroep Westerbork to publicize this silent demonstration in Trouw, 19/12/92.

³⁸⁶⁹ 'Vijfduizend demonstranten tegen oorlog op Balkan' ('Five thousand demonstrate against war in Balkans'), ANP, 31/01/93, 19:05. See also 'Plan voor landelijke actie evacuatie gevangenkampen ex-Joegoslavië' ('Plan for national campaign to evacuate prison camps in former Yugoslavia'), ANP, 29/01/93, 14:17; 'Demonstratie 2500 mensen tegen oorlog op Balkan' ('Two-and-a-half thousand people demonstrate against war in Balkans'), ANP, 28/02/93, 20:26.

³⁸⁷⁰ Cf. Max Arian, 'Pacifiste' ('Pacifist'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 17/03/93.

³⁸⁷¹ Cf. W. Beusekamp, 'Duitse leger moet naar Bosnië' ('German army must go to Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 04/02/93.

³⁸⁷² Jacques van Nederpelt & Tom Pitstra, 'Joegoslavië: De pacifistische valkuilen van GroenLinks', de Helling, 9(1996)2, p. 29.

³⁸⁷³ NIOD, Coll. CDA. CDA Secretariat, Foreign Affairs Committee, Conferences 1991-1992, J.W. Wiggers to various, 22/09/92, H2.432/92/JG.

³⁸⁷⁴ Ditto, Wiggers to various, 01/10/92, H2.450/92/JJ.

Parliament. The speakers included Minister Peter Kooijmans, MEP Arie Oostlander and Pax Christi Secretary Jan Ter Laak.³⁸⁷⁵

As well as the established peace movement, smaller groups were also active – many focusing specifically upon the former Yugoslavia. For example, the activist movement Tilburg Za Mir (Tilburg for Peace), founded in 1992, provided material and moral support to independent peace, women's and human rights groups and media in the former Yugoslavia. It originally concentrated upon Croatia, Kosovo and Vojvodina, but later upon Bosnia-Herzegovina too. The movement organized visits by Yugoslavs to the Netherlands, raised funds and acted as an intermediary between organizations inside and outside Yugoslavia. Another movement, Lopend Vuur (Wildfire), was also founded in 1992 following a contact mission by a number of people from the Netherlands to various peace groups in the former Yugoslavia. This organization tried to support groups there that were working for a peaceful, democratic and tolerant society. It eventually developed 18 local sections, in places including Amsterdam, The Hague, Deventer, Enschede, Groningen, Maastricht, Nijmegen and Rotterdam, each of which maintained its own contacts with groups in Yugoslavia. Again, these were mainly in Croatia, Kosovo, Vojvodina and Macedonia.

In partnership with Lopend Vuur, from mid 1992 the group Socia Media distributed, by electronic means, information about the former Yugoslavia which was not being covered in the established media. According to its own mission statement, this was intended to dispel the ignorance and confusion surrounding the former Yugoslavia, and the apathy about the war in Bosnia.³⁸⁷⁶ Another press-related group, but this time one providing support to independent media in the former Yugoslavia, was Press Now. Founded in April 1993, this was based at De Balie in Amsterdam and counted Minister Kooijmans amongst the members of its Recommending Committee.

Whilst some peace groups or individuals within them evolved towards an interventionist standpoint in response to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, there were others which adopted such a stance from the outset. One such was the purely interventionist Comité voor krachtig militair ingrijpen in voormalig Joegoslavië (Committee for Forceful Military Intervention in the Former Yugoslavia), which was founded on 25 November 1992 and from the end of 1993 would be called Politiek Comité Stari Most (Old Bridge Political Committee). Its main activity was campaigning for an end to the weapons embargo against Bosnia-Herzegovina, for the relief of besieged cities, for the closure of concentration camps, for the creation of protected areas, and for military intervention to prevent the violence spreading to Kosovo, Vojvodina and Macedonia. The Committee demonstrated in The Hague on 16 January 1993, attracting between 100 and 150 supporters. Arie Oostlander addressed the demonstrators on the Binnenhof (The Hague).³⁸⁷⁷

Another rally was organized for 13 March 1993, on Dam Square in Amsterdam. This attracted 200 people and was addressed by VVD (Liberals) MP Jan Dirk Blaauw.³⁸⁷⁸ The Hilversum GroenLinks councillor Iede de Vries went even further, in autumn 1993 founding the Comité Verdedig Bosnië-Herzegovina (Defend Bosnia-Herzegovina Committee) which collected money for the Bosnian government to buy weapons.³⁸⁷⁹ Then there was the Comité Voormalig Joegoslavië (Former Yugoslavia Committee), which was launched on 12 May 1992 to lobby politicians to take a stand against ethnic cleansing and division.

³⁸⁷⁵ See, for example, Rob Meines, 'Europa verlamd door doemdenken over Joegoslavië' ('Europe paralysed by doom-mongering over Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 15/02/93.

³⁸⁷⁶ <http://www.sociamedia.nl/~boyd/datacom/joego/joego1.html> consulted on 07/12/01; Boyd Noorda to NIOD, 28/07/99.

³⁸⁷⁷ 'Demonstratie voor militair ingrijpen voormalig Joegoslavië' ('Demonstration for military intervention in former Yugoslavia'), ANP, 16/01/93, 15:35; 'Roep om ingrijpen in ex-Joegoslavië' ('Call for intervention in former Yugoslavia'), Algemeen Dagblad, 18/01/93.

³⁸⁷⁸ Politiek Comité Stari Most, Background, 25/11/99; Max Arian, 'Pacifiste', De Groene Amsterdammer, 17/03/93; Caspar ten Dam, 'Sarajevo-complex' ('Sarajevo complex'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/04/95.

³⁸⁷⁹ Jacques van der Bragt, 'Wapens tegen machteloosheid' ('Weapons against powerlessness'), HP/De Tijd, 19/11/93, pp. 14-15.

As well as those movements concerned mainly with idealistic goals, a large number of organizations focused upon material aid. Several of these had their origins in activities by Croatians and Bosnians resident in the Netherlands. For example, on 25 October 1991 a group of Croatians living in and around The Hague formed the Stichting Vrienden van Kroatië/Zaklada Prijatelji Hrvatske (Friends of Croatia Foundation) to alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Croatia by collecting money and supplies from individuals and businesses. At the end of September 1992, Islam Telalovic – a Bosnian Muslim by origin – founded the Stichting Hulp aan Bosnië en Hercegovina (Aid to Bosnia and Hercegovina Foundation) in his adopted hometown of Rotterdam. Over the next few years this would send private aid convoys to Bosnia, mainly to the town of Zenica.³⁸⁸⁰ Early in 1993 Vrienden van La Benovolencija (Friends of La Benovolencija) was set up in the Netherlands to help the Jewish aid organization in Sarajevo which benefited from its ‘neutral’ position between the main ethnic groups in Bosnia.³⁸⁸¹

As well as activities focusing specifically upon Yugoslavia, established aid agencies such as the Nederlandse Rode Kruis (Dutch Red Cross) and Artsen zonder Grenzen (Médecins Sans Frontières Netherlands) tried to offer relief in the region. For example, between late 1991 and summer 1993 Stichting Mensen in Nood (Caritas Netherlands) sent NLG 6.4 million worth of food, medicines, clothing and the like to the former Yugoslavia. The bulk of this went to Bosnia and Croatia. During the same period, the Stichting Oecumenische Hulp (Dutch Interchurch Aid, SOH) provided support worth NLG 2.7 million and the Stichting Memisa Medicus Mundi (Memisa World Medical Foundation) offered NLG 2.4 million in medical assistance.³⁸⁸²

To summarize, it can be stated that up until the end of 1992 the principal themes of campaigns were peace initiatives, pleas for intervention and material aid. The means used by the campaign groups consisted mainly of writing open letters and media correspondence, collecting signatures on petitions, maintaining contacts with pro-democracy and peace groups in the former Yugoslavia and collecting cash and goods for direct aid. Demonstrations seemed less effective as a campaigning tool, probably in part because the Dutch public was under the impression that its own government did not need persuading in the same way as it had done during the Vietnam War and cruise missile debate.

The majority of public campaigning in the Netherlands would not begin until autumn 1993, at a time when the definitive decision to send an active-service unit had already been (more or less) taken. In any case, many of those activities were local in nature.³⁸⁸³

2. Rapes in Bosnia: a new theme in the media

Intensification in public campaigns was discernible in December 1992. Several factors played a part in this, including the more urgent need for aid with the impending onset of winter in Bosnia and the approach of the festive season. It was no coincidence that several campaigns were concentrated around Christmas. Moreover, like the Dutch government various groups saw a concrete opportunity for action in the call for safe havens. This had a greater appeal than enforcement of a no-fly zone or heavy weapons monitoring. From autumn 1992 the issue of women being raped in Bosnia-Hercegovina became a new theme in the public campaigns being conducted in the Netherlands.

In the period shortly before Christmas advertisements appeared in four major national newspapers³⁸⁸⁴ with the slogan ‘Stop (sexual) violence against women and girls in the former Yugoslavia’. This campaign was jointly organized by Medusa/Metis/Arachne in Utrecht and Vrouwen voor Vrede in Amsterdam.

³⁸⁸⁰ Interview I. Telalovic, 21/10/99.

³⁸⁸¹ Max Arian, ‘La Benovolencija’, De Groene Amsterdammer, 09/06/93, pp. 9-10.

³⁸⁸² NIOD, Coll. Blaauw. Mensen in Nood, etc. to the Parliamentary Permanent Committee on Foreign Affairs, 27/07/93.

³⁸⁸³ For an overview of public campaigns, see Pax Christi, Oorlog.

³⁸⁸⁴ NRC Handelsblad, Het Parool, Trouw and de Volkskrant.

One week after his appointment as Minister for Foreign Affairs, a highly emotional³⁸⁸⁵ Peter Kooijmans attended a demonstration of 800 people protesting against the rape of Bosnian women, at which he accepted two petitions containing 20,000 signatures. These demanded the closure of the camps in Bosnia and aid for women who had been raped, as well as the recognition of rape as a war crime.³⁸⁸⁶ Kooijmans himself did not need to be convinced. He declared that he had already – late in 1992, when he had carried out research into human-rights abuses in the former Yugoslavia together with Tadeusz Mazowiecki – concluded that the rapes committed during the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina had assumed a systematic character and were being used as a weapon.³⁸⁸⁷ The minister declared that the Netherlands would pay particular attention to this group of women within its existing asylum policy.

Below we shall examine the interest in the subject of rapes in Bosnia which existed from late 1992 in both the United States and Europe, and in particular in the Netherlands. This concern would reach its height during the first two months of 1993. The primary point considered is the extent to which reports about rapes contributed to an increased readiness to intervene – militarily or otherwise – in Bosnia, or to create safe havens for those under threat. A second consideration is how much this reporting created an even more negative image of the Serbs. Other interesting issues, such as the question as to the relationship between information about rapes and the establishment of a tribunal to try war crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia, will not be considered in great detail here. Moreover, it must be emphasized that we have carried out no independent investigation into the rapes in Bosnia. We are primarily concerned with the reporting of and debate about them in the West, and the possible repercussions thereof for Western policy towards the former Yugoslavia.

Rapes began immediately after clashes broke out between Serbs and Muslims in Bosnia in April 1992. They sometimes occurred as isolated incidents, for example when combatants entered homes or when a group of guards at camp forced women under their control to perform sexual acts. But rapes were also committed in public, as part of the process of ethnic cleansing, in which case they appeared to have the same objective as the executions of local elites: to force the other ethnic group to leave with the intention that it never dare return. Houses or hotels were also converted into brothels, at which women were held for extended periods and raped repeatedly. The best known of these would be the ‘rape centre’ at the Partisans’ sports hall in Foca. This was set up in May 1992, with some women being taken from it to private homes.³⁸⁸⁸ A large proportion of the women who were held in brothels of this kind were later murdered. It should also be mentioned that not only were the women held in prison camps raped but also that many forms of sexual violence were used against male detainees.³⁸⁸⁹

The Bassiouni Committee would eventually count 162 places in Bosnia where women were detained and raped. Of these, 88 were run by Serbs, 17 by Croats, eight by Muslims and 14 jointly by Croats and Muslims. In 35 cases, it was not known who was in charge.³⁸⁹⁰

The first cases of rape in Bosnia became known as early as April 1992, with the arrival of women fleeing after the ethnic cleansing by the Serbs of Bijeljina.³⁸⁹¹ By the following month it

³⁸⁸⁵ Cisca Dresselhuys, ‘Ik vind mezelf eigenlijk een wat saaie man’ (‘I consider myself a rather boring man’), Opzij, June 1993, p. 87; S. Termeer, ‘Minister Kooijmans ziet weer uit naar het schrijven van een nieuw boek’ (‘Junior Minister Kooijmans looks forward to writing another new book’), Mare, 14/01/93, p. 5.

³⁸⁸⁶ ‘Massale protestactie tegen seksueel geweld in Bosnië’ (‘Mass protest against sexual violence in Bosnia’), Trouw, 11/01/93; Caspar Janssen & Thomas Ruijgrok, ‘Peter Kooijmans’, HP/De Tijd, 12/03/93, p. 16. On this matter, see also ABZ, DIO/JS/00002. Memorandum from DIO/Yugoslavia to Kooijmans, 07/01/93, no. 93/9.

³⁸⁸⁷ Cisca Dresselhuys, ‘Ik vind mezelf eigenlijk een wat saaie man’, Opzij, June 1993, p. 87.

³⁸⁸⁸ See the charges against Dragan Gagovich et al. and then the revised charges of 13/07/98 and 08/11/99 by the ICTFY against Dragoljub Kunarac with respect to the conduct of himself and his VRS reconnaissance unit, made up of Serbs and Montenegrans, in Foca, <http://www.un.org/icty/indictment/english/kun1a1980819e.htm> United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, Genocide, pp. 16-17; Roy Gutman, ‘Rape Camps’, Newsday, 19/04/93; ditto, Witness, pp. 164-167.

³⁸⁸⁹ See, for example, Vranic, Wall, pp. 291-292.

³⁸⁹⁰ UN, S/1994/674, Appendix IX, par. 475.

³⁸⁹¹ Vranic, Wall, p. 186.

appeared from the reports supplied by the swelling number of refugees entering Croatia from Bosnia that rape was occurring on a large scale.³⁸⁹² At the beginning of summer 1992, rapes by Serb troops became a major topic in the Croatian newspapers.³⁸⁹³ However, these reports only trickled very slowly into the Western media. But occasional coverage of the rape of Muslim women by Bosnian Serbs did appear in the West from summer 1992.³⁸⁹⁴ Credible reports about systematic rapes were circulating in the US State Department at this time.³⁸⁹⁵ And in the Netherlands De Hoop Scheffer was confronted with stories about rapes during a visit to the Willem I barracks in Den Bosch, where Bosnian refugees were being housed.³⁸⁹⁶ However, the Western media and politicians paid little attention to the information, probably either because rape was regarded as a 'normal' phenomenon of war³⁸⁹⁷ or because the reports seemed exaggerated.³⁸⁹⁸ This latter attitude was reinforced by sensational earlier stories, also about rapes, for which evidence was never found.³⁸⁹⁹

Ed Vulliamy, who had visited Trnopolje camp on 5 August 1992 with the ITN television crew, remembered later that during his visit prisoners had spoken about girls who had been 'taken away' but that it had not occurred to any of the journalists at the time to ask about rapes.³⁹⁰⁰ Once again it was Roy Gutman who, as in his reports about Serbian prison camps, was ahead of the field in the West.³⁹⁰¹ As early as 9 August 1992, he had written that, 'Reports of rape have been so extensive that some analysts think it was systematic.'³⁹⁰²

However, reports of systematic rapes only really began to appear from 25 September, when Radio Bosnia accused Serbs of holding 10,000 Muslim women at special camps in Bosnia where they were raped 'in public' and then murdered.³⁹⁰³ Three days later the Women's Group Tresnjevka in Zagreb published a report about the rapes in collaboration with women's organizations in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This emphasized their systematic character. The group wrote that, following the earlier discovery of 'Nazi-style concentration camps', it was now aware of 'rape/death camps'. Their locations were given in the report. And they were said to be part of a 'final solution'. According to the group, its sources stated that more than 35,000 women and children were being held in such Serb-run 'rape/death camps',

'enduring the most frightful methods of terror and torture. Such tortures include rapes, gang rapes, forced incest, the draining of the blood of captives to provide blood for transfusions for the needs of the criminals, setting children ablaze, and drowning babies. These are only a part of the daily death crimes.

³⁸⁹² Vranic, Wall, p. 234.

³⁸⁹³ Vranic, Wall, p. 186.

³⁸⁹⁴ See, for example, 'Vooral Moslims zijn slachtoffer van moorden in Bosnië' ('Muslims are principal victims of murders in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 24/06/92; Nicole Lucas, 'Laat ons, we hebben te veel meegemaakt' ('Leave us alone, we've been through too much'), Trouw, 01/07/92.

³⁸⁹⁵ Danner, America, p. 58.

³⁸⁹⁶ Leonard Ornstein, 'CDA'er De Hoop Scheffer bleef in zijn vakantie dóórdenken' ('CDA's De Hoop Scheffer continues to reflect, even on holiday'), Vrij Nederland, 15/08/92.

³⁸⁹⁷ Vranic, Wall, p. 265; Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 196.

³⁸⁹⁸ This was the case, for example, at the BBC World Service, 'A Letter to the BBC World Service from Vladimir Lojen, a former employee', <http://www.barnsdle.demon.co.uk/bosnia/bbcwor.html> consulted 06/06/00.

³⁸⁹⁹ 'Vrijlating brengt eerst euforie, dan depressie' ('Release first brings euphoria, then depression'), NRC Handelsblad, 19/12/92.

³⁹⁰⁰ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 196.

³⁹⁰¹ Gutmann, Witness, pp. xiv-xv, 25, 64-76; Roy Gutman, 'Mass Rape', Newsday, 23/08/92. See also Allen, Warfare, p. 65.

³⁹⁰² R. Gutman, 'Bosnia Rape Horror', 09/08/92; Gutman, Witness, p. 64.

³⁹⁰³ 'In Joegoslavië is grens tussen feit en verzinsel vaag' ('Boundary between fact and fantasy is vague in Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad 30/01/93.

Females between 10 and 30 years of age are the primary objects of daily gang rapes. They are raped daily by between 40 and 50 Chetniks.³⁹⁰⁴

The group called upon international organizations and the women's movement abroad to help in the struggle against these crimes. A week later Radovan Karadzic and the Bosnian government's Commission for War Crimes accused one another's supporters of committing systematic rape.³⁹⁰⁵

Particularly in Germany, there was considerable interest in mass rapes in Bosnia after the journalist Maria von Welser featured interviews with victims and with Roy Gutman in the ZDF television programme Mona Lisa on 15 November, and journalist Alexandra Stiglmeier wrote about rape camps in the magazines *Weltwoche*³⁹⁰⁶ and *Stern*³⁹⁰⁷. Gutman went so far as to claim that there was not a woman aged 15-25 left in Bosnia-Herzegovina who had not been raped.³⁹⁰⁸ Croatian and Muslim agencies now put the figure at approximately 60,000 rapes.³⁹⁰⁹

Because it was primarily Muslim women under Serb control who were the victims of rape, an intensive discussion arose as to whether this was a 'normal' by-product of the war – based upon the idea that rape occurs in virtually every conflict – or whether it was a systematic form of violence intended to drive out the Muslims and strip them of their sense of identity and orientation. Adherents of the latter theory spoke of 'rape warfare'³⁹¹⁰ or 'strategic rape':³⁹¹¹

'This is a specific of the Bosnian case. Rape was used as a component of the Serb political and military strategy. This is a selected and refined weapon for attaining the goal of the war and a final political aim. This specificity sets apart mass rape in Bosnia from other cases, ranking it as the worst crime of its type.'³⁹¹²

In this respect, some people called the rapes a form of genocide. Others used the term 'gynocide': 'a deliberate attack on women as the bearers of children'.³⁹¹³ As one author put it, 'The world has never seen sex used this consciously, this cynically, this elaborately, this openly, this systematically, and with this degree of technological and psychological sophistication, as a means of destroying a whole people.'³⁹¹⁴

Some saw evidence for the systematic nature of the rapes in remarks made by perpetrators to their victims that they would carry 'Serbian seed'.³⁹¹⁵ The American Professor of Women's Studies Beverly Allen emphasized in her 1996 book, Rape Warfare. The Hidden Genocide in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, that Serbs would hold victims whom they had made pregnant until such time as termination ³⁹⁰⁴ NIOD, Coll. Blaauw, Women's Group 'Tresnjevka, report, 28/09/92.

³⁹⁰⁵ 'VS geven vliegverbod boven Bosnië steun' ('US backs no-fly zone over Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 03/10/92.

³⁹⁰⁶ Alexandra Stiglmeier, 'Die Demütigung as Waffe' ('Humiliation as a weapon'), Weltwoche, 05/11/92.

³⁹⁰⁷ See, for example, Cheryl Benard & Edith Schlaffer, 'Kleiner als ein Stück Dreck' ('Smaller than a piece of dirt'), Der Spiegel, 1992 no. 50, pp. 184-190. In the Netherlands see, for example, Anet Bleich, 'In Trnopolje wordt dagelijks verkracht' ('Rapes being committed daily in Trnopolje'), 'Complete families zitten vast in Servische kampen' ('Entire families held in Serb camps') and 'Meisjes werden geslacht als lammetjes' ('Girls were slaughtered like lambs'), de Volkskrant, 13/11/92; 'Europa's schande' ('Europe's shame'), de Volkskrant, 14/11/92; Anet Bleich, 'Bewakers kwamen 's avonds meisjes halen' ('Guards came at night to take away girls'), de Volkskrant, 16/11/92.

³⁹⁰⁸ Quoted in Calic, Krieg, p. 135.

³⁹⁰⁹ Calic, Krieg, pp. 135 and 137; Oliver Tolemein, 'Männerphantasie Frauen-Kriegsbewegung' ('Male Fantasies of the Women's War Movement'), Schneider (ed.), Andruck, p. 92. For even higher numbers from various sources, see ibidem, p. 93; Wolfgang Schneider, 'Aufklärung und Propaganda. Eine Kontroverse' ('Education and propaganda. A controversy'), ibidem, p. 84; ditto, 'Das vage Bewusstsein' ('The vague awareness'), ibidem, p. 102.

³⁹¹⁰ Allen, Warfare.

³⁹¹¹ Vranic, Wall, p. 316.

³⁹¹² Vranic, Wall, p. 317.

³⁹¹³ Sells, Bridge, pp. 21-22, 66.

³⁹¹⁴ Catherine A. MacKinnon, quoted in Vranic, Wall, p. 31.

³⁹¹⁵ See, for example, Sells, Bridge, p. 22.

was no longer possible so as to be sure that that ‘Serbian seed’ would bear fruit. ‘The pregnancies,’ she wrote, ‘and not the rapes alone, are a major weapon of the genocide. There may be “nothing unprecedented about mass rape in war”, but this is something new.’³⁹¹⁶ And, ‘Genocidal rape aimed at enforced pregnancy would seem to be a peculiarly Serb contribution to the history of atrocity.’³⁹¹⁷

According to Allen, pregnancy and the bearing of the rapist’s child destroyed the cultural identity of the victim, ‘The very characteristics that ostensibly made that person an enemy in the first place.’³⁹¹⁸

Jantien Achttienribbe and Leoni Sipkes thought the same. At the time of their initiative to send a letter to fellow parliamentarians in Europe, they stated that in the near future they wanted to visit women’s camps in Bosnia-Herzegovina with a delegation of Dutch women. They had already discussed this with Ministers Hans Van den Broek and Relus Ter Beek. Achttienribbe told the press that it might well be that women were raped in every war, ‘But this situation is unique, because the rapes are taking place with the premeditated purpose of making women pregnant and so ‘de-ethnifying’ the land.’³⁹¹⁹

Sipkes later reiterated the same point to the NIOD as follows. ‘So as soon as you as a Serb rape a Muslim woman, that’s even worse than when you simply rape a woman. Ethnicity came into it again... Yes. That ethnicity which came into it. “We make sure that that Muslim woman is raped,” and that was the worst thing you could do to her. In that way you also ensure that more Serb children come along. So that makes it even more horrific.’³⁹²⁰ Other women in the West who addressed the rape issue, such as Allen, rejected such statements because they thought that they reflected adoption of both the ethnic-nationalist frame of mind and, above all, a chauvinistic male notion of sexual reproduction, as if a woman was merely a biological container for the man’s sperm and subsequently bore his child.³⁹²¹

Others saw important evidence for the systematic nature of the rapes in claims by perpetrators that they had been acting under orders from their superiors and had even been forced to commit rapes against their will.³⁹²² ‘It is rape under orders, not rape by those who are out of control, writes Vranic.’³⁹²³ ‘It is controlled and deliberate rape. This fact definitively separates the “Bosnian case” from the context of random rape.’ However, this type of order always came from immediate superiors – for example, a camp commandant. This meant that no connection had yet been made with the highest levels of the Bosnian Serb command structure. It was inconceivable, though, given the scale upon which the rapes were taking place, that the political and military leadership was not aware of them. At the very least, it had not acted against them. Some authors therefore conclude that there was not only passive acquiescence but also active planning at the very top:

‘Without a uniform order given only by the highest authorities, mass-scale rape would not have been possible; neither would the systematic sexual abuse of camp and prison inmates be possible or the otherwise improbable concordance of acts (which includes the use of sexual violence) in the campaign of “ethnic cleansing” of territories under Serb control.’³⁹²⁴

On the other hand, other authors used comparisons with the extent of rape during other wars and the involvement of superiors in them to claim that statements about the unique nature of the practice in ³⁹¹⁶ Allen, Warfare, p. 91. See also ibidem, pp. vii and 100.

³⁹¹⁷ Ibidem, p. 92.

³⁹¹⁸ Allen, Warfare, p. 101.

³⁹¹⁹ Elsbeth Kegge, ‘Steun van Kamer voor verkrachte vrouwen Bosnië’ (‘House supports raped women in Bosnia’), Het Parool, 10/12/92.

³⁹²⁰ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

³⁹²¹ Allen, Warfare, p. 87. See also Carpenter, Children, p. 443.

³⁹²² See, for example, Tom Post et al., ‘A Pattern of Rape’, Newsweek, 04/01/93; the witness statements in Vranic, Wall, pp. 142 and 306; NOS Journaal, 22/01/93; UN, S/1994/674, pars. 250 and 498.

³⁹²³ Vranic, Wall, p. 304.

³⁹²⁴ Vranic, Wall, p. 308.

the Croatian and Bosnian wars should be viewed with a certain wariness.³⁹²⁵ Susan Brownmiller, who in 1975 had published the much debated rape study, Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape, wrote in early 1993:

‘Alas for women, there is nothing unprecedented about mass rape in war when enemy soldiers advance swiftly through populous regions, nor is it a precedent when, howling in misery, leaders of the overrun country call the endemic sexual violence a conspiracy to destroy their national pride, their manhood, their honor.’³⁹²⁶

Sorabji seriously questioned the systematic nature of the rapes. To her, the practices gave more an impression of chaos and confusion:

‘The much-publicized accounts of rape (...) include cases of women being assaulted in their homes, in military headquarters, in camps, on the road to exile, allowed to buy their way free with Deutschmarks, released after impregnation and the possibility of terminating the pregnancy had passed, killed after being assaulted, assaulted once, assaulted continuously, told by their perpetrators they had been ordered to rape, told they had to bear Serbian children, raped as part of a supposed interrogation, told that their men were raping Serbian women, or told nothing.’³⁹²⁷

And according to Linda Grant of The Guardian there was nothing unique about the wartime rapes in Bosnia. What was unique was that this was the first time a war was accessible to the feminist movement.³⁹²⁸

The reaction in the West to the rapes in Bosnia was indeed related not only to the events themselves but also to the situation in domestic society, in particular the position of women and the significance of sexual violence within it. In the reporting of the wars in Yugoslavia, people in the West sought things they could identify with. The images from summer 1992 of refugees and men behind barbed wire had already struck a general chord in this respect. They were compared with those from the Second World War. The coverage of rapes allowed certain women to draw parallels not with past events but their own era. This particularly applied to sections of the American women’s movement. As the American jurist Diane Conklin wrote in the introduction to a book containing the testimonies of Bosnian women who had been the victims of rape:

‘The rape of Bosnian women is the rape of myself. I identify with them because I could have been there. I could have experienced multiple rapes (up to 30 a day) for months and then been murdered. Or I could have survived the ordeal and then been forgotten.’³⁹²⁹

And Allen opened her book about rapes in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia with section entitled ‘About Myself’.³⁹³⁰ Another author wrote that, ‘[p]rior to Bosnia, there was never an issue involving ³⁹²⁵ See, for example, Allcock, Yugoslavia, p. 404; Allcock & Milivojevic & Horton (eds.), Conflict, p. 234; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 170; Calic, Krieg, p. 139.

³⁹²⁶ Quoted in Allen, Warfare, p. 88.

³⁹²⁷ Sorabji, War, p. 83.

³⁹²⁸ Linda Grant, ‘Anyone here been raped and speak English?’, The Guardian, 02/08/93.

³⁹²⁹ Diane Conklin, ‘Special note’, Vranic, Wall, p. 19.

³⁹³⁰ Allen, Warfare, pp. 1-4.

women in other countries that preoccupied American women. Overnight, it seemed that the plight of Bosnian women had become a domestic issue to American feminists.³⁹³¹

But in the Netherlands, too, the rapes in the former Yugoslavia deeply troubled many women. No other aspect of the Yugoslavia issue generated such a stream of letters to the government, elected representatives and political parties. And almost all this correspondence came from women's organizations.³⁹³² Several petitions were also organized as a result of the sexual violence against women in the former Yugoslavia.³⁹³³

However long it took the media to pick up properly on the information about the rapes, once they did so the subject was embraced with a vengeance. Although the images of Fikret Alic had been burned into the consciousness of television viewers and newspaper readers for years, after a while they lost their power of expression for the media.

In any case, as shown in Chapter 7, the intervention debate had temporarily collapsed in the Netherlands after August 1992. Now the subject of rape provided a new focal point for the coverage of the former Yugoslavia. As the media expert Carruthers writes, 'Media try to counter 'compassion burnout' by repackaging each new humanitarian disaster in a new frame.'³⁹³⁴

Finally, the subject of rapes in Bosnia had a special significance for the West due to the discussions going on at the same time about the establishment of a special tribunal to try war criminals from the former Yugoslavia. This synchronicity opened up an opportunity for a campaign to have sexual violence in wartime 'upgraded' to the status of a war crime.³⁹³⁵ In the United States, the subject of the rapes in Bosnia was an active issue for the various women's organizations which together formed the Ad Hoc Women's Coalition Against War Crimes, one of the aims of which was international legal means to prosecute the perpetrators of rape. In some countries, the attempt to 'upgrade' rape to the status of a war crime also reflected a specifically domestic agenda. Sexual violence against women was not being viewed with sufficient seriousness by the prosecuting authorities and judiciaries in those states. It was hoped that the recognition of sexual violence during wartime as a war crime would automatically lead to sexual violence at home in peacetime being taken more seriously.³⁹³⁶

In the stories about rapes in Bosnia, it was once again the use of the word 'camps' which appealed most to the imaginations of journalists. But attempts to find those camps yielded no results. However, there were camps containing both men and women in which virtually all the women had been raped. One such was Omarska, which housed several dozens of women who had been raped repeatedly.³⁹³⁷ There were also, as already mentioned, hotels and smaller premises which appeared to be used exclusively as brothels.³⁹³⁸ In these it was rare for more than 15 women to be held at any one time.³⁹³⁹ Nevertheless, certain people and agencies clung firmly to the word 'camps'. Semantics had to be pressed into service to maintain the existence of special rape and death camps. Allen, for instance, defined 'rape/death camps' as follows:

³⁹³¹ Aryeh Neier, quoted in Carpenter, Children, p. 431.

³⁹³² See, for example, ABZ, DIO/ARA/00087. Arachne Vrouwenadviesbureau Overheidsbeleid (Arachne Women's Consultancy on Government Policy) to the Parliamentary Permanent Committee for Defence, 25/01/93; DIO/ARA/00089. Vrouwenkoor Cantabile (Cantabile Women's Choir), Denekamp, to Foreign Affairs, 08/03/93; H. de Koning-Peet, Chair of the Equal Opportunities Committee, Christelijk College Rotterdam (Rotterdam Christian College), to Kooijmans, 08/03/93.

³⁹³³ See, for example, ABZ, DIO/ARA/00089. Nederlandse ChristenVrouwenbond (Netherlands Christian Women's Union) to all sections, March 1993.

³⁹³⁴ Carruthers, Media, p. 237.

³⁹³⁵ Cf. Allen, Warfare, p. 108; Carpenter, Children, pp. 431-432.

³⁹³⁶ See, for example, Tamar Lewin, 'The Balkans Rapes: a Legal Test for the Outraged?', The New York Times, 15/01/93.

³⁹³⁷ Allen, Warfare, p. 64.

³⁹³⁸ United Nations, S/1994/674, 27/05/94, Annexe, pars. 248 and 249.

³⁹³⁹ Vranic, Wall, p. 300.

‘Buildings or enclosures where Bosnian-Herzegovinian and Croatian girls and women are kept and systematically raped for weeks or months at a time. These are restaurants, hotels, hospitals, schools, factories, peacetime brothels, or other buildings; they are also animal stalls in barns, fenced-in pens, and arenas.’³⁹⁴⁰

And Selma Hecimovic, a relief worker with raped women in Zenica, where many of the reports in the West about rapes had their origin, declared:

‘Maybe people out there think rape camps have to be camps of the kind we used to see in films about the Second World War, organised by the Nazis. There aren’t such camps. We regard a “camp” as a house or school or café or hospital in which they violated people.’³⁹⁴¹

In the case of rapes, the fixation with camps added an extra dimension when compared with prison camps, since their establishment would indicate the existence of a ‘rape system’. But reports indicating a lack of any evidence for rape on a large scale were given short shrift in the German press. Anyone pointing this out ran then risk of being labelled a Vergewaltigungsverharmloser (‘rape denier’) or Serbenfreund (‘Serb-lover’).³⁹⁴²

Germany became the springboard for wider European interest in the issue of the rapes in Bosnia. Between 11 and 15 November 1992, the International Women’s Peace Forum met in Oberhausen, with participants coming from 14 countries in Europe, Africa, North America and Central America. The Netherlands was represented by Adrienne van Melle-Hermans, ‘contact woman’ of the International Contacts Working Party of Vrouwen voor Vrede, which endeavoured to support peace movements in the former Yugoslavia.

At the end of its gathering, the Forum adopted a resolution stating that rape during the wars in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina was part of the military strategy of the former Yugoslav National Army and the paramilitary groups. A call was also made to regard rape as a war crime, to make every effort to close the ‘rape/death camps’ immediately and to organize support and relief for the victims of rape. The affiliated women’s movements took it upon themselves to demand national and international attention for the resolution, which they sent to bodies including the European Parliament, the United Nations Security Council and the German Bundestag.

In the Netherlands, the resolution was circulated to women’s organizations with the request that they collect signatures in support of it. These would be presented to the minister for Foreign Affairs early in 1993. Kooijmans did accept them on 9 January. In a letter accompanying the circular to women’s organizations, Van Melle-Hermans apologized for the fact that the resolution referred only to rapes perpetrated on the Serb side. In explanation, she wrote that it was ‘likely’ that most rapes were committed on that side and that the resolution had come about as a result of the ‘SOS’ from the Women’s Group Tresnjevka at the end of September.³⁹⁴³

At the European Community summit in Edinburgh in December 1992, Chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany – where the rapes in Bosnia had attracted considerable attention – urged that Europe take action.³⁹⁴⁴ Other leaders also expressed their horror at reports about the existence of rape camps for Muslim women.³⁹⁴⁵ The European Council therefore decided at Edinburgh to send a mission headed by a former British diplomat at the United Nations, Dame Ann Warburton, to investigate the ³⁹⁴⁰ Allen, Warfare, viii.

³⁹⁴¹ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 201.

³⁹⁴² Cf. Martin Lettmayer, ‘Da wurde einfach geglaubt, ohne nachzufragen’ (‘It was simply believed without question’), Bittermann (ed.), Serbien, pp. 37-49.

³⁹⁴³ NIOD, Coll. GroenLinks, dossier ‘Yugoslavia – Women’. Women for Peace, International Relations, to Dutch women’s organizations and other, 30/11/92.

³⁹⁴⁴ See also ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. COREU of the UK EU Presidency, 09/12/92, cpe/pres/lon 2008.

³⁹⁴⁵ See also ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. COREU The Hague, 11/12/92, cpe/hag 785.

rape of Muslim women. This EC initiative was supported by the UN Security Council on 18 December 1992, when it unanimously adopted Resolution 798 which condemned the mass rape, primarily of Muslim women in Serb camps, as ‘acts of unspeakable brutality’. According to the Council, there existed ‘massive, organized and systematic detention and rape’.

The appointment of the Warburton Mission was the concrete action taken in respect of Yugoslavia at the Edinburgh summit. However, the Dutch government, politicians and civil servants regarded the Warburton mission as ‘unnecessary’. As far as they were concerned, enough was already known about what was happening in Bosnia. Maarten Van Traa described it as the ‘pinnacle of cynicism by the European Community (...) that we have decided to send a mission to Bosnia to see if women are being raped there.’³⁹⁴⁶

One interesting issue is how the EC declaration about the treatment of Muslim women was worded. Germany had submitted a draft declaration to the Comité Politique which included the words, ‘It [the EC] strongly condemns these acts of unspeakable brutality, which form part of a deliberate strategy to destroy the identity of the Muslim community in Bosnia-Herzegovina.’ But several member states, including France and the United Kingdom, objected to this wording because they said it came too close to the definition of genocide. At the suggestion of the Netherlands, the second part of the sentence was therefore changed to read, ‘which form part of a deliberate strategy to terrorise the Muslim community in Bosnia-Herzegovina, in order to achieve the purpose of ethnic cleansing.’³⁹⁴⁷ The EC declaration also included a clause stating that those responsible for war crimes would be held personally accountable and ‘will be brought to justice’.

Achtienribbe and Sipkes – who had already written to fellow parliamentarians – decided several days later to send another letter, this time to the political leadership in Belgrade. In this they called upon it to bring to an end the atrocities being committed against women and children in Serb camps in Bosnia-Herzegovina ‘as part of an organized system’ designed to ethnically cleanse Muslims and Croats. ‘Sexual abuses in this context have modern precedents only in Nazi Germany,’ stated the parliamentary letter writers.³⁹⁴⁸

In both Serbia and the Republika Srpska, however, the reports about rape camps were denied. In mid December, for example, the Conference of Bishops of the Serbian Orthodox Church declared that there existed no special camps in which Serbs were holding Muslim women prisoners. According to the ecclesiastical dignitaries, reports to the contrary were war propaganda designed to ‘demonize’ the Serb people.³⁹⁴⁹ On 23 December, however, the World Council of Churches reported that witness statements showed that ‘thousands of women’ were held in rape camps and that the rape was systematic, not a by-product of war.³⁹⁵⁰

3. ‘If oil is a reason to go to war, then these rapes certainly are’

The Warburton mission first consulted the main international humanitarian organizations in Geneva and then travelled on to Zagreb to conduct its investigations. All this took five days, 20-24 December 1992. During the final days of 1992, the mission stated in an interim report that there was a huge contrast between the extensive attention given to the rapes in the media and the lack of evidence for them provided by all relevant organizations, including the UNHCR and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). The mission itself never went any further than Zagreb. Nevertheless, it claimed ³⁹⁴⁶ Martijn Delaere, ‘Eensgezind ten strijde’ (‘United into battle’), Het Binnenhof, 19/12/92. A similar notion prevailed in the Council of Ministers, judging by the objectivized minutes of its meeting on 15/12/92; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102, marginal notes on COREU London, 09/12/92, cpe/pres/lon/2008.

³⁹⁴⁷ ABZ, DEU/2002/00001. Van den Broek 187 to London embassy, 15/12/92.

³⁹⁴⁸ NIOD, Coll. GroenLinks, dossier ‘Yugoslavia – Women’. J. Achtienribbe-Buijs and L. Sipkes to Cosic, Milosevic and Panic, 17/12/92.

³⁹⁴⁹ RFE/RL, daily report no. 240, 15/12/92; Vranic, Wall, p. 308.

³⁹⁵⁰ ‘In Joegoslavië is grens tussen feit en verzinsel vaag’, NRC Handelsblad, 30/01/93.

that 'on the basis of evidence available to it' there must have been many thousands of rapes. The most well-reasoned estimate presented to the Commission gave a figure of about 20,000. It had repeatedly heard about camps or small detention centres such as houses, restaurants and police stations at which rapes were said to be taking place, but their existence had not – yet – been confirmed. The mission also claimed that rape, or the threat of it, could not be regarded as a by-product of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina but formed part of a Serb tactic of demoralization and terror directed against the Muslims in the interests of ethnic cleansing.³⁹⁵¹

The British newspaper The Independent managed to obtain a copy of this interim report, which had not yet been intended for publication.³⁹⁵² Once The Independent had published the provisional conclusions of the Warburton mission, both the report and the phenomenon of rape again attracted a great deal of attention from the press and parliamentarians in Europe.³⁹⁵³ The media gave little space to the dissenting opinion of mission member Simone Veil, former President of the European Parliament, who distanced herself from the figure of 20,000 rapes because it was based solely upon discussions with just four people.³⁹⁵⁴ Warburton would later say that her Commission had spoken with nine women who had been raped and also conducted dozens of interviews with direct witnesses.³⁹⁵⁵

The Dutch government certainly adopted the provisional conclusion of the Warburton Report, that there had been systematic rape by the Serbs, straight away. It proposed the gynaecologist Dr Gunilla Kleiverda, of the Flevo Ziekenhuis hospital in Almere, for the follow-up mission called for in the interim report; this should conduct investigations in Bosnia itself. Kleiverda had many years of experience in treating both victims of sexual violence and Muslim women in Amsterdam. She also enjoyed some renown at the time because she had drawn up a protocol for medical contact with Islamic women.³⁹⁵⁶ In addition to Kleiverda, several members from other countries were added to the original Warburton group for its follow-up investigation. The full mission met in Zagreb on 19-21 January, after which only the team of experts led by Warburton travelled on to Zenica in Central Bosnia, where it stayed from 22 to 26 January.

The political team, of which Kleiverda was a member, returned home after the meeting. In Zagreb the mission spoke with representatives from international organizations, with leaders of Catholic and Muslim groups and with both official and unofficial Croatian and Bosnian organizations. There were also contacts with the Croatian government. In both Croatia and Bosnia the Warburton mission visited refugee camps and hospitals, where its members spoke with aid workers and a limited number of victims and witnesses.

In her own report on the trip, Kleiverda – who had visited two reception camps for female war victims in Croatia with the Warburton mission – called its investigation 'one-sided' because its assignment was confined to studying the rape of Bosnian Muslim women. She stated that the members of the mission were well aware that Croatian and Serbian women had also been and were being raped 'on a large scale', although she added that Muslim women were the principal victims. Kleiverda wrote that it was difficult to establish whether the rapes were taking place on orders from above. But she called it 'striking' that in many cases the rapists were either known to their victims or members of local militias. Freed women had confirmed the existence of rape camps, according to Kleiverda's report. Whilst estimates of the number of rapes varied between 10,000 and 50,000, figures for the number of pregnancies resulting from them ranged from 900 to 1500. Fewer than 10 women in Zagreb had given birth to babies fathered by Serb rapists. And not a single such case was known of Split. There had been ³⁹⁵² L. Doyle, 'Victims of cold, calculated cruelty' and 'Serbs raped 20,000 as a "weapon of war"', The Independent, 06/01/93.

³⁹⁵¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00102. COREU of the UK EC Presidency, 27/12/92, cpe/pres/lon 2123.

³⁹⁵³ See, for example, 'Rapport verkrachtigen schokt EG' ('Rape report shocks EC'), Trouw, 07/01/93.

³⁹⁵⁴ Flounders, Bosnia Tragedy, p. 9.

³⁹⁵⁵ Lieke Noorman, 'Je kunt beter verkracht worden dan vermoord' ('Better to be raped than killed'), HP/De Tijd, 19/02/93, p. 32.

³⁹⁵⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00110. COREU The Hague, 05/01/93, cpe/hag 002; COREU The Hague, 12/01/93, cpe/hag 021.

abortions, but there was no systematic recording of whether those pregnancies were the result of rape.³⁹⁵⁷

Before the rest of the Warburton mission returned and before its final report was presented, Kleiverda organized a press conference at the Flevo Ziekenhuis. At this she declared that she shared the mission's conclusion that rape formed part of the system of ethnic cleansing: 'The Muslim population is being knowingly destroyed'. Her main recommendation was military intervention. 'We cannot continue just providing aid ad infinitum and not tackle the causes. If there is no intervention, the European Community and the rest of the world will be accessories.'³⁹⁵⁸ She admitted that she had been unable to win over the rest of the mission to her interventionist standpoint, but personally she was resolute in it: 'If oil is a reason to go to war, then these rapes certainly are.'³⁹⁵⁹

At about the same time Joris Voorhoeve – who was deeply affected by the reports of rapes – came to the same conclusion. He saw a new argument for military intervention by the European Community or the UN. 'The West can no longer look on idly or make feeble noises. It did not in fact interest Voorhoeve at all whether or not the mass rapes of Muslim women in Bosnia were the result of an official dictation from the government leaders there.'³⁹⁶⁰

So a whole range of individuals and organizations in the Netherlands had had absolutely no need of the Warburton mission to reach the conclusions that it reached. There was no doubt in the Dutch media about the (preliminary) conclusion that the rapes formed part of the Serbian and Bosnian Serb war tactics. Not that there was any proof of such a deliberate policy in the form of, for example, Serbian documents or speeches. Some also claimed that it would be difficult to obtain information from the victims because – according to some of these authors – openness about sexuality, let alone sexual atrocities, would conflict with their Islamic faith.³⁹⁶¹

Even as the experts in the Warburton mission were on their way to Zenica on 21 January, Amnesty International published two reports entitled *Bosnia Herzegovina. Rana u duši. A wound to the soul*³⁹⁶² and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Rape and sexual abuse by armed forces.³⁹⁶³ Although Amnesty stated that all sides in the conflict were guilty of sexual crimes, both of its reports pointed to the Bosnian Serb forces as the principal perpetrators of rape and identified Muslim women as the main victims. However, Amnesty International shied away from describing a deliberate tactic of rape on the part of the Serbs. It would go no further than stating that this 'appeared' to be the case.

The Warburton Mission released its final report on 29 January. The findings of the second mission had added little to those of the first. It stuck to the figure of 20,000 as the best estimate for the number of victims. This figure was now based upon an extrapolation of data about rapes in a number of ethnical-cleansed villages. The mission also assumed that the rapes had resulted in 1000 pregnancies, which usually resulted in a wish for abortion. And it maintained its opinion that the rapes were being committed in a recognizable pattern. The Commission avoided using the word 'systematic' in its report ³⁹⁵⁷ ABZ, DIO/ARA/00088. Report of the Warburton-II mission on rapes of Muslim women in Bosnia-Herzegovina, undated. See also Gunilla Kleiverda, "'Wij protesteren tegen manipulatie met slachtoffers'. Hulp verlenen aan Bosnische vrouwen vereist politieke keuzes'" ("We protest against the manipulation of victims." Helping Bosnian women demands political choices'), Vrouw & Gezondheidszorg, March/April 1993, pp. 7-10.

³⁹⁵⁸ 'EG-commissie stuit op 'walgelijke verkrachtingen' in Bosnië' ('EC commission stumbles upon "atrocious rapes" in Bosnia'), ANP, 26/01/93, 22:34; J. Holthausen, 'Arts: moslim-vrouwen bewust kapot gemaakt' ('Doctor: Muslim women deliberately destroyed'), Het Parool, 24/01/93; Romanda Abels, 'Verkrachtingen nopen tot ingrijpen in Bosnië' ('Rapes compel intervention in Bosnia'), Trouw, 29/01/93.

³⁹⁵⁹ R. Abels, 'Verkrachtingen nopen tot ingrijpen in Bosnië', Trouw, 24/01/93.

³⁹⁶⁰ 'Voorhoeve: 'Dit wordt in geen tien generaties vergeven' ('Voorhoeve: This won't be forgiven after ten generations'), Dagblad De Stem, 27/01/93. Voorhoeve also repeated his plea for intervention at around the same time in a dialogue with Beunders organized by de Volkskrant, A. Roelofs & J. Tromp, 'Is het zo belangrijk dat West-Europa buiten elk risico blijft?' ('Is so important that Western Europe avoids all risk?'), de Volkskrant, 25/01/93.

³⁹⁶¹ See, for example, 'A Pattern of Rape', Nieuwweek 11/01/93; A. Bouwmans, 'Verkrachting als wapen' ('Rape as a weapon'), Leeuwarder Courant, 23/01/93.

³⁹⁶² AI index: EUR 63/03/93.

³⁹⁶³ AI index: EUR 63/01/93.

because it had been unable to establish whether the rapes actually were being ordered from above. Following earlier criticism of the interim report for its emphasis upon Serb perpetrators, in its final report the Commission stated that rapes in Bosnia and Croatia were being committed by all sides – Croats, Muslims and Serbs – but mostly frequently by Serbs in their efforts to ethnically cleanse areas of Bosnia and Croatia. The Commission concluded by making a number of recommendations for the relief of and aid to the victims.³⁹⁶⁴

The debate as to whether or not the rapes were a matter of policy flared when, at almost exactly the same time, the conclusions of another investigation became known. This had been conducted in Croatia, Serbia and Bosnia-Herzegovina by four doctors on behalf of Tadeusz Mazowiecki, the Special Rapporteur of the UN Commission on Human Rights in the Former Yugoslavia. They came to the conclusion that whilst rapes may have taken place on large scale in Bosnia, exact numbers were impossible to establish and there was no way of telling whether there was a deliberate policy of rape.³⁹⁶⁵ Frits Kalshoven, Chairman of the UN Commission of Experts for the Violations of Humanitarian Law in the Former Yugoslavia, also expressed criticism of the Warburton Mission's findings. It said that the figure quoted was based upon information from groups in Zagreb. 'They have been able to convince the Commission that that is the correct number,' said Kalshoven. 'But I don't call that verification.'³⁹⁶⁶

A few weeks later, though, the Warburton Mission did obtain backing for some its findings from Mazowiecki. Reporting to the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, he said that he was deeply shocked by the systematic rape of women and girls. However, he did share the conclusion drawn by the doctors commissioned by him that it was impossible to state numbers of victims. But in his view it was beyond dispute that there were a lot of them.³⁹⁶⁷

Like Mazowiecki, Cherif Bassiouni – who succeeded Kalshoven – eventually agreed with the Warburton Mission. In its interim report of October 1993, the Bassiouni Commission stated that the number of rapes must have been considerably lower than the 20,000 mentioned in the Warburton Report. Jeri Laber of the American human rights organization Helsinki Watch also described the figure of 20,000 as 'exaggerated'.³⁹⁶⁸ But 18 months later, at a US congressional hearing, Bassiouni no longer described that 20,000 as 'a figure picked from thin air'. His Commission had investigated 1600 cases of rape. And those investigations had produced evidence of further cases, bringing the total to 4500. According to Bassiouni in 1995, it would be reasonable to multiply this number by four – bringing him close to the figure of 20,000.³⁹⁶⁹ In any case, in a letter to the Security Council in May 1994 UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali underlined the conclusion of the Bassiouni Commission's report 'that rape and sexual assault... have been carried out by some of the parties so systematically that they strongly appear to be the product of a policy.'³⁹⁷⁰

In the Netherlands, the Warburton Mission's report and its consideration on 18 February 1993 by the Equal Opportunities Committee of the European Parliament led to renewed major publicity. On 19 February no less than four programmes about the rape of Muslim women were screened on Dutch television within one 90-minute period.³⁹⁷¹ Of the press, the daily NRC Handelsblad in particular devoted ³⁹⁶⁴ UN, S/25240; ABZ, DIO/ARA/00087, EC Investigative Mission into the Treatment of Muslim Women in the former Yugoslavia, Report to EC Foreign Ministers; ABZ, 00110, COREU of the Danish EU Presidency, 29/01/93, cpe/cop 207; 'EG: meer hulp aan Bosnische verkrachtingslachtoffers' ('EC: more aid for Bosnian rape victims'), Trouw, 02/02/93; Lieke Noorman, 'Je kunt beter verkracht worden dan vermoord', HP/De Tijd, 19/02/93, pp. 32-33.

³⁹⁶⁵ 'Geen bewijs voor systematisch verkrachten' ('No proof of systematic rapes'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/01/93.

³⁹⁶⁶ 'Geen bewijs voor systematisch verkrachten' and 'Deze oorlog moet getoetst worden aan primaire rechtsregels' ('This war must be tried under basic law'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/01/93.

³⁹⁶⁷ UN, E/CN.4/1993/50 (this also contains the report by the four doctors, as Appendix II); 'VN-rapporteur zal opstappen als geweld in Bosnië niet stopt' ('UN Rapporteur will resign if violence in Bosnia does not end'), de Volkskrant, 11/02/93.

³⁹⁶⁸ 'Rape was weapon of Serbs, U.N. Says', The New York Times, 20/10/93.

³⁹⁶⁹ United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, Genocide, pp. 7-8.

³⁹⁷⁰ UN, S/1994/674, 27/05/94. See also the Annex, pars. 253 en 313.

³⁹⁷¹ Peternel, Joegoslavië, p. 108.

considerable and serious attention to the relationship between fact and fiction with regard to the rapes in Bosnia during late January and early February 1993. This coverage included an interview with Heleen Habraken, the Dutch Assistant Executive in the Yugoslavia Department at the headquarters of Amnesty International in London. She explained to the newspaper that there was no proof of a systematic campaign of rapes and that in Croatia countless horror stories were doing the rounds which were difficult to refute because of the lack of witnesses and alleged locations of the crimes. According to Habraken, Amnesty International's greatest concern was 'that all those hysterical stories about rapes will ultimately prove counterproductive for the victims themselves'.³⁹⁷²

As well as propaganda in the region, Amnesty also had to contend with exaggerated expectations in the West. 'After our report appeared,' claimed Habraken, 'some people wondered why we had come out with 'all those boring cases' and not with one woman who – let's say – had been raped by a hundred soldiers.'³⁹⁷³ According to Habraken, 'suffering inflation' had set in: being raped once was no longer enough. And the fixation upon the total number of rapes – 20,000 or more – had the same effect, in her opinion. Not to mention the fact that this sensational interest in Yugoslavia distracted attention from other regions. 'I can imagine that this is difficult for workers who for years have been trying to draw attention to the systematic rapes in a country like Guatemala.'³⁹⁷⁴

Habraken also stated that it was a problem that victims in the former Yugoslavia did not want to talk, for example due to their Islamic background. But, she added, 'This is an advantage for those who want to whip up the situation, because they hide behind that argument.'³⁹⁷⁵ Nor, in her view, were the victims helped by insulting the culprits.³⁹⁷⁶ According to Habraken, the media were guilty of sensationalist reporting:

'Once, I couldn't enter a camp in Croatia because three TV crews were there before me – all looking for pregnant raped women. They stretch facts and take them out of context. In Croatia I spoke with a woman who had been raped by a guard at a prison in Vojvodina. According to her this was totally without the knowledge of the commandant but simply because the guard had felt like it. But a couple of days later that same woman was presented in a German television programme as a witness from a Serb rape camp. In such cases it is never clear where precisely a fact has become fiction, but what is clear is that that is happening on a huge scale.'³⁹⁷⁷

The scenes in which journalists pushed aside one another and aid workers were indeed sometimes disgraceful, as in the case when a British journalist and a French camera crew ended up squabbling over the hospital bed of a raped Bosnian girl.³⁹⁷⁸

Following extensive analysis, a team from the NRC Handelsblad comprising editorial staff members Peter Michielsen, Laura Starink and Hans Steketee concluded that neither the ICRC nor the UNHCR yet had any first-hand witness statements about the existence of special rape camps.³⁹⁷⁹

In a fairly unconvincing response to the statements by the NRC team, Habraken and Kalshoven, Gunilla Kleiverda stated that 'a figure of 20,000 [rapes] is possibly still on the low side'. Anyone doubting that was in danger of 'implicitly approving the atrocities which are still being committed'. As for whether rape was a matter of policy, she was now less certain: 'No verdict can be ³⁹⁷² 'Hysterische verhalen helpen de slachtoffers niet' ('Hysterical stories do not help the victims'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/01/93.

³⁹⁷³ Ibidem.

³⁹⁷⁴ Ibidem.

³⁹⁷⁵ Ibidem.

³⁹⁷⁶ Ibidem.

³⁹⁷⁷ Ibidem.

³⁹⁷⁸ See also Linda Grant, 'Anyone here been raped and speak English?', The Guardian, 02/08/93.

³⁹⁷⁹ 'In Joegoslavië is grens tussen feit en verzinsel vaag', NRC Handelsblad, 30/01/93.

delivered about whether or not rapes are being committed “under orders” as long as the war continues.³⁹⁸⁰ But she saved the final attack in her contribution to the NRC Handelsblad for Habraken: ‘By confining ourselves solely to aid work, we reinforce the feeling that we are “at least making a useful contribution” and buy off our collective sense of guilt.’³⁹⁸¹

As Habraken had highlighted, media coverage of the rapes did indeed sometimes lack critical distance. The most extreme example of this was the story promoted by German CDU MP Stefan Schwarz, who claimed that women were being implanted with dog foetuses. This was picked by certain media in the Netherlands,³⁹⁸² and resulted in responses including a letter from the municipal executive in Eindhoven to Minister Peter Kooijmans calling for ‘an end to be made to the murderous insanity in the former Yugoslavia by the quickest and most effective means’.³⁹⁸³ Shortly afterwards, Schwarz himself attributed the story to translation and communication errors. But he did not really agree that he had sent an untrue story into the world. ‘OK,’ he said. ‘It wasn’t an experiment like those conducted in Auschwitz by the Nazi doctor Mengele. But to me it looks much the same and makes little difference. We’re looking on and doing nothing.’³⁹⁸⁴

Beverly Allen also wrote, in response to reports that videotapes were circulating showing rapes being committed by Serbs, that, ‘Whether they exist in fact or simply as a rumor, even the rumor of such tapes is a chilling aspect of this genocide.’³⁹⁸⁵

Some people showed a strong tendency to believe stories of sexual violence even when there was no evidence. One example is Slavenka Drakulic who, having asked a girl in a refugee camp in Croatia whether she had been raped and been told that she had not, responded, ‘But I doubted it. Perhaps if I came back another time she might tell me her real story.’³⁹⁸⁶ Of course, Drakulic could have been right that the girl was concealing that she had been raped – but the point here is her assumption that she already knew what the ‘real story’ was.

On 1 February 1993, the EC ministers accepted the findings of the Warburton Report. They declared that they were prepared to admit more victims of rape to the European Community and to offer physical and psychological help to those who remained in the Balkan region itself. The parties to the conflict were urged to put an end to the practice of rape.³⁹⁸⁷ Minister Kooijmans declared that the ultimate objective was to liberate the women from the camps,³⁹⁸⁸ but two weeks later a spokesperson from the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated that even inspection of the camps was ‘entirely dependent’ upon ‘further developments in the international political efforts with regard to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia’.³⁹⁸⁹

This was rather reminiscent of a statement at the beginning of January by French Foreign Minister Roland Dumas that, if necessary, France would act alone to end the existence of prison camps ³⁹⁸⁰ G. Kleiverda, ‘Cijfers over verkrachte moslimvrouwen niet uit de lucht gegrepen’ (‘Figures for raped Muslim women not plucked out of the air’), NRC Handelsblad 01/02/93.

³⁹⁸¹ Ibidem.

³⁹⁸² W. Beusekamp, ‘Artsen Servië doen proeven op moslimvrouwen’ (‘Serbia doctors conducting tests on Muslim women’), de Volkskrant, 04/01/93; RTL Nieuws, 04/01/93.

³⁹⁸³ ‘B en W Eindhoven: beëindig ‘moorddadige waanzin’ (‘Eindhoven Executive: end "murderous insanity"’), ANP, 05/01/93, 18:32. For a reaction to this letter from the Netherlands Department of Foreign Affairs, see ARA/DIO/00087, P.P. van Wulfften Palthe to Eindhoven City Council, 05/01/93, no. DIO-199425.

³⁹⁸⁴ Willem Beusekamp, ‘Duitse parlementariër Schwarz inventariseert misdaden Serviërs’ (‘German MP Schwarz audits Serb crimes’), de Volkskrant, 14/01/93. See also Marjolien Sebregts, ‘Hondefoetussen? Nooit van gehoord’. Geen bewijs voor medische experimenten in Bosnië’ (‘Dog foetuses? Never heard of such a thing. No evidence for medical experiments in Bosnia’), Elsevier, 23/01/93; A. Vaessen & O. Zimmermann, ‘Gegoochel met Servische wreedheden. Duitse politicus Stefan Schwarz krabbelt terug’ (‘Juggling with Serb atrocities, German politician Stefan Schwarz retracts’), Algemeen Dagblad, 29/01/93.

³⁹⁸⁵ Allen, Warfare, p. 145, n. 3.

³⁹⁸⁶ Quoted in Allen, Warfare, p. 93.

³⁹⁸⁷ Lieke Noorman, ‘Je kunt beter verkracht worden dan vermoord’, HP/De Tijd, 19/02/93, pp. 32-33.

³⁹⁸⁸ ‘EG: meer hulp aan Bosnische verkrachtingsslachtoffers’, Trouw, 02/02/93.

³⁹⁸⁹ Lieke Noorman, ‘Je kunt beter verkracht worden dan vermoord’, HP/De Tijd, 19/02/93, pp. 32-33.

in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The next day it seemed that he had been misinterpreted: France would only act within the framework of United Nations and was not planning to use force in Bosnia. This, however, did not prevent Dutch Deputy Prime Minister Wim Kok from telling a PvdA meeting a week later that the Netherlands should support the French plan.³⁹⁹⁰ Dumas' original statement earned him a reputation for suffering from 'verbal incontinence'.³⁹⁹¹

Despite all the uncertainties and problems of proof, following the publication of the Warburton Report the figure of 20,000 or more would become generally accepted as the number of rapes committed in Bosnia.³⁹⁹² This could give the impression that there were few reports of new rape cases after its publication. And, indeed, according to the report of the Bassiouni Commission the majority of the rapes it recorded took place between April and November 1992, although during the 1993 conflict in central Bosnia between Bosnian government troops and the HVO – the Bosnian Croat army – supported by Croatian paramilitaries, many more Muslim women would be raped by Croatian soldiers and a number of rapes would also be committed by Muslim troops.³⁹⁹³

On the Serb side, the response to figures of tens of thousands of rapes was also scornful and showed little compassion for the victims. The standard rebuttal was that such acts were impossible for troops confronted by a numerically superior enemy.³⁹⁹⁴ In a typical reaction, General Ratko Mladic was quoted by an American reporter as saying, 'We would all have to be supermen to do this. We would have to be sexual maniacs worthy of an entry in the Guinness Book of Records.'³⁹⁹⁵ As far as Mladic and his associates were concerned, the West could take its pick: either rapes on this scale were physically impossible and so the West could not complain about them, or they had taken place on such a scale and so represented a formidable performance.

4. 'The objective has been achieved: everyone knows that it is happening'

On Monday 8 February 1993 Kooijmans sent the report by the Warburton Mission to the Dutch National Assembly, together with a supplement by Gunilla Kleiverda and a declaration on the report from the General Council of EC Foreign Ministers.³⁹⁹⁶ On the previous day, 7 February 1993, a delegation from the Parliamentary Permanent Committee on Equal Opportunities made up of Annemarie Jorritsma-Lebbink of the VVD, Minouche Janmaat-Abee of the CDA, Jantien Achttienribbe-Buijs of the PvdA and Leoni Sipkes of GroenLinks had taken part in the International Congress of Women's Solidarity in Zagreb. This was organized by the Bürgerinitiative Perspektive Berlin ('Berlin Perspective' Citizens' Initiative) and the Ost-West-Europäisches FrauenNetzwerk (East-West European Women's Network, OWEN).³⁹⁹⁷ And it was the first time in the Permanent Committee's ten-year history that its members had made such a trip abroad. According to Sipkes, it had taken them some effort to persuade their male colleagues before they were able to go.³⁹⁹⁸ An article in the daily De Telegraaf reported that in Zagreb, the Dutch MPs hoped to convince their fellow parliamentarians from ³⁹⁹⁰ 'Pleidooi Kok voor ingreep tegen Serviërs' (Kok calls for intervention against Serbs'), Het Parool, 12/01/93; 'Dumas zwakt standpunt over eventueel militair ingrijpen in Bosnië af' (Dumas softens stance on military intervention in Bosnia'), ANP, 12/01/93, 10:55.

³⁹⁹¹ Olivier Rolin, 'Pogroms en de politiek van het bluffen' (Pogroms and the politics of bluff), de Volkskrant, 18/01/93.

³⁹⁹² See, for example, United States Congress, Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, United Nations, pp. 2, 4 en 16.

³⁹⁹³ Rathfels, Sarajevo, pp. 139-140; Vranic, Wall, pp. 263 en 312-313.

³⁹⁹⁴ For example, interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01.

³⁹⁹⁵ John Burns, 'Serbian General Is Either a Snake or a Charmer, Depending on the Beholder', The New York Times, 08/08/93. Similar reaction in interview with M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00. Cf. Ian Traynor, 'Profile: Beast of Bosnia', The Guardian, 18/04/94. For denials by Karadzic, Milosevic and other Serbian and Bosnian Serb individuals and organizations, see Cigar, Genocide, pp. 91-92.

³⁹⁹⁶ TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 32.

³⁹⁹⁷ See the report in TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 34.

³⁹⁹⁸ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

other countries to press their own governments for military intervention to put an end to the bloodshed in the former Yugoslavia, 'A standpoint long taken by the Dutch government and parliament but in which they stand virtually alone in Europe.' Jorritsma, who acted as leader of the delegation, said in an interview with the newspaper that the visit to Zagreb had come out of a need to do something, at least, with regard to the former Yugoslavia. In her position, Jorritsma was guided by the idea that 'we all know' that 'tens of thousands of women there are being deliberately raped, abused and mutilated. Should we just acquiesce to this? I never want to have the feeling in the future that we knew about it but did nothing to stop it.'³⁹⁹⁹

Although the 300 participants in the Zagreb congress included representative from various Western countries – Austria, Belgium, Finland, France, Germany, Poland, Spain and the United Kingdom – the Netherlands was the only nation to send an official parliamentary delegation. On the other hand, the former President of the European Parliament, Simone Veil, and the President of the German Bundestag, Rita Süßmuth, had both decided not to travel to Zagreb for fear of being used for propaganda purposes by the Croatian authorities.⁴⁰⁰⁰ As well as the parliamentarians, the Netherlands was also represented by participants from the Federatie van Instellingen voor Ongehuwde Moederzorg (Netherlands Federation of Institutions for the Care of the Unmarried Mother and her Child, FIOM), the women's aid centre Metis, the sexual violence policy and aid development centre Medusa, Vrouwen tegen Kernwapens (Women Against Nuclear Weapons) and Women's Exchange Programme International. Pax Christi sent a message of support.⁴⁰⁰¹

At the time of the women's congress in Zagreb, the Croatian authorities were considerably more restrained in propagating stories about raped women than they had been previously. Major battles had now flared up between Croats and Muslims in central Bosnia and so the Zagreb government no longer had any interest in publicizing Muslim suffering. Meanwhile, women from Bosnia had themselves had enough of the constant rape stories and were reluctant to talk to the press. During the congress Western journalists were therefore, as one of their number put it, 'desperately' in search of raped women. So it was that at one point a pregnant German journalist was asked by an American television crew if she was by any chance a rape victim.⁴⁰⁰²

The congress itself ended in chaos when Croatian women present opposed both the presence of a Serbian speaker and a resolution which, although accusing the Serbs of being the main perpetrators of rape, also stated that all sides had been guilty of the crime. According to the Croatian women, the Serbs were the only culprits.⁴⁰⁰³

The Dutch delegation was deeply affected both by the deep feelings of hate they encountered and by the intense sense amongst the women present that they had been abandoned by the international community.⁴⁰⁰⁴ The representatives of non-governmental organizations from the ³⁹⁹⁹ M. Willems, 'Vrouwentribunaal in Voormalig Joegoslavië' ('Women's tribunal in former Yugoslavia'), De Telegraaf, 03/02/93.

⁴⁰⁰⁰ E. Nysingh, 'Servische mag praten over verkrachting' ('Serb can talk about rape'), de Volkskrant, 08/02/93.

⁴⁰⁰¹ ABZ, DIO/ARA/00088. Fiom, Medusa, Metis, Vereniging Vluchtelingenwerk Nederland (Dutch Refugee Council), Vrouwen tegen Kernwapens, WEP International, Internationale Vrouwen Solidariteitsbijeenkomst Zagreb 07/02/93. Verslag van de Nederlandse niet-gouvernementele organisaties; GroenLinks parliamentary party archive, dossier 'Yugoslavia – Women', Pax Christi to Perspektive et al., 02/02/93.

⁴⁰⁰² 'Zagreb gonst van geruchten over offensief Serviërs' ('Zagreb buzzing with rumours about Serb offensive'), de Telegraaf, 06/02/93.

⁴⁰⁰³ 'Vrouwentribunaal in Zagreb wordt strijdtooneel' ('Women's tribunal in Zagreb becomes battleground'), ANP, 07/02/92, 21:00; "'Etnische zuiveringen' Bosnië op andere leest?" ('New pattern for Bosnia "ethnic cleansing"'), Trouw, 08/02/93; E. Nysingh, 'Servische mag praten over verkrachting', de Volkskrant, 08/02/93; A. van den Berg, 'Vrouwen klagen aan in Zagreb' ('Women accuse in Zagreb'), Vrij Nederland, 13/02/93, pp. 22-23. For the pressure from, in particular, the Croatian authorities to identify the Serbs alone as perpetrators, see also Anet Bleich, 'Angst voor propaganda rond verkrachting. Kroatische vrouwengroepen: 'Onze jongens' doen het ook' ('Fear of rape propaganda. Croatian womens groups: "Our boys do it too"'), de Volkskrant, 05/02/93.

⁴⁰⁰⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181 no. 43, pp. 1-3; Annemarie Jorritsma, 'Diepe haat in Zagreb niet te bevatten' ('Deep hatred in Zagreb incomprehensible'), Algemeen Dagblad, 09/02/93.

Netherlands were also struck by the hatred between women from different ethnic groups. In their view comments like ‘I can’t talk to Serbian women because they are the ones who bear Cetniks’ were ‘totally at odds with the international solidarity between women which had prompted the organization of the congress’.⁴⁰⁰⁵

In an emotionally worded statement read out by Jorritsma and referring to the atrocities of the Second World War, the Dutch delegation expressed its embarrassment that it had not yet been able to persuade the international community to take action against the rapes in the former Yugoslavia.⁴⁰⁰⁶ The delegation urged that rape be recognized as a war crime and that refugee status be granted to raped women from areas in which they could be offered no protection. The Dutch representatives also called upon the international community to do everything possible to create safe havens in order to guarantee basic human rights.⁴⁰⁰⁷ They also backed the closing declaration in which the mass rapes by Serbs were described as part of a military strategy and which contained calls similar to those in the Dutch statement.⁴⁰⁰⁸ The Dutch government, too, fell in behind the demand for rape to become a war crime. As for safe havens, Minister Kooijmans made no comment on the issue in his response to the report by the Dutch delegation.⁴⁰⁰⁹

Finally, the Dutch government made available NLG 2 million to establish self-help groups in the refugee camps and to fund the training and supervision of local aid workers through the Stichting Admira (Admira Foundation). With this financing of aid work and the confidence that rape would in the near future be acknowledged as a war crime, reporting of rapes in Yugoslavia virtually ceased after March 1993.⁴⁰¹⁰ Adrienne van Melle-Hermans, a member of the Vrouwen voor Vrede movement and coordinator in the Netherlands of an international working group which provided aid to women in the former Yugoslavia, was not sorry. In late December 1993 she said:

‘The objective has been achieved: everyone knows that it is happening and it is on the political agenda. But the reporting was becoming sensationalist. I have witnessed disgusting scenes of journalists trying to interrogate raped women in search of sensational details.’⁴⁰¹¹

In a report from mid 1993, Mazowiecki also complained about the practices of some journalists. According to him, repeated interrogations by reporters had reduced the readiness of women to give evidence to experts from his commission:

‘Some of the women met by the team of experts felt exploited by the media and the many missions “studying” rape in the former Yugoslavia. Furthermore, health care providers are concerned about the effects on women of repeatedly recounting their experiences without adequate psychological and social support systems in place. The danger of subjecting women to additional emotional hardship in the course of interviews is a real one. There have been reports of ⁴⁰⁰⁵ ABZ, DIO/ARA/00088. Fiom, Medusa, Metis, Vereniging Vluchtelingenwerk Nederland, Vrouwen tegen Kernwapens, WEP International, Internationale Vrouwen Solidariteitsbijeenkomst Zagreb 07/02/93. Verslag van de Nederlandse niet-gouvernementele organisaties, p. 3.

⁴⁰⁰⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 34, p. 4.

⁴⁰⁰⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 34, p. 4.

⁴⁰⁰⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 34, p. 5.

⁴⁰⁰⁹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 36, p. 2.

⁴⁰¹⁰ Vranic, Wall, p. 235; Scholten et al., Sarajevo, p. 58.

⁴⁰¹¹ M. Bolwijn, ‘Verkrachting als oorlogsmisdaad. Juiste cijfers zullen nooit bekend worden’ (‘Rape as a war crime. True figures will never be known’), Het Parool, 29/12/93.

women attempting suicide after being interviewed by the media and well-meaning delegations.⁴⁰¹²

Moreover, Van Melle-Hermans – who travelled regularly to Bosnia – had the impression that rape was becoming less common as a result of all the publicity. Professor Tineke Cleiren, who had investigated the rapes for the Bassiouni Commission, was more cautious on this point. Reports were indeed declining, she said, and certainly those about rapes in camps, but such statements had been always been difficult to analysis. ‘The statements about where and when those rapes took place are not always clear. We are still charting them.’⁴⁰¹³

The debate about the rape of women was a vague one because, even more so than with that about the prison camps in the summer of 1992, it was obscured by a lack of concrete evidence. Just as the camps debate degenerated at a certain point into a discussion about the presence and location of barbed wire, so in the case of rape there arose a fixation with the accuracy of the 20,000 figure, with the existence of rape camps and with whether or not the rapes were systematic or policy-driven.⁴⁰¹⁴

The source material available provides little support for the claim that Serbs deliberately held Muslim women until they had passed the stage when abortion was possible. In most cases when it is known that women became pregnant as a result of rape, they were able to have an abortion.⁴⁰¹⁵ Seada Vranic, for example, established that 11 out of a research population of 175 raped women had become pregnant, and that in two of these cases abortion was no longer possible because of the late stage at which they came into contact with aid workers.⁴⁰¹⁶ Her book also contains testimony from a woman who was imprisoned at a rape location near Foca, which sheds a somewhat different light upon pregnancy as a result of rape:

‘Women were not exempt from rape and abuse if they were pregnant. Pregnancy brought no mercy, but in the house [where the women were held] led to the expectation that you would not end your life in a river or a mine. They constantly told that we would bear little Chetniks. And there was another reason why you lived in hope that you would survive: a pregnant woman could be exchanged for more captured Serb soldiers.’⁴⁰¹⁷

This testimony is supported by another comment from a woman who had been raped every night for several weeks, noted by Ed Vulliamy:

‘I became pregnant quite quickly, which in a certain sense was my good fortune because it meant that I was exchanged, together with 13 others. I was also lucky that I was early enough for an abortion, which was not the case for others.’⁴⁰¹⁸

The direct influence upon policy of the reports and discussion about rapes is difficult to assess, but it is true that the term ‘safe haven’ was frequently heard as a solution in this respect.

The thinking behind this seemed to be that women who had been raped on ethnic grounds should not be removed any further from their own home environment. Aid could better be provided there – possibly by local workers trained with Western help – than in the West itself. As a result, the idea of safe havens may have gained a wider acceptance. Certainly the President of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Cornelio Sommaruga, did not hesitate to use the point to again justify his ⁴⁰¹² Quoted in Allen, Warfare, pp. 94-95.

⁴⁰¹³ Marjon Bolwijn, ‘Verkrachting als oorlogsmisdaad. Juiste cijfers zullen nooit bekend worden’, Het Parool, 29/12/93.

⁴⁰¹⁴ For a criticism of this turn in the debate, see also A. Bleich, ‘Exacte cijfers’ (‘Exact figures’), de Volkskrant, 06/02/93.

⁴⁰¹⁵ See, for example, UN, E/CN.4/1993/50, Appendix II, paragraphs 11 t/m 13.

⁴⁰¹⁶ Vranic, Wall, pp. 248-249.

⁴⁰¹⁷ Vranic, Wall, p. 302.

⁴⁰¹⁸ Vulliamy, Seasons, p. 198.

safe havens idea. In February 1993 he declared that if the international community had agreed to them in the summer of 1992, a proportion of the rapes would not have happened.⁴⁰¹⁹

It is also striking that, despite reports pointing to the contrary, during the debate the Serbs were often presented as the sole culprits.⁴⁰²⁰ This contrasts – at least in the Netherlands – with the case of the prison camps, when there still was much greater scope for reporting the misconduct of other groups. Now there was barely any coverage of raped Serb women. The terms of reference of the Warburton mission even confined it exclusively to investigating the rape of Muslim women. An accumulation of primarily Serb atrocities – bombings, starvation, prison camps and sexual crimes – probably played a part in this bias. Moreover, in this case the lack of information about victims in general and about Serb ones in particular provided an easier breeding ground for one-sided condemnation of Serb misconduct.

5. A tribunal for Yugoslavia

On 23 February 1993 the UN Commission on Human Rights adopted two resolutions on the former Yugoslavia without a vote. The first condemned rapes and other forms of abuse against women as war crimes. The second condemned all breaches of human rights, but at the same time identified the Serbs as have the greatest responsibility for them.

Shortly after the formation of the Kalshoven Commission, UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali had declared himself a supporter of the appointment of an ad-hoc tribunal to try war criminals from the former Yugoslavia. However, given the divisions amongst the members of the Security Council about the desirability of such a tribunal, the UN Secretariat had not developed any further initiatives.⁴⁰²¹ But other bodies had, albeit not in a co-ordinated way. Both the European Conference for Cooperation and Security (CSCE) and the French and Italian governments studied the possibilities and the statutory conditions for establishing such a tribunal.⁴⁰²²

Once resistance in Washington to a special international tribunal began to ebb away following the inauguration of President Bill Clinton (see Chapter 8),⁴⁰²³ France submitted a draft resolution for a Yugoslavia tribunal to the Security Council.⁴⁰²⁴ In accepting this Resolution 808 on 22 February 1993, the Security Council decided to establish a special international tribunal to try war crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia since June 1991, including ethnic cleansing and mass rapes.

Six days later, on 28 February, the Dutch Minister Peter Kooijmans told a meeting of the Partij van de Arbeid (Dutch Labour Party) that he could imagine the tribunal being based in The Hague,⁴⁰²⁵ even though for the time being he regarded the institution as being merely 'palliative'. Three-and-a-half years later he would still say that the Tribunal had been set up 'to conceal the impotence of the international community to do anything about the conflict in a politically effective way'.⁴⁰²⁶

This latter statement continued to reflect closely the feelings Kooijmans had expressed on 2 March 1993 at a meeting with the Parliamentary Permanent Committee on Equal Opportunities. In ⁴⁰¹⁹ Mercier, Crimes, p. 119.

⁴⁰²⁰ Cf. Scholten et al., Sarajevo, p. 66.

⁴⁰²¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Kooijmans 002 to PR New York, 05/01/93; D'Ansembourg 004 to Kooijmans, 07/01/93; Biegman 78 to Kooijmans, 27/01/93.

⁴⁰²² ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Veenendaal 6 to Kooijmans, 18/01/93; Kooijmans 14 to Paris embassy, 20/01/93; Biegman 102 to Kooijmans, 03/02/93; Rome embassy to Foreign Affairs/JURA, 04/02/93, PA-ROM-198; Kooijmans to PR New York, 18/02/93, celer 35; Veenendaal 50 to Kooijmans, 18/02/93; Bassiouni, Yugoslavia, p. 414.

⁴⁰²³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Meesman 55 to Kooijmans, 30/01/93; Cynthia Bunton to Van der Zwan, 25/02/93.

⁴⁰²⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Biegman 150 to Kooijmans, 17/02/93; Biegman 155 to Kooijmans, 18/02/93.

⁴⁰²⁵ 'Den Haag mogelijk standplaats oorlogstribunaal Joegoslavië' ('The Hague possible location for Yugoslavia war tribunal'), ANP, 28/02/93, 18:07; ABZ, DPV/ARA/02054. Kooijmans 39 to PR New York, 02/03/93.

⁴⁰²⁶ M. Kwast-Van Duursen, 'Ik ben meer jurist dan politicus' ('I am more a jurist than a politician'), CD/Actueel, 18/01/97, p. 14. See also F. Halsema, 'Kleine stapjes. Het pragmatisch optimisme van Peter Kooijmans' ('Small steps. Peter Kooijmans' pragmatic optimism'), de Helling, 9 (1996)3, p. 5.

their turn, the MPs present showed their frustration at the limited action taken by the international community in the light of the very serious violations of human rights which had been taking place. As CDA member Riet Roosen-Van Pelt put it, 'UN resolutions are being walked all over and the dismantling of prison camps demanded by the UN is not happening. This could easily lead to the interpretation that the EC and the rest of the world is in fact an accessory to what is happening in the former Yugoslavia.'⁴⁰²⁷ Kooijmans pointed out, however, that there was no international readiness to intervene in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Particularly for the United States, an enforceable accord had to be in place before anything would be done.⁴⁰²⁸

6. The Vance-Owen peace plan

By the time Kooijmans spoke those words, a peace plan had been on the table for two months. After the London Conference, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Working Party of the Yugoslavia Conference headed by the Finn Martti Ahtisaari had started working on plans for the constitutional future of the region.

At the beginning of October 1992 there had been five options on the table. The first was for a centralized state. The second was a centralized federal state, but with important functions devolved to the provincial level. The third was a loose federal state made up of three ethnically based entities, each with territories spread throughout Bosnia. The fourth was a loose confederation of three ethnically based republics with a very large degree of autonomy. And the fifth involved the partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina, with predominantly Croat and Serb regions being incorporated into their respective 'motherlands' and an independent Muslim state created from what remained.

Owen and Vance decided to develop the second variant, a federal state with important functions administered at provincial level. There would be between four and ten of such provinces. Owen and Vance decided though that the state must be decentralized rather than centralized.⁴⁰²⁹ Various considerations would be taken into account in drawing the provincial boundaries, including ethnic, geographical and historical factors as well such aspects as economic viability and the existing infrastructure.⁴⁰³⁰ At the end of October Ahtisaari had a draft constitution ready, which would soon form the core of the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁰³¹

On 2 January 1993, Vance and Owen succeeded in bringing the leaders of the three ethnic groups together around the same table for the first time since the conflict began. Up until then the two mediators had only conducted bilateral talks as an extension to the London Conference. Vance and Owen revealed their plan during this three-day meeting.⁴⁰³²

It consisted of three parts. Firstly, the constitutional principles which would turn Bosnia-Herzegovina into a decentralized state with a large degree of executive authority resting in the hands of ten constituent provinces. Secondly, there was a map showing the boundaries of the ten provinces. And, thirdly, there were military arrangements for a ceasefire to be followed by the phased demilitarization of all Bosnia.

The Vance-Owen map is reproduced in Part I, Chapter 9, Section 6. The Muslims would be given the provinces of Bihac, Tuzla and Zenica (in the Vance-Owenplan these provinces were numbered 1, 5 and 9 respectively), which included Srebrenica in Tuzla province. The Serbs were allocated the provinces of Banja Luka (2) Bijeljina (4) and Nevesinje to the south-east of Sarajevo (6), and the Croats would receive Bosanski Brod (3), Mostar (8) and Travnik (10). Province 7, Sarajevo, was not assigned to any of the parties.

⁴⁰²⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 43, p. 4.

⁴⁰²⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 43, p. 9.

⁴⁰²⁹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 215.

⁴⁰³⁰ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 216.

⁴⁰³¹ Owen CD-ROM, 'Proposed constitutional structure for Bosnia and Herzegovina', 25/10/92.

⁴⁰³² Owen CD-ROM, 'The Vance-Owen Plan'.

The plan tried to reconcile a number of different principles as effectively as possible. First, Serb territorial conquests must not be accepted and so ethnic cleansing had to be undone. Second, the two mediators tried to build in opportunities for the people of Bosnia eventually to end their ethnic divisions.⁴⁰³³ Because there was little confidence that this could happen in the short term, some form of international supervision was needed. Finally, they wanted to stop the police and army forming a threat to the civilian population. It should be borne in mind that the Bosnian government was still seeking a unified state, whereas the Bosnian Serb and Bosnian Croat leaderships aspired to autonomy or even the possibility for their territories to break away completely.

To reconcile all these requirements, Owen and Vance presented a complicated constitutional plan in which certain matters were not yet finally settled and which would undergo numerous changes over the months to come. In fact, the plan was no more than a basis for further discussions.⁴⁰³⁴

In general terms, the plan involved the following. The government of Bosnia would be in the hands of a 'Presidium' with nine members, three from each main ethnic group. Their appointment would be subject to approval by Vance and Owen, who would station a permanent representative in Sarajevo. Not one of the ten provinces would be ethnically homogenous. They would largely restore the situation which existed before the outbreak of war, so ethnic cleansing would for the most part be reversed. Land and property seized from those driven out would be restored to the rightful owners. There would be freedom of movement within Bosnia, which would also help undo the effects of ethnic cleansing. Territorial enclaves occupied by members of one ethnic group would be connected by UN corridors. The provincial governments would reflect the ethnic composition of the local population, but all would contain at least one member of each ethnic group. Control over the police, the only armed force in the region, would rest with the provinces, which would also have extensive powers over the administration of justice and taxation. A host of courts, ombudsmen and the like – often with international personnel or under international supervision – would be put in place to guarantee the rights of minorities.

Each ethnic group would be in either the absolute or the relative majority in three provinces. Three would have an absolute majority of Muslims, two an absolute majority of Serbs and one an absolute majority of Croats. In the remainder, ethnic majorities would only be relative. The tenth province, Sarajevo, with an absolute Muslims majority, would become a more or less open city under UN administration.

⁴⁰³³ Cf. Burg & Shoup, War, p. 229.

⁴⁰³⁴ Cf. Eisermann, Weg, p. 157.

The plan was greeted extremely critically by many opinion-formers in the West on grounds of principle. Essentially, they believed that it rewarded Serb aggression and accepted ethnic cleansing. This, however, was certainly not the case: one of the stated principles of the plan was to actually reverse ethnic cleansing.

Because the provinces with a Serb majority would not be contiguous, it would not be easy for the Bosnian Serbs to unite their territory with Serbia itself or with the Serb areas in Croatia. The Croats would be in control of the Posavina region, which lay between Serbia and the Serb areas of Croatia and western Bosnia. Only in April would Owen propose the creation of a narrow UN corridor between the Serb areas near Brcko, but this solution was unacceptable to the Serbs since they would not control the corridor themselves.

Under the original Vance-Owen plan, the Serbs were allocated 43 per cent of Bosnian territory, excluding Sarajevo. This meant that they would have to give up approximately 40 per cent of the land they actually held. Moreover, those areas they could keep were the poorest in Bosnia-Herzegovina. For example, they contained only 18 per cent of the country's raw materials.⁴⁰³⁵ Of all the peace plans put forward, this was the one which came closest to combining peace with justice. That, however, was also exactly what made it so difficult to implement.

The Vance-Owen plan, as the proposal was soon to be called, was certainly not an ideal peace plan. Even Vance and Owen themselves admitted that, as soon as the microphones were off and the notebooks put away. 'A peace from Hell', is how Owen once described it.⁴⁰³⁶ Although the ideal was to restore the pre-war situation, it was difficult to imagine how this could actually be achieved in practice. Almost half of Bosnia's 4.5 million people had fled their homes. Towns allocated to the Muslims in the plan, such as Zvornik, Bratunac, Visegrad and Foca, were now under absolute Serb control. And even if the parties were to allow citizens to return to their homes, many would find them in ruins. It was common in ethnic cleansing for abandoned homes to be blown up, burned down or booby-trapped. On the issue of remigration, the Vance-Owen plan painted a highly optimistic picture. One version stated – perhaps with a typical British sense of understatement – that 'it is very likely to take more than a year for the many refugees and Displaced Persons to return to their homes'.⁴⁰³⁷ Also, the division of Bosnia into ten provinces would create long borders, along which interprovincial conflicts over attempts to annex neighbouring territory were all too possible. In theory, every provincial boundary was a potential front line.

Reactions to the plan in Bosnia

Of the three ethnic groups, only the Bosnian Croat leaders responded positively to the plan straight away. Although Croats made up only 17 per cent of the Bosnian population, the three provinces they would dominate accounted for a third of Bosnia, excluding Sarajevo. In places, they were allotted even more territory than they had asked for.⁴⁰³⁸ Moreover, although the three Croat provinces were not adjacent to one another, all bordered directly on Croatia itself. The Croatian magazine Globus called the plan 'the greatest triumph for Croatian politics of the 20th century'.⁴⁰³⁹ The initials of the Bosnian Croat army, the HVO, were reinterpreted by some standing for Hvala ('thank you') Vance Owen.⁴⁰⁴⁰

⁴⁰³⁵ Calic, Krieg, p. 205.

⁴⁰³⁶ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 118.

⁴⁰³⁷ Quoted in Bert, Superpower, p. 194.

⁴⁰³⁸ Hayden, Blueprints, p. 104.

⁴⁰³⁹ Quoted in Grémaux & De Vries, Crisis, p. 39.

⁴⁰⁴⁰ Loyd, War, p. 86.

The Croats immediately signed all three parts of the plan: the constitutional principles, the ceasefire and the map. Clearly, the tactic being used by Owen and Vance was that their plan would be accepted by the warring parties in three stages. It was deliberately made as attractive as possible to the Croats so that they could agree to it right away.⁴⁰⁴¹ The government in Sarajevo would then be persuaded to agree, so that finally the pressure on the Bosnian Serbs to accept all its proposals too could be stepped up.⁴⁰⁴²

The Serbs would have to give up a lot of territory, and had particular difficulty accepting that Eastern Bosnia – the fifth province in the plan – which bordered Serbia proper, would have a Muslim majority.⁴⁰⁴³ This would mean having to give up Milici, with its bauxite mine controlled by Rajko Dukic, one of the main financiers of the Serb Democratic Party, the SDS. Also lost would be Bratunac, the town which had, with great difficulty and at a high cost in casualties, resisted Muslim attacks from Srebrenica. Another objection for the Bosnian Serb leadership was the lack of any geographical link between Serbia itself and the Serb territory around Banja Luka. Finally, the Bosnian Serbs did not want a unified state but a Confederation of Bosnia-Herzegovina made up of three ethnically based states. They were prepared to accept an immediate ceasefire, but rejected the constitutional principles and the map.⁴⁰⁴⁴

The Muslims particularly deplored the fact that, in their opinion, the plan gave them too little territory and did not propose a centralized and unified state. In their opinion, the Vance-Owen plan rewarded the Serbs for part of their ethnical cleansing. Whilst Muslims made up 44 per cent of the population they were given only about a quarter of its territory, excluding Sarajevo. This may have been more than double the 11 per cent or so they actually held at the time, but it was still not much compared with the 43 per cent allocated to the Bosnian Serbs. Moreover, under the proposed Presidium system the Muslims would have to give up much of the power they held in the central government. Not only would they have to share power equally with Serbs and Croats at the national level, but authority in many fields would be devolved from the state to the provinces. Nevertheless, the Bosnian government originally responded enthusiastically to the plan. It originally wanted to express its support immediately but was dissuaded from doing so by Vance, who feared that the Serbs would then try to wrest more concessions.⁴⁰⁴⁵

After Owen and Vance had presented their plan to the warring parties over a three-day period, 2-4 January 1993, they gave the delegations an opportunity to consider the proposals. The two mediators would spend the rest of January trying to obtain the assent of all three sides to all three parts of the plan: the constitution, the ceasefire and phased demilitarization.

However, despite its original approval the Bosnian government soon began to voice objections. On 22 January they announced that they would refuse to sign the map because it sanctioned Serb conquests and because certain districts with a Muslim majority would fall within Croat-dominated provinces. They also wanted Sarajevo to become a Muslim-dominated province rather than a neutral territory. Izetbegovic said that he would be prepared to accept the constitution and the ceasefire, but he still did not sign them.⁴⁰⁴⁶

An important contributing factor in the Bosnian government's negative response was the impending change of administration in Washington, where Bill Clinton was about to succeed George Bush as president. This was expected to lead to a US military intervention which would benefit the ⁴⁰⁴¹ Cf. Burg & Shoup, War, p. 219.

⁴⁰⁴² Eisermann, Weg, p. 154.

⁴⁰⁴³ See, for example, ABZ, 911.31, 'Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen' ('Yugoslavia. Political relationships and parties'), parts V-VI, May 1992-April 1993; MID, 'Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie' ('Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation'), 22/93, 25/03/93.

⁴⁰⁴⁴ Sremac, War, p. 140.

⁴⁰⁴⁵ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 222.

⁴⁰⁴⁶ Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 224-225.

Muslims.⁴⁰⁴⁷ Clinton's arrival in office was looked forward to expectantly in Bosnia during late 1992 and early 1993. Convinced that the new President would make good the expectations he had raised during his election campaign by calling for attacks on Serb targets, Muslims would greet Americans in Bosnia at the time with the words 'Clinton dobro' ('Clinton is good').⁴⁰⁴⁸

Lord Owen considered it necessary to temper the high hopes in Bosnia. In December 1992 he told the leaders of its government, 'Don't live under this dream that the West is going to come in and sort this problem out.'⁴⁰⁴⁹ However, immediately after the presentation of the Vance-Owen plan Izetbegovic travelled to the United States to consult with the Clinton camp, which at the time was preparing for the new president's inauguration and administration. Owen warned the Americans beforehand that they should avoid giving Izetbegovic any impression that they would provide military assistance, since this would reduce his readiness to negotiate. Nevertheless, Izetbegovic returned after holding talks with Vice-President elect Al Gore and other members of the Clinton camp under the impression that military intervention was imminent.⁴⁰⁵⁰ As a senator, Gore had already hit out fiercely at Milosevic. During the war in Croatia he had spoken of the 'moral stupidity' and lack of moral courage of the US government, which had cost thousands of Croats their lives.⁴⁰⁵¹ Within a week of being made Clinton's running mate, Gore had urged the future president to make Bosnia a priority in US foreign policy.⁴⁰⁵²

The Yugoslavia policy of the new administration was being anxiously awaited not only in the areas under the control of the Bosnian government, but also in the Republika Srpska. American reporters used to the Bosnian Serb leaders ignoring the standpoints taken by European governments found themselves being cross-examined about the intentions of the Washington administration during visits to Pale in the first few months of 1993. Critical reporting by them was resented out of fear that it might lead to US intervention.⁴⁰⁵³

7. Milosevic as an apostle of peace

To elicit acceptance of the peace plan by the Republika Srpska, the international community was dependent upon the leadership in Belgrade. On 6 January 1993, Christmas Eve in the Orthodox Christian calendar, President Cosic of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia told the Serbian people in a television address that a failure to reach agreement at the Geneva negotiations would lead to military intervention by the US and European countries. This would not be confined to Bosnia, but also target Serbia and Montenegro. In addition, the results of the talks in Geneva would determine whether sanctions against what remained of Yugoslavia were lifted or tightened. 'Serbs therefore face a terrible dilemma,' said Cosic. 'Political and military capitulation or an attack by the world's mightiest powers.'⁴⁰⁵⁴

The issue of sanctions could indeed be an effective way of exerting pressure upon the regime in Belgrade. Economic conditions in Serbia and Montenegro continued to deteriorate. By early 1993 the Yugoslav dinar had fallen in value against the US dollar by no less than 11,000 per cent. Important foodstuffs like flour, sugar and salt were rationed. Exports in January 1993 were just a quarter of the figure one year previously.⁴⁰⁵⁵ Industrial production in Serbia in 1993 was a quarter less than in 1989.

⁴⁰⁴⁷ Cf. Burg & Shoup, War, p. 223.

⁴⁰⁴⁸ See also Halberstam, War, p. 225.

⁴⁰⁴⁹ Sremac, War, p. 136. See also Simms, Hour, p. 138.

⁴⁰⁵⁰ Sremac, War, p. 137.

⁴⁰⁵¹ Patrick Glynn, 'What foreign policy? III: Yugoblunder; US support of Yugoslavia', The New Republic, 24/02/92.

⁴⁰⁵² Karan Tumulty, 'Gore's Role: Deep in the Details', Time, 14/06/99, p. 28; Drew, Edge, p. 150; confidential interview (14).

⁴⁰⁵³ John F. Burns, 'Bosnia Loses Any Hope of Being Saved', The New York Times, 25/07/93.

⁴⁰⁵⁴ Owen CD-ROM, 'Address of FRY President Dobrica Coic to the Yugoslav Public, Belgrade, 6 January 1993'; Cohen, Bonds, p. 273 n. 68. See also Stojanovic, Autoritet, p. 31.

⁴⁰⁵⁵ Dyker & Bojicic, Impact, p. 51.

The income per head of population was a mere 40 per cent of that four years previously. Only 40 per cent of the active population was in work,⁴⁰⁵⁶ and 4 million Serbs were living below the poverty line.⁴⁰⁵⁷

In 1992 Milosevic had expanded his police force by 20,000 men and equipped special units with armoured vehicles, helicopters and rocket launchers so as to tackle any unrest resulting from the sanctions.⁴⁰⁵⁸ A gulf was opening up between the Serbs in Serbia and those in Bosnia. The latter believed that their ethnic brothers and sisters on the other side of the Drina were not doing enough to help them,⁴⁰⁵⁹ whereas Milosevic in particular believed that the Serbian economy was cracking under the weight of the solidarity his government was showing towards the Bosnian Serbs.⁴⁰⁶⁰ This situation sometimes led to emotional outbursts by Milosevic against Karadzic and other Bosnian Serb leaders, whom he claimed were holding Serbia hostage with their 'idiocies'.⁴⁰⁶¹

Milosevic must have realized that if Milan Panic had been unable to achieve an easing of the sanctions, then it would certainly be impossible for him to do so following Panic's election defeat unless he changed his country's policy. So the Serbian president – who had been behind the conflicts with Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia – now cleverly manoeuvred himself into the role of 'apostle of peace'. He sided with Cosic, who was arguing that whilst the Vance-Owen plan might well contain many drawbacks for the Serbs, it should be accepted because improved arrangements for them – better than those outlined at the original presentation on 2 January – could be negotiated as the plan crystallized.⁴⁰⁶²

On 6 January Owen and Vance had a long conversation with Milosevic in which they urged him to convince the Bosnian Serb leaders that the peace plan was not unfavourable to them. It may not have offered them a Serb state within the Bosnian state, but both mediators emphasized the high degree of administrative decentralization proposed. Milosevic promised to do what he could and declared several times that it was vitally important for Serbia that peace came. He was very concerned about the state of his country's economy and repeatedly emphasized that an end had to be made to Serbia's isolation and the sanctions against it. Owen promised that, once the peace plan had been accepted, the isolation of Serbia would indeed come to an end.⁴⁰⁶³ Not only Milosevic but also his wife, Mira Markovic, subsequently reiterated publicly how important it was for the Bosnian Serbs to accept the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁰⁶⁴ Meanwhile, in her diary notes which were published fortnightly during 1993 after having been read by her husband, Markovic regularly portrayed the Bosnian Serb political leadership as fascistic and mendacious because of its policies of ethnic cleansing and partitioning Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴⁰⁶⁵

The West was left in a quandary by Milosevic's new role as an apostle of peace. Had he repented, or did he simply want to rid himself of the sanctions against his country?⁴⁰⁶⁶ The new US administration found it difficult to believe that it would be possible to exert pressure on the Bosnian ⁴⁰⁵⁶ Cohen, Serpent, p. 193.

⁴⁰⁵⁷ Calic, Krieg, p. 172.

⁴⁰⁵⁸ Woodward, Tragedy, p. 293.

⁴⁰⁵⁹ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 123.

⁴⁰⁶⁰ Stojanovic, Fall, p. 201.

⁴⁰⁶¹ Doder & Branson, Milosevic, p. 180.

⁴⁰⁶² Interview D. Cosic, 13/09/01.

⁴⁰⁶³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00110. COREU of the Danish EC presidency, 08/01/93, cpe/pres/cop 50; Owen CD-ROM, 'Coreu telegram: Report of ICFY Co-Chairmen's Visit to Belgrade and Zagreb – 6 January 1993'.

⁴⁰⁶⁴ Markovic, Night, p. 57 (04/05/93).

⁴⁰⁶⁵ For Markovic's criticisms of Karadzic and Biljana Plavis, see Markovic, Night, pp. 17-18 (20/01/93), 43 (29/03/93), 52 (27/04/93), 111-113 (10/09/93).

⁴⁰⁶⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, 'De Servische vader des vaderlands redt de vrede in Bosnië' ('The Serbian Father of the Nation saves the peace in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 13/01/93; Nicole Lucas, 'Vredesakkoord stoelt op Servisch drijfzand' ('Peace agreement built on Serbian quicksand'), Trouw, 14/01/93; Dirk-Jan van Baar, 'Milosevic als vredesapostel' ('Milosevic as apostle of peace'), Intermediair, 29(1993)3; Jonathan Steele, 'Slobodan Milosevic lijkt echt naar vrede in Bosnië te verlangen' ('Slobodan Milosevic really seems to yearn for peace in Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 19/07/95; Steve Crawshaw, 'Milosevic, de architect van de haat' ('Milosevic, the architect of hate'), Rotterdams Dagblad, 14/10/98.

Serbs to agree to the Vance-Owen plan through Milosevic. American officials suggested to the mediators that, 'It is almost impossible that there is not something else behind this'.⁴⁰⁶⁷

All this prompts the question of how much influence Milosevic actually had over Karadzic and Mladic. According to some sources he had a major and direct influence over Mladic and his VRS force, which would hardly be surprising given that its officers' pay was constantly being subsidized from Belgrade.⁴⁰⁶⁸ In the Dutch Department of Foreign Affairs, too, it was assumed that Milosevic pulled the strings in the Republika Srpska. However, his intentions were not very clear to departmental officials in The Hague.⁴⁰⁶⁹ Moral objections to negotiating with Milosevic were pushed to one side: one had to do business with him.⁴⁰⁷⁰

Tensions between Karadzic and Mladic had already appeared more than once during autumn 1992: Mladic and other military officers were unhappy with concessions made by Karadzic at the negotiating table which were disadvantageous to the strategic position of the VRS.⁴⁰⁷¹ Since then negotiators had noticed that Karadzic became nervous whenever he was asked to agree to anything he had not yet discussed with Mladic.⁴⁰⁷² In any case, it was apparent that Karadzic had no control over the VRS. The only person who did was Mladic.⁴⁰⁷³

Mladic also took umbrage at the fact that the Republika Srpska's Defence Ministry was controlled by the (Bosnian) Serb Democratic Party, the SDS,⁴⁰⁷⁴ and that it was forcing officers on the VRS who had been attached for political reasons. And he accused the SDS of constantly being out for plunder. Officers were also annoyed by the private militias run by politicians.⁴⁰⁷⁵

A difference in geographical orientation also appears to have played a part in the relationship between Milosevic, Karadzic and Mladic. Milosevic was primarily interested in Kosovo, where many aspects of the situation troubled him. Every time Milosevic raised the need to assert Serbian authority in Kosovo with foreign diplomats, they confronted him with the situation in Croatia, where President Tudjman wanted the same with the areas held by Serbia. Moreover, the sanctions against Serbia were partly linked to the situation in Croatia.⁴⁰⁷⁶ Kosovo, on the other hand, was for Milosevic not only the cradle of Serbian history but also the area in which his own political star had first risen in 1987.

For Mladic it was Krajina which was of the greatest importance. The general was emotionally attached to the region where for him the war had begun. Mladic regarded the Serb nation as single and indivisible, a belief which he saw confirmed in a treaty of mutual military assistance reached in 1992 between the Serb republics in Krajina and Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴⁰⁷⁷

Karadzic, on the other hand, was not so tied to the Serb regions in Croatia, which were making heavy logistical demands on the VRS. He would prefer to concentrate upon the Serb part of Bosnia, of which he was president.

The estrangement between Milosevic and Karadzic was thrown into the spotlight during a meeting in Belgrade on 9 January, at which Milosevic received a Bosnian Serb delegation. He demanded that their leaders accept the Vance-Owen plan. They, however, refused to bow to pressure from Milosevic and had still failed to reach agreement when they left by plane for Geneva, accompanied by ⁴⁰⁶⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00110. Biegman 112 to Kooijmans, 04/02/93.

⁴⁰⁶⁸ ABZ, 999.241, Engels 241 to Kooijmans, 26/03/93; interview M. Steiner, 06/07/00; confidential interview (4).

⁴⁰⁶⁹ Interview P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00.

⁴⁰⁷⁰ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁴⁰⁷¹ See, for example, MID. MID, 'Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie', 67/92, 17/09/92; 76/92, 20/10/92; 78/92, 26/10/92; 80/92, 02/11/92; 84/92, 11/11/92. Also confidential interview (4).

⁴⁰⁷² John Burns, 'Serbian General Is Either a Snake or a Charmer, Depending on the Beholder', The New York Times, 08/08/93.

⁴⁰⁷³ ABZ, 99.241, Engels 277 to Van den Broek, 10/09/92, state secret.

⁴⁰⁷⁴ Confidential interview (4).

⁴⁰⁷⁵ Interview M. Milutinovic, 20 and 22/03/00.

⁴⁰⁷⁶ Interview D. Milovanovic, 22/03/00.

⁴⁰⁷⁷ MID. MID, 'Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie', 12/93, 04/02/93.

Cosic.⁴⁰⁷⁸ In Switzerland Owen and Vance exerted heavy pressure upon Karadzic, through Milosevic and Cosic, to sign up to their plan. Milosevic informed Karadzic that he would no longer be able to count upon supplies from Serbia if he did not agree to it. Milosevic and Cosic also told Karadzic that if the war in Bosnia continued, the West would intervene with what a member of Yugoslav delegation described to a reporter from The New York Times as ‘weapons you can't even see’.

Under this pressure, Karadzic did finally agree to the Vance-Owen plan in Geneva on 12 January. He also said that he was certain the Bosnian Serb parliament would ratify his decision and promised to present the plan to it within a couple of days.⁴⁰⁷⁹ Karadzic did indeed persuade his parliament to accept Vance-Owen in principle on 20 January, by 55 votes to 15. However, strict conditions were attached to that approval. For example, the Bosnian Serb leadership was not prepared to give up the Posavina region nor Eastern Bosnia.⁴⁰⁸⁰ On 23 January Karadzic declared that he accepted in principle the foundations of the constitution outlined in the peace plan, but could not agree to the map.⁴⁰⁸¹

The negative attitude of the Bosnian Serb leadership towards the peace proposals was a problem not only from the perspective of the international community. Even viewed from the Serbs' own position, it is difficult to identify the rationale behind their thinking. A few months after the outbreak of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Serbs held approximately 70 per cent of the country – more than they had planned to capture. It was obvious that they would try to cash in on these military successes at the negotiating table. And obvious, too, the Bosnian Muslims would resist a diplomatic settlement when they were in such a weak position militarily. The question, then, is why the Bosnian Serbs were no longer inclined to accept the plan. In August 1994 Milovan Stankovic, a VRS commander, complained that:

‘Our policy has never defined the basic aims of the struggle-political, national, economic, military or regional aims. It has never clearly said what state it is, of what size, and what cities are to be taken. The policy that says that the border is as far as the army boot can reach is, to say the least, frivolous. A boot can easily slip.’⁴⁰⁸²

The Bosnian Serb leaders were thus unable to follow up their military conquests with a diplomatic endgame. And neither the West nor Milosevic could convince them of how important this was.

To Vance and Owen, January ended with the acceptance of the constitution of their plan by all three sides. Their map was accepted only by the Croats. The military agreement was signed by the leaders of the Bosnian Croats and Serbs, Boban and Karadzic. Izetbegovic refused to accept it, arguing that the controls it placed on heavy weapons were inadequate.⁴⁰⁸³ However, it seems more obvious to assume that he expected to benefit from a continuation of the war – either by making conquests in the field or from the propaganda gains to be achieved abroad by continued Serb bombardments of Bosnian towns and cities.⁴⁰⁸⁴

Only on 3 March did Izetbegovic finally relent and sign the military agreement,⁴⁰⁸⁵ after UN Force Commander Satish Nambiar had informed him that the heavy weapons would be placed under ⁴⁰⁷⁸ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 225.

⁴⁰⁷⁹ David Binder, ‘Leader of Bosnia’s Serbs, In Shift, Backs an Accord’, The New York Times, 13/01/93; Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 225-226.

⁴⁰⁸⁰ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 226; Cohen, Bonds, pp. 259-260.

⁴⁰⁸¹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 226.

⁴⁰⁸² Quoted in Burg & Shoup, War, p. 185.

⁴⁰⁸³ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 227.

⁴⁰⁸⁴ Cf. Eisermann, Weg, p. 155.

⁴⁰⁸⁵ UN, A/47/901 and S/25362; Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1318-1320.

UN supervision.⁴⁰⁸⁶ Early in February Owen and Vance moved the talks with the leaders of the warring parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina to New York, so that they could elicit support for their plan amongst the members of the UN Security Council and use their good services to bringing those sitting around the negotiating table closer together. Moreover, in New York Owen and Vance could maintain closer contacts with the US government.⁴⁰⁸⁷ And that was badly needed.

8. The consequences of the change of administration in the United States

On 20 January, the same day as the Bosnian Serb parliament voted to accept the Vance-Owen plan in principle, Bill Clinton was inaugurated as the new President of the United States in Washington. It seemed that, now that Karadzic and the parliament of Republika Srpska had bowed in the face of the combined threat of Serbian sanctions and international intervention, with some pressure from the United States a final agreement on the plan was within reach.⁴⁰⁸⁸ The attitude of the US government was also of great importance because it was expected that, if Washington took a more active stance on the former Yugoslavia, so too would the British government.⁴⁰⁸⁹

In its final days before Clinton entered office, however, the outgoing Bush administration had responded negatively to the peace plan. This standpoint was based upon a number of factors. Firstly, so soon after the end of the Cold War the political policymakers in Washington had not in general been able to free their view of Eastern Europe from the black-and-white perspective of that era. During the Cold War, the struggle was between the capitalist 'us' and the communist 'them'. As far as the government in Washington was concerned, those in power in Serbia still represented the communists. Secondly, for the United States – itself a melting pot of cultures – the multicultural society was something natural. Any deviation from it was difficult to accept psychologically.⁴⁰⁹⁰ Moreover, the Bush administration considered that in essence the Vance-Owen plan represented the acceptance, if not the actual rewarding, of ethnic cleansing by the Serbs.⁴⁰⁹¹

This criticism from the government in Washington was broadly supported by the American public. Perhaps the most important objection, however, was the paradox that the Vance-Owen peace plan would require a greater military commitment on the part of the West than had hitherto been the case. Towards the end of 1992, NATO had calculated that implementation of the plan as formulated at that time would require a force of 75,000 troops.⁴⁰⁹² And, so Owen was eventually convinced, Washington was not prepared to make such a commitment.⁴⁰⁹³ Authoritative American commentators drew attention to the likelihood that military intervention to enforce the plan had little chance of success since in fact virtually the entire Bosnian population objected to it.⁴⁰⁹⁴

⁴⁰⁸⁶ Owen CD-ROM, 'Letter dated 1 March 1993 from UNPROFOR Force Commander Satish Nambiar to His Excellency President Izetbegovic'; Ramcharan, Conference, p. 1320.

⁴⁰⁸⁷ Cf. Owen CD-ROM, 'Lord Owen's report from New York of 6 February 1993 on progress of Vance-Owen Peace Plan'; UN, S/25248.

⁴⁰⁸⁸ Cf. the editors, 'Clinton and Milosevic', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 164.

⁴⁰⁸⁹ Cf. Max van Weezel and Leonard Ornstein, 'Lubbers zit er niet om lellen uit te delen' ('Lubbers not there to deal out blows'), Vrij Nederland, 22/01/93.

⁴⁰⁹⁰ Cf. M.C. Brands and Ronald Havenaar, 'De Verenigde Staten en het probleemkind Europa' ('The United States and the problem child Europe'), Gijs de Vries et al, Continent, p. 65.

⁴⁰⁹¹ 'Lot Bosnië in handen van Veiligheidsraad' ('Bosnia's fate in the hands of the Security Council'), de Telegraaf, 01/02/93; 'VN-hulpkonvoien Bosnië gestaakt na dodelijke aanval van Serviërs' ('UN aid convoys suspended after deadly attack by Serbs'), de Telegraaf, 03/02/93; 'Owen en Vance doen vredesplan over aan V-raad. Zware gevechten na mislukken overleg Genève' ('Owen and Vance submit peace plan to Security Council. Heavy fighting after Geneva talks fail'), Trouw, 01/02/93; 'Owen laat hoop op vrede Bosnië nog niet varen' ('Owen not yet abandoning hope of Bosnia peace'), de Volkskrant, 01/02/93; 'Vance en Owen stuiten op verzet regering-Clinton' ('Vance and Owen encounter resistance from Clinton administration'), de Volkskrant, 03/02/93.

⁴⁰⁹² Eisermann, Weg, p. 161.

⁴⁰⁹³ Edward Mortimer, 'An exit with one regret', Financial Times, 02/06/95.

⁴⁰⁹⁴ See, for example, Pfaff, Invitation, p. 107; see also ibidem, pp. 99 and 105-106.

Would all this change once Clinton succeeded Bush? Everything seemed to indicate that it would. During his election campaign, Clinton had talked about lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian Muslims and about the possibility of bombing Serb military targets – a dual approach which would later become known as the 'lift and strike' policy. Furthermore, during both his campaign and the early days of his presidency Clinton showed a degree of interest in the United Nations which was highly unusual by American standards.⁴⁰⁹⁵ Madeleine Albright, the United States' Permanent Representative at the UN, was appointed to the cabinet in that capacity (!) and also became a member of the National Security Council. She was a great supporter of peacekeeping and emphasized the need for 'assertive multilateralism' in US foreign policy.⁴⁰⁹⁶ The post of Assistant Secretary for Peacekeeping and Democracy was created at the Department of Defense. In his inauguration address, Clinton also stated that the United States would resort to force if the will and conscience of the international community were defied.⁴⁰⁹⁷

During the months between his election and his inauguration, Clinton had let it be known that he believed the time had come for the West 'to turn up the heat a little' in Bosnia.⁴⁰⁹⁸ His thoughts were turning to aggressive enforcement of the no-fly zone, as announced at a press conference on 4 December.⁴⁰⁹⁹

In subsequent weeks the British government, with the backing of the government in Paris, let no opportunity pass to make it clear that it was opposed to this due to the potential for reprisal against British troops on the ground. This difference between the American stance and the refusal by the United Kingdom to allow its ground troops to become the indirect victims of the air strikes wanted by Washington would lead to what Prime Minister John Major later called 'the most serious Anglo-American disagreement since the Suez crisis'.⁴¹⁰⁰ American diplomats would be so frustrated by the British resistance that they almost came to regard the UK as a hostile power.⁴¹⁰¹ The consequences of this difference in approach are examined in detail in Part III.

A more active approach by Clinton to Bosnia was also hindered by a number of initiatives taken by the Bush administration in its final days. The first was the decision to deploy American troops in support of the UN peacekeeping force in Somalia. It was very unlikely that the US government would commit troops to two trouble spots simultaneously. The second part of the inheritance from Bush was a letter written in late December 1992 by the outgoing president, with Clinton's knowledge and approval, to Milosevic and the Yugoslav army Commander Zivota Panic.⁴¹⁰² This was prompted by intelligence reports that Milosevic wanted to unleash a wave of violence during the presidential transition in the United States and information that he was considering 'special actions' in Kosovo and Macedonia. Owen and Vance had already been warning since early November that violence could break out at any time in Kosovo and Macedonia, and had called for a force of at least battalion strength to be stationed in Macedonia as a preventive measure.⁴¹⁰³

⁴⁰⁹⁵ See, for example, R.W. Apple, 'U.N. and the Pentagon', The New York Times, 15/02/93.

⁴⁰⁹⁶ Drew, Edge, p. 145.

⁴⁰⁹⁷ Shawcross, Evil, p. 89.

⁴⁰⁹⁸ J.F., 'Croatian leader urges western action against Serbs', New York Times News Service, 12/12/92, 1821EST.

⁴⁰⁹⁹ E. Sciolino, 'Clinton faults Bush over Bosnia policy', New York Times News Service, 11/12/92, 2053EST; Owen, Odyssey, p. 83. See also Powell & Persico, Journey, pp. 547-548.

⁴¹⁰⁰ Major, Autobiography, p. 540.

⁴¹⁰¹ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia – The Secret War: Tragic Cost of Allies' Hidden Hostility', The Guardian, 21/05/96.

⁴¹⁰² 'Bush dreigt Milosevic met militair ingrijpen' ('Bush threatens Milosevic with military intervention'), NRC Handelsblad, 29/12/92; 'VS dreigen Servië met geweld om Kosovo' ('US threatens Serbia with force over Kosovo'), de Volkskrant, 29/12/92.

⁴¹⁰³ Ramcharan, p. 1213; Owen CD-ROM, 'Summary of Lord Owen's speech and answers to questions at NATO, Brussels, 04/12/92'; 'Navo waarschuwt Servië' ('NATO warns Serbia'), Trouw, 08/12/92.

Owen's warnings were picked up by the media.⁴¹⁰⁴ Extension of the conflict into either Kosovo or Macedonia was a nightmare scenario for the West, because it could draw NATO partners Greece and Turkey into the hostilities. At the request of the Macedonian government, the UN Security Council therefore agreed to station 700 'blue helmets' in its territory as a preventive measure (Resolution 795 of 11 December 1992).

On 6 January 1993, 147 Canadian soldiers arrived in Macedonia. On 6 March they were replaced by a Scandinavian battalion made up of troops from Norway, Sweden, Finland and Denmark. This force was part of UNPROFOR, but operated under its own Macedonia Command.⁴¹⁰⁵ In July 1993 the US government would add 315 of its own men. In his letter to Milosevic, Bush threatened air strikes against both Serbia itself and Serbs in Kosovo if Milosevic provoked war there.⁴¹⁰⁶ Both these actions formed part of the American policy to build a 'dam' against potential confrontations in the southern Balkans.⁴¹⁰⁷ The letter also stated that US air strikes would take place if Serbia violated the no-fly zone, attacked UNPROFOR in Bosnia or interfered with humanitarian convoys in Bosnia.⁴¹⁰⁸ Although this appeared at first sight to send a powerful signal, Milosevic could easily have inferred from it that Washington may not have been prepared to allow the fire in former Yugoslavia to spread any further but also did not intend to extinguish the flames already burning in Bosnia.⁴¹⁰⁹

Quite apart from this policy legacy from Bush to his successor, it was also expected that it would take Clinton some time to develop a specific policy of his own towards Bosnia once he had entered the White House. It took him a long time to put together his national security policy team. The man he had chosen as Secretary of State, Warren Christopher, was head of his transitional team and his intended National Security Adviser, Sandy Berger, was chief of staff in that team. So neither had much time at all to prepare the new president's foreign policy. Clinton himself, who in any case had little experience in foreign policy, was further hindered by his promise to the voters that he would be homing in on economic policy 'like a laser beam'.⁴¹¹⁰

But amidst all the hesitations and problems during his settling in, Clinton was sure of one thing: no American ground troops would be deployed and any US military action in respect of the former Yugoslavia would be conducted exclusively within a multilateral framework. The new president was quoted as saying as much in the magazine US News & World Report on the day after his inauguration.⁴¹¹¹

According to opinion polls, the American public was sharply divided over the issue of whether the United States should become involved in either military or peacekeeping operations in Bosnia. In any case, only a small percentage of Americans were interested in the Bosnian situation. The proportion ⁴¹⁰⁴ For a sample of the reports about Macedonia appearing in the Dutch press in late 1992, see Frank Westerman, 'De chauvinisten hier bouwen levensgevaarlijke luchtkastelen' ('The chauvinists here build life-threatening illusions'), de Volkskrant, 19/11/92; idem, 'Banaal incident kan strijd doen ontvlammen' ('Minor incident could ignite conflict'), de Volkskrant, 20/11/92; idem, 'Regering Macedonië is tevreden over komst VN-waarnemers' ('Macedonia government pleased with arrival of UN observers') and 'Macedonië opgetogen' ('Macedonia dressed up'), de Volkskrant, 26/11/92; idem, 'Niet erkend maakt onbemind' ('Unrecognized is unloved'), de Volkskrant, 04/12/92; Peter Michielsen, 'Europa speelt Russische roulette met Macedonië' ('Europe plays Russian roulette with Macedonia'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/11/92; idem, 'In kampen Macedonië dreigt explosie' ('Explosion threatens in Macedonia camps'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/11/92; idem, 'Het bevroren hart van de Balkan' ('The froze heart of the Balkans'), NRC Handelsblad, 28/11/92; 'De Serviërs gebruikten ons bij hun opmars als levend schild' ('The Serbs used us a living shield in their advance'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/11/92; J.F. Hinrichs, 'Militair ingrijpen in Joegoslavië komt naderbij' ('Military intervention in Yugoslavia comes closer'), Het Financieele Dagblad, 09/12/92.

⁴¹⁰⁵ Peter Michielsen, 'VN voor het eerst preventief' ('UN preventive for the first time'), NRC Handelsblad, 14/12/92.

⁴¹⁰⁶ Callahan, Wars, pp. 117-118; Don Oberdorfer, 'A Bloody Failure in the Balkans', The Washington Post, 08/02/93; David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, p. 137.

⁴¹⁰⁷ David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, pp. 136-137.

⁴¹⁰⁸ ABZ, top secret codes, Van den Broek 511 to PR NATO, 29/12/92, state secret.

⁴¹⁰⁹ Cf. David C. Gompert, 'The United States and Yugoslavia's Wars', Ullman (ed.), World, p. 137.

⁴¹¹⁰ Drew, Edge, p. 138; Daalder, Dayton, p. 83; Maarten Huygen, 'De vraag is of Clinton wel tijd heeft voor buitenlands beleid' ('The question is whether Clinton has time for foreign policy'), NRC Handelsblad, 24/12/92.

⁴¹¹¹ Paulsen, Jugoslaviëpolitiek, p. 105.

who claimed that they were following events there almost always remained at a fairly steady 10-15 per cent throughout 1993 and 1994. Only American participation in aerial action and the distribution of emergency aid could count upon a virtually constant majority in favour.⁴¹¹² Leading American commentators like Leslie Gelb claimed that the Europeans should fight their own battles and that, 'If Europeans once again ignore genocide and evil and decline to be their brother's keepers, Americans may not want to be Europe's keepers for much longer either'.⁴¹¹³

Once Clinton had finally assembled his national security team – Christopher at the State Department, Les Aspin at the Department of Defense and Anthony Lake (not Berger) as National Security Adviser – they were unable to reach agreement about American policy towards Bosnia for a long time. That policy was principally a subject of discussion for the Principals Committee, which as well as Lake, Christopher and Aspin also included Colin Powell, CIA chief James Woolsey, Berger – now Lake's deputy – and Vice-President Al Gore's man on the National Security Council, Leon Fuerth. Clinton and Gore themselves also sometimes attended the Committee's meetings. The 'hawks' at these gatherings were Gore, who had long wanted action against the Serbs, Fuerth and Albright, who was allergic to anything that smacked of a 'new Munich'. Lake also wanted to punish the Serbs.⁴¹¹⁴ Aspin argued that results could only be achieved if forces were deployed on a massive scale. This stance reflected the opinion of his department, the Pentagon.⁴¹¹⁵

Christopher was the prototype of the diplomat used to traditional international relations, and who looked disfavouredly upon civil wars at the periphery of US foreign policy interests.⁴¹¹⁶ He had difficulty reaching a definitive standpoint on the issue of the former Yugoslavia, but eventually decided – like the previous administration – that Bosnia was really a European problem.⁴¹¹⁷ Clinton, hindered by his lack of foreign policy experience, did not lead the discussion.⁴¹¹⁸ Through 1993 he was buffeted back and forth between personal emotions about Bosnia and Gore's pressure to do something on the one hand, and reticence because of his desire to prioritize his domestic programme and the expectation that the American public would not support the deployment of ground troops on the other.⁴¹¹⁹ As a result, according to one senior official the long meetings of the Principals Committee in the White House Situation Room had little to do with policy formulation: 'It was group therapy – an existential debate over what is the role of America.'⁴¹²⁰

The policy of the government in Washington was made even opaque by its failure to choose whether in the first instance to back the Bosnian government – which wanted a just peace – or the European Community, which in general terms was seeking a rapid end to the war, just or not. The result of this veering approach by the Clinton administration was a lot of empty rhetoric which appeared to express US support for the Bosnian government in its struggle for a just peace.⁴¹²¹ Thanks to that rhetoric, Sarajevo continued to entertain hopes of an American intervention and increasingly regarded the UN as the institution which was resisting that longed-for development. At the same time, the US government withheld its support from peace proposals.

The fact that Vance and Owen had been in frequent contact with the European Community and the government of its leading member states, but had a very aloof relationship with both the outgoing and the incoming administrations in Washington, also had its repercussions.⁴¹²² Owen himself ⁴¹¹² Bert, Superpower, pp. 86-88. See also 'Clinton breekt vredesplan voor Bosnië open' ('Clinton blows open peace plan for Bosnia'), de Volkskrant, 11/02/93.

⁴¹¹³ L.H. Gelb, 'Foreign Affairs: Never again', New York Times News Service, 12/12/92, 1452EST.

⁴¹¹⁴ Drew, Edge, p. 142.

⁴¹¹⁵ Drew, Edge, p. 142.

⁴¹¹⁶ Callahan, Wars, p. 19.

⁴¹¹⁷ Shawcross, Evil, p. 102.

⁴¹¹⁸ Drew, Edge, pp. 144 and 145-146.

⁴¹¹⁹ Cf. Drew, Edge, p. 283.

⁴¹²⁰ Drew, Edge, p. 150.

⁴¹²¹ Cf. Callahan, Wars, p. 143; Christopher, Stream, p. 345.

⁴¹²² Ludlow, Involvement, pp. 1, 3.

came to this conclusion soon after the presentation of the peace plan, but any regrets about it were negated by his own bluntness over the lack of knowledge in Washington. He spoke of 'monumental ignorance' on the part of the American policymakers and, more than a month after its presentation, claimed that 'a crash course is needed to make it clear to the Americans what the plan actually entails'. An offer by the mediators to provide more information elicited no response from the Americans, however.⁴¹²³ They were livid at Owen's remarks and felt that they did not need to be taught a lesson by him.⁴¹²⁴ In fact, they would rather be rid of him altogether.⁴¹²⁵ There was a serious breakdown in communication between the two mediators and the US government.⁴¹²⁶ Most exchanges between them were conducted in the press. According to Pauline Neville-Jones, a senior civil servant in the Cabinet Office of British Prime Minister John Major, after this clash with the Clinton administration Owen became 'useless' for anything to do with Yugoslavia.⁴¹²⁷

Almost immediately after the Clinton administration took office, Christopher rounded on the Vance-Owen plan since it would reward ethnic cleansing and was practically unenforceable.⁴¹²⁸ He regarded it as a dead end, because he could not see how the Bosnian Serbs would be persuaded voluntarily to give up almost half the territory they held.⁴¹²⁹ As US National Security Adviser Anthony Lake would later say, '[H]e didn't think it was viable or made sense, it was so hoggedly-poggedly'⁴¹³⁰

9. Developments in Bosnia itself

In Bosnia itself, the peace plan was suffering the same fate as virtually every other proposed peace for the region. Months of negotiation and consultation followed, as each side tried to frustrate those parts of the plan it did not like. This was done by conducting military campaigns against areas promised to other parties or by starting or (continuing) ethnic cleansing in areas assigned to themselves according to the plan. Specifically, the Serbs renewed their offensive in Eastern Bosnia – which under Vance-Owen would go to the Muslims – and fighting broke out between Croats and Muslims in Hercegovina. The upshot was that the Bosnian Muslim forces, the ABiH, found themselves fighting a war on two fronts – or, as Burg and Shoup describe it more accurately, a war on multiple fronts against two different enemies.⁴¹³¹

The battles between Croats and Muslims were in large part a direct consequence of the proposals made by Owen and Vance for the gradual demilitarization of Bosnia-Hercegovina. Under these, the Bosnian Serbs could withdraw their forces into the three provinces allocated to them. That was a clear proposal. But the proposals with respect to the Croatian and Bosnian Croat troops were much less clear. They would have to withdraw to 'their' province 3, Bosanski Brod, and 'the remaining forces would hopefully reach agreement as to their deployment in provinces 1, 5, 8, 9 and 10'⁴¹³² – that is, Bihac, Tuzla, Mostar, Zenica and Travnik. Three of these, Bihac, Tuzla and Zenica, were Muslim provinces. But Mostar and Travnik were allocated to the Croats, at the time there were still both Croat HVO and Muslim ABiH units.

In this respect, the Vance-Owen plan failed to solve a huge problem. The Bosnian government insisted that its troops should remain in these two areas of western Hercegovina and central Bosnia, whilst the Croats insisted that their forces alone should govern areas which would have a Bosnian-⁴¹²³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00110. Biegman 112 to Kooijmans, 04/02/93.

⁴¹²⁴ Cf. Burg & Shoup, War, p. 233; Owen CD-ROM, 'Report from Lord Owen's Private Secretary from New York in Co-Chairmen's meeting with Secretary of State Christopher on 1 February 1993'.

⁴¹²⁵ Interview T. Stoltenberg, 22/09/00.

⁴¹²⁶ Simms, Hour, pp. 147-148.

⁴¹²⁷ Interview Dame Pauline Neville-Jones, 15/11/01.

⁴¹²⁸ Daalder, Dayton, pp. 10-11; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 106.

⁴¹²⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. COREU Bonn, 08/05/93, cpe/bon 292.

⁴¹³⁰ Simms, Hour, p. 147.

⁴¹³¹ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 134.

⁴¹³² Burg & Shoup, War, p. 222.

Croat majority according to the plan. Shortly after the presentation of Vance-Owen, the Bosnian Croats proposed that all military units in the provinces assigned to them be brought under HVO command. Conversely, Croat units in the provinces with a Muslim majority should place themselves under the command of the ABiH. The Bosnian government did not agree, however, since it feared that this would lead to the Croat provinces breaking away, thus effectively partitioning Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴¹³³

When the ABiH units in 'its' areas continued to operate independently, the Bosnian Croat leadership issued an ultimatum: they must place themselves under HVO command by 15 April. When this date passed without the demands being met, the Bosnian Croats began 'cleansing' their region – principally the province of Travnik in the Vance-Owen plan – of Muslims. In this region they were only a relative majority of the population: 45 per cent, compared with 41 per cent Muslims and 9.5 per cent Serbs. Effectively, therefore, the Bosnian Croats regarded the Vance-Owen plan as legitimizing the ethnic cleansing of the territory allocated to them.⁴¹³⁴

Fighting had begun immediately, in January 1993, in and around Vitez, Travnik and Jablanica. There were also heavy battles around Busovaca, which contained both the military headquarters of the HVO in central Bosnia and the base of the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion. The Bosnian Croat forces did not confine themselves to fighting, but also tried to cut off supplies to the Muslims. That led to such serious threats to international aid workers in central Bosnia that in mid January the UNHCR was forced to close its offices in Jablanica, Prozor and Gornji Vakuf. The Croats also tried to seize the Prozor-Fojnica-Kiseljak road, thus threatening the supply of food to Sarajevo. The ferocity of these battles was heightened in part by the fact that the ABiH received its first large-scale illegal consignments of weapons during spring 1993.⁴¹³⁵

The HVO at first managed to force the government forces in central Bosnia back to the area around Zenica, but in June 1993 the ABiH captured Travnik. From then on it unexpectedly made significant gains from the Croat forces, and by the end of the year had driven them out of a third of their territory. The government in Zagreb felt forced to send the equivalent of three or four battalions of the Croatian army itself, the HV, to lend support. But this did not help: between spring 1993 and March 1994, Croat-held territory fell from almost 20 per cent to barely 10 per cent of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Between 9000 and 13,000 Croats, both from Croatia and Bosnia, died in this conflict with the Muslims.⁴¹³⁶

The dispatch of regular units of the Croatian army, in contravention of UN Security Council resolutions, made Zagreb the subject of massive international criticism. But the international community was unable to be too hard on the Zagreb government for its actions in central Bosnia, because Western measures against Croatia could lead to the Tudjman government denying access to his country to the hundreds of thousands of Muslim refugees from Bosnia who were fleeing there. And that would saddle Western Europe with the problem.⁴¹³⁷ Only in the United Kingdom was much attention paid to the fighting between Croats and Muslims in central Bosnia, this was mainly because Britain's UN troops were stationed there. Moreover, the conflict gave the British government – which always felt uneasy about any calls for more action against the Serbs – ammunition to claim that the Croats as well as the Serbs were responsible for committing serious crimes.⁴¹³⁸

Elsewhere in the West, however, the battles between Croats and Muslims went largely unnoticed by the general public. The media did not want to make the conflict too complicated for its audiences. In addition, the US government did not want to demonize the Croats too much because they had been given a key role in a strategy devised against the Serbs during 1993. The authorities in Sarajevo also preferred not to draw too much attention to the struggle against the Croats because it was ⁴¹³³ Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 227-228.

⁴¹³⁴ Cigar, Genocide, pp. 125 and 151.

⁴¹³⁵ Gow, Forces, p. 2.

⁴¹³⁶ Martin Spegelj in Magas & Zanic, War, p. 107.

⁴¹³⁷ Tanner, Croatia, p. 288.

⁴¹³⁸ Simms, Hour, pp. 33-34 and 145-146.

still counting upon their support against the Serbs. Moreover, a proportion of the illegal weapons shipments to the Bosnian government during this period were passing through Croatian territory.

Occasionally, reports of atrocities did break through this wall of silence. For example, the mass murder by Croat fighters in the Muslim village of Ahmici on 22 April. Of the 500 civilian residents, 104 were killed and their homes then set on fire with the bodies inside.⁴¹³⁹ On 10 May the Croats held up a convoy of aid destined for Muslims and murdered eight of the drivers.⁴¹⁴⁰ In June heavy fighting broke out for control of Mostar, a battle which attracted mainly international attention when Croat artillery fire destroyed the town's famous mediaeval bridge on 9 November. From time to time, in this conflict serious outrages were also committed by the Muslim side.

The fighting between Croats and Muslims, the threat from Croatia itself not to prolong the UNPROFOR presence on its territory, the Serb offensive in eastern Bosnia and the refusal by the Bosnian Serbs to accept the peace plan all led to Western diplomats lurching from one crisis to the next during the early months of 1993. Little came of the effort to implement a blueprint for peace. Even David Owen himself eventually stopped believing in one of the essential points of the plan he and Cyrus Vance had presented. His objective with regard to the conflict in Bosnia had become, as he himself described it, 'the lowest possible level of violence with the highest possible level of humanitarian relief'.⁴¹⁴¹ Or, to put it more bluntly, muddling through – a policy to which the West was condemned not only by the situation in Bosnia and Croatia themselves, but also by the increasingly obvious differences between Washington and the European Community over the best way to tackle the problems in Yugoslavia.

10. The Dutch response to the Vance-Owen plan

'Politics has given me broad shoulders,' said Lord Owen on 6 June 1995, in the fourth Cornelis van Vollenhoven Memorial Lecture at the University of Leiden, 'but I was still surprised by the vehemence and the nature of some of the criticism expressed in the Netherlands in 1992 and 1993 about the so-called Vance-Owen peace plan.'⁴¹⁴² According to Owen, his and Vance's plan was torpedoed not only by the US, but also by the Netherlands and to a certain extent Germany.⁴¹⁴³

In this assessment, Owen ascribes the Netherlands with a great deal of influence. It cannot be denied, the original response to the Vance-Owen plan from both Dutch politicians and the Department of Foreign Affairs was negative.⁴¹⁴⁴ This arose from the impression that the Muslims were being sacrificed to the Serbs, who would be given too much territory. The principle from the London Conference that military conquests should not be recognized was being undermined. However, not in every case, the criticism seems to have been based upon a good understanding of the plan; rather, it sometimes appears to have come from disappointment that more decisive action was not being taken against the Bosnian Serbs.

One of those who criticized the plan on a number of points was the Dutch Christian-Democrat MEP Jean Penders.⁴¹⁴⁵ In his view, the plan not only rewarded Serb aggression but also played into the hands of Serbs and Croats who wanted to partition Bosnia-Herzegovina. Acceptance of Vance-Owen would lead to ethnic cleansing spreading elsewhere: to Kosovo, Macedonia and the former Soviet ⁴¹³⁹ For a description see, for example, Rathfelder, Sarajevo, pp. 118-125.

⁴¹⁴⁰ See e.g. Rathfelder, Sarajevo, pp. 142-143.

⁴¹⁴¹ ABZ, archive links, COREU of the Danish EC presidency, 24/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 913.

⁴¹⁴² Owen, Grenzen, p. 372. See also Owen CD-ROM, Owen 'The Limits of UN Enforcement', The Fourth Cornelis van Vollenhoven Memorial Lecture, 06/06/95: 'Politics has given me broad shoulders (...)'; Van de Roier, Frontdiplomaten, p. 39.

⁴¹⁴³ For the surprised responses in the Netherlands to the amount of influence ascribed by Owen to the Dutch position, see, for example, 'Nederland in sleutelrol' ('Netherlands in key role'), and 'Van den Broek: niet eens met kritiek Lord Owen' ('Van den Broek does not agree with Lord Owen's criticism'), NRC Handelsblad, 12/06/95.

⁴¹⁴⁴ Cf. Scholten et al., Sarajevo, p. 97 (see CD-ROM with the Dutch version)

⁴¹⁴⁵ J.J.M. Penders, 'Het nationaliteitsvraagstuk en de veiligheid' ('The nationality issue and security'), Christen Democratische Verkenningen (1993)4, pp. 147-155.

Union. As a result, according to Penders, the moral authority of the EC would be harmed, particularly in its relations with Eastern Europe. Refugees would flood from Eastern Europe to the West, which in turn would offer a trump card to far-right groups in Western Europe. The instability which would be unleashed by the plan in Eastern Europe would threaten the progress and extension of European integration. And American irritation about European inability to solve the Yugoslavia problem would have repercussions for the transatlantic relationship. Instead of the Vance-Owen plan, Penders therefore called for 'an arrangement which will satisfy our sense of justice'.⁴¹⁴⁶ Such an arrangement should include the closure of the camps, the establishment of safe zones and the placing of heavy weapons under international supervision. The no-fly zone should be enforced and, possibly, aimed air raids carried out on Serb military targets.

Political scientist and commentator Bart Tromp also regarded the plan as rewarding Serb murderousness. He drew comparisons with 1938, when another aggressor had managed to achieve an Anschluss, 'also without a plebiscite'.⁴¹⁴⁷ Jan-Geert Siccama found a parallel in the 1930s, too: he compared Vance-Owen with the Laval-Hoare plan, which had been drawn up in 1936 in response to the occupation of much of Ethiopia by Mussolini's fascist Italy. That plan sounded the death-knell for the League of Nations as an effective security structure. If the United Nations did not watch out, it was now destined for the same fate.⁴¹⁴⁸ André Roelofs wrote in the newspaper De Volkskrant of a 'cynical operation' on the part of Owen and Vance, who were seeking 'a Realpolitik arrangement under which the Bosnian government would acknowledge its defeat and the Serbs would be satisfied with what they had so far conquered – or at least would say that they were satisfied.' When it turned out that Radovan Karadzic was not prepared even to do that, André Roelofs claimed that the West had been caught with its trousers down because it simply had not considered what to do if the Geneva talks were to fail.⁴¹⁴⁹ Writing in the newspaper NRC Handelsblad, Sampienon called Vance-Owen a 'partition plan' in which the 'the right of the strongest was accepted' and with which the EC was trying to extract itself from the tragedy in Bosnia-Herzegovina 'at a bargain price'.⁴¹⁵⁰

However, there were less negative voices to be heard talking about the peace plan in the Netherlands. CDA parliamentarian Ton De Kok was inclined – reluctantly – to accept it. 'Unfortunately, it is evident that in this case aggression pays,' he wrote. 'The Muslim leadership will have to weigh up a choice between accepting the proposals tabled by Owen and Vance and looking at what gains can be made from continuing the war.'⁴¹⁵¹ De Kok's view broadly paralleled a comment made towards the end of 1992 by Peter Volten of the Institute for East-West Studies in New York that the West had lost the battle in Bosnia-Herzegovina. According to Volten, there was 'no longer any sense from a strategic perspective in achieving victory in a 'sideshow'. It was more important to force Serbia to its knees and dictate a peace at the 'negotiating table'.⁴¹⁵² Retired Brigadier General J.C.A.C. De Vogel went even further when, at around the same time, he objected to large-scale intervention. In his view, the state of Bosnia-Herzegovina had 'virtually no right to exist, so the question is whether there is any point in sustaining this fiction'.⁴¹⁵³

In his initial response to the Vance-Owen plan, Hans Sandee of the Eastern Europe Bureau at the Department of Foreign Affairs wrote that the Bosnian Serbs would gain a lot of territory under its ⁴¹⁴⁶ J.J.M. Penders, 'Het nationaliteitsvraagstuk en de veiligheid', Christen Democratische Verkenningen (1993)4, p. 149.

⁴¹⁴⁷ Tromp, Verraad, p. 53 (06/01/93).

⁴¹⁴⁸ J.G. Siccama, 'Laval-Hoare 1936/Vance-Owen 1993', Armex, April 1993, p. 6.

⁴¹⁴⁹ André Roelofs, 'Westen niet voorbereid op échec in Genève' ('West not prepared for stalemate in Geneva'), de Volkskrant, 13/01/93.

⁴¹⁵⁰ J.H. Sampienon, 'Vredehandhaving zonder vrede kan niet' ('Maintaining peace is impossible when there is no peace'), NRC Handelsblad, 11/02/93.

⁴¹⁵¹ 'Joegoslavië' ('Yugoslavia'), CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 18.

⁴¹⁵² P.M.E. Volten, 'Ingrijpen ter wille van democratie' ('Intervene for the sake of democracy'), NRC Handelsblad, 31/12/92.

⁴¹⁵³ Infantry Brigadier General J.C.A.C. de Vogel (ret'd), 'Ingrijpen in Joegoslavië?' ('Intervention in Yugoslavia?'), Carré (1992)12, pp. 13-19. See also idem, 'Ingrijpen in Joegoslavië?' ('Intervention in Yugoslavia?'), Vrij Nederland, 09/01/93, pp. 7-8; idem, 'Er bestaat geen Bosnische identiteit' ('There is no Bosnian identity'), NRC Handelsblad, 30/03/93.

allocation scheme. Even though Owen and Vance assumed that the population would return to their original homes it was highly questionable whether that would indeed be the case, according to Sandee. He also described the fact that the plan made no mention of a central Bosnian government army as an 'ominous sign'.⁴¹⁵⁴

Brand-new Minister of Foreign Affairs Peter Kooijmans played a major role in determining the Dutch attitude towards the plan, which was launched on the same day he took office. Having visited the region, Kooijmans felt a strong emotional attachment to the Yugoslavia issue.⁴¹⁵⁵ He believed that the international community should be doing more⁴¹⁵⁶ and so in this respect – despite the original, somewhat different outlook expressed during his introductory meeting with Van Walsum (see Chapter 8) – continued to follow the line taken by his predecessor, Hans van den Broek, 'with complete conviction'.⁴¹⁵⁷ At the press conference to mark his appointment, the new Minister was asked what he regarded as the biggest problem in his new job. 'My biggest problem is Yugoslavia,' he replied, little realizing how deeply that remark would come to burden his period in office. During his 18 months at Foreign Affairs, the media would constantly remind Kooijmans of that comment.⁴¹⁵⁸ His attitude towards the Vance-Owen plan was determined in part by his difficulty in accepting that frontiers were gaining in significance in Eastern Europe and multi-ethnicity was becoming a thing of the past there. A few months before becoming Minister of Foreign Affairs, Kooijmans had described it as an 'absurdity' that, 'whilst we in Western Europe in many ways regard borders as out of date, people in the other part of Europe are shutting themselves off from one another'.⁴¹⁵⁹

In his efforts to achieve a just peace, Kooijmans was very inclined to listen to what the Bosnian government thought of the plan. 'The Bosnians were against and you have to listen to the people who have got to live with it,' he told Norbert Both in a May 1997 interview. 'We were in close touch with them.'⁴¹⁶⁰ In the same interview, Kooijmans also claimed that in Washington the Dutch government had urged military intervention as an alternative to the Vance-Owen plan. With the help of American troops, he said, it would be possible to obtain a more favourable map for the Muslims and the reintegration of Bosnia.⁴¹⁶¹ According to Both, the Dutch government would only embrace the Vance-Owen plan at the beginning of May, by which time it was virtually dead, and would then become 'a staunch advocate'.⁴¹⁶² Both's evidence is drawn partly from Owen, who in his written memoirs of his time as a mediator ascribed great significance to Dutch moral indignation. According to Owen, the Dutch government had a major responsibility for torpedoing the plan, among other things by the pressure put on Washington from The Hague.⁴¹⁶³ The Dutch responded to this claim with surprise: Owen's criticism was too flattering for a country like the Netherlands with limited international influence.⁴¹⁶⁴ But Both agreed with the British mediator:

'To some degree the Netherlands had carried responsibility for the continuation of war, the reduced solidarity between EC member states and the diminished credibility of the ICFY [the international conference on Yugoslavia]... Dutch ⁴¹⁵⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Memorandum DEU to Kooijmans, 05/01/92 (should be: 05/01/93), no. 7/93.

⁴¹⁵⁵ Femke Halsema, 'Kleine stapjes. Het pragmatisch optimisme van Peter Kooijmans' ('Small steps. Peter Kooijmans' pragmatic optimism'), de Helling, 9(1996)3, p. 6.

⁴¹⁵⁶ Interview H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00.

⁴¹⁵⁷ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁴¹⁵⁸ Interview B. Hiensch, 13/07/00. See, for example, Rob Meines, 'Europa verlamd door doemdenken over Joegoslavië' ('Europe paralysed by defeatism over Yugoslavia'), NRC Handelsblad, 15/02/93.

⁴¹⁵⁹ Kooijmans in an interview in CD/Actueel, 05/09/92, quoted in Olaf van Boetzelaer, 'Kooijmans kan de juiste man op de juiste plaats zijn' ('Kooijmans could be the right man in the right place'), CD/Actueel, 16/01/93, p. 10.

⁴¹⁶⁰ Both, Indifference, p. 153. the Dutch quote in Both, version 1999, p. 248 n. 32

⁴¹⁶¹ Both, Indifference, p. 155.

⁴¹⁶² Both, Indifference, p. 158; see also p. 159.

⁴¹⁶³ Owen, Odyssey, p. 91.

⁴¹⁶⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 152.

policy encouraged the Bosnian government – with whom the Dutch were in constant touch – to refuse acceptance of the VOPP [Vance Owen peace plan] at a stage where their hold on east Bosnian land was still considerable. The Dutch attitude also awarded a degree of European legitimacy to the American opposition to the plan.⁴¹⁶⁵ And, 'Bosnian-Dutch-American opposition proved the death knell for the VOPP.'⁴¹⁶⁶

The problem with these criticisms by Both is that they are based mainly upon interviews conducted after the event. He himself notes that the Dutch government did not voice its criticism publicly at the time.⁴¹⁶⁷ This is an inaccurate assessment in two respects. Firstly, the Dutch government certainly did make its views about the plan known, and secondly it soon dropped what limited criticism there was, like that formulated by Sandee. Kooijmans would defend Vance-Owen through thick and thin in the Dutch parliament. Both's comment that the Dutch government changed from being a fervent opponent of the plan to 'a staunch advocate' at the beginning of May also cuts no ice. In a conversation with Warren Christopher on 7 May (see below), Kooijmans concluded that implementation of the peace plan was no longer a priority. In the view of Both, he could therefore not have been 'a staunch advocate' for very long.⁴¹⁶⁸ In reality, the Dutch government very soon reached the conclusion that there may have been a lot to find fault with in Vance-Owen but that – at the time – it was the 'least worse' solution.⁴¹⁶⁹

On 8 January 1993 it was announced in the Dutch government that a 'decisive peace effort' would be made in Geneva on Sunday, 10 January. The results of those negotiations were expressed in pessimistic terms. It had been decided in advance that any failure would be the fault of the Serbs, not the Muslims. And if that happened the UN Security Council would again debate the enforcement of the existing no-fly zone. On the same day the government discussed the Memorandum of Priorities without – at least according to the objectivized minutes – making any mention of the current situation in the former Yugoslavia or the dispatch of Dutch troops to the region.⁴¹⁷⁰

On 25 January 1993 the Dutch Parliament informed the National Assembly that it regarded 'full and unconditional' acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan by all sides as being 'of essential importance'. 'Only acceptance of this plan,' stated the government, 'and its implementation in the field can contribute to a lasting solution being found.'⁴¹⁷¹ The government also used this occasion to declare that it was prepared in principle to allow Dutch F-16 fighter aircrafts to take part in an operation to enforce the no-fly zone over Bosnia-Herzegovina, which was not being observed at the time. 'In this case, for the government credibility is of major consideration,' continued its statement, 'especially now that the United Nations is taking on an increasing role in promoting international peace and security.'⁴¹⁷²

The first verbal consultations between the new Minister, Kooijmans, and the parliamentary foreign affairs and defence committees took place on 28 January 1993. Most MPs appeared to accept the Vance-Owen plan, albeit as a recognition of reality rather than as a flawless initiative in its own right. None of the parliamentarians was more direct than Van Middelkoop:

'Does this plan not in fact accept the results of the ethnic cleansing in recent months? Does it not in fact create homelands for the various ethnic groups? Is ⁴¹⁶⁵ Both, Indifference, p. 160.

⁴¹⁶⁶ Both, Indifference, p. 175.

⁴¹⁶⁷ Both, Indifference, p. 155.

⁴¹⁶⁸ See also Both, Indifference, pp. 158-159.

⁴¹⁶⁹ Cf. Also ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. Memorandum 'Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond' ('Former Yugoslavia. Background') for Gymnich, 24-25/04/93, 22/04/93.

⁴¹⁷⁰ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 08/01/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴¹⁷¹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 31, p. 2.

⁴¹⁷² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 31, p. 5.

this not the introduction of ethnic apartheid into Europe? Does this plan not mean abandoning the political effort to restore a status quo ante? On the grounds of what international legal morality is this plan acceptable to the government? What future value does it have?⁴¹⁷³

The government, however, took the stance that the Vance-Owen plan was the 'only feasible' option at that stage and the acceptance of its basic principles by all the parties was 'at least a step in the right direction'.⁴¹⁷⁴ According to Kooijmans, the ethnic situation at the beginning of the war could not be restored. He also pointed out, rightly, that the plan certainly did not propose full ethnic partition. The provinces created would continue to have multi-ethnic populations, which in turn would maintain Bosnia-Herzegovina as a state. Moreover, said the Minister, the plan attempted to prevent the predominantly Serb provinces annexing themselves to Serbia proper. In other words, the plan tried 'to build a bridge between the irreparable status quo ante and the non-recognition of the results of ethnic cleansing'.⁴¹⁷⁵ There was little in those words to reflect the determined opposition which Owen and, in his wake, Both claimed to have detected from the Dutch government.

Apart from a modest sign that it took the no-fly zone over Bosnia seriously, the report of this meeting with Parliament shows that Kooijmans did not consider the international community to be in a position to exert military pressure. Given the stance being adopted by some permanent members of the UN Security Council, it was even doubtful whether aggressive enforcement of the no-fly zone as supported by the Dutch government was achievable. As a result, after the efforts made by the Netherlands in November and December 1992 to establish Safe Areas, Kooijmans had little confidence that they would come about quickly. 'After all,' he told the meeting of MPs, 'international ideas about safe havens, security zones and the like are still much too fragmented for the international community to be able to clench its fist.'⁴¹⁷⁶ In a memorandum written to brief Kooijmans for a conversation with his German counterpart, Klaus Kinkel, Department of Foreign Affairs official R. (Robert) in den Bosch of the Military Co-operation Bureau of the Directorate for Atlantic Co-operation and Security Affairs described the likely feasibility of Safe Areas as 'virtually nil'. On the one hand, the military situation in Bosnia did not allow for their creation, on the other no country was prepared to supply the additional troops needed to enforce them.⁴¹⁷⁷

11. Enforcement or implementation of the peace plan

The Dutch Ministry of Defence agreed to the deployment of F-16s to enforce the no-fly zone – this offer had been made public by Minister Ter Beek himself on 12 December. But the department was more reserved about any Dutch contribution for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan. In addition to ECMM (European Community Monitor Mission) monitors, signals personnel might be available to be dispatched.⁴¹⁷⁸ However, UNPROFOR's need for such staff would decrease drastically with the implementation of a new communications system.

Kooijmans' pessimism about the potential for enforcing anything, with the possible exception of a limited no-fly zone, was well-founded. The chances that the Owen-Vance peace plan could be military enforced were small from the outset, because Russia and China opposed any armed ⁴¹⁷³ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 41, pp. 6-7.

⁴¹⁷⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 41, p. 7.

⁴¹⁷⁵ TK, session 1992-1993, 22181, no. 41, p. 8. Were this peace accord ever accepted, according to Kooijmans the international community would 'be kept busy 'peacekeeping' for a long time in the same way as in Cambodia' [TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 41, p. 8.]

⁴¹⁷⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 41, p. 8.

⁴¹⁷⁷ ABZ, 999.241, Background notes for visit by Minister Kinkel, 14/01/92 (should be: 14/01/93), Military aspects ex-Yugoslavia, z.d..

⁴¹⁷⁸ ABZ, DIE/2001/0023. Memorandum from Deputy DEU to AP et al., 10/02/93, no. 48/93.

intervention against the Serbs and because France and the United Kingdom feared for the safety of their 'blue helmets'.⁴¹⁷⁹

The development of military plans to implement Vance-Owen was also hindered by duplication and rivalry between the WEU and NATO. The Dutch Permanent Representative to NATO, Jacobovits, observed in a telegram sent to his Minister on 28 January 1993 that this duality threatened the decisiveness of the Western community because the various governments could play their cards on whichever was the most favourable option for them and the Security Council would always seem to have a choice between two alternatives: NATO plans and WEU proposals. In particular the French government which preferred not to give NATO too great a role repeatedly misused the situation to promote the WEU. This had already been the case during the discussions about the safe havens. At the NATO Council on 27 January, Jacobovits had urged that the WEU agenda in respect of the peace plan be introduced into the NATO consultations as a joint WEU position. He also proposed to Kooijmans that decisions of WEU working groups be put to the Union's Permanent Council so that co-ordination could take place at that level and the WEU's ad-hoc Yugoslavia group was not constantly submitting independent decisions to international fora.⁴¹⁸⁰

These recommendations from Jacobovits came rather late. Two days earlier, on 25 January 1993, the ad-hoc Yugoslavia group of the WEU had met in Rome. It was then decided to submit its plans in respect of the neutralization and protection of Sarajevo in accordance with Vance-Owen to the United Nations, European Political Co-operation (EPC) and NATO. It was also agreed that the ad-hoc group would hold its last meeting on 1 February. The dissolution of the Contingency Planning Group (CPG) was looming, too, since the Permanent Council was demanding a greater role for itself in deciding policy.⁴¹⁸¹ Shortly after that France abandoned the WEU as an instrument: it was dawning on Paris that Europe needed the Americans in any approach to the Yugoslav conflict, and that the WEU was unsuitable in that context.⁴¹⁸² This effectively marked the end of the WEU's role in the war in the former Yugoslavia, except in the enforcement of sanctions.

The possibility of enforcing the peace plan, and the readiness to do so, had now become an issue because Owen and Vance had been unable on their own, through negotiations, to achieve its acceptance by the warring parties. By early February, therefore, they were seeking support from the UN Security Council to enforce it. On 1 February the EC Foreign Ministers publicly expressed their support for the Vance-Owen plan at a meeting in Brussels.⁴¹⁸³ The EU had not consulted in advance with Washington about this standpoint. It was clearly hoping to put pressure upon the Clinton Administration, which had not declared itself in favour of the plan. And that pressure was not insignificant: the Brussels decision implied that if Washington rejected the plan, it would be accountable for the consequences.⁴¹⁸⁴ At the same time any difference in approach to the Yugoslavia question by the Western European nations and the United States would create serious tensions in the transatlantic relationship. On 31 January, NATO's despairing Secretary-General, Manfred Wörner, had already called upon the international community to make it clear to the warring parties in Bosnia that it was serious.⁴¹⁸⁵

The new American Administration, however, continued to have doubts about a plan which had not been accepted by all sides. Therefore, it put no pressure upon the Bosnian government to adopt it ⁴¹⁷⁹ 'Lot Bosnië in handen van Veiligheidsraad' ('Bosnia's fate in hands of Security Council'), de Telegraaf, 01/02/93.

⁴¹⁸⁰ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Jacobovits 129 to Kooijmans, cc. Ter Beek, 28/01/93.

⁴¹⁸¹ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Kooijmans to PR WEU and Rome ambassador, 26/01/93, circ. 62.

⁴¹⁸² Interview A.P.R. Jacobovits de Szeged, 21/09/00.

⁴¹⁸³ Owen CD-ROM, Statement by the EU Council of Foreign Ministers, 01/02/93; 'Amerikanen halen gewonden op uit Bosnische oorlog' ('Americans collect wounded from Bosnian war'), de Telegraaf, 02/02/93.

⁴¹⁸⁴ Daalder, Dayton, p. 11.

⁴¹⁸⁵ K. Koch, 'Joegoslavië, Oost-Europa en de strategie van neo-containment' ('Yugoslavia, Eastern Europe and the strategy of neocontainment'), Gijs de Vries et al., Continent, pp. 126.

– which, according to Owen, was the necessary step between acceptance by the Croats and pressurizing the Serbs.

Interestingly, it was at exactly this point that Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrei Kozyrev floated the possibility of limited military intervention. In an interview with the French newspaper La Croix, he talked about both enforcement of the no-fly zone and attacks on ground targets if international forces were attacked.⁴¹⁸⁶ He also called for sanctions against all parties which failed to accept the Vance-Owen plan.⁴¹⁸⁷ On this last point, the Russian government was supporting the EC's standpoint against that of the United States. To the government in Moscow, the Vance-Owen plan seemed the best guarantee against large-scale intervention against Republika Srpska or Serbia itself.⁴¹⁸⁸ Moreover, with a view to nationalist opposition at home it could do Russian president Yeltsin no harm to side with Europe so as to show that he was not tied to the United States.⁴¹⁸⁹

On 4 February, during a brief visit to Washington, the German Minister of Foreign Affairs Kinkel made an impassioned plea to the new US government to support the Vance-Owen plan. However, those he met – Clinton, Christopher, Aspin, Lake and several leading member of Congress – were disinclined to do so. Their stated objections to the plan were that it rewarded Serb aggression, would be difficult to implement, required a peacekeeping force which would have to be supplied largely by the Americans and that that would be unlikely to obtain in a majority in Congress. Moreover, Owen had seriously offended them with his anti-American comments.⁴¹⁹⁰

Although the Clinton Administration did not at first come out with any new policy, one was being developed behind the scenes. One of Clinton's first acts after entering the White House was to ask his National Security Team to revise American policy on Bosnia, because he wanted 'something' done against Serb aggression.⁴¹⁹¹ Perhaps stimulated by the first noises from Russia at the beginning of February and by a powerful call from Bonn for the US to back the Vance-Owen plan because there was no alternative,⁴¹⁹² on 10 February 1993 Washington finally announced a six-point plan. This sidestepped the real question, whether or not to support Vance-Owen. The plan contained little of substance, and so marked the start of period of almost two years in which Clinton's policy towards Bosnia consisted mainly of rhetorical fireworks, with few actual deeds.⁴¹⁹³ Under the six-point plan, the American government left open the possibility that it might send troops to Bosnia to monitor the implementation of any peace accord, but this would have to be 'a viable agreement containing enforcement provisions', acceptable to all sides and allowing for the deployment of a multilateral military force.⁴¹⁹⁴

The American Permanent Representative to NATO, former Undersecretary of State for International Security Affairs and Ambassador to Lebanon Reginald Bartholomew, was appointed by Washington as a special envoy to assist Vance and Owen. Almost immediately he gained a Russian counterpart, Vitaly Churkin, whom Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs Kozyrev began using to put pressure upon Karadzic to accept the Vance-Owen plan.⁴¹⁹⁵ The involvement of both Russia and the United States in seeking a solution to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia thus became institutionalized.

⁴¹⁸⁶ 'EG: meer hulp aan Bosnische verkrachtingsslachtoffers' ('EC; more aid to Bosnian rape victims'), Trouw, 02/02/93.

⁴¹⁸⁷ 'Clinton geïsoleerd met aarzeling Bosnië-plan' ('Clinton isolated with hesitancy over Bosnia plan'), Trouw, 05/02/93.

⁴¹⁸⁸ Eisermann, Weg, p. 160.

⁴¹⁸⁹ Cf. Andrei Edemskii, 'Russian Perspectives', Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 39.

⁴¹⁹⁰ ABZ, 910, Yugoslavia general. Meesman 72 to Van den Broek, 05/02/93.

⁴¹⁹¹ Daalder, Dayton, pp. 8 and 87; Powell & Persico, Journey, pp. 548 en 561.

⁴¹⁹² Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting, 05/02/93.

⁴¹⁹³ Owen CD-ROM, 'Warren Christopher's Statement on US policy initiative, Washington, 10/02/93'. Cf. Daalder, Dayton, p. 10; Powell & Persico, Journey, p. 560.

⁴¹⁹⁴ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 233-234. See also 'VS gaan zich meer bemoeien met Bosnië' ('US to step up involvement in Bosnia'), De Telegraaf, 11/02/93; 'VS zetten overleg Bosnië onder druk' ('US puts Bosnia talks under pressure'), Trouw, 11/02/93.

⁴¹⁹⁵ Ludlow, Involvement, pp. 3-4.

The veiled refusal by Washington to enforce Vance-Owen was followed by a return to the severely tried means of finding a solution to the problems in the former Yugoslavia by negotiation. And it was now clear that the United States would only back a peace plan if it were acceptable to the Bosnian government. And as long as that government believed that it could achieve more success on the battlefield than at the negotiating table – as its army's recent victories over the Croats appeared to show was possible – it knew that it would be supported in its rejection. Even without American intervention, the Sarajevo government had been given carte blanche for intransigence at the negotiating table.

That did not make matters easier for Owen and Vance. It thwarted the three-stage strategy under which first the Croats and then the Bosnian government would accept the peace plan. The only chance for Owen and Vance to achieve that now would be to make more concessions to the Bosnian government.⁴¹⁹⁶ But the more they did that, the less likely it was that their third stage – acceptance by the Bosnian Serbs – would be achieved. Whilst the Bosnian Serbs already had a problem with the peace plan because they regarded it as denying them the Posavina corridor as a result of the province of Bosanski Brod being allocated to the Croats, Owen and Vance now tried to bring the Bosnian government on board by offering it a link between province 5 (Tuzla) and the River Sava through the same area. This would remove any possibility for the Bosnian Serbs to create a link between 'their' provinces along the Posavina corridor through an exchange of territory with the Croats. According to Owen, this was in fact the decisive factor in the Serbs' eventual rejection of the plan.⁴¹⁹⁷ When putting heavy pressure on the Bosnian Serb leaders to accept the plan on 12 January in Geneva, Milosevic, too, had told Owen and Vance that it would only be acceptable to him on the condition that a northern corridor be created between the Serb areas.⁴¹⁹⁸

One of the positive aspects of the American six-point plan was that in it the Clinton Administration declared itself prepared to enforce the no-fly zone over Bosnia. At the UN, Washington now also backed the rapid establishment of the war-crimes tribunal. For the British and French governments, though, probably the most important aspect of the six-point plan was that it did not include either air strikes or the abolition of the weapons embargo against Bosnia, both ideas which had been widely posited in the American capital in recent weeks.⁴¹⁹⁹

Despite the meagre substance of the six-point plan, the Dutch government applauded the greater American involvement now that Bartholomew had been appointed to 'help' Vance and Owen. The government in The Hague still hoped that a number of US objections to the Vance-Owen plan could soon be overcome, because it regarded American support for its implementation as essential.⁴²⁰⁰ In reality, however, Bartholomew would primarily act as a lobbyist for Izetbegovic during the talks led by Owen and Vance.⁴²⁰¹

At a special meeting of NATO Ministers held on 26 February it became clear that, despite the six-point plan, the American government still did not know what it wanted. Christopher may have stated that Washington was prepared to contribute to monitoring based upon a peace plan, but that must still represent 'a just, sustainable and enforceable arrangement' under which Bosnia-Herzegovina remained a unitary state. Christopher did not say whether such an American military contribution would include ground troops. An invitation to Christopher from Kooijmans to indicate what specific objections the Clinton Administration harboured in respect of Vance-Owen met with no success.

⁴¹⁹⁶ Cf. Burg & Shoup, War, p. 234.

⁴¹⁹⁷ Van de Roer, Frontdiplomaten, p. 40. See also Burg & Shoup, War, p. 235. See also Owen CD-ROM, 'Personal telegram from Lord Owen to Sir Robin Redwick, 29/01/93'.

⁴¹⁹⁸ Eisermann, Weg, p. 158.

⁴¹⁹⁹ Daalder, Dayton, p. 10.

⁴²⁰⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Kooijmans to PR WEU, 15/02/93, celer 067; TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 35, p. 2; Both, Indifference, p. 156.

⁴²⁰¹ Owen CD-ROM, 'Direct governmental involvement in the search for a negotiated settlement to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, September 1992-July 1994, Part 1'; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 236.

According to Christopher, the European nations must take the lead in implementing any peace plan, and redouble their efforts to that end. For him, the question was whether the Europeans possessed the political will to assume their responsibilities with regard to the former Yugoslavia. But Hurd and Dumas, continued to take the view that the Western attitude towards Serbia could go no further than 'persuasion backed by pressure' – with the pressure above all referring to sanctions. They had little time for peace enforcement. Dumas, moreover, wanted the peace plan to be implemented by the UN, not NATO as the Americans wished.⁴²⁰²

Meanwhile, the talks being led by Owen and Vance in New York barely managed to get off the ground. That was due not only to the attitude of the American government, but also to the warring parties. President Izetbegovic refused to go to New York to negotiate at the beginning of February, sending Silajdzic instead. But, as Owen told the permanent representatives to the UN of the EC member states on 4 February, Silajdzic represented a government which was hardly functioning. For example, the Prime Minister in the Bosnian government, Mile Akmadzic, was actually a member of the Bosnian Croat delegation to the talks.⁴²⁰³ This led to the bizarre situation that he claimed to speak in both his capacities – as Bosnian premier and as Croat leader – during the negotiations.⁴²⁰⁴ Akmadzic disputed the decision to send Silajdzic: according to him, the Bosnian government had never debated the appointment.⁴²⁰⁵ On 18 February, Akmadzic challenged Silajdzic's testimony before the European Affairs Subcommittee of the US Senate's Foreign Affairs Committee, telling its Chairman, Senator Joseph Biden, that Silajdzic might well be Foreign Minister in the Bosnian government but had failed properly to represent that government's standpoint. According to Akmadzic, Silajdzic represented only the Bosnian Muslims whereas the government had appointed a delegation made up of two Muslims, two Croats and two Serbs to represent it in contacts and negotiations abroad. Akmadzic also used the occasion to point out that Izetbegovic's term as President had expired on 20 December. And although he had extended that term under the State of Emergency, according to Akmadzic the prerogative to do so rested not with him as President but solely with the Presidium. So, just as Silajdzic did not speak for the government, so Izetbegovic did not speak for the Presidium, of which in any case he was under normal circumstances only the primus inter pares. In his letter to Biden, Akmadzic apologized for having to be so 'blunt' at a time when the Muslims in Bosnia were suffering so much, but nevertheless asked that the letter be distributed to Biden's Senate colleagues. He also requested Boutros-Ghali to circulate the letter in the General Assembly of the United Nations so as to make it clear there that, whilst the Bosnian government supported the peace process being conducted by Owen and Vance, it did not speak with one voice in the negotiations.⁴²⁰⁶

Owen, meanwhile, now had the feeling that not only did Silajdzic not really represent his own government, he did not reflect the feelings of the majority of Muslims, either. According to Owen, Silajdzic, together with Ganic was one of the 'hardliners' who did not want the war to end and who did not shrink from provoking Serb attacks on Muslims, hospitals, journalists, and so on.⁴²⁰⁷ In any case, Silajdzic had little more to say than that his government was not prepared to negotiate as long as heavy weapons were not put under supervision and humanitarian corridors were not opened. And Silajdzic was no longer available to the negotiators from 5 February. Then the Bosnian Serbs abandoned the talks on 11 February, with Karadzic claiming that they were pointless if Izetbegovic failed to attend.⁴²⁰⁸ And on 19 February Owen and Vance had their last meeting for the time being with the Bosnian Croat

⁴²⁰² ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Jacobovits NATO to Kooijmans, no. 336, 26/02/93.

⁴²⁰³ UN, S/25050, Appendix I.

⁴²⁰⁴ Owen CD-ROM, 'Lord Owen's report from New York of 6 February on progress of Vance-Owen-plan'. See also ibidem, 'Meeting in Sarajevo between Co-Chairmen and President Izetbegovic and Akmadzic, 20/01/93'.

⁴²⁰⁵ Owen CD-ROM, 'Report from Lord Owen from New York on 5 February on meeting with EC Ambassadors on Vance-Owen Peace Plan; S/25100, par. 21.

⁴²⁰⁶ UN, A47/899 en S/25360.

⁴²⁰⁷ Owen CD-ROM, 'Report from Lord Owen from New York on 5 February on meeting with EC Ambassadors on Vance-Owen Peace Plan. See also ibidem, 'Personal telegram from Lord Owen to Sir Robert Renwick, 29/01/93'.

⁴²⁰⁸ 'Karadzic verlaat vredesbesprekingen New York' ('Karadzic leaves peace talks in New York'), ANP, 12/02/93, 01:47.

delegation.⁴²⁰⁹ By now the position of the mediators had been further weakened by Vance's announcement on 16 February that he would be stepping down as Co-Chairman of the Yugoslavia Conference within a few weeks. He had originally wanted to leave at the end of February, but said that he would not turn his back on the talks at such a crucial time. On the other hand, he said that he could stay not stay on forever.⁴²¹⁰ Which, of course, was only human.

12. Conclusion

Owen and Vance's plan for peace in Bosnia-Herzegovina was an attempt to combine peace with justice by countering the faits accomplis of ethnic cleansing as far as possible. It was a clever construction of the diplomatic drawing board, but one which proved difficult to explain in practice. Both the Bush and the Clinton administrations, as well as many commentators, saw it as an acceptance of Serb conquests and ethnic cleansing. That was not only a consequence of the plan's less than successful presentation, particularly by Owen, but also derived from the limited practical feasibility of the proposals. Most governments were careful not to say openly that they could or would not commit troops to enforce the plan, but that was probably the reality of the situation. The US government, which would have had to contribute significant ground forces, in particular were not eager to do so. At the same time it was clear that Europe would be unable to force a solution in Bosnia without American participation. It was unfortunate timing that the Vance-Owen plan was launched two-and-a-half weeks before the inauguration of a new US president who had announced categorically that domestic policy would be his priority.

The new American government demonstrated its immaturity in international politics by, on the one hand, keeping the Bosnian government's hopes of military intervention alive and so torpedoing Owen-Vance, and on the other hand proposing no real alternative to it. Owen and Vance thus felt themselves compelled to persuade the Bosnian government – which was increasingly becoming a purely Muslim one – by making a concession with regard to the Posavina corridor. However unsophisticated the realization by the leaders of Republika Srpska that they must have concrete territorial policy objectives and achieve these at the negotiating table may have been, it was beyond dispute that any summation of Bosnian Serb war aims would include the strategically important Posavina corridor. The original proposal from Vance and Owen may have allocated that corridor to the Croats, but the Serbs could always live in hope of gaining control of the Sava Valley through an exchange of territory.

When the Bosnian government was also offered a corridor through the region, thus creating a double barrier to the connection of Serb areas, Owen and Vance's proposals to all intents and purposes became unacceptable to the Bosnian Serbs. Owen and Vance would be able to continue negotiating for a few more months, but with little hope of achieving any results. Meanwhile, the American and Russian governments had also come to the negotiating table in the persons of Bartholomew and Churkin. It was still far from clear whether their presence would be a blessing or a curse.

For the time being the new Dutch Minister for Foreign Affairs, Peter Kooijmans – who appeared to be strongly emotionally involved with developments in the former Yugoslavia – looked on. He and the Dutch government did not, as Owen claimed, and in his wake Both, torpedo the Vance-Owen plan. At the time he regarded it as the most feasible and a step in the right direction. Meanwhile, Kooijmans observed that, of the two tactics which had been widely discussed since late 1992, only enforcement of the no-fly zone still had any chance of immediate success. The establishment of Safe Areas, despite the support it had received from the women's movement in the ⁴²⁰⁹ Owen CD-ROM, 'Speaking Notes for Mr Vance at Informal Consultations of Security Council, 3/02/93'.

⁴²¹⁰ 'Vance wil binnen enkele weken uit Joegoslavië-overleg stappen' ('Vance wants to leave Yugoslavia talks within weeks'), ANP, 17/02/93, 02:04; 'Vance van plan snel af te treden' ('Vance plans to step down soon'), Het Parool, 17/02/93.

wake of the widespread rapes in Bosnia, still seemed a very long way off. However, it did not in fact take long before one safe haven of a sort was created – Srebrenica.

Chapter 10

Srebrenica under siege

1. Interdepartmental coordination

At the end of February 1993 NATO had plans for an international force of approximately 50,000 troops to remain stationed in Bosnia for ten years if the Vance-Owen peace plan was to be implemented. ‘Not an appealing prospect,’ was Theo Koelé’s opinion in Trouw.

‘What politician readily decides to place human lives in the balance for a period of ten years or longer? The risks are considerable, the objectives unclear. It is doubtful whether peacekeeping – maintaining the peace – will suffice. Will these troops not rapidly have to move to enforcing peace – using violence to achieve peace?’⁴²¹¹

On 28 February Minister Kooijmans was a guest at a Yugoslavia meeting held by the PvdA (Labour) in the Reehorst in Ede. According to press reports, when questioned by the foreign affairs editor of De Volkskrant, Anet Bleich, the CDA (Christian Democrats) government minister painted a gloomy picture of the potential for a UN-sponsored military intervention to halt the war. In order for the deployment of military force to be meaningful, he felt that there should first be a peace plan which was acceptable to all the parties involved. Once such a plan was in place, Dutch soldiers should also participate in any intervention, which could continue until 2000. In stating this, the Minister actually did not reveal more than what had been discussed at the NATO Council meeting on 26 February. In addition, Kooijmans announced that the Dutch government would offer the UN the opportunity to host the Yugoslavia tribunal in The Hague.⁴²¹²

B. (Bert) Kreemers, a spokesperson for Minister Ter Beek, later accorded Kooijmans’ statements far greater political clout than that which they originally carried. According to Kreemers, the Minister had indicated that he supported a “substantial, lengthy deployment” of additional Dutch troops in Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴²¹³ As Kreemers conceded, his statements drew hardly any attention in the press. The articles that were published on the matter reported his announcement of the possible establishment of the tribunal in The Hague. Actually, they did not consider this to be newsworthy.⁴²¹⁴ Kreemers apparently noticed the mood developing between the Ministers of Defence and Foreign Affairs and their respective departments with regard to the deployment of troops in Bosnia.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs bore primary responsibility for foreign policy, including that pertaining to security.⁴²¹⁵ The Ministry of Defence was mainly responsible for the establishment, maintenance and operation of the armed forces. In the past it had disrespectfully been said that the Defence Department’s only raison d’être was to mind the hardware shop or alternatively ‘the boys and their toys’.⁴²¹⁶ Thus the Foreign Affairs Department traditionally occupied itself with security policy ⁴²¹¹ Theo Koelé, ‘Vlag met Navo-ster wappert nog lang niet boven Bosnië’ (Prospect of a flag flying the NATO star over Bosnia is still a long way off), Trouw, 26/02/93.

⁴²¹² ‘Tribunaal kan in Den Haag. Kooijmans biedt aan oorlogsmisdaden Bosnië hier te vervolgen’ (Tribunal may be hosted in The Hague: Kooijmans offers to try Bosnian war crimes here), Trouw, 01/03/93; ‘VN-tribunaal over oorlog Joegoslavië kan in Den Haag’ (UN Yugoslavia war tribunal can be hosted in The Hague), de Volkskrant, 01/03/93; ‘Den Haag mogelijk standplaats oorlogstribunaal Joegoslavië’ (The Hague is possible site for Yugoslavia war tribunal), ANP, 28/02/93, 6.07 pm.

⁴²¹³ Kreemers, ‘Aan de achterkant van de maan’, p. 14; W. Joustra, ‘Vredeshandhaving in Bosnië legt zware claim op krijgsmacht’ (Peacekeeping in Bosnia makes heavy demands on armed forces), de Volkskrant, 10/03/93.

⁴²¹⁴ Interview B. Kreemers, 16/04/99.

⁴²¹⁵ cf. Van Eenennaam, Kruisraketten, pp. 36-37.

⁴²¹⁶ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 167; cf. De Ruiter, quoted in: Van Eenennaam, Kruisraketten, p. 37; Berghorst, News, p. 26.

abroad, including matters pertaining to defence. The Minister of Foreign Affairs was very much inclined to express a desire on the part of the Netherlands to assert itself internationally and the country's willingness to play a role in promoting international security and the legal order. However, at the time of the discussion about the modernization of NATO's medium-range weapons in September 1981, Van der Stoep, the then Foreign Minister, and his colleague, Defence Minister Van Mierlo, had acknowledged 'the interwoven activities in the field of arms control and defence, and the impact their decisions had on each other's field of operation'. They concluded that they therefore bore a 'joint and special responsibility ... for closely coordinated policy' in the field of international security. Since then the Ministry of Defence has increasingly stressed the shared responsibility of the Defence and Foreign Affairs Departments for policy on security, where both departments were of course able to place their unique emphasis.⁴²¹⁷ Because the Foreign Affairs Department never really subscribed to this concept, in the 1990s the various Defence ministers and their officials still found it 'necessary to underline their joint responsibility with some regularity'.⁴²¹⁸

In the first place, the Minister of Defence needed to ascertain whether it was also possible for the Netherlands to achieve the objectives of its security policy with the military resources it had at its disposal. Moreover, he was responsible for the safety of the troops.⁴²¹⁹ This responsibility was not borne by the government ministers and officials of the Foreign Affairs Department. For example, Ter Beek was under the impression that, in the course of international consultations, the Foreign Affairs department had 'a natural predisposition to offer a squad of soldiers if at all possible' for the greater honour and glory of the Netherlands.⁴²²⁰ Or, in the words of the head of the Military History Section, P.H. Kamphuis, '...while the Defence Department pondered the risks to which its own personnel were exposed, the nation's diplomatic corps seemed to be evolving into a travelling salesman in soldiers'.⁴²²¹ As a result officials of the Defence and Foreign Affairs departments sometimes engaged in 'intense discussions' about the restrained approach adopted by the Ministry of Defence, in the process of which Ter Beek and the officials in his Ministry put it to their colleagues in the Foreign Affairs department that they would not need to provide families with explanations if body bags were to return.⁴²²² The rift between the Foreign Affairs and Defence departments was thus partly due to the distinction between foreign and domestic policy. The position adopted by the Parliament was of paramount importance to the Department of Defence. Parliament had to be reassured. It was there that support had to be nurtured for its policy. In fact, the Foreign Affairs Department did not ignore the question of potential casualties in its deliberations. Here too, some officials found the willingness to act in relation to Yugoslavia 'ghastly' at times. Dutch diplomats also wondered sometimes how settled public opinion would remain if body bags were to return.⁴²²³ Another source of friction between the Foreign Affairs and Defence ministries lay in the fact that the armed forces were being restructured, which made it often difficult to find units that could be deployed. It was all too easy for inability on the part of the Defence Department to be interpreted as unwillingness by Foreign Affairs officials, who saw military deployment as a means of enabling the Netherlands to count for something on the international stage.⁴²²⁴ This was linked to the fact that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was particularly taken with operations involving NATO, while this was less pronounced in the case of the Department of Defence. Maintaining political contact with NATO was primarily the responsibility of the Ministry of Foreign ⁴²¹⁷ See also Berghorst, News, pp. 26-27.

⁴²¹⁸ DAB. VN algemeen, memorandum from De Winter to the Minister, 05/10/98. Also the interview with J. de Winter, 20/07/00.

⁴²¹⁹ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 49.

⁴²²⁰ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴²²¹ P.H. Kamphuis reviewing R. ter Beek, Manoeuvres. 'Herinneringen aan Plein 4', Amsterdam 1996, in Bijdragen en Mededelingen betreffende de Geschiedenis der Nederlanden, 114 (1999)1, p. 166.

⁴²²² Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 176 and p. 205; interviews A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99 and F.J.J. Princen, 08/01/98.

⁴²²³ Interviews A.P. van Walsum, 12/07/00 and H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00. See also the interviews with R. Swartbol on 24/02/99 and 08/07/00.

⁴²²⁴ Interview R. Swartbol, 24/02/99.

Affairs. In addition, NATO traditionally preferred a large-scale approach, whereas both pressure to cut costs and concern for its personnel meant that the Defence Department was more inclined to opt for a peacekeeping operation that required the commitment of fewer resources and reduced the chance of casualties amongst its own troops. Moreover, the Defence Ministry's Directorate of General Policy Matters (Dutch abbreviation DAB) felt that there was a much smaller chance of a reversal of international developments following the Cold War than the Foreign Affairs Department. This is to say that the Directorate for General Policy Matters was more inclined to assume that there was no chance of a major conflict with Russia for a very long period of time, than the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV).⁴²²⁵ Due to this division of aspirations and responsibilities it was almost inevitable that the Foreign Ministry spearheaded the Dutch offer for involvement in international military operations, in particular peacekeeping missions, while the Defence Department gave the impression that it was applying the brakes.

In the meantime, as a result of growing Dutch involvement in UN operations, Ter Beek had started making numerous foreign trips and developing his own international network. This led to something of a 'jalousie de métier' in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.⁴²²⁶ Especially the officials from the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, who were the main people within the Foreign Affairs Department who maintained contact with Plein 4, and who were said to be Van den Broek's confidants, had to get used to the more assertive approach adopted by the Defence Ministry. Moreover, because Ter Beek had abolished the Defence Council, of which the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs used to be a member, they no longer had direct contact with the leaders of the various branches of the armed forces. In principle, Foreign Affairs officials were not supposed to deal directly with these branches. Their contact was to be routed through the Ministry situated on the Plein. It was only when discussing peacekeeping operations that officials of the Foreign Ministry's Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs and the Directorate for Political and UN Affairs (DPV) still had direct contact with Army representatives.⁴²²⁷

At the other end, Foreign Affairs officials viewed the Directorate for General Policy Matters as a competitor of their Ministry, a type of Foreign Affairs division within the Ministry of Defence, and preferred to deal with the Defence Staff.⁴²²⁸ The view held by the Department of Foreign Affairs coincided with how the Directorate of General Policy Matters saw itself, as expressed by Directorate for General Policy Matters official, J. de Winter: "Here at the Directorate for General Policy Matters we have a rather wide-ranging view as to what we are entitled to do in relation to the Foreign Affairs Department, because we feel that we know something about foreign policy and sometimes believe we are somewhat more familiar with it. Of course, this is quite arrogant but this is what we feel".⁴²²⁹ However, during the consultations held between the Foreign Affairs and Defence Departments the latter always succeeded in presenting a united position, despite any differences in the views held by the Defence Staff and the Directorate for General Policy Matters.

Unlike the situation that prevailed during the Gulf crisis and the Kosovo war, in the first half of the 1990s there was no interdepartmental structure comprising officials from the departments of General Affairs, Foreign Affairs and Defence in relation to the former Yugoslavia. Minister Van den Broek took a step in this direction at the very beginning of the UNPROFOR operation in March 1992 but this came to naught.⁴²³⁰ Early in March 1992 Van den Broek had voiced his concerns to his colleague, Ter Beek, about 'the Defence Department's increasing tendency to go its own way' in relation to policy on defence and security. Ter Beek declared that there were no grounds for concern

⁴²²⁵ Van Brouwershaven, Turbulentie, p. 156 and p. 168.

⁴²²⁶ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 224. See also ibid, pp. 36-37. cf. ABZ, Kabinetsarchief, Van den Broek coll. Corr. M/collegae 1992 (Defence), Van den Broek to Ter Beek, 01/04/92.

⁴²²⁷ Interviews R. in Den Bosch and F.A.M. Majoor, both on 19/04/00.

⁴²²⁸ Interview J.M. Vos, 24/06/00.

⁴²²⁹ Interview J. de Winter, 20 July 2000.

⁴²³⁰ ABZ, kabinetsarchief: Van den Broek coll. Memorandum from Van den Broek to DGPZ, 06/03/92, no.15/92.

but Van den Broek continued to note a tendency on the part of the Ministry of Defence to exclude the Foreign Affairs Department from a range of matters in respect of which this ministry was also supposed to play a role. On 1 April 1992 he sought from Ter Beek ‘urgent correction, if mutual trust is to remain intact, and what is no less important, unity of policy’.⁴²³¹

In the interim, the Ministry of Defence had assigned the Chief of Defence Staff responsibility for interdepartmental coordination and the Deputy Chief of Operations, and Command and Information Systems (SCOSIS) was charged with its implementation. The latter was required to ensure that policy was properly coordinated with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, if necessary in cooperation with the Directorate for General Policy Matters.⁴²³² However, in practice Foreign Affairs and Defence officials worked together on an ad hoc and personal basis.⁴²³³ For example, consultations were held about the substance of letters which the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence jointly sent to parliament, which was virtually always the case in connection with the (former) Yugoslavia.⁴²³⁴ Only at a relatively late stage – at the end of 1993 – was a representative of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs admitted to the daily briefings of the Defence Crisis Management Centre in a bunker under the Department of Defence. The latter represented a deliberate ploy on the part of the Defence Ministry to gain a tighter grip on policymaking than had been the case during the Gulf War, when Foreign Affairs officials exercised considerable influence through the Gulf Team due to a lack of structure in the Defence Department.⁴²³⁵

Feeble attempts made by J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, a council adviser in the General Affairs Department who was responsible for policy on foreign affairs and security, to establish some form of interdepartmental coordination similar to what had existed during the Gulf War, floundered.⁴²³⁶ According to Merckelbach, one could point to a further reason for the different interdepartmental consultative structures that existed during the Gulf War and the situation in Yugoslavia. The Netherlands viewed the Gulf conflict as a war, whereas the Yugoslavian armed conflict ‘merely’ amounted to participation in peacekeeping operations. Such operations did not constitute a crisis and only became one at the time of the attack on Srebrenica in July 1995.⁴²³⁷

2. No willingness to enforce the Vance-Owen plan

On 2 March 1993 Minister Kooijmans pointed out to the Parliament’s Committee for Emancipation Affairs that the international community was still not willing to embark on a military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In particular, the USA insisted that this would need to be preceded by a potentially enforceable solution. In addition, a risk analysis would need to be conducted before any military intervention, according to the Minister.⁴²³⁸ Nevertheless, in the first week of March there again appeared to be reason for optimism about the discussions held by Owen and Vance. Close consultations took place in New York covering the peace plan presented by the two mediators. With the support of Clinton’s deputy security adviser, Sandy Berger, Vance and Owen held discussions with Izetbegovic, Karadzic and Boban. On 3 March Izetbegovic signed the military component of the agreement, with the result that Owen and Vance now had seven of the nine signatures required for the plan. Only those of Izetbegovic and Karadzic were still missing below the map. At the same time the ⁴²³¹ ABZ, kabinetsarchief: Van den Broek coll. Van den Broek to Ter Beek, 01/04/92.

⁴²³² DS. Memorandum from Van den Breemen to Ter Beek and Van Voorst tot Voorst, 19/03/93, S92/139/1056; Marstaf. Exh. 24/04/92, no. S14806/4431, Notes on information processing and Defence Staff coordination during the impending peace missions in Cambodia and Yugoslavia, 20/03/92.

⁴²³³ For example, interviews B.J. van Eenennaam on 22/08/00 and J.M. Vos on 24/06/00; BSG. Van den Heuvel to Isth, 02/04/92, V-350/92.

⁴²³⁴ See the TK document series no. 22181.

⁴²³⁵ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

⁴²³⁶ Interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00.

⁴²³⁷ Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00.

⁴²³⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 43, p. 9.

military staff at the NATO Headquarters in Brussels were drawing up plans for a peacekeeping force, which was to be deployed as soon as the plan was accepted. On 3 March senior NATO officials gathered in New York to consult leading UN administrators, such as the Undersecretary-General Annan, Lieutenant General Nambiar, Brigadier General Baril and the Boutros-Ghali's deputy military adviser, Colonel Purola.⁴²³⁹ In the meantime NATO Secretary-General Worner held discussions on the same subject with Warren Christopher.

On Saturday 6 March, the negotiations being conducted with Izetbegovic in New York were suspended until the end of the following week. If he were to follow the Croats and also agree to the overall peace plan proposed by Owen and Vance, also the map, then it would subsequently be possible for the international community to exert considerable pressure on the Bosnian Serbs to do the same. In this connection, a crucial role had since been set aside for the government in Moscow. It would need to induce Milosevic, who would himself probably no longer be willing to bear the yoke of sanctions (possibly more severe) on account of the Bosnian Serbs, to exert so much pressure on the latter that they would also agree to the peace plan.⁴²⁴⁰

A fresh development occurred at the beginning of March when Boutros-Ghali appeared to drop his objections to the use of force to execute the peace agreement⁴²⁴¹ and even thought of having the Vance-Owen plan implemented by a green-helmeted multinational force led by the Americans. Apparently, Boutros-Ghali saw this as an opportunity both to rid himself of the problem of Yugoslavia, which he believed was a millstone around the UN's neck, and to avoid a major item of expenditure on the UN budget.⁴²⁴² On 7 March 1993 the UN Secretary-General announced during a broadcast by the American television station, ABC: "Our objective is to secure the withdrawal of the Serbs and, if they fail to do so, we will have to take any measures that may be necessary."⁴²⁴³ On the same day Berger declared that the US was prepared to join a peacekeeping force and perhaps even commit ground troops. The intention appeared to be to persuade Izetbegovic to put his signature below the map of the Vance-Owen plan by undertaking to despatch a considerable UN military force. Sixteen NATO countries were to provide the core of the peacekeeping troops, which would have to silence the Serbian artillery with force if need be.⁴²⁴⁴ The Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs did not allow the world to wait long in anticipation of learning what the Netherlands' position would be in such a case. On 4 March a spokesperson for the department declared that if the Security Council decided in favour of military intervention, the Netherlands would make a contribution.⁴²⁴⁵ When Minister Kooijmans spoke to Boutros-Ghali on 31 March, the latter still seemed to prefer outsourcing the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan to NATO. However, France in particular wanted a UN operation.⁴²⁴⁶

On 8 March Owen held a press conference in Brussels which was widely covered in the Dutch press. According to Owen, no country in the world was prepared to use military force to compel the Serbs to sign a peace agreement. If such an agreement was to be reached, a substantial international force would be required of between forty and one hundred thousand heavily armed troops. This was because the light armoured vehicles which the UN troops currently used, did not offer protection

⁴²³⁹ DS. Memorandum from Van den Breemen to Ter Beek, 9/03/93, SN93/216/1484.

⁴²⁴⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU, 07/04/93, cpe/lon 268; COREU, 17/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 848.

⁴²⁴¹ 'VN-chef pleit voor harde actie Bosnië' (UN leader calls for tough action in Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 04/03/93; 'VN-chef Boutros-Ghali wil meer risico's nemen' (UN leader Boutros-Ghali wants to take more risks), Haagsche Courant, 04/03/93; Nicole Lucas, 'Amerikaanse actie te laat voor Cerska' (American action too late for Cerska), Trouw, 04/03/93; 'Geweld voor Bosnië' (Force for Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 04/03/93.

⁴²⁴² Owen CD-ROM: Notes of Lord Owen's reaction to the UN Secretary-General's attitude towards implementing the Vance-Owen Plan, 03/03/93. See also ABZ, DPV/ARA/01813. Biegmans 234 to Kooijmans, 11/03/92.

⁴²⁴³ Oscar Garschagen, 'VN en NAVO' vijftigduizend man naar Bosnië' (UN and NATO: fifty thousand troops to Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 08/03/93.

⁴²⁴⁴ J. Klaassen, 'Nederlandse deelname aan vredesmacht twijfelachtig' (Dutch participation in peacekeeping force doubtful), de Volkskrant, 09/03/93.

⁴²⁴⁵ 'VN-chef pleit voor harde actie Bosnië', de Telegraaf, 04/03/93.

⁴²⁴⁶ ABZ, DOA/ARA/00017, Kooijmans 75 to PV New York, 01/04/93.

against mortar fire.⁴²⁴⁷ De Telegraaf noted that, in view of the fact that no international support was forthcoming to enforce a peace plan against the Serbs' will, it remained 'uncertain for the time being' what should be done. 'This would mark the materialization of the greatest danger facing a UN mission in one form or another, namely, confusion about its mandate.'⁴²⁴⁸ Following EC consultations with Owen, Kooijmans was hesitant in his reply to questions about the possibility of the Netherlands participating in a military force designed to impose peace. The Minister declared that it was not him but the government who would decide this.⁴²⁴⁹

De Volkskrant seemed to know more because on the morning of 9 March it reported that it was 'doubtful' whether the Netherlands would be part of such a peacekeeping force.⁴²⁵⁰ The demand would mainly be for ground troops and, after deploying marines in Cambodia, the Netherlands would not have any more soldiers available. In addition, difficulties were apparently encountered in the same month in efforts to assemble sufficient troops to send the third and final battalion of marines to Cambodia.⁴²⁵¹

3. The Parliament debate of 9 March 1993

Against this background, the Parliament conducted an exceptionally interesting plenary debate on 9 March 1993. It had not invited Minister Ter Beek to join this debate, although the ministers of Foreign Affairs and Defence almost always acted jointly in matters relating to Yugoslavia.⁴²⁵² This omission probably had something to do with the fact that the Parliamentary Committee for Defence was paying a visit to Dutch troops in Cambodia from 1 to 10 March. However, prior to the debate Kooijmans had already arranged with Ter Beek to itemise the possible ways in which the Netherlands could contribute to a UN peacekeeping force, which would need to be assembled if the peace plan were to be accepted.⁴²⁵³

This was the first time that Minister Kooijmans spoke in a plenary parliamentary debate about the former Yugoslavia. The Members of Parliament concluded that there appeared to be an impasse in the peace talks headed by Owen and Vance. The restrained approach adopted by the American government under Clinton, who had hinted at intervention during his election campaign, was particularly disappointing to them. In addition, the debate was strongly influenced by the statement made by Boutros-Ghali shortly beforehand, which the Parliament interpreted as a plea for the deployment of troops to impose peace.

Eisma anticipated that the Netherlands would only be able to make a modest contribution to any international peacekeeping force that might be established, if at all: 'This situation teaches us that we should adopt a more modest approach in the future. Modesty becomes a small country such as the Netherlands, which has little to offer.'⁴²⁵⁴ Such cautious statements were lost on F.W. Weisglas, who spoke on behalf of the VVD (Liberals). Weisglas availed himself of the opportunity to make much of his irritation about the situation pertaining to the former Yugoslavia. According to him, endless negotiations were being held and the only thing to show for them was the powerlessness of the international community in the face of the violence and violation of human rights being perpetrated by ⁴²⁴⁷ Theo Koelé, 'EG-bemiddelaar: nu nog geen interventie in Bosnië' (EC intermediary: no intervention in Bosnia yet), Trouw, 09/03/93; J. Klaassen, 'Nederlandse deelname aan vredesmacht twijfelachtig', de Volkskrant, 09/03/93.

⁴²⁴⁸ 'Owen tegen geweld bij afdwingen vrede' (Owen against using force to achieve peace), de Telegraaf, 09/03/93.

⁴²⁴⁹ Wio Joustra, 'Vredeshandhaving in Bosnië legt zware claim op krijgsmacht' ('Peacekeeping in Bosnia makes heavy demands on armed forces'), de Volkskrant, 10/03/93.

⁴²⁵⁰ J. Klaassen, 'Nederlandse deelname aan vredesmacht twijfelachtig', de Volkskrant, 09/03/93.

⁴²⁵¹ 'Ter Beek wil komende bataljon mariniers voor Cambodja inkrimpen' (Ter Beek wants to reduce next battalion of marines for Cambodia), ANP, 24/03/93, 6 pm.

⁴²⁵² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3855, (09/03/93), Van Traa & De Hoop Scheffer.

⁴²⁵³ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 12/03/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴²⁵⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3850.

the Serbs in the main. Weisglas was also more critical than his fellow party member, Blaauw, had been several weeks earlier about the Vance-Owen plan, which he felt amounted to 'a premium ... on the violent territorial conquests of the Serbs and subscribed ... to the reprehensible principle of ethnic homogeneity'.⁴²⁵⁵ Weisglas produced a veritable litany of complaints. He wondered how one could discuss peace with people who could soon be primary suspects in war crimes proceedings. According to him, the lack of unanimity within the EC was contrary to the Maastricht agreement on pursuing a common foreign policy. The sanctions against Serbia were not effective. The UN troops did not appear to be able to protect the aid convoys. Weisglas also suggested that the safety of UN personnel was allowed to weigh too heavily.⁴²⁵⁶ This summary of irritation led him to conclude 'that one will not achieve anything with half-measures. And we will therefore need to opt for genuine involvement or withdrawal'. However, 'after Auschwitz', the latter option, which would lead to unbridled human rights violations, was no longer acceptable. Weisglas therefore repeated his plea for peace to be imposed in Bosnia, which he had made several months earlier when the Foreign Affairs budget had been debated. This should be done by NATO acting under the auspices of the UN. In addition, the Dutch government would need to draw the logical conclusions from its policy by assisting refugees as far as possible in their own region, namely, by establishing 'safe areas'.

De Hoop Scheffer could not imagine what political objectives would be served by the massive military intervention that Weisglas envisaged. He was of the opinion that there was no alternative to the Vance-Owen plan. Moreover, large-scale military intervention would not be feasible at an international level if it were not based on a peace agreement.⁴²⁵⁷ Nonetheless, what needed to happen was that previous agreements should be enforced: the prohibition of flights and economic sanctions. In addition, he referred to the establishment of 'safe havens' in Eastern Bosnia, for which he believed NATO had prepared plans. He called on the government 'to keep that item on the agenda at any rate. I know that there are few countries who agree to this but that does not mean that you should stop pressing for it'.⁴²⁵⁸ According to De Hoop Scheffer, if a peace plan was to be agreed and it needed to be 'enforced' by a large military force, the Netherlands should contribute to this. In a mini-debate with Weisglas, De Hoop Scheffer asked the VVD member of Parliament where he wanted to send the large contingent of troops he had in mind: 'Do you send them to Belgrade where Mr Milosevic is running the show directly or at any rate indirectly?'⁴²⁵⁹ Weisglas replied that they should be sent to those places where people were suffering most: '... to the concentration camps to close them down, to those places where refugees are not treated as such, because they are detained. Those are the places which you should turn into a safe haven, a Safe Area. That is my primary intention and to achieve it, you will need a larger, more extensive military deployment than has been the case until now'.⁴²⁶⁰ De Hoop Scheffer agreed with Weisglas in principle but raised the 'moral dilemma' as to whether deployment in one camp would not have negative implications for people in another camp.

Van Traa was of the opinion that this was not really the dilemma facing Parliament. More important was the question whether Parliament felt that force should be used, if necessary, in order to secure acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan, which admittedly was not ideal, because he did not anticipate that it would be in the interests of the Bosnian Serbs ('that bunch' as he referred to them) to offer wholehearted collaboration. He advised some restraint: 'I believe that we should be a bit modest in this respect, because in the final analysis the problem is not the extent of the risk we are prepared to ⁴²⁵⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3852.

⁴²⁵⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3853.

⁴²⁵⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3854.

⁴²⁵⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3854.

⁴²⁵⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3856.

⁴²⁶⁰ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3856.

take but rather that none of the larger countries wish to take any.⁴²⁶¹ It was clear to Van Traa that, if the Vance-Owen plan was implemented, it would result in a Safe Haven at the very least.⁴²⁶²

Ultimately, the three largest parties in Parliament agreed on the formula that the Dutch government should endeavour to secure an approach which would entail a willingness on the part of the United Nations to impose peace, following which the Netherlands would have to make a military contribution.⁴²⁶³ Van Traa made a fervent plea for the Dutch government to adopt an active approach. He asked Lubbers and Kooijmans also to take the initiative outside formal meetings in Brussels, for example, to approach Paris, Bonn, Brussels and Madrid. The PvdA (Labour) member had already given up on London: 'Unfortunately, the United Kingdom is a hopeless case.'⁴²⁶⁴ Opinions varied when it came to the question as to the nature of any Dutch contribution. Weisglas was of the opinion that, if necessary, the marines should be transferred from Cambodia to the former Yugoslavia. This idea met with major objections. The military felt that it was a foregone conclusion that any ground operations in Yugoslavia were a matter for the Army (Chapter 4). De Hoop Scheffer recommended that the absent Minister, Ter Beek, consider the possibility of an armoured infantry battalion, for example the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade. Later De Hoop Scheffer announced that he had indeed discussed this idea with his parliamentary party first but had not discussed it with anyone else.⁴²⁶⁵ However, his colleague, De Kok, who was replaced by De Hoop Scheffer during this debate, held the view that De Hoop Scheffer 'had not come up with this idea himself. He must have done so in consultation with the minister'.⁴²⁶⁶

4. Pressure to deploy a 'grossly exorbitant showpiece'

Prior to the summer of 1992 the media had raised the idea of deploying the Airmobile Brigade in Yugoslavia on a number of occasions (Chapter 6). The Airmobile Brigade represented that part of the 1991 White Paper on Defence which was to guarantee not only the reduction of Army spending but also its simultaneous modernization. At the time the 1991 White Paper on Defence was dealt with the permanent Parliamentary Committee on Defence had unanimously agreed to the Airmobile Brigade, although it seriously questioned several investments at the time and later on, and expressly reserved its judgement on the purchase of heavily armed military helicopters for the brigade. The minister and the Army therefore knew that Parliament's watchful eye would be focussed on them where this brigade was concerned. For example, every six months the minister and his junior minister were required to report to Parliament on the progress made in establishing the brigade and the costs involved.⁴²⁶⁷

The substantial costs which the Airmobile Brigade accounted for had already been frequently seized upon by Oostlander, one of the foremost proponents of military intervention in Bosnia, in order to question the actual benefit that the brigade represented to the Netherlands. According to him, the ⁴²⁶¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3857; emphasis added.

⁴²⁶² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3858.

⁴²⁶³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3857.

⁴²⁶⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3860.

⁴²⁶⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, 09/03/93, p. 3855; TCBU, Vertretpunt, III, hearing of J.G. de Hoop Scheffer, 29/05/00, p. 176.

⁴²⁶⁶ TCBU, Vertretpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 122.

⁴²⁶⁷ Wio Joustra, 'Kamer twijfelt aan tijdig gereedkomen brigade' (Parliament doubts timely readiness of brigade), de Volkskrant, 06/02/92; 'Ter Beek mag van Kamer doorgaan met luchtbrigade' (Parliament gives Ter Beek green light for Airmobile Brigade), de Volkskrant, 07/02/92; Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, 'Kamer heeft twijfels over luchtbrigade: stapsgewijze goedkeuring' (Parliament has doubts about Airmobile Brigade: step-by-step approval), NRC Handelsblad, 06/02/92; 'Kamer voortaan sneller ingelicht over luchtbrigade' (Parliament to be informed sooner about Airmobile Brigade from now on), NRC Handelsblad, 07/02/92; M. van den Doel, 'De luchtmobiele brigade dreigt nu al vleugellam te raken' (The airborne brigade is already in danger of losing its wings now), NRC Handelsblad, 12/03/92. See also TK, 1991-1996, 22 327, nos. 1-39.

Dutch Ministry of Defence would have been better off spending this money ‘on the establishment of a Franco-German fanfare’.⁴²⁶⁸ The political scientist and columnist, Koen Koch thought much the same:

‘Now this raises the very simple question as to why we really need that prohibitively expensive Airmobile Brigade, that showpiece of the restructuring of the Netherlands armed forces. The official justification is crisis prevention. Van den Broek views this ... differently. It is also clear that after Yugoslavia this brigade will never be deployed in a similar conflict because the risks are too great. All that money, all that money is being spent on the perpetuation of pretences which, when push comes to shove, we dare not live up to.’⁴²⁶⁹

Once the Airmobile Brigade had been included in the White Paper on Defence, the Army also began to doubt the usefulness of what was seen to be ‘the showpiece’ of the Defence Department and the Army.⁴²⁷⁰ Some people felt that the airborne concept was already obsolete before it was implemented. They pointed out that it really represented a Cold War approach.⁴²⁷¹ The Airmobile Brigade was designed to be flown in after an incursion of tanks in a major conflict, following which they were supposed to halt the attack until other units arrived. Airmobile troops would only be able to hold out for a brief period of time in view of their own limited protection.⁴²⁷² As the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Couzy was therefore in favour of establishing a multifunctional brigade in which both an airmobile and a mechanised component would be able to realize their full potential. However, Wilmink, the commander, had prevented him from elaborating on this idea. Wilmink argued that it had cost enough effort to convince Ter Beek of the benefit of having an Airmobile Brigade and that in turn the minister had had to devote a great deal of energy to persuading Parliament. It would take years to establish a new organization and this would threaten the Army’s purchase of helicopters in the interim. According to Couzy, Wilmink therefore issued orders that the Army should be ‘inflexible and unbending’ in its insistence that the airmobile concept was extremely feasible, even in the changed international circumstances.⁴²⁷³

12 January 1993 saw the release of Ter Beek’s Priorities Memorandum,⁴²⁷⁴ which served as a follow-on to the 1991 White Paper on Defence. The most important changes in this policy statement were the announcement of the suspension of compulsory military service on 1 January 1998 and the reversal of the order stated for the defence of national territory and alliance commitments for so-called crisis management operations. The Priorities Memorandum was based on the premise that the Soviet Union no longer constituted a major threat. Whereas ‘the major conflict’ constituted priority number one in the White Paper on Defence, crisis management operations forced it into second place in the Priorities Memorandum. Peacekeeping operations accounted for part of these crisis management activities. According to this policy statement, peace-keeping required that four units of battalion strength manned by professional personnel should be able to operate in four different areas for at least three years. In the case of peace-keeping, allowances should be made for the deployment of no more ⁴²⁶⁸ MdZ, ‘CDA’er ziet Satan in Bosnië’ (CDA member sees Satan in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 22/09/92.

⁴²⁶⁹ Koen Koch, ‘Goed gebruld leeuw’ (Lion with a throaty growl), de Volkskrant, 25/09/92.

⁴²⁷⁰ Couzy, Jaren, p. 79; interview E.A.W. Koestal, 24/05/00; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, p. 86; Brantz Diary, p. 6; M.C. de Kruijf, H.J. /05/ers and O.P. van Wiggen, ‘De luchtmobiele brigade: met beide benen op de grond’ (The Airmobile Brigade: with both feet on the ground), Carré (1993)9, p. 9; ‘De landmacht loopt het serieuze risico onder deze kostbare brigade te bezwijken’ (The Army runs a grave risk of succumbing to this costly brigade), Nota zonder prioriteiten (White paper without priorities), Carré (1993)4, p. 7; former infantry Lieutenant Colonel F.J.D.C. Egter van Wissekerke, ‘Een voortdurend déjà vu, deel 2’ (A continual déjà vu, Part 2), Carré (1998)6, p. 20.

⁴²⁷¹ Interviews H. Couzy on 7, 14 and 17/09/98, and with J. Lemmen on 17/10/01.

⁴²⁷² This criticism was also evident in the main editorial comment, ‘Hoeveel en waarvoor?’ (How much and what for?), NRC Handelsblad, 01/04/92.

⁴²⁷³ Interviews H. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98 and 04/10/01.

⁴²⁷⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 975, nos. 1 and 2.

than one unit the size of a brigade. In view of the fact that only light and light-armoured units could be deployed for peace-monitoring, the three airmobile battalions, the two armoured infantry battalions and the reconnaissance battalion were eligible for these duties. Because every operational battalion required two others – one for refurbishment and the other for dismantlement and refuelling – the Airmobile Brigade, which was the only one that had three battalions for peacekeeping operations, appeared to be the ideal candidate. All of this was supposed to be possible although cutbacks were proceeding over and above those following the 1991 White Paper on Defence. According to the latter, personnel were to be reduced by 30% within seven years. The Priorities Memorandum increased this target to 44%. The peacetime strength of the Army was to be more than halved from 55,000 to 25,000 troops.

The White Paper on Defence was released virtually at the same time as international debate about the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan commenced. Because the airborne brigade was considered to be eminently suitable to act in crisis management operations and it had been announced that the first airmobile infantry battalion would be operational by mid-1993,⁴²⁷⁵ it was not difficult to relate this to the situation in Yugoslavia. As early as 10 December 1992, during consultations held with the Permanent Parliamentary Committee on Defence, Junior Minister Van Voorst tot Voorst had noted that, 'purely hypothetically', it was conceivable that the Airmobile Brigade would be deployed in Yugoslavia, for example, if the Sarajevo airport was unusable.⁴²⁷⁶

On 25 February the first red berets were issued to those who had completed their training for the Airmobile Brigade. This also signalled the start of a campaign involving the erection of advertising billboards for the brigade throughout the Netherlands. In a column by Leon Wecke which appeared in Trouw on 23 February, the scholar from Nijmegen referred to the possible deployment of this brigade, incidentally warning against its excessively rosy portrayal in the survival advertisements. Its deployment in crisis situations could result in considerable loss of life, following which public support for involvement in such operations would rapidly diminish, according to Wecke.⁴²⁷⁷ De Hoop Scheffer had now become the first member of Parliament to moot the potential deployment of the Airmobile Brigade in the former Yugoslavia. Van Traa also appeared to have the brigade in mind, when he asked the government which sections of the Army would be considered for deployment 'also at a later stage if necessary'.^{4278 68}

The combination of Kooijmans and Parliament

In his reply to Parliament, Kooijmans was of the opinion that the members of Parliament had misinterpreted Boutros-Ghali's words, thinking that he supported moves to impose peace. According to the government minister, no country was prepared to enforce peace. The UN Secretary-General was only in favour of peace-keeping, Kooijmans assured them.⁴²⁷⁹ Although the question pertaining to the concrete nature of the Netherlands' contribution to the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan was something that he needed to discuss with his colleague, Ter Beek, Kooijmans felt that 'he could confidently state that, in view of the Netherlands' approach in the past, in principle the country was prepared to contribute to such a peacekeeping operation with the resources it had available for this ⁴²⁷⁵ TK, 1992-1992, 22 975, no. 2, p. 39.

⁴²⁷⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 327, no. 10, p. 13. See also ibid, p. 14, where the Junior Minister referred to possible deployment in a Bosnian scenario.

⁴²⁷⁷ Leon Wecke, 'Als er veel soldaten sneuvelen is het uit met steun voor de actie' (Support for action will end if too many soldiers die), Trouw, 23/02/93;

⁶⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3858.

⁴²⁷⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3868.

purpose'.⁴²⁸⁰ With regard to its nature and size, Kooijmans assured Parliament that he would speak to Minister Ter Beek about this the following day.⁴²⁸¹ One of the important questions now was when the Dutch government should make such an offer. This was because Parliament had reproached the government for placing a squadron of F-16s on standby on Christmas Eve to help enforce a flight ban above Bosnia, even though no provision had yet been made for this.⁴²⁸²

In the second term De Hoop Scheffer asked the minister to examine the issue of safe havens again: 'Does he only envisage that they will be created by forcing through a peace plan mano militari [sic], hence using military resources? Or can he imagine a situation ... where this could also occur without a peace plan?'⁴²⁸³ Kooijmans recalled that the Dutch government had responded positively to the idea of safe havens already at an early stage. However, the idea had floundered 'on objections from countries which argued that one would also need to be prepared to protect those Safe Havens', and protecting them would require many ground troops, which were not available at that point in time. Nevertheless, according to the minister NATO and the WEU were discussing plans 'and I believe that the establishment of a Safe Haven as part of a peace agreement, particularly in the neighbourhood of Sarajevo, could be viable'.⁴²⁸⁴

On 9 March 1993, the day on which the parliamentary debate was held, Van der Vlis, the Chief of Defence Staff, sent a memorandum to Ter Beek dealing with the question as to what contribution the Netherlands could make to a UN force of 40,000 to 50,000 troops who would be charged with peace-enforcement. In view of the potentially dangerous situation and the possibility of escalation, the Chief of Defence Staff believed it essential to equip any units that were to be dispatched with armoured vehicles. However, the four armoured infantry battalions which were on standby were not considered, because they consisted mainly of national servicemen who could not be compelled to agree to deployment. It would only be possible to deploy the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade on 1 November. Furthermore, Van der Vlis advised against deploying it because it first needed to be equipped with armoured vehicles, and one also needed to take into account that this battalion would have to replace the third battalion of marines in Cambodia at the end of 1993. According to Van der Vlis, the deployment of the marines in the former Yugoslavia would impose too much of a burden on them following their service in Cambodia. This would be contrary to the cycle of six months deployment in any period of eighteen months as stipulated in the Priorities Memorandum. Moreover, the marines also did not have any armoured vehicles. It was impossible to deploy a military engineers unit because their operations were being restructured. Apart from its current deployment of a signals battalion and transport unit, the most important contribution that the Netherlands could make would be in the form of a tailor-made logistics unit consisting of repair and supply components amongst others.⁴²⁸⁵ Here 'tailor-made' was supposed to refer to a response that would meet the specific requirements for logistic support which the UN secretariat formulated.

On the morning of 10 March 1993 de Volkskrant carried a news analysis by the parliamentary editor, Wio Joustra, replete with charts which showed that the Netherlands was already making a major contribution to the United Nations' peace operations. With 1829 personnel, the Netherlands was the seventh largest provider of UN troops (following France, the United Kingdom, Canada, Indonesia, Ghana and Poland). According to Joustra, the supply of combat units was out of the question for the time being, although it would be possible to 'scrape' together support troops from throughout the Army, who did not need to constitute an organic entity. According to the journalist of de Volkskrant, 'The Airmobile Brigade must offer a solution in the future,' but it could be almost a year before it

⁴²⁸⁰ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3865.

⁴²⁸¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3866.

⁴²⁸² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3865.

⁴²⁸³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, pp. 3871-3872.

⁴²⁸⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 3874.

⁴²⁸⁵ NIOD, Ter Beek Coll. Memorandum from Van der Vlis to Ter Beek, 09/03/93, SN93/216/1510.

would be ready to be deployed.⁴²⁸⁶ This article was based on information which the military adviser to the Netherlands' Permanent Representative at the UN, Colonel R. van Veen, who was on leave, had submitted to the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCBC) the day before.⁴²⁸⁷ The publication of this information was designed to send a signal to Minister Kooijmans and his department, and it was for this reason that the Defence spokesperson, Kreemers, had 'leaked' this article on Minister Ter Beek's orders.⁴²⁸⁸

In the afternoon of 10 March Ter Beek met with Van der Vlis. Their discussion centred mainly on the question as to how realistic the chances were of achieving peace in Bosnia. Van der Vlis was exceptionally pessimistic about this. If the Vance-Owen plan was accepted by the leaders of all the parties involved, the Chief of Defence Staff felt that the local commanders would not comply with it, with the result that the agreement would need to be enforced, which he believed to be an impossible task.⁴²⁸⁹ Van der Vlis remained sceptical about the possibility of achieving peace in the former Yugoslavia throughout 1993. He felt that the Netherlands was doing enough by providing a signals battalion along with the contribution of a transport unit.⁴²⁹⁰ In particular, he opposed the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade because the restructuring process had not yet been completed in the Defence Department.⁴²⁹¹

Ter Beek shared the gloomy outlook of his military adviser in respect of the chances of achieving peace in the former Yugoslavia, but at the same time he felt Parliament – and the Foreign Affairs Department – breathing down his neck. On 10 March he asked the general to review all deployment alternatives again.⁴²⁹² While Van der Vlis compiled a new list, Ter Beek was paid a visit by Frinking and Van Traa, the spokespersons of the two governing parties. They made an impassioned plea for the minister to establish a combat unit for the former Yugoslavia comprising volunteers drawn from the various armoured infantry battalions. Ter Beek did not inform them that there were major objections to deploying such a unit, because the troops in question had not been trained to operate as a cohesive force.⁴²⁹³

Early in the evening of 10 March Minister Kooijmans, accompanied by Van Walsum and Van Eenennaam, then visited Minister Ter Beek, who was assisted by Van der Vlis and Barth. Kooijmans urged the deployment of combat units.⁴²⁹⁴ According to Minister Ter Beek, the discussion 'covered almost everything: tank squadrons, armoured infantry battalions, field artillery units, you name it.' Yet Ter Beek had to respond to every wish by saying that he could give no guarantees.⁴²⁹⁵ The difficulty lay in the principle of voluntary commitment on the part of national service personnel. This is why Van der Vlis' list did not feature a combat unit but only a tailor-made one comprising four hundred troops. Because the UN had not yet announced its requirements, it was decided not to reveal this offer yet.⁴²⁹⁶

Consequently, Kooijmans did not wish to disclose anything to the press after this discussion: 'For the simple reason that we drew up a list and nothing more'.⁴²⁹⁷ After these consultations Ter Beek ⁴²⁸⁶ Wio Joustra, 'Vredeshandhaving in Bosnië legt zware claim op krijgsmacht' (Peacekeeping in Bosnia makes heavy demands on armed forces), de Volkskrant, 10/03/93.

⁴²⁸⁷ Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 9.

⁴²⁸⁸ Interview R.L. ter Beek on 01/12/99 and with B. Kreemers 16/04/99; Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan' p. 10.

⁴²⁸⁹ Kreemers, 'Balkan-expres', pp. 4-5.

⁴²⁹⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 52.

⁴²⁹¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 51.

⁴²⁹² Kreemers, 'Balkan-expres', pp. 4-5.

⁴²⁹³ Kreemers, 'Brigade', spring 1994, p. 5; Berghorst, Opdracht, p. 9.

⁴²⁹⁴ Kreemers, 'Balkan-expres', p. 3.

⁴²⁹⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 97.

⁴²⁹⁶ Kreemers 'Balkan-expres', p. 5.

⁴²⁹⁷ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Den Haag vandaag (The Hague today), 10/03/93, 11 pm.

said that he 'would like to exhaust all alternatives' but simultaneously announced that one should not count on more than support in the form of military engineering, communications and transport.⁴²⁹⁸

Little information was withheld from de Volkskrant readers at the time. On 11 March, the morning after the discussion between Ter Beek and Kooijmans, Wio Joustra announced that, following consultations in his department, Ter Beek had ordered the leadership of the Army to draw up a list of alternatives for the establishment of a battalion comprising combat units drawn from various sections of the Army. The Dutch battalion was to consist of the first company of the Airmobile Brigade that was ready, and two armoured infantry companies made up entirely of volunteers.⁴²⁹⁹ According to Kreemers, Joustra obtained this information from Frinking and Van Traa, who were said to have bumped into the journalist after their discussion with Ter Beek the day before. Kreemers says that both members of Parliament had given the impression that the minister had agreed to their proposal.⁴³⁰⁰

After the discussion between Ministers Ter Beek and Kooijmans, Van der Vlis received information which provided him with a clearer insight into NATO plans for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan. Based on this, he drew up another list of alternative ways in which the Netherlands might contribute to the implementation of this plan. On 15 March he presented his list to Minister Ter Beek. NATO's plans were based on a peacekeeping operation, according to Van der Vlis, but they would act decisively to protect their own personnel, which was indicated by the use of words such as 'go in heavy', 'robust', 'with massive self-defence' and 'with excellent self-protection measures'. The plan envisaged three divisions: one American, one Russian and one European (from the East and West). Every division was to consist of ten to sixteen brigades, each of which would comprise a large number of battalions. In total, this force would amount to 55,000 to 75,000 personnel, of which 34,000 to 54,000 would be combat troops. As it happens, NATO headquarters only anticipated that little more than half of this force would be mobilised. Van der Vlis again cited a possible Dutch contribution comprising a tailor-made logistics battalion of approximately four hundred personnel in addition to the signals battalion and transport unit which were already there. Other alternatives summarized by Van der Vlis included the deployment of an artillery division with radar capacity for tracking down mortars. According to Van der Vlis, the deployment of combat units still floundered on the familiar problem pertaining to voluntary commitment on the part of national service personnel. He felt that the Airmobile Brigade would not be available for deployment, because NATO had clearly stated that there was no need for light infantry without armoured transport vehicles. However, it was possible to equip the first battalion of this brigade with YPR combat vehicles to transform it into an armoured infantry battalion, but Van der Vlis had major objections to this:

'This 'new' unit no longer fits in with the idea of an Airmobile Brigade in any way and undermines its normal establishment. There is a danger that the overall concept will be neglected as a result. The 'improper' deployment of an airmobile battalion as an armoured infantry battalion will project a negative image and will undermine the credibility of the Royal Netherlands Army's recruitment efforts. This solution must therefore be strongly discouraged.'⁴³⁰¹

After taking note of Van der Vlis' memorandum, Ter Beek nevertheless ordered the Chief of Defence Staff in the course of the so-called political consultations of the senior political and administrative ⁴²⁹⁸ 'Mogelijkheden voor extra bijdrage aan VN-acties gering' (Limited opportunities for extra contribution to UN campaigns), Algemeen Dagblad, 11/03/93. See also the ANP report, 'Ter Beek zoekt bijdragen VN-macht Bosnië' (Ter Beek searches for contributions to UN force for Bosnia), 10/03/93, 2116.

⁴²⁹⁹ Wio Joustra, 'Ter Beek stelt leger vredesmacht samen uit delen landmacht' (Ter Beek assembles peacekeeping force with parts of army), de Volkskrant, 11/03/93.

⁴³⁰⁰ According to Kreemers, the minister did not inform them about the list which he had ordered Van der Vlis to prepare. Kreemers, Brigade, spring 1994, p. 5. Kreemers' account does not explain how Joustra knew this anyway.

⁴³⁰¹ NIOD, Ter Beek Coll. Memorandum from Van der Vlis to Ter Beek, 15/03/93, SN93/216/1624.

management of the ministry to investigate whether armoured vehicles could be found, which could be added to the airmobile battalion at a later stage.⁴³⁰² Van der Vlis now produced a new memorandum which was completed on 17 March and which covered the premises that Ter Beek had formulated. The most remarkable premise was the statement that the Airmobile Brigade could not be deployed prior to 1 November 1993. The negative manner in which this premise was formulated barely concealed the fact that the Airmobile Brigade could be deployed after 1 November 1993. Further on, the memorandum also stated that the Royal Netherlands Army was unable to provide a combat unit ‘in the near future’, although in the meantime it was investigating whether the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade could be equipped with armoured vehicles which the allies would have to provide: ‘This battalion would then become available for deployment at the end of the year’.⁴³⁰³ It is therefore indisputable that Ter Beek had issued a political directive to the Chief of Defence Staff and the Army to prepare for the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade.

According to the memorandum, the information provided in it was ‘relevant to further discussions with the Minister of Foreign Affairs’. On 19 March the substance of this memorandum was revealed in the course of consultations held by both the CDA and PvdA government ministers.⁴³⁰⁴ It did not take long before the Foreign Affairs Department began to parade the concession yielded by the combined pressure brought to bear on Ter Beek by Minister Kooijmans and Parliament. Once the prospect of having the Airmobile Brigade ready for deployment by the end of 1993 was presented, the Foreign Ministry began to ‘air’ the idea, as Ter Beek put it.⁴³⁰⁵ A diplomat would naturally never express it in this way. For this reason Van Eenennaam declared that Foreign Affairs officials began to discuss the potential deployment of the Airmobile Brigade in Yugoslavia ‘where the occasion presented itself’ in consultations held with accredited foreign diplomats in The Hague.⁴³⁰⁶ In April 1993 the British ambassador in The Hague reported to his government that the Dutch government was considering making an airborne battalion available for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan.⁴³⁰⁷ Lord Owen recalled reading in a report from the British embassy in The Hague that it was Van Eenennaam who began making announcements about this to British diplomats at the beginning of April. Ministers Lubbers and Kooijmans are even said to have felt that the deployment of an airborne battalion was too limited but that the provision of an armoured infantry battalion appeared to be impossible owing to the problems pertaining to voluntary undertakings by national service personnel.⁴³⁰⁸

On 6 April the Defence Staff reported to the minister that so far only Finland appeared able to satisfy the need for armoured vehicles. It was decided that the airmobile battalion would not yet be offered to NATO for deployment to implement the Vance-Owen plan.⁴³⁰⁹ Two days later the Defence Department informed NATO about Dutch capabilities as formulated by Van der Vlis, omitting any reference to the Airmobile Brigade.⁴³¹⁰ The Foreign Affairs Department responded irritably. The Defence Ministry had not consulted either Kooijmans or Foreign Affairs officials about the nature of its statement. The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs referred to the offer as meagre, certainly in view of the fact that the airmobile battalion was not yet mentioned in it. According to Foreign Affairs, NATO would:

⁴³⁰² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 51. It is remarkable that the Bakker Committee barely mentions this exceedingly important turn of events in its report, although Van der Vlis had reported it when heard by this committee. In its report the committee moved directly from the memorandum of 15/03/ to that of 6/04/ and ignored the memorandum of 17/03/, which set out the change of policy. See TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 114.

⁴³⁰³ DS. Memorandum from Van der Vlis to Ter Beek, 17/03/93, SN93/216/1680.

⁴³⁰⁴ DS. Notes taken by Waltmann for BDZ, BLS and BDL, 18/03/93.

⁴³⁰⁵ Interview R.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴³⁰⁶ B.J. van Eenennaam to NIOD, 05/12/01.

⁴³⁰⁷ Confidential information (29).

⁴³⁰⁸ Interview Lord Owen, 27/06/01.

⁴³⁰⁹ NIOD, Ter Beek Coll. Memorandum from Waltmann to Ter Beek, 06/04/93, SN93/225/2222.

⁴³¹⁰ ABZ, Kabinet, Correspondence of M – colleagues I, 1993, Waltmann to Kooijmans, 08/04/93.

‘definitely not be “impressed”. The same applies to the Americans, who will again be required to bear the bulk of the burden again, although they would expect a substantial European contribution as a prerequisite. Nor will our European partners be impressed by our “contribution”.’⁴³¹¹

5. Ter Beek’s visit to Bosnia

On 15 and 16 March Minister Ter Beek paid a visit to Bosnia-Herzegovina to familiarize himself with the situation in the event that any Dutch troops were to be deployed, if this were requested within the context of a peace agreement. In Zagreb he spoke to Nambiar’s successor, who had been appointed several weeks before. Nambiar had no longer seen much point in the operation. At the end of February he had openly asked the question ‘why men and women from distant countries should lose their lives for communities who themselves failed to show that they were prepared to agree on a settlement’.⁴³¹² At the beginning of March Nambiar had transferred command of UNPROFOR to the Swedish Lieutenant General Lars-Eric Wahlgren, who had prior experience of peacekeeping operations in Lebanon and Sinai. In the evening of his visit to Zagreb, Ter Beek’s dinner with Wahlgren was virtually a washout because the Swedish Lieutenant General was in almost constant communication with General Morillon, who found himself in difficult circumstances outside Srebrenica at that point in time. Following his visit to Zagreb, Ter Beek concluded that the deployment of new peacekeeping troops should occur gradually, because Wahlgren saw no benefit in the mass arrival of unprepared contingents. In addition, the general did not want to sideline the population from the peace process. Those countries which contributed troops would be committed for a very long period of time as a result. Wahlgren mentioned that a period of between fifteen and forty years would be required for a military and civil operation.⁴³¹³ Ter Beek’s visit made an impression on Wahlgren, because the former said that he was under considerable political pressure ‘to do something’ with regard to the former Yugoslavia.⁴³¹⁴ This is why apparently several hours before his departure to Zagreb Ter Beek had directed Van der Vlis to include the possible deployment of the Airmobile Brigade somewhat further on in the future in his memorandum. Now that Wahlgren had referred to a rather long-term deployment of peacekeeping forces, the fact that it would still be more than half a year before the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade could be deployed began to seem less important. The next day Ter Beek spoke to Morillon’s deputy, the Spanish general, Prado, in Sarajevo. Although an 82 mm shell fell a mere ten metres from the office of the French general Philippe Morillon, where the government minister was staying, upon his departure from Sarajevo Ter Beek still described the risks to be run by any Dutch soldiers who were to be deployed, as acceptable.⁴³¹⁵

During his stay in Bosnia the Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Major General R. Reitsma, who was accompanying the minister, developed a new solution to the ongoing demand for combat units. At the time he realised that it would be difficult to assemble a logistics unit, and launched the idea of an artillery unit. Such a unit would require little artillery practice ⁴³¹¹ ABZ, Kabinet, Correspondence M – colleagues I, 1993, note from DAV to Kooijmans, z.d. (8 or 09/04/93).

⁴³¹² Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Ex-Joegoslavië dreigt proeftuin van Europa te worden’ (Former Yugoslavia in danger of becoming Europe’s experimental field), NRC Handelsblad, 26/02/93; ‘Commandant van VN-macht geeft lucht aan frustratie’ (Commander of UN force vents his frustrations), Algemeen Dagblad, 27/02/93.

⁴³¹³ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Notes, ‘Discussions with Wahlgren, Prado, Cordy Simpson, z.d.’; ‘UNPROFOR-commandant verwacht doorbraak bij Srebrenica’ (UNPROFOR commander anticipates Srebrenica breakthrough), ANP, 16/03/93, 2.29 am; ‘Commandant tegen massale komst VN-soldaten in ex-Joegoslavië’ (Commander opposes massive influx of UN troops in former Yugoslavia), NRC Handelsblad, 16/03/93.

⁴³¹⁴ Interview L.-E. Wahlgren, 03/06/99.

⁴³¹⁵ W. Nieuwenhuis, Sarajevo is nu eenmaal een onmenselijke barbarij’ (Sarajevo is quite simply inhuman barbarism), NRC Handelsblad, 17/03/93; ‘Mortiergranaat mist Ter Beek op haar na’ (Mortar narrowly misses Ter Beek), De Telegraaf, 17/03/93; ‘Mortiergranaat slaat in vlak bij Ter Beek’ (Mortar explodes close to Ter Beek), Trouw, 17/03/93.

and its period of training could therefore be brief.⁴³¹⁶ He decided to inform his findings immediately to the Dutch journalists who accompanied the minister during his visit. In NRC Handelsblad Reitsma launched the idea of providing a number of artillery batteries equipped with 155 mm howitzers as support for the division which Europe was to supply within the framework of the Vance-Owen plan. 'The advantage of artillery is that you can strike a powerful blow and that you have firepower present. The politicians want this and we can supply it.'⁴³¹⁷ However, the despatch of an artillery unit did not tally with the peacekeeping operation which the UN envisaged at that point in time and the idea disappeared as quickly as it had been raised.⁴³¹⁸

While Minister Ter Beek later visited the transport battalion in Busovaca, the journalists who were present received an ANP report that Prime Minister Lubbers was to send a letter to Parliament in which he proposed that once national service personnel had agreed to deployment, they would not be allowed to reconsider at a later stage ('until the aircraft steps'). Ter Beek had not been notified beforehand of Lubbers' intention to send this letter to Parliament. The minister and his adviser, Kreemers, made frenzied attempts to obtain greater clarity from The Hague but to no avail. The seven journalists who had accompanied Ter Beek, wished to speak to him but the minister remained incommunicado in his hotel room and finally sent Kreemers with a message that there was no difference of opinion between Ministers Ter Beek and Lubbers. The underlying principle remained one of voluntary commitment. Restricting the opportunity for soldiers to reconsider a commitment they had previously given would not resolve the difficulties relating to deployment, because there were too few volunteers in the first place.⁴³¹⁹ However, this move on the part of the Prime Minister was one of the signs that Lubbers, who had achieved little success abroad with his plea for a larger Western deployment in the former Yugoslavia, was beginning to take a more active role in the implementation of Dutch policy. Apparently, the Prime Minister was beginning to have enough of the Defence Department's attitude of 'we are willing but unable'.

6. The Prime Minister and the Ministry of General Affairs

In principle, the Prime Minister and his officials in the Ministry of General Affairs had a role in coordinating the Foreign Affairs and Defence ministries in relation to Dutch security policy. However, the prime minister has traditionally played a modest role in the Netherlands. The constitution first made reference to the prime minister following its amendment in 1983. On this occasion the prime minister was assigned special responsibility for ensuring uniformity of government policy in his capacity as chairperson of the Ministerial Council. Nevertheless, ministerial autonomy has remained pronounced and the prime minister continues to be depicted as no more than primus inter pares.⁴³²⁰ He was subject to a sort of non-intervention principle in interdepartmental relations.⁴³²¹ Typical of this was the reply Prime Minister Lubbers gave his interviewer, Cees Labeur, when the latter asked him on 23 April 1993 whether military intervention had been discussed by the Ministerial Council that day: 'No, because Minister Kooijmans was not present'.⁴³²² The prime minister could also not give individual ministers ⁴³¹⁶ Interview R. Reitsma, 04/10/99; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 184.

⁴³¹⁷ W. Nieuwenhuis, 'Nederland past grote broek gevechtspak Bosnië niet' (Netherlands unable to fill Bosnian combat boots), NRC Handelsblad, 19/03/93. cf. interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴³¹⁸ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁴³¹⁹ Interview W. Lust on 19/07/00; R. Reitsma, 04/10/99; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, pp. 185-86.

⁴³²⁰ TK, 1987-1988, 20 559, no. 7, pp. 117-18; Van Thijn, Retour, p. 37; R.J. Hoekstra, 'De minister-president en Europa', Rehwinkel & Boven d'Eert & Hoekstra, Positie, p. 45. See, for example, the statement made by the VVD member of Parliament, G. Wilders in 2000: 'I am not saying that the Prime Minister should keep quiet but he is no more than the first amongst equals and this should remain the case.'; 'Parliament should not seek to govern', de Volkskrant, 04/10/00.

⁴³²¹ Van Thijn, Retour, p. 37.

⁴³²² TV, Nederland 3, NOS/VARA, Nova, 23/04/93, 10.30 pm.

directions.⁴³²³ During the debate arising from the animosity between Van den Broek and himself about their positions in the European Council at the end of 1990,⁴³²⁴ Lubbers formulated his role as follows:

‘The chairperson of the Ministerial Council must be able to act in such a manner that he does not in any way impede the ministers in the performance of their work due to a lack of communication, by getting in the way of his colleagues, by displaying excessive enthusiasm thereby overshadowing as it were the policy of his colleague to whom a particular portfolio has been entrusted. This is one side of the coin. The other side of the coin is that indeed the chairperson of the Ministerial Council, because of his capacity as such, bears primary responsibility for ensuring that policy remains on the move, for clarifying its internal correlation, and for implementing it in a coordinated fashion, not only in the domestic arena but also in an international context.’⁴³²⁵

However, the Ministry of General Affairs had done little to coordinate the Defence and Foreign Affairs departments’ policy on Yugoslavia.⁴³²⁶ At the beginning of the nineties the Prime Minister’s chief official advisers were eleven council advisers covering the various areas of policy which constituted the Prime Minister’s government. During this period J.P.M.H. Merckelbach was the adviser responsible for foreign affairs and security policy. Merckelbach explained that the General Affairs Department’s failure to coordinate policy on Yugoslavia was due to his efforts to exclude the Prime Minister from the affairs of other ministries. As long as he did not hear anything from the other ministries, he assumed that nothing untoward was happening.⁴³²⁷ Also according to other people involved, the General Affairs Ministry only came ‘on board’ when things really became exciting,⁴³²⁸ if there were noticeable differences of insight between ministries.

Neither Lubbers, Prime Minister since 4 November 1982 and en route to becoming the longest serving premier in the history of the Netherlands on 16 July 1993, nor his successor, Kok, felt a need to have the Ministry of General Affairs act as a type of shadow organization or super-Defence or super-Foreign Affairs administration which constantly monitors how relations develop between the two departments.⁴³²⁹ According to Ter Beek, the role played by Lubbers in directing defence and security policy was therefore ‘not a major one. This is putting it quite nicely. Now and then.’⁴³³⁰ As it happens, this restraint was not only attributable to the Prime Minister. Lubbers was known to other ministers for his willingness to ‘think through things with them’.⁴³³¹ Ter Beek:

‘Lubbers’ approach was ... always like this: he asked the Ministers of Defence and Foreign Affairs to consider matters together. He assumed that they would agree at some stage, but if this did not happen, he was willing and able to think ⁴³²³ R.J. Hoekstra, ‘De minister-president en Europa’, Rehwinkel & Boven d’Eert & Hoekstra, Positie, p. 45.

⁴³²⁴ See the appendix dealing with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the CD-ROM that goes with the Dutch version of this report.

⁴³²⁵ TK 1990-1991, Proceedings, p. 1127, (08/11/93).

⁴³²⁶ Interview D. Barth, 08/10/99, P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00; B. Hiensch, 13/07/00; J.Th. Hoekema, 05/03/98; K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 20/01/00; J.L. Sandee, 12/06/00; R. Swartbol, 24/02/99; A.K. van der Vlis, 13/02/98; H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁴³²⁷ Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00.

⁴³²⁸ Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

⁴³²⁹ Amongst other things, interview W. Kok, 08/05/00; 28/05/00. cf. ‘Bijlmerramp. Lubbers: afhandeling ramp was bij Van Thijn in goede handen’, ANP, 12/03/99, 3.01 pm; ‘Tweede Kamer. Kosto: Vreemdelingentoezicht via uitkijkposten en vliegende brigades’ (Kosto in Parliament: Supervision of foreigners using watch towers and flying brigades), ANP, 24/03/94, 11.43 pm.

⁴³³⁰ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴³³¹ Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00; Metze, Stranding, p. 63; W. Breedveld, ‘Het geheim van de spil’ (The secret of the linchpin), Trouw, 07/11/92.

things through with them. Usually, this was an incentive to reach agreement quickly, because if Ruud joined in, things always only became more complicated. He had thought of ten problems by the time you had thought that you had a solution. All very creative.⁴³³²

Despite all his yearning to find solutions for seemingly insoluble problems, Lubbers remained a hesitant, groping person.⁴³³³ Again and again he came up with ideas – big and small – with which he peppered his fellow ministers in the form of memos, sometimes to the point of distraction.⁴³³⁴ During so-called ‘brief bilateral consultations’ in the Prime Minister’s office, the Prime Minister presented himself as a mediator, someone capable of reconciling people. His statements were sprinkled with terms such as ‘with each other’, ‘together’ and ‘as we go’. However, for some it was far from clear in which direction they were going.⁴³³⁵ Although he may have had the reputation of a Macher due to his sometimes resolute statements,⁴³³⁶ to political insiders he was ‘anything but a tough guy. Lubbers lets matters take their course’.⁴³³⁷ Lubbers himself said that he was not Prime Minister ‘in order to dish out discipline’.⁴³³⁸

Contrary to the above, in March and April 1993 Lubbers began to involve himself increasingly in the positions adopted by the various departments towards the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. He is said to have concerned himself, amongst other things, with the question of voluntary commitment, statements made by the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Couzy, and developments relating to Srebrenica.

Voluntary commitment on the part of deployed national service personnel

The new security situation which emerged in Europe in about 1990, in which there was no longer a major threat but several smaller crises which needed to be managed, had occasioned a demand for flexible mobile units on standby. The White Paper on Defence only earmarked the Airmobile Brigade for crisis management. The Priorities Memorandum made it clear to professional soldiers that in the future they might be required to spend six of every eighteen months abroad for crisis management operations. Initially, career personnel were very enthusiastic about peacekeeping operations. According to a survey conducted by the Netherlands Institute for Public Opinion and Market Research (NIPO) in 1992, 91% of professional personnel were positive about them and 38% declared that they would volunteer for them.⁴³³⁹ However, in the spring of 1992 an editorial in Carré, the journal of the Netherlands Officers Association, stated that career personnel could only be expected to remain loyal when deployed abroad, if this occurred on the basis of well-considered policy accompanied by clearly defined objectives.⁴³⁴⁰ It was difficult to view this remark in isolation from the fact that in August 1992 two Dutch non-commissioned officers of the Corps of Signals had refused to return to their barracks in Sarajevo when the latter had come under mortar fire, saying that they found the situation too dangerous for the nine national servicemen entrusted to their care. They were sent back to the Netherlands and were sentenced to four months’ imprisonment by the Military Division of the Court

⁴³³² Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴³³³ Metze, Stranding, pp. 55-56.

⁴³³⁴ Metze, Stranding, p. 57.

⁴³³⁵ cf. H. Righart, ‘De meestergoochelaar’ (The master magician), HP/De Tijd, 24/04/92; Max van Weezel & Leonard Ornstein, ‘Lubbers zit er niet om lellen uit te delen’ (Lubbers is not there to dish out punishment), Vrij Nederland, 21/01/93.

⁴³³⁶ Willem Breedveld, ‘Het geheim van de spil’, Trouw, 07/11/92.

⁴³³⁷ Jan Tromp, ‘Lubbers is helemaal geen krachtpatser’ (Lubbers is absolutely not a tiger), de Volkskrant, 18/09/91.

⁴³³⁸ Max van Weezel & Leonard Ornstein, ‘Lubbers zit er niet om lellen uit te delen’, Vrij Nederland, 21/01/93.

⁴³³⁹ Elands, Militairen, p. 32. Zie ook T. Lagas & L. Meijer, ‘Jan Soldaat knijpt ‘m’ (GI Joe gets the wind up), Trouw, 30/05/92.

⁴³⁴⁰ ‘Inzet van beroepsmilitairen: een uitweg?’ (Deployment of career personnel: a solution?), Carré 15(1992)10, p. 5.

of Arnhem at the beginning of 1993. In addition, they were given a dishonourable discharge for gross dereliction of duty.⁴³⁴¹

At the beginning of March 1993 a survey conducted by the General Federation of Military Personnel revealed that more than half of the professional soldiers in the Netherlands were not favourably disposed towards peacekeeping missions as a relatively new task for the Netherlands Armed Forces. One third were even prepared to refuse involvement in them. Of the various branches of the armed forces, the Royal Netherlands Army was the one which accounted for the greatest resistance.⁴³⁴² According to De Telegraaf, this 'spineless (Jan Salie) mentality' was unacceptable and the only possible response to it was dismissal.⁴³⁴³ Minister Ter Beek agreed with this view and made this clear in a talk he gave to Eurofedop, the European association of military personnel, in Veldhoven on 22 March. He declared it to be unacceptable for career soldiers who refused duty in peacekeeping operations, to benefit from favourable redundancy arrangements.⁴³⁴⁴ In this he received support from the Dutch public. The AVRO-NIPO survey of August 1992 referred to above revealed that 67% of those people who supported Dutch involvement in any intervention in Yugoslavia, felt that only professional military personnel should participate, while 28% were of the opinion that national servicemen should also fight.⁴³⁴⁵ According to the NIPO survey conducted at the beginning of February 1993, 82% of the respondents were in favour of the compulsory deployment of career soldiers in Yugoslavia, but not of the deployment of national service personnel.⁴³⁴⁶ In another NIPO survey conducted in April 1993 65% of the respondents said that only professional soldiers should be deployed for military intervention in Yugoslavia, while 31% felt that the government should also be allowed to send national servicemen in such a case.⁴³⁴⁷

Following his discussion with Kooijmans on 10 March, Ter Beek had informed the press that voluntary commitment on the part of national service personnel imposed 'substantial limitations' on the deployment of combat units.⁴³⁴⁸

The voluntary commitment of national service personnel began to form a major obstacle to Dutch involvement in peacekeeping operations. Already when sending the signals unit abroad, the Army had encountered great difficulty finding two hundred national servicemen who were prepared to be involved. Allegations were made that the sergeants had gone to great lengths to ensure voluntary commitment. In this connection the soldiers' trade union, VVDM (Association of Compulsory Military Service Personnel), referred to 'press-ganging practices'.⁴³⁴⁹ The third contingent of the signals battalion was 'a battalion of signals volunteers herded together from other sections and consisting of a large number of volunteers from general operations who were rushed into readiness with the aid of crash ⁴³⁴¹ e.g. P. Ruigrok, 'Den Haag wist van niets, maar de onderofficieren móesten terug' (The Hague knew nothing but the NCOs had to return), Vrij Nederland, 30/10/93, pp. 10-12; J. Marijnissen, 'Werving militairen voor Bosnië is misleidend' (Recruitment of troops for Bosnia is misleading), Brabants Dagblad, 12/02/94; Van Wondergem, Je komt, pp. 113-15 and 128.

⁴³⁴² BSG. Memorandum from Kreemers to Ter Beek, 04/03/93, V-299/93/298, with appendices: AFMP press report, 03/03/93; 'Militairen doen VN-werk met lood in de schoenen' (Troops reluctant to perform UN duties), Trouw, 04/03/93; 'Geen gejuich voor VN-taken. Onzekere toekomst zit beroepsmilitairen dwars' (No cheers for UN duties: Uncertain future bothers career personnel), Trouw, 16/03/93. With regard to the hesitancy of professional military personnel in relation to peacekeeping operations, particularly in the former Yugoslavia, see also the VARA TV programme, 29/01/93.

⁴³⁴³ 'Jan Salie' (Ninny), de Telegraaf, 06/03/93.

⁴³⁴⁴ 'Ter Beek: geen regeling voor militairen met bezwaren tegen VN-operaties' (Ter Beek: no provision for troops who object to UN operations), ANP, 22/03/93, 3.05 pm; 'Geen pardon voor militairen. Weigeraars VN-taken krijgen geen aparte afvloeiingsregeling' (No pardon for troops. Objectors to UN duties will not be eligible for separate redundancy scheme), Trouw, 23/03/93.

⁴³⁴⁵ Radio 2, AVRO, News, 09/08/92, 1.04 pm.

⁴³⁴⁶ 'Slachtoffers aanvaardbaar bij actie in ex-Joegoslavië' (Casualties acceptable during action in the former Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 02/02/93.

⁴³⁴⁷ Boode & Everts, 'Ontwikkelingen', p. 188.

⁴³⁴⁸ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, Den Haag vandaag, 10/03/93, 11 pm.

⁴³⁴⁹ B. Bommels, 'De landmacht de lucht in' (Army goes airmobile), Elsevier, 04/04/92, p. 22; P. den Hollander, 'VVDM: Yoego-express rijdt te snel' (VVDM: Yugoslavia express travelling too fast), Algemeen Dagblad, 13/03/92.

courses,' according to Colonel, N. Stuiver, the chairperson of the Netherlands Officers Association (NOV).⁴³⁵⁰ In his annual address to the general meeting of this association, Stuiver had already exaggeratedly remarked that the situation could arise in which the Minister of Defence would have to tell the United Nations: 'I shall first ask the national servicemen if I can accede to your request'.⁴³⁵¹ In its chief editorial comment on 10 March, the day on which Kooijmans paid a visit to Ter Beek, NRC Handelsblad observed that if the obstacle of voluntary involvement were to be removed, the Netherlands would suddenly possess a 'military capacity which would give weight to its actions and enable it to put its words into practice. Even if this was only because maintaining peace in the relevant circumstances is as essential to our national interests as the defence of the kingdom within the Atlantic alliance was during the Cold War'.⁴³⁵²

In the Ministerial Council meeting of 12 March 1993 it was announced that Milosevic had been 'summoned' to Paris in connection with the approval of the proposed peace plan. He would be given to understand that, if Karadzic were to continue to refuse to approve the plan, the Security Council would decide on the complete isolation of Serbia and Montenegro. If the Serbs were to cooperate, then the peace plan would have to be implemented. In this case the UN forces would need to act in order to 'keep peace on the one hand, and enforce it on the other'. Vance and Owen had expressly referred to green instead of blue helmets because of the psychological threat implicit in the former. The peacekeeping force would therefore also need to carry heavier arms than was normal for a UN peacekeeping force. NATO was considering a peacekeeping force of 75,000 troops, namely, a division from the US, one from the former Soviet Union and a European division. Establishing the latter division would be 'an enormous task', as was noted by the Ministerial Council. This was because Germany and Italy would not be participating and the question remained as to whether a French unit could be included in the NATO command structure. The problem would be exacerbated if there were to be resistance not only from local leaders but also at a structural level. In this case 125,000 to 150,000 troops might even be required.⁴³⁵³

Nor would the Royal Netherlands Army be able to do all that much, according to one of the government ministers. There was an obstacle in the form of the Frinking resolution, which had been unanimously adopted by Parliament when the Compulsory Military Service Act (Dienstplichtwet) had been amended in 1987, and which only permitted the deployment of national service personnel on a voluntary basis. It was therefore impossible to provide an armoured infantry battalion. However, it was possible to despatch military engineers and signals troops, although quite a large number of them were already in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. In reality, the Frinking resolution merely demanded that Parliament be given timely opportunity to express its views on the compulsory deployment of national servicemen outside the area covered by the NATO treaty.⁴³⁵⁴ However, in the course of time it became practice for the government and Parliament to acknowledge that there was a prohibition against the compulsory deployment of national service personnel.⁴³⁵⁵ One of the ministers felt that confidential consultations should be held with Parliament if the government were to decide to deploy national servicemen. Another minister did not consider this to be a useful approach and saw more point in seeking an interim solution in terms of which national servicemen would no longer be able to decline ⁴³⁵⁰ N. Stuiver, Colonel in the Dutch Airforce retired., chairperson of the NOV, 'De Nederlandse krijgsmacht op weg waar naar toe? Jaarrede 1992' (Dutch armed forces en route to where? Annual Address 1992), Carré 15(1992)12, p. 8.

⁴³⁵¹ N. Stuiver, Colonel in the Dutch Airforce retired, chairperson of the NOV, 'De Nederlandse krijgsmacht op weg waar naar toe? Jaarrede 1992', Carré 15(1992)12, p. 8.

⁴³⁵² 'Nederland en Bosnië' (Netherlands and Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 10/03/93.

⁴³⁵³ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 1203/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study. cf. ABZ, 999.241, No Fly Zone, Part III. Jacobovits NATO 680 to Kooijmans, 23/04/93.

⁴³⁵⁴ TK, 1987-1988, 16 521, no. 13.

⁴³⁵⁵ R.C.R. Sieckmann, 'Geen verbod onvrijwillige uitzending' (No ban on dispatch of non-volunteer troops), Trouw, 20/03/93.

deployment at the very last moment but would have to make a legally binding commitment at an earlier stage.⁴³⁵⁶

After the Ministerial Council meeting Lubbers informed the assembled press that the option had not been excluded of partially suspending the voluntary involvement of national service personnel in any deployment outside the NATO treaty area with a view to despatching them to the former Yugoslavia in order to implement the peace plan. According to the Prime Minister, the Netherlands had ‘a moral duty’ to participate in any peacekeeping force which would have to enforce the Vance-Owen plan if required, and this would be awkward to achieve on the basis of absolute voluntary involvement.⁴³⁵⁷ In this connection, his thoughts were turning in the direction of the establishment of an armoured infantry battalion. Any national serviceman who upon commencement of his compulsory service voluntarily reported to a unit which was prepared to participate in armed campaigns outside NATO territory, would not be allowed to change his mind at a later stage.⁴³⁵⁸ Of the major parties, only the CDA appeared to support the Prime Minister. His fellow party member, Frinking, the spiritual father of the 1987 resolution, warned Lubbers that he would not easily obtain support for his proposal from Dutch members of parliament.⁴³⁵⁹ The General Association of Military Personnel in the Netherlands (AVNM) and the Dutch National Servicemen’s Association (VVDM) also rejected Lubbers’ ideas.⁴³⁶⁰ ‘Seldom has the Prime Minister sewn the seeds of so much confusion,’ wrote Wio Joustra a week later in de Volkskrant. ‘Terms such as “mercenary army”, “press-ganging practices” and “foreign legion” suddenly began to do the rounds.’⁴³⁶¹

When Lubbers raised the issue of voluntary involvement in a letter addressed to Parliament on 17 March, Ter Beek responded from Bosnia that, as far as he was concerned, everything remained the same as it had been. He had no need of people who were not properly motivated. Moreover, according to Ter Beek, it only happened sporadically that, once he had agreed, a national serviceman later changed his mind; the numbers involved were negligible. The problem was that initially too few national service personnel had immediately reported for deployment in peacekeeping operations. In other words, Lubbers was seeking a solution for a problem that did not exist.⁴³⁶² Lubbers’ proposal also ⁴³⁵⁶ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 12/03/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴³⁵⁷ ‘Kabinet zoekt wegen voor inzet dienstplichtigen bij VN-operaties’ (Government searches for ways to deploy national service personnel in UN operations), de Volkskrant, 13/03/93. See also Radio 1, TROS, Aktua, 12/03/93, 5.07 pm; TV, Nederland 3, Nova, 12/03/93, 11 pm; ‘Soldaat verplicht richting Bosnië. Vrijwilligheid dienstplichtige op helling’ (Mandatory military service in Bosnia: Voluntary service by national servicemen under fire), de Telegraaf, 13/03/93; ‘Ook dienstplichtige naar brandhaard’ (National service personnel also destined for inferno), Trouw, 13/03/93.

⁴³⁵⁸ ‘Soldaat verplicht richting Bosnië’, de Telegraaf, 13/03/93; ‘Kabinet zoekt wegen voor inzet dienstplichtigen bij VN-operaties’, de Volkskrant, 13/03/93; ‘Vrijwilligheid bij uitzending naar Joegoslavië ter discussie’ (Voluntary nature of service in Yugoslavia up for debate), ANP, 12/03/93, 6.50 pm; L. Meijer, ‘Waar de soldaat “nee” zegt’ (Where soldiers say ‘No’), Trouw, 19/03/93.

⁴³⁵⁹ ‘Kabinet zoekt wegen voor inzet dienstplichtigen bij VN-operaties’, de Volkskrant, 13/03/93; ‘Bolkestein tegen onvrijwillige VN-inzet dienstplichtigen’ (Bolkestein opposed to mandatory UN deployment of national service personnel), ANP, 15/03/93, 11.47 pm; ‘Kamer wil duidelijkheid over uitzending dienstplichtigen’ (Parliament wants clarity on deployment of national servicemen), ANP, 16/03/93, 1.31 pm; ‘Commandant tegen massale komst VN-soldaten in ex-Joegoslavië’, NRC Handelsblad, 16/03/93; ‘Ter Beek oneens met Lubbers. “Dienstplichtigen niet tegen hun wil naar brandhaard’ (Ter Beek disagrees with Lubbers: ‘National service personnel not to go to inferno against their will’), Algemeen Dagblad, 18/03/93.

⁴³⁶⁰ ‘Dienstplichtigenbonden voelen niets voor suggesties Lubbers’ (National servicemen not happy with Lubbers’ suggestions), ANP, 13/03/93, 3.15 pm; ‘Dienstplichtige moet kunnen weigeren’ (National service personnel must be able to refuse), Trouw, 15/03/93.

⁴³⁶¹ Wio Joustra, ‘Kabinet móet wel dienstplichtigen naar Bosnië sturen’ (Government must send national service personnel to Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 19/03/93.

⁴³⁶² ‘Verschil van mening Lubbers en Ter Beek over inzet dienstplichtigen’ (Difference of opinion between Lubbers and Ter Beek about deployment of national servicemen), ANP, 17/03/93, 7.42 pm; ‘Ter Beek ontzenuwt argument Lubbers over dienstplicht’ (Ter Beek refutes Lubbers’ argument about national service), ANP, 18/03/93, 12.43 am; ‘Ter Beek oneens met Lubbers: “Dienstplichtigen niet tegen hun wil naar brandhaard’’, Algemeen Dagblad, 18/03/93; ‘Ter Beek wil dienstplichtige niet dwingen tot deelname VN’ (Ter Beek does not wish to force UN involvement on national servicemen), appeared to contain an element of injustice. Compulsory military service was scheduled to be scrapped within five years. So why should the last few batches of national servicemen, who already had ‘bad luck’, have such a heavy burden added to their load? The question was even more pertinent in view of the fact that the period of national service had already been reduced to nine months, a period which was not long enough to permit both training and deployment. The implementation of Lubbers’ idea could perhaps even have an adverse effect. From now on those national servicemen who might be willing, could have second thoughts before signing up for peacekeeping operations.⁴³⁶³

It very much looks as though Lubbers not only actually attempted to do something about ‘voluntary commitment until the aircraft steps’ but mainly wished to send a political signal that the Netherlands would have to make an additional effort with the acceptance or enforcement of the Vance-Owen plan on the horizon. During his press conference on 12 March Lubbers said that the Netherlands felt ‘morally obliged’ to participate in any military intervention with ground troops.⁴³⁶⁴ If the Prime Minister’s intention was to send a political signal, then Lubbers succeeded in doing so. In response to his suggestion, the chief editorial comment in Trouw described the Parliament’s proposal to despatch a combat unit consisting of career personnel as ‘more realistic’.⁴³⁶⁵ Whether he intended to do so or not, the fact that Prime Minister Lubbers encouraged people to think about the Netherlands’ participation in the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan with his remarks about limiting voluntary involvement, is evident, for example, in an article published in de Volkskrant on 19 March 1993, which noted that the political dust had settled after a week:

‘The political discussion can now focus on the heart of the matter, which is that the Netherlands can simply not afford to remain on the sidelines if it is decided to establish a large armed force to supervise compliance with the peace plan for Bosnia-Herzegovina, which the negotiators, Vance and Owen, have drawn up. The Netherlands has been manoeuvred into this position by the loudly proclaimed need for military intervention Little will remain of the Netherlands’ international credibility if it lets other countries do the dirty work. Indeed, even the national electorate would not understand a shred of it and would become even more convinced of the CDA-PvdA coalition’s lack of decisiveness. For the moment, Parliament and the rest of the government are not satisfied with Ter Beek’s initial input, namely, support or logistics units such as those which the Netherlands has already provided to UNPROFOR I and II. We need to do all in our power to mobilise a battalion of heavily armed combat troops.’⁴³⁶⁶

De Telegraaf mainly questioned the timing of Lubbers’ announcement. The Dutch Government had favoured forceful action in Bosnia for some time. Why had this matter not been raised earlier? ‘The fact de Telegraaf 18/03/93; Theo Koelé, ‘Ter Beek wil inzetten dienstplichtigen zo houden als het nu is’ (Ter Beek wants to retain status quo for the deployment of national service personnel, Trouw, 18/03/93; ‘Ter Beek niet eens met Lubbers over vrijwilligers’ (Ter Beek disagrees with Lubbers about volunteers), NRC Handelsblad, 18/03/93; interview Ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴³⁶³ L. Meijer, ‘Waar de soldaat “nee” zegt’, Trouw, 19/03/93; Theo Koelé, ‘Ter Beek wil inzetten dienstplichtigen zo houden als het nu is’, Trouw, 18/03/93, and ‘Nederland wil veel, maar kan weinig’ (The Netherlands wants a lot but can only offer a little), Trouw, 20/03/93; W. Nieuwenhuis, ‘Nederland past grote broek gevechtspak in Bosnië niet’ (The Netherlands does not fit into the big combat boots required for Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 19/03/93.

⁴³⁶⁴ ‘Ook dienstplichtige naar brandhaard’ (National service personnel also to go to the inferno), Trouw, 13/03/93; Merckelbacht doubted whether Lubbers really wanted to send a political signal. According to him, Lubbers was a person who thought in highly pronounced organizational terms and who felt that he should be able to rely on people. Anyone who had said ‘Yes’ at some stage, should not be able to say ‘No’ later on. Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/05/00.

⁴³⁶⁵ ‘Dienstplicht en vrijwilligheid’, Trouw, 18/03/93.

⁴³⁶⁶ Wio Joustra, ‘Kabinet móet wel dienstplichtigen naar Bosnië sturen’, de Volkskrant, 19/03/93.

that this has not been done, amounts to gross negligence which does not enhance the credibility of the government's tough political position.⁴³⁶⁷ This credibility was further eroded at the time by the overt signs of differences between Dutch politicians and the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, Couzy.

Couzy and freedom of speech for military personnel

Couzy also understood that the government had begun to move in favour of deploying troops. At the end of March it was revealed that he would be quoted in the following edition of Twintig, the VVDM magazine, as saying that he was not 'champing at the bit' to leave for the former Yugoslavia with combat units. According to the commander, enforcing peace could entail 'dozens of deaths' amongst Dutch troops and he suggested that Dutch parliamentarians were not paying enough attention to the implications. The question was whether fighting 'a bunch of men who think like bandits' was worth Dutch lives. He doubted whether he would be able to explain to the family of fallen Dutch soldiers that they had died for a good cause. He also had no illusions about the outcome of deployment in Yugoslavia. The politicians had not even defined a clear objective. In addition, the UN command structure did not function and UN troops were deployed without enough weapons. According to him, any operation should only be led by NATO or the United States and not the United Nations. Couzy was of the opinion that his comments did not entail that he was straying into politics. He himself was responsible for the safety of his personnel. As soon as it was threatened, he felt that 'he was first and foremost the commander and not a Defence Department member of staff'. The commander's statements were the source of considerable irritation amongst the major parties represented in Parliament, who felt insulted.⁴³⁶⁸ According to VVD MP Weisglas, they even reeked of 'anti-parliamentary sentiment'.⁴³⁶⁹ It was not the first time that Couzy had drawn the ire of politicians on account of his public statements.

The 1991 White Paper on Defence had in principle opted to delegate powers as far down the ranks as possible within the organization based on the principle of 'decentralized, unless'. In 1992 a corporate structure was introduced into the Defence Department in terms of which the Ministry became the executive body as it were and the various branches of the armed forces acquired the role of operating companies.⁴³⁷⁰ As a result, at the beginning of 1992 the command of each branch came to be held by a commander who assumed overall responsibility for the operation of 'his' service. The addition of a tight line organization with far-reaching delegation of powers, which was then implemented, represents a sound chain of communication from the top down and vice versa. In the case of the Defence Department this meant that the various services needed to be quite familiar with the policy requirements of their political masters, while at the other end the services had to provide the information required for the formulation of policy. The services therefore needed to have a clear understanding of the information which the government ministers required in order to bear political responsibility for the operation of the military apparatus. Because political responsibility could manifest itself on an ad hoc basis, the services needed to develop a 'nose' for political susceptibilities. In many cases this was asking too much of them or, as Minister Ter Beek put it, '... I have never managed to catch the Royal Netherlands Army displaying excessive political sensitivity'.⁴³⁷¹ Many military personnel ⁴³⁶⁷ 'Vrijwillig' (Voluntary), de Telegraaf, 16/03/93.

⁴³⁶⁸ 'CDA en PvdA hekelen uitspraken generaal Couzy' (CDA and PvdA denounce Couzy's remarks), ANP, 25/03/93, 5.50 pm; 'Generaal Couzy heeft twijfels over ingrijpen in Bosnië' (General Couzy has doubts about intervening in Bosnia), ANP, 25/03/93, 1.05pm; 'Waarschuwing Couzy valt fout in Kamer' 'Bevelhebber bezorgd om veiligheid Bosnië' (Couzy's warning irks Parliament: Commander concerned about safety in Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 26/03/93; 'Couzy', de Telegraaf, 27/03/93; 'Generaal vreest zinloze interventie' (General afraid of meaningless intervention), Trouw, 25/03/93; 'Waarschuwing Couzy schiet Kamer in het verkeerde keelgat' (Couzy's warning annoys Parliament), Trouw, 26/03/93.

⁴³⁶⁹ Quoted in P.G.M. van Even, 'Onparlementair' (Unparliamentary), Armex, 77(1993)5, p. 4.

⁴³⁷⁰ See the Appendix Dealing with the Defence Department in a changing world.

⁴³⁷¹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99. See also Rosenthal et al., Calamiteiten- en incidentenmanagement, pp. 8, 11, 17 and 19-20.

felt that politicians should not interfere in matters affecting implementation. They also failed to understand the political decision-making process, which appeared to them to be laborious and not direct enough. They also held politicians' military expertise in low regard. 'The realization that final responsibility for the state of affairs within the armed forces is not borne by the commander but by the relevant government ministers, is not held by all military personnel to the same degree,' the head of the Ministry of Defence Information Directorate, H. van den Heuvel, noted cautiously in this respect. According to him, some military personnel were also under the misapprehension that they were doing their branch of the armed forces a service by playing it against the central organization.⁴³⁷² The various services had a tendency to close ranks, particularly if they realized that their performance had left something to be desired. At the other end, the central organization failed to communicate the political aspects involved in, for example, deployment for the purposes of peacekeeping operations.⁴³⁷³

The relationship between the central organization and the Royal Netherlands Army resembled that prevailing between 'elephants grinding against each other', as Minister Ter Beek put it. Within the so-called corporate model much depended on the relationship between the minister himself and the commanders, particularly after Minister Ter Beek decided to abolish the Defence Council, which had been the forum in which the political and official heads of the Defence Department met with the Chief of Defence Staff and the commanders. In his memoirs of his time as a minister, Manoeuvres, Ter Beek presents the view that his method of conducting separate discussions with the various commanders worked well.⁴³⁷⁴ However, it was a public secret that Ter Beek and Wilmink, the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, found it difficult to get along with each other.⁴³⁷⁵

On 10 September 1992 General Couzy succeeded Wilmink. Couzy's image was one of a desk officer in The Hague who had little experience with the troops⁴³⁷⁶ and he made his entry at a time when major spending cuts had to be implemented in the Netherlands armed forces, particularly the Royal Netherlands Army. Consequently, there was a danger that the general might wish to portray himself as someone who stood up for his men and women, which could occur at the expense of his relationship with the minister.⁴³⁷⁷ At the same time Couzy sometimes encountered difficulties when seeking contact with Minister Ter Beek. When Couzy wished to oppose specific cutbacks, it appeared that the minister was shielded by his staff. According to Couzy, he found it difficult to gain access to Ter Beek 'and it was absolutely impossible if there were some chestnuts in the fire. I always had to beg and plead before an appointment could be made with him by the grace of God'.⁴³⁷⁸ However, the minister was always ready to assist him where operational matters were concerned, such as deployment in Yugoslavia.⁴³⁷⁹ According to Couzy, however, it sometimes happened that he and Ter Beek did not see each other for months at a stretch and did not even speak to each other on the phone.⁴³⁸⁰

'As the commander, I therefore had hardly any idea what the minister was up to and what he felt about important matters. I did not see him and hardly heard

⁴³⁷² BSG. Notes taken by Van den Heuvel for Voorhoeve, 'De val van Srebrenica en de beeldvorming van Defensie', 18/08/95, no. V95015937. See also Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, II, interview Voorhoeve, 31/08/98, p. 8; interview H. van den Heuvel, 05/11/01.

⁴³⁷³ BSG. Memorandum from Van den Heuvel to Voorhoeve, 24/08/95, no. V95016235. With regard to the latter cf. BDL. Major General B.A.C. Droste, future commander of the Air Force, to PCDS, 18/08/95, no. BDL 95.058.466/252.

⁴³⁷⁴ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 220.

⁴³⁷⁵ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, 'Nederlandse generaal commandant NAVO' (Dutch general is NATO commander), NRC Handelsblad, 15/06/92; F.J.D.C. Egter van Wissekerke, 'Verdient Ter Beek's beleid wellicht een beter onthaal?' (Does Ter Beek's policy deserve a better reception perhaps?), Carré 16(1993)4, p. 11.

⁴³⁷⁶ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 234; Couzy, Jaren, pp. 15-16; interview J.T. Bruurmijn, 07/04/99.

⁴³⁷⁷ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁴³⁷⁸ Couzy, Jaren, p. 14.

⁴³⁷⁹ Interview H. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98; Robijns, Baas, p. 12.

⁴³⁸⁰ NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. File 8c, decision-making pertaining to the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade; interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95.

from him. At most, I met with him once every two months, although it was necessary for us to synchronise matters far more often than that.⁴³⁸¹

According to Ter Beek on the other hand, he and Couzy saw each other two to three times a month. He felt that matters were not hampered by the fact that Couzy could sometimes not reach him at times when crucial decisions needed to be made. In those cases he was familiar with the commander's views on the issue in question.⁴³⁸²

For his part, Ter Beek complained that he missed a transparent approach within the Royal Netherlands Army. According to him, the Army was used to playing its cards close to its chest, with the result that the minister always needed 'to tug and pull in order to find out certain things'.⁴³⁸³ Couzy, on the other hand, also felt that Ter Beek waited very long before he revealed what he thought: 'He first covered his political flanks and only then did he present his decision. You were never sure whether he would support genuine military interests if push came to shove'.⁴³⁸⁴ Van der Vlis also thought that the minister took a long time to play his cards.⁴³⁸⁵

Apart from this, Couzy did not have much feel for political relations and behaviour. He had a very direct approach.⁴³⁸⁶ This could present difficulties. At the beginning of the 1990s public freedom of speech for military personnel was still formally regulated by Article 12a of the Military Personnel Act 1931, which provided as follows:

'A military official shall refrain from any public disclosure of his thoughts or feelings, or from exercising his right to associate or meet with others, or to demonstrate, if it were no longer possible, in a reasonable manner, to ensure the proper fulfilment of his duties or the proper operation of public services in so far as the latter may be related to the performance of his duties, due to the exercise of such right.'

In 1992 a document drawn up by the Secretary-General for Defence, Directive for Contact with the Media, was released. This directive was based on the minimal exercise of freedom of speech. Contact with the media was reserved for the ministry's Directorate of General Information.

Couzy repeatedly obstructed Ter Beek by making public statements contrary to this directive.⁴³⁸⁷ The awkward relationship between Couzy and Ter Beek was not only due to the somewhat deficient ⁴³⁸¹ Couzy, Jaren, p. 107.

⁴³⁸² Robijns, Baas, p. 12.

⁴³⁸³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/04/99.

⁴³⁸⁴ Couzy, Jaren, p. 13.

⁴³⁸⁵ Interview Van der Vlis, 12/02/99

⁴³⁸⁶ Interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99.

⁴³⁸⁷ See for example 'PvdA en VVD willen dat bevelhebber landmacht zwijgt' (PvdA (Labour) and VVD (Liberals) want army commander to be silent), ANP, 14/01/93, 7.14 pm; W. Joustra, 'Bevelhebber Couzy moet zich wel roeren' (Commander Couzy must get involved), de Volkskrant, 18/03/93; Wio Joustra, 'Sfeer tussen minister en generaal te rellig' (Mood between minister and general too antagonistic), de Volkskrant, 29/01/94; P. Petit and J. Warners, 'Legertop vreest hoog dodental' (Military leaders fear extensive casualties) and 'Ik een politiek onbenul, dan lach ik in mijn vuistje' (Me a political dimwit? I would be laughing up my sleeve.), Algemeen Dagblad, 25/03/93; Marcel Reijmerink, 'Vooral luisteren naar de generaal' (Listen especially to the general), Algemeen Dagblad, 15/06/95; 'Slechte relatie tussen krijgsmacht en politiek verontrust PvdA en D66' (Poor relationship between the armed forces and politicians worries PvdA and D66), de Volkskrant, 09/11/95; 'Dwarsligger Couzy' (Couzy the trouble-maker) and Henk Bouwmans, 'Ter Beek liet probleem-Couzy achter voor opvolgers' (Ter Beek left the Couzy problem for his successors), Het Parool, 06/02/96; 'Weer Couzy' (Couzy again), Dagblad de Limburger, 06/02/96; 'PvdA dringt aan op aftreden Couzy' (PvdA urges Couzy's dismissal), NRC Handelsblad, 08/02/96; 'Coup van Couzy' (Couzy's coup), Elsevier, 09/02/96; Ton Olde Monnikhof & Pierre Petit, 'De generaal is een taaie dwarsligger' (The general is a tough trouble-maker), Algemeen Dagblad, 10/02/96; A. van der Horst, 'De eigen oorlog van Hans Couzy' (Hans Couzy's personal war), HP/De Tijd, 16/02/96; Rudie Kagie, 'Het spreekverbod. Wat generaal Couzy wel en niet mag zeggen' (The ban on public statements: What General Couzy may and may not say), Vrij Nederland, 30/01/93.

communicative skills of the former, as Ter Beek suggested.⁴³⁸⁸ At a structural level communication between the armed forces and politicians was awkward. The abolition of various forms of consultation between the central organization, i.e. the top of the Ministry of Defence and the armed forces had narrowed communication to that between the minister and the commander, beyond which there was no recourse. As a result, there was a great temptation for members of the armed forces to use the press to air those of their views which they felt the central organization was paying little or no attention to.

On 10 November 1992, two months after assuming the position of commander, Couzy used the comments column of the NRC Handelsblad to air his criticism of the growing move to reduce the transitional period for the suspension of compulsory military service.⁴³⁸⁹ Couzy's statements appeared at a very unfortunate moment for Ter Beek. Within government he still needed to persuade Prime Minister Lubbers and Minister Van den Broek that compulsory military service should be suspended. In addition, Couzy's statements could give one the impression that Ter Beek hung on the commander's every word in relation to the transitional period, which could jeopardise the political acceptance of the Priorities Memorandum which was being prepared. Ter Beek therefore sought written evidence from Couzy that his statements were designed:

‘to support the policy pursued by the Minister of Defence. This also means that I unconditionally accept the decisions taken by the Minister about the future structure of the Royal Netherlands Army and compulsory military service, and am prepared to present and implement the relevant policy without reservation.’⁴³⁹⁰

In practice, this document, which had been drafted by Van den Heuvel and became known as a declaration of loyalty, became a bone of contention to the Army. In the eyes of the military, this incident made Couzy a martyr, which was to his advantage as it happens,⁴³⁹¹ and led the Army to despise the Directorate of General Information, which it felt chose sides with the Minister too often and underplayed the Army's views.⁴³⁹² It ensured that Couzy acquired a reputation as someone who was ‘solidly behind his people’, who idolized him.⁴³⁹³

On 14 January 1993 Couzy again made a controversial public announcement. On this occasion, two weeks after his visit to the Dutch troops in the former Yugoslavia, he said in the NCRV radio programme, Goedemorgen, Nederland, that military intervention in that region was ‘absolutely impossible’. Western soldiers would be faced with a guerrilla war there: ‘Then you will get a second Vietnam’.⁴³⁹⁴

⁴³⁸⁸ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 234; Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het eergevoel van Relus ter Beek’ (Relus ter Beek's sense of honour), Vrij Nederland, 18/03/95.

⁴³⁸⁹ H.A. Couzy, ‘Afschaffen dienstplicht vergt ruime overgangstijd’ (Abolition of compulsory national service demands long transitional period), NRC Handelsblad, 10/11/92.

⁴³⁹⁰ F. Peeters, ‘Couzy verbergt zijn twijfels achter ferme uitspraken’ (Couzy conceals his doubts behind robust statements), Het Parool, 08/02/96.

⁴³⁹¹ NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Decision-making in relation to the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade, interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95; Rudie Kagie, ‘Het spreekverbod. Wat generaal Couzy wel en niet mag zeggen’, Vrij Nederland, 30/01/93; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 234; Couzy, Jaren, p. 20; Ewoud Nysingh, ‘De pers over Defensie’, Hoe communiceert defensie, p. 18.

⁴³⁹² M. Reijmerink and P. Pierik, ‘Bij defensie dienen alsnog koppen te rollen’ (Heads still need to roll in the Defence Department), de Volkskrant, 02/09/95; interview H.P.M. Kreemers, 18/03/99.

⁴³⁹³ General Coopmans quoted in Debbie Langelaan, ‘De laatste in zijn soort. Generaal Couzy verlaat de actieve dienst als een omstreden man’ (The last of his kind. General Couzy takes leave of active service as a contentious figure), De Stem, 30/03/96. Identical terms were used by Bauke Snoep, chairperson of the Algemene Federatie Militair Personeel (General Federation of Military Personnel), in: H. Goudriaan, ‘Een om zich heen slaande generaal. Couzy veroorzaakt commotie, maar kan bij “zijn” landmacht niet stuk’ (A pugilistic general: Couzy caused a stir but cannot put a foot wrong in ‘his’ army), Trouw, 09/02/96, and by Bauke Snoep and Major General b.d. Schaberg in A. van der Horst, ‘De eigen oorlog van Hans Couzy’, HP/De Tijd, 16/02/96.

⁴³⁹⁴ Radio 1, KRO, Echo, 14/01/93, 1.10 pm; ‘PvdA en VVD willen dat bevelhebber landmacht zwijgt’, ANP, 14/01/93, 7.14 pm.

The PvdA MP, M. Zijlstra, repeated what he had already said in November 1992 in response to Couzy's statements about the transitional period for the abolition of compulsory military service: 'We have generals to command our troops and not to indulge in politics'.⁴³⁹⁵ Blaauw referred to the Commander's comment as 'a cheap comparison' and felt that it was time Couzy acquired some wisdom in relation to his public statements. He did not really feel like 'saying it is so frightening and dangerous. By saying that, we in the Western world would be putting our credibility up for grabs'.⁴³⁹⁶ The VVD MP thought that Ter Beek should ask Couzy 'to take his foot off the accelerator somewhat'.⁴³⁹⁷ However, Minister Ter Beek did not rap the commander on the knuckles this time. The former Defence ministers, Stemerdink, Van Mierlo and Bolkestein, also felt that the general had done no more than his duty.⁴³⁹⁸

The fear of casualties amongst Dutch military personnel while involved in a peacekeeping mission in the former Yugoslavia played a role in statements made by Couzy in the Algemeen Dagblad on 25 March 1993. Shortly before this Couzy had said in Commentaar, the CMHF magazine, that, as someone responsible for a 'company' and for 'his' people, he could allow himself to make more far-ranging public statements than policymaking officials, at least as long as no political decisions had yet been made. This challenging approach led Wio Joustra to present an analysis in de Volkskrant on 18 March to the effect that Couzy had now become like a 'wounded animal'. The minister would be chary about handing out a second yellow card to the commander whom he himself had appointed, because this would automatically amount to a red one. Moreover, in such a case Ter Beek would run the risk of a confrontation with 'the generals', according to Joustra.⁴³⁹⁹ Shortly before this, one of them had said that Couzy should never have signed the statement: 'If Ter Beek had thrown him out, I know for sure that more high-ranking officers would have threatened to resign. This would have put the minister on the spot'.⁴⁴⁰⁰

Perhaps encouraged by such inflammatory remarks, in an interview with the Algemeen Dagblad on 25 March Couzy stated that he had warned Minister Ter Beek that there would be 'a substantial number of casualties' if Dutch troops were made available to enforce the Vance-Owen plan. Although the minister did not treat the possible risks light-heartedly, this was different in the case of some parliamentarians, according to the general. In the same interview Couzy also entered the debate about the voluntary involvement of national service personnel in any deployment. He understood that it was appropriate for him to show 'considerable restraint' in this matter but if the situation remained as it was, it would be rather 'difficult' to make units available: 'Then we will not be going'.⁴⁴⁰¹

The Defence Ministry did not wish to become too concerned about the commander's remarks. The ministry even tried to calm the waters: 'Couzy made his statements within the context of his responsibilities. The minister was aware of this.' However, the members of parliament did not wish to be depicted as 'a bunch of madmen who are simply intent on throwing our boys to their death'.⁴⁴⁰² Not only did Couzy receive support from Ter Beek, assistance was also forthcoming from unexpected quarters. The Podium column in Trouw featured a piece by Faber, the IKV (Interchurch Peace Council) secretary, who expressed concern about the criticism levelled at the commander, because he detected ⁴³⁹⁵ PvdA en VVD willen dat bevelhebber landmacht zwijgt', ANP, 14/01/93, 19:14; R. Kagie, 'Het spreekverbod. Wat generaal Couzy wel en niet mag zeggen', Vrij Nederland, 30/01/93; Couzy, Jaren, p. 111.

⁴³⁹⁶ Radio 1, KRO, Echo, 14/01/93, 1.10 pm.

⁴³⁹⁷ Rudie Kagie, 'Het spreekverbod. Wat generaal Couzy wel en niet mag zeggen', Vrij Nederland, 30/01/93.

⁴³⁹⁸ Rudie Kagie, 'Het spreekverbod. Wat generaal Couzy wel en niet mag zeggen', Vrij Nederland, 30/01/93.

⁴³⁹⁹ Wio Joustra, 'Bevelhebber Couzy moet zich wel roeren', de Volkskrant, 18/03/93.

⁴⁴⁰⁰ W. Joustra, 'Bevelhebber Couzy moet zich wel roeren', de Volkskrant, 18/03/93.

⁴⁴⁰¹ P. Petit en J. Warners, 'Legertop vreest hoog dodental' and 'Ik een politiek onbenul, dan lach ik in mijn vuistje', Algemeen Dagblad, 25/03/93. See also the news report on the Nederland 2 TV channel, 25/03/93, 6 pm.

⁴⁴⁰² Teun Lagas, 'Openheid generaal valt nu ineens blijktbaar goed bij minister Ter Beek' (Minister Ter Beek suddenly appears to appreciate the general's candour), Trouw, 26/03/1993. See also Van Traa in the news report on the Nederland 2 TV channel, Journal, 25/03/93, 6 pm: 'Wij zijn geen Don Quichottes, we zijn niet gek' (We are not Don Quichotte: we are not crazy).

too many indications in it that politicians were shielding their ears from the warnings of an expert.⁴⁴⁰³ During the Ministerial Council of 26 March 1993 various government ministers expressed their concern about Couzy's statements. They asked themselves why Couzy felt he should advise Minister Ter Beek in public and regretted the fact that he was creating the impression that the Dutch government did not carefully weigh up matters when deploying Dutch troops. At the same time mention was made during the Ministerial Council that Couzy was acting in accordance with his responsibilities by pointing out the possible risks involved in any action. He had not undermined the primacy of the political process.⁴⁴⁰⁴ After the meeting Lubbers announced on NOS television that 'generals are allowed to say something from time to time'. After all, other senior officials did this as well. However, the Prime Minister held the view that Couzy had gone a bit too far by suggesting that the members of Parliament had failed to have sufficient regard to the risks involved in any military intervention in the former Yugoslavia.⁴⁴⁰⁵

7. Srebrenica under siege

Morillon's position in Bosnia

While the Dutch minister, Ter Beek, was visiting Bosnia on 16 and 17 March, events occurred elsewhere which had major implications for further developments in that country. On board the same Antonov 32, which the Russian government had placed at the disposal of the UN, and in which Ter Beek had flown from Zagreb and landed in Sarajevo, the Bosnian president, Izetbegovic, left shortly afterwards for talks in New York. During his visit to Sarajevo Ter Beek was allowed to sleep in the bed of the French general, Morillon, who was visiting Srebrenica at that time. Philippe Pierre Lucien Antoine Morillon, 58 years old, was born in Casablanca. He was a former platoon commander in the French Foreign Legion at the time of Algeria's struggle for independence, later commanded the French army corps in Germany and finally became commander of the first French army corps in Metz. With his silver-grey hair and an athletic figure despite his age, he was known to be a charismatic, captivating and dedicated man. However, he could also act impulsively.⁴⁴⁰⁶

There was an ongoing difference of opinion between Morillon and his superiors in Zagreb and New York. The French general held the view that, while it was true that UNPROFOR needed to be impartial, the UN force was never allowed to tolerate ethnic cleansing. He was not a proponent of large-scale military intervention but, according to him, the UNPROFOR troops that were on the scene, had to be allowed to display their power in order to halt Bosnian-Serb aggression. Morillon could not accept that force was only permitted for the protection of his own troops and not for the population. He referred to the attitude of his UN superiors as perverse angelic behaviour. It irritated him when he was challenged to abide by the text of the UNPROFOR mandate. According to Morillon, one could interpret Security Council resolutions any way one wanted to. One could find evidence to counter everything they contained. He felt that the issue at stake was to act in accordance with the spirit of the mandate. Morillon himself maintained that he engaged in heated telephone conversations with the UN

⁴⁴⁰³ Mient Jan Faber, 'In hun eentje staan soldaten in Bosnië voor hopeloze taak' (On their own, our soldiers face a hopeless task in Bosnia), Trouw, 31/03/93.

⁴⁴⁰⁴ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 12/03/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁴⁰⁵ TV, Nederland 3, NOS, interview the Prime Minister, 11.05 pm; 'Joegoslavië. Lubbers kapittelt Couzy over sneuvelen militairen' (Yugoslavia: Lubbers lectures Couzy on military casualties), ANP, 27/03/93. See also TK, 1992-1993, schedule to the Proceedings, no. 462.

⁴⁴⁰⁶ With regard to Morillon see for example Henk Steenhuis, 'Philippe Morillon', HP/De Tijd, 21/05/93, pp.20-24; Stoltenberg and Eide, Dagene, p.p. 82-83; interview J. Zoutendijk, 6/04/01. Especially with regard to his impulsiveness see Cohen, Hearts, pp. 236-37.

staff in Zagreb every day, in the course of which he repeated that UNPROFOR needed to elicit respect, otherwise the peacekeeping force might as well withdraw.⁴⁴⁰⁷

Morillon had seen how rapidly the United Nations had lost credibility with the Bosnian Muslims. Although the first blue berets had been greeted by tram conductors ringing their bells in Sarajevo in March 1992 and they had always been offered drinks at the sidewalk cafés,⁴⁴⁰⁸ MacKenzie had been forced to move out in the face of threats. The population of the Bosnian capital had definitely not adopted a more welcoming approach towards the UN after a visit by Boutros-Ghali at the end of December 1992. The UN Secretary-General had appealed to his Muslim audience to start negotiations and not to wait for foreign intervention.⁴⁴⁰⁹ He was rewarded with widespread incomprehension. The inhabitants of Sarajevo accused him of being a fascist and a murderer.⁴⁴¹⁰ At the press conference he gave before departing from the Sarajevo airport, the United Nations Secretary-General told his audience that he could present them with a list of ten places in the world where the people were worse off. Those who were present, were so stunned into silence that no one asked him which places he was referring to.⁴⁴¹¹ It was a rude awakening for people who had really believed that the letters, PRO, in UNPROFOR, actually stood for 'protection'.⁴⁴¹²

Like MacKenzie, Morillon came to the conclusion in the course of 1992 that the various parties in the Bosnian conflict only differed marginally from each other in the pursuit of evil. As a UN official stated at the time, 'The Serbs are mass murderers, the Croats are assassins, and the Muslims are killers.'⁴⁴¹³ Morillon was also inundated with Muslim frustration with the United Nations, which appeared to stand in the way of military intervention to their advantage and simultaneously enforced an arms embargo, with the result that the Bosnian government found it difficult to act as a sovereign state.⁴⁴¹⁴ Morillon saw how the propaganda machine of the Bosnian Muslims attempted to pull the wool over the eyes of the world in order to secure military intervention. For instance, in the autumn of 1992 stories were doing the rounds of cannibalism in Zepa as a result of food shortages but, when the first convoys carrying humanitarian aid entered this enclave in December 1992, there appeared to be an abundance of cattle and poultry.⁴⁴¹⁵ At the same time 'spontaneous' demonstrations by the family members of the inhabitants of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde were held outside Morillon's headquarters in Sarajevo. Towards the end of the year the UNPROFOR vehicles were targeted with snowballs containing stones and over Christmas Morillon's headquarters were shelled with mortars fired from positions held by the Bosnian government army.⁴⁴¹⁶

Relations between Morillon and the Bosnian government sank to their lowest when on 8 January 1993, several days after the presentation of the Vance-Owen plan, the Serbian militia shot and killed the Bosnian Deputy Prime Minister, Hakiija Turajlic, in an outer suburb of Sarajevo while being escorted in a UN armoured vehicle. Representatives of the Bosnian government accused Morillon of being the really guilty person.⁴⁴¹⁷ Muslim demonstrators portrayed him as a murderer, Izetbegovic sought his dismissal from the government in Paris, and journalists made things uncomfortable for ⁴⁴⁰⁷ E. Vulliamy, 'The general who told troops to tear up UN mandate' and 'Only passivity is dishonourable', The Guardian, 12/01/96.

⁴⁴⁰⁸ 'Militairen vertrekken naar Joegoslavië' (Troops leave for Yugoslavia), de Volkskrant, 28/03/92.

⁴⁴⁰⁹ Sremac, War, p. 136.

⁴⁴¹⁰ Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 52; Maass, Neighbor, pp. 177-79.

⁴⁴¹¹ Owen CD-ROM, Press Conference of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, held on 31/12/92 in Sarajevo; Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 53; Maass, Neighbor, p. 181; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 24.

⁴⁴¹² Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 140-41 and 152.

⁴⁴¹³ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 220.

⁴⁴¹⁴ These anti-Morillon sentiments were still being expressed in 1998 in Bosnia. See also Sejo Omeragic, 'Svi Srbi i 'posteni' Morillon', Ljiljan, 25 /05/1998, p. 17.

⁴⁴¹⁵ Morillon, Croire, pp. 133-34.

⁴⁴¹⁶ Morillon, Croire, p. 141.

⁴⁴¹⁷ Morillon, Croire, p. 144.

him.⁴⁴¹⁸ But the French government maintained Morillon on his difficult assignment. From here Morillon continued to voice his scepticism regarding the possibilities of a military intervention. The sole solution for the conflict in Bosnia could only come from diplomatic negotiations.⁴⁴¹⁹

In mid-February Morillon angered the Muslim authorities again, when he said that he understood that the ferocity of the Bosnian-Serb offensive in Eastern Bosnia was partly due to the fact that, after capturing Kamenica the VRS (the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs) had discovered a mass grave containing dozens of Serbs who had been badly tortured in November 1992.⁴⁴²⁰ The reinterment of the corpses in Zvornik bore the characteristics of an official event and was attended by Karadzic, amongst others, who not only held the Bosnian Muslims responsible for the death of these Serbs but also the West. He said that following the discovery of this atrocity the last opportunity for Serbs and Muslims to live together ever again had been lost.⁴⁴²¹ At this time Mladic displayed signs of being extremely upset by the death of 1,500 Serbs in Bratunac and surroundings in the months before, which the Muslims of Srebrenica were guilty of, according to him. He said that it had made a great impression on him to fly in a helicopter – contrary to the ban on flights, incidentally – over places such as Tegari, Ratkovici, Fakovici and Skelani, where these murders had been perpetrated, and at the same time to see ‘fellow Serbs’ playing football on the other side of the Drina.⁴⁴²²

It had not escaped Morillon that there was more hatred to be found ‘in this remote corner of Bosnia’ than anywhere else. He was convinced that Mladic was intent on seeking revenge for the dead Serbs.⁴⁴²³ Reports began to appear in the press that thousands of Muslims had been killed during a Serb offensive in Cerska, a town with six thousand inhabitants,⁴⁴²⁴ after which Morillon personally visited the place on 5 March, three days after its fall. Following a brief inspection, Morillon reported that he believed no slaughter had occurred. There were several wounded people, who could be evacuated. His statement, ‘Je n’ai pas senti l’odeur de mort’ in the course of a press conference was one that the Muslims held against him for a long time.⁴⁴²⁵ The Muslims in the Drina valley took it as a sign that they could expect nothing from the French general.

At the beginning of March the Bosnian Serbs briefly opened a corridor for those Muslims who were in Cerska, Kamenica and Konjevic Polje. The Bosnian Serbs argued that they had decided on this humanitarian deed in the face of international pressure but in reality it represented one of the methods they used for ethnic cleansing in Eastern Bosnia.⁴⁴²⁶ On 6 March a British captain, David Bennett, an escort to Morillon, announced that the purpose of the French general’s visit to Eastern Bosnia was to remove as many Muslims as possible from those of their enclaves which had been surrounded: ‘If that encompasses the evacuation of all refugees, so be it’. This policy was supported by the UNHCR.⁴⁴²⁷ However, the Muslim authorities did not appreciate what they viewed as Morillon’s support for ethnic cleansing. On 11 March the political parties in Tuzla, the Citizens’ Forum and the Association of ⁴⁴¹⁸ See for example ‘Bosnische regering wil vervanging VN-bevelhebbers’ (Bosnian government wants UN commanders replaced), ANP, 11/01/93, 16.00. However, the French government retained Morillon in his difficult post. There he continued to express his scepticism about the potential for military intervention. According to him, diplomacy offered the only solution to the conflict in Bosnia (H. Steenhuis, ‘Philippe Morillon’, HP/De Tijd, 21/05/1993, p. 22).

⁴⁴¹⁹ H. Steenhuis, ‘Philippe Morillon’, HP/De tijd, 221/05/93, p. 22.

⁴⁴²⁰ T. Barber, ‘Generall Philippe Morillon – Bosnia, I am with you’, The Independent, 21/03/93; Janine di Giovanni, ‘Morillon takes flak in his finest hour’, Sunday Times, 04/04/93.

⁴⁴²¹ ‘Karadzic attends funeral in Zvornik of “massacred” Serbian victims’, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 24/02/93; Donald Forbes, ‘Karadzic renounces Muslim-Serb brotherhood on grave of “martyrs”’, The Herald (Glasgow), 23/02/93.

⁴⁴²² Sherman, Zerschlagung, p. 169.

⁴⁴²³ Cohen, Hearts, p. 234.

⁴⁴²⁴ See for example Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Bloedbad na val Bosnische stad Cerska’ (Bloodbath after the fall of the Bosnian town of Cerska), NRC Handelsblad, 03/03/93.

⁴⁴²⁵ Morillon, Croire, pp. 164-165; Hollingworth, Christmas, pp. 176-177; ‘VN-generaal: geen bewijs bloedbad’ (UN general: no evidence of a bloodbath), HP/De Tijd, 07/03/93; Thieu Vaessen, ‘Morillon roept kritiek op VN-vredesmacht over zich af’ (Morillon draws criticism of the UN peacekeeping force), ANP, 08/03/93, 14:32.

⁴⁴²⁶ Adrian Brown, ‘UN general braves fighting to help trapped Muslims’, The Daily Telegraph, 06/03/93.

⁴⁴²⁷ Adrian Brown, ‘UN general braves fighting to help trapped Muslims’, The Daily Telegraph, 06/03/93.

Bosnian Muslim Intellectuals, called on the government in Sarajevo to declare Morillon persona non grata because of his 'open support for the aggressor'.⁴⁴²⁸

Srebrenica

11 March was also the day on which Morillon left for a visit to Srebrenica, which was surrounded. Srebrenica was situated in a valley encircled by mostly forested mountains rising to between six hundred and a thousand metres about three kilometres from the Drina River. More than other parts of Yugoslavia, the Drina valley, which was known as the Podrinje, had been the scene of battles in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Although the Drina formed the border between Bosnia and Serbia, the people living on both sides of the river, did not feel it was.⁴⁴²⁹ In the nineteenth century, when Serbia won independence, many Muslims had been driven out of it and had sought refuge on the other side of the Drina in Eastern Bosnia. Conversely, Serbs from Eastern Bosnia had sought sanctuary in Serbia. Those Serbs whose main territorial base was on the south bank of the river, subsequently found it easier to cross the river than the Muslims. Nevertheless, in about 1990 not only Serbian but also Muslim students from Eastern Bosnia went to school in Serbia and many of their parents travelled the same route to work on the other side of the Drina.⁴⁴³⁰ In times of want, for example, during the First World War, when the Serbs fought against the Austrians in this region, or during the Second World War, when the hilly, forested land of Eastern Bosnia was the terrain in which the partisans waged war against the monarchists, Croat extremists, Italian and German troops with varying success, the inhabitants retreated to either river bank as required and gave each other support.⁴⁴³¹ For instance, Serbs in the areas around Bratunac and Srebrenica volunteered for service in the Serb army in 1913.⁴⁴³²

⁴⁴²⁸ Ekrem Abdic in a report from Tuzla for Croat radio. BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 11/03/93; Morillon, Croire, p. 165.

⁴⁴²⁹ See also, for example, Thomas, Serbia, p. 134.

⁴⁴³⁰ Frans van Deijl, 'Ik hou van jou, mijn Bosnië' (I love you, my Bosnia), HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, p. 25.

⁴⁴³¹ See also Appendix Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië, passim, in particular, p. 18 et seq., p. 35, and p. 47.

⁴⁴³² Appendix Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

Nevertheless, the Serb population felt closer ties with their immediate neighbours on the other side of the river than with Belgrade, a situation which also existed in the first half of the 1990s. Neither the Serbs nor the Muslims in the Drina valley felt that they were part of a national state.⁴⁴³³ The Podrinje was actually a peripheral area, relatively isolated from both Belgrade and Sarajevo, and even from Tuzla. If Eastern Bosnia was isolated, than this was even more so in the case of Srebrenica.⁴⁴³⁴ This town was situated at the end of the Krizevica River valley. It could only be accessed from Bratunac, a place with approximately 7,700 inhabitants in 1991, which was situated 12 kilometres away. The hamlet of Potocari lay halfway between both towns. The town of Srebrenica was surrounded by numerous settlements where time appeared to have stood still even more so than in the surrounding areas. Many of the villages could only be accessed by almost impassable tracks and their population lived mainly off their own agricultural produce and cattle farming. Agricultural production barely exceeded subsistence levels. The proportion of the inhabitants of the Eastern Bosnian towns of Bratunac and Srebrenica that was employed abroad, was significantly lower than elsewhere. At the beginning of the 1980s a quarter of the population of both places was still illiterate.⁴⁴³⁵ The only reason why Srebrenica had drawn the attention of the central authorities in the past, was because of its strategic importance in the form of lead, zinc, bauxite and silver mines. It was this last type which gave Srebrenica its name, which literally means silver city.

There were virtually no Croats in Bratunac and Srebrenica, which probably contributed to the development of greater antagonism between the two ethnic groups. On the eve of the conflict in the 1990s Muslims accounted for two thirds of the Opstina Bratunac and Serbs one third.⁴⁴³⁶ In the Opstina Srebrenica almost 73% of the inhabitants were Muslim and more than a quarter were Serbs.⁴⁴³⁷ The population of the town of Srebrenica increased by more than a quarter in the 1980s, from 4,512 inhabitants in 1981 to 5,746 in 1991.⁴⁴³⁸ On the other hand, in the same period the number of inhabitants in the district of Srebrenica fell from 31,780 to 30,920. The Muslim population of Srebrenica experienced a spectacular rate of growth, rising by almost half, while the number of Serbs only increased by one sixth.⁴⁴³⁹

The events of the Second World War were well remembered in the area. Unlike developments elsewhere in Yugoslavia, hardly any people of the Srebrenica district were tried for misconduct during the war. Nevertheless, the local populace knew all too well which families had played an important role in the perpetration of blood baths.⁴⁴⁴⁰

Ethnic consciousness was said to be poorly developed amongst the young people of Bratunac.⁴⁴⁴¹ However, by the end of the 1980s ethnic and national sentiments had also become palpable in Bratunac and Srebrenica. To the Serbs the source of this was initially Milosevic's Belgrade, to the Muslims, Sarajevo. In a certain sense this had the effect of shifting the political orientation of these peripheral regions from their own locality to the metropolitan centres within the country. The major protagonist of the development of enhanced ethnic awareness amongst the Serbs in Srebrenica was the judge, Goran Zekic, who was soon competing with more extremist elements, however. Amongst the Muslims this role was played by Besim Ibisevic, the curator of the district museum. Ibisevic was soon joined by Ibran Mustafic, who later became his competitor. Both had studied in Sarajevo and had returned to the villages near Srebrenica where they had been born. These nationalist leaders found support mainly in the villages around Srebrenica, most of which were ethnically ⁴⁴³³ Smit, Geography, p. 391.

⁴⁴³⁴ For a more detailed account of the history of Srebrenica see appendix Duijzings Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië; Smit, Geography.

⁴⁴³⁵ Smit, Geography, p. 395.

⁴⁴³⁶ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 30.

⁴⁴³⁷ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 31; Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 15-16.

⁴⁴³⁸ Smit, Geography, p. 396.

⁴⁴³⁹ Smit, Geography, p. 396.

⁴⁴⁴⁰ UN, A/48/177 and S/25835, annex: Memorandum, p. 6.

⁴⁴⁴¹ Frans van Deijl, 'Ik hou van jou, mijn Bosnië', HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, pp. 24-27.

homogenous. Prior to this, when no free elections were held, the communists had never worried much about these villages. Now the bulk of the Muslim villages supported the SDA and the Serbian ones opted for the SDS. Not only were the nationalist leaders responsible for a revolt against communism – where they went, the villagers removed pictures of Tito from the walls – but they also recalled the atrocities of the First and Second World Wars.

In Srebrenica rising ethnic consciousness was fuelled by conflicting economic interests, especially in relation to the question of allocating jobs in various companies. A media campaign was launched to expose the actual or supposed prejudice against the Serb community, while the Serbs interpreted their declining proportion of the population as confirmation of the way they felt themselves to be disadvantaged. This campaign was influenced by so-called leaks of confidential information about discrimination against Serbs by the Serbian national security service, the SDB. Despite acts of moderation on the part of the current community leaders in Bratunac and Srebrenica, polarization occurred between these ethnic groups. Social life was increasingly broken down in accordance with ethnic divisions. Anyone who tried to continue efforts towards mediation, received threats. Rumours began to circulate amongst Muslims and Serbs that the other group was secretly arming itself. Anyone who could afford to, left the district. As they had done so often before, the Serbs moved to the other side of the Drina. After the SDA and SDS made gains in the area around Srebrenica in the elections held in November 1990 – the first free elections since the Second World War – the two nationalist parties initially worked together, driven by the need to unite in order to eradicate the institutional and individual rule of the communists. The conflict in Croatia also cast a shadow over Srebrenica. Tensions rose when Ibisevic and Mustafic advised Muslims not to respond to a call-up from the Yugoslavian National Army in May and June 1991 not only because they did not consider the Serb cause to be worthy of Muslim lives, but also because Muslims would be required in Srebrenica if fighting were to break out. When they were therefore summoned to appear before the military tribunal in Sarajevo, they ignored this order. Government authority was increasingly ignored or undermined. Community property was stolen, such as electricity and wood. Serbs refused to pay rates to the municipal council in Srebrenica, in which Bosnians held the majority. The first major incident to take place in the region of Bratunac and Srebrenica occurred at the beginning of September 1991. This happened in Kravica, a hotbed of Serbian nationalism since time immemorial.⁴⁴⁴² This was the source of agitation for the expropriation of land from Muslim landowners after the First World War. In December 1941, during the Second World War, the inhabitants of Kravica used guns, knives and sticks to commit the mass murder of 68 Muslim residents of the hamlet of Sopotnik on the Drina. For their part, Croat extremists slaughtered more than a hundred Serbs in Kravica in July 1943. An incident had already occurred there in 1971 when a drunk Muslim from Konjevic Polje entered a pub in Kravica after visiting a fair in Bratunac. There he had remonstrated with the Serbs about their role in the Second World War. First he was stabbed with a knife but, when he pulled the latter from his side and began to wave it around menacingly, the barman shot him. Fatally wounded, he collapsed in front of the door to the pub. When his fellow villagers from Konjevic Polje arrived to collect the corpse, shooting ensued between the residents of Kravica and the visitors but no one was wounded. The military police acted in order to restore order.⁴⁴⁴³

In the autumn of 1990 Muslims hardly dared to travel through Kravica in the same way that Serbs hardly dared to pass through Potocari between Bratunac and Srebrenica. Barriers had been erected across the road in both places where members of the other ethnic group were checked.⁴⁴⁴⁴ In 1991 Kravica became the weapon distribution and training centre for Serbs from the surrounding settlements. Muslim daredevils began provocative drives through Kravica cursing the Serbs, waving green flags and playing loud 'Eastern' music. In order to 'teach them a lesson' three local Serbs, assisted ⁴⁴⁴² Appendix Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

⁴⁴⁴³ Interviews L. Bogdanovic and N. Stjepanovic, 20/10/00.

⁴⁴⁴⁴ Appendix Duijzings, Geschiedenis en herinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

by three policemen from Bratunac, fired on one of these cars on 3 September 1991, killing two Muslims. Thousands of Muslims then took to the streets to protest in Bratunac.⁴⁴⁴⁵ Following the referendum on the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina, ethnic tensions rose even further in Bratunac and Srebrenica.

In March 1992 Serbs slit the throats of two Muslims near Bratunac. Fear took hold of the people in and around Bratunac and Srebrenica from that time on. Hardly any men still went to work, discussing the situation on the street and in coffee houses instead. Others fled the area. At the beginning of April, when rumours spread that Serbs from outside Bratunac were planning to attack the Muslims in the town, a large group of Muslims left Bratunac and retreated to the mountains where they hid in the forests for days on end. Some fled to neighbouring towns while others sent their wives and children to safer areas.⁴⁴⁴⁶

In mid-April the Serbs gave the Muslims in Srebrenica and the surrounding villages an ultimatum. They were required to hand in their weapons before 18 April. When this ultimatum expired, the first mortars were fired on Srebrenica and surroundings. A large proportion of the population and several armed Muslims fled into the snow-covered hills surrounding the town. Only 365 Muslims, mainly older people, remained in there.⁴⁴⁴⁷ Militia from Arkan, Seselj, Beli Orlovi and groups from Bijeljina then entered Srebrenica under the guidance of local Serbs, including Goran Zekic, the Serbian representative in the parliament of Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴⁴⁴⁸ They plundered the place, set fire to various houses and murdered 27 people.⁴⁴⁴⁹

On 5 May troops from Arkan and Seselj surrounded Bratunac.⁴⁴⁵⁰ They were mainly troops that had previously gone on the rampage in Zvornik.⁴⁴⁵¹ Together with radical Serbs from Bratunac and surroundings, they chased the Muslims out of their homes in Bratunac and neighbouring villages, after which they confiscated all their valuable possessions. Anyone who tried to escape, was shot. They set fire to several villages. Several thousand Muslims were arrested. Approximately seven hundred of them were taken to the police station, where the troops from Arkan and Seselj were in control. The following day Serbian troops took several thousand Muslim women and children to the stadium of the local football club, Bratstvo. Several girls are said to have been moved to the local hotel, Fontana, where they were raped. Eventually, the women and children were taken by bus to Kladanj, which was held by the Bosnian government.

The men were taken to the gymnastics hall of the Vuk Karadzic primary school. While 150 to 200 armed Serbs surrounded the school, the imprisoned Muslims were horrifically tortured over several days. Many were beaten to death with clubs or hammers. People were cut with knives and forced to eat clothes. A total of several hundred Muslim men are said to have been murdered. Some of the corpses were burnt. The remaining bodies were thrown into the Drina. Finally, four hundred Muslims were exchanged for Serbian prisoners.⁴⁴⁵² On 23 May another seventy Muslims are said to have been murdered in front of the mosque of neighbouring Glogova led by the SDS chairperson of Bratunac, Miroslav Deronjic.⁴⁴⁵³

On 6 May Muslim fighters from Srebrenica launched a counterattack on the Serbs in this town. Goran Zekic was murdered on 8 May 1992. The Serbs allege that this was the work of a Muslim police ⁴⁴⁴⁵ See also 'Geweld breidt zich uit naar Bosnië' (Violence spreads to Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 06/09/91.

⁴⁴⁴⁶ F. van Deijl, 'Ik hou van jou, mijn Bosnië', HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, p. 25.

⁴⁴⁴⁷ Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, p. 17.

⁴⁴⁴⁸ Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 58-59 and 103.

⁴⁴⁴⁹ Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 17 and 59-60.

⁴⁴⁵⁰ Williams and Cigar, III.C.1; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2 (Vol. I), 28/12/94, Annex III.A, IV.A.10.

⁴⁴⁵¹ Ludwig Boltzmann Institute, 'Operations', par. 5.2.

⁴⁴⁵² Different figures are cited for the number of Muslims murdered, varying from two to several hundred. B. Rijs, 'Sporen van een massamoord' (Traces of mass murder), HP/De Tijd, 28/08/92, pp. 10-12; Westerman & Brug, p. 71; United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2 (Vol. I), 28/12/94, Annex III.A, IV.A.10.

⁴⁴⁵³ United Nations, S/1994/674/Add.2 (Vol. I), 28/12/94, Annex III.A, III.C, Forces of Miroslav Deronjic and IV.A.10.

officer in Srebrenica, Hakija Meholic.⁴⁴⁵⁴ This murder heralded the exodus of Serbs from Srebrenica, an event that was observed to occur on numerous occasions in the Bosnian conflict following the death of a prominent local figure. This exodus received added impetus in the form of two other Muslims, Naser Oric and Zulfo Tursonovic, who had assumed the role of commanders and who began to attack surrounding villages inhabited by Serbs and then advanced on Srebrenica. A large number of Serbian refugees found sanctuary in Bratunac. This nearby town, which had once had a Muslim majority, became a place that was almost entirely Serbian. In this way the logic of the process of mutual ethnic cleansing on the part of the Muslims and Serbs in this section of the Drina valley resulted in the physical division of these two groups. Now it was no longer only a question of Muslims against Serbs but a battle between those of Srebrenica and those of Bratunac, a situation exacerbated by the fact that there had already been animosity between the two towns for years, fuelled by the superior wealth of Srebrenica.⁴⁴⁵⁵

Throughout the remainder of 1992 the Serbs remained on the defensive in this region. Overall, Muslim fighters from Srebrenica attacked 79 Serbian places in the districts of Srebrenica and Bratunac. They followed a certain pattern. Initially, Serbs were driven out of ethnically mixed towns. Then Serbian hamlets surrounded by Muslim towns were attacked and finally the remaining Serbian settlements were overrun. The residents were murdered, their homes were plundered and burnt down or blown up. There was a preference to launch these attacks on Serbian public holidays (those of Saint Joris, Saint Vitus and the Blessed Peter, and Christmas Day), probably because least resistance was expected. Yet it simultaneously contributed to the development of profound Serbian grievances. Many of these attacks were bloody in nature. For example, the victims had their throats slit, they were assaulted with pitchforks or they were set on fire.

It is estimated that between 1,000 and 1,200 Serbs died in these attacks, while about 3,000 of them were wounded. Ultimately, of the original 9,390 Serbian inhabitants of the Srebrenica district, only 860 remained, mainly in the four villages of Skelani, Crvica, Petrica and Lijesce.⁴⁴⁵⁶ Serbian attempts to defend other villages met with little success. The Serbs in the district of Bratunac were largely driven back to the town of the same name. Faced with a constant shortage of troops, the authorities of the Republika Srpska (Serb Republic) showed little interest in defending the area. On the other hand, the Muslims of Srebrenica could not count on the authorities in Sarajevo showing much interest in them. Confronted with the remark that the Muslims in Eastern Bosnia had also committed atrocities, the Bosnian vice-president, Ganic, said, "The Muslims along the Drina have never received support from us. They obtained their own weapons."⁴⁴⁵⁷

Naser Oric from Potocari had already distinguished himself as a fearsome Muslim fighter, when the fighting broke out around Srebrenica and Bratunac. Oric was born in Potocari on 3 March 1967. He attended the police academy in Zemun near Belgrade and subsequently joined the anti-terrorism unit run by the Ministry of the Interior. After some time he became a bodyguard to Milosevic. When a warrant was issued for his arrest in Belgrade – for theft according to some, for murder according to others⁴⁴⁵⁸ – he went to Ilidza, where he stayed for six months. From there he returned to Srebrenica at the beginning of 1992 when tensions were rising in Bosnia. At the time he assumed the position of local police officer, which is said to have transpired upon the recommendation of the SDA official, Ibran Mustafic, a relative of Oric's mother. Together they are said to have used SDA funds to purchase ⁴⁴⁵⁴ With regard to questions surrounding Zekic's death, see Duizings, Appendix.

⁴⁴⁵⁵ Appendix Duizings, Geschiedenis en berinnering in Oost-Bosnië.

⁴⁴⁵⁶ For a detailed list of the attacks, victims, suspected perpetrators and witnesses, see UN, A/48/177 en S/25835, Annex: Memorandum, p. 6.

⁴⁴⁵⁷ Nicole Lucas, 'Bosnische vice-president: "Kroaten hebben ons nodig"' (Bosnian vice-president: "The Croats need us."), Trouw, 23/02/93.

⁴⁴⁵⁸ Based on the MID Archives, Directorate of Operations, Dutch Army, Department of Intelligence and Security, Intelligence Division, Supintrep Enclave Srebrenica, no. 30370/4/021194, p. A-1 – for the murder of as many as seven people.

weapons, although it is doubtful whether the money and arms were always used for their original purpose, the defence of Muslims. Oric prepared for battle against the Serbs with 17 friends. Due to a combination of bravery and cruelty, at the start of hostilities Oric developed into a charismatic war hero who was in the vanguard of the attacks and division of any booty.⁴⁴⁵⁹ Although he was a master of ambush tactics, this did not make him a great strategist. In addition, he was no stranger to the idea that he could claim privileges in exchange for his valour. Initially, Oric was one of the local commanders of Srebrenica, and was primarily responsible for the northern section of the enclave. However, upon the insistence of the military leadership in Sarajevo and aided by his membership of the SDA, he soon acquired authority over the other commanders in Srebrenica. Despite achieving numerous military successes during the second half of 1992, Oric failed to link up with the Muslim area around Tuzla. In addition, he neglected to capture Bratunac, which would have enabled him to control a major supply route.

On 7 January 1993 Oric led a major attack of Muslims on Kravica during the Serbs' Christmas festivities. At the time the inhabitants of this Serbian village numbered 353 in total. 28 of them were killed, after which the place was reduced to rubble. This event was not noticed by the Western press at the time, unlike the attack on the Deputy Prime Minister, Turajlic, which occurred in Sarajevo almost simultaneously, where the representatives of the international media had assembled. At the end of January the Muslims of Srebrenica almost overran another Serbian village, Skelani. The area which the ABiH (the military forces of the Bosnian Muslims) held around Srebrenica, was now the largest it would become. After the Muslims of Srebrenica succeeded in establishing access to the Muslim area of Zepa, which was situated more to the south, in January they also managed to forge a line of communication with the enclave of Cerska to the west of Srebrenica. At that point in time the Muslim area of Eastern Bosnia was the largest it would ever be: approximately 900 square kilometres. The ABiH had advanced from various sides to within three kilometres of Bratunac.

The Serbian offensive in Eastern Bosnia and difficulties providing humanitarian aid

In the meantime, in October 1992 the VRS had launched an offensive against the Muslim enclave, which stretched from Cerska to Zepa and beyond at the time. This enclave and the one around Tuzla only allowed for a narrow opening near Zvornik for a line of communication between the Bosnian-Serb military forces and Serbia on the other side of the Drina. At the time units of the Yugoslavian army, the VJ, had joined the Serbian paramilitary forces in Bajina Basta on the Serbian side of the Drina. Targets within the area of Srebrenica were fired on from the slopes of the Tara mountains in Serbia.⁴⁴⁶⁰ The winter delayed the VRS offensive but in January it surged ahead with a massive attack on Konjevic Polje to the north of Srebrenica. This constituted part of the Bosnian-Serb plan to ensure that Eastern Bosnia would not become a Muslim area as provided for in the Vance-Owen plan. The Bosnian Serbs appeared to be bent on creating a situation which was to their advantage, and on presenting the international community with a fait accompli.⁴⁴⁶¹

Following heavy artillery bombardments the starving population in the Muslim enclaves were encouraged to evacuate to Tuzla through various corridors. As a result places such as Cerska, Konjevic Polje and Skelani fell to the Bosnian Serbs at the beginning of February. Thousands of Muslims did indeed avail themselves of this opportunity to make good their escape. At the same time Karadzic called for referendums to be held in the area along the Bosnian-Serb border marked by the Drina River to examine whether they wished to be part of the Muslim area or that of the Serbs.⁴⁴⁶² Other residents ⁴⁴⁵⁹ Amongst other things, interview P. Koring, 05/07/00.

⁴⁴⁶⁰ Cekic, Aggression, pp. 276-77.

⁴⁴⁶¹ 'Bosniërs wijzigen in de Drina-vallei de kaart van Vance en Owen' (Bosnians change the map of Vance and Owen in the Drina valley), de Volkskrant, 06/02/93; F. Westerman, 'Serviërs proberen door zuiveringen plan te wijzigen' (Serbs try to change plan through ethnic cleansing), de Volkskrant, 10/02/93.

⁴⁴⁶² "'Etnische zuiveringen' Bosnië op andere leest" (Ethnic cleansing? Bosnia on different lines), Trouw, 08/02/93.

of the Muslim villages that had been captured, fled to Srebrenica, with the result that the number of inhabitants of that town rose drastically.

Humanitarian conditions in Eastern Bosnia were appalling. Every day dozens of people perished from starvation and cold in Cerska, Gorazde, Srebrenica and Zepa. According to the Bosnian ambassador to the UN, signs of cannibalism had even been observed, although the UNHCR refuted this allegation as an example of 'the growing hysteria'.⁴⁴⁶³

In the meantime, Ogata, the High Commissioner for Refugees, had repeatedly sought attention for the extremely difficult circumstances in which aid had to be provided. On 15 January she appealed to Boutros-Ghali in the form of a letter in which she pointed out that the Bosnian-Serb authorities were denying access to the convoys, while the Bosnian government was adopting an increasingly critical attitude towards aid, because they viewed it as an obstacle to military intervention.⁴⁴⁶⁴ At the end of January the UNHCR had to halt all convoys to Sarajevo from the Dalmatian coast, because the Bosnian-Croat forces were stopping trucks loaded with aid supplies for the Muslims in Central Bosnia. At the end of January Ogata was given an undertaking by Cosic, Milosevic, Tudjman, Izetbegovic, Karadzic and Boban that they would do all in their power to allow the aid convoys through.⁴⁴⁶⁵ This had hardly any effect. Despite daily efforts to reach the eastern enclaves, no aid convoy had succeeded in reaching Gorazde since 19 January. In Zepa this had not happened since 17 January and the inhabitants of Srebrenica had not seen a convoy since 10 December 1992.⁴⁴⁶⁶

In mid-February the authorities in Sarajevo and Tuzla prohibited the distribution of aid supplies in these two cities 'in solidarity' as long as the Bosnian Serbs prevented the trucks carrying aid supplies from getting through to Cerska and Gorazde in Eastern Bosnia.⁴⁴⁶⁷ The action taken in Sarajevo was said to be a concession to a delegation from Srebrenica, who had demanded that the authorities in Sarajevo should draw the world's attention to the suffering in Srebrenica by killing a Serb in Sarajevo for every death in Srebrenica. The Bosnian government did not wish to go as far as that. It viewed the denial of food to its own population as a 'second-best' solution.⁴⁴⁶⁸

In the meantime the UN threatened to halt aid to the Bosnian Serbs if they failed to allow convoys through to the eastern enclaves. However, the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republika Srpska, Todor Dutina, stated that the Serbs could not permit Eastern Bosnia to belong to the Muslims.⁴⁴⁶⁹ The Serbian press agency, Tanjug, was of the opinion that the aid went to the Muslim fighters in the enclaves instead of the residents. It suggested that it was difficult to accept that the survivors of Muslim 'atrocities' should permit 'their future murderers' to be fed.⁴⁴⁷⁰

The refusal to allow the food convoys through was reason enough for Ogata to halt all aid to the Muslims on 17 February. In addition, she did not want convoys to wait for permission at ⁴⁴⁶³ 'Getergde VN staken hulp voor heel Bosnië' (Annoyed UN suspends aid to all of Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 18/02/93; 'VN zet hulp aan Bosnië toch voort' (UN nevertheless resumes aid to Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 18/02/93.

⁴⁴⁶⁴ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 15/01/93.

⁴⁴⁶⁵ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 02/02/93.

⁴⁴⁶⁶ See for example ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. UNHCR Updates on Ex-Yugoslavia, 2/02/93 and 12/02/93.

⁴⁴⁶⁷ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 15/93, 16/02/93; 'Pakhuizen overvol in Sarajevo' (Warehouses overflowing in Sarajevo), Trouw, 13/02/93; 'Serviërs houden hulp Oost-Bosnië tegen' (Serbians obstruct aid to Eastern Bosnia), Trouw, 15/02/93; 'Laatste bakkerij Sarajevo moet zijn deuren sluiten' (Last bakery in Sarajevo forced to close), Trouw, 16/02/93; 'Bewoners Sarajevo achter boycot VN-hulp' (Sarajevo residents back UN aid boycott), Trouw, 17/02/93; 'Nieuw dieptepunt Bosnië: spelletje met voedselhulp' (New deterioration in Bosnia: Food aid games), Trouw, 19/02/93; 'Serviërs blijven voedselhulp voor moslims tegenhouden' (Serbians continue to obstruct food aid for Muslims), de Telegraaf, 15/02/93; 'VN woedend over cynisch spel met hulpgoederen voor Bosnië', (UN angry about cynical games with aid for Bosnia) de Telegraaf, 17/02/93; 'Moslims in de aanval in Sarajevo' (Muslims on the attack in Sarajevo), de Volkskrant, 12/02/93; 'Hulpkonvooi voor Moslims opnieuw tegengehouden' (Aid convoy for Muslims obstructed again), de Volkskrant, 16/02/93.

⁴⁴⁶⁸ Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 168; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 179.

⁴⁴⁶⁹ 'Serviërs willen oosten van Bosnië niet opgeven' (Serbians do not wish to abandon Eastern Bosnia), ANP, 15/02/93, 15:06; 'Moslim-enclave blijft van hulp verstoken' (Muslim enclave continues to be denied aid), de Telegraaf, 16/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷⁰ Ibid.

roadblocks for days on end. The constant political obstacles to the provision of humanitarian aid were a thorn in her flesh. Two stranded UNHCR convoys that had been denied access to Cerska and Gorazde, returned. A convoy that was ready to travel to Zepa, did not leave.⁴⁴⁷¹

By taking this action Ogata astounded friend and foe alike. In a response to Ogata's decision, Morillon, who showed himself to be increasingly annoyed by the powerlessness of the peacekeeping troops, announced that UNPROFOR would then send its own convoy to the Muslims in Gorazde. He immediately left for Rogatica to negotiate with the Bosnian Serbs in order to secure the removal of the roadblocks en route to the Eastern Bosnian enclave.⁴⁴⁷² However, UN headquarters in New York wanted him to remain detached⁴⁴⁷³ and Morillon was overruled by Wahlgren.⁴⁴⁷⁴ The Security Council was piqued because it felt that the decision which Ogata had taken, fell within the council's prerogative and not that of the UNHCR.⁴⁴⁷⁵ Biegman, the Netherlands' Permanent Representative at the UN, termed it 'somewhat absurd' that the hunger strike in Sarajevo referred to in Ogata's statement was treated the same as the Serbs' months-long refusal to allow food through to Eastern Bosnia, a policy which amounted to enforced starvation in the areas that the Serbs did not yet hold: "It is an illustration of the ineradicable even-handedness that is adopted towards the aggressors and the victims, as well as towards the Croats and other profiteers in this conflict."⁴⁴⁷⁶ Izetbegovic responded to Ogata's decision to halt aid by asking the American government to airlift supplies to the Muslim towns that were surrounded.⁴⁴⁷⁷ In addition, he decided to boycott the peace negotiations in New York for as long as Bosnia did not receive any supplies.⁴⁴⁷⁸

Boutros-Ghali found it necessary to overturn Ogata's decision publicly.⁴⁴⁷⁹ On 21 February Ogata announced that aid convoys would be resumed after she had received guarantees from all three warring factions in Bosnia that they would no longer obstruct them.⁴⁴⁸⁰

The attitude adopted by the authorities in Sarajevo and the decision subsequently taken by Ogata had had an impact in the meantime.⁴⁴⁸¹ On 21 February a convoy was allowed into Zepa for the second time since the outbreak of war in Bosnia.⁴⁴⁸² The American government also decided to airlift supplies to the eastern enclaves, an operation which commenced on 28 February. The European Community felt overwhelmed by the rapid action taken by the Americans and initially failed to make any actual response. It was only a month later that French aircraft also began to participate in the food drops.

In its main editorial comment the Dutch morning newspaper, Trouw, complained that the Western European countries, 'are not moving a finger, that is to say they are not making any aircraft ⁴⁴⁷¹ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. UNHCR Update on ex-Yugoslavia, 17/02/93; Boddens Hosang 176 to Kooijmans, 17/02/93; Hollingworth, Christmas, pp.166-168.

⁴⁴⁷² 'Flüchtlingskommissariat zieht Konvois Anet Bleich, Kontroverse in der UNO über Bosnien', Süddeutsche Zeitung, 19/02/93; John F. Burns, 'Bosnia Cheering Decision by U.N. to Resume Aid', The New York Times, 20/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷³ Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 166.

⁴⁴⁷⁴ Minear et al, Action, p. 88.

⁴⁴⁷⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Biegman 148 to Kooijmans, 17/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Biegman 148 to Kooijmans, 17/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷⁷ 'Voor VN-helpers in Bosnië is grote wachten begonnen' (Long wait has started for UN helpers in Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 19/02/93; 'VS gekant tegen opschorten hulp' (US opposes suspension of aid), Trouw, 19/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷⁸ 'VN-chef gelast hervatting hulpoperaties in Bosnië' (UN chief orders resumption of aid operations in Bosnia), de Telegraaf, 20/02/93.

⁴⁴⁷⁹ 'VN-chef gelast hervatting hulpoperaties in Bosnië', de Telegraaf, 20/02/93; 'VN-chef haalt uit naar Japanse.

Hulpoperaties voor ex-Joegoslavië moeten worden hervat' (UN chief lashes out at Japanese woman: Aid operations for the former Yugoslavia must be resumed), Trouw, 20/02/93; Susan Chira, 'Japanese Diplomat Puts Refugees Before Politics', The New York Times, 07/04/93.

⁴⁴⁸⁰ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. UNHCR Update on ex-Yugoslavia, 21/02/93.

⁴⁴⁸¹ Ejub Ganic: "It was the only way we could show solidarity. Moreover, the world needed to be woken up again." That happened he concluded with satisfaction...., Nicole Lucas, 'Bosnische vice-president: "Kroaten hebben ons nodig"', Trouw, 23/02/93.

⁴⁴⁸² The previous convoy had reached the town in mid-January 1993.

available to participate in this operation'.⁴⁴⁸³ The VVD (Liberals) member, Weisglas, felt it was a 'shameful situation' for the Americans to pull the chestnuts from the fire in Europe. For this reason, his parliamentary party – like that of the PvdA and the CDA – supported the proposal presented by Ministers Kooijmans and Ter Beek to support the American food drops with F-16s, although the members of parliament would have preferred to see the convoys on the ground breach the barricades with firepower.⁴⁴⁸⁴ A spokesman for the Defence Department stated that it would be possible to deploy the F-16s almost immediately: 'If the Americans say that they wish to commence the food drops in several days' time, we will be able to get involved straightaway'.⁴⁴⁸⁵ Washington immediately declined the offer.⁴⁴⁸⁶ Following a discussion with Boutros-Ghali, Clinton made it clear that this was to be solely a humanitarian operation and that the transport planes would not be escorted by fighter aircraft. The Bosnian-Serb leaders had undertaken not to attack these planes.⁴⁴⁸⁷

This rejection was painful for the Dutch government, which had already been turned down on two previous occasions when it had offered F-16s (at the time of the Gulf War and after the announcement of the flight ban). After all, the drops, only 30% of which reached their target,⁴⁴⁸⁸ were mainly intended to serve a symbolic purpose: they were to break the blockade of ground transport imposed by the Bosnian Serbs.⁴⁴⁸⁹

On 2 March, several days after the food drops had commenced, the VRS captured one of the areas for which they were intended, the enclave of Cerska, following a siege of ten months. According to some commentators, the Serbian triumph was due to the fact that the Muslim troops had deserted their posts to go in search of the food parcels that had been dropped.⁴⁴⁹⁰ After the fall of Konjevic Polje and Cerska at the beginning of March 1993, Srebrenica was virtually cut off from the outside world. As a result of ethnic cleansing in 1992 and the Bosnian-Serb offensive conducted from the autumn of that year, Muslims from Zvornik, Bijeljina, Visegrad, Bratunac, Vlasenica, Konjevic Polje, Cerska and numerous other nearby settlements fled to Srebrenica and Potocari, which boosted their original population by several tens of thousand. Consequently, there was a severe shortage of food while sanitary conditions deteriorated rapidly. The British doctor, Simon Mardel, an aid worker with the World Health Organization (WHO), who managed to reach Srebrenica on 6 March, reported that at least two thousand of the people there were sick or wounded. The last convoy to reach the enclave had arrived on 10 December. Every day forty people were said to be dying and about nine hundred children were reported to be living on the streets with their parents. According to Mardel, the situation could easily withstand comparison with countries such as Afghanistan, Ethiopia and Liberia. He saw families who had not eaten for an entire week. 'Children lay without stirring. Parents were indifferent.'⁴⁴⁹¹ He felt ⁴⁴⁸³ 'Absurde beelden' (Absurd images), Trouw, 02/03/93.

⁴⁴⁸⁴ De Kok and Valk on Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en Nu (Here and Now), 23/02/93, 1.10 pm; 'Kamer positief over aanbod Kooijmans en Ter Beek. Onze F16's naar Bosnië als steun voedseldroppings' (Parliament positive about the Kooijmans and Ter Beek offer: Send our F-16s to Bosnia to support food drops), de Telegraaf, ong. 23-25/02/93.

⁴⁴⁸⁵ 'Verdeelde reacties op plan VS voor droppen voedsel boven Bosnië' (Mixed response to US plan to drop food over Bosnia), Trouw, 24/02/93. See also 'Nederland wil voedseldroppings met F-16's steunen' (The Netherlands wishes to support food drops with F-16s), ANP 23/02/93, 4:08 pm.

⁴⁴⁸⁶ 'Kans op inzet Nederlandse F-16's in Bosnië uiterst klein' (Extremely small chance of Dutch F-16s being deployed in Bosnia), ANP, 24/02/93, 5:55 pm; 'Geen bijdrage NAVO-partners aan voedseldroppings VS' (No contribution from NATO allies to US food drops), ANP, 26/02/93, 3.47 pm.

⁴⁴⁸⁷ 'Voedseldroppen boven Bosnië wordt riskant voor vliegtuigen' (Food drops over Bosnia will be risky for aircraft), Trouw, 25/02/93; Theo Koelé, 'Vlag met Navo-ster wappert nog lang niet boven Bosnië', Trouw, 26/02/93.

⁴⁴⁸⁸ 'Moslims mogen uit Cerska. Karadzic neemt verholen driegement over terrorisme terug' (Muslims may leave Cerska: Karadzic retracts disguised threat of terrorism), Trouw, 05/03/93.

⁴⁴⁸⁹ American Defence Secretary, Les Aspen, quoted in 'Serviërs veroveren Cerska en eisen ontwapening moslims' (Serbs capture Cerska and demand that Muslims be disarmed), de Telegraaf, 03/03/93.

⁴⁴⁹⁰ 'Moslims slaan weer massaal op de vlucht' (Muslims flee again en masse), De Telegraaf, 04/03/93.

⁴⁴⁹¹ 'Wanhopige Moslims tot alles bereid om Srebrenica te verlaten' (Desperate Muslims prepared to do anything to leave Srebrenica), ANP, 31/03/93, 2.10 pm; 'VN-commandant wekt woede van Bosniërs' (UN commander raises Bosnian ire), de Telegraaf, 08/03/93; "'Geen massamoorden in Cerska.' Bosniërs woedend over snelle conclusie VN-commandant' ('No the situation in Srebrenica was worse than what he had seen during civil wars in other parts of the world. According to him, some people even resorted to eating hay in order to stay alive.⁴⁴⁹² A special aid convoy that sought to evacuate a hundred heavily wounded people from Srebrenica, were, however, refused access to the enclave on 9 March.⁴⁴⁹³

In the meantime the VRS attacked Srebrenica. In doing so, the Bosnian-Serb army received support from the border town of Bajina Basta in Serbia. There eye witnesses saw the movement of large numbers of tanks, armoured vehicles, artillery, missiles, aircraft and helicopters, and they reported the involvement of the Titove Uzice and Valjevo Corps, both from Serbia. The operation was headed by General Ojdanic, the commander of the Uzice Corps.⁴⁴⁹⁴ At the same time Seselj's Cetniks led by Branislav Vukic advanced on Srebrenica from Skelani with the support of the MUP (Serbian Ministry of the Interior) official, 'Badza' Stojicic. Early in 1992 they had undergone training at the military base of Bubanj Potok near Belgrade and were later transferred to a new base at Bajina Basta, just on the Serbian side of the Drina close to Bratunac and Srebrenica. There they received further training from Frank ('Frenki') Simatovic from the Serbian Ministry of the Interior, who was stationed there with his own special troops. The Cetniks from Seselj were equipped with the best weapons that they had had until now: mortars, machine guns and sniper rifles fitted with night vision devices, after which Simatovic led them in strikes against the Muslims of Srebrenica. Arkan's Tigers were also active in this area.⁴⁴⁹⁵ An attempt made by the Bosnian government to do something about the precarious position of the Muslim fighters around Srebrenica failed when a convoy carrying thousands of Milan anti-tank missiles, which had been procured in Malaysia, was confiscated by Croat troops as part of the struggle that had broken out between Croats and Muslims in Central Bosnia.⁴⁴⁹⁶

On 11 March Owen and Vance held a five-hour meeting with Milosevic in Paris under the auspices of Mitterrand and Dumas. It was made clear to Milosevic that acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan could ensure that Serbia would regain a worthy place within the European community of states. On the other hand, its rejection would result in far-reaching sanctions and isolation. It became clear to his discussion partners that Milosevic was more impressed by economic than political arguments, and was easier to move in relation to Krajina than Bosnia-Herzegovina. Nevertheless, he finally promised that he would ask Karadzic, Mladic and Koljevic to go to New York for discussions on 14 March.⁴⁴⁹⁷ However, once he had returned from Paris, Milosevic noted that Karadzic had major objections to Mladic participating in the discussions in New York.⁴⁴⁹⁸ Mladic himself would have liked to go to New York, because he personally wanted to see what happened around the negotiating table to what he had achieved by military means. When Karadzic refused to take Mladic with him, the latter decided – according to his own account – to torpedo the negotiations with a fierce attack on Srebrenica.⁴⁴⁹⁹ mass murder in Cerska': Bosnians furious about UN commander's rapid conclusion), Trouw, 08/03/93; Holligworth, Christmas, pp. 174 and 178-83.

⁴⁴⁹² 'Evacuatie per helikopter uit Srebrenica' (Helicopter evacuation from Srebrenica), De Telegraaf, 15/03/93.

⁴⁴⁹³ 'Cosic Een multinationaal Bosnië zal kansloos zijn' (Cosic: A multinational Bosnia will not have a chance), De Telegraaf, 10/03/93.

⁴⁴⁹⁴ Comment by Senad Avdic, editor of Slobodna Bosna, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 08/03/93; Ekrem Abdic in a report from Tuzla for Croat radio, ibid, 11/03/93; interview N. Mujkanovic, 20/05/1999; Williams and Cigar, War Crimes, VB.1; Cekic, Aggression, pp. 277-78.

⁴⁴⁹⁵ Jonathan S. Landay, 'Belgrade Regime Tied to Alleged War Crimes', The Christian Science Monitor, 26/11/93; Julian Borger, 'Inside Story: The President's Secret Henchmen', The Guardian (London), 03/02/97; Williams & Cigar, War Crimes, III.B.2.

⁴⁴⁹⁶ John Pomfret and David B. Ottaway, 'U.S. Allies Fed Pipeline of Covert Arms to Bosnia', The Washington Post, 12/05/1996.

⁴⁴⁹⁷ Owen CD-ROM, note by Lord Owen's private secretary on co-chairmen's meeting with President Milosevic, Paris, 11/03/93; ibid, Lord Owen's assessment of the meeting in Paris on 11/03/93 with President Mitterrand and President Milosevic for the British Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, z.d.; ABZ, DPV/ARA/02050. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 12/03/93, cpe/pres/cop 570.

⁴⁴⁹⁸ Owen CD-ROM, Lord Owen's note of co-chairmen's meeting with P5 Ambassadors, New York, 16/03/93.

⁴⁴⁹⁹ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 170.

Finally, an instant hero

After the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) in New York asked Morillon for information about the gravity of the situation in Srebrenica, the French general decided to investigate the situation personally.⁴⁵⁰⁰ He took UNHCR personnel along with him to survey the refugee situation, MSF (Médecins sans Frontières) staff to inspect the hospitals, two American soldiers to visit the places where food was dropped, five Canadian soldiers, two of his closest aides, and four UNMO (United Nations Military Observer) officials to inspect the security situation.⁴⁵⁰¹

Various stories later did the rounds as to Morillon's motives for visiting Srebrenica. Anonymous UN officials alleged that Morillon had decided to go to Srebrenica to get back at Ogata, who had previously suspended aid operations to Eastern and Central Bosnia. Morillon himself denied this.⁴⁵⁰² Furthermore, in the briefing given by Ogata to the Security Council on 11 March, one does not get the impression that there was any rivalry between UNHCR and UNPROFOR in relation to this concrete issue. There Ogata declared that Karadzic had promised her several times in the preceding weeks to grant UNHCR access to Konjevic Polje and Srebrenica in order to evacuate the wounded and other vulnerable categories of people from there. However, whenever negotiations occurred in the field new conditions were imposed which were unacceptable to UNHCR, such as the exchange of ethnic groups. In addition, Ogata stated that UNPROFOR could make some of UNHCR's tasks easier, especially in Eastern Bosnia.⁴⁵⁰³

Soon after his arrival in Bosnia in October 1992, Morillon had interpreted his duties to include the creation of conditions for the implementation of a peace plan in addition to providing support for humanitarian aid. He believed that in principle it would be necessary to end the siege of various areas in order to achieve this, as well as to restore the free movement of people and goods. However, according to Morillon, the most important reason for his mission was to counter any new ethnic cleansing, because this would raise obstacles for negotiations about the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁵⁰⁴ For some time now ⁴⁵⁰⁰ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

⁴⁵⁰¹ Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 188.

⁴⁵⁰² Morillon, Credo, p. 132; Ed Vulliamy, 'Only passivity is dishonourable', The Guardian, 12/01/96.

⁴⁵⁰³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Statement by Ogata to the Security Council, 11/03/93, accompanying PV New York to DPV/PZ et al, 12/03/93, fax no. 2767.

⁴⁵⁰⁴ Morillon, Credo, p. 132; Ed Vulliamy, 'Only passivity is dishonourable', The Guardian, 12/01/96; Janine di Giovanni, 'Morillon takes flak in his finest hour', The Times, 04/04/93; 'Morillon mag in Bosnië blijven' (Morillon is allowed to stay in Bosnia), ANP, 18/04/93, 9.52 pm; Morillon, Credo, pp. 138-40; idem, Paroles, p. 75.

he had been annoyed by the objections which the Bosnian Serbs raised against the provision of humanitarian supplies to Srebrenica and Zepa. He felt that this discredited UNHCR and UNPROFOR in the eyes of the Bosnian government.⁴⁵⁰⁵ Based on the map that was part of the Vance-Owen plan, the Eastern enclaves were situated in a Muslim province. If the VRS were to succeed in overrunning Srebrenica and the two other enclaves of Zepa and Gorazde, there would be a danger that there would no longer be any prospect of implementing the Vance-Owen plan. Moreover, the plan was based on the principle that everyone should be able to live where he would like to. However, Mladic seemed intent on transforming the west bank of the Drina into a homogenous Serbian territory.

On 11 March Morillon arrived in Srebrenica with his small band following difficult negotiations with the Serbian commanders in Zvornik to allow himself and an aid convoy through.⁴⁵⁰⁶ Morillon was only able to continue travelling to Bratunac and Srebrenica after calling on assistance from the Yugoslavian president, Cosic.⁴⁵⁰⁷ Once Morillon had familiarised himself with the situation in Srebrenica and wanted to leave, a crowd of Muslims, mainly women, prevented him from doing so. They demanded protection against the Serbian offensive and the arrival of humanitarian aid.⁴⁵⁰⁸ This abduction was almost a repeat of what had occurred a few days earlier in Konjevic Polje, when several British UN soldiers had been held for a day by angry Muslims because, after consulting the Serbs, they had only been prepared to evacuate women and children and not also the wounded men. According to some sources, the abduction had been called for by Murat Efendic, a former mayor of Srebrenica, who now lived in Sarajevo and maintained radio contact with his former place of residence.⁴⁵⁰⁹ Kumar points to Ejub Ganic as the person who issued the instructions but incidentally does not cite a source for this.⁴⁵¹⁰ According to yet another source, the decision was taken by Oric and the Opstina.⁴⁵¹¹ Morillon himself believes that Naser Oric had been ordered by Sarajevo to hold him. However, he does not mention the identity of the person in Sarajevo who gave the command.⁴⁵¹²

It is a fact that the government in Sarajevo and the military authorities in Tuzla found it difficult to accept that, by agreeing to the evacuation of Muslims from the eastern areas, the Bosnian Serbs would still manage to perpetrate ethnic cleansing. When the Serbian authorities had opened a so-called 'one-way humanitarian corridor' from Cerska at the beginning of February, thousands of people used it to flee to Tuzla. The place fell shortly afterwards. Apparently, the morale of the fighters who remained behind, weakened as soon as the women and children had left.

The Bosnian government was undoubtedly aware that the evacuation of Muslims who were in danger, had since become a deliberate policy on the part of the UNHCR. Following the fall of Cerska, on 2 March Ogata wrote to Boutros-Ghali stating that it was not enough to provide on-site aid to the victims of ethnic cleansing. In view of the fact that Srebrenica and villages around Cerska were also on the point of falling, a concerted effort was required to evacuate people to the area around Tuzla, 'which would appear to be the only remaining "Safe Area" for the Bosnian Muslim people in the region', ⁴⁵⁰⁵ Morillon, Croire, pp. 132-133.

⁴⁵⁰⁶ For a report of the discussions held on 10 March see the annex to the interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

⁴⁵⁰⁷ UN Archives, no. 87305, DFC, 3300 – Srebrenica, vol. 2, Mar 93, R. Denyft, 'Special report on situation in Srebrenica area', z.d., appendix to, Wahlgren to Annan, 15/03/93, UNPROFOR-Z-327.

⁴⁵⁰⁸ There are many reports and accounts of Morillon's abduction. See for example Morillon, Croire, pp. 172-73; CRST. Col. P. Leentjes (BH Comd Main Kiseljak to LN Der Zagreb, 12/03/93, 22200, Special sitrep Srebrenica 122200A Mar 93; UMYNY, DPKO, Coded Cables UNPROFOR, Wahlgren to Annan, 13/03/93, UNPROFOR Z-321, Special report on Gen Morillon's situation in Srebrenica; ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 - /04/93, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 20/93, 17/03/93; Morillon, Credo, pp. 112-13; McCarthy, Fall, p.33 and p. 111; Honig and Both, Srebrenica, pp. 128-31; Henk Steenhuis, 'Philippe Morillon', HP/De Tijd, 21/05/93, p. 24; Hren (ed.), Srebrenica, p. 254; Hollingworth, Christmas, pp. 195-98.

⁴⁵⁰⁹ Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 214.

⁴⁵¹⁰ Kumar, Divide, p. 62.

⁴⁵¹¹ Interview N. Mujkanovic, 20/05/99.

⁴⁵¹² Morillon, Paroles, p. 75; Ed Vullima, 'Only passivity is dishonourable', The Guardian, 12/01/96.

according to Ogata.⁴⁵¹³ The Bosnian authorities should therefore take action to prevent Srebrenica from suffering the same fate as Cerska.

Being the strategist he was, Morillon followed up an unsuccessful attempt to escape at night⁴⁵¹⁴ by deciding to make a virtue of necessity. He let it be known that he was staying in the town of his own volition in order to boost the inhabitants' morale and to secure the arrival of the aid convoy. He proclaimed Srebrenica to be a protected UN area and demanded that the Bosnian-Serb army allow the wounded to be evacuated.⁴⁵¹⁵ This action on the part of Morillon elicited praise in France and beyond. The media believed that it had finally discovered a white dove in a conflict teeming with scoundrels.⁴⁵¹⁶ It was briefly forgotten that heroism could not be reconciled with the appeasement implicit in the UNPROFOR operation. 'Now, at last, we know what is right and what is wrong,' a relieved Tony Barber wrote in The Independent.⁴⁵¹⁷ Morillon's act was probably no more than an attempt on his part to secure his own release. In this connection, he probably considered that the political damage caused by his statement could not be great, because the plan envisaged by Owen and Vance provided for Srebrenica to be part of a Muslim-dominated province.

Morillon reached an agreement with the combatants around Srebrenica for the evacuation of Muslims from Srebrenica to Tuzla in exchange for the similar treatment of Serbs in the Muslim-controlled town. In addition, he decided to remain in Srebrenica until the first aid convoy arrived, which could then be used to start the evacuation.

In the meantime neither the food drops nor Morillon's stay led to a reduction of Serbian military pressure on Srebrenica. On the contrary. On 18 March the VRS troops had advanced to five kilometres from the town and Serbia still prevented a convoy from reaching Srebrenica. On 18 March Izetbegovic announced in New York that he would not be participating in any peace talks as long as the Bosnian-Serb offensive continued against Srebrenica.

In these circumstances Ejub Ganic and Naser Oric presented Morillon with a proposal to make Srebrenica an open city protected by UNPROFOR. Morillon announced that he supported this. In this case the town would need to be demilitarized.⁴⁵¹⁸

On 19 March a convoy carrying 175 tonnes of aid and medicine managed to reach Srebrenica with Morillon at its head. Again the media sang General Morillon's praises.⁴⁵¹⁹ The Bosnian Muslims were now prepared to forgive him for what they had previously accused him of. 'Thank God for General Morillon,' said the Bosnian ambassador to the UN, Sacirbey. 'We have had many differences with him. But it seems that one man with a blue helmet has more commitment and guts than the entire ⁴⁵¹³ ABZ, PV New York, Joegoslavië/ algemeen, September 1991 – December 1995. Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 02/03/93, accompanying PV New York to DPV/PZ and DEU/OE, 03/03/93, fax no. 2571.

⁴⁵¹⁴ Morillon, Croire, pp. 173-74; interview N. Mujkanovic on 20/05/1999 and Lt. Colonel Burt Horn on 17/11/99.

⁴⁵¹⁵ Morillon, Croire, pp. 174-75; Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 198.

⁴⁵¹⁶ 'Steun Bosnië voor vredesplan. Serviërs willen hervatting vredesonderhandelingen uitstellen' (Support for Bosnian peace plan: Serbs want to postpone peace talks), Trouw, 15/03/93; 'VN-generaal in Bosnië is plots "een man met een missie" geworden' (UN general in Bosnia has suddenly become 'a man with a mission'), Trouw, 16/03/93; 'Evacuatie per helikopter uit Srebrenica', De Telegraaf, 15/03/93; 'VN-commandant beschermt in zijn eentje moslim-enclave' (UN commander protects Muslim enclave on his own), De Telegraaf, 16/03/93; 'Morillon, van potentate tot held' (Morillon: from potentate to hero), Het Parool, 16/03/93. See also the superlatives which the French press showered on Morillon as quoted in H. Steenhuis, 'Philippe Morillon', HP/De Tijd, 21/05/93, p. 24; Alan Riding, 'France Finds a Hero in Balkan Town', The New York Times, 20/03/93.

⁴⁵¹⁷ T. Barber, 'General Philippe Morillon – Bosnia, I am with you', The Independent, 21/03/93.

⁴⁵¹⁸ Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 133; UNPROFOR, Box 195, 2-5-2, Sitreps BH Command, Headquarters BH Command Kiseljak to UNPROFOR Headquarters in Zagreb, 18/03/93, 0240, Sirep for period 170001A to 172359A Mar 93; 'Morillon is de held van Srebrenica' (Morillon is the hero of Srebrenica), De Telegraaf, 20/03/93; 'Morillon zegeviert. VN-generaal brengt hongerend Srebrenica eten' (Morillon victorious: UN general takes food to starving Srebrenica), Trouw, 20/03/93.

⁴⁵¹⁹ 'Konvooi hulpgoederen bereikt Srebrenica' (Aid convoy reaches Srebrenica) and 'Morillon is de held van Srebrenica' (Morillon is the hero of Srebrenica), De Telegraaf, 20/03/93. See also the interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01; Tony Barber, 'General Philippe Morillon – Bosnia, I am with you', The Independent, 21/03/93.

United Nations.⁴⁵²⁰ Despite the euphoria UN observers wondered whether help had not arrived too late, because the town's fall appeared to be imminent.

A maligned hero

The outside world was not allowed to know that Morillon's heroic deed was occasioned by abduction. To many in the UN bureaucracy Morillon's actions therefore appeared to be more evidence of his intractability. Although Morillon had maintained radio contact with Kiseljak and through the headquarters there with Zagreb, Paris and New York while he was in Srebrenica,⁴⁵²¹ he had not in any way been authorised to proclaim the town a Safe Area.⁴⁵²² 'Personne d'autre que moi ne croyait à mes chances de succès,' he later wrote about his own actions following his abduction.⁴⁵²³ He also believed that he had saved the UN's honour 'en désobéissant à Srebrenica'.⁴⁵²⁴ If Morillon was not guilty of insubordination, at the very least he had exceeded his mandate.⁴⁵²⁵ At the beginning of 1996 he stated in a NOVA broadcast, 'It was my decision, because I was the only one in a position to take it. I was the only one who was familiar with the theatre, the actors, the situation, and in essence it was a logical part of my responsibilities as a commander in the field.'⁴⁵²⁶

Not everyone in the international community appreciated Morillon's initiative. Anonymous UN officials vented criticism and branded him as an unguided missile.⁴⁵²⁷ 'We would be able to contain our grief if he were to leave,' one of them remarked scornfully.⁴⁵²⁸ Another asserted that the religiously inclined general appeared to consult no one other than God before he undertook anything.⁴⁵²⁹ Boutros-Ghali is said to have personally reprimanded the general for 'exceeding his mandate'.⁴⁵³⁰ Morillon's act of proclaiming Srebrenica a 'safe area' had undermined the UNHCR's efforts to evacuate its inhabitants and the refugees who were there.⁴⁵³¹

Morillon's fellow officers in France were sharply divided about his actions. Some allowed him his sudden fame in the media, while others urged that he be replaced. The chiefs of staff in the military headquarters in Paris also held it against Morillon that he had failed to consult them. Their colleague's heroism appeared to irritate them and by acting as he did, he was said to have unintentionally exposed the shortcomings of the UN's operations. The French army leadership were therefore reported to have called for his replacement and to have even appointed one in the person of General Michel Zeisser, the commander of France's First Army in Metz.⁴⁵³² On 13 April the new French Minister of Defence, Léotard, announced that Morillon would be replaced at the end of April. According to Léotard, who had visited Morillon in Sarajevo several days before, this step should not be regarded as a punishment, yet the French minister also failed to provide a clear explanation for this sudden decision.⁴⁵³³ A day later, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, Alain Juppé, and the spokesperson of President ⁴⁵²⁰ T. Barber, 'General Philippe Morillon – Bosnia, I am with you', The Independent, 21/03/93.

⁴⁵²¹ Morillon, Croire, p. 186.

⁴⁵²² Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00; N. Mujkanovic, 20/05/99; M. Toholj, 14/12/99; L. Wahlgren, 03/06/99.

⁴⁵²³ Morillon, Credo, p. 113. See also ibid, p. 143.

⁴⁵²⁴ Morillon, Paroles, p. 45.

⁴⁵²⁵ Ibid, p. 48.

⁴⁵²⁶ NPS, NOVA, 16/01/96.

⁴⁵²⁷ Janine di Giovanni, 'Morillon takes flak in his finest hour', Sunday Times, 04/04/93; Stoltenberg & Eide, Dagene, pp. 82-83.

⁴⁵²⁸ Jonathan C. Randall, 'France Likely to Recall General Leading U.N. Troops in Bosnia', The Washington Post, 14/04/91.

⁴⁵²⁹ Jonathan C. Randall, 'France Likely to Recall General Leading U.N. Troops in Bosnia', The Washington Post, 14/04/91.

⁴⁵³⁰ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 169.

⁴⁵³¹ Claire Tréan, 'Le conflit dans l'ex-Yougoslavie et l'éventualité du départ du général Morillon.', Le Monde, 13/04/93.

⁴⁵³² Charles Bremmer, 'Morillon limelight irks French officers', The Times, 10/04/93; Claire Tréan, 'Le conflit dans l'ex-Yougoslavie et l'éventualité du départ du général Morillon.', Le Monde, 13/04/93; Sharon Waxman, 'France pulls UN general out of Bosnia', Chicago Tribune, 14/04/93; Patrick McDowell, 'Likely Recall of Heroic General Provokes Outcry', The Associated Press, 16/04/93.

⁴⁵³³ 'Parijs roept Morillon tegen eind/04/ terug' (Paris to recall Morillon at the end of/04/), ANP, 13/04/93, 5.30 pm.

Mitterrand, Muriel de Pierrebouurg, revealed that claims to the effect that the Serbs wanted Morillon recalled, were incorrect.⁴⁵³⁴

However, Morillon received support from various quarters. His predecessor, MacKenzie was outspoken in his view of the UN bureaucrats who had branded Morillon as an unguided missile: 'I don't know what they're smoking, but it has to be pretty good.'⁴⁵³⁵ He felt that Morillon was right to take food and medicine to the Eastern Bosnian town himself after others had failed to do so. Moreover, MacKenzie did not believe that Morillon had acted entirely on his own initiative. According to him, no French officer did such things: 'It would stretch my imagination beyond the realms of possibility to suggest he was operating entirely on his own'.⁴⁵³⁶

On 14 April Morillon received public support from Boutros-Ghali, who emphatically announced to the media that Morillon had remained within his mandate.⁴⁵³⁷ The former British Prime Minister, Thatcher, also came to Morillon's support, saying that he had finally offered a ray of hope and had provided leadership in the Bosnian war, in response to which Western governments had shown themselves to be so passive that she did not hesitate to refer to 'complicity in a new holocaust'.⁴⁵³⁸ Thatcher's statement struck a chord with the general public in Europe but not with the British Secretary of State for Defence, Malcolm Rifkind, who said that the West needed to 'guard against decisions prompted by emotions'.⁴⁵³⁹

Several days after the arrival of the first aid convoy in Srebrenica since December 1992, Izetbegovic wrote a letter to the European Community, in which he expressed the fear that the fall of Srebrenica would lead to the mass murder of its civilian population.⁴⁵⁴⁰ This was reason enough for the committee to propose that those UNPROFOR troops that were now in Srebrenica, should also remain there after the aid convoys had arrived.⁴⁵⁴¹ According to reports presented by Judith Kumin, the UNHCR head in Belgrade, which also reached the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Srebrenica had actually fallen and the enclaves of Zepa and Gorazde would soon share this fate. Kumin also anticipated a 'mass slaughter' in Srebrenica. Partly at the request of the UNHCR an attempt was therefore made to arrange a meeting between Morillon and Milosevic, who needed to be persuaded to ensure that Mladic and the local commanders moderated their actions. Van der Zwan, the head of the Political Affairs Department of the Directorate of UN Political Affairs in the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs, noted on this report, 'Mass slaughter forecast – what can be done?' An unknown person wrote underneath this, 'Pray!'⁴⁵⁴²

Evacuation or ethnic cleansing?

The trucks of the convoy that had entered Srebrenica on 19 March, were used to evacuate 674 wounded people the following day. This transport operation was chaotic. When the trucks were readied ⁴⁵³⁴ Michael Evans/James Bone, 'Morillon withdrawn for keeping too high a profile', The Times, 14/04/93; Sharon Waxman, 'France pulls UN general out of Bosnia', Chicago Tribune, 14/04/93.

⁴⁵³⁵ Alan Ferguson, 'MacKenzie blasts U.N. over recall of his successor', The Toronto Star, 15/04/93.

⁴⁵³⁶ Alan Ferguson, 'MacKenzie blasts U.N. over recall of his successor', The Toronto Star, 15/04/93.

⁴⁵³⁷ Hugh Nevill, 'M. Boutros-Ghali: 'le général Morillon a agi en conformité avec les résolutions de l'ONU'', Agence France Presse, 14/04/93.

⁴⁵³⁸ 'Internationale bemoeienis wijzigt verloop Bosnische oorlog niet' (International intervention is not changing the course of the Bosnian war), ANP, 16/04/93, 6.37 pm; Hugh Nevill, "M. Boutros-Ghali: 'le général Morillon a agi en conformité avec les résolutions de l'ONU'", Agence France Presse, 14/04/93; Patrick McDowell, 'Likely Recall of Heroic General Provokes Outcry', The Associated Press, 16/04/93.

⁴⁵³⁹ 'Tumult over kritiek Thatcher op optreden Westen in Bosnië' (Uproar following Thatcher's criticism of the West's actions in Bosnia), ANP, 14/04/93, 3.11 pm.

⁴⁵⁴⁰ ABZ, Communications archives. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 24/03/93, cpe/pres/cop 653. This letter is also referred to in ABZ, 345169, COREU message from the European Commission, 24/03/93, cpe/cee 135.

⁴⁵⁴¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. COREU message from the European Commission, 24/03/93, cpe/cee 135.

⁴⁵⁴² ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Engels 83 to Kooijmans, 25/03/93.

for departure, people fought for places on them. UN staff could not contain the frenzied advance of the crowd. As a result of this chaos, the UNHCR was only able to take 40 of the 97 wounded people who should have been given priority during the evacuation.⁴⁵⁴³

An attempt to evacuate sick and wounded Muslim civilians from Srebrenica by helicopter was disrupted on 24 March when Bosnian Serb mortars fell on the landing strip. Three people were killed and six wounded, including two Canadian peacekeepers.⁴⁵⁴⁴ The Serbs refused to allow a French mobile hospital access to the enclave. Mortar fire resumed from the Tara and Zvijezda mountains in Serbia, amongst other places.

As a result of the VRS' escalating attacks on the Muslim enclave, the capture of Srebrenica appeared to be imminent.⁴⁵⁴⁵ The situation was all the more dangerous as both Serbia and Srpska seemed to have little concern for international opinion. Prominent Serbian leaders continued to declare with undiminished vigour that they did not want a Muslim-controlled area in Eastern Bosnia on their border. In the first half of April the Speaker of the Serbian parliament, Lilic, paid a visit to the Serbian area on the other side of the Drina opposite Srebrenica and fiercely condemned the Bosnian Muslims who were said to be firing on Serbian territory, a statement that appeared to legitimise Yugoslavia's growing involvement in the military struggle in Eastern Bosnia.⁴⁵⁴⁶ Yugoslavian officers openly conceded that armoured and reconnaissance units of the VJ had crossed the border between Bosnia and Serbia and had provided direct support to the VRS in Eastern Bosnia, because Serbia could not tolerate a Muslim-dominated area along its border as envisaged in the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁵⁴⁷

In the meantime the peace talks conducted under the guidance of Owen and Vance between the Bosnian parties in New York were becoming seriously bogged down by developments around Srebrenica. Izetbegovic, who wrote that he feared a mass murder if Srebrenica were to fall, refused to speak to Karadzic. He confined himself to his hotel room and refused to participate in substantive negotiations until the Bosnian Serbs halted their offensive in Eastern Bosnia and Sarajevo.⁴⁵⁴⁸ This threatened to jeopardise the attempt of Vance and Owen to persuade the Muslims to accept their plan, as the Croats had previously done, after which it would be possible to impose the peace plan on the Serbs.⁴⁵⁴⁹

On 25 March Izetbegovic signed the comprehensive Vance-Owen plan, including the map and interim arrangements, albeit under considerable American pressure. However, he indicated that he would withdraw his signature if the Serbs failed to sign it as well. At the press conference which followed, Izetbegovic declared that he was not enthusiastic about the peace plan but other solutions would be even worse. He appeared to have abandoned the hope that the international community would sanction a military intervention in support of his government. The Bosnian president told the journalists that, having lost his trust in the rest of the international community, he still had unswerving faith in the good will and influence of the American government in Washington. Izetbegovic stated that ⁴⁵⁴³ Hollingworth, Christmas, pp. 211-13.

⁴⁵⁴⁴ 'Navo-plan voor vliegverbod af' (NATO plan for flight ban abandoned), Trouw, 25/03/93.

⁴⁵⁴⁵ cf. ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 22/93, 25/03/93.

⁴⁵⁴⁶ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 26/93, 15/04/93.

⁴⁵⁴⁷ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 24/93, 05/04/93. cf. ibid 26/93, 15/04/93.

⁴⁵⁴⁸ 'Woedende Karadzic verlaat vredesoverleg' (Furious Karadzic leaves peace talks), ANP, 24/03/93, 1.45am; 'Verwarring rond vredesoverleg Bosnië in New York' (Confusion surrounds Bosnian peace talks in New York), ANP, 24/03/93, 6.34 am; ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 21/92, 22/03/93 and 22/93, 25/03/93.

⁴⁵⁴⁹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 21/92, 22/03/93.

he had been assured by the Washington administration that the international arms embargo of his country would be lifted if Serbian aggression did not cease.⁴⁵⁵⁰

Almost immediately after Izetbegovic had signed the plan, the Security Council called on the Bosnian Serbs to sign it as well 'without delay' and 'with immediate effect' to cease 'the violence, military campaigns, ethnic cleansing and the obstruction of humanitarian convoys in Bosnia-Herzegovina'. The Council held up the prospect of 'taking the necessary steps that will be required to achieve a final peace settlement'. Christopher announced that, if the Serbs were to refuse, the American government would press for far-reaching UN economic sanctions against Serbia, such as cutting off its lines of transport, freezing its financial assets, and confiscating any means of conveyance which violated existing sanctions.⁴⁵⁵¹ The governments in London and Paris endorsed this objective immediately.⁴⁵⁵²

Following Milosevic's intervention, on 26 March Morillon reached agreement with Karadzic and Mladic concerning a ceasefire in Eastern Bosnia and the evacuation of all Muslims who wanted to, subject to the condition that they leave their arms behind.⁴⁵⁵³ After this it would be possible to start transporting people from Srebrenica to Tuzla. On 28 March a ceasefire came into effect throughout Bosnia.

On 29 March 20 trucks which had earlier delivered food and medicine to Srebrenica, were to take approximately 2,300 people from this place to Tuzla, being mainly women, children and the wounded. Upon their arrival it appeared that a number of those evacuated had suffocated to death.⁴⁵⁵⁴ Two days later another 2,000 people arrived in Tuzla. Again people died during the journey. Two children were trampled in Srebrenica when people stormed the trucks as they stood ready to leave. Although five ABiH soldiers were stationed on each truck before their departure, they were unable to prevent people from storming the empty trucks. Mothers who had lost hope of leaving themselves, threw their children on the trucks. At least four people died on the way.⁴⁵⁵⁵

Following the arrival of this convoy, the Second Corps in Tuzla announced that further evacuations were contrary to their military objectives.⁴⁵⁵⁶ According to these authorities, evacuation amounted to complicity in ethnic cleansing.⁴⁵⁵⁷ Moreover, the enclave gave the Bosnian government some leverage over the international community. Finally, the presence of Muslim troops in the enclave put pressure on the Bosnian-Serb front. The Bosnian authorities seemed prepared to put up with the fact that this meant that they were holding their own people in the enclave against their will. Abdulah Sabic, intelligence officer of the Second Corps, is reported to have said, 'We are prepared to sacrifice these people.'⁴⁵⁵⁸ In the future the trucks, which took food and medicine, were to return empty from Srebrenica. For his part, on 1 April Mladic informed the UNHCR that he was only prepared to permit ⁴⁵⁵⁰ 'VS dreigen Serviërs te isoleren' (US threatens to isolate Serbs), ANP, 26/03/93, 3.57 am; 'Izetbegovic tekent vredesplan uit wanhoop en pessimisme' (Izetbegovic signs peace plan in despair and pessimism), ANP, 26/03/93, 7.35 pm. Zie ook (ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 21/93, 22/03/93; 23/93, 31/03/93; 25/93, 13/04/93, 26/93, 15/04/93; Part VII, /05/1993 to/03/94, 33/93, 13 /05/1993.

⁴⁵⁵¹ 'VS dreigen Serviërs te isoleren', ANP, 26/03/93, 3.57 am.

⁴⁵⁵² 'Druk op Serviërs om plan Vance-Owen te tekenen' (Pressure on Serbs to sign Vance-Owen plan), ANP, 26/03/93, 12.56 pm.

⁴⁵⁵³ 'Morillon: Milosevic wil Srebrenica helpen' (Morillon: Milosevic wants to help Srebrenica), ANP, 25/03/93, 11.34 pm.

⁴⁵⁵⁴ Hollingworth, Christmas, p. 217; Chuck Sudetic, 'Thousands Jam U.N. Trucks to Flee Bosnian Town', The New York Times, 30/03/93; Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 46-47.

⁴⁵⁵⁵ 'NAVO en Rusland zetten Servië onder druk om vredesplan te tekenen' (NATO and Russia pressure Serbia to sign peace plan), ANP, 29/03/93, 11.57 pm; 'VN stoppen evacuatie uit Srebrenica' (UN halts evacuations from Srebrenica), ANP, 31/03/93, 19:13; NIOD, Svensson Coll. UNHCR, Background Note on Situation in Eastern Bosnia, 01/04/93; NOS Journaal (News), 31/03/93.

⁴⁵⁵⁶ Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 136.

⁴⁵⁵⁷ cf. Janine di Giovanni, 'Morillon takes flak in his finest hour', The Times, 04/04/93; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 209.

⁴⁵⁵⁸ Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 136. Both and Honig say the name of this officer was Basic.

evacuations. The UNHCR trucks were to be empty when they left for Srebrenica – without food or medicine – and were permitted to be full – of people – when they returned.⁴⁵⁵⁹

Under pressure from representatives of the international community, on 4 April Izetbegovic finally agreed to permit the evacuation of wounded civilians, people older than sixty and women with small children.⁴⁵⁶⁰ However, despite this undertaking given by Izetbegovic, no further evacuations from Srebrenica appeared to be possible. On the same day that the Bosnian head of state undertook to permit limited evacuations, eight trucks returned empty from Srebrenica. The local authorities in the town had prevented the transportation of people, arguing that they refused to collaborate in ethnic cleansing. The UNHCR, which had hoped to evacuate a further 15,000 of the 60,000 people or thereabouts in Srebrenica, saw its plans undermined.⁴⁵⁶¹

In order to eradicate the fear of the local authorities that Srebrenica would fall because too few people remained, Morillon decided to try and post 150 Canadian peacekeepers to the town. Their presence was to guarantee that the VRS would not capture it.⁴⁵⁶² In doing this, Morillon was acting in tandem with Ogata, who sent a letter to Boutros-Ghali at the same time, in which she wrote that efforts should be directed either towards ensuring that Srebrenica was a Safe Area by increasing the UNPROFOR presence there, or by providing humanitarian aid there on a much larger scale. If neither alternative was successful, then mass evacuation was the only solution.⁴⁵⁶³

In the meantime an overall humanitarian impasse threatened to envelop the town. While the Muslim leaders in Srebrenica refused to allow people to leave, the Bosnian Serbs refused to allow the transportation of 20,000 tents for refugees in the area. Morillon, who wished to travel to Srebrenica with an escort of 23 Canadian peacekeepers, was prevented from doing so by the VRS, because the Republika Srpska had never given its permission for UN troops to be stationed in or around Srebrenica. He was only permitted to continue his journey with ten people in an armoured vehicle. However, he had to abandon his attempt to reach Srebrenica when a crowd of 300 angry Bosnian Serbs obstructed him 40 km from the enclave. On 7 April the Muslim authorities in Srebrenica nevertheless gave permission for the evacuation of 1,600 women and children. The next day saw the departure of about 2,000 people, who again ignored the procedures which the local authorities had drawn up for the evacuation.⁴⁵⁶⁴ On the way this group was stoned in the open vehicles in which the people were seated, after which the local Muslim authorities no longer permitted departures on open trucks, because they felt this to be ‘inhuman in the prevailing cold and dangerous’. The UNHCR would have to return with closed trucks.⁴⁵⁶⁵ On 13 April another convoy left with 650 evacuees according to press reports of the time.⁴⁵⁶⁶

⁴⁵⁵⁹ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 2/04/93.

⁴⁵⁶⁰ Honig & Both, Srebrenica, p. 138.

⁴⁵⁶¹ ‘Moslim-autoriteiten Srebrenica weigeren medewerking evacuatie’ (Muslim authorities in Srebrenica refuse to assist with evacuation), ANP, 04/04/93, 9.45 pm; L. Silber and R. Mauthner, ‘Moslims halt UN evacuation of Srebrenica’, Financial Times, 07/04/93; ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. Wagenmakers 343 to Kooijmans, 07/04/93.

⁴⁵⁶² ‘Morillon wil pogen compagnie blauwhelmen in Srebrenica te krijgen’ (Morillon wants to try and station a company of peacekeepers in Srebrenica), ANP, 07/04/93, 3.59 pm.

⁴⁵⁶³ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. Ogata to Boutros-Ghali, 02/04/93; Wagenmakers 343 to Kooijmans, 7/04/93; ABZ, PVNY. Biegan 314 to Kooijmans, 03/04/93.

⁴⁵⁶⁴ Teddy Weir, ‘Refugees Fight Fiercely to Board U.N. Trucks’, The Associated Press, 09/04/93; UN, Srebrenica Report, par. 40.

⁴⁵⁶⁵ ‘Moslims verhinderen evacuatie uit Srebrenica’ (Muslims obstruct evacuation from Srebrenica), ANP, 10/04/93, 5.17 pm; ‘Moslims staan gedeeltelijke evacuatie Srebrenica toe’ (Muslims permit partial evacuation of Srebrenica), ANP, 7/04/93, 11.38 am; ‘Nieuw VN-konvooi op weg naar Srebrenica’ (New UN convoy en route to Srebrenica), ANP, 8/04/93, 10:11 am; ‘Bosnië vraagt om spoedzitting Veiligheidsraad’ (Bosnia calls for emergency session of the Security Council), ANP, 9/04/93, 6.14 am.

⁴⁵⁶⁶ ‘UN takes 650 out of Srebrenica’, Chicago Tribune, 14/04/93; John Daniszewski, ‘Hundreds Evacuated from Srebrenica’, The Associated Press; UN, Srebrenica Report, par. 40 refers to a figure of 800 evacuees.

8. Enforcing the no-fly zone

After the Bosnian Muslim leaders had accepted the comprehensive Vance-Owen plan on 25 March, as the Bosnian Croats had done before them, one could expect the Security Council to adopt a resolution supporting the peace plan and holding out the prospect of placing further pressure on the Bosnian Serbs as the only party who had not yet signed it. At that time two alternatives were being considered, both of which had been discussed for some time already: tightening the sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro, and enforcing the no-fly zone above Bosnia. The approach adopted by the American government was important in both cases.

On the same day that Izetbegovic signed the plan the section of the American government which was involved with policy on Bosnia decided that a choice should be made between either lifting the arms embargo and halting the air strikes or arranging a ceasefire, after which it would be possible to offer enclaves such as Srebrenica a certain amount of protection.⁴⁵⁶⁷ The American armed forces had major objections to the first solution. Apart from the leadership of the air force, who held the view that the Bosnian Serbs could be controlled from the air, the prevailing opinion was that there were too few substantial targets for large-scale air strikes. Only ground troops would really have an impact. Colin Powell tried to make it clear to Clinton what he had previously told Bush, namely, that only ground troops could really influence the actions of the Bosnian Serbs. Heavy bombardments would not be able to drive the Serbs from the areas they occupied. Limited air strikes would make little sense, because the Bosnian Serbs would have their tanks seek shelter in the forested areas and mists of Bosnia. Even if the terrain and weather did not help them, they could position their tanks and artillery close to civilian locations or take UN personnel hostage.⁴⁵⁶⁸ During a hearing held by the American Senate's Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense the Chief of Staff of the American air force, General Merrill A. McPeak, was forced to concede that ground and weather conditions made it considerably more difficult to launch air strikes over Bosnia than against Iraq during the Gulf War.⁴⁵⁶⁹ Apart from objections to air strikes in connection with their troops on the ground, the British chiefs of staff also felt that the mist which frequently gathered in the valleys of Bosnia, would make air strikes very difficult in practice.⁴⁵⁷⁰

There was considerable division within the American government and senior officials in the State Department as to the precise tools that were to be used.⁴⁵⁷¹ The Secretary for Defence, Les Aspin, and security adviser, Anthony Lake, followed Powell's line to the effect that there should first be a political objective or a diplomatic solution before American troops could be deployed. The American ambassador to the United Nations, Madeleine Albright, was a leading proponent of military action.⁴⁵⁷² She sent a memorandum to the White House, in which she called for air strikes, from the USA alone if necessary, in order to protect the Muslim towns under siege from the VRS. At the same time 12 senior officials in the State Department who dealt with Eastern Europe or the UN, took a most unusual step in sending an emotional letter to Christopher, in which they referred to American policy on Bosnia as a fiasco. They also pleaded for attacks on the Bosnian Serbs in order to protect the Muslims against genocide and recommended that the arms embargo against the Bosnian government be lifted. Christopher met with these officials and told them very diplomatically that he did not view their plea as a revolt against his policy but as a healthy part of the process of determining policy.⁴⁵⁷³

⁴⁵⁶⁷ Daalder, Dayton, p. 12.

⁴⁵⁶⁸ Powell and Persico, Journey, p. 561.

⁴⁵⁶⁹ Elaine Sciolino, 'U.S. military split on using air power against the Serbs', The New York Times, 29/04/93.

⁴⁵⁷⁰ Major, Autobiography, p. 541.

⁴⁵⁷¹ Daalder, Dayton, pp. 13-14.

⁴⁵⁷² Powell & Persico, Journey, p. 561.

⁴⁵⁷³ Michael R. Gordon, '12 in State Dept. ask military move against the Serbs', The New York Times, 23/04/93; 'Toenemende druk voor militair ingrijpen tegen Serviërs' (Growing pressure for military intervention against Serbs), ANP, 23/04/93, 8.13 am.

In a discussion he had with the Danish EC President, Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen, early in 1993, the Bosnian Vice-President, Ganic, had already let it be known that he was in favour of the international community enforcing the no-fly zone. It irritated him that the Serbians were still able to move their troops by helicopter. He did not show himself to be susceptible to the argument that this would endanger humanitarian aid. This aid was already 'too little, too late', according to the Vice-President. If the Serbs were to halt this aid because of air strikes, this would last about two to three weeks but Ganic was probably convinced that, after this, it would reach all areas for which it was destined, which was not the case at that point in time.⁴⁵⁷⁴

At a meeting held in London on 8 February for those countries who were providing troops, Nambiar and Goulding nevertheless raised serious objections against the enforcement of the flight ban, because it would endanger the UN's ground personnel. Goulding was of the opinion that peacekeeping on the ground and enforcement in the air represented an impossible combination. Nambiar even said, 'In that case pull us out of it.' Nambiar's successor, Wahlgren, also held the view that enforcing a no-fly zone could have major negative implications for both the provision of humanitarian aid and the safety of UN personnel on the ground. Like so many others, he pointed out that the violations of the flight ban had hardly any significant impact on the military situation. In general, the air transport of personnel was highly limited.⁴⁵⁷⁵ However, the French and British governments had since become convinced that an air dimension needed to be added to the UNPROFOR operations, irrespective of whether or not the Vance-Owen peace plan would meet with success.⁴⁵⁷⁶ Nevertheless, Owen and Vance wanted to use the flight ban as a means of bringing pressure to bear on the Bosnian Serbs to agree with their peace plan. They felt that this means should only be used once Izetbegovic had accepted the three elements of their peace plan.⁴⁵⁷⁷

In the five months following the imposition of the no-fly zone on 9 October 1992 UN personnel on the ground and AWACS aircraft in the air had detected 465 instances of its violation. According to Boutros-Ghali, no attacks on ground targets had been observed in this connection.⁴⁵⁷⁸ Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Srebrenica repeatedly complained about attacks from Serbian aircraft from the autumn of 1992.⁴⁵⁷⁹ In the first ten days of February 1993 alone 56 people are said to have died in Srebrenica and more than a hundred are reported to have been wounded in these attacks.⁴⁵⁸⁰ On 13 March 1993, while Morillon was in Srebrenica, the villages of Gladovici and Osatica to the south of the town were attacked by three single-engine agricultural planes. Presumably, they took off from an airstrip near Bratunac.⁴⁵⁸¹ They dropped a total of nine bombs on the two villages, after which they disappeared out of sight over the Drina above Serbian territory, according to eye witnesses. These bombardments were reason enough for Vance and Owen not to delay the enforcement of the flight ban any longer with the negotiations in mind, and to call on the Security Council to commence the enforcement of the five-month old no-fly zone.⁴⁵⁸²

On 31 March 1993 the Security Council adopted resolution 816, which, referring to Chapter VII of the UN Charter, authorised member states to enforce the flight ban above Bosnia-Herzegovina. At the last moment the Russians managed to secure an undertaking that this action had to be confined ⁴⁵⁷⁴ ABZ, Communications Archive. COUREU message from the Danish presidency of the EC, 10/01/93, cpe/pres/cop 52.

⁴⁵⁷⁵ ABZ, 921.241. D'Ansembourg 266 to Kooijmans, 22/03/93.

⁴⁵⁷⁶ ABZ, Government Archives Stg. Secret codes. Kooijmans 011 to the embassy in London, 9/02/93, Stg Confi.

⁴⁵⁷⁷ Owen CD-ROM, Lord Owen's report of briefing meeting with EC ambassadors, New York, 4/03/93.

⁴⁵⁷⁸ United Nations Department of Public Information, United Nations, p. 13.

⁴⁵⁷⁹ See for example Cekic, Aggression, p. 170 and pp. 172-73; Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 127-28 and p. 170.

⁴⁵⁸⁰ Cekic, Aggression, p. 173.

⁴⁵⁸¹ NIOD, Jansen Coll., Briefing by Colonel F. Jansen to the Army Council, period of 22-29/03/93.

⁴⁵⁸² Owen, CD-ROM, Lord Owen's meeting with P5 Ambassadors, New York, 16/03/93; CRST. Letter from R.A. Cordy Simpson, BH Comd Main to Headquarters UNPROFOR Zagreb, 13/03/93, 2233; 'Serviërs betrapt op het bombarderen van doelen in Bosnië' (Serbs caught bombing targets in Bosnia), Trouw, 18/03/93; 'Geloofwaardigheid' (Credibility), Trouw, 19/03/93.

to Bosnian air space and was not applicable to Serbian air space. Attacks on ground targets would only be acceptable in connection with immediate self-defence. The resolution was to take effect seven days later and a further seven days would be required for NATO to organize these operations and to coordinate them with the UN. This transitional period was also intended to enable those countries with ground troops in Bosnia to take measures to protect their troops from any Serbian retaliation. On 8 April NATO assumed responsibility for the implementation of the resolution. Because Resolution 816 called for proper cooperation between the UN on the one hand, and the countries or organizations that were to perform the operation on the other, NATO posted communications officers to the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb and Kiseljak. For their part, UNPROFOR stationed liaison officers in Vicenza in Italy, from where the aircraft of the NATO countries operated. The NATO commander responsible was the Commander in Chief, Allied Forces Southern Europe (CINSOUTH), Admiral J.M. Boorda. On 12 March, four days after NATO undertook to implement the resolution Operation Deny Flight commenced under the command of NATO's Fifth Allied Tactical Air Force (5ATAF) in Vicenza. In addition to the USA and France, the Netherlands participated with 18 F-16 combat aircraft (twelve fighter and six reconnaissance planes), which operated from the NATO base of Villa Franca in Northern Italy. The 314 Dutch military personnel required for this deployment boosted the total number of Dutch troops serving in and around the former Yugoslavia to 1,750. Moreover, the six Dutch reconnaissance aircraft would soon be replaced by a further six interceptor jets.⁴⁵⁸³ Several weeks after the operation commenced, British and Turkish planes joined those of France, the Netherlands and the USA. Incidentally, the instructions governing the use of force which were issued for the planes participating in Operation Deny Flight, were highly restrictive. They were not allowed to violate Serbian air space. The NATO pilots were only permitted to take action against anyone who violated the flight ban, if they actually saw the plane or helicopter which committed the violation, engage in hostile action. In practice, violators heeded NATO pilots' warning to land. Then they waited on the ground until the NATO plane was forced to return to base.⁴⁵⁸⁴ As mentioned, attacks on targets on the ground were prohibited. In addition, almost all the Bosnian-Serb helicopters had a red cross painted on their side, irrespective of whether or not they were deployed for humanitarian or military purposes.⁴⁵⁸⁵

The resolution was therefore prompted not so much by the idea that the deployment of NATO aircraft would actually have an impact on the course of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina. It was primarily designed to exert psychological pressure on the Bosnian Serbs to accept the peace plan but appeared to have met with little success in this respect. The only response from the Serbs, the Montenegrins, and the Bosnian Serbs was to produce threats of escalation of the war.⁴⁵⁸⁶ This therefore represented an initial step from peacekeeping to peace-enforcing. Shashi Tharoor, who headed the DPKO department which was responsible for the peace operation in Bosnia, declared that from now on UNPROFOR would be waging war and peace at the same time.⁴⁵⁸⁷

The Dutch parliament agreed with the government's decision to deploy the F-16s in Operation Deny Flight, although various representatives felt that this step had come too late.⁴⁵⁸⁸ The members of the Dutch parliament were now prepared to accept that the deployment of Dutch and other aircraft could have implications for Dutch ground troops, a risk which they had previously shown themselves to be aware of on numerous occasions.⁴⁵⁸⁹ In Blaauw's words, '... it should be clear that the ⁴⁵⁸³ Lutgert & De Winter, Horizon, pp. 125-27.

⁴⁵⁸⁴ Beale, Bombs, p. 20. See also Leurdijk, United Nations, p. 34.

⁴⁵⁸⁵ Gow, Triumph, p. 134.

⁴⁵⁸⁶ See for example ABZ, 999.241, No-Fly Zone, Pert III. PA Belgrado to DEU and DAV, 14/04/93, bel 791 and bel 801.

⁴⁵⁸⁷ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 165.

⁴⁵⁸⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 49.

⁴⁵⁸⁹ See for example TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 27, p. 4 (Van Middelkoop); no. 28, p. 7 (Ter Veer); no. 28, p. 8 (Sipkes); Proceedings, p. 13-806 (Sipkes, 22 October 1992); Proceedings, p. 13-808/809 (Van Middelkoop, 22 October 1992).

Netherlands and the Dutch parliament dare to take this step.’⁴⁵⁹⁰ He also asked critical questions about the instructions issued to the pilots for the use of force: ‘... surely we cannot have a situation where a pilot has a target in his sights and must then first use various lines of communication to ask what he may and may not do? If the directions for the use of force are of such a nature, surely our credibility will be at issue?’⁴⁵⁹¹ In his reply Minister Kooijmans said that the flight ban was partly designed to serve as a signal to Serbia and the Bosnian Serbs that it was time for them to sign the Vance-Owen peace agreement. Although the minister could understand that the members of Parliament were disappointed about the late and inadequate response of the international community to the developments in Bosnia-Herzegovina, it was ‘simply a fact that no government in the world is currently prepared to take military action without a peace settlement’.⁴⁵⁹² The fact that UNHCR was not prepared to fight its way to Srebrenica, for example, in order to provide aid, was not the fault of UNHCR, according to the minister, but that of the governments that were participating in the operations. They were against this. According to Ter Beek, during interception operations NATO pilots maintained constant contact with AWACS aircraft, which in turn communicated with senior NATO commanders: ‘This approach represents a good balance between ongoing control of the operation and a desire to act as decisively as possible’.⁴⁵⁹³

Troops for the peace plan?

At the end of March Kooijmans paid an introductory visit to Washington, where he spoke to his counterpart Christopher, and the Security Adviser, Lake, amongst others. It must have become clear to the Dutch minister that the US did not wish to tie itself to the Vance-Owen plan. Following Kooijmans’ trip a remark was made in the Ministerial Council that a Dutch plea for the use of force to secure the adoption of the plan would not sound very credible, because it was precisely the Dutch troops that needed to be protected. It was precisely the governments of those countries that provided protection – Canada, France, the United Kingdom and Spain – which did not want to use force.

Nevertheless, another minister was of the opinion that the Netherlands must call for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan and for the use of greater military force at the same time. Naturally, the implications of the latter were that the Netherlands would also have to be prepared to make a substantial contribution to this, as a third minister concluded.⁴⁵⁹⁴

A spokesperson for the American State Department, Richard Boucher, declared that, while the United States Government did indeed support the peace process, it did not wish to force a plan on the parties in question. This was because the American administration took account of the fact that Izetbegovic would indeed wish to revoke his signature to the Vance-Owen plan if the Bosnian Serbs failed to accept it in full. Washington also dropped the idea of new sanctions at the time, to the astonishment of, in particular, the Security Council members France, the United Kingdom and Spain. In view of Jeltsin’s shaky position in relation to opposition in his own country, the American government did not wish to go further than tightening the existing sanctions, although their description did afford some scope for manoeuvre.⁴⁵⁹⁵

In addition, the American government let it be known that the European countries would have to account for a share in any peacekeeping or peace-enforcing force equal to that of the Americans. In ⁴⁵⁹⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 49, p. 6.

⁴⁵⁹¹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 49, p. 6.

⁴⁵⁹² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 49, p. 7.

⁴⁵⁹³ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 49, p. 10.

⁴⁵⁹⁴ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 02/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁵⁹⁵ ‘VN stoppen evacuatie uit Srebrenica’ (UN halts evacuation from Srebrenica), ANP, 31/03/93, 7.13pm; ‘VN-Raad bekrachtigt vliegverbod boven Bosnië’ (UN Council ratifies flight ban above Bosnia), ANP, 01/04/93, 6.57 am; Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 02/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

this connection, consideration was being given to France, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Belgium, Spain, Finland, Poland, Sweden and Turkey if necessary. A third division would need to be provided by Russia and perhaps several other Eastern European countries. In this case the US was prepared to contribute a division of 20,000 troops. The Washington administration warned that this figure should actually be multiplied by three bearing in mind the need for relief troops. Furthermore, Washington insisted that the parties to the conflict should give at least one indication of their agreement to the arrival of this force by, for example, withdrawing their troops or removing heavy weapons.⁴⁵⁹⁶

At virtually the same time the Kremlin appeared to be backing away from their previous willingness to provide a substantial contribution of manpower for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan in the face of pressure exerted by the Russian opposition and financial difficulties.⁴⁵⁹⁷

During April it became clear to NATO that the European allies would only be able to provide several thousand troops. The British government revealed that it could provide little more than the 3,500 troops it already had stationed in Bosnia. A source within the British Defence Ministry moaned, 'We simply cannot send the forces needed by NATO because we haven't got the men, and if we had they wouldn't have the right equipment and if they did we wouldn't have the money to pay for the operation.' This led to an angry outburst from the American general, Powell, who asked the British Chief of Staff, Air Marshall Sir Peter Harding, on the phone, 'Are we the only country that cares about the future of NATO? We are the only country carrying the flag for NATO.'⁴⁵⁹⁸ Confronted with the unwillingness and inability of the Russians and Europeans, the American offer of ground troops faded into the background.⁴⁵⁹⁹

On 2 April Karadzic signed the Vance-Owen peace plan subject to the proviso that the Bosnian-Serb parliament would also need to agree to it. The same evening he advised the Bosnian-Serb parliament not to accept the plan. According to him, agreeing to it would 'give rise to ethnic cleansing at the expense of the Serbs ... on an unprecedented scale'.⁴⁶⁰⁰ On Sunday 4 April, this meeting rejected the peace plan by 81 votes to 68. This was the first but certainly not the last time the parliament rejected the plan.

9. Red alert for Srebrenica

When the Bosnian Serbs noticed that the Muslim authorities did not want any further evacuations from Srebrenica, they resumed their offensive against the town on 5 April. In the meantime, from as early as late March Wahlgren had urged Mladic and Karadzic to permit a UN infantry company and three military observers to be stationed in Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁰¹ A Canadian company was held on standby for this purpose. During the Easter holidays of 11 and 12 April the UNHCR in Belgrade began to be highly concerned that the VRS would soon attempt to capture Srebrenica. It was clear that the West was not overly inclined to take action against Serbia or the Bosnian Serbs in anticipation of a referendum that was scheduled to be held in Russia on 25 April dealing with the position of President Jeltsin and his policy. The West did not wish to assist the Russian opposition by adopting anti-Serb measures.⁴⁶⁰² Even if the West had attempted to do this, the Serbs still had a second line of defence within the Security ⁴⁵⁹⁶ ABZ, DWH/ARA/00844. Meesman 204 to Kooijmans, 01/04/93.

⁴⁵⁹⁷ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 24/93, 05/04/93; ABZ, 999 NATO-WEU, Part 4. De Vos van Steenwijk 37 to Kooijmans, 31/03/93.

⁴⁵⁹⁸ James Adams, 'Bosnia mission causes NATO row', Sunday Times, 28/03/93.

⁴⁵⁹⁹ DAB. Memorandum from Barth to Ter Beek, 21/04/93, D93/200.

⁴⁶⁰⁰ 'Verwerping vredesplan door Bosnisch-Servische parlement vrijwel zeker' (Bosnian-Serb parliament virtually certain to reject peace plan), ANP, 03/04/93, 12.11 am.

⁴⁶⁰¹ ABZ, Yugoslavia UN ECOSOC Human Rights. PV Genève to DIO/Yugoslavia, 08/04/93, hum/gev-0615/93, addendum, Wahlgren to Karadzic, 04/04/93.

⁴⁶⁰² ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Engels 105 to Kooijmans, 13/04/93. See also Daalder, Dayton, p. 17.

Council: on 11 April rumours circulated within the UN that the Russian government was planning to make use of its veto in the Security Council for the first time since 1984, if a resolution were to be voted on for tougher sanctions.⁴⁶⁰³ The reports emanating from Paris that Morillon was to be recalled must have also given the Bosnian-Serb leaders the impression that they would not encounter much resistance from the West if they were to take Srebrenica. In London Defence Secretary Rifkind said that he was making allowances for the fall of the enclave, while simultaneously stressing that the British government was not overly inclined to deploy ground troops on a large scale.⁴⁶⁰⁴ Another development which appeared to play into the hands of the Serbs with regard to their attack on Srebrenica, was the outbreak of widespread hostilities between the Croats and the Muslims. The HVO (Croatian army) command had demanded that the ABiH withdraw from the Croat-majority areas designated as such in the Vance-Owen plan before 15 April. When this deadline passed fierce fighting broke out immediately in Vitez and Jablanica in Central and Southern Bosnia. As a result, the Muslims in Srebrenica could not count on receiving much support from the ABiH stationed outside Srebrenica.

On 9 April Mladic had expressed his willingness to Wahlgren and Morillon to meet the Bosnian army commander, Halilovic, under Wahlgren's guidance at the Sarajevo airport on 12 April to discuss one thing only: Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁰⁵ However, on 12 April Halilovic refused to put in an appearance following the heavy bombardment of the sports field at the secondary school in Srebrenica on the same day, Easter Monday. 56 people were killed in this attack and another 73 were seriously wounded.⁴⁶⁰⁶ Halilovic demanded that all hostilities should first cease. Mladic, who had arrived, did not want to tell Wahlgren whether he was planning to take Srebrenica. He only stated that he could have done so ten days earlier but that it had not been politically expedient to do so. Like Morillon before him, Wahlgren felt that Srebrenica was a test case for the viability of the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁶⁰⁷ In the meantime Wahlgren had become convinced that the Muslims had provoked the mortar attack on 12 April and had felt that it was important to keep Srebrenica on the front page of the newspapers. Moreover, on 12 April Mladic was still unwilling ('over my dead body') to give Wahlgren permission to station a Canadian company in Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁰⁸

Against this background the seven most industrialised countries, the G7, took the view during their meeting in Tokyo on 14 April, that they needed to send a signal to show that there was a limit to the amount of Serbian aggression the West was prepared to put up with. While it is true that the seven decided to postpone the Security Council vote on resolutions relating to the Vance-Owen plan and the tightening of sanctions until 26 April, the day after the Russian referendum, they announced that they reserved the right to take other action if further developments occurred in Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁰⁹ This did not appear to help. The Serbs launched fierce attacks on Srebrenica. The Bosnian government made an urgent appeal to the Security Council to call a halt to this and asked Morillon to visit the town again. In addition, they threatened to withdraw their acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan if the Serbs were to capture Srebrenica.⁴⁶¹⁰

⁴⁶⁰³ 'Rusland wil uitstel sancties tegen Klein-Joegoslavië' (Russia want postponement of sanctions against lesser Yugoslavia), ANP, 11/04/93, 12.34 pm.

⁴⁶⁰⁴ Tim Witcher & Diplomatic Staff, 'French ready to recall Morillon with a month', The Daily Telegraph, 14/04/93.

⁴⁶⁰⁵ NIOD Collection (2).

⁴⁶⁰⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. UNPROFOR Press Release, 'UN Outrage at Atrocity in Srebrenica', 13/04/93; Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, pp. 128-29 and 190-92; Honig and Both, Srebrenica, pp. 139-40.

⁴⁶⁰⁷ NIOD Collection (2).

⁴⁶⁰⁸ NIOD Collection (2).

⁴⁶⁰⁹ 'G7 besluit stemming Veiligheidsraad over Servië uit te stellen' (G7 decides to postpone Security Council vote on Serbia), ANP, 14/04/93, 8.03 am; 'Internationale bemoeienis wijzigt verloop Bosnische oorlog niet', ANP, 16/04/93, 6.37 pm; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 16/93, 22/02/93; 'VN woedend over cynisch spel met hulpgoederen voor Bosnië', De Telegraaf, 17/02/93; 'Voor VN-helpers in Bosnië is grote wachten begonnen', De Telegraaf, 19/02/93; Alain Franchon, 'Alors que le général Morillon s'apprêterait à regagner la France les Occidentaux paraissent résignés à une victoire serbe en Bosnie', Le Monde, 12/04/93.

⁴⁶¹⁰ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 26/93, 15/04/93.

On Friday 16 April, the international media expected Srebrenica to fall at any moment.⁴⁶¹¹ Serbian troops were less than two kilometres from the town. Mortar fire peppered the main street, which resulted in many deaths and wounded.⁴⁶¹² The ABiH announced to journalists that it had intercepted a radio command that day from Mladic to a colonel who was heading the siege of the Eastern Bosnian town, which stated, 'Inform all units to enter Srebrenica tonight. Proceed directly to the town, no journalists, no reports, no announcement.'⁴⁶¹³ Murat Efendic, a representative of the Srebrenica council who was in Sarajevo and maintained constant radio contact with Srebrenica, said the town was lost and pleaded for the evacuation of civilians from Srebrenica to Tuzla. According to him, the Muslim soldiers should also leave 'with their weapons in their hands'.⁴⁶¹⁴ Ibrahim Džananović, a representative from Srebrenica in the government in Sarajevo, was gloomier. According to him, the people of Srebrenica could not escape. 'Some will be murdered, some will be taken to camps, and as far as the rest are concerned, I do not know what will happen.'⁴⁶¹⁵ The Deputy Commander of the ABiH, Stjepan Šiber, claimed there was a danger that the inhabitants of Srebrenica would be killed: 'Tens of thousands of innocent women, children and the elderly will be butchered and annihilated by tanks.'⁴⁶¹⁶

At a little past half past eight in the evening the ANP reported that 'to all intents and purposes' the Serbs had captured Srebrenica.⁴⁶¹⁷ It based its report on messages received from the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Serbian television reported that Muslims in the outskirts of Srebrenica were surrendering.⁴⁶¹⁸ As a result of these new developments the fate of the civilians had 'become extremely uncertain'. In Pale, Karadžić, who was involved in talks with Morillon about the situation, had announced earlier in the day that, if the Muslim combatants in the town were to hand over their weapons to the 130 Canadian peacekeepers who were on their way there, the civilians would be allowed to leave and the VRS would not enter the town but merely 'pacify' it. If the Muslims failed to surrender their weapons, then the Bosnian Serbs would 'need to defeat them', according to Karadžić.⁴⁶¹⁹

The American government now threatened tougher sanctions against Serbia, if Srebrenica fell, and was considering large-scale air strikes against Serbian artillery, although it did not want to proceed with this without the consent of its European allies. The British government immediately let it be known that it was not keen on the idea: '... we still haven't seen any militarily achievable objectives for air strikes, apart from destroying things for the sake of it'.⁴⁶²⁰ For the first time since he assumed the role of EC negotiator, Owen also favoured direct military intervention now. He called for air strikes on bridges and roads to prevent supplies reaching the Serbian troops from Serbia.⁴⁶²¹ According to Owen, the time had come for the resolute confrontation of the Bosnian-Serb leadership by the world. If the Serbs were to take Srebrenica, they would have to withdraw from it. The British mediator again stressed that Srebrenica was 'a Muslim town in a Muslim area'.⁴⁶²²

⁴⁶¹¹ 'New York Times: Overgave Srebrenica kwestie van tijd' (New York Times: Surrender of Srebrenica is a question of time), ANP, 16/04/93, 6.04 am.

⁴⁶¹² 'Nederlandse AZG-arts: Srebrenica slachtoffer van terreur' (Dutch AZG doctor: Srebrenica is a victim of terror), ANP, 16/04/93, 8.53 am; Tim Judah, 'Reckoning time in valley of death', The Times, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶¹³ John Daniszewski, 'Serbs Reportedly Enter Srebrenica', The Associated Press, 16/04/93.

⁴⁶¹⁴ 'Srebrenica zur Kapitulation bereit', Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 17/04/93; John Daniszewski, 'Serbs Reportedly Enter Srebrenica', The Associated Press, 16/04/93.

⁴⁶¹⁵ Michael Montgomery, 'Hope runs out in city of death', The Daily Telegraph, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶¹⁶ 'Val Srebrenica onafwendbaar' (Fall of Srebrenica inevitable), ANP, 16/04/93, 8.35 pm. With regard to Karadžić's statements, see also 'Karadžić: troepen zullen Srebrenica niet binnengaan' (Karadžić: troops will not enter Srebrenica), ANP, 16/04/93, 3.32 pm.

⁴⁶¹⁷ 'Val Srebrenica onafwendbaar', ANP, 16/04/93, 8.35 pm.

⁴⁶¹⁸ 'Serviërs vallen Srebrenica binnen' (Serbs enter Srebrenica), ANP, 16/04/93, 11.44 am.

⁴⁶¹⁹ 'Val Srebrenica onafwendbaar', ANP, 16/04/93, 8.35 pm. With regard to Karadžić's statements, see also 'Karadžić troepen zullen Srebrenica niet binnengaan', ANP, 16/04/93, 3.32 pm.

⁴⁶²⁰ Yigal Chazan & Ian Black & Martin Walker, 'Serbs enter Srebrenica', The Guardian, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶²¹ 'Owen roept op tot Westers bombardement op Serviërs' (Owen calls for Western bombardment of Serbs), ANP, 16/04/93, 1.59 pm; John Daniszewski, 'Serbs Reportedly Enter Srebrenica', The Associated Press, 16/04/93.

⁴⁶²² 'Srebrenica zur Kapitulation bereit', Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 17/04/93.

There was little enthusiasm amongst Dutch members of parliament for Owen's call. De Hoop Scheffer expected the bombardments that were envisaged to yield more problems than benefits. He felt that it was no longer possible to avoid the imminent fall of Srebrenica and that bombardments could jeopardize further humanitarian action as well as the peace plan. Moreover, he was convinced that Russia would never agree to a resolution in favour of such bombardments. The D66 (Democrats) member of parliament, Ter Veer, anticipated that such bombardments would merely escalate the conflict.⁴⁶²³

Srebrenica in the Dutch Ministerial Council

In the Netherlands in the meantime interdepartmental consultations proceeded with the encouragement of Lubbers about the question as to whether increased military pressure should be brought to bear on the Bosnian Serbs and whether NATO could transform Srebrenica into a safe town. Because the officials involved were of the opinion that a new resolution would be required from the Security Council for air strikes such as those Owen was calling for, and Russia and the US were awaiting the outcome of the Russian referendum on 25 April, it seemed best not to do anything for the time being. The official advisers felt that the chance of preventing the fall of Srebrenica by means of external armed intervention must be considered to be 'virtually zero'.⁴⁶²⁴ In addition, previous deliberations of the NATO council had revealed that there was insufficient support for attacks on ground targets. Van der Vlis is reported to have said that he would find such action 'extremely unwise and unfortunate' at that point in time.⁴⁶²⁵ With regard to the question whether the Netherlands could itself do anything from a military point of view in the light of the emergency in Srebrenica, the answer was nothing other than help by providing medicine, food, funds and shelter.⁴⁶²⁶

Lubbers' questions were 'answered emphatically in the negative accompanied by reasons, both with regard to procedure and substance', as was revealed in the Ministerial Council of 16 April.⁴⁶²⁷ The conclusion of these deliberations was that the Security Council would first need to take action. The arguments were 'sufficiently persuasive to allow the matter to rest', albeit that this outcome was regrettable.⁴⁶²⁸ The Ministerial Council of 16 April also emphatically took into account that Srebrenica would fall during the next few days. One of the ministers shared his fear with his colleagues that in this case the Serbian attackers would kill the Muslim populace 'en masse'. The Ministerial Council felt that little could be expected from the UN before the Russian referendum on 25 April 1993. The minister in question wondered if action could be taken within the EC in order to knock out Serbian heavy artillery from the air.⁴⁶²⁹

In the evening of 16 April London sent a COREU message which reported that it was maintaining contact with UN organizations to do everything possible to prevent a mass murder once Bosnian-Serb forces captured Srebrenica. The CoPo (from the French 'comité politique'), which was to assemble on 21 April, was to prepare statements, if necessary, warning the Serbs against committing atrocities and urging them to cooperate with UNPROFOR and the UNHCR. In addition, London wished to arrange an orderly evacuation because the Foreign Office expected about 60,000 refugees to make their way to Tuzla if Srebrenica were to fall. However, London had understood that, if Srebrenica ⁴⁶²³ 'Kamerleden reageren terughoudend op suggestie Owen' (Reserved response from MPs to Owen's suggestion), ANP, 16/04/93, 5.13 pm.

⁴⁶²⁴ AAZ. Memorandum from DAV head to Visser and Waltmann, 16/04/93.

⁴⁶²⁵ AAZ. Memo from Waltmann and Princen to Ter Beek, 16/04/93, incl. remarks by Van der Vlis, 16/04/93.

⁴⁶²⁶ AAZ. Memorandum from DAV head to Kooijmans about the Netherlands' contribution to Srebrenica, z.d.

⁴⁶²⁷ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 16-17/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁶²⁸ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 16-17/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁶²⁹ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 16-17/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

were to fall, the UNHCR had a contingency plan for the refugees both during their move and their arrival in Tuzla. The United Kingdom also called on the other EC member states to provide food, transport and engineering facilities to cover such an eventuality.⁴⁶³⁰

Preventing the fall

While Srebrenica seemed to be yielding to the pressure of the Bosnian-Serb attack and the world appeared to have few illusions about the events that would ensue, various developments had occurred which would yet lead to a settlement. Now that they found themselves at the very brink, the authorities in both Srebrenica and Sarajevo appeared to be willing to make concessions. Naser Oric sent a secret message to the UN peacekeeping force that he agreed to surrender subject to three conditions. Wounded combatants had to be evacuated by helicopter and all the civilians had to be taken to safe surroundings. He demanded a guarantee that the Muslim fighters be allowed to withdraw unopposed to Tuzla. It was assumed that Oric had made this offer without consulting the government in Sarajevo.⁴⁶³¹

On the afternoon of 16 April Karadzic let it be known to the world that the war would be over as soon as the Muslims relinquished Srebrenica.⁴⁶³² Karadzic uttered these words after consulting Milosevic. The latter also expected a bloodbath in Srebrenica owing to the desire for revenge on the part of the Serbs following the death of thousands of Serbs as a result of the attacks carried out by Oric and his men. Milosevic feared the resolution which the Security Council was currently considering with a view to toughening its sanction against Serbia. After all, the G7 countries had made it clear that it would be dealt with if serious developments occurred around Srebrenica. For this reason Milosevic told Wahlgren in a telephone call that he should immediately send the Canadian company to Srebrenica, which he was holding on standby. Milosevic announced that he had already been in touch with Karadzic about this and that the latter had agreed to it.⁴⁶³³

During the night of Friday 16 April to Saturday 17 April, Karadzic explained what he had meant by his previous reference to 'pacifying' the town. The residents of Srebrenica would be able to choose whether they wished to continue living peacefully in the town or wanted to be evacuated.⁴⁶³⁴ Later that Saturday Karadzic gave an assurance that the VRS would not enter Srebrenica. The army merely wanted the local Muslim troops 'neutralised, so that they can no longer attack us in the region'.⁴⁶³⁵

Fighting in and around Srebrenica still continued on 17 April. An amateur radio operator, Becirovic, reported the occurrence of man-to-man fighting in the town and heavy bombardments. The streets were said to be littered with corpses.⁴⁶³⁶

The question was how Izetbegovic now thought about matters. In mid April he had made varying private and public statements about the significance he would attach to the fall of Srebrenica. On 14 April, when the press asked him following a visit to Egypt and several Gulf states what his response would be to the fall of Srebrenica, he said that it would be 'a catastrophe'. However, it would have few implications for his attitude towards the Vance-Owen plan. He said that he no longer ⁴⁶³⁰ ABZ, Communications Archive. COREU message from London, 17/04/93, cpe/lon 292. The transmission time listed by the COREU system was 16/04/93, 7.23 pm and the time it was received, is listed as 17/04/93, 8.36 am.

⁴⁶³¹ 'Onduidelijkheid over val van Srebrenica' (Confusion about the fall of Srebrenica, ANP, 17/04/93, 1:53am; AZ, memo from DAV head to Kooijmans, 16/04/93, no. 93/546; UN, Srebrenica Report, par. 54.

⁴⁶³² 'Karadzic: troepen zullen Srebrenica niet binnengaan', ANP, 16/04/93, 15:32; 'Srebrenica zur Kapitulation bereit', Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶³³ Honig and Both, Srebrenica, p. 141; NIOD, Coll. Wahlgren. Wahlgren to Annan, 16/04/93, UNPROFOR Z-490.

⁴⁶³⁴ Rouba Kabbara, 'Radovan Karadzic affirme que les Serbes ne sont pas entrés à Srebrenica', Agence France Presse, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶³⁵ 'VN: Zware gevechten in Srebrenica' (UN: Heavy fighting in Srebrenica), ANP, 17/04/93, 10.07 pm.

⁴⁶³⁶ 'VN: Zware gevechten in Srebrenica', ANP, 17/04/93, 10.07 pm; 'Bestand Srebrenica lijkt voorbode van capitulatie Moslims' (Srebrenica settlement appears to herald the Muslims' surrender), ANP, 18/04/93, 9:24pm.

considered himself to be bound by his signature to the plan. In the future the Bosnian government's approach to further negotiations would be a matter of 'good will'.⁴⁶³⁷

On 16 April the spokesperson for the Bosnian president, Kemal Muftic, announced that negotiations were being conducted to arrange the surrender of Srebrenica. According to him, the town's fall was inevitable. The most important issue at that point in time was to avoid a mass slaughter. For this reason the leadership in Sarajevo wished to proceed with the complete evacuation of Srebrenica. If this town were to fall, the peace plan would be 'dead', according to the spokesperson.⁴⁶³⁸

While on a trip through Scandinavia, Izetbegovic was visiting the Danish Prime Minister, Poul Nyrup Rasmussen and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Niels Helveg Petersen, in Copenhagen on 17 April. In the presence of the Bosnian chargé d'affaires in Stockholm, Serder, the legal adviser, Haris Nanic and the unofficial representative of Bosnia in Denmark, Professor Tanovic, Izetbegovic told both government ministers that the situation in Srebrenica was 'desperate ... but even if it should fall, it would not be the end of Bosnia-Herzegovina'. At no point during the meeting did he indicate that the fall of Srebrenica would lead him to withdraw his acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan. However, during the press conference that followed, he stated that the fall of Srebrenica should lead to this but, according to him, this was for the Bosnian government to decide. At the same time, he said that he still hoped that the peace plan would succeed.⁴⁶³⁹

At the request of the Commander of the ABiH, Halilovic, in the afternoon of 17 April the meeting with Mladic that had not proceeded five days earlier due to his refusal to appear, went ahead at the airport of Sarajevo in the presence of Wahlgren, Morillon and the representative of the UNHCR in Bosnia, José-Maria Mendiluce.⁴⁶⁴⁰ The reason for the refusal had been the Serbian attacks on Srebrenica. Now it was precisely these attacks that constituted the main topic of this meeting. The talks commenced at two in the afternoon and continued for 12 hours. During this meeting Mladic and Halilovic agreed on a ceasefire which was to start at midnight early in the morning of 18 April. In addition, the two commanders agreed on the deployment of 130 to 150 Canadian peacekeepers in Srebrenica and the evacuation of the wounded by air. The Bosnian Muslims were to demilitarize the area and the Bosnian Serbs would allow UNPROFOR freedom of movement. This agreement was finally signed early in the morning of 18 April.⁴⁶⁴¹

The question arises as to why Mladic did not proceed and capture Srebrenica in April 1993, even though the town had virtually fallen. Owen believed it was likely that Mladic had been restrained by Milosevic, to whom he remained as loyal as ever. It did not seem likely to Owen that he had allowed Karadzic to hold him back. The latter appeared to have forfeited his control over Mladic.⁴⁶⁴² Later on Mladic himself said that he had been restrained by 'more senior individuals'.⁴⁶⁴³ In addition, he had received an undertaking from UNPROFOR that the population of Srebrenica would be evacuated and that any war criminals amongst them would be tried at a later stage.⁴⁶⁴⁴

According to Owen, once Mladic had made a concession in respect of Srebrenica, consideration needed to be given to the fact that he would attack other areas now that he was in a winning mood ⁴⁶³⁷ Hugh Nevill, 'M. Boutros-Ghali: 'le général Morillon a agi en conformité avec les résolutions de l'ONU'', Agence France Presse, 14/04/93.

⁴⁶³⁸ 'Srebrenica zur Kapitulation bereit', Neue Zürcher Zeitung, 17/04/93; Chazan & Black & Walker, 'Serbs enter Srebrenica', The Guardian, 17/04/93.

⁴⁶³⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 17/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 848; 'VN: Zware gevechten in Srebrenica', ANP, 17/04/93, 10.07 pm.

⁴⁶⁴⁰ 'Bosnische Moslems willen niet praten' (Bosnian Muslims do not wish to speak, ANP, 11/04/93, 10.32pm; 'Boutros Ghali veroordeelt aanvallen op Srebrenica' (Boutros-Ghali condemns attacks on Srebrenica), ANP, 15/04/93, 1.13 pm.

⁴⁶⁴¹ See amongst others ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. 'Agreement for the demilitarization of Srebrenica', accompanying PV Genève to DIO/Joegoslavië, fax no. hum/gev-0574/93; UN, Srebrenica Report, par. 59-60.

⁴⁶⁴² ABZ, Communications Archive. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 24/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 913.

⁴⁶⁴³ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 93.

⁴⁶⁴⁴ Bulatovic, Mladic, pp. 93-94.

following recent military successes. In this respect, the question was whether he would opt for an offensive against Zepa and Gorazde or to reduce the pressure on the Posavina corridor.⁴⁶⁴⁵ Heavy fighting had ensued in the Posavina corridor from the first week of April.⁴⁶⁴⁶ In the prevailing circumstances Mladic preferred to achieve total control over the Posavina corridor around Brcko,⁴⁶⁴⁷ which constituted the ‘Achilles’ heel of the Serbian military campaign’.⁴⁶⁴⁸ If they were to seize the area, which the Vance-Owen plan did not assign to the Bosnian Serbs but which they wanted to control, then the Posavina corridor enjoyed top priority,⁴⁶⁴⁹ certainly for Mladic, who was deeply concerned about the fate of the Serbs in Croatia, and did not wish to draw a distinction between the Serbs in Serbia, Bosnia or Croatia.⁴⁶⁵⁰ Srebrenica had since become a much smaller enclave within Bosnian-Serb territory and the VRS controlled all the access routes to it. If the presence of the UN in Srebrenica could lead to a reduction in the operations of the ABiH fighters who were still active in the area, the VRS, faced with an ongoing shortage of personnel, would be able to maintain only a small number of troops around the town. The situation appeared to be ‘frozen’ for the time being. After the VRS finally ceased its attacks on Srebrenica on Sunday, 18 April, as expected the Bosnian-Serb offensive was immediately intensified in the north of Bosnia in the night of Sunday to Monday.⁴⁶⁵¹ If the Bosnian government and army commanders had not already realized it, it must have now become apparent to them that a demilitarized zone in one area meant an increase in Bosnian-Serb military power in another. Relief following the rescue of Srebrenica would therefore soon turn to exasperation. Whatever the case, as long as the war continued in Bosnia, the Bosnian government and the ABiH had little interest in matters really remaining quiet in the vicinity of Srebrenica.

10. A Safe Area

Faced with the threat of Srebrenica falling, the Security Council had also met. It assembled to consider a proposal submitted by five Third World countries, namely, Djibouti, Cape Verde, Morocco, Pakistan and Venezuela, to declare Srebrenica a Safe Area. Initially, it was assumed that there was no chance that this resolution would be adopted, because it would encounter resistance from the permanent members of the Security Council.⁴⁶⁵² Yet the Council adopted Resolution 819, in which it declared Srebrenica to be a Safe Area and UNPROFOR was mandated to assume responsibility for the humanitarian situation in the town. No further attacks on the town were to be countenanced and the paramilitary units around it would have to withdraw. The resolution referred to Chapter VII of the UN Charter, which permits military action against ‘threats to peace’. In the course of informal consultations about the draft of the resolution the EPC members of the Security Council and the US had scrapped the term safe haven. This was because a safe haven guaranteed ‘full protection’. The study conducted by the WEU into the establishment of a safe haven in Sarajevo, which had previously been presented to Boutros-Ghali, had shown that 15,000 ground troops would be required for this purpose. Because it had since become clear how difficult it was to raise such a force, the representatives of the EPC countries and the US had decided to replace the term, safe haven, with ‘a Safe Area which should be free from any armed attack ⁴⁶⁴⁵ ABZ, Communications Archives. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 24/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 913.

⁴⁶⁴⁶ ‘Bosnië vraagt om spoedzitting Veiligheidsraad’, ANP, 09/04/93, 6.14 am.

⁴⁶⁴⁷ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 29/93, 26/04/93; 30/93, 28/04/93; Part VII, /05/1993 to/03/94, 31/93, 6 /05/1993; 36/93, 27 /05/1993.

⁴⁶⁴⁸ Giersch, Konfliktregulierung, p. 279.

⁴⁶⁴⁹ Gow, Triumph, p. 247.

⁴⁶⁵⁰ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 39.

⁴⁶⁵¹ ‘Gevechten verplaatsen zich naar noorden Bosnië’ (Fighting moves to the north of Bosnia), ANP, 19/04/93, 9.42 am. According to this ANP report, fighting stopped at about midday. Mladic says this happened at 4.59 am. Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 96.

⁴⁶⁵² ‘Onduidelijkheid over val Srebrenica’ (Confusion about the fall of Srebrenica), ANP, 17/04/93, 1.53am.

or any other hostile act'. In other words 'full protection' would not be provided but only a 'certain degree of security'.⁴⁶⁵³ This marked the beginning of a great deal of confusion, more so because no provision of international law stipulated what a Safe Area was. Much would depend on the concrete implementation of the term.

In Resolution 819 the Security Council requested Boutros-Ghali to strengthen the presence of UNPROFOR in Srebrenica and to take steps that would lead to the evacuation of the sick and wounded from the town. Finally, the Council required unimpeded access to Srebrenica for humanitarian aid. Later, on Saturday 17 April, the Security Council, acting in the light of the events that had occurred around Srebrenica, agreed to tighten sanctions against Yugoslavia, unless the Bosnian Serbs accepted the Vance-Owen plan in the near future. Amongst other things, the Council ordered the prohibition of transit traffic through Yugoslavia, the proclamation of a comprehensive naval blockade, the freezing of the international financial assets of the rump Yugoslavia, and the confiscation of all Yugoslavian aircraft and other means of transport (Resolution 820). The Russian delegation abstained, as did the Chinese one. In order to spare the Jeltsin government which was to be subject to a referendum on 25 April, the sanctions were only to come into effect on 26 April if the Bosnian-Serb leaders had not agreed to the Vance-Owen peace plan in the interim.

Early in the afternoon of Sunday 18 April 145 Canadian troops entered Srebrenica. Their heaviest weapons were .50 machine guns. They were required to supervise the ceasefire and the Muslims' surrender of their weapons. The latter was supposed to occur within 72 hours. If this deadline was not met, 'all the obligations of the (Bosnian-) Serb army towards the Muslims' would cease to apply, according to Mladic.⁴⁶⁵⁴

Ultimately, the demilitarization was confined to the town itself. Although the Muslims only handed in a modest amount of weapons (two tanks, an armoured vehicle, 23 pieces of artillery and mortars, and 260 handguns), on 21 April Wahlgren declared that the demilitarization of the town had been completed. He was able to do this because the day before a VRS team had approved the demilitarization, although it must have been no secret to the team members that the nature of the disarmament was rather limited. The reason why the VRS nevertheless agreed to this imperfect demilitarization was probably because they would otherwise have had to allow two additional platoons of Canadian troops into Srebrenica, which UNPROFOR had stated would be needed to ensure that the demilitarization process was properly implemented. However, the VRS did not want to allow in any more peacekeepers.⁴⁶⁵⁵ On 23 April Kofi Annan, who had succeeded Goulding as head of the DPKO, directed Wahlgren not to commence demilitarization too energetically. This was because he understood disarmament to mean that, 'UNPROFOR takes on a moral responsibility for the safety of the disarmed that it clearly does not have the military resources to honour beyond a point.' He advised against searching homes for weapons: 'You will undoubtedly be made aware by the visiting Security Council delegation (of Diego Arria, the Permanent Representative of Venezuela) of the strong feeling amongst several members that UNPROFOR should not participate too actively in "disarming the victims"'.⁴⁶⁵⁶

In addition, Mladic and Halilovic had agreed that 500 wounded people would be allowed to leave Srebrenica by helicopter. In the end, a total of 489 wounded people were evacuated from Srebrenica by helicopter. Probably acting as ordered by Sarajevo, Naser Oric prohibited the evacuation of civilians from the enclave by road, fearing that this could lead to the depopulation of the town.⁴⁶⁵⁷ A week later a further 150 wounded people were to be moved to Tuzla. Between the arrival of Morillon

⁴⁶⁵³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. DEU (coordination), memorandum, 'Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond' (Former Yugoslavia: Background) for Gymnich, 24-25/04/93, 22/04/93.

⁴⁶⁵⁴ 'Bestand Srebrenica lijkt voorbode van capitulatie Moslims', ANP, 18/04/93, 9.24 pm.

⁴⁶⁵⁵ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/ 2001; NIOD, Wahlgren coll. Wahlgren to Annan, 21/04/93, UNPROFOR Z-517, Security Council Meeting on Srebrenica.

⁴⁶⁵⁶ Shawcross, Evil, p. 100; Honig and Both, Srebrenica, p. 154.

⁴⁶⁵⁷ 'Autoriteiten Srebrenica weigeren nieuwe evacuatie' (Srebrenica authorities refuse new evacuation), ANP, 19/04/93, 2.57 pm; interview J. Zoutendijk, 6/04/ 2001.

in March and the end of April a total of between 8,000 and 9,000 people were evacuated from Srebrenica. Several tens of thousands remained behind in the enclave.⁴⁶⁵⁸

Following the adoption of Resolution 819, the French government found it difficult to give the Srebrenica hero, Morillon, the push. On Sunday 18 April, the French Prime Minister, Edouard Balladur, announced that the general would no be recalled.⁴⁶⁵⁹ Emboldened, Morillon swore to the press that same day that he would keep the Serbs out of Srebrenica. Once the Canadian peacekeepers had arrived, a Serb attack on Srebrenica would amount to 'an attack on the entire world', according to the French general. He was convinced that the Bosnian Serbs would not dare to do this.⁴⁶⁶⁰

Wahlgren felt it was nevertheless better to issue a public warning intended for Serbian ears: 'Our orders are to protect this demilitarized zone as peacekeepers,' said the Swedish general. 'This means that, if anyone tries to enter by force, the United Nations troops will use force for the purposes of self-defence.' According to Wahlgren, the 150 Canadian troops were sufficiently well-armed to defend the enclave.⁴⁶⁶¹

However, on 23 April Wahlgren wrote a more considered report to Annan about what the Canadian troops would do if they were attacked in Srebrenica:

'They would fire back in self-defence; this includes defence of their mission, i.e. they would use force if armed elements attempted by force to intrude into the demilitarized area. However, as you have also stressed to us, UNPROFOR has deployed in Srebrenica with the agreement of the parties and the threat of the use of force in this context is intended to apply in a situation where a small number of armed elements violate this agreement. We understand, of course, that 145 peace-keepers cannot be expected to resist a full-scale invasion by the Bosnian Serb Army; and that should heavy artillery shelling occur, UNPROFOR will take shelter like everyone else.'⁴⁶⁶²

A day later the British government offered to use air strikes to assist the 150 Canadian peacekeepers, if they were to become the target of VRS attacks.⁴⁶⁶³

Any more Safe Areas?

Following the conclusion of the agreement between Halilovic and Mladic, and the adoption of Resolution 819, UNHCR declared that it now supported Safe Areas, whereas it had opposed them so much in December 1992. The refugee agency proposed that Zepa and Gorazde also be declared Safe Areas. This would require a 'large UN presence, mostly military'.⁴⁶⁶⁴ Ogata, who had resisted the combination of humanitarian aid and military enforcement for so long, now inclined towards UNPROFOR.

The Dutch government had sought the establishment of Safe Areas for some period of time. When the Dutch Ministerial Council met again on Saturday, 17 April, it was able to note with relief that the Security Council had adopted Resolution 819. However, the Ministerial Council was divided as to ⁴⁶⁵⁸ UN, Srebrenica Report, par. 40; Hren (ed.), Overlevenden, p. 19.

⁴⁶⁵⁹ 'Morillon to stay in Bosnia', Press Association Newsfile, 18/04/93.

⁴⁶⁶⁰ 'Morillon mag in Bosnië blijven', ANP, 18/04/93, 21:52.

⁴⁶⁶¹ 'VN-chef: zenden VN-grondtroepen mogelijke enige oplossing' (UN chief: sending UN ground troops is possibly the only solution, ANP, 22/04/93, 4.01 pm.

⁴⁶⁶² NIOD Collection (2).

⁴⁶⁶³ 'EG neigt naar militaire actie' (EC inclines towards military action), ANP, 24/04/93, 9.36 pm.

⁴⁶⁶⁴ ABZ, DIO/2004/00075. UNHCR, 'Note on Bosnia-Herzegovina', 19/04/93, accompanying PV Geneva to Kooijmans, 22/04/93, fax no. hum/gev-0574/93; Wagenmakers 380 to Kooijmans, 23/04/93; ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part V-VI, /05/1992 -/04/93. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 28/93, 22/04/93.

the next step. On the one hand, there were ministers who found that the resolution imposed a duty to do something to guarantee the safety of the inhabitants of Srebrenica, otherwise the credibility of the international community would be eroded. On the other hand, there was one minister in particular who supported the mass evacuation of the population. Finally, it was decided that the Dutch government would inform the American government that the Srebrenica resolution implied a moral obligation to render the town a Safe Area. This meant that the evacuation should not proceed.⁴⁶⁶⁵ Later that day Kooijmans addressed a CDA conference in Gouda devoted to foreign policy, where he referred to the Security Council resolution to establish a Safe Area in Srebrenica as ‘a ray of hope’. Nevertheless, the minister said that he expected the town to fall soon, because the Council had failed to provide the resources required to secure its safety at the same time. In a wider context the minister noted that the Western world would have to get used to the idea of deploying military resources, even though the ultimate goal may not be immediately clear.⁴⁶⁶⁶

Barth, the Head of the Directorate for General Policy Matters in the Ministry of Defence was more positive towards Resolution 819. According to him, the ‘most realistic “military” option’ open to the West in Bosnia-Herzegovina was to implement Safe Areas. He felt that this represented the proper performance of the primary duties of UNPROFOR II: help alleviate intense humanitarian suffering wherever possible. In addition, Barth felt that by providing the Bosnian people with aid, they need ‘not wait (in vain?) for the Vance-Owen plan’. However, according to him, one would need to consider within an international context what technical resources and/or observers could be used to determine which party bombarded the Safe Areas. ‘This must be done partly to ensure that Muslim fighters do not attempt to provoke international military intervention by attacking their “own” towns.’⁴⁶⁶⁷

Moreover, at the time the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs received reports from the American government that it was interested in the idea of Safe Havens. This was reported by both the political adviser to the American embassy in The Hague, Holm,⁴⁶⁶⁸ and by Ralph Johnson, who had accompanied Bartholomew on a mission to the former Yugoslavia. According to Johnson, the Americans had already investigated the practical aspects of establishing Safe Havens in Bosnia and questions remained as to their precise location, size, degree of protection and the question whether Serbian artillery stationed around the areas could be removed by force.⁴⁶⁶⁹ According to an article published in The Guardian on 12 April, the report produced by the experts who had visited Bosnia, had however received a cool reception from the State Department and the National Security Council.⁴⁶⁷⁰

Greater value could be attached to the announcement by Holm that American policy tended more towards ‘lift and strike’, lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian government and the deployment of air power for major attacks.⁴⁶⁷¹ According to Holm, lifting the arms embargo and deploying air power would constitute a logical complement to the superior manpower which the Bosnian government had at its disposal. Such a policy would have created a similar situation to that prevailing in Kosovo at the end of the 1990s when allied forces carried out bombardments and the UCK, the Albanian army, engaged in ground battle. As early as the summer of 1992 the Bosnian government had tried to make it clear to the West that it would be satisfied with a policy of ‘lift and strike’. It felt that not a single non-Bosnian would need to be deployed.⁴⁶⁷² At a later stage it would also be possible for Safe Havens to constitute part of the policy proposed by the American government, ⁴⁶⁶⁵ Objectivized summary of the minutes of the Ministerial Council meeting of 16-17/04/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁶⁶⁶ ‘Veiligheidszone Srebrenica “lichtpuntje”’ (Srebrenica safe area is ‘a ray of hope’), ANP, 17/04/93, 11.04 am.

⁴⁶⁶⁷ DAB. memorandum from Barth to Ter Beek, 21/04/93, D93/200.

⁴⁶⁶⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Kooijmans to the embassy in Washington, 20/04/93, celer 065.

⁴⁶⁶⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Bentinck 259 to Kooijmans, 24/04/93.

⁴⁶⁷⁰ Michael Gordon and Stephen Engelberg, ‘Experts urge US to intervene in Bosnia’, The Guardian, 12/04/93.

⁴⁶⁷¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Kooijmans to the embassy in Washington, 20/04/93, celer 065.

⁴⁶⁷² Simms, Hour, pp. 77-78.

according to Holm, but he stressed that it would be difficult to guarantee their safety without the deployment of more ground troops.⁴⁶⁷³

Prior to the CoPo in Brussels on 21 April, Hattinga van 't Sant headed a team in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which formulated the principles underlying Dutch policy in relation to Bosnia. With regard to what was said to be the most pressing problem, Srebrenica, the following was determined: there should be no complicity in the ethnic cleansing of Srebrenica; Srebrenica should become a Safe Haven and maximum efforts should be made to provide humanitarian assistance. Tuzla should also become a Safe Haven. Economic sanctions still appeared to be the best means of putting pressure on the Serbs to accept the Vance-Owen plan. Military action represented a last resort and acquiescing to Serb conquests represented 'a second Munich' which 'would throw the door wide open to the creation of chaos in many parts of Europe'.

On 23 April Kooijmans directed the Netherlands' Permanent Representative to NATO, L.W. Veenendaal, who had succeeded Jacobovits de Szeged shortly beforehand, to lobby the allies for the transformation of the Safe Area of Srebrenica into a Safe Haven, which would offer much greater military protection to its residents. In addition, Veenendaal was to raise the question as to what provision should be made for the protection of Zepa and Gorazde, and also Tuzla if possible, in order to prevent those areas from facing the threat of falling into the hands of the VRS like Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁷⁴

However, the European Community was more interested in the concept of Safe Areas following the adoption of Resolution 819 and in view of the fact that UNHCR had been 'converted'. During the weekend of 24 and 25 April, a week after Srebrenica had almost fallen, the EC Ministers of Foreign Affairs assembled for informal consultations in the Hindsgavl castle in Middelfart in Denmark. This meeting was largely dominated by the scheduled visit of the American Secretary of State, Christopher, to Europe, during which he was expected to outline the policy which the Clinton administration had finalized on the former Yugoslavia. In the meantime rumours were circulating that this policy would comprise the elements of 'lift and strike'. The British government, in particular, was fiercely opposed to this. It held the view that lifting the arms embargo would result in all-out war. According to the government in London, air strikes would endanger the provision of humanitarian aid and simultaneously fail to delay aggression. In addition, the Major government wished to keep its diplomatic lines of communication with Belgrade open.⁴⁶⁷⁵ With this as their starting point, the Foreign Affairs Ministers of the 12 EC member states were very successful in agreeing that no option, including the military one, should be excluded if the Vance-Owen plan was not accepted.⁴⁶⁷⁶ During their weekend in Middelfart the Foreign Affairs Ministers of the 12 EC member states mainly considered the closure of their embassies in Belgrade and limited air strikes. Furthermore, they agreed that it would be advisable to exclude Yugoslavia from UN-related meetings. Hurd called for an examination of the possibility of creating Safe Havens, especially around Srebrenica.⁴⁶⁷⁷

Naturally, Kooijmans agreed with this and he pleaded that the enclaves of Gorazde, Zepa and Tuzla should also acquire the status of well-protected Safe Havens. Of course, more ground troops would be required for this. If it was impossible to mobilize them, then Kooijmans felt they should settle for Safe Areas or Relief Zones, which offered significantly less protection. Kooijmans argued that it would be possible to provide the enclaves with better protection from the air. However, he received little support for his views.⁴⁶⁷⁸

⁴⁶⁷³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Kooijmans to the embassy in Washington, 20/04/93, celer 065.

⁴⁶⁷⁴ ABZ, 999 NAVO-WEU, isn 1197, Part 04. Kooijmans to PV NAVO, 23/04/93, celer 194.

⁴⁶⁷⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Hoekman 127 to Kooijmans, 22/04/93.

⁴⁶⁷⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Kooijmans to PV EG, 26/04/93, celer 041. It was apparently of great importance to the 12 EC member states to avoid harming trans-Atlantic relations. ('EC ministers brace for clash with US over Bosnia action', The Guardian, 26/04/93.

⁴⁶⁷⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Kooijmans to PV EG, 26/04/93, celer 041.

⁴⁶⁷⁸ ABZ, 999 NAVO-WEU, isn 1197, Part 04, Kooijmans 206 to PV NAVO, 28/04/93. See also the interview with P.H. Kooijmans, 10 September 1999. The Netherlands had also raised this matter during the CoPo meeting on 21/04/. ABZ, DPV/ARA/00112, memorandum, 'Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond' for Gymnich, 24-25/04/93, 22/04/93. See also

Public opinion in the Netherlands

Apart from covering the camps and the rapes, the media had been informing the Dutch public about the course of the conflict since the summer of 1992. In 1993 the war in Yugoslavia continued to feature prominently in the international reports carried by the printed press. In the case of the six major daily newspapers (Algemeen Dagblad, NRC Handelsblad, Het Parool, De Telegraaf, Trouw and De Volkskrant) news about the former Yugoslavia made it to the headlines 222 times, followed at a distance by the former Soviet Union (128 times) and relations between Israel and the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) (73 times). The same order was discernible in the case of leading articles (123, 94, 49) and political illustrations (89, 53, 23).⁴⁶⁷⁹ In a survey conducted amongst young people by the Stichting Krant in de Klas (Foundation for Newspapers in the Classroom), it appeared that the war in Bosnia accounted for the most important news to them in 1993.⁴⁶⁸⁰ According to another survey, in April 1993 25% of adults followed reports on the former Yugoslavia very closely, 56% did this to a reasonable degree and 18% hardly at all. These statistics barely differed from the responses to the same question in August 1992, when the debate on intervention peaked (22%, 57% and 18% respectively).⁴⁶⁸¹

However, the reports continued to emanate frequently from the Bosnian side of the lines. Yet this could also offer clarity to both the supporters and opponents of military intervention. For instance, Zeljko Knez, the commander of the Second Army Corps in Tuzla provided the Dutch freelance journalist, Clifford Cremer, with an excellent portrayal of the relative strengths of the ABiH and the VRS. Only one in every three ABiH soldiers was armed, according to Knez:

‘We are fighting against tanks with bows and arrows as it were. We have the numbers on our side and they have technology on theirs. In addition, their morale is very low. The only thing they are fighting for is a corridor to Krajina. They are therefore not fighting for their own land, as we are. They find it necessary to recruit increasingly younger boys or crooked old men. Yet they can still rely on the federal army for heavy artillery and tanks if things go wrong. This is why they can go on.’

Asked about a Western military intervention, Knez said that it was better for the Bosnians to solve their own problems:

‘Moreover, I would not like to see European boys killed on account of the policies of a few crazy politicians in Belgrade. We have enough manpower, only we do not have the weapons.... With heavy tanks and artillery we would throw the aggressors out of Bosnia without any difficulty! In order to end this war quickly, three things are necessary: one, a total flight ban above Bosnia; two, lift the arms embargo against Bosnia; and three, completely boycott Serbia.’⁴⁶⁸²

However, once conflict broke out between the Croats and Muslims in Central Bosnia, it became more difficult to explain matters to readers.⁴⁶⁸³ The then RTL journalist, Willem Lust, later complained:

DEU (coordination), memorandum, ‘Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond’ for the CoPo 21/04/93, 20/04/93; ABZ, 999.241, No Fly Zone, Part III. Kooijmans 29 to embassy Ankara, 29/04/93.

⁴⁶⁷⁹ Jan van de Plasse, ‘Meer lezers, minder annonces. De landelijke zes in ‘93’ (More readers, fewer advertisements: The national six in ‘93), De Journalist, 11/02/94, p. 25.

⁴⁶⁸⁰ This was to be the same again in 1994. ‘Belangrijk nieuws’ (Important News), De Journalist, 10/02/95, p. 7.

⁴⁶⁸¹ De Boode and Everts, Ontwikkelingen (Developments), p. 187.

⁴⁶⁸² Clifford C. Cremer, ‘Met pijl en boog tegen tank’ (Using bows and arrows against tanks), HP/De Tijd 15/01/93, p. 12.

⁴⁶⁸³ cf. Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Lessen van de oorlog op de Balkan’ in Van Es, Sampiemon and Starink (eds.), Redacteuren, p. 215.

‘Everyone I spoke to in the Netherlands, said, ‘Could you explain it again, because I do not understand a word of it!’ Look, sorry. You will simply have to read the newspaper. It is all in there. Many of the people who said that they did not understand it at all, were able to list the names of the Dutch national football team. It depends on what you are interested in. If you are not interested in it... Although I must say that we once ... hung up a small map of Bosnia listing all the battles going on in just about every valley. At a certain point the Serbs were fighting the Muslims and the Croats were fighting the Serbs. The next moment it was the Muslims against the Croats. We enlarged it and hung it on the wall. People thought it was a joke. That was the way things were. At a certain point you had different coalitions in each valley. It was difficult to make sense of everything.’⁴⁶⁸⁴

Nicole Lucas, the foreign editor and Balkan specialist at Trouw said that it also became increasingly difficult to determine who you could still believe in the conflict. ‘All you want to do is write about the events in the former Yugoslavia properly but that is almost no longer possible.’⁴⁶⁸⁵ Caroline de Gruyter referred to the conflict in Elsevier as ‘a war without goodies or baddies’.⁴⁶⁸⁶

According to De Journalist, the periodical of the NVJ (Netherlands Association of Journalists), the lack of transparency in the conflict and the many conflicting interests confused journalists, public opinion and the politicians in equal measure. At the end of 1993 one could therefore detect a certain weariness in the media in relation to the war in Bosnia, a fatigue which had its source mainly in its powerlessness to galvanize the politicians into action.⁴⁶⁸⁷ Van der Horst felt that ‘the Dutch’ had not known which side to back in the former Yugoslavia for some time already: ‘Despite international involvement and the constant presence of television cameras, the conflict has become incomprehensible. Granted, we do want to send food or money for the victims and, if necessary we will send off our boys who serve in the Royal Netherlands Army’.⁴⁶⁸⁸ In particular, the editorial introductions in HP/De Tijd regularly referred to powerlessness and indecision in relation to Bosnia, but at the same time it was stated that there were hardly any opportunities for intervention.

However, there were few indications in the public opinion polls of a declining preference for military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In a survey conducted by the NIPO in April 1993 three quarters of the respondents were in favour of military intervention with the sole aim of supporting the provision of aid. Barely fewer people favoured military intervention in order to halt the war: 71%. In August 1992 the corresponding figures had been 68% and 63% respectively. The most remarkable development was an about-turn on the part of GroenLinks (‘Green Left’). Those of its members who supported military action for the purposes of aid, rose from 50% in August 1992 to 88% in 1993, and for the purposes of ending the war, from 22% to 68%. 88% of all the respondents felt that Dutch troops should also be part of any military intervention, and 80% said that it was acceptable if Dutch soldiers died in the process.⁴⁶⁸⁹ On 25 January 1993 the NCRV current affairs television program Hier en Nu began to present a series of weekly overviews which was to continue until 21 February 1994, and which invariably ended with the words, ‘And still there is no intervention’.

The Professor of History from Utrecht and columnist for HP/De Tijd, Hans Righart, therefore felt that public opinion was exerting increasing pressure on the politicians to decide on military ⁴⁶⁸⁴ Interview W. Lust, 19 July 2000.

⁴⁶⁸⁵ PvdK, ‘Onbekende stemmen van het front’ (Unknown voices from the front), De Journalist, 23/04/93, p.10.

⁴⁶⁸⁶ Caroline de Gruyter, ‘Europa gruwet van “solo-actie van Clinton”’ (Europe abhors ‘Clinton’s solo action’), Elsevier, 08/05/1993, p. 39.

⁴⁶⁸⁷ Frits Baarda, ‘Foto’s uit Bosnië veroorzaken niets’ (Photographs from Bosnia have no effect), De Journalist, 19 November 1993, p. 18.

⁴⁶⁸⁸ A. van der Horst, ‘Tenten kun je niet eten’ (You cannot eat tents), HP/De Tijd, 23/04/93, p. 10.

⁴⁶⁸⁹ De Boode & Everts, Ontwikkelingen, pp. 187-88.

intervention, although he did not actually see any point in this. Action should really be directed against people such as Milosevic and Karadzic, who he believed were playing the roles of Hitler and Mussolini in ‘the dirty war of conquest waged by Greater Serbia’.⁴⁶⁹⁰

Nevertheless, the debate on intervention as pursued by the printed media had lost steam. The complexity of the Vance-Owen plan and the discussions held within NATO about the composition of an armed force, which occurred outside public scrutiny, led to a form of resignation on the part of those in favour of intervention. Now it was mainly the warnings uttered against intervention that resonated in the press. There was a growing disparity between organized public opinion as it was presented in the daily and weekly publications, and unorganized public opinion. In view of the broadcasts of current affairs programme Hier en Nu, television appeared to have chosen the side of the wider public.

Writing in NRC Handelsblad, Major General A.J. van Vuren stated that it would be better if the West were to desist from moving resolutions in the Security Council as long as there was no political will to implement them. The UN’s authority was only being eroded as a result.⁴⁶⁹¹ Prof. Dr. F.A.M. Alting von Geusau expected any intervention by the West in Bosnia to have an escalating rather than a calming effect.⁴⁶⁹² The journalist, Henri de By, wrote an editorial comment in HP/De Tijd, in which he noted that, however powerful NATO might seem to be, the question may be posed as to whether the alliance was equipped for the conflict in Bosnia:

‘In spite of all the Airmobile Brigades, the transformation from defence against a massive lightning attack from the East to a surgical intervention in a civil war does not seem to be a piece of cake. Saving innocent lives is most certainly an honourable goal but the ... question arises: at the cost of how many other lives? And whose? That of the neighbour’s boy, your own son or your daughter?’⁴⁶⁹³

The well-known journalist and columnist, W.L. Brugsma, was totally opposed to intervention: ‘If we see the unbearable images of Bosnia appear on our screens, it would be better for us to switch channels with the remote control than to intervene’. According to him, soldiers simply only fight well when they are defending their own relatives and country. ‘A humanist who cannot cope with these images, is at liberty to buy a one-way ticket to Sarajevo with space in the luggage rack for his rifle. He is not at liberty to send his female neighbour’s son there to defend something which is also not part of his territory from a humanitarian perspective.’⁴⁶⁹⁴ According to Lieutenant General Gé Berkhof retired, NATO military personnel shrank from deployment in the former Yugoslavia, because they feared an unclear mandate and a stay in Bosnia that might last years if not generations.⁴⁶⁹⁵

Even former supporters of military intervention found their appetite for it eroded by the Vance-Owen plan. De Kok, who had pleaded for air bombardments of the Serbian military industry and infrastructure in June 1992, stated as early as December 1992 that military intervention to end the conflict was undesirable and impossible. It was not clear what political objective intervention was to serve. There was a good chance of matters escalating in the Balkans, according to him. In addition, it could ruffle the feathers of Russian conservatives.⁴⁶⁹⁶ Mient Jan Faber declared, ‘Imagine that the ⁴⁶⁹⁰ H. Righart, ‘Het Bosnische moeras’ (The Bosnian swamp), HP/De Tijd, 16/04/93, p. 15.

⁴⁶⁹¹ A.J. van Vuren, ‘Aanscherpen van VN-sancties tegen Bosnië niet zinvol’ (Toughening UN sanctions against Bosnia makes no sense), NRC Handelsblad, 11/01/93.

⁴⁶⁹² O. van Boetzelaer, ‘Naleving Verenigde Naties-resoluties’ (Compliance with United Nations resolutions), CD/Actueel, 6/02/93, p. 15.

⁴⁶⁹³ Henri de By, ‘Götterdämmerung’, HP/De Tijd, 30/04/93, p. 7.

⁴⁶⁹⁴ W.L. Brugsma, ‘De cultureelrijke staat van de mens’ (The cultural condition of humankind), HP/De Tijd, 11 June 1993, p. 64.

⁴⁶⁹⁵ Guikje Roethof, ‘In staat van ontbinding’ (In the process of decomposition), HP/De Tijd, 30-04/93, p. 26.

⁴⁶⁹⁶ T. de Kok, ‘Voormalig Joegoslavië’ (Former Yugoslavia), CD/Actueel, 12/12/92, p. 8; ‘Voormalig Joegoslavië’, CD/Actueel, 24/04/93, p. 19.

Vance-Owen plan is accepted anyway and that NATO provides troops to implement it. This plan is so poorly put together, that the operation could simply turn out to be a major fiasco.⁴⁶⁹⁷ In an article in De Volkskrant entitled ‘Nederland heeft in Bosnië niets te zoeken’ (The Netherlands has no business to be in Bosnia), he wrote that he was disturbed by the ease with which Parliament pleaded to send Dutch troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina. Writing about the Vance-Owen plan, he posed the question as to whether Dutch troops were required to defend and perpetuate ‘this discriminatory monstrosity for many years to come’.⁴⁶⁹⁸ Lieutenant Colonel M. van den Doel, of the Instituut Clingendael (Clingendael Institute), the former military attaché in Belgrade, Brigadier General J. de Vogel retired, and the Slavic scholar from Leiden, Willem Vermeer, said that the Vance-Owen plan was too complex to produce lasting stability.⁴⁶⁹⁹

The lack of willingness on the part of the American government to contribute ground troops and the powerlessness of the European countries to make a stand for peace played into the hands of those who wished to warn against intervention. The former CDA member of Parliament, Joep de Boer, warned that any military intervention would require the involvement of the United States and Russia, a clearly defined objective and a centralized command structure. More like 100,000 troops would be required rather than 10,000 for such an operation. ‘Anything else is highly dangerous nonsense.’⁴⁷⁰⁰

Dr. Paul Hoebink, an associate of the Derde Wereld Centrum (Third World Centre) of the Catholic University of Nijmegen, was of the opinion that hardly any serious discussion still ensued in the Dutch media about the possibility and impossibility of intervention and its advantages and disadvantages.⁴⁷⁰¹ The journalist, Jan van der Ven, wrote in Het Parool that in view of the fact that the intervention debate had died down, he expected parliament would also express itself ‘in more moderate and realistic terms’. The repetition of its previous verbal abuse would ‘only highlight the impotence of small Holland, thereby casting shame on the national political process’.⁴⁷⁰² Joris Cammelbeeck noted in De Volkskrant that those favouring intervention always fell silent when the issue of ground troops was raised. However, as long as they refused to consider this option, Cammelbeeck felt that their calls for military intervention were ‘free of obligation’. According to him, there was little left to do other than ‘not intervene and hope that it blows over soon’, because he felt that a failed intervention would be worse than doing nothing. Now that the politicians had realized that one cannot create a society, Cammelbeeck believed that politicians should not continue to produce the illusion that there were indeed simple solutions for international problems.⁴⁷⁰³ Arie Elshout wrote in the same newspaper that pleas for intervention were beginning ‘to be boring’ after the former British Prime Minister, Thatcher, was reported in the BBC news on 13 April to have accused the West of cowardice and of being devoid of any conscience,⁴⁷⁰⁴ because it had not intervened forcefully in Bosnia. Because those favouring intervention never mentioned how great a chance there was that the action they recommended would even achieve anything, he wondered whether those politicians who said they were in favour of intervention, actually meant that or simply needed to say something. He quoted the American Professor of International Relations, Stephen John Stedman, who warned ‘against human hubris: the ⁴⁶⁹⁷ Guikje Roethof, ‘In staat van ontbinding’, HP/De Tijd, 30/04/93, p. 30.

⁴⁶⁹⁸ Mient Jan Faber, ‘Nederland heeft in Bosnië niets te zoeken’, de Volkskrant, 17/03/93.

⁴⁶⁹⁹ A. van der Horst, ‘Het misbaksel van Vance en Owen’ (The Frankenstein of Vance and Owen), HP/De Tijd, 21/05/1993, pp. 13-14. In relation to Van den Doel’s point of view see also Pieter den Hollander, ‘Het westen zwemt fuik van geweld binnen’ (The West stumbles into bloodbath), Algemeen Dagblad, 29/04/93

⁴⁷⁰⁰ Joep de Boer, ‘Wel of geen interventie in Joegoslavië’ (To intervene or not to intervene in Yugoslavia), CD/Actueel, 27/02/93, p. 20.

⁴⁷⁰¹ ‘Dr. Paul Hoekink: “Demokratie kun je niet afdwingen met militair ingrijpen”’ (Dr Paul Hoekink: ‘You cannot enforce democracy through military intervention’), Tribune (1993)2, 26/02/93, p. 14.

⁴⁷⁰² Van der Ven, ‘Machteloosheid’ (Impotence), Het Parool, 06/03/93.

⁴⁷⁰³ J. Cammelbeeck, ‘Mislukte interventie is erger dan niets doen’ (Failed intervention is worse than doing nothing), de Volkskrant, 30/04/93.

⁴⁷⁰⁴ Hieke Jippes, ‘Lady Thatcher valt uit naar Westen over oorlog in Bosnië’ (Lady Thatcher attacks West in relation to war in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 14/04/93.

overconfidence in the ability of the world community to take over “God’s work” and establish peace and tranquillity throughout the world through its intervention’.⁴⁷⁰⁵ Raymond van den Boogaard also believed that ‘probably well-intentioned’ politicians were attempting to do something about their feeling of disquiet in relation to the war in Yugoslavia ‘mainly in the form of empty promises’. He raised the question whether it was not time for those who influence public opinion, to convince their compatriots that war ‘is a fact of life under the circumstances’. He had few illusions about Western intervention at that point in time: ‘No one has ever helped an alcoholic abandon drink while he was determined to continue drinking’.⁴⁷⁰⁶

Oostlander was one of the few people who supported intervention and still let himself be heard. He believed that, in order to avoid an ‘Endlösung der Bosnienfrage’ by the Serbs, the CDA should support the lift-and-strike policy advocated by the American government instead of continuing to pursue the ‘third-rate politics’ of the United Nations and the European Council of Ministers.⁴⁷⁰⁷

The question was whether the change of organized public opinion – that is, the about-turn in the intervention debate – would have any effect on the Dutch parliament and the government. De Kok suspected that it would not, because he said that he expected Parliament to be more willing than the Dutch public, for example, if Safe Havens needed to be fought for. In such a case he predicted that parliament would consent to the deployment of Dutch ground troops, but he would still need to see how the Dutch public would respond if there were any casualties. ‘I think that many, very many Dutch people will wonder out loud whether those people in The Hague have not had their brains bashed in, simply to allow our boys to be shot to bits by a bunch of bandits.’⁴⁷⁰⁸

During those months the government adopted a different position from that of organized public opinion in respect of two points. In the first place, it accepted the Vance-Owen plan as its starting point, and secondly, it was quite prepared to deploy Dutch troops for this purpose. At the end of April Minister Kooijmans seized on a description of himself penned by Rob Meines in NRC Handelsblad to contrast his position against that of the Dutch critics of the peace plan. He said that for months he had let it be known that the Vance-Owen plan was the only one there was. According to him, the critics had never presented an alternative. Kooijmans felt they were certainly entitled to continue highlighting the morally reprehensible aspects of the plan, ‘because if you lose sight of the moral aspects to this type of awful issue, you will begin to get used to it as it were’. However as a minister, he had to base his decisions on different grounds, even though he sometimes found this difficult to do.⁴⁷⁰⁹

Conclusion

Apart from obtaining Izetbegovic’s signature to the map on 25 March – a signature which he felt he could withdraw at any point in time – Owen and Vance had hardly made any progress in negotiations about their peace plan since the beginning of March. Responsibility for this lay with the Bosnian-Serb leaders in the first place. While it was not new to see them defy the world, it was new that they did not appear to be susceptible to the pressure brought to bear on them by Cosic, Milosevic and Bulatovic. In addition, there were still differences between Karadzic and Mladic, which even seemed to contribute to ⁴⁷⁰⁵ Arie Elshout, ‘De illusie van het interventionisme’ (The illusion of ‘interventionism’), Het Parool, 26/04/93.

⁴⁷⁰⁶ Raymond van den Boogaard, ‘Ex-Joegoslavië dreigt proeftuin Europa te worden’, NRC Handelsblad, 26/02/93.

⁴⁷⁰⁷ Arie Oostlander, ‘Overzicht Serviërs met militaire middelen teniet doen’ (Destroy Serbian dominance by military means), CD/Actueel, 15 /05/1993, p. 15. See also Frénk van der Linden, ‘Arie Oostlander: Vance en Owen bedrijven apartheidspolitiek in Bosnië’ (Arie Oostlander: Vance and Owen are pursuing an apartheid policy in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 23/01/93; A.M. Oostlander, ‘Symbolisch nepbeleid is voor militairen levensbedreigend’ (Symbolic pseudo-policy is life-threatening to troops), Trouw, 01/05/1993.

⁴⁷⁰⁸ Ton de Kok, ‘Haagse politici valt over Bosnië geen passiviteit te verwijten’ (one cannot accuse the politicians in The Hague of being passive in relation to Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 25/03/93.

⁴⁷⁰⁹ Rob Meines, ‘De bevlogen diplomatie van minister Kooijmans’ (Minister Kooijman’s enthusiastic policy), NRC Handelsblad, 24/04/93.

a move on the part of the Bosnian-Serb army commander to torpedo the Vance-Owen peace plan by launching an offensive against Srebrenica.

Another obstacle for Owen and Vance was that it turned out to be impossible to mobilize troops to implement their plan. The American and Russian governments seemed to have agreed to this in principle in March 1993 but, when the European countries appeared to encounter difficulties making more than a few thousand troops available, enthusiasm waned rapidly in Washington and Moscow. It was telling that even someone like the American General, Powell, who absolutely did not support the deployment of troops, maintained that the Europeans were barely able to contribute to an armed force. It indicated that a major depression was about to move into the Atlantic Ocean. The European Ministers of Foreign Affairs felt this too, when they decided to keep all options on the table in connection with the former Yugoslavia at the end of April with a view to the arrival of their American counterpart, Christopher. They were under the impression that, if they did not do this, the trans-Atlantic relations would be disrupted.

The American administration's intention to wait for an agreement that was acceptable to the three warring factions in Bosnia, not only made it possible for the Bosnian government to drag out the negotiations in order to create a more favourable position for themselves in the meantime. Although not intended, the Bosnian Serbs were able to play the same card. It was eminently clear that the Clinton administration was not in too much of a hurry to intervene in developments in Bosnia. It was typical that three months after Clinton was sworn in, the American government still had not formulated a clearly defined policy on the former Yugoslavia.

It meant that the West did not determine what happened in Yugoslavia but that developments in Bosnia-Herzegovina dictated its policy. For instance, the Security Council adopted three resolutions in succession in response to events in Bosnia, namely, to enforce the flight ban, to establish Srebrenica as a Safe Area, and to tighten sanctions. The establishment of a Safe Area was particularly noteworthy. There appeared to be few people who supported this as late as early 1993. As Minister Kooijmans informed the Dutch Parliament, he saw few opportunities to promote the idea. The near fall of Srebrenica led to the sudden embrace of this idea, even though few people were aware of exactly what it was that the Security Council had embraced. In addition, no one had asked the parties on the ground whether they agreed to the establishment of a Safe Area. This meant that, in principle, one could not exclude Bosnian-Serb aggression against Srebrenica at a later stage. The overall idea that the area needed to be secured, naturally implied that it had to be protected against a certain party, in this case the Bosnian Serbs. The proclamation of a Safe Area therefore implied an element of enforcement. This element would become more pronounced if Minister Kooijmans were to obtain more support for the proposal that he presented to his European counterparts at the end of April, namely, to provide air protection to Srebrenica and any other Safe Areas against possible attacks. Naturally, the implementation of the no-fly zone also entailed a form of enforcement in UNPROFOR's peacekeeping operations, even though the rules of engagement for the pilots who were deployed were aimed at minimising the chance of an armed confrontation.

In the meantime, relations between UNPROFOR and the people whom they were supposed to be helping, had not turned out well. Clashes with the Bosnian government also occurred with growing frequency. UNPROFOR was constantly under the impression that the Bosnian government would have preferred to see it leave. The differences between the policy objectives of UNPROFOR and UNHCR on the one hand, and the Bosnian government and the ABiH on the other, were succinctly illustrated in the difficulties encountered in evacuating people from the hard-pressed town of Srebrenica, for example. Although everything was in favour of this for humanitarian reasons, the government in Sarajevo and the troops in this city, Tuzla and Srebrenica viewed it as collaboration in the process of ethnic cleansing and the achievement of the military objectives of the Bosnian Serbs. This contradiction merely presaged the difficulties which could arise between UNPROFOR and the Muslim authorities in the enclave.

When the Dutch government was investigating its potential contribution to the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan in March 1993, it again became apparent just how small this could be.

Although it had been repeatedly asserted in comments in the media from the summer of 1992, it seemed as though the government only really became aware of this in March 1993, particularly in the case of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Prime Minister Lubbers. Minister Kooijmans was rather calm and businesslike when he assumed office, although it was clear that the issue of Yugoslavia was easily capable of moving him. However, he initially guarded against making excessively assertive comments and pointed out to parliament and the press that there was not much willingness on the part of the international community to take action. Nevertheless, Kooijmans displayed emphatic behaviour on two occasions. The first time was early in March when, urged on by his officials and parliament, he called on Minister Ter Beek to provide more units for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan. The second time occurred at the end of April, when he wanted to go much further than his European counterparts by pleading to upgrade the Safe Area of Srebrenica to the status of Safe Haven, and for the extension of this status to more areas. The pressure brought to bear by the Foreign Ministry and parliament at the beginning of March in favour of a larger Dutch contribution to the possible implementation of the Vance-Owen plan had the effect of moving Minister Ter Beek to give a signal to the Chief of Defence Staff and the Royal Netherlands Army to consider the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade as soon as the first battalion was ready for this. The Airmobile Brigade represented Ter Beek's response to the message of 'We are unable', which the Defence Department had constantly been forced to utter as a result of the expenditure cuts and the problem pertaining to the voluntary deployment of national service personnel. This Airmobile Brigade also had to be the answer. This was because it was simultaneously the showpiece of the restructured Royal Netherlands Army and its 'most expensive toy'. In this, not only was the Airmobile Brigade an eligible unit in the eyes of its protagonists, but also of those who argued that Dutch taxpayers sometimes wanted to see value for their money.

Finally, Lubbers began to play a more active role in March and April. The question of Yugoslavia had continued to have an impact on him but until then the Prime Minister had devoted most of his energy into calling for more to be done or for tougher action during international conferences or on Dutch radio and television. Now other ministers were also beginning to feel the impact of his involvement, primarily Ter Beek, who noted that Lubbers was beginning to 'think through things with them'. This was very clearly expressed in Lubbers' letter calling for a 'solution' to the question of the voluntary deployment of national service personnel, while Ter Beek was in Bosnia. Ter Beek needed to be prepared for what Lubbers and his other colleagues had in store for him.

Chapter 11

Bankruptcy of the international community – the Netherlands as a catalyser: May to July 1993

1. Gloomy prospects for the Vance-Owen plan

From 21 to 25 April Owen conducted a number of intensive discussions with Cosic, Milosevic and Bulatovic, the presidents of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Serbia and Montenegro respectively. These discussions occurred in the face of the threat represented by the Security Council's Resolution 820 of 17 April, which held out the prospect of tougher sanctions if the Bosnian Serb authorities failed to accept the peace plan by 26 April. In the course of these discussions Owen emphasised that he would not accommodate the Bosnian Serbs' desire for a northern corridor. However, it would be possible to have the Vance-Owen plan provide for the road from Brcko to Derвента to be placed under UN supervision. In this case a five kilometre strip on either side of it would become a demilitarised zone. Owen made a second concession to accommodate the Bosnian-Serb position by guaranteeing that only UN troops would be stationed in Serbian areas in Croat or Muslim dominated provinces following the withdrawal of the VRS (Serbian armed forces) from those areas, and not the ABiH (Muslim armed forces) or the HVO (Croatian armed forces). However, the administration of such cities and towns would be the direct responsibility the provinces. This was because Owen was not keen on a repeat of the situation involving the UNPAs in Croatia, where UNPROFOR was responsible for their administration but was unable to act against the Serbian police force.⁴⁷¹⁰ According to Owen, all three presidents were interested in hearing about these changes, especially because Milosevic feared the stricter sanctions that had been announced.⁴⁷¹¹ On 25 April Milosevic invited Karadzic, the President of the Republika Srpska, and the Praesidium member, Krajisnik, to Belgrade for a joint meeting with Owen. Krajisnik's presence was important, because, although Karadzic might personally be prepared to accept the Vance-Owen plan, on account of his Montenegrin origin he did not wish to adopt a less militant approach than Krajisnik, the 'real Serb'. The latter was known as Mr No.⁴⁷¹² He appeared to be utterly opposed to the plan, thereby preventing Karadzic from accepting it.⁴⁷¹³ During the meeting that Owen and Milosevic held with Karadzic and Krajisnik, the two Bosnian-Serb leaders seemed to agree to the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁷¹⁴

Immediately afterwards they left for the Bosnian-Serb parliament, which had assembled in Bijeljina that day to discuss the plan, which it had previously rejected during the weekend of 3 and 4 April. In the course of the evening Milosevic received reports from Bijeljina that the Bosnian-Serb Parliament's opinion was not particularly favourable with respect to the peace plan.⁴⁷¹⁵ The presidential trio of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, that is to say, Cosic, Milosevic and Bulatovic, drew up a letter at about midnight, in which they bluntly urged acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan and warned that its rejection would lead to the international isolation of the rump Yugoslavia and the Republika Srpska. The Bosnian Serbs were told that they were no longer entitled to expose the 10 million ⁴⁷¹⁰ Owen CD-ROM, From Lord Owen to Douglas Hurd, 21/04/93; Lord Owen's message to foreign minister Kozyrev, 27/04/93.

⁴⁷¹¹ Owen, Odyssey, p. 153.

⁴⁷¹² P. Michielsen, 'Momcilo Krajisnik. Doorgewinterde extremist' (Momcilo Krajisnik: Veteran extremist), NRC Handelsblad, 4/4/ 2000.

⁴⁷¹³ Interview V. Jovanovic 14/09/01. The fact that Krajisnik was a hawk, is also clear from the interview V. Matovic, 16/12/99.

⁴⁷¹⁴ Owen, Odyssey, p. 153.

⁴⁷¹⁵ Owen, Odyssey, p. 153.

inhabitants of Yugoslavia to sanctions through their stubborn attitude. The Foreign Affairs Minister of the rump Yugoslavia, Jovanovic, was sent to Bijeljina by helicopter to read it out in the Parliament early in the morning. After this, the Parliament decided not to make any decision itself about the plan but to present it to the people of the Republika Srpska three weeks later in the weekend of 15 and 16 May.⁴⁷¹⁶

Every postponement of a decision about the plan was a disaster. The military relations between the parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina were becoming more complex with each passing day. At the end of April fighting broke out between the Muslims and Bosnian Croats in Mostar. Apart from the latter, these parties were also battling each other in Maglaj, Vitez, Fojnica, Kiseljak and Jablanica. On the other hand, in Tuzla and to the north of it they were fighting together against the VRS. To make it even more complicated, the Croats received support from the VRS in Maglaj.

In the meantime Vance withdrew as a mediator as he already had announced he would in February. On 1 May 1993 he was succeeded by Thorvald Stoltenberg, who had acted as Norway's Minister of Foreign Affairs from 1987 to 1993 and had played an important role as a mediator in the Middle East. The choice of Stoltenberg as a mediator was unfortunate. At first glance it seemed to be an advantage that he had served as a diplomat in Belgrade between 1961 and 1964. However, this background and statements Stoltenberg is said to have made to the effect that the Bosnian Croats and Muslims were in fact 'ethnic Serbs' and that the war in Bosnia was a socio-economic conflict between poor Serbian farmers and wealthy Muslims,⁴⁷¹⁷ soon earned him a reputation as a Serb supporter.⁴⁷¹⁸ In addition, Stoltenberg had little perception of developments in Bosnia itself, where he was represented by Sergio Vieira de Mello in Sarajevo.⁴⁷¹⁹ He therefore enjoyed little prestige and authority as a UN envoy.⁴⁷²⁰

On 1 May two important Americans travelled from Washington to Europe. The first was Christopher, who was to visit various European capitals in an attempt to synchronise American and European endeavours with regard to the manner in which they approached the former Yugoslavia. The second was Bartholomew, who was en route to Athens. The Greek Prime Minister, Konstantin Mitsotakis, had invited Karadzic and Koljevic to persuade them to agree to the Vance-Owen plan in the presence of Milosevic, Cosic, Bulatovic, Owen and Stoltenberg. Karadzic again came under intense pressure from Milosevic and Cosic during the meeting in Athens. Finally, Karadzic yielded on 2 May but he also mentioned that the Bosnian-Serb parliament would need to do likewise in several days' time.

2. The Dutch Government en route to the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade

On 28 April the Dutch Minister of Development Aid, Pronk, announced on the radio that the Bosnian-Serb authorities would 'probably' only start taking the negotiations seriously again following 'large-scale military operations'. He felt that the international community was evading its responsibility by constantly asserting that military intervention would endanger humanitarian aid.⁴⁷²¹ Pronk publicly expressed the mood currently prevailing within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The day before the directie Europa (European directorate) had already concluded that there was little point in pursuing the negotiations headed by Owen and Vance. According to the directorate, the Security Council needed to adopt a resolution which permitted air strikes on Serbian supply routes and heavy artillery. The ⁴⁷¹⁶ Owen CD-ROM, Message from Cosic, Milosevic and Bulatovic to the Bosnian Serb Parliament, 26/04/93; Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1334-37; interview V. Jovanovic 14 September 2001; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. COREU message from the Danish Presidency of the EC, 27/04/93, cpe/pres/cop 923. With regard to the negative response of the Bosnian Serbs to the letter, see Buha, Arguments, pp. 109-10.

⁴⁷¹⁷ Cuvalo, Dictionary, p. 231.

⁴⁷¹⁸ Interview B. Pellnass, 03/11/99.

⁴⁷¹⁹ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

⁴⁷²⁰ ABZ, Kabinetsarchief: Coll. Van den Broek. Correspondence M/colleagues (Defence Department) 1994, Voorhoeve to Van Mierlo, 31/08/94.

⁴⁷²¹ Radio 1, VARA, Woensdageditie (Wednesday edition), 28/04/1993, 7.07 am.

anticipated alternative was that the Bosnian Serbs would not be prepared to cooperate in the implementation of any peace plan. In order to protect the Bosnian Muslims more Safe Areas needed to be established and the UN member states would have to be asked to provide ground troops for this purpose.⁴⁷²² In a directive which he issued to the Netherlands' permanent representative to NATO, Veenendaal, on 28 April, Minister Kooijmans went along with this policy and added that consideration should be given to lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian Government with a view to changing the relations of power in Bosnia.⁴⁷²³ As it happens, shortly before this the DAV (Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs) had again listed all the benefits and drawbacks of lifting the embargo. In this respect the disadvantages had still outweighed the advantages.⁴⁷²⁴

Partly in response to the statements made by Minister Pronk, the D66 member, Eisma, had requested a parliamentary debate to ascertain whether the Minister's remarks were shared by the government. In addition, he wished to be informed about the outcome of European deliberations in Denmark and about the possible enforcement of the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁷²⁵ Throughout 1992 Ter Beek had felt that during Cabinet meetings Van den Broek and Pronk had wanted to go much further than he did in relation to the Netherlands' military deployment in the Yugoslavian conflict.⁴⁷²⁶ As he perceived it, he felt that those he faced were 'almost all hawks'.

'Who was in the vanguard? There was Pronk and Ien Dales, and they were almost always supported by Hirsch Ballin. He did not often get involved in the discussions but, if he did, he usually agreed with Pronk. I can recall a discussion during a Cabinet meeting in which our moral temperature was taken, particularly by Ien Dales of Kerk en Wereld (Church and World) ... that one could not simply allow all these things to happen.'⁴⁷²⁷

In addition, Ter Beek felt that Lubbers and Kooijmans 'were constantly inconvenienced in that they wanted more but the Minister of Defence could not deliver it'. The line of reasoning always amounted to this: 'How is it possible that such a large military force is unable to do more?'⁴⁷²⁸ Pronk conceded this later on: 'Then there were no pilots or the army did not have the means. It could therefore never be deployed. There was always something. This represents a bit of the impatience of someone who is not a Defence specialist.'⁴⁷²⁹ Van der Vlis also believed that Lubbers 'was very clearly one of those who felt that more needed to be done'.⁴⁷³⁰

Another Cabinet meeting was held again on 3 May, during which the situation prevailing in the former Yugoslavia was discussed extensively. However, this time Ter Beek acknowledged defeat in advance. The day after Pronk made his statements about large-scale military intervention Minister Ter Beek announced that he supported Pronk's position in the course of a speech given on the occasion of the university days for peace in Groningen on 29 April. Ter Beek stated that he was also in favour of military intervention to end the war in the former Yugoslavia. In addition, he described the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade as indispensable to ensure compliance with international peace agreements as in Cambodia and Yugoslavia: 'It represents a means with which the Netherlands can express its involvement. This involvement is more urgently required than ever before. Political declarations and ⁴⁷²² ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Memorandum from DEU to Kooijmans, 27/4/ 1993, no. deu/122.

⁴⁷²³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans 206 to NATO permanent representative, 28/4/ 1993.

⁴⁷²⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Memorandum from DAV to Kooijmans, 21/4/93, MS-90/93.

⁴⁷²⁵ Radio 1, NCRV, Hier en nu (Here and now), 28/4/93, 5.07 pm; 'Kamer wil duidelijkheid over militair ingrijpen Bosnië' (Parliament wants clarity about military intervention in Bosnia), ANP, 28/04/93, 3.48 pm.

⁴⁷²⁶ L. Ornstein and M. van Weezel, 'Het warme bad en de koude douche van Relus ter Beek' (A hot bath and cold shower for Relus ter Beek), Vrij Nederland, 12/12/92, p. 10.

⁴⁷²⁷ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁴⁷²⁸ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁴⁷²⁹ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁴⁷³⁰ NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Interview A.K. van der Vlis, 30/03/95.

financial aid are not enough.⁴⁷³¹ Deputy Prime Minister Kok also aired his views before Cabinet met. During the PvdA's Labour Day festivities in Wageningen he stated that the Netherlands should cooperate with any military intervention in Bosnia if the Bosnian-Serb Parliament, which was scheduled to sit again on 5 May, rejected the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁷³²

When the situation in ex-Yugoslavia was dealt with in the Cabinet meeting of 3 May, one of the ministers said that he was not optimistic about the chances of the Bosnian-Serb Parliament accepting the plan, even after Karadzic's about-turn in Athens. If Karadzic would indeed reject the plan, he supported the idea of the UN establishing 'safe areas', which could be protected with the aid of air strikes, amongst other things. As it happened, this minister did not consider it likely that the American Government would support the idea of 'safe areas'. According to him, Washington was on course towards lift-and-strike bombardments of Serbian supply lines and positions, and towards lifting the arms embargo against Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁴⁷³³

During this Cabinet meeting another minister showed himself to be a master in outlining other dilemmas. He noted that it appeared from the repeatedly disappointing experience of the European Council, that the latter lacked any feeling of responsibility for developments in the former Yugoslavia. The role of the United Nations and the Security Council, in particular, was overestimated, he felt. The relevant minister received support from one of his colleagues for his idea that it would be better if NATO were to act. However, this speaker held the view that the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation was experiencing an identity crisis, with the result that NATO generals did not have a political frame of reference. Another minister added that it would be risky to raise the Yugoslavia issue in a NATO Council meeting at that point in time, because this would probably reveal the existence of a closed front of European countries which were not very keen on far-reaching action. According to him, it would be best first to await the bilateral discussions with Christopher which were scheduled to occur within several days' time.⁴⁷³⁴

The Cabinet meeting created the opportunity to agree to both the establishment of 'safe areas' and attacks on Serbian supply routes, if the Vance-Owen plan was rejected. In addition, the Foreign Affairs and Defence Departments were to engage in interdepartmental consultations about the Netherlands' contribution to an implementation force, for which NATO now estimated it would require at least 75,000 troops,⁴⁷³⁵ in the event that the peace plan was accepted. However, it was noted in the course of the Cabinet meeting that at that stage the European allies had not yet managed to raise more than 40% of the division which they would be required to provide in this case. This was due to the fact that no contribution could be expected from Germany, Italy and Greece, while any input from Turkey would raise problems owing to anticipated resistance on the part of the Serbs. If no European division was available, it was probable that the American Government would also not provide a division. A Russian division could only be requested, if there was certainty about the American and European divisions.⁴⁷³⁶

According to one of the ministers, the signals and transport which were already active as well as an additional logistics unit of 400 troops, meant that the Royal Netherlands Army had reached the limits of what it could contribute, in view of the requisite voluntary nature of the deployment of national service personnel. If it was decided to conduct aerial bombardments, the Netherlands could ⁴⁷³¹ 'Ter Beek: pas ingrijpen als effecten duidelijk zijn' (Ter Beek: Only intervene once the effects are clear), ANP, 29/04/93, 6.48 pm.

⁴⁷³² 'Kok wil militaire ingreep in Bosnië' (Kok wants military intervention in Bosnia), De Telegraaf, 03/05/93. See also Kok's statements on Radio 1, AVRO, radio news, 03/05/93, 12.05 pm.

⁴⁷³³ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁷³⁴ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁷³⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Jacobovits NATO 680 to Kooijmans, 23/04/93.

⁴⁷³⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

contribute the F-16s that were stationed in Italy as part of Operation Deny Flight. These aircraft, which were equipped for air combat at that point in time, could be fitted with weapons for bombardments within 24 hours.⁴⁷³⁷

Various ministers emphatically asked whether this indeed represented all that the Defence Department was capable of doing. One of them reminded the meeting that Government policy had always been that the Netherlands would be prepared to do all that it was technically capable of accomplishing in order to tackle the conflict in Yugoslavia, with the exception of lifting the arms embargo. Another minister remarked that he had heard that the Defence Department would be able to provide the Airmobile Brigade at some time in the future.⁴⁷³⁸ Minister Ter Beek later said that there was a collective sigh of relief in the meeting when he announced that the prospect of having the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade ready for deployment by the end of 1993, could be presented during international consultations about the Netherlands' contribution to an armed force for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan. 'It was,' said Minister Ter Beek, 'an announcement that alleviated any feeling of discomfort on the part of many who attended the meeting: "Now why can we not do anything?"'"⁴⁷³⁹ Once Ter Beek had made this remark, the Cabinet meeting urged the Defence Department to do everything in its power to increase the Netherlands' contribution.⁴⁷⁴⁰ This final passage in the minutes of the meeting was a source of encouragement for everyone to do all in their power to achieve this, even the officials who read these minutes.⁴⁷⁴¹

It appeared that Minister Ter Beek had already decided in mid-March to indicate to Van der Vlis and Couzy that they needed to make allowances for the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade in ex-Yugoslavia in the future. However, at the beginning of April, it was decided to refrain from mentioning this possibility to NATO, to the disappointment of the Foreign Affairs Department. Nevertheless, one or more Foreign Ministry officials – presumably Van Eenennaam in any case – had already suggested this possibility in the course of contact with diplomats accredited to the Dutch Government. This became the official line after this Cabinet meeting. If it had not yet been understood in the Defence Department, the need for the expeditious preparation of the Airmobile Brigade was clear after this meeting.

Another position adopted by the Cabinet meeting that needs to be addressed briefly, is the different view assumed by the Dutch Government towards selectively lifting the arms embargo. Although the Dutch Government found it very important to involve the American administration in the search for a solution to the problems in Bosnia,⁴⁷⁴² it did not wish to budge in this respect. The possibility of lifting the arms embargo had been discussed in the Dutch Foreign Ministry shortly before this, but again the disadvantages appeared to outweigh the benefits in the eyes of the relevant Dutch officials. It was anticipated that lifting the arms embargo would not turn the military tide in favour of the Bosnian Government forces immediately nor perhaps in the long term either. It was felt that there was a risk that the Russian Federation would respond by supplying weapons to Serbia, which would render the situation entirely unmanageable. In addition, the supply of arms to the Bosnian Government could increase tensions between the Muslims and the Croats, whom the former merely considered to be tactical allies in the most favourable case.⁴⁷⁴³

⁴⁷³⁷ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁷³⁸ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁷³⁹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁴⁷⁴⁰ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁷⁴¹ Interview W. Kok on 08/05/00 and A.L. ter Beek on 01/12/99.

⁴⁷⁴² Cf. interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁴⁷⁴³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. Memorandum, 'Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond' (Former Yugoslavia: Background) for Gymnich, 24-25/04/93, 22/04/93. See also the memorandum, 'Voormalig Joegoslavië. Achtergrond' for the CoPo 21/04/93, 20/04/93.

3. The rejection of the Vance-Owen plan

On 5 and 6 May Bosnian-Serb Parliament assembled in Pale to discuss the Vance-Owen peace plan for the third time. Those present included Milosevic, Cosic and Bulatovic, who apparently did not want to be surprised again as they had been on 25 and 26 April. The Greek Prime Minister, Mitsotakis, who was the guiding hand responsible for Karadzic's conditional agreement to the plan, also attended this parliamentary session. Karadzic explained why Parliament should accept the plan. However, it was a feeble presentation. Mladic, on the other hand, squarely opposed the plan.⁴⁷⁴⁴ Plavsic, who had already insulted Jovanovic on 26 April, when he read out the letter from the three presidents,⁴⁷⁴⁵ again revealed her opposition, amongst other things, by refusing to shake Milosevic's hand upon his arrival in Pale. All the guests who were in attendance, strongly urged Parliament to accept the plan. Milosevic spoke twice but was under the impression that Mladic had more influence over the delegates than he did, and in the course of his second address said, 'I really do not know what else you want'. According to him, the hostile attitude adopted by the Bosnian Serbs would give Izetbegovic exactly what he really wanted: military intervention.⁴⁷⁴⁶ After meeting for 17 hours the parliament rejected the plan by 51 votes to two with 12 abstentions. However, it proposed to give the Serbian people the final say in the previously agreed referendum scheduled for 15 and 16 May.

Milosevic was utterly astounded that the Bosnian Serbs did not do as he wished.⁴⁷⁴⁷ He was so angry that he called them everything under the sun.⁴⁷⁴⁸ For example, he described Mladic as 'clinically insane'.⁴⁷⁴⁹ According to a Serbian journalist, Milosevic was 'radioactive' with rage at the end of the debate.⁴⁷⁵⁰ This anger was not feigned.⁴⁷⁵¹ Milosevic was enraged with the Bosnian Serbs for allowing Serbia's economic problems to persist because of their position. That very same day he closed the border between Serbia and Bosnia, making exceptions only for food and medicine. Bosnian-Serb leaders were denied access to Serbia. It is debatable whether Milosevic's embargo against the Republika Srpska was effective. In interviews with the NIOD various international observers have expressed the view that Belgrade's sanctions had little effect.⁴⁷⁵² Nevertheless, at the time independent observers assumed that no more than 5% of Serbia's sharply reduced gross domestic product found its way to Krajina and the Republika Srpska.⁴⁷⁵³ In any event Serbs in the Republika Srpska were deeply offended by Milosevic's official decision and the obstacles this raised for the movement of highly placed Bosnian Serbs.⁴⁷⁵⁴ Milosevic had apparently had more than enough of the attitude of the Bosnian-Serb leaders. Already before the rejection of the Vance-Owen plan, General Radovan Radinovic, a senior general in the Yugoslavian army who maintained close ties with Milosevic, had revealed that, while the Belgrade authorities would indeed consider the lifting of the international arms embargo against the Bosnian Government as a negative step, they would not regard it as an act of war.⁴⁷⁵⁵

⁴⁷⁴⁴ With regard to Mladic's actions during this meeting, see for example Charles Lane, 'Dateline Bosnia: Beyond Pale' in Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 86.

⁴⁷⁴⁵ Interview V. Jovanovic, 14/09/01; Doder and Branson, Milosevic, p. 182.

⁴⁷⁴⁶ Cohen, Bonds, p. 264.

⁴⁷⁴⁷ Stojanovic, Fall, pp. 172-73.

⁴⁷⁴⁸ Interview S. Djukic, 04/08/01.

⁴⁷⁴⁹ Djukic, Milosevic, p. 70.

⁴⁷⁵⁰ Cohen, Bonds, p. 264.

⁴⁷⁵¹ Morillon, Credo, pp. 140-41; idem, Paroles, p. 77.

⁴⁷⁵² See for example, the interview B. Ashton, 30/05/00; confidential interview (9).

⁴⁷⁵³ Calic, Frage, p. 150.

⁴⁷⁵⁴ Interview M. Deronjic on 03/11/99 and D. Milovanovic on 22/03/00. See also Doder and Branson, Milosevic, p. 187; 'Karadzic in Servië ongewenst persoon' (Karadzic persona non grata in Serbia), Het Parool, 10/05/93.

⁴⁷⁵⁵ Simms, Hour, p. 82.

4. Parliament almost unanimous in requiring the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade

After the Cabinet meeting on 3 May Kooijmans reported to Parliament that the heightened fighting in Bosnia-Herzegovina, amongst other things, the Serbian attacks on the Muslim enclaves in Eastern Bosnia, underscored the need for the international community to do its utmost to end the war there. The Vance-Owen plan should remain the basis for doing this.⁴⁷⁵⁶ During subsequent consultations with the Foreign Affairs and Defence committees on 6 May 1993 Kooijmans expressed the Dutch Government's great disappointment following the Bosnian-Serb parliament's rejection of the Vance-Owen plan in Pale. As a result the chance of mobilising a peacekeeping force to supervise the implementation of the plan was 'noticeably smaller'.⁴⁷⁵⁷ The alternative establishment of Safe Areas had only become more relevant as a result, according to the Minister. He hoped to discuss this the following day with his American counterpart, Christopher, who had been travelling around Europe for bilateral contact for several days, and also hoped to encourage their establishment during the meeting of the EC's General Council on 10 May 'because this would have the most immediate humanitarian effect' and 'in spite of the fact that insufficient troops were available for the protection of these areas'.⁴⁷⁵⁸ Moreover, these Safe Areas – in this respect the Minister was mainly considering Zepa, Gorazde and Tuzla – could be protected from the air. The Members of Parliament agreed with the Minister that the time was not yet ripe to lift the arms embargo against Bosnia-Herzegovina. They also agreed to the possible deployment of Dutch F-16s for the establishment of safe havens.

In addition, they wondered whether the government or the Netherlands could offer assistance in the form of ground troops. Some members of Parliament were annoyed that suggestions had been published in the press, such as those made by Pronk, without parliament having been notified. De Kok pointed out that the junior minister for Defence had initially announced that the Dutch Government could not provide any more troops but a day later stated that perhaps 300 logistics personnel might be available. He asked whether an armoured infantry battalion could also perhaps be deployed.⁴⁷⁵⁹

Valk felt that the time had come for the Western community to say 'Enough is enough'. He was in favour of increasing pressure on the Bosnian Serbs, because he felt that the credibility of the international community was now at stake. In addition, he called for the rapid establishment of 'safe areas' in parts where Muslims still lived. The PvdA member did not incidentally wish to preclude the possibility that the Vance-Owen plan might yet be implemented. In this connection, he again asked the minister of Defence to examine whether the Netherlands could make an additional military contribution, even though it was already doing a great deal: 'For instance, we could examine whether the Airmobile Brigade could start exercising with heavy equipment in the coming months, after which units of this brigade could perhaps commence action'.⁴⁷⁶⁰

Blaauw also felt that the position of the Bosnian Serbs 'had reached ... the mark ... even ... overstepped it'.⁴⁷⁶¹ The international community now had to ready military resources in order to implement the Vance-Owen plan once a resolution to this effect had been adopted by the Security Council. Apart from deploying the Dutch F-16s to secure the Safe Areas, for example, the VVD member felt that the Netherlands should also be prepared to send in ground troops. In this connection, he was also considering the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade, which had originally been destined to relieve the marines in Cambodia at the end of 1993. Perhaps this would no longer be required by that time and this battalion could comprise the infantry component of a mechanised armoured battalion. This brigade therefore needed to learn how to operate armoured vehicles, so that they might ⁴⁷⁵⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 46.

⁴⁷⁵⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 1.

⁴⁷⁵⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 2.

⁴⁷⁵⁹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 3.

⁴⁷⁶⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 4.

⁴⁷⁶¹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 4.

perhaps be deployed to protect Safe Areas within four to six months or to provide greater protection for humanitarian convoys.⁴⁷⁶² Sipkes also asked whether the troops of the Airmobile Brigade could be deployed following supplementary training.⁴⁷⁶³ Whereas two months earlier De Hoop Scheffer had been the only Member of Parliament to call for the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade explicitly, Parliament was now almost unanimous in its desire for this. The only Member of Parliament who was reluctant to see the deployment of ground troops for Safe Areas, was Van Middelkoop. He wanted to know what long-term goal was envisaged for the Safe Areas: 'It is one thing to start this but what steps will need to be taken subsequently?'⁴⁷⁶⁴

In his reply Minister Kooijmans again recommended Safe Areas. According to the Minister, their structure would be defensive: they will 'after all, only be used to defend the civilian population',⁴⁷⁶⁵ In addition, they would be situated in areas which would largely have a Muslim majority according to the Vance-Owen plan: 'The ultimate objective of establishing Safe Areas is therefore to ensure that it remains possible to implement this plan if it is accepted in due course'.⁴⁷⁶⁶ Ter Beek sided with this position expressis verbis.⁴⁷⁶⁷

The Minister of Defence declared that, if the Vance-Owen plan were to be accepted, the Netherlands would be prepared to provide ground troops to implement it. In addition to the communications and transport battalions, the Netherlands would provide a tailor-made logistics battalion comprising some 400 troops. Ter Beek said it was impossible to send in an armoured infantry battalion, because it appeared that not enough national service personnel were available for this. An armoured infantry battalion consisting exclusively of career personnel would only be available in 1996.⁴⁷⁶⁸ Ter Beek informed Parliament that the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade was scheduled to complete its training in November. An additional period of training of two months would be required if it was to be deployed as an armoured infantry battalion. '... We are investigating the possibility. I am not saying it is impossible,' Ter Beek is reported to have said during the debate. According to a journalist: 'In the face of considerable pressure from Parliament, Minister Ter Beek (Defence) undertook to examine whether the Airmobile Brigade could be deployed in Bosnia-Herzegovina'.⁴⁷⁶⁹ The general language in which the report of this debate was formulated, is less explicit on this point. Nevertheless, the announcement which the Minister is reported to have made, to the effect that international alternatives were being examined to use armoured vehicles which were not part of the Netherlands' equipment, constituted a clear indication to a discerning reader of what the Minister intended to do.⁴⁷⁷⁰ Apparently, there was no need for Parliament to exert such heavy pressure. The Minister was already doing what Parliament was asking of him.

5. Christopher's trip

At the end of April a Security Council fact-finding mission headed by the Venezuelan diplomat, Diego Arria, had paid a visit to the former Yugoslavia. It also visited the Srebrenica enclave. Although the mission concluded that Srebrenica resembled an open-air prison, it also recommended that the 'safe area' concept be extended to enclaves such as Gorazde, Zepa and Tuzla.⁴⁷⁷¹ Because some of these areas – Zepa in particular – were on the verge of falling to Bosnian-Serb aggression, just as Srebrenica had been in the past, in the night of 6 to 7 May the Security Council adopted Resolution 824, in which ⁴⁷⁶² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 5.

⁴⁷⁶³ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 7.

⁴⁷⁶⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 8.

⁴⁷⁶⁵ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 9.

⁴⁷⁶⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 10.

⁴⁷⁶⁷ Ibid. This view was repeated in TK, session of 1992-1993, 22 151, no. 50, p. 3.

⁴⁷⁶⁸ See also TK, session of 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 48.

⁴⁷⁶⁹ 'Kans op inzet in Bosnië van onze brigade' (Chance that our brigade may be deployed in Bosnia), De Telegraaf, 07/05/93.

⁴⁷⁷⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 51, p. 12. cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 98.

⁴⁷⁷¹ UN, S/25700; interview D. Arria, 10/05/00.

it also declared Sarajevo, Zepa, Gorazde, Tuzla and Bihac to be Safe Areas in addition to Srebrenica. No further attacks against these areas were to be allowed and the VRS troops were to be withdrawn so far away from them that they no longer constituted a threat to them. In addition, the resolution required that UNPROFOR personnel be afforded unimpeded access to these areas. The resolution did not refer to the demilitarisation of Safe Areas. An additional 50 military observers were to be deployed to monitor the humanitarian situation in these areas. As a result the Serbs were still able to treat these areas as targets. In addition, the non-aligned countries, who supported this resolution, were aware that the United Nations did not have enough resources to deploy in these Safe Areas. The idea was that only 20 to 30 troops would be deployed in each Safe Area as a symbol of UN involvement in securing the well-being of the people concerned. 'The idea would not be to physically protect the town but raise the political price of any aggression,' Annan wrote to Wahlgren.⁴⁷⁷² Apparently, not everyone was sure that the Bosnian-Serb authorities had any respect for the international community. Following the adoption of this resolution, America's permanent representative to the UN, Albright, made things quite clear by saying that the actions of the Serbs would determine whether the use of force by the international community would be inevitable.⁴⁷⁷³

UNPROFOR Commander Wahlgren was not jubilant about the new resolution. However limited the duties of UNPROFOR troops might be in a Safe Area, he felt that at least a company needed to be stationed in each area. This deployment would draw troops away from UNPROFOR's primary duties, the protection of humanitarian aid convoys.⁴⁷⁷⁴ In addition, Wahlgren thought that, owing to their limited numbers, the UN troops stationed in the enclaves could fall victim to acts of violence perpetrated by either Serbs or Muslims.⁴⁷⁷⁵ On 3 June Wahlgren warned New York that the Safe Areas could act as bases for attacks by Muslim fighters. The Serbs would want to attack them for the same reason. There was a danger of the conflict intensifying. He drew a comparison with the war in Vietnam.⁴⁷⁷⁶

The resolution came too late for the Dutch morning newspapers of 7 May. They could only report on the position adopted by Minister Kooijmans in Parliament the day before. 'If Dutch politicians were able to control the world at some stage, the conflict in the former Yugoslavia would not have got so out of hand as it has,' Leonoor Meijer wrote with irony in Trouw.⁴⁷⁷⁷ Foregoing irony, the leading article in that morning's Algemeen Dagblad concluded in response to the Bosnian-Serb parliament's rejection of the Vance-Owen plan that one had to seriously doubt the ability of the international community 'to respond to this idiocy'. It was clear to the commentator that, if no military intervention followed now, 6 May 1993 would enter history as a black day. It would 'not be easy to explain this disgrace to the generations that follow us'.⁴⁷⁷⁸

While these morning newspapers were falling on Dutch doormats, Minister Kooijmans found himself in Bonn for a discussion with Christopher. During a meeting held by President Clinton with his most important formulators of American policy on ex-Yugoslavia on 1 May, almost everyone present had appeared to support a policy of lift and strike. Only Aspin was opposed to this, as was the American Intelligence Service, who feared that such a policy would incite the Albanians in Kosovo to revolt.⁴⁷⁷⁹ With the knowledge that lift and strike represented the dominant policy preference in Washington, Christopher had left for Europe several hours later.⁴⁷⁸⁰

⁴⁷⁷² Shawcross, Evil, p. 101.

⁴⁷⁷³ Shawcross, Evil, p. 100.

⁴⁷⁷⁴ Shawcross, Evil, p. 101.

⁴⁷⁷⁵ Stoltenberg and Eide, Dagene, p. 92.

⁴⁷⁷⁶ Honig and Both, Srebrenica, p. 167.

⁴⁷⁷⁷ L. Meijer, 'Nederland in drama Bosnië machteloos' (The Netherlands is powerless in Bosnian drama), Trouw, 07/05/93.

⁴⁷⁷⁸ 'Zwarte dag' (Black day), Algemeen Dagblad, 07/05/93.

⁴⁷⁷⁹ Patrick Glynn, 'See No Evil' in Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 136.

⁴⁷⁸⁰ Daalder, Dayton, pp. 15 and 87; Drew, Edge, p. 155.

Christopher's trip was typified by inexperience on the part of Clinton, who did not fully understand the extent to which the rest of the world waited for America to take the initiative.⁴⁷⁸¹ While Christopher was en route, Clinton told his advisers in Washington that he was impressed by the book, Balkan Ghosts, by Kaplan, from which he had drawn the conclusion that it would be better for the United States not to become involved in the conflict in view of how deep-seated violence was in the Balkans. Christopher was immediately informed that the president no longer fully supported the policy which had been virtually unanimously adopted on 1 May.⁴⁷⁸² Indeed, it had already been decided beforehand that Christopher would not be permitted to present America's preferred policy of lift and strike as a fait accompli in the European capitals.⁴⁷⁸³ It would probably have been possible for him to persuade the Western European leaders with a single utterance of power, but this would have made Bosnia America's problem and the Clinton administration definitely did not want this.⁴⁷⁸⁴ To Washington the Yugoslavian issue remained a European problem. The American Government was prepared to make a contribution to a multilateral approach at most. As his briefs for discussion in London indicated, Christopher had come 'in a listening mode'.⁴⁷⁸⁵ This gave both the Europeans and the Americans the impression that the Washington administration sought support for a policy they did not wish to fight for.⁴⁷⁸⁶

Together with the fact that the European leaders still needed to get used to Christopher's soft-spoken attitude, the American approach merely sewed the seeds of confusion in the capitals of Europe, which were used to America dictating the way.⁴⁷⁸⁷ Karadzic had contributed to this confusion by agreeing to the Vance-Owen plan in Athens on 2 May.⁴⁷⁸⁸ Even though there were reasonable doubts as to how firm Karadzic's agreement was, Christopher now had to make allowances for two policy options. Either the Bosnian-Serb parliament would not agree to the peace plan and lift and strike remained a possibility, or the people's representatives would agree to the plan and there would be no room for a policy of lift and strike. In the latter case an implementation force would need to be mobilised as soon as possible. The indecisiveness which was so typical of Christopher's trip appeared to have contributed to the rejection of the Vance-Owen plan. In Pale it soon became obvious that Christopher was not wielding a club when he travelled to Europe.⁴⁷⁸⁹

In London, the city which was Christopher's first port of call on his round trip, Prime Minister Major stated that he was utterly opposed to a lift-and-strike policy. He believed that his government would fall if he were to present this to Parliament.⁴⁷⁹⁰ As soon as Christopher left London en route for Paris, the media immediately began to report that the Americans had not decided on a policy for Bosnia and had no idea what was happening there.⁴⁷⁹¹ The French Government told Christopher that in itself it understood America's preference for lift and strike but believed that, if this policy were to be implemented, French troops in Bosnia would fall victim to Serbian retaliation.⁴⁷⁹² President Yeltsin and his Minister of Foreign Affairs, Kozyrev, were fiercely opposed because at that point in time they believed that a breakthrough was imminent in respect of the Vance-Owen peace plan, as the parliament ⁴⁷⁸¹ Michael Dobbs, 'Bosnia Crystallizes U.S. Post-Cold War Role', The Washington Post, 3 December 95.

⁴⁷⁸² Christopher, Stream, p. 347; Drew, Edge, p. 157; Michael Dobbs, 'Bosnia Crystallizes U.S. Post-Cold War Role', The Washington Post, 03/12/95. See also Chapter 2.

⁴⁷⁸³ Christopher, Stream, p. 346. cf. ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Jacobovits 284 to Kooijmans, 03/05/93.

⁴⁷⁸⁴ Drew, Edge, p. 156.

⁴⁷⁸⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU, 03/05/93, cpe/lon 335; Walker, President, p. 265.

⁴⁷⁸⁶ Paulsen, Jugoslavienpolitik, p. 136.

⁴⁷⁸⁷ Daalder, Dayton, pp. 15-16.

⁴⁷⁸⁸ Christopher, Stream, p. 346 n. 2.

⁴⁷⁸⁹ John F. Burns, 'Bosnia Loses Any Hope of Being Saved', The New York Times, 25/07/93.

⁴⁷⁹⁰ Christopher, Stream, p. 346; Drew, Edge, pp. 155-56; Halberstam, War, p. 227.

⁴⁷⁹¹ Halberstam, War, p. 227.

⁴⁷⁹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. COREU message from the French government, 06/05/93, cpe/par/315; Védérine, Mondes, pp. 653-55.

in Pale was still to make its decision.⁴⁷⁹³ In Rome Christopher was informed that lift and strike would inflame the Bosnian conflict. Although the government in Bonn was prepared to consider lifting the arms embargo, it did not wish to make any statements about air strikes, because it felt that constitutional and historical reasons prevented it from becoming involved in this.⁴⁷⁹⁴

After this it was Kooijmans' turn to speak to Christopher, being the reason why the Dutch Minister had travelled to Bonn. Christopher could expect the Netherlands mainly to raise the issue of Safe Areas as a policy option. At the end of April Deputy Prime Minister Kok had already indicated the Netherlands' preference for this in a discussion with the American Vice-President, Al Gore. In this connection he had pointed out that not only ground troops would be required for this, but also air support in order to protect both the UN troops and the people in the Safe Areas.⁴⁷⁹⁵ Kooijmans was aware that the American Government was not enthusiastic about the Netherlands' preference for Safe Areas. Several days before the Minister's talks with Christopher, Jacobovits, the Netherlands' permanent representative to NATO, had reported to him that D.A.S. Calwell, an State Department official, had stated that the American Government was opposed to safe havens:

‘because the American military did not believe it would be possible to defend them with air strikes. Ground troops would be required for this. If one deployed ground troops, however, one ran the risk that they would have to remain there ad calendas graecas. This would amount to the establishment of new UNPAs and this is precisely what the US sought to avoid.’⁴⁷⁹⁶

Christopher had said much the same in his consultations with the EC troika on 6 May. He stated that the American Government did not want a repeat of anything similar to what had befallen the Canadian troops in Srebrenica, who had been entirely dependent on the benevolence of the Bosnian Serbs. A report of this discussion was sent to the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the same day.⁴⁷⁹⁷

In the one and a quarter hours of talks between Christopher and Kooijmans, which took place at the Dutch embassy in Bonn on 7 May, the American Secretary of State began by saying that, while it was true that the Vance-Owen plan was not dead following its rejection by the parliament in Pale the day before, it was now ‘at most something for later’. He said that he expected to receive support for this conclusion from the Dutch Government, unlike the EC troika, whom he had spoken to the previous day and who had stated that they still supported the mediators' plan. According to Christopher, sanctions had to be maintained but would only have an impact in the long term and that could be too late for the Bosnian Government army, which found itself in a rather unfortunate position. A truce based on the existing situation was something Christopher referred to as immoral. Air bombardments carried the risk of collateral damage. Moreover, it was doubtful if this would be enough to induce the Serbs to accept and implement the peace plan. A combination of lift and strike therefore appeared to be the only alternative, according to Christopher.⁴⁷⁹⁸ By pursuing such a policy the Americans expected to restore a ‘balance’, after which new negotiations could be opened about an entirely different peace plan. The Americans envisaged that the Muslims would need to protect their own Safe Areas.⁴⁷⁹⁹

Kooijmans was largely in agreement with his discussion partner. However, the Dutch Minister felt that lifting the arms embargo was a last resort, because it could lead to escalation, not only between ⁴⁷⁹³ Christopher, Steam, p. 346.

⁴⁷⁹⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. Bonn COREU, 08/05/93, cpe/bon 292.

⁴⁷⁹⁵ ABZ, 910, Yugoslavia in General. The Netherlands' views on the situation in Bosnia. Agenda for talks between Deputy Prime Minister Kok and Vice-President Gore about Yugoslavia and Bosnia.

⁴⁷⁹⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Jacobovits 248 to Kooijmans, 03/05/93.

⁴⁷⁹⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00112. COREU message from the EPC secretariat, 06/05/93, cpe/sec 508.

⁴⁷⁹⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Kooijmans 42 to the embassy in Bonn, 09/05/93.

⁴⁷⁹⁹ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council of 07/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study the Muslims and Serbs but also between the Muslims and Croats. Kooijmans feared that air strikes would have consequences for both UN and Muslim targets. As expected, he raised the option of Safe Areas with a symbolic force present in them and protection afforded them through air support provided by the aircraft already stationed in the region. One of the benefits of Safe Areas which Kooijmans cited, was that they left the Vance-Owen plan intact, because they would be part of the Muslim provinces.⁴⁸⁰⁰

Christopher raised an objection in that the American army command considered Safe Areas to be 'militarily unsound'. They were certainly not prepared to provide ground troops for this purpose. According to Kooijmans, the concept of a Safe Area was working in Srebrenica and he did not expect the Bosnian Serbs to dare attack such areas. Christopher ended the discussion by stating that he hoped the 12 EC members could agree on a single policy and would not reject America's ideas.⁴⁸⁰¹

Herman Schaper, who attended the meeting, recalled that the Dutch delegation to the talks were later 'perplexed' by the failure of the US to reveal any driving force. Christopher's attitude of 'So tell me! What do you think of it?' was unheard of on the part of the world's leading nation.⁴⁸⁰² Van Walsum, who had just been appointed ambassador in Bonn and had also been part of the delegation, was also astounded by the Americans' lack of knowledge.⁴⁸⁰³ Christopher therefore left them with the impression that the 'holiday from leadership' which the Bush administration had given itself following the outbreak of the war in Yugoslavia, had still not ended under his successor almost two years' later.⁴⁸⁰⁴ After the talks the Dutch delegation revealed their conclusion that the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan no longer enjoyed priority.⁴⁸⁰⁵ Because the relevance of this plan had ebbed, the Dutch delegation had not raised the question of the Netherlands' contribution to its implementation, as was revealed in the Cabinet meeting held on the same day. One member of the Cabinet was now in favour of dividing Bosnia into three sections and of providing the Muslims with weapons to defend themselves. Another minister responded by saying that, while he was not quite that far, he did not discount the possibility of getting there, because he felt that it was morally indefensible to deny the Muslims the opportunity to defend themselves for a protracted period of time.⁴⁸⁰⁶

By the end of his trip Christopher was under the impression that the Dutch Government was the most amenable to America's plans.⁴⁸⁰⁷ It bore least responsibility for the fact that Christopher returned with 'bullet holes all over him', as one American journalist put it.⁴⁸⁰⁸ Christopher, himself, summarised the achievements of his trip concisely by stating, 'I haven't changed my views; I just don't know if I've changed anyone else's.'⁴⁸⁰⁹ According to the American Secretary of State, it took two years before the negative effects of this trip to Europe had dissipated. According to some people close to him, Christopher himself never recovered from this failure at the beginning of his term in office.⁴⁸¹⁰

After Christopher's trip it was clear that lift and strike would have no chance. Nevertheless, the Washington Government continued to present this alternative frequently.⁴⁸¹¹ Aware that the European heads of government objected to this policy, the American administration could afford to continue uttering these tough words, sure in the knowledge that it would never be called on to live up to ⁴⁸⁰⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Kooijmans 42 to the embassy in Bonn, 09/05/93.

⁴⁸⁰¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00887. Kooijmans 42 to the embassy in Bonn, 09/05/93.

⁴⁸⁰² Interview H.A. Schaper, 10/04/00.

⁴⁸⁰³ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁴⁸⁰⁴ The description of the American government's hesitant approach to Yugoslavia as a 'holiday from leadership' comes from Shalikhshvili and is quoted in Halberstam, War, p. 88.

⁴⁸⁰⁵ 'Kooijmans breekt lans voor 'veilige gebieden' in Bosnië' (Kooijmans champions 'safe areas' in Bosnia), De Telegraaf, 08/05/93.

⁴⁸⁰⁶ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 07/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁸⁰⁷ Drew, Edge, p. 156.

⁴⁸⁰⁸ Quoted in Halberstam, War, p. 228.

⁴⁸⁰⁹ Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 131.

⁴⁸¹⁰ Halberstam, War, p. 230.

⁴⁸¹¹ Daalder, Dayton, p. 18.

them.⁴⁸¹² This represented ‘alibi diplomacy’, according to the former American ambassador in Belgrade, Zimmerman.⁴⁸¹³ At the same time the Americans’ reproach that the European governments objected to lift and strike, poisoned relations between America and Europe.⁴⁸¹⁴

6. The Airmobile Brigade in the debate about the Priorities Memorandum

In a letter addressed to Parliament on 12 May which followed on from the debate of 6 May, the Dutch Minister, Ter Beek, explained that it would be impossible to deploy an additional armoured infantry battalion in view of the political principle of voluntary involvement on the part of national service personnel. The Minister went on to state that the first infantry battalion of the Airmobile Brigade (consisting of professional personnel) would only be available in November 1993. Moreover, this battalion would require supplementary training with armoured vehicles for a period of at least two months. In the short term, the Minister wrote, it would be possible to offer a logistics battalion comprising 400 troops.⁴⁸¹⁵

Apparently, not everyone in the Dutch Ministry of Defence was pleased with the new duties which the government and Parliament had assigned to the Airmobile Brigade. A senior official in the department sighed, ‘Now what sort of foolishness is this, deploying the Airmobile Brigade in the former Yugoslavia as a type of armoured division? This is the same as saying to a volleyball team just before the Olympic Games, “We would prefer you to play ice hockey.”’⁴⁸¹⁶ The Chief of Defence Staff, Van der Vlis, found it necessary to voice his aversion to the new duties for the ‘Airmobile’ in public before the parliamentary debate about the Defence White Paper in an interview with the daily newspaper, Trouw. His greatest concern was that the brigade’s new duties would put paid to the purchase of attack helicopters for it, which he felt would deal ‘a fatal blow’ to the concept of ‘airmobile’. To be sure, there appeared to be reason for concern, because, while it is true that Minister Ter Beek said that he was bent on purchasing both transport and attack helicopters, Prime Minister Lubbers revealed that the procurement of the attack helicopters would again need to be reviewed when a new government was formed.⁴⁸¹⁷ If no helicopters were forthcoming, the Chief of Defence Staff believed that this would remove the core of the Priorities Memorandum: flexibility. It would also amount to tampering with the restructuring of the armed forces that had commenced, and he anticipated ‘chaos’ within the Royal Netherlands Army. In addition, it was a source of concern to Van der Vlis that there was no international agreement about the long-term objectives in the former Yugoslavia. According to him, they needed to go further than merely stating, ‘We want Safe Areas’.⁴⁸¹⁸

On 13 and 17 May the permanent committee on Defence in Parliament considered the Priorities Memorandum. The plenary debate followed on 18 and 19 May.⁴⁸¹⁹ In the course of this debate the government gave an undertaking that the Netherlands would provide ‘a battalion with relief capacity’ as soon as possible. Such a gesture was also to serve as a means of persuading those countries that had such a battalion but did not have any relief capacity.⁴⁸²⁰ By doing this, the government hoped ⁴⁸¹² cf. Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 87.

⁴⁸¹³ Zimmermann, Origins, p. 225.

⁴⁸¹⁴ Owen CD-ROM, Direct governmental involvement in the search for a negotiated settlement to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina with special reference to the Contact Group, September 1992 – July 1994, Part 1.

⁴⁸¹⁵ TK, session of 1992-1993, 22 181 no. 48

⁴⁸¹⁶ T. Lagas & L. Meijer, ‘Als wereldorde niet werkt, hebben we een groot probleem’ (If the world order breaks down, we will have a major problem), Trouw, 12/05/93.

⁴⁸¹⁷ B. de Ruiter, ‘Komt de Luchtmobiele brigade ooit van de grond?’ (Will the Airmobile Brigade ever see the light of day?), Democraat, 26(1993)4, pp. 11-12.

⁴⁸¹⁸ T. Lagas and L. Meijer, ‘Als wereldorde niet werkt, hebben we een groot probleem’, Trouw, 12 May 1993.

⁴⁸¹⁹ In so far as nothing else is mentioned, these references are to the views recorded during the plenary debate. For the report of the committee meeting see TK, 1992-1993, UCV 27 (13/05/93) and UCV 28 (17/05/93).

⁴⁸²⁰ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 3.

to prevent a situation from arising where the Netherlands commented on the situation but did not make any military contribution to the operation in ex-Yugoslavia.⁴⁸²¹

The question was whether this could be interpreted to refer to an airmobile division. The debate reflected the differences that existed within the Armed forces themselves (see Chapters 13 and 15) between those who supported the Airmobile Brigade and those in favour of armoured infantry. According to the Priorities Memorandum, the number of army brigades, which had already been cut from ten to seven in accordance with the Defence White Paper of 1991, was to be further reduced to four. Some members of Parliament, who were already critical of the substantial expenditure on the Airmobile Brigade, wondered whether it would not be better to use the relevant funds to maintain armoured infantry, which were set to disappear in accordance with the Priorities White Paper. For instance, voices were heard within the SGP (a small right-of-centre political party) to the effect that units would be required in any military intervention in Bosnia which were more heavily armed than an Airmobile Brigade, 'for example, an armoured brigade'.⁴⁸²² At the time it was also suggested in the D66 Security and Defence Project Group, which met with Jan Willem van Waning, a retired naval Captain, in the chair and included Kees Homan, a Colonel in the marines, Bram Schulte, a retired army General, and Karel Hilderink, a Colonel in the air force, that the armed force which would be required to implement the Vance-Owen plan, mainly needed to consist of traditional, mechanised, armoured infantry units. So what was the value of airmobile?⁴⁸²³ This question was thus raised by the D66 Member of Parliament, Ter Veer, during the debate on the Priorities White Paper.⁴⁸²⁴ He was not the only one to do so. Already at an early stage of the conflict in Yugoslavia Sipkes had said that he doubted the usefulness of an Airmobile Brigade in situations such as those prevailing in that country.⁴⁸²⁵ When the Priorities White Paper was dealt with, she said that she had heard talk that the Airmobile Brigade would not be equipped for peacekeeping operations, 'that it is too lightly equipped and also ridiculously expensive'.⁴⁸²⁶ She therefore tabled a motion calling on the government not to purchase attack helicopters for the Airmobile Brigade. According to her, it would be better to use the money that would be saved as a result, for peacekeeping operations.⁴⁸²⁷ This motion was exactly what Van der Vlis had feared, although only Groen Links (a left-of-centre environmental political party) voted for it.⁴⁸²⁸

Van Heemskerck Pillis-Duvekot pointed out that UN peacekeeping was moving towards peace-enforcing. An armoured infantry battalion was more appropriate for such types of operations than an airmobile one.⁴⁸²⁹ She therefore requested that, like the Airmobile Brigade, armoured infantry units also be allowed to complete an entirely independent cycle of one and a half years for peacekeeping operations. Instead of the two armoured infantry battalions which were provided for in the Priorities White Paper, she therefore wanted three included and tabled a motion to this effect.⁴⁸³⁰ This motion only received the support of Groen Links and the smaller parties on the right, and was thus rejected.⁴⁸³¹ She was also favourably disposed towards the idea of converting the eleventh armoured infantry brigade into an airmobile one 'keeping pace with the actual availability of the attack helicopters'. In other words, part of the Airmobile Brigade would need to continue using the equipment of the ⁴⁸²¹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 3.

⁴⁸²² F.W. den Boef, 'Defensiepersoneel geen kind van de rekening' (Defence personnel should not be left holding the baby), De Banier, 08/04/93, p. 18.

⁴⁸²³ B. de Ruiter, 'Komt de Luchtmobiele brigade ooit van de grond?', Democraat, 26 (1993) 4, pp. 11-12.

⁴⁸²⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4970 (18/05/93).

⁴⁸²⁵ TK, 1991-1992, 22 327 no. 3, report of consultations held on 06/02/92, p. 9.

⁴⁸²⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4965.

⁴⁸²⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5038 (19/05/93).

⁴⁸²⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5072 (25/05/93).

⁴⁸²⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4977 (18/05/93).

⁴⁸³⁰ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5044.

⁴⁸³¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5072 (25/05/93).

eleventh armoured infantry brigade as long as the helicopters were not available.⁴⁸³² Leerling noted that his scepticism about the Airmobile Brigade – he had always been opposed to it – was shared by a growing number of people. He felt that a small country such as the Netherlands was aiming too high with this expensive brigade. He therefore said that he was in favour of a fifth mobile brigade which could be financed with the savings made on the airmobile one.⁴⁸³³

7. The Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion

Van Traa was also of the opinion that the extent of the investments required for the Airmobile Brigade needed to be offset against the capital losses occasioned by the decommissioning of a number of armoured infantry and mechanised brigades. According to him, the Airmobile Brigade would be too lightly armed to act in operations involving genuine acts of war. It was precisely Yugoslavia that had shown how peacekeeping could move in the direction of peace-enforcing. For this reason he felt that the Airmobile Brigade and the armoured infantry brigades should conduct joint exercises and consideration needed to be given to the question whether it was not ‘wiser and cheaper’ to keep a larger number of armoured vehicles than that provided for in Priorities White Paper. In addition, Van Traa urged that, ‘in view of the need to make allowances for the eventuality of making a contribution to a peacekeeping force in Bosnia’, the first operational airmobile battalion, which was to be established as the first combat unit consisting exclusively of volunteers, be provided with adequate training and instruction using armoured vehicles as soon as possible.⁴⁸³⁴ Attention needed to be devoted to ensure that it was possible to deploy the Airmobile Brigade as soon as possible for duties covering the upper ‘spectrum of force’. In this connection his thoughts ‘naturally turned to Yugoslavia’. To this end, he and the CDA Member of Parliament, Van Vlijmen, tabled a motion asking the government ‘to ensure that the Airmobile Brigade was also suited for action in foreseeable UN operations by providing operational battalions with adequate training and instruction using heavier equipment, including armoured vehicles, as soon as possible’.⁴⁸³⁵ In response to a question from Van Middelkoop, Van Traa, who was closely involved in the events in the former Yugoslavia,⁴⁸³⁶ confirmed that the PvdA and the CDA were prepared to make a contribution to peace-enforcement in that country.⁴⁸³⁷

Kooijmans seized on the remarks of Heemskerck and Van Traa indicating a shift from peacekeeping to peace-enforcing to say that development in Yugoslavia showed ‘that there is a need for a more substantial deployment of more heavily equipped – hence armoured – units’.⁴⁸³⁸

‘The boundary between blue and green helmets is therefore less clear-cut as a result. Yet even if the parties agree, in many instances it will be necessary to deploy extensive military resources as a precaution and a deterrent in view of the insecure situation on the ground.’⁴⁸³⁹

Ter Beek stated that he could not see the point of an Airmobile Brigade without attack helicopters, although he could imagine that the ground component of this brigade could be deployed for both peacekeeping and peace-enforcing. In the latter case incidentally, the Airmobile Brigade would only be deployed in its entirety.⁴⁸⁴⁰ He said that, like Van Traa, he experienced discomfort that there was only ⁴⁸³² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4979, p. 5016 and p. 5045.

⁴⁸³³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4981.

⁴⁸³⁴ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 4994.

⁴⁸³⁵ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5052; 22 975 no. 22.

⁴⁸³⁶ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

⁴⁸³⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5053.

⁴⁸³⁸ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5002.

⁴⁸³⁹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5003.

⁴⁸⁴⁰ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5022-5023.

so little the Netherlands could do for Yugoslavia.⁴⁸⁴¹ In response to the Van Traa and Van Vlijmen motion, the Minister noted that the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade would be ready in November, following which there would be ‘additional training as required covering the use of armoured vehicles’. The Minister recalled the debate of 6 May in the course of which he had stated that the government was involved in an international search for such vehicles.⁴⁸⁴² Ter Beek said that he was content with the motion, provided that the airmobile battalion was not converted into an armoured infantry one. For the rest, he assumed that this battalion would be deployed to implement a peace plan. By stating this he was incidentally not saying anything new: he had said the same during the debate of 6 May.⁴⁸⁴³ Only the GPV (a small right-of-centre political party) and the SGP voted against the Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion.⁴⁸⁴⁴

Some people believe that the Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion played a major role in relation to the decision to deploy the airmobile battalion.⁴⁸⁴⁵ According to Van der Vlis for example, this motion was ‘the dominant factor ... in the decision to go to Srebrenica’.⁴⁸⁴⁶ In his ministerial memoirs Ter Beek wrote that ‘Whatever I tried, I could not distance myself from that motion’.⁴⁸⁴⁷ It is clear from the above that the Minister did not try much. The PvdA Member of Parliament, Valk, later remarked that, if Ter Beek had had major objections to the motion, he should have shown this in some way. This had not been the case.⁴⁸⁴⁸ Valk rightly noted that Ter Beek had actually not said ‘No’ to the deployment of the airmobile battalion in the general debate on 6 May. The motion in the plenary session was merely ‘the icing on that cake’.⁴⁸⁴⁹ In 2000 even the leader of the PvdA and then Deputy Prime Minister, Kok, could not recall that pressure had been brought to bear on him within his own party and the media in relation to decision-making pertaining to the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade. As Kok put it, the Van Traa and Van Vlijmen motion was ‘not something which inspired any ideas in Cabinet’. According to him, this motion followed on from Parliament’s need to outline its own position, to indicate that the people’s representatives also felt that the time was ripe to ready the Airmobile Brigade for deployment in Bosnia.⁴⁸⁵⁰ Later on Couzy also stated that it was true the motion played a role in relation to the decision to deploy the Airmobile Brigade ‘but the Cabinet also felt that something needed to happen’.⁴⁸⁵¹ Van Vlijmen, the co-author of the motion, later downplayed the importance of the motion by pointing out that not only Parliament but also parts of the army itself were urging Ter Beek to deploy the Airmobile Brigade.⁴⁸⁵²

The Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion has therefore been wrongly credited with having been a driving force in the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade in the former Yugoslavia. The media had already suggested this alternative on numerous occasions since the outbreak of hostilities in this country. In December 1992 Junior Minister Van Voorst tot Voorst had proposed this alternative in Parliament. In mid-March Minister Ter Beek had even directed Van der Vlis to include the brigade in his list of units which the Dutch Government could make available for a force to implement the Vance-Owen plan. The Foreign Affairs Department subsequently suggested this alternative to diplomats in the legislative capital. In a talk he gave in Groningen at the end of April Minister Ter Beek had described the Airmobile Brigade as indispensable for ensuring compliance with international peace agreements, such as that in Yugoslavia. On 3 May Cabinet had actually opted to offer the Airmobile ⁴⁸⁴¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5060.

⁴⁸⁴² TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5061.

⁴⁸⁴³ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5063.

⁴⁸⁴⁴ TK, session of 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 5072 (25/05/93).

⁴⁸⁴⁵ See for example Brabander and Metselaar, Verstrikking, p. 8.

⁴⁸⁴⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 52. See also Couzy, Jaren, p. 137.

⁴⁸⁴⁷ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 170.

⁴⁸⁴⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 252.

⁴⁸⁴⁹ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

⁴⁸⁵⁰ Interview W. Kok, 08/05/00. cf. B.J. van Eenennaam to NIOD, 05/12/01.

⁴⁸⁵¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 61.

⁴⁸⁵² Interview M.B.M.J. van Vlijmen, 14/10/99.

Brigade for an implementation force and had stated that this option could be referred to in any international contact. Indeed, the Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion did not give the government any ideas. It already had one of its own. The Foreign Affairs Department also assumed that the motion was part of a broader consensus to which the government was party, that it was desirable for the Netherlands to have a more pronounced presence in Bosnia than the transport battalion. The motion served more to profile Parliament than to accommodate the government's need to be spurred on.⁴⁸⁵³ If Parliament exerted any pressure which led to the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade, this did not happen in May as a result of the Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion, but on 9 March when the parliamentary debate amounted to firm support for Minister Kooijmans when he urged Minister Ter Beek the following day to deploy additional resources for the former Yugoslavia. In November 2000 Ter Beek informed the Bakker Committee that once this motion had been passed, he gave 'very express orders' to ready the first airmobile battalion for deployment.⁴⁸⁵⁴ However, Cabinet had already decided on this on 3 May.

8. A joint programme of action

In the Bosnian-Serb referendum on the Vance-Owen plan held on 15 and 16 May as many as 96% of the 70% of the Bosnian Serbs who voted, rejected the plan and opted for an independent state. An hour after the polling booths closed, Karadzic announced that the peace plan was definitely 'dead' now. The signature that he had put to the plan in Athens, was no longer valid. According to him, it was now time to divide Bosnia-Herzegovina into three separate states. He did not wish to wait a moment longer. 'I am no longer the representative of the Bosnian Serbs. I now represent the Republika Srpska,' Karadzic stated. The borders that were current at the time, were also to be the final ones. Seselj could not but add his contribution. He travelled to Pale where he informed the world that, if the West intervened, his Cetniks would destroy Sarajevo 'in a flash'.⁴⁸⁵⁵ Russia's attitude represented a ray of hope to the West at that point in time. Minister of Foreign Affairs Kozyrev announced that the peace plan must be implemented despite the outcome of the Serbian vote.⁴⁸⁵⁶

Some of the countries of the West had not even waited for the results of the referendum and had contemplated new policy immediately after the Bosnian-Serb parliament had rejected the Vance-Owen plan. On 10 May the French Government presented a draft resolution of Safe Areas to the United Kingdom, the United States and Russia. This proposal was supposed to result in a resolution which would make it possible to implement Resolution 824 covering the six Safe Areas. On 14 May the EC's ad hoc group on Yugoslavia met.⁴⁸⁵⁷ It postulated the following objectives for EC policy: strict compliance with sanctions and the creation of Safe Areas in accordance with Resolution 824. Germany and France were now calling for the idea of Safe Areas. The Germans now considered these areas necessary for humanitarian reasons – 'to secure the survival of the Bosnian (Muslim) people' – because waiting any longer would make it difficult to implement the Vance-Owen plan, and also to ensure that there was no increase in the criticism levelled by the Islamic world against Western restraint in the conflict.⁴⁸⁵⁸ The Netherlands naturally supported this interest in Safe Areas and stressed the desire to protect them from the air.⁴⁸⁵⁹ As it happens, it was also determined in the course of this meeting that ⁴⁸⁵³ Interview O. Hattinga van 't Sant on 18/07/00 and H.A.C. van der Zwan on 12/04/ 2000.

⁴⁸⁵⁴ TCBU, talk with A.L. ter Beek, 23/03/00, pp. 25-26.

⁴⁸⁵⁵ John Pomfret, 'Peace Plan Dead, Serb Leader Says', The Washington Post, 17/05/93.

⁴⁸⁵⁶ John Pomfret, 'Peace Plan Dead, Serb Leader Says', The Washington Post, 17/05/93.

⁴⁸⁵⁷ For a report of this meeting see ABZ, DEU/ARA/00754. Kooijmans, 17/05/93, celer circ 356; ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU message, 18/05/93, cpe/sec 577.

⁴⁸⁵⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00754. Kooijmans, 17/05/93, celer circ 356.

⁴⁸⁵⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU message, 18/05/93, cpe/sec 577; ABZ, DEU/ARA/00754. Kooijmans, 17/05/93, celer circ 356.

these Safe Areas constituted a 'mesure conservatoire' and were in no way a substitute for a political settlement.⁴⁸⁶⁰

On 19 May the French Government circulated its final proposal for Safe Areas. It described a 'safe area' as 'a besieged area with a precisely defined perimeter, placed under the protection of the United Nations, in which the delivery of humanitarian assistance is ensured and all acts of aggression (are) banned'. The general purpose of the Safe Areas was to halt Bosnian-Serb aggression and to facilitate a peace settlement. The French Defence White Paper drew a distinction between light, medium and heavy options. In the first case the aim was to deter aggression, monitor a ceasefire and make it possible to supply aid to the people. The medium option provided for UNPROFOR to assist with the provision of aid itself and also to take control of important positions on the ground. According to the heavy option, UNPROFOR would need to counter every form of aggression and hold corridors open for the passage of assistance convoys. It would also need to ensure demilitarisation pursuant to this option. According to the Defence White Paper, only the participation of the P4 – the permanent members of the Security Council sans China – on the ground and close cooperation of ground and air forces would lend credibility to the light option.⁴⁸⁶¹ This option would also require 9,600 troops while 35,000 to 40,000 were felt to be needed for the heaviest.⁴⁸⁶²

On 19 May the WEU held its spring Ministerial meeting in Rome, which was entirely devoted to the situation in Yugoslavia. The ministers concluded that a political solution based on the Vance-Owen plan might offer a way forward. There was no alternative. The establishment of Safe Areas as envisaged by the French Government deserved to be accorded priority. On this occasion it appeared that even Hurd supported this.⁴⁸⁶³ The following day Ter Beek again stressed in the course of the WEU Forum of Consultation that all international political, diplomatic, economic and military efforts made in respect of the former Yugoslavia should be directed towards the unconditional acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan by all the parties: 'If adequately protected by international troops, Safe Areas could make a substantial contribution to the creation of the conditions required for further steps in this direction, and could also help relieve the unacceptable humanitarian situation prevailing on the ground'.⁴⁸⁶⁴ Those ministers who were present, mandated the Permanent Council of the WEU to conduct a study into the establishment of different Safe Areas as referred to in Resolution 824.⁴⁸⁶⁵

However, the French plan for Safe Areas initially ran into unwillingness on the part of the American Government.⁴⁸⁶⁶ After Christopher's return from Europe it delayed new policy initiatives until the outcome of the Bosnian-Serb referendum was known. However, it was a fact that America was not making a major effort to do anything about the conflict in Bosnia. 'This is a problem, after all, that's in Europe's backyard,' President Clinton said after Christopher's trip to Europe.⁴⁸⁶⁷ The American Government did not wish to deploy any ground troops in Bosnia and was only prepared to contain the conflict.⁴⁸⁶⁸ It would only try to ensure that the conflict did not spread to Albania, Greece and Turkey. This concern was again confirmed by the announcement on 12 May that 325 American troops were to be stationed in Macedonia for preventive duties.⁴⁸⁶⁹ Although Clinton persisted in his rhetoric in the media against ethnic cleansing, during a photo session on 17 May he said that he would not be sending American ground troops into a 'shooting gallery'.⁴⁸⁷⁰ A day later Christopher told the ⁴⁸⁶⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU message, 18/05/93, cpe/sec 577.

⁴⁸⁶¹ S/25800; ABZ, PVNY. New York permanent representative to Heijkoop (embassy in Washington), 19/05/93, fax no. 5008, addendum: French memorandum relative to safe areas.

⁴⁸⁶² ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Jacobovits 328 to Kooijmans, 17/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Veenendaal WEU 865 to Kooijmans, 21/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Kooijmans to PV WEU, 25/05/93, celer 246.

⁴⁸⁶⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Weurom/175, 29/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Jacobovits 328 to Kooijmans, 17/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶⁷ Cragg Hines, 'U.S. plan would draw a line in the Balkans', The Houston Chronicle, 12/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶⁸ See for example Elaine Sciolino, 'U.S. Goal on Bosnia: Keeping War Within Borders', The New York Times, 19/05/93.

⁴⁸⁶⁹ Callahan, Wars, pp. 118-19.

⁴⁸⁷⁰ Daalder, Dayton, p. 18; Shawcross, Evil, p. 102.

American Congress that Bosnia was ‘a problem from hell’, a ‘morass’ of centuries of hatred in which all three parties had committed crimes, concluding, as had Clinton, that ‘at heart, this is a European problem.’⁴⁸⁷¹ Both Christopher and Clinton wanted to ensure that the American president could devote all his energies to American domestic politics without stumbling into the problems of Bosnia.⁴⁸⁷² In addition, the disagreement with the European countries that had come to light during Christopher’s trip,⁴⁸⁷³ had to be resolved.

The American Government therefore torpedoed a Security Council debate initiated by Russia on the further involvement of the UN in the situation in the former Yugoslavia. The Russian Government had wanted to raise the possibility of a step-by-step implementation of the Vance-Owen plan, which would start in those areas that were reasonably calm, after which this approach would be able to spread steadily across the rest of Bosnia.⁴⁸⁷⁴ According to the American Government, such a discussion would only highlight the differences between the members of the Council and, in particular, the countries of the West.⁴⁸⁷⁵ For this reason the American Government invited Kozyrev and representatives of the three Western members of the Security Council, namely, France, the United Kingdom and Spain, for talks in Washington. Following several days of intensive consultations in the American capital⁴⁸⁷⁶ on 22 May 1993 France, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States, all of whom were members of the Security Council, adopted a Joint Action Programme for Bosnia-Herzegovina, which finally brought Europe, the United States and Russia into line with each other.⁴⁸⁷⁷ In itself, this was a fine outcome. First of all, the plan was designed to ensure that the tense relations within the alliance of America and Europe no longer persisted.⁴⁸⁷⁸ In the words of the American Defence, Minister Aspin, ‘We have moved from criticising each other’s ideas to joining in a common action programme to address the most critical problems.’⁴⁸⁷⁹

However, the new programme was to deal a fatal blow to the Vance-Owen plan. Owen himself saw this programme as a means for Washington to extricate itself from any commitment to implement his and Vance’s peace plan.⁴⁸⁸⁰ He anticipated that the division of Bosnia-Herzegovina would be completed soon, even though the European countries involved in this programme stated that it only applied to the short term and that the Vance-Owen plan continued to retain its value for the long term.⁴⁸⁸¹

The programme accepted the Safe Areas but the United States only undertook to provide air support for the UNPROFOR troops in these areas. According to a senior British diplomat this represented the common denominator which had enabled the various powers to agree with each other. By accepting Safe Areas the European countries believed that they could prevent the Americans from ⁴⁸⁷¹ Drew, Edge, p. 162. See also Maarten Huygen, ‘VS nemen steeds meer afstand van kwestie-Bosnië’ (USA distances itself even further from the issue of Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 19/05/93; ‘VS trekken handen af van oorlog in Bosnië’ (USA steps back from war in Bosnia), Het Parool, 19/05/93.

⁴⁸⁷² Drew, Edge, p. 162; Paulsen, Jugoslaviëpolitiek, p. 132.

⁴⁸⁷³ See for example ‘VS en EG pogen ruzie over Bosnië te verdoezelen’ (USA and EC attempt to gloss over quarrel about Bosnia), ANP, 12/05/93, 8.26 pm; ‘Anglo-U.S. love lost as Clinton drifts’, The Daily Telegraph, 17/05/93; ‘VS en Europa verdeeld over aanpak Bosnië’ (USA and Europe divided on approach to Bosnia), ANP, 18/05/93, 10.22 pm.

⁴⁸⁷⁴ With regard to the strong points of this approach see Gow, Triumph, pp. 248-52. In the Netherlands such a solution was propounded by Van den Doel & Leurdijk & Voorhoeve, Oplossing, p. 313.

⁴⁸⁷⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01803. Veenendaal NAVO 850 to Kooijmans, 18/05/93.

⁴⁸⁷⁶ See for example ‘VS en Rusland bespreken gezamenlijke aanpak Bosnische crisis’ (USA and Russia discuss joint approach to Bosnian crisis), ANP, 20/05/93, 10.04 pm; Elaine Sciolino, ‘U.S. and Russia Agree on Strategy Accepting Serbian Gains for Now’, The New York Times, 21/05/93.

⁴⁸⁷⁷ For the text see ‘Tekst actieplan Bosnië-Herzegovina’ (Text of plan for Bosnia-Herzegovina), ANP, 23/05/93, 12.11 am; Ramcharan, Conference, pp.1337-39.

⁴⁸⁷⁸ Cf. ABZ, the embassy in Washington. Veenendaal NATO 891 to Kooijmans, 27/05/93.

⁴⁸⁷⁹ ABZ, the embassy in Washington. Kooijmans, 27/05/93, circ 375.

⁴⁸⁸⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Faber 13 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93.

⁴⁸⁸¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. COREU message from the EPC secretariat, 02/06/93, cpe/sec 623.

bombarding the Serbs.⁴⁸⁸² On the other hand, the American Government agreed to Safe Areas without being obliged to supply ground troops. Unlike the Vance-Owen plan, which demanded that the Serbs vacate part of the terrain they held, this programme appeared to resign itself to the results of ethnic cleansing. This was also precisely the reason why the Bosnian government fiercely opposed this plan.⁴⁸⁸³ According to Izetbegovic, the Safe Areas resembled 'reserves'.⁴⁸⁸⁴ The Joint Action Programme was therefore actually a 'do-little' plan.⁴⁸⁸⁵ The American Government would be able to lean back largely and let the EC and the United Nations take the initiative.⁴⁸⁸⁶

Karadzic therefore praised the programme as 'more realistic' than the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁸⁸⁷ The latter and the threat of large-scale military intervention no longer applied now. Karadzic announced that his troops would not stand in the way of the establishment of the Safe Areas, provided that the 'sovereignty of Serbian territory' was respected.⁴⁸⁸⁸

On 24 May the ministers of Foreign Affairs responded positively to this programme in the North-Atlantic Council. The ministers of Defence were considerably more critical the following day. The final statement merely indicated that the plan had been 'discussed'. The German Minister of Defence, Volker R  he, was utterly opposed to it, because he felt that the establishment of Safe Areas amounted to acquiescence to ethnic cleansing.

UNPROFOR circles also warned that the Safe Areas would play into the Serbs' hands. For instance, the VRS had been able to withdraw most of its troops around Srebrenica and deploy them around Brcko and Zepa. On the other hand, the Safe Areas could serve as bases for terrorist attacks.⁴⁸⁸⁹

The latter consideration was probably fuelled by the fact that Mladic had since protested strongly against the inadequate demilitarisation of Srebrenica. In a formal protest lodged with UNPROFOR, he warned of 'additional steps' if the Muslims continued to ignore the ceasefire.⁴⁸⁹⁰ According to the Dutch Military Intelligence Service, MID, this threat meant that 'there was still a possibility of direct conflict between UNPROFOR and the Bosnian-Serb armed forces in Eastern Bosnia'.⁴⁸⁹¹

Neither was the Dutch Government particularly pleased with the programme of action, because it lacked any notion of a lasting political solution now that the Vance-Owen plan definitely appeared to have been abandoned. Although Minister Kooijmans seemed to have rather little difficulty distancing himself from this plan during his meeting with Christopher in Bonn, after the release of the programme of action the Dutch Government let it be known in the EC and the alliance that it did not see an alternative to the Vance-Owen plan as the basis for a peace settlement.⁴⁸⁹² In a telephone conversation

⁴⁸⁸² Tromp, Verraad, p. 217.

⁴⁸⁸³ 'Bosni   en Klein-Joegoslavi   wijzen actieplan voor Bosni   af' (Bosnia and Lesser Yugoslavia reject programme of action for Bosnia), ANP 23/05/93, 9.01 pm; 'VN: Veilige zones Bosni   bron van onrust' (UN: Bosnian Safe Areas are source of unrest), ANP, 25/05/93, 2.49 pm; K. Koch, 'Joegoslavi  , Oost-Europa en de strategie van neo-containment' in Gijs de Vries et al., Continent, pp. 122-23. cf. J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Het "Actieplan voor Bosni  " hoeft geen loos gebaar te zijn' (Bosnian programme of action need not be an empty gesture), Vrij Nederland, 19/06/93, p. 30.

⁴⁸⁸⁴ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavi  . Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 35/93, 24/05/93.

⁴⁸⁸⁵ Edgar O'Ballance, quoted in Gr  maux and De Vries, Crisis, p. 40.

⁴⁸⁸⁶ Daalder, Dayton, p. 87.

⁴⁸⁸⁷ 'Karadzic schikt zich in plan voor beveiligde gebieden' (Karadzic goes along with plan for safe areas), ANP, 23/05/93, 4.52 pm.

⁴⁸⁸⁸ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavi  . Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 35/93, 24/05/93; K. Koch, 'Joegoslavi  , Oost-Europa en de strategie van neo-containment' in Gijs de Vries et al., Continent, pp. 123.

⁴⁸⁸⁹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavi  . Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 36/93, 27/05/93.

⁴⁸⁹⁰ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavi  . Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 33/93, 13/05/93.

⁴⁸⁹¹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavi  . Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 33/93, 13/05/93.

⁴⁸⁹² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 50, p. 2.

with his French counterpart, Alain Juppé, Kooijmans used virtually identical words to those with which Izetbegovic had rejected the programme of action: the Safe Areas would become ghettos.⁴⁸⁹³ Moreover, the Dutch Government took umbrage because those who had taken the initiative, had bypassed the EC, the WEU and NATO, as well as the Netherlands, which bore a military involvement in the former Yugoslavia that was not insignificant. The government felt that this was not the way in which EC member states were supposed to be dealing with each other within the context of European Political Cooperation.⁴⁸⁹⁴ However, Juppé managed to persuade the Dutch Government not to publicly disclose its sharp criticism of the plan.⁴⁸⁹⁵

During a debate on 2 June 1993 the Dutch Members of Parliament sided with the government's criticism. De Kok described the programme of action 'as a low point in diplomatic relations in recent months'. If the international community was unable to think of anything better, the CDA was even prepared to lift the arms embargo against Bosnia-Herzegovina now.⁴⁸⁹⁶ Van Traa felt that the programme of action was 'a slap in the face for European cooperation in the area of foreign policy'. He called for the Netherlands to send as clear a signal as possible to the US through the European Council, indicating that the authority of the international community needed to be restored for the establishment and protection of Safe Areas, which could serve as a starting point for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan.⁴⁸⁹⁷ Replying on behalf of the government, Kooijmans stated that, if one were to abandon the implementation of this plan, the aim of establishing the Safe Areas would no longer be clear: 'For this reason the establishment of the Safe Areas must be extricated from the programme of action and, more importantly, should be embedded within the context of the Vance-Owen plan...'.⁴⁸⁹⁸ In spite of all his criticism, Kooijmans stressed that the Safe Areas represented the positive element of the programme of action. While it is true that until then the international community had not done much more than declare certain parts to be Safe Areas, Kooijmans believed that Srebrenica, where a mere 150 Canadians were stationed who could rely on British support in the event of an attack on the enclave, constituted proof that even such a minimal act could have a moderating effect on the warring factions. In the course of this debate Minister Ter Beek again mentioned that, following supplementary training in the use of armoured vehicles, it would be possible to deploy the first airmobile battalion – also for duties in Yugoslavia – by about the end of the year or beginning of the next.⁴⁸⁹⁹

9. Detailing the concept of 'safe areas'

The Safe Areas could therefore only exist with the approval of the Bosnian Serbs and the Muslims. Even the demilitarisation could ultimately only be the result of agreement between the two warring factions. The United Nations troops that were stationed in the enclave, could only serve as a trip wire in the event of an attack by the Bosnian-Serb army. Ultimately, the protection of the enclaves would depend on air support.

On 28 May Boutros-Ghali sent a working paper on 'safe areas' to the Security Council. This paper drew a distinction between safe zones, safe havens and Safe Areas. According to this paper, 'safe zones' were areas in which security and humanitarian aid were provided to people who still lived in their own homes. The same happened in 'safe havens', except for the fact that people had already fled and were threatened with further persecution. The concept of a 'safe area' covered both of these categories. According to Boutros-Ghali, Safe Areas depended on the agreement of the parties ⁴⁸⁹³ Both, Indifference, p. 160; Impartial version of the government meeting of 28/05/93.

⁴⁸⁹⁴ See also TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 7.

⁴⁸⁹⁵ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 28/05/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

⁴⁸⁹⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 1.

⁴⁸⁹⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 2. cf. PvdA policy paper 1992-1994, p. 39.

⁴⁸⁹⁸ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 7.

⁴⁸⁹⁹ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 52, p. 11

concerned. An effective ceasefire was therefore required. Based on this paper, a Safe Area would therefore need to be adequately demilitarised in order to ensure that the protected party did not derive any military benefit from it. A Safe Area would need to be surrounded by a secure perimeter 30 km wide which would have to be heavily patrolled.⁴⁹⁰⁰

In the meantime UNHCR warned that the Security Council and the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command were focussing exclusively on the military security of Safe Areas. One needed to ensure that there was a properly functioning civil administration and that the people had long-term access to food. UNHCR had since learned from its experience in Srebrenica that nothing 'which resembles normal life' was to be found there. The residents lived in isolation, heaped together in a small area and without any future. Their actions were increasingly limited to acts of violence, black market trade, prostitution and theft. There was considerable tension between the original population and the refugees.⁴⁹⁰¹

In addition, at the end of June 1993 Kumin, the head of the UNHCR in Belgrade, expressed her concern about the food situation in Srebrenica to Engels, the Dutch deputy chargé d'affaires in the Serbian capital. The aim of 530 grams of food per person per day was not being achieved, while the prospects of doing so were even poorer. The Serbs and Bosnian Serbs were providing diminishing cooperation in respect of the convoys. There was a water shortage amounting to one litre per person per day and there were sanitary and medical problems. According to Kumin, it was necessary to evacuate 20,000 of the 51,000 residents.⁴⁹⁰² On both occasions UNHCR expressed grave reservations about the concept of 'safe areas', because they could become permanent refugee camps. If they were to be established or to remain, far more aid would be required from the international community, not only in the form of food and medicine, but also administrative facilities, for example.

Early July, Stoltenberg and Ogata were also of the opinion that a number of Safe Areas were not viable. In this connection, Ogata mainly had Srebrenica in mind, which the Japanese High Commissioner believed could only hold 12,000 people but was currently home to between 45,000 and 50,000. If the Serbs were not to change their approach to the aid convoys destined for this enclave, a mass evacuation would still be required.⁴⁹⁰³ More than a week later the High Commissioner for Refugees again informed the international community that she believed that Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde were not viable and that evacuation in the near future might perhaps be the only solution.⁴⁹⁰⁴

10. Resolution 836: What protection?

'L'enfer est pavé de bonnes résolutions.'⁴⁹⁰⁵

On 1 June the French permanent representative to the UN, J.B. Mérimée, presented a draft resolution on the Safe Areas. The non-aligned countries tabled their own resolution, which provided for a robust protection of the Safe Areas. At the time they viewed the activities of those countries that were party to the Joint Programme of Action with a great deal of suspicion.⁴⁹⁰⁶ They operated as a closed front and D. Arria acted as their spokesperson. However, Mérimée managed to detach Brazil from this front employing a streak of high school diplomacy, after which the French draft resolution 'prevailed'.⁴⁹⁰⁷ It was to become known as Resolution 836 and moved the concept of a 'safe area' from the political ⁴⁹⁰⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Safe Areas. Working Paper by the Secretariat, accompanying New York permanent representative to DPV/PZ and DEU/OE, 28/05/93, fax no. 4927.

⁴⁹⁰¹ ABZ, DIE/2004/00075. UNHCR Belgrade to UNHCR Geneva and UNHCR Zagreb, 22/05/93, accompanying PV Geneva to DIO/Yugoslavia, 27/05/93, hum/gev-0770/93. See also ABZ, DPV/ARA/00782. Wagenmakers 435 to Kooijmans, 27/05/93.

⁴⁹⁰² ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Engels 172 to Kooijmans, 29/06/93.

⁴⁹⁰³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Boddens Hosang 521 to Kooijmans, 08/07/93.

⁴⁹⁰⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Boddens Hosang 536 to Kooijmans, 19/07/93.

⁴⁹⁰⁵ Morillon, Credo, p. 132.

⁴⁹⁰⁶ Interview D. Arria on 10/05/00 and A. Erdos on 11/05/00.

⁴⁹⁰⁷ Interview D. Arria, 10/05/00.

sphere accorded to it in Resolution 824, which only made 50 military observers available for the six Safe Areas, to one of a more military nature. Article 9 of the draft resolution empowered UNPROFOR in Bosnia:

‘acting in self-defence, to take the necessary measures, including the use of force, in reply to bombardments against the Safe Areas ... or to armed incursion into them or in the event of any deliberate obstruction in or around those areas to the freedom of movement of UNPROFOR or of protected humanitarian convoys.’

The resolution permitted member states to deploy aircraft in order to permit UNPROFOR to carry out its mandate. However this was subject to the condition that the Security Council would need to request this support. In addition, the resolution permitted the Bosnian Government to maintain military and paramilitary units in the enclave. This provision appeared to be contrary to the demilitarisation agreement concluded between Generals Halilovic and Mladic on 17 April and a subsequent demilitarisation agreement of 8 May 1993,⁴⁹⁰⁸ but in view of the position adopted by non-aligned countries, it was not anticipated that they would agree to the unilateral disarmament of the Bosnian Muslims in the enclave. At the same time this was an indication of how unstable relations remained in and around those areas designated as safe. Already while Resolution 836 was being prepared, the UN Situation Centre warned that it would be difficult to translate it into instructions which could be carried out by the troops.⁴⁹⁰⁹ Mladic had informed Morillon that he did not have any intention of withdrawing the heavy and other weapons the VRS had stationed around the Safe Areas as long as the latter were not actually demilitarised. In addition, if any aircraft were to attack the Serbs while they were defending themselves against aggression emanating from the enclaves, the VRS would treat UNPROFOR as an enemy, according to the Bosnian-Serb general.⁴⁹¹⁰ Moreover, Wahlgren feared that air strikes would herald the end of humanitarian aid: ‘One cannot make peace and war at the same time’.⁴⁹¹¹ Paragraph 9 of the resolution was now amended to empower UNPROFOR ‘acting in self-defence to take the necessary measures including the use of force’ and nothing else was added. The duties of the troops stationed in an enclave were now ‘to deter attacks’ and ‘to promote withdrawal’ of any troops positioned around it. The duties of UNPROFOR troops stationed in a Safe Area would therefore not be to defend or secure the withdrawal of an attacking force.

It was also very important that Resolution 836 only stated that safe areas ‘should be safe from attack’. This entailed an entirely different commitment from that if ‘shall’ had been used. The resolution did not impose any duty on the Bosnian-Serb army not to attack but assumed that they would not do so. Indeed, the Bosnian-Serbs had to weigh up the benefits of any coup-de-main against Srebrenica and the other Safe Areas against the strategic drawback of incurring the wrath of the world community. On the other hand, the policy of Safe Areas represented a form of bluff which was based on the assumption that there could be no other reason for Serbian leaders to capture it, such as revenge, compensation for defeats on other fronts, a desire for personal prestige, and so forth. Thirteen members of the Security Council voted in favour of Resolution 836 on 4 June. Pakistan and Venezuela abstained because they felt the resolution was too toothless. Albright announced that she was voting in favour on behalf of the USA ‘with no illusions about its ultimate consequences. It is an intermediate step – no more, no less’. In his coded message to The Hague, the Netherlands acting permanent representative to the UN, D’Ansembourg, noted that the temporary nature of Safe Areas could cover a very lengthy period of time.⁴⁹¹²

⁴⁹⁰⁸ See Part 2, Chapter 3.

⁴⁹⁰⁹ Shawcross, Evil, p. 102.

⁴⁹¹⁰ Shawcross, Evil, p. 103.

⁴⁹¹¹ Shawcross, Evil, p. 110.

⁴⁹¹² ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. D’Ansembourg 567 to Kooijmans, 04/06/93.

In a meeting of the EC's General Council on 8 June Hurd nevertheless stated that Resolution 836 was a temporary measure 'which keeps people alive, whilst we look for a real solution'. On this occasion it also appeared that the resolution was still not only to serve to protect UNPROFOR but also the local population, according to Juppé. Various speakers emphasised that the joint programme of action had not put an end to the Vance-Owen plan. Like Hurd, Minister Kooijmans stated that Resolution 836 was only of a transitional nature and that the search for a permanent solution should continue. In this connection, he sought a prominent role for the Netherlands by requesting appreciation of:

'the fact that it was impossible for a country such as the Netherlands, with such a substantial on-site involvement, not to be involved in the relevant decision-making. This involvement was also indispensable with a view to securing political support.'

According to Kooijmans, when implementing Resolution 836 the international community should operate in a manner that was 'not maximized but pragmatic'. This meant that the consent of local parties was indispensable for the 'safe area' concept, otherwise there would not be enough UN troops. The minister felt that 'air support was essential also because of its deterrent effect.'⁴⁹¹³

In the midst of the relief occasioned by European unity in the form of consensus on the pursuit of the Vance-Owen plan, the strict compliance with sanctions, and the implementation of Resolution 836, Owen was the person whose utterances were the most admonitory. He believed that the European ministers needed to realise that the Muslims would not balk at using anything to involve UN troops in the conflict. For this reason the Belgian Minister, Claes, called for clearly defined rules of engagement which left no doubt as to what the warring factions in Bosnia were able prepared and capable of doing.⁴⁹¹⁴

The following day, on 9 June, the EC ministers were scheduled to meet Christopher in Luxembourg. He too said that he did not see any discrepancy between the programme of action and the Vance-Owen plan. The programme of action and the Safe Areas were to serve as interim measures, while the Vance-Owen plan represented a long-term prospect.⁴⁹¹⁵ While Christopher and the European ministers displayed consensus in Luxembourg by embracing Safe Areas, on the home front the CIA warned against their establishment. In the course of time they would appear to be poor refugee camps in which a form of lawlessness would prevail along with animosity between the original inhabitants and the refugees, according to analysts in the American Intelligence Service. Furthermore, they foresaw that the Bosnian Serbs would delay supplies to these areas. In short, the international community was busy establishing 'six little West Banks'.⁴⁹¹⁶

11. Security with the aid of air support

Resolution 836, which was adopted on 4 June, permitted UN member states, either on their own or as part of an alliance, to support the UNPROFOR units in its operations to carry out its mandate 'through the use of air power' in and around the Safe Areas. During NATO talks on 25 and 26 May most of the countries that were participating in Operation Deny Flight appeared to be prepared to increase the number of fighter aircraft which they had made available, for the performance of duties in relation to the Safe Areas. However, France and the United Kingdom only wished to deploy these aircraft for the protection of UN personnel in the enclaves, while the other European member states felt that they ⁴⁹¹³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Faber 13 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93.

⁴⁹¹⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Faber 13 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93.

⁴⁹¹⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. cpe/sec 669, 11/06/93; ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Bot 214 to Kooijmans, 09/06/93.

⁴⁹¹⁶ Michael R. Gordon, 'U.S. Experts Say 'Safe Havens' Won't Help Much', The New York Times, 10/06/93.

should also defend their residents.⁴⁹¹⁷ According to a report dated 5 June from Jacobovits, the Dutch ambassador in Washington, the American authorities were also of the opinion that they were only providing aircraft for the protection of UNPROFOR and not for the defence of the Safe Areas 'because the military experts believe that it is impossible to defend Safe Areas from the air alone'.⁴⁹¹⁸

During the NATO Council meeting in Athens on 10 June the USA and its European allies produced a formula which purported that there was again consensus within NATO in relation to the former Yugoslavia. They announced that they had agreed that the Safe Areas should constitute a temporary measure, which was to lead to a settlement achieved through negotiations. The principles embodied in the Vance-Owen plan were still to apply in the case of such a settlement, namely that the full sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina had to be guaranteed. NATO undertook to provide UNPROFOR with air support if its members were attacked while acting in accordance with their mandate in relation to the Safe Areas. The question as to exactly what the air force was supposed to protect – UNPROFOR, the people or the Safe Area – was resolved with a compromise stating that the air force would protect UNPROFOR 'in the performance of its overall mandate'. This also covered the protection of the civilian population, a point which had been strongly argued for mainly by the Turkish Minister, Cetin.⁴⁹¹⁹ On 12 June NATO announced that it was prepared to provide the air support which was required for UNPROFOR to prosecute its mandate in accordance with Resolution 836. However, Christopher proclaimed that this air support would cover UNPROFOR units throughout Bosnia-Herzegovina 'but not protection for the civilian population in case of an attack'.⁴⁹²⁰ Christopher thus extended the scope of this support on the one hand – covering all UN troops in Bosnia – and simultaneously reduced it – not including the people. In the end, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States provided 19 aircraft for the protection of the Safe Areas. Several AWACS and other reconnaissance planes were added, thereby bringing the total number of aircraft involved to more than 100. The necessary arrangements were made within a month. The use of air support was supposed to remain within the confines of a peacekeeping operation, this is to say, to achieve one's objectives with a minimum of force, to issue a warning before using any force, to ensure a proportionate use of force, and to keep collateral damage to a minimum. In addition, a sharp distinction was drawn between Close Air Support and air strikes. 'Close Air Support' was only intended to be used to defend UNPROFOR troops and to deter attacks on Safe Areas. 'Air strikes', on the other hand, were of an offensive and strategic nature and were designed to destroy part of the fighting capacity of the warring factions, either for military or political purposes.

As of 22 July the NATO aircraft were ready to provide Close Air Support. After this, it was a question of waiting for the UN to give the green light. However, Boutros-Ghali asked NATO to delay operations above Bosnian terrain, including practice flights, as long as the forward air controllers (FACs), who were to track down targets on the ground and guide the pilots to them, were not in the field.⁴⁹²¹

It would therefore be possible to provide air support for the Safe Areas in the event of an emergency. On paper, the ability to summon air support appeared to be a powerful tool but there were a number of objections to it. For instance, the move from offering resistance on the ground using light arms to the deployment of airmobile weapons represented a major psychological step up the ladder of escalation.⁴⁹²² On 17 October 1995 the Director of the Legal Affairs Office of the Dutch Ministry of ⁴⁹¹⁷ Lutgert & De Winter, Horizon, pp. 193-95. See also ABZ, the embassy in Washington. Veenendaal NATO 891 to Kooijmans, 27/05/93.

⁴⁹¹⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Jacobovits 382 to Kooijmans, 04/06/93.

⁴⁹¹⁹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Vijverberg 91 (Kooijmans) to the Foreign Ministry, 11/06/93; interview W. Claes, 12/03/01.

⁴⁹²⁰ Quoted in Leurdijk, United Nations, p. 37.

⁴⁹²¹ 'NAVO-jagers nog niet ingezet voor beschermingstaak' (NATO fighters not yet deployed for protective duties), ANP, 23/07/93, 12.40 pm; 'NAVO kan begin volgende week beginnen met luchtoperatie Bosnië' (NATO can commence air operations in Bosnia next week), ANP, 28/07/93, 7.25 pm.

⁴⁹²² Cf. Colonel J.H. de Jonghe in: Frank Westerman, 'VN-missie berust op denkfouten' (UN mission conceptually flawed), NRC Handelsblad, 30/05/95.

Defence, Ybema, gave a lecture on the Conference on Rules of Engagement and the Law of War at the Koninklijke Militaire Academie (Royal Netherlands Military Academy) in Breda. In the draft of his talk he wrote that it is true that Resolution 836 explicitly permits the use of air support to counter any threat to a Safe Area. While there was nothing wrong with this from a legal point of view, Ijbema felt that the situation was different from a political perspective. At the international level there were rather significant differences of opinion about the wisdom and advisability of deploying airmobile weapons. According to Ybema, a UNPROFOR commander would therefore need to take account of the international and political consequences of his actions when making a decision in relation to air support.⁴⁹²³ In other words, deploying airmobile weapons was definitely not a reflexive act and its rationale was more political than military.

12. Troops for the Safe Areas

‘Deterrence is almost always preferable to fighting a war. But the decision to deter is one that should only be taken with great care, for with it comes the responsibility to make good on the commitment.’⁴⁹²⁴

On 7 June Annan spoke to representatives of the five countries responsible for the programme of action of 22 May and Canada, in order to ask them for troops (additional or otherwise) for the implementation of Resolution 836 covering Safe Areas. He said that a military personnel study conducted by the UN had shown that 34,000 troops would be required for a credible implementation of the resolution. None of these countries appeared to be prepared to offer a helping hand. The French wanted to continue to focus on Bihac and Sarajevo, and refused to accept responsibility for a third Safe Area. The British Government did not want any other tasks assigned to its troops over and above their existing ones in Central Bosnia. The United States and Russia bluntly refused to provide any troops. In the meantime it had been revealed that the Canadian Government wished to withdraw its troops from Srebrenica. The representatives of the five countries that had accepted the joint programme of action attempted to prevent Boutros-Ghali from presenting recommendations for decisive action or at least options for such action in his report on the implementation of the resolution. This was one of the numerous indications of a ‘game’ in which the major powers sought to hide behind the United Nations, while being the first to deprive the latter of arms, so as to enable Clinton to declare at a later stage, for example, ‘We have done everything the United Nations has asked us to do’.⁴⁹²⁵ The five responsible for the programme of action and the UN Secretariat agreed that, while it was true that Resolution 836 had been adopted in accordance with Chapter VII of the UN Charter, agreements would nevertheless be required at the local level. According to countries behind the programme of action, the phrase, ‘to deter attacks against the Safe Areas’, which in itself represented a dilution of the draft resolution, had to be interpreted narrowly. It did not entail the comprehensive defence of these areas. The task, ‘to promote the withdrawal of military or paramilitary units, was therefore not to be performed with the aid of weapons but was to be the subject of consultations with the parties involved. The permanent representatives of France and the United Kingdom were of the opinion that, following the amendment of Paragraph 9 of the draft-resolution, a light option was possible, only requiring about 7,000 soldiers.’⁴⁹²⁶

On 14 June Boutros-Ghali sent his report on the implementation of Resolution 836 to the Security Council.⁴⁹²⁷ It stated that, although 34,000 troops were required to deter attacks on the Safe Areas effectively, 7,600 would suffice for a minimum deterrence. Instead of deterrence through ⁴⁹²³ DJZ. Ybema to Voorhoeve, 13/10/95, no. 95001055.

⁴⁹²⁴ Haass, Intervention, p. 79.

⁴⁹²⁵ The editors, ‘The Abdication’ in Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 171.

⁴⁹²⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 577 to Kooijmans, 09/06/93.

⁴⁹²⁷ UN, S/25939.

strength, which would require 34,000 troops, there would now be deterrence by presence involving 7,600. The latter option would only be possible if the warring factions consented to the establishment of Safe Areas and if there was a threat of airmobile action in the event that any party nevertheless attacked a Safe Area. Airmobile action would take the form of Close Air Support which would simultaneously serve to defend the UN troops and act as a deterrent against attacks on Safe Areas. In addition, this light option was based on the consent and cooperation of the warring factions. Four days later the Council adopted Resolution 844, which approved the smaller number of troops. However, it said a lot that this number did not seem to be determined so much by the circumstances prevailing in and around the Safe Areas but, as Boutros-Ghali, had stated in his report of 14 June, on commitments 'which can realistically be expected from member states'.⁴⁹²⁸

Apart from the group of five, there also appeared to be little enthusiasm in the rest of the Western world to provide troops for the implementation of Resolution 836. Only the Swedish Government reported that it was considering an offer. For the rest, there were offers from Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia, thus Islamic countries, something the secretariat was not entirely pleased about given the anticipated Serbian response to this.⁴⁹²⁹ In the period that followed the Islamic countries were to make commitments which the UN Secretariat found embarrassing. For instance, on 13 July seven Islamic countries offered a total of 18,000 troops for the Safe Areas, including Iran, which presented a complete division of 10,000 soldiers.⁴⁹³⁰ Boutros-Ghali felt it necessary to decline these offers.⁴⁹³¹

Several days after Resolution 836 was accepted, the military adviser to the Netherlands' permanent representative, Colonel R. van Veen, was invited to a working level meeting at the UN Secretariat on 9 June to acquaint the representatives of those countries that could probably supply troops, with the UN's needs in relation to the implementation of the resolution. At the same time Annan approached the Dutch permanent representative, Biegman, with an informal question, which he was at liberty to interpret as a request, as to whether his information was correct that the Dutch Government was prepared to provide a logistics unit of approximately 400 personnel. Following consultations with the Ministry of Defence and the Defence Staff, it was decided that Van Veen would exercise restraint during the meeting.⁴⁹³²

13. 'Silly Sod' and the Netherlands' role as a catalyser

On 11 June Biegman reported that he and Van Veen had attended a meeting of 'troop contributors' chaired by Annan. According to him, a reference to 'non-contributors' would have been more appropriate. An embarrassing silence had fallen when Annan had asked for contributions. Biegman therefore urged that the logistics unit be offered. Not only would the Netherlands curry favour with the UN as a result, but it could also influence other potential contributing countries to get involved in the implementation of Resolution 836.⁴⁹³³

Several days later on 16 June Kooijmans informed the permanent representatives to the UN and NATO that the Netherlands was prepared to make an additional contribution to UNPROFOR for the Safe Areas in the form of a logistics unit, which the UN was to merge with contributions from ⁴⁹²⁸ UN, S/25939.

⁴⁹²⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 577 to Kooijmans, 9 June 1993; Biegman 579 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93.

⁴⁹³⁰ 'Moslimlanden overbieden VN-verzoek om blauwhelmen voor Bosnië' (Muslim countries' over-zealous response to UN request for peacekeepers in Bosnia), ANP, 13/07/93, 6.06 pm; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 733 to Kooijmans, 22/07/93.

⁴⁹³¹ DCBC, 2125. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, June 1994, 31/01/94; DCBC, 2125. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, June 1994, 31/01/94; 2122, September 1994, 11/02/94; 2118, 13/94, 25/02/94.

⁴⁹³² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 579 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93. For a report of the meeting itself see ABZ, 00782, Biegman 580 to Kooijmans, 09/06/93.

⁴⁹³³ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00782. Biegman 601 to Kooijmans, 11/06/93.

other countries into a unit that was appropriate for the concrete requirements of the other units which were to be made available for the Safe Areas: hence a so-called tailor-made unit. This meant that the tailor-made logistics unit which had been offered to NATO for the armed force that was to implement the Vance-Owen plan, was now earmarked as a contribution for the Safe Areas. Because at the time the Dutch Government made its new offer, it was not yet known what other offers the UN would receive and accept, it was also not known what logistic requirements these other units would have. A final decision was expected in September and would depend on both the overall political situation as well as local security conditions and the willingness of other countries to contribute troops. Based on its offer, the Netherlands thought that a repair unit would probably be requested. Because the Netherlands had already contributed a transport battalion, offering another was at any rate impossible. At the same time it presented its offer of a logistics unit, the Dutch Government announced that it was prepared to release six of the 18 F-16s that were currently deployed as part of Operation Deny Flight, for the protection of the Safe Areas.

Finally, the Dutch ambassadors were able to indicate:

‘that the Netherlands is retaining the option of having the first battalion of its Airmobile Brigade ready for possible deployment in Bosnia-Herzegovina as of the beginning of 1994, once it becomes operational in November 2000 and completes a further two months of training using Dutch armoured vehicles. In this connection, we are expressly not considering the Safe Areas, which are, after all, to serve as an eminently appropriate temporary measure, but its possible deployment in the broader context of the implementation of a ‘negotiated settlement on the basis of the principles of the Vance-Owen plan’.

As it happens, it would not have been possible to deploy the logistics unit and an airmobile battalion simultaneously, because the latter would require a logistics component, which would not be possible to achieve if a logistics unit of 400 personnel were to be sent elsewhere. The Dutch Government wanted this announcement to serve as a political signal to break the impasse affecting the establishment and implementation of a peace settlement. In other words, the offer was to serve ‘as a catalyser’ to induce other countries to offer troops as well. This was because the prospect of achieving a peace settlement would remain limited as long as no troops were forthcoming.⁴⁹³⁴ On 17 June Biegman informed both Annan and the permanent representatives of the EC member states of this offer and explicitly added ‘that by making this offer, the Netherlands hopes that it will also encourage other non-Muslim countries to front up and contribute additional troops’.⁴⁹³⁵ Feith, the deputy permanent representative to NATO accompanied his announcement of the offer with a call to the countries of the North-Atlantic Council for Cooperation to provide the necessary units and resources as well in the interests of ensuring a speedy peace settlement.⁴⁹³⁶ On 18 June it was reported in Cabinet that this new offer had been made to the UN. In this connection, it was noted that the logistics unit had indeed initially been offered for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan. This condition therefore no longer applied. The airmobile brigade – and this was stated here again – was only to be deployed for the implementation of any peace plan.⁴⁹³⁷

The observation that a lack of troops had hindered the West from forcefully pursuing a peace settlement was correct. However, the timing of the Dutch Government’s attempt to break this impasse was strange. Such an attempt would have been logical at the end of March or the beginning of April. At that time the American and Russian Governments were in principle still prepared to provide troops for ⁴⁹³⁴ ABZ, PVNY. Kooijmans to New York and NATO permanent representatives, 16/06/93, circ 428.

⁴⁹³⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Biegman 623 to Kooijmans, 17/06/93.

⁴⁹³⁶ ABZ, the embassy in Washington. Feith NAVO 981 to Kooijmans, 17/06/93.

⁴⁹³⁷ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 18/06/93 prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study.

a force to implement a peace settlement. While it is true that Minister Ter Beek had allowed the Airmobile Brigade to be included in the list of resources for such a force at the time, NATO was not supposed to be informed of this alternative. At the time officials in the Department of Foreign Affairs were disappointed with the meagre offer that the Dutch Ministry of Defence was able to make. By mid-June the Vance-Owen plan was dead, irrespective of the fine words chosen by the representatives of the countries that had brought about its demise, to maintain that it could again play a role at some time in the future. The Dutch Government appears to have refused to see this. On the same day that Kooijmans issued his directive, Presidents Tudjman, Milosevic and Izetbegovic met to discuss a confederate structure for Bosnia-Hercegovina, which marked the start of a new peace plan. The United States was to have been the major contributor of an implementation force yet it was utterly clear from the statements made by Clinton and Christopher following the latter's return from his tour of European capitals in the first week of May that one could not count on the deployment of American ground troops. The position adopted by the USA, France and the United Kingdom to the request for troops for the Safe Areas was indicative. If the Dutch Government had wanted to break the impasse by offering troops in mid-June, it should not have been an offer for an implementation force but for the Safe Areas. However, the Dutch Government assumed that at the beginning of 1994, when the first airmobile battalion was scheduled to be ready for deployment, there would be no further need for it to be sent to the Safe Areas, which were intended to be a temporary measure.

On the other hand, the fixation on the Airmobile Brigade which had gradually developed, came to assume such proportions that it began to seem almost inevitable that the Dutch Government would deploy it in Yugoslavia as soon as it was ready for this. The more the moment of actual decision-making about the deployment of a Dutch unit was delayed, the closer it came to the time – the end of 1993 or beginning of 1994 – when the Airmobile Brigade would technically be ready for deployment.

Yet would it be possible to continue to differentiate between the logistics unit for the Safe Areas and the airmobile battalion for a force to implement a peace plan? This would be difficult for two main reasons, firstly because of the pressure emanating primarily from the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs to ensure the credible implementation of the concept of 'safe areas', and secondly, the problems that the Netherlands was encountering in its efforts to establish the logistics unit it had promised for the Safe Areas. In view of the renewed consensus that had become visible within the EC at the beginning of June, the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs attached great importance to 'the issue currently meriting attention, namely, the protection of the Safe Areas, which the Netherlands, in particular, has pleaded for so strongly since the start'.⁴⁹³⁸ Despite this apparent consensus, that was taking shape in early June among EC-members the Dutch Government continued to demand more than its European partners in relation to the former Yugoslavia. On 22 June Minister Kooijmans informed television presenter, Maartje van Weegen, and her Dutch television audience that in the course of international consultations he was gradually being overcome by the feeling that 'I am a silly sod to stand here screaming ... for so long'. Nevertheless, Kooijmans felt that the Dutch position had eventually yielded results, such as the resolution providing for air protection for the Safe Areas.⁴⁹³⁹

Kooijmans said this following a meeting of the European Council, which the Danish Presidency of the EC had convened on 21 and 22 June to discuss the latest developments in the negotiations in Geneva. The Vance-Owen plan had since been abandoned there. On 16 June 1993 Milosevic and Tudjman had met with Izetbegovic and had proposed that Bosnia-Hercegovina be split into three. The Bosnian Muslims had always resisted this and on this occasion Izetbegovic had merely listened.⁴⁹⁴⁰ During the meeting in Copenhagen⁴⁹⁴¹ Owen mainly blamed 'the tactless actions of Izetbegovic' for the ⁴⁹³⁸ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Kooijmans to New York and NATO permanent representatives, 16/06/93, circ 428.

⁴⁹³⁹ NOS, NOVA, Interview Kooijmans conducted by Maartje van Weegen, 22/06/93, 10.30 pm.

⁴⁹⁴⁰ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 43/93, 29/06/93; 44/93, 05/07/93; 45/93, 13/07/93; 47/93, 03/08/93; ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812. Smit 217 to Kooijmans, 18/06/93.

⁴⁹⁴¹ For a detailed report of the meeting in Copenhagen see ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

new situation.⁴⁹⁴² According to the British negotiator, the Bosnian president had himself driven the Croats and Serbs into each others' arms, with the result that the Vance-Owen plan 'has been torn to pieces before our eyes'.⁴⁹⁴³ Owen was of the opinion that the plans of the Croats and Serbs were not in themselves to the Muslims' disadvantage and he wished to negotiate further on that basis but no longer with Izetbegovic, whom he described as 'undemocratic'. He only wished to speak to the Bosnian praesidium. Owen felt that there was scope for negotiations in this case. If negotiations were no longer to ensue, the Croats and Serbs would impose their will on the Muslims.

Minister Kooijmans was highly critical of Owen's address. He had been left with 'an "Alice-in-Wonderland" feeling'. At the beginning of June the European Council had still asserted that the Vance-Owen plan constituted the cornerstone of the EC's policy on Bosnia and the joint programme of action of 22 May represented a step towards this. Now, less than two weeks later, the Vance-Owen plan was declared to be dead by one of its authors. The same author was now urging the EC ministers to support another plan 'where the probable victims of the plan for division were simultaneously branded as the primary cause of all this misery. On behalf of whom and in accordance with what mandate were negotiations now actually being conducted in Geneva?' Kooijmans asked.⁴⁹⁴⁴ According to the Dutch Minister, there was a need to abide by the principles stipulated during the conference held in London in August 1992 and 'whatever the case, the Muslims should not be left holding the baby'.⁴⁹⁴⁵ This view was shared by European Commissioner Van den Broek and the German Minister, Kinkel. However, Kooijmans was disappointed to note that his other foreign counterparts displayed 'a frequent mixture of cynicism and despondent resignation'.⁴⁹⁴⁶

Urged by the Dutch delegation, the Council issued a statement calling for a 'fair and viable' peace settlement acceptable to all three parties. A Serbian and Croatian diktat would not be countenanced, according to a free translation of the mandate which the EC gave the mediator, Owen.

At Clinton's request, Kohl again raised the question of lifting the arms embargo against the Bosnian Government during the meeting in Copenhagen.⁴⁹⁴⁷ In this way the American Government indirectly supported the request for the embargo to be lifted, which the Bosnian President, Izetbegovic, addressed to the European Council.⁴⁹⁴⁸ Most member states felt that this could only be done if all hope was abandoned of finding a solution through negotiations.

The Council also discussed the member states' potential contribution in response to Boutros-Ghali's request for the supply of troops that were required for the protection of the Safe Areas as provided for in Resolution 836. In principle, the Council was favourably disposed towards this request. The EC countries undertook to respond favourably 'within their power' to the UN Secretariat's request for additional troops for the purposes of Resolution 836. At the same time they called on other countries to do the same.⁴⁹⁴⁹ In the course of heated discussions, the Government leaders realised that it had to be one or the other: either the international community would provide troops to protect the Safe Areas or they had to lift the arms embargo imposed on the Bosnian Government. The French President Mitterrand linked the two points together by stating that, if the troops required for the Safe Areas were not assembled soon, the embargo would be lifted.⁴⁹⁵⁰ However, the Netherlands was the ⁴⁹⁴² ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

⁴⁹⁴³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

⁴⁹⁴⁴ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

⁴⁹⁴⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

⁴⁹⁴⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans, 25/06/93, circ 446.

⁴⁹⁴⁷ 'Clinton vraagt hulp Kohl voor opheffing wapenembargo Bosnië' (Clinton requests assistance to lift Bosnian arms embargo), ANP, 22/06/93, 6.28 am; ' Clintons Brief an Kohl stiftet neue Verwirrung', Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 24/06/93; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 145.

⁴⁹⁴⁸ 'Bosnische president wil af van wapenembargo' (Bosnian president wants arms embargo dropped), ANP, 21/06/93, 8.35 pm.

⁴⁹⁴⁹ European Council in Copenhagen – 21-22/06/93: Conclusions of the presidency, Appendix III Statement on Bosnia-Herzegovina, RAPID, 22/06/93.

⁴⁹⁵⁰ Lionel Barber & David Gardner, 'EC promises more troops for Bosnia peacekeeping role', Financial Times, 23/06/93.

only country to make a concrete proposal: the 400 logistics personnel who were originally offered as part of the Vance-Owen plan but who were now to be made available for the protection of the Safe Areas.⁴⁹⁵¹ The French Government also seemed to make an offer of 1,000 troops but it later turned out that, while it was true that it had ultimately proposed as many as 1,450, it was to simultaneously withdraw 1,308 from Croatia, with the result that it would only be making an addition of 142 men available.⁴⁹⁵² Moreover, the French Government made significant gains in return for this cosmetic offer. It had initially made its offer dependant on the willingness of Boutros-Ghali to replace Wahlgren as the UNPROFOR Commander with a French general.⁴⁹⁵³ Boutros-Ghali agreed to this, after which General Cot succeeded Wahlgren at the helm in Zagreb on 1 July, and replaced Morillon with the Commander of the BH Command, his old friend the Belgian General F. Briquemont.⁴⁹⁵⁴ The Italian Government later offered a unit comprising 1,700 troops but Boutros-Ghali turned it down, firstly, because Italy was historically burdened by its role as occupier in Yugoslavia during the Second World War and, secondly, the UN Secretary-General did not wish to create a precedent for other neighbouring or nearby countries, in which connection he appeared to have Turkey in mind.⁴⁹⁵⁵ The United Kingdom and Spain explicitly excluded the possibility that they would provide troops for the Safe Areas.⁴⁹⁵⁶

According to a subsequent report about Dutch decision-making in connection with the former Yugoslavia, the Dutch Government made its offer during the EC summit again because of 'the exemplary function it was expected to have'.⁴⁹⁵⁷ If the Dutch Government intended to act as a catalyser by offering troops in Copenhagen, then the country's diplomats should have sounded out opinion in the European capitals prior to that summit. The Foreign Ministry directorate had apparently failed to learn any lessons from 'Black Monday' one and a half years earlier, when the Netherlands' proposal for a European Political Union had failed to gain support, partly owing to a lack of consultation beforehand. In addition, the difficulties encountered in coordinating the efforts of the Ministries of General and Foreign Affairs in relation to foreign policy probably also played a role. The General Affairs Department was entitled to assume that Dutch diplomats abroad had performed preparatory work. On the other hand, the Foreign Affairs Department held the view that the Prime Minister should himself use the offer to ensure that other countries were prepared to provide troops. It was only there that business was done. According to the Foreign Ministry, not a single European capital would be willing to reveal its own position prior to such a summit.⁴⁹⁵⁸

As it happens, the purpose of this offer was not merely to induce other countries to follow the Dutch example. It was also done because the Dutch Government apparently felt embarrassed by the discrepancy between its own words and deeds. In 1992 Van den Broek had already found that his insistence on a credible threat against the Serbs, in respect of which he had been relatively isolated internationally, was felt to be 'relatively easy' by his foreign counterparts, because the Netherlands itself had little to offer. According to the then Deputy Prime Minister, Kok, during the summit of Copenhagen 'a certain awkwardness ... began to emerge: a number of things really needed to be offered then'. 'And if we are so critical about the overall situation, that much is said but too little is done, let us then display a visible presence using the best possible resources that we have for this ⁴⁹⁵¹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Kooijmans to New York permanent representative and PV NAVO, 24/06/93, circ 444.

⁴⁹⁵² NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek Memorandum from Waltmann to Ter Beek, 09/07/93; confidential interview (1).

⁴⁹⁵³ ABZ, government files: Stg. Secret codes. D'Ansembourg 097 to Kooijmans, 01/07/93; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Kooijmans, 30/06/93 circ 462; Adolf Carlson, 'No Balm in Gilead: The Employment of Military Force in the War in Former Yugoslavia and Prospects for a Lasting Peace' in Blank (ed.), Wars, p. 84; Shawcross, Evil, p. 112; interviews B. Boutros-Ghali on 30/01/01 and E.L. Wahlgren, 03/06/99.

⁴⁹⁵⁴ Briquemont, Do something, p. 14.

⁴⁹⁵⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Kooijmans, 09/07/93, circ 494.

⁴⁹⁵⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Memorandum from DAV to Kooijmans, 23/06/93, no. DAV/MS-148/93; 2001/00023, Impression of part of the European Council deliberations on Bosnia-Herzegovina, enclosed with memorandum from plv. DEU to AP et al., 24/06/93, no. 77.

⁴⁹⁵⁷ TK, session of 1995-1996, 22 181, no. 149, p. 9.

⁴⁹⁵⁸ Interview O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00.

purpose.⁴⁹⁵⁹ The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in particular, held a widely shared view ‘that we cannot preach that everyone needs to make a contribution and then ourselves ... do nothing’.⁴⁹⁶⁰

‘Something needs to be done. We cannot remain on the sidelines. We made this clear in Europe. We made this clear in New York. We have tried to induce the international community to take action.... Now we have a duty if we are to maintain our credibility, to make a gesture, a symbolic gesture, because again, it was nothing more than that.... In the hope of ... yes, at a certain point our other partners were irritated to a certain extent about the Netherlands’ fair weather games.... All our talk was cheap....⁴⁹⁶¹

If you do not make a material contribution in one way or another, you will count for little very soon. So it is not a question of emotion alone or anything like this, or we really have to, or whatever. No, it is also a question of the Netherlands having an international role to play. But if we wish to live up to this more or less, we will also need to show that we have something to contribute.⁴⁹⁶²

14. The logistics unit not achievable

If Prime Minister Lubbers had presented his offer of a logistics unit to the army before he did that in Copenhagen, he would not have done the latter, according to the former Brigadier-General G.J.M. Bastiaans, who worked for the Army Staff.⁴⁹⁶³ This was because shortly after the Foreign Affairs Department had issued its directive concerning the offer to the permanent representatives to NATO and the UN on 16 June, the Commander of the First Army Corps, Lieutenant-General M. Schouten, had reported to General Couzy, the Chief of the Army that it would not be possible to establish a logistics unit of 400 personnel, which had been referred to since Van der Vlis had drawn up his first list at the beginning of March. The main reason was that there were not enough heavy vehicle drivers available. Couzy then approached Van der Vlis with this unpleasant news.⁴⁹⁶⁴ This occurred shortly before Lubbers made his offer in Copenhagen. Couzy did not know whether the information had reached Ministers Ter Beek and Lubbers in time.⁴⁹⁶⁵

On 23 June, the day after the summit in Copenhagen, the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV) in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs directed that a Priorities White Paper be urgently presented to Minister Kooijmans to the effect that the Defence Staff doubted whether the Dutch logistics unit could consist of 400 personnel. The DAV stated that Lubbers had since made this offer on various occasions and that it would be difficult for the Dutch Government to go back on this now. The Directorate of General Policy Matters (DAB) in the Defence Department wished to consult the Ministers of General Affairs, Foreign Affairs and Defence about this.⁴⁹⁶⁶

This alarming news did not prevent Kooijmans from informing Biegan on 24 June that the latter could offer 400 troops that same day during the meeting which Annan had arranged with representatives of those countries that could possibly contribute to the implementation of Resolution ⁴⁹⁵⁹ Interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁴⁹⁶⁰ Interview O. Hattinga van ‘t Sant, 18/07/00. See also the interview P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99 and R. Swartbol on 24/02/99.

⁴⁹⁶¹ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁴⁹⁶² Interview P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00.

⁴⁹⁶³ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁴⁹⁶⁴ Interviews H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁴⁹⁶⁵ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁴⁹⁶⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Memorandum from DAV to Kooijmans, 23/06/93, no. DAV/MS-148/93.

836.⁴⁹⁶⁷ During this meeting Biegman therefore made an offer on behalf of the Dutch Government of a tailor-made logistics unit of 400 personnel to be deployed for the purposes of the Safe Areas.⁴⁹⁶⁸

At that point in time the UN had only received a definite commitment – of 1,200 troops – from Bangladesh, as well as unconfirmed offers from Indonesia, Pakistan, Tunisia and Sweden. In itself, the offer must have been welcome to Annan, in particular its subject, a logistics unit. The UN experiences a chronic shortage of logistics in relation to its peacekeeping operations. This is because poor countries, which provide many troops, find it relatively easy to mobilise infantry, but rarely a communications battalion or a divisional hospital. The UN views logistics as a ‘force multiplier’. A military unit can do nothing without logistics but so much more with the latter. No wonder therefore that as early as 25 June, the day after the meeting chaired by Annan, the UN Secretariat formally submitted a request to the Dutch Government to provide a logistics unit.⁴⁹⁶⁹

There is no such thing as a logistics battalion. The offer of a logistics unit of 400 personnel meant that troops had to be pulled from numerous units. The Defence Department and the Army therefore informally referred to this logistics unit as a ‘culled option’. Culling personnel from other units meant that the latter would no longer be operational. In this sense the offer of a logistics unit represented a ‘show-stopper’ for the rest of the Royal Netherlands Army. Moreover, it had to be possible to offer a unit for a longer period of time. This is to say that after six months, which was considered to be a normal tour of duty, it had to be possible to relieve the troops in question. In other words, there had to be what is known in military jargon as sustainability. Apparently, this was a problem that the army realised at a late stage.

On 28 June Van der Vlis and Couzy had a talk about notes made by Bastiaans dealing with the difficulties that had arisen. The Deputy Commander of the Army, Major-General R. Reitsma, had informed Bastiaans that same day that a political loss of face needed to be avoided. By no later than the end of the afternoon of 6 July the Royal Netherlands Army would need to inform Van der Vlis what it could provide in order to fulfil the UN’s stated logistic requirements.⁴⁹⁷⁰ It then appeared that the previous figure of 400 troops was due to a duplicate count. Only 220 troops would be available, of whom 100 were national service personnel.⁴⁹⁷¹ This report was communicated to Major E.A.W. Koestal, the deputy military adviser to the Dutch permanent representative in New York. Koestal in turn immediately notified the UN Secretariat, because on 7 July Biegman reported to the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs that, owing to a difference from the original commitment, ‘the DPKO had placed several question marks next to the Dutch offer’. Biegman anticipated a major blow to the Netherlands’ credibility, because it had first asserted the need to set an example and then threatened to go back on this.⁴⁹⁷² Kooijmans informed Biegman that he should not withdraw the offer he had made to the UN Secretariat. Biegman was to view the number of 200 to 250 as ‘a provisional figure that is merely based on an initial assessment of needs following contact with UNPROFOR assuming current data’.⁴⁹⁷³ On 8 July the minister again confirmed the offer, this time to his counterpart, Juppé, in person.⁴⁹⁷⁴

The question is whether Ministers Ter Beek, Kooijmans and Lubbers were aware of the army’s discovery that a logistics unit of 400 military personnel was not feasible prior to the summit in Copenhagen. Couzy said that he did not know. It could have been possible. According to Drea Berghorst, who studied the decision-making process involved in the deployment of the Airmobile ⁴⁹⁶⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01820. Kooijmans to New York and NATO permanent representatives, 24/06/93, circ 444.

⁴⁹⁶⁸ ABZ, PVNY. Biegman’s notes for the meeting of troop contributors in connection with Security Council Resolutions 836 and 844; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Biegman 686 to Kooijmans, 07/07/93.

⁴⁹⁶⁹ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Biegman 663 to Kooijmans, 25/06/93.

⁴⁹⁷⁰ NIOD, Coll. Reitsma. Confidential memorandum from Major-General Reitsma to Brigadier-General Bastiaans, 28/06/93.

⁴⁹⁷¹ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memorandum from Waltmann to Ter Beek, 09/07/93; Kreemers, Balkan-express, p.15.

⁴⁹⁷² ABZ, DPV/ARA/00209. Biegman 686 to Kooijmans, 07/07/93.

⁴⁹⁷³ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. Kooijmans 185 to New York permanent representative, 08/07/93.

⁴⁹⁷⁴ ABZ, government files. Kooijmans to Juppé, 08/07/93.

Brigade, Prime Minister Lubbers was not aware that it was uncertain as to whether or not enough national service personnel could be mustered for a logistics unit.⁴⁹⁷⁵ However, various statements made by people who were involved, indicate that this was indeed the case. According to H.A.C. van der Zwan, the head of the Political Affairs Office (bureau Politieke Zaken) of the Directorate for Political and UN Affairs (directie Politieke VN-Zaken) in the Department of Foreign Affairs, Ter Beek and Kooijmans knew before the Copenhagen summit that it would probably not be possible to assemble enough personnel for the logistics unit.⁴⁹⁷⁶ In Copenhagen Prime Minister Lubbers referred to the offer as ‘a political commitment’ and ‘a general undertaking’: ‘In Copenhagen the matter was not specified ... in terms of those troops and that manner’.⁴⁹⁷⁷ According to Ter Beek, the main thing that happened in Copenhagen, was that a political signal was given to the effect that the Netherlands felt that something should happen.⁴⁹⁷⁸ Once consensus on the approach to Safe Areas had been achieved, Lubbers felt that the Dutch Government had ‘to do something in a flash, because it might not be possible one way and would have to happen another’.⁴⁹⁷⁹ Hoekema, Van der Zwan’s departmental superior, also believed that the main purpose of the offer of a logistics unit was ‘to exert political pressure on others.... Just as though the Netherlands knew that it was never going to provide that unit. The stakes were quite high and a great many alternatives were held open in the period June and July 1993’.⁴⁹⁸⁰ Actually, there were only two alternatives: the logistics unit which had been offered for the Safe Areas, and the Airmobile Brigade, a prospect cited for the implementation of a peace settlement. What if one were to become impossible now, would the other then...?

The answer was provided as early as the day after the European Council meeting in Copenhagen, issuing from Minister Kooijmans’ mouth during the conclusion of the debate on the summit in Parliament:

‘With regard to the airmobile battalion which could be ready by 1 January – actually even earlier – last week the Minister of Defence also announced that it could be deployed for the implementation of any peace plan that is agreed. If the Safe Areas still need to be protected at that time, it could also be used for this purpose if necessary.’⁴⁹⁸¹

In view of the fact that it was a question of either or, either the logistics unit or the airmobile battalion, it seems highly likely that Minister Kooijmans had already taken the mental step from the deployment of a logistics unit for the Safe Areas to that of an airmobile battalion for these areas. From a memo drawn up by Barth and Van den Breemen in mid-August 1993 (see Chapter 13) it emerged that Ter Beek was indeed already aware before the Copenhagen summit that the logistics unit could not be realized and that he had also communicated this fact to Kooijmans.⁴⁹⁸² The offer that had been made in Copenhagen, was therefore indeed worth no more than a political signal. The Dutch Government endeavoured to persuade other countries to provide units as well and it showed that it was prepared to put its money where its mouth was. In Copenhagen it mentioned the offer of a logistics unit, even though it was already aware that it would not be feasible, yet how many months were still to pass before the first airmobile battalion would be ready to be deployed? No more than six. Perhaps it would be possible to bridge this period and the Dutch Government could replace a logistics unit with an airmobile battalion at any point in time. Various key players and analysts have endlessly quibbled about ⁴⁹⁷⁵ Berghorst, Opdracht, p. 10.

⁴⁹⁷⁶ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁴⁹⁷⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, p. 133.

⁴⁹⁷⁸ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁴⁹⁷⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, p. 133. Similar sentiments were expressed in an interview C. Minderhoud on 02/06/00.

⁴⁹⁸⁰ TCBU, interview J.T. Hoekema, 07/03/00, p. 20.

⁴⁹⁸¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, p. 6041.

⁴⁹⁸² NIOD Coll. Ter Beek, Memo from Barth and Van den Breemen, 17/08/93, D93/326.

the question as to whether the Netherlands offered a battalion of its Airmobile Brigade for the Safe Areas or as part of a peace settlement, and whether this changed in the course of time. Well then, the last change occurred in Parliament on 23 June. At the time Minister Kooijmans stated that the airmobile battalion could be used for either purpose but, in view of preceding events, everything pointed in the direction of the Safe Areas. Although it had been formally offered, it was not possible to achieve this and it would have to be replaced with the airmobile battalion at any moment.

A formal reason can be added to this. From a formal perspective, the Netherlands' offer to the United Nations was only possible in response to a statement of need by the latter. Such a statement was only permitted on the basis of a resolution adopted by the Security Council. Well then, the Council adopted resolutions covering the Safe Areas in 1993. No resolution had been adopted for a force to implement a peace plan. If the Dutch Government made an offer in 1993, it could only have been done so for the purposes of the Safe Areas. This meant either deployment in an actual Safe Area or a role in the protection of convoys destined for such an area.

From the perspective of the Dutch Government, one may also add that it held to the idea embodied in the preamble to Resolution 836, to the effect that the Safe Areas did not constitute a goal in themselves but were part of the process of negotiations headed by Vance and Owen, and were an initial step towards a permanent political solution. For this reason the Dutch Government regarded Safe Areas as the first move towards a peace settlement which it expected until the end of September. It would be possible to link the Safe Areas to Bosnian terrain with the aid of corridors as part of a peace settlement.⁴⁹⁸³ In view of the above, any discussion about the question as to whether the Dutch government offered the Airmobile Brigade as part of an impending peace settlement or for the purposes of the Safe Areas, assumes an academic nature. Alternatively, as Minister Ter Beek viewed it, the Airmobile Brigade was intended for the UN:

‘The fact that the Airmobile Brigade was treated as an implementation force at one stage and as something for the Safe Areas at another, was largely determined by the time when it was mentioned. This is because it was simply determined by the political circumstances that were prevailing there at that time.’⁴⁹⁸⁴

For this reason any further reference will reveal the purpose stated in respect of any offer at the time but no significant implications will be drawn from this. Ostensibly entirely in line with the position adopted by his minister, Commodore H.J. Vandeweyer, the Chief of Operations of the Defence Staff, conceded off the record in a conversation that he and the head of the Military Collaboration Office (bureau Militaire Samenwerking) of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs, K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, had with Canadian diplomats on 7 June, that it would be possible to deploy the Airmobile Brigade for the Safe Areas.⁴⁹⁸⁵

In the course of the debate about Copenhagen on 23 June there was general agreement on the offer of the logistics unit. However, there was also a good deal of criticism because only the Netherlands and France – as was then still thought to be the case – had made a concrete offer. Moreover, Parliament suspected that the negotiations which Owen had since begun, would produce an inferior settlement for the Muslims than that envisaged in the Vance-Owen plan, and would abandon the principles of the London conference. Various members of Parliament expressed the view that the EC was nearly or actually morally bankrupt.⁴⁹⁸⁶ In particular the CDA parliamentary party believed that, ⁴⁹⁸³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99 and 13/01/00; O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 01/08/97 and 18/07/00, with P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99; H.A.C. van der Zwan on 12/04/00.

⁴⁹⁸⁴ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁴⁹⁸⁵ DFAIT, Ottawa, File No. 21-14-6-UNPROFOR Vol. 32, from 930604 to 930615, Hague to YWGR0553. Bosnia SA: 836. (4 p.), 07/06/93.

⁴⁹⁸⁶ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, pp. 6013 (Sipkes), 6015 (Van Middelkoop), 6027 (Van Traa and Eisma), 6028 (Van Traa).

in view of the fact that Copenhagen had failed to provide sufficient guarantees for the Muslims, the arms embargo applying to them should be lifted. Other members of the house also tended towards this view. Lubbers became irritated, because the approach adopted by the house conflicted with the line that he and Kooijmans had taken in Copenhagen: induce other countries to commit troops for Resolution 836, otherwise the arms embargo would be lifted. They had actually pleaded for Safe Areas and against the arms embargo being lifted. Which country would be prepared to send troops to the Safe Areas if the arms embargo was lifted? The tenor of Lubbers' response was that if Parliament wished to undermine the security of the Safe Areas, it should simply continue in that vein. On the other hand, his position was difficult, however, because he could not guarantee the house that the other EC countries would actually ensure that enough troops were provided for the Safe Areas.⁴⁹⁸⁷ This was the way in which the Dutch Government greeted the summer of 1993.

The offer made by the Dutch Government in Copenhagen also failed to have a catalytic effect in the weeks that followed. The offer made by the French during the EC summit turned out to be cosmetic, because it actually amounted to a relocation of troops. Outside the EC only Bangladesh (1,250 troops) and Pakistan (300 personnel) made concrete offers. A number of other Islamic countries also seemed willing to provide troops. 'Will it really be the case that an armed force headed by a NATO general will be made up of French, Dutch, Pakistani, Bengalese, Tunisian and Algerian troops for such a risky mission?' Wio Joustra sarcastically inquired in The Volkskrant of 15 July 1993, and immediately answered the question himself by referring to a 'mission impossible':

'The question is whether we have not gradually lost sight of the relationship between the end and the means in Bosnia. Combat aircraft are being readied to protect 'safe areas'. And the latter are precisely those areas where the fighting is heaviest. The arrangement of ground protection is further away than ever. The Netherlands is in danger of involving itself in a concept that does not exist, and of doing so under the auspices of a Minister of Foreign Affairs who has constantly sought to ensure that a Dutch contribution must depend on a clearly defined political objective.'⁴⁹⁸⁸

After bargaining for troops for several months Annan had received undertakings accounting for 24,000 troops, more than three times the amount of 7,600 which the Security Council had authorised. However, most of these troops had no equipment at their disposal. Countries such as the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany and Belgium made equipment available but the troops needed to be trained to use it, with the result that it was only possible to deploy the Pakistani troops a year later, for example. In other cases, absolutely no equipment was provided, with the result that Bangladesh and Tunisia had to withdraw their commitment to provide troops. As a result it took almost a year before Boutros-Ghali had assembled the required number of 7,600 troops.

Following the Copenhagen summit the Dutch Government was irritated by the lack of undertakings from other countries. At the same time the Netherlands could do little other than continue to provide a good example.⁴⁹⁸⁹ As a result, the country was under great pressure to live up to its promises.

The question arises as to what room for manoeuvre the Dutch parliament still had following Lubbers' offer in Copenhagen and its consent to this. If the Dutch Government failed to honour this commitment, the Netherlands' credibility abroad would plummet. The offer itself was the product of the realisation that words need to be backed up by deeds. The Dutch Government realised that it needed to do something. Withdrawing its offer would have been disastrous. The PvdA Member of ⁴⁹⁸⁷ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings, pp. 6013-6041. See also 'CDA ruziet over beëindiging wapenembargo tegen Moslims' (CDA squabbles about lifting arms embargo against Muslims), de Volkskrant, 24/06/93.

⁴⁹⁸⁸ Wio Joustra, 'Strategie voor inzet F-16's in Bosnië ontbreekt' (Strategy absent for deployment of F-16s in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 15/07/93.

⁴⁹⁸⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, p. 132.

Parliament, Valk, was to acknowledge this to the Bakker Committee at a later stage. With regard to the debate of 16 November 1993, during which Parliament approved the despatch of a battalion of the Airmobile Brigade, he wondered, 'How much room for manoeuvre did Parliament still actually have for its decision at the time, in view of the fact that it had urged even greater military involvement months or perhaps even years beforehand?'⁴⁹⁹⁰ If it was impossible to deploy a logistics unit, the Dutch Government's only alternative was to outdo its offer.

15. The preparation of the Airmobile Brigade for deployment in Bosnia

In the spring of 1993 it was still assumed that the Airmobile Brigade would be sent to Cambodia at the end of 1993, when the deployment of the last of the three marine battalions was due to expire. As late as June 1993 the brigade's magazine, Falcon, published an article about its possible deployment in South-East Asia. A number of officers had been sent to Malaysia to attend a jungle course and a reconnaissance mission to South-East Asia had been planned.⁴⁹⁹¹ However, elections proceeded in Cambodia in May 1993 without any major problems, with the result that it was possible for the Dutch troops who had been sent there, to return home without the need to relieve them.

The army leadership then began to make preparations for an alternative deployment of the Airmobile Brigade. At the end of June Couzy issued a so-called planning order to the Airmobile Brigade: 'Prepare for deployment in Bosnia-Herzegovina' as of 1 January 1994.⁴⁹⁹² This actually happened while the orders for Cambodia were still current.⁴⁹⁹³ Issuing planning instructions represents sound operational practice to initiate military projects at an early stage. They open doors that would otherwise remain shut. The relevant unit receives more ammunition, is accorded priority for the use of exercise facilities, and its training is accelerated.

While it was clear that the Dutch Government would not be able to deploy both a logistics unit and the Airmobile Brigade under any circumstances, and that it had offered a logistics unit both in New York and Copenhagen, the army began to plan for the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade under orders from Couzy. The army reasoned that Parliament had expressly called for the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade and that Minister Ter Beek would not oppose this either. Moreover, preparations were required, because an airmobile battalion would virtually have to be ready the moment it received the green light for its deployment.⁴⁹⁹⁴

On 1 July the daily newspaper, De Gelderlander, reported that the 800 troops of the 11th Infanteriebataljon Luchtmobiel Garde Grenadiers (Grenadiers Guard Airmobile Infantry Battalion) had been notified that they had to make preparations in Schaarsbergen for deployment in Yugoslavia before 1994. Apart from Bosnia, Kosovo and Macedonia were also cited as possible arenas for deployment. The paper also reported that the airmobile troops were to be equipped with model YPR 765 armoured vehicles.⁴⁹⁹⁵ Once the press release had been included in the Defence Information Department's files, Minister Ter Beek intervened. He ordered that the planning directive be withdrawn immediately. He said that he appreciated the army's ability to anticipate matters, but he interpreted it as 'a certain eagerness to set off with the Airmobile Brigade'. Thinking ahead was not to turn into dictating policy.⁴⁹⁹⁶ Couzy later stated that he had also understood that the planning order would be politically sensitive. He had therefore '...consulted General Van der Vlis closely' about the order and had ⁴⁹⁹⁰ TCBU, Vertretpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 253.

⁴⁹⁹¹ Christ Klep, 'De weg naar Srebrenica' in Jellema, First-in, p. 17 and p. 21; Kreemers, Balkan-express, p. 14; interview C. Vermeulen, 09/06/99.

⁴⁹⁹² Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 13.

⁴⁹⁹³ Interview Chr. Vermeulen, 09/06/99.

⁴⁹⁹⁴ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁴⁹⁹⁵ 'Luchtmobiele Brigade bereidt zich voor op ex-Joegoslavië' (Airmobile Brigade prepares for the former Yugoslavia), Gelderlander, 01/07/93.

⁴⁹⁹⁶ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 1/12/99 and 13/01/00.

assumed that the latter would have informed the minister.⁴⁹⁹⁷ However, Ter Beek said that he knew nothing about the matter until he read the cuttings file.⁴⁹⁹⁸

According to Bastiaans, the Minister was only annoyed that the order had featured in the newspaper.⁴⁹⁹⁹ Couzy also believed that the minister must have been surprised that the order had reached the press: 'He thought that it would remain low key but naturally you cannot keep something like this secret, if more than 1,000 people are involved'.⁵⁰⁰⁰

16. The protection of the Safe Areas: 'I think that that will work'

In the meantime there was much that was not clear as to what the protection of a Safe Area precisely entailed. The then spokesperson for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated:

'I never understood what a Safe Area was.... It was declared to be a Safe Area and that was that, just as you can say this chair is green. But if you do not paint it green, it will never be that.'⁵⁰⁰¹

Neither did the Dutch authorities really know whether the troops that were deployed, had to protect people, an area or a combination of both.⁵⁰⁰² Was a UN unit stationed in a Safe Area required to protect an area or the people? Or should it only act as a trip wire? Would world opinion be mobilised due to the presence of UN troops, as soon as the Bosnian-Serb troops positioned around an enclave, were to commence their attack? Yet in such a situation there was also the question as to when a trip wire commenced operation: when the area was attacked or its residents? Radio and television interviews conducted with ministers at the time reveal that the Dutch Government also counted on the fact that the Bosnian-Serb authorities would not have the effrontery to defy the international community. At the end of the weekly Cabinet meeting on 7 May when Prime Minister Lubbers was asked how far the military protection of the Safe Areas would extend, he replied:

'Those are two questions. You need a limited number of people on-site. Why limited? Because you may assume that the United Nations does have some authority.... Essentially, you also have aircraft as a backup.'

The interviewer, Beckx of TROS Aktua, then posed the following question:

'Yet now we are hearing the Serbs say, 'We are not at all afraid of the United Nations. We do not care what it does. Perhaps intervention may be required in such circumstances. If so, how far do you go?'

Lubbers: 'I am not going to respond to if, if, if – if you do not mind. Naturally, it is certainly interesting if we are having a conversation with each other but you asked what the Cabinet's position is.'⁵⁰⁰³

Following the meeting in Copenhagen, Minister Kooijmans spoke to Van Weegen on the television programme, NOVA, saying that the summit had yielded more than he had expected, namely:

⁴⁹⁹⁷ Interviews H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/10/98.

⁴⁹⁹⁸ Robijns, Baas, pp. 15-16.

⁴⁹⁹⁹ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵⁰⁰⁰ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵⁰⁰¹ Interview B. Hiensch, 13/07/00.

⁵⁰⁰² Interview R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

⁵⁰⁰³ Radio 1, TROS Aktua, 07/05/93, 5.07 pm.

‘that the mandate of the troops who are stationed there in the Safe Areas – which is focussed primarily on self-defence at present – will also come to include the protection of the population and, if this is not enough, protection can also be provided from the air. We have been pressing for this for months now and it has now happened.... I consider this to be a gain for Copenhagen, even though I am not entirely happy with what happened there. We have now said – and I hope that we will really live up to this – Europe’s credibility is now at stake: if the Safe Areas are attacked, we are prepared to act against those who attack them, and I think that this will work.’

Van Weegen: ‘Even now the Safe Areas are being attacked and people are dying. Following Copenhagen, what will be different tomorrow from yesterday or tonight?’

Kooijmans: That is not true.... In those Safe Areas where UN troops are currently stationed, those besieging them have baulked at attacking them until now. This means that they have therefore also baulked somewhat at really challenging the entire international community and causing casualties.⁵⁰⁰⁴

At other points in the interview the Minister again repeated that the troops destined for the Safe Areas were going there ‘in order to save human lives, to protect people’.⁵⁰⁰⁵

Now the European Council is not exactly the place where mandates and instructions for the use of force by UN peacekeeping troops are determined. On 9 June during a working level meeting of the representatives of those countries that were potential suppliers of troops, which was attended by Colonel Van Veen on behalf of the Netherlands, it was explained that in accordance with the rules of engagement self-defence covered:

‘measures necessary to protect their own lives, other UN lives, the lives of persons under their protection, or the integrity of areas under their protection against direct attack on the orders of the senior person present.’⁵⁰⁰⁶

In other words, the UN troops in the enclaves were required to protect both the terrain and the people of the Safe Areas.

Beyond the view of the television cameras, however, Kooijmans stated his conviction that the UN troops in the Safe Areas would be able to do little more than offer ‘political and psychological protection’. This was the reason why he was so keen on air support for the troops on the ground.⁵⁰⁰⁷ In 2000 this was also the assessment of the Foreign Ministry official who coordinated the files on Yugoslavia, Hattinga van ‘t Sant. According to him, the troops who were deployed in accordance with the resolution, offered mainly ‘psychological protection’.⁵⁰⁰⁸

During the meeting held on 24 June with the representatives of those countries that were expected to provide troops where Biegman offered a logistics unit, Annan also presented a view of the protection that the UNPROFOR troops would be able to provide, which was similarly devoid of optimism. Annan stated that, even after expanding UNPROFOR to include the troops for the Safe Areas, the UN forces would not be able ‘(to) effectively deter aggression against them’. Negotiations would therefore constitute the only way of keeping the Safe Areas intact, also because UNPROFOR

⁵⁰⁰⁴ NOS, NOVA, Interview Kooijmans conducted by Maartje van Weegen, 22/06/93, 10.30 pm.

⁵⁰⁰⁵ NOS, NOVA, Interview Kooijmans conducted by Maartje van Weegen, 22/06/93, 10.30 pm.

⁵⁰⁰⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00782. Biegman 580 to Kooijmans, 09/06/93.

⁵⁰⁰⁷ ABZ, the embassy in Washington. Kooijmans 27/05/93 circ 375.

⁵⁰⁰⁸ Interview O. Hattinga van ‘t Sant, 18/07/00.

would be similarly unable to secure the provision of supplies to them. The limited number of additional troops available for the implementation of Resolution 836 meant that UNPROFOR could do no more than enter into agreements with the parties to the conflict. It was clear from Annan's address that UNPROFOR would continue to depend on the Bosnian Serbs' goodwill. Their consent was crucial to ensure supplies: 'There is little benefit to establishing Safe Areas if the people in them cannot be fed'.⁵⁰⁰⁹

At the same time the former military attaché in Belgrade, Brigadier-General De Vogel retired, pointed to the weaknesses of the Safe Areas in Vrij Nederland. Apart from any difficulties that might occur in the provision of supplies to the enclaves through Bosnian-Serb terrain in the form of military goods and elementary necessities of life for the civilian population, the possibility could not be excluded – based on experience – that the Serbs would return on their prior consent to the Safe Areas. This meant that the symbolic presentation of UN troops would not suffice. Active security was demanded, which the former general felt would require an average of three mechanised infantry battalions for each Safe Area along with combat and logistic support, or put another way, 3,000 troops for each area. In addition, the rules of engagement would need to be stated more broadly to be able to respond to any artillery fire on the part of the Serbs. However, broader rules of engagement would heighten the risks involved. For this reason those countries providing troops would probably not be keen on this. Thus the circle was complete and a half-baked solution was embedded in the Safe Area concept.⁵⁰¹⁰

As a result of the vague formulation of Resolution 836 and its limited implementation, many of the organisations and people involved did not have a clear idea of the point at which the 'deterrence' afforded by UNPROFOR troops in a Safe Area would need to come into effect. In December 1994, one and a half years after Resolution 836 was adopted, Boutros-Ghali endeavoured to provide clarity: 'The intention of Safe Areas is primarily to protect people and not to defend terrain'.⁵⁰¹¹ However, NATO continued to think mainly in terms of defending terrain.⁵⁰¹² Even after 1994 lawyers in the Netherlands and elsewhere concluded that the rules of engagement issued to the UN troops in the Safe Areas only permitted self-defence. On 19 July 1993 the existing rules of engagement, which included a provision amongst others to the effect that 'UNPROFOR troops may use their weapons to resist attempts by forceful means to prevent the Force from discharging its duties' (see Chapter 7), were supplemented with one in view of the establishment of Safe Areas: 'to resist deliberate military or paramilitary incursions into the ... Safe Areas'.⁵⁰¹³ A lawyer who was part of the Crisis Action Team at the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb in 1994 and 1995, was of the opinion that the term, 'acting in self-defence', as stated in Resolution 836 had to be interpreted in its broadest sense: not to be impeded in the execution of its mandate. He felt that the concept of a 'safe area' would be utterly ridiculous in the light of any other interpretation. When he was required to consider the revision of the rules of engagement at the beginning of 1995, it was not clear to him from their formulation whether the terrain of a Safe Area had to be defended, its population or only UN personnel. He held the view that as then formulated, the rules only permitted the UNPROFOR personnel stationed in the Safe Areas to defend themselves. He felt that the population should also be defended in a Safe Area and that this should also be stipulated explicitly but was told that he was not allowed to amend that provision.⁵⁰¹⁴ The Dutch Lieutenant-Colonel K.R. Lo-Fo-Wong, a lawyer attached to the staff of the commander in chief of the ⁵⁰⁰⁹ ABZ, PVNY. Meeting with potential troop and equipment contributors for the implementation of the SCRs 836 and 844, Introduction by Kofi Annan, 24/06/93, enclosed with letter 6151 from the New York permanent representative to Kooijmans, 25/06/93.

⁵⁰¹⁰ J.C.A.C. de Vogel, 'Het "Actieplan voor Bosnië" hoeft geen loos gebaar te zijn' (The 'Action Plan for Bosnia' need not be an empty gesture), Vrij Nederland, 19/06/93, p. 30.

⁵⁰¹¹ VN, S/1994/1389, par. 43.

⁵⁰¹² Interview W. Claes, 12/03/01, L. Smith, 06/06/00 and J. Shalikhavilli on 07/06/00.

⁵⁰¹³ Berkovitz, Rules, p. 638.

⁵⁰¹⁴ Interview G.F. Collins, 08/06/00.

Royal Netherlands Army, was to state in the summer of 1995 following the fall of Srebrenica that the idea of territorial defence was completely contrary to the nature of the peacekeeping operation conducted in Bosnia. Territorial defence amounted to peace-enforcement. Therefore he believed that the Safe Areas did not permit territorial defence, nor did it allow the protection of their population: 'In this case every shelling of the population would lead to a countermeasure by the UN'.⁵⁰¹⁵

It may be concluded that the concept of a 'safe area' was open to a wide range of interpretation and raised too many expectations in relation to the security of the people located within it. There was an erroneous idea that the UNPROFOR troops that were stationed inside the enclaves, would mount a defence against a large-scale attack by the VRS. It was possible for this illusion to survive mainly because only a few people believed that the Bosnian-Serb leaders would dare to defy the international community by entering an area which the United Nations had proclaimed to be safe. The possibility of attack was precluded by thought, as it were. For this reason it was not necessary to consider the type of action that would be required in the event that an attack occurred. Of the entire history of UN involvement in the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, the establishment of the Safe Areas represents the example of two views of reality at odds with each other: the reality of the diplomats in New York who had settled on a formula to allay the situation with which they could all agree, and that of the situation in Bosnia where the various parties were locked in a life-and-death struggle paying no heed to humanitarian law, and where the troops deployed by the UN had insufficient means available to fulfil the expectations of diplomats, politicians and the public in the West.

17. 'The bankruptcy of the international community'

It was not only the government of the Netherlands that was concerned about the slow pace at which troops were offered for the Safe Areas. In addition, the VRS appeared to have tightened its hold on the city of Sarajevo. In mid-July the Hugo De Groot Vereniging (HCA Nederland) (Hugo de Groot Association (HCA The Netherlands)) called on Parliament to conduct an emergency debate on the situation in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The association suggested action such as food drops above Sarajevo, the construction of a landing strip in the city, or a secure corridor between the airport and the centre.⁵⁰¹⁶ In response, Groen Links (Green Left) requested an emergency debate.⁵⁰¹⁷ On 29 July 1993 Parliament therefore reconvened during its summer recess for the third consecutive year in connection with the former Yugoslavia. On the day of the parliamentary debate the Hugo de Groot Vereniging notified the members of the House of its concern that, in view of the Croatian and Serb plans for the division of Bosnian territory, the international community was offering up the 'Muslim state'. It therefore asked the members of the House to commence the protection and reconstruction of a multi-ethnic Sarajevo.⁵⁰¹⁸

This time the announcement of consultations to be held by the Permanent Parliamentary Committees for Foreign Affairs and Defence elicited letters from various private organizations. These letters repeatedly urged the provision of more effective aid and the establishment of Safe Areas. The Stichting Mensen in Nood (Foundation for People in Need), Caritas Neerlandica, the Stichting Oecumenische Hulp (Foundation for Ecumenical Aid) and the Stichting Memisa stated that three views were struggling for supremacy amongst the Dutch public. Briefly put, they were 'What is happening there, is a ⁵⁰¹⁵ SMG, 1004. Report produced by C. Klep of a discussion with Ikol Lo-Fo-Wong in reply to written questions on 28/07/95, 01/08/95.

⁵⁰¹⁶ NIOD, Coll. Blauw. Press release 'Spoeddebat over het voormalige Joegoslavië, in het bijzonder over de situatie in Sarajevo' (Emergency debate on the former Yugoslavia, in particular, the situation in Sarajevo), 19/07/93.

⁵⁰¹⁷ 'Kamer terug van vakantie voor debat Sarajevo' (Parliament back from holiday for debate on Sarajevo), ANP, 21/07/93; 'Kamerreces op zijn retour' (Parliamentary recess is over), ANP 21/07/93, 6.03 pm; 'Kooijmans en Ter Beek bij overleg Tweede Kamer over ex-Joegoslavië' (Kooijmans and Ter Beek attend Parliament debate on ex-Yugoslavia), ANP, 27/07/93, 9.57 pm; NIOD, Coll. Blauw. Clerk of the Parliament Committee on Foreign Affairs, Defence and Development Aid, 20/07/93 plus appendix by Van Ojik for the chairpersons of the these committees, 19/07/93.

⁵⁰¹⁸ NIOD, Coll. Blauw. Hugo de Groot Vereniging to Tweede Kamer, 29/07/93.

disgraceful scandal', 'Why aren't they doing anything about it?' and 'What can I do if a dozen women are capable of obstructing a large convoy of aid en route?'. According to the foundation, the latter view explained why there was less willingness to provide donations for the former Yugoslavia than Africa, for example. Humanitarian aid, the foundation observed, had become an instrument of war. The international community was partly to blame for this, for example, because the foundations felt that UNPROFOR looked on without doing anything when the free transport of aid was halted. For this reason the four charity organisations asked the Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs not only to devote attention to the requisite level of aid in its debate, but also to the meaningful provision of this aid in particular.⁵⁰¹⁹ On 28 July the Landelijk Bureau VluchtelingenWerk (National Office for Refugee Affairs) also approached the Committee with the question as to what steps the EC and the Netherlands were preparing in order to save as many human lives as possible if international political consultations failed to produce results.⁵⁰²⁰ Artsen zonder Grenzen (Doctors without Borders) called for the parliamentary debate to focus attention on the admission of humanitarian aid, the protection of the population and the provision of enough troops for the Safe Areas.⁵⁰²¹

In the course of the consultations held before the Committees, for Foreign Affairs, Defence and this time also Development Aid, various speakers expressed the view that the EC's credibility in relation to ex-Yugoslavia was on the line. For instance, Sipkes observed that the EC's foreign policy was 'bankrupt'. She felt that nothing could be expected from the Community now that the European Council had stated that 'a tour of the region should make it clear that the EC and its member states are still – and want to continue being – actively involved in the search for solutions to the problems in the former Yugoslavia'.⁵⁰²² Blaauw also referred to bankruptcy on the part of the international community. Because he felt that the promised deployment of 7,500 troops would not be enough to protect the Safe Areas, he believed that the relevant activities should be concentrated in Sarajevo, in the first place, secondly, in Tuzla and thirdly in Srebrenica.⁵⁰²³ He was of the opinion that this was:

'the last chance to intervene. Waiting for the outcome of the peace conference will take too much time and is unacceptable. The Western world cannot and may not turn its back on the civilian population of the former Yugoslavia. This would represent the bankruptcy of Dutch policy, of European policy, of NATO' policy, and of the policy of the United Nations....'⁵⁰²⁴

Valk wanted protection for the Safe Areas as soon as possible, with ground troops if possible and also air support. Incidentally, he felt that the air force should not only strike if UN troops came under fire but also if the people in the Safe Areas were attacked. Minister Kooijmans was of the opinion that the term, 'acting in self-defence', in Resolution 836 also permitted the use of force in the event that the areas were attacked.⁵⁰²⁵ However, Minister Pronk, who had visited Croatia and Bosnia shortly beforehand to itemise the aid required and to investigate whether aid was being used effectively, downplayed excessive expectations in connection with the degree of protection which the West could offer Bosnia: 'Terms such as "safe haven" are primarily indicative of objectives and are not based in reality. The people of Sarajevo do not feel that they are protected but that they have been betrayed by Europe'.⁵⁰²⁶ Minister Ter Beek again announced that the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade would ⁵⁰¹⁹ NIOD, Coll. Blaauw. Mensen in Nood, et al. to the Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs, 27/07/93.

⁵⁰²⁰ NIOD, Coll. Blaauw. F. Florin to the permanent Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs, 28/07/93

⁵⁰²¹ NIOD, Coll. Blaauw. Artsen zonder Grenzen to Blaauw, 27/07/93.

⁵⁰²² TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 2.

⁵⁰²³ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 5.

⁵⁰²⁴ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 6..

⁵⁰²⁵ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 10.

⁵⁰²⁶ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 15.

be ready to be deployed in Bosnia-Herzegovina by the new year. It was to be equipped with YPR armoured vehicles.⁵⁰²⁷

Several days before the debate the representatives of the five major parties (Sipkes of Groen Links (Green Left), Valk of the PvdA (Labour), De Kok of CDA (Christian Democrats), Blaauw of the VVD (Liberals) and Eisma of D66 (Democrats))⁵⁰²⁸ sent a letter to their fellow Members of Parliament in the member states of the European Community. In it, they observed that the international community and the EC, in particular, had done little until then in relation to Bosnia-Herzegovina. They asked their counterparts to urge their governments, amongst other things, to bring about a rapid peace settlement, to provide genuine protection for the Safe Areas and relief for the Muslim enclaves, to arrange for the withdrawal of the Serbs from their artillery positions around Sarajevo, and to establish a protected corridor between Central Bosnia and the Adriatic Coast.⁵⁰²⁹

18. Conclusion

By mid-May the Vance-Owen plan was to all intents and purposes dead. This was first of all due to the position adopted by the Bosnian-Serb authorities, primarily Mladic. It was also attributable to the West's failure to provide a clear indication that it had an implementation force ready, let alone that it was prepared to exert more pressure on Pale to accept the plan. It was not prepared to do more than tighten sanctions. The months of uncertainty about American policy towards Bosnia represented a major difficulty. When that finally appeared to crystallise into the approach of lift and strike, it was presented to the European allies in a gentle – un-American – manner. Christopher's tour of the European capitals to promote this approach was a downright diplomatic disaster. It contributed to an unprecedented estrangement between the United States and Western Europe. Finally, this was partially healed through the joint action programme through which the United States and Europe reached agreement on the issue of Safe Areas. The outcome therefore had less to do with the reality of Bosnia than with the need to restore trans-Atlantic relations. This also explains why the countries involved did not manage to produce much enthusiasm for the practical implementation of the Safe Areas. The concrete definition of the concept of 'safe areas' was consequently kept vague, thereby ensuring that they became many things at the same time. They represented a response to the humanitarian needs of the Muslims in Bosnia-Herzegovina and the demands of people outside Bosnia to alleviate them. To Western governments they also represented an alternative to far-reaching military intervention. According to some people, they were also a preliminary step towards a peace settlement. Yet others felt that they were open-air prisons, reserves or concentration camps maintained by the United Nations.⁵⁰³⁰ Already when the Safe Areas were established, it was thought that the UN troops within them would become hostage to the warring factions, both the Bosnian-Serb troops outside the enclaves and the ABiH fighters within the areas, who were after all barely disarmed or not at all.⁵⁰³¹

The lack of demilitarisation was also evident in the fact that weapons production actually occurred in some of these areas. Reference has already been made in Chapter 5 to the extensive production of mortar shells in Sarajevo. In Gorazde explosives were manufactured in the Pubjeda ammunition factory, part of which was underground. Demilitarisation could only have been effective if it had been possible to rid the residents of the Safe Areas of their fear of the threat emanating from the Serbs who surrounded them. To achieve this, the international community had to provide real ⁵⁰²⁷ TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 60, p. 13.

⁵⁰²⁸ A draft had circulated in Dutch which was signed by 'all the democratic parliamentary parties'. In addition to the five mentioned it included the names of Van Dis (SGP, Leerling (RPF) and Van Middelkoop (GPV). Their names were not included in the English letter that was sent. The draft is kept in the Blaauw file.

⁵⁰²⁹ NIOD, Coll. CDA. CDA party executive. Foreign Affairs Committee, 9310370, Open letter to members of parliament in all EC member states, 03/08/93, accompanying J.W. Wiggers to R. Stuth, 16/08/93.

⁵⁰³⁰ See for example the criticism of George Soros, quoted in Shawcross, Evil, p. 23.

⁵⁰³¹ Shawcross, Evil, pp. 23-24.

protection. The combination of planned demilitarisation and the presence of troops whose mandate entailed deterrence rather than defence or protection, could not work, not in the eyes of the Bosnian Muslims in the Safe Areas nor in those of the Bosnian Serbs around them.

The protection of the Safe Areas with air support diminished the will of the Bosnian Serbs, against whom air strikes would have been targeted, to cooperate any further with UNPROFOR and the UNHCR. They announced that, in response to UN sanctions, they would impose their own sanctions against the United Nations. As a result, UNPROFOR was obstructed in its freedom of movement and its ability to provide supplies.⁵⁰³²

With the establishment of the Safe Areas, the Dutch Government appeared to have achieved what it had been calling for at an international level for a long period of time. It was frustrating for it to see that other countries were, to put it mildly, not very willing to provide troops for this purpose. During the meeting of the European Council in Copenhagen the Dutch Ministers, Lubbers and Kooijmans, endeavoured to encourage their European partners to provide troops as well by presenting their own offer. When they made this offer – a logistics unit comprising 400 personnel – both Ministers were aware that it was highly likely that the Royal Netherlands Army would not be able to establish such a unit. Even when this must have become incontrovertibly clear to them, they continued to present this offer. The day after the meeting in Copenhagen Minister Kooijmans had already informed the Lower House that the closer they came to the time of actual deployment, the greater the chance that the offer of a logistics unit would be replaced with an airmobile battalion.

The government had already decided at the beginning of May that it would deploy this battalion in the former Yugoslavia if necessary. The Van Vlijmen and Van Traa motion which was adopted during the debate on the Priorities White Paper several weeks later, had little impact on this decision. In adopting it, Parliament merely indicated that it also felt that the Airmobile Brigade should be considered for deployment in ex-Yugoslavia. Once the offer of the logistics unit had been presented, it was a question of waiting until such time as the UN Secretariat asked the Dutch Government to make good its promise. The longer it took for this to happen, the closer the focus shifted to the Airmobile Brigade. More to the point, at the end of June the army issued a planning order for this battalion. However, once this appeared in the press, Minister Ter Beek suddenly directed that this order be rescinded. Anticipating policy was commendable, dictating it was less admirable, the Minister felt. In the meantime, the purpose for which the logistics unit which the Netherlands was to provide, was still not clear. It could have been for the Safe Areas or a new peace plan. Presidents Milosevic and Tudjman had since tabled such a plan. The question was to what extent it would be acceptable to the Izetbegovic administration. The question also remained as to how far the international community, which many Dutch Members of Parliament felt to be morally bankrupt already, would be willing or able to ensure that such a peace was also just.

⁵⁰³² Kofi A. Annan, 'Peacekeeping, Military Intervention, and National Sovereignty in Internal Armed Conflict', in Moore (ed.), Choices, p. 65.

Chapter 12

The Owen-Stoltenberg plan: June 1993 - September 1993

1. The strangulation of Sarajevo and the NATO decision

In late July the NATO planes were still waiting for the green light from the UN to be allowed to provide Close Air Support. In the meantime the VRS (the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs) tightened the stranglehold around Sarajevo with an offensive in which the Romanija division took the Igman and Bjelasnica mountains in the early days of August. This gave them control of the last remaining summits around the Bosnian capital and cut off the last overland access route to the city. This was the reason why on 29 July Minister Kooijmans, supported by the Dutch Parliament, urged Boutros-Ghali to allow Close Air Support as soon as possible. The Dutch minister believed that without this form of Close Air Support the Safe Areas would not be able to continue to exist.⁵⁰³³ However, he did not need to worry about this as a lot of work was being done behind the scenes. In the weekend of 24 and 25 July 1993 Lake and Bartholomew flew secretly to Europe in a small plane for discussions with the British and French governments. They brought the message that the American administration wanted to seriously seek a solution for the Bosnian crisis which would also be acceptable to London and Paris. Washington feared that if no action were taken and Sarajevo were to fall, as the CIA foresaw,⁵⁰³⁴ the planned NATO meeting in January would be a farce and transatlantic relationships would come under pressure. In addition, Western credibility in the Muslim world would be seriously damaged. President Clinton, who had been shocked by the television pictures of the siege of Sarajevo,⁵⁰³⁵ had therefore decided on air strikes to end the siege of Sarajevo and of the other Safe Areas and to force the Bosnian Serbs to enter into serious negotiations. This was therefore an extremely broad interpretation of the use of force which was permitted under Resolutions 770 and 836.⁵⁰³⁶ Clinton had authorized both his representatives to hint that the American administration would act alone if necessary.⁵⁰³⁷ On 2 August the North Atlantic Council held an emergency meeting to discuss the American proposal. The meeting, which lasted 12 hours, was described by an American official as 'as bitter and rancorous a discussion as has ever taken place in the alliance'.⁵⁰³⁸ In particular, the American position to conduct air strikes without UN permission if necessary encountered strong objections from the allies.⁵⁰³⁹ Boutros-Ghali had also strongly objected to this, because of the potential consequences of unauthorized NATO actions on UN staff on the ground, on humanitarian aid and on the negotiations.⁵⁰⁴⁰ Finally, the Council decided to agree on possible air strikes. An important factor in this decision was the fact that, shortly before, French UN troops had come under fire from Bosnian-Serb artillery. This helped the French government to agree to this NATO role.⁵⁰⁴¹ It was decided that if the 'strangulation' of Sarajevo and the other Safe Areas continued, air strikes would follow. Plans would ⁵⁰³³ ABZ, PVNY. Biegman to Boutros-Ghali, 29/07/93; Biegman 752 to Kooijmans, 29/07/93.

⁵⁰³⁴ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 142.

⁵⁰³⁵ Drew, Edge, pp. 273-274; Bert, Superpower, p. 204.

⁵⁰³⁶ For a discussion of this material see ABZ, DEU/ARA/02575. Memorandum from DPV/PZ to acting head of DGPZ, 02/08/93, DPV-PZ/1821-93.

⁵⁰³⁷ Daalder, Dayton, p. 21; Drew, Edge, p. 277; Major, Autobiography, p. 543.

⁵⁰³⁸ Quoted in Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 156. See also 'NATO puts brakes on US plans to relieve Sarajevo', ANP, 03/08/93, 00:00.

⁵⁰³⁹ Francis Harris, 'War in Bosnia: America pushes for intensive air strikes', The Daily Telegraph, 04/08/93; Douglas Jehl, 'Conflict in the Balkans; U.S. Turns Bosnia Threat Into a Near Ultimatum', The New York Times, 04/08/93.

⁵⁰⁴⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05275. Boutros-Ghali to Wörner, 04/08/93; D'Ansembourg 756 to Kooijmans, 04/08/93; Boutros, Unvanquished, pp. 89-90.

⁵⁰⁴¹ Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 156.

be developed to this end to be submitted to the NATO Council one week later. However, mainly on French insistence, a central role in the decision-making was allocated to the UNPROFOR Commander, meaning that the American administration backed down from its idea that NATO should be allowed to conduct air strikes independently.⁵⁰⁴²

The NATO Council meeting on 9 August once again stated that air strikes would only be launched if the UN Secretary-General authorized them.⁵⁰⁴³ In this way, a dual key system was developed: any form of air strikes required approval from both the NATO Commander for the southern part of the NATO Treaty Area, (in military terms: CINCSOUTH) and from the UNPROFOR Force Commander. In respect of the use of Close Air Support the final approval would have to be given by the UN Secretary-General, although operational control would be delegated to the subordinate commanders on the ground. This type of air support would only be deployed as a last resort (ultima ratio).⁵⁰⁴⁴

Two chains of command had now been created. One went from the NATO aircraft via a C-130 command plane in the air to the Combined Air Operations Centre in Vicenza, where the Combined Air Component Commander gave permission for an operation. The other went from the Forward Air Controller to the Bosnian Air Support Operations Centre in Kiseljak and from there to Zagreb, where the UNPROFOR Commander requested permission from UN Headquarters in New York. One problem in this second chain of command was the seven-hour time difference between Zagreb and New York. In addition, there was no permanently staffed situation centre in New York. UNPROFOR commanders had experience of trying to contact UN headquarters in New York on a Friday, to be told that they could call back on Monday.⁵⁰⁴⁵ In respect of the command structure, the main difference between Close Air Support and air strikes was that air strikes also had to be authorized by the NATO Council. For both types of air operations, the initial deployment had to be authorized by the UN Secretary-General, who first had to consult the Security Council.⁵⁰⁴⁶

A number of people have seen this dual key procedure as an attempt by London and Paris to manipulate the threat of air strikes in line with their own national interests.⁵⁰⁴⁷ However, the question is whether it would have been reasonable to deprive the UN Secretary-General and the Security Council of any say in air strikes, whilst the UN staff on the ground would be faced with the consequences. In any case, the Bosnian Serbs now knew that they would have to allow just enough food through to prevent 'strangulation'. In mid-August an anonymous American official stated that: 'I'm worried about the British and French - that a time may come when we say this is the time to bombard them, they say the supplies are getting through.'⁵⁰⁴⁸ Briquemont and his deputy, the British Brigadier General Guy de Vere Hayes, had managed to persuade Mladic to withdraw his troops from Igman and Bjelasnica as a means to prevent air strikes. UNPROFOR troops took their place. For a very brief period it looked as though the West was still going to take a stand, but this threat against the Bosnian Serb leaders soon receded.⁵⁰⁴⁹ During the NATO Council on 9 August the decision taken a week earlier was substantially weakened because it was decided that air strikes must be limited to support for humanitarian aid operations. They should not be interpreted as 'a decision to intervene militarily in the conflict'.⁵⁰⁵⁰

⁵⁰⁴² DCBC, 2272. Veenendaal NATO 1256 to Kooijmans, 03/08/93. Daalder, Dayton, pp. 22-23 takes the view that it was chiefly the United Kingdom that advocated a UN role in the decision-making.

⁵⁰⁴³ Trifunovska, Yugoslavia, pp. 183-184; 'NAVO geeft laatste woord aan VN over luchtacties tegen Serviërs' ('NATO gives the final word to UN on air strikes against Serbians'), ANP, 09/08/93, 23:13.

⁵⁰⁴⁴ Confidential information (84).

⁵⁰⁴⁵ Dore, Japan, p. 133.

⁵⁰⁴⁶ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05275. D'Ansembourg 805 to Kooijmans, 12/08/93.

⁵⁰⁴⁷ See for example Daalder, Dayton, p. 23.

⁵⁰⁴⁸ Drew, Edge, p. 279.

⁵⁰⁴⁹ 'Kans op spoedige luchtaanvallen NAVO klein' ('Little chance of early NATO air attacks'), ANP, 09/08/93, 18:36.

⁵⁰⁵⁰ Lutger & De Winter, Horizon, p. 216; ABZ, NAR(93)52. Decisions taken at the meeting of the NAC on 09/08/93, Press release (93)52.

On 18 August Boutros-Ghali was able to report to the Security Council that NATO support of the UN troops was operational.⁵⁰⁵¹ On that day NATO conducted its first air support operation, which consisted of aggressive low flying. At that time UNPROFOR saw little advantage in the deployment of air support, fearing that it would jeopardize its impartiality. There was no need to combine peacekeeping on the ground with enforcing from the air. In addition, they feared reprisals against UN soldiers on the ground. Furthermore Owen and Stoltenberg did not want their negotiations to be undermined by air operations.⁵⁰⁵² A typical example of the attempts which UNPROFOR made to avoid any kind of provocation of air operations was the statement in mid-August by the Canadian spokesman for UNPROFOR II, Barry Frewer, that Sarajevo was not besieged, but that the VRS had simply taken a 'tactically advantageous position'.⁵⁰⁵³ UNPROFOR authorities were so unanimous in their attempts to keep the word 'siege' out of the papers⁵⁰⁵⁴ that it can be assumed that instructions had been issued for press contacts on this matter.

However, at that time, the NATO decision in early August to block the stranglehold on Sarajevo was the best thing that could have happened to the Bosnian government. In all other respects they were in a poor position, for instance in the negotiations in the presence of Owen and Stoltenberg, which were heading towards a three-way split of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

2. The Owen-Stoltenberg Plan and the Western position

After the failure of the Vance-Owen Plan, Owen took the emphatic position that he would no longer actively negotiate. He then operated as a neutral chairman who left it to the parties themselves to put forward solutions.⁵⁰⁵⁵ One risk associated with that position was that the parties would make proposals ⁵⁰⁵¹ VN: 'Alles in gereedheid voor luchtaanvallen' ('UN: All set for air strikes'), ANP, 19/08/93, 02:56.

⁵⁰⁵² Paulsen, Jugoslaviëpolitiek, p. 153; 'Briquemont hekelt dreigen met bombardementen' ('Briquemont criticizes threat of bombardments'), ANP, 06/08/93, 2.56 p.m. ; 'Briquemont spreekt zich uit tegen NAVO-luchtaanvallen' ('Briquemont voices opposition to NATO air strikes'), ANP, 19/08/93, 10.31 a.m.

⁵⁰⁵³ Cigar, Genocide, p. 115.

⁵⁰⁵⁴ For examples see John F. Burns, 'A Siege by Any Other Name Would Be as Painful', The New York Times, 17/08/93.

⁵⁰⁵⁵ Edward Mortimer, 'An exit with one regret', Financial Times, 02/06/95.

which no longer bore any relationship to the London principles, which the European Community believed should serve as the starting point for the discussions and as the touchstone of the results.

On 16 June 1993 Tudjman and Milosevic presented a peace plan which, in effect, returned to the Karadjordjevo discussions of March 1991 and which pointed to a three-way partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina, in which only 23 to 24% of the land would be left for the Bosnian Muslims. Owen and Stoltenberg took the plan into discussion, presenting a draft version on 29 July and a final version on 20 August 1993.

Under the Owen-Stoltenberg plan Croats, Muslims and Serbs would each be given their own republic within a loose confederation of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The land of the Croats and Serbs would both consist of a single entity, the land of the Muslims would consist of two parts: one area in the centre of the country around Sarajevo, Tuzla and Zenica, and one around Bihac. The Bosnian Serbs would be given 52% of the Bosnian land, the Muslims 30% and the Croats 18%. The Drina valley would be Serbian, meaning that the Muslims would have to give up their eastern enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde. The Serbs would also be given Posavina. A three-member presidium, in which a Croat, a Muslim and a Serb would take turns to be chairman, would head the Union of Republics of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Sarajevo would be governed for a period of two years by the UN, and Mostar would be governed for the same period by the EC.

The plan did not conform to the principles of the London Conference which assumed that the results of ethnic cleansing would not be accepted and that the integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina would have to be guaranteed. However, the chances of the Western powers agreeing to a plan for an extremely loose confederation or even a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina in the long-term were increasing. The longer it took to put an end to the war, the more the idea took root that this was the fault of the Bosnian government, which simply refused to make concessions. The West increasingly started to see the Bosnian government as obstructionist at the negotiations: it wanted to prolong the war in order to achieve better goals. However, the international negotiators were becoming frustrated. Why could not Izetbegovic and his people resign themselves to a peace, even if this were not ideal? It would at least put a stop to the bloodshed, and, by the way, to the frustrations of the Western negotiators whose reputations were crumbling with each successive failure.⁵⁰⁵⁶ There was a growing tendency to blame the victims for the continuance of the war, which became known as the 'blaming the victim' process.⁵⁰⁵⁷ It seemed as though Izetbegovic wanted to prolong the war for as long as he believed that it would improve his position, irrespective of the number of victims.⁵⁰⁵⁸

In turn Izetbegovic increasingly believed that the West, and in particular the American administration, was not prepared to intervene in favour of the government in Sarajevo. He believed that the international community was only prepared to take decisive measures if it came to prevention of a general Balkan war.⁵⁰⁵⁹ On 12 July the British Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Hogg, explicitly stated in the House of Commons that nobody should give the Bosnian government the impression that the West would intervene militarily.⁵⁰⁶⁰ In this he was expressing the consensus prevailing at that time in the Western world (even the US Secretary of State Christopher participated this time) that Izetbegovic should not be given 'false hope'. In other words, Izetbegovic should simply accept the Milosevic and Tudjman plan, whether it was legitimate or not.⁵⁰⁶¹ Foreign Secretary Hurd spelled it out once again in a TV interview for Channel 4 on 2 August:

⁵⁰⁵⁶ Compare Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p., 175.

⁵⁰⁵⁷ Tom Gjelten, 'Blaming the victim: are the Muslims the aggressors?', The New Republic, 20/12/93; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 221.

⁵⁰⁵⁸ George Kenney, 'Steering clear of Balkan shoals. American troops in Bosnia', The Nation, 08/01/96.

⁵⁰⁵⁹ Izetbegović, Govori, p. 5. See also John F. Burns, 'Bosnia Loses Any Hope of Being Saved', The New York Times, 25/07/93.

⁵⁰⁶⁰ Simms, Hours, p. 30.

⁵⁰⁶¹ Compare ABZ, 999.241 Yugoslavia/No Fly Zone part IV. Memorandum from DAV/MS, 22/07/93, no. MS-179/93.

‘The only thing which could have guaranteed peace with justice would have been an expeditionary force (...) And no government, no government has at any time seriously proposed that. And that I think is a line which should run through any analysis because it cuts out so much of the rhetoric which has bedevilled this.’⁵⁰⁶²

In late July the VRS launched an offensive on Sarajevo which was apparently intended to increase the likelihood of the Bosnian Muslims accepting a partition plan. In the third week of July Bosnian-Serb tanks advanced 30 kilometres south and south-west of Sarajevo and the bombardments of the Bosnian capital were renewed in what was the heaviest fighting around the city since the start of the war. UN commanders considered it a possibility that the ABiH might have to concede strategic defence points around the city.⁵⁰⁶³ UN Commander General Briquemont, who had arrived only a short time earlier and who was demonstrably deeply moved by the situation in Sarajevo, expressed his doubts as to whether Sarajevo could be preserved as a Safe Area. Having been in the area scarcely two weeks, he criticized the international community for creating Safe Areas without making the resources available which were necessary for implementing that policy. He believed that preservation of the Safe Areas would only be possible if political agreement were reached in Geneva.⁵⁰⁶⁴

The West’s unwillingness to come to Bosnia’s aid fitted easily into the Islamic and fatalistic vision of Izetbegovic. The Bosnian president was resigned to the fact that the West would make less effort to help Muslims than it would to help a Christian people in the same difficult circumstances. He was also resigned to his belief that a non-Islamic West was more easily inclined to hedonism and laziness than to struggle. In this respect he believed that there was a ‘passive conspiracy’ by the West against his government.⁵⁰⁶⁵

The logical conclusion was that the Bosnian government was left entirely to its own devices, as Izetbegovic told the Bosnian Parliament in late September,⁵⁰⁶⁶ but in order to shape that philosophy in a war, arms were needed. On 19 June the European Commission devoted a COREU (communication through a confidential EC telex network) to the tendency towards a three-way ethnic partition of Bosnia. The question was whether the Bosnian government would accept the facts or would fight on as a matter of principle. In the latter case, suggested the Commission, the EC should be prepared to lift the arms embargo against the Bosnian government.⁵⁰⁶⁷

In Chapter 11 it was shown that the European Council of Copenhagen, meeting a few days later, was not willing to grant Izetbegovic’s request to lift the arms embargo against him. The US administration was in favour, but did not want to go solo in public. In late June 1993 the UN debated the arms embargo against Bosnia. In the General Assembly 109 member states voted in favour of lifting the embargo, with 57 member states voting against. In the Security Council six members voted in favour, including the United States, thereby breaking a two-year tradition of always voting with France and the United Kingdom. However, nine members abstained, meaning that the majority required to lift the embargo was not reached.

Immediately following the presentation of the Tudjman and Milosevic plan on 16 June it became clear that the US administration was not unsympathetic to a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina into three separate ethnic zones, if the three parties could agree on this.⁵⁰⁶⁸ As early as the beginning of ⁵⁰⁶² Quoted in Gow, Triumph, p. 179. See also Douglas Hogg, ‘Three good reasons to exercise caution’, The Independent, 06/08/93.

⁵⁰⁶³ John F. Burns, ‘Bosnia Loses Any Hope of Being Saved’ and idem, ‘Serbs Continue Assault on Sarajevo’, The New York Times, 25/07/93.

⁵⁰⁶⁴ John F. Burns, ‘Serbs Continue Assault on Sarajevo’, The New York Times, 25/07/93.

⁵⁰⁶⁵ Izetbegovic, Govori, p. 9.

⁵⁰⁶⁶ Bert, Superpower, p. 208; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 164.

⁵⁰⁶⁷ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Coreu, cpe/cee 273, 19/06/93.

⁵⁰⁶⁸ Bert, Superpower, p. 204; Paulsen, Jugoslawienpolitik, p. 141, Oscar Garschagen, ‘VS aanvaarden opdeling Bosnië’ (‘US accepts partition of Bosnia’), de Volkskrant, 19/06/93.

June the CIA had already concluded that it was no longer possible to restore the integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina and that the most probable result of the conflict would be a partition into separate Croat, Serbian and Muslim zones.⁵⁰⁶⁹ Washington was under the impression that the Muslims themselves were also aiming for such a solution, because they were thought to have reached the conclusion that time was not on their side.⁵⁰⁷⁰ However, as far as the American administration was concerned, the initiative had to come from the Bosnian government. As one commentator wrote on the position of the Clinton administration: "They were ready to live with partition, but they weren't ready to advocate it."⁵⁰⁷¹ In fact, the American administration had no desire to exert pressure on the government in Sarajevo because, as Walter Slocombe, a Pentagon official, was to say some months later: if pressure were to be exerted in Yugoslavia, then it would be on the Serbs and on no one else.⁵⁰⁷²

3. Izetbegovic in difficulties

Izetbegovic was already in great difficulties in the summer of 1993, when the proposals by Tudjman and Milosevic were under discussion. The reasons for this, apart from the changed position of the West, related mainly to the military situation at that time in Bosnia-Herzegovina. From late 1992 - early 1993, the hostilities between the Muslims and Croats had intensified to such a degree that in the spring of 1993 they developed into an all-out war between the two groups. Subsequently the three main ethnic groups fought against each other in changing compositions. This entailed the most disadvantages for the Muslims, who had earlier been able to maintain their position against the Bosnian Serbs thanks to Croat support. Some of the most appalling acts in the Bosnian war took place in the battle between Croats and Muslims in Central Bosnia, such as the Croat mass slaughter of Muslims from Ahmici in 1993, or the atrocities perpetrated by the ABiH forces against the Croatian inhabitants of the village of Uzdol, in the hills east of Gornji Vakuf in mid-September.⁵⁰⁷³ Another mass murder took place in Stupni Do, where people and cattle were set on fire by the HVO Bobovac brigade. These war crimes demonstrated the extent to which attitudes had hardened between the Croats and Muslims. This was partly due to the influence of the actions of the seventh brigade of the ABiH in Central Bosnia (which was renowned for its combination of strict observation of Muslim commandments and wild pillaging raids) and of the mujahedin, who were mainly operating in Central Bosnia. The hostile attitude of the Croatian forces also meant that convoy supplies to Sarajevo from the Adriatic coast were obstructed.

In June the Croat and Serbian leaders in Bosnia entered into a military coalition against the Muslims, which apparently ran parallel to the discussions on the Serbo-Croat proposal for a confederation. They largely stopped fighting amongst themselves and the Croats then concentrated their firepower entirely on the Muslims who, by that time, commanded less than 10% of the total ground area of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

After the outbreak of hostilities with Muslims in early 1993, the Croatian leaders in Bosnia paid less and less attention to the central command in Sarajevo. As early as 18 May the ad hoc EC Yugoslavia group stated that the Bosnian Serbs had achieved their territorial objectives in Bosnia and that the Croats were working on carving out their piece of Bosnia. In other words, there was a de facto ⁵⁰⁶⁹ Michael R. Gordon, 'U.S. Experts Say 'Safe Havens' Won't Help Much', The New York Times, 10/06/93; Paulsen, Jugoslaviëpolitiek, p. 140.

⁵⁰⁷⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Jacobovits 412 to Kooijmans, 17/06/93; Veenendaal NATO 1036 to Kooijmans, 28/06/93.

⁵⁰⁷¹ Callahan, Wars, p. 173.

⁵⁰⁷² Callahan, Wars, p. 173.

⁵⁰⁷³ See for example. 'Moslims slachten burgers af' ('Muslims butcher civilians'), de Volkskrant, 16/09/93; 'Kroaten nemen wraak na bloedbad' ('Croats take revenge after bloodbath'), Het Parool, 16/09/93. See also Robert Block, 'Doodseskaders in Mostar genadeloos' ('Death squads pitiless in Mostar'), Het Parool, 07/09/93; 'Gevangen moslims worden in kampen van Kroaten gefolterd' ('Muslim prisoners tortured in Croat camps'), NRC Handelsblad, 07/09/93; 'VN vragen om druk op Bosnische Kroaten' ('UN requests pressure on Bosnian Croats'), NRC Handelsblad, 08/09/93; Rudolf Gruber, 'Die Hölle von Mostar' ('The Hell of Mostar'), Die Woche, 26/08/93.

partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁵⁰⁷⁴ In the EC General Council on 8 June Foreign Secretary Hurd said that it was 'all too clear that the Croats were trying to achieve secretly what the Serbs were aiming for publicly.'⁵⁰⁷⁵ On 28 August 1993 there was little secrecy left. On that day the 'Croatian Republic of Herceg-Bosna' was declared, with Mostar as its capital. The Croatian delegation was withdrawn from the Bosnian Parliament.

Another problem for Izetbegovic was division within his own ranks. In the first instance, there was Fikret Abdic, the man who controlled the enclave of Bihac and who was suspected of wanting to commit a coup at the beginning of the war whilst Izetbegovic was temporarily imprisoned by the JNA. The situation had remained relatively quiet around Bihac. At the start of the war the Bosnian Serbs had fired on Bihac for some months, but had made no serious attempts to take the town. From the autumn of 1992 it was even quite peaceful. This was a result of the smuggling activities of Abdic, who lived in the north of the enclave in a castle near Velika Kladusa.⁵⁰⁷⁶ In 1967, at an early age Abdic was appointed manager of the agricultural concern Agrokomerc in Bihac. He made a great success of this enterprise and its 13,000 employees revered him as their father ('Babo'). In 1987, however, he was arrested after it was revealed that his company had been issuing unsecured loans. This was quite a common practice in the former Yugoslavia, but Agrokomerc had been doing it on an unusually large scale. It was revealed that many of the leading members of the Communist Party in Bosnia had been aware of this. The resulting scandal led to charges being filed against the Communist Party of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which then lost a great deal of credibility. Abdic and a few others were given prison sentences. However, this did no damage to his reputation at all, quite the contrary. Many Muslims started to believe that he had been sacrificed because he was a Muslim. He was released in 1990 and was elected as one of the two Muslim representatives to the presidium later that year. He won more votes than Izetbegovic, which in fact gave him the right to become chairman of the presidium. However, Abdic gave the honour to Izetbegovic, who refused to comply with the rotation system and stand down in late 1991. After Izetbegovic managed to survive the suspected coup attempt in May 1992 without any political damage, Abdic withdrew to Bihac, where he became the undisputed leader.

During the war in Bosnia he organized the transport of numerous products from the Adriatic coast through Krajina to Bihac, which became a sort of distribution centre between the Croatian, Serbian and Muslim areas. As early as the spring of 1993 rumours were circulating that Fikret Abdic wanted to commit a new coup within the Bosnian government.⁵⁰⁷⁷ Conversely, there were rumours that circles close to Izetbegovic were trying to murder Abdic.⁵⁰⁷⁸ If Abdic regarded himself as an alternative to Izetbegovic, he was not the only one. Owen could also see the political potential of this Muslim who did business with Serbs in both Serbia and Bosnia with such ease. From as early as 1993 Owen kept him informed of progress in the peace talks.⁵⁰⁷⁹ The more Owen became frustrated at the intransigence of Izetbegovic (see Chapter 11), the more attractive it appeared to use Abdic, if only to break the deadlock. Abdic was in fact declaring his belief that there should be an end to the fighting in Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁵⁰⁸⁰ Owen did all he could to reinforce Abdic's position.⁵⁰⁸¹ Finally this process led the local assembly of Velika Kladusa in Bihac - led by Fikret Abdic - to sever its links with Sarajevo on 27

⁵⁰⁷⁴ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Coreu, 18/05/93, cpe/sec 577.

⁵⁰⁷⁵ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. Faber 13 to Kooijmans, 08/06/93.

⁵⁰⁷⁶ Compare Detrez, Sloop, pp. 287-289; Judah, Serbs, pp. 242-247; Rathfelder, Sarajevo, pp. 167-173.

⁵⁰⁷⁷ Kumar, Divide, p. 65; 'Bosnische regering verdeeld aan vooravond vredesbesprekingen Genève' ('Bosnian government divided on eve of Geneva peace talks'), ANP, 22/06/93, 20:25.

⁵⁰⁷⁸ 'Zagreb Daily on plan to assassinate Bosnian Muslim leader Abdic', BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, 12/07/93.

⁵⁰⁷⁹ OWEN CD-ROM, Message from Lord Owen to Fikret Abdic, 02/01/93; ibidem, Letter from David Owen to Fikret Abdic, 13/01/93. See also ibidem, Report of Lord Owen's meeting with British Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, New York, 04/03/93.

⁵⁰⁸⁰ Bosnische Moslim-leiding voert openlijk ruzie ('Bosnian-Muslim leaders arguing in public'), ANP, 16/07/93, 15:31.

⁵⁰⁸¹ Simms, Hour, pp. 163-164; Paul Lewis, 'Bosnians Divide Over New Talks To Split Country', The New York Times, 23/06/93.

September 1993 and declare Bihac the Autonomous Province of West Bosnia.⁵⁰⁸² Subsequently Abdic concluded an agreement with both the Croatian and Serbian leaders in Bosnia.⁵⁰⁸³ The Bosnian government, led by Izetbegovic, viewed his actions as treachery. Abdic was thrown out of the SDA and the presidium, and the government sent the Fifth Corps to deal with the renegade Muslims in Bihac. Abdic formed his army which, with the help of Croatian and Bosnian Serbs, fought against the Fifth Corps of the ABiH, led by general Dudakovic.

Abdic was not the only problem causing Izetbegovic sleepless nights. In Sarajevo itself there was growing criticism of Izetbegovic for his continuing indecisiveness after 15 months of war.⁵⁰⁸⁴ There was in fact good reason for that indecisiveness in relation to the political future of the area which Izetbegovic's government commanded. In this respect there were two or three camps in the Bosnian capital.

Because the land that was commanded by the Bosnian government had become smaller and smaller as a result of the ethnic cleansing, the multi-ethnic state which Izetbegovic had professed as his goal at the start of the war was becoming ever-more distant. In the spring of 1993 the Canadian historian Michael Ignatieff, who was considered an expert both on the Balkans and on peace operations, wrote that whilst ethnic apartheid might be anathema, and whilst the Vance-Owen plan was criticized in the West for that reason, he believed that the civilian victims of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina would hold no such scruples. The West had not been able to protect these civilians and could now hardly expect them to take much notice of Western principles of multi-ethnicity.⁵⁰⁸⁵

Almost a year from the start of the war, on the Bosnian Muslim side the goal of a multi-ethnic state of Bosnia-Herzegovina had therefore largely disintegrated.⁵⁰⁸⁶ In the course of the war the Islamization of the Muslims in Bosnia had continued, partly due to aid given by fellow Muslims from countries like Saudi Arabia, Iran and Algeria, who held more fundamental beliefs.⁵⁰⁸⁷ From June 1992 so-called mujahedin or 'holy warriors' from Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Algeria, Turkey, Bahrain and Qatar fought on the Muslim side in the war in Bosnia. There were only a few hundred of them fighting in the war⁵⁰⁸⁸ but, more importantly, their involvement had the blessing of Izetbegovic.⁵⁰⁸⁹ In the course of the war prominent SDA figures turned against ethnic mixed marriages and demanded a prohibition on the broadcasting of Serbian music on radio stations in Sarajevo. Islamitic religious instruction was introduced in the schools.⁵⁰⁹⁰ Smoking and drinking in the ABiH were banned on religious grounds.⁵⁰⁹¹ Many Muslims observed fasting during Ramadan for the first time in their lives, and the mosques filled up.⁵⁰⁹² The area controlled by the Bosnian government was becoming increasingly a one-party state run by the SDA.⁵⁰⁹³

In early July Owen and Stoltenberg put heavy pressure on Izetbegovic to agree to the partition plan proposed by Milosevic and Tudjman. If he did not agree, that could mean the end of the peace talks and the UN presence in Bosnia.⁵⁰⁹⁴ During June a majority of the seven members of the Bosnian presidium, which consisted of Muslims, Croats, Serbs, a Jew and a Hungarian, had indicated their willingness to accept an ethnic partition as the basis for further peace talks.

⁵⁰⁸² Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1351-1354.

⁵⁰⁸³ Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1354-1357.

⁵⁰⁸⁴ John Pomfret, 'Bosnian Mourns "Tragic Reality" of Partition', The Washington Post, 06/07/93.

⁵⁰⁸⁵ Michael Ignatieff, 'Het kleine verschil en de grote gevolgen' ('The minor difference and the major consequences'), De Groene Amsterdammer, 19/05/93, pp. 16-18. The article had previously been published in The New York Review of Books.

⁵⁰⁸⁶ Burg & Shoup, War, pp. 12-13

⁵⁰⁸⁷ Caroline de Gruyter, 'In de tang van de halve maan' ('Cornered by the crescent moon'), Elsevier, 14/11/92, pp. 68-69.

⁵⁰⁸⁸ UN, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, n. 47.

⁵⁰⁸⁹ UN, S/1994/674/Add.2(Vol. I), 28/12/94, Appendix III.A, II.B.2.

⁵⁰⁹⁰ Cohen, Hearts, p. 289; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 196.

⁵⁰⁹¹ Rathfelder, Sarajevo, p. 176.

⁵⁰⁹² Rathfelder, Sarajevo, pp. 176-177.

⁵⁰⁹³ Judah, Serbs, p. 218.

⁵⁰⁹⁴ NCA/Agence France Presse/Reuter/AP, A-wire, 08/07/93, 03:14:18.

According to journalists in the Bosnian capital, however, another group of military and political leaders in Sarajevo was increasingly prepared to push Izetbegovic out if he were to agree to an actual partition of the land area.⁵⁰⁹⁵

There was another, third, way between a multi-ethnic Bosnia and a smaller Muslim state. This was an integrated Islamic state of Bosnia, to which even Muslim areas beyond it could be added, such as Sandzak. This idea was supported by Vice-President Ejup Ganic, who came from Sandzak himself.⁵⁰⁹⁶

These tendencies were often even unified in a single person. Multi-ethnicity was the dominant theme favoured by many Muslims, but - if nothing else were possible - they could fall back on a Muslim nationalist perspective.⁵⁰⁹⁷ Although from the start of the war in Bosnia Izetbegovic had nearly always spoken in public of the integrity and multi-ethnicity of the state of Bosnia-Herzegovina,⁵⁰⁹⁸ the commander of the ABiH, Halilovic, claimed that, in private, he had long given up on this.⁵⁰⁹⁹ For instance, in November 1992 Izetbegovic and Ganic are said to have held discussions with the leader of the Muslims in Sandzak, Sulejman Ugljanin, on the possibility of giving up Eastern Herzegovina in exchange for Sandzak. Halilovic claims that in January 1993 Izetbegovic was persuaded by the Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat that he should settle for that part of the area given to the Muslims under the Vance-Owen plan. Arafat is alleged to have told Izetbegovic that if he refused to agree to the territory allocated to him under that plan, he would later be left empty-handed.⁵¹⁰⁰ On 15 November 1993 Izetbegovic told Bosnian radio that a multi-ethnic Bosnia-Herzegovina was no longer possible. He said that it was unacceptable that Serbs and Croats - he used the terms četniks and ustashe - would ever join Muslims in a common presidium. He said that land which could not be regained from the Bosnian Serbs through negotiations would have to be recaptured by force.⁵¹⁰¹ In March 1994 Izetbegovic was to publicly state that whilst multi-ethnicity sounded good, it was in all honesty 'a lie': 'because a soldier does not lay down his life so that ethnic groups can live together, but because he is defending his people.'⁵¹⁰²

In late June 1993 Owen made an attempt to do business with members of the Bosnian presidium who were prepared to negotiate on the basis of the Milosevic and Tudjman plan. It looked as though Izetbegovic was going to be beaten. The negotiation delegation of seven presidium members left for Geneva without him and without Vice-President Ganic.⁵¹⁰³ On 29 June the majority of the presidium members issued Izetbegovic an ultimatum: he should decide whether to continue to ⁵⁰⁹⁵ 'Bosnia's Muslim President faces appalling dilemma', Reuter B-wire, 09/07/93, 17:52:41.

⁵⁰⁹⁶ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 67/92, 17/09/92; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 78/92, 26/10/92; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 03/93, 11/01/93; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 47/93, 03/08/93; Nicole Lucas, 'Bosnische vice-president: "Kroaten hebben ons nodig"' (Bosnian vice-president: "Croats need us"), Trouw, 23/02/93; John F. Burns, 'Serbs' Attack on Sarajevo Keeps Bosnians From Talks', The New York Times, 23/07/93.

⁵⁰⁹⁷ Donia & Fine, Bosnia, p. 265.

⁵⁰⁹⁸ See also C. de Gruyter, 'Redder van Joegoslavië' (Saviour of Yugoslavia), Elsevier, 29/02/92, p. 44; Caroline de Gruyter, 'In de tang van de halve maan' (Cornered by the crescent moon), Elsevier, 14/11/92, p. 69.

⁵⁰⁹⁹ Halilovic, Strategija, pp. 18-19.

⁵¹⁰⁰ Halilovic, Strategija, p. 23.

⁵¹⁰¹ "'Bosnië moslimstaat'. Izetbegovic zet punt achter multi-etnisch bestuur' ("Bosnia Muslim state". Izetbegovic puts an end to multi-ethnic leadership), Trouw, 16/11/93; 'Bosnia: Izetbegovic says common Bosnia no longer possible', Reuter Business Briefing, 15/11/93, 07:45.

⁵¹⁰² Hannes Hofbauer, 'Neue Staaten, neue Kriege. Die Zerstörung Jugoslawiens (1991-1999)', idem (Hg.), Balkankrieg, p. 86.

⁵¹⁰³ 'Bosnische regering verdeeld aan vooravond vredesbespreking Genève' (Bosnian government divided on eve of Geneva peace talks), ANP, 22/06/93; Paul Lewis, 'Bosnians Divide Over New Talks To Split Country', The New York Times, 23/06/93; 'Ne, nismo izolirani', Vecernji List, 24/06/93; 'Bosnia-Herzegovina Presidency to secure equality of all three peoples', Yugoslav Daily Survey, 25/06/93.

represent the state of Bosnia-Herzegovina, or else be known in future as the spokesman of the Muslims.⁵¹⁰⁴

The fact that Izetbegovic sent his wife, two daughters and grandchildren to Turkey in late June, where the Izetbegovic family owned property, seemed to be linked to the internal political difficulties he was facing. The Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs felt compelled to quash the rumours and explain that the arrival of part of the family did not mean that Izetbegovic himself would also be leaving for Turkey in the near future to settle with his family in the town of Bursa in the north-west of the country.⁵¹⁰⁵

In the meantime, Owen was putting pressure on Izetbegovic to return to the negotiating table.⁵¹⁰⁶ In early July a visibly tired Izetbegovic changed track and said he was prepared to negotiate on the basis of the Milosevic and Tudjman plan for an extremely loose confederation consisting of three separate entities for Croats, Muslim and Serbs. In an interview with John Pomfret of The Washington Post he said: 'I can't accept it, but it seems that it is becoming an ugly, tragic reality.' 'All the cards are in my enemies' hands. Still, how can I surrender?'⁵¹⁰⁷ Shortly afterwards he said that he had reached the conclusion that continuing the war would lead to collective suicide of the Muslims, making acceptance of a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina inevitable.⁵¹⁰⁸ On 17 August the Bosnian Permanent Representative to the UN, Sacirbey, told a press conference that Izetbegovic was still in favour of the principle of a multi-ethnic state, but that the Bosnian government 'found itself without any option but to concede the positions forced upon it': a plan for a three-way split of Bosnia was now being 'shoved down our throats'.⁵¹⁰⁹

4. The further progress of the negotiations

At the end of July Izetbegovic returned to the negotiating table and the real negotiations on a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina started. However, from early August he stayed away again, stating that he would not return as long as the VRS were still occupying Mount Igman. When the Bosnian president returned on 17 August, he appeared to be willing to accept a three-way partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina within its existing boundaries. On 20 August 1993 Owen and Stoltenberg submitted a draft agreement to the three parties in the Bosnian conflict to which they were expected to respond within ten days. Apparently to prevent any real objections by Izetbegovic, Christopher sent him a letter insisting that he should support the plan.⁵¹¹⁰ The draft granted 52% of the land to the Bosnian Serbs, 17% to the Croats and 31% to the Muslims. At the level of the union of the three areas, there would be a presidium consisting of the presidents of the three constituent parts. The chairmanship of the presidium would rotate every four months. All decisions within the presidium would be taken unanimously. The most significant powers at the level of the union related to foreign policy and international trade. There would be a parliament of 120 members, to which each of the republics would elect 40 members. Just as in the 1974 constitution for the whole of Yugoslavia, it was stipulated that none of the constituent parts was allowed to withdraw from the union without the permission of the others. The question can be asked whether, in the light of the experiences from 1991 onwards, the stipulation would make much impression on the warring factions in Bosnia, in particular on the Muslims, who will also have taken account of the fact that the Serbs could easily flout the operations of the union by simply ignoring it.

⁵¹⁰⁴ 'Ultimatum aan Izetbegovic' ('Ultimatum for Izetbegovic'), ANP, 29/06/93, 23:06

⁵¹⁰⁵ 'Milliyet: Izetbegovic to move to Turkey', Yugoslav Daily Survey, 01/07/93; 'Izetbegovic allegedly going into exile to Turkey', DPA, B-wire, 30/06/93, 14:24:45; 'Izetbegovic's family to take shelter in Turkey', DPA, B-wire, 30/06/93, 17:26:30.

⁵¹⁰⁶ Vladimir Voronkov, 'Owen says Moslems running out of time to deal', TASS, 06/07/93.

⁵¹⁰⁷ John Pomfret, 'Bosnian Mourns "Tragic Reality" of Partition', The Washington Post, 06/07/93.

⁵¹⁰⁸ 'Bosnia's Moslem President faces appalling dilemma', Reuter B-wire, 09/07/93, 17:52:41.

⁵¹⁰⁹ ABZ, PVNY. Press conference by Bosnia and Herzegovina, 17/08/91, Appendix to PR New York to DPV/PZ and DEU/OE, 19/08/93 fax no. 7879.

⁵¹¹⁰ David Binder, 'U.S. Policymakers on Bosnia Admit Errors in Opposing Partition in 1992', The New York Times, 29/08/93.

From the late 1980s in Yugoslavia this had not been an unfamiliar phenomenon.⁵¹¹¹ The proposal was extremely disadvantageous to the Muslims, given their proportion of the population and the lack of an access route to the sea. The draft did provide for a corridor which would link the three eastern enclaves with the Muslim area in Central Bosnia.

Izetbegovic decided to continue with the negotiations and to accept conditionally the Stoltenberg-Owen plan. On 27 August 1993 he told the Bosnian Parliament: 'Our task now is to save what we can of Bosnia. That is our task, here and now - so that perhaps somewhere in the future the whole of Bosnia can be saved.'⁵¹¹² Ten days earlier he had already said that he was willing to accept a 'temporary' partition.⁵¹¹³ General Rasim Delic, who had succeeded Sefer Halilovic as commander of the ABiH on 10 June, advised the Muslim Parliament to accept the Owen-Stoltenberg plan because the Muslim forces had pretty much exhausted their reserves. Although the ABiH was scoring successes against Croats, at the same time they were losing to the Serbs.⁵¹¹⁴ Following these recommendations, the parliament agreed to Izetbegovic's compromise approach: agreement in the short-term in the hope of achieving greater gains in the long-term.

On 31 August the negotiations were resumed in Geneva. The Bosnian Croats and Muslims wanted further discussion about the geographical partition. The Muslims demanded four per cent more land. From the Serbs they wanted areas in Eastern Bosnia and the return of the cities of Prijedor and Sanski Most in the west. From the Croats they asked for Neum, which would give them access to the sea. This was difficult for the Croats to swallow, as it would cut through their own land on the Dalmatian coast. The Bosnian Serbs and Croats made insufficient concessions to the Muslim demands and the negotiations were suspended on 1 September.

In the second week of September Izetbegovic travelled to the United States to seek support in the American Congress. However, he was given a rude awakening because both President Clinton and the members of the House of Representatives he spoke to told him that the American administration would not come to his aid to strengthen his negotiating position. Izetbegovic's requests for American bombardments of Bosnian-Serb positions if the VRS refused to end the siege of Sarajevo before a certain date were rejected outright by Clinton. The American president stated that negotiations should now take the place of bombardments to bring a solution for Sarajevo. In fact, Izetbegovic's visit to Clinton was counter-productive, since the American president took the opportunity to set certain strict conditions for American participation in an implementation force for the peace agreement. For instance, the Americans would only take part if the troops came under NATO command.⁵¹¹⁵ Back in Bosnia, Izetbegovic was forced to make the best of a bad job. On 14 September Izetbegovic and Tudjman reached agreement to end all hostilities between Muslims and Croats in Bosnia with effect from 19 September.⁵¹¹⁶ Ultimately, Tudjman gained more from this agreement than from an alliance with the Bosnian Serbs. It allowed him to free up the Croatian government troops which he had deployed in the increasingly heavy fighting against the ABiH for a possible confrontation with the Serbs, who still held more than a quarter of the ground area in Croatia. It also allowed him to defy the ⁵¹¹¹ Compare Hayden, Blueprints, p. 108.

⁵¹¹² Ljiljan, no. 33, 1993, quoted in X. Bougarel, 'Bosnia and Hercegovina - State and Communitarianism', Dyker&Vejvoda (ed.), Yugoslavia, p. 106.

⁵¹¹³ Izetbegovic: opdeling is tijdelijk ('Izetbegovic: partition is temporary'), NRC Handelsblad, 16/08/93; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 49/93, 18/08/93.

⁵¹¹⁴ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 53/93, 03/09/93.

⁵¹¹⁵ Burg & Shoup, War, p. 279; 'Clinton geeft Izetbegovic nul op rekest' ('Clinton turns down Izetbegovic'), Het Parool, 09/09/93; 'VN willen alleen met NAVO vredesmacht vormen voor Bosnië' ('UN not prepared to form peace force for Bosnia without NATO'), ANP, 09/09/93, 03:26. Clinton repeated this position in the weeks that followed. See for example. 'Clinton noemt voorwaarden voor Amerikaanse inmenging in Bosnië' ('Clinton sets terms for American involvement in Bosnia'), ANP, 27/09/93, 23:54.

⁵¹¹⁶ Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1346-1348.

growing international criticism of his support of the Bosnian Croat violence, particularly in Mostar. On 16 September Izetbegovic reached a similar agreement with Milosevic, Karadzic and Bulatovic.⁵¹¹⁷ Owen and Stoltenberg used the agreement as an opportunity to resume the talks about their plan. On 21 September an agreement was reached on board the British aircraft carrier HMS Invincible. The agreement went further than the Owen-Stoltenberg plan in the direction of partition. Under the new agreement, referenda would be held in the separate ethnic zones on their status within two years of a territorial agreement being reached. This phrase was already included in the agreement made between Izetbegovic and the (Bosnian) Serb leaders on 16 September and demonstrated that Izetbegovic was resigned to a partition.⁵¹¹⁸ Apparently Owen and Stoltenberg were attempting to persuade the Croat and Serb leaders to concede a large area to the Muslims in exchange for the right to establish separate zones. On 21 September the parties met in Sarajevo to discuss this further.

An exchange for the eastern enclaves?

From late July the issue of the position of the eastern enclaves was high on the agenda at the talks co-chaired by Owen and Stoltenberg. If there were to be a partition of Bosnia, Karadzic, who had always had a strong regional connection with Eastern Bosnia within the VRS,⁵¹¹⁹ would lay claim to the Muslim enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde, which were located there. Karadzic said that, in exchange, he would relinquish all Serbian claims to the capital, Sarajevo.⁵¹²⁰ However, Izetbegovic believed that the three enclaves should be part of a continuous Muslim area, and was supported by Owen and Stoltenberg.⁵¹²¹ Under their plans, the three Muslim enclaves would be linked together and then linked by a corridor to Sarajevo.

Following the agreement reached on the HMS Invincible Izetbegovic opened consultations with both Serb leaders and his own supporters over a land exchange with the Bosnian Serbs which would also include Srebrenica. Izetbegovic sent Muhamed Filipovic to Belgrade to negotiate on this question with Milosevic. He himself consulted with Krajisnik and held separate discussions with a nine-man delegation of Muslims led by Fahrudin Salihovic, who had been summoned from Srebrenica. As far as can be ascertained, the other members of the delegation, which travelled there and back in a UNPROFOR helicopter, consisted of Oric's deputy, Ramiz Becirovic, the doctor Avdo Hasanovic, police chief Hakija Meholic, Hajrudin Avdic, Mehmedalija Ustic, Ibrahim Becirovic, Nedžad Bektic and Dzermal Mastic. However, this delegation rejected the plan for an exchange between Srebrenica and Vogosca, a suburb of Sarajevo.⁵¹²²

The Bosnian Serbs say that, following this, an exchange of the eastern enclaves for part of Sarajevo was often discussed, both in international consultations and in direct contacts between Muslims and Serbs. For instance, Milosevic is said to have spoken by telephone to Izetbegovic about this on 11 November 1993.⁵¹²³ However, the Muslims were never able to reach a final decision on ⁵¹¹⁷ Ramcharan, Conference, pp. 1348-1351.

⁵¹¹⁸ Ramcharan, Conference, p. 1349.

⁵¹¹⁹ Bougarel, Bosnië, p. 64.

⁵¹²⁰ 'Karadzic nudi Sarajevo za Gorazde, Zepu i Srebrenicu', Oslobodjenje, 24/06/93; MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 43/93, 29/06/93.

⁵¹²¹ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (MID, Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 43/93, 29/06/93; 49/93, 18/08/93.

⁵¹²² Halilovic, Strategija, p. 109; interviews S. Halilovic and S. Rustempasic, 17/04/98; H. Meholic, 19/04/98 and 21/05/99; H. Selmanagic, 07/08/97; S. Vilibic, 15/04/98; '5,000 Muslim Lives for Military Intervention', Dani, 22/06/98; Esad Hecimovic, 'Hoe ze Srebrenica hebben verkocht en de macht behouden' ('How they sold Srebrenica and stayed in power'), Dani, September 1998; Rusmir Mahmutcehajic in Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 237; Vanno Jobse, 'Srebrenica is al in april 1993 al gevallen' ('Srebrenica fell as early as April 1993'), Het Parool, 16/07/95; Documentary about Naser Oric, part 2, by Geertjan Lassche, 2Vandaag, 26/02/01; 'Opnieuw vraagt eens rond inzet Dutchbat enclave Srebrenica' ('New questions on deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica enclave'), Metro, 26/02/01; 'Enclave viel door verraad' ('Enclave fell through treachery'), Algemeen Dagblad, 24/02/01; UN report, par. 115.

⁵¹²³ Hartmann, Milosevic, p. 314.

this.⁵¹²⁴ Conversely, Izetbegovic denies ever having spoken to the Serbs about a land exchange which would include Srebrenica in advance of the Dayton talks.⁵¹²⁵

However, a possible exchange of areas was discussed in contacts between Dutch officials from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Muhamed Sacirbey, the UN Permanent Representative for Bosnia-Herzegovina. Muhamed Sacirbey was born in Sarajevo in 1956. His family left Yugoslavia in 1963 and lived consecutively in Western Europe and North Africa before moving to the United States in 1967. Muhamed Sacirbey studied law there and obtained an MBA from the Columbia University School of Business in New York. Having worked for various large American companies, he was appointed the first Permanent Representative for Bosnia to the United Nations in May 1992. In this role he won the admiration of both friends and enemies for his powerful defence of the interests of Bosnia.⁵¹²⁶ Sacirbey, who at that time had a Dutch girlfriend, maintained extremely good relations with the Dutch Permanent Representative, Biegman, and was a regular visitor to the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs.⁵¹²⁷

In talking to him it became clear to Dutch officials that an exchange of Srebrenica for part of Sarajevo, for instance, was taboo. Sacirbey indicated that the representatives from Srebrenica itself were against this and that it would also, in some ways, be politically impracticable for Bosnian Muslims to agree to give up the eastern enclaves. The officials from the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs believed that the Bosnian Muslims were able to manipulate publicity so well that it would be unthinkable for the West to openly advocate a solution in which the Safe Areas would be given up in exchange for other areas. The idea was entertained, but it was always summarily dismissed as unfeasible.⁵¹²⁸

In February 1994 the American, Redman, who succeeded Bartholomew as special American representative to the peace talks, tried once again to propose an exchange of land between Srebrenica and Zepa (for the Muslims) and parts of Sarajevo (for the Serbs), but the Muslims did not take it seriously.⁵¹²⁹

According to Minister Kooijmans, discussions were held with the Bosnian government on evacuating the population from the eastern enclaves, but these continually resulted in the accusation that this would constitute collaboration with ethnic cleansing.⁵¹³⁰ This gave rise to a problem for the West that the parties in the region themselves would have to create a solution for the enclaves and that this would have to be achieved through negotiations, not through a military fait accompli. On their own, however, the Muslims were not able to reach a decision to exchange the eastern enclaves.

The Bosnian government embarks on a new course after rejecting Owen-Stoltenberg Plan

On 28 September a completely new institution met in Sarajevo to discuss the Invincible agreement: the Bosnian Assembly (Bosnjacki sabor), a meeting of 349 politicians, clergy, artists and intellectuals, which decided that the term Muslim would no longer be used as the official designation of the population group concerned, and would be replaced by the term Bosniaks. This indicated a change of policy. In 1990 the SDA had rejected every proposal which referred to a Bosniak identity, favoured at that time by Adil Zulfikarpasic. Zulfikarpasic had ultimately established his own Muslimanska

⁵¹²⁴ Interviews A. Buha, 17/12/99; D. Cosic, 13/09/01; D. Harland, 04/08/97; V. Matovic, 02/08/01; M. Steiner, 06/07/00; M. Toholj, 14/12/99. See also interviews H. Meholic, 19/04/98 and 21/05/99; Foreign Affairs, Cabinet archive: coll. Van den Broek. Voorhoeve to Van Mierlo, 25/10/94, with appendix: Wijnaendts 243 to Van Mierlo, 18/10/94 and Van Mierlo to Voorhoeve, 01/11/94.

⁵¹²⁵ Interview David Harland with Izetbegovic, 16/07/99.

⁵¹²⁶ Interviews A. Buha, 17/12/99 and B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00; Cuvalo, Dictionary, p. 205.

⁵¹²⁷ Interviews N. Biegman, 03/07/00; O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00; F.A.M. Majoor, 19/04/00; C. Minderhoud, 02/06/00; P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00; J.L. Sandee, 12/06/00; H. Hazewinkel, 17/04/00; J.M. Vos, 24/06/99; and H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵¹²⁸ Interviews O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00; F.A.M. Majoor, 19/04/00; H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00. Also: Sacirbey was opposed in principle to any form of exchange: confidential interview (97); TCBU, Vertretpunt, III, hearing J.J.C. Voorhoeve, 31/05/00, p. 200.

⁵¹²⁹ Confidential interview (53).

⁵¹³⁰ Interview P. H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99

Bošnjačka Organizacija (MBO) (Chapter 3). Now the VRS suddenly embraced the term 'Bosniaks' to designate the inhabitants of the Bosnian state.

Although this meeting nominally accepted the Invincible agreement, it in fact rejected the plan, because acceptance was conditional on the Bosnian Serbs and Croats conceding all the land they had conquered to the Muslims. The next day the Parliament of Bosnia-Herzegovina took the same position, with a special role being played by Army Commander Delic. Whilst only a month earlier he had been urging acceptance of the Owen-Stoltenberg plan because the army was exhausted, now, backed by Ganic, he was urging resistance to the Invincible agreement, because in the meantime the ABiH had achieved victories against the Bosnian Croats. They found the battlefield more attractive than the negotiating table. If need be, another 200,000 people would have to die in the coming winter, according to Ganic.⁵¹³¹

Izetbegovic, who realized that he would have to settle for less than the whole of Bosnia for the time being, but who had apparently not given up hope of getting his hands on the whole of Bosnia in due course, had now decided to follow the route taken by Tito and his partisans 50 years earlier. From a core area, he would try to conquer more and more land, with the whole of Bosnia as his ultimate goal. In November 1993 he said in an interview with Bosnian television that:

'We must learn a lesson from the things from the last war... when the četniks or ustashe arrived in a place, the population fled because those armies killed civilians; when partisans arrived, they did not flee... the partisans were cruel and extremely tough on their enemies, but we know that they never murdered women and children, and that's why they were victorious.'

He added:

'In the area which is controlled by the Bosnian army, we must create a space in which there is the rule of law, in which civilization is upheld and democracy is the order of the day, with the basic rule that no one in that area can be persecuted for their religion, their ethnicity or their political beliefs... then we will be capable of winning... and that will pave the way to the reintegration of Bosnia.'⁵¹³²

The green light for the new politics was given in the Bosnjacki sabor. A conscious attempt to push the more secular nature of Bosnia-Herzegovina to the forefront.

The tendency towards a movement which used human rights and democracy as a tactical resource also came to light with the appointment of Haris Silajdzic as Prime Minister on 25 October, prior to which he had been Minister of Foreign Affairs. Silajdzic was the son of the imam of the Begova mosque in Sarajevo.⁵¹³³ He had studied Islam and Arabic languages at the Garyounis University in Benghazi in Libya. He wrote his dissertation on American-Albanian relations between 1912 and 1939 and lived in Washington D.C. for a year during his research. He gained a second-class honours degree in history and political science from the University of Pristina in Kosovo. He then worked as a consultant for both Yugoslavian businesses in Libya and for Reis-ul-Ulema, the spiritual leader of the Muslims in Yugoslavia. Silajdzic was one of Izetbegovic's proteges, and had been a founding member of the SDA in 1990. Shortly after the 1990 elections he was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs for Bosnia, a position he filled for three years. Silajdzic had a reputation as an aggressive diplomat, which ⁵¹³¹ Eisermann, Weg, p. 205.

⁵¹³² Quoted in Bougarel, Bosnie, pp. 68-69.

⁵¹³³ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

earned him the professional admiration of his opposite number in the Republika Srpska, A. Buha.⁵¹³⁴ He was appointed Prime Minister on 25 October 1993, a job he was to keep until early 1996.

Within the SDA Silajdzic attempted to build bridges between the Islamic and pro-Western factions.⁵¹³⁵ Apparently his position between the two camps gave rise to a range of opinions about him amongst representatives of the international community. Some believed him to be in favour of an integrated multi-ethnic and multi-religious Bosnia,⁵¹³⁶ while others placed him in the fundamental Islamic camp.⁵¹³⁷ C. Bildt, who would later be a negotiator in the Yugoslavian conflict, considered him a cynic.⁵¹³⁸ Conversely, the Dutch Minister Kooijmans described him as 'one of the most reasonable': 'I wish they had all been like that'.⁵¹³⁹

Silajdzic had only agreed to accept his role after receiving a commitment that the authorities would take action against the criminal gangs run by Delalic and Topalovic, which had more or less become a state within the state.⁵¹⁴⁰ The day after he took office, the action against Topalovic took place (see Chapter 5). The Silajdzic government explicitly made human rights a central theme of its programme.

The developments in the ABiH were apparently at odds with the government programme. For instance, in the same period General Jovan Divjak, a Serb who had organized the defence of Sarajevo on behalf of the Muslims, was arrested. His arrest was designed to demonstrate that the ABiH would become a pure Muslim army or, even worse, a party army because, in fact, the army was subject to the SDA in that period.⁵¹⁴¹ The Croatian Chief of Staff of the ABiH, Siber, was suddenly removed from his job and appointed military attaché to the Bosnian embassy in Switzerland. And these were only the most important in a whole series of changes which swiftly put those Croats and Serbs who until then had served in the ABiH out of action.⁵¹⁴² The new army leader, Rasim Delic, wanted to ensure strict observance of the military hierarchy and put an end to all sorts of personal contacts maintained by Halilovic. He also removed all kinds of irregular groups and unsavoury elements which had been given a chance by Halilovic in the chaotic early days of the war. In early November the ABiH dissolved the HVO division which had participated in the defence of Sarajevo right from the start of the war, and arrested its commander, Slavko Celic. The ABiH then invited HVO troops to join a new Croatian division of the First ABiH-Corps in the Bosnian capital.

The transformation of the ABiH into a party army in a state which was increasingly turning into a one-party regime run by the SDA, and the human rights programme of the Silajdzic government, which aimed for better acceptance of military conquests, were rooted in the same philosophy: the SDA and the Bosnian army should behave in the same way as the Communist Party and partisans had in the Second World War. This was seen as the route to success. And just as Tito and his partisans had been in awkward situations at certain times but had eventually come out on top, so the SDA did not need to despair if Izetbegovic was forced to settle temporarily for a mini state. In the long-term, they still believed in an integrated Bosnia, which would be conquered through 'a struggle for liberation'.⁵¹⁴³

⁵¹³⁴ Interview A. Buha, 17/12/99.

⁵¹³⁵ Compare Čuvalo, Dictionary, p. 216.

⁵¹³⁶ Rogel, Breakup, p. 109; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 194.

⁵¹³⁷ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

⁵¹³⁸ Interview C. Bildt, 13/12/00.

⁵¹³⁹ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁵¹⁴⁰ J.F. Burns, 'New Horror for Sarajevo: Muslims Killing Muslims', The New York Times, 31/10/93.

⁵¹⁴¹ Mahmutcehajic, 'War', p. 19; Marko Attila Hoare, 'Civilian-Military Relations in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992-1995', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, pp. 179 and 190-192.

⁵¹⁴² See Djuro Kozar, 'Croats and Serbs are (Un)suitable', Oslobodjenje-Svijet, 02/08/96, <http://www.cdsp.neu.edu/info/students/marko/oslob/oslob7.html>

⁵¹⁴³ Compare Marko Attila Hoare, 'Civilian-Military Relations in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1992-1995', Magas/Zanic (eds.), War, p. 193.

5. The Dutch response to the plan

During the Copenhagen Summit the Dutch Prime Minister described the Tadjman and Milosevic plan, as it was on the table at that time, as: ‘no laughing matter. On the contrary, it’s a very serious business.’⁵¹⁴⁴

However, the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs was not clear about which course Izetbegovic planned to take. They did know that there were different schools of thought among the Muslims in respect of whether Bosnia-Herzegovina should maintain its integrity or whether there should be a smaller, ‘pure’ Muslim state, which the Bosnian Muslims themselves referred to as a fildzan state, a reference to the tiny cups in which Turkish coffee is served.⁵¹⁴⁵ The Ministry had the impression that the ‘soft’ Izetbegovic was having difficulty imposing his leadership on these two schools of thought.⁵¹⁴⁶

During a meeting of the ad hoc Yugoslavia group in Brussels in early July 1993, the Dutch government, together with Germany and France, took the position that the EC should not actively interfere in the negotiating process on the Owen-Stoltenberg plan, but should submit the results of the negotiations to the London Conference principles and the conclusion drawn by the European Council of Copenhagen. This position was adopted by the meeting. The Dutch did, however, indicate that the proposals made by the Croats and Serbs contained certain elements which gave cause for concern. Firstly, no mention was made of the return of Displaced Persons. Secondly, under these plans the three republics would be allowed to conduct international relations themselves, which pointed to a recognition that Bosnia would be broken up. Lord Owen also seemed to be going in this direction by trying to ensure that, when the geographical lines were drawn, the Muslim republic would be able to continue independently if necessary.⁵¹⁴⁷

During the CoPo meeting on 12 and 13 July the Dutch Director General of Political Affairs, J.M. Vos, repeated the Dutch government’s criticism of the plan and added that, according to the map under this plan, the enclaves in Eastern Bosnia were left hanging in mid-air with ‘the ever-increasing risk of degenerating into Muslim reservations’.⁵¹⁴⁸ On 28 July the head of DEU, Schaper, wrote a memorandum for Minister Kooijmans which reflected the strong indignation which could increasingly be seen in memos issued by the Ministry in the following weeks. Schaper remarked that the secret report written by Owen the previous day on the discussions in Geneva confirmed ‘the worst fears’ about what Owen and Stoltenberg were doing. They seemed to be intent on achieving a result in Bosnia as quickly as possible, bypassing all previous statements by the EC and the UN, for example in London and Copenhagen. The political integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina was no longer being maintained. Owen accused the Bosnians who refused to agree to this approach as being out-of-touch with reality. Schaper advised that in its public statements the Dutch government should emphasize that it would evaluate the results achieved in Geneva in the light of the statement by the European Council of Copenhagen, and should stress that the real problem in Bosnia was not the Muslims, but the Serbs and Croats.⁵¹⁴⁹ Shortly afterwards, Schaper branded the Owen-Stoltenberg plan as little more than ‘asset-stripping’.⁵¹⁵⁰

⁵¹⁴⁴ NOS, Journal, 21/06/93, 20.00.

⁵¹⁴⁵ Interviews P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00 and B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

⁵¹⁴⁶ Interviews P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00 and B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00.

⁵¹⁴⁷ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00754. Kooijmans, 09/07/93, circ 493

⁵¹⁴⁸ ABZ, DEU/ARA/00740. Kooijmans, 14/07/93, circ 515

⁵¹⁴⁹ ABZ, 911.13, Bosnia June 1992-September 1996. Memorandum from head of DEU to Kooijmans, 28/07/93, no. 222/93.

⁵¹⁵⁰ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Memorandum from head of DEU to Kooijmans, 12/08/93, DEU-232/93; Schaper did not remove that term. See also ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from head of DEU to Kooijmans, 19/09/93, no. 93/286. The term is also used in the report by the Coordinating group chaired by Hattinga van ‘t Sant dated 21/09/93, ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum from acting head of DEU to AP and others, 24/09/93, no. 281/93 and in the objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 19/08/93.

On 29 July, the day on which the Owen-Stoltenberg plan was announced, Kooijmans sent a telegram to his Belgian opposite number W. Claes, who chaired the EC at that time, in which he referred to the fact that the plan was in conflict with the principles established in London and Copenhagen. He asked for a European Council meeting to be organized to discuss the negotiations in Geneva. However, Claes took the view that the negotiators should not be disturbed at this crucial phase of the talks.⁵¹⁵¹ On 9 and 10 August the German and Dutch governments supported each other's positions on this in COREU communications. Owen and other EC member states, however, took the view that, at that time, no better solution was possible.⁵¹⁵² On 19 August Kooijmans once again made clear in a COREU telex that the Dutch government strongly sympathized with Izetbegovic's desire for more land for the Muslims. He warned that there was a chance that the Dutch government would not make any Land Forces available for the implementation force, because the government in The Hague did not believe that this was a fair and viable solution.⁵¹⁵³

The Dutch position was probably influenced by its close contact with Mohamed Sacirbey. Sacirbey and his girlfriend at that time, Mabel Wisse Smit, are the only people referred to by officials of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs as people outside the Dutch political and official circuit who exercised influence on the policy.⁵¹⁵⁴ For that matter, Sacirbey is said to have had more success with Biegan in this respect than with the Ministry itself.⁵¹⁵⁵ Sacirbey mainly made it clear that a separate Muslim state would not be viable and would become little more than a glorified enclave.⁵¹⁵⁶ At the Ministry in The Hague there was also some anxiety that a separate Muslim state would not be economically viable and could therefore be open to radical Islamic influences.⁵¹⁵⁷ In the meantime, a request from Kooijmans for a meeting of the European Council was dismissed even by the German government, which had virtually the same substantive criticism as The Hague, because such a meeting might put a spoke in the wheel of the negotiations co-chaired by Owen and Stoltenberg.⁵¹⁵⁸

In the meantime the US State Department informed the Dutch government that the Americans' initial view of the Owen-Stoltenberg plan was that it looked 'realistic'. It said that it would be regrettable 'if certain allies were to distance themselves from this agreement', all the more so since Izetbegovic appeared to be able to live with it.⁵¹⁵⁹ On 23 August Christopher sent a letter to Kooijmans which contained the following passage: 'In our contacts with the parties over the coming week, we should all emphasize the importance of approaching the package that has emerged from Geneva with realism and flexibility so that the tragic conflict can be brought to an end.'⁵¹⁶⁰ It was clear that the State Department was trying to temper the criticism of the plan expressed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in The Hague.

As a result of the criticism from Bonn and The Hague, Owen and Stoltenberg held separate meetings with Kinkel and Kooijmans on 25 August. Prior to their visit, the Ministry seems to have been spoiling for a fight. Hoekema states that the officials at Foreign Affairs were ready to 'give the negotiators a rocket' and make it clear to them that Dutch support would only be forthcoming if the peace agreement could stand the 'ethnic test'.⁵¹⁶¹ The points for discussion which Schaper drew up for ⁵¹⁵¹ Both, Indifference, p. 162; ABZ, Cabinet archive, letters abroad: A-K, 1993, Kooijmans to Claes, 29/07/93 and Claes to Kooijmans, 05/08/93.

⁵¹⁵² Both, Indifference, p. 162.

⁵¹⁵³ Both, Indifference, p. 163; ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. COREU The Hague, 19/08/93, cpe/hag/521.

⁵¹⁵⁴ Interviews O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00; H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵¹⁵⁵ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵¹⁵⁶ Interviews O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00; R. in den Bosch, 19/04/00.

⁵¹⁵⁷ Interview O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00.

⁵¹⁵⁸ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meeting of 24-25/08/93, prepared for the purposes of the NIOD study.

⁵¹⁵⁹ ABZ, Washington Embassy. Bentinck 563 to Kooijmans, 13/08/93.

⁵¹⁶⁰ ABZ, Cabinet archive, Letters abroad L-Z, 1993, Message to Minister for Foreign Affairs Peter H. Kooijmans from Secretary of State Christopher, 23/08/93, appendix to M. Klosson to Kooijmans, 23/08/93.

⁵¹⁶¹ Both, Indifference, p. 163; Dutch language quotations in Both, version 1999, p. 251 n. 64.

the meeting on behalf of Minister Kooijmans stated that both negotiators had placed such emphasis on realism that the agreement gave far too much to the Bosnian Serbs and too little to the Muslims.⁵¹⁶² During their visit, the objections to the agreement raised by Kooijmans were that it was not sufficiently fair to the Bosnian Muslims, that the Croatian and Serb parts of the republic would be able to secede, that there was little chance that the Bosnian Muslim part would be viable and that he foresaw major difficulties in implementation. The Dutch Minister for Foreign Affairs told the negotiators that this position would be 'of real significance' for the Dutch government's decision on Dutch participation in any implementation force for a peace agreement.⁵¹⁶³

The Dutch government could therefore completely understand that, without amendment, the Owen-Stoltenberg plan was unacceptable to Izetbegovic.⁵¹⁶⁴ Kooijmans reminded Owen and Stoltenberg of the Dutch government's responsibility to Parliament and to public opinion, an argument also used by Kinkel. Owen said that the only alternative to the plan was either chaos or 'lift and strike', which he labelled an 'absurd plan'. Furthermore, the West had not been prepared to use force to counter Serb territorial gains. Owen and Stoltenberg therefore believed that it was impossible to comply entirely with the London Conference principle that these gains should be totally unacceptable. Both negotiators were afraid that if the West were to indicate to Izetbegovic that the plan was unacceptable, he would continue to cling to false hopes of intervention.⁵¹⁶⁵

On the same day, Kooijmans sent a letter to Christopher in which he expressed his opposition to the way the Geneva negotiations were going. They appeared to be pointing to a result which would be in conflict with the London Conference principles and which could not be interpreted as fair and viable.⁵¹⁶⁶ The reaction from Washington was that the 'fairness' of an agreement must be balanced against the alternatives.⁵¹⁶⁷ It was clear that the Dutch government found little support for its resistance in Washington.

Following their meeting with Kooijmans, Owen and Stoltenberg believed that the Dutch Minister preferred continuance of the war in Bosnia to acceptance of their peace plan.⁵¹⁶⁸ The Minister himself said that the negotiators had not been able to remove all his doubts, a conclusion which had also been expressed as the expectation by the Dutch Ministerial Council in advance of the meeting.⁵¹⁶⁹ But, as Kooijmans added following the meeting, the Dutch government would suspend its final judgement until such time as the three parties involved in the conflict had given their views.⁵¹⁷⁰ However, Kooijmans' meeting with the two negotiators appears to have clarified things for the top officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and, if that were not the case, the ensuing press conference certainly did. Numerous foreign journalists had come to The Hague, attracted by the confrontation with Owen and Stoltenberg. They asked Minister Kooijmans whether he was aiming for a continuance of the war and other atrocities in Bosnia. According to Rob Meines, a journalist for NRC Handelsblad, by the end of the press conference Minister Kooijmans had 'already become so cautious that he said that he intended to include few details of his concerns in his letter to the Dutch Parliament'.⁵¹⁷¹ In the ⁵¹⁶⁴ TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 61, p. 1.

⁵¹⁶² ABZ, Memorandum from head of DEU to Kooijmans, 24/08/93, DEU/243/9.

⁵¹⁶³ TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 58, p. 6.

⁵¹⁶⁵ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05238. Kooijmans 229 to PR Geneva, 25/08/93. See also OWEN CD-ROM, Bosnia: Co-chairmen's meeting with Dutch Foreign Minister Kooijmans and German Foreign Minister Kinkel, 26 (sic) August on Union of Three Republics; Stoltenberg/Eide, Dagene, p. 124; Both, Indifference, p. 164.

⁵¹⁶⁶ ABZ, 910, Yugoslavia (formally Bosnia), isn 2028, Kooijmans to Christopher, 25/08/93.

⁵¹⁶⁷ ABZ Washington Embassy. Jacobovits 604 to Kooijmans, 31/08/93.

⁵¹⁶⁸ OWEN CD-ROM, Bosnia: Co-chairmen's meeting with Dutch Foreign Minister Kooijmans and German Foreign Minister Kinkel, 26 (sic) August on Union of Three Republics.

⁵¹⁶⁹ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meeting of 24-25/08/93, prepared for the purposes of the NIOD study.

⁵¹⁷⁰ 'Kooijmans houdt twijfels over vredesregeling Bosnië' ('Kooijmans still has doubts on Bosnian peace settlement'), NRC Handelsblad, 25/08/93.

⁵¹⁷¹ R. Meines, 'Kritiek Den Haag op plan Owen raakt gevoelige snaar' ('Dutch criticism of Owen plan strikes painful chord'), NRC Handelsblad, 26/08/93.

letter which Minister Kooijmans sent to Parliament the following day concerning his discussion with Owen and Stoltenberg, the criticism was therefore largely limited to the size of the Muslim state and doubts about the implementation of the agreement.⁵¹⁷² A day later, on 27 August, the head of the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security, F.A.M. Majoor, wrote a memo in which he stated that the Bosnian government had nothing to gain by rejecting the plan. This would not lead to a military intervention, as Sarajevo perhaps hoped, nor would it lead to air strikes or to a lifting of the arms embargo. And there was a strong possibility that, in the meantime, the Bosnian government would simply lose more ground.⁵¹⁷³ In fact, the Ministry should have been able to see for itself that there was little point to principled resistance to the Owen-Stoltenberg plan if the Dutch government was not capable of putting forward any alternatives itself.

It only remained to persuade Parliament. A meeting of the Foreign Affairs sub-committee on 2 September voiced considerable criticism of Owen, who, Dutch MPs believed, had exceeded his mandate. The majority of MPs viewed the agreement as neither fair nor viable, seeing it more as a plan for partition than a plan for peace. Van Middelkoop labelled Minister Kooijmans' statement that 'there is reason to doubt whether the plan complies with the London principles' the 'understatement of the month'.⁵¹⁷⁴ There was a great deal of sympathy for Izetbegovic, who was being forced to choose between an unfair peace and continuance of the war. Blaauw said that 'a tough warning' should be given that NATO air power would be used if the Serbs and Croats did not adopt a more conciliatory position.⁵¹⁷⁵

Eisma took a different view, stating that it was not a good idea for the Minister to have criticized the agreement before the parties involved had given their response. Furthermore, he asked, why had the EC ministers themselves not been able to keep more in touch with Owen? He also expressed the view that it was all too easy to criticize from the sidelines: 'Those who accuse Owen of arrogance should realize that, without any alternatives, they are guilty of greater arrogance!'⁵¹⁷⁶ Van Middelkoop also defended Owen in somewhat more restrained tones.

Minister Kooijmans, who earlier that day had been presented with a petition from the human rights groups Appèlgroepen Westerbork and Vught against the Owen-Stoltenberg plan and in favour of military intervention against the human rights violations in Bosnia, admitted that he had been quick to criticize the Owen-Stoltenberg plan. Defending his action, he said that it had been an attempt to influence the negotiations, albeit an unsuccessful one. In defence of Owen, it could be said that the British diplomat had reported virtually every day to the European ministers and the Commission during the last weeks of the negotiations. However, there was not enough support from the member states to call a European Council meeting. In answer to the question whether the agreement would be viable, the Minister said that this would depend mainly on the nature of the mandate, on the command structure, on which countries would participate in the implementation force, and finally on a request from the UN and the Bosnian government to supply Dutch troops. The Minister stated that the Netherlands had expressed its doubts about the possibilities for implementing the draft agreement in stronger terms than those used by other EC countries.⁵¹⁷⁷ Kooijmans said that the previous week he had met with Sacirbey who 'impressed upon him' that his government was prepared to accept a mini state in which there would be sufficient space for the same ethnic diversity as before the war. The Minister revealed that the Dutch government would face a 'moral dilemma' if the Bosnian government did in fact agree to the plan. If the Bosnian government accepted this plan, which rewarded ethnic cleansing, it would be ⁵¹⁷² TK, session 1992-1993, 22 181, no. 58.

⁵¹⁷³ Both, Indifference, p. 165.

⁵¹⁷⁴ TK, session 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 61, p. 6.

⁵¹⁷⁵ TK, session 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 61, p. 3.

⁵¹⁷⁶ TK, session 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 61, p. 4.

⁵¹⁷⁷ TK, session 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 61, pp. 6-8.

‘extremely difficult’ for the government in The Hague to reject the agreement.⁵¹⁷⁸ The Dutch government was apparently very well aware of what was good for Bosnia.

The Owen-Stoltenberg plan had sparked a revival of the media debate on the attitude of the international community towards the former Yugoslavia, and in particular on the question of what it remained for the Netherlands to do. The relatively successful campaign by the ABiH in Central Bosnia, which led to the flight of thousands of Croats, gave rise to the question whether Muslims were now going to indulge in the same practices used earlier by the Serbs and Croats. For instance, Brugsma was against a unilateral condemnation of the Serbs ‘... Croats and Muslims are also guilty of war crimes, albeit on a smaller scale. And not just genocide, but also starvation, torture and rape.’⁵¹⁷⁹ Professor Vojin Dimitrijevic, Professor of International Law and International Relations at the University of Belgrade, who had given a lecture in the Netherlands at the symposium on ethnic conflicts and human right violations in Europe, said in an interview with the periodical Vrij Nederland that the image of good guys and bad guys, which existed, for example, in Germany, was ‘of course’ ‘total nonsense’. The difference was that the Serbs possessed the greatest firepower, because of their links to the federal army. ‘But if other groups had gained the upper hand, exactly the same thing would have happened.’ He called Milosevic an opportunistic nationalist and Tudjman a fervent nationalist: ‘I don’t know which sort is the more dangerous.’ In late 1993 NRC Handelsblad correspondent Raymond van de Boogaard wrote in an anthology of articles from his paper: ‘scarcely have you started to feel a grain of sympathy or understanding for one of the parties to the conflict, before they too start to commit the most terrible crimes against the civilian population.’ He reserved his fiercest criticism for the ‘perfidious routine’ of the underdog parties - the Croats and Muslims - in attacking their ‘own’ people for propaganda purposes and to provoke intervention by the West.⁵¹⁸⁰

Not everybody agreed with these arguments. In late June De Volkskrant published an article by Ian Traynor entitled ‘Muslims still keeping their hands clean’ which clearly distanced itself from the view that all the parties were equally guilty of atrocities. ‘Most informed observers on the ground agree that with their detention camps, mass rapes, siege and starvation tactics, and the systematic and deliberate targeting of civilians, the Serbs are in a class of their own,’ wrote Traynor.⁵¹⁸¹ He claimed that there was little evidence for crimes committed by Muslims, and a great deal of evidence for crimes against Muslims. He agreed with the conclusions of Human Rights Watch that genocide was being committed against them. However, Payan Akhavan of the UN Centre for Human Rights warned that: ‘The Muslims have refrained from systematic ethnic cleansing, because they realize that this is fatal for a multi-ethnic state. But that self-control is disappearing, because they realize that they must now gain ground and keep it. They are losing their faith in the multi-ethnic society, which is why we could now start to see atrocities being committed by Muslims on a much larger scale.’⁵¹⁸²

One month later José Maria Mendiluce, who had worked since October 1991 as the special representative of the High Commissioner for Refugees to coordinate all humanitarian assistance from the UNHCR in the former Yugoslavia, questioned the view that all the parties were equally guilty. To describe the conflict as complicated would be ‘a perverse distortion of the facts. It is in fact quite simple: this is not an ethnic war and there are not three parties.’ He described the situation as one of a country with a government whose goal was multi-ethnicity and which was, at the same time, under attack from two sides whose goal was to take areas away from it and to make them ethnically cleansed states. In respect of the crimes committed there was ‘a world of difference’ between the Croats and Serbs on the one hand and ‘my Bosnian friends’, in other words all the people, including non-Muslims, ⁵¹⁷⁸ Moreel dilemma Kooijmans: wellicht instemmen met slecht vredesplan (‘Kooijmans’ moral dilemma: likely agreement to a bad peace plan’), ANP, 02/09/93, 18:44.

⁵¹⁷⁹ W.L. Brugsma, De cultureel-morale staat van de mens (‘The cultural state of mankind’), HP/De Tijd, 11/06/93, p. 64.

⁵¹⁸⁰ Raymond van de Boogaard, De vele gedaanten van een burenmoord (‘The many faces of kill thy neighbour’), in: Van de Roer/Steketee (eds.), Vernedering, p. 134.

⁵¹⁸¹ I. Traynor, Muslims hebben nog altijd schone handen (‘Muslims still keeping their hands clean’), de Volkskrant, 25/06/93.

⁵¹⁸² I. Traynor, Muslims hebben nog altijd schone handen (‘Muslims still keeping their hands clean’), de Volkskrant, 25/06/93.

who had remained faithful to the Bosnian government on the other hand. Mendiluce therefore strongly objected to the Owen-Stoltenberg plan: Serbs and Croats would aim to establish separate zones and the Bosnian government did not want a Muslim mini state. Furthermore, partition into three mini states would lead to further ethnic cleansing. The international community would legitimize the 'Final Ethnic Cleansing'. He believed it was high time for the West to use military power against the ethnic cleansers, which he claimed was the only language they understood.⁵¹⁸³

In the Netherlands the Owen-Stoltenberg plan was greeted with considerable distaste. A good example was the reaction of Righart, who had already expressed opposition to America's acceptance of a partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina along ethnic lines in an article in HP/De Tijd on 25 June :

'By accepting ethnic cleansing we have returned to a state of pure fascist barbarism. The so-called partition of Bosnia along ethnic lines implies the triumph of the law of the jungle, and must only herald the start of even more murder and misery. The next hotbeds will probably be Kosovo and Macedonia and it is only a question of time before we see ethnic cleansing in Russia and other parts of the former Soviet Union. And what kind of precedent will the Bosnian 'settlement' set for much older conflict situations in the world, such as in the Middle East or Northern Ireland? Who will dare to speak of morality in international politics after Karadzic and his Great Serbian murderous gangs have been so richly rewarded?'⁵¹⁸⁴

His article ended with an appeal to the United States, 'the last and strongest bastion of Western civilization in a world which is degenerating into the primitive violence of tribal wars': 'In short Mister President: where are the Yanks?'⁵¹⁸⁵

This was a rather unusual tone for the periodical, which until then had been extremely cautious in respect of intervention. It redressed the balance in August with an article by W.L. Brugsma. He rubbed the readers' noses in it that Colonel Duncan, of the British Institute of Strategic Studies, had expressed surprise in an interview with Nova that the Netherlands was the only country which had troops stationed in Bosnia and which was at the same time arguing for air attacks on Serbian positions. Brugsma also referred to a VPRO programme presented by Christoph Bertram in which an American, a Russian, a German and a Dutch general had advised against intervention in Bosnia. He criticized the Dutch daily newspapers which had accused Owen of weak-kneed politics against Karadzic. 'What a nice country we have: the Netherlands, the country of moral guidance. The best intentions. But just as Chamberlain, alias Lord Owen, would say: the road to hell is paved with good intentions.'⁵¹⁸⁶ He blamed Dutch interventionism on their lack of war experience. Based on the history of the last two centuries, the Netherlands was in the running for the 'world record in beating the retreat'. Countries such as Great Britain, France and Germany understood that a country should only deploy troops when its own vital interests were at stake, and not for the sake of human rights. Brugsma was not impressed by deployment for UN purposes: 'The exceptionally disunited United Nations contains a mixed bag of nice democrats alongside all sorts of riffraff ... it is a sort of bazaar in which changing coalitions barter with good intentions, bad intentions, aid and arms shipments '... 'a Minister of Defence who sends professional soldiers to Bosnia without there being any danger to our country itself, risks a reputation for committing peace crimes.'⁵¹⁸⁷ As to Dutch Members of Parliament, he accused them of playing games with an eye on the forthcoming elections by giving in to 'populist rage'. He was tempted to say ⁵¹⁸³ A. Bleich, 'Mensen in Sarajevo geven een schitterend voorbeeld' ('People in Sarajevo set a wonderful example'), de Volkskrant 29/07/93.

⁵¹⁸⁴ H. Righart, 'Meneer de president!' ('Mister President!'), HP/De Tijd, 25/06/93, p. 14.

⁵¹⁸⁵ H. Righart, 'Meneer de president!' ('Mister President!'), HP/De Tijd, 25/06/93, p. 14.

⁵¹⁸⁶ W.L. Brugsma, 'Wat weet dat deert' ('Ignorance is bliss'), HP/De Tijd, 27/08/93, p. 46.

⁵¹⁸⁷ W.L. Brugsma, 'Wat weet dat deert' ('Ignorance is bliss'), HP/De Tijd, 27/08/93, p. 46.

that war was too important to be left to politicians. ‘These days we have extremely sensible generals in the Netherlands and, almost without exception, they are against intervention in Bosnia.’⁵¹⁸⁸

In the same edition of HP/De Tijd the German essayist Hans Magnus Enzensberger argued passionately against sending peace missions to regions where civil wars raged: ‘The political costs are astronomical, the mandates are contradictory, the consequences are dubious.’ Peace missions could not remove the causes of civil wars. The governments which dispatch UN troops deny them their right to enforce their goals militarily. The question was what exactly politicians thought they could achieve with their ‘fantasies of omnipotence’ in all kinds of far-flung places where the dirtiest civil wars were being fought. ‘Even Christianity has always advocated helping ones’ neighbours, not those furthest away.’⁵¹⁸⁹

In late July Vrij Nederland decided to do another round of experts, in this case 19 academics, mainly in the field of international relations and international law, and three retired generals. The general tone was that the Netherlands could do nothing on its own. At the same time it was clear that, with the exception of France, the major countries were backing off. Few of them supported military action. And, even if that had been possible, it was probably already too late. It was now better to settle for humanitarian aid and supplying arms to the Muslims, which would give them the right to defend themselves so that a new balance could be created in Bosnia. Only a few of the experts talked about the Safe Areas. R.Th. Jurrjens, lecturer in international relations at the Vrije Universiteit in Amsterdam and vice chairman of the CDA (Christian Democrat) working group on Central and Eastern Europe, was against continuation of the enclaves in any form. Siccama, senior lecturer in war history in Utrecht, took the view that the ‘remaining reserves’ should be given the right to self-defence. Only the lecturer in human rights P.R. Baehr and Th. van Boven advocated implementation of the UN resolutions concerning the Safe Areas. Retired Brigadier General H.J. van der Graaf argued that both enforcing the no fly zone and the use of air support on behalf of the Safe Areas would be half measures which would only make the situation worse. Nor did he see any benefit in deploying thousands of ground troops to protect the Safe Areas: ‘nobody is saying this openly but none of us wants a major war about the Muslims in Bosnia.’⁵¹⁹⁰

A new round of interviews by Vrij Nederland, this time with eight generals shortly after it had been decided to dispatch the Airmobile Brigade, revealed little enthusiasm for military intervention in the former Yugoslavia. Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Reitsma stated that 18 months earlier military intervention might still have stood a chance. Now it was down to the politicians on the spot to find a solution. Lieutenant General Tjassens feared heavy losses: ‘Must we make Dutch mothers suffer because Yugoslavians filled with hate are killing each other?’⁵¹⁹¹ The ‘rounds’ showed that the Dutch press was increasingly emphasizing the internal political angles and paying less and less attention to the developments in the former Yugoslavia. Most journalists from other countries were also leaving Bosnia ‘because the war has been going on for so long, it’s just not interesting any more.’⁵¹⁹²

In the summer of 1993 Siccama observed that in each phase of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia the international community had attempted to rectify the errors made in the previous phase, an effort to catch up which, at best, did not make things any worse. Was it therefore not time for a moratorium on plans by the West, he wondered.⁵¹⁹³ At the end of June and with much gnashing of teeth - aggression seemed to pay - Ton de Kok accepted a three-way split of Bosnia, because this would probably create stable relations at last. He did not expect that the West would be capable of recruiting ⁵¹⁸⁸ W.L. Brugsma, ‘Wat weet dat deert’ (‘Ignorance is bliss’), HP/De Tijd, 27/08/93, p. 46.

⁵¹⁸⁹ Hans M. Enzensberger, ‘De barbarij van alledag’ (‘Everyday barbarism’), HP/De Tijd, 27/08/93, p. 65.

⁵¹⁹⁰ K. Colijn and P. Rusman, ‘Wat moet Nederland met “Joegoslavië”?’ (‘Why should the Netherlands bother about “Yugoslavia”?’), Vrij Nederland, 31/07/93, pp. 8-12. See also Philip Everts, ‘Er is wel een draagvlak voor geweld’ (‘There is support for violence’), Vrij Nederland, 07/08/93, p. 21.

⁵¹⁹¹ L. Ornstein, ‘Het gevaar van een Rambo-leger’ (‘The danger of a Rambo army’), Vrij Nederland, 20/11/92, p. 48.

⁵¹⁹² M. Smits, ‘Kate Adie, een “tough lady” in Bosnië’ (‘Kate Adie, a “tough lady” in Bosnia’), Vrij Nederland, 27/11/93, p. 27.

⁵¹⁹³ J.G. Siccama, ‘Nogmaals: ex-Joegoslavië’ (‘Once again: the former Yugoslavia’), Armex, July/August 1993, p. 5.

7000 men to protect the Muslims. Which is why he was not unsympathetic to lifting the arms embargo on the Bosnian government.⁵¹⁹⁴ People like Van den Doel and Oostlander were extremely negative about the Owen-Stoltenberg plan in the Dutch media. The plan was viewed as capitulation to the ethnic cleansers⁵¹⁹⁵ and as unfair to the Muslims. They were being given too little and, according to the writers, would not resign themselves to this forever, meaning that the plan would only give rise to instability in the long-term.⁵¹⁹⁶ Nonetheless, acceptance of the partition was implicit in some of the criticism; there was only criticism of what was considered to be an excessively small portion for the Muslims.⁵¹⁹⁷ The fiercest criticism was voiced by Michael Stein, editor of NRC Handelsblad, who, among other things, denounced Owen as he accepted the Dick Scherpenzeel journalism award. He believed that the Muslims had been offered an ‘Indian reservation chopped into little pieces’ by the Croats and Serbs and that, even worse, the West was putting them under pressure to accept it. Stein had clearly had enough of the Western ‘Pontius Pilate attitude’ and stated that it was fortunate the Americans had taken a different position during the Second World War. He handed over the prize money of NLG 5000 to Minister Pronk of Development Cooperation so that he could pass it on to the Bosnian government to help it buy arms to defend the state of Bosnia. Minister Pronk handed over the money to Sacirbey, quoting the Dutch government position on the arms embargo, and received assurances that the money would be put to good use.⁵¹⁹⁸ Hofland invited Minister Kooijmans to ‘persuade Lord Owen with all the diplomatic finesse he possesses that other functions in international diplomacy offer him a bright future’.⁵¹⁹⁹ EC Commissioner Van den Broek laid a great deal of blame at Owen’s door, labelling his diplomacy ‘a capitulation strategy’ which ‘legitimizes violence’.⁵²⁰⁰

In contrast, other people were resigned to the plan and hoped that it would in fact bring an end to the war. ‘In the last few weeks it has become quite the thing to denounce Lord Owen (...)’, Peter Michielsen wrote in NRC Handelsblad on 25 August, the day on which Kooijmans met with Owen and Stoltenberg. He believed that Lord Owen was being made a scapegoat for the actions of the warring factions and the guilty feelings of representatives of the international community who had done little up to that point. Owen should be praised because he worked from concrete opportunities and not from moral imperatives, wrote Michielsen.⁵²⁰¹ In an article entitled ‘The war is over, the spoils are divided’ a short time later, Michielsen wrote that Izetbegovic had insisted on a Bosnian unified state for 18 months, ‘a plan that was in fact already unrealistic before the war broke out in earnest in March last year, and which has only become more unrealistic since then with the military conquests by the Serbs

⁵¹⁹⁴ ‘Bosnië-Herzegovina’ (‘Bosnia-Herzegovina’), CD/Actueel, 26/06/93, p. 18.

⁵¹⁹⁵ A.C.A. Dake, ‘Bemiddelaars blameren EG’ (‘Negotiators accuse EC’), Het Parool, 09/08/93; Arie M. Oostlander, ‘Owen speelt het spel van het gewetenloze Engeland’ (‘Owen plays England’s morally bankrupt game’), Trouw, 01/09/93.

⁵¹⁹⁶ See for instance M. van den Doel, ‘Een schijnoplossing. Plan Owen-Stoltenberg maakt geen eind aan oorlog’ (‘A spurious solution: Owen-Stoltenberg plan won’t end the war’), Trouw, 05/08/93; B. Lanting, ‘Ethnische zuivering is ook geen ‘Realpolitik’’ (‘Ethnic cleansing is not “Realpolitik”’), Het Parool, 16/06/93. See also André Roelofs, ‘Beëindiging van strijd in Bosnië nog illusie’ (‘End to conflict in Bosnia still an illusion’), De Volkskrant, 15/07/93.

⁵¹⁹⁷ See also appendix Scholten, Ruigrok & Heerma, In Sarajevo wordt geschoten (‘Shots ring out in Sarajevo’), pp. 150-156.

⁵¹⁹⁸ For Stein’s speech see M. Stein, ‘Het Westen herhaalt in Bosnië het verraad van München’ (‘The West repeats Munich betrayal in Bosnia’), NRC Handelsblad, 23/06/93. See also S. Montag, ‘Overpeinzingen Michael Stein’ (‘Reflections of Michael Stein’), NRC Handelsblad, 26/06/93. At the time of writing Sacirbey was wanted by Interpol following Bosnian government allegations that he misappropriated large sums of money in his role as UN Permanent Representative.

⁵¹⁹⁹ H.J.A. Hofland, ‘Perspectief voor Lord Owen’ (‘Prospects for Lord Owen’), NRC Handelsblad, 25/08/95. See also H.J.A. Hofland, ‘Het “terecht” der realisten’ (‘The “correctness” of the realists’), NRC Handelsblad, 23/06/93; idem, ‘De onderwereld wint’ (‘The underworld wins’), NRC Handelsblad, 01/09/93.

⁵²⁰⁰ P. Michielsen, ‘Owen speelde Serviërs in Bosnië in de kaart’ (‘Owen plays into Serbian hands in Bosnia’), NRC Handelsblad, 28/08/93.

⁵²⁰¹ P. Michielsen, ‘De jacht op Lord Fraud maskeert het schuldgevoel’ (‘Hounding “Lord Fraud” masks guilt’), NRC Handelsblad, 25/08/93. For a comparable defence of Owen see Martin Woolcott, ‘The Demonizing of Dr Owen’, The Guardian, 13/08/93, which appeared in Dutch as ‘De onverdiende verguizing van David Owen’, de Volkskrant, 14/08/93. For an illustration of the criticism of Owen see André Roelofs, ‘De dokter en de psychiater’ (‘The doctor and the psychiatrist’), de Volkskrant, 12/08/93.

and the Croats and the wide-scale ethnic cleansing'.⁵²⁰² The editorial in the NRC Handelsblad on 22 July stated that Izetbegovic's one remaining option was to accept the partition of Bosnia:

'Continuing the armed struggle no longer serves any political purpose. The last enclaves' only chance of survival is when the fighting stops and the UN can resume the flow of humanitarian aid which is now staunch. The credibility of the international community is at an all-time low, but it is the only community which has something to offer the beleaguered people'.⁵²⁰³

Koen Koch wrote that the 'lamentations' of the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs had become 'futile' now that even Izetbegovic appeared to accept the partition: 'there is absolutely no point in continuing to strive for something which was still meaningful 18 months ago, but which is now meaningless in the totally changed circumstances'.⁵²⁰⁴

In early May 1993 more than half of the Dutch population was still in favour of military intervention by the international community in the crisis in the former Yugoslavia. However, the different surveys presented a range of diverse statistics. In a NIPO survey of 500 Dutch people commissioned by the AVRO, 75% of the respondents believed that the Western countries should intervene militarily to end the civil war in the former Yugoslavia. 80% said it was acceptable that, if the Netherlands sent troops, there might be casualties.⁵²⁰⁵ A telephone survey of 5600 people for KRO's Brandpunt programme showed that 60% of the Dutch population was in favour of military intervention in the former Yugoslavia. A similar amount, 56%, believed that Dutch troops should participate in such an intervention. The same percentage of people believed that military intervention would bring an end to the war.⁵²⁰⁶ Surveys of public opinion by the European Commission, the so-called Eurobarometer, in the same month showed that of the EU member states, the Netherlands was second only to Italy in the number of people favouring military intervention. The European average was 55% in favour and 28% against. In Italy the percentages were 64 and 21 respectively and in the Netherlands 62 and 24. The largest groups of opponents of intervention were found in Denmark (47% against) and Greece (50% against).⁵²⁰⁷

But a survey carried out in early September by the Studiecentrum voor Vredesvraagstukken (Centre for Peace Studies) of the Katholieke Universiteit Nijmegen (Nijmegen University) in collaboration with the NIPO showed that 53% of those surveyed considered partition of Bosnia-Herzegovina on ethnic lines to be acceptable. Only 15% were against and 32% claimed to have no opinion, which was a high percentage for a subject in which the category 'don't know' had definitely not been high in the previous two years. It appears that the Dutch population wanted to see a quick end to the war and no longer considered reversal of ethnic cleansing to be necessary. Pragmatism had triumphed over idealism, concluded the Head of the Centre for Peace Studies, L. Wecke.⁵²⁰⁸ The survey also showed that at least 42% of respondents believed that military intervention did not justify the death of a single Dutch soldier. Earlier surveys had revealed higher acceptance of possible casualties among the Dutch troops ⁵²⁰² Peter Michielsen, 'De oorlog is in feite voorbij, de buit verdeeld' ('The war is over, the spoils are divided'), NRC Handelsblad, 17/09/93. Compare A. Bleich, Gietelink, 'Bosnië heeft nooit bestaansrecht gehad' ('Bosnia has never had a raison d'être'), Trouw, 17/06/93.

⁵²⁰³ 'De laatste fase' ('The final phase'), NRC Handelsblad, 22/07/93.

⁵²⁰⁴ ⁵²⁰⁴ K. Koch, 'Bitter gelag' ('Bitter pill'), de Volkskrant, 25/09/93.

⁵²⁰⁵ 'Meer steun onder Nederlanders voor militair ingrijpen' ('More popular support in the Netherlands for military intervention'), ANP, 02/05/93, 12:59; 'Kok wil militair ingreep in Bosnië' ('Kok wants military intervention in Bosnia'), De Telegraaf, 03/05/93.

⁵²⁰⁶ 'Meerderheid bevolking voor militair ingrijpen' ('Majority of population in favour of military intervention'), de Volkskrant, 10/05/93.

⁵²⁰⁷ 'Meeste Europeanen voor militair ingrijpen in Bosnië-Herzegovina' ('Most Europeans support military intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina'), ANP, 24/05/93, 18:14; Van der Meulen, Verlangen, p. 3.

⁵²⁰⁸ Leon Wecke, 'Zodra er doden vallen...' ('Once soldiers start to die ...'), Trouw, 09/09/93.

participating. ‘The only conclusion that can be drawn from this survey is that there is no support in public opinion in advance for the risky imposition of a peace plan that has been agreed and which must put an end to a war situation.’⁵²⁰⁹

6. Conclusion

After the rejection of the Vance-Owen Plan, the wait-and-see attitude of Owen and Stoltenberg in respect of the contribution by the warring factions themselves allowed President Milosevic and President Tudjman to grasp the initiative and make a proposal for an extremely loose confederation. The Bosnian President Izetbegovic originally refused to negotiate on this basis, but because of the attitude of the West, including the American administration, he resigned himself to partition from mid-June. In addition, Izetbegovic was experiencing political difficulties at home. He had to be prepared to deal with the possible ambitions of Fikret Abdic, who was supported by Owen, and be careful not to be manoeuvred into an impossible position between those who were prepared to settle for a mini Bosnia and those who harboured greater territorial ambitions.

Finally, in July, Izetbegovic declared that he was willing to negotiate on a partition. However, various statements by the Bosnian President show that he was only prepared to agree to such a solution on a temporary basis. He kept the option open to extend the area over the long term. What could not be won at the negotiating table, would have to be conquered by force. Military and political reorganizations in Sarajevo in the summer and early autumn of 1993 seemed to follow this strategy. In the meantime that part of Bosnia under Izetbegovic’s command was developing increasingly into a one-party state under the SDA. The Islamic character of this mini state was also growing, although not too much emphasis was given to this for opportunistic reasons.

In the context of the discussions on a partition, a possible exchange of Srebrenica and the other eastern enclaves for the Serb part of Sarajevo was also discussed. After a delegation of the population of Srebrenica had opposed this, the subject was closed, although it came up again frequently. The West did not wish to propose such an exchange because of the negative publicity it would generate, and it was impossible for Izetbegovic and his circle to take a decision on this independently.

All in all, the peace plan which took shape in the summer of 1993 was certainly not the model of a just peace and did not square with the principles laid down by the London Conference one year earlier. Its supporters described it as being informed by realism and pragmatism. And this was precisely why Minister Kooijmans and his officials objected to it. Within the EC, however, the Dutch government position was only supported by Germany, but, in contrast to the government in The Hague, Bonn did not wish to disrupt the delicate negotiations. Although the American administration and the Belgian chair of the EC attempted to persuade the Dutch government to temper its criticism, this did not work. Owen and Stoltenberg were compelled to provide explanations to Kooijmans and his German opposite number Kinkel. Kooijmans and the rest of the Dutch government then quickly fell into line because, right from the start, they had no alternative to offer. Furthermore the Dutch government was in a weak position because it appeared to want to resist a solution which Izetbegovic and his government were resigned to by that time. None the less, the Dutch government continued to attach a qualification to its contribution to the peace plan. It first wanted to know how the warring factions would react to it. This gave the impression that the offer to send the Airmobile Brigade still seemed to be up in the air.

Whilst a gap between the government and organized public opinion seems to have arisen sometime earlier, in the summer of 1993 a greater gap seemed to develop between the government position and general public opinion in respect of the former Yugoslavia. In early September, the Head of the Centre for Peace Studies at Nijmegen University, Wecke, wondered whether the government was aware of this. Whilst opinion polls showed that the population was tending towards support for a pragmatic partition of Bosnia, the government in The Hague continued to oppose the injustice imposed on the Muslims by the Owen-Stoltenberg plan. Based on the same opinion poll, Wecke concluded that there was insufficient support among the Dutch population for Dutch participation in an implementation force for a peace agreement.⁵²¹⁰ However, a few days before Wecke wrote these words, Minister Ter Beek had offered an Airmobile Brigade to Boutros-Ghali on behalf of the Dutch government, which would possibly be deployed even before such a peace agreement had been made.

⁵²⁰⁹ Leon Wecke, ‘Zodra er doden vallen...’ (‘Once soldiers start to die...’), Trouw, 09/09/93.

If such a unit were to be deployed, it could end up being heavily dependent on the use of air power. In early August 1993 a new agreement had been reached on this issue between NATO and the UN after the American administration had even sought to exclude the UN entirely from decision-making in this matter. At that time major tensions were revealed, both between NATO and the UN, and within NATO itself. This did not bode well for the practical implementation of air operations.

⁵²¹⁰ Leon Wecke, 'Zodra er doden vallen...' ('Once soldiers start to die...'), Trouw, 09/09/93.

Chapter 13

Offering the Airmobile Brigade: August 1993 – November 1993

1. Presented with pride and accepted with gratitude

'I have stated previously (...) that military deployment needs to reflect clearly the objectives to be achieved. The political objectives should be the first priority. They should be formulated clearly and comprehensively. These political objectives will determine the required military resources, units, plans of operation and the like.'⁵²¹¹

He did not share their objections: Van der Vlis, Couzy and Ter Beek

The Dutch Minister Kooijmans of Foreign Affairs had been a strong advocate of the Safe Areas. After the Security Council designated Srebrenica as a Safe Area in Resolution 819 on 16 April, he had recommended assigning this status to other Muslim enclaves in international consultations. The higher echelons of the Ministry of Defence and the Royal Netherlands Army were less delighted with these so-called Safe Areas. On 22 November 1992, Chief of Defence Staff General Van der Vlis had listed his objections to safe havens on the television programme Het Capitool (see Chapter 8). In his view, their establishment would cross the line between peacekeeping and peace-enforcement, since protection meant protecting people on one side from people on the other side. About a hundred thousand military troops would be required. Their logistics would need to be managed in an area where guerrilla-style warfare was in progress. Because such a complicated situation demanded strong political resolve, it had to be handled by the major powers. Van der Vlis wondered whether such an operation was feasible without US involvement. Finally, he believed that the safe havens might be perceived as support for ethnic cleansing by the Bosnian Serbs. More than six months down the road, none of these arguments had become any less convincing following the Security Council adoption of resolutions 836 and 844, which established the concept of Safe Areas and determined the resources for this purpose. The military forces required according to Van der Vlis were far from being mobilized; the US government had refused to deploy ground troops for the Safe Areas; supplies for the Safe Areas were a serious problem due to resistance by the Bosnian-Serb authorities; the 'Safe Areas' were repeatedly fired upon; and military actions were launched from those areas because they were not fully demilitarized. Van der Vlis also doubted whether UNPROFOR could protect the Safe Areas. Barth, the head of the division of General Policy Affairs (DAB), agreed with him.⁵²¹²

Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Couzy did not feel that enough troops had been provided for the Safe Areas. He was under the impression that his counterparts in France and the United Kingdom wanted to withdraw their troops from the former Yugoslavia, since no prospects for resolving the conflict were apparent. Only the political leadership of their respective countries withheld them from doing so.⁵²¹³ This was why, as he later explained, he had felt the operation would be an impossible mission. He did not believe that the Netherlands should become involved in the operations in the former Yugoslavia for military reasons.⁵²¹⁴ Couzy had stated his objections to ⁵²¹¹ TK, 1992-1993, Proceedings p. 72. Minister Ter Beek, (16/09/92).

⁵²¹² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, p. 86.

⁵²¹³ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵²¹⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 60; interview with H. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98; NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. File 8c, besluitvorming uitzending luchtmobiele brigade (deciding about the deployment of an airmobile brigade), interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95.

participating in this conflict on several occasions. In late December 1992, he had said that if the Netherlands deployed F16s over Bosnia, the Dutch troops and observers there should be withdrawn (Chapter 8). A few weeks later, Couzy had described military intervention in the former Yugoslavia as ‘absolutely impossible.’ He believed that Western troops would be entering ‘another Vietnam.’ In March 1993 the commander noted that peace-enforcement might lead to ‘dozens of casualties’ among Dutch troops deployed there and doubted whether ‘a bunch of robber chiefs’ merited those Dutch lives (Chapter 10). In these last two cases, however, Couzy was referring to peace-enforcement. This was obviously different from Safe Areas, although those also entailed a measure of enforcement.

The problem for Couzy and Van der Vlis in conveying their objections to Minister Ter Beek was the Minister’s lack of political interest in whether or not the two generals approved of the idea of Safe Areas and its elaboration. Ter Beek, who was under enormous pressure from his peers in the government and the Parliament to do something for the former Yugoslavia, was interested primarily in whether Dutch troops to be deployed faced an acceptable risk. Both generals had assured Ter Beek regarding the issue of acceptable risks to ‘his’ people, which he considered crucial. They did not believe that the UN peacekeeping forces would be in serious danger in Bosnia.⁵²¹⁵ The minister did not care that neither of the two generals approved of the Safe Areas idea. Van der Vlis and Couzy had ‘consistently told [him] that the risks were acceptable. This is a separate issue and a different debate from the entire Safe Areas idea. My question to the commander and the Chief of Defence Staff was whether I could assume political responsibility for deployment, considering the risks to the personnel.’

Their affirmative response helped Ter Beek make up his mind.⁵²¹⁶

Van der Vlis had also objected to deploying the Airmobile Brigade in Bosnia. Back in mid-March, Minister Ter Beek had overruled him by instructing him to include the Airmobile Brigade in his inventory of units eligible for implementation of the Vance-Owen Plan. Prior to the debate about the White Paper on Defence Priorities, Van der Vlis had stated his objections in an interview with the morning daily Trouw (Chapter 11). A few days after the debate, on 23 May, Van der Vlis had stated once again on an NOS television broadcast that the Netherlands was willing to provide the UN with a logistic unit of 400 troops. He emphasized that the Netherlands would deliver combat units only after restructuring the Armed forces, when the military would consist of professional servicemen. During his television appearance, he also warned Parliament against undermining the essence of the Airmobile Brigade by purchasing cheap transport helicopters instead of expensive attack helicopters.⁵²¹⁷ Couzy’s main concern was that deploying the Airmobile Brigade too early might jeopardize the decision to purchase the attack helicopters, which might then be considered unnecessary.⁵²¹⁸ Or, as Ter Beek summarized the reluctance of Van der Vlis: ‘(...) perhaps we risk that if we go ahead with this battalion, it will prove to be a regular mechanized infantry battalion, and people will wonder why we need those expensive helicopters.’⁵²¹⁹ Van der Vlis’s view on this subject was not widely shared.⁵²²⁰ Neither Couzy’s deputy Major General Reitsma nor the Airmobile Brigade Commander Brigadier J.-W. Brinkman expressed this concern.⁵²²¹ The reason was not that Reitsma and Brinkman cared less about the Airmobile Brigade. Both were very eager for this division to prove itself in the former Yugoslavia.⁵²²² They believed that successful deployment of the brigade would be indisputable justification of its ⁵²¹⁵ On this issue, see the enlightening dialogue between Ter Beek and Couzy, Robijns, ‘Baas’, p. 16.

⁵²¹⁶ Robijns, ‘Baas’, pp. 16-17.

⁵²¹⁷ ‘Nederland heeft 400 man extra voor Bosnië’ (The Netherlands has an extra 400 men for Bosnia), Haagsche Courant, 24/05/93.

⁵²¹⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 53; Ibid., D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, p. 86; Ibid., hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 43; NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. File 8c, besluitvorming uitzending luchtmobiele brigade (deciding about the deployment of an airmobile brigade), interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95.

⁵²¹⁹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99. Ibid. in interview H.G.B. van den Breemen, 20/05/98.

⁵²²⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 53.

⁵²²¹ Interviews J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99; A.K. van der Vlis, 13/02/98.

⁵²²² Interviews H.G.B. van den Breemen, 20/05/98; J.Th. Bruurmijn, 07/07/99; H.J. Vandeweyer, 19/01/98; A.K. van der Vlis, 13/02/98.

existence. ‘With the government and the Parliament on the verge of important decisions regarding the purchase of helicopters for this brigade, much of the army was aware of this’, explained Minister Ter Beek. Moreover, successful deployment would enhance the Army’s reputation and consequently boost recruitment for the brigade.⁵²²³ Lieutenant General M. Schouten, commander of the First Army Corps, believed it would be ‘very bad’ for recruitment for the Airmobile Brigade if this unit ‘had come no further than the heath at Ossendrecht and a practice session in Greece after two and a half years.’⁵²²⁴ Reitsma felt that the helicopters would eventually be purchased anyway.⁵²²⁵ Barth also expected, as he said, that the deployment process would be self-sustaining in this respect.⁵²²⁶ Couzy, who shared several of Van der Vlis’s reservations regarding the deployment in Safe Areas, found the use of material arguments improper and did not support Van der Vlis on this issue.⁵²²⁷ Minister Ter Beek understood Van der Vlis’s concern but must have felt that this argument would fail to impress a government and parliament calling for greater military deployment.⁵²²⁸

Advocates and opponents within the Army of the ‘airmobile’ deployment

Notwithstanding the decision on principle that Cambodia would be for the Marines and the former Yugoslavia for the Army (Chapter 4), the different military services started to consider each other with envy, as the decision did not appear to be cast in stone. On the one hand, deployment of the Airmobile Brigade had been anticipated in Cambodia to relieve the third marine battalion. This battalion had been difficult to assemble⁵²²⁹ and was therefore known as the leftovers battalion⁵²³⁰ and had ‘reached the end of its tether’ in Cambodia.⁵²³¹ On the other hand, deploying a marine battalion to the former Yugoslavia for a few months (chapters 10 and 11) had been suggested as a possibility until the first Airmobile Battalion was operational. To avoid further cutbacks, the military services wanted to ‘raise their profile’⁵²³² and prove that they were each indispensable.⁵²³³ Moreover, the Marines feared that formation of the Airmobile Battalion might lead to ideas that the Marines should abandon or at least curtail its infantry duties.⁵²³⁴ According to Van der Vlis, the Army was convinced that its turn had come.⁵²³⁵ Continuing to use infantry without assigning any responsibilities to the Army would not be right. Concerns about the willingness of conscripts rendered only the Airmobile Brigade eligible for deployment.

The chief proponents of deploying an Airmobile battalion came from a group of officers that was zealously involved in reorganizing the Army: Deputy Commander Reitsma, who called himself the Jan Timmer of the Army in reference to the man assigned to revitalize the Philips Company⁵²³⁶; the ⁵²²³ Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 191.

⁵²²⁴ Interview M. Schouten, quoted in: Berghorst, ‘Opdracht’, p. 11.

⁵²²⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 45.

⁵²²⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, p. 86.

⁵²²⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 59. See also TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 53.

⁵²²⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 98.

⁵²²⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 52.

⁵²³⁰ Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 58.

⁵²³¹ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵²³² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 95. See also interviews P. de Gooijer, 01/07/99; H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵²³³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁵²³⁴ On this view, see e.g. Infantry Major General (rtd.) J.P.A. van Buuren, ‘Te land, ter zee en in de lucht’ (‘By land, sea or air’), Carré 15 (1992) 12, pp. 21-22. Previously, Ter Beek had notified Parliament that ‘agreements indisputably existed between the airmobile brigade and the marine corps, but that each one had ‘a distinctive, individual mission’’, TK session 1991-1992, 22 327, no. 2.

⁵²³⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 52.

⁵²³⁶ Leonard Ornstein, ‘Het gevaar van een Rambo-leger’ (‘The danger of a Rambo army’), Vrij Nederland, 20/11/93, p. 54.

First Army Corps Commander Schouten; and Airmobile Brigade Commander Brinkman.⁵²³⁷ Brinkman was a strong advocate of deploying his Airmobile Brigade. He believed deeply in the idea and aimed to ‘promote [his unit] and establish its reputation.’⁵²³⁸ Brinkman was the only one who later stated that he had not zealously supported the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade. He denied having lobbied in favour of deploying the brigade in 1999. He said that he regretted that the initial deployment of the brigade would not be airmobile but would concern a rather static conflict. ‘The child that was still growing up was simply thrown to the lions.’ He believed that this had thoroughly disrupted the training.⁵²³⁹ As will become clear below, however, Brinkman’s views had been different in the summer of 1993.

Some Royal Netherlands Army officers believed, as did some MPs, that the Airmobile Brigade was getting very expensive indeed, and that a lot of the armoured infantry was being eliminated as well. Moreover, they and others considered deploying armoured infantry units preferable to the Airmobile Brigade for peace operations in areas of turmoil.⁵²⁴⁰ Retired Brigadier General H.J. van der Graaf, for example delivered a lecture at the Stichting Maatschappij en Krijgsmacht (Society and Armed Forces Foundation) on ‘De Nederlandse krijgsmacht onder VN-vlag’ (Netherlands Forces under UN-command), in which he condemned the Airmobile Brigade. He considered it far too vulnerable in a war like the one in Yugoslavia. In a situation that was in between peacekeeping and peace-enforcement, classical armoured infantry was more appropriate. He opposed ‘perpetuating the vastly expensive Airmobile Brigade. Better to quit halfway than to become lost altogether!’ Van der Graaf believed that General Couzy, who had repeatedly got into trouble through his public statements himself, was silencing his people. Otherwise, Van der Graaf believed that officers in active service would be echoing his own views.⁵²⁴¹ Moreover, as stated in Chapter 10, Couzy as Deputy Army Commander had believed that the Airmobile Brigade idea was obsolete and had advocated forming a multifunctional brigade that would make optimal use of both the airmobile element and mechanized performance. Commander Wilmink had informed him, however, that for political reasons the Army had to insist ‘rigidly’ that the airmobile concept would also be very useful, even with the international changes.

Public debate did not thrive in the Army. This became apparent from the article by three majors of the armoured infantry in the September issue of Carré, the journal of the Netherlands Officers’ Association. The three authors seriously questioned the capabilities of the Airmobile Brigade.⁵²⁴² The editors explained that the article had originally been intended for the July/August issue of Carré but had been withheld at the request of the Airmobile Brigade Commander Infantry Brigadier General J.-W. Brinkman, pending simultaneous publication with a response article that he had written. The reason for this request was, considering that (political) decisions regarding (part of) the Airmobile Brigade were ⁵²³⁷ Interviews G.L.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; Ter Beek, 01/12/99; J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99 and R. Reitsma, 04/10/99; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 184.

⁵²³⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 60. See also the interview with Major E.A.W. Koestal, 24/05/00; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 44.

⁵²³⁹ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵²⁴⁰ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Memorandum ‘Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending’ (Interference in the decision to deploy), n.d. See also P.G.M. van Even, ‘Luchtmobiel naar Bosnië’ (Airmobile to Bosnia), Armex, 78(1994)3, p. 4.

⁵²⁴¹ SG. H.J. van der Graaf, ‘De Nederlandse krijgsmacht onder VN vlak. Draagkracht voor militaire missies. Organisatie, middelen en mentaliteit’ (The Dutch Armed forces under the UN flag. Support for military missions. Organization, resources and mentality). See also DJZ. Casteleijn to Ter Beek, 29/03/93, D93/158, with appendices. Verslag van de door de Stichting Maatschappij en Krijgsmacht georganiseerde conferentie ‘De Nederlandse krijgsmacht onder VN-vlag’ (Report of the conference organized by the Armed Forces and Society Foundation ‘The Dutch Armed forces under the UN flag’), 26/03/93.

⁵²⁴² M.C. de Kruif, H.J. Mayers and O.P. van Wiggen, ‘De luchtmobiele brigade: met beide benen op de grond’ (‘The airmobile brigade: with both feet on the ground’), Carré 16(1993)9, pp. 9-13.

being taken in this period, the desire to present the pros and cons of this sensitive issue simultaneously if possible.⁵²⁴³

The three majors mentioned the limited mobility of the airmobile infantry once grounded and the minimal means for continuation and resilience as the major weaknesses of the idea. Moreover, the Airmobile Brigade idea required a lot of infantry; only 36 attack helicopters were expected to be purchased. In this event, the limited number of attack helicopters would be used primarily for immediate firing support for the infantry. This would limit the action radius of the helicopters to a few kilometres and maximize the likelihood of detection. High consumption of munitions and fuel would limit the duration of deployment for the helicopters. Moreover, helicopters were extremely vulnerable to enemy air defence, planes and direct fire. In fact, planes would need to open an air corridor first before deployment of the brigade.

The authors assessed the value of the brigade for various forms of armed warfare. The first was securing or surveillance of an area by the airmobile infantry with patrols and observation posts. This situation resembled – unbeknownst to the authors at that time – the Srebrenica Safe Area, where three consecutive airmobile battalions would later serve. With a low level of force, according to the authors, surveillance would be possible across a relatively large area through helicopter reconnaissance flights. If the violence increased, the infantry would be able to secure only a small area. In the event of imminent confrontation with a larger hostile (mechanized) unit, the means for continuation and resilience would be insufficient. Possible helicopter evacuation of the infantry under enemy pressure would be ‘extremely perilous.’ The authors concluded: ‘With respect to security and surveillance of relatively large areas of land, where violence is imminent, other units of the Royal Netherlands Army would be more suitable, such as elements of the light brigade.’⁵²⁴⁴

In delaying or defensive combat operations, lack of protection would lead to ‘considerable losses’ on the part of the airmobile infantry, even on uneven terrain. Under these conditions the authors assumed that attack helicopters would participate in the battle, and that their presence or absence would be decisive for the strike force of the brigade. The tactical mobility (i.e. the ability to displace the infantry elements of the brigade across land) was poor, according to the authors, because of the vulnerability, the minimal firing ability and the lack of combat support. ‘This contrasts sharply with the state-of-the-art devices already abundant among the mechanized units of the Royal Netherlands Army.’ The three majors therefore proposed transforming the Airmobile Brigade into a standby 11th Mechanized Brigade and selecting an armoured infantry battalion of the brigade for potential airmobile deployment. Had the article been included in the July/August issue of Carré, it might indeed, as Brinkman anticipated, have promoted the debate over the Airmobile Brigade, albeit not in a manner to his liking. On 12 July Minister Ter Beek and Junior Minister A.B.M. Frinking, who had succeeded Van Voorst tot Voorst on 1 June, sent a letter to Parliament. In this letter they discussed the airmobile intervention idea extensively in connection with the decision to purchase helicopters for the brigade. They wrote that airmobile units could perform a wealth of tasks in a wide variety of situations: ‘They may, for example, be deployed effectively for humanitarian aid missions while securing and protecting Safe Areas.’ In the event of escalating warfare in which an airmobile unit was deployed – and according to the minister such escalation had occurred recently in Bosnia – it could be relieved by a mechanized unit. ‘Should continued deployment of the airmobile unit prove necessary under such difficult circumstances, then this unit will be equipped with armoured vehicles, known as UN vehicles, primarily for passive protection of the personnel.’⁵²⁴⁵

⁵²⁴³ The contents of the upcoming issue was announced in Perry Pierik/Marcel Reijmerink, ‘Nederland vertilt zich aan luchtmobiele brigade’ (‘The Netherlands bites off more than it can chew with airmobile brigade’), de Volkskrant, 26/08/93.

⁵²⁴⁴ M.C. de Kruijff, H.J. Mayers and O.P. van Wiggan, ‘De luchtmobiele brigade: met beide benen op de grond’, Carré, 16(1993)9, p. 11.

⁵²⁴⁵ TK session 1992-1993, 22 327, no. 13, p. 4.

In his response to the article by the three majors, Brinkman submitted that the armaments of the Airmobile Brigade did not differ substantially from those of the armoured infantry.⁵²⁴⁶ The main difference with respect to their equipment was that the armoured infantry was armoured and had a YPR-765 25 mm gun, unlike the Airmobile Brigade. If the Airmobile Brigade were assigned passive tasks and a limited mandate that excluded authorization to fire, as was the case with peacekeeping, several armoured ground vehicles could simply be added. Brinkman admitted that without armour the brigade would be vulnerable during long-term static deployment. Mechanized units were therefore better suited for holding ground. Brinkman concluded his article, which was not very convincing, with an appeal to stop blocking 'progress' and ended with: 'Majors, get your feet off the ground and come round!'⁵²⁴⁷

The tone conveyed perfectly Brinkman's zealous support for his brigade. A former staff member of the Operations Division of the Royal Netherlands Army remembered how in late 1993 he had growled at two journalists that they had better not express any reservations about the brigade. When the brigade became an issue, he was said to have written to the NRC Handelsblad under a pseudonym.⁵²⁴⁸ In January 1994, two officers of the Airmobile Brigade project desk, Lieutenant Colonel R.J.M. Veger and Major E.F.W. Bleeker, announced in De Telegraaf that criticism from the army about the brigade would be unwelcome. After all, public debate about such criticism might affect parliamentary decisions.⁵²⁴⁹

The switch

In early July Deputy Military Advisor Koestal at the Dutch Permanent Representation in New York had explained to DPKO that the Dutch government would probably be unable to realize the offer made a few weeks earlier of a logistic unit of 400 troops (Chapter 11). On 9 July the Defence Staff informed Minister Ter Beek that adding a staff contingent of sixty to a hundred troops might exceed the previous ceiling of 220 troops. This was still nowhere near 400, without even providing for substitutes. Therefore, according to the Defence Staff, all energies at that point 'were dedicated primarily toward meeting the need stated by the UN and were not focused on contrived numerical provision of 400 men.'⁵²⁵⁰ In July, a planning mission for a 'logistic battalion (minus)' for the Safe Areas was still under development.⁵²⁵¹ In mid-July, however, the departure of a reconnaissance mission for the unit was postponed.⁵²⁵²

By June the Army understood not only that it would not or would hardly be able to gather the 400 troops required for a logistic unit. Even if this effort were somewhat successful, deployment of scarce logistic personnel would compromise the restructuring of several important units, including the Airmobile Brigade.

⁵²⁴⁶ J.W. Brinkman, 'Reactie op "De luchtmobiele brigade met beide benen op de grond?"' (Response to "The Airmobile Brigade: with both feet on the ground"), Carré 16(1993)9, pp. 14-15.

⁵²⁴⁷ A subsequent response reflected a similar note: Major E.F.W. Bleker of supply and displacement troops and Lieutenant Colonel R.J.M. Veger of the Engineering Corps, 'De Luchtmobiele Brigade: met beide benen op de grond', Carré 17(1994)1, pp. 19-20. They considered publicly debating internal army issues unwise, since the politicians had already embraced the airmobile concept; such a course might jeopardize parliamentary discussions about army equipment. The authors hoped that their response would 'point everybody back in the right direction', Ibid., p. 20.

⁵²⁴⁸ M. Reijmerink, 'Voorluisteren naar de generaal' ('Listen to the general, whatever you do'), Algemeen Dagblad, 15/06/95. See also M. Reijmerink & P. Pierik, 'Bij defensie dienen alsnog koppen te rollen' ('Heads should still roll at Defence'), de Volkskrant, 02/09/95.

⁵²⁴⁹ In De Telegraaf of 18/01/94, according to a reference in De Boode, 'Vrijheid' (Freedom), p. 217.

⁵²⁵⁰ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memo from Waltmann to Ter Beek, 09/07/93.

⁵²⁵¹ DCBC, 2327. Intern memorandum van de Directie Operatiën van de KL (Internal memo from the Operations Division of the Royal Netherlands Army), 06/07/93; DCBC, 413. OZ, M.J.H. Bevers to Maj. Scheffer, 22/07/93, 1530B, no. 93/228; DCBC, 412. OZ, Bevers to Scheffer and Bakx, 27/07/93, no. 93/237.

⁵²⁵² 'Verkenningmissie nog niet naar voormalig Joegoslavië' ('Reconnaissance mission not yet off to former Yugoslavia'), ANP, 13/07/93, 17:39.

On 9 August the NRC Handelsblad ran an article about the Airmobile Brigade. In this item, Siccama and former Defence Ministers Van Mierlo and Stermerdink described the idea as costly and obsolete. In the same article, Brinkman asserted that the Royal Netherlands Army needed to use this unit in the heat of international conflicts, 'or you're not worth tuppence'.⁵²⁵³ In the same issue, an editorial appeared critiquing the Airmobile Brigade and calling for a cost-benefit analysis to examine the 'motives, recommendations and conclusions concerning the army's showpiece'.⁵²⁵⁴ On 10 August, the day after the two critical articles about the Airmobile Brigade were published in the NRC Handelsblad, the Defence Staff members met with the staff of the Army's situation centre to discuss what the Army could provide. The caustic commentary alleging that the Airmobile Brigade was extremely costly but yielded few returns, which the NRC Handelsblad had published the previous evening, cast a shadow over the deliberations.⁵²⁵⁵

By 23 June Minister Kooijmans had informed the Parliament that offering the Airmobile Brigade instead of a logistic unit for the Safe Areas might be better at some point. This idea became increasingly appealing for various reasons. The Parliament and press needed to be shown that the Airmobile Brigade was cost-effective. A logistic unit was difficult to mobilize.

A few days after Boutros-Ghali's official request for a 'maintenance and repair unit',⁵²⁵⁶ Colonel Van Veen sent word from New York that the UN wanted to reconsider the planned composition of the unit. In addition to the recovery unit offered, the UN now wanted transport capacity, a salvaging unit and the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee for traffic management.⁵²⁵⁷ On 18 August this was communicated in writing in a message to the UN secretariat.⁵²⁵⁸ These needs were hard for the Netherlands to meet, since the Dutch transport units already claimed such logistic capacity.⁵²⁵⁹ This request meant that the Netherlands was expected to provide mechanics for equipment from the former East German army, which was to be allocated to a Pakistani battalion.⁵²⁶⁰ Hardly an attractive offer. The Dutch military troops would apparently serve as maintenance and repair workers for the Pakistani battalion, although they were not familiar with the equipment used. Most likely, this situation would lead to almost daily complaints.⁵²⁶¹ Reitsma had long believed that a logistic unit would fail to provide the Netherlands with the international recognition that the Airmobile Brigade would yield.⁵²⁶² The requirement stated by the UN was therefore, according to a concerned unnamed decision-maker, a 'blessing in disguise'⁵²⁶³: it offered the Dutch government an unsolicited way out of its previous offer.

This happened during the summer, when both Van der Vlis and Couzy were on holiday. Their deputies were aware of their objections to the operations in the former Yugoslavia in Safe Areas and deployment of an airmobile battalion, especially the ones that Van der Vlis had expressed in March during his inventory of the units available for deployment to the former Yugoslavia.⁵²⁶⁴ Van der Vlis had other specific objections to the combination of an airmobile battalion and deployment in a Safe Area.⁵²⁶⁵ He considered the mobile unit unsuitable for patrols with armoured vehicles as an armoured infantry unit and occupation of observation posts. He was also concerned about supplying the Dutch ⁵²⁵³ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, NRC Handelsblad, 09/08/93.

⁵²⁵⁴ 'Rode baretten' ('Red berets'), NRC Handelsblad, 09/08/93.

⁵²⁵⁵ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99; Berghorst, News, p. 64.

⁵²⁵⁶ CRST. CSKL 1993, Dutch participation, Boutros-Ghali to UNPR, 05/08/93.

⁵²⁵⁷ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memo from Barth and Van den Breemen to Ter Beek, 17/08/93, D93/326; interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵²⁵⁸ ABZ, DDI/DPV/00209, D'Ansembourg to Kooijmans, No. 823, 18/08/93; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 125.

⁵²⁵⁹ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memo from Barth and Van den Breemen to Ter Beek, 17/08/93, D93/326.

⁵²⁶⁰ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵²⁶¹ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵²⁶² Interview R. Reitsma, 04/10/99.

⁵²⁶³ According to an anonymous respondent in Wolberink, Luchtmobiel, p. 23. Cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 125.

⁵²⁶⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 53.

⁵²⁶⁵ Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 13.

units in enclaves.⁵²⁶⁶ Couzy did not find the risk unacceptable: ‘Foreign units had been present for some time. Why should it be all right for them but not for our soldiers?’⁵²⁶⁷ This last argument, as will become clear, was just as effective at luring the Dutch troops into Srebrenica as the Dutch politicians who had urged that more be done in the former Yugoslavia at international gatherings and through letters to foreign counterparts.

Van den Breemen and Reitsma, deputies of Van der Vlis and Couzy, respectively, were more favourably disposed to deployment of the Airmobile Brigade.⁵²⁶⁸ They believed that the time had come to refuse, now that the UN had specified the need for the logistic unit. Barth advocated notifying Minister Ter Beek upon his return from his holiday on 17 August that the request from the UN was impossible to grant. Van den Breemen, ‘a true political general’,⁵²⁶⁹ understood that outright refusal would be unacceptable. Such a response would send an international message that the Dutch government had been insincere in New York and Copenhagen. Van den Breemen reviewed the memos that Van der Vlis had written in March and April. Over the months that had elapsed, the extended wait before deployment of the Airmobile Brigade had all but resolved itself. A solution was available for the armoured vehicles as well. The only remaining obstacles to deployment of the Airmobile Brigade were Van der Vlis’s political-strategic objections. Van den Breemen was convinced, however, that these objections could not withstand the immense political pressure in the Netherlands to deploy more troops for the peace operation in Bosnia.⁵²⁷⁰ On 13 August Schouten drafted a memo in which he proposed offering the UN airmobile battalion rather than the logistic unit.

Barth and Van den Breemen wrote a joint memo to the minister.⁵²⁷¹ In this document, they started to explain that providing a logistic unit of 400 troops was ‘even more problematic’ than anticipated. They reminded the minister of the inception of the offer and wrote that on the eve of the summit in Copenhagen where the Dutch government had disclosed the offer, the minister had discussed with Kooijmans that it was highly uncertain whether this offer could be realized. Ter Beek was said to have explained to his counterpart in Foreign Affairs that guaranteeing a tailor-made unit was extremely difficult when the tailor himself was unaware of the sizes and tastes of his clients, and that the supply of willing conscripts had been virtually depleted. Lubbers and Kooijmans had nevertheless made the offer ‘for political reasons.’ Because the moment of deployment of the – impossible – logistic unit was now so close to the point that the first airmobile battalion might be operational, Barth and Van den Breemen proposed offering the battalion together with its own logistic support. This would yield an expanded battalion of 900 to 1,000 troops. Such a battalion, equipped with YPR armoured vehicles, might be ready for deployment in early 1994. It would comprise 500 to 550 infantrymen, and the remainder would be support personnel. The minister would present the new offer to Boutros-Ghali during his visit to the UN Secretary-General on 7 September. Finally, the authors of the memo assumed that the Safe Area operation would soon be converted into implementation of a peace settlement.⁵²⁷²

According to Reitsma, he had not been consulted directly while Van den Breemen and Barth’s memo was being drafted.⁵²⁷³ He assumed that the Defence Staff and the Crisis Staff of the Royal Netherlands Army had been in touch. He did not remember whether he had attended the Army staff ⁵²⁶⁶ Kreemers, ‘Aan de achterkant van de maan’, p. 15.

⁵²⁶⁷ Kreemers, ‘Aan de achterkant van de maan’, p. 15.

⁵²⁶⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 61.

⁵²⁶⁹ Van Brouwershaven, Turbulentie, p. 154.

⁵²⁷⁰ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. ‘Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending’, n.d.

⁵²⁷¹ According to an interview H.G.B. van den Breemen, 22/09/99, the drafters were Waltmann & Vandeweyer. NIOD, Coll. Vandeweyer. However, contains a Log-airmb file with an undated and incomplete memo to Van den Breemen (mediated by Waltmann) about deployment of a logistic unit and/or airmobile brigade battalion, in which the switch is proposed.

⁵²⁷² NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memo from Barth and Van den Breemen to Ter Beek, 17/08/93, D93/326.

⁵²⁷³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, p. 41. Cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 125.

meeting on 10 August.⁵²⁷⁴ Admittedly, the contact with the Army staff had not been with Reitsma himself but with Brigadier General G.J.M. Bastiaans, the deputy head of Army Operations.⁵²⁷⁵ Nor did Reitsma see why Couzy should be surprised about the switch upon returning from holiday. ‘No, it was a concretization of previous analyses that were assessed according to their consequences,’ such as the equipment and the training programme (see Part II, Chapter 5).⁵²⁷⁶ Couzy vehemently disagreed: ‘Of course, there were analyses, but both of them – Van den Breemen and Reitsma – were well aware that their respective bosses felt entirely differently.’⁵²⁷⁷ Still, Couzy did not blame Reitsma. After careful consideration, Couzy believed that the situation would have been the same, even if he had not been away on holiday. The government pressure had been too strong to accuse Van den Breemen and Reitsma of attempting a coup.⁵²⁷⁸ Couzy’s only reservation about deployment of the Airmobile Brigade was that such a new unit was being deployed very early indeed.⁵²⁷⁹

Upon returning from his holiday to the ministry on 17 August, Ter Beek found the memo from Barth and Van den Breemen on his desk. That evening, the minister discussed the pros and cons of this recommendation with them over dinner.⁵²⁸⁰ After consulting Couzy, Reitsma and Schouten, Ter Beek took a decision. That very week, according to his statement, he proposed to Lubbers and Kooijmans and the Ministerial Council, which was meeting almost continuously to draft the budget at that point, that they present the UN with a new offer.⁵²⁸¹ Lubbers, Kooijmans and Pronk were delighted with the idea, according to Ter Beek.⁵²⁸² The objectivized versions of the minutes of the Ministerial Council do not reveal that Minister Ter Beek informed the plenary Ministerial Council during this period, although the former Yugoslavia or Bosnia did figure in the deliberations on 19, 24/25 and 26 August.⁵²⁸³ According to these documents, he did so only on 3 September, the day after the Parliament was notified. Based on the objectivized version of the minutes of the council from that date, Ter Beek reminded those present about the previous offer of a logistic unit of 400 troops for the Safe Areas. He subsequently mentioned that Resolution 836 had yet to be implemented, and that the UN now required more from the Dutch government. A few days later, he therefore made an offer to the UN on behalf of the Dutch government of the airmobile battalion with its own logistics component for a peace settlement.⁵²⁸⁴

The day after Ter Beek’s return to the Ministry of Defence, an amended version of Barth and Van den Breemen’s memo was generated, which Ter Beek submitted to Kooijmans in the margin of the Ministerial Council only nine days later on 27 August.⁵²⁸⁵ The purged memo did not mention the problems with recruiting a logistic unit of 400 troops. The criticism about the premature offer of this unit during the European Council of Copenhagen was deleted from the memo as well.⁵²⁸⁶ In the morning of 20 August, Ter Beek and Junior Minister Frinking met with MP Henk Vos (the PvdA spokesman for the Defence budget) and Thijs van Vlijmen (the CDA expert on Defence material). At this occasion, Ter Beek reported that they probably discussed that deployment of the Airmobile ⁵²⁷⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, p. 42.

⁵²⁷⁵ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Memorandum ‘Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending’, n.d.

⁵²⁷⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 43.

⁵²⁷⁷ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵²⁷⁸ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 61.

⁵²⁷⁹ Interviews F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00; H.G.B. van den Breemen, 20/05/98.

⁵²⁸⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 99; interview with A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵²⁸¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 99.

⁵²⁸² Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 193.

⁵²⁸³ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 19, 24/25 and 26/08/93.

⁵²⁸⁴ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council, 03/09/93. Cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 127.

⁵²⁸⁵ ABZ, DDI/DPV/00209, memo from Barth and Van den Breemen to Ter Beek, No. D93/P/1273, 18/08/93; ABZ, ABZ, DDI/DPV/00209, memo from DAV and DPV to Kooijmans, DAV/MS-198/93, 30/08/93.

⁵²⁸⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 126.

Brigade in Bosnia would not affect the purchase of the helicopters.⁵²⁸⁷ In other words, Ter Beek tried to alleviate one of Van der Vlis's deepest concerns regarding the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade.

Couzy later asserted that upon returning from holiday he and Van der Vlis had spoken with the minister about their objections to the switch. According to Couzy, the minister had refuted all the arguments the two general raised. At one point, the minister asked Couzy whether he felt there were any prevailing security risks. Couzy said that he did not think there were. He mentioned that the sides in the Bosnian conflict generally avoided harming UN troops.⁵²⁸⁸ Ter Beek vehemently denied to the Bakker committee that any such conversation ever took place. He had to control himself when confronted with Couzy's statement. According to Ter Beek, Couzy 'apparently missed his calling as a novelist.'⁵²⁸⁹

Whether or not Couzy was present, Van der Vlis's return from his holiday on 24 August was a time of 'considerable upheaval,'⁵²⁹⁰ when Van der Vlis learned that Ter Beek had already initialled the letter from Van der Breemen and Barth and had arranged for General Bastiaans to travel to Zagreb to discuss the new offer in the margin of a conference of troop-contributing nations. Van der Vlis subsequently concluded 'that a point of no return had been reached.'⁵²⁹¹

Foreign Affairs and Defence at odds over the purpose of the offer to the UN

On 23 and 24 August, General Bastiaans did indeed attend a gathering of troop-contributing nations in Zagreb chaired by Kofi Annan. Bastiaans had been instructed to inform Annan that the Netherlands would be unable to supply the recovery unit that the UN desired. He was not authorized to tell Annan any more at the time. According to his own report of the meeting, his statement was roughly as follows:

'Discussions continue regarding the composition of the Dutch logistic unit. The Netherlands is presently exploring several options outside the logistic area as well. The Dutch government will consult the UNSG about this in the week of 7 September. The possible point of elaboration depends on the option selected, ranging from early November until the first half of January 1994.'

In response to Annan's question about what the options were, Bastiaans stated that he was not authorized to disclose them.⁵²⁹²

In a private conversation with Briquemont (Bastiaans insisted that Briquemont's aide be excluded), he did, however, offer prospects of an airmobile battalion.⁵²⁹³ On 30 August the directors of Political UN Affairs (DPV) and Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs (DAV), Hoekema and Majoor, mentioned in a White Paper to Kooijmans that Ter Beek would speak to him again in the margin of the Ministerial Council about the offer of a battalion of the Airmobile Brigade. They feared 'partners and public' might think that the Netherlands was reneging by withdrawing the offer of a logistic unit for the Safe Areas. Several DAB staff members shared this concern.⁵²⁹⁴ They noted that both the offer and the objective had changed. Ter Beek's offer was valid for the Safe Areas as well as for a peace settlement. An offer ⁵²⁸⁷ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵²⁸⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 61.

⁵²⁸⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 99. Cf. TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 126.

⁵²⁹⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 61. Cf. interviews with A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00 and H. Couzy, 04/10/01; NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. 'Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending', n.d.

⁵²⁹¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 53.

⁵²⁹² DCBC 1665. Note from Bastiaans to Ter Beek, 27/08/93.

⁵²⁹³ Interviews G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; F. Briquemont, 22/06/00; DEF 492, S93/061/2700, Note from Bastiaans to Ter Beek, 27/08/93; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 126.

⁵²⁹⁴ ABZ, DDI/DPV/00209, memorandum from DAV and DPV to Kooijmans, DAV/MS-198/93, 30/08/93; interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

concerning a peace settlement elicited objections at Foreign Affairs. At the end of his conversation with Owen and Stoltenberg, Kooijmans had expressed reservations about this very subject. In their White Paper, Hoekema and Majoor therefore mentioned four conditions for possible Dutch participation in a peace settlement, assuming there was one, since this seemed rather doubtful.⁵²⁹⁵

The next day, 31 August, Ter Beek had a letter drafted in which he informed Boutros-Ghali of the offer of the Airmobile Brigade and withdrew the one of a logistic unit of 400 troops. In his draft letter, Ter Beek offered to implement a peace settlement. The letter was not a carte blanche, however, but mentioned that the Dutch government wanted to know the details of the peace settlement and the mandate that would apply first. Nonetheless, the Dutch government was making the offer, according to the letter, to encourage other countries to pledge to contribute and thus to increase the pressure on the sides in the conflict.⁵²⁹⁶ The relationship with the Safe Areas was not considered. The draft letter was presented to DPV for transmission.

While Foreign Affairs was undoubtedly delighted that even Defence was casting the Netherlands as a catalyst, the switch in the purpose of the offer was unfortunate. The Dutch government had zealously supported the Safe Areas all along. At the European summit in Copenhagen, the Netherlands had offered a logistic unit for the Safe Areas to encourage other EU Member States in the hope of gathering the 7,600 troops that Boutros-Ghali deemed necessary. Less than a week earlier, Minister Kooijmans had expressed several reservations about the peace plan presented by Owen and Stoltenberg. Even with all the ifs, ands and buts in Minister Ter Beek's letter, the Dutch government's position at the vanguard with an offer for a peace settlement was remarkable, given that it had been the sole agent in international circles to question the settlement.

Foreign Affairs therefore blocked the draft letter.⁵²⁹⁷ Some have alleged that the letter was not sent because Foreign Affairs felt that only their ministry was authorized to correspond with the UN in New York, although this view had been somewhat undermined by assigning a military advisor to the permanent representation in New York and Dutch military officials in the DPKO.⁵²⁹⁸ The two ministries definitely competed with one another.⁵²⁹⁹ Nonetheless, sufficient intrinsic reasons were available for preventing dispatch of Ter Beek's letter, precisely because it referred to a peace settlement rather than to the Safe Areas. According to Hoekema, the opinion at Foreign Affairs was that this sensitive issue needed to be talked through between the two ministries first.⁵³⁰⁰ Little seems wrong with that position. A DPV staff member was said to have notified DAB staff member F.J.J. Princen that the letter would not be sent, when Princen brought Ter Beek's letter to Foreign Affairs (on 2 September).⁵³⁰¹ That same day, Hoekema, Majoor and deputy DEU chief Hattinga van 't Sant advised Kooijmans not to send the letter. Instead, they recommended that he consult Ter Beek and send detailed instructions to Permanent Representative Biegman in New York. According to the White Paper from the three division heads, Kooijmans had personally stated that he did 'not know of a letter and did not want such a letter to be sent.' The first and simplest argument from the division heads was 'that the Ministry of Defence cannot take matters into its own hands (via the Perm. Rep. New York) and send a letter about an important foreign policy issue to the UNSG.' The substantive justification

⁵²⁹⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, II, J.Th. Hoekema to TCBU, 05/06/00, p. 60.

⁵²⁹⁶ ABZ, PVNY. Peacekeeping/Yugoslavia/UNPTOFOR/Dutch participation, December 1991-November 1995, Ter Beek to Biegman, 31/08/93, D93/145/24304, with appendices. Ter Beek to Boutros-Ghali, 31/08/93; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of D.J. Barth, 31/05/00, p. 87.

⁵²⁹⁷ See note 'not sent' on ABZ, PVNY. Peacekeeping/Yugoslavia/UNPROFOR/Dutch participation, December 1991-November 1995, Ter Beek to Biegman, 31/08/93, D93/145/24304, with appendices. Ter Beek to Boutros-Ghali, 31/08/93.

⁵²⁹⁸ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵²⁹⁹ See also the appendix about Defence.

⁵³⁰⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.T. Hoekema, 24/05/00, p. 71.

⁵³⁰¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.T. Hoekema, 24/05/00, p. 71; interview with F. Princen, 08/01/98.

for this recommendation was the political risk associated with the withdrawal of the offer for the Safe Areas.⁵³⁰²

All available information suggests that Barth was informed that Ter Beek's letter would not be sent on. Seven years later, Barth no longer remembered whether Minister Ter Beek was notified as well. Substantiating documents were lacking, except for the words 'no longer necessary' in the margin of the section where Minister Kooijmans was advised to consult his counterpart at Defence in the recommendation from the three division heads to the minister.⁵³⁰³

In their advice to Kooijmans, the three division heads continued to insist that the Dutch play a role in the Safe Areas, especially because they did not believe that the Netherlands should automatically commit to a peace settlement of which the content was unknown.⁵³⁰⁴ On 2 September Minister Kooijmans instructed – 'also on behalf of my counterpart at Defence' – Biegman to offer a battalion of the Airmobile Brigade as of January 1994 in keeping with the current UN resolutions, especially Resolution 836 (i.e. for the Safe Areas).⁵³⁰⁵ He added that if these Safe Areas were eventually included in a peace settlement, new consultation would become necessary about the battalion's possible deployment and task.

At this point the substance of such a peace settlement was rather uncertain. On 1 September the talks had been suspended in Geneva, as the Bosnian delegation felt that its territorial demands were receiving insufficient consideration. Prior to issuing these instructions, Foreign Affairs consulted Barth about their content. Besides Barth, Van den Breemen was also aware of the code issued by Foreign Affairs. Both pertained to the group that accompanied Minister Ter Beek a few days later on his trip to New York, where he told Boutros-Ghali again about the offer at the UN headquarters. In his statements to the Bakker Committee in 2000, Barth assumed that Minister Ter Beek had been informed about this code.⁵³⁰⁶ Ter Beek's group included Hoekema, who was also aware of this code. In New York Biegman's deputy J.M.V.A. Count de Marchant et d'Ansembourg, joined the group, which had complied with the instructions in the code and had reported to The Hague about the relevant conversation with Boutros-Ghali's military advisor General M. Baril. So when Ter Beek went to the UN headquarters, he was accompanied by four people who knew that instead of Minister Ter Beek's letter to Boutros-Ghali different instructions had been sent by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which according to the text came from the Minister of Defence as well. The main difference was that the Safe Areas had replaced a future peace settlement as the deployment objective.

Minister Ter Beek told the Bakker Committee that he had learned from this committee only in 2000 that his letter of 31 August 1993 had never been sent. He had become aware of the contents of the code of 2 September with instructions to D'Ansembourg 'only later.'⁵³⁰⁷

D'Ansembourg had been the one to carry out the instructions of 2 September because Permanent Representative Biegman was on holiday at the time. As was standard practice in this situation, D'Ansembourg conveyed the instructions in a White Paper.⁵³⁰⁸ On 3 September he notified The Hague that he been unable to speak with Boutros-Ghali or Undersecretary-General Annan at short notice. He had therefore presented the Dutch offer to General Baril. In the code that D'Ansembourg sent to The Hague, he wrote that Baril believed the Dutch offer of an extensive battalion of 1,100 troops would put the total offers for the Safe Areas above the 7,600 troops required

⁵³⁰² ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from DPV, DAV and DEU to Kooijmans, 02/09/93, no. DPV-2095/93.

⁵³⁰³ ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from DPV, DAV and DEU to Kooijmans, 02/09/93, no. DPV-2095/93; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, II, D.J. Barth to TCBU, 25/05/00, p. 44 and 05/06/00, pp. 56/57, Ibid., J.Th. Hoekema to TCBU, 05/06/00, pp. 60-61. See also TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 128.

⁵³⁰⁴ ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from DPV, DAV and DEU to Kooijmans, 02/09/93, no. DPV-2095/93.

⁵³⁰⁵ Def. DCBC, Kooijmans to Biegman, No. 242, 02/09/93.

⁵³⁰⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, II, D.J. Barth to TCBU, 05/06/00, p. 57; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 130.

⁵³⁰⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, p. 100.

⁵³⁰⁸ TK session 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 149, p. 11; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of N.H. Biegman, 29/05/00, p. 187.

for the light options of the Safe Areas.⁵³⁰⁹ The UN thus assumed that the Dutch offer was for the Safe Areas.

Any disappointment that might have existed at the UN regarding the cancellation of the offer of a logistic unit was basically alleviated by the fact that the Dutch battalion would arrange its own logistics. The battalion would be self-sustaining. This was why the battalions of the Airmobile Brigade, which would ordinarily consist of about six hundred men, now comprised eleven hundred troops.

Because the press learned on 27 August of the offer of the airmobile battalion as of 1 January – i.e. that the Troops Commando Corps would supply a reconnaissance platoon for the Airmobile Brigade to be deployed in Bosnia in early 1994⁵³¹⁰ – Kooijmans confirmed this on 2 September, the very day the instructions were issued to D’Ansembourg in a meeting with the standing parliamentary committee for Foreign Affairs. The phrasing of the meeting report does not specify clearly whether Kooijmans said the offer was for a peace settlement or for the Safe Areas. The minister reported that the figure of 7,500 troops for the Safe Areas had been revised. Regarding the offer of the Airmobile Brigade, his statement in the record reads: ‘In that case there should obviously be a settlement for implementation that has yet to be evaluated by the Netherlands.’ This statement suggests that Kooijmans still assumed deployment for a peace settlement. He also reported that the UN would prefer something from the Netherlands other than the logistic unit of 350 troops offered for the Safe Areas. The report seemed to suggest that this offer was being replaced with a unit that was additional to the offer of the Airmobile Brigade, in part because of the words attributed to the minister: ‘There will be consultation on this subject.’⁵³¹¹ The contribution to the debate from Kooijmans was ‘without much qualification,’ as Barth wrote in a memo to Ter Beek, who had not attended the deliberations in Parliament.⁵³¹² The qualifications to the ministers concerned were either unclear or totally irrelevant. This was already apparent from the remarks by Minister Ter Beek that the offer was being made to the UN, and that the demand to be met depended on the current political situation. According to the objectivized version of the minutes from the Ministerial Council of 3 September, it was discussed at the meeting that Minister Ter Beek would offer Boutros-Ghali the airmobile battalion a few days later with a view toward a peace settlement. This statement was not contradicted.⁵³¹³

An offer without conditions

A few days later Minister Ter Beek departed for New York with a few advisors. According to Crisis Staff Chief F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, the crisis staff and Couzy had talked about the need for the Netherlands to impose conditions on the deployment of the Dutch battalion. The cases mentioned included the Norwegian battalion (which was to be deployed only in Tuzla) and the Spanish battalion (which was only to be deployed in Mostar). The crisis staff urged the Netherlands government to waste no time in claiming deployment of the Dutch battalion in Central Bosnia, as close as possible to Busovaca near the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion. This would facilitate logistics considerably. Also for logistic reasons, the battalion should avoid ending up in a Safe Area. According to Couzy, the specific intention was to avoid having the battalion stationed in Srebrenica.⁵³¹⁴ Another condition was that the battalion was not to be dispersed under any circumstances. For all Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse knew, Couzy and Reitsma had also discussed these conditions with Ter Beek. Moreover, he had ⁵³⁰⁹ DCBC. D’Ansembourg to Kooijmans, No. 917, 03/09/93.

⁵³¹⁰ ‘Commando’s bereiden zich voor op verkenningsstaken in Bosnië’ (‘Commandos prepare for reconnaissance assignment in Bosnia’), ANP, 27/08/93, 11:12; ‘Commando’s Roosendaal gaan verkenningsacties uitvoeren in Bosnië’ (‘Roosendaal commandos to carry out reconnaissance in Bosnia’), De Stem, 27/08/93. See also Pieter Nijdam, ‘Joego-actie voor de rode baretten’ (‘Action in Yugoslavia for the red berets’), De Telegraaf, 02/08/93; ‘Ter Beek stelt nieuwe landmacht-eenheden beschikbaar’ (‘Ter Beek makes new army units available’), ANP, 02/09/93, 10:13.

⁵³¹¹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181 no. 61, p. 8.

⁵³¹² TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 127.

⁵³¹³ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 03/09/93.

⁵³¹⁴ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01; NIOD, Coll. Kremers. Interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95.

communicated the basic conditions to Colonel Van Veen, his predecessor as Crisis Staff Chief and military advisor to the Permanent Representation at the UN.⁵³¹⁵

Couzy later said that he did not feel comfortable about imposing conditions concerning the location before the decision to provide a unit. He had communicated this position to his staff as well. Moreover, he claimed that in the conversation that he and Van der Vlis had upon returning from their respective holidays with Minister Ter Beek – the conversation that had never taken place according to Ter Beek – the deployment had been an unresolved issue. According to Couzy, this was primarily because Ter Beek kept asking questions throughout this conversation, such as about their assessment of the risks.⁵³¹⁶ He had subsequently been notified by Van der Vlis that the minister was en route to Boutros-Ghali with the offer of the Airmobile Brigade. At that point, Couzy must have understood that the Ministerial Council had taken a decision, or at least that Lubbers had allowed Ter Beek to proceed. By then, it was obviously too late for Couzy to disclose the conditions.⁵³¹⁷

This course of events is improbable. First, whether such a conversation ever occurred as Minister Ter Beek has stated remains questionable. Second, Van der Vlis understood perfectly well following the conversation he had after his holiday ‘that a point of no return had been reached’ with respect to the decision to offer the airmobile battalion. And would Couzy not have been aware that his deputy Head of Operations Bastiaans had already presented this offer in Zagreb to General Briquemont, the UNPROFOR II commander? It thus appears that Couzy never communicated the conditions desired by the crisis staff to the Ministry.

Stating the conditions prior to providing a unit for a peace operation is extremely important. Ordinarily with peace operations, matters such as intervention, location and duration are agreed before a unit is provided. Transferring operational control means authorizing a UN commander to deploy units at his discretion in accordance with the agreed mission, resources and geographic restrictions. Deviating from the agreed objectives requires consultation with and approval from the nation supplying the troops.

In early 1995, B. van Lent, Esq., of the Judicial Affairs Division at the Ministry of Defence wrote in the Militair Rechtelijke Tijdschrift:

‘The Dutch government is able (and has an obligation) to impose conditions for provision of troops. These conditions may, for example, concern the objective and conditions of personnel deployment, preservation of criminal jurisdiction, financial aspects and the like. Such conditions are to be included in an agreement with the United Nations. Failure to comply with these conditions should lead the provision [of troops] to be revoked...’⁵³¹⁸

In 1979 the Parliament had severely reprimanded the contemporary Minister of Foreign Affairs C. van der Klaauw for providing an armoured infantry battalion for the UNIFIL operation without stipulating conditions.⁵³¹⁹ During the war in Yugoslavia, the Dutch had already encountered serious difficulties a year before Ter Beek offered an airmobile battalion due to the Dutch government’s failure to impose conditions concerning the area of their deployment. As a result, Dutch UNMOs were deployed exclusively in Bosnia (which was more dangerous) rather than in Croatia (where a ceasefire was in effect).⁵³²⁰ During this same period, the Dutch government proved perfectly capable of imposing ⁵³¹⁵ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵³¹⁶ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵³¹⁷ Interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98; NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95.

⁵³¹⁸ B. van Lent, ‘Command and control’ in VN-vredesoperaties’ (‘Command and control’ in UN peacekeeping operations’), Militair-Rechtelijke Tijdschrift 88(1995)1, p. 21.

⁵³¹⁹ Vos, Altaar, pp. 71, 73, 77-78.

⁵³²⁰ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

conditions, when it blocked realization of the transport unit offered for deployment in Bosnia, because its conditions had not been met, especially with respect to protection for the drivers.

On 7 September Minister Ter Beek, accompanied by Barth, Van den Breemen, Kreemers, Ter Kuile, Hoekema, D'Ansembourg and Colonel Van Veen, visited Boutros-Ghali at the UN headquarters. The UN Secretary-General, who had arrived from Europe by Concorde two hours earlier, opened the conversation with a wide range of subjects: discussions about the oil boycott against Iraq, extradition of Libyan suspects in the Lockerbie case, the Dutch contribution to UNTAC (the UN operation in Cambodia), the support for the Kalshoven Committee with a contingent of fifty troops, the location of the Yugoslavia tribunal to be established and ways to finance peace operations. First, Ter Beek raised the issue of the standby forces for the UN, which was current at the time. He then offered a battalion of the Airmobile Brigade 'for the Safe Areas,' according to D'Ansembourg's report of the meeting. Ter Beek mentioned very approximate figures of about a thousand troops and forty armoured vehicles.⁵³²¹ In the forty-minute conversation, only five minutes were devoted to the offer of the battalion.⁵³²²

According to the minister, Boutros-Ghali responded that this was 'very good news.'⁵³²³ In his response, the Secretary-General mentioned his recent conversation with NATO Secretary-General M. Wörner, 'which had also covered the force of troops required to implement the peace accord' that he hoped would be reached the next week in Geneva. He also noted that after three exercises, the response time for air strikes (including the go ahead that he had to issue) had been reduced to one hour. After discussion of a few more items, the conversation ended.⁵³²⁴

During the conversation, Ter Beek did not associate any conditions with deployment of the battalion.⁵³²⁵ He later stated that he had considered this unnecessary in such a formal conversation, since he assumed the Secretary-General would duly consider his letter of 31 August.⁵³²⁶ This letter had never been sent. Moreover, in September 1993 Ter Beek expected a peace settlement to be reached in the near future.⁵³²⁷ Because the offer was made without conditions, however, Ter Beek believed that the UN could assume afterwards 'that the Netherlands would also be willing to deploy this unit to protect the Safe Areas.'⁵³²⁸ Ter Beek saw no alternative. In June the Dutch government had offered 400 troops for the Safe Areas. Now that he was offering 1,100 troops instead, Ter Beek felt that he could hardly prohibit their use for the Safe Areas.⁵³²⁹ Later on, Van den Breemen did not recall whether the Safe Areas had been mentioned during the conversation. He believed that it had been assumed during the conversation that a comprehensive peace settlement would soon be forthcoming.⁵³³⁰ At Ter Beek's request, Van den Breemen visited the peace operations department at the UN to elucidate the new Dutch offer.⁵³³¹ Once again, no conditions were stated.⁵³³² Basically, the offer had been made for the Safe Areas and was unconditional.

The day after his visit with Boutros-Ghali, Ter Beek went to Washington, where he met with Perry and Lake. The American Defence Secretary and the National Security Advisor were delighted with the Dutch offer. They considered it an excellent step toward establishing a force for implementing ⁵³²¹ Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 17.

⁵³²² Interview J.Th. Hoekema, 05/03/98.

⁵³²³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵³²⁴ DCBC, NYPR D'Ansembourg to Kooijmans, No. 925, 07/09/93.

⁵³²⁵ Kreemers, 'Brigade', Spring of 1994, p. 25; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 101 and hearing of D.J. Barth, 31/05/00; interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵³²⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 100.

⁵³²⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 101.

⁵³²⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 104.

⁵³²⁹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁵³³⁰ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Memorandum 'Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending,' n.d.

⁵³³¹ NIOD, Coll. Van den Breemen. Memorandum 'Bemoeienissen met het besluit tot uitzending,' n.d.

⁵³³² CSKL 1993. Dutchbat planning mission, Col. H.A.J. Bokhoven to Crisis staff CLF, 1035B, no. 93/350, 24/09/93, with appendices: H. Purolo, Note for file, 07/09/93.

a peace treaty.⁵³³³ Apparently, Ter Beek had assumed, as described in Chapter 12, that the offer had been made to the UN, which could deploy the battalion at its discretion. This could depend on the prevailing political circumstances. If a peace agreement was reached soon in Bosnia, the battalion could be deployed for this purpose. In the weeks following Ter Beek's visit with Boutros-Ghali, Foreign Affairs appears to have been in a state of confusion as well. This ministry, which in late August had objected to the letter that Ter Beek intended to send the UN Secretary-General on the grounds that the offer was not for the Safe Areas but for implementation of a peace settlement, now assumed that Ter Beek had offered the airmobile battalion to carry out a peace settlement.⁵³³⁴

2. Deterioration of international relations

Shortly after Ter Beek's offer of the Airmobile Brigade to Boutros-Ghali, however, two developments had major consequences for the setting in which the Dutch battalion would have to operate. While the peace negotiations had been suspended shortly before Ter Beek's visit to New York, Owen and Stoltenberg assumed that a treaty was still on the cards. The prospects for the Invincible Plan still appeared good, until it was effectively rejected by the Bosnian Parliament in late September. This course of events eliminated the possibility that the battalion would be deployed for implementing a peace treaty for the time being. Deployment to the Safe Areas was the only option left. Still, with a few months to go before the battalion's scheduled deployment, some believed that much could change and might enable the battalion to be deployed for a peace plan nonetheless.⁵³³⁵ Basing the military planning on this option, however, was not realistic. More likely scenarios included deployment to one of the six Safe Areas or a security assignment elsewhere for humanitarian aid to those areas.

Following the failure of the Invincible Plan, Owen and Stoltenberg started drafting a new plan targeting an integral solution for all problems in the former Yugoslavia rather than in Bosnia-Herzegovina alone. Negotiations with the parties in Bosnia continued during the final months of 1993. The Bosnian Muslims claimed areas in Western and Eastern Bosnia, where the majority had been Muslim before the war, while the Bosnian Serbs wanted the Posavina corridor to be broadened.

Van der Vlis later reported that he and Ter Beek felt that after the Bosnian Serbs⁵³³⁶ had rejected the peace plans, the Netherlands was no longer bound by its offer to provide the UN with an airmobile battalion for the time being either. Van der Vlis reversed the connection established in Resolution 836 between the Safe Areas and a peace settlement. Now that prospects for the peace settlement had disappeared for the moment, he felt that 'the Safe Areas concept had become a serious problem.'⁵³³⁷ In his memoirs about his term as a minister, Ter Beek has written that he, too, thought that deployment of the airmobile battalion had been called off for the moment.⁵³³⁸ Of course, the Dutch government was not in a position to simply withdraw its commitment.

On 5 November the German and French governments presented a plan to Willy Claes as the president of the European Union – as the former EC became known from 1 November onward – allocating the Bosnian Muslims three or four percent more land than they would have received under the Invincible Plan, or one third of the territory in the republic.⁵³³⁹ The plan also aimed for a modus vivendi between the Croatian government and the Croatian Serbs. If the Serbs co-operated with the plan's implementation, the sanctions against Serbia would gradually be lifted. Following approval from ⁵³³³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99; Ter Beek, Manoeuvreren, p. 193; 'VS zien belangrijke rol Nederland in vredesmacht Bosnië' ('US sees important role for the Netherlands in Bosnian peacekeeping force'), ANP, 09/09/93, 17:04; 'VS zien Nederland als voorbeeld voor sterke Europese bijdrage' ('US sees the Netherlands as example for strong European contribution'), ANP, 09/09/93, 23:57.

⁵³³⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 133.

⁵³³⁵ See e.g. Tromp, Verraad, pp. 87 (26/09/93) and 90 (11/10/93).

⁵³³⁶ He must have been referring to the Bosnian government.

⁵³³⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 54.

⁵³³⁸ Ter Beek, Manoeuvreren, p. 194.

⁵³³⁹ ABZ, NYPR. Juppé and Kinkel to Claes, 05/11/93, appendices at DGPZ to New York PR, 09/11/93.

the rest of the European Union, this plan became known as the EU action plan. It was supported by the Dutch government,⁵³⁴⁰ which had consistently advocated more land in its efforts to achieve a fair peace settlement following the turn of events concerning the Owen-Stoltenberg Plan in late August. The support from the Dutch government may also have been motivated by the fear of international isolation, now that the German government had also changed its position, and the US government was expected to approve the plan as well.⁵³⁴¹ At a General Affairs Council of the EU on 22 November, Kooijmans acknowledged that the London principles were no longer an option.⁵³⁴² Nonetheless, the plan failed due to resistance from the Bosnian and – surprisingly – the US governments.

Once it had adopted this position, the Dutch government nevertheless tried to get the Clinton administration to support the plan. Without a peace settlement, a humanitarian emergency was imminent during the winter in Bosnia. The US government in Washington, however, was unwilling either to pressure Sarajevo or to lift the sanctions against Serbia.⁵³⁴³ On 9 December, in the margin of a meeting of the NATO Defence Planning Council, Ter Beek tried in vain to convince his US counterpart Les Aspin to provide troops for implementing the peace settlement. The Safe Areas were intended only as a ‘temporary arrangement’ pending a definitive settlement.⁵³⁴⁴ Also at Foreign Affairs, especially at DEU, there was a sudden drive to do away with the Safe Areas. Kooijmans seemed to understand that the longer the Safe Areas existed, the more anomalous they would become; ‘you need to embed them in a plan.’⁵³⁴⁵ The Safe Areas appeared to be an obstacle to a definitive peace settlement. Moreover, the Bosnian government was suggesting to the Netherlands, its ‘friend’ and ‘closest ally’ in the EU, that it would be amenable to an exchange of territory that also comprised the Eastern enclaves.⁵³⁴⁶

The problem was that neither the Bosnian government nor any of the Western governments would dare broach the idea in public of giving up the Eastern enclaves.⁵³⁴⁷ This would have brought moral discredit upon the West. The Netherlands tried to raise the matter discreetly at a CoPo council on 6 December 1993 but did not achieve any tangible results. Without US support and given the ongoing warfare of the Bosnian government, the EU Action Plan was doomed. Nevertheless, Kooijmans continued his efforts to convince the Americans until late January 1994, as the Dutch battalion would otherwise end up in an anomaly.

On 3 October, a few days after the Bosnian Parliament definitively rejected the Invincible Plan, an operation failed in Mogadishu in which the US elite unit the Rangers had attempted to arrest two officers of the local war lord Mohammed Farrah Aidid. Toward the end of the Bush administration on 9 December 1992, 1,800 US marines landed in Mogadishu. This action was part of a UN peace mission aimed at humanitarian objectives. It was the first time that US ground forces participated in such an operation.⁵³⁴⁸ The mission failed and changed from peacekeeping to peace-enforcing. The mounting violence forced Bush’s successor Clinton to deploy 400 Rangers. The abortive US operation yielded 18 American casualties and 78 injured. Total dead and injured Somalis probably exceeded 500. The presence of cameras enabled the entire world to witness the corpse of an American serviceman being dragged through the streets. The operation was the fiercest exchange of fire involving American soldiers since the Vietnam War. Its conclusion traumatized the American public once again. In late March 1994 the US troops were withdrawn from Mogadishu, and the entire UN mission was subsequently dismantled.

⁵³⁴⁰ P.H. Kooijmans, ‘Grimmig kaartspel’ (Gruesome card game), Het Parool, 08/12/93.

⁵³⁴¹ Both, Indifference, p. 168.

⁵³⁴² Both, Indifference, p. 169.

⁵³⁴³ Both, Indifference, p. 169.

⁵³⁴⁴ Both, Indifference, pp. 169-170.

⁵³⁴⁵ Interview Kooijmans, in: Both, 1999 version, p. 253, no. 87.

⁵³⁴⁶ Both, Indifference, pp. 170-171.

⁵³⁴⁷ Cf. Both, Indifference, p. 171.

⁵³⁴⁸ See e.g. Cees Homan, ‘Interventie in Somalië: het failliet van de “nieuwe wereldorde”’ (Intervention in Somalia: the bankruptcy of the ‘new world order’), Interchurch Peace Council/Pax Christi working group, Interventie, pp. 48-61.

Even during the weeks preceding the events in Mogadishu, the United States adopted considerable reserve toward the UN peace operations.⁵³⁴⁹ On 23 September 1993 at the National War College in Washington, D.C., Albright disclosed a list of five questions that the US government needed to ask before agreeing to support the UN peace operation:

Is there a genuine threat to international peace and security? Are the objectives of the proposed mission clear, and is their scope identifiable? Is a ceasefire in effect, and have the parties consented to the presence of UN troops? Are the required financial resources available? Can an end to the operation be defined? Four days later, Clinton repeated these questions in a speech before the UN General Assembly and indicated that he intended to make it harder for the United Nations to proclaim peace missions: ‘The United Nations simply cannot become engaged in every one of the world’s conflicts. If the American people are to say yes to UN peacekeeping, the United Nations must know when to say no.’⁵³⁵⁰

Following the incident in Mogadishu, Washington decided to stop getting dragged into ‘operation creep,’ in which the objectives changed from peacekeeping to peace-enforcing.⁵³⁵¹ Although the Rangers had not been under UN command in Mogadishu, Washington, eager to identify a scapegoat, reported it would never again place American troops under UN command. The US government became highly critical even of UN operations in which the US did not participate. Henceforth, the so-called Mogadishu line determined the American disposition toward the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. Washington’s new reluctance toward peace operations was formulated in May 1994 in Presidential Policy Directive (PPD) 25, which demanded a clear objective, a chain of command acceptable to Washington, adequate resources and an operation of limited duration. In addition, there had to be a clear relation to American interests and sufficient chance of success. American troops would be deployed only where necessary for the operation to succeed.⁵³⁵² At any rate, Washington did not want the United Nations to become ‘a dumping ground for conflicts that the warring factions themselves lack the will to resolve.’⁵³⁵³

Not only was the US government deeply impressed by the events in Mogadishu. Within the United Nations the fiasco instigated doubt as to the prudence of the trend of doing more than with conventional peace operations that had emerged in the early 1990s. General willingness to resort to violence for UN operations diminished.⁵³⁵⁴ Even if a peace settlement were reached in Bosnia-Herzegovina in the short term, the likelihood that the US government would be willing to supply troops had dwindled.

The failure of the Invincible Plan and the changed US attitude toward peace operations were not cause for the Dutch government to reconsider the offer that Ter Beek had made to Boutros-Ghali. As Minderhoud said: ‘That would have an embarrassment! It would have been like saying ‘Yes, but the car crashed. I won’t drive anymore.’

3. Preliminary reconnaissance

Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse was shocked when Colonel Van Veen called him soon after Minister Ter Beek’s visit to Boutros-Ghali and informed him that the offer of deployment of the airmobile battalion had been unconditional.⁵³⁵⁵ He intended to launch a reconnaissance mission to Bosnia straight away.

⁵³⁴⁹ Cf. interview G. Ward, 01/12/00.

⁵³⁵⁰ Haass, Intervention, p. 17. Cf. Shawcross, Evil, p. 122; John MacKinlay, ‘Problems for U.S. Forces in Operations Beyond Peacekeeping’, Lewis (ed.), Peacekeeping, p. 30.

⁵³⁵¹ Cf. the interview J.A. Schear, 30/11/00.

⁵³⁵² For a concise account, see ‘Clinton Administration Policy’; M. Nishihara, ‘Japan-U.S. cooperation in U.N. peace efforts’, Harrison/Nishihara (eds.), UN Peacekeeping, p. 164.

⁵³⁵³ Anthony Lake, ‘The Limits of Peacekeeping’, The New York Times, 06/02/94.

⁵³⁵⁴ Michael N. Barnett, ‘The Politics of Indifference at the United Nations and Genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia’, Cushman & Mestrovi (eds.), Time, pp. 151-152.

⁵³⁵⁵ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

The day after Ter Beek offered the airmobile battalion in New York, Major F. Peermans, who was stationed as G3/Plans at B-H Command, informed the Dutch contingent commander Colonel M.J.H. Bevers with a view toward the upcoming visit from Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse that various options were available for deploying the Dutch battalion: helping secure freedom of movement for UNPROFOR in the Tarcin-Jablanica-Dreznica area; deployment in Zenica to stabilize the situation there, deployment in Sarajevo or in one of the Safe Areas at Bihac (together with a French battalion), Srebrenica or Gorazde.⁵³⁵⁶ On 13 September Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse wrote Couzy explaining that there were various options for deployment of the Dutch battalion. He listed only the first two. Why he did not indicate the other possibilities, which had been faxed to the Crisis Staff a few days earlier, remains unclear. The Chief of Staff wrote that he had elaborated both the options he mentioned and had informed General Schouten, commander of the First Army Corps, that he preferred Zenica.⁵³⁵⁷

Also on 13 September, Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse travelled to Bosnia for a few days with Lieutenant Colonel Chris Vermeulen, commander of the eleventh battalion of the Airmobile Brigade, which would be the first to be deployed. They were accompanied by Major E.R. Sinninghe of the 10th engineering corps combat group. At BH Command in Kiseljak, they inquired how and where the Dutch battalion would be deployed. Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse recalled that the BH Command G3 Operations officer, a French Canadian colonel, mentioned five deployment options to his Dutch guests: Zenica, Jablanica, Sarajevo, Visoko and Srebrenica. According to the White Paper that Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse wrote immediately following his return to the Netherlands on 19 September, Visoko was not listed, and Srebrenica had been mentioned together with Zepa.⁵³⁵⁸ The report drafted by Major Sinninghe a week later indicated the same.⁵³⁵⁹ The two travel reports deviated from what Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse later recalled in other respects as well. According to the White Paper, BH Command focused on the Zenica and Srebrenica/Zepa options.⁵³⁶⁰ Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse remembered the Canadian colonel that spoke with the Dutch battalion mentioning Srebrenica as a non-option: it would not happen. Dutchbat was most likely to be assigned to Zenica in Central Bosnia. The Dutch trio was told that the Bosnian Serbs would not allow them to travel to Srebrenica. As the area had been described as a non-option anyway, the urge to go there was also minimal, according to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse. The Dutch then considered the first four options. In Visoko, where Canadians were billeted, they also inquired about the situation in Srebrenica. Vermeulen is believed to have received a description of the situation, such as the location of the Canadian observation posts.⁵³⁶¹ J. Champagne, the officer who spoke with them, later stated that Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse and Vermeulen seemed disinterested in his explanation about the difficulties in Srebrenica.⁵³⁶² That impression might be corroborated if Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse was right with respect to his subsequent assertion that the G3 in Kiseljak had said that Srebrenica was a non-option. But if his immediate record of first impressions of 19 September 1993 are right, according to which the Zenica and Srebrenica/Zepa options were emphasized, this attitude is incomprehensible. After this reconnaissance, Vermeulen was certain that his battalion would be deployed to Central Bosnia.

‘There were about six options. It must be in writing, but I was unable to find it again. (...) Five were marked with plus and minus signs, but not the last one.

⁵³⁵⁶ CSKL 1993 Dutchbat planning mission, Maj. Peersman, Commitment of Dutchbat in Bosnia-Herzegovina, 08/09/93, appendix with Col. Bevers to CLF Crisis Staff, 1105B, no. 93/321, 09/09/93.

⁵³⁵⁷ CSKL 1993 Dutchbat planning mission, internal memorandum from CS Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff to CLF, 13/09/93.

⁵³⁵⁸ DCBC, Cabinet 13, File 3, First impression report of orientation visit to UNPROFOR by CS Dutch Army Crisis Staff morning paper, 1800, 19/09/93; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, p. 133.

⁵³⁵⁹ CSKL 1993, Internal memorandum from Sinninghe, 101 Engineering corps combat group, no. 10929, 27/09/93.

⁵³⁶⁰ DCBC, Cabinet 13, File 3, First impression report of orientation visit to UNPROFOR by CS Dutch Army Crisis Staff morning paper, 1800, 19/09/93; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, p. 133.

⁵³⁶¹ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵³⁶² Interview J. Champagne, 12/11/99.

That one was really not important. It was Srebrenica/Zepa. We had ‘BVTed’ about that one in advance in The Hague as well.⁵³⁶³ We were aware of a controversy among the staff in Kiseljak, between General Briquemont and his own staff. He kept saying that he wanted to send a unit, preferably the first one available, toward Srebrenica/Zepa.⁵³⁶⁴

Surely, this should have been cause for considering that option more seriously. The Royal Netherlands Army officers, however, continued to assume they would be deployed to Central Bosnia.

According to the logistic BVT that the Army officers compiled of Srebrenica/Zepa (see Part II, Chapter 5), the enclaves were too far apart for this option to be feasible. The Army called it the Michelin option because of the need to drive a hundred kilometre detour to reach Zepa.⁵³⁶⁵ That information made Vermeulen stop and think: ‘Darn, I hope they don’t screw me (...)!’⁵³⁶⁶ When the Dutch Major Peersman reported a few weeks later that the place assigned to the Dutch battalion was still unclear, and that the possible place of deployment kept changing,⁵³⁶⁷ those in charge of Defence became worried. Apparently, Van der Vlis was far less certain than suggested above that the Bosnian government’s rejection of a peace settlement allowed the Netherlands to withdraw its offer of an airmobile battalion.⁵³⁶⁸ On 8 October Van der Vlis wrote in a White Paper for the Political Council of the Ministry of Defence that the rejection of a peace settlement brought deployment for the Safe Areas closer than ever. In his White Paper the Chief of Defence Staff listed the four areas of deployment mentioned to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse and Vermeulen during their visit to Bosnia: Zenica, Srebrenica/Zepa, Tarcin/Jablanica and Sarajevo. He recommended pressuring UNPROFOR not to station the airmobile battalion in Srebrenica. Zenica was the preferred place of deployment.⁵³⁶⁹ In a White Paper to the Political Council, the Chief of Defence Staff wrote: ‘The Srebrenica/Zepa option, which UNPROFOR strongly prefers with the anticipated withdrawal of the Canadians in mind, will, due to the site’s inaccessibility, present major logistic problems for the battalion.’⁵³⁷⁰ On 11 October the Political Council of the ministry seconded this conclusion of the Chief of Defence Staff.⁵³⁷¹

By then, the Intelligence Section of the Army had teamed up with Section 2 (Information) of the Airmobile Brigade to compile accounts of the military installations such as barracks, practice sites, storage facilities for munitions and fuel and airports, as well as checkpoints, roadblocks and tunnels for all four potential deployment areas mentioned to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, Vermeulen and Sinninghe in mid-September. On 18 October this investigation was completed.⁵³⁷² On 26 October word arrived from New York from the military advisor Colonel Van Veen that the UN secretariat had assigned the airmobile battalion offered to Gorazde, Zepa and Srebrenica. UNPROFOR Commander Cot was considering a battalion subdivided into four companies. At least one company would operate in each area, leaving one company as an operational reserve for the battalion.⁵³⁷³

⁵³⁶³ ‘BVT’ stands for assessment of the situation.

⁵³⁶⁴ Interview Chr. Vermeulen, 09/06/99.

⁵³⁶⁵ Interview C. Haverhoek, 27/04/98.

⁵³⁶⁶ Interview Chr. Vermeulen, 09/06/99.

⁵³⁶⁷ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵³⁶⁸ See also Vandeweyer’s remark in Def. DCBC, memorandum from Vandeweyer to CDS, Update concerning deployment of the first airmobile battalion to former Yugoslavia, 30/09/93: ‘If no treaty is reached, the UN will undoubtedly revert to plans and offers made under previous resolutions.’

⁵³⁶⁹ NIOD, Coll.Ter Beek. Note regarding deployment of the first airmobile battalion to former Yugoslavia by Van der Vlis, 08/10/93, S93/061/3190; Van Aardenne-Van der Hoeven, TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, pp. 54 and 101.

⁵³⁷⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 54.

⁵³⁷¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 134.

⁵³⁷² R.B. Barend to various parties, 18/10/93, no. 26996/041093, with appendices. List of installations and military objects in Bosnia-Herzegovina (in possible deployment areas of 11 (NL) Airmbl Brig.).

⁵³⁷³ CRST. CSKL 1993, Dutchbat planning assignment, Biegan to Kooijmans, No. 1283, 26/10/93. See also ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum from DEU to AP et al., 02/11/93, 335/93.

Of the six Safe Areas, in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Sarajevo seemed to be in the least danger, especially after the US government announced in late July and early August that it would not permit the fall of the Bosnian capital. The city was so much the centre of world interest elsewhere that its fall was improbable, even in the unlikely event that the VRS managed to launch a successful attack. Tuzla also encompassed a fairly large area and appeared capable of defending itself. Bihac was a very special area, as all parties – the Croats, the Serbs and the Muslims under Abdic's leadership – seemed to acknowledge. The Eastern enclaves were the problem: Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde, precisely the areas where the airmobile battalion would be deployed, according to the report from Colonel Van Veen.

Srebrenica and its immediate surroundings often figured in the Dutch press, which had published several reports about the murder in Bratunac in April 1992.⁵³⁷⁴ In Bratunac the journalist Bart Rijs had witnessed Serb video and hearsay testimonies of over one hundred murders that the Muslims were believed to have committed against their population group. Whether or not they were true, Rijs wrote that such information plunged the inhabitants of Bratunac into:

‘.....a state that they are willing to commit such atrocities themselves. As a result, the next video and the next story need not be contrived or distorted, since the adversary is using the same tactics. Most of the people in Bratunac are consumed by hatred.

All Serbs have reason to hate the Muslims. The people from Bratunac are afraid of losing their homes and their loved ones, the refugees because of their desire for vengeance, and the many Serb volunteers because there might be something left to pillage, and because they simply enjoy hating others. We can easily imagine what will happen when the Serbs conquer the last Muslim villages.⁵³⁷⁵

In August 1992, Rijs and the photographer Kadir van Lohuizen reached Srebrenica. Working for the weekly HP/De Tijd, they were the first journalists to enter Srebrenica since the town had been under siege. They had met Oric there, ‘an amiable athletic fellow, with a frank expression,’ who had escorted them around Srebrenica for 24 hours.⁵³⁷⁶ He had shown them a town half in ruins with thirty thousand refugees swarming around each other like ants, where the inhabitants went to search for food daily near the enclave, where they might step on mines or encounter Serb patrols. Oric's soldiers could supplement their arms and munitions only through raids on Serbs. ‘They are aware that they cannot defend themselves against planes or a massive tank attack. Everybody has been through enough to know what lies in store after that.’ ‘That is why we prefer to die fighting.’⁵³⁷⁷

Srebrenica also received extensive television coverage in the Netherlands. On 28 November the Dutch public news (NOS) broadcast scenes of inhabitants of the enclave delighted at the arrival of a UN food convoy.⁵³⁷⁸ A few months later, the same news programme covered the US food droppings over Srebrenica,⁵³⁷⁹ the desperate shortages of food and medical supplies⁵³⁸⁰ and the Serb offensive against the town in March and April 1993.⁵³⁸¹ Like much of the Western media, Dutch television also broadcast Morillon's demands that the Bosnian Serbs admit aid convoys and his guarantees of safety to ⁵³⁷⁴ F. van Deijl, ‘Ik hou van jou, mijn Bosnië’ (‘I love you, my Bosnia’), HP/De Tijd, 14/08/92, pp. 25-27; Bart Rijs, ‘Sporen van een massamoord’ (‘Traces of a massacre’), HP/De Tijd, 28/08/92, pp. 10-12.

⁵³⁷⁵ Bart Rijs, ‘Reis naar het einde van Bosnië’ (‘Journey to the end of Bosnia’), HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 24.

⁵³⁷⁶ Bart Rijs, ‘Reis naar het einde van Bosnië’, HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 26.

⁵³⁷⁷ Bart Rijs, ‘Reis naar het einde van Bosnië’, HP/De Tijd, 04/09/92, p. 27.

⁵³⁷⁸ NOS, TV Journaal, 28/11/92.

⁵³⁷⁹ NOS, TV Journaals, 02/03/93 and 17/03/93.

⁵³⁸⁰ NOS, TV Journaal, 29/03/93.

⁵³⁸¹ NOS, TV Journaal, 07/03/92.

the inhabitants in mid-March.⁵³⁸² Morillon's action in Srebrenica in March 1993, when he had personally declared the area a UN enclave, met with approval in the Netherlands.⁵³⁸³ The disorganized evacuations from Srebrenica in March and April 1993, which involved casualties, appeared on Dutch television news as well.⁵³⁸⁴

Following the establishment of a Safe Area in Srebrenica, UNHCR had reported repeatedly that serious demoralization and anarchist conditions prevailed in Srebrenica as a result of the food shortage and the precarious situation there for relief workers. According to UNHCR, conditions were different in Zepa and Gorazde. The problems there were generally the same, but UNHCR was more in control. These reports had been conveyed to the Dutch government by Wagenmakers, the Dutch Permanent Representative in Geneva.⁵³⁸⁵

The Dutch military intelligence service (MID) also covered Srebrenica in its analyses of the course of events in the former Yugoslavia. Following the rise in shootings at the enclaves of Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde in October 1993, the MID wrote in a commentary in early November:

‘These shootings probably serve mainly to terrorize the civilian population and if possible to erode morale among the Bosnian troops. As far as the Safe Areas are concerned, Bosnian-Serb leaders have emphasized repeatedly that they will not tolerate Muslim areas along the border with Serbia. The shootings may also serve to drive the remaining Muslims away from the Safe Areas. The Serbs are unlikely, however, to take actions that will elicit a massive international response and consequently jeopardize their conquests of the past few months.’⁵³⁸⁶

According to the MID [Military Intelligence Service], Bosnian-Serb subjugation of the Muslim areas in the region along the border with Serbia was a long-term Serb political objective.⁵³⁸⁷ Colonel Van Veen, the military advisor to the Dutch permanent representation at the UN, had held this opinion from the outset.⁵³⁸⁸ Over a week later, the MID reported daily Serb shootings at the Eastern enclaves. The intelligence services noted, ‘however, that such shootings are often provoked by the Bosnian forces shooting at the Serbs from population centres.’ According to the service, Bosnian-Serb aggression toward the enclaves was ‘a distinct possibility.’ In the view of the MID, the Serbs aimed to control the Safe Areas through hostage taking.⁵³⁸⁹ Therefore, some awareness must have existed that Srebrenica and its surroundings were not as peaceful as the term Safe Area might suggest.

On 21 October Boutros-Ghali officially accepted the offer from the Dutch airmobile battalion for the Safe Areas, which was to be launched in early 1994.⁵³⁹⁰ In his response on 3 November, in which the government itemized the battalion provided, Kooijmans advocated launching the battalion in Central Bosnia near the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion.⁵³⁹¹ A parliamentary debate was scheduled ⁵³⁸² NOS, TV Journaals, 13/03/93, 16/03/93, 17/03/93 and 19/03/93. See e.g. also H. Steenhuis, ‘Philippe Morillon’, HP/De Tijd, 21/05/93, pp. 20-24.

⁵³⁸³ Cf. interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

⁵³⁸⁴ NOS, TV Journaals, 20/03/93, 21/02/93, 22/03/93 and 31/03/93.

⁵³⁸⁵ See e.g. ABZ, DPV/ARA/01812, Wagenmakers to Kooijmans, No. 435, 27/05/93.

⁵³⁸⁶ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie [Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation], 62/93, 02/11/93.

⁵³⁸⁷ See e.g. MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie [Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation], 64/93, 10/11/93; 68/93, 07/12/93; 71/93, 21/12/93.

⁵³⁸⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of N.H. Biegman, 29/05/00, p. 189.

⁵³⁸⁹ MID/CO. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie [Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation], 64/93, 10/11/93. Cf. 66/93, 24/11/93.

⁵³⁹⁰ CRST. CSKL 1993, Dutch participation, Boutros-Ghali to UNPR, 21/10/93.

⁵³⁹¹ ABZ, DDI/DEU/05275 (HvhS) Kooijmans to New York PR, No. 403, 03/11/93; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 134.

for the evening of 16 November to discuss the situation in the former Yugoslavia and to inform Parliament about the deployment of the airmobile battalion.⁵³⁹²

With the parliamentary debate in mind, Minister Ter Beek decided to visit Bosnia from 9 to 11 November. A team led by General Brinkman and comprising DAB staff member Princen, Vandewijer of the Defence Staff and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse preceded him. According to Van der Vlis, Ter Beek's trip was the outcome of his White Paper of 8 October, in which he had advised the minister not to agree to station the battalion in Srebrenica. Ter Beek wanted to investigate 'the opportunities and problems' in Bosnia himself.⁵³⁹³ Couzy did not believe such an open arrangement existed. He regarded the minister's visit primarily as 'window dressing'.⁵³⁹⁴ It was intended mainly to 'suggest that everything was receiving careful consideration'⁵³⁹⁵ and was 'a major theatrical production' directed by the minister.⁵³⁹⁶ Prior to the journey, it was already known that Briquemont would be absent during the minister's visit, as he would be on holiday.⁵³⁹⁷ Couzy was certain before the visit that Srebrenica would be the site of deployment. He believed that Minister Ter Beek must have known this as well. Since August, his staff had been telling him 'practically every week' that he should claim Central Bosnia to ensure that the Dutch battalion was not stationed in Srebrenica. 'Of course the Minister and the Chief of Defence Staff must have known this.'⁵³⁹⁸ At least, this sentiment emerged from Van der Vlis's White Paper of 8 October.

Brinkman's team departed with the open mission of assessing B-H Command's views on the area of deployment of the Dutch battalion.⁵³⁹⁹ In Kiseljak they spoke with the G3, a Canadian colonel that Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse and Vermeulen had also spoken with in September, and with the British Brigadier Ramsey, Briquemont's Chief of Staff and first deputy. They indicated two possible areas of deployment for the Dutch battalion: Central Bosnia or deployment in Srebrenica and Zepa. The Scandinavian countries were to be requested for the latter option, as they already had units stationed in Tuzla. Central Bosnia was considered interesting to the Dutch for the same reason: the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion was already stationed there.⁵⁴⁰⁰ Despite the shared preference, Brinkman contacted the headquarters of the Canadian battalion in Visoko. He spoke with a Canadian company commander who had just returned from Srebrenica and briefed Brinkman extensively about the problems that the Canadian troops encountered there with positioning their troops, getting supplies and aid to the population and guarding the status quo.⁵⁴⁰¹

According to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, the Dutch did not get a clear impression of the intentions of UNPROFOR for the Dutch battalion from these conversations. The impression was that the battalion would be assigned a role in Central Bosnia, but whether it would be in Zenica or Kupres remained unclear. Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse reported that he and his travel companions received only one guarantee: deployment to Srebrenica would not happen. He vehemently denies the impression conveyed about this subject in Ter Beek's book Manoeuvres. Considering the allegations of other concerned individuals and the documents, as revealed below, Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse must be mistaken on this point.⁵⁴⁰²

Upon arriving in Zagreb on 9 November, Minister Ter Beek and his entourage learned from Brinkman that Briquemont had yet to determine the location. According to Ter Beek, Brinkman said ⁵³⁹² ABZ, DDI/DPV, memorandum from DPV and DAV to Kooijmans, DPV-2747/93, 05/11/93.

⁵³⁹³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 54.

⁵³⁹⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 62.

⁵³⁹⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 60.

⁵³⁹⁶ Interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98. See also NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. File 8c, Besluitvorming uitzending luchtmobiele brigade (Deciding about the deployment of the Airmobile Brigade), Interview H. Couzy, 21/04/95.

⁵³⁹⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III hearing of H. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 62.

⁵³⁹⁸ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵³⁹⁹ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁴⁰⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, II, J.-W. Brinkman to A.D. Bakker, 23/05/00, p. 43; interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁴⁰¹ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁴⁰² Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

that the UN commanders were considering two possibilities for the Dutch battalion: stationing it in Central Bosnia in the Zenica-Vares-Kladanj triangle, north of the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion, or stationing part of it in Central Bosnia and part of it in Srebrenica.⁵⁴⁰³ In the first case, the airmobile battalion would perform security tasks for humanitarian convoys. In the second case, part of the battalion would perform such tasks, while the other part would be stationed in Srebrenica. According to a White Paper that the advance party led by Brinkman faxed Ter Beek prior to the conversation, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command preferred deploying the Dutch battalion in Central Bosnia.⁵⁴⁰⁴ Couzy was very reluctant about the Srebrenica option, considering the logistic problems anticipated.

According to Ter Beek, Couzy reprimanded Brinkman severely for remarking that the Netherlands could also handle this second option, since he had understood from the Canadian company commander that the mission was difficult but not impossible.⁵⁴⁰⁵ Other participants in the meeting have a different recollection of the incident. In the first place Brinkman, though Kreemers had later tried to convince him that Ter Beek's version was accurate.⁵⁴⁰⁶ According to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, deployment to Srebrenica had not been an issue. Remarks on the subject therefore could not have been cause for calling Brinkman to order.⁵⁴⁰⁷ Barth maintained that Couzy had kept mum throughout Brinkman's presentation. Afterwards, Barth told Couzy that Brinkman's position had surprised him, as he (Barth) certainly preferred deployment to Zenica. Couzy was quoted by Barth as having said that he did not want to argue with Brinkman in the presence of the troop front.⁵⁴⁰⁸ Brinkman also remembered Barth asking Couzy what the commander intended to do with Brinkman. Couzy was believed to have responded that he would speak to Brinkman later, although Brinkman said that Couzy never brought the subject up again.⁵⁴⁰⁹ Couzy later stated that he had sat there fuming at the superlatives hurled back and forth during Brinkman's presentation.⁵⁴¹⁰ Afterwards, he had remarked that Brinkman's positive assessment of deployment to Srebrenica reflected insufficient consideration for the difficulties it entailed.⁵⁴¹¹ Princen supported this interpretation. He believed that Couzy considered Brinkman's position foolhardy and reminded the commander of the problems with logistic and medical care. Couzy did not, however, reject deployment to Srebrenica.⁵⁴¹² While Couzy was unwilling to be more outspoken with the minister present, the commander felt that his views on the matter must have been clear to discerning listeners, since he ordinarily remained silent during briefings.⁵⁴¹³ 'When we returned to our hotel rooms,' Couzy related, 'the delegation proved to have noticed that the briefing had not been entirely objective. "Will you be putting Brinkman before the firing squad or simply discharging him," a few members asked me.'⁵⁴¹⁴ Couzy himself later said that as soon as he understood prior to the trip that the deployment decision had actually already been taken, the location 'no longer mattered' to him. He had never resisted Srebrenica as the area of deployment.⁵⁴¹⁵

While Brinkman's group returned to the Netherlands, Minister Ter Beek travelled to Kiseljak the next day for a meeting. Unlike Brinkman's team, the minister and his entourage spoke not with ⁵⁴⁰³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 102.

⁵⁴⁰⁴ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memorandum from Brinkman, Princen, Vandeweyer and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse to MinDef plus UNPROFOR delegation visit, n.d.

⁵⁴⁰⁵ Kreemers, 'Balkan-expres', p. 22; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 102; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 198.

⁵⁴⁰⁶ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 16/05/00.

⁵⁴⁰⁷ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁴⁰⁸ Interview D.J. Barth, 08/10/99.

⁵⁴⁰⁹ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 16/05/00.

⁵⁴¹⁰ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵⁴¹¹ Interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁵⁴¹² Interview F. Princen, 08/01/98.

⁵⁴¹³ Interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁵⁴¹⁴ Couzy, Jaren, p. 142.

⁵⁴¹⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 62.

Briquemont's first but with his second deputy, the Spanish Brigadier General Luis Feliz Ortega, who knew nothing and hardly spoke English.⁵⁴¹⁶ Ter Beek recommended that the Dutch battalion be deployed in the Vares-Kakanj-Zenica triangle, because it would not depend on Serb permission for supplies there, and the area was contiguous and adjacent to the Belgian-Dutch transport battalion.⁵⁴¹⁷ In retrospect, Ter Beek wondered whether UNPROFOR had already decided to station the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica.⁵⁴¹⁸ That was also the impression of Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, who made a third trip to Bosnia in November to get more information about the area of deployment. He believed that Srebrenica and Zepa were not explicitly mentioned as the sole location of deployment to the Dutch authorities, because this might very well have led the Dutch government to withdraw the offer of a battalion.⁵⁴¹⁹ Ter Beek and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse appear to have been right. In the summer of 2000, Briquemont stated: 'From September-October a Dutch battalion in Srebrenica and Zepa looked like the only solution to me. (...) So from September-October I said: "The Dutch battalion should go to Srebrenica."⁵⁴²⁰ Only because the arrival of the Dutch battalion was constantly deferred, had he attempted to enhance the Nordic battalion in Srebrenica. His effort failed.

On 10 November General Bastiaans, now head of the UN military observers in Bosnia-Herzegovina, briefed Ter Beek in Busovaca about the options presented to the Dutch on the matter. Based on the reports from the Canadians, Bastiaans had formed an impression of the state of dependence of the UN military in Srebrenica. The VRS controlled the flow of supplies to the enclave and directed its fire to express its desires to the UN troops inside. If the political decision were taken to deploy Dutch troops in Srebrenica, Bastiaans believed it should be made clear that they would 'definitely not be calling the shots' there.⁵⁴²¹ The next day Bastiaans had an extensive discussion with the British Brigadier General Ramsay in Kiseljak about the place where the Dutch battalion would be stationed. According to the entry in his diary, placement in Zenica – or at least partially in Zenica – was the main idea.⁵⁴²²

4. Government decision to deploy

On the plane back from Zagreb to the Netherlands, Ter Beek and Couzy discussed the basic conditions for deployment. Couzy felt that deployment should not exceed two years. Moreover, the Dutch unit should operate in a contiguous area. The minister agreed to both conditions.

After being summoned to the airport that afternoon, Van der Vlis met the minister upon his return to Naval Airfield Valkenburg on 11 November. The two spoke until 2am.⁵⁴²³ Couzy was present, but only listened. He felt that the minister had made up his mind.⁵⁴²⁴ Van der Vlis soon got the same impression.⁵⁴²⁵ 'Like a Tibetan prayer mill,' the Chief of Defence Staff reiterated all arguments against deployment and especially against being stationed in an enclave. Ter Beek, however, did not find his highest military advisor's arguments politically convincing. Finally, Ter Beek asked Van der Vlis about the risks facing the troops to be deployed. Van der Vlis considered them acceptable, as he did not expect Mladic to assault the UN personnel.⁵⁴²⁶ Van der Vlis subsequently resigned himself to the ⁵⁴¹⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, p. 102; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 199.

⁵⁴¹⁷ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 23/03/00, p. 32.

⁵⁴¹⁸ TCBU, conversation with A.L. ter Beek, 23/03/00, p. 32.

⁵⁴¹⁹ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁴²⁰ Interview F. Briquemont, 22/06/00.

⁵⁴²¹ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; NIOD, Coll. Bastiaans. Diary entry of G.J.M. Bastiaans, 10/11/93.

⁵⁴²² NIOD, Coll. Bastiaans. Diary entry of G.J.M. Bastiaans, 11/11/93.

⁵⁴²³ Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 23.

⁵⁴²⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 62; interview with A.K. van der Vlis, 13/02/98.

⁵⁴²⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 54.

⁵⁴²⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 54; interview with A.L. Ter Beek, 01/12/99; Couzy, Jaren, p. 143.

decision, although he questioned the duration of the deployment. Ter Beek then reduced its duration to eighteen months.

The main question that puzzled Couzy and Van der Vlis in their respective objections to deployment of the airmobile battalion was: how far can a military advisor – especially the highest military advisor – to the minister go in criticizing the decision-making? The prevailing view on the matter is that military advisors may express dissent during the policy preparation stage and must loyally execute decisions once taken.⁵⁴²⁷ If they still disagree with decisions and are unable to abide by them, they should accept the consequences and resign.

After returning from his holiday in late August 1993 to find the White Paper of 17 August and its approval by the Ministerial Council, Van der Vlis was under the impression that ‘the draft decision to deploy the airmobile battalion had effectively been taken.’⁵⁴²⁸ Nonetheless, he continued resisting deployment until 11 November, the day before its approval by the Ministerial Council. Only then did he face the decision between staying or resigning. Because this concerned operational deployment, he felt that loyalty among the forces should be beyond question. Nor did he consider such a moment opportune for a senior military officer to resign.⁵⁴²⁹ Couzy believed that the definitive decision, which he had to respect, had been taken earlier: the moment that Minister Ter Beek presented the battalion to the UN Secretary-General.⁵⁴³⁰

The question is whether the two generals abandoned their dissuasive efforts at the right time. The context for implementing the decision was highly dynamic. No information was available yet regarding important issues such as the area of deployment, even though Briquemont already knew. Was the Chief of Defence Staff not allowed to continue commenting on the subsequent developments, even publicly?⁵⁴³¹ The extended echoes of two incidents during the Den Uyl administration probably affected Dutch views about the informal relationships between members of the military and government ministers: the 1974 conflict of generals, when several high-ranking officers locked horns with Defence Minister Henk Vredeling and the flight of a few naval Neptunes over the government centre (Binnenhof) to protest cutbacks in 1976. Moreover, the consistent irritation in response to public statements from military officers, especially those of Couzy, attests to such over-sensitivity as well. Following the memorable nightly meeting at Valkenburg, Van der Vlis had made up his mind as well.

‘All that mattered to me anymore was to prepare this difficult mission that lay ahead as quickly as possible and to ensure that everything was in order. At one of the morning briefings, I told my staff: ‘People, you know where I stand on this, but the discussion is over. We all have to stick together on this and make sure that everything goes smoothly.’⁵⁴³²

The Chief of Defence Staff advised Couzy to follow this line as well.⁵⁴³³ This advice came a bit too late. Couzy had already spoken with NRC Handelsblad journalist Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, who reported in his newspaper the next day that Couzy objected to deployment of the Airmobile Brigade in Bosnia, because it allowed ‘insufficient leeway’ for the use of force.⁵⁴³⁴ He had noticed at the discussions in ⁵⁴²⁷ See e.g. M. van den Doel in: ‘Een militair in de politiek’ (‘A soldier in the political world’), Carré 18(1994)11, p. 30; ‘Storm in een glas water’ (‘Storm in a teacup’), Carré 20(1996)1, p. 24.

⁵⁴²⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, 22/05/00, p. 534.

⁵⁴²⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, p. 55-56.

⁵⁴³⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, II, Couzy to Bakker, 29/05/00, p. 47; interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98; Robijns, ‘Baas’, p. 18.

⁵⁴³¹ Cavalry Major D.M. Brongers provided an affirmative answer to this question in ‘Luchtmobiele brigade: met beide benen op de grond?’, Carré 16(1993)12, p. 16.

⁵⁴³² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, p. 56.

⁵⁴³³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, p. 56.

⁵⁴³⁴ Willibrord Nieuwenhuis, ‘Nederlandse bevelhebber: Luchtmobiele brigade nog niet inzetten’ (‘Dutch commander: Don’t deploy Airmobile Brigade yet’), NRC Handelsblad, 12/11/93.

Kiseljak that the officers there wanted to 'keep the use of force to a minimum.' They were expected to refrain from force where required for military purposes to avoid tainting the humanitarian nature of the UNPROFOR operation in Bosnia.⁵⁴³⁵ Couzy appears to have misunderstood when to stop issuing recommendations through the media. According to the Ministry of Defence, however, Couzy did not disagree with the minister on this point: 'Couzy believes that the instructions about the use of force leave local soldiers few options.'⁵⁴³⁶ And Couzy stated following the publication in the NRC Handelsblad that he had 'no objections to the decisions taken by the minister of Defence.' He believed that broader instructions on the use of force would enable the crew of the armoured vehicles available to the airmobile battalion to use the machine gun mounted on them sooner.⁵⁴³⁷

On 12 November the Ministerial Council also approved the proposal to deploy the Airmobile Brigade for a year and a half. The two options reported to Minister Ter Beek during his visit to Bosnia the previous week were mentioned as possible areas of deployment; deployment to Central Bosnia or partial deployment to Central Bosnia and partial deployment to Srebrenica. The Ministerial Council preferred deploying the battalion in a contiguous area. Various ministers expressed doubts and concern about the operation. They therefore adopted a two-stage decision, which basically complied with Boutros-Ghali's official request but deferred implementation pending disclosure of the area of deployment and information about the participation of allies of the Netherlands.⁵⁴³⁸ On 3 December when the Ministerial Council saw Ter Beek's letter about the area of deployment, which proved to be Srebrenica and Zepa, the council apparently saw no cause for additional debate. The document was duly noted.⁵⁴³⁹

On 12 November the Ministerial Council decided to restrict the duration of the Dutch deployment to a year and a half, as Minister Ter Beek had determined the previous evening.⁵⁴⁴⁰ Only in June 1994, however, did Minister Ter Beek mention the time limit in a private conversation with Boutros-Ghali.⁵⁴⁴¹ Brinkman, who became the B-H Command Chief of Staff in September 1994, noted as such that the B-H Command was still unaware of this condition stated by the Netherlands.⁵⁴⁴² On 19 October the officials at Foreign Affairs established in their coordination meeting about the former Yugoslavia that 'a clear message' would need to be sent to the UN in early 1995 regarding the limited duration of the contribution with a battalion for the Safe Areas, since the UN was still under the impression that the Dutch contribution was for an indefinite period.

The Army probably felt little need initially to inform the minister of this shortcoming. Couzy did not view the duration of the deployment as 'a big deal.' Apparently, his view was that the matter was the concern of the ministry. He took 'notice' of the term.⁵⁴⁴³ According to General A.P.P.M. van Baal, the Army had understood 'from the outset,' upon the disclosure of Srebrenica as the location, that the term would probably not be enforceable. The Army knew that the Canadians had been expressing their desire to leave Srebrenica for 'quite a while,' but 'that no country was willing to go there,' except for the Netherlands. The Army was therefore pursuing a two-track policy. The first track concerned the political aspirations of Minister Ter Beek ('a year and a half, and then somebody else will have a turn'). The second track entailed military consideration for the departure of the 42nd battalion of Limburg fighters for Srebrenica as Dutchbat IV.⁵⁴⁴⁴

⁵⁴³⁵ Couzy zegt begrip to hebben voor "haast" Ter Beek', NRC Handelsblad, 12/11/93.

⁵⁴³⁶ 'Nederland stuurt 1100 militairen naar Bosnië' ('The Netherlands sends 1100 troops to Bosnia'), Algemeen Dagblad, 13/11/93.

⁵⁴³⁷ 'Kabinet: troepen naar Bosnië' ('Cabinet: troops to Bosnia'), NRC Handelsblad, 13/11/93.

⁵⁴³⁸ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 12/11/93.

⁵⁴³⁹ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 03/12/93.

⁵⁴⁴⁰ Objectivized version of the minutes of the Ministerial Council of 12/11/93.

⁵⁴⁴¹ DS. Memorandum from Kreemers to Verhoeve, no. V95021437, 14/11/95; interview R. van Veen, 16/08/00; Berghorst, News, p. 58; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, pp. 132-133.

⁵⁴⁴² Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁴⁴³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 62.

⁵⁴⁴⁴ TCBU, preliminary interview with A.P.P.M. van Baal, 15/03/00, p. 3.

5. Parliament decides

‘Remarkable how much more spiritual freedom exists in professional environments outside Parliament.’⁵⁴⁴⁵

The Parliament continued to receive good general information from the government about the decisions concerning the former Yugoslavia.⁵⁴⁴⁶ The government policy was set forth in letters to Parliament, which were discussed first within the government and subsequently submitted to Parliament. Some were presented even before the Ministerial Council had a chance to consider them.

One exception to this generally adequate information supply may have been that the ministers directly involved at the time the logistic unit was offered in Copenhagen in June 1993 were probably aware that this was not feasible. Moreover, the reports from the ministers were sometimes confused, such as the explanation provided for the Rules of Engagement.

On the other hand, the MPs themselves were rarely military experts. In the debates about the former Yugoslavia, Blaauw was often the specialist in this respect and was often selected by the other MPs to ask the technical questions.⁵⁴⁴⁷ De Kok had been a naval officer for ten years. He informed the Bakker Committee, however, that the CDA comprised three or four former military officers (at a certain point three colonels – Frinking, De Boer, Couprie – and a captain – De Kok) who knew that deployment to Srebrenica was a mission impossible but had to go along with the ‘pathological dispatch urge’ within the faction.⁵⁴⁴⁸

Nearly all discussions between the government and the Parliament, including the definitive deployment debate on 16 November 1993, were committee meetings. Eisma, one of the spokespeople in the Yugoslavia file, later stated:

‘I disapproved of this practice; far more should have been handled in a plenary format, with faction chairmen present. Such important decisions merited far more plenary consideration. In my day, [as an MP] the assembly was assumed to agree, if nobody placed the report of the oral consultation on the parliamentary agenda. As MPs, we understood all that and had few material concerns, but I think it was less obvious to the outside world. (...)’⁵⁴⁴⁹

Oral consultations tend to involve joint consideration of the problems by the government and MPs. The arrangement of the meeting room (the government and MPs sit around one table and chat over cups of coffee, as the Dutch enjoy doing) are conducive to this format. The rule is: no supervision without distance. The meeting is not intended for clear affirmative and negative responses. Rather, ‘yes, provided’ and ‘no, unless’ prevail. Reports of such meetings are general rather than literal and come available only weeks later. The opportunity for MPs to score points is therefore minimal, as is press coverage in most cases. The same held true for the preparations for these gatherings. At any rate, prior to deployment of the Airmobile Brigade, the PvdA prepared the debate for the oral consultation in the faction committee rather than as a plenary session.⁵⁴⁵⁰ Another reason for convening an oral consultation to discuss the Yugoslavia file was obviously that the respective positions of the government and the Parliament differed little in substantive respects. Moreover, the principle stands on ⁵⁴⁴⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 125.

⁵⁴⁴⁶ See e.g. also TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of E. van Middelkoop, 05/06/00, p. 293.

⁵⁴⁴⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of E. van Middelkoop, 05/06/00, p. 298.

⁵⁴⁴⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 122.

⁵⁴⁴⁹ TCBU, conversation with D. Eisma, 06/04/00.

⁵⁴⁵⁰ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99. Nowadays, the gravity of the subject determines whether the entire PvdA faction or only a section is involved in the preparations.

foreign affairs tend to be fairly similar among the different parties.⁵⁴⁵¹ The meeting hardly addressed general policy (i.e. deployment of units) and focused more on implementation, such as equipment.

Members of the Foreign Affairs parliamentary committee returned from recess for three consecutive summers. However, Parliament generally adopted a wait-and-see policy. The government convened the meetings by sending a letter.

Some felt that the former Yugoslavia had hardly been covered in preliminary talks. De Hoop Scheffer maintained that contact with receptive ministers on the subject was infrequent: 'I would state as a fact that no regular talks really took place. Preparatory measures really did not figure in this context.'⁵⁴⁵² Nor did Lubbers recognize any of De Kok's assertions about him on this issue and viewed them as retrospective self-justification.⁵⁴⁵³ Presumably, however, De Kok had an experience he was unlikely to forget in May 1992, when he advocated military intervention in the former Yugoslavia and was called to order by his faction. By the early 1990s, the CDA, which had been traumatized in the early 1980s by the dissident stand of a few loyalists within its own faction, carefully managed its own parliamentary faction. Moreover, the Christian Democratic MPs felt that the directives from Prime Minister Lubbers' office of deliberations and the party leaders were restricting their freedom of movement. This was especially the case in the weekly Catshuis council of the party leaders chaired by Lubbers, where faction leader E. Brinkman provided little resistance.⁵⁴⁵⁴ Brinkman tried to project an image in the media of a counterweight to Lubbers but repeatedly instructed the faction to tone down or modify its stand.⁵⁴⁵⁵ He never expected any political consequences to arise from his decisive demeanour. 'At the time, under the aegis of Lubbers and party chairman Van Velzen,' deviant views among faction members would 'have signified political suicide,' according to a contemporary anonymous CDA MP.⁵⁴⁵⁶ The parliamentary press reported that the two CDA chiefs ran such a tight ship that even off-the-record criticism was rare under their leadership.⁵⁴⁵⁷ Van Velzen, who had become party chairman in 1987, attributed most of his control over the MPs to the selection procedures, performance reviews and quality assessments that he established for CDA representatives. Their deep imprint on the candidature gave rise to the term Christian technocracy.⁵⁴⁵⁸ In the autumn of 1990, CDA Senator Kaland had already reproached his fellow party MPs for voting in blocks.⁵⁴⁵⁹ De Kok did not believe that this accusation applied to him. In 2000 he stated before the Bakker Committee that he had recently understood once again

'...how powerless Parliament was. In the current political system, MPs have virtually no freedom. We were essentially an extension of the party leadership. We were not directly elected by the voters; we were basically appointed by the party leadership. Our position therefore depended greatly on them. MPs had virtually no spiritual freedom to perform their supervisory duties.'

His duties as spokesman for peace operations entailed maintaining ⁵⁴⁵¹ Van der List, Mensenrechten, p. 44.

⁵⁴⁵² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.G. de Hoop Scheffer, 29/05/00, p. 177.

⁵⁴⁵³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, p. 134.

⁵⁴⁵⁴ 'Formatie. Biesheuvel: Lubbers hield CDA-fractie teveel aan leiband' ('Formation. Biesheuvel: Lubbers spoonfed CDA faction too much'), ANP, 05/05/94, 17:42.

⁵⁴⁵⁵ Metze, Stranding, pp. 47-48.

⁵⁴⁵⁶ Metze, Stranding, p. 43.

⁵⁴⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁴⁵⁸ Metze, Stranding, p. 147. See also D.-J. Eppink, 'De meesters van de macht' ('The power masters'), NRC Handelsblad, 23/05/92; ibid., 'Democratie heeft behoefte aan nieuw type Tweede-Kamerleden' ('Democracy needs a new breed of MPs'), NRC Handelsblad, 27/7/92; Jan Tromp, 'Een rechtse bal, maar hij draait tenminste niet' ('A right-wing snob, but at least he doesn't turn'), de Volkskrant, 30/05/92; 'In Het Nieuws: Van Velzen, steile technocraat' ('In the News: Van Velzen, inflexible technocrat'), De Limburger, 08/03/94; 'Veel CDA-Kamerleden keren niet terug' ('Many CDA MPs won't be back'), ANP, 18/01/94, 14:35.

⁵⁴⁵⁹ Metze, Stranding, pp. 183-184.

‘....very intensive contact with the ministers. The information supply came through two channels; on the one hand through an ordinary, open letter and on the other hand through personal contact. We regularly had lunch or dinner with the ministers. That was where policy was elaborated. (...) None of us had the courage, the opportunity or the disposition to tell the minister of Foreign Affairs: now listen, we will not do that; we’re headed in the other direction. It never entered our mind. As I just explained, our political system does not operate that way. Those conversations served to exchange information, as well as to prepare debates thoroughly. The debates we conducted with the minister following such a discussion were staged. He knew what we knew and which concessions we would make and vice versa. So everything was rehearsed to avert any surprises during the debate.’⁵⁴⁶⁰

According to De Kok, the same situation existed within the PvdA as well: ‘My former colleagues, the late Messrs Van Traa and Vos, dealt with Minister of Defence Ter Beek in the same manner.’⁵⁴⁶¹ ‘Everything was rehearsed, especially in a combination that included Van Traa,’ explained De Kok.⁵⁴⁶² Valk did not, however, ‘recognize’ himself in De Kok’s account, ‘as if the Parliament was only a voting block and had to follow the dictates of the party leadership.’ According to him, the Parliament had played an individual, active role.⁵⁴⁶³ Although such contacts between ministers and MPs are difficult to trace outside the Parliament, a few indications are available. One instance was when Van Traa and Frinking consulted with Minister Ter Beek on 10 March about providing a combat unit for deployment in the former Yugoslavia. Another was when Minister Ter Beek consulted Van Vlijmen and Vos outside Parliament in mid-August about securing the helicopters for the brigade upon deployment of a battalion of the Airmobile Brigade in Bosnia.

De Kok believed that such private arrangements between the ministers and the MPs of the government parties put the opposition in a very difficult predicament. The opposition parties knew only what was stated in the letter and were therefore unable to respond adequately.⁵⁴⁶⁴ The faction members of D66 were on good terms with fellow party members among the officials at the ministries of Foreign Affairs and Defence. D66 spokesman Eisma thus ‘compensated’ for being part of the opposition and, unlike the faction members of the government parties, being unable to maintain ties with sympathetic ministers.⁵⁴⁶⁵ Eisma also derived tremendous benefit from his membership of the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe, which was far more involved with humanitarian security policy at the time. In this capacity he travelled to Sarajevo, which nobody from the Dutch Parliament had visited yet. The Council of Europe was also in a better position to dispatch fact-finding missions.⁵⁴⁶⁶ S. van Heemskerck Pillis-Duvekot derived information through her membership of the North Atlantic Assembly.⁵⁴⁶⁷

Another factor underlying the lack of parliamentary objections to the government policy appears to have been the fact that the Netherlands held the EC presidency during the second half of 1991, when the war in Yugoslavia first broke out. During such a period, the Parliament ordinarily maintains a low profile with respect to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and considers that this minister speaks not only on behalf of the Netherlands but also on behalf of the Twelve. The idea was to avoid making things too difficult for the minister. Moreover, both the ministers and the MPs often used ⁵⁴⁶⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 121.

⁵⁴⁶¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 122.

⁵⁴⁶² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 124.

⁵⁴⁶³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 249.

⁵⁴⁶⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 122.

⁵⁴⁶⁵ TCBU, conversation with D. Eisma, 06/04/00, p. 2.

⁵⁴⁶⁶ TCBU, conversation with D. Eisma, 06/04/00, p. 2.

⁵⁴⁶⁷ TCBU, conversation with S. van Heemskerck Pillis-Duvekot, 05/04/00, p. 2.

emotional terms to describe the conflict in the former Yugoslavia and how it needed to be resolved.⁵⁴⁶⁸ ‘We were extremely united about the former Yugoslavia in the Parliament,’ explained Sipkes. ‘In my view that remains the worst part of the decision-making process. (...) We all felt that something had to happen. No opposition came from Parliament.’ ‘We were far too united on this. Too concerned about everything happening there to figure out how to proceed without getting our fingers dirty.’⁵⁴⁶⁹

The consequence of the emotional urge to intervene in war-torn Bosnia became clear to various MPs when a delegation of the permanent committees for Defence and Foreign Affairs, comprising Blaauw, De Kok, Ramlal (CDA), Van Traa, Valk and Van Ojik (GroenLinks), visited Croatia and Bosnia from 1 to 5 October 1993. Repeated requests from Parliament for a visit were consistently rejected ‘on internal UN/UNPROFOR grounds.’⁵⁴⁷⁰ The visit was ‘eventually’ scheduled for July but was postponed twice after that as well.⁵⁴⁷¹ The delegation visited the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb, Sarajevo and Kiseljak and the Dutch units in Busovaca and Santici.⁵⁴⁷² Only then did the committee members start to realize how unsafe the Safe Areas really were. Following their return, Van Traa, one of the parties who submitted the motion to make the Airmobile Brigade more suitable for deployment to the former Yugoslavia, issued media statements questioning the wisdom of sending ground troops to Bosnia as part of a peace settlement. ‘I have always been a strong advocate of a peace settlement,’ explained Van Traa, ‘but I also have a duty to ask questions at this point.’⁵⁴⁷³ Perhaps, he admitted, the Parliament, including his own party, had been a bit too eager to prepare the Airmobile Brigade for a mission in that region.⁵⁴⁷⁴ The transport battalion, which the MPs included in their visit, was experiencing problems at the time. Between 24 September and 9 November 1993, sixteen troops from this unit were injured.

‘We were aware of all the problems, but what could we do? Withdrawing would have been worse,’ explained De Kok.⁵⁴⁷⁵ Nevertheless, he rang the spokesperson for the Ministry of Defence L. Kreemers on 4 November to express his concerns following the disclosure of the official request from Boutros-Ghali for deployment of the airmobile battalion. ‘Protecting’ the Safe Areas was highly complicated, and the Dutch battalion would be of little use there. According to a note from Kreemers, De Kok said that ‘perhaps Parliament had been a bit too eager in requesting that the Airmobile Brigade be equipped with armoured vehicles.’⁵⁴⁷⁶

‘Given the background to the humanitarian emergency in Bosnia-Herzegovina,’ the government informed Parliament on 15 November 1993 that it had decided to deploy the first operational battalion of the Airmobile Brigade, reinforced by about fifty armoured vehicles and a logistic unit, for an initial period of a year and a half. Deployment had been approved primarily on humanitarian grounds. The idea that military presence might be conducive toward achieving a peace settlement was secondary.⁵⁴⁷⁷ Deployment of these 1,100 troops brought the total Dutch contribution in the former Yugoslavia to 3,100. While the area of deployment had yet to be determined, the Dutch government preferred a contiguous area.⁵⁴⁷⁸ Use of force was authorized as the ultimate measure in case of self-defence and if a ⁵⁴⁶⁸ Cf. interview L.W. Veenendaal, 17/8/00.

⁵⁴⁶⁹ Interview L. Sipkes, 24/01/00.

⁵⁴⁷⁰ DS. exh. 19/07/93 no. S93/061/2307, memorandum from Olivier to New York PR, attn milad, 15/07/93 no. V93020694.

⁵⁴⁷¹ DS. exh. 19/07/93 no. S93/061/2307, memorandum from Olivier to New York PR, attn milad, 15/07/93 no. V93020694; ABZ, DDI/DIE/2001/00023 Memorandum from deputy DEU to AP and others, 05/07/93 no. 191.

⁵⁴⁷² A report appears in TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 63.

⁵⁴⁷³ ‘Twijfels bij Van Traa over deelname aan nieuwe vredesmacht’ (‘Van Traa has doubts about taking part in new peacekeeping force’), ANP, 05/10/93, 21:07. See also TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 252; interview with G. Valk, 15/10/99; TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 141.

⁵⁴⁷⁴ Both, Indifference, pp. 205-206; Berghorst, News, p. 53.

⁵⁴⁷⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.C.H.M. de Kok, 25/05/00, p. 125. On the experiences of De Kok during the visit, see also T. de Kok, Kamerleden sprokkelen feiten in “Joegoslavië” (‘MPs gather facts in “Yugoslavia”’), Vrij Nederland, 16/10/93.

⁵⁴⁷⁶ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Memorandum from Kreemers to Ter Beek, 04/11/93.

⁵⁴⁷⁷ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 64, p. 6.

⁵⁴⁷⁸ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 64, p. 6.

UN unit was being prevented from carrying out its duties by force. The decision to resort to force rested with the UN commander concerned. Force would consistently be kept to a minimum.⁵⁴⁷⁹

In an AVRO/Nipo survey in August 1992, only 18 percent of those questioned believed that a simple parliamentary majority was sufficient for approving deployment. Thirty-nine percent wanted a two-thirds majority for such decisions, while 37 percent actually wanted unanimous parliamentary support for such a decision.⁵⁴⁸⁰ Most of the MPs who participated in the general discussion about the government decision to deploy the battalion appear to have been convinced that the exchange of ideas with the government was intended to rally support. Valk later stated that ‘all of us, including the government, benefit from the greatest possible consensus in such decisions. Otherwise, we will lack popular support for participating in these kinds of operations.’⁵⁴⁸¹

Opposition spokesperson Blaauw felt the same way.⁵⁴⁸² After the visit to Bosnia in October 1993, however, Parliament no longer dared question the deployment of troops and unanimously voted in favour.⁵⁴⁸³ In the past the SGP had expressed tremendous reserve about deployment of Dutch troops for the UN. This party believed that ‘in a world riveted by sin, where war will prevail until the end of time,’ thinking ‘that world peace was accessible to mankind was unrealistic.’⁵⁴⁸⁴ Parliament therefore adopted the view that ‘any effort, however premature, to establish a world government with its own combat forces is to be discouraged.’⁵⁴⁸⁵ Now, however, the party was agreeing through Van den Berg. Despite his premonitions of fear, De Kok even complimented the government for ‘remaining at the vanguard in Europe in taking responsibility for and aiming to alleviate the atrocities in the former Yugoslavia.’⁵⁴⁸⁶

Still, doubts existed among the MPs, although most were concealed. VVD faction members questioned the Safe Areas concept but agreed following lengthy internal deliberations because of the air support that would appear in case of emergency. Moreover, the VVD did not wish to send out a battalion ‘from a divided house.’⁵⁴⁸⁷

Valk was ridiculed by the other MPs, when he suggested making approval of the government decision contingent upon the location, which had not yet been disclosed.⁵⁴⁸⁸ Nor did Ter Beek welcome the attitude of Valk, whose actions he believed to be instigated by Van Traa’s horror at what he saw on his visit to Bosnia.⁵⁴⁸⁹ In its faction meeting on 16 November, the PvdA had belaboured the deployment.⁵⁴⁹⁰ The faction committees of Foreign Affairs and Defence, however, echoed the doubts that Van Traa had expressed upon his return from a trip to Bosnia with a parliamentary delegation in early October as to whether deploying ground troops in Eastern Bosnia was wise. Some reserve was therefore adopted regarding the location. A preliminary meeting took place between Ter Beek, Van Traa, Valk and Euro MP Jan Marinus Wiersma on the eve of the parliamentary meeting of 16 November.⁵⁴⁹¹ Afterwards, Valk clearly recalled that they had agreed to conduct a final debate as soon as the location was disclosed. Valk also consulted De Kok in advance on this issue.⁵⁴⁹² The next day, he felt as if one MP after another was bypassing him, and Ter Beek appeared to have forgotten the ⁵⁴⁷⁹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 64, p. 7.

⁵⁴⁸⁰ Radio 2, AVRO, Radiojournaal, 09/08/92, 1.04 pm.

⁵⁴⁸¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 257.

⁵⁴⁸² Interview J.D. Blaauw, 23/04/99.

⁵⁴⁸³ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 66, p. 1 and 22181, no. 67.

⁵⁴⁸⁴ F.W. den Boef, ‘Prioriteiten voor de krijgsmacht’ (‘Priorities for the Armed forces’), De Banier, 03/06/93, p. 7.

⁵⁴⁸⁵ F.W. den Boef, ‘Nederlandse deelname aan vredesoperaties na Srebrenica: tussen cynicisme en idealisme’ (Dutch participation in peacekeeping operations after Srebrenica: between cynicism and idealism’), Zicht 23 (1997) 2, p. 12.

⁵⁴⁸⁶ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 67, p. 1.

⁵⁴⁸⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.D. Blaauw, 31/05/00, p. 220.

⁵⁴⁸⁸ Interview F. Princen, 08/01/98.

⁵⁴⁸⁹ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99 and 13/01/00.

⁵⁴⁹⁰ G. Valk to NIOD, 31/05/00.

⁵⁴⁹¹ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00 and G. Valk.

⁵⁴⁹² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, p. 252; interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

agreement reached the previous evening. Then Valk realized that questions were apparently unwelcome during a deployment debate. Parliament was expected to stand behind the troops to be deployed. 'It would have been inconceivable for one of the major factions to say: "no way, José." Especially not following the preceding course of events.'⁵⁴⁹³

Van Middelkoop wanted to oppose the government position, because he felt the deployment was intended to provide peace of mind, because it seemed as if the Airborne Brigade had to prove itself, because the deployment lacked any long-term perspective, and because there was no guarantee that air support would materialize. In the faction deliberations, GPV faction leader Schutte informed him, however, that he could not be the only opposing force in a deployment debate. Van Middelkoop, who had already drafted his input for the debate, therefore transformed his negative conclusions into critical reservations by noting at the bottom of his pages of text that his faction supported the government despite the objections stated. He later recalled that the debate about deployment of the airmobile battalion had been the only moment in his political career in which he voted with the majority of the Parliament against his will.⁵⁴⁹⁴ Nonetheless, he remained the most critical MP throughout the consultation. He asked what reasons the government had for approving deployment at that specific moment. He also questioned whether the government had enough operational data to reach a carefully considered decision, 'to ensure an acceptable risk.'⁵⁴⁹⁵ In addition, he wanted to know the likelihood that air support would be used to protect Safe Areas.

Minister Kooijmans also felt that the Netherlands was at the vanguard of the efforts in the former Yugoslavia. He 'believed that the other [EC] Member States [had] at least a moral obligation to investigate what else they could have done to enable the EC to honour the commitments made (...) The Netherlands would admonish the partners not to lapse into non-committal positions (...)'.⁵⁴⁹⁶

Ter Beek could not yet provide specific information about the duties of the Dutch battalion and merely listed the general UNPROFOR duties. Stationing the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica, Zepa and Gorazde was, according to the minister, 'no longer an issue.' A reinforced company might, however, be stationed in Srebrenica to replace the departing Canadian company. Ter Beek listed his objections to this scenario: extended connections, which would complicate supplies and medical aid. He emphasized, however, that he had not made deployment contingent on location. The rules of engagement were similar to those of other UN units in B-H. More resolute conduct on the part of the Dutch troops had nothing to do with the instructions regarding use of force but would be the outcome of the resources with which the battalion would be equipped. Ter Beek guaranteed that the Dutch troops deployed would have kevlar helmets, bullet-proof vests and the like. If necessary, the battalion would be able to use crypto devices as well. Ter Beek mentioned the procedures for deploying air combat forces: the UNPROFOR commander would request authorization from the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who would then 'undoubtedly' consult the Security Council before taking a decision. 'The minister did not have the impression that air strikes were receiving serious consideration.'⁵⁴⁹⁷ Except for Valk, who emphasized that Parliament reserved the right to reconsider deployment, should circumstances change, none of the MPs shared any remarks in the second round.

The Socialist Party 'squarely opposed' the deployment, because military interventions would lead to extension and escalation of conflicts.⁵⁴⁹⁸ Party members disapproved of the effort 'from GroenLinks (Green Left) to VVD on the right' to have the Netherlands 'participate' in the war in the ⁵⁴⁹³ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99. This sentiment prevailed during other deployment debates in the 1990s as well, Megens, Vredesoperaties, pp. 78-79.

⁵⁴⁹⁴ Interview E. van Middelkoop, 08/10/99.

⁵⁴⁹⁵ TK 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 67, p. 6.

⁵⁴⁹⁶ TK 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 67, p. 7.

⁵⁴⁹⁷ TK 1993-1994, 22 181, no. 67, p. 9.

⁵⁴⁹⁸ T. Kox, 'Luchtmobiele Brigade naar Bosnisch slagveld' ('Airmobile Brigade to Bosnian battleground'), Tribune, 29(1993)12, p. 12. See e.g. also J. Marijnissen, 'Nieuwe kruistochten? SP tegen militaire interventie in voormalig Joegoslavië' ('New crusades? Socialist Party against military intervention in former Yugoslavia'), Tribune 28(1992)17, pp. 14-15; T. Kox, 'Interventie zal de lijdensweg verlengen' ('Intervention will draw out the agony'), Tribune 29(1993)8, pp. 18-19.

former Yugoslavia. The Dutch troops would become caught between the different sides, of which none had a 'reputation for moderation and compassion.'⁵⁴⁹⁹ But this party had not joined the parliamentary deliberations.

The news about the deployment decision quickly became submerged in the press. On the evening of 16 November 1993, CDA faction leader Elco Brinkman once again flexed his political muscles. At a speech in Groningen, he demanded that Parliament discuss the current disability benefits before the May elections. This issue was particularly sensitive, since the CDA and PvdA government had nearly fallen because of this issue in early 1993. Brinkman's unambiguous statements thwarted the strategy of Prime Minister Lubbers of securing approval for the proposals by the Buurmeijer Committee, which targeted a complete overhaul of the social security system in the long run. Brinkman's stand ushered in the fall from grace of Lubbers's crown prince, an electoral defeat for the CDA and an historic exile of the CDA to the opposition. Although this course of events had not been anticipated in the evening of 16 November 1993, the news was sufficiently explosive to sweep the deployment debate about the airmobile battalion under the carpet of parliamentary journalism.

⁵⁴⁹⁹ 'Interventie zal de lijdensweg verlengen', Tribune 29(1993)8, p. 18.

Chapter 14

Interim balance

1. Wrong perceptions

The declaration of independence by Croatia and Slovenia on 25 June 1991 did not come as a surprise in the West. However, Western Governments and media had no conception of the depth of the animosities brought about by a combination of nationalism whipped up by politicians and the media and the mixture of hate, greed, frustration and fear felt by the population of Yugoslavia. When the Yugoslav crisis erupted with the short-lived war in Slovenia, European leaders were able to proclaim in all naivety that 'Europe's hour had come'. Lack of knowledge of the country and the peoples of Yugoslavia would lead time and time again to incorrect assessments of the situation by Western Governments and organizations, so that the policy based on these assessments was inevitably also incorrect.

The European Community, which took the lead in the international approach to the crisis, believed that it could do business with the Federal authorities in Yugoslavia at a time when the power of the Federal Presidium and the government of Yugoslavia was already reduced to a fiction. There was insufficient understanding of the fact that Croatia and Slovenia were not the only ones with a desire for independence, but that Milosevic had also long ago accepted the dissolution of Yugoslavia. He simply tried to camouflage this fact for as long as possible. As a result, the European Community could believe that the withdrawal of the Federal troops from Slovenia was a success for its own diplomatic efforts, while in reality Milosevic and his immediate entourage were already making preparations for the next war. Similarly, while the West greeted the end of the war in Croatia in late 1991 and early 1992 with enthusiasm, the authorities in Serbia and Tudjman's government in Croatia were taking measures to prepare for the war in Bosnia. The West was always one step behind the conflicts breaking out in the former Yugoslavia.

One of the reasons for this was the failure to understand what Milosevic's real motives were. He was neither the convinced Communist some people saw in him, nor the fervent nationalist many others believed him to be. Personal power was his alpha and omega. The face of this power-crazy amoeba, who was known as the 'Babyface Killer', could turn in an instant into that of an angel of peace. It was not until the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina had been under way for some time that Western governments began to realize that opportunism was his trademark.

Some Western governments also had inadequate insight into the behaviour of other major actors in the Yugoslav drama. Especially in Germany and the United States, people tended to see Tudjman through rose-coloured glasses, as a democratic alternative to Milosevic, while in fact he was a convinced nationalist. It was difficult for the West to understand that while at war with Serbia, he was capable of working together with Milosevic to dismantle Bosnia-Herzegovina. The image people had of the Bosnian President Izetbegovic was also often too positive. He was seen as a symbol of the victim status of the Muslims, or of the will to maintain a multi-ethnic society in Bosnia. Too little was known about his leadership of a Muslim nationalist party and his personal views about the role of Islam in the state to realize that it was far from self-evident that he would be an effective president over all ethnic groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

There was equally little understanding of the position of the JNA (the Federal Yugoslav army). Some saw it as the last group propping up the old Yugoslavia, while others were convinced that it was simply a tool of Milosevic right from the beginning of the conflict. Neither of these views was correct. The JNA was in fact riven by extreme differences of opinion about the choice between these two options. This uncertainty only served to make its behaviour in Croatia even bloodier. Izetbegovic was also plagued by continual doubts, due among other things to the existence of several partly overlapping fractions within his own party (the SDA, or Bosnian Muslim Party of Democratic Action). There were, for example, differences between those who supported the idea of an integral Bosnia, of a Muslim state extending beyond the boundaries of Bosnia and of a mini-Muslim state within Bosnia. There were further tensions between a clerical religious faction and one with more sectarian views. Differences of opinion also existed within the SDA about the extent to which (continuation of) the war in order to achieve the party's aims was acceptable. Hardly anything was known about all this in the West. It was in many respects not the efficiency of the various parties to the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia but precisely their inefficiency which made these conflicts last so long and involve so much more bloodshed than the West had initially expected.

The Western governments, media and public turned to the past in an effort to explain all these puzzling and painful events. They pointed to the contradictions inherited from the Second World War, which certainly played a role in a Yugoslavia that had experienced the horrors of a civil war during the occupation by various Fascist powers, but also to what was called the age-old ethnic divisions, a 'Balkan mentality' or feudal patterns of power built up round local warlords. Many of these ideas had little connection with reality, because the orchestration of the violence from Belgrade was insufficiently recognized. Paramilitary groups were seen as isolated units, while they were in fact also tools of the Milosevic regime. As the notorious paramilitary leader Arkan put it, terror existed in order to make people aware of their (ethnic) identity. The manifestations might look old-fashioned to viewers who still had TV images of the Gulf War with its smart weapons imprinted on their retinas, but in reality it would be more accurate to characterize the violence encountered in the Balkan conflicts as modern rather than as 'age-old'.

The comparisons made between the JNA, the VRS, the paramilitary groups and the militias on the one hand and the Partisans and guerrilla fighters on the other also had little to do with reality. The morale of the regular troops was very low, with desertion figures running into tens of percents. The behaviour of the paramilitary and militia groups was characterized by disorder and drunkenness. They may have been efficient in the plundering and chasing away of defenceless civilians or other, poorly armed, militia groups, but they could not handle any serious resistance.

Exaggerated ideas of the degree of resistance Western forces might encounter in the case of military intervention in the former Yugoslavia hindered such intervention in the period between the declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia and the start of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina, when such action would have been relatively feasible. In fact, Western governments showed very little readiness for military intervention at that time because the conflict in the former Yugoslavia had little impact on their basic interests. Comparisons with previous conflicts in the Balkans with the potential of exploding into a European war, as in 1914, thus lacked any basis. The wars raging on the territory of the former Yugoslavia were not the result of Western machinations, but of a lack of interest on the part of governments.

There was initially not much pressure for military intervention from public opinion either. The public often has little understanding of, or interest in, complex issues. Western journalists noticed this in the first few years of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia. They complained continually about the lack of interest shown by readers and viewers in events and relationships which did not follow clearly recognizable patterns. The need for simple distinctions - communism versus democracy, nationalism versus multi-ethnicity, aggressor versus victim, villain versus hero - hindered the understanding of balanced reporting. Images were better than words in meeting this need for black-white contrasts: the pictures of the Trnopolje detention camp, rape victims telling their stories, UN Force Commander Philippe Morillon guaranteeing protection for the population of Srebrenica. Despite the highly evocative nature of some of these images, they proved to have little effect on the governments of Western Europe and the United States. These governments could often simply wait until the media storm had calmed or take measures that did not contribute directly to the military intervention called for, such as setting up a war crimes tribunal or providing humanitarian aid.

2. Faulty set of instruments

The failure of the West to intervene at an early stage in the former Yugoslavia was not just a question of lack of will, but also a question of incapacity. The period following the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989 was one in which international security policy was being revamped. Wars and civil wars seldom come at a convenient time, but the conflict in Yugoslavia certainly came at a very inconvenient time for the international community. Various international organizations, and national governments, were undertaking a major reorientation of their structures and policies. The United Nations hoped to profit from the new post-Cold-War climate, in which it was hoped that the Security Council would less often be rendered impotent by vetoes. This led to ambitions for new types of peacekeeping operations, which were however hampered by the unwillingness of the member states to make the necessary resources available. This applied in the first place to the regular financial contributions, but above all to the supply of troops for operations in regions which were in effect still in a state of war. The UN headquarters was hardly equipped to provide leadership for such risky operations, and the impetus had to come from Security Council resolutions which were the fruit of compromises in New York, as a result of which they were not always adequate to deal with the situation on the ground in the former Yugoslavia. Moreover the UN was initially hesitant to act because of inability or indeed reluctance to interfere in the internal affairs of one of its member states.

As a result, it was mainly the European Community that took the lead in dealing with the Yugoslav conflict. This community, which had twelve member states at the time, had the same need to act on the basis of compromise as the UN. On the way to a common foreign and security policy due to be agreed in December 1991 within the framework of the Maastricht Treaty, the chair of the EC in the second half of 1991 (the Netherlands) was keen to avoid voices of dissent from the various European capitals. The attempts of the Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Broek to keep the twelve European sheep neatly in the same fold elicited resistance in particular from the government in Bonn, that had gained a new self-confidence after the reunification of Germany and had its own views about the approach to be taken to the problems of Yugoslavia which differed markedly from those of the Dutch chair. Even after the ratification of the Maastricht treaty, it was found that a common foreign policy did not necessarily lead to more rational decision-making. The requirement that any decision should be based on consensus actually meant in practice that a government with a strong opinion could impose its will on the other member states. This proved to be the case in late 1991 and early 1992, when Germany was able to force through recognition of Croatia and Slovenia, while Greece was able to block that of Macedonia.

The biggest handicap that the European Community suffered from was its lack of any 'stick' other than sanctions to enforce its decisions. The ineffectiveness of the 'carrot' approach, due to the endemic nationalism that had already established itself in Yugoslavia, had already become clear to the Community before the outbreak of the conflicts. The question was not only when sanctions could be applied, but above all what effect selective sanctions would have at a time when the Twelve still hoped that negotiations could bear fruit. This meant that it took a relatively long time before such sanctions were applied. Besides, sanctions could not be really effective if they were not backed up by UN approval. Finally, the EC had no way of enforcing sanctions by military means if that should prove necessary. This lack of its own armed force doomed EC diplomacy to impotence from the start. A further structural weakness of the EC was the lack of its own control and analysis centre. When joint analyses were needed, EC governments were forced in the first instance to call on the resources of the ministry of Foreign Affairs of the member state currently holding the chairmanship. In the case dealt with here, that was the Netherlands during the first half year of the Yugoslav crisis. It proved difficult not only for national governments to accept analyses coming from a resource centre in another country, but also for that resource centre to muster the personnel capacity needed to produce effective analyses.

Milosevic's only concern apart from sanctions was the possibility of American military action. He realized that he had little to fear from the European states in this respect. The government in Washington had however decided that it was time for the European Community to show what it could do in the field of conflict management on its own continent. By the time that it became clear that the Community was so riven by internal disagreement that it was unable to solve the problem itself, the American administration was already operating in the shadow of the coming presidential elections. At that stage, President Bush and his government were not keen to expose American troops to risks in a terrain that was much less easy to oversee than the sandy plains of the Gulf War, in a conflict that was coming to look more and more like a civil war and where the political objectives on which any intervention would be based had not yet crystallized out.

After the elections, the new government team under President Clinton lacked experience in the field of foreign policy. Moreover, the new President had stated clearly during the election campaign that he wanted to concentrate on domestic economic policy. Not only was the situation in Bosnia a disturbing factor when it came to putting this commitment into practice, but the President's principal advisors were divided as to the correct approach to this situation while the President himself did not give any forceful leadership. As a result, it was not until late May 1993 that the contours of an American policy began to become visible. The non-interventionist attitude of the USA was a major element in the whole process.

The above-mentioned stance adopted by two successive governments in Washington had major consequences for NATO, where the American government traditionally leaves a clear stamp on decision-making. Moreover, NATO's scope for action was initially severely limited by the principle that the treaty organization could only undertake operations when the territory of one of its member states was threatened. This limitation was only removed in the course of 1992. Even then, NATO could only participate in operations involving the former Yugoslavia after consultation with the United Nations; the learning curve for this process proved to be quite steep. NATO was further hindered in taking any action by the fact that all its member states were busily cashing in the 'peace dividends' after the end of the Cold War. Reductions in troop levels were the order of the day, and a tendency to renationalization was initially more clearly visible than a readiness to undertake new international obligations. This became particularly clear in the course of 1993 when various peace plans requiring the formation of an implementation force were put forward. It proved extremely difficult to find Western European countries prepared to supply the necessary troops, especially since there were various reasons for not making use of the services of some member states such as Germany, Italy and Turkey.

The fact that European governments were unable or unwilling to make a military commitment led to severe irritation in Washington at the few moments when the American Government did feel disposed to military involvement in the former Yugoslavia, e.g. in late June 1992 when the visit of the French President Mitterrand to Sarajevo thwarted American action, and in early August 1992 when the European members of NATO made air strikes conditional on UN approval. The Yugoslav question thus threatened to split NATO at a time when it was looking for new legitimation for its existence after the end of the Cold War.

Another divisive factor in the equation was the fact that the French Government was initially mainly advocating action within a WEU framework. It was not until mid-1993 that the government in Paris accepted that the problems in the former Yugoslavia could not be dealt with without NATO involvement. While it is true that the WEU did participate in monitoring compliance with the embargo imposed on the new Yugoslavia and also played a part in military planning, its lack of a command structure like that of NATO made it largely ineffective. A few options for WEU involvement were discussed in the early days of the Yugoslav conflict, but they came to nothing largely because of opposition from the United Kingdom which was unable to commit itself to supplying appreciable military resources because of cuts in the overall manning levels in its armed forces and continuing commitments in Northern Ireland and Cyprus; besides, the UK's experience in these two regions led it to write off any form of serious involvement in the former Yugoslavia.

The CSCE had also had a certain level of involvement in the early days of the conflict. However, this organization – which was still at the start of its learning curve as far as conflict management was concerned – was hampered by its large size and its voting procedures. All decisions initially had to be unanimous. Even though the less stringent condition of ‘unanimity minus 1’ was introduced in early 1992, this still left the organization (with its 52 member states after the accession of Bosnia-Herzegovina) not very efficient.

3. Shifting objectives

The question of what the West wanted to achieve in the former Yugoslavia raised its head fairly early in the conflict, when the Director-General for Political Affairs (Dutch abbreviation DGPZ) at the Dutch Foreign Ministry Peter Van Walsum sent a COREU message to the capitals of all EC member states suggesting that Yugoslavia’s internal boundaries should be open to discussion. This proposal met with a fairly massive ‘no’ from the other member states, however. The logical consequence was that the West would have to make efforts to protect the ethnic minorities within the existing boundaries. However, the Conference on Yugoslavia convened in early September 1991 under the auspices of the EC met with the problem when discussing this issue that Milosevic was not prepared to give the Kosovo Albanians the same rights in Serbia as those he demanded for the Serbs in Croatia; while Tudjman was quite happy to oppose what he saw as Serb occupation of Croatian territory, but still sent Croatian troops to Bosnia himself in order to reserve part of that terrain for the Croats. Milosevic’s attitude on this point effectively spelled the end of the conference.

Because it was difficult to delay recognition of Croatia and Slovenia indefinitely, it was not strange that the other EC member states finally gave in to German pressure in favour of recognition at the end of 1991. What was strange was that Croatia was recognized despite clear evidence that no effective measures to protect minorities had been taken there. At the same time, the recognition of another republic – Macedonia – which was known to have taken such measures was delayed for a long time because of Greek sensitivities. The government of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which had also requested recognition, was told by the EC that a condition for this was that they should hold a referendum on independence the practical purpose of which was not at all clear. In fact, this referendum gave the nationalist parties in Bosnia-Herzegovina the opportunity to build up their stocks of weapons even further – a process which had been going on among Bosnian Muslims and Serbs since the spring of 1991, i.e. even before Croatia and Slovenia had made their declarations of independence.

By the end of 1991, the European Community was prepared to lay the hot potato of Yugoslavia in the lap of the UN. This was how the new Secretary-General of the UN from the start of 1992, Boutros-Ghali, interpreted these events too: the rich countries of Europe were saddling him with a question they could not handle themselves, as if there were not enough other conflicts in the world that required the attention of his organization. It was therefore with fresh reluctance that he implemented the Security Council resolution requiring the deployment of a peacekeeping force in Croatia. This force proved unable to achieve much. Ethnic cleansing, murder, rape, arson and the like were perpetrated literally under the eyes of the UN soldiers.

The same reluctance to get involved was shown after the outbreak of war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. From the time when the airfield of Sarajevo was opened, the Western approach to the war in Bosnia acquired a mainly humanitarian character. Intentions were good – or looked good – but were certainly open to question. They were, for example, questioned by the government and population of Bosnia-Herzegovina, who often complained that the citizens of their country were enabled to die with full stomachs. What is even worse is that the humanitarian supplies often fell into the hands of the military or militia, who demanded payment for the passage of the goods. In this way, the humanitarian aid was actually contributing to the continuation of the war.

Within a few months after the start of the war, the Bosnian Serbs had managed with the aid of their Serbian brothers from the other side of the Drina to gain control of about 70 percent of the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina. The process of ethnic cleansing associated with this had not only sowed a great deal of hatred – even among people who had originally believed in a multi-ethnic society – but had also led in many cases to the destruction of the houses people had been forced out of, or their occupation by others who in their turn had often been chased out of their own homes elsewhere.

That made the realization of a just peace which would involve reversal of the ethnic cleansing and conquest of terrain and a guarantee of the right of return for the refugees extremely difficult if the mediators (initially Owen and Vance on behalf of the EC and the UN respectively, and later Owen and Stoltenberg) lacked military back-up for their proposals. In fact, it looked very much as if the West would feel greatly embarrassed if the mediators really did manage to bring about a peace agreement, since that would have required a greater number of troops than was available for Bosnia at that moment.

If the situation at the negotiating table was so difficult, it might seem that one alternative was to leave matters to be decided on the battlefield. The Serbs were indeed able to translate their military superiority into territorial gains at the beginning of the war. The Bosnian Government was keen to win the conquered terrain back, but has hampered in achieving this aim by the arms embargo on all parts of the former Yugoslavia that the UN had announced at the end of September 1991. This led to the schizophrenic situation that while the international community recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina in April 1992, it did not give the government of the new state the opportunity to defend itself against encroachment on its territorial integrity. It is hardly surprising that the Bosnian Government and people felt little sympathy for the UN troops who prevented them from waging war and thus helped to maintain the status quo achieved by the Serbs. This must have made the proclamation of the principle of impartiality by UNPROFOR sound very false in the ears of the Bosnian Government and the Muslims.

The Bosnian Government, which increasingly became a Muslim government in the course of 1993, was not very keen on accepting a peace that consolidated the existing conditions in part or in whole. They tried to regain terrain with the aid of clandestine arms supplies and attacks on Serb arms caches. As long as they saw some prospects of success in this process, they did not actually want peace. It is more difficult to explain why the Bosnian Serb leaders were so reluctant to accept peace. They had already conquered more than the 64 percent of Bosnian territory to which they had laid claim at the start of the war. One would have thought that they would have been delighted to agree to peace terms backed up by the West that would have legitimized their territorial gains. Although the Vance-Owen plan (and subsequent peace plans) did involve their giving up some of their gains, the remainder would have been recognized. Acceptance of the plan would have obliged the West to implement a very difficult plan which would in practice have given the Bosnian Serbs much that they had not been able to achieve at the negotiating table. Their acceptance of the plan would have left Izetbegovic holding the baby. As things turned out, it was the latter who agreed with the full plan at the end of March 1993 in order to place the Bosnian Serbs in a bad light as viewed from the West. The Serbs were never very good at such double bluffs.

The advantages the Serbs could gain from acceptance of a peace plan became clear when the Owen-Stoltenberg plan and the Invincible plan were laid on the table in the summer of 1993. The Western mediators and governments were getting so tired of their failures that they started to blame the victim by laying the responsibility for the continuation of the war on the Muslims. It was clear by this time that the West was more or less prepared to accept ethnic division of Bosnia-Herzegovina, in other words the suggestion that Van Walsum had made two summers ago and that had been roundly rejected at the time. All that remained were the Safe Areas, of which Van Walsum had already said in December 1992 that while the Netherlands had wanted them, they represented an enormous risk as long as the international community was not prepared to protect them – by force of arms, if necessary.

4. The Dutch approach to the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia

In the summer of 1991, when Van Walsum made his proposal about the correction of Yugoslavia's internal boundaries, the Netherlands coincidentally happened to take over the chairmanship of the EC at just about the same time as the outbreak of the Yugoslav conflict. This caused Dutch Foreign Minister Hans Van den Broek, and to a lesser extent Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers, to become directly involved in this conflict. Van den Broek was keen to make a success of the Dutch chairmanship, that was supposed to culminate in the ratification of the historic Maastricht Treaty, putting the seal on a common foreign policy for the Twelve among other things. The Yugoslav question raised its head at an inopportune moment. Van den Broek put all his energies into looking for a solution, but owing among other things to a lack of insight into what was really happening in Yugoslavia, all his activity soon degenerated into the making of provisional fixes which only lasted a few days. Within little more than a month, the Minister himself became hopelessly frustrated while his image abroad suffered rapid damage.

Not in the Netherlands, though. Dutch MPs were full of praise for a Foreign minister who seemed finally able to show the world that a small country was capable of great deeds. The European Community has sometimes been criticized for overhasty involvement in the crisis in the former Yugoslavia, 'not because it had a solution or the necessary means, but because it hoped to acquire both'.⁵⁵⁰⁰ This statement, which referred mainly to the initial period of the Yugoslav conflict when the Netherlands chaired the European Community, is in fact quite a good description of practically the entire Dutch contribution to the debate on the former Yugoslavia from mid-1991 to the end of 1993. The relative insignificance of the Netherlands on the world stage and the low level of knowledge about the Balkans were actually seen as advantages by Dutch politicians and civil servants, since it meant that the Netherlands would not represent a threat to the various parties to the Yugoslav conflict. This attitude explains the marked tendency of Dutch decision-makers to transpose the harmony model, which worked so well in their own country, to Yugoslavia where a certain level of threat and possibly also of physical violence were almost inevitable in the initial phase of the conflict.

One of the main factors that led to the low effectiveness of the Dutch foreign minister as chairman of the EC in dealing with this question was the fact that, just a few days after the outbreak of the conflict in Yugoslavia, the German Government took a radically different course from that envisaged by the Dutch in their chairmanship of the EC. Moreover, the Paris-Bonn axis which had been damaged by this idiosyncratic German stance was back to its original state within a couple of months. This meant that Van den Broek was continually confronted by little plans cooked up jointly by the French and Germans which ran counter to his own intentions. Instead of accepting this fact and trying to bend it subtly to his advantage whenever possible, Van den Broek got annoyed. This certainly did not improve his relations with his German counterpart Genscher, who saw this as just one more reason to pay very little attention to the Netherlands as chair of the EC. The Dutch Parliament did nothing to correct Van den Broek's attitude but rather praised the minister who was being given such a hard time by his German counterpart.

In fact, Van den Broek had basically lost control of the situation by mid-August. Important decisions concerning the conference on Yugoslavia, such as the time at which it was due to start, the conditions for a ceasefire and the setting up of the Badinter Commission, were dictated by others. Van den Broek could only look on as Kohl and Genscher managed to arrange the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia by the EC without reference to him.

The experience gained during the Dutch chairmanship of the EC was important for the subsequent period in two respects. In the first place, Foreign minister Van den Broek had got his teeth into the issue. As a result, once he was freed of the obligations of chairmanship he went on advocating a hard line on Serbia and forceful intervention in Bosnia. Secondly, the Dutch Parliament took the traditional approach of not making things too difficult for the Foreign minister during their country's chairmanship of the EC. Dutch MPs knew that statements made by their Foreign minister were interpreted in other European capitals as the voice of the Twelve. Their attitude could be characterized as 'Van den Broek belongs to Europe for the moment, but at the same time he is very much one of us'. This led to a gradual blunting of Parliament's readiness to hold the government to account, which was accentuated by the fact that Parliament tended to discuss the policy with respect to (the former) Yugoslavia in a more informal manner, and hardly ever in a plenary debate.

⁵⁵⁰⁰ S.K. Pavlowitch, 'Who is 'Balkanizing' Whom?', p. 219.

It goes without saying that Dutch relinquishment of the EC chairman's gavel at the end of 1991, and the end of outright war in Croatia after implementation of the Vance Plan, took some wind out of the Dutch Government's sails for a time. However, when war broke out in Bosnia and some information on the excesses occurring there leaked out, Van den Broek – now firmly supported by Prime Minister Lubbers – became an outspoken advocate of firm intervention. The Dutch Government put forward this standpoint repeatedly in the international debate on the Yugoslav problem, despite frequent warnings in the media that it was unwise to adopt such a far-reaching stance when the Netherlands was unable to make a substantial military contribution itself to the ending – or at least the damping down – of the conflict.

While it is true that the Netherlands did contribute a signals battalion and a number of transport units, the very presence of the latter units underlined the need for deployment of a Dutch combat unit within the framework of the approach taken. When the Netherlands advocated more and harder action during the international debate in the summer of 1992, it was forced to go cap in hand to Paris and London to ask for protection for its transport units.

The spotlight then fell on the Dutch Airmobile Brigade, which was the first unit consisting entirely of regular servicemen that came into consideration for deployment, thus avoiding the problems the government might be faced with in connection with the fact that conscripts could only be deployed on a voluntary basis. However, the first battalion of this brigade would not be available until the end of 1993 or the beginning of 1994.

The situation thus arose that the Dutch Government had difficulty formulating an offer for the Safe Areas of which they had been such a strong advocate long before they came into existence. When it came to the bit, in June 1993, all that the government could offer was a logistic unit – and it was clear that even that was not operational at the moment the offer was made. Shortly before that, in April 1993, the government had not been able to commit itself to supplying a combat unit for the implementation of the Vance-Owen plan, though officials of the Dutch Foreign Ministry were stating off the record that it might be possible to make the Airmobile Brigade available in the long term. In early May, the government decided to do all it could to make the first battalion of this brigade ready for deployment as soon as possible. Once again, Parliament followed the government's lead. The motion proposed by Van Vlijmen (CDA) and Van Traa (PvdA), requesting deployment of the brigade in the former Yugoslavia, was not so much the spark that ignited the government policy as the crown on this policy.

Peter Kooijmans, who succeeded Van den Broek as Foreign Minister in early 1993, initially displayed a sense of reality about the likelihood of getting things moving internationally in the handling of the war in Bosnia, but after a couple of months he was following more and more in the footsteps of his predecessor. In March 1993, with the support of Parliament, he put pressure on Minister of Defence Ter Beek to realize a maximum commitment of units of the Royal Netherlands Army. This led Ter Beek, against the wishes of the Chief of Defence Staff, General A.K. Van der Vlis, to indicate the prospects of the Airmobile Brigade being available in the foreseeable future. Once Srebrenica had been declared a Safe Area, Kooijmans urged that other regions should be given the same status, and that the option of giving such enclaves protection from the air should be considered.

The Dutch Government's timing was not always optimal in the summer of 1993. For example, it stated in mid-June that it might be able to commit an airmobile battalion at some (unspecified) time in the future as part of the force required for implementation of a peace plan, in the hope of encouraging other countries to make similar commitments. This was, however, more than two months too late for the Vance-Owen plan. At about the same time as the Dutch Government was trying to use this promise of an airmobile battalion to catalyse the peace process, Milosevic and Tudjman announced suggestions for a new peace plan that conflicted strongly with the views of the Dutch Government because it involved ethnic partition of Bosnia.

When as expected the Netherlands failed two months later to comply with the UN's request to supply a logistic unit, the Dutch ministry of Defence did its best to cobble together a combined offer of an airmobile battalion with its own logistic component. Defence wanted to make this offer, which would apply both to the Safe Areas and to the implementation of a peace plan, during a visit Ter Beek was paying to Boutros-Ghali. At practically the same time, Dutch Foreign Minister Kooijmans was explaining to the mediators Owen and Stoltenberg that it was by no means certain that the Netherlands would cooperate in the formation of such an implementation force in view of what he saw as the ethical shortcomings of the plan.

This was typical of the lack of coordination between the Dutch ministries of Foreign Affairs and Defence. Defence was starting to come out from under the wings of Foreign Affairs in the field of security policy, partly as a result of the increased tempo of the peacekeeping operations. Personal disagreements between Foreign Minister Van den Broek and Defence Minister Ter Beek in the past contributed to this state of affairs. The Dutch constitution did not make full provisions for the Prime Minister to arbitrate in such differences. The ministry of General Affairs (roughly equivalent to the Cabinet Office in the UK) had developed the habit of not intervening in such matters unless the ministers in question indicated that there were problems. The relations between Van den Broek and Prime Minister Lubbers in the early nineties were not such as to make it likely that Van den Broek would be readily disposed to bring a problem to Lubbers' attention. As a result of this attitude on the part of Van den Broek, the ministry of Foreign Affairs as a whole was more or less allergic to intervention from General Affairs. And Ter Beek was wary of involving the Prime Minister, because in his view Lubbers' propensity to creative thinking in solving other people's problems was more likely to make things worse than to improve them.

In fact, the day after the Dutch Foreign Ministry had decided that the new offer of the airmobile battalion applied to the Safe Areas the whole objective went by the board. Spokespersons from Foreign Affairs now changed their tune, and claimed that the offer applied to the implementation of a peacekeeping force. The ministry had apparently dropped its objections to a peace treaty quite quickly when Foreign Minister Kooijmans, asked for an alternative for the Owen-Stoltenberg Plan, was at a loss for an answer. Both Defence and Foreign Affairs seemed to have assumed after the offer of the airmobile battalion had been made that Safe Areas were in any case the prelude to a peace treaty, and that it would not be long before the Safe Areas were incorporated into a wider arrangement aimed at implementation of an agreed peace plan. When all hopes of such an outcome faded quickly after the end of September, the Safe Areas were all that was left, and in the words of Foreign Minister Kooijmans they had become an anomaly.

Anomaly or not, the Dutch Government had made an offer in connection with them. Initial reconnaissance seemed to indicate that if the Dutch battalion was to be stationed in a Safe Area, it was likely to be in Srebrenica. Chief of Defence Staff Van der Vlis and Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Couzy were far from happy about this idea, as they foresaw great problems in keeping the enclave supplied in view of expected Serb opposition. Since however they did not believe that Dutch soldiers would run 'unacceptable risks' in such a situation, Defence Minister Ter Beek did not regard their reservations as of decisive importance. On 12 November, the government agreed in principle to the deployment of Dutchbat, though they reserved the option of making a new decision about the location. When the destination was announced at the beginning of December, however, the Dutch Government wasted few words on it. Parliament voted unanimously in favour of the decision, though this unanimity masked more doubt than might appear at first sight. Valk from the PvdA fraction wanted to delay his definitive support till the destination was known, but he was silenced by the scorn of his fellow MPs who felt that a debate on the deployment of Dutch troops was not a suitable occasion for giving expression to doubts.

MPs were not the only ones to have doubts about the utility of and scope for deployment, and about the safety of the 'blue helmets', though it may be noted that the debate about intervention – at least that part of the debate that took the form of press articles and letters to the editor – was less lively after the summer of 1992. (It has to be noted though that the absolute number of people taking part in the debate was never very high.) The voices raised against intervention actually tended to predominate in the course of 1993, because of dissatisfaction with the objectives laid down in the peace plans and because it became clear that other countries were having trouble turning their promises to supply troops into reality. There are even indications that unorganized public opinion, that had long been largely in favour of military intervention, showed a dip in the summer of 1993 – just when the government had committed itself to supply the airmobile battalion (the first Dutch combat unit to operate in the former Yugoslavia).

In fact, in the period preceding this decision the general mood of the Dutch public had been hardly, if at all, more in favour of military intervention than in countries like Germany or France. There was however a tendency for domestic outrage among Dutch politicians about what was going on in the former Yugoslavia to translate itself into demands on other countries. One of the reasons for this was that the Dutch Government made no distinction between ideal and material national interests. The maintenance and promotion of the international rule of law could in their eyes also be regarded as a Dutch national interest. Apart from the criterion that conscripts should only be sent on active military service on a voluntary basis, there were no reasons in principle against sending Dutch troops to Yugoslavia. For a country like Germany, it could be – and was – argued that military involvement was not permitted by the constitution, while there were also good historical reasons for not sending German troops to Yugoslavia in view of the events of the Second World War. Even though the Italian Government stated in the summer of 1993 that it would be prepared to overlook the last-mentioned concern as far as their own troops were concerned, Boutros-Ghali felt that it was still relevant. A special element in the equation was further the fact that many people in the Netherlands – including Van den Broek and Lubbers – were very sensitive to the similarities between the events in Yugoslavia and memories of the Second World War. The idea that the vow ‘never again’ that was repeated annually in the Dutch national commemoration of the events of the Second World War should be dishonoured was unbearable. It seemed that the Dutch sense of guilt for not having done enough during that war was now translated into the determination to be prepared to do no less than other countries.

It may be asked whether it might have been wiser for the Dutch Government to engage in ‘low politics’ rather than in ‘high politics’ in this connection. There was a tendency for both ministers and MPs not only to want to do more than other countries to manage and resolve the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, but also to criticize the governments of those countries for not doing enough – or even to play on the sympathies of the populace there in order to exert indirect pressure on their governments. Naturally enough, this irritated the governments in question. Even if their representatives did not put this feeling into words, Dutch ministers and officials still felt the implicit pressure on the Netherlands to prove that its level of (military) commitment was sufficiently high. It was not pleasant to be confronted with the (implied) criticism, ‘the Netherlands promises a lot, but its performance is poor’. The willingness to do something went so far that the Dutch Government set no conditions on its offer to deploy the airmobile battalion, but committed itself fully on the basis of its own words and emotions. Doubts about the effectiveness of the Dutch contribution would come later.

It might have been better if the energy that had gone into this military commitment had been invested in aid to refugees or maintaining contacts with democratic forces aimed at promoting a multi-ethnic society or dialogue. Starting in the summer of 1992, there was a great discrepancy between the big words being spoken about intervention and the fact that thousands of Muslims and Croats were languishing in Serb prison camps because no country was prepared to accept them. Democratic forces in the former Yugoslavia felt abandoned because the West appeared to be only willing to talk to the nationalist leaders. Opportunistic or formal considerations long prevented the Dutch Government from subsidizing such pro-democracy groups. It looks very much as if the Dutch Government failed to realize that this was a field in which a small country could have made a big contribution.

The need to make oneself heard in particular at high political level was not simply an expression of the desire of Dutch politicians, diplomats and senior military officers to be counted among the big boys. It was also derived from a tendency to idealism and solidarity with the poor and oppressed that has long characterized Dutch foreign policy. This attitude can however also lead to intellectual laziness. Representatives of the Netherlands had become accustomed to take the lead in international discussions, believing with a certain degree of arrogance that the others would automatically fall in line behind them, even if this took some time. And if they did not, the Dutch Parliament and public could in any case be told that it was not the fault of the Netherlands that their advice had not been followed. As Piet Dankert, junior secretary for Foreign Affairs during the Lubbers-Kok coalition, put it, the Dutch had a tendency to behave as internationalists at an abstract level. They too often failed to realize that the Netherlands could not act in isolation from other countries: it might need them later. They were also sometimes unwilling or unable to put themselves in the other country's shoes. The assumption was that the governments of those countries should really also think just like the Dutch Government. In addition, when it came to the deployment of troops, the Dutch had relatively little recent experience of the behaviour of their own troops abroad. It would have been wise to pay more attention to the suggestions from countries that did have more experience in this field that discretion was the better part of valour in the case of Yugoslavia. The behaviour of Dutch ministers abroad in connection with the Yugoslav question suggests, however, that the ability not to overestimate their own importance was not their strongest point.

In fact, Dutch ministers did not pay much attention to the words of warning from their own generals either. The channels of communication between the military and the politicians seem to have been quite severely clogged. When senior military figures tried to get their message across via the media, since the politicians were apparently not prepared to listen, the same politicians tended to over-react. The Airmobile Brigade did however deserve a great deal of attention, not only because it was the first Dutch combat unit to be ready for deployment, but also because it was so expensive and was expected to show results as soon as it was (even partly) operational - if only because otherwise there might be a call for reconsideration of the choices that had been made during the reorganization of the Royal Netherlands Army (and which had led, among other things, to the creation of this new-style combat unit). A large part of the politicians, who were looking for an effective instrument, and the supporters of the Airmobile Brigade in the Army, who were looking for a worthwhile objective for their new unit, could at least reach agreement on this point.

5. Two kinds of ethics

'Bosnia was my main concern during the second half of my period as Foreign Secretary ... it actually consumed more intellectual and – let's put it this way – ethical effort than any other subject running at the time.'⁵⁵⁰¹

'Morality is neither functional nor rational. If one risks one's life by entering a burning house to save a neighbour's child and comes back carrying the dead child in one's arms, can we say that the action was worthless since it was unsuccessful? Morality is what gives value to this apparently useless sacrifice, to this attempt without success...'⁵⁵⁰²

'Pour moi, le premier commandement de la morale ou de l'éthique, quand on est à un poste de responsabilité, c'est précisément d'être responsable. De ne rien faire ni dire sans avoir pesé tous les termes de sa décision ou de sa déclaration, et être prêt à assumer toutes les conséquences qui pourront en découler. Est-ce anachronique? N'est-ce pas plutôt une exigence qu'il faudrait réhabiliter? ... Nous ne sommes pas devant un choix schématique entre morale et réalisme, mais devant la nécessité de marier les deux, de façon à être le plus efficace possible dans chaque cas particulier. ... Il n'y a pas aujourd'hui de tâche plus ⁵⁵⁰¹ Douglas Hurd, cited in: Simms, Hour, p. 45.

⁵⁵⁰² Izetbegovic, Islam, p. 109.

exaltante en politique étrangère que de faire une synthèse dynamique des courants réaliste et idéaliste.⁵⁵⁰³

Round the time of the Russo-Turkish war of 1875-1878, the outcome of which was of such great importance for Serbia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, the British statesmen Benjamin Disraeli and William Ewart Gladstone disagreed strongly. The latter was of the opinion that the politics of national interest and the balance of power should be set aside and that the British Government should operate on humanitarian grounds: 'We have been involved in moral complicity with the basest and blackest outrages upon record within the present century, if not within the memory of man.'⁵⁵⁰⁴ Disraeli took issue with such 'shallow politicians ... who have allowed their feelings of revolted humanity to make them forget the capital interest involved'. And the interests at stake were according to him 'not affected by the question whether it was 10,000 or 20,000 persons who perished'.⁵⁵⁰⁵ In the same period, the German Chancellor Otto von Bismarck stated that the Balkans were not worth the healthy bones of a single Pomeranian musketeer.⁵⁵⁰⁶

These differing views – those of Gladstone on the one hand and of Disraeli and Bismarck on the other – provide an excellent illustration of the distinction between the ethics of conviction or intention and the ethics of responsibility drawn in the Introduction to this part of the report.

It will be clear from the present report that the standpoint of Dutch politicians with respect to the crisis in the former Yugoslavia in the period 1991-1993 was largely based on considerations taken from the ethics of conviction. This appeared e.g. from the stance adopted by Prime Minister Lubbers on the eve of the EC summit in Edinburgh, when he told Parliament that he 'couldn't give a damn' which organization led the operations in Bosnia as long as something was done. It was also clearly illustrated by the reactions of Foreign Minister Kooijmans and his officials to the peace plans of Owen and Stoltenberg. Peace and stability on their own were not enough. It was also important that the peace should be a just one. However, Kooijmans was unable to reply to the mediators when they asked him whether he was prepared to state that he accepted a prolongation of the war in Bosnia. The fact that such a stance ultimately placed an obligation on the Dutch Government to make additional efforts to supply combat troops was accepted without complaint, and was even welcomed by some.

The ethics of conviction was not entirely absent in the debate about the former Yugoslavia that took place in countries like France and the UK, though the policy ultimately adopted was largely based on considerations of the consequences of the planned actions (and was thus more representative of the ethics of responsibility). For example, one analyst described the British policy as 'predominantly determined by international and regional practicalities'.⁵⁵⁰⁷ While the government in Paris was more generous than that in London as regards the deployment of troops, it still remained convinced up to the spring of 1995 that care had to be taken to ensure that Western military operations did not throw oil on the flames of the Yugoslav conflicts.

The dilemma of the choice between the ethics of conviction and the ethics of responsibility came up repeatedly in the media in the period preceding the decision to send Dutchbat to (the former) Yugoslavia. In fact, this was the essence of the intervention debate. For example, the former defence attaché in Belgrade, Brigadier-General (retd.) De Vogel wrote at the end of 1992:

'Why would the Dutch Government actually want to intervene in the Yugoslav conflict? On the basis of the TV images appearing as if by magic on our screens every evening, this might seem to be a superfluous question. A little thought will show, however, that this question is not so superfluous: we do need a moral ⁵⁵⁰³ Védrine, Cartes, pp. 170-171.

⁵⁵⁰⁴ Fouad Ajami, 'In Europe's Shadows', in: Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 44.

⁵⁵⁰⁵ Niall Ferguson, 'Europa Nervosa', in: Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, 128.

⁵⁵⁰⁶ Ibid., p. 129.

⁵⁵⁰⁷ James Gow, 'British Perspectives', in: Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. 88.

justification, based on logical arguments, for any intervention that may be undertaken. This logical basis is necessary not only to justify the policy that has been, or may be, arrived at but also in order to permit proper assessment of the level of risk one is prepared to run.⁵⁵⁰⁸

A few years later, in 1999, during the Kosovo crisis, the Dutch Foreign Minister at the time, Jozias Van Aartsen, wrote an opinionated article about the ‘CNN factor’, which threatened to turn into ‘a virtual Pied Piper’:

‘We are sometimes too easily bewitched by media reportage. Images of degrading conditions can whip up support for some cause or another among both the public and politicians within a matter of hours. Hard action is loudly called for. Good, effective foreign policy cannot however be based on primary emotions.’

In his opinion, thoroughly trained diplomats were better able ‘to pick out national or international interests from the tangled chaos of facts, and to get to the core of the problem’. And even that did not guarantee correct action, since ‘the scope for effective action in international relations is limited.’ The minister’s argument encapsulates in a nutshell the tension between the ethics of conviction – a call for hard action a few hours after the showing of images of degrading conditions – and a cautious approach with regard to the possible consequences of action. Van Aartsen did not leave it at that, however. He gave this tension a dialectic tail by asking whether it was right to acquiesce in such situations. In his view, the fifty-year-old Charter of the United Nations, with its stress on national sovereignty, put too many obstacles in the way of humanitarian intervention in the case of serious human rights violations. He therefore concluded his article with a call for courage to rethink the UN Charter and its place in international law.⁵⁵⁰⁹

Looking back on the policy of his predecessors and the rest of the Dutch Government in the period from 1991 to 1993, however, one can see little trace of such a synthesis of the ethics of conviction and the ethics of responsibility. Not only the Foreign ministers at the time but also MPs showed on the one hand disappointment about the position adopted by other countries, and on the other a certain gratification at the thought that the Netherlands was taking a lead with its military commitment in the former Yugoslavia.⁵⁵¹⁰ The chairman of the Dutch Association of (Armed Forces) Officers (Dutch abbreviation NOV) rightly characterized the policy of the Dutch Government towards the former Yugoslavia at the end of 1992 as one of ‘premature willingness to contribute (without counting the cost)’.⁵⁵¹¹ When Bert Bakker of the Bakker Committee asked Van den Broek in 2000 whether the Netherlands had played a leading part in thinking about possible military involvement in the former Yugoslavia during the period when he was Foreign Minister, Van den Broek replied that he was not ashamed to admit that this had been the case.⁵⁵¹² According to Jaap de Hoop Scheffer (a prominent member of the CDA fraction in Parliament at the time), who also testified before the same committee, during the discussion about Safe Areas the Netherlands ‘rightly took a lead at that moment – and continued to do so – when it came to doing all that was possible to reduce the suffering of ⁵⁵⁰⁸ Brigadier-General (ret.) J.C.A.C. de Vogel, ‘Ingrijpen in Joegoslavië?’ (‘Intervention in Yugoslavia?’), Carré 15(1992)12, p. 13.

⁵⁵⁰⁹ J.J. van Aartsen, ‘Buitenlands beleid moet zich niet laten leiden door CNN’ (‘Foreign policy should not be led by CNN’), NRC Handelsblad, 09/09/99.

⁵⁵¹⁰ See e.g. TK, 1993-1994, 22181, No. 67, pp. 1 and 7.

⁵⁵¹¹ Colonel N. Stuiver, Royal Netherlands Air Force (ret.), chairman of NOV, ‘De Nederlandse krijgsmacht op weg waar naar toe? Jaarrede 1992’ (Where are the Dutch armed forces going? Annual lecture 1992), Carré 15(1992)12, p. 9.

⁵⁵¹² TCBU, Vertrekpunt (Starting point), III, deposition by H. van den Broek, 22/05/00, p. 24.

people in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Not only the Netherlands took an indisputable lead in this discussion; so did the Dutch Parliament, so did the CDA fraction, so did I.⁵⁵¹³

It should be noted, however, that as early as 1977 the head of DAV (the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security in the Dutch Foreign Ministry) at the time, and later Secretary-General of the WEU, Willem Van Eekelen, had written that Parliament had a duty to guide public opinion and ‘to ensure that Gesinnung (citing the German sociologist Weber’s term for moral conviction) does not gain the upper hand over Verantwortung (responsibility)’.⁵⁵¹⁴ If this applied to Parliament, it applied even more strongly to the government in view of the latter’s administrative responsibilities.

A third kind of morality also played a role in the West’s policy with regard to the former Yugoslavia. The Canadian author Michael Ignatieff called this ‘virtue by proxy’, an attitude in which conscience allows itself to be bribed into silence. He accuses e.g. the American Government of this because while they employed a great deal of rhetoric in their policy concerning Yugoslavia, they were quite happy to leave peacekeeping operations on the ground to other countries or to provide arms to the Bosnian Government so that the Bosnian people could do their own fighting.⁵⁵¹⁵ According to Ignatieff, the attitude which allowed troops to be deployed in peacekeeping operations can also be called virtue by proxy: these troops were the ‘mercenaries of our conscience’.⁵⁵¹⁶ Seen in this light, the deployment of Dutchbat was the sacrifice the Dutch Government brought on the altar of its own policy of conviction. Whether such a sacrifice is justified depends, according to Ignatieff, on the outcome of a form of moral bookkeeping. The sacrifice involved in the deployment, plus the number of dead and wounded among the troops deployed, on the debit side must be balanced by the credit entry of the reduction in suffering in the region where the peacekeepers were deployed.⁵⁵¹⁷ At the moment when the decision to deploy Dutchbat was taken by the Dutch Government and approved by the Parliament in The Hague, this balance appeared to be positive. Would this conclusion be confirmed in the long term?

⁵⁵¹³ TCBU, Vertrepunt, III, deposition by J.G. de Hoop Scheffer, 29/05/00, p. 175.

⁵⁵¹⁴ Van Eekelen, Parlement, p. 53.

⁵⁵¹⁵ Michael Ignatieff, ‘Introduction: Virtue by Proxy’, in Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, pp. ix-x and xv.

⁵⁵¹⁶ Michael Ignatieff, ‘Introduction: Virtue by Proxy’, in Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, p. ix.

⁵⁵¹⁷ Michael Ignatieff, ‘Introduction: Virtue by Proxy’, in Danchev & Halverson (eds.), Perspectives, pp. x-xi.

Chapter 15

Problems with implementation

‘The real moral of the story is that once an offer of that kind is on the table a whole lot has to happen before you withdraw it, even if the circumstances in which you envisaged deploying the battalion have changed completely.’⁵⁵¹⁸

Once the Dutch Parliament had agreed to the government’s decision to send out the airmobile battalion which was to become known as Dutchbat, until Dutchbat was deployed in March 1994 there were still five problems that could in principle give rise to major concern at government level, viz. the area where it was to be deployed; how heavily it should be armed; the guarantees of air support; political and military complications in Bosnia that could affect the deployment of Dutchbat; and any uncertainties there might be as regards the battalion’s remit. To conclude Part I we shall consider these five aspects.

1. The deployment area

‘An honourable, not easy but certainly feasible, task’

By the end of November the Dutch government still did not know where Dutchbat would be deployed, although it did receive an indication on 24 November from the Deputy Chief of Operations and Command and Information Systems, Major General Kolsteren, who was visiting Bosnia at the time. He had talked to the Deputy Operations Officer that morning, who had told him that the night before General Briquemont had listed the options for the Dutch airmobile battalion in order of priority:

- ‘1. The bat. in Srebrenica/Zepa (reason: in the event of a peace plan this area would form a large Muslim enclave which could be protected by one good battalion).
2. The bat. in the Vares-Kladanj-Tuzla area, possibly alternating with NORBAT in supplying a company for Srebrenica.
3. The Zenica-Kakanj-Vares option with a sub-unit in Srebrenica.’⁵⁵¹⁹

All the options included the name of Srebrenica. On 29 November a reconnaissance party consisting of 20 representatives of the Airmobile Brigade, the Support Command (the logistics component) and the Crisis Staff in The Hague set off for Split for a visit that was to last until 12 December.⁵⁵²⁰ The party was led by Colonel Lemmen, Chief of Staff of the Airmobile Brigade. The Commander of the first battalion of the Airmobile Brigade to be sent out, Lieutenant Colonel Vermeulen, led the tactical part of the reconnaissance, and Lieutenant Colonel Van Dullemen, the intended Deputy Commander of Support Command, the logistical part.

⁵⁵¹⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.T. Hoekema, 24/05/00, p. 75.

⁵⁵¹⁹ DCBC, 1651. Kolsteren to DCBC, 24/11/93, 2135A.

⁵⁵²⁰ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from head of Section G3, W.J.T.M. Jeurissen, p.p. Cdr 1-Lk, to DOKL Crisis Staff et al., 16/11/93 No. G3 OPN002.

Despite the fact that the Deputy Military Adviser to the UN's Permanent Representation, Koestal, had sent a fax to The Hague a week before the departure of the mission saying that Dutchbat would be deployed in Central Bosnia,⁵⁵²¹ when the mission set off it was still assumed that there were two possible deployment areas, either the Zenica-Kakanj-Vares-Olovo area or Zenica, Kakanj and Srebrenica.⁵⁵²² The deployment area would be clarified following talks between General Reitsma, Deputy Commander of Land Forces, with General Briquemont on 1 December in Kiseljak. Reitsma was accompanied by Vandeweijer of the Defence Staff and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse of the Dutch Army Crisis Staff. In the talks Reitsma was supposed to stress the Dutch preference for deployment in the Vares-Kakanj-Zenica triangle.⁵⁵²³ There were major objections to the other option – Zenica, Kakanj and Srebrenica –, in particular since it would be difficult to satisfy the requirements of rapid medical care, which was 'unacceptable' as far as Vermeulen was concerned.⁵⁵²⁴ Supplies would also be a problem, as the area in between was in Bosnian Serb hands. Hence the Deputy Commander of Support Command, Lieutenant Colonel Van Dullemen, considered that Briquemont had to be told that this option could not be supported logistically.⁵⁵²⁵ Once the deployment area had been decided, the party would reconnoitre it.

Shortly before leaving, Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse was handed a note indicating that General Bastiaans had dined with the Force Commander, General Cot, on the evening of 28 November and the deployment of the Dutch battalion had been discussed. Cot had said that the Scandinavian countries were willing to send one company to Srebrenica temporarily until Dutchbat arrived. After that 'strong consideration' was being given to deploying the main force of the Dutch battalion in Central Bosnia, with one company in Srebrenica.⁵⁵²⁶

At that time UNPROFOR Commander Cot was seriously concerned about Srebrenica. As he said later, the enclave was indisputably the black sheep among the Safe Areas.⁵⁵²⁷ A Canadian company had been deployed there on 18 April, but this cannot have been much to the Canadian government's liking. Three weeks earlier the Dutch Defence Attaché in Ottawa had been told that 'there was a growing feeling' among the Canadian defence authorities 'that the Canadians have done enough and it's time for someone else to take over'.⁵⁵²⁸ Just two days after 143 Canadians arrived in Srebrenica, on 20 April, the Canadian government began to be seriously concerned about the situation of its troops. Without adequate demilitarization the Serbs might feel they had the right to invade the enclave. It was far from certain whether they would allow themselves to be restrained by the presence of Canadian forces, the authorities in Ottawa gloomily surmised.⁵⁵²⁹ They were also concerned about the remote situation of Srebrenica, a long way from the rest of the area controlled by Bosnian government troops and close to Serbia. The Canadians were also not happy about the fact that their battalion had been split up between Visoko and Srebrenica.⁵⁵³⁰ Hence the Canadian Department of National Defence began working on plans for the withdrawal of the Canadian troops almost immediately after they had ⁵⁵²¹ CRST. Koestal to Defence Staff and Army Crisis Staff, 22/11/93, 1116.

⁵⁵²² BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from DOKL, Operational Affairs Section, Deputy CS Army Crisis Staff to G3-1 Lk et al., 24/11/93, 1400; Van Bouwdijk B., Head Operational Affairs Section, no date. This latter document is also in the Ministry of Defence archives, 395 OZ, dated 26/11/93, No. OZ/7313.

⁵⁵²³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵⁵²⁴ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from 11 Infbat AIRMBL (APC) to Deputy BLS via Crisis Staff, 26/11/93.

⁵⁵²⁵ DCBC, 1172. Reconnaissance Party I, Internal memorandum from Deputy Chief SPTCMD W. van Dullemen to Deputy CS Crisis Staff Van Bouwdijk B., 26/11/93. See also Jellema, First-in, p. 56.

⁵⁵²⁶ CRST. Note from Deputy Chief Operations of Army Staff to DOKL c.c. CS Crisis Staff.

⁵⁵²⁷ Interview J. Cot, 19/04/00.

⁵⁵²⁸ ABZ, PVNAVO. De Vos van Steenwijk 35 to Kooijmans, 29/03/93.

⁵⁵²⁹ Interview Aaron Hywarren and Col. Tim Sparling, 12/11/99.

⁵⁵³⁰ Interview B. Fowler, 06/06/97.

arrived in the enclave.⁵⁵³¹ The Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister, Barbara McDougall, at once tried to persuade the British and French governments to station their troops in Srebrenica alongside the Canadians, but neither government was interested.⁵⁵³²

Meanwhile a second Canadian company had been stationed in Srebrenica, but the two of them were replaced on 11 October 1993 by a single company, the Infantry Company of the 22nd Regiment, which was only able to man eight observation posts and had to abandon five existing posts.

When UNPROFOR Commander Cot tried, at the end of September, to move part of the Nordbat 2 battalion, consisting of Swedish, Norwegian and Danish forces, from Tuzla to Srebrenica until the Dutch battalion arrived, the Swedish government refused point blank.⁵⁵³³ An attempt by Briquemont to get this unit to Srebrenica by issuing an order to the Swedish battalion commander was unsuccessful: the commander simply refused, saying he could not go there without permission from the Scandinavian governments.⁵⁵³⁴ In the first weekend of December UNPROFOR put in another request, this time to all three Scandinavian Foreign Ministers, for temporary placement of a company in Srebrenica to relieve the Canadian unit which was there awaiting the arrival of Dutchbat,⁵⁵³⁵ but the Scandinavian Ministers refused. They objected to the isolated location of Srebrenica, its situation in a valley and the large number of Displaced Persons in the enclave, and furthermore they insisted on being allowed to take tanks with them at the urging of the Danish Parliament.⁵⁵³⁶ Following this refusal Cot summoned the battalion commander to Zagreb to give him a personal order to direct his unit to Srebrenica. Upset at this, the Swedish Colonel, Ulf Hendrikson, told Cot, who took the matter seriously, that his government forbade him to do this as the parliaments of the participating countries had earmarked the battalion solely for Tuzla.⁵⁵³⁷ On 12 December the Swedish commander confirmed to the Dutch General Bastiaans, head of the UN observers, that he was not permitted to obey Cot's order without consulting the Scandinavian governments.⁵⁵³⁸

When Reitsma, Vandeweijer and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse arrived in Zagreb on 1 December they found that direct talks with Briquemont could not take place. The UN contract with the pilots of the airline Sky Link, who had been contracted to provide transport for UNPROFOR between Zagreb and Sarajevo, had expired, and the pilots refused to take passengers from Zagreb to Sarajevo for the UN until they had been paid. Deep snowfall meant that Sarajevo could not be reached by road either, so Reitsma contacted Briquemont by telephone from the office of Bokhoven, the Commander of the Dutch Contingent. Before he did so, however, Bokhoven told him that it was certain as far as he was concerned that the Dutch battalion would be sent to Srebrenica.⁵⁵³⁹ In the telephone conversation, according to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, Briquemont did not say 'it's to be Srebrenica' in so many words,⁵⁵⁴⁰ he merely said that Dutchbat would not be stationed in Central Bosnia but in a Safe Area.⁵⁵⁴¹ According to Bokhoven Briquemont was being 'shrewd', but it was clear from the telephone conversation that Srebrenica and Zepa would be the deployment area.⁵⁵⁴² Briquemont would not entertain a request by Reitsma to station the Dutch battalion in Central Bosnia, near the transport ⁵⁵³¹ Interview Aaron Hywarren and Col. Tim Sparling, 12/11/99.

⁵⁵³² Honig & Both, Srebrenica, pp. 155-156.

⁵⁵³³ Eriksson, 'Intelligence', p. 17 n. 14; interview A.K. van der Vlis, 13/02/98. See also Briquemont, Something, pp. 213-214.

⁵⁵³⁴ Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 63; interviews G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00, and F. Briquemont, 22/06/00; UN report, par. 104.

⁵⁵³⁵ DOKL/OZ. Van der Vlis to Ter Beek and Frinking, 02/12/93, No. S93/061/3990.

⁵⁵³⁶ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00; K. Hillingsø, 28/10/99; General K. Lyng, 29/10/99; B. Pelnäss, 03/11/99.

⁵⁵³⁷ Interviews J. Cot, 19/04/00; G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00, and F. Briquemont, 22/06/00; Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 63.

⁵⁵³⁸ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; journal note G.J.M. Bastiaans, 12/12/93.

⁵⁵³⁹ Interview R. Reitsma, 04/10/99.

⁵⁵⁴⁰ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁴¹ Interview R. Reitsma, 04/10/99.

⁵⁵⁴² Interview H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01; Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, Part II, Appendix 4, interview Bokhoven, 04/09/98, p. 7.

battalion.⁵⁵⁴³ In the conversation with Briquemont Reitsma did say that secure logistics and medical evacuation were ‘specific areas of concern’ for the Dutch government.⁵⁵⁴⁴

Briquemont subsequently stated that there was no government willing to send troops to Srebrenica, neither the British, the French, the Scandinavian nor the Spanish governments, and the Canadian government wanted to get its company out of the enclave as soon as possible. He was convinced himself that the Safe Areas were a bad idea and Srebrenica was too far to the east, but ‘I had to argue in favour of the deployment of the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica.’⁵⁵⁴⁵

Following this telephone conversation Bokhoven arranged for Reitsma to visit Cot.⁵⁵⁴⁶ Reitsma also went into this meeting ready to state the conditions that deployment had to be to a contiguous area and that the unit’s logistics and medical supplies had to be secure. While Briquemont could be said to have presented the deployment in Srebrenica and Zepa ‘shrewdly’ and not ‘in so many words’, Cot left no room for misunderstanding whatsoever. ‘He came straight to the point, bang!’, according to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse.

‘I have only one priority, Srebrenica! There is only one task for the battalion. That’s how it came across to me. It was really ‘bang!’. Scarcely anything by way of introduction. Well, the three polite phrases, of course... He even used the word ‘évident’, I think. ‘C’est évident.’⁵⁵⁴⁷

As a result of failure to reach a political solution and lack of troops the French general had been obliged to prioritize the implementation of Resolution 836 on Safe Areas and Freedom of Movement in order to secure humanitarian aid and supplies to the UN forces. Meanwhile the UNPROFOR Commander had found a solution for almost all the safe areas and Central Bosnia. Britbat would keep the principal supply route to Central Bosnia open. The Canadians would protect the central part of the Muslim area and act as back-up in the event of an emergency evacuation of Sarajevo. The Scandinavian battalion would concentrate on the area around Tuzla. Protection was provided for Bihac by the French battalion there. Sarajevo was adequately protected by Egyptian, Ukrainian and two French battalions. A Ukrainian unit would protect Gorazde. This only left Srebrenica, from which the Canadian company wanted to withdraw as soon as possible, and Zepa. General Cot indicated, probably in an attempt at reassurance, that there were plans for exchanging areas, including the three eastern enclaves. Bokhoven was able to confirm this, as he had been present in October when Cot had talked to Izetbegovic and Silajdzic about the subject.⁵⁵⁴⁸ As Dutchbat would not be able to start deploying until the end of February/beginning of March, Cot had asked the Scandinavian battalion to take over Srebrenica temporarily. As was already clear, he did not have much success.

In response to Reitsma’s condition that Dutchbat should only operate in a contiguous area Cot said that he regarded the areas of Srebrenica and Zepa as a single entity. According to him the two areas were only 25 kilometres apart and a corridor between the two enclaves would be provided. Brinkman, Vandeweijs and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse were well aware that it was not as easy as Cot presented it. But it was clear that Cot had only one option for the Dutch force. Any cautious objection on the part of Reitsma would elicit a response from Cot along the lines of ‘You’re not telling me that a Dutch battalion can’t manage that?’⁵⁵⁴⁹ In effect Cot faced Reitsma’s team with a ‘take it or leave it’ offer. The Dutch battalion could come, but only to Srebrenica and Zepa. An airmobile battalion would ⁵⁵⁴³ Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, Part II, Appendix 4, interview Bokhoven, 04/07/98, p. 7; interview H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01.

⁵⁵⁴⁴ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from Deputy BLS to Lemmen, c.c. L.Col. Van Hoorn Alkema and Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, 01/12/93, 2130.

⁵⁵⁴⁵ Interview F. Briquemont, 22/06/00.

⁵⁵⁴⁶ CRST. Fax from DOKL to CDS d.t.v. SCOCIS (Kolsteren), 02/12/93, 0040; interview H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01.

⁵⁵⁴⁷ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁴⁸ Van Kemenade, Omtrent Srebrenica, II, deel 4, interview Bokhoven, 04/09/98, p. 7; interview H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01.

⁵⁵⁴⁹ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

thus have to be deployed in two enclaves, access to which was controlled by troops known for delaying convoys. A battalion whose strategic advantage derived from its air mobility and the limited predictability of its deployment area was being turned into a sitting duck which simply had to guess whether there would be enough supplies to ensure its operational and tactical mobility.

There was nothing left for Reitsma other than to tell Cot that he would report to his minister.⁵⁵⁵⁰ If the Dutch Government had not been willing to send troops to Srebrenica, none would have gone there. As Minister Pronk said, ‘There was no alternative, unless no- one went there.’⁵⁵⁵¹ Briquemont considered with hindsight that the Dutch Government ought to have refused to deploy in Srebrenica:

‘Then the politicians would at last have had to review UNPROFOR’s operational strategy, and above all the blue helmets’UN peacekeepers’ mandate, if they wanted to retain the concept of safe zones.’⁵⁵⁵²

If the Dutch Government had refused it would indeed have faced the UN with a dilemma. But was it conceivable, given the substantial political pressure to do something, to give the Dutch presence a higher profile and to protect the Safe Areas, and after the promises made in Copenhagen and New York, that the Netherlands would say ‘no’ and withdraw its offer of the battalion? That Reitsma, in other words, would advise the Dutch Government against this course of action? Not according to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse:

‘We felt we were faced with a fait accompli... The battalion was ready to go. The battalion wanted to go. The political pressure in the Netherlands was extremely strong. The Netherlands had shouted from the rooftops ‘We are going to take part!’ Parliament, the government, the Foreign minister, the Defence minister. The whole caboodle: ‘We’re going to take part!’ The Dutch press was urging ‘We must, we must!’ That pressure, of course, was paramount. Then there was the way Cot presented it. As a result we simply couldn’t go back.’⁵⁵⁵³

At Bokhoven’s office Reitsma, Vandeweyer and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse drew up messages for the commander of the reconnaissance party, Colonel Lemmen, and the Army Staff.⁵⁵⁵⁴ At half-past nine in the evening Reitsma notified Lemmen by fax that his discussions that day had revealed that Dutchbat’s job would be to secure the Safe Areas of Srebrenica and Zepa.

Although Minister Ter Beek had not yet consented to this, the reconnaissance now had to be concerned solely with this deployment option. The exchange of information with the Canadian battalion in Srebrenica – ‘already partly done’ – and the Ukrainian battalion in Zepa had to be ‘deepened’.⁵⁵⁵⁵

At two minutes past midnight on the night of 1-2 December Reitsma sent a fax to the Army Staff⁵⁵⁵⁶ indicating that he had taken good note of the preference expressed by Parliament on 16 November for deployment in a contiguous area in Central Bosnia. He also reported that he had raised the need for proper logistical support and medical care with Cot. From the conversations with both Cot and Briquemont it was clear, however, that there was only one deployment option, Srebrenica and ⁵⁵⁵⁰ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁵¹ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁵⁵⁵² Briquemont, Something, p. 225. See also Van Meteren, ‘Oud-VN-General: drama Srebrenica was onnodig’ (Ex-UN General says Srebrenica drama was unnecessary), ANP, 09/01/97, 21:37.

⁵⁵⁵³ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00. Similar communication in interview H. Bokhoven, 16/05/01

⁵⁵⁵⁴ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁵⁵ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from Deputy BLS to Col. Lemmen, c.c. Lt. Col. Van Hoorn Alkema and Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff, 01/12/93, 2130.

⁵⁵⁵⁶ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from DOKL to CDS d.t.v. SCOCIS (Brigadier General Kolsteren), 02/12/93, 0040.

Zepa. Reitsma said that according to Cot the Dutch battalion's task in the Safe Areas would not be 'more dangerous or more difficult' than that of the other battalions in Bosnia. Because of the international pressure on Serbia, Reitsma continued in his fax, the Bosnian Serbs were not expected to attack the enclaves. 'On the contrary, there is more likelihood of negotiation than of confrontation.' He also noted that Cot did not exclude the possibility of an exchange of the eastern Safe Areas for areas around Sarajevo at some time in the future. Supplies ought not to be a problem either, according to Cot, as the combatants had signed an agreement on 29 November guaranteeing freedom of movement of convoys along three central routes in Bosnia.

Reitsma did not hide the fact that the assignment would be 'no easy task', pointing out the difficult terrain and the question of where to locate Support Command. Reitsma's fax followed Cot's assertion that Srebrenica and Zepa were a contiguous area, thus meeting Parliament's desires. On the same lines he maintained that the problem of adequate medical care could be solved by providing surgical facilities in one of the two enclaves.

Reitsma's conclusion was that the Netherlands, by deploying in the two enclaves, would make a valuable contribution to implementing Resolution 836: 'The Srebrenica and Zepa option is an honourable, not easy but feasible, task for the Dutch Army and fits in with the requirements of the government and Parliament's wishes.' He recommended that the locations that had been assigned be accepted quickly, for one thing to avoid speculation by the press and personnel.⁵⁵⁵⁷

Reitsma enclosed with his fax the declaration by the combatants on guarantees of freedom of movement for convoys along the routes Ploce-Metkovic-Mostar-Sarajevo-Tuzla, Belgrado-Sarajevo via Zvornik, and Zagreb-Sarajevo via Banja Luka. The signatories, who included Delic and Karadzic but not Mladic, acknowledged 'that should elements within their area of responsibility inhibit the inflow of humanitarian assistance and logistic supply, they acknowledge that UNPROFOR will use all available means including force to establish unimpeded flow.'

Just over half an hour after receiving Reitsma's fax the Army Staff sent it on to Van der Vlis.⁵⁵⁵⁸ Couzy substantively agreed with Reitsma.⁵⁵⁵⁹ He knew that there was no other country willing to send troops to Srebrenica. Asked in 2000 why he had not opposed this he opined that a country like the Netherlands could not refuse out of loyalty to the UN. Furthermore, 'If it was a question of gauging the risks to Dutch UN servicemen, Bihac and Sarajevo were more dangerous locations than Srebrenica and Zepa.'⁵⁵⁶⁰ And the mission was feasible in military terms.⁵⁵⁶¹

⁵⁵⁵⁷ With his subsequently much quoted words Reitsma, without realizing it, was probably referring to the 'honourable and difficult task' referred to almost eighty years earlier when a Dutch peace mission in another part of the Balkans, Albania, was completed and a Dutch Lieutenant Colonel, Lodewijk Thomson, died there. The journalist Doe Hans, quoted in Marcel Broersma, 'De held van Durazzo' (The Hero of Durazzo), Historisch Nieuwsblad, September 2000, p. 45.

⁵⁵⁵⁸ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from DOKL to CDS d.t.v. SCOCIS (Kolsteren), 02/12/93, 0040.

⁵⁵⁵⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, pp. 63-64.

⁵⁵⁶⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 63.

⁵⁵⁶¹ Ibid., p. 64.

Reitsma's fax and the reactions of the Dutch military suggest that Srebrenica was relatively safe compared with the other option that had been on the cards for some considerable time, namely Zenica, and tactically that was indeed the case. At that time there was violent conflict taking place in Central Bosnia, not in Srebrenica. Operationally, however, Srebrenica was less safe because the Bosnian Serbs controlled the supply lines, so they could stop supplies and changeover of forces at any time they pleased.

'Somehow or other' Reitsma's fax never reached Van der Vlis, but it went straight to the minister, after which the Chief of Defence Staff was told that the minister wanted a rapid reaction from him.⁵⁵⁶² That same day, 2 December, Van der Vlis informed Minister Ter Beek that both he and Couzy stood by the description of stationing Dutchbat in Srebrenica and Zepa as 'an honourable, not easy but feasible, task'. Van der Vlis was able to add that it had been 'relatively peaceful for some time now' in Srebrenica and Zepa.⁵⁵⁶³

On or around 2 December Brigadier General Bastiaans objected to the deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica in a telephone conversation with the Deputy Chief of Operations or the Head of the Crisis Staff because of the difficulties the Canadian battalion had met with there.⁵⁵⁶⁴ This message did not reach Minister Ter Beek. At that time he heard no reservations 'from anyone' regarding the mission to Srebrenica. Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse too, on his return to the Netherlands, said he had not heard of any criticism of the choice of location. There was a lot of talk, he said, about the problem of the supply lines, but otherwise everyone proceeded to the order of the day, as there was not much time to prepare for the mission.⁵⁵⁶⁵ The Army's Head of Intelligence and Security, General Bosch, remembered that he and his staff were shown maps of the area and 'we agreed that these were difficult areas. But that's not unusual in itself, as there aren't any easy areas in Yugoslavia.'⁵⁵⁶⁶ ⁵⁵⁶² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.K. van der Vlis, p. 56.

⁵⁵⁶³ DOKL/OZ. Van der Vlis to Ter Beek and Frinking, 02/12/93, No. S93/061/3990.

⁵⁵⁶⁴ Interview G.L.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; Bastiaans to NIOD, 12/12/00.

⁵⁵⁶⁵ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁶⁶ Interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99.

On 2 December Ter Beek telephoned Lubbers, Kok and Kooijmans about the deployment in Srebrenica and Zepa, and they gave their approval.⁵⁵⁶⁷ After the Ministerial Council had also agreed,⁵⁵⁶⁸ on 3 December Parliament was notified of the deployment area in a letter in which the government stated that the Scandinavian battalion was originally to have been stationed partly in Tuzla, partly in Srebrenica, but a lot of importance was attached to reopening Tuzla airport. The international community had for some considerable time been pressing for the reopening of the airport to enable goods to be flown in, as otherwise there would be a 'humanitarian disaster' in Tuzla and the three eastern enclaves.⁵⁵⁶⁹ The Bosnian Serbs refused to permit its reopening, however, as they feared that Tuzla would be used for arms supplies to the Muslims.⁵⁵⁷⁰ On top of this, Briquemont wanted to have the Safe Areas of Srebrenica and Gorazde secured by the same battalion. It was against this background that the plan of stationing the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica and Zepa had been hatched. Logistical and medical support for the Dutch UN forces in the Srebrenica and Zepa enclaves would require good preparation, said the government: 'use can in fact be made of the knowledge and experience already gained on the spot by Canadian and Ukrainian forces'.⁵⁵⁷¹ It is said that a passage that mentioned the presence of Bosnian Serb heavy arms around Srebrenica was scrapped from the draft on the orders of Van Eenennaam.⁵⁵⁷² The announcement of the locations Srebrenica and Zepa did not in fact attract much attention in the Netherlands and certainly did not produce any criticism.

The reconnaissance

Once it was known that Srebrenica and Zepa would be the deployment area, on 3 December in Visoko some of the Dutch reconnaissance party were given a 'well-organized briefing' by the commander of the Canadian battalion about the situation in Srebrenica, which answered 'almost all our main questions': about the combatants and their weaponry, the ceasefire violations (150 to 400 a day), the observation posts, the UN military observers and civilian UN police in the area, the demilitarization, the – disputed – boundaries of the enclave and the problems with supplies.⁵⁵⁷³ The Dutch reconnaissance team were told that the Canadian battalion commander had only once been given permission by the Bosnian Serbs to visit his company in Srebrenica.⁵⁵⁷⁴ The Dutch were also able to contact the company in Srebrenica briefly through the Operations Room. According to Reitsma there was even 'constant interchange with the Canadians about the actual situation in Srebrenica'.⁵⁵⁷⁵

However, no trace has been found of any contact between the Dutch and Canadian authorities in Ottawa about the deployment area prior to the deployment of Dutchbat,⁵⁵⁷⁶ and according to the Canadian authorities no such contact ever took place: neither at diplomatic nor at military level did the ⁵⁵⁶⁷ Interview R.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁵⁵⁶⁸ Objectivized summary of the Ministerial Council meetings of 03/12/93, prepared for the purposes of the present NIOD study; BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, fax from CSKL to LO DB G3 Plans BH Command Kiseljak, Soesbergen, 04/12/93, 2045.

⁵⁵⁶⁹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen (Yugoslavia. The political situation and parties), Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (Developments in the former Yugoslav federation), 70/93, 15/12/93; 71/93, 21/12/93.

⁵⁵⁷⁰ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 71/93, 21/12/93; DCBC, 2128, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 03/94, 14/01/94; 2127, 04/94, 18/01/94; 2125, 06/94, 31/01/94; 2123, 08/94, 09/02/94; 2121, 10/94, 15/02/94; 2118, 13/94, 25/02/94; 2117, 14/94, 17/03/94.

⁵⁵⁷¹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 66, p. 2.

⁵⁵⁷² Interview J.T. Hoekema, 05/03/98.

⁵⁵⁷³ Jellema, First-in, pp. 69-70; interview F.J.A. Pollé, 08/03/00.

⁵⁵⁷⁴ Interview C. Vermeulen, 09/06/00

⁵⁵⁷⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 47. See also BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, Fax from C.H.P. Vermeulen, C-DB, Lt.Col. of Grenadiers, 11 INFBAT AIRMBL GG (APC)/DUTCHBAT, to BLS Attn. Crisis Staff, 'Verkeningsrapport Srebrenica en Zepa', 001, 12/12/93, incl. Appendix: Situation Report Srebrenica.

⁵⁵⁷⁶ Interview T. Quiggin, 26/03/99.

Dutch Government consult the authorities in Ottawa or the Canadian Embassy in The Hague.⁵⁵⁷⁷ The absence of any contact with the Canadians about the deployment in Srebrenica is also remarkable in that the Canadian Government had in the past regularly supplied the Dutch Government at diplomatic level with information on the Canadian view of both the developments associated with UNPROFOR in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina in general and the Canadian deployment. This took place either from the Canadian Department of National Defence to the Dutch Military Attaché in Ottawa or from the Canadian Embassy in The Hague to officials at the Dutch Foreign Ministry.⁵⁵⁷⁸ The lack of attempts to inquire about the Canadians' experience is illustrated by the fact that when the Canadian Prime Minister, Chrétien, buttonholed Lubbers on the fringe of the NATO summit in Brussels on 10 January 1994 and asked him whether the Dutch airmobile battalion was going to Srebrenica or Zepa, Lubbers and his Council Adviser Merckelbach did not know and had to check with The Hague.⁵⁵⁷⁹ In any event it became clear to Lubbers that the Canadian Prime Minister was relieved that the weary Canadian troops would soon be able to leave Srebrenica thanks, as he understood, to their replacement by the Dutch forces. Veenendaal, the Permanent Representative to NATO, gained the same impression from his Canadian counterpart.⁵⁵⁸⁰ No wonder, since at the time the Secretary-General of the Canadian defence ministry, Bob Fowler, was having nightmares that the Bosnian Serbs would overrun the enclave.⁵⁵⁸¹ The Canadians' experiences in the enclave were otherwise not discussed by Chrétien and Lubbers, however. The Dutch Prime Minister did not consider there was any reason to inquire into such matters. On the contrary, he was very pleased with the robust stand taken by NATO, which had again confirmed the decisions of 2 and 9 August 1993 on the possibility of air strikes to protect the Safe Areas, explicitly referring to the relief of the Canadian battalion by Dutch forces, which the Bosnian Serbs were still obstructing.⁵⁵⁸² At the same time the Dutch Military Adviser to the Permanent Representation in New York, Colonel Van Veen, noted his Canadian counterpart's relief regarding their departure from Srebrenica. However, the relief on the part of the Canadians should not necessarily have given rise to unrest on the part of the Dutch, in Van Veen's opinion: the Canadians had only had a company in Srebrenica, whereas the Dutch were arriving with a full battalion. 'That, of course, was certainly somewhat more realistic (...) than what they had there. That was just nonsensical.'⁵⁵⁸³

Nor did Dutch Intelligence make inquiries of its Canadian counterpart about conditions in and around Srebrenica.⁵⁵⁸⁴ According to Minister Ter Beek, Intelligence in fact played 'no explicit role' in the decision about the specific location.⁵⁵⁸⁵ Once the deployment area was known, the Army's Intelligence and Security Department did gather information on the terrain and the combatants, which was passed on to the Crisis Staff.⁵⁵⁸⁶ The department's advice on both the deployment area and the weaponry would have been unfavourable.⁵⁵⁸⁷

The need among the military to make inquiries in Ottawa was slight because the most important parameters for stationing in the Srebrenica enclave were known: it was a relatively quiet area, the supply routes to which were controlled by the Serbs, who could resort to chicanery.⁵⁵⁸⁸ The deployment of ⁵⁵⁷⁷ Interview Aaron Hywarren and Col. Tim Sparling, 12/11/99.

⁵⁵⁷⁸ See e.g. ABZ, PVNY. Van den Broek 395 to PR New York, 28/11/91; 00142; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00155. Van den Broek 44 to Embassy Ottawa, 22/10/92; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00142. Walkate 155 to Van den Broek, 22/10/92; ABZ, 999.241, Joegoslavië, NO FLY Zone, Part II. Memorandum from DAV to Deputy DAV, 23/02/93 No. DAV/MS-93/034; ABZ, PVNAVO. De Vos van Steenwijk 35 to Kooijmans, 29/03/93.

⁵⁵⁷⁹ Interview J.P.M.H. Merckelbach, 25/02/00.

⁵⁵⁸⁰ Interview L.W. Veenendaal, 17/08/00.

⁵⁵⁸¹ Interview N. Biegman, 03/07/00.

⁵⁵⁸² Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/99.

⁵⁵⁸³ Interview R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

⁵⁵⁸⁴ MID to NIOD, 01/98, File: RIOD:Doc, re RIOD investigation into Srebrenica, questionnaire to MID, Strictly Confidential; interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99.

⁵⁵⁸⁵ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00. Identical information in interview H.J. Vandeweijer, 19/01/98.

⁵⁵⁸⁶ Interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99.

⁵⁵⁸⁷ Confidential interview (36).

⁵⁵⁸⁸ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

Dutchbat there was based more on political than on military considerations. There were large sections of the Army, moreover, who thought that the Dutch with a battalion ought easily to be able to do what the Canadians had done with a company.⁵⁵⁸⁹ According to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, once it was known that Srebrenica would be the deployment area the Dutch authorities were sent the Canadian situation reports from Srebrenica by the Dutch Major Peersman, who was in Bosnia-Herzegovina Command.⁵⁵⁹⁰ No traces of them have been found in the Dutch archives, however.

Scarcely was the deployment area known than a number of problems became apparent. On 6 December Lieutenant Colonel Van Hoorn Alkema reported to the Army from the headquarters of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command that the almost constant refusal of the Serbs to allow supply convoys through was causing great concern at HQ. He pointed out that this was probably what the future held in store for Dutchbat.⁵⁵⁹¹ Major Madern, who took part in the logistics side of the reconnaissance party under Lemmen, reported in mid-December that the only possible supply route to Srebrenica from Split ran north through Serb terrain. He pointed out that this made logistics support to the units in Srebrenica and Zepa 'extremely vulnerable', 'if not impossible', if the Bosnian Serbs refused to cooperate.⁵⁵⁹²

Srebrenica and Zepa, it furthermore transpired, were by no means the contiguous area Cot had talked about. As the crow flies the two areas were not far apart, but transports had to cover 210 kilometres of road.⁵⁵⁹³ A subsequent reconnaissance party took eight-and-a-half hours to reach Zepa by this route (via Zvornik, Vlasenica and Han Pijesak) on 29 January 1994. Nor could rapid evacuation of the wounded be guaranteed.⁵⁵⁹⁴

As if not to leave the reconnaissance party in any doubt as to the difficulties Dutchbat would face, the Bosnian Serbs refused to allow the party through.⁵⁵⁹⁵ This was a sign that the situation as regards freedom of movement was manifestly not as good as the agreement of 29 November had led to suppose.⁵⁵⁹⁶ The refusal of the Bosnian Serbs, according to Bokhoven, was due to irritation at the fact that the Bosnian Serb army had not been informed of the proposed stationing of the Dutch battalion in the two enclaves and its functions there.⁵⁵⁹⁷ According to a member of the Bosnian Serb Government the VRS feared that the Canadian battalion, on changeover, would leave its weapons in the enclave and that they would fall into the hands of the Muslim fighters.⁵⁵⁹⁸ As there seemed no point in waiting any longer the party decided to return to the Netherlands and had reached Gornji Vakuf when it was ordered by the Crisis Staff in The Hague to go back and continue to exert pressure. Some of the party, including the Commander, Colonel Lemmen, however, returned to the Netherlands on 10 December.

⁵⁵⁸⁹ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99, and J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99; NIOD, Coll. Kreemers . Interview H.A. Couzy, 21/04/95; Ter Beek, Manoeuvres, p. 212.

⁵⁵⁹⁰ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁵⁹¹ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from HQ BH Command Kiseljak NLSNO (Van Hoorn Alkema) to Sitcen Army, 06/12/93, 1000.

⁵⁵⁹² BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, 'Verslag dienstreis verkenning in Bosnië Herzegovina t.b.v. Dutchbat' (Report of trip to reconnoitre Bosnia-Herzegovina for Dutchbat) by P. Madern, G4-Implementation, Army Crisis Staff Ochtendblad, no date.

⁵⁵⁹³ BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, Fax from C.H.P. Vermeulen, C-DB, Lt.Col. of Grenadiers, 11 INFBAT AIRMBL GG (APC)/DUTCHBAT, to BLS Attn. Crisis Staff, 'Verkeningsrapport Srebrenica en Zepa' (Report of Srebrenica and Zepa Reconnaissance), 001, 12-12-93, Appendix: Situation Report Zepa.

⁵⁵⁹⁴ BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, Fax from C.H.P. Vermeulen, C-DB, Lt.Col. of Grenadiers, 11 INFBAT AIRMBL GG (APC)/DUTCHBAT, to BLS Attn. Crisis Staff, 'Verkeningsrapport Srebrenica en Zepa', 001, 12-12-93, Appendix: Situation Report Srebrenica.

⁵⁵⁹⁵ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, fax from Bouwdijk Bastiaanse (CS Army) to G3 Plans/LO Dutchbat (Major Soesbergen) c.c. Commander Dutch contingent, 07/12/93, 1030; Fax from Major Soesbergen to Lt.Col. Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 07/12/93, 2230; Kolsteren to Briquemont, Appendix to fax from Major Govaarts (DCBC) to Col. Bokhoven, 09/12/93, 1855; Ministry of Defence archives, Def 2581, Reconnaissance Party II, 'Verslag dienstreis verkenning in Bosnië Herzegovina t.b.v. Dutchbat' by Major P. Madern, G4-Implementation, Army Crisis Staff Ochtendblad, no date.

⁵⁵⁹⁶ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from Bokhoven to Major Soesbergen, 07/12/93, 1051.

⁵⁵⁹⁷ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Fax from Milovanovic to UNPROFOR Command Kiseljak, 8-12-93; Reconnaissance Party II, Fax from C.H.P. Vermeulen, C-DB, Lt.Col. of Grenadiers, 11 INFBAT AIRMBL GG.

⁵⁵⁹⁸ Interview M. Toholj, 14/12/99.

On 16 December the remainder of the party were ordered to return home without having seen Srebrenica or Zepa.

Knowledge of Srebrenica

As we saw in Chapter 13, Srebrenica was not unfamiliar to attentive television viewers and newspaper readers in the Netherlands. But what did the Defence Staff and the Army know about it specifically? Not very much. Almost five months after the outbreak of hostilities in Bosnia, the Army's Intelligence and Security Department knew little about the conflict area. On 26 August 1992 Dutch UN observer Gerard van Wondergem in Sarajevo received a fax saying:

'(...) the position of the Royal Netherlands Army as regards information is very mediocre: to date there has been scarcely any contact with UNPROFOR. This was a nuisance in the period when the Intelligence and Security Department was holding informative briefings etc. in preparation for posting, but in the new situation, where the decision-making processes are taking place, it is highly unsatisfactory.'⁵⁵⁹⁹

The Netherlands Officers' Association, following a visit to the Signals Battalion by a delegation from the Central Consultative Committee (Centraal Georganiseerd Overleg) for the Armed Services, had in the autumn already laid down as a condition for loyal implementation of a posting decision that the Crisis Staff and the Parliamentary Permanent Committee on Defence must have situation reports from the military observers on the spot.⁵⁶⁰⁰ The Netherlands made no use of the experience of Dutch military observers, including in Srebrenica and Zepa. At the time it was not standard practice to debrief military observers supplied to the UN by the Netherlands. The Army did not even have a data file on the stationing of the Dutch United Nations Military Observers.⁵⁶⁰¹ Not until after October 1992, when thirty students from the Peace Research Centre (Centrum voor Vredesvraagstukken), which provided courses for UN observers, invited a returnee observer to talk about his experiences, did such visits become a regular feature of the Centre's curriculum.⁵⁶⁰² One of the students at the time, Captain Harold Jacobs, wrote a handout based on his experience in the former Yugoslavia in spring 1993, which was issued to prospective UNMOs.⁵⁶⁰³ Gerard van Wondergem, who had been a UN observer in Sarajevo and Croatia in the second half of 1992, was appointed to the Army's Crisis Staff on 1 March 1993 in order to help with the future training of observers and other personnel sent out on an individual basis. UNMO Marechaussee Colonel Van Dijk, who was involved in finalizing the ceasefire agreement around Zepa at the time, was to warn against deployment in the eastern enclaves in a briefing at the Defence Ministry at the end of 1993.⁵⁶⁰⁴ Van Dijk, who was also vice-chairman of the Netherlands Officers' Association, had previously reported in the Association's journal Carré on his experience of Zepa, a conglomeration of a few villages in a valley with a total area of about a hundred square kilometres, which was not so well known to the Dutch public as Srebrenica. He had described the devastation caused by Serb artillery fire shortly before his visit in May 1993 and the deplorable hygienic conditions in which the population were living, for the most part camping in the woods in caves and huts made of branches and sods. On the other hand, he had noted that in Zepa, thanks to the American food drops, there was no malnutrition and the Muslim troops were well-disciplined and ⁵⁵⁹⁹ Van Wondergem, 'Je komt' (You come), p. 114; Paul Ruigrok, 'Den Haag wist van niets, maar de onderofficieren móésten terug' (The Hague knew nothing but the NCOs had to return), Vrij Nederland, 30/10/93, pp. 10-12. Neither the fax itself nor any copy of it could be found at MID.

⁵⁶⁰⁰ 'Belangenverenigingen bezoeken UNPROFOR' (Pressure groups visit UNPROFOR), Carré 15(1992)12, p. 30.

⁵⁶⁰¹ Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01; W.A.M. van Dijk, 'Nogmaals: Karremans en Dutchbat' (Karremans and Dutchbat again), Carré 18(1995)11, p. 20. See also the complaint by returnee UN observer Air Force Major J. Brinkhof in Eric Vrijzen, 'Een massale invasie is onbegonnen werk' (A massive invasion is a hopeless task), Elsevier, 09/01/93.

⁵⁶⁰² Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01.

⁵⁶⁰³ See LL. Operations BLS, hand-out for UN observers.

⁵⁶⁰⁴ Both, Indifference, p. 185.

respected human rights. When the Ukrainian battalion, which arrived soon after Van Dijk, had been there a week some of the population returned to their homes, which they had made habitable again as best they could. Van Dijk had also described at length how nothing had come of the demilitarization of the area, partly because constant Serb sniping and the odd shell continued to make the Muslims feel unsafe.⁵⁶⁰⁵

Major Dekker, who had been responsible for Operations at Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, also said at a briefing to the Intelligence Section of the Airmobile Brigade on 15 November that deployment of the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica and Zepa would be ‘not so desirable’. The big drawback with the enclaves was that they were difficult to reach. There was still a confrontation line in Srebrenica.⁵⁶⁰⁶

In its regular overviews of developments in the former Yugoslavia, the Military Intelligence Service made no special mention of potential deployment areas, not even when it had been decided that Srebrenica and Zepa would be the deployment area. Information on these areas did crop up sporadically, along with and mixed in with all sorts of other information. A report of 7 December, for instance, said that Intelligence considered a military attack on Srebrenica by the Serbs unlikely because of its designation as a ‘protected area’ by the UN. The Bosnian Serbs would therefore be willing to exchange it for part of Sarajevo. Intelligence did not expect Izetbegovic to accept the offer, however, ‘not least because the “protected areas” guaranteed international (military) involvement in the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina’.⁵⁶⁰⁷ He could even hope to provoke foreign military intervention by exploiting the ongoing siege of Srebrenica and Zepa for propaganda purposes, said Intelligence, and furthermore Izetbegovic would not be prepared to relinquish access to the Drina.⁵⁶⁰⁸

There was no separate risk analysis of Srebrenica and Zepa as a deployment area carried out by the Military Intelligence Service. As Minister Ter Beek said, ‘There was no independent report. Never an independent report from Intelligence. As I said, there were these mini-reports’.⁵⁶⁰⁹⁵⁶¹⁰ Conversely, Intelligence was never asked for a risk analysis.⁵⁶¹¹ Asked whether it had drawn up a risk analysis before Dutchbat was sent out, Intelligence itself told the NIOD:

‘On the basis of the information available, in particular weighing up the military power balance on the spot, it was possible to describe the security environment, from which it could be concluded that the enclave was indefensible from a military point of view.’⁵⁶¹²

There is no indication that the higher echelons were informed of this conclusion.

On 14 December Minister Kooijmans visited Sarajevo. Firstly, he wanted to persuade the Bosnian Government to make do with less terrain in the peace talks: this was part of an agreement he had made with his German counterpart Kinkel to help bring about a peace agreement.⁵⁶¹³ Secondly, Kooijmans wanted to get information direct from President Izetbegovic and Prime Minister Silajdzic on the chances of reaching an agreement.⁵⁶¹⁴ The Bosnians were pessimistic about the chances of peace in view of the unwillingness of the Bosnian Serbs to make the territorial concessions demanded by ⁵⁶⁰⁵ W.A.M. van Dijk, ‘UNMO-actie naar Zepa’ (UNMO campaign to Zepa), Carré 16(1993)7/8, pp. 20-25.

⁵⁶⁰⁶ BLS. Airmobile Brigade, Section 2 of 11th Airmobile Brigade, Notes of conversation with Major Dekker, 15/11/93.

⁵⁶⁰⁷ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie (Developments in the former Yugoslav Federation), 68/93, 07/12/93.

⁵⁶⁰⁸ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 03/94, 14/01/94.

⁵⁶⁰⁹ The intelligence summaries or ‘intsums’.

⁵⁶¹⁰ Interview A.L. Ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵⁶¹¹ Interview P. Kok, 07/06/00.

⁵⁶¹² MID to NIOD, 01/98, File: RIOD:Doc, re RIOD investigation into Srebrenica, the questionnaire to MID, Strictly Confidential.

⁵⁶¹³ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁵⁶¹⁴ For the report of Kooijmans’ trip see 19 1993-94, 22 181, No. 68.

Sarajevo. Also, the Bosnian Muslims wanted a route connecting the three eastern enclaves and Sarajevo, or one connecting Zepa and Srebrenica with Tuzla. Kooijmans did not manage to extract much more information from them, as there was to be a meeting in Brussels the next week, so the Bosnian Government were keeping their cards close to their chest. According to Kooijmans the stationing of Dutchbat in Srebrenica was scarcely mentioned during this visit.⁵⁶¹⁵ Following his talks with Silajdzic there was a small press conference in the lobby of the government building, at which Silajdzic commented that if there was one country that did not have to be ashamed after the end of the Bosnian war it was the Netherlands.⁵⁶¹⁶

Concern regarding lack of access to the enclaves

At Kooijmans' Ministry, meanwhile, concern had arisen that the Dutch reconnaissance party had not gained access to Srebrenica and Zepa. The Ministry had realized that a unit in an enclave would be dependent on the good will of the Bosnian Serbs, but nevertheless this first foretaste of what lay in store for Dutchbat came as a shock to them.⁵⁶¹⁷ The day after Kooijmans spoke to Izetbegovic and Silajdzic he sent a telegram to Biegman, the Permanent Representative to the UN, informing him of the Bosnian Serbs' refusal to allow the reconnaissance party through. Without reconnaissance, wrote the Minister, the proposed deployment in January 1994 could not take place according to plan. On 7 December, according to Kooijmans' telegram, the Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Brigadier General Hayes, had talked to the Chief of Staff of the Bosnian Serbs, Milovanovic, and permission had been promised, but the promise was not kept. Talks between Briquemont and Mladic at which this topic was also to be raised had meanwhile been cancelled several times by the Bosnian Serb army chief. Milovanovic, for his part, cited higher political authorities. As the Bosnian Serbs had nothing to gain from a strong UN presence, it could take a long time for the party to be allowed through, according to Kooijmans, 'if the reconnaissance unit ever is allowed through'. Meanwhile Van der Vlis, according to Kooijmans, had on 7 December informed Briquemont of the concern about the situation that had arisen. Kooijmans also asked Biegman to inform the UN secretariat of the Dutch Government's concern. The Minister reminded Biegman that the Netherlands would prefer deployment in Central Bosnia and noted that there were now two options: either the UN could stick with the deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica and Zepa, which could involve considerable delay, or the Dutch battalion could be assigned a new area, possibly moving to the Safe Areas later on. Biegman was asked to raise this matter at the UN secretariat.⁵⁶¹⁸ With this move the Dutch Government cannot have made a good impression on the UN secretariat: they were trying to get away from the area assigned to them at the first sign of difficulty. Nonetheless Annan promised to put the question to the Security Council.⁵⁶¹⁹ He went back on this at Stoltenberg's request, however, as the latter was scared that involving the Security Council in the deployment issue would interfere with discussions on a Christmas ceasefire. Annan said that in the meantime it was assumed that Dutchbat would deploy in Central Bosnia for the time being, pending deployment in the Safe Areas.⁵⁶²⁰

On 21 December Junior Minister Frinking, in verbal consultations with the Parliamentary Permanent Committees on Foreign Affairs and Defence, said that he was allowing for the possibility of deploying Dutchbat at an alternative location.⁵⁶²¹ On this occasion Van Traa expressed doubts as to whether the deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica and Zepa 'will turn out to be effective'. He could not a priori accept still stationing the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica and Zepa if this were to take on a ⁵⁶¹⁵ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁵⁶¹⁶ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁵⁶¹⁷ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵⁶¹⁸ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Kooijmans 540 to PR NY, 15/12/93.

⁵⁶¹⁹ DDI/DEU/05275. Biegman 1656 to Kooijmans, 17/12/93.

⁵⁶²⁰ DDI/ARA/02016. Biegman 1665 to Kooijmans, 21/12/93; TCBU, Vertretpunt I, p. 148.

⁵⁶²¹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 73, p. 7.

different substance as a result of a peace agreement. He also wanted clarification of a newspaper report which suggested that UNPROFOR was not willing to defend the Safe Areas of Srebrenica and Zepa against the Serbs.⁵⁶²² Blaauw was mainly interested in logistical communications with Zepa and Srebrenica.⁵⁶²³ According to reporters present at the consultations, Frinking even said that posting to Eastern Bosnia was off. According to the media, Cot, following a two-day visit to Belgrade, where he had talked to the authorities inter alia about the stationing of the Dutch forces, had said in a statement that the airmobile battalion was a ‘welcome reinforcement’ for Central Bosnia. The newspaper Het Parool added that the previous days had seen the heaviest fighting of the past few months in that area, with dozens of fatalities.⁵⁶²⁴ Briquemont, however, let it be known at the end of December that, despite the attitude of the Bosnian Serb authorities, the only place where Dutchbat could be deployed was Srebrenica and Zepa. He intended to contact Karadzic about this and on 12 January 1994 the commanders of the Bosnian Serbs (VRS) and the Bosnian Muslims (ABiH).⁵⁶²⁵

At the beginning of January the stationing of Dutchbat in Srebrenica and Zepa was postponed for two or three weeks. In principle, said the UN, there was a possibility of stationing Dutchbat in Central Bosnia, after which it might be stationed in the enclaves, but for the time being they would stick with the assignment to the Eastern Bosnian enclaves.⁵⁶²⁶ The problem had also come to the notice of Queen Beatrix: at the New Year Reception in the Palace in Amsterdam she asked General Brinkman, Commander of the Airmobile Brigade, referring to his men, ‘Haven’t you gone yet?’⁵⁶²⁷

Under the threat of NATO air strikes if the changeover between the Canadians and the Dutch was not allowed to take place, Akashi gained the consent of Milosevic, Karadzic and Mladic, on 10, 13 and 19 January respectively, for the deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica. The UN now wanted a rapid departure by the reconnaissance party as a ‘demonstrative gesture’ to the Bosnian Serb authorities to make it clear that UNPROFOR was serious about deploying Dutchbat.⁵⁶²⁸ A second reconnaissance party set off on 21 January 1994 under the command of Major Peek (S3-Infbat). The party reached Srebrenica in four days and visited Zepa two weeks later.⁵⁶²⁹

2. The strength of the weaponry: .50 or 25 mm?

‘To be respected, we must be strong.’⁵⁶³⁰

‘Toujours est-il que cet angélisme pervers – oubliant les principes élémentaires qui appellent à montrer sa force pur ne pas avoir à s’en servir – régnait non seulement à New York mais chez la plupart des exécutants.’⁵⁶³¹

⁵⁶²² TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 73, p. 2.

⁵⁶²³ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 73, p. 2.

⁵⁶²⁴ ‘Nederlandse troepen toch naar Bosnië’ (Dutch troops to go to Bosnia after all), Het Parool, 23/12/93. See also ‘Brigade gaat niet naar Oost-Bosnië’ (Brigade not going to Eastern Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 21/11/93; ‘Frinking bevestigt uitstel van VN-missie’ (Frinking confirms postponement of UN mission), NRC Handelsblad, 22/12/93; ‘Locatie en vertrek van Luchtmobiele Brigade naar Bosnië onzeker’ (Location and departure of Airmobile Brigade uncertain), ANP, 21/12/93, 18:22; ‘UNPROFOR-commandant: luchtmobiele brigade hard nodig in Bosnië’ (UNPROFOR Commander says airmobile brigade badly needed in Bosnia), ANP, 22/12/93, 1624.

⁵⁶²⁵ ABZ, DDI/DEU/05275, Kooijmans to PR NY, 31/12/93, celer 553; BLS. Foreign Affairs (ed.: Van Stegeren according to DGPZ) to PR NY, 31/12/93. See also TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 148.

⁵⁶²⁶ ABZ, DIE/2001/00023. Memorandum from Acting DEU to AP et al., 07/01/94, No. 012/94, conclusions of the Foreign Affairs coordination consultations, 05/01/94.

⁵⁶²⁷ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁶²⁸ BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, D’Ansembourg 044 (PR NY) to Foreign Affairs, 17/01/94.

⁵⁶²⁹ See also Part II, Chapter 5

⁵⁶³⁰ Philippe Morillon, ‘The military aspects of field operations’, Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 84.

⁵⁶³¹ Morillon, Credo, p. 137.

The decision about the posting also involved the issue of how heavily the forces should be armed.

The battalion was sent out as a light infantry unit with a few additional resources. It was to be equipped with some heavy weaponry, e.g. nine TOW anti-tank weapons on carriages with a range of about three kilometres, 27 Dragon anti-tank weapons with a range of about a thousand metres, and nine 81 mm mortars with a range of about 3,500 metres. The additional resources included 49 armoured infantry vehicles with caterpillar tracks, type YPR 765, as the Airmobile Brigade did not have standard-issue protective equipment in the form of vehicles. The YPRs were to serve as protective means of transport or battlefield taxis, i.e. they were there to protect personnel against snipers and mines. They were not intended for tactical purposes.

The question was what weaponry to equip the YPRs with. The Army had different versions of YPR, e.g. with a TOW anti-tank system, with a 25 mm KBA automatic Oerlikon gun and with a .50 machine gun. The 25 mm gun was the standard weapon for vehicles used on armoured infantry duties. The YPRs equipped with .50 machine guns were from the former mobilizable 101st Infantry Brigade.

The 25 mm gun could knock out unarmoured or lightly armoured vehicles and troops under cover up to 1,500 metres. For this purpose the standard-issue YPR had three hundred armour-piercing cartridges on board. The weapon, which could fire up to six hundred rounds a minute, was vulnerable, however. Parts would have to be replaced regularly, as they tended to break. If supplies were to become a problem, these weapons would be unusable.

The .50 Browning machine guns, which had been in use in the Dutch Armed forces since 1950, had a maximum effective range against ground targets of a thousand metres and used half-inch (approx. 14.5 mm) ammunition. The piercing strength of the .50 ammunition was much less than that of the 25 mm gun: it could not penetrate tanks or armoured vehicles and was really only suitable for use against infantry advancing in the open. When using tracer ammunition it was easy to guide the weapon to the target. Also, unlike the other gun, the machine gun rarely if ever displayed defects. A big drawback of the .50 machine guns, on the other hand, was that the gunner was virtually exposed, whereas the gun, which was part of a turret system, could be operated while protected by armoury. To protect .50 gunners a special armoured turret had been developed which was rotated with difficulty using manpower, whereas the turret of the 25 mm version rotated electrically.⁵⁶³² This was a system that Colonel Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse had seen used by the Danes on his visit in September. He had taken photographs of it, and on returning to the Netherlands he urged that the Dutch YPRs be fitted with turrets of this kind.⁵⁶³³

The decision on how heavily to arm Dutchbat was taken at a very early stage, when it was certainly not clear that Dutchbat would be deployed in Srebrenica⁵⁶³⁴. The decision was never subsequently changed. When it was still assumed that Dutchbat would be deployed in Central Bosnia on territorial duties Van der Vlis, Couzy and the Commander of the First Army Corps, General Schouten, tackled the point at a meeting.⁵⁶³⁵ As to why Dutchbat was sent out with .50 machine guns instead of 25 mm guns, there are various explanations. Firstly, there was a training argument. Secondly, the UN aide-mémoire supposedly laid down that weapons such as the 25 mm gun could not be deployed. Thirdly, the Bosnian Serb Army would object.⁵⁶³⁶

According to Couzy and Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, training and the interchangeability of gunners were the decisive arguments. Training a gunner to use a 25 mm gun took five to ten days.

⁵⁶³² BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Internal memorandum DOKL./Project Bureau Air Mobile action from H-PBLO/DOKL to C-11 LMB, 25/08/93; A.H.H. Geeraerts, De taxi van Ter Beek (Ter Beek's taxi), Armex, 78(1994)3, pp. 25-26; A. Sebes to NIOD, 20/06/01.

⁵⁶³³ Interviews F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00; C. Vermeulen, 09/06/99.

⁵⁶³⁴ See also e.g. CRST. Note on Deployment of first airmobile battalion from HOZ to PCDS, no date, with Appendix 'Safe Lion' Planning Assignment, 24/08/93.

⁵⁶³⁵ Interviews F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00, and H. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁵⁶³⁶ Cf. interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

Anyone could be trained to use a .50 within one day.⁵⁶³⁷ Another point that concerned Couzy was that the 25 mm guns required a lot of maintenance: if there were supply problems there might not be enough spare parts.⁵⁶³⁸ The independent defence journal Armex cast doubt on the training argument, saying that training a gunner to operate the 25 mm gun did not take that much more time than training someone to operate the .50 machine gun.⁵⁶³⁹ Lieutenant Colonel Groeneveld, who was on the Defence Staff at the time, was not convinced by the training argument either: if drivers could be trained separately, he saw no reason why gunners could not be trained specially to use the 25 mm guns.⁵⁶⁴⁰

Then there is the argument that the weaponry had to be light when operating in a UN context.⁵⁶⁴¹ This can be countered by the fact that the Security Council in the case of UNPROFOR I had permitted UNPROFOR personnel to be more heavily protected than was customary in UN peacekeeping operations, as a result of the Croatian offensive in parts of the United Nations Protected Areas (UNPAs) in January 1993 and the Serb response. On 19 February 1993 the Council adopted Resolution 807, which invited the Secretary-General to take 'all appropriate measures to strengthen the security of UNPROFOR, in particular by providing it with the necessary defensive means'. Purely for that purpose the Resolution cited Chapter VII. Resolution 815 of 30 March 1993, which extended UNPROFOR's mandate in Croatia, used almost the same phraseology: 'Determined to ensure the security of UNPROFOR and its freedom of movement for all its missions, and to these ends acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations...' Against this background Boutros-Ghali wrote in February 1993 that countries who had asked to be allowed to arm their units more heavily were permitted to do so providing it was possible to explain to the combatants that the heavier weaponry was intended for self-protection.⁵⁶⁴²

The troop-supplying nations did not in fact take UN guidelines particularly seriously in Bosnia from the outset. The UN originally said, for instance, that the number of armoured vehicles per unit should be limited for budgetary reasons. The troop-supplying countries, however, considered this undesirable with a view to the safety of their personnel and sent more than were permitted.⁵⁶⁴³ MacKenzie, the Commander in Sarajevo nota bene, ensured that the Canadian battalion was supplied with projectiles for the TOW anti-tank system in spite of a UN ban.⁵⁶⁴⁴ As governments sending troops realized the dangers in the region, the more heavily they armed their units.⁵⁶⁴⁵ French units in Bosnia had 20 mm guns and even a few 90 mm guns. The British used Warriors with 25 mm guns and the Spanish 20 mm guns. Besides the Dutch, only the Canadians and Danes used .50 machine guns.⁵⁶⁴⁶ Denmark also sent a tank company in September 1993 equipped with Leopards for deployment near Tuzla, but by the beginning of December it had been held by the Serbs in Pancevo, the logistics base in Serbia, for ninety days.

The UN, meanwhile, simply accepted the inevitable fact that troop-supplying countries were sending heavier weaponry. Briquemont considered that it should be clear to everyone in November 1993 that he in fact wanted countries to send more heavily-armed forces, even though Mladic was constantly reminding him that anything heavier than a 12.5 mm machine gun was not permitted under the UN rules. He considered it 'regrettable' that he had not been able to convince the Dutch authorities. The choice of weaponry was a purely Dutch matter in his eyes.⁵⁶⁴⁷ Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse agreed. The UN argument did not pull any weight: 'There was an awful lot of leeway there. If you're ⁵⁶³⁷ Interviews F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00, and H. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁵⁶³⁸ Interviews H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98 and 04/10/01.

⁵⁶³⁹ A.H.H. Geeraerts, 'De taxi van Ter Beek', Armex, 78(1994)3, p. 26.

⁵⁶⁴⁰ Interview J.C. Groeneveld, 17/02/98.

⁵⁶⁴¹ Interview M.C.J. Felix, 06/04/00.

⁵⁶⁴² UN, S/25264, Report of the Secretary-General on the Situation in the Former Yugoslavia, 10/02/93.

⁵⁶⁴³ See e.g. MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 201.

⁵⁶⁴⁴ MacKenzie, Peacekeeper, p. 205 and 281.

⁵⁶⁴⁵ Hillen, Helmets, p. 151.

⁵⁶⁴⁶ CDPO/GNKD. Chief Army Crisis Staff to Junior Commanders and Directors of Army Staff, 11/02/94, OZ/7806.

⁵⁶⁴⁷ Interview F. Briquemont, 22/06/00.

talking about strength of weaponry you have to look at it purely from the Dutch point of view.⁵⁶⁴⁸ Various other people who were closely involved are also certain that the choice of .50 machine guns was not due to the UN placing restrictions on the strength of weaponry.⁵⁶⁴⁹ The military adviser to the Permanent Representation in New York, Colonel Van Veen, himself a member of the armoured infantry, was even badly disappointed when he heard that the 25 mm guns were going to be left at home: ‘.50 is not really a serious weapon’.⁵⁶⁵⁰

According to Ter Beek, one of the arguments put forward by Van der Vlis for light weaponry was that the Serbs should not be provoked. It had to be clear to them that the weaponry was merely for self-protection, ‘not for military defence of the enclave’.⁵⁶⁵¹ Briquemont told Bastiaans that the Bosnian Serb authorities had resisted allowing Swedish armoured vehicles with 20 mm guns into Srebrenica.⁵⁶⁵² Karadzic and the Parliament of the Republika Srpska said that they would not agree to the Canadian unit in Srebrenica being relieved by Dutchbat if the Dutch forces were more heavily armed than their Canadian counterparts.⁵⁶⁵³ But these pronouncements were made on 17 December 1993 and mid-January 1994,⁵⁶⁵⁴ long after the decision had been made in the Netherlands to send out the YPRs with .50s. According to the Army Staff Deputy Chief of Operations, Brigadier General Pollé, however, the Serbs’ objection was ‘known fairly soon. It was actually a factor when we were making plans.’⁵⁶⁵⁵ The Ministry of Defence’s Directorate of Information, on the other hand, emphatically denied to Armex that the troops were not armed with 25 mm guns because the weapon would have had a provocative effect.⁵⁶⁵⁶ Speaking to the NIOD, Couzy also denied that the argument that the Serbs would not have been willing to allow in 25 mm guns played any role in opting for .50 machine guns.⁵⁶⁵⁷

If there are doubts about the reasons often given for deploying .50 machine guns instead of 25 mm guns, was there perhaps some other reason for opting for .50s? The reason was that the airmobile battalion must not resemble an armoured infantry battalion.⁵⁶⁵⁸ In fact the debate on this was implicitly initiated in spring 1993 in Carré, the journal of the Netherlands Officers’ Association, when there was talk of possibly deploying a Dutch combat unit under the Vance-Owen Plan. The journal pointed out that only an armoured infantry battalion was heavily enough armed to operate in Bosnia; the airmobile infantry would be too lightly armed.⁵⁶⁵⁹ If the battalions of the Airmobile Brigade were to be heavily armed, there could be questions again about this Army showpiece and those who had argued in favour of more emphasis on armoured infantry battalions in the structure of the new army would be proved right. This, according to Reitsma, was why Couzy opted to equip the battalion as a light infantry unit with a few additional resources.⁵⁶⁶⁰ This argument also obtained for his deputy, Reitsma:

‘If we suddenly decide to transform a unit being set up for a particular purpose⁵⁶⁶¹ into another unit while it is in the process of being set up, making it

⁵⁶⁴⁸ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁶⁴⁹ Interviews E.A.W. Koestal, 24/05/00; H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵⁶⁵⁰ Interview R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

⁵⁶⁵¹ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵⁶⁵² NIOD, Coll. Bastiaans. Journal note G.J.M. Bastiaans, 17/12/93; interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵⁶⁵³ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 04/94, 18/01/94; Interview A.P.P.M. van Baal, 27/05/98.

⁵⁶⁵⁴ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 04/94, 18/01/94; Interview A.P.P.M. van Baal, 27/05/98.

⁵⁶⁵⁵ Interview F.J.A. Pollé, 08/03/00.

⁵⁶⁵⁶ A.H.H. Geeraerts, ‘De taxi van Ter Beek’, Armex, 78(1994)3, p. 26.

⁵⁶⁵⁷ Interview H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98.

⁵⁶⁵⁸ Interviews M.C.J. Felix, 06/04/00; J.C. Groeneveld, 17/02/98.

⁵⁶⁵⁹ ‘Nota zonder prioriteiten’ (Memorandum without priorities), Carré 16(1993)4, pp. 5-6. See also J. Schaberg, ‘Het blijft nog behelpen met luchtmobiele brigade’ (Still make do and mend with airmobile brigade), Algemeen Dagblad, 27/04/93.

⁵⁶⁶⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 43.

⁵⁶⁶¹ I.e. the first battalions of the Airmobile Brigade.

look suspiciously like units the Dutch Army already has, what is the added value of such a unit?⁵⁶⁶²

Then all sorts of matters would be raised yet again, e.g. the acquisition of helicopters, the further development of the airmobile concept and the relationship with the air force.⁵⁶⁶³ If the helicopters were dropped, after having played such a major role in the commercials for the Airmobile Brigade, the unit would lose something of its prestige. According to Reitsma this was a factor in Van der Vlis's decision to arm the unit lightly, as Van der Vlis was seriously concerned about whether enough people could be recruited for a professional army.⁵⁶⁶⁴ The Army Crisis Staff Operations Officer, Lieutenant Colonel Felix, also said that the strength of the weaponry was due to concern that the debate about the Airmobile Brigade's raison d'être could flare up again.⁵⁶⁶⁵ This argument was indeed a factor for Van der Vlis. At a meeting of the Committee of the Chief of Defence Staff and Commanders on 24 May Van der Vlis said that 'if it were to be decided to deploy an airmobile battalion in the former Yugoslavia this battalion would certainly not be trained and deployed as an armoured infantry battalion'.⁵⁶⁶⁶ Couzy subsequently ruled that 'only YPR vehicles with .50s' were 'suitable' where airmobile battalions were being deployed.⁵⁶⁶⁷

So just as the provision by the Dutch Government of an airmobile battalion was influenced by interdepartmental politics, this was also the case with regard to the strength of the weaponry: the airmobile battalion must not be allowed to resemble an armoured infantry battalion.

Colonel Stuiver (retired), Chairman of the Netherlands Officers' Association, set the cat among the pigeons on 24 November 1993 with an address to the Association's general meeting in which he exposed the battalion's inadequate weaponry and protection. This won him enthusiastic applause and the resignation from the Association of Brinkman, Reitsma and Schouten.⁵⁶⁶⁸

The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs also criticized the choice of weaponry, pointing to the British units that had deployed Warriors. The Directorate considered that an armoured infantry unit should have been sent to Srebrenica and took the view that the defects of the White Paper on Defence Priorities which was less than a year old, were now coming to light. The criticism of the strength of the weaponry gave the Directorate a chance to underline yet again how justified its criticism had been of the emphasis on lightly-armed troops, which the MoD had opted for in the white paper at the expense of mechanized and armoured units.⁵⁶⁶⁹ Minister Kooijmans also warned against the dangers of being lightly or too lightly armed. The Foreign Ministry asked the MoD to send 25mm guns instead of .50 machine guns. The MoD refused, arguing that this could have an escalating effect and the Bosnian Serbs would have to agree to it.⁵⁶⁷⁰ The MoD further said that heavier ⁵⁶⁶² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 44.

⁵⁶⁶³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 44.

⁵⁶⁶⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of R. Reitsma, 22/05/00, p. 44.

⁵⁶⁶⁵ Interview M.C.J. Felix, 06/04/00. According to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse there had been a fear that an airmobile battalion would resemble an armoured infantry battalion, but in his view this had not been as important as the arguments about training and interchangeability, interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁶⁶⁶ CRST. Report of the 21st meeting of the Committee of the Chief of Defence Staff/Commanders, 24/05/93, S93/007/1945.

⁵⁶⁶⁷ CRST. Decision sheet of Deputy Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army Crisis Staff to DOKL, 23/07/93.

⁵⁶⁶⁸ Kreemers, 'Aan de achterkant van de maan', p. 25; interview J.T. Bruurmijn, 07/04/99.

⁵⁶⁶⁹ Interviews R. in den Bosch, 19/04/00; B.J. van Eenennaam, 22/08/00; and K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 13/12/99; NIOD, Coll. Kreemers. Interview B.J. van Eenennaam, 12/05/95.

⁵⁶⁷⁰ ABZ, 999.241/DAV/MS/Yugoslavia/NATO/Coordination, 1995-96. Memorandum from DAV to S, 16/10/95, DAV 95/1123; ABZ, Cabinet archive Strictly Confidential Secret Codes. Secure fax from Klompenhouwer to Foreign Affairs, 15/11/95, BRN/668.

weaponry might in fact provoke aggression⁵⁶⁷¹ and pointed to the training aspect and the problems that the Bosnian Serbs would put in the way of allowing in heavily armed units.⁵⁶⁷²

Blaauw and the VVD (Liberal Party) considered that a YPR with a .50 did not accord with the possibility of robust action that the Dutch Government had talked about at the beginning of November,⁵⁶⁷³ but he thought it was 'going too far to table a motion for a gun'.⁵⁶⁷⁴ Blaauw did however ask Junior Minister Frinking at the verbal consultations on December 21 whether it was true that the conversion of the turrets on the YPRs meant that gunners' heads were now left unprotected.⁵⁶⁷⁵ De Hoop Scheffer also raised this point, but from a different angle: he described it as 'demotivating' for the servicemen being sent out that the Netherlands Officers' Association had started a debate on the matter 'at the last minute'. Members of the Airmobile Brigade who had visited the CDA (Christian Democrat Party) had said that the Association's criticism did not hold water.⁵⁶⁷⁶ Frinking agreed entirely with the comments on demotivation, which were based on 'inaccurate information and suppositions' and had been made by 'people who may be assumed to know it all'. A pointed letter from Minister Ter Beek to the Association on 24 November had evidently not been able to convince them, whereas the Commander of UNPROFOR, the Dutch Chief of Defence Staff, the Army Commander and the brigade commander concerned were convinced.⁵⁶⁷⁷

During verbal consultations on 1 February 1994 Van Traa returned to the question of weaponry. He wanted to know whether the equipping of the YPR armoured vehicles with .50 machine guns had been forced upon the Dutch by the Serbs. And would it not be possible for a few YPRs with 25 mm guns to be sent out as well? Blaauw wanted to know what the French, British and Spanish armoured cars in the former Yugoslavia were equipped with, and he asked the Minister to investigate alarming reports about the condition of the ordnance being sent.⁵⁶⁷⁸

De Kok was fed up with debates on the security aspects. These had already been discussed at length, and a visit to Bosnia had made it clear to him that a good deal of attention was being devoted to such issues. Any further debate on this subject would only increase the unease among the servicemen involved and their families.⁵⁶⁷⁹

Minister Ter Beek 'emphatically' denied that the light arming of the YPRs had been dictated by Serb conditions. The choice of the .50 machine gun was dictated by the fact that it was easier to operate and its use could therefore be taught to large numbers of soldiers more quickly, he said, backed up by the Chief of Defence Staff, Van der Vlis, who was present. There was no question of 'converting' armoured vehicles, as the Army had YPRs with both 25 mm guns and .50 machine guns. Given the remit, the threat, the other weapons there and the terrain, Van der Vlis considered that equipping the Dutch YPRs with .50 machine guns was 'entirely adequate'.⁵⁶⁸⁰ Parliament did not in fact ask whether the weaponry was adequate to defend the enclave; it was only interested in whether the Dutch servicemen could defend themselves and in evacuation plans.

⁵⁶⁷¹ Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵⁶⁷² Interview R. in den Bosch, 19/04/00.

⁵⁶⁷³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.D. Blaauw, 31/05/00, p. 220.

⁵⁶⁷⁴ Interview J.-D. Blaauw, 23/04/99.

⁵⁶⁷⁵ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 73.

⁵⁶⁷⁶ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 73, p. 3.

⁵⁶⁷⁷ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Ter Beek to Stuiver, 24/11/93; ibid., NOV to members of the Parliamentary Permanent Committees on Foreign Affairs and Defence, 06/12/93; TK, 1993-1994, 22 181 No. 73, p. 7.

⁵⁶⁷⁸ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181 No. 74, p. 2.

⁵⁶⁷⁹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181 No. 74, p. 2.

⁵⁶⁸⁰ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 74, p. 6.

3. The expectations regarding air support

High expectations

In his report of 14 June 1993 implementing Resolution 836, Boutros-Ghali stated that the light option for the Safe Areas, which required a military force of 7,500, could not in itself completely guarantee the security of these areas, but was based on the threat of air strikes against the combatants.⁵⁶⁸¹ The responsible members of the Dutch Government such as Minister Kooijmans have also persisted in maintaining, since the fall of Srebrenica, that the resources with which Dutchbat was sent out were inadequate to defend the enclave, but that they had counted on air support appearing on the horizon if push came to shove.⁵⁶⁸² In a conversation with the NIOD, Kooijmans, who as the Foreign Minister in spring 1993 had argued that the security of the Safe Areas could be enhanced by air protection, was however of a different opinion:

‘We always knew that if a full-scale attack were to take place they (Dutchbat) would not be able to do anything. Unless there was Close Air Support, which would take over the deterrence function. But you’re not going to succeed even with Close Air Support if they decide to overrun the whole shooting match.’

Prime Minister Lubbers visited Srebrenica in May 1994 and noted that the enclave was scarcely defensible: ‘It’s almost threatening, seeing the mountains around you and you’re in the middle of them.’ After that, however, he went on to Villafranca, where he was confirmed in his conviction that air support at the right time would provide protection. None of the military personnel he spoke to during his visit to Srebrenica warned him about the situation Dutchbat found itself in, despite the fact that he made himself, in his own words, ‘very accessible’. The Dutch Prime Minister said that the trip had instilled in him a good deal of confidence.⁵⁶⁸³

For Dutch MPs too it was an established fact that air support would provide the solution in an emergency.⁵⁶⁸⁴ As Liberal MP Blaauw said to the Bakker Commission: ‘Air support, deployed at the right time, ought to have been enough, even with a lesser force in a safe haven.’⁵⁶⁸⁵ De Hoop Scheffer likewise told the Commission he had counted on air support. That was also why he had not consulted the government any further on the locations Srebrenica and Zepa.⁵⁶⁸⁶ Nor did the civil servants think any differently.⁵⁶⁸⁷ On this point there seems to have been no disagreement between the politicians and the military, as Couzy told the Bakker Commission that at the time he had even thought that the problems he foresaw with supplies to Srebrenica could be solved with the aid of air support. ‘Everyone thought that air power could be an effective tool.’⁵⁶⁸⁸

A NATO report published in 1994 again confirmed the expectations on the use of air support:

‘The deployments which UNPROFOR is compelled to adopt in order to carry out its peacekeeping duties make it very vulnerable to attack or interdiction. The particularly hazardous nature of the operation is only acceptable from the ⁵⁶⁸¹ ABZ, DEU/ARA/05274. S/25939.

⁵⁶⁸² See e.g. interview W. Kok, 08/05/00; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of W. Kok, 08/06/00, p. 390; M. Meijer, ‘Kooijmans: Verenigde Naties moeten bij vredesoperaties eigen grenzen kennen’ (Kooijmans says United Nations must know its limits in peace-keeping operations), CD/Actueel, 28/10/95, p. 13.

⁵⁶⁸³ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/00.

⁵⁶⁸⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of G. Valk, 31/05/00, pp. 250-251 and 253; interviews L. Sipkes, 24/01/00, and G. Valk, 15/10/99.

⁵⁶⁸⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.D. Blaauw, 31/05/00, p. 219.

⁵⁶⁸⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.G. de Hoop Scheffer, 29/05/00, p. 178.

⁵⁶⁸⁷ See e.g. interview B. Hiensch, 13/07/00.

⁵⁶⁸⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of H.A. Couzy, 22/05/00, p. 63.

soldier's point of view because he knows that in extremis, NATO air power is available to protect him.⁵⁶⁸⁹

The same report did however warn that there was a limit to the extent of the air power that could be used without endangering acceptance of the peacekeeping operation by all parties.

Low expectations

It was precisely for this reason that Couzy had not been as optimistic about air support in November 1993 as he was in his statements to the Bakker Commission a few years later. In the interview he gave to NRC Handelsblad journalist Willebrord Nieuwenhuis in November 1993 on the flight to the Netherlands, following his visit to Kiseljak with Minister Ter Beek, he said that the use of force, including deploying NATO air power from Italy, which included Dutch F16s, was an 'empty promise', as the UNPROFOR commanders – as he had experienced during his visit to Kiseljak – would avoid using force so as not to jeopardize the humanitarian operation.⁵⁶⁹⁰ Speaking to the NIOD, Couzy stated that his low expectations of air support were based on the fact that the UN did not want to deploy air power until there was a 'smoking gun', and because of the long chain involved in handling requests: 'Before you've got through the whole chain the weapon has long returned to a camouflaged emplacement so you can never find it again. (...) Plus the fact that they could easily take hostages, which makes your weapon very blunt.'⁵⁶⁹¹

Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse said that that was his sentiment at the time as well. He based his expectations on UN action, or rather the lack of it, on the experiences of roadblocks. In his view UN forces were very limited in what they did and the Bosnian Serbs knew precisely how far they could go without the UN taking action: 'They knew perfectly well that they were in charge. They not only thought that, they really were in charge.'⁵⁶⁹² He was also aware that there was often ground mist, which made Close Air Support impossible, since this always required good visibility. Nor was air power effective against infantry on the march. 'Or you would have to carpet-bomb', but that would have been difficult to square with a peacekeeping operation.⁵⁶⁹³ Looking back, Bastiaans described Couzy's pronouncements of November 1993 as 'honest'. Bastiaans also could not see 'how in heaven's name you can incorporate the use of air support with the consent of the parties while upholding the mandate. In peacekeeping in the traditional sense – which is what it was then – the use of air power is roughly comparable to the threat of a nuclear strike. Once you deployed it you would almost be on the losing side. (...) A strike, in the sense of a number of air attacks, would mean quite simply that you were taking sides, as any lay person would understand. That would spell the end of the mission for UNPROFOR.'⁵⁶⁹⁴ This was also the opinion of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in autumn 1993. Air strikes were incompatible, in the opinion of HQ, with the character of peacekeeping operations. Hitting a tank in the course of self-defence was acceptable, in the view of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, in a peacekeeping operation, but it regarded shooting at infrastructure, command posts and logistics as war.⁵⁶⁹⁵

General Brinkman too told the NIOD that he had been aware of the problems with air support at the time. He saw three preconditions for air support, all of which were problematic in Bosnia. Firstly, weather conditions had to be good, which was often not the case in those parts. Secondly, there had to be enough aircraft with enough fuel. That was also often not the case, given the flying distance between ⁵⁶⁸⁹ Confidential informatie (165)..

⁵⁶⁹⁰ 'Couzy zegt begrip te hebben voor 'haast' Ter Beek' (Couzy says he understands Ter Beek's 'haste'), NRC Handelsblad, 12/11/93.

⁵⁶⁹¹ Interview H.A. Couzy, 04/10/01.

⁵⁶⁹² Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁶⁹³ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁶⁹⁴ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00. Cf. Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 87.

⁵⁶⁹⁵ Quoted in Hillen, Helmets, p. 143.

Italy and Bosnia. Thirdly, the aircraft had to be talked in to their targets, which often did not succeed. Furthermore, aircraft were not permitted to fly lower than five thousand feet for their own safety. Brinkman did say that he had not felt so strongly about these reservations because he had regarded the Safe Areas as a political, not a military, concept.⁵⁶⁹⁶

According to Van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse the Army made these objections to air support sufficiently clear to the politicians.⁵⁶⁹⁷ Certainly the pronouncements of Couzy published in NRC Handelsblad on 12 November, four days before the parliamentary debate on the mission, could have been seen as a clear signal. MoD spokesman Kreemers was in fact astonished that Couzy expressed his reservations in the press but not in the appropriate quarters,⁵⁶⁹⁸ yet another proof of the lack of communication between the Army top brass and the upper echelons at the Defence Ministry.

Anyone who tried to picture air support over Bosnia could have been warned by the Turkish word 'Balkan', which literally means 'wooded mountains'. The concepts of the territorial and national defence of the former Yugoslavia had accordingly been based on the fact that hostile air supremacy would not mean very much. The Yugoslav fighters on the ground would take advantage of the mountains, ravines, dense woodland and caves, especially in Bosnia.⁵⁶⁹⁹ This led the top brass of the American Armed forces to go so far as General Powell's pronouncement 'We do deserts, we don't do mountains'.⁵⁷⁰⁰ On top of this there was indeed the ground mist that often hung in the valleys of Bosnia, which was one reason why the Yugoslav Armed forces, which had their ground forces concentrated in Bosnia, sited their military airbases mainly along the Adriatic coast. The Dutch Armed forces were well aware of the ground mist problem, which had repeatedly cropped up in trying to get supplies to Sarajevo, in which the Netherlands had been involved with an F27.⁵⁷⁰¹

Ex-Commander of the Army and former Chief of Defence Staff General De Jager had noticed in summer 1992 that air strikes over Bosnia were not a realistic option as they could endanger the UN forces on the ground. Both the terrain and the attitude of the Serb forces meant that little effect could be expected of an air strike: 'When you fly over, all you see is one big cauliflower. The men lie down at the side of the road until the noise has gone. Then they just carry on.'⁵⁷⁰² The Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs realized in December 1992, based on the enforcement of the no-fly zone, that the deployment of air power was 'not sufficient in itself' to control the situation on the ground, especially in mountainous terrain.⁵⁷⁰³ It had been noted elsewhere that it was very difficult in Bosnia to detect artillery from the air, especially in the summer, because of the dense leaf cover.⁵⁷⁰⁴ Other people had publicly pointed out the difficult terrain and climatic conditions in the former Yugoslavia: it had been pointed out, for instance, that it was difficult to use lasers to guide bombs towards their targets there because of the mountains and forests.⁵⁷⁰⁵ At the end of 1992, when considering the possibility of flying in supplies over Bosnia by air, Van Walsum wrote that the weather conditions over Bosnia were 'far from ideal' for aircraft movements.⁵⁷⁰⁶ When the American administration started supplying the Muslim enclaves in Eastern Bosnia by air, in February 1993, the newspaper Trouw warned: 'The weather conditions in the former Yugoslav Republic – treacherous ⁵⁶⁹⁶ Interview J.-W. Brinkman, 11/10/99.

⁵⁶⁹⁷ Interview F. van Bouwdijk Bastiaanse, 28/08/00.

⁵⁶⁹⁸ Interview B. Kreemers, 18/03/99.

⁵⁶⁹⁹ UN, S/1994/674/Annex II, Bassiouni report, Annex III, p. 13.

⁵⁷⁰⁰ Ed Vulliamy, 'The secret war', The Guardian, 20/05/96; Bert, Superpower, p. 172.

⁵⁷⁰¹ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 72/92, 05/10/92.

⁵⁷⁰² Remco Meijer, 'Een harde job' (A hard job), Elsevier, 22/08/92, p. 33.

⁵⁷⁰³ ABZ, 999.241. Secret memorandum from Klompenhouwer (DAV/MS) to Chief DAV, 15/12/92.

⁵⁷⁰⁴ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, p. 11.

⁵⁷⁰⁵ Martijn Delaere, 'NAVO-acties is zo gepiept' (NATO campaigns a piece of cake), Haagsche Courant, 12/02/94.

⁵⁷⁰⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01806. Memorandum from DGPZ to Van den Broek, 09/12/92, No. 195/92.

winds, frequent mist and low cloud – make low flying difficult if not impossible.’ Aircraft flying at any height would also be vulnerable to Serb air defences.⁵⁷⁰⁷

The argument that lightly-armed ground forces could fall victim to air strikes had been put forward on numerous occasions, too.⁵⁷⁰⁸ On 29 December 1992 Couzy had indicated that if Ter Beek’s proposal to deploy F16s to enforce the no-fly zone were to be implemented the Dutch ground forces would have to be withdrawn (see Chapter 8). Wahlgren and the French and British Governments warned from the beginning of 1993 against armed enforcement of the no-fly zone over Bosnia, as they considered that shooting down Serb or Croatian aircraft could easily result in reprisals against the UN peacekeepers on the ground: consequently, as a leading article in Trouw put it, ‘it is becoming increasingly clear that the United Nations cannot take military action in Bosnia because they have forces there.’⁵⁷⁰⁹ Public opinion in France was sharply divided as to the wisdom of using air power. A poll conducted on 9 January 1994 showed that 51 per cent of the French were against ‘tough military action, for example air strikes, knowing what the risks to our soldiers on the ground are’, as against 44 per cent in favour.⁵⁷¹⁰ The reason why the no-fly zone over Bosnia had not been enforced for months was indeed the risk of Serb reprisals against UNPROFOR forces.⁵⁷¹¹ At the last minute UNPROFOR Commander Wahlgren advised against passing the Security Council Resolution on enforcing the no-fly zone.⁵⁷¹² According to Dutch Intelligence, the possibility of Bosnian Muslim Armed forces taking action against Western aircraft to provoke Western intervention could also not be ruled out.⁵⁷¹³ In April 1993, when Belgrade and Pale feared Western air strikes as a means of putting a stop to the Serb attacks in Eastern Bosnia, the Yugoslav Defence Minister Bulatovic threatened reprisals against the perpetrators’ ‘vital targets’.⁵⁷¹⁴ ‘There can be no doubt that UN forces will be the target of counterattacks as soon as a Western combat aircraft shoots down one of the combatants’ aircraft or bombs military installations. They will then be caught like rats in a trap’, as the former UN Commander in Sarajevo, MacKenzie, put it in De Volkskrant at the beginning of February 1993. The Canadian general added that this nightmare scenario had haunted him throughout his entire period as Commander.⁵⁷¹⁵ In early 1993, when a Resolution on enforcing the no-fly zone was in the pipeline, the governments involved agreed that there had to be a period between the passing of the Resolution and its actual implementation to enable the UN troops on the ground to prepare themselves for reprisals.⁵⁷¹⁶

Air strikes, then, could result in the UN units scattered throughout Bosnia being taken hostage, or worse, but even without going that far the government in Pale was not particularly worried about NATO air power. In December 1992 the magazine De Groene Amsterdammer published an interview with ⁵⁷⁰⁷ ‘Voedseldroppen boven Bosnië wordt riskant voor vliegtuigen’ (Food drops over Bosnia getting risky for aircraft), Trouw, 25/02/93.

⁵⁷⁰⁸ E.g. by H. Tromp in Max Arian and Joke van Kampen, ‘Te wapen’ (To arms), De Groene Amsterdammer, 05/08/92, p. 6.

⁵⁷⁰⁹ ‘Geloofwaardigheid’ (Credibility), Trouw, 19/03/93. See also e.g. ‘Heli-luchtbrug Bosnië van start’ (Helicopter airlift to Bosnia under way), De Telegraaf, 24/03/93; ‘Major ontraadt bombarderen Servië. Britse premier schrijft brief aan president Clinton’ (Major advises against bombing Serbia. British Prime Minister writes letter to President Clinton), de Volkskrant, 01/02/93.

⁵⁷¹⁰ Marie-Claude Smouts, ‘Political aspects of peace-keeping operations’, Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 35.

⁵⁷¹¹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Parts V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 93/92, 04/12/92 and 97/92, 14/12/92.

⁵⁷¹² ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Parts V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 22/92, 25/03/93.

⁵⁷¹³ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Parts V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 25/93, 13/04/93.

⁵⁷¹⁴ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Parts V-VI, May 1992 - April 1993, MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 29/93, 26/04/93.

⁵⁷¹⁵ L. MacKenzie, ‘Interventie zal in Bosnië geen vrede brengen’ (Intervention will not bring peace in Bosnia), de Volkskrant, 06/02/93.

⁵⁷¹⁶ ‘Hevige strijd in Bosnië, VN praten over vliegverbod’ (Violent conflict in Bosnia, UN talking about no-fly zone), Trouw, 19/03/93.

Karadzic in which the President of the Republika Srpska said he was not at all impressed by air power: unlike artillery, he said, aircraft always had to turn back within a few hours.⁵⁷¹⁷

Although Dutch politicians had great confidence in the protection that could be provided from the air if push came to shove in the Safe Areas, among the military the expectations were much lower. Their reservations related to the terrain, the ground mist, the height at which aircraft had to fly, the limited time aircraft could operate over Bosnia, the risk of ground forces being taken hostage, the unwillingness to deploy air power because it could mean the end of the humanitarian operations, and the long lines of command any request for air support had to negotiate. If the military did not inform the politicians of these objections, many of them could be found in newspapers and magazines.

The role of Akashi

The government's attention was focused mainly on the question of lines of command and competences as regards air support. Only days after NATO Secretary-General Wörner sent a detailed plan for Close Air Support to the UN, on 6 July 1993, and reported on 22 July that NATO aircraft in Italy were ready to provide it, informal consultations took place in New York between the countries involved in drawing up the Joint Action Plan. After the meeting the Deputy Military Adviser to the Dutch Permanent Representation, Koestal, was told that in the event of an initial incident General Cot could ask Boutros-Ghali for air support and that the latter could agree without consulting the Security Council.⁵⁷¹⁸

Another few days later NATO decided that air strikes could be undertaken in consultation with the UN. There was not much support for air strikes, strategic bombing for political ends, either at the UN or in NATO. Besides the United States,⁵⁷¹⁹ and at times France, the Netherlands was the only country with forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina that supported such air strikes in international forums. 'Other NATO Member States doubt the value of air strikes against Serb positions, presumably for fear of Serb reprisals against UNPROFOR personnel', said the Military Intelligence Service in a report dated 11 January 1994.⁵⁷²⁰

Early in January, Lubbers and Kooijmans visited President Clinton. The Americans saw the visit mainly as being in preparation for the NATO summit on the Partnership for Peace which was to be held on 10-11 January. The two Dutch Ministers, however, hoped above all to elicit pronouncements on the situation in Bosnia from the President. During the visit to the White House, Clinton, in Lubbers' opinion, gave a guarantee that air support would be provided to protect UN forces. Kooijmans thought he also remembered that the possibility of deploying American ground forces was raised but that Clinton's reaction was negative. As far as Lubbers recalled, Clinton promised air strikes if push came to shove in the Safe Areas. Kooijmans attached less importance to the undertaking than Lubbers; he considered that a guarantee of this kind already existed in the NATO decisions of 2 and 9 August.⁵⁷²¹

At the NATO summit in Brussels on 10-11 January 1994 the main items on the agenda were the Partnership for Peace, i.e. cooperation with the former Warsaw Pact countries, and the development of a European security and defence identity. On 11 January 1994, after the summit, NATO issued a statement in which the NATO Member States reaffirmed their willingness 'to carry out air strikes in order to prevent the strangulation of Sarajevo, the Safe Areas and other threatened areas in ⁵⁷¹⁷ E. Limonov, 'Omsingeling' (Encirclement), De Groene Amsterdammer, 09/12/92, p. 13.

⁵⁷¹⁸ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00141. Biegman 733 to Kooijmans, 22/07/93.

⁵⁷¹⁹ See e.g. ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen. M. Klosson, American temporary chargé d'affaires in The Hague, to Lubbers, 31/07/93, with Appendix: Clinton to Lubbers, 31/07/93; Klosson to Kooijmans, 31/07/93, with Appendix: Christopher to Kooijmans, 31/07/93.

⁵⁷²⁰ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 02/94, 11/01/94.

⁵⁷²¹ Interview R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/99; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, pp. 132 and 136.

Bosnia and Hercegovina.⁵⁷²² It explicitly referred to the reopening of Tuzla airport and the relieving of the Canadian company in Srebrenica by the Dutch UN forces. The Bosnian Serb top brass subsequently announced that air strikes would result in direct reprisals against UN personnel.⁵⁷²³ Whether the Canadian Prime Minister, Chrétien, was startled by NATO's resolute language or the Bosnian Serb military leadership is unclear; in any event he declared soon after the meeting that Canada would say 'no' to air strikes if it was consulted: after all, the soldiers in Srebrenica were Canadian.⁵⁷²⁴

If Prime Minister Lubbers, after the NATO summit, was impressed by what he regarded as a robust stand on the part of the alliance, a few days later fresh doubts arose as to how strongly air power would be used, following statements by the Japanese official Yasushi Akashi. At the end of 1993 Boutros-Ghali appointed Akashi his Special Representative for the UNPROFOR operation in the former Yugoslavia, replacing Stoltenberg. Stoltenberg had resigned from the post of Special Representative (but not from that of negotiator) following criticism from both Cot and the Bosnian Government. Cot's criticism was that Stoltenberg was constantly involved in the negotiations on a peace plan, which took place mainly in Geneva, as a result of which he was not really in touch with UNPROFOR and the situation on the ground in Bosnia and Croatia, and there were frequent quarrels between him and Cot.⁵⁷²⁵ The Bosnian Minister for contacts with the UN, Hasan Muratovic, even refused point blank to communicate with Stoltenberg because he was supposedly pro-Serb (see Chapter 11), effectively making Stoltenberg's situation unworkable.⁵⁷²⁶

The purpose of the post of UN Secretary-General's Special Representative had been to separate the political level of UN decision-making, i.e. the Secretary-General and the Security Council, from strategic decision-making. The Special Representative was the link between the two levels. He was also expected to coordinate all UN activities in the former Yugoslavia, which mainly boiled down to coordinating the political, diplomatic and humanitarian efforts with the military activities. Akashi's arrival was urgently needed after the UN had repeatedly failed to act in a unified manner in the former Yugoslavia in the preceding 22 months of the UNPROFOR operation. His arrival was particularly necessary, however, with a view to the contact the UN needed to maintain with NATO on the deployment of air support. Because Akashi, as the Secretary-General's Special Representative, had to coordinate the military activities with political, diplomatic and humanitarian efforts, his very appointment involved the risk that a military desire to deploy air support had less chance of being granted because the other interests were judged more important.

This became clear within a few weeks of Akashi's appointment. In a report dated 18 January 1994 Dutch Military Intelligence noted reports in the press that Akashi had argued against NATO attacks on Bosnian Serb targets in a confidential report because of the danger of reprisals against UN personnel and the risk of the Bosnian Serb Armed forces making it impossible for UNPROFOR to use Sarajevo airport.⁵⁷²⁷ Two weeks later Intelligence pointed out again that when deciding on requests for air support Boutros-Ghali would be heavily influenced by Akashi, who in recent weeks had stressed he saw 'little point in air strikes'.⁵⁷²⁸

With the appointment of Yasushi Akashi as Boutros-Ghali's Special Representative, UN policy on Bosnia-Hercegovina to a large extent fell under two Japanese, Sadako Ogata, head of UNHCR, and Akashi. The actions of Akashi, who was to remain at his post in Zagreb until autumn 1995, were determined by a number of factors. Having risen in the UN bureaucracy since 1957 he, perhaps more than others, had adopted the philosophy predominant in the New York offices that the organization

⁵⁷²² UN, S/1994/50, 18/01/94.

⁵⁷²³ MID. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 03/94, 14/01/94.

⁵⁷²⁴ Jos Klaassen, 'Canada weigert nu luchtaanvallen op stellingen Serviërs' (Canada now refuses air strikes on Serb positions), de Volkskrant, 12/01/94. Cf. interview R.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁵⁷²⁵ Interviews B. Pellnäss, 03/11/99, and F. Briquemont, 22/06/00.

⁵⁷²⁶ Interview H. Muratovic, 30/01/98.

⁵⁷²⁷ DCBC, 2127. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 04/94, 18/01/94.

⁵⁷²⁸ DCBC, 2125. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 06/94, 31/01/94.

that had been founded in 1945 to maintain peace and security hardly if ever had the right to use force in the course of a peacekeeping operation.⁵⁷²⁹

A short time previously, Akashi, again as Boutros-Ghali's senior envoy, had gained experience of the new type of UN peacekeeping operation in Cambodia. That operation differed from the one in the former Yugoslavia in various respects. The UN operation in Cambodia, UNTAC, was not a traditional peacekeeping operation but a form of peacemaking that had been made possible once the Paris agreement had been signed by the parties, King Sihanouk, the supporters of the Hang Sen, which had been put in power by Vietnam, and Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge. The purpose of UNTAC was to bring about a democratic society, inter alia by organizing elections. A major difference from the situation in the former Yugoslavia was that there was a peace agreement in the Asian state whereas there was 'no peace to keep' in the Balkan country. Another big difference was that the international community was not really divided about action in Cambodia, whereas it was divided about action in the former Yugoslavia. The UN mandate in Yugoslavia was also much more limited than that in Cambodia. Despite these relatively favourable conditions there was criticism of Akashi's actions as Boutros-Ghali's Special Representative in Cambodia: it was said that he had not managed the whole operation properly, for one thing in that he had not coordinated the various parts of it.⁵⁷³⁰ Akashi himself, on the other hand, saw his work as a success. He considered that the main objectives in Cambodia had been achieved: free and fair elections, assisting Cambodia with the transition to a democracy and social reconstruction.⁵⁷³¹ His own role, as he saw it, had been as follows:

'On the ground, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General had almost unlimited authority over national institutions. However, due to his political judgement, he exercised his power in a limited and cautious manner, in order to place before the parties their full responsibilities for the final outcome of the peace process. In this way, he promoted a spirit of dialogue and compromise among the Cambodian leaders.'⁵⁷³²

He himself stressed that he had benefited considerably from the fact that the international community was broadly in agreement on Cambodia.⁵⁷³³ Asked about the secret of his success, however, he cited 'the Asian approach of seeking peace', which he admitted was time-consuming.⁵⁷³⁴

Akashi himself said that after his 'success' in Cambodia he set off for the former Yugoslavia with few illusions. He had realized when studying the documents in New York that the UN was adopting a very cautious stance in the conflict.⁵⁷³⁵ He subsequently had great difficulty adjusting to the attitude of the negotiators in Yugoslavia, which was so different from that in Cambodia.⁵⁷³⁶ Despite this he did not lose his tendency to think that everyone sitting across the table from him automatically became a diplomat.⁵⁷³⁷ Also, he had grown up with the Japanese peace constitution, which denied the country the right to wage war or have an army. Akashi found it hard to distance himself from that notion, as he admitted himself.⁵⁷³⁸ He had grave misgivings about the use of force.⁵⁷³⁹ Furthermore, from his arrival in Zagreb on 3 January 1994 he regarded the conflict in Bosnia as a civil war in which ⁵⁷²⁹ Interviews G.F. Collins, 08/06/00, and P. Galbraith, 23/06/99; Van de Roer, Frontdiplomaten, pp. 149 and 151.

⁵⁷³⁰ See e.g. Bais, Mijnenveld, p. 41; the final report by Brigadier General Robert Rideau to the Chief of Staff of the French Armed forces, quoted in Philippe Morillon, 'The military aspects of field operations', Brigitte Stern (ed.), Operations, p. 84.

⁵⁷³¹ Akashi, 'Limits', p. 88.

⁵⁷³² Akashi, 'Limits', p. 89.

⁵⁷³³ Akashi, 'Limits', pp. 89-90.

⁵⁷³⁴ 'Akashi leaves Bosnia job with mission incomplete', Asabi News service, 12/10/95.

⁵⁷³⁵ Interview Y. Akashi, 25/11/99.

⁵⁷³⁶ Interview E. Shitaka, 11/05/00.

⁵⁷³⁷ Interview G.F. Collins, 08/06/00.

⁵⁷³⁸ Interviews Y. Akashi, 25/11/99; G.F. Collins, 08/06/00; Van de Roer, Frontdiplomaten, p. 151.

⁵⁷³⁹ Interviews T. Banbury, 05/06/00; G.F. Collins, 08/06/00.

he had to adopt a neutral stance towards the three parties, for one thing because the use of force would stand in the way of the UN negotiations.⁵⁷⁴⁰ Many Western observers considered that his impartial attitude effectively made him a supporter of the Serbs and nicknamed him the 'Mitsubishi Chetnik' or the 'Senior Serb Liaison Officer'.⁵⁷⁴¹ With his – non-violent – heart in Japan and his – bureaucratic – head in New York, the question was what attitude Akashi would take to the use of air power in Yugoslavia now that the decision had been delegated to him.

Boutros-Ghali's visit

Besides Akashi there was the Russian factor. On 18 January Boutros-Ghali sent a letter to the Chairman of the Security Council from which it emerged that, following the NATO declaration of 11 January on the use of air strikes, the Russian Government had informed him that 'any use of force' in Bosnia would first have to be discussed by the UN Secretary-General with the members of the Security Council. Only then could a decision be made and only then could NATO be contacted.⁵⁷⁴² The letter from the Secretary-General raised a number of questions with Cornelia Minderhoud, who worked at the Dutch Permanent Representation in New York. In a memorandum dated 19 January she questioned whether Akashi and Ogata could be expected to agree to the deployment of air support if UN forces were threatened. She considered that the UN and a few troop-supplying countries would not be keen to embark upon any military operation as there was always the threat of a Russian veto on the use of air power.⁵⁷⁴³ She also had serious doubts as to the willingness of France and the United Kingdom to provide air support. The discussion about the difference between Close Air Support and air strikes, she said, was thus 'very vague'.⁵⁷⁴⁴

On 18 January Boutros-Ghali began a visit to the Netherlands which was to last a few days. On the evening of 19 January, at a dinner at the Catshuis (the Dutch Prime Minister's official residence), Ministers Lubbers, Kok, Kooijmans and Ter Beek asked him about his views on air support. The discussion resulted in a good deal of confusion, particularly because Boutros-Ghali did not distinguish between Close Air Support and air strikes but used the collective term 'air power'. At the time of this discussion the Foreign Ministry took the view, as before, that air support had to be granted without hesitation and was therefore keen to keep the Security Council out of the decision-making and to elicit a statement from the Secretary-General that he would take responsibility for air support. According to Kooijmans, Boutros-Ghali had a 'gadget' with him at the dinner on which he calculated that a request from a commander in the field could be answered within two hours from UN headquarters in New York. Kooijmans argued to Boutros-Ghali that the power to authorize air strikes could be delegated to his representative in the field. Kooijmans was in favour of the dual key, however, as he was apprehensive that NATO might go it alone and endanger UNPROFOR forces.⁵⁷⁴⁵

Caution as regards air strikes was in Minister Ter Beek's interest, in view of the imminent deployment of Dutchbat personnel in Srebrenica and – as was expected at that time - Zepa. He was not in favour of air strikes because they had an element of peace-enforcing which was incompatible with the nature of peacekeeping for humanitarian purposes which still dominated the UN operation in Bosnia. As regards Close Air Support (CAS) specifically to support Dutch troops, on the other hand, Ter Beek considered that the procedures must not be too complicated and must not take too long. Ter Beek took Boutros-Ghali's Indian adviser, Chinmaya Gharekhan, whom he knew, to one side several ⁵⁷⁴⁰ 'Akashi leaves Bosnia job with mission incomplete', Asahi News service, 12/10/95; Kenichi Miyata, 'Akashi's tricky balancing act in Bosnia', Asahi News Service, 23/10/95.

⁵⁷⁴¹ Mentioned in Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 166, whom Akashi himself described as 'a two-faced apologist for the Serbs', ibid., p. 167.

⁵⁷⁴² UN, S/1994/50, 18/01/94.

⁵⁷⁴³ ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from Minderhoud to temporary chargé d'affaires, 19/01/94.

⁵⁷⁴⁴ Interview C. Minderhoud, 02/06/00.

⁵⁷⁴⁵ Interview P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

times to communicate his views to the Secretary-General.⁵⁷⁴⁶ The Defence Minister, who was not in favour of over-hasty deployment of air power, with a view to the safety of the Dutch troops in Bosnia, had his mind put at rest by Boutros-Ghali's repeated explanation of the dual key principle. Ter Beek, like Kooijmans, was content that NATO was not likely to go it alone.⁵⁷⁴⁷

After the meeting, however, the opinions of the ministers present differed as to precisely what Boutros-Ghali had said. Ter Beek had gained the impression during his discussion with the Secretary-General that Lubbers and Kooijmans 'were not entirely clear as to what the difference was between Close Air Support and air strikes'.⁵⁷⁴⁸ Lubbers admitted that this was true as far as he was concerned but said that Kooijmans had explained the difference to him that night. Anyway the distinction was scarcely made in the discussion, according to Lubbers.⁵⁷⁴⁹ The annoying thing about the meeting as far as Kooijmans was concerned was that Boutros-Ghali was not at all au fait with the subject of air support: he had been amazed when Kooijmans explained to him that CAS was included in the mandate of Resolution 836.

Deputy Prime Minister Kok thought that Boutros-Ghali had been 'fairly vague' on the night of 19 January.⁵⁷⁵⁰ Kooijmans regarded his answers to the Dutch questions as 'unsatisfactory'.⁵⁷⁵¹ And Lubbers went home that night with the feeling 'Is this watertight and clear enough?'⁵⁷⁵² At the Foreign Ministry, the Directorate for Atlantic Cooperation and Security Affairs in particular had difficulty with the caution that Ter Beek had urged and Boutros-Ghali had confirmed would be exercised.⁵⁷⁵³

The next day Vos discussed the matter again with Boutros-Ghali's Special Adviser, Gharekhan. Vos rejected the idea that had come up during the dinner with Boutros-Ghali of the Dutch Government sending Boutros-Ghali a letter about delegating the power to authorize CAS. He considered that the domestic political support for sending Dutchbat was so substantial that there was no need to send any such letter: 'the deployment will go ahead as planned'. In Boutros-Ghali's camp, on reflection, they were also not so keen on the idea of a letter: he would have to consult the Security Council before replying. The position of the Russians on this point was well-known, so the answer might be unsatisfactory. Gharekhan assured Vos that if push came to shove the Secretary-General would decide on 'the deployment of air power' within one to one-and-a-half hours, 'whatever the Russians say'. If necessary he would even not inform the Security Council until after making his decision. As a result of this clarification there was no need, according to Vos, for a letter from the Dutch Government to Boutros-Ghali.⁵⁷⁵⁴

As a result of the conversation between Vos and Gharekhan the Secretary-General made a clearer pronouncement on air support, in the view of the Dutch Government, at a press conference on 21 January.⁵⁷⁵⁵ On that occasion Boutros-Ghali declared that he was personally in favour of the use of 'air power':

'If we receive a request, I will certainly give the green light after a consultation with the Security Council. (...) In my interpretation consultation means that I will inform the Security Council concerning the first time one uses air force. (...) Furthermore I have no objection to mandate my special representative, Akashi, to give the green light for using air forces in any operation in Bosnia.

⁵⁷⁴⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, pp. 104-105.

⁵⁷⁴⁷ Both, Indifference, pp. 213-214; interview A.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99; TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of A.L. ter Beek, 24/05/00, pp. 104-105; Ter Beek, Manoevreren, p. 205; interview K.J.R. Klompenhouwer, 13/12/99.

⁵⁷⁴⁸ TCBU, conversation with A.L. ter Beek, 23/03/00, p. 33. The same opinion in interview B. Kreemers, 18/03/99.

⁵⁷⁴⁹ Interviews R.F.M. Lubbers, 13/10/99.

⁵⁷⁵⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of W. Kok, 08/06/00, p. 389. See also interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁵⁷⁵¹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of P. Kooijmans, 25/05/00, p. 115.

⁵⁷⁵² TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of Lubbers, 25/05/00, p. 136.

⁵⁷⁵³ Both, Indifference, p. 215.

⁵⁷⁵⁴ ABZ, PVNY. Memorandum from DGPZ to Kooijmans, 20/01/94, No. 14/92.

⁵⁷⁵⁵ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of W. Kok, 08/06/00, p. 389; hearing of Kooijmans, 25/05/00, p. 115.

Again after consultation with the Security Council. (...) I will inform the Security Council. I will say: I have done this. After the use of the power, the next day the Security Council may decide to stop the mandate they gave me.⁵⁷⁵⁶

On top of this he recorded his standpoint, which satisfied the Dutch Government, in a letter to the Security Council on 28 January. That made a ‘considerable difference’ according to Deputy Prime Minister Kok.⁵⁷⁵⁷ In the letter Boutros-Ghali distinguished between CAS, the use of air power for the purpose of self-defence, and air strikes, the use of air support ‘for pre-emptive or punitive purposes’. And yet Boutros-Ghali’s letter still left a lot of questions unanswered. He wrote, for instance, that ‘air power would be used, if necessary, in self-defence against a deliberate attack upon UNPROFOR by any party’. And he would not hesitate to give authorization for Close Air Support. But these statements only related to the changeover in Srebrenica and the reopening of Tuzla airport. Similarly, the power to grant a request for CAS from the Force Commander would only be delegated ‘in the specific circumstances of these operations relating to Srebrenica and Tuzla’.⁵⁷⁵⁸ The Dutch ministers were satisfied after reading Boutros-Ghali’s letter. Hoekema, who took minutes at the meeting at the Catshuis, told the Bakker Commission:⁵⁷⁵⁹

‘We thought it had to work because we all wanted it to. At a meeting of that kind you don’t immediately envisage a worst case scenario. As I said, we assumed that the presence of the (UN) forces would deter the Serbs and, if push did come to shove, the threat of air power alone would be enough to deter the Serbs.’⁵⁷⁶⁰

Minister Pronk told the NIOD: ‘We thought we had guarantees. They were not given. What is a guarantee? You can’t go any higher than the Secretary-General of the UN.’⁵⁷⁶¹ Looking back, Pronk considered that at the time the Dutch Government had been too eager to seek a solution to the risks ‘in procedures rather than in protecting ourselves’.⁵⁷⁶²

At the Dutch Permanent Representation in New York there was a conviction right after Boutros-Ghali’s visit to the Netherlands that what the Dutch Government regarded as undertakings and guarantees from the Secretary-General was of little value. According to Biegman, who was also at the dinner, at that time the UN did not really distinguish between air strikes and Close Air Support,⁵⁷⁶³ nor did Boutros-Ghali at the dinner at the Catshuis. As far as he recalled, the UN chief thought that he needed the consent of the Security Council, i.e. of the Russians, for any use of air power, ‘especially if it’s the first time’.⁵⁷⁶⁴ Minderhoud too subsequently considered that Boutros-Ghali could not do anything in regard to air support without the Security Council, even if Resolutions gave him the power: any Secretary-General who acted differently would be out on his ear the next day, she thought.

According to Minderhoud air support was an issue that was decided on ‘the spur of the moment’. Everything depended on how indignant Mitterrand – and subsequently Chirac – was about specific events in Bosnia. As things changed from moment to moment, the main actors in the Security Council had no need of clear phraseology. Resolutions had to provide maximum room for manoeuvre. With hindsight Minderhoud was convinced that the dual key had been a ‘disguised British joke’ right ⁵⁷⁵⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt I, p. 153. See also Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, p. 143.

⁵⁷⁵⁷ Interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁵⁷⁵⁸ ABZ, PR NY. Boutros-Ghali to K. Kovanda, 28/01/94, enc. with fax from PR New York to DPV/PZ, DAV and DEU, 28/01/94, nyy-1145.

⁵⁷⁵⁹ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.T. Hoekema, 24/05/00, p. 77.

⁵⁷⁶⁰ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.T. Hoekema, 24/05/00, p. 77.

⁵⁷⁶¹ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁵⁷⁶² Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁵⁷⁶³ Interview N. Biegman, 03/07/00.

⁵⁷⁶⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of N.H. Biegman, 29/05/00, p. 188.

from the start. The British Government, in her opinion, was dead against a major military responsibility without American participation. The dual representation of the United Kingdom and France, on both the Security Council and NATO, made it possible for London and Paris to manipulate the dual key.⁵⁷⁶⁵ When the American Permanent Representative, Albright, asked the United Nations Secretary-General some time after Boutros-Ghali's visit to the Netherlands why he was always so cautious about air support, he answered that he had no choice, as the UNPROFOR commanders took their orders from London and Paris.⁵⁷⁶⁶

On 27 January, on the occasion of the departure of 114 Dutchbat quartermasters from Schaarsbergen, Couzy described 'the discussions about air strikes' as 'completely crazy'. According to him this was an idea going around Dutch conference rooms and offices that bore no relation at all to the reality in Bosnia.⁵⁷⁶⁷ The MoD had to draw up a statement in haste for the commander to issue the next day 'to clarify his pronouncements'. The statement stressed the distinction between CAS and air strikes. The former was an additional guarantee of safety for the peacekeeping soldiers. The latter was a form of taking sides which could jeopardize the safety of the UN peacekeepers on the ground.⁵⁷⁶⁸ The statement ignored the fact that on 2 and 9 August 1993 the Netherlands had agreed to air strikes on condition that other countries with troops on the ground would be willing to take part in such action. Couzy, moreover, in spite of the clarification, continued to have reservations about any form of air support, as became clear from a telephone conversation he had with MoD spokesman Kreemers.⁵⁷⁶⁹

In a letter to Parliament on 26 January 1994 Ter Beek, also on behalf of Minister Kooijmans, stated that the government attached 'great importance' to Boutros-Ghali's statement during his visit to the Netherlands that he would certainly give the 'green light' if air support were requested by the UNPROFOR commander: 'We regard this possibility as an important additional guarantee of the safety of the Dutch UN forces, should it be necessary.'⁵⁷⁷⁰

The Foreign Affairs and Defence Permanent Committees discussed this letter on 1 February. Van Traa said he still agreed to the mission, albeit he considered with hindsight that it might have been better to hold the debate in a plenary session, as combat forces were being sent to the former Yugoslavia for the first time. He was also aware that in sending Dutchbat the Netherlands was rowing against the international stream, but he hoped that this would give a signal to France and the United Kingdom not to withdraw their forces unilaterally. He considered the security risks to be 'acceptable'. Should there be casualties among the members of the battalion this ought not to be a reason to review the decision to send them.⁵⁷⁷¹

Except for De Kok, all the spokesmen mentioned the uncertainty regarding air support. Van Traa noted that there was confusion about the terms 'air support' and 'air strikes'. To speculate about this would be pointless, in his view. The military would have to decide on the nature of air support operations. Also there was 'in general not much point in politicians constantly speculating about things that are not likely to happen'.⁵⁷⁷² However, now that the Netherlands was to provide the Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command of UNPROFOR from 1 March (Major General Van Baal), ⁵⁷⁶⁵ Interview C. Minderhoud, 02/06/00. Similar opinion given in interview P.M. Kurpershoek, 22/06/00. Cf. also interview P.C. Feith, 24/08/00, for the suspicion with which the British/French attitude in NATO was regarded in the Netherlands.

⁵⁷⁶⁶ Ed Vulliamy, 'Bosnia – The Secret War: Tragic Cost of Allies' Hidden Hostility', The Guardian, 21/05/96.

⁵⁷⁶⁷ 'Bevelhebber landmacht ziet niets in luchtaanvallen' (Army Commander sees no point in air strikes), ANP, 27/01/94, 23:46; 'Couzy ziet niets in luchtsteun voor VN'ers' (Couzy sees no point in air support for UN personnel), Trouw, 28/01/93; Kreemers, 'Brigade', June 1994, p. 35; Van Gils, 'Tweede Kamer steunt uitzending bataljon' (Parliament supports posting of battalion), ANP, 31/01/94, 14:56.

⁵⁷⁶⁸ 'Couzy verduidelijkt uitspraken over luchtaanvallen' (Couzy clarifies statements on air strikes), ANP28/01/94, 1327; Kreemers, 'Brigade', June 1994, pp. 35-36.

⁵⁷⁶⁹ NIOD, Coll. Ter Beek. Note from Kreemers to Ter Beek, 31/01/94.

⁵⁷⁷⁰ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 70, pp. 1-2.

⁵⁷⁷¹ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 74, p. 1.

⁵⁷⁷² TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 74, p. 1.

consideration needed to be given to shorter lines of command and better coordination between the local planners and those in Brussels and New York, in case the troops needed air support.

Blaauw asked the minister how air support could be requested and whether this could also be done to protect Safe Areas.⁵⁷⁷³ Evidently he had not known this when he agreed to Dutchbat being sent. This shows his comment later on to the Bakker Commission, suggesting that if he had had doubts about air support his party would not have agreed to the deployment of Dutchbat in Srebrenica,⁵⁷⁷⁴ in a strange light. For Sipkes too the question was whether the UN would be prepared to grant air support. If this was the case, would the Dutch Government be involved in authorizing it?

In his reply Minister Ter Beek mentioned Boutros-Ghali's letter of 28 January to the Chairman of the Security Council. To shorten the lines of command the UN Secretary-General had decided to delegate this power to his Special Representative in the former Yugoslavia, Akashi, said Ter Beek.

For eighteen months, in various debates, MPs had pointed out the risks air strikes entailed for UNPROFOR ground forces and the possibility of UN personnel in the former Yugoslavia being taken hostage.⁵⁷⁷⁵ The government's letter about Boutros-Ghali's statement, however, suddenly seemed to remove all the reservations and hesitations.

Blaauw subsequently stated that for him this was not just:

‘...about Boutros-Ghali. I was mainly dealing with the ministers, with the government, who gave the clear impression that air support was a very important element for them and that you could trust that. (...) (Then) you must have that trust. Otherwise consultations with the government are very difficult. Unless of course you yourself have information to the effect that you cannot trust the United Nations' undertaking that air support would be granted, but I did not.’⁵⁷⁷⁶

Van Middelkoop similarly stated:

‘What other choice do you have? ... The government states in a letter that the UN Secretary-General had promised the government that air support would be granted if requested. There comes a point where you just have to accept that.’⁵⁷⁷⁷

He admitted that he may have been too hasty in his acceptance.⁵⁷⁷⁸ Valk considered that Boutros-Ghali's statement was ‘a good guarantee’.⁵⁷⁷⁹

Thus the government accepted what Boutros-Ghali had stated, after having had some pressure exerted on him, and Parliament went along with this. The UN Secretary-General was taken at his word. It was not sufficiently realized that the UN was no more than the sum of its members and that among them the five permanent members played a dominant role. The diplomat Wijnaendts, asked by journalists from De Volkskrant in early February 1994 whether the Dutch Government, given the British and French Governments' opposition to air support, was not displaying ‘just a little too much ⁵⁷⁷³ TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 74, p. 3.

⁵⁷⁷⁴ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.D. Blaauw, 31/05/00, p. 221.

⁵⁷⁷⁵ See e.g. TK, 1992-1993, 22 181, No. 27, p. 4 (Van Middelkoop); No. 28, p. 7 (Ter Veer); No. 28, p. 8 (Sipkes); Proceedings, p. 13-806 (Sipkes, 22/10/92); Proceedings, p. 13-808/809 (Van Middelkoop, 22/10/92).

⁵⁷⁷⁶ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of J.D. Blaauw, 31/05/00, p. 221.

⁵⁷⁷⁷ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of E. van Middelkoop, 05/06/00, p. 293. Similar information in interview E. van Middelkoop, 08.10/99

⁵⁷⁷⁸ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, III, hearing of E. van Middelkoop, 05/06/00, p. 294.

⁵⁷⁷⁹ Interview G. Valk, 15/10/99.

heroism' with the Srebrenica move, replied that the Netherlands was simply 'somewhat more principled than the others'.⁵⁷⁸⁰

The instructions to spokesmen on the posting of Dutchbat I distinguished between air strikes and Close Air Support. They said that in the event of air strikes the UN would be taking sides in the conflict, which would have repercussions for UNPROFOR ground forces and the humanitarian aid in Bosnia. Deploying this weapon would therefore require the consent of the North Atlantic Council '(i.e. the sixteen NATO countries)' and the Security Council. Close Air Support could also lead to repercussions, but if asked about this the spokesman should answer '... as you know we are trained and equipped to deal with all options as regards force'.⁵⁷⁸¹

The attack on Sarajevo

On Saturday 5 February 1994, just after noon, a shell exploded in Markale market in Sarajevo, near the cathedral. As a result of the attack 68 people died and about two hundred were wounded. It was the worst attack on the city since the start of the war. The market was strewn with blood and severed limbs. Western television companies did not broadcast a lot of the pictures that were available because they were too gruesome.

The incident came just when the major Western countries were revising their policies and some new protagonists had stepped onto the Bosnian stage. It was already noticeable at the NATO summit on 9-10 January that the American administration was reconsidering its standpoint on Bosnia. William Perry, who had succeeded Aspin as Secretary of Defense, and General John Shalikashvili, who had taken over from Powell, were more inclined to deploy air power than their two predecessors. From the beginning of January the French Government had been urging American 'intervention' in Bosnia-Herzegovina.⁵⁷⁸² During a visit to Paris by Warren Christopher on 24 January Juppé exerted strong pressure in favour of more American involvement in the crisis in Yugoslavia.⁵⁷⁸³ A week later, on 1 February, Hurd spoke to Christopher in Washington in similar terms. In a letter Minister Kooijmans also called upon his American counterpart to play a more active role with a view to the negotiations on Bosnia.⁵⁷⁸⁴ On 4 February Christopher told Lake that he was 'acutely uncomfortable' with his government's passive attitude and that it was time for a fresh initiative.⁵⁷⁸⁵ What happened at the market in Sarajevo on 5 February substantially facilitated the change of heart by the American administration.⁵⁷⁸⁶

This was also the case with Mitterrand, who told Juppé following the incident that it was impossible for France to conduct a policy guided by emotion. On the other hand the French President realized that the population of his country would not put up with Realpolitik in this case. He said he found choosing between the two types of policy extremely difficult after the incident.⁵⁷⁸⁷ At the same time he was glad that the American administration was willing, following the attack, to embark on the ⁵⁷⁸⁰ Paul Brill & Martin Sommer, 'Diplomatie op drijfzand' (Diplomacy in the quicksand), de Volkskrant, 05/02/94.

⁵⁷⁸¹ CDPO/GNKD. Chief of Army Crisis Staff to Junior Commanders BLS and Directors of Army Staff, 11/02/94, OZ/7806.

⁵⁷⁸² 'Frankrijk wil Amerikaanse interventie in Bosnië' (France wants American intervention in Bosnia), ANP, 04/01/94, 22:02; Van Gils, 'Kamer roept regering op Frans plan voor Bosnië te steunen' (Parliament urges government to support French plan for Bosnia), ANP, 07/01/94.

⁵⁷⁸³ Ridderma, 'VS wijzen Franse oproep af voor ingrijpen in Bosnië' (US rejects French call for intervention in Bosnia), ANP, 24/01/94, 22:04.

⁵⁷⁸⁴ Van Gils, 'Nederland vraagt om actieve rol in vredesoverleg Bosnië' (The Netherlands asks for active role in Bosnia peace talks), ANP, 03/02/94, 13:15.

⁵⁷⁸⁵ Danner, 'Point', p. 38; Daalder, Dayton, pp. 24-25.

⁵⁷⁸⁶ Danner, 'Point', p. 38; Cf. TK, 1993-1994, Proceedings, p. 3895 (Kooijmans, 16/02/94); Carruthers, Media, p. 216; Drew, Edge, pp. 410-411; Schoemaker, 'Oorlog', p. 30; Burg & Shoup, War, p. 164; Strobel, Policy, p. 155.

⁵⁷⁸⁷ Adler, Année, p. 83.

Bosnian adventure. This had always been a precondition for stronger French action as far as he was concerned.⁵⁷⁸⁸

Serbs and Muslims accused each other of being responsible for the attack.⁵⁷⁸⁹ At the end of July 1992 Bosnian Serb forces had destroyed a radar detection unit of a Ukrainian UN battalion near Sarajevo.⁵⁷⁹⁰ The unit had not subsequently been replaced, so UNPROFOR could never determine with absolute certainty which party had been shooting. Some commentators have suggested that this handicap was borne cheerfully by the UN,⁵⁷⁹¹ as it enabled them to remain 'impartial' in the conflict. After the attack on 5 February 1994, however, the Under-Secretary-General for peacekeeping operations, Annan, asked the Governments of France, Great Britain and the Netherlands to supply radar systems of this kind,⁵⁷⁹² but the Dutch Government refused to supply one of the seven Dutch weapon-locating radar units, which were capable of detecting artillery and mortars, to UNPROFOR because the soldiers who operated them were mainly conscripts whose willingness to be posted would be 'very slight' in the Army's view. Professional soldiers could be trained to use the radar within two weeks, after which they would have to take a one-month UN course.⁵⁷⁹³ Evidently something that would have been possible for the airmobile battalion was not possible for a radar unit.

In the absence of radar, UNPROFOR military and a team of international experts could only ascertain that the weapon was a 120 mm shell which had been fired from the north-east at a distance of two or three kilometres. They were unable to ascertain which of the parties was responsible, as Muslims and Serbs both had positions close together in the north-east of the city and both sides had this type of shell. On top of this the shell had first hit a rooftop, with the result that the crater was too shallow to enable the angle at which it had been fired to be calculated precisely. Nor could any information on the manufacturer of the shell be obtained. The British general Michael Rose, who had taken over from Briquemont as Commander of UNPROFOR II on 21 January, however, stated: 'I categorically claim there was no opening of fire from Bosnian Serb Army positions in that area at that time.'⁵⁷⁹⁴ And some of the press were no less categorical.⁵⁷⁹⁵ Anonymous UN officers subsequently said that there was a secret UN report which showed that the Bosnian Government authorities were responsible for the explosion.⁵⁷⁹⁶ Dutch Military Intelligence thought it most likely that the Bosnian Muslims, who had recently been trying harder and harder to provoke foreign military intervention, were responsible.⁵⁷⁹⁷ It was never officially established whether the shell was fired by the Serbs or the Muslims, however.⁵⁷⁹⁸

On the day after the explosion the Bosnian Government demanded that the Bosnian Serbs' heavy weapons around Sarajevo be pulled back and placed under UNPROFOR supervision.⁵⁷⁹⁹ The ⁵⁷⁸⁸ Adler, Année, p. 84.

⁵⁷⁸⁹ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 781, 789; Bodansky, Offensive, pp. 61-62; Danner, 'Point', pp. 35 and 37-38.

⁵⁷⁹⁰ 'Bosniërs willen door blokkade Sarajevo breken' (Bosnians want to break Sarajevo with blockade), de Volkskrant, 01/08/92.

⁵⁷⁹¹ See e.g. Tromp, Verraad, pp. 154-155.

⁵⁷⁹² Bstas. Defence Staff, exh., 22/02/92, No. S94/061/674, Annan, to Biegman, 10/02/94; ABZ, DPV/ARA/00581. Biegman 185 to Kooijmans, 18/02/94.

⁵⁷⁹³ Bstas. Memorandum from Defence Staff to Ter Beek, 17/02/94, S94/061/611.

⁵⁷⁹⁴ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 781-782. See also Danner, 'Point', p. 40; Rieff, Slaughterhouse, pp. 188 and 219-220.

⁵⁷⁹⁵ See also Mira Beham, 'Die Medien als Brandstifter', publ. Bittermann, Serbien, pp. 119-121.

⁵⁷⁹⁶ Chuck Sudetic, 'Bosnia Army Said to Shell its Own Territory', The New York Times, 11/11/94.

⁵⁷⁹⁷ DCBC, 2123. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 08/94, 09/02/94.

⁵⁷⁹⁸ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 784, 787, 789, 796 and 801; Major, Autobiography, p. 543; Koet, 'Adviser', p. 37; Burg/Shoup, War, p. 166; C. Cremer, 'De ogen en oren van UNPROFOR' (The eyes and ears of UNPROFOR), Armex, 78(1994) 5, p. 21. British and American Intelligence are said to have established that the shell most probably came from the Muslim side. Interviews J. Cooke, 01/08/00, and C. Wallace, 04/05/00. Cf. interview R. Morgan, 25/11/00; John Sray, 'Selling the Bosnian Myth', Foreign Military Studies, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, October 1995. The same claim is made by an anonymous high-ranking British official, James Gow & James Tilsley, 'The Strategic Imperative for Media Management', Gow & Paterson & Preston (eds.), Bosnia, p. 111 n. 40.

⁵⁷⁹⁹ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 784.

American administration considered that the shell attack fitted into the pattern of the Bosnian Serb shelling of Sarajevo. As Albright, the American Permanent Representative to the UN, put it:

‘It’s very hard to believe that any country would do this to their own people, and therefore, although we do not exactly know what the facts are, it would seem to us that the Serbs and the Bosnian Serbs are the ones that probably have a great deal of responsibility.’⁵⁸⁰⁰

Spurred on by the government in Paris,⁵⁸⁰¹ she therefore requested NATO air strikes in Washington, and Boutros-Ghali did indeed ask NATO to consent to air strikes against the Serb artillery around the city.⁵⁸⁰² There was opposition from various quarters. Owen let it be known that he did not think this was the solution.⁵⁸⁰³ Karadzic said that if this were to happen, foreigners would not be safe in Bosnia.⁵⁸⁰⁴ On 7 February seven of the EC Foreign ministers voted against air strikes, with Germany abstaining. Only the Netherlands, France, Italy and Belgium were in favour.⁵⁸⁰⁵ The Russian Foreign Minister, Kozyrev, considered that a fresh decision by the Security Council was required for air strikes.⁵⁸⁰⁶ Both NATO and the Chairman of the Security Council, however, stressed that the Security Council Resolutions authorized the UN Secretary-General to approve air strikes.⁵⁸⁰⁷

At the suggestion of the Americans, on 9 February the North Atlantic Council set the Serbs an ultimatum, taking effect at midnight on 10 February, ordering them either to pull back their heavy weapons twenty kilometres from Sarajevo or to place them under UN supervision. If this were not done within ten days air strikes would ensue. The Bosnian Muslims were also called upon to place their heavy weapons under UNPROFOR supervision. After the ultimatum of 9 February the power to request air support for the whole of Bosnia, whether CAS or air strikes, was delegated to Akashi. Boutros-Ghali’s consent was only required the first time.⁵⁸⁰⁸ After that Akashi only needed to call upon the commander of NATO’s Southern Region for his support.

During a parliamentary debate on Sarajevo on 16 February following the NATO ultimatum, Minister Ter Beek assured MPs, in response to a question from Van Traa, that Boutros-Ghali had succeeded in substantially reducing the time it took for a request for air support to be granted.⁵⁸⁰⁹ However, on 12 March 1994, when a request for CAS from French forces in Bihac, after days of shelling by Bosnian Serb artillery, was granted, it took four-and-a-half hours from the initial request for Akashi to agree to CAS. Aircraft circled uselessly over the Serb targets for hours. By the time permission finally arrived the Bosnian Serb forces had disappeared. Because of the long time it had taken, Akashi ordered the authorization procedures to be streamlined to reduce the response time.⁵⁸¹⁰

Minister Kooijmans welcomed the NATO ultimatum: ‘With it the international community has adopted a more robust stance and left no doubt that the threat will be carried out.’ He admitted that ‘in principle’ there was ‘a certain risk’ to ground forces in the case of air strikes, but a more resolute stand ⁵⁸⁰⁰ Burg & Shoup (eds.) War, p. 169.

⁵⁸⁰¹ Gow, Triumph, pp. 147 and 219; Strobel, Policy, p. 157.

⁵⁸⁰² UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, p. 785.

⁵⁸⁰³ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 785 and 789.

⁵⁸⁰⁴ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 788.

⁵⁸⁰⁵ UN, S/1994/674/Annex VI, pp. 788.

⁵⁸⁰⁶ DCBC, 2123. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 08/94, 09/02/94.

⁵⁸⁰⁷ DCBC, 2122. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 09/94, 11/02/94.

⁵⁸⁰⁸ TK, 1993-1994, Proceedings, pp. 3901-3902 (16/02/94).

⁵⁸⁰⁹ TK, 1993-1994, Proceedings, pp. 3901-3902 (16/02/94).

⁵⁸¹⁰ ABZ, PVNY. Background paper concerning the request for Close Air Support on 12 March 1994; Boutros-Ghali to Wörner, 22/03/94; ABZ, DPV/ARA/09144. Biegman 291 to Kooijmans, 16/03/94; ibid., Biegman 326 to Kooijmans, 25/03/94; Bstas. Memorandum from Kolsteren to Ter Beek, S94/061/1024; Hillen, Helmets, p. 162; ‘Hoe een luchtactie niet doorging’ (How an air strike did not take place), NRC Handelsblad, 15/03/94.

on the part of NATO would also have a deterrent effect on reprisals: '(...) as Akashi can ask NATO to take action in the event of aggression against the forces on the spot.'⁵⁸¹¹

It did not come to air strikes in Sarajevo, however. The Russian Government, which had great difficulty with air strikes against the Bosnian Serbs, had reached an understanding with the Bosnian Serb leadership to prevent this: the Bosnian Serb Army would pull back its heavy weapons and Russian UN forces would be stationed between the Bosnian Muslim and Bosnian Serb forces near Sarajevo. As soon as the Russians had occupied their position on the outskirts of the city Mladic's mind could be at ease. The West would not be keen to carry out bombing that would kill Russian soldiers, and on arrival the Russian troops were indeed received with the celebrated Serb hospitality.⁵⁸¹² An exclusion zone was created and hundreds of UNPROFOR personnel were stationed along the front line to supervise the depots where the weapons were stored. Their scattered locations made the UN troops vulnerable to hostage-taking.

What had looked like a firm ultimatum, then, actually made UNPROFOR even weaker. In Washington, moreover, it was warned that the 'success' of the threat of air strikes around Sarajevo could not easily be repeated. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Shalikashvili, said at the beginning of March 1994: 'There were very specific conditions around Sarajevo that lent themselves to the application of air power that don't exist in any other places in Bosnia today.'⁵⁸¹³ At almost the same time Defense Secretary Perry told the American Congress that the other Safe Areas could not be protected with air support alone as this would not have much effect on the infantry and light artillery that the Bosnian Serb Army had stationed around them.⁵⁸¹⁴ This was a sharp blow to the guarantee of air support that the Dutch Government thought it had been given.

The crisis in Gorazde

The results of this approach became clear one-and-a-half months later around the Safe Area of Gorazde. The fact that Gorazde was held by the Muslims had long been a thorn in the flesh of the Bosnian Serb leadership. There were two roads linking the northern and southern parts of the areas occupied by the Serbs, one via Sarajevo, the other via Gorazde. When the Serbs complied with the NATO ultimatum, in February 1994, they lost their link via Sarajevo. They were very keen to secure the other link, via Gorazde. In late March/early April the Bosnian Serbs attacked the Safe Area of Gorazde. This enclave was about 50 kilometres south of Srebrenica, where the rumbling of the Bosnian Serb artillery shelling Gorazde could sometimes be heard.⁵⁸¹⁵ The Serbs claimed that they were only responding to attacks from the enclave. According to Mladic, Muslims had been trying to create a link to Foca from the enclave.⁵⁸¹⁶ It was probably true that attacks took place from the enclave, but the Serb response was again disproportionate.⁵⁸¹⁷ There were reports of hundreds of fatalities and thousands of wounded.⁵⁸¹⁸

The question of how to respond to this Serb challenge threatened to cause a split in NATO. The Americans' initial response was lukewarm. The Chief of Staff of the American army, Shalikashvili, claimed that there were no heavy weapons in position at Gorazde. Defense Security Perry said that Prijedor and Gorazde should not be allowed to fall into Serb hands, but NATO would not take action:

⁵⁸¹¹ O. van Boetzelaer, 'Standvastiger NAVO-opstelling kan Servische vergeldingsaanvallen voorkomen' (More resolute NATO stance could prevent Serb retributions), CD/Actueel, 12/03/94, p. 22.

⁵⁸¹² Rieff, Slaughterhouse, 186.

⁵⁸¹³ Callahan, Wars, p. 195; The editors, 'The Abdication, Cont'd', Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 173.

⁵⁸¹⁴ Callahan, Wars, p. 195; Haass, Intervention, p. 42.

⁵⁸¹⁵ Jellema, First-in, p. 130.

⁵⁸¹⁶ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 107.

⁵⁸¹⁷ Cf. Marjon van Royen, 'Nederlandse generaal: Moslims lokten aanval Gorazde uit' (Dutch general says Muslims provoked attack on Gorazde), NRC Handelsblad, 27/04/94.

⁵⁸¹⁸ Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 103.

‘we will not enter the war to stop that from happening. That is correct yes.’⁵⁸¹⁹ Prijedor had in fact been held by the Serbs for two years. The Bosnian Serbs now knew that the West was not prepared to show its strength in this case. For them this was ‘the green light to push on’, as an adviser to Karadzic put it.⁵⁸²⁰

The weekend of 16-17 April saw the departure of the Forward Air Controllers, who would have guided the bombs to their targets. For the population this was a sign that all hope was lost.⁵⁸²¹ Médecins sans Frontières accused the UN of ‘laxity’.⁵⁸²² After an UNPROFOR serviceman died as a result of Bosnian Serb shelling, air support was finally given: on 10 April two American F16s attacked a Serb tank and a ‘command centre’ (a few tents) just outside Gorazde. It was the first time since its inception that NATO had attacked ground targets. The next day an American F18 attacked a number of Serb armoured cars.

In response Karadzic said he would stop cooperating with UNPROFOR and warned Boutros-Ghali that from then on he regarded UNPROFOR as ‘a potentially hostile armed force’.⁵⁸²³ A series of incidents with UN forces ensued. In Srebrenica, for instance, the Bosnian Serbs broke off all contact with Dutchbat, which had meanwhile deployed there, and Bosnian Serb artillery was set up around the enclave. The situation scared a number of Dutchbat personnel to such an extent that they wrote letters of farewell to their families.⁵⁸²⁴ At the same time the events in Gorazde led to Muslim demonstrations in Srebrenica against the UN’s feeble approach to the crisis.⁵⁸²⁵ On 17 April the Bosnian Serbs occupied almost all of Gorazde.

The next day, 18 April, a heated telephone conversation took place between Mladic and Rose, with the Bosnian Serb Army leader demanding that there be no more air strikes and Rose demanding of Mladic that the shelling of Gorazde be halted. Finally Rose gave Mladic (‘you arsehole’) ten minutes to stop the shelling, and a quarter of an hour later it did indeed stop.⁵⁸²⁶

On 22 April NATO set the Bosnian Serbs an ultimatum, ordering them to withdraw to three kilometres from the centre of Gorazde and remove their heavy weapons from a 20-kilometre zone around the city. The Bosnian Serb forces then withdrew from the centre, on 23 April. Many people in the West concluded optimistically that the threat of air power seemed to have been effective again, after the events around Sarajevo in February.⁵⁸²⁷

The true lessons of Gorazde were less encouraging. When deploying NATO aircraft against some T55 tanks near Gorazde, NATO used old-fashioned, imprecise bombs. With the low cloud the planes had difficulty finding the targets. A few bombs missed their targets, some did not even go off. After Serb air defences brought down a British Sea Harrier in a third series of NATO air strikes the action was called off. NATO ascribed the loss of the aircraft to the fact that UNPROFOR had demanded that the pilot fly over the tank he was going to try and eliminate several times to make sure that it was indeed attacking. Admiral Boorda, the Commander of NATO’s Southern Command, who was responsible for the air operations over the former Yugoslavia, was so outraged that he said he would no longer approve tactical targets, only strategic targets.⁵⁸²⁸ This meant that any future requests for air support would be of an even more escalatory nature.

⁵⁸¹⁹ Quoted in ‘The Abdication, Cont’d’, Mousavizadeh (ed.), Book, p. 173.

⁵⁸²⁰ Frank Westerman, ‘Helpers Bosnië: ‘Nog even en ik pak een geweer’ (Bosnia helpers say ‘If this goes on much longer I’ll grab a gun’), De Volkskrant 22/04/94.

⁵⁸²¹ Frank Westerman, ‘Helpers Bosnië: ‘Nog even en ik pak een geweer’, de Volkskrant 22/04/94.

⁵⁸²² Frank Westerman, ‘Helpers Bosnië: ‘Nog even en ik pak een geweer’, de Volkskrant 22/04/94.

⁵⁸²³ TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 80; Steven Ratner & Masahiko Asada, ‘Peacemaking, peacekeeping, and peace enforcement. Legal underpinnings of the U.N. role’, Harrison & Nishigara (eds.), Peacekeeping, p. 57.

⁵⁸²⁴ Jan Westerhof, ‘Benauwde dagen voor Dutchbat in Srebrenica’ (Anxious days for Dutchbat in Srebrenica), de Volkskrant, 05/05/94.

⁵⁸²⁵ Jellema, First-in, pp. 135-136.

⁵⁸²⁶ Ian Traynor, ‘Profile: Beast of Bosnia’, The Guardian, 18/04/94.

⁵⁸²⁷ Even in TCBU, Vertrekpunt, I, p. 80.

⁵⁸²⁸ UN report, par. 138. See also Rose, Peace, pp. 114-115.

If this alone was a blow to the credibility of air support, things got even worse when an assessment concluded that the Serb targets did not warrant the deployment of smarter bombs.⁵⁸²⁹ The chances of conventional bombs hitting their targets were low. In summer 1995 Feith, the Netherlands' Deputy Permanent Representative to NATO, was not aware of this decision. He expressed indignation that two 500-pound free-fall bombs had been used in the eventual air strike during the Bosnian Serb attack on Srebrenica, 'technology from the Second World War', whereas he had counted on precision weapons being deployed.⁵⁸³⁰

Another thing that emerged from this operation was that the UN restrained NATO from stronger action. When the Bosnian Serbs did not initially seem to be responding to the NATO ultimatum on 23 April, the alliance wanted to organize a major air strike with the secondary aim of bombing the Serbs back to the negotiating table, but Akashi refused to give his consent.⁵⁸³¹ Rose again urged proportionality in air strikes as this was a peacekeeping operation. While preparing for his command in New York he had said to Madeleine Albright that 'air power alone could not be used in Bosnia to defend Srebrenica'.⁵⁸³² Rose had difficulty convincing NATO commanders, who were used to thinking in terms of overwhelming force. As one of them said, 'Proportionality. I'll give you proportionality. Han Pijesak (the Bosnian Serb HQ) and the Pale ammunition dump and Lukavica barracks. That's proportionality!'⁵⁸³³ The Dutch Brigadier General Bastiaans, head of the UN military observers, also said following the crisis in Gorazde that he was in favour of caution as regards air strikes: 'Bombing changes the relationships. It shuts off the possibility of continuing negotiations. Anyone who thinks this is not the case is just not of this world.'⁵⁸³⁴

On top of this, in response to the air strikes the Bosnian Serbs took about 150 UNPROFOR soldiers hostage near Sarajevo. Following the crisis Gorazde had been held, but reduced to a much smaller area. Boutros-Ghali drew the conclusion that the events around Gorazde proved once more that there were problems with the concept of a 'Safe Area'. Neither the presence of eight UN observers in Gorazde nor that of an UNPROFOR company in Bihac had stopped the Bosnian Serbs from attacking. It was clear, according to a NATO assessment, that the Bosnian Serbs would only halt an offensive in response to 'the wider use of air strikes for which further political authority was required'.⁵⁸³⁵ For the Bosnian Muslim commander Rasim Delic it was now clear 'that the international community was not willing to defend the protected areas at any price and that they would pull back at the first difficult problem...'⁵⁸³⁶ Conversely, General Rose was convinced that the Muslim Armed forces had deliberately stopped resisting: 'I think they basically turned and ran and left us to pick up the bits.' 'They think we should be fighting for them.'⁵⁸³⁷ He also noted that Gorazde had been less badly hit than some earlier reports had suggested.⁵⁸³⁸ Rose went on to complain that supposedly wounded Bosnian Muslim soldiers who had been transported by helicopter later jumped out apparently unhurt.⁵⁸³⁹ Talking openly to Roger Cohen, head of the Balkan Bureau of The New York Times, about what he considered to be the two-faced nature of the Bosnian Muslims, he added: 'It is very hard to ⁵⁸²⁹ Colonel of Cavalry R.H. Sandee, 'Militaire besluitvorming bij crisisbeheersing' (Military decision-making in crisis control), Carré 18(1995)4, p. 15.

⁵⁸³⁰ Interview P.C. Feith, 24/08/00; TCBU, Vertretpunt, I, p. 81.

⁵⁸³¹ Paul Shoup, 'The Crisis in Bosnia Herzegovina: Past, Present and Future', Blank (ed.), Wars, pp. 8-9 and 20 n. 8.

⁵⁸³² Rose, Peace, p. 15.

⁵⁸³³ Bell, Way, p. 182.

⁵⁸³⁴ Marjon van Royen, 'Nederlandse VN-General: Moslims lokten aanval Gorazde uit', NRC Handelsblad, 27/04/94; 'VVD: uitleg Ter Beek' (Liberals demand explanation from Ter Beek), NRC Handelsblad, 28/04/94.

⁵⁸³⁵ Confidential information (165).

⁵⁸³⁶ Report of explanation by Delic in September 1997 to the Bosnia-Herzegovina parliament of the causes of the fall of Srebrenica and Zepa, Appendix to MID. Vandeweyer to Voorhoeve, 10/11/97, DIS97005661.

⁵⁸³⁷ Bell, Way, p. 184. See also Rose, Peace, pp. 125-126; Cohen, Hearts, p. 261; Simms, Hour, pp. 189-195.

⁵⁸³⁸ Rose, Peace, pp. 124-125; Bulatovic, Mladic, p. 105; Cohen, Hearts, p. 261.

⁵⁸³⁹ Rieff, Slaughterhouse, p. 188.

believe that the Muslim enclaves are viable in the long run.⁵⁸⁴⁰ The Dutch Brigadier General Bastiaans, who was head of the United Nations Military Observers, stated: ‘The Muslims have provoked the Serbs with shelling and harassment to such an extent that the latter had little alternative but to deploy heavy weapons.’⁵⁸⁴¹

A Dutch UN observer who had been in Gorazde during the Bosnian Serb attack contradicted the notion that the Muslims had provoked the Bosnian Serb attacks. He said it was true that there had been fewer casualties than the Bosnian Government wanted the world to believe.⁵⁸⁴² Bosnia-Herzegovina Command came to the conclusion that Bastiaans, right from the start of the crisis, had not taken the signals given by the five UN observers there seriously enough.⁵⁸⁴³ International aid organizations were severely critical of Bastiaans’ and Rose’s pronouncements. According to one of the aid workers they were trying, having not responded adequately themselves, to save ‘their arses’ by blaming the Muslims and criticizing the aid organizations for exaggerating the crisis in Gorazde.⁵⁸⁴⁴ The Dutch Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Brigadier General Van Baal, when asked to comment on Bastiaans’ claim that the Muslims had provoked the conflict, responded by saying that if anyone could tell him who had started it that would be an ‘awfully clever’ person.⁵⁸⁴⁵ The UN’s response to the crisis in Gorazde did not inspire much confidence in UNPROFOR’s reaction to any fresh attacks on the Safe Areas. Médecins sans Frontières demanded the resignation of Akashi,⁵⁸⁴⁶ who was still annoyed by the fact that the Muslims continued to count on intervention. Following the crisis in Gorazde he commented: ‘We can only hope that the failure of NATO to come to their aid around Gorazde will convince them that the US cavalry isn’t around the corner.’⁵⁸⁴⁷ Annan tried to protect Akashi and UNPROFOR against the storm of criticism⁵⁸⁴⁸ of the inadequate use of air power. He said that such action was designed

‘.....to protect lives – not just of the handful of UN soldiers who might be threatened by a given attack but the thousands of lightly armed peacekeepers and hundreds of unarmed relief workers, military observers and police monitors whose lives would be threatened by precipitous military action.’⁵⁸⁴⁹

Two things stand out from this observation. Firstly, the populations of the Safe Areas are not included among those whose lives were to be protected. Secondly, this pronouncement yet again underlined the fact that air strikes were not an automatic response but were considered in the broader context of the whole operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina. As Boutros-Ghali wrote in a report to the Security Council at the beginning of May, the Safe Areas could not be defended, not even with air support.⁵⁸⁵⁰

⁵⁸⁴⁰ Cohen, Hearts, p. 261.

⁵⁸⁴¹ Marjon van Royen, ‘Nederlandse generaal: Moslims lokten aanval Gorazde uit’, NRC Handelsblad, 27/04/94. See also Bodansky, Offensive, p. 63.

⁵⁸⁴² Leon Vankan, ‘Majoer Buisman: Moslims hebben niet geprovoceerd’ (Major Buisman says Muslims did not provoke attack), De Telegraaf, 29/04/94.

⁵⁸⁴³ Marjon van Rojen, ‘Kritiek van VN op generaal Bastiaans’ (UN criticism of General Bastiaans), NRC Handelsblad, 03/05/94.

⁵⁸⁴⁴ Marjon van Rojen, ‘Kritiek van VN op generaal Bastiaans’, NRC Handelsblad, 03/05/94.

⁵⁸⁴⁵ Marjon van Rojen, ‘VN medeverantwoordelijk voor Gorazde’ (UN shares responsibility for Gorazde), NRC Handelsblad, 07/05/94.

⁵⁸⁴⁶ Marjon van Rojen, ‘Kritiek van VN op generaal Bastiaans’, NRC Handelsblad, 03/05/94.

⁵⁸⁴⁷ Quoted in Bert, Superpower, p. 166.

⁵⁸⁴⁸ See e.g. Wim Jans, ‘Yasushi Akashi. Zo lang mogelijk aan tafel met de duivel’ (Yasushi Akashi. At the table with the devil as long as possible), Trouw, 30/04/94.

⁵⁸⁴⁹ Quoted in Michael N. Barnett, ‘The Politics of Indifference at the United Nations and Genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia’, Cushman & Mestrovic (eds.), Time, p. 154.

⁵⁸⁵⁰ UN, S/1994/555.

The events around Gorazde had caused great concern in The Hague as well. Minister Kooijmans noted that ‘we were not able to respond effectively’.⁵⁸⁵¹ CD/Actueel, the magazine of the Christian Democrats (CDA), expressed the hope that Akashi, who had again been very cautious, had ‘learned’ that a request for air strikes had to be put in ‘before the Serb forces had pushed right through to the centre of an enclave’.⁵⁸⁵² As a result of the tense situation around Gorazde a visit by Minister Ter Beek to Sarajevo and to Dutchbat in Srebrenica planned for 11 April had not been able to take place. On 25 April 1994, during a visit to Washington, Barth expressed his concern about the protection of the Safe Areas which relied on NATO air support to Deputy Assistant Secretary Vershbow. He said that while the NATO ultimatum had worked in the case of Gorazde, next time more importance might be attached to UNPROFOR’s humanitarian remit than the desirability of NATO action. Vershbow did not by any means put Barth’s mind at ease: he showed ‘complete understanding of Dutch sensibilities’ in view of the presence of Dutchbat in Srebrenica, and he said he could imagine that ‘at the end of the day the question could arise as to which of the two missions in Bosnia was most important’.⁵⁸⁵³

4. Bad omens

After the decision had been made to send Dutchbat various developments took place in Bosnia which could have an adverse effect on the Safe Areas. After the Silajdzic Government came to power, on 25 October 1993, more and more important state posts fell into the hands of the SDA. With Halilovic replaced by Rasim Delic as army leader the strength of the Bosnian Government forces increased. This, plus increasingly strong indications that NATO would be willing to use air strikes, made it more unlikely that the Bosnian Government would work to achieve something at the negotiating table, as Dutch Military Intelligence noted.⁵⁸⁵⁴ On top of this UNPROFOR reports indicated that the Bosnian Armed forces were increasingly positioning their artillery near UN locations or in residential areas, evidently with the intention of provoking the Serbs and eliciting foreign military intervention through pressure of public opinion. It was probably for this reason, too, that Bosnian Muslims conducted military actions in UN uniforms.⁵⁸⁵⁵

Intelligence reported on 31 January 1994:

‘Bosnian Serb spokesmen have said they have indications that Muslims in the enclaves on the Bosnian Serb border (Zepa, Srebrenica and Gorazde) intend to shoot at aircraft and helicopters of UNPROFOR or other UN bodies so as to hold the BSA (Bosnian Serb Army) responsible. Although there are no indications that these reports are correct it is clear that the Muslims have been attempting in recent weeks to step up foreign military involvement in the conflict. They hope in this way to bring the achievement of their ultimate political objective, viz. to keep Bosnia-Herzegovina a unitary state, closer.’⁵⁸⁵⁶

On 15 November 1993, the date when the Dutch Government sent its letter on the deployment of an airmobile battalion to Parliament, Owen said that international interference in Bosnia was probably lengthening the conflict, as humanitarian aid was benefiting the fighters on all three sides.⁵⁸⁵⁷ He ⁵⁸⁵¹ Knol, ‘Oorlog’, p. 136.

⁵⁸⁵² ‘Gorazde’, CD/Actueel, 29/04/94, p. 11.

⁵⁸⁵³ ABZ, PVNAVO. Jacobovits 270 to Kooijmans, 25/04/95.

⁵⁸⁵⁴ DCBC, 2130. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 01/94, 07/01/94; 2127, 04/94, 18/01/94; 2125, 06/94, 31/01/94.

⁵⁸⁵⁵ DCBC, 212. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 04/94, 18/01/94; 05/94, 25/01/94.

⁵⁸⁵⁶ DCBC, 2125. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 06/94, 31/01/94.

⁵⁸⁵⁷ Belae, Bombs, p. 24.

proposed that in spring 1994, once the winter was over, all aid to Bosnia be halted and all UN forces withdrawn, if the parties themselves had not reached a peace agreement by then.⁵⁸⁵⁸

On 20 January the European Parliament with a slim majority adopted a resolution not to extend Owen's mandate now that the peace talks had reached an impasse. Owen did not take much notice; he had been appointed by the Council of Ministers, not the European Parliament.⁵⁸⁵⁹

It was not only Owen who urged that UN forces be pulled out of Bosnia. In November 1993 the British Government let it be known that the UN efforts in Bosnia could not go on indefinitely if the parties to the conflict did not adopt a more cooperative stance. It was not entirely clear whether these pronouncements were intended solely to put pressure on the Bosnian Government to agree to the Owen-Stoltenberg plan or whether they had a broader import.⁵⁸⁶⁰ At the end of 1993 the French Government repeatedly hinted at the possibility of pulling its troops out of UNPROFOR in spring 1994 if there were no visible signs of a peace settlement.⁵⁸⁶¹ Minister Kooijmans, however, was not in favour of withdrawing: 'Even speculating about withdrawal will only decrease the desire for peace.'⁵⁸⁶² Nor did his fellow Minister Ter Beek contemplate withdrawal.⁵⁸⁶³

On 4 January 1994 the Belgian UNPROFOR Commander in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Briquemont, who was originally supposed to remain until June 1994, resigned in frustration at the small number of men he had at his disposal to carry out his mandate. The resources designed to protect the Safe Areas were completely inadequate. He considered there was a 'yawning gulf' between the Security Council Resolutions and the means provided for implementing them,⁵⁸⁶⁴ and he had stated on various occasions that he therefore no longer read the Resolutions.⁵⁸⁶⁵ He was also annoyed that the governments in Paris and London were threatening to pull out their UNPROFOR units. Briquemont's resignation led Christian Democrat MP De Kok, speaking in Elst at a talk for the AVNM conscripts' association, to comment 'speaking for myself' that 'we as politicians need to seriously reconsider the mission of the Airmobile Brigade'.⁵⁸⁶⁶ His call met with no response.

Cot too criticized the 'lack of will' he perceived among the countries contributing to UNPROFOR to try and reach a political solution to the conflict.⁵⁸⁶⁷ Briquemont was succeeded on 24 January by Sir Michael Rose. The 54-year-old British general, who had been in the Coldstream Guards and the Special Air Service (SAS), had experience of the Middle East, the Far East, the Falklands War and the Northern Ireland conflict. As Commander of the staff college in Camberley he had set up the first officers' course on peacekeeping operations. He was welcomed by Cot with a warning that the limit of feasibility had been crossed in the Bosnian conflict. Cot was no less frustrated than Briquemont. He objected to the fact that he had to request authorization for air strikes from UN headquarters in New York. He declared that 'the humiliation of the forces of the international community has reached a limit and I can no longer accept it'. The UN peacekeeping force in Bosnia ⁵⁸⁵⁸ 'Bosnië wenst u ...' (Bosnia wishes you...), Het Parool, 08/12/93.

⁵⁸⁵⁹ Peter de Graaf & Wio Joustra, 'EG-parlement wil vervanging van Lord Owen' (EC Parliament wants Lord Owen replaced), de Volkskrant, 21/01/94.

⁵⁸⁶⁰ Simms, Hour, p. 31.

⁵⁸⁶¹ ABZ, 911.31, Joegoslavië. Politieke verhoudingen en partijen, Part VII, May 1993 to March 1994. MID (Intelligence), Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 71/93, 21/12/93; 'Frankrijk wil geheel nieuwe aanpak van kwestie-Bosnië' (France wants completely new approach to Bosnia issue), de Volkskrant, 21/01/94.

⁵⁸⁶² 'Vlaanderen is politieker; Nederland meer ambtelijk' (Flanders is more political, the Netherlands more official), Standaard, 07/02/94.

⁵⁸⁶³ Peter de Graaf & Wio Joustra, 'EG-parlement wil vervanging van Lord Owen', de Volkskrant, 21/01/94.

⁵⁸⁶⁴ DCBC, 2130. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 01/94, 07/01/94; F. Jensma, 'Als er doden vallen stuur je geen rapporten' (If there are fatalities you don't send any reports), NRC Handelsblad, 29/01/94; T. Koelé, 'De frustraties van een VN-generaal' (The frustrations of a UN general), Trouw, 29/01/94.

⁵⁸⁶⁵ Briquemont, Something, p. 31; C.J., 'New UNPROFOR command', International Peacekeeping, Vol. I(1994)(January-February), p. 25; Hillen, Helmets, pp. 169-170.

⁵⁸⁶⁶ 'CDA-kamerlid ziet uitzending Lumob niet zitten' (Christian Democrat MP against Airmob posting), Defensiekrant, 13/01/94.

⁵⁸⁶⁷ DCBC, 2127. MID, Ontwikkelingen in de voormalige Joegoslavische federatie, 04/94, 18/01/94.

had in his view degenerated into 'a goat tethered to a fence'.⁵⁸⁶⁸ Boutros-Ghali in turn considered that the French general had crossed the line by insisting that he should have the power to decide on air strikes and asked the French Government to remove him from his post.⁵⁸⁶⁹ On 18 January it was announced that Cot would soon be leaving. He was succeeded on 10 March by General Bertrand Guillaume de Sauville de Lapresle.

The American administration had since spring 1993 been urging the government in Zagreb and the Bosnian Croats to halt their struggle with the Bosnian Muslims.⁵⁸⁷⁰ The American Special Envoy to Bosnia, Charles Redman, considered that the key to a diplomatic solution in Bosnia lay in changing the power relationships on the ground, which entailed getting the Muslims and the Croats to join forces. This would also reduce the number of sides in the negotiations from three to two. The idea was to bring about a Muslim-Croat federation which would cover about half the terrain of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the other half comprising a Serb area within Bosnia.⁵⁸⁷¹ Redman was able to take advantage of the situation on the ground in Central Bosnia, where the Croat forces had difficulty standing up to the Bosnian Muslims in early 1994. The realization dawned in Zagreb that the Croatian Armed forces could not for long conduct a war on two fronts, against the Serbs in Croatia itself and against the Muslims in Bosnia.⁵⁸⁷² On 18 March delegations from the Bosnian Croats and Muslims accordingly signed an agreement in Washington to enter into a federation that could eventually be absorbed into a confederation with Croatia. Both the Muslims and the Croats thus gave up some of their aspirations, at least for the time being: the Muslims for a unitary state of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the Croats for the creation of a Greater Croatia. In the longer term, however, there was still the possibility of both an integrated, sovereign Bosnia-Herzegovina and a Greater Croatia. In exchange for this agreement, Tudjman, who had been placed under considerable pressure to agree to the accord by the American administration, had been assured of American support to sort out the situation in Krajina, for which purpose he could use the men who could leave Bosnia-Herzegovina now that the accord had been signed.⁵⁸⁷³ An advantage of the Washington accord for the Bosnian Government, moreover, was that it made arms supplies to the Bosnian Muslims easier, as they no longer in principle had to cross enemy lines.

Although the partnership between the Croats and the Muslims offered fresh perspectives at the negotiating table, this did not necessarily mean an improvement in the prospects of the eastern enclaves. Peace plans often cast long shadows ahead of them during the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. According to an analysis by the Dutch Internal Security Service at the end of April 1994, it was the expectation of an imminent peace breakthrough that had enticed the Serbs to attack Gorazde, speculating on the fear of the international community, in particular the United States, of becoming involved in fighting. The attack on Gorazde, according to the Service, could be 'the run-up to fighting around other Muslim towns such as Zepa or Srebrenica'.⁵⁸⁷⁴

The status of the enclaves in the case of a peace settlement was in fact unclear. In early 1994 both Redman and Owen tried to open discussions once more with the Bosnian Government on giving up Srebrenica and Zepa in exchange for other terrain, but again without success.⁵⁸⁷⁵ According to ⁵⁸⁶⁸ Cohen, Hearts, pp. 365-366.

⁵⁸⁶⁹ 'Frankrijk bevestigt aflossing VN-commandant Cot' (France confirms replacement of UN Commander Cot), ANP, 18/01/94, 22:00; 'Generaal Cot buigt voor Boutros-Ghali' (General Cot gives way to Boutros-Ghali), De Telegraaf, 19/01/94; C.J. 'New UNPROFOR command', International Peacekeeping, Vol. I (1994)(January-February), p. 25; interview J. Cot, 19/04/00.

⁵⁸⁷⁰ ABZ, DPV/ARA/01818. COREU, 07/04/93, Cpe Bonn 222; Scheffers, Ambassadeur, p. 26.

⁵⁸⁷¹ Daalder, Dayton, p. 27.

⁵⁸⁷² Gow, 'Forces', p. 2.

⁵⁸⁷³ Scheffers, Ambassadeur, pp. 26-27.

⁵⁸⁷⁴ BVD. 'Vredeskansen in ex-Joegoslavië en de gevolgen voor Nederland' (Chances of peace in ex-Yugoslavia and the consequences for the Netherlands), 22/04/94.

⁵⁸⁷⁵ Interview Lord Owen, 27/06/00.

Minister Kooijmans it was ‘not the idea to maintain the Safe Areas ad infinitum, or until a miracle happened’.⁵⁸⁷⁶

Both military events and developments at the negotiating table, then, could affect the presence of the Dutch battalion in Srebrenica. It was unclear, however, which body in the Netherlands was responsible for monitoring developments around Srebrenica, in the former Yugoslavia and regarding crucial concepts such as ‘Safe Area’ and ‘air support’, and for considering the consequences for Dutchbat. This was primarily the responsibility of the Foreign and Defence Ministries, and they were responsible for properly allocating duties in this regard.⁵⁸⁷⁷ Continual monitoring was necessary, not only because peacekeeping operations such as UNPROFOR take place in a very unstable environment with the conflict still raging and it is unclear how much value should be attached to the sides consenting to the presence of a peacekeeping force, but also because it was clear that the Safe Areas were only of a temporary nature.⁵⁸⁷⁸ Once the decision to send in Dutchbat had been taken, the Foreign Ministry’s interest in the battalion waned. After this it was more a matter for the MoD, which is understandable as it was the Defence Minister who was politically responsible for the implementation of policy on peacekeeping operations.⁵⁸⁷⁹ The focus in this part of the Yugoslavia file moved from Foreign Affairs to Defence, which was responsible for training, equipping and sending the troops. The issues of security, force protection and supplies also involved a strong military component which could not primarily be regarded as the responsibility of the Foreign Ministry. When it came to spokesmen, too, the emphasis shifted from Foreign Affairs to Defence.⁵⁸⁸⁰ The deployment area was a matter that held little interest now for the Foreign Ministry, once it had been established that deployment in one of the Safe Areas had not been ruled out.⁵⁸⁸¹

The allocation of duties as regards monitoring politically relevant developments was unclear, however. Situation reports and threat analyses, provided for example by Intelligence, were discussed in the ‘bunker consultations’ between Defence and Foreign Affairs, but there was no clear-cut agreement on who should act on important information.⁵⁸⁸² In fact there is not much evidence of threat analyses in the archives. According to Defence Minister Ter Beek the MoD was responsible for the security risks to Dutchbat and the Foreign Ministry for surveying political shifts in the region that could affect Dutchbat.⁵⁸⁸³ Ter Beek, however, did not detect any increase in the attention paid to the area by the Military Intelligence Service:

‘What I mean by that is, the unstable situation and environment (...) of course existed right from the first moment we decided to participate, initially in UNPROFOR I in Croatia with our signallers and then with UNPROFOR II in Bosnia with our transport battalion. Sending in the airmobile battalion was not actually anything new. (...) that’s something I only fully realize now. Of course you could ask, why, after the Srebrenica decision, was the level of attention to developments not increased? That’s what I meant by no watershed. We just continued something that was already going on.’⁵⁸⁸⁴

This was a course of events that the Minister himself could of course have influenced. The Dutch Army’s Security Section only stepped up its work on Yugoslavia to a limited extent after Dutchbat was ⁵⁸⁷⁶ TCBU, Vertrekepunt, III, hearing of P. Kooijmans, 25/05/00, p. 114.

⁵⁸⁷⁷ Cf. interview W. Kok, 08/05/00.

⁵⁸⁷⁸ Cf. W.A.M. van Dijk, ‘Nogmaals: Karremans en Dutchbat’, Carré, 18(1995)11, p. 20.

⁵⁸⁷⁹ Cf. TK, 1995-1996, 24 605, Nos. 1 and 2, p. 6.

⁵⁸⁸⁰ Interviews B. Hiensch, 13/07/00, and R. Swartbol, 24/02/99.

⁵⁸⁸¹ Interviews O. Hattinga van ‘t Sant, 01/08/97 and P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99.

⁵⁸⁸² Interview H.A.C. van der Zwan, 12/04/00.

⁵⁸⁸³ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

⁵⁸⁸⁴ Interview A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00.

sent out,⁵⁸⁸⁵ not at all according to another source.⁵⁸⁸⁶ The Eastern Europe Department of the Foreign Ministry also evidently did not consider it had any responsibility for monitoring political developments that could be relevant to Dutchbat.

Aside from the fact that in the Dutch administration it is rarely appreciated if one Ministry looks over another one's fence and 'contributes ideas', a major factor in the failure to follow and point out developments relevant to Dutchbat was the fact that the policy-makers in the Netherlands could not imagine that the Serb forces would have the nerve to defy the international community after having agreed to the presence of UN troops in the region.⁵⁸⁸⁷ Even Development Cooperation Minister Pronk, who had shown in April 1993 that he seriously feared for the fate of the population of Srebrenica, was convinced, like Generals Van der Vlis and Couzy, that not much would happen to Dutchbat personnel:

'I never thought that. And nothing did happen (to Dutchbat personnel) throughout the whole conflict. The only thing that happened was that those people were taken hostage. Nothing else happened. There were accidents. There were isolated atrocities... but they were not systematic. They (the Serb leadership) knew they couldn't do that... The fear that was so strong in the Netherlands, that our soldiers would die there, is something I never shared. There was no reason to. After all, nothing happened. It would have been the first time.'⁵⁸⁸⁸

The Dutch Government authorities, however, more than the governments of other countries, assumed that once a unit had been sent out under the auspices of the United Nations it would be purely a matter for the international organization. There was a strong conviction that domestic interference in UNPROFOR was undesirable. It was not unknown that other governments did interfere, but for the Dutch Government this could not be a reason for perpetrating such wickedness.⁵⁸⁸⁹ Characteristic of the Dutch approach was to 'rely on the overall picture... The risks were gauged, but the solution was sought in someone else's intervention.'⁵⁸⁹⁰ That 'someone else' was the UN. This was the reasoning in Army Intelligence, for instance, too. The Army's Intelligence service did not send any reports to Dutchbat because it thought that the security of Dutchbat was not a national issue but a matter for the UN: '(...) it's absolutely none of your business. You've loaned them out, end of story!'⁵⁸⁹¹

This was a high-risk attitude, especially since the United Nations itself was averse to gathering intelligence.⁵⁸⁹² According to Van Veen Intelligence was 'not a topic for discussion in New York. They'd chuck you out of the building straight away!... That's how sensitive it is.'⁵⁸⁹³ Even where other governments were prepared to provide the UN with Intelligence – and the UN was prepared to accept it – it could not be seen as an objective cross-section of the totality of national information. Particularly in an issue such as the former Yugoslavia, on which the thinking and objectives of the United States and the European countries had long differed, any Intelligence provided was designed mainly to ⁵⁸⁸⁵ Interviews J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99, and 10/10/01.

⁵⁸⁸⁶ Confidential interview 23.

⁵⁸⁸⁷ Interviews A.L. ter Beek, 13/01/00; H.A. Couzy, 7, 14 and 17/09/98; O. Hattinga van 't Sant, 18/07/00; K.A.R. Klompenhousers, 20/01/00; E.A.W. Koestal, 24/05/00; W. Kok, 25/05/00; P.H. Kooijmans, 10/09/99; F.A.M. Majoor, 19/04/00; C. Minderhoud, 02/06/00; R. Swartbol, 24/02/99; Ter Beek in J. Schepers/R. Siebelink, 'Relus ter Beek en zijn knauwende en wroegende vragen over Srebrenica' (Relus ter Beek and his biting and remorseful questions on Srebrenica), Drentsche Courant, 26/02/00.

⁵⁸⁸⁸ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁵⁸⁸⁹ This conviction was clear e.g. from the interviews D. Barth, 08/10/99; P. Bas Backer, 22/05/00; G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00; and H. van den Heuvel, 05/11/01.

⁵⁸⁹⁰ Interview J. Pronk, 03/04/00.

⁵⁸⁹¹ Interview J.M.J. Bosch, 10/05/99.

⁵⁸⁹² Appendix Intelligence, Chapter 1; Eriksson, 'Intelligence'.

⁵⁸⁹³ Interview R. van Veen, 16/08/00.

support national policy objectives. Each country therefore remained at least partly dependent on its own Intelligence.

The solution the Dutch authorities finally sought in order to keep a finger on the pulse of what was going on with regard to the Dutch forces was to try to create a national line of command within UNPROFOR with the aid of Dutch representatives in key positions.⁵⁸⁹⁴ The realization that this was necessary had not yet developed to any great extent among the Dutch authorities in late 1993/early 1994, unlike the British and the French for example.⁵⁸⁹⁵ In early 1994, however, the Dutch Government succeeded in bagging the post of Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command by referring to the major Dutch contribution to UNPROFOR.⁵⁸⁹⁶

5. Uncertainty as to the remit

On 4 November 1993 a new Mission Statement for the UN peacekeeping operations in Bosnia-Herzegovina was issued, based on Resolutions 824 and 836 and the Rules of Engagement. The Statement included maintaining the status of the Safe Areas, 'if necessary by the use of force, including air support'. The Dutch military lawyer on the staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, Koet, considered on the other hand that there were no Safe Areas in Bosnia, for one thing since the condition that the parties must guarantee freedom of movement had not been met. He also considered that the Mission Statement was incompatible with Resolution 824, which did not refer to 'safe areas' but to areas regarded as safe. As the new Mission Statement had been issued while he was on leave in the Netherlands, he tried to get it changed on his return to Bosnia. With the support of the G3 he proposed the following amendment: 'Maintain the status of the "safe" or "demilitarised" areas ... once they have been established, if necessary by the use of force, including air support.'⁵⁸⁹⁷

Koet's criticism had its effect on Dutchbat's preparations. The plans for the airmobile battalion stated:

'The terminology Safe Area is not legally sound; in effect there is (as yet) no Safe Area, as the use of force to protect civilians in Dutchbat's Area of Responsibility is not permitted (yet)??, because the UNPROFOR RoE have not been amended. Action: SSO/Legal Dept (BLS/Legal Dept.) will investigate the legal significance of this term and the substance of the RoE regarding this term and then make recommendations (if necessary in consultation with legal adviser B/H Cmd) on the terminology to be used.'⁵⁸⁹⁸

And Vermeulen wrote to the Dutch Army Crisis Staff: 'According to the legal experts it is not permissible to refer to Safe Areas as there first needs to be agreement between the sides and this has never taken place.'⁵⁸⁹⁹ The Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, however, was not in favour of Koet's proposed amendment. A lot of work had gone into producing the text of the Mission Statement and it had meanwhile been sent to all jurisdictions. He decided to leave things as they were.⁵⁹⁰⁰ ⁵⁸⁹⁴ Interviews G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00, and R.L. ter Beek, 01/12/99.

⁵⁸⁹⁵ Interview G.J.M. Bastiaans, 20/11/00.

⁵⁸⁹⁶ ABZ, DPV/ARA/00581, Kooijmans 004 to PR NY, 06/01/94; ibid., Biegan 011 to Kooijmans, 07/01/94; Def, 2246, Boutros-Ghali to PR NY, 25/01/94, DPKO/MIL.

⁵⁸⁹⁷ Koet, 'Adviser', p. 36. The underlined text is the amendment.

⁵⁸⁹⁸ BLS. Reconnaissance Party I, Points for action following debriefing of log section of reconnaissance party and report of ops section of reconnaissance party, internal memorandum from Deputy CS to CS et al., 13/12/93.

⁵⁸⁹⁹ BLS. Reconnaissance Party II, Fax from C.H.P. Vermeulen, C-DB, Lt. Col. of Grenadiers, 11 INFBAT AIRMBL GG (APC)/DUTCHBAT, to BLS Attn. Crisis Staff, 'Verkeningsrapport Srebrenica en Zepa', 001, 12-12-93.

⁵⁹⁰⁰ Koet, 'Adviser', p. 36.

Over and against this internal uncertainty there was a desire not to show anything to the outside world. At the time of his mission to Bosnia in early November Brinkman spoke of:

‘...a robust presence there. You have to let the combatants know right away that you’re there. If I look at how the French do that and the British, I think we can manage fine. If you’re attacked you have to respond immediately. Only then do you command respect and they won’t take it into their heads to shoot at you a second time.’⁵⁹⁰¹

The robust action also featured in the government’s letter to Parliament on the mission, which stated that by sending in a combat unit, unlike in the case of the communications and transport units, Dutch soldiers would now play an active role in UNPROFOR’s self-defence. They were bound by the same Rules of Engagement, it is true, but because of their remit and weaponry the actions of the air mobile battalion could be ‘more robust’.⁵⁹⁰²

After the Ministerial Council had agreed to send in the airmobile battalion, on 12 November, Prime Minister Lubbers told the press that the Rules of Engagement could be ‘more robust’ as far as the government was concerned. What he meant by this, however, he was not willing to say.⁵⁹⁰³

Couzy said in an interview with the authoritative Jane’s Defence Weekly at the time Dutchbat was sent out that Dutchbat would take strong action if its troops were attacked: ‘If attacked, we will defend ourselves with our .50 machine guns. The UN’s Rules of Engagement are interpreted differently. There are countries which have a policy of sitting it out, closing the hatches and backing off. We on the other hand will be very firm.’⁵⁹⁰⁴ The instructions for spokesmen on the Dutchbat mission also discussed the Rules of Engagement. If asked about the rules on the use of force, a spokesman could refer to the last version of the Rules of Engagement of 19 July 1993, which mentioned the use of force ‘to offer resistance to determined incursions by soldiers and paramilitary units into UNPAs or Safe Areas’. According to these instructions the Rules of Engagement were ‘very clear’.⁵⁹⁰⁵

But things were not so clear: when the quartermasters set off on 27 January Battalion Commander Vermeulen distanced himself from the term ‘more robust action’, while at the same time saying that the Rules of Engagement permitted ‘only shooting to protect one’s own person, the persons of the population being protected and one’s own property’.⁵⁹⁰⁶ ‘I am permitted to regard people in my safe-keeping (this referred to the Muslims in Srebrenica) as mine’, said Vermeulen.⁵⁹⁰⁷ Soon after arriving in Srebrenica, Dutchbat asked Bosnia-Herzegovina Command how to respond in the event of a direct attack on the enclave: ‘Were we supposed, as a UN unit, to regard this enclave as a ‘Safe Area’ and therefore defend the area? Or should we just watch, and only pick up our weapons if the Bosnian Serbs threatened us directly?’⁵⁹⁰⁸ Dutchbat was not given any clear answer. They fell back on their Standing Operating Procedure (SOP), fixed instructions from the UN, which provided in such cases that Dutchbat would act as an onlooker if an enclave was captured.⁵⁹⁰⁹ There was a discrepancy, then, ⁵⁹⁰¹ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, ‘Vragen over nieuw bataljon in Bosnië’ (Questions about new battalion in Bosnia), NRC Handelsblad, 11/11/93.

⁵⁹⁰² TK, 1993-1994, 22 181, No. 64.

⁵⁹⁰³ Willebrord Nieuwenhuis, ‘Luchtmobiele brigade nog niet inzetten’ (Airmobile Brigade not to be deployed yet), NRC Handelsblad, 12/11/93.

⁵⁹⁰⁴ Delaere, ‘Interview’, p. 32.

⁵⁹⁰⁵ CDPO/GNKD. Chief of Army Crisis Staff to Junior Commanders BLS and Directors of Army Staff, 11/02/94, OZ/7806.

⁵⁹⁰⁶ ‘VN-bataljon vertrekt ondanks vage belofte van Karadzic’ (UN battalion to set off despite vague promise by Karadzic), Trouw, 28/01/94.

⁵⁹⁰⁷ Wio Joustra & Hans Moleman, ‘Ik wil niet dat mijn mannekens risico lopen’ (I don’t want my men to run any risk), de Volkskrant, 28/01/94. See also ‘Luchtmobiel bataljon ontfermt zich zonodig met geweld over burgers’ (Airmobile battalion takes care of civilians by force if necessary), ANP, 27/01/94, 12:35.

⁵⁹⁰⁸ Jellema, First-in, p. 136.

⁵⁹⁰⁹ Jellema, First-in, p. 137.

between the impression of Dutchbat's remit as given in the Netherlands and the battalion's own interpretation of its remit, which was subsequently to cause a lot of confusion and misunderstanding.

6. Conclusion

Once the government had decided to send out the airmobile battalion, and Parliament had agreed, there were a number of problems and uncertainties before the battalion deployed. Two weeks after the decision it was established that Dutchbat would be assigned Srebrenica and Zepa as deployment areas, two Safe Areas which other governments were not interested in, to put it mildly. Militarily these were not attractive locations as far as the Dutch Government was concerned either, but given the political history it was unlikely that the Netherlands would refuse this 'honourable, not easy but certainly feasible, task'.

Some officers, when considering the deployment of the airmobile battalion, had taken into account the fact that this part of the Army needed to prove itself and they had no desire to entertain the question of whether a wrong choice might have been made in the recent past at the expense of the armoured infantry. The decision Van der Vlis and Couzy made at an early stage, to opt for light weaponry in the form of YPRs with .50 machine guns instead of 20 mm guns, was in line with this step: the airmobile battalion must not come to resemble an armoured infantry battalion. Thus the decision made in the early 1990s as a matter of political strategy, in favour of airmobile and against armoured infantry, significantly influenced the nature of the mission to Srebrenica.

The fact that the airmobile battalion could not defend the 'safe area' of Srebrenica by itself was crystal clear to most politicians and military men, even if lack of clarity in the formulation of Dutchbat's remit might produce different expectations among the Dutch population. The Safe Areas were more a political than a military concept, however. Nevertheless ministers and MPs strongly believed in the feasibility of securing their defence with the aid of air support. At the time of the decision to send Dutchbat they ignored a host of problems with, and obstacles to, such support which were already well-known by then, such as the terrain, the ground mist, the height at which aircraft had to fly, the limited time aircraft had to operate over Bosnia, the risk of ground forces being taken hostage and the long lines of command any request for air support had to negotiate. What was particularly disregarded was the fact that the use of air support or air strikes was not a purely military decision: the use of air power, for instance, could not work if negotiations were taking place, or it could jeopardize the essentially humanitarian nature of the UNPROFOR operation in Bosnia. Couzy warned about this, in both November 1993 and January 1994, but after a series of previous public utterances from the Commander of the Land Forces the Defence Ministry and Parliament had developed a reflex to gag the General rather than inquire into what he had to say.

Despite worrying signals about events and developments that could be relevant to the presence of Dutch servicemen in Srebrenica there was no change in policy. The decision to send Dutchbat was in a way the almost inevitable result of the Dutch Government's stance, especially since summer 1992. Backing out after the decision had been made was even more difficult, and pulling the troops out of Srebrenica impossible, given the stand the Dutch Government had adopted hitherto and the expectations the Dutch presence had aroused among the population of Srebrenica. That the concern was no greater than it had been in April 1994 after the Gorazde crisis was due mainly to credulity. Firstly there was the trust in the UN, that what it did was well done. There was insufficient realization that the UN is the sum of the nations, not a harmonious whole. Secondly, trust in the therapeutic effect of the UN was projected onto the Bosnian Serb authorities: it seemed unthinkable that they would want to defy the international organization.

Such over-optimistic expectations also contributed to the failure of all but a few authorities in the Netherlands to feel responsible for monitoring relevant political and military developments, in the Yugoslavia region and internationally, and analysing them for their significance to the Dutch presence in Srebrenica. The strong independence of the Ministries also seems to have contributed to this. Once the decision to send Dutchbat had been taken, the emphasis as regards involvement shifted from the Foreign Ministry to the Defence Ministry. The military Intelligence services of both the Ministry of Defence and the Army did not concern themselves to any appreciably greater extent with developments in the former Yugoslavia as a result of the Dutchbat mission. Individuals in the Dutch administration did undoubtedly concern themselves with the fate of the battalion after it was sent out at the beginning of 1994, but for the government as a whole it was to some extent a case of 'out of sight, out of mind'.

Part II

Dutchbat in the enclave

Chapter 1

The organizational structure of UNPROFOR

1. Introduction

When Dutchbat was sent to the former Yugoslavia, it became part of an organization which had a different structure than the familiar NATO one to which the units of the Royal Netherlands Army were accustomed. In this chapter, we describe in general the specific structure and mission of the UN peacekeeping operation, under which Dutchbat operated in the years 1994 and 1995. This chapter concentrates on the military structure and the chain of command. Three headquarters acted as nodes in this chain: UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb, followed by the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command and third, the Sector North East headquarters in Tuzla. In this chapter, we also describe the arrangements and tasks of two other organizations with which Dutchbat had contact with during its mission in Srebrenica. These were the United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) and the United Nations Civilian Police (UnCivPol). After describing the organizational structure we will discuss the operational rules to which the UN peacekeeping operation was bound, in particular the Rules of Engagement.

Normally, when Dutch troops are deployed as part of a NATO effort, there is a clear division of responsibility between the NATO authorities and the Dutch government. In these cases, there are clear agreements about command and control, the influence of national governments, the operational authority of the NATO Commander in Chief and about all the other aspects involved in the execution of a NATO operation. The execution of these operations is planned according to strict procedures and there are unambiguous rules about collaboration between national military authorities and the military arms of the NATO. The closely coordinated parties can thus proceed according to a fixed scenario. Dutch troops have prepared and trained to operate in such a context since the 1950s.

By contrast, a UN peacekeeping operation lacks this type of systematic planning and training. A completely different scenario applies. Once the Security Council has decided to begin a peacekeeping operation and has laid down the mandate of the peacekeeping force in a resolution, it is up to the UN Secretary-General to organize the operation from scratch. Below, we describe how this takes place.

The UN Secretariat's Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) draws up a provisional plan for the peace operation. The Secretary-General requests the member states to contribute troops and personnel for the operation and its staff. At the same time, the Secretariat builds up a civilian staff team, usually composed of people from the UN organization. Together, the military and civilian components form the peacekeeping mission. Important steps in this preparatory process are the appointment of the military Commander in Chief and other key officials. The most striking characteristic of this planning phase is its ad hoc nature. In general, three to four months pass from the moment that the Security Council accepts the resolution to the deployment of the first peacekeeping units in the operation area. The legal status of the peacekeeping corps is laid down in a Status of the Forces Agreement between the recipient state or states and the United Nations. In Bosnia, this agreement was not binding, because the Bosnian Croats and the Bosnian Serbs did not recognize the UN's agreement with President Izetbegovic of Bosnia.¹

Of course the UN Secretariat in New York can tap into past experiences with previous peacekeeping operations, but each mission is nevertheless unique due to specific characteristics and difficulties concerning the nature of the conflict, the parties to the conflict and the region where it is taking place. Sometimes, the best option may be to deploy the troops of the permanent members of the Security Council, in other cases the UN will prefer to utilize troops from the same continent; in yet other cases troops from a certain country might not be welcome because one of the parties to the conflict has accused that country of being partial.

¹ J.W. Koet, 'Legal Advisor UNPROFOR Bosnia-Herzegovina' in: Militair Rechtelijk Tijdschrift 88 (1995), p. 33-35.

The foundations for a peacekeeping operation must therefore be laid with the utmost care. This preparatory operation has three main elements. First, it is necessary to establish a headquarters. Second, units must be recruited which are both adequately trained and equipped. Third, rules must be drawn up governing the implementation of the mission's mandate. With respect to this third point, two categories of rules can be distinguished. In addition to general rules about routine matters such as uniforms, modes of dispatch, transportation and behaviour, there is the operational brief addressing the execution of the peacekeeping task, and the internal and external security of the peacekeeping operation. The most important rules in this second category are the so-called Rules of Engagement (RoE) on the use of force. All rules are laid down in the Standing Operating Procedures (SOP). Each subordinate commander then translates these instructions into a standing brief for his operation area.

All these actions by the UN Secretariat culminate in a multinational peacekeeping force. The military component of this force cannot be compared with regular armed forces. On paper, a peacekeeping force might appear to have overlaps with a regular army, even though the former are typically equipped with only light weapons for self-defence purposes and do not have heavy weapons. But unlike regular armed forces, a UN peacekeeping force is made up of national contingents. Each has its own level of training, its own bearing and attitude, and often specific instructions from its national government with respect to its functioning in the operation area.

For all these reasons, headquarters cannot suffice with drawing up plans, giving orders and monitoring their execution. In practice, it is often impossible to use every component of the peacekeeping force for every task. Troop-contributing nations often lay down limiting conditions: sometimes, troops may only and explicitly be used in a certain region, or they may only be used to carry out a certain part of the peacekeeping mandate. The commanders of the national contingents of the peacekeeping force often maintain a direct line of communication with their national military authorities regarding orders given by the peacekeeping force command centre. These complicating factors clearly played a role in the construction of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR).

2. UNPROFOR Headquarters in Zagreb

UNPROFOR was established on 21 February 1992 by resolution 743 of the Security Council to implement a plan, developed by the Special Envoy of the UN Secretary-General Cyrus Vance, for the demilitarization and withdrawal of the Yugoslav Army from the United Nations Protected Areas (UNPAs) in Croatia.² The international decision-making process which led to this was described extensively in Part I, Chapter 4. In early March 1992, the proposed leaders of UNPROFOR travelled to New York to consult with Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the Undersecretaries-General Sir Murrill Goulding and Kofi Annan and the latter's righthand man Sashi Tharoor. This group of senior UN officials briefed the Force Commander, General S. Nambiar of India, his deputy, General Ph. Morillon of France and the Chief of Staff, General L. Mackenzie of Canada on the situation in the future operation area, Croatia. On the basis of the information provided, they proceeded to develop an operation plan.

The UN Secretariat's Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) decided to situate the UNPROFOR Headquarters in Sarajevo rather than Croatia, the area of operation, in order to stress the impartiality of the peacekeeping mission. The UN Secretariat also hoped that the choice for the Bosnian capital would bring some stability to Bosnia, where tensions were mounting fast.³ In practice, however, the establishment of the UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo was not a feasible solution, being too far removed from the areas where the peacekeeping force was in operation. There was not enough contact with those in the field and much time was lost in travelling and working visits. In April 1992, the political tension in Bosnia-Herzegovina culminated in all-out war between the three ethnic groups there. The international community put considerable pressure on UNPROFOR to intervene in this conflict, too. On 16 and 17 May of that year, in the heat of the Bosnian conflict, two-thirds of the Sarajevo headquarters staff under Force Commander Nambiar moved to Belgrado. This is discussed in detail in Part I, Chapter 5. The remaining one hundred military and civilian staff members in Sarajevo carried out admirable work in bringing about ceasefires and organizing humanitarian aid, without in fact having been mandated to do so.

² United Nations Yearbook 1992.

³ Srebrenica Report, 5 (para.14).

In the summer of 1992, the UNPROFOR headquarters was established in the Croatian capital of Zagreb.⁴ Ultimately, UNPROFOR headquarters would become responsible for peacekeeping operations in much of the former Yugoslavia: with a resolution in June 1992 the Security Council extended its mandate to Bosnia-Herzegovina, and in November 1992 to Macedonia. Due to this accumulation of resolutions by the Security Council, UNPROFOR eventually found itself with a different mandate per area of operation.

General Nambiar led the UNPROFOR operation until he stepped down in March 1993. He was responsible for all aspects of the implementation of the peacekeeping operation. A different construct was introduced under his successor, General L-E Wahlgren of Sweden (see figure 1). This came about as follows: in May 1993, the UN's co-chair at the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, Th. Stoltenberg was appointed Special Representative of the Secretary-General (SRSG). As such, he acted as head of the UN mission in the former Yugoslavia and served as the first point of contact for the Department of Peacekeeping Operations in New York. All contacts between UNPROFOR in Zagreb and the UN in New York had to run via his office. This also applied to the Force Commander's communications which did not mean, however, that the Force Commander had no direct contact with New York. The aim of having one person fill both positions of head of the UN peacekeeping operation and of co-chair at the peace negotiations in Geneva was to achieve a better synchronization of the UN's input at the peace talks and UNPROFOR's work in the field. As SRSG, Mr Stoltenberg was responsible for the coordination of all UNPROFOR operations, which also entailed assessments of the political implications of operational decisions as well as the actions of the conflicting parties.

In practice, this combination of tasks was impossible to juggle. A serious conflict is said to have occurred between Thorvald Stoltenberg and General Wahlgren's successor, General J. Cot of France. Cot was appointed in July 1993 in return for President Mitterrand's additional contribution of two French battalions.⁵ General Cot disagreed with Mr Stoltenberg about the latter's role as SRSG, and at the end of 1993 the two tasks were again split up. Mr Stoltenberg stayed on as co-chair of the peace negotiations in Geneva on behalf of the UN, and on 1 January 1994 the Japanese diplomat Y. Akashi was appointed SRSG responsible for all UNPROFOR operations in the former Yugoslavia. It was he who negotiated with the authorities of the conflicting parties. The Force Commander, usually a Lieutenant-General, continued to be responsible for all military matters and all military personnel of the national contingents came under his command. The Force Commander appointed areas of operation to the various contingents (taking into account any existing preconditions) and issued orders (in accordance with the Security Council's mandate).

In addition to the Force Commander, the Head of Civilian Affairs was also situated in Zagreb. The latter official was responsible for all negotiations and contacts with civilian authorities. He had a broad set of tasks, for example following and evaluating political developments, collecting information for the SRSG, giving legal advice, bearing responsibility for the return of refugees to their place of residence, and monitoring humanitarian affairs and respect for the rights of minorities and for human rights.

⁴ CRST. UNPROFOR aide memoire to Troop Contributing Nations. Chapter 1, Appendix F, pp. 2 and 5. Boutros-Ghali, Unvanquished, pp. 38-40; Mackenzie, Peacekeeper.

⁵ Interview B. Boutros-Ghali, 30/01/01.

The third authority under the SRSG at the UNPROFOR headquarters was the Chief Administrative Officer, with responsibility for the administrative, logistic and technical aspects of the operation as well as all financial affairs. Coming from the UN Department of Management and Administration in New York, this official had a lot of power and influence in the bureaucracy of the UN.⁶

The most important members of the Force Commander's staff were the Deputy Force Commander and the two Chiefs of Staff, one for operational affairs and one for logistics and administration. The Chiefs of Staff were responsible for the day-to-day concerns. The Chief of Staff for operational affairs was at the head of four sections which in accordance with common military practice were called: G2 (military information and cartography), G3 (operations, both on the ground and from the air, planning and policy), the engineering corps, and G6 (connections). The second Chief of Staff (Deputy Chief of Staff from March 1995 on) was responsible for the sections G1 (personnel and administration), G4 (logistics), for the coordination of activities undertaken by the Force Provost Marshall (military police) and by the Force Medical Officer. The Deputy Force Commander, which in UNPROFOR was always a general from a NATO country, was in charge of the day-to-day coordination between the military and civilian sections at headquarters, and coordination with NATO and other organizations such as UNHCR. The Deputy Force Commander monitored the activities of the United Nations Military Observers assigned to UNPROFOR and maintained direct contact with the military staff in New York.⁷ (see figure 2)

The primary tasks of the military branch of UNPROFOR headquarters were the coordination and support of activities conducted by the various regional headquarters, such as Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The Joint Operations Centre, a centre for general logistics, and a Monitoring and Close Air Support Coordination Centre were set up to enable the military branch at HQ to follow and coordinate actions at lower levels of command. Support activities mainly comprised distributing geographical information, organizing airlifts, making daily reports to the UN Secretariat in New York and other organizations, carrying out military police tasks and so-called specific logistic and medical tasks within UNPROFOR. Each of the troop-contributing nations were allowed to appoint a number of staff officials at the UNPROFOR headquarters and the three subordinate headquarters. These officials had to have a good command of the English language, completed training for staff positions and have the required experience and military rank.⁸

UNPROFOR's organization changed somewhat on 1 April 1995 when the peacekeeping force in Croatia was placed under the UN peacekeeping force for all of the former Yugoslavia. From the start of the peacekeeping operation, UNPROFOR headquarters had concentrated on the operation in Croatia. Yet a separate command centre for Croatia -- the oldest area of operation of the mission -- was not established at the headquarters until December 1994. This was the Headquarters United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation, or HQ UNCRO. In early 1995, the Croatian government announced that they did not intend to renew the mandate for the UN peacekeeping operation. Intensive negotiations between the Croatian government and UNPROFOR followed. These resulted in a formal name change of the peacekeeping operation for the former Yugoslavia. UNPROFOR became the United Nations Peace Forces (UNPF), with three subordinate regional commands: HQ UNCRO for Croatia, HQ UNPROFOR (previously the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command) for Bosnia, and thirdly HQ UNPREDEP (United Nations Preventive Deployment Force) for Macedonia (previously the FYROM Command established in December 1992). The new names caused some confusion, primarily because the term UNPROFOR continued to exist but now applied to the UN headquarters in Sarajevo rather than Zagreb. The old names continued to be popularly used for some time. This might become confusing in Part III of this report, therefore in that part we will refer to the various headquarters by the names of the towns where they were located. Finally, the term UNPROFOR was also used in the former Yugoslavia to refer to the troops of the peacekeeping operation rather than the operation command. Where this occurs in the report, we clearly show the context in which the term is used.

⁶ CRST. UNPROFOR aide memoire to Troop Contributing Nations. Chapter 5, Command and Control, pp. 5-1. Gow, Triumph of Lack of Will, p. 101, Stoltenberg, De tusene dagenen, p. 143.

⁷ CRST. UNPROFOR aide memoire to Troop Contributing Nations. Chapter 5, Command and Control, pp. 5-1 - 5-2. UNPROFOR, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, pp. 60-61.

⁸ CRST. UNPROFOR aide memoire to Troop Contributing Nations. Chapter 5, Command and Control, pp. 5-2 – 5-3.

In response to one of the Croatian government's main demands, the renamed regional headquarters were given more independence than before. On 12 June 1995 a new command was created under UNPF, the Rapid Reaction Force (RRF). This was a 'green' combat unit made up of 12,500 British, French and Dutch troops equipped with tanks and high calibre artillery in order to increase the effectiveness and the credibility of the peacekeeping operation.⁹ The problems that arose when this unit was actually deployed is described in detail in Part III, Chapter 1.

3. Bosnia-Herzegovina Command

Since the beginning of March 1994, Dutchbat was under the operational command of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, UNPROFOR's headquarters for Bosnia-Herzegovina at two locations, Sarajevo and Kiseljak. The Sarajevo location was referred to as Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Forward and the Kiseljak division as Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Main.

The office of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander was located in Sarajevo in what had once been the club for high officials of the Bosnian Communist Party. It was situated near the presidential palace in the centre of Sarajevo. The rest of the Sarajevo section was housed in part of the building next door, which housed the intelligence unit of the ABiH Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Forward. Lieutenant-General Sir Michael Rose, who had been appointed Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander on 23 January 1994 was convinced that both buildings were so heavily bugged that they were only suitable for discussing matters which he wanted the Bosnian government to know about. When greater confidentiality was required, he preferred to meet outside the walls of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Forward.

UNPROFOR operations in Bosnia were directed by the Chief of Staff at the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Main in Kiseljak, while the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander in Sarajevo conducted negotiations with the conflicting parties at the strategic level. Communication between the two divisions was so poor that, 'for much of the time Rose and his Chief of Staff were out of touch with each other.'¹⁰

In addition to the military staff, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command also consisted of a Civil Affairs section, headed by the Russian UN diplomat Viktor Andreev, and an administrative section. During negotiations with the conflicting parties, Andreev always acted in the same capacity as the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander. After he stopped in March 1995, his successors the Spaniard Enrique Aguilar and the American Phillip Corwin were unable to hold on to this position of equality. From then on, it was Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander General Smith and his military staff who more or less independently determined the course of the peacekeeping operation in Bosnia.¹¹

The Bosnia-Herzegovina Command had been formally established by resolution 776 of the Security Council on 14 September 1992. The actual organization came into being at the end of October 1992 under the direction of the French général de division Morillon, who had arrived in Sarajevo in March 1992 as the UNPROFOR Deputy Force Commander in Zagreb. After the start of the Bosnian civil war and the extension of UNPROFOR's mandate to Bosnia-Herzegovina, however, he chose to relinquish his position as deputy to General Nambiar in order to take on the command of this new operation area.¹²

⁹ UNPF, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, [Zagreb 1996] pp. 10-20.

¹⁰ Briquemont, Do something, p. 27. Rose, Fighting for Peace, pp. 18-19.

¹¹ Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00. Corwin, Dubious Mandate, pp. 6-7.

¹² Morillon, Croire et oser, pp.100-101.

The core of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command was formed by British, Belgian, Dutch and American members of the NATO Northern Army Group headquarters (Northag, an organization which would later be disbanded in an internal NATO rationalization process). NATO also supplied office equipment and means of transportation, but as Chief of Staff Cordy-Simpson put it, 'the ridiculous charade of de-baptizing any mention of NATO' was doggedly maintained in public. The Bosnia-Herzegovina Command was operational within three weeks of the passing of the resolution. Because of the underlying NATO structure, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command had more than the usual number of staff officers for a typical UN operation headquarters.¹³ The advantage of this was that one-third of the staff officers were familiar with each other's ways of working and could get started right away. They could also help new personnel get settled in their positions. In accordance with UN practice, these newcomers were from troop-contributing nations.

Under the direction of the Chief of Staff, Brigadier General Cordy-Simpson of the UK, the staff commenced its duties in the old UNPROFOR Headquarters building in Belgrade on 6 October.¹⁴ General Morillon was initially opposed to establishing the headquarters in Sarajevo, because of his negative experiences with the UNPROFOR headquarters there at the beginning of the civil war some months earlier. The establishment of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo, in Ilidza on the western through-road to Tuzla and Mostar, was also opposed by the Bosnian Serb army, the VRS. For military and political reasons, Morillon therefore decided to split up his headquarters, so that the operational headquarters of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command would be located well away from the conflict. Morillon decided on Kiseljak, 20 kilometres west of Sarajevo in the Croatian part of Bosnia. Having done that, he and his direct staff then established themselves in the Bosnian capital after all, under the name of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Forward, in order to demonstrate their confidence that the city would not fall in the near future.¹⁵

Under Morillon and his successor, the Belgian Lieutenant-General Briquemont, Bosnia-Herzegovina Command was a clearly structured organization. The usually staff sections for personnel and administration (G1), intelligence and cartography (G2), operations (G3), logistics (G4) and contacts with civilian authorities (G5) fell under the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander and his Chief of Staff. There were also sections for the engineering corps, medical corps, a special Air Operations Coordination Centre for all operations in the Bosnian air space, and a UNMO section for the UN military observers. The Chief of Staff also headed the officers who maintained contact with external organizations and other Commands such as Civil Affairs, UNHCR, the European monitoring operation ECMM, the UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb, the fifth allied air force of the NATO in Vicenza and Comcen, the communications centre.

Acting on the instructions of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander, the Chief of Staff of Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Main in Kiseljak gave direct orders to all units in Bosnia and organized escorts for humanitarian convoys. Bosnia-Herzegovina Command was a fairly horizontal organization; within the headquarters many sections operated side by side under the direct supervision of the Chief of Staff. A number of battalions in the field also came under the direct responsibility of Command Main in Kiseljak, without an intermediate brigade commanding rank. The exception was the city of Sarajevo; Sarajevo was a distinct sector within Bosnia-Herzegovina Command and fell under the commander of the French contingent, who was also Deputy Commander for Bosnia-Herzegovina.¹⁶

On his appointment in January 1994, General Rose noted that the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command had a number of serious shortcomings, despite its straightforward structure. First, there was no clear plan de campagne to implement the mandate. Also, Bosnia-Herzegovina Command Main was burdened with a disproportionately high number of high-ranking officers. This was of course a direct ¹³ CRST. UNPROFOR aide memoire to Troop Contributing Nations. Chapter 5, Command and Control, p. 5-3. Sie LL. Fax NLO 93/075/360 contribution by Brigadier Cordy-Simpson, 24/11/93, (quote on p.113).

¹⁴ Morillon, Croire et oser, pp. 105-106.

¹⁵ Morillon, Croire et oser, pp. 107-110.

¹⁶ Briquemont, Do something, pp. 30-31. Rose, Fighting for Peace, p. 23. Interview V. Andreev, 07/07/00.

result of the UN practice of 'rewarding' troop-contributing nations with the offer of HQ staff positions, an offer which these countries were not inclined to pass up. This practice, Rose noted, did not result in the required expertise and lacked efficiency. He felt that efficient management was impeded by the influence of the various national contingents within the headquarters. Officers from the various countries would relay the decisions of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Commander to their own national military authorities, which not uncommonly resulted in a counter-imperative. Rose wanted to put an end to this.¹⁷ Ignoring the scepticism of the residing Chief of Staff, the British Brigadier General A. Ramsay, Rose launched a thorough rationalization in which nationality became an irrelevant factor at the level of the individual officer.

Sector North East in Tuzla

The order to rationalize the organization had in fact been given much earlier by Force Commander Cot to Rose's predecessor Briquemont. For Rose, this brief formed the basis of his own campaign plan. He introduced a new commanding rank between Bosnia-Herzegovina Command and the various battalions in the field, which was a highly significant move from an operational perspective. Rose's decision was motivated to an important extent by the fact that, between October 1992 and February 1994, the number of mechanised infantry battalions had grown from four to eleven.

Rose decided to divide his operation area into three sectors. Sector Sarajevo remained as it was, encompassing the entire land area of Sarajevo, Gorazde and Zepa. The two new sectors were Sector North East with its headquarters in Tuzla and Sector South West with its headquarters in Gornji Vakuf (see map on page #). Each sector headquarters was run by a proportionally formed multinational staff. Rose believed that having a competent staff team in place in the shortest possible time prevailed over having an optimal balance between the contributing nations of the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command.

The goal of the rationalization was to delegate as many tasks as possible to the sectors, so that Bosnia-Herzegovina Command could focus on a limited number of core tasks. In particular, the three new sector headquarters were to focus on integrating and coordinating political, humanitarian and military activities within and between the different sections for intelligence (G2), operations (G3) and contacts with civilian authorities (G5). They were to keep track of developments in their sector, gather intelligence and facilitate humanitarian relief, for example by organizing convoys and planning special activities such as humanitarian evacuations, ceasefires, the disengagement of conflicting parties and demilitarization. The sector headquarters were also responsible for planning evacuations, security, and resolving misunderstandings and conflicts with respect to the Freedom of Movement which UNPROFOR troops had been guaranteed.

In order to realize these objectives, the sector headquarters had to have a wide array of communications instruments (telephone, satellite and HF radio), easy and permanent access by road and helicopter, and direct contact with authorities in the operation area. In practice, this meant that sector commanders had to see to roads maintenance and monitor the supply of gas, water and electricity. Rose had ordered each sector commander to make a special effort to achieve a close collaboration with UNHCR, the International Red Cross, UNMO and ECMM, either by maintaining close contacts or sharing the same housing. In the sector command post, therefore, places were reserved for a UNHCR representative as well as representatives of non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Bosnia-Herzegovina Command continued to bear primary responsibility for the administrative and logistic facilities for UNPROFOR units; the sector headquarters were to concern themselves as little as possible with these tasks.¹⁸

¹⁷ Rose, Fighting for Peace, pp. 14 and 23.

¹⁸ Rose, Fighting for Peace, p. 35. UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 200, file Bosnia-Herzegovina Command 12 Feb – 17 Feb 94: fax 320/94, BH Comd G3 OPS to Britfor et al., 16/02/94. Order for the establishment of Sector Command Structure; Ibidem: Appendix A: Role of Sector HQ. UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 59 file. Civil Affairs 2.5 Bosnia-Herzegovina Command: 01/03/94: A Campaign Plan for Bosnia Herzegovina, appendix 1 to Appendix E.

Since its establishment in March 1994, Sector North East in Tuzla had fallen under the command of reserve Brigadier General Ridderstad of Sweden. Two infantry battalions were located in his operation area, the Scandinavian Nordibat 2 and Dutchbat. A medical company and a Norwegian helicopter detachment were also stationed in this area. In addition to Ridderstad, the sector staff comprised Ken Biser, the Civil Affairs Coordinator, and representatives of the UNHCR and NGOs, as stated above. Five sections fell under the responsibility of the military Chief of Staff, which was always a Dutch officer. The four sections which usually made up a military staff had been merged into two: a small section for personnel, administration and logistics (G1/G4), and a larger section for intelligence and operations (G2/G3). There were separate sections for the engineering corps and civil-military matters (G5), respectively. Finally, a modest Headquarters Command section bore responsibility for a variety of matters, including communication connections.¹⁹

This completes our general overview of the chain of command in which Dutchbat operated. Within the Safe Area of Srebrenica, Dutchbat also worked with two other United Nations organizations which operated under UNPROFOR: the UNMOs and the UN police officers (UnCivPol), which we discuss below.

The United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) organization

The United Nations Military Observers (UNMOs) are part of the military branch of UN peacekeeping operations. UNMOs are well-educated professional soldiers assigned to the UN by their countries in order to carry out liaison duties and monitor the conflicting parties in the peacekeeping operation area. UNMOs report on military developments by the conflicting parties. In the former Yugoslavia, an important part of their work consisted of establishing the facts about attacks on military or civilian targets and the scale of hostilities, which they did often at great personal risk. Five aspects distinguish UNMOs from the military peacekeeping corps: they are impartial as UNMOs are recruited from many different countries, they are unarmed, they operate independently in the area concerned, they are highly flexible and mobile, and finally they operate and live among the local population.

As 'the only real sensor (eyes and ears)' of the Security Council and the UN Secretary-General in the field, the UNMOs made professional military observations. Their weak point was their vulnerability to hostile acts by the conflicting parties. Nevertheless, their presence was vital; they were usually the first to arrive in an operation area and the last to leave hotbeds of conflict. After the expansion of the UNPROFOR operation area, the Security Council's first move was to deploy UNMOs in the new areas in order to establish the UN's presence. The first fifty UNMOs were loaned to the Secretary-General on 8 January 1992 (UN resolution 727). It was their task to improve the enforcement of the ceasefire between Croatia and the Yugoslav army.²⁰ Because of their particular interest in the activities of the conflicting parties, they were all but welcome and often carried out their duties at considerable risk to their lives. During the operation in the former Yugoslavia, one UNMO died in the course of his duties; seven other fatalities were due to road accidents.²¹

As the war spread over the former Yugoslavia, the number of UNMOs and their brief grew likewise. From the first deployment of UNMOs until April 1994, the Security Council deployed a total of 748 UNMOs. Because they had their own brief, the UNMOs were considered to be a distinct organization in UNPROFOR. They were headed by a Chief Military Observer, whose headquarters was located in Zagreb, and fanned out over the different regions of the operation area where they operated under their own distinct structure. Bosnia-Herzegovina was divided into five UNMO sectors: Bihac, North East, South West, Gorazde and Sarajevo. Sarajevo was the headquarters. The basic structure of the UNMO in each of the sectors comprised a multinational team of eight, including the commanding officer. Although formally the organization operated independently, the Chief Military Observer regularly consulted the UNPROFOR Force Commander in Zagreb about the deployment of the teams. Likewise, the commander of the UNMOs acted as advisor to the Force Commander and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General (SRSG), Yashusi Akashi. The UNMO organization independently collected and analysed information and reported directly to New York.²² Formally, UNMO was part of UNPROFOR and an important source of information for the analyses of the Military Information Officer at UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb (see also Chapter 1 of the Appendix to this report regarding intelligence, C. Wiebes, Intelligence and the war in Bosnia). In practice, however, UNMO had sufficient freedom to operate independently from the Force Commander and Akashi.

¹⁹ UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 200, file Bosnia-Herzegovina Command 12 Feb – 17 Feb 94. Fax 320/94, BH Comd G3 OPS to Britfor et al., 16/02/94: order for the establishment of Sector Command Structure; Ibidem: Appendix B: Task specification. UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 59 file: Civil Affairs 2.5 Bosnia-Herzegovina Command: 01/03/94: A Campaign Plan for Bosnia Herzegovina, appendix 1 to Appendix E.

²⁰ UN doc S/23592. United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), p. 4.

²¹ UNPROFOR, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, p. 20. United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), Appendix 2.

The UNMO mandate was as complicated as UNPROFOR's mandate. The UNMOs had been given additional tasks that on the surface bore little relation to military observation and liaison. As a result, the conflicting parties mistrusted UNMOs' claim to impartiality. Accusations of espionage were made and UNMOs freedom to operate curtailed.²³ The UNMOs had to operate in the UNPROFOR area of operation and in Lesser Yugoslavia, controlling the airports to ensure the enforcement of the no-fly zone laid down in resolution 786.

There were several advantages to the deployment of UNMOs next to the regular peacekeeping forces. UNMOs were unarmed, impartial, independently operating teams of highly mobile experts. They made observations, helped bring about agreements, monitored violations of these, investigated the background to and facts of incidents and thus had frequent contacts with the conflicting parties. Carried out by experienced observers, usually officers, this work had a two-way effect. The first effect, and also the primary objective of deploying UNMOs, was that they provided reliable information to UN New York and to the peacekeeping force. A side effect of their functioning, however, was that they succeeded in reducing the mutual feelings of mistrust among the conflicting parties and assuaging the anxiety of the civilian population by countering the relentless flow of rumours with reliable information. As the UN's alert eyes and ears, they operated on the front lines and in inaccessible regions. One of their regular tasks was to verify all claims made by the conflicting parties and to establish what actually took place in confrontations. They were also regularly called on by UNPROFOR to analyse damage caused by mortar and artillery attacks. For example, in March 1993, when a few UNMOs from the Banja Koviljaca team (near Zvornik) accompanied General Morillon at his request to Srebrenica. In Srebrenica, UNMO observers were a constant, active presence from the arrival of the Canadian battalion in April 1993 until after the fall of Srebrenica in July 1995. Srebrenica was assigned its own independent UNMO team in November 1993. This team operated in the enclave as well as in the surrounding area controlled by Bosnian Serbs. The team was made up of six UNMOs and three interpreters, two Muslim interpreters for activities in the Safe Area and one Bosnian-Serb interpreter to facilitate contacts with parties outside the Safe Area, primarily the military forces of the Bosnian Serbs. The UNMOs, in conjunction with the liaison staff officers of the Canadian battalion (S5) and, later, Dutchbat, maintained contacts with the conflicting parties.²⁴

²² United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), pp. 25-29.

²³ United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), pp. 4-5.

²⁴ UNPROFOR, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, 20-21. United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), pp.4-6 en pp. 14-15. Interview J. Zoutendijk, 06/04/01. UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 434, file: UNMO Srebrenica. TA to TX6A, 03/05/95, no. IN.365.

In Srebrenica and in other Safe Areas, UNMO was instructed to carry out the following five primary tasks:

- To provide military support to UNHCR and other recognized humanitarian aid organizations;
- Permanent presence in the area of operation;
- To observe the activities of all parties to the conflict;
- To monitor compliance with the ceasefire by investigating real and supposed violations thereof, inspecting weapon sites, controlling the withdrawal of heavy weapons and registering weapons at so-called Weapon Collections Points.
- To carry out special assignments given by own headquarters.²⁵

The United Nations Civilian Police (UnCivPol) and aid organizations

The United Nations Civilian Police, or UnCivPol, was the second organization under UNPROFOR with its own brief. UnCivPol was established simultaneously with UNPROFOR in February 1992. Its purpose was to ensure that local police forces in UNPROFOR protected areas treated all inhabitants equally and respected their human rights. Like UNPROFOR, UnCivPol's mandate would be extended in the course of time as a result of new resolutions by the Security Council. This is discussed in more depth further on in this report.

In Bosnia-Herzegovina, UnCivPol operated only at Sarajevo airport, in Mostar and in Srebrenica. In accordance with resolution 819 of the Security Council and a subsequent agreement with the conflicting parties, UnCivPol monitored law enforcement and the humanitarian situation in the Safe Area. The organization maintained contacts with the local police, ensured that individual citizens' rights were respected and investigated reports of violations of human rights.

UnCivPol also provided support to authorized aid organizations such as UNHCR, Médecins sans Frontières (MSF) and the Swedish Shelter Project (which are all described in Part II of Chapter 4). In order to establish friendly relations with all the parties in the Safe Area, UnCivPol carried out regular patrols. UnCivPol ended its activities in Srebrenica in the Spring of 1995.²⁶

To summarize, the most important institutions in the UN structure in which Dutchbat would operate were: UNPROFOR in Zagreb, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo, Sector North East in Tuzla, UNMO and UnCivPol. In carrying out their work, Dutchbat troops also had contact with the UNHCR and the non-governmental organizations in Srebrenica, mentioned above. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, the UNHCR was the main organization for humanitarian relief. UNPROFOR's task was to create optimum conditions for UNHCR to carry out its tasks as best as possible.

As mentioned above, several non-governmental organizations were stationed in the Srebrenica Safe Area, the main ones being MSF and the Swedish Shelter Project. MSF, in cooperation with UNHCR, provided medical care to the population in the Safe Area. The Swedish Shelter Project ran in 1993-1994 and involved building homes for refugees on the southern border of the Safe Area. After completion of the houses, the name Swedish Shelter Project stuck.

4. Standing Operating Procedures and Rules of Engagement

At the beginning of this chapter, we noted that the chain of command within the military component of a peacekeeping operation cannot be compared with the situation in a regular army. In part, this is due to the enormous diversity of the participating military units in technical military, national and cultural terms. Such differences are not usually removed by laying down a system of formal instructions and rules. To some extent, however, the different chain of command is also due to the restrictions or ²⁵ United Nations, United Nations Peace Force UNMO HQ Zagreb, UNMO in UNPROFOR/UNPF Post Mission Report (1992-1996) (Zagreb 1996), 11.

²⁶ UNPROFOR, Force Commander's End of Mission Report, E-2 and E-7. UNHCR: fax, UNCIVPOL Commissioner Zagreb to UNCIVPOL commander Bosnia-Herzegovina Command etc, 19/01/94: Mandate of UNCIVPOL.

conditions which national governments attach to its contribution of troops for the peacekeeping operation. Common practice within NATO is that all national units fall under the operational command of the NATO commander. This large-scale transfer of command gives the NATO commander a large degree of freedom in the deployment of participating units.

In UN peacekeeping operations, however, only the more restricted operational control tends to be transferred to the UN commander, who can thus only deploy units within the restrictions of the mandate, in a certain area and for a certain period of time. For example, Nordibat could only be deployed in the Tuzla area, and an additional condition of the Danish government concerned the inclusion of a tank squadron.

According to the interpretation of the Netherlands' Ministry of Defence, the transfer of operational control meant that troop-contributing nations would be closely involved 'in the peacekeeping operation's progress, especially at times when the implementation of the mandate is under threat'. There could be no question of direct national intervention, but a constant dialogue 'would have to be maintained with all parties involved in order to secure the effectiveness of the operation'.²⁷

The transfer of operational control to the United Nations is usually laid down in a Transfer of Authority agreement. The assent of troop-contributing nations is required for any change in operational control. In principle, a government can decide independently to pull back a unit, even without consulting the UN. As described in Part I, Chapter 13, however, the Dutchbat battalion had been provided unconditionally to the UN to function as part of UNPROFOR.

Immediately on its arrival in the former Yugoslavia, Dutchbat came under the operational control of UNPROFOR. No conditions had been attached to the battalion's deployment. The Netherlands had agreed to its deployment in Srebrenica and Zepa, but did not object at a later stage to giving one Dutchbat company a different area of operation. This was a clear message that there were no national conditions regarding the location of the deployment of the Dutch battalion. Interestingly, we have been unable to trace any document containing a Transfer of Authority for Dutchbat. The Dutch government did not lay down conditions (of a different sort) until a later stage, when it stated that the deployment should not exceed 18 months and that Dutchbat was to be relieved in July 1995.²⁸

It is also important to note that Dutchbat received no operational instructions from the Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army. General Couzy's operational order to Dutchbat I and successive Dutch battalions merely involved an order to relocate and to commence its duties under the UNPROFOR Force Commander as soon as possible after its arrival in the former Yugoslavia. The Netherlands thus complied in full with the UNPROFOR Rules of Engagement without assessing them in the light of existing Dutch rules. This contrasts with the procedures followed in other NATO countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States. These countries laid down their own rules with respect to the use of force on the basis of the peacekeeping operation's Rules of Engagement. The purpose of this was to prevent misunderstandings and soldiers taking action that conflicted with national legislation.²⁹

The fact that Dutchbat did not have a national operational order did not give UNPROFOR more influence over the battalion with respect to its operational command. But the absence of a clear protocol on which rules and laws applied, at which times and in which situations did result in ²⁷ DCBC. No. C95/277 95016171, Director of Dept. of Legal Affairs, Ybema, to Director of General Policy Affairs and Chief of Defence Staff, 23/08/95; appendix: Command and Control in UN operations.

²⁸ DCBC. No. 95000785, DJZ/IJB Van Lent to CDS/Chief of Operations Van Dam, 09/08/1995. ADEF Defensiestaf: no. C95/277 95016171, DJZ Ybema to DAB, 23/08/95. Klep en Van Gils, Van Korea tot Kosovo, p. 278. Vertretpunt Den Haag, I, pp. 131-134. For UNPROFOR Under-chain of command see: ADEF DOKL/OZ: no. OZ/7767 Scheffer to mailing list, 07/02/94 appendix: Operations order No.24 (DUTCHBAT UNPROFOR) BLS sub 5a2.

²⁹ DOKL/OZ. No. OZ/7767 Scheffer to mailing list, 07/02/94 appendix: Operations order No.24 (DUTCHBAT UNPROFOR) BLS sub 2. The orders to Dutchbat II (24A) and III (24B) are identical in this respect. Confidential Information (117). Parks, 'Deadly Force Is Authorized' in Proceedings (2001)(January), pp. 33-37. Kroon & Jacobs, 'Rules of Engagement' in: Military Spectator 166 (1997)3, pp. 129-130.

uncertainty with respect to the chain of command. This ambiguity existed, for example, in the application of the Rules of Engagement, in establishing sanctions on violations of this rule, and in the prosecution of violations considered punishable according to the Standing Operating Procedures of UNPROFOR but not according to Dutch military criminal law.

Since the early 1990s, the United Nations has had a code of conduct and set of orders for peacekeeping operations. These rules and orders cover both administrative and operational aspects. Within UNPROFOR, they were operationalized at every level of command into the organization's 'own' legislation. This usually involved a repetition of the rules applicable to the next higher level, and if necessary the rules were operationalized specifically for the level itself. The basis of all instructions laid down in UNPROFOR was formed by the Force Commander's Policy Directives, a general brief for the operational and administrative sub-units which arranged in detail all aspects of the operation in a given area. In addition to these were the Standing Operating Procedures, the UN's guidelines for the peacekeeping operation. Next to UNPROFOR's Standing Operating Procedures, the Bosnia-Herzegovina Command in Sarajevo and Sector North East in Tuzla each had their own Operational Orders and Standing Operating Procedures. At the battalion command level, these instructions and orders were laid down in a so-called standing brief.

The administrative brief in particular was more or less fixed, while the operational brief was revised from time to time. This could be done for a variety of reasons: ambiguity in existing instructions, a change in the structure of the peacekeeping force, or the need for supplementary rules due to changes in the actual situation. Dutchbat had to comply with all the Force Commander's Policy Directives laid down by headquarters in Zagreb, and with the Standing Operating Procedures of Sarajevo and Tuzla. In this sense, UNPROFOR was like any other military organization. All these instructions ultimately served a single purpose: to ensure uniform conduct, action and dispatch by units in the areas of operation.

In an ad hoc multinational peacekeeping force, standardized rules and instructions were especially important to soften the effect of inherent differences in language, military doctrine, training and equipment, which complicated command and coordination.³⁰

A detailed description of the numerous briefs for the different levels of command would serve no purpose here. Some, concerning close air support, given by Akashi as part of the Standing Operating Procedures, are discussed in Part III of this report. In the Appendix 'Medical concerns: Dutchbat and the population', we discuss the brief on providing medical assistance. In Part IV we discuss the briefs concerning the protection of refugees and the violations of human rights and war crimes, respectively.³¹ The implementation of the operational brief in Dutchbat's 'standing brief' is discussed later on in Part II, Chapter 6 on the operational deployment of the Dutch battalion.

Here, we restrict ourselves to a discussion of the Force Commander's Policy Directive number 13 concerning the Rules of Engagement, and Sector North East's Security Directive of April 1994. These played a role in the peacekeeping operation as a whole, and were particularly important with respect to Dutchbat's line of action.

According to the Netherlands' definition of 1992, Rules of Engagement are 'a means for the competent authority to restrict the use of force by the units under that authority's command.'³² There are various reasons why rules might be laid down concerning the use of force. First, such rules aim to optimize the safety of the peacekeeping units by preventing incidents and containing conflicts. Another objective of the Rules of Engagement was to prevent civilian casualties, as this would undermine social and political support for the peacekeeping operation. Finally, for the sake of the peace negotiation process it was important that the negative backlash of using force was restricted as much as possible.³³ For the peacekeeping operation in the former Yugoslavia, the UN Secretary-General ruled that the use of force was to be kept 'to the minimum extent necessary', in other words only 'in self-defence'.³⁴

³⁰ Cumner, 'Challenges Faced by the Military in Adapting to Peacekeeping Missions', Peacekeeping & International Relations (1998) (January/February), pp. 13-14.

³¹ On medical relief: FCPD 22 / SOP 506. On refugees: BHC SOP 206 'on protecting persons seeking urgent assistance'. On violations of human rights and war crimes: BHC SOP 208 'on human rights and war crimes'. Not discussed: BHC SOP 504 on logistic affairs, SOP 202 on convoys, BHC SOP 105 'on Security of Documents' and BHC SOP 108 'on Communications and Infosystems'.

³² DJZ. Rules of Engagement. (Den Haag 1992)

The Force Commander adopted this as the primary principle of his Rules of Engagement, laid down on 24 March 1992. The interpretation of the term self-defence played a crucial role in the implementation of the rule. The countries participating in the peacekeeping operation each tended to have their own interpretation and this hampered a clear understanding of the rule within UNPROFOR. This ambiguity ended when the rule was amended in June 1994, broadening the term self-defence to include direct attacks on persons falling under UNPROFOR's protection.³⁵ How this was put into practice during the fall of Srebrenica is discussed in Part III, Chapter 7.

Next to the substantive aspect of the Rules of Engagement, there is the legal status of such rules. Rules prescribing the conduct of soldiers may not conflict with the national laws of the participating countries, nor with international law. These effectively restrict the scope of such rules. The status of Rules of Engagement for a peacekeeping operation is not laid down in Dutch law, nor is there a procedure in case of violations thereof.³⁶ It is possible that the Dutch operational orders contained stipulations on this subject.

UNPROFOR's Rules of Engagement were laid down on 24 March 1992. It was first amended on 19 July 1993, followed by a second amendment on 24 June 1994. The actual rules of engagement were preceded by a general introduction. The Rules of Engagement were a brief as well as a guideline to be used by commanders at all levels of the peacekeeping force. In accordance with the brief given by the UN Secretary-General, the main principle of the Rules of Engagement was that the use of force should be kept to a minimum. The peacekeeping force was only equipped with light weapons for self-defence; retaliatory acts were strictly prohibited.

The use of weapons was allowed in exceptional circumstances. UNPROFOR soldiers were authorized to defend themselves, other UN personnel and persons or land under their protection in case of a direct attack, 'acting always under the order of the senior officer/soldier at the scene'. Weapons could also be drawn to resist violent attempts intended to stop UNPROFOR from carrying out its tasks. Finally, UN troops were authorized to use their weapons in the case of attempts by military or paramilitary troops to enter United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia or, after the amendments of July 1993 and June 1994, any of the other Safe Areas supervised exclusively by UNPROFOR. How these general principles were put into practice by Dutchbat during the fall of Srebrenica is described in detail in Part III, Chapter 7.

The 1992 Rules of Engagement comprised six rules, the amended versions seven. The main gist of these amended versions follows, below. Each rule provided at least two options, or standardized responses.

The first rule laid down the circumstances under which weapons could be or should be carried. The options were: may not be carried, and may be carried.

The second rule concerned the state in which the weapon could be carried. The two options were: semi-loaded, and loaded.

The third rule laid down how forces should respond to a hostile threat of force without using weapons. UNPROFOR gave three options for response: a) observe, report to superior officer and retreat in order to protect one's own unit; b) observe, report to superior officer, unit stays put and establishes contact with opponent and/or local authorities; c) observe, report to superior officer, unit ³³ Kroon and Jacobs, 'Rules of Engagement' in: Military Spectator 166 (1997)3, p. 125.

³⁴ United Nations, Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Resolution 721 (1991), (appendix III para.4), no. S/23280, 11/12/91.

³⁵ Kroon & Jacobs, 'Rules of Engagement' in: Military Spectator 166 (1997)3, pp. 125-126.

³⁶ Kroon & Jacobs, 'Rules of Engagement' in: Military Spectator 166 (1997)3, pp. 129-130.

stays put, warns aggressor that it will use force if necessary and demonstrates that intention by loading weapons or taking combat positions.

The fourth rule prescribed the response to hostile action in which UNPROFOR troops were taken under fire. In that case, there were two possible responses. The first option for a unit under fire was to immediately take protective measures, make observations and report to superiors. The commanding officer on location would then warn the aggressor that force would be used and make necessary preparations for doing so (as option c of the third rule). The firing of warning shots was authorized. If the hostile action did not cease and the UNPROFOR unit was in a life-threatening situation, the next higher commanding officer could give the order to open fire. This last action in effect comprised the second option for responding to hostile action. Next to these options, the fourth rule also explicitly stated that retreating, breaking out or escaping were also allowed, as were staying put and defending oneself.

The fifth rule concerned self-defence against hostile action. In these situations, protective measures had to be taken immediately and direct shots could be fired.

Under the sixth rule, which concerned the disarming of civilians, paramilitary troops and soldiers, the use of force as a first option was prohibited. In the 1993 Rules, the second option allowed disarmament 'if failure to do so prevents the UNPROFOR from carrying out its task'. In the amended version of 1994, this provision was scrapped, effectively authorizing the use of minimum but necessary force - including direct firing - during disarmament in order to ensure that this took place as quickly as possible. The Bosnia-Herzegovina Command, however, almost immediately ruled out the use of force during disarmament.

The seventh and last rule concerned the controlled use of own weapon systems, such as mortars and guns. The first option prohibited the manning, preparing, positioning and firing of such weapons in the presence of the conflicting parties. Under the second option, these actions were allowed in the presence of the conflicting parties. In November 1994 this rule was changed to also allow the use of anti-tank weapons and artillery (see also Part III, Chapter 7).³⁷

For each rule, the Force Commander would decide which option would normally be appropriate. Lower ranking commanders could however decide to deviate from the Force Commander's instruction. In UNPROFOR, the standard procedure was to carry semi-loaded weapons when leaving the compound (rules 1 and 2, option b). In case of a hostile threat without force, UNPROFOR would remain in place (rule 3, option b); the standard response to a hostile threat with force was to give out a warning that force would be used and if necessary to fire warning shots (rule 4). In response to enemy fire, UNPROFOR would shoot in self-defence (rule 5), but would not disarm civilians, paramilitary troops or soldiers (rule 6, option a) and would not get its weapons ready in the presence of the conflicting parties (rule 7, option a).

To ensure that the use of force was kept to a minimum, UNPROFOR added three supplementary provisions to the seven rules above. First, before UNPROFOR soldiers were authorized to open fire in self-defence they were to give the aggressor a verbal demand to cease their fire. If this did not help, UNPROFOR soldiers were to fire in the air, and only if that action failed to have the desired effect would the commander be authorized to give the order to fire back.

There were other restrictions, too, to the use of weapons by UNPROFOR in self-defence. Soldiers could not open fire if there was a possibility of causing collateral damage, and UNPROFOR had to stop firing as soon as the aggressor did so, too. Any form of retaliation was strictly forbidden. UNPROFOR soldiers were allowed to open fire immediately without first firing warning shots only if their lives were at risk or if UN personnel or individuals under UNPROFOR's protection were at risk of serious injury. In theory, changes to the Rules of Engagement (indicating that a different option could be used in a different prescribed situation) were made by the Force Commander. The Bosnia-

³⁷ UNGE, UNPROFOR, Box 116, file SNE Memo In Sep 94 – Dec 95. Commander SNE to Nordbat 2 and others, 04/06/95.

Hercegovina Commander was not authorized to change the rules for his area of operation until June 1994. Until that time, that authority was delegated to the sector commanders -- comparable with arrangements in Croatia - and Bosnia-Hercegovina Command's own operational responsibility was disregarded.³⁸

During UNPROFOR's mission in the former Yugoslavia, few changes were made to the Rules of Engagement. The wording of the seven rules and in particular the supplementary provisions governing the use of weapons clearly showed that force was intended to be used in exceptional circumstances only. In that sense, the Rules of Engagement were in harmony with the traditional peacekeeping spirit which coloured the whole UN approach to the former Yugoslavia. There was no question of stepping up the rules in view of the critical situation on the ground in Bosnia-Hercegovina. The amendments of 1993 and 1994 did not affect the core of the Rules of Engagement. In applying the Rules of Engagement, commanders had two choices when their unit was threatened: they could follow the principle of minimum use of force (in which case they would likely elect not to shoot) or take a strict interpretation of self-defence (in which case they would be more likely to decide to respond to the hostile act).

A commander's decision, in practice, was based on three elements: the unit's attitude and mentality with respect to the peacekeeping operation, its analysis of the conflicting parties and its estimation of what the consequences of its actions would be for the rest of the mission. Dutchbat's interpretation and application of the Rules of Engagement are described in Part II, Chapter 6.

Even before Dutchbat had been deployed in Bosnia-Hercegovina, clearly conflicting views had been exchanged on the substance of the Rules of Engagement between General Couzy, Commander in Chief of the Royal Netherlands Army, and General Brinkman, Commander of the Dutch Airmobile Brigade. The latter believed UNPROFOR's presence should be 'robust' and that soldiers should respond immediately if attacked. General Brinkman felt that the rules were adequate and that the crux lay in their application. It was important, he felt, 'to let the conflicting parties know, right from day one, who they're dealing with'. By contrast, General Couzy felt that the Bosnia-Hercegovina Command strove for 'the lowest possible scale of violence' and that UNPROFOR should and could only threaten to use force if UN troops actually intended to carry through their threat.³⁹

The second permanent brief, or Standing Operating Procedure, relevant to Dutchbat was the Security Directive of Sector North East, which came about with the establishment of the sector headquarters in March 1994. The Sector North East brief was based on various existing Standing Operating Procedures laid down by the Bosnia-Hercegovina Command with respect to security, the tasks of staff officers, document security, communications and information systems. The Security Directive basically only repeated and regrouped existing rules, adapted to the specific situation within the sector and at Tuzla headquarters. The Security Directive laid down the responsibilities of the Chief of Security (G2) and the Chief of Personnel and Communications (G1/6). The Directive also prescribed the procedure for security incidents and contained provisions on military security. This comprised a series of measures to protect information, equipment and personnel. Interestingly, the Directive was rather casual on this point: it contained no stringent instructions or rules, only generally formulated admonitions to protect information, equipment and lines of communication and about admitting various categories of individuals onto the premises of Sector North East. The Security Directive did not synthesize and classify the provisions of the pre-existing Standing Operating Procedures of the Bosnia-Hercegovina Command in any logical order; it thus remained a fairly inefficient brief on internal security. The aims of the document could only be understood with a background analysis of the preceding Standing Operating Procedures laid down by Sarajevo.⁴⁰

³⁸ BDL. Force Commander's Directive No.1: Rules of Engagement, 24/03/92. SMG, 1004. FCPD No.13 Rules of Engagement Part I – Ground Forces, 19/07/93. Ibidem: FCPD No. 13 Rules of Engagement Part I – Ground Forces, 24/06/94.

³⁹ P.G.M. van Even, 'Vierkant en robuust' in: Armex, 77(1993)12, p.4.

⁴⁰ CRST. UNPF stukken: Security Directive HQ Sector North East, 04/94.

The internal UNPROFOR briefs described above all aimed to facilitate the operational command of UNPROFOR. As mentioned earlier, the Dutch government had only transferred the operational control of Dutchbat to the UN. Just as the other troop-contributing nations, the Netherlands retained responsibility for personnel and administration, even in cases requiring the application of specific UNPROFOR rules; for example, the rules concerning leave, establishing violations punishable according to UNPROFOR, repatriation for medical, social or disciplinary reasons, reporting casualties and so on. The commander of the Dutch contingent in the former Yugoslavia was responsible for the monitoring and enforcement of these rules. In September 1994, these rules were brought together in a publication titled Beleidsbundel Commandant Nederlandse Troepen in voormalig Joegoslavië.⁴¹

This concludes our general sketch of the backdrop against which Dutchbat operated. In the UNPROFOR chain of command, Dutchbat occupied the fourth tier, with the sector commanders occupying the third tier. The fourth tier primarily had an operational task. Within this structure, Dutchbat was expected to operate as an independent unit with its own logistic arrangements. Dutchbat was dependent on the UNPROFOR organization to some extent for crucial supplies such as fuel. For the rest, it was expected to obtain its supplies from the Netherlands. From an organizational point of view, the battalion had two lifelines: UNPROFOR and the Royal Netherlands Army.

Dutchbat had been assigned responsibility for the Srebrenica Safe Area. Neither UNPROFOR nor Bosnia-Herzegovina paid much attention to Srebrenica, however. Srebrenica was situated in eastern Bosnia, which was geographically and mentally far removed from Sarajevo and Zagreb. The rest of the world was focused on the fight for Sarajevo and the peace process. As a Safe Area, Srebrenica only occasionally managed to attract the attention of the world press or the UN Security Council. That is why the Dutch troops there remained of secondary importance, in operational and logistic terms, for so long; and why the importance of the enclave in the battle for domination between the Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims failed to be recognized for so long. In the next chapter, we describe the relations between Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims at the beginning of the war in Bosnia to enable a full comprehension of the relation between the two conflicting parties in Srebrenica.

⁴¹ CRST. Beleidsbundel Commandant Nederlandse troepen in voormalig Joegoslavië.

Chapter 2

The history preceding the conflict in Eastern Bosnia up until the establishment of the Safe Area

1. The economic and political crisis of the eighties

This chapter will describe the disintegration of Yugoslavia on the micro level of the local communities in Eastern Bosnia, among them Srebrenica.⁴² After the death of Josip Broz Tito (1980) Yugoslavia found itself in a downward spiral of economic decline and political and ethnic tensions which ultimately led to the dissolution of the multi-ethnic state. Tito had been able to keep the country together through his popularity and charisma, and he was one of the few Communist leaders who could really rely upon the mandate of the people. There was no one of his calibre to step into his footsteps and the unity of the multi-ethnic state quickly began to show cracks, which only became larger as the economic crisis in Europe increased in the eighties. Tito's death signalled the start of a moral and political crisis as well, one that toppled the Yugoslav socialist system he had built up. Not a year after his death, a revolt started in Kosovo among the Albanians who demanded their own republic, and there were nationalist tendencies in other places as well.

The economy of the country was affected by low productivity, lack of labour discipline, widespread corruption, and ever-increasing inflation. The Yugoslav system of labour self-management seemed incapable of solving the problems that had arisen. About the middle of the eighties various companies were on the brink of bankruptcy and were only able to survive through state subsidies. Financial scandals, such as the Agrokomerc affair in 1987, revealed the close and unhealthy ties between the regional and local party bosses and the local economy. The sorely needed political and economic reforms did not get off the ground because the Communist elite did not want to give up its control over the economy.

